State Trials.

151. Proceedings in Parliament against JOHN LORD FINCH,* Baron of FORDWICH, Lord Keeper, for High Treason: 16 CHARLES I. A. D. 1640. [4 Rushworth, 124. 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 685.]

THE House of Commons having secured that great statesman the earl of Strafford, and that zealous Churchman archbishop Laud; began to prepare an Impeachment against the great officer of the law, the Lord-Keeper Finch, of High-Treason.

December 14, 1640, a Committee was appointed to prepare a Charge against him; of which he having notice, sent to the House of Commons a Letter, desiring to be admitted to speak for himself, before any Vote passed against him. Upon this Letter there arose a great debate in the house, and after some time spent therein, it was granted him; and Monday Dec. 21, was appointed for the hearing of him.

On Monday he was admitted in this manner; there was a chair set for him to make use of if he pleased, and a stool to lay the purse upon, a table on the side of the bar on the left hand as you come in; he himself brought in the purse, and laid it in the chair, but would not sit down himself nor put on his hat, though he was moved to it by Mr. Speaker, but spake all the while bare-headed and standing; the Serjeant at Arms attending on the house, standing by him with the mace on his shoulder: And spake as follows:

"Mr. Speaker; I do first present my most humble thanks to this honourable assembly for this favour vouchsafed me, in granting me admittance to their presence, and do humbly beseech them to believe it is no desire to preserve myself or my fortune but to deserve the good opinion of those that have drawn me hither. I do profess in the presence of Him that knoweth all hearts, that I had rather go from door to door, and crave da obolum Belizario, &c. with the good opinion of this assembly, than live and enjoy all the honours and fortunes I am capable of. I do not come hither with an intention to justify my words, my actions, or my opinions; but to make a plain and clear narration for myself, and then humbly to submit to the wisdom and justice of this house myself, and all that concerns me.

"I do well understand, Mr. Speaker, with what disadvantage any man can speak in his own cause, and if I could have told how to have transmitted my thoughts and actions, by a clearer representation of another (I do so much defy my own judgment in working, and my ways in expressing), that I should have been a most humble suitor another might have done it. But this house will not take words, but with clear and ingenuous dealing; and therefore I shall beseech them to think, I come not hither with a set or studied speech, I come to speak my heart, and to speak it clearly and plainly, and then leave it to your clemency and justice: and I hope if any thing shall slip from me, to work contrary to my meaning, or intention, disorderly or ill-placed, you will be pleased to make a favourable construction, and leave me the liberty of explanation, if there shall be any; but I hope there shall be no cause for it.

"I hope, for my affection in Religion no man doubteth me; what my education, what, and under whom for many years, is well known; I lived near thirty years in the Society of Gray's-Inn: and if one that was a reverend preacher in my time (Dr. Sibbs) were now alive, he were able to give testimony to this house, that when a party ill-affected in Religion sought to weary

"I have now, Mr. Speaker, been fifteen years of the King's Council; from the first hour to this minute, no man is able to say that ever I was author, adviser, or consentor to any project. It pleased the king, my gracious master, after I had served him divers years, to prefer me to two places; to be Chief-Justice of the Common Pleas, and then Keeper of his Great-Seal: I say it in the presence of God, I was so far from the thought of the one, and from the ambition of the other, that if my master's grace and goodness had not been, I had never enjoyed those honours.

"I cannot tell, Mr. Speaker, nor I do not know what particulars there are, that may draw me into your disfavour or ill opinion, and therefore I shall come very weakly armed; yet to those that either in my own knowledge, or by such a knowledge as is given me, and not from any in this house, I shall speak somewhat, that I hope, being truth, and accompanied with clearness and ingenuity, will at last procure some allay of that ill opinion which may perhaps be conceived of me.

"Mr. Speaker, I had once the honour to sit in the place that you do: from the first time I came thither to this unfortunate time, I do appeal to all that were here then, if I served you not with candour. All office I never did to any of the house, good offices I have witnesses enough I did many; I was so happy, that upon an occasion which once happened, I received an expression and testimony of the good affection of this house towards me. For the last unhappy day, I had great share in the unhappiness and sorrow of it. I hope there are enough do remember, no man within the walls of this house did express more symptoms of sorrow, grief, and distraction, than I did.

"After an adjournment for two or three days, it pleased his majesty to send for me, to let me know that he could not so resolve of things as he desired, and therefore was desirous that there might be an adjournment for some few days more. I protest I did not then discern in his majesty, and I believe it was not in his thoughts, to think of the dissolving of this assembly; but was pleased, in the first place, to give me a command to deliver his pleasure to the house for an adjournment for some few days, till the Monday following, as I remember, and commanded me withal to deliver his pleasure, that there should be no further speeches, but forthwith upon the delivery of the message come and wait upon him: he likewise commanded me, if questions were offered to be put, upon my allegiance I should not dare to do it. How much I did then in all humbleness reason with his majesty, is not for me here to speak; only thus much let me say, I was no author of any counsel in it. I was only a person in receiving commission; I speak not this, as any thing I now produce or do invent, or take up for my own excuse, but that which is known to divers, and some honourable persons in this house, to be most true. All that I will say for that, is humbly to beseech you all to consider, that if it had been any man's case, as it was mine, between the displeasure of a gracious king, and the ill opinion of an honourable assembly; I beseech you lay all together, lay my first actions and behaviour with the last, I shall submit to your honourable and favourable constructions.

"For the Shipping business, my opinion of that cause hath lain heavy upon me; I shall clearly and truly present unto you what every thing is, with this protestation, that if in reckoning up my own opinion what I was of, or what I delivered, any thing of it be displeasing, or contrary to the opinion of this house, that I am far from justifying of it, but submit that and all other my actions, to your wisdom and goodness.—Mr. Speaker, the first writs that were sent out about the Shipping-business, I had no more knowledge of, and was as ignorant as any one member of this house, or any man in the kingdom. I was never the author nor adviser of it, and will boldly say, from the first to this hour, I did never advise nor counsel the setting forth of any Ship-Writs in my life.

"Mr. Speaker, it is true that I was made Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas some four days before the Ship-Writs went out to the ports and maritime places; as I do remember, the 20th of Oct. 1634, they do bear teste, and I was sworn justice the 16th of October: so as they went out in that time, but without my knowledge or privy, the God of Heaven knows this to be true.

"Mr. Speaker, afterwards his majesty was pleased to command my Lord Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench, that then was, sir Thomas Richardson, and Chief Baron of the Exchequer that now is, and myself, then Chief Justice of the Common-pleas, to take into consideration the Precedents then brought unto us; which we did, and after returned to his majesty, what we had found out of those precedents. It is true, that afterwards his majesty did take into consideration, that if the whole kingdom were concerned, that it was not reason to lay the whole burthen upon the Cinque-Ports and Maritime towns. Thereupon, upon what ground his majesty took that into his consideration, I do confess I do know nothing of it. His majesty did command my Lord Chief-Justice that now is, my Lord Chief-Baron, and myself, to return our Opinions; Whether, when the whole kingdom is in danger, and the kingdom in general is concerned, it be not according to law and reason, that the whole kingdom, and his majesty, and all interested therein, should join in defending and preserving thereof? This was, in time, about 1634. In Michaelmas-term following, his majesty commanded me to go to all the Judges, and require their Opinions in particular. He commanded me to do it to every one, and to charge them upon their duty and allegiance to keep it secret*.

* See Peacham's Case, vol. 2, p. 88: and "Luders' Observations," there referred to.

“ Mr. Speaker, it was never intended by his majesty (so professed by him) at that time, and so declared to all the Judges, that it was not required by him, to be such a binding Opinion to the Subject, as to hinder him from calling it in question, nor be binding to themselves, but that upon better reason and advice they may alter it; but desire their Opinions, for his own private reason. I know very well, that extrajudicial Opinions of Judges ought not to be binding. But I did think, and speak my heart and conscience freely; myself, and the rest of the Judges being sworn, and by our oaths tied to counsel the king, when he should require advice of us, that we were bound by our oaths and duties to return our Opinions. I did obey his majesty's command, and do here before the God of Heaven avow it. I did never use the least promise of preferment, or reward to any, nor did use the least menace; I did leave it freely to their own consciences and liberty; for I was left the liberty of my own by his majesty, and had reason to leave them the liberty of their own consciences. And I beseech you be pleased to have some belief, that I would not say this, but that I know the God of Heaven will make it appear; and I beseech you that extravagant speeches may not move against that which is a positive and clear truth.

“ Mr. Speaker, in the discourse of this (as is between Judges) some small discourses sometimes arose, yet never was any cause wherein any Judges conferred, that were so little conferences as between me and them. Mr. Speaker, against a negative, I can say nothing; but I shall affirm nothing unto you, but by the grace of God, as I affirm it to be true, so I make no doubt of making it appear to be so. This Opinion was subscribed without solicitation; there was not any man of us, did make any doubt of subscribing our Opinion, but two, Mr. Justice Hutton, and Mr. Justice Croke. Mr. Justice Croke made not a scruple of the thing, but of the introduction; for it was thus: ‘ That whereas the Ports and the Maritime towns were concerned, there according to the precedents in former times, the charge lay on them. So when the kingdom was in danger, of which his majesty was the sole judge; whether it was not agreeable to law and reason, the whole kingdom to bear the charge?’ I left this case with judge Croke.

“ The next Term I spake with him, he could give me no resolution, because he had not seen the writs in former times: but did give his opinion, That when the whole kingdom was in danger, the charge of the defence ought to be borne by all. So of that Opinion of his, there was no need of a solicitation.

“ I speak no more here, than I did openly in my argument in the Exchequer Chamber. This is the naked truth: for Mr. Justice Hutton, he did never subscribe at all. I will only say this, that I was so far from pressing him to give his Opinion, because he did ask time to consider of it, that I will boldly say, and make it good, that when his majesty would have had him sometimes sent for, to give his Opinion, I beseeched his majesty to leave him to himself and his conscience: and that was the ill office I did.

“ The Judges did subscribe in November or December 1635. I had no conference, nor, truly I think, by accident any discourse with any of the Judges touching their Opinions: for till February, 1636, there was no speech of it, for when they had delivered their Opinions, I did return according to my duty to my master the king, and delivered them to him; in whose custody they be.

“ In February, 1636, upon a command that came from his majesty, by one of the then Secretaries of State, the Judges all assembled in Gray's-inn; we did then fall into a debate of the case then sent unto us, and we did then return our Opinion unto his majesty; there was then much discourse and great debate about it. Mine opinion and conscience at that time was agreeable to that opinion I then delivered. I did use the best arguments I could, for the maintenance of my opinion; and that was all I did.

“ It is true, that then at that time, Mr. Justice Hutton, and Mr. Justice Croke, did not differ in the main point, which was this: ‘ When the kingdom was in danger, the charge ought to be borne by the whole kingdom.’ But in this point, ‘ Whether the king was the sole judge of the danger,’ they differed. So as there was between the first subscription, and this debate and consultation, some fifteen months difference.

“ It is true, that all of them did then subscribe, both justice Hutton, and justice Croke, which was returned to his majesty, and after published by my Lord Keeper, my predecessor, in the Star-Chamber. For the manner of publishing it I will say nothing, but leave it to those, whose memories will call to mind what was then done. The reason of the subscription of justice Hutton and justice Croke, though they differed in opinion, grew from this, that was told them, from the rest of the Judges: ‘ That where the greater number did agree in their vote, the rest were involved and included.’

“ And now I have faithfully delivered what I did in that business, till I came, which was afterwards, to my Argument in the Exchequer-Chamber: for the question was, a Scire Facias issued out of the Exchequer in that Case of Mr. Hampden's; of which I can say nothing, for it was there begun, and afterwards journeyed, to have advice of all the Judges.

“ Mr. Speaker, amongst the rest, according to my duty, I argued the case. I shall not trouble you, to tell you what my Argument was, I presume there are copies enough of it; only I will tell you there are four things, very briefly, that I then declared. First, concerning the matter of danger, and necessity of the whole kingdom. I profess that there was never a judge in the kingdom did deliver an opinion, but that it must be in a case of apparent danger. When we came to an argument of the case, it was not upon a matter of issue, but it was upon a demurrer; Whether the danger was sufficiently admitted in pleading, and therefore was not the thing that was in dispute, that was the first degree and step that led unto it. I did deliver myself as free and as clear as any man did, that the king ought to govern by the positive laws of the kingdom; that he could not alter nor change, nor innovate in matters of law, but by common consent in parliament. I did further deliver, that if this were used to make a further revenue or benefit to the king, or in any other way but in case of necessity, and for the preservation of the kingdom, the judgment did warrant no such thing: My Opinion in this business, I did in my conclusion of my Argument submit to the judgment of this house. I never delivered my Opinion, that money ought to be raised, but ships provided for the defence of this kingdom, and in that the writ was performed. And that the charge ought not to be in any case, but where the whole kingdom was in danger. And Mr. Justice Holt, and Mr. Justice Croke, were of the same opinion with me.

“ I do humbly submit, having related unto you my whole carriage in this business; humbly submitting myself to your grave and favourable censures, beseeching you not to think that I delivered these things, with the least intention to subvert or subject the Common Law of the kingdom, or to bring in, or to introduce any new way of Government; it hath been far from my thoughts, as any thing under the heavens.

“ Mr. Speaker, I have heard too that there hath been some ill opinion conceived of me about Forest business, which was a thing far out of the way of my study, as any thing I know toward the law. But it pleased his majesty, in the sickness of Mr. Noy, to give some short warning to prepare myself for that employment. When I came there, I did both the king and commonwealth acceptable service; for I did and dare be bold to say, with extreme danger to myself and fortune, (some do understand my meaning herein) run through that business, and left the Forest as much as was there. A thing in my judgment, considerable for the advantage of the commonwealth, as could be undertaken.

“ When I went down about that employment, I satisfied myself about the matter of Perambulation. There were great difficulties of opinions, what Perambulation was. I did arm myself as well as I could, before I did any thing in it. I did acquaint those that were then Judges, in the presence of the noble lords, with such objections. I thought it my duty to offer out them. If they thought they were not objections of such weight as were fit to stir them, I would not do the king that disservice. They thought the Objections had such answers as might well induce the like upon a conference with the whole country: admitting me to come and confer with them, the country did unanimously subscribe.

“ It fell out afterwards, that the king commanded me, and all this before I was Chief-Justice, to go into Essex, and did then tell me he had been informed, that the bounds of the Forest were narrower than in truth they ought to be; and I did according to his command. I will here profess that which is known to many, I had no thought or intencion of enlarging the bounds of the Forest, further than II. and that part about it, for which there was a Perambulation about 26 Edw. 4. I desired the country to confer with me about it, if they were pleased to do it; and then according to my duty, I did produce those Records which I thought fit for his majesty's service, leaving them to discharge themselves as by law and justice they might do. I did never, in the least kind, go about to overthrow the Charter of the Forest. And did publish and maintain Charta de Foresta, as a sacred thing, and no man to violate it, and ought to be preserved for the king and commonwealth. I do in this humbly submit, and what I have done, to the goodness and justice of this house.*”

After his Lordship was retired, it was moved, That this admission of the Lord-Keeper might not be drawn into precedent; and in answer to what his lordship said,

Mr. Rigby made this following Speech:

“ Mr. Speaker; Though my judgment prompts me to sit still and be silent, yet the duty I owe to my king, my country and my conscience, move me to stand up and speak. Mr. Speaker, had not this Syren so sweet a tongue, surely he could never have effected so much mischief to this kingdom: you know, sir, ‘optimorum putrefactio pessima,’ the best things putrefied become the worst; and as it is in the natural, so in the body politic; and what is to be done then, Mr. Speaker? We all know ‘ense recidendum est,’ the sword, justice must strike, ‘ne pars sincera trahatur.’

“ Mr. Speaker, it is not the voice, ‘non vox sed votum,’ not the tongue, but the heart and actions, that are to be suspected: for doth not our Saviour say it, ‘Shew me thy faith by thy works, O man?’ (St. James, not our Saviour saith it.) Now, Mr. Speaker, hath not this kingdom seen, (seen, say I?) nay felt and smarted under the cruelty of this man's justice? so malicious as to record it in every court of Westminster; as if he had not been contented with enslaving of us all, unless he entailed it to all posterity. Why had I believe words now, ‘cum factum videam?’ Shall we be so weak men, as when we have been injured and abused, will be gained again with fair words and compliments? Or, like little children, when we have been whipt and beaten, be pleased again with sweetmeats? Oh no, there be some birds is the summer of parliament will sing sweetly, who in the winter of persecution, will for their prey ravenously fly at all, upon our goods, nay seize upon our persons; and bath it not been with this man so, with some in this assembly?

“Mr. Speaker, it hath been objected unto us, that in judgment you should think of mercy, and, ‘be ye merciful as your heavenly Father ‘is merciful;’ now God Almighty grant that we may be so, and that our hearts and judgments may be truly rectified to know truly what is mercy: I say to know what is mercy: for there is the point, Mr. Speaker: I have heard of foolish pity, foolish pity; do we not all know the effects of it? And I have met with this epithet to mercy, ‘crudelis misericordia;’ and in some kind I think there may be a cruel mercy: I am sure that the Spirit of God said, Be not pitiful in judgment; nay it saith, be not pitiful of the poor in judgment: if not of the poor, then, à latiori, not of the rich; there is the emphasis. We see by the set and solemn appointment of our courts of justice, what provision the wisdom of our ancestors hath made for the preservation, honour, and esteem of justice; witness our frequent terms, sessions, and assizes, and in what pomp and state the Judges, in their circuits, by the sheriffs, knights and justices, and all the country, are attended oft-times for the hanging of a poor thief for the stealing of a hog or a sheep, nay in some cases for the stealing of a penny, and justice too, in terrorem: and now shall not some of them be hanged that have robbed us of all our propriety, and sheered at once all our sheep and all we have away, and would have made us indeed poor Helizarios to have begged for half pennies, when they would not have left us one penny that we could have called our own?

“Let us therefore now, Mr. Speaker, not be so pitiful as that we become remiss; not so pitiful in judgment, as to have no judgment; but set the deplorable estate of Great Britain now before our eyes, and consider how our gracious sovereign hath been abused, and both his majesty and all his subjects injured by these wicked instruments; for which my humble motion is, that with these particulars we become not so merciful as to the generality, the whole kingdom, to grow merciless. Fiat Justitia.”

Whereupon, the Lord Keeper was the same day voted a Traitor, upon the following particulars; 1. For refusing to read the remonstrance against the Lord-Treasurer Weston, 4 Car. when the parliament desired it. 2. For soliciting, persuading, and threatening the Judges to deliver their Opinion for the levying of Ship-Money*. 3. For several illegal actions in Forest-matters. 4. For ill offices done, in making the king dissolve the last Parliament, and causing his Declaration thereupon to be put forth.

Whereupon, it was resolved upon the Question,

“That John lord Finch, baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, shall be accused in this house, in the name of all the Commons of England, of High-Treason, and other great Misdemeanors.”

Resolved, “That a Message be sent by the lord Falkland, to accuse John lord Finch, baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, in the name of this house, and all the commons of England, of High-Treason, and other great Crimes and Misdemeanors; and to desire that he may be forthwith sequestered from parliament, and be committed; and that in some convenient time this house will resort to their lordship, with particular Accusations and Articles against him.

The next morning, the 22d, the Lord-Keeper (considering with what impetuosity and violence every thing was managed) got up early, and escaped in disguise into Holland, from whence he wrote a Letter to the Lord Chamberlain, dated from the Hague, Jan. 3, 1640-1.

“My most well beloved lord; The interest your lordship hath ever had in the best of my fortunes and affections, gives me the privilege of troubling your lordship with these few lines, from one that hath nothing left to serve you withal but his prayers; these your lordship shall never fail of, with an heart as full of true affection to your lordship as ever any was. My lord, it was not the loss of my place, and with that of my fortunes, nor being exiled from my dear country and friends, though many of them were cause of sorrow, that afflicts me; but that which I most suffer under is, that displeasure of the house of commons conceived against me. I know a true heart I have ever born towards them, and your lordship can witness in part, what ways I have gone in: but silence and patience best becomes me, with which I must leave myself and my actions to the favourable constructions of my noble friends, in which number your lordship hath a prime place. I am now at the Hague, where I arrived on Thurs-

“He took up Ship-money where Mr. Noy left it, and being a Judge carried it up to that pinnacle, from whence he almost broke his own neck, having in his journey thither had too much influence on his brethren to induce them to concur in a Judgment they had all cause to repent. To which his Declaration, after he was Keeper of the Great Seal of England, must be added, upon demurrer put into a bill before him, which had no other equity in it, than an order of the lords of the council: ‘That whilst he was ‘Keeper, no man should be so saucy as to dispute those Orders, but that the wisdom of ‘that board should be always ground enough ‘for him to make a decree in Chancery.’”

* Lord Clarendon in his History, vol. 1. p. 71 (8vo. edition) says, “Undoubtedly, my lord Finch’s Speech in the Exchequer Chamber made Ship-money much more abhorred and formidable than all the Commitments by the Council-Table, and all the distresses taken by the sheriffs in England.” And p. 74, he says, day the last of the last month, where I purpose to live in a fashion agreeable to the poorness of my fortunes; for my humbling in this world, I have utterly cast off the thoughts of it, and my aim shall be to learn to number my days, that I may apply my heart to wisdom, that wisdom that shall wipe away all tears from my eyes and heart, and lead me by the hand to true happiness, which can never be taken from me. I pray God of Heaven to bless this parliament, both with a happy progress and conclusion; if my ruin may conduce but the least to it, I shall not repine at it. I truly pray for your lordship and your noble family, that God would give an increase of all worldly blessings, and in the fullness of days to receive you to his glory; if I were capable of serving any body, I would tell your lordship, that no man should be readier to make known his devotion and true gratitude to your lordship, than, your lordship's most humble, and most affectionate, poor kinsman and servant,

J. FINCH."

January 14, 1640-1. The Committee having prepared Articles of Impeachment against the Lord-Keeper, they were presented to the house, and are as follow:

THE ACCUSATION AND IMPEACHMENT OF JOHN LORD FINCH,* Baron of FORDWICH, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, by the House of Commons.

I. That the said John lord Finch, baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper, &c. hath traitorously and wickedly endeavoured to subvert the fundamental Laws and established Government of the realm of England, and instead thereof to introduce an arbitrary, tyrannical government against law; which he hath declared by traitorous and wicked words, counsels, opinions, judgments, practices and actions.

II. That in pursuance of those his traitorous and wicked purposes, he did in the 3d and 4th year of his majesty's reign, or one of them, being then Speaker of the Commons House of parliament, contrary to the commands of the house then assembled and sitting, deny and hinder the reading of some things which the said house of commons required to be read, for the safety of the king and kingdom, and preservation of the religion of this realm; and did forbid all the members of the house to speak, and said that if any did offer to speak, he would rise and go away, and said nothing should be done in the house; and did offer to rise and go away, and did thereby and otherwise, as much as in him lay, endeavour to subvert the ancient and undoubted rights and course of parliament.†

III. That he being of his majesty's Council at the justice seat, held for the county of Essex, in the month of October, in the 10th year of his now majesty's reign, at Stratford Langton in the same county, being then of his majesty's council, in that service did practise by unlawful means to enlarge the Forest of that county many miles beyond the known bounds thereof, as they had been enjoyed near 300 years, contrary to the law and to the Charter of the Liberties of the Forest, and other charters and divers acts of parliament: and for effecting the same did unlawfully cause and procure undue return to be made of jurors, and great numbers of other persons who were unsworn, to be joined to them of the jury, and threatened and awed the said jurors to give a verdict for the king, and by unlawful means did surprize the county, that they might not make defence, and did use several menacing wicked speeches and actions to the jury and others, for obtaining his unjust purpose aforesaid. And after verdict obtained for the king in the month of April following (at which time the said justice-seat was called by adjournment), the said John Finch, then lord chief-justice of his majesty's court of Common-Pleas, and one of the judges assistants for them; he continued by farther unlawful and unjust practices, to maintain and confirm the said verdict, and did then and there, being assistant to the justice in Eyre, advised the refusal of the traverse offered by the county, and all their evidences, but only what they should verbally deliver; which was refused accordingly.

IV. That he about the month of November, 1635, being then lord chief justice of the Common Pleas, and having taken an oath for due administration of justice to his majesty's liege people, according to the laws and statutes of the realm, contrived an Opinion in hæc verba, [When the good and safety, &c. See vol. iii. p. 844], and did subscribe his name to that Opinion, and by persuasions, threats, and false suggestions, did solicit and procure sir John Bramstone, knt. then and now Lord Chief Justice of England; sir Humphrey Davenport, kt. Lord Chief Baron of his majesty's court of Exchequer; sir Richard Hutton, knt. late one of the justices of his majesty's court of Common Pleas; sir John Denham, knt. late one of the barons of his majesty's court of Exchequer; sir William Jones, knt. late one of the justices of the said court of King's-bench; sir George Croke, knt. then and now one of the Judges of the said court of King's-bench; sir Thomas Trevor, knt. then and now one of the barons of the Exchequer; sir George Vernon, knt. late one of the justices of the said court of Common Pleas; sir Robert Berkley, knt. then and now one of the justices of the said court of King's-bench; sir Francis Crawley, knt. then and now one of the justices of the said court of Common Pleas; sir Richard Weston, knt. then and now one of the barons of the said court of Exchequer; some or one of them, to subscribe, with their names, the said Opinion presently, and enjoined them severally some or one of them secrecy, upon their allegiance.

V. That he the 5th day of June, then being Lord Chief Justice of the said court of Common Pleas, subscribed an extrajudicial Opinion in answer to Questions in a Letter from his majesty, in hæc verba, &c. [See vol. iii. p. 844.] And that he contrived the said Questions; and procured the said Letter from his majesty: And whereas the said justice Hutton and justice Croke declared to him their Opinions to the contrary; yet he required and pressed them to subscribe, upon his promise that he would let his majesty know the truth of their Opinions, notwithstanding such subscriptions; which nevertheless he did not make known to his majesty, but delivered the same to his majesty as the Opinion of all the Judges.

VI. That he being Lord Chief Justice of the said court of Common Pleas, delivered his Opinion in the Exchequer Chamber against Mr. Hampden in the Case of Ship-money; that he the said Mr. Hampden upon the matter and substance of the case was chargeable with the money then in question; a copy of which proceedings the Commons will deliver to your lordships: and did solicit and threaten the said Judges, some or one of them, to deliver their Opinions in like manner against Mr. Hampden. And after the said baron Denham had delivered his Opinion for Mr. Hampden; the said lord Finch repaired purposely to the said baron Denham's chamber in Serjeants-inn, in Fleetstreet; and after the said Mr. Baron Denham had declared and expressed his Opinion, urged him to retract the said Opinion; which he refusing, was threatened by the said lord Finch, because he refused.

VII. That he, being then Lord Chief Justice of the court of Common Pleas, declared and published in the Exchequer Chamber and Western circuit where he went Judge; that the king's right to Ship-money, as aforesaid, was so whereat a right to the crown, as an act of parliament could not take it away; and with divers malicious speeches inveighed against, and threatened all such as refused to pay Ship-money: all which Opinions contained in the 4th, 5th, and 6th Articles, are against the law of the realm, the subjects right of property, and contrary to former Resolutions in parliament, and to the Petition of Right: which said Resolutions and Petition of Right were well known to him resolved and enacted in parliament, when he was Speaker of the Commons house of parliament.

VIII. That he being Lord Chief Justice of the court of Common Pleas did take the general practice of that court to his private chamber; and that he sent warrants into all or many shires of England to several men, as to Francis Giles of the county of Devon, Robert Benson of the county of York, attorneys of that court, and to divers others, to release all persons arrested on any outlawry for about 40s. fees; whereas none by law so arrested can be bailed or released without supersedeas under seal, or reversal.

IX. That he being Lord Chief Justice of the court of Common Pleas, upon a pretended suit begun in Michaelmas Term, in the 11th year of his majesty's reign, although there was no plaint or declaration against him, did notoriously, and contrary to all law and justice, by threats, menaces, and imprisonment, compel Thomas Laurence, an executor, to pay 19*l.* 12*s.*; and likewise caused Richard Bernard, being only overseer of the last will of that testator, to be arrested for the payment of the said money, contrary to the advice of the rest of the Judges of that court, and against the known and ordinary course of justice, and his said oath and knowledge: and denied his majesty's subjects, the common and ordinary justice of this realm, as to Mr. Limerick, and others; and for his private benefit endangered and ruined the estates of many of his majesty's subjects, contrary to his oath and knowledge.

X. That he being Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, and sworn one of his majesty's privy council, did by false and malicious slanders labour to incense his majesty against Parliaments, and did frame and advise the publishing the Declaration after the dissolution of the last Parliament.

All which Treasons and Misdemeanors above-mentioned, were done and committed by the said John lord Finch, baron of Fordwich, lord-keeper of the great seal of England; and thereby he the aforesaid Finch hath traitorously, and contrary to his allegiance laboured to lay imputations and scandals upon his majesty's government, and to alienate the hearts of his majesty's liege people from his majesty, and to set a division between them, and to ruin and destroy his majesty's realm of England; for which they do impeach him the said lord Finch, baron of Fordwich, lord-keeper of the great seal of England, of High-Treason against our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity, of the misdemeanors above-mentioned. And the said Commons by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any other Accusation or Impeachment against the said lord Finch, and also of replying to the Answer, that the said John lord Finch shall make unto the said Articles, or to any of them; and of offering Proof of the premises, or any of their Impeachments or Accusations that shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall, according to the course of parliaments, require; do pray, that the said John lord Finch, baron of Fordwich, lord-keeper of the great seal of England, may be put to answer to all and every of the premises, and such Proceedings, Examinations, Trials, and Judgments, as may be upon every of them, had and used, as is agreeable to law and justice.

After reading these Articles, Resolved upon the question,

“ That these Articles thus read and ingrossed shall be sent to the lords, in maintenance of the Commons' Charge against John lord Finch of Fordwich, late Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England.”

Mr. Arthur Goodwin is appointed to go up with a Message to the lords to a Conference with their lordships, by a committee of both houses, concerning Articles to be delivered in maintenance of the Commons' Accusation of John lord Finch of Fordwich, late Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England; and concerning the Liberty and Property of the Subject.

At the request of the lord Falkland, Mr. Hyde is appointed to be assistant unto him, for the reading of the articles to be delivered against the late Lord-Keeper.

Mr. Goodwin brought answer, That according to the Order of the house, he had delivered the Message to their lordships, and their lordships will give a meeting to-morrow morning, at nine o'clock, by a committee of the whole house, as is desired.

Accordingly, the Articles against the Lord-Keeper were presented to the lords; and after reading the same,

The Lord Falkland spoke as follows:

"My Lords; These Articles against my lord Finch being read, I may be bold to apply that of the Poet, 'Nil refert tales versus qua voce legantur;' and I doubt not but your lordships must be of the same opinion, of which the house of commons appears to have been, by the choice they have made of me, that the Charge I have brought is such, as needs no assistance from the bringer, leaving not so much as the colour of a colour for any Defence, including all possible evidence, and all possible aggravation (that addition alone excepted) which he alone could make, and hath made; I mean, his Confession, included in his sight.

"Here are many and mighty crimes, crimes of supererogation, (so that High-Treason is but a part of his charge) pursuing him fervently in every several condition, (being a silent Speaker, an unjust Judge, and an unconscionable Keeper). That his life appears a perpetual warfare (by mines, and by battery, by battle, and by stratagem,) against our fundamental laws, which (by his own confession) several conquests had left untouched, against the excellent constitution of this kingdom, which hath made it appear unto strangers rather an iden, than a real commonwealth, and produced the honour and happiness of this to be a wonder of every other nation; and this with such unfortunate success, that as he always intended to make our ruins a ground of his advancement, so his advancement the means of our further ruin.

"After that, contrary to the further end of his place, and the ending of that meeting in which he held his place, he had, as it were, gagged the Commonwealth, taking away (to his power) all power of speech from that body, of which he ought to have been the mouth, and which alone can perfectly represent the condition of the people, whom they only represent: which if he, had not done, in all probability, what so grave and judicious an Assembly might have offered to the consideration of so gracious and just a Prince, had occasioned the redress of the Grievances they then suffered, and prevented those which they have since endured, according to the ancient maxim, 'Odiosse quos læseris.' He pursued this offence towards the parliament, by inveighing against the Members, by scandalizing their proceedings, by trampling upon their Acts and Declarations, by usurping and devolving the right, by diminishing and abrogating the power, both of that and other parliaments, and making them (as much as in him lay) both useless and odious to his majesty; and pursued his hatred to this fountain of justice by corrupting the streams of it, the Laws; and perverting the conduits-pipes, the Judges.

"He practised the annihilating of ancient and notorious perambulations of particular Forests, the better to prepare himself to annihilate the ancient and not-rious perambulation of the whole kingdom, the metes and boundaries between the liberties of the subject and sovereign power; he endeavoured to have all tenures durante bene placito, to bring all law from his majesty's courts into his majesty's breast; he gave our goods to the king, our lands to the deer, our liberties to his sheriffs; so that there was no way by which we had not been oppress, and destroyed, if the power of this person had been equal with his will, or that the will of his majesty had been equal to his power.

"He not only by this means made us liable to all the effect of an invasion from without, but (by destruction of our Liberties, which included the destruction of our propriety, which included the destruction of our industry) made us liable to the terriblest of all invasions, that of want and poverty. So that if what he plotted had taken root, and he made it, as sure as his Declaration could make it, (what himself was not, parliament-proof) in this wealthy and happy kingdom, there could have been left no abundance but of grievances and discontentment, no satisfaction but amongst the guilty. It is generally observed of the plague, that the infection of others is an earnest and constant desire of all that are seized by it: and as this design resembles that disease, in the ruin, destruction, and desolation it would have wrought, so it seems no less like it in this effect: he having so laboured to make others share in that guilt, that his solicitation was not only his action, but his works, making use both of his authority, his interest, and importunity, to persuade; and in his majesty's name (whose piety is known to give that excellent prerogative to his person, that the law gives to his place, not to be able to do wrong) to threaten the rest of the Judges, to sign Opinions contrary to law, to assign Answers contrary to their Opinions, to give Judgment which they ought not to have given, and to recant Judgment when they had given it as they ought: so that whosoever considers his care of, and concernment, both in the growth and in the immorality of this project, cannot but by the same way, by which the wisest judgment found the true mother of the child, discover him not only to have been the fosterer, but the father of this most pernicious and envious design.

“ I shall not need to observe, that this was plotted and pursued by an Englishman against England, (which increaseth the crime in no less degree than parricide is beyond murder) that this was done in the greatest matter joined to the greatest bond, being against the general liberty, and public propriety, by a sworn judge (and if that salt itself, because unsavoury, the Gospel hath designed whether it must be cast) that he poisoned our very antidotes, and turned our guard into a destruction, making law the ground of illegality; that he used this law not only against us, but against itself, making it, as I may say, felu de se, making the pretence (for I can scarce say the appearance of it) so to contribute to the utter ruin of itself.

“ I shall not need to say, that either this is (or can be) of the highest kind, and in the highest degree of Parliamentary Treason, a treason which needs not a computation of many several actions, which alone were not treason, to prove a treason all together, and by that demonstration of the intention, to make that formally treason which were materially but a misdemeanor: this is a Treason as well against the king, as against the kingdom; for whatsoever is against the whole, is undoubtedly against the head, which takes from his majesty the ground of his rule, the laws, (for if foundations be destroyed, the pinnacles are most endangered) which takes from his majesty the principal honour of his rule; the ruling over freemen, a power as much nobler than that over villeins, as that is than that over beasts; which endeavoured to take from his majesty the principal support of his rule, their hearts and affections over whom he rules; (a better and surer strength and wall to the king, than the sea is to the kingdom;) and by begetting a mutual distrust, and by that a mutual disaffection between them, to hazard the danger even of the destruction of both.

“ My lords; I shall the less need to press this, because, as it were unreasonable in any case to suspect your justice, so here especially, where your interest so nearly unites you; your great share in possessions, giving you an equal concernment in propriety, the care and pains used by your noble ancestors in the founding and asserting of our common liberties rendering the just defence of them your most proper and peculiar inheritance, and both exciting to oppose and extirpate all such designs as did introduce, and would have settled an arbitrary, that is, an intolerable form of government, and have made even your lordships and your posterity but right honourable slaves.

“ My lords; I will spend no more words, luctando cum larva, in accusing the ghost of a departed person, whom his crimes accuse more than I can do, and his absence accuseth no less than his crime. Neither will I excuse the length of what I have said, because I cannot add to an excuse, without adding to the fault, or my own imperfections, either in the matter or manner of it; which I know must appear the greater, by being compared with that learned gentleman's great ability, who hath preceded me at this time: I will only desire, by the command, and in the behalf of the house of commons, that these proceedings against the lord Finch may be put in so speedy a way of dispatch, as in such cases the course of parliament will allow.”

The same day, the Commons ordered thanks to be returned from the house to Mr. St. John, Mr. Whitlock, the lord Falkland, and Mr. Hyde, for the great service they have performed to the honour of the house, and good of the Commonwealth, in the transferring the Articles against the late Lord-Keeper.

Jan. 30. It was ordered by the lord, That such Judges as the house of commons shall desire, are to be examined in the Case of the lord Finch, by the same deputed lords as were appointed in the earl of Strafford's case: but the Judges are not to be examined upon any thing to accuse themselves.

Feb. 15. The house of lords thought fit, that a Proclamation do issue out to summon the lord Finch, late Lord-Keeper, personally to appear before the Lords in parliament; to answer an Accusation of High-Treason brought against him by the commons.

But his Lordship never thought fit to surrender himself, and the Civil War soon after breaking out, there was no further proceedings against him, and he endured eight years banishment, and Compositions amounting to about 7,000*l*. But he lived to see the horrid murder of king Charles 1, and the happy restoration of king Charles the Second.

The following curious Particulars relative to the Impeachment of Lord Keeper Finch were copied by bishop Warburton from a MS. History of the Rebellion, found in a large volume, all in lord Clarendon's hand writing, which contains the private memoirs of his own life, as well as the public history that was extracted from this volume. They form one of the many passages which lord Clarendon himself had drawn his pen through, as not to be printed as part of the History of the Rebellion, and were presented to the compiler by the late learned and excellent Dr. Balguy, who received the copy from bishop Warburton:

“ IT began now to be observed, that all the public professions of a General Reformation, and Redress of all Grievances the kingdom suffered under, were contracted into a sharp and extraordinary persecution of one person (lord Strafford,) they had accused of High Treason, and within some bitter mention of the archbishop; (archbishop Laud,) that there was no thought of dismissing the two armies, which were the capital grievance and insupportable burthen to the whole nation; and that instead of questioning others, who were looked upon as the causes of greater mischief than either of those they professed so much displeasure against, they privately laboured by all their offices to remove all prejudice towards them, at least all thoughts of prosecution for their transgressions, and so that they had blanched all sharp and odious mention of Ship-Money, because it could hardly be touched without some reflection upon the lord keeper Finch, who had acted so odious a part in it, and who, since the meeting of the great council at York, had rendered himself very gracious to them, as a man who would facilitate many things to them, and therefore fit to be preserved and protected. Whereupon the lord Falkland took notice of the business of Ship-Money, and very sharply mentioned the lord Finch as being the principal promoter of it; and that, being a sworn judge of the law, he had not only given his judgment against law, but had been the solicitor to corrupt all the other judges to concur with him in their opinion, and concluded, that no man ought to be more severely prosecuted than he. It was very sensible that the leading men were much troubled at this discourse, and desired to divert it; some of them proposing, in regard we had very much and great business upon our hands in necessary preparation, we should not embrace too much together, but suspend the debate of Ship-Money for some time, till we could be more vacant to pursue it, and so were ready to pass to some other matter. Upon which Mr. Hyde insisted upon what the lord Falkland had said, that this was a particular of a very extraordinary nature, which ought to be examined without delay, because the delay would probably make the future examination to no purpose; and therefore proposed, that immediately, whilst the house of commons was sitting, a small committee might be appointed, who, dividing themselves into the number of two and two, might visit all the judges, and ask them apart, in the name of the house, what messages the lord Finch, when he was chief justice of the court of Common Pleas, had brought to them from the king in the business of Ship-Money? and, whether he had not solicited them to give judgment for the king in that case? Which motion was so generally approved of by the house, that a committee of eight persons, whereof himself was one, was presently sent out of the house to visit the several judges, most whereof were at their chambers: and justice Croke and some other of the judges, being surprised with the questions, and pressed earnestly to make clear and categorical answers, ingenuously acknowledged that the chief justice Finch had frequently, whilst the matter was depending, earnestly solicited them to give their judgment for the king, and often used his majesty's name to them, as if he expected that compliance from them. The Committee, which had divided themselves to attend the several judges, agreed to meet at a place appointed to communicate the substance of what they had been informed of, and agreed upon the method of their report to the house, which they could not make till the next morning, it being about ten of the clock they were sent out of the house.

“ That Committee was no sooner withdrawn, (which consisted of men of more temperate spirits than the leaders were possessed with,) but without any occasion given by any debate, or coherence with any thing proposed or mentioned, an obscure person inveighed bitterly against the archbishop of Canterbury; and there having been a very angry vote passed the house two days before, upon a sudden debate upon the Canons which had been made by the Convocation after the dissolution of the last parliament (a season in which the church could not reasonably hope to do any thing that would find acceptance): upon which debate they had declared, by a vote, that those Canons were against the king's prerogative, the fundamental laws of the realm, the liberty and property of the subject, and that they contained divers other things tending to sedition, and of dangerous consequence; Mr. Grimstone took occasion, from what was said of the archbishop, to put them in mind of their vote upon the Canons, and said, that the presumption in sitting after the dissolution of the parliament, (contrary to custom, if not contrary to law,) and the framing and contriving all these canons, (which contained so much sedition,) was all to be imputed to the archbishop; that the Scots had required justice against him from his being a chief incendiary and cause of the war between the two nations; that this kingdom looked upon him as the author of all those innovations in the church which were introductive to popery, and as a joint contriver with lord Strafford to involve the nation in slavery; and therefore proposed that he might be presently accused of High-Treason, to the end that he might be sequestered from the council, and no more repair to the presence of the king (with whom he had so great credit, that the earl of Strafford himself could not do more mischief by his councils and insinuations). This motion was no sooner made but seconded and thirded, and found such a general acceptance, that, without considering that of all the envious particulars whereof the archbishop stood accused there was no one which amounted to treason, they forthwith voted that it should be so, and immediately promoted Mr. Grimstone to the Message, who presently went up to the house of peers; and being called on, he, in the name of all the Commons of England, accused the archbishop of Canterbury of high-treason and other misdemeanors, and concluded in the same style they had used in the case of the lord lieutenant of Ireland. Upon which the poor archbishop, who stoutly professed his innocence, was brought on the bar upon his knees, and thence committed to the custody of Maxwell, the gentleman usher of the black rod, (from whence the earl of Strafford had been sent a few days before to the Tower) where he remained many months before they brought in a particular Charge against him.

against the archbishop, (when the Committee the next morning made their report of what the several judges had said concerning the lord Finch,) they were wonderfully indisposed to bear any thing against him; and though many spoke with great sharpness of him, and how fit it was to prosecute him in the same manner and by the same logic they had proceeded with against the other two, yet they required more particulars to be formally set down of his miscarriage, and made another committee to take farther examination (in which committee Mr. Hyde likewise was): and when the Report was made, within a few days, of several very high and imperious miscarriages, (besides what related to the Ship-Money,) upon a motion made by a young gentleman of the same family (who pretended to have received a letter from the lord keeper, in which he desired leave to speak in the house before they should determine anything against him); the debate was suspended for the present, and leave given him to be there (if he pleased) the next day; at which time, having likewise obtained a permission of the peers to do what he thought good for himself, he appeared at the bar of the house of commons, and said all he could for his own excuse (more in magnifying the sincerity of his religion, and how kind he had been to many preachers, whom he named, and, whom he knew were of precious memory with the un-conformable party); and concluded with a lamentable supplication for their mercy. It was about nine of the clock in the morning when he went out of the house (and when the debate could no longer be deferred what was to be done upon him); and when the sense of the house appeared very evidently, notwithstanding all that was said to the contrary by those eminent persons who promoted all other accusations with the greatest fury, that he should be accused of high treason in the same form the other two had been, they persisted still so long in the debate, and delayed the putting the question by frequent interruptions, a common artifice, till it was twelve of the clock: and till they knew the house of peers was risen (which they were likewise readily enough disposed to, to gratify the keeper); and the question was put and carried in the affirmative, (with very few negatives,) and the lord Falkland appointed to carry up the accusation to the house of peers (which they knew he could not do till the next morning;) and when he did it the next morning, it appeared that the Lord Keeper had sent the great seal the night before (to the king), and had newly withdrawn himself, and was soon after known to be in Holland."

November 21, 1640.

THE house of commons ordered Dr. Cosin into custody as a Delinquent. On the Tuesday following a Mr. Norton, a divine, was called in, and examined, and to divers questions demanded of him by Mr. Speaker, answered, 'That he had a son at Cambridge, and certain fellows of Peter-house endeavoured to seduce him to Popery, pretending that Dr. Cosin would make him a fellow of Peter-house if he would come thither.' Thus much appeared upon oath, and that he was forced to send for his son away: He further said, 'He had a copy of the Arguments that passed between them and his son. That the Questions in Peter-house chapel are maintained and

'held as they are at Rome;' and instanced several of the Questions. This was referred to the Committee for Mr. Smart's Petition.

January 19, 1640-1, Dr. Cosin was bailed on his own bond for 2,000*l.* and those of two sureties for 1,000*l.* each.

January 22. The Commons resolved, 1. That the several Proceedings of the High Commission Court of York and Canterbury, against Mr. Smart, and the several Fines imposed by them upon him, were illegal and unjust, and ought not to bind. 2. That the Degradation of Mr. Smart, and his deprivation from his prebends, and other ecclesiastical livings, were unjust and illegal; and that he ought to be restored to all of them, together with the mean profit. 3. That Dr. Cosin, and others the prosecutors of Mr. Smart, ought to make him satisfaction for his damages sustained. 4. That Dr. Cosin is guilty of bringing in of Superstitious Innovations into the church, tending to idolatry, and of speaking of scandalous and malicious words against his majesty's supremacy, and the religion established. 5. That Dr. Cosin is in the opinion of this house unfit and unworthy to be a governor in either of the Universities, or to continue any longer head or governor of any

* "This term," says Hume, "was newly come into vogue and expressed a degree and species of guilt not exactly known or ascertained."

' college, or to hold and enjoy any ecclesiastical promotions.'

Referred to the Committee for Mr. Smart, to prepare such things as may be fit to be transmitted to the lords, concerning Dr. Cosin; and likewise to consider of some fit way of reparations to be made to Mr. Smart for his damages sustained.

Feb. 26. A Complaint was made against Dr. Cosin for causing 2,000*l.* to be spent in setting up of Images, and other Innovations, in the cathedral of Durham; providing an holy consecrated knife, kept on purpose to cut the Communion-Bread.

March 15. Mr. Rouse carries up the Impeachment against Dr. Cosin to the Lords, where he spake as followeth:

My lords; I am commanded by the house of Commons, to present to your lordships a Declaration and Impeachment against Dr. Cosin, and others, upon the Complaint of Mr. Peter Smart: which Mr. Smart was a Proto-Martyr, or first confessor of note, in the late days of persecution. The whole matter is a tree, whereof the branches and fruit are manifest in the Articles of this Declaration; which being read, I shall with your lordships favour discover and lay open the root."

Then the Articles were read thus:

ARTICLES of IMPEACHMENT against DR. CO-SIN.

I. That he was the first man that caused the Communion-Table in the church of Durham to be removed, and set Altar-wise; in the erecting and beautifying whereof, he, being then Treasurer, expended 200*l.*

II. That he used to officiate at the West-side thereof, turning his back to the people.

III. That he used extraordinary bowing to it.

IV. That he compelled others to do it, using violence to the persons of them that refused so to do: For instance, once some omitting it, he comes out of his seat, down to the seat where they sate, being gentlewomen, called them whores and jades, and pagans, and the like unseemly words, and rent some of their cloaths.

V. That he converted divers prayers in the book of common-prayer into hymns, to be sung in the choir, and played with the organ, contrary to the ancient custom of that church.

VI. That whereas it had been formerly a custom in that church, at the end of every sermon to sing a psalm, this custom, when Dr. Cosin came thither, was abrogated, and instead thereof, they sung an anthem in the choir, there being no psalm sung either at the minister's going up into the pulpit, or at his coming down.

VII. That the first Candlemas-day at night that he had been in that church, he caused three hundred wax-candles to be set up, and lighted in the church at once, in honour of Our Lady, and placed threescore of them upon and about the altar.

VIII. That in this church, there were reliques of divers images, above which were remaining the ruins of two seraphims, with the picture of Christ between them, erected in queen Mary's time, in the time of popery: All which, when queen Elizabeth came to the crown, were demolished by virtue of a commission by her to that intent granted; which so continued demolished from that time, till Dr. Cosin came to that church: who being treasurer, caused the same to be repaired, and most gloriously painted.

IX. That all the time that he was unmarried, he wore a cope of white sattin, never officiating in any other, it being reserved solely for him, no man except himself making use thereof, which after marriage he cast off, and never after wore.

X. That there was a knife belonging to the church, kept altogether in the vestry, being put to none but holy uses, as cutting the bread in the sacrament, and the like, Dr. Cosin refusing to cut the same with any other but that, thinking all others that were unconsecrated, polluted; but that which he putting holiness in, never termed but The Consecrated Knife.

XI. That in a Sermon preached in that church, he did deliver certain words in disgrace of the reformers of our church: For instance, the words were these: 'The reformers of this church, when they abolished the mass, took away all good order; and instead of reformation, made it a deformation.'

XII. That he seldom or never, in any of his sermons, stiled the ministers of the word and Sacraments, by any other name than priests, nor the Communion-Table by any other name than Altar.

XIII. That by his appointment there was a cope bought, the seller being a convicted Jesuit, and afterwards employed in that church, having upon it the picture of the invisible and incomprehensible Trinity.

XIV. That whereas it had been formerly a custom in that church, at five of the clock to have morning-prayers read winter and summer; this custom, when Dr. Cosin came thither, was abandoned, and instead thereof was used singing, and playing on the organs, and some few prayers read, and this was called the First Service; which being ended, the people departed out of the church, returning at nine a clock, and having then morning-prayers read unto them; and this was called Second Service. Which Innovation being disliked and complained of by Mr. Justice Hutton was reformed.

XV. That he framed a superstitious ceremony, in lighting the tapers which were placed on the altar, which for instance was this: A company of boys that belonged to the Church, came in at the choir-door, with torches in their hands lighted, bowing towards the altar at their first entrance, bowing thrice before they lighted their tapers; having done, they withdrew themselves, bowing so oft as before: not once turning their back-parts towards the altar, the organs all the time going.

XVI. That he counselled some young students of the university, to be imitators and practisers of his superstitious ceremonies; who to ingratiate themselves in his favour, did accordingly; and being afterwards reprov'd for the same, by some of their friends, confessed that Dr. Cosin first induced them to that practice, and encouraged them therein.

XVII. That he used upon Communion-days to make the sign of the cross, with his finger, both upon the seats whereon they were to sit, and the cushions to kneel upon, using some words when he so did.

XVIII. That one Sabbath-day there was set up an unnecessary company of tapers and lights in the church; which Dr. Hunt being then dean, fearing they might give offence, being they were unnecessary, sent his man to pull them down, who did so. But Dr. Cosin being thereat aggrieved, came to the fellow, and there miscalled him in most uncivil manner, and began to beat him in the public view of the congregation, to the great disturbance of the same.

XIX. That the dean and chapter of that church, where Dr. Cosin was one, with many others, being invited to dinner in the town of Durham; Dr. Cosin then and there spake words derogating from the king's prerogative. The words were these; 'The king hath no more power over the church, than the boy that rubs my horse's heels*.'

XX. That there being many canons of the said church present at that time, amongst the rest there was one took more notice of his words than the rest, and acquainted one of his fellow-canons with them when he came home: This canon being a friend to Dr. Cosin, told the doctor that such a man exclaimed of him, and charged him with words that he should speak at such a time: The doctor presently sends for him; and when he came into the house, the doctor desires him to follow him into an inner room, who did so: but as soon he came in, the doctor shuts the door, and sets both his hands upon him, calling him rogue and rascal, and many other names: Inasmuch, that the man fearing he would do him mischief, cried out. Mrs. Cosin coming in, endeavoured to appease her husband, and holding his hands, the other ran away.

XXI. That the doctor did seek many unjust ways to ensnare this man, that so he might take a just occasion to put him out of his place: but none of them taking effect, he put him out by violence, having no other reason why he did so, but because he had no good voice, when he had served the place two years before Dr. Cosin came thither: For instance of which unjust ways to ensnare this man, Dr. Cosin hired a man and a woman to pretend a desire of matrimony, and to offer a sum of money to this petty-canon to contract matrimony between them in a private chamber; so thereupon to take advantage of his revenge upon him.

Which ARTICLES being read,

Mr. Rouse proceeded thus:

"My Lords; I am now to discover the root of Mr. Smart's persecution. Your lordships have heard of a great design to bring in popery; you have heard of armies of soldiers, and particularly of the popish Irish army, the burthen and complaint of the commons. But there is another army not so much spoken of; and that is, an army of priests; For since altars came in, so they delight to be called. It is a saying of Gregory the great, That when antichrist comes, 'preparatus est exercitus sacerdotum,' there is an army of priests to receive him: This is fulfilled in our time: for certainly this army of Priests doth many ways advance the design and plot of popery. A first is by the subversion of our laws and government: Our laws and popery cannot stand together; but either popery must overthrow our laws, or our laws must overthrow popery. But to overthrow our laws, they must overthrow parliaments; and to overthrow parliaments they must overthrow property; they must bring the subjects goods to be arbitrarily disposed, that so there may be no need of parliaments: This hath been done by Dr. Mainwaring*; (whom we find wanting, yet not in the Seats, but at the bar of the lords house) and the like by Dr. Beale: And I think it was the intention of the late Canons.

"A second way, by which this Army of Priests advanceth the popish design, is the way of Treaty. This hath been acted both by writings and conference. Sancta Clara himself saith, 'doctissimi eorum quibuscum egi;' So it seems they have had conferences together: And Sancta Clara, on his part, labours to bring the Articles of our Church to popery; and some of our side strive to meet him in that way. We have a testimony, that the great arch priest himself hath said, 'it were no hard matter to make a reconciliation, if a wise man had the handling of it.' But I verily believe, that as the state of papacy stands, a far wiser man than he cannot reconcile us without the loss of our religion. For the pope being fastened to his errors, even by his chair of inerrability, he sits still unmoved, and so we cannot meet, except we come wholly to him. A man standeth in a boat tied to a rock, when he draws the rope, doth not draw the rock to the boat, but the boat to the rock. And Sancta Clara doth (in this somewhat honestly) confess it; for he saith, that he dealt in this way of treaty, not to draw the church to the protestants; but the protestants to the church.

"A third way is a way of violence; this violence they exercise partly by secular arms, and partly by priestly arms, which they call spiritual,

* The utterance of these words had been alleged against Dr. Cosin in the year 1638; and an investigation was then had by the house of commons into the conduct of the Attorney General in not proceeding in a prosecution against Cosin for the same, and into the circumstances of a pardon granted to him upon that occasion. † Cobb. Parl. Hist. 458 et seq.

* See vol. 3, p. 335.

For secular arms, we have their own confession, that the late war was bellum episcopale: and we have the papists confession, that it was bellum papale; for in their motives they say, 'That the war concerns them not only as subjects, but as catholics;' for so they falsly call themselves; and if it be so, then bellum episcopale is also bellum papale: In the episcopal war, the papal cause is advanced for the spiritual arms. Thus they come to execution.

"When a great man is coming, his sumpters, his furniture, his provisions go before: The pope's furniture, altars and copes, pictures and images are come before; and, if we believe doctor Cosin, the very substance of the mass; a certain sign that the pope was not far off. Now these fore-runners being come, if any man resist them, fire comes out of the brambles, and devours the cedars of Lebanon; the army of the priests falls upon him with their arms of suspension, sequestration, excommunication, degradation, and deprivation. And by these arms hath Mr. Smart been oppressed and undone: He falls upon their superstitions and innovations; and they fall upon him with their arms; they beat him down, yea they pull him up by the roots, taking away all his means of maintenance and living; yet they leave him life to feel his miseries. 'Ita feriunt, ut diu se sentiat mori.' There is no cruelty to priestly cruelty: These are they that did put our Saviour to death: The calling is reverend, but the corruption of it most pernicious 'corruptio optimi pessima.' I know no reason of this change, except it be that of the Apostle, because when they 'knew God they did not worship him as God,' but made a God of the world, placing the excellency of priesthood in worldly pomp and greatness, and gave the glory of the invisible God to pictures, images, and altars, therefore God gave them up to vile affections, to be implacable, unmerciful, and without natural affection. But whatsoever is the cause of their corruption, certainly their arms have fallen heavily upon Mr. Smart; and priestly cruelty hath cast him into a long misery; from which he could get no release by any priestly mercy.

"And now it is prayed, That as these Delinquents, by the cruel oppressions of Mr. Smart have advanced the cause of popery, so they may in such a degree of justice be punished; that in them priestly cruelty, and the very cause of popery may appear to be punished and suppressed; and that Mr. Smart, suffering for the cause of protestancy, may be so repaired, that in him pious constancy, and the very cause of protestancy, may appear to be righted and repaired."

To the above ARTICLES the Doctor put in his ANSWER upon oath, and so fully vindicated himself, during the five days the Affair was depending before the Lords, that most of them acknowledged his innocence: And Mr. Glover, one of Smart's own counsel, told him openly at the bar of the house of lords, 'That he was 'ashamed of him, and could not in conscience 'plead for him any longer.' Whereupon, the lords dismissed the Doctor upon his putting bail for his appearance: but they never sent for him again*.

* "John Cosin was master of Peter-house in Cambridge and Dean of Peterborough, in the reign of Charles 1, in which he enjoyed several other considerable preferments. He was accused of introducing superstitious innovations in the church of Durham, of which he was then prebendary, by Peter Smart, who had been prosecuted by him for preaching against Episcopacy. He held his deanery but a short time, as he was the first of the clergy who were sequestered from their dignities and benefices by the parliament. In 1643 he retired to Paris, where he was appointed chaplain to the Protestant part of queen Henrietta's family. He succeeded Dr. Morton in the see of Durham and while he sat in that see, expended large sums in public and private charities and benefactions. He died Jan. 15, 1671-2, in the 78th year of his age." 153. Proceedings against Dr. MATTHEW WREN,* Bishop of ELY, on an Impeachment for High Crimes and Misdemeanors: 16 CHARLES I. A. D. 1640. [4 Rushw. Coll. 351. 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 682.]

ON the 19th of December 1640, a Message was sent to the house of lords by Mr.

* Mr. Grimston, with an attempt at wit which probably had its admirers, inveighing against Manwaring, Piers, Bancroft, and Wren, called this last "the least of all those birds, but one of the most unclean ones." He was dean of the chapel to Charles the First. Clarendon calls him a man of a severe, sour nature, but very-learned, and particularly versed in the old liturgies of the Greek and Latin churches.

Hampden, to let their lordships know, "That they had received Informations of a very high nature against Matthew Wren, lord bishop of Ely, for setting up Idolatry and Superstition in divers places, and exercising and acting some things of that nature in his own person; and because they hear the said bishop of Ely endeavours to make an escape out of the kingdom, he was commanded to desire their lordships to think of some such course, that he may put in security for his forth-coming; and to abide the judgment of parliament." Thus the bishop of Ely was commanded to withdraw; and the lords ordered him to give 10,000*l.* bail for his forth-coming. Hereupon the Bishop was called again, and the Lord Keeper acquainted him with the order, which he consented to, hoping to get friends to be bound with him. Then it was moved, That the bishop of Ely might be bound by recognizance of 10,000*l.* for his appearance, until he put in such security as the house should approve of; which he consenting to, did immediately before the Lord Keeper in the house acknowledge as followeth, viz., ‘ Matthew Wren, Episcopus Eliensis, recognovit se de beredomino regi decem mille libras, levare de terris et tenementis bonis et catallis suis, &c. ad usum domini regis.’ The condition was, That he should appear from day to day, until Wednesday next; against which day he is to provide sufficient bail for 10,000*l.* such as this house shall approve of, to be bound for his forthcoming, and abiding the judgment of parliament.

July 5th, 1641.

Sir Thomas Widdrington brought in to the House of Commons twenty-five Articles of Impeachment against Matthew Wren, late bishop of Norwich, now bishop of Ely; which being read, and singly voted, were ordered to be engrossed. These Articles were as follows :

ARTICLES of IMPEACHMENT against MATTHEW WREN, D.D. late Bishop of NORWICH, and now Bishop of ELY.

That the said Matthew Wren, being popishly and superstitiously affected, did, at his first coming to be bishop of Norwich, which was in the year 1635, endeavour by sundry ways and means to suppress the powerful and painful preaching of the word of God, did introduce divers orders and injunctions, tending to superstition and idolatry, did disturb and disquiet the orderly and settled estate of the ministers and people, and churches of that diocess, to the great prejudice of his majesty, the great grief and disquiet, and hazard of the estates, consciences, and lives of many of his majesty's loyal subjects there, to the manifest bringing in and encreasing of prophaneness, ignorance and disobedience in the common people, as by the particulars ensuing may appear :

I. Whereas many chancels of churches, during all the time of queen Elizabeth, king James, and of his majesty that now is, had laid and been continued even and flat, without any steps ascending towards the east end of the same, and are by the Rubrick in the Book of Common Prayer, ordered to continue as they were, and so ought to have continued; he, of his own mind and will, without any lawful warrant or authority, in the year 1636, being then bishop of Norwich, ordered and enjoined, that the same should be raised towards the east-end, some two, some three, some four steps, that so the communion-table there placed altarwise, might be the better seen of the people.

II. He in the same year 1636, ordered,

That the communion-table, which is appointed by the said Rubrick, at the time of the celebration of the holy communion, to be placed in the body of the church or chancel, where divine prayers are usually read, and where the people might best hear, should be set up close under the wall at the east-end of the chancel, altarwise, and not to be removed from thence; whereby the minister, who is by the law to officiate at the north side of the table, must either stand and officiate at the north-end of the table so standing altarwise, or else after the popish and idolatrous manner, stand and officiate at the west-side of the table with his back towards the people.

III. He in the same year 1636, enjoined that there should be a rail set on the top of the new raised steps before the communion-table, so set altar-wise as aforesaid, which rail should reach from the south-side of the chancel to the north within, which the minister only should enter, as a place too holy for the people, and some of the people were punished for entering into it, as namely Daniel Whayman, and others.

IV. The more to advance blind superstition, he in the same year 1636, ordered that all the pews in the churches should be so altered, that the people might kneel with their faces eastward, towards the communion-table so set altarwise, as aforesaid; and that there should be no seats in the chancel above, or on either side, even up with the said table.

V. He in the same year 1636, enjoined that every minister, after he had finished the reading of some part of morning prayer at the desk, should go out from the same to the holy table, set altarwise, as to a more holy place, and there, when no communion was to be administered, read at the said table a part of the communion service, now commonly called the second service, whereby the consciences, both of the ministers and people, have been not only very much offended and grieved; but also the service itself was made very unprofitable to the people, who could not hear what was said, or prayed in that place.

VI. That both he in his own person, his chaplains, and others of the clergy; as namely, Mr. John Nowel, Mr. William Guest, Mr. John Dunkon, and others, following his example, did ever, after the table was so set altarwise, use and perform such, so many, and so frequent bowings, and adorations, examples, to draw others to the like superstitious gestures, as have given great scandal, and offence to the sound, sincere, and well-affected Christians.

VII. He in the said year 1636, enjoined all the people to come up to the rail to receive the holy communion, and there kneel, and do reverence before the holy table placed altarwise, and gave directions to the ministers, not to administer the communion to such people as should not so come up, and do such reverence as aforesaid; and that the minister should within the rail deliver the bread to such people only as should so come up and kneel before the said table as aforesaid; this was an offence to the consciences of many good people, who for fear of idolatry and superstition, durst not come to kneel at the said rail before the table so placed altarwise; and many people not coming up thither, though presenting themselves upon their knees in chancel, have not had the communion delivered unto them; and afterwards for not receiving have been excommunicated; as namely, John Shyming, Samuel Dunckon, Peter Fisher, Thomas Newton, Edward Bedwell, Edmund Day, John Frowar, and many others.

VIII. He did in the same year 1636, enjoin and command that there should be no sermons on the Lord's days in the afternoon, or on the week days at all, without his license; and also enjoined that there should be no catechising; but only such questions and answers, as are contained in the Book of the Common Prayer, not allowing the ministers to expound or open the points of the same to the people; he and his under officers affirming in public places that such an exposition might be as ill as a sermon; and the more to hearten and confirm the people in prophaning the Lord's-day, he enjoined the ministers to read publicly in their churches, a book published touching sports on the Lord's-day, for not reading whereof, some ministers were by the command and directions of the said bishop, suspended, viz. Mr. William Leigh, Mr. Richard Proud, Mr. Jonathan Burr, Mr. Matthew Brownrigg, Mr. Mott, and divers others; some deprived, Mr. Powell, Mr. Richard Raymond, Mr. Jeremy Borrowes, and some otherwise troubled; by all which, knowledge was suppressed, and ignorance and prophaneness introduced in that diocess.

IX. There having been formerly two kinds of ringing of bells, and calling people to the church in that diocess, viz. one kind when there were only prayers to be read, and another kind when there were both prayers to be read, and a sermon preached, whereby the people did apply themselves to the service of God in those places, where both prayers and preaching was to be: he, to hinder the people in their good desires in serving of God, and edifying their souls, did in the same year 1636, command and enjoin, that there should be no difference in ringing of bells to church when there was a sermon and when there was none.

X. Whereas many godly ministers, for the preventing of the great sin in the people of unworthy receiving of the holy communion of the Lord's Supper, did use to preach, two or three days before every communion, a preparation sermon to prepare and instruct the people in the right and worthy receiving of the communion, he the said bishop did in the said year 1636 forbid ministers to preach any such preparation sermon in that diocess; as namely, Mr. Devereux, Mr. Swan, and other ministers.

XI. Whereas all godly ordinances are sanctified, and made fruitful by the blessing of God upon them by prayer, he endeavouring to suppress the benefit and power of prayer in the year 1636, enjoined, that no minister should use any prayer before his sermon; but mo the people to pray only in the words of the 50 canon, made anno 1603, which canon was warranted by the law, and that no pray should be used before or after the sermon, unless he in his own person having been at the sermon in the town of Ipswich, when the preacher did use or make any other prayer, did sit upon his seat, without using or giving any reverence of kneeling, or otherwise, thereby to discountenance such prayer: and he, in the said year 1636, enjoined that no prayer should be made in the pulpit for the sick, and that such as were prayed for in the reading-desk, should be prayed for only in the two collects prescribe for the visitation of the sick in private houses.

XII. He, the more to alienate the people hearts from hearing of sermons, in the said year 1636 commanded and enjoined all ministers to preach constantly in their hood and surplice; thing not used before in that diocess, and much offensive to the people as a scandalous innovation; and the parishioners of Knatshall wanting a surplice, he did by his officers, in the year 1637, enjoin the churchwardens there, that no prayers should be read in that church, till they had got a surplice, which they not getting for the space of two Lord's days after, had no prayers during that time there.

XIII. That during the time of his being bishop of Norwich, which was about two years and four months, there were, for not reading the second service at the communion table set altarwise, for not reading the book of sports, for using conceived prayers before and after sermons, and for not observing some other illegal innovations by him and his under-officers, by and upon his directions and injunctions, sundry godly, painful, preaching ministers, that is to say, master William Powel, master John Carter, master Robert Peck, master William Bridges, master William Green, master Mott, master Richard Raymond, master Thomas Scot, master Greenhill, master Nicholas Beard, master Hudson, Robert Kent, Jeremy Burrows, master Thomas Allen, and others, to the number of fifty, excommunicated, suspended or deprived, and otherwise censured and silenced, to the undoing of many of them, their wives and children; and they could not be absolved without giving promise to conform to his directions, editis et edendis; by means whereof some ministers were enforced to depart this realm into Holland, and other parts beyond sea, viz. the said master Thomas Bridges, master Jeremy Burrows, master Thomas Allen, master John Ward; and others of Norwich, to remove into other peaceable diocesses, as namely, Mr. Edmund Calamy, Mr. Broom, Mr. Beard, and others; and some of them so prosecuted, as hath been suspected to be the cause of their deaths, as namely Mr. Thomas Scot and others; the terror of which proceedings hath caused other ministers to leave their cures, and go away, viz. Mr. William Kirington, Mr. Thomas

Warren, Mr. John Allen, and others: and if a stranger preached at the cure of such a parson suspended, the churchwardens permitting such parson so to preach, were enjoined penance, and otherwise troubled; as namely the churchwardens of Snailwell, and the stranger for preaching, was also therefore molested, viz. Mr. Ash, Mr. Eades, Mr. Manning, and other ministers.

XIV. That during the time he was bishop of the said see of Norwich, he did unlawfully compel the inhabitants of the several parishes within that diocese, to raise the floors of the chancels of their respective churches, to rail in their communion tables, to remove the pews and seats, and to make other alterations in the respective churches; in the doing whereof the said inhabitants were put to great, excessive, and unnecessary charges and expences, amounting in the whole, to the sum of 5,000*l.* and upwards; which said charges and expences, he did by unlawful means and courses, enforce the said inhabitants to undergo; and such of the said inhabitants, as did not obey the same, he did vex, trouble, and molest by presentments, citations, excommunications, tedious and frequent journeys, and by attendances at the courts of his chancellor, and other his officials, viz. the churchwardens of Linne, Ipswich, St. Edmundsbury, and others.

XV. That for not coming up to the rail to receive the holy communion, kneeling there before the table altarwise, for not standing up at the Gospel, and for not observing and performing of his unlawful innovations and injunctions, many other of his majesty's subjects, viz. Peter Fisher, Samuel Duncon, James Percival, John Armiger, Thomas King and others, have been by him, his chancellors, visitors, commissaries, and officials, by commands and injunctions, much molested, disquieted, and vexed in their estates and consciences, by citations to the courts, long attendance there, dismissal, fees, excommunications, penances, and other censures.

XVI. That by reason of the rigorous prosecutions and dealings in the last precedent Articles mentioned, and by reason of the continual superstitious bowing to, and afore the table set altarwise, the suspending, silencing, driving away of the painful preaching ministers, the suppressing and forbidding of sermons and prayers, the putting down of lectures, the suppressing means of knowledge and salvation, and introducing ignorance, superstition, and profaneness; many of his majesty's subjects, to the number of three thousand, many of which used trades, spinning, weaving, knitting and making of cloth, stuffs, stockings, and other manufactures of wool; that is to say, Daniel Sanning, Michael Metcalf, John Berant, Nicholas Metcalf, John Derant, Busby, Widow Mares, Richard Cock, John Dicks, Francis Laws, John Senty, and many others; some of them setting an hundred poor people on work, have removed themselves, their families and estates, into Holland, and other parts beyond the seas, and there set up and taught the natives there, the said manufactures, to the great hinderance of trade in this kingdom, and to the impoverishing, and bringing to extreme want; very many who were by those parties formerly set on work, to the great prejudice of his majesty and his people.

XVII. That he the said bishop, finding the people to distaste his innovations, hath often in public and private speeches, declared in the said year 1636, that what he did in the same, was by his majesty's command; whereby he, contrary to the duty of his place, which he held under his majesty, being dean of his majesty's royal chapel, and contrary to the duty of a good and loyal subject, endeavoured to free himself of blame, and to raise an ill opinion of his royal majesty, in the hearts of his loving subjects.

XVIII. That he the said Matthew Wien, being bishop of Norwich in the said year 1636, in the tower church in Ipswich, and other places, did in his own person use superstitious and idolatrous actions and gestures in the administration of the Lord's Supper, consecrating the bread and wine, standing at the West side of the table with his face to the East, and his back towards the people, elevating the bread and wine so high, as to be seen over his shoulders; bowing low, either to or before them; when he, after the elevation, had set them down on the table.

XIX. That he the more to manifest his Popish affections, in the said year 1636, caused a Crucifix, that is to say the figure of Christ upon the cross, to be engraven upon his episcopal seal, besides the arms of the see.

XX. That he hath chosen and employed such men to be his commissioners, rural deans, and to be his household chaplains, whom he knew to be, and stand affected to his innovated courses, and to Popish superstition, and to be erroneous and unsound in judgment and practice, as namely Mr. John Nowell, Mr. Edmund Mapletoft, Mr. John Dunkin, Mr. Boucke, Mr. Dun and others.

XXI. That he hath very much oppressed divers patrons of churches, by admitting, without any colour of title, his own chaplains, and others whom he affected, into livings which became void within his diocese; unjustly enforcing the true and right patrons to long and chargeable suits to evict such incumbents, and to recover their own right; some of which he did against his priestly word given to the said patrons, or their friends, in verbo sacerdotis, not to do the same; this he did in the case of one Mr. Rivet.

XXII. That he and others, in the year 1635, sold, or granted away the profits of his primary visitation for 500*l.* over and above the charges of the visitation, and for the better benefit of the farmer, set forth a Book in the year 1636, intituled, Articles to be enquired of within the Diocese of Norwich, in the first visitation of Matthew, lord bishop of Norwich, consisting of 139 articles; and wherein are contained the number of 897 questions, according to all which, the churchwardens were enforced to present upon pain of perjury; and some churchwardens, that is to say, Robert Langley, Charles Newton, Richard Hart, William Bull, and Zephany Ford, and others, not making presentments accordingly, were cited, molested and troubled, and enjoined penance; notwithstanding many of the said articles were ridiculous and impossible.

XXIII. That the churchwardens, and other men sworn at the visitation, were enforced to have their presentments written by clerks, specially appointed by such as bought the said visitation, to whom they paid excessive sums of money for the same: some twenty-two shillings, as namely, Richard Hurrell, John Punchard, and others, some more, some less, for writing one presentment, to the grievous oppression of his majesty's poor subjects in that diocess.

XXIV. Whereas by the laws of this realm no tithes ought to be paid out of the rents of houses, nor is there any custom or usage in the city of Norwich for such payments; yet the said bishop endeavoured to draw the citizens, and other the inhabitants within the said city, against their wills and consents to pay 2s. in the pound, in lieu of the tithes of houses within the several parishes of the said city, unto the ministers there of the said respective parishes; and the better to effect this his unjust resolution, he did by false and undue suggestions in the 14th year of his majesty's reign that now is, procure his majesty to declare under his highness's great seal of England his royal pleasure, That if any person within the said city shall refuse to pay according to the said rate of 2s. in the pound unto the minister of any parish within the said city; that the same be heard in the court of Chancery, or in the consistory of the bishop of Norwich; and that in such case no prohibition against the said bishop of Norwich, their chancellors or commissaries in the said courts of consistory, be granted; and if any such writ be at any time obtained, the Judges so granting the same, upon sight of his highness's said order, shall forthwith grant a consultation to the minister desiring the same; which said order and decree under the great seal of England tended to the violation of the oaths of the judges, and was devised, contrived, and made by the said bishop; and afterwards by his evil counsels and false surmises he did obtain his majesty's royal consent thereunto, and by colour of the order aforesaid, and other the doings of the said bishop, the citizens and inhabitants of Norwich aforesaid, viz. John Collar, Judith Perkeford, and others, have been enforced to pay the said 2s. in the pound in lieu of tithes; or else by suits and other undue means been much molested, and put to great charges and expences, contrary to the law and justice.

XXV. That he assumed to himself an arbitrary power, to compel the respective parishioners in the said diocess, to pay great and excessive wages to parish-clerks, viz. the parishioners of Yarmouth, Congham, Tostock and others, commanded his officers, that if any parishioner did refuse to pay such wages the should certify him their names, and he would set them into the high commission court for example of the rest, and that one or two out of Ipswich might be taken for that purpose.

And the said commons by protestation saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any other accusation or impeachment against the said Matthew Wren late bishop of Norwich, and now bishop of Ely; and also of replying to the Answer that by the said Matthew Wren shall make unto the said Articles or any of them, or of offering proof of the premises or any other impeachments or accusations that shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall, according to the course of parliaments, require, do pray that he the said Matthew Wren may be called to answer the said several crimes and misdemeanours, and receive such condign punishment as the same shall deserve, and that such further proceedings may be upon every of them had and used against him, as is agreeable to law and justice.

After reading these Articles, the Commons resolved, "That Matthew Wren, bishop of Ely, is in their opinion unfit, and unworthy to hold or continue any spiritual promotion or office in the church or common-wealth; and that the lords be desired to join with this house, to move his majesty to remove the said bishop from his person and service." Upon this,

Sir Philip Parker, knight of the shire for Suffolk, took occasion to speak as follows:—
"Mr. Speaker; I stand not up in my own particular behalf, but in the universal and general name of the whole kingdom. Alas! Mr. Speaker, they depend all upon our exemplary justice; which, if we do fully execute, will not only give great and plenary satisfaction to our union, but will likewise cause the land to smile hereafter with the blessed beams of prosperous felicity; but if the least error or smallest deliberation be overseen by us, (Oh! it strikes my trembling mind with horror to think on it) how will all things precipitate themselves into ruin most irrevocable? But I speak not this, as if any here would omit, or extenuate, the supremacy of justice in the least thought. To admonish you of that point were to bid the moon keep her monthly course, the spheres to reduce themselves in their circumference, or the sun to shine upon the earth. But I speak this only to add a spur unto you, lest we should at any time languish in our Heaven-proceeding journey. The cries of the people have come up to me: the voice of the whole nation tingles in my ears; and, methinks, I hear each subject wish, that we would briefly establish the church-government with all expedition. Let us first begin to confirm our religion, and God will bless our other proceedings the better. That was always my opinion, and, I am sure, the expectation of the whole kingdom. How long have we sat here, and how little have we effected? How much time have we consumed, and what little have we performed therein? How long have we laboured in this our daily travail, and as yet have brought forth but an embryo in what we did intend? It is true, I confess, we have tormented ourselves with daily troubles and vexations, and have been very solicitous for the welfare of the common-wealth; but what have we performed, what have we perfected? I will once more relate what my former opinion was, let us I say, begin in the real establishment of our religion; and as I said all our other determinations will succeed with a better omen; for indeed most of our delinquents are linked to this chain, they depend most on this point; therefore we should do well to enter speedily upon the work.

“Mr. Speaker, excuse my zeal in this case; for my mouth cannot imprison what my mind intends to let out, neither can my tongue conceal that which my heart desires to promulge. Behold the archbishop, that great incendiary of this kingdom, lies now like a fire-brand raked up in the embers; but if ever he chance to blaze again, I am afraid that what heretofore he had but in a spark, he will burn down to the ground in a full flame. Wherefore, let us begin, for the kingdom is pregnant with expectation in this point. I confess there are many more delinquents, for the judges and other knights walk in querpo; but they are only thunderbolts forged in Canterbury’s fire. I look upon them all but as polluted rivers, flowing from that corrupt fountain. Well, is it so then, that all depend on religion? Why are we then so backward in reforming the church? Why do we stick in this point, and not rather proceed in it with all expedition? For indeed according to the laws of this kingdom, as it hath the dignity of pre-eminence, so let us give it the priority in our determinations.

“Mr. Speaker, think with yourself, I pray, in what faction the church is now; in what schism; in what confusion of distracted sectaries it is promiscuously shaken; behold the Papists will have their way, the Brownists will have their way, the Anabaptists their way, the Puritans, as some call them, their way, the Jesuitical priests their way; and in these various ways, they make such a labyrinth of religion, that few or none scarce can find out the right way. It behoves us therefore, and is expedient, that we should add a period to those irregular ways, that the vulgar may no longer wander in these distracted paths.

“Mr. Speaker, I have now unloaded my mind of her weary burthen; and I beseech you digest my words, with your serious consideration, in this respect of establishing the church government, in true, sincere, perfect, and unpolluted religion; which if we do perform, and fully effect, we shall do great honour to God, get credit to ourselves, and give great satisfaction to the whole kingdom. This is my opinion; this is my expectation; this is my prayer; and lastly, this is my hope.”

July 20.

The Commons sent up the aforesaid Articles of Impeachment against Matthew Wren, bishop of Ely, by sir Thomas Widdrington, member for Berwick: who, upon presenting the same, made the following Speech:

“My Lords; I am commanded by the knights, citizens, and burghesses now assembled for the commons in parliament, to deliver to your lordships these Articles against Matthew Wren, D. D. late bishop of Norwich, and now bishop of Ely; may it please your lordships to hear them read. [Here the Articles were read.]

“My Lords, these Articles are dipped in those colours in which this bishop rendered himself to the diocese of Norwich: they need no gloss nor varnish. In them you may behold the spirit and disposition of this bishop: hear the groans and cries of the people; see a shepherd scattering (I had almost said devouring) his own flock. He that was desired to paint Hercules, thought he had done enough, when he had made a resemblance of the lion’s skin, which he was wont to carry about him as a trophy of his honour. I will not say, in these, you will find a resemblance of the lion’s skin. I am sure you will find the resemblance of the skins, (that is to say, the tattered and ruined fortunes) of poor innocent lambs, who have extremely suffered by the violence of this bishop. In 1635, this man was created bishop of Norwich. He is no sooner there, but he marcheth furiously. In the creation of the world, light was one of the first productions. The first visible action of this bishop, after his creation into this see, was to put out many burning and shining lights; to suspend divers able, learned, and conscientious ministers. He, that should have been the golden snuffer of these lights, became the extinguisher; and, when these are taken away, where shall poor men light their caudles?

“My Lords, this was not all: he puts out lights, and sets up firebrands in their places; suspends painful ministers, and set up idle, factious and superstitious priests, to use their own favourite word, in their places; yet it is the fortune of these men, at this time, like rivers in the ocean, to be buried in the extreme activity of their diocesan. He made a scourge, not of small cords, but of new injunctions and numerous articles, tied about with a strong twist of a most dangerous oath; and with this he whips, not buyers and sellers, but the faithful dispensers of the word, out of their churches, out of their estates, out of their dear country. This Noah (if I may so call him without offence) as soon as he entered into the ark of this diocese, he sends, nay, forces doves to fly out of this ark; and when they return unto him with olive branches in their mouths of peaceable and humble submission, he will not receive them into this ark again; unless, like ravens, they would feed upon the carrion of his new inventions, they must not have any footing there. He stands as a flaming sword, to keep such out of his diocese.

“ My Lords, unless he had done this, he could never have hoped to have brought that great work, he undoubtedly aimed at, to any perfection. Whilst the Palladium of Troy stood, that city was impregnable. The Greeks had no sooner stolen that away, but they instantly won the city: so then he first put out the candles, then was the opportunity to shuffle in his works of darkness: he first beats off the watchmen and seers; then was likely to follow that which the impiety of some was pleased to stile, ‘ The piety of the times.’ This being done, he then begins to dress out God’s worship, according to his own fancy. This he expresseth in injunctions and directions, the Minervas of his own brain. We find them stiled, ‘ Regales injunctiones domini episcopi;’ a stile too sacred to baptize his brats withal: I shall be bold to call them ‘ Tyrannicas injunctiones domini episcopi.’—Stories afford not a more barbarous cruelty, than to join a dead and a living body together; the one is miserably killed with the stench of the other. This bishop, who, like Aaron, should have stood between the living and dead, hath joined to lively ordinances many dead and venomous ceremonies; which have no other life than what they received from the breath of his injunctions; and these are pressed upon the consciences; even these must be observed, as moral laws. An arbitrary government in the church is more dangerous, more grievous than that in the state: this is exercised upon men’s consciences, the most tender parts; and is the very pinnacle of tyranny, and of all others the most intolerable. That blow, which will hardly be felt by the arm, will put out the eye.

“ My Lords, in the time of Richard 1, one of this man’s predecessors, a valiant bishop, went into the Holy War: This bishop hath raised a war at home in his own diocese; a war not against Saracens, Barbarians, Turks, or Infidels, but against good and well disposed people. I know not what stile to give this war: without doubt, my lords, this was no Holy War. The weapons used in this war were 28 Injunctions, 139 Articles, containing 879 Questions. The soldiers were chancellors, commissaries, officials, commissioners, rural deans, &c. Himself commanded in chief. The ways of assault and killing were by excommunications, suspensions, deprivations.—I stop here. ‘ Mille modis moritur mortales.’ The magazine, wherein all these were originally hatched and lodged, was the superstitious and malicious breast of this bishop. His diocese was the stage where the direful tragedies of this war were acted, by the space of two years and upwards. Thus did he trouble Israel, in the time of peace; nay, by these, he put some of the chariots and horsemen of Israel to flight; out of these he raiseth a farm of 500*l.* for his primary visitation. If it be considered, ‘ cum pertinentius,’ it was not dear, yet well improved; for it was but 40*l.* in the time of some of his predecessors. Will it please your lordship, with patience, to cast your eyes upon the model of this bishop’s zeal, piety, and religion let his affection to prayer and preaching speak for all the rest. First, for prayer: It was his hap to find a prayer, which I know no prayer; pretended to be prescribed by a canon, which is no canon; I mean the 55*th* canon, set forth in 1603; and no other prayer must be used in his diocese before sermon.—That monster of conceived prayer (pardon the expression, it is not mine own) seemed as bad to him as a spell or charm. It must not be used upon any occasion. Without doubt he would never have been so strait laced and severe in this particular, if he had but dreamed of that strait which a minister, a friend of his, was put unto by this means: the story is short; A butcher was gored in the belly by an ox; the wound was cured; the party desired public thanksgiving in the congregation; the minister, finding no form for that purpose, read the collect for churching of women.—Next for Preaching. That he is most able in this kind is agreed on by all; but that he ever preached himself in his diocese, saving once, I never heard affirmed by any. His next care was that others should not preach too often; if they did, they must be put into his black bill. He changed that golden sentence of ‘ Vae mihi si non predicavero,’ into ‘ Vae alii si predicaverint.’ He was so far from the practice of St. Paul, the great preacher of the Gentiles, who, we read, preached till midnight, that there must be no sermons in the afternoon; but there may be, nay, there must be, sports and pastimes then. And, as if he had stood in fear of the inarticulate language of bells which might foretell a sermon, he cannot endure the noise of a sermon in the toll of a bell. In a word: he adorned churches, at the charge of others; and spoiled pulpits, which ought to have been the greatest part of his own charge.

“ My Lords, you have now presented to your lordships a brother, nay, one whose place engaged him to be a father of the clergy: yet one who, like Joseph’s brethren, hath taken the coats from Joseph; nay they were forced to fly from him as Joseph from his mistress, or else they must taste of his forbidden waters; but, in their going away, he rent their skirts, nay their whole garments and livelihood from them. He hath taken the lock from many Samsons, and done what he could to put out their eyes, and to make them grind in the mill of his pernicious and dangerous innovations. He should, like Moses, have led his flock. Moses led the children of Israel through the Red Sea: this man drives part of his flock over the sea, but went not himself. Like Nimrod, he hath invaded the laws and liberties of the subject: he hath been as great a robber as ever was presented to your lordships: he hath robbed the king of his subjects, the greatest glory of kings; a kingdom of trade, of its tradesmen, the supporters of it. He that deprives the king of one subject, you know his punishment; and what shall be the punishment of him who hath robbed the king of so many subjects?—In the 14*th* of

Hon. S, we find a tenant in dower punished in action of waste, because she had destroyed two rich villains, and made them beggars. I appeal to your lordships what is his offence who hath committed so much wilful waste and spoil, beggared hundreds, not villains, but free-born subjects. He robbed souls of that sweet manna, which is Pabulum Animarum, the Word of God.

“ My Lords, I have not yet recourted all his robberies: he hath robbed God of part of his day, making part of that, a day of sports: he hath robbed the subjects of their undubitable birthright, the laws of the kingdom. The citizens of Norwich must pay tythes for the rents of houses; there is no law in England, nor custom in Norwich for it: nay, and that they may be sure to be robbed of justice too, the suit for these tythes must be in his own consistory, from whence there must be no appeal, no prohibition. The true patrons of churches; they are robbed of their presentations; others, who had none or small pretence of right, are admitted upon this unhallowed maxim, That if he should institute those who had right, the pretender was without remedy. By this he inverted a fundamental law of this nation, to invest remediless rights in unjust possessors.

“ My Lords, I cannot tell you all, but you can measure a lion by the paw. I am commanded to lay this great malefactor at your doors; one who hath been a great oppugner of the life and liberty of religion; and who set a brand of infamy (to use his own words) upon Ipswich education. In sum: one who is a complete mirror of innovation, superstition, and oppression. He is now in the snare of those Articles, which were the works of his own hands. The rod of Moses, at a distance, was a serpent; it was a rod again when it was taken into his hand: This bishop was a serpent, a devouring serpent, in the diocese of Norwich; your lordships peradventure will, by handling of him, make him a rod again; or, if not, I doubt not but your lordships will chastise him with such rods as his crimes shall deserve. My lords, I am commanded by the house of commons to desire your lordships, that this bishop may be required to make Answers to these Articles; and that there may be such proceedings against him, as the course and justice of parliament doth admit.”

No further proceedings upon this Impeachment appear to have taken place.* But see the Trial of the Twelve Bishops, No. 158.

* “ Wren was of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, and afterwards became master of Peter-House, chaplain to Charles I., prebendary of Winchester, dean of Windsor, and in 1634 was made bishop of Hereford: He was afterwards translated to Norwich, and in 1638 to Ely; during the Civil Wars his property was seized, and his person imprisoned in the Tower, where he continued 18 years without being brought to trial. At the Restoration he was reinstated in his bishoprick, and died at Ely House, London, 1667, aged 81.” Lempriere.

154. Proceedings in Parliament against Sir FRANCIS WINDEBANK,* knt. Secretary of State, for High Crimes and Misdemeanors:
16 CHARLES I. A. D. 1640. [4 Rushw. Coll. 68. 2 Cobb.
Parl. Hist. 682.]

IN the month of November 1640, the fifth and last parliament of king Charles I, met, and very soon this Parliament of Inquisition, as Saunderson calls it, began to look terrible to all that lodged but under a suspicion of guilt; but insufferable to those whose consciences condemned themselves. Sir Francis Windebank, Secretary of State, was said to be one of the

* “ Mr. Francis Windebank (soon after knighted) was made Secretary of State by the interest of hishop Laud, who has thus entered it in his Diary, 1632, June 15. ‘ Mr. Francis Windebank, my old friend, was sworn secretary of state; which place I obtained for him of my gracious master king Charles.’ He proved so much a creature of the Queen’s, and such an advocate and patron of all suffering Priests and Jesuits, that he got the character of a Papist, and brought the greater odium upon hishop Laud, who preferred him, and who for that reason was to answer to the people for his good behaviour. That which created the more envy, was the turning out an old secretary, sir John Coke, whose age and infirmities had indeed made him unfit for business.” Kennett.

“ About this time,” says Clarendon, “ sir

Francis Windebank, one of the principal Secretaries of State, and then a member of the house of commons, was accused of many transactions on the behalf of the Papists, of several natures (whose extraordinary patron indeed he was) and he being then present in the House, several warrants under his own hand were produced for the discharge of prosecutions against priests, and for the release of priests out of prison: whereupon, whilst the matter should be debated, according to custom he was ordered to withdraw, and so went into the usual place, the committee-chamber; immediately whereupon, the house of commons went to a Conference with the lords upon some other occasion, and returning from that Conference, no more resumed the debate of the Secretary, but having considered some other business rose at their usual hour; and so the Secretary had liberty to go to his own house; latter; who, observing a storm rising strongly against him, by some votes in the house, about the beginning of December, thought proper to withdraw himself to a place of greater safety, and fled into France.

from whence, observing the disposition of the House, and well knowing what they were able to say against him, he had no more mind to trust himself in that company, but the same night withdrew himself from any place where enquiry might be made for him, and was no more heard of till the news came of his being landed in France.

“ I could never yet learn the true reason, why they suffered secretary Windebank to escape their justice (for the lord Finch, it was visible he was in their favour, and they would gladly have preserved him in the place) against whom they had more pregnant testimony of offences within the verge of the law, than against any person they have accused since this Parliament, and of some that, it may be, might have proved capital, and so their appetite of blood might have been satisfied: For, besides his frequent letters of intercession in his own name, and signification of his majesty's pleasure, on the behalf of Papists and Priests, to the Judges and to other ministers of justice; and Protections granted by himself to priests, that nobody should molest them; he harboured some priests in his own house, knowing them to be such; which, by the statute made in the 29th year of queen Elizabeth, is made felony: and there were some warrants under his own hand for the release of priests out of Newgate, who were actually attainted of treason, and condemned to be hanged, drawn, and quartered; which by the strict letter of the statute, the lawyers said, would have been very penal to him.

“ I remember one story brought into the House concerning him, that administered some mirth; a messenger (I think his name was Newton) who principally attended the service of apprehending Priests, came one day to him in his garden, and told him, ‘ That he had brought with him a priest, a stirring and active person, whom he had apprehended that morning; and desired to know, to what prison he should carry him.’ The Secretary sharply asked him, ‘ Whether he would never give over this blood thirsty humour?’ and in great anger calling him Knave, and taking the warrant from him by which he had apprehended him, departed without giving any other direction. The Messenger appalled, thought the priest was some person in favour, and therefore took no more care of him, but suffered him to depart. The priest, freed from this fright, went securely to his lodgings, and within two or three days was arrested for debt, and carried in execution to prison. Shortly after, secretary Windebank sent for the messenger, and asked him, ‘ What was become of the priest he had at such a time brought before him?’ He told him, ‘ That he conceived his

The ARTICLES against him were ready drawn up, and the Crimes he was accused of were as follows:*

“ I. Seventy-four Letters of Grace to Recusants, within these four years, signed by his own hand. II. Sixty-four Priests in the Gatehouse, within these four years discharged, for the most part, by him. III. Twenty-nine discharged by his verbal order. IV. A Warrant to protect one Muffon, a condemned Priest, and all the houses he frequented: V. One committed by the king's own hand, and discharged by him, without signification of the king's plea-

‘ honour had been offended with the apprehension of him, and therefore he had looked no farther after him.’ The Secretary in much passion told him, ‘ the discharging a priest was no light matter, and that if he speedily found him not, he should answer the default with his life; that the priest was a dangerous fellow, and must not escape in that fashion.’ The messenger, besides his natural inclination to that exercise, terrified with those threats, left no means untried for the discovery, and at last heard where the man was in execution in prison: thither he went and demanded the priest (who was not there known to be such) as his prisoner formerly, and escaped from him; and by virtue of his first warrant took him again into his custody, and immediately carried him to the Secretary; and within few days after, the priest was discharged, and at liberty. The jailor, in whose custody he had been put for debt, was arrested by the parties grieved, and he again sued the messenger, who appealed for justice to the house of commons against the Secretary.

“ This case had been presented to the Committee, and was ready to be reported, with all those warrants under his own hand before-mentioned, at the time when secretary Windebank was in the house. Besides that, he was charged by the lords, by message, or at a conference, for breach of privilege at the dissolution of the last parliament, and signing Warrants for the searching the Studies and Papers of some members; for which, according to the doctrine then received, he might have been put into the custody of the serjeant of the House. But, as the last occasion was not laid hold of, because it would have inevitably involved his brother secretary sir Harry Vane, who was under the same charge, and against whom indeed that charge was aimed: so, it seems, they were contented he should make an escape from any trial for the rest; either, because they thought his place would be sooner void by his flight than by his trial, which would have taken up some time, and required some formality, they having designed that place to Mr. Hollis; or, that they thought he would, upon any examination, draw in somewhat to the prejudice of sir Henry Vane, whom they were to protect: and so they were well content with his escape.”

pure therein. VI. A Petition of St. Giles in the fields, near London, to the king, of the Increase of Popery in their parish, wherein twenty-one persons were seduced and turned by two priests, the which priests were both discharged by him."

From Calais, this unfortunate Statesman wrote the following Letter to Philip earl of Pembroke, then Lord Great Chamberlain of England :

" My Lord ; I owe myself to your lordship for your late favours, and therefore much more the account of myself; though the debt, in either respect, be of little consideration, and the caucelling of both may be of greater advantage to you than to continue the obligation.

" This account had been presented to your lordship at my first arrival here with my first dispatches, but I was so mortified with my hazardous passage in an open shallop, and so perplexed with the thoughts of miseries, into which I find myself plunged; and besides, the departure of the messenger that carried those letters, was so sudden, that it was not possible to perform this duty to your lordship sooner; for the which I do most humbly crave pardon. Your lordship may now please to accept the expressions, from the saddest and most wounded soul in the whole world, who am a spectacle of misery in myself, in my distressed wife and children, and in my whole fortunes; who have left the attending of my sovereign and master, and access to the best prince in the world; who am become a scorn and by-word to all the world, both at home and abroad; a wanderer, an exile from my own country, now in the declination of my years, and likely to end my days in a remote country, far from the comfort of all my friends.

" What I am guilty of none knows so well as his majesty, whom I have served faithfully, diligently, and with as true and loyal a heart, according to my poor abilities, as any other whatsoever; and if I found my conscience charged with any crime of baseness, corruption, infidelity, or any thing else unworthy of a gentleman, I should not venture to address these complaints to your lordship, or to any other person of honour.

" In this disconsolate estate, being an object not altogether unworthy of your Lordship's compassion, be it for no other respect, but that I have long served the king and queen's majesties, I doubt not but your lordship, in your generosity and goodness, will have a lively sense and feeling of my sufferings, and vouchsafe me such relief as in your honour you may; and if myself, who, by course of nature, cannot be now of long continuance, be not considerable, I must beseech your lordship to have pity upon my poor innocent wife and children, that they receive such comfort and assistance from you in my absence, that they may be preserved from perishing. And to that end I most humbly crave your lordship's favour to this bearer, my son, and to give him the honour of access whensoever he shall make his addresses to you; wherein you shall do a work of singular charity.

" Now, because there is an opinion in the world, that I have much improved my fortune by the Roman party, and that there hath been a design, by my ministry, to introduce popery into England, I shall humbly crave your lordship's patience in giving me leave to clear these two great misunderstandings; which, if they were true, were sufficient to render me incapable of his majesty's favours, or of the compassion of any person of honour whatsoever.

" For the first, it is notorious to all the world, that having now served his majesty, in the place of secretary, for the space of above 8 years, I have not added one foot of land to the inheritance left me by my father; which, in land and lease, was not above 500*l.* per annum; a poor and inconsiderable estate for a secretary, and such a one as most secretaries have more than trebled in a short time: for my manner of living, it hath been much under the dignity of a secretary, and if I had not been very frugal, I could not have subsisted; where then this concealed mass of treasure is, I wish those that speak so liberally of it would let me know; for I do protest to God I am utterly to seek where to discover it; and at this present I am so unfurnished with money, that if his majesty cause me not to be supplied, I am unable to subsist in these parts, without exposing my family in England to the danger of starving; and yet neither my purpose nor inclination is to live otherwise here, than in the greatest obscurity and closeness that possibly I may. I assure your lordship that those of the Roman party that passed my hands, by his majesty's commandment, were poor distressed creatures, and far from being able to enrich me: and besides, how little I have attended my own private interest, and how freely and like a gentleman (I hope I may speak the truth without ostentation) I have done courtesies to all, I wish it should rather appear by the testimony of such as have made use of my services, than by my own. My father and I have served the crown of England near 80 years together, in which time, if a greater estate had been raised it might well have been justified, considering the great employments near the persons of queen Elizabeth, king James, and his majesty that now is, we both have had; and your lordship may believe it, for I avow it upon the faith of a Christian, that it is no more than I have above-mentioned; and whether there are not many, from less employments, have risen to be noblemen, and made their fortune accordingly, I leave the world to judge.

" For the other suspicion, of my being a favourer or advancer of Popery, I protest before Almighty God, and as I shall answer at the last dreadful day, that I know no ground for the least suspicion thereof; neither am I myself, nor is any of mine, to my knowledge, guilty of the least thought of any such purpose; for myself, I received my baptism in the church of England, and I know nothing in the church of Rome that can win me from that church wherein I was made a Christian; I do therefore hold this church of England, not only a true and orthodox church, but the most pure and near the primitive church of any in the Christian world; and this I will be ready to seal with my blood, whensoever there shall be occasion; with this further protestation, that if I did not hold it so, I would not continue in it for any worldly consideration whatsoever*.

“ For that which hath passed my hands for favour of that party, it hath been merely ministerial, as his majesty best knows: and I must be bold to say that his majesty hath not been deceived by it, but hath received many greater advantages: besides that, if a secretary of state

* Saunderson says, “ That sir Francis Windebank having been questioned and mainly convicted for repriming Jesuits and Priests, and of worse matters suspected guilty, got over into France, where he remained to his death a professed Roman Catholic;” but Whitlocke is more tender, saying only, “ That it was reported he remained to his death a professed Papist.”—Life of Charles 1, p. 333. Memoirs, p. 87.

should not hold intelligence with the party, is absolutely to disable him from the service of the state, and that hath been done always more or less, and so must always continue: kings and their ministers of state have ever had, and might ever have, a latitude according to time and occasion, and cannot be so tied according to strictness of law, as others are, without peril to the government; therefore, when the Roman party were practique and busy about the state, there was reason to be more strict; but now, by the wisdom of the queen and her good offices, they are better tempered, less severity hath been used; it being the prerogative of the prince to use moderation according to the accusation. Further than this I have not had to do with the Roman party, nor thus far, but in obedience to my master's commandment; which I hope shall not be censured a crime.

This being my condition, I most humbly submit it to your lordship's wisdom and goodness; and seeing there is no malignity in it, nor prejudice to the state, that your lordship would vouchsafe me your favour and protection, and preserve from perishing your lordship's most humble and faithful, though much distressed servant,

“ FRANK WINDEBANK.”

155. Proceedings against Sir GEORGE RATCLIFF,* kn. on an Impeachment for High Treason: 16 CHARLES I. A. D. 1640. [4 Rushw. Coll. 44, 90. 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 698.]

AFTER the accusation of the earl of Strafford, the House of Commons fell into debate concerning sir George Ratcliff; some members of the house giving information against him, That there was cause to accuse him of High Treason, and that he ought to be sent for hither to answer it before the parliament of England, though he be a member of the parliament now sitting in Ireland; but some scruples being made about sending for him, it was referred to a Committee of seven, viz. Mr. Selden, Mr. St. John, Mr. Palmer, Mr. Solicitor, Mr. Maynard, Mr. Grimston, and Mr. Chadwell, to consider of that matter and to make a Report to the house; who afterward reported, “ That the Committee were of opinion, that it is better to examine this matter according to the rules and foundation of this House, than to rest upon scattered instances.” They further find an Information given of High Treason against sir George Ratcliff, which if it be true, then there is no doubt but in case of High Treason, (which privilege of parliament neither here nor there doth reach unto) sir George Ratcliff may be sent for, though a member of parliament there.—He was accordingly sent for and committed to the Gate-House.

* “ Sir George Ratcliff was accused here of High Treason upon pretence of being a confederate with the Earl of Strafford in his Treason; but in truth, that he might not be capable of giving any evidence on the behalf of him and thereupon sent for into this kingdom.” Lord Clarendon.

On the 31st of December 1640, Mr. Pym, in the name of the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the House of Commons, did present Articles to the lords, in maintenance of their Accusation of High Treason against sir George Ratcliff, the Articles were read openly, in hac verba:

ARTICLES of the Commons, assembled in Parliament, against Sir GEORGE RATCLIFF, knight, in maintenance of their Accusation, whereby he stands charged with High Treason.

I. That he the said sir George Ratcliff hath traiterously conspired and confederated with Thomas earl of Strafford, to subvert the fundamental laws and government of the realms of England and Ireland, and to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government, against laws; and hath been a counsellor, actor and abettor, in that wicked and traiterous design of bringing the Irish army into England, to compel the subjects of it kingdom to submit thereunto.

II. That he hath traiterously confederated and conspired with the said earl of Strafford, and hath been an actor, counsellor, and instrument to him, in assaunding and exercising regal power over the liberties and persons, lands and goods, of his majesty's subjects of Ireland; and hath accordingly exercised the same tyrannically, to the subversion and undoing of divers of his majesty's liege people.

III. That, for the better enabling the said Earl and himself to go on with their traitorous designs, he the said sir George Ratcliff traiterously joined and confederated with the said Earl, in taking great sums of money out of his majesty's exchequer of Ireland, and converting them to the use of the said Earl and himself, when his majesty was necessitated for his own urgent occasions; the army having been then long unpaid.

IV. That he hath traiterously confederated with the said Earl, and abused the power and authority which he held in Ireland, to the countenancing and encouraging of papists, that he might settle a mutual dependance and confidence betwixt the Earl and himself and that party, and to alienate the affections of the Irish papists from the subjects of England, and by their help to prosecute and accomplish their malicious and tyrannical designs.

V. That he hath traiterously confederated with the said earl of Strafford, in plotting and endeavouring to stir up enmity and hostility betwixt his majesty's subjects of Ireland and those of Scotland.

VI. That, the better to preserve himself and the said Earl in these and other traitorous courses, he hath laboured to subvert the rights of parliaments, and the ancient course of parliamentary proceedings.

All which offences were committed during the time that the said sir George was a counsellor of state in the kingdom of Ireland, and had taken oath for his faithful discharge of the same. By which actions, confederacies, and conspiracies, he hath traiterously, and contrary to his allegiance, endeavoured the ruin and destruction of his majesty's kingdoms; for which they do impeach him the said sir George Ratcliff of High Treason against our sovereign lord, his crown and dignity.

And the said Commons, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any other Accusation or Impeachment against the said sir George Ratcliff, and also of replying to the Answers that he the said sir George shall make unto the said Articles, or to any of them, and of offering proof also of the premises, or any of them, or of any other Impeachment or Accusation that shall be by them exhibited, as the case shall, according to the course of parliaments, require, do pray that the said sir George may be put to answer to all and every the premises; and that such proceedings, examinations, trial, and judgment, may be upon every of them had and used, as is agreeable to law and justice.

After the reading of these Articles, Mr. Pym delivered himself to the Lords in these words:

"My Lords; By hearing this Charge, your lordships may perceive what near conjunction there is between this cause and the earl of Strafford's. The materials for the most part are the same in both. The offences of the Earl, moving from a higher orb, are more comprehensive; they extend both to England and Ireland. These (except in one particular of reducing England by the Irish army) are confined within that kingdom. The Earl is charged as an author; sir George Ratcliff as an instrument and subordinate actor. The influences of superior planets are often augmented and enforced, seldom mitigated, by the concurrence of the inferior, where merit doth arise not from well-doing, but from ill. The officiousness of ministers will rather add to the malignity of their instructions, than diminish it, that so they may more fully ingratiate themselves with those upon whom they depend.

"In the crimes committed by the Earl, there appears to be more haughtiness and fierceness, being acted by his own principles: Those motions are ever strongest which are nearest the primum mobile. But in those of sir George Ratcliff, there seems to be more baseness and servility, having resigned and subjected himself to be acted by the corrupt will of another. The earl of Strafford hath not been bred in the study and practice of the law; and, having stronger lusts and passions to incite him, and less knowledge to restrain him, might more easily be transported from the rule.

"Sir George Ratcliff, in his natural temper and disposition more moderate, and by his education and profession better acquainted with the grounds and directions of law, was carried into his offences by an immediate concurrence of will, by a more corrupt suppression and inthralling of his own reason and judgment.

"My lords, as both these have been partners in offending, so it is the desire of the commons, they may be put under such Examination and Trial, and other proceedings of justice, as may bring them both to partake in a deserved punishment, for the safety and good of both kingdoms."

Then sir George Ratcliff was brought to the bar, and told that the house of commons had brought up Articles of High Treason against him; which being read unto him (having liberty granted him to speak,) he desired their lordships that he might have Counsel assigned him, and that they might have liberty to come to him to advise him, because he conceived there was in the Charge divers points of law to be considered, and he himself was altogether unknowing in the manner of proceedings of this house; next, he desired that he might be allowed a competent time to answer.

This being resolved of, the Lords were pleased to call sir George Ratcliff in again; and the Speaker told him the House had granted both his requests, and acquainted him with the aforesaid order; and then he withdrew.

Then their lordships thought fit to call the Keeper of the Gatehouse, and told him that sir George Ratcliff was now committed by this house to the Gatehouse, upon an Accusation of High Treason: Therefore their Lordships would now expect from him that he should be kept in safe and sure custody, upon his peril;

and that every night he must take a note what persons have visited him that day, and every Saturday to give an account thereof to this house.—See the next Case.

156. Impeachment of Sir RICHARD BOLTON, knt. Lord Chancellor of Ireland; Dr. JOHN BRAMHALL, Lord Bishop of Derry; Sir GEORGE LOWTHER, knt. Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas; and Sir GEORGE RATCLIFF, knt.; before the House of Lords in Ireland: 16 CHARLES I. A. D. 1641. [4 Rushw. Coll. 214.]

THIS Impeachment was brought up to the House of Lords in Ireland March 4th, 1641, by Captain Audley Mervin, who introduced it with the following Speech:

“ My lords; I am commanded by the knights, citizens and bargesses of the Commons House, to present unto you Ireland’s Tragedy; the gray-headed Common Laws funeral; and the active Statutes death and obsequies. This dejected spectacle answers but the prefiguring type of Cæsar’s murder, wounded to death in the Senate, and by Brutus his bosom friend. Our Cæsar’s image by reflection, even the fundamental Laws and Statutes of this kingdom, the sole means by which our estates are confirmed, our liberties preserved, our lives secured, are wounded to death in the Senate, I mean in the Courts of Justice, and by Brutus too, even by those persons that have received their beings and subsistence from them: so that here enters first those inseparable twins, Treason, and Ingratitude.

“ In a plain phrase, (my lords), I tender unto you Treason, High-Treason, such a Treason, that wants nothing but words to express it.—To counterfeit the king’s seal, to counterfeit the king’s money, it is Treason: but this dies with the individual party: to betray a fort is Treason; but it dies with a few men. To betray an army is Treason; but it dies with a limited number; which may be reinforced again by politic industry: to blow up both houses of parliament, is Treason; but succeeding ages may replant branches by a fruitful posterity: but this High-Treason, by which I do now again in the name of the House of Commons, charge and impeach sir Richard Bolton, kt. lord chancellor of Ireland, and sir Gerard Lowther, kt. lord chief justice of the common-pleas; John, lord bishop of Derry, and sir George Ratcliff, kt. in its nature so far transcends any of the former, that the rest seem to be but petty larcenies in respect of this.

“ What is it to subvert the fundamental laws of this kingdom? High-Treason. What is it with a contumacious malice to trample under feet the rich legacies of our fore-fathers, purchased with sweat and expence. I mean the statute laws? High-Treason. What is it, through an innate antipathy to the public good, to incarcerate the liberty of the subject under the iron and weighty chains of an arbitrary government? High-Treason! What is it, since his majesty is the amiable and delightful portraiture of flourishing and indulgent justice to his subjects, to represent him personated in their extrajudicial censures and judgments; but to possess (if possible) the hearts of his loyal subjects of this kingdom, that he is a bloody and devouring tyrant, and to provoke their never dying allegiance into a desperate and fatal rebellion? What is it to violate the Grants of many of his majesty’s progenitors, kings and queens of England, confirmed under the broad-seal, being the public faith of this kingdom, by an extra-judicial breach, grounded upon no record? What is it to insert a surreptitious Clause, forged by some servile brain, in the preamble of our last Act of Subsidies: by which the king’s most excellent majesty, and the earl of Strafford are placed in one and the same sphere, allowing them but equal influences to nourish the allegiance of this kingdom. What is this but to extol other than regal authority; and to crucify the majesty of our sovereign between the two thieves of government, Tyranny and Treason?

“ My lord; having such a full and rushing gale to drive me into the depth of these occasions, I can hardly steer and confine my course within the compass of patience, since I read in the first volume of their brows, the least of these to be the certain ruin of the subject; and if proved, a most favourable prologue to usher in the Tragedy of the Actors, Counsellors and Abettors herein: What was then the first and main question? It was the subversion of the fundamental laws of this kingdom. Let them Magna Charta that lies prostrated, besmeared and groveling in her own gore, discount her wounds, as so many pregnant and undeniable proofs. Mark the epithet ‘ Magna,’ Kæm confirmed by thirty parliaments in the succession of eighteen kings, the violation of which hath several times engaged the kingdom of England in a voluntary sacrifice: a Charter which imposeth that pleasant and well becoming Oath upon all sovereignty, to vindicate and preserve the immunity thereof before the crown incircle the royal temples in this oath of so high consequence and general interest, his majesty doth in a manner levy a fine to his subjects use, for avoiding all fraudulent conveyances in the administration of justice; and this oath is transplanted unto the judges, as feoffees in trust, appointed between his majesty and the subject, and sealed by his majesty’s provident care, with that emphatical penalty, that their estates and lives shall be in the king's mercy, upon the violation of the same, either in whole or in part; Neither hath the deserved punishment for the breach of this oath, been enacted, as bugbears to enforce the obedience of children.

"No, my lords, the just execution of it upon their predecessors, though in breaches not so capital, might have warned them to have strangled their ill born resolutions in the cradle, before they should more proclaim their infamy, and petition for their punishment. Witness sir Thomas Wayland his banishment, confiscation of his goods and lands, only for his mercenary justice contrary to his Oath, who was chief justice of the Common Pleas, in the time of Edward 1. Witness sir William Thorp, Chief Justice of the King's Bench in the time of Ed. 3, who was adjudged to be hanged, because he had broken the king's Oath made unto the people, wherewith he was entrusted; for so was the interpretation of the reason entered in the roll.

"Yet, my lords, though Magna Charta be so sacred for antiquity; though its confirmation be strengthened by oath, though it be the proper dictionary that expounds meum and fructus, and assigns every subject his birthright, it only survives in the Rolls, but is miserably rent and torn in the Practice. These words, 'salva contentemento,' live in the Rolls, but they are dead in the Star-chamber. These words, 'Nullus homo liber disseisitur de libero suo tenemento nisi per iudicium parium,' live in the Rolls, but they are dead where property and free-hold are determined by paper petitions; These words, 'Nulli vendemus, nulli differemus justitiam,' live in the Rolls, but are dead when the suits, judgments, and executions of the subjects are wittingly or illegally retarded, suspended and avoided: Shall we desire to search the mortal wounds inflicted upon the Statute Laws? Who sees them not lying upon their death-beds, stabbed by Proclamations, their primitive and genuine tenures escheated by Acts of State, and strangled by Monopolies?

"Will you survey the Liberties of the Subject? every prison spews out illegal Attachments and Commitments; every pillory is dyed with the forced blood of the subjects, and hath ears, though not to hear, yet to witness this complaint. Do you doubt of the defacement of the amiable offices of his majesty's most transcendent, and renowned justice and grace? Let then that microcosm of letters patents, confirmed under his majesty's and his predecessors broad seal of the kingdom, being the public faith thereof, and yet unchristened by frivolous and private opinions, rise up in judgment. Let the abortive judgment of the tenure in capite, where no tenure was expressed; nay, let the heretical traitorous opinions, where the tenure was expressed, yet to draw in all by markets and fairs, granted in the same patents, rise up in judgment.—What glass hath this unhappy divided kingdom from his majesty's presence and audience to contemplate the fair and ravishing form of his royal intentions in, but in the clear and disphanous administration of his justice? And what do these traitorous and illegal practices aim at, but in affront to his majesty, which we most tenderly resent, and discontent to his subject, to multiply, as by a magic glass, the royal dispensation of his favours, into the ugly and deformed visage of their suppression of the liberties, devastation of estates, and deprivation of the lives of his loyal subjects; so that it may be said, 'Regali capiti cervicem consul equinam jungere sic vellet variasque inducere plumas.'

"My Lords; these ought to be considered, with as serious and attentive an ear, as they were practised by mischievous experimenta. Inquire of the Netherlands why their fields are grown fertile by the inundation of blood; why the pensive matrons solemnize too too frequent funerals of their husbands and issue, and they will answer, That it was for the preservation of their laws, which tyranny would have innovated. This kingdom personated in the sable habit of a widow, with dishevelled hairs, seems to petition your lordships, that since she is a mother to most of us, yet certainly a nurse unto us all, that you would take some order for a redress of her tyrannical oppressions.

"These persons impeached, resemble the opacous body of the earth, interposed to eclipse that light and vigour, which the solar aspect of majesty would communicate unto his subjects. They imitate the fish Sepia, that vomits a dark liquor out of her mouth, to cloud the waters for her securer escape. They are those to whom the keys have been committed, yet they have barred the door to them that knocked. They are those unnatural parents, that give their children stones instead of bread, and scorpions for fish. Was it to this purpose that the royal authority situated them in these eminent places, that, like beacons upon high bills, they should discover and proclaim each innovation and stratagem against the public weal; whilst they, in the mean time, employ their fires to a public incendiary, or like Ignes fatui, seduce the easy and believing traveller into pits and unexpected mires?

"Were they sworn to seal their damnation, and not the confirmation of our liberties, estates, and lives? Shall a man be censured for perjury in that breach of his private faith, and these be justifiable in Treason, aggravated by perjury against the crown and public faith of the kingdom? No, my lords, your grave, judicious, and mature examination, and deserved punishment of these traitorous proceedings, will speak these times as glorious to posterity in their reformation, as now they are lamented in their persecution. The blood-thirsting sword of an hostile enemy by a timely union and a defensive preparation may be prevented. The thin-ribbed carcass of an universal famine may have his consumption restored by a supply from our neighbouring nations. The quick-spreading venom of an infectious pestilence may be prevented by antidotes, and qualified by physical remedies: but this Catholic grievance, like a snake in the most verdant walks, (for such are the unblemished laws truly practised) stings us to death when we are most secure, and, like the king's evil, can only be cured, by his majesty's free and gracious permission, of our modest and gentle proceedings for his vindication, and our preservation therein included.

"Spenser and Gaveston,* who have left their names monumentally odious, for the evil counsel they fed the king's ears with, yet did possibly advance their own friends; whilst these dart their envy and treason as from a common center, equally touching the bounds of every superficiality: for as concerning the valid estates, they have illegally overthrown them; when by your lordship's industry the laws receive their vigour, they will resume their confirmation. But the estates happily in themselves legal, that they have in an extrajudicial form established, will haste as speedily to their dissolution; so, that, Judas like, they betrayed their best friends with a kiss.

"My Lords, I cannot find in any surviving chronology of times, this season, to be paralleled with all circumstances: which makes me view the records amongst the infernal spirits, to find if, matched there, I might extenuate their facts, where first they appear like the false spirit, sent into the mouth of the prophets of Achab, to speak delusions to subvert the host of God. The most vehement and traitorous encounter of Satan, is lively decyphered in the true example of Job; where first I observe the disanalogy; he overthrows not Job's Magna Charta, he disseizes him not of his inheritance, nor dispossesses him of his leases, but only disrobes him of some part of his personal estate: when he proceeds to infringe Job's liberty he doth not pillory him, nor cut off his ears, nor bore him through the tongue; he only spots him with some ulcers: Here Satan stays, when these persons, by their traitorous combinations, envy the very blood that runs unspilt in our veins; and by obtruding bloody acts, damned in the last parliament, will give Satan size-ance and the dice, at Irish, in enthralling the lives of the subjects, by their arbitrary judicature. I would not, my lords, be understood to impute unto judges an infallibility, nor in impeaching these, to traduce those, whose candour and integrity shine with a more admired lustre, than their white furs, who, like trophies of virgin-justice, stood fixed and unmoved in the rapid torrent of the times, while these like straws and chips played in the streams, until they are devolved in the ocean of their deserved ruin. No, my lords, humanum est errare; and the law allows writs of error, and arrests of judgment; but where there is crassa ignorantia, against their oaths, against the fundamental, elementary, and known laws of the kingdom; nay, my lords, where it is rather premeditata mu- litia, where there is an emulating policy, who should raze and embezzle the records in the practick, that are for the tender preservation of our liberties, estates, and lives, seeking only to be glorious in a national destruction, as if their safety were only involved in our ruin, there I have command to pity, but not to excuse them.

"To kill a Judge, quatenus a Judge, is not Treason; but to kill a Judge sitting on the bench, is treason; not for that the law intends it out of any malice against the party, but for malice against the law; Where then can an intensive or an extensive malice be more expressed or employed against the law, than the practical dialect of these persons impeached, speaks with a known and crying accent. The Benjamites slung stones with their left hands, yet they would not miss an hair's breadth: These extrajudicial proceedings are slung with the left, I mean they are sinistrous, and imprint their black and blue marks more certain and more fatal: so that they may say, 'Quæ regio in terris nostri non plena laboris?' Though these things be familiar unto us, yet I cannot but admire how this unproportionable body of judicature, should swell up into such a vast and ulcerous dimension. But why should I? considering this eccentric motion of the body of the law, had his birth obscure, resembling the tares that were sowed in the night-time: but here is the difference, they were sown by the enemy in the absence of the master; but these are sown by the grand masters themselves purposely, to overtop and choke the expected harvest. Innovations in law, and consequently in government, creep in like heresies in religion, slowly and slyly, pleading in the end a saucy and corrupt legitimacy, by uncontroled prescription.

"My lords, this is the first sitting; and I have only chalked out this deformed body of High Treason; I have not drawn it at length, lest it might fright you from the further view thereof.

"In conclusion, It is the humble desire of the Commons, that the parties impeached may be secured in their persons, sequestered from this house, from the Council-Table, and from all places of judicature (as being civiliiter mortui) that they may put in their Answers to the Articles ready now to be exhibited against them, and that all such further proceedings may be secretly expedited, as may be suitable to justice and the precedents of parliaments, so his majesty may appear in his triumphant goodness and indulgence to his people, and his people may be ravished in their dutiful and cheerful obedience and loyalty to his majesty. Your lordships may live in records to posterity, as the instrumental reformers of these corrupted times, and the kingdom and commonwealth may pay an amiable sacrifice in retribution and acknowledgment of his majesty's multiplied providence for our preservation herein."

ARTICLES of the knights, citizens and burgeses in Parliament assembled, against Sir RICHARD BOLTON, Lord Chancellor of Ireland; JOHN Lord Bishop of DERRY; Sir GERARD LOWTHER, kt. Lord-Chief Justice of his majesty's Court of Common-Pleas; and Sir GEORGE RATCLIFF, kt. in maintenance of their Accusation, whereby they stand charged with High Treason.

I. That the said sir Richard Bolton, kt. lord chancellor of Ireland, John lord bishop of Derry, sir Gerard Lowther, kt. lord chief justice of his majesty's court of Common-Pleas, and sir George Ratcliff, kt. intending the destruction of this realm, have traiterously considered and conspired together, to subvert the fundamental laws and government of this kingdom; and in pursuance thereof they and every of them have traiterously contrived, introduced and exercised an arbitrary and tyrannical government against law, throughout this kingdom, by the countenance and assistance of Thomas Earl of Strafford, then chief governor of the kingdom.

II. That they and every of them the said sir Richard Bolton, kt. lord chancellor of Ireland, John lord bishop of Derry, sir Gerard Lowther, kt. lord chief justice of his majesty's court of Common-Pleas, and sir George Ratcliff, kt. have traiterously assumed to themselves, and every of them, regal power over the goods, persons, lands, and liberties, of his majesty's subjects of this realm; and have likewise maliciously, perfidiously, and traiterously given, declared, pronounced, and published false, unjust, and erroneous opinions and judgments, sentences and decrees, in extrajudicial manner against law; and have perpetrated, practised, and done many other traiterous and unlawful acts and things, whereby as well divers mutinies, seditions, and rebellions have been raised; as also many thousands of his majesty's liege people of this kingdom, have been ruined in their goods, lands, liberties, and lives: And many of them being of good quality and reputation, have been utterly delam'd by pillory, mutilation of members, and other infamous punishments; by means whereof his majesty and the kingdom have been deprived of their service in juries and other public employments, and the general trade and traffic of this island for the most part destroyed, and his majesty highly damnified in his customs and other revenues.

III. That the said sir Richard Bolton, John lord bishop of Derry, sir Gerard Lowther, and sir George Ratcliff, and every of them, the better to preserve themselves and the earl of Strafford in these and other traiterous courses, have laboured to subvert the rights of parliaments, and the ancient course of parliamentary proceedings: All which offences were contrived, committed, perpetrated, and done at such times as the said sir Richard Bolton, sir Gerard

Lowther, and sir George Ratcliff, knights, were privy counsellors of state within this kingdom, and against their and every of their oaths of the same; and at the such times as the said sir Rich: Bolton, kt. was lord chancellor of Ireland, or chief baron of the court of Exchequer within this kingdom, and sir Gerard Lowther, kt. was lord chief justice of the said court of Common-Pleas, and against their oaths of the same, and at such time as the said lord bp. of Derry was actually bishop of Derry within this kingdom, and were done and perpetrated contrary to their and every of their allegiance, and several and respective oaths taken in that behalf.

For which, the said knights citizens, and burgeses do impeach the said sir Richard Bolton, lord chancellor of Ireland, John lord bishop of Derry, sir Gerard Lowther, kt. lord chief justice of his majesty's said court of Common-Pleas and sir George Ratcliff, kt. aforesaid, and every of them, of high treason against our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity.

And the said knights, citizens, and burgeses, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any other Accusation or Impeachment against the said sir Richard Bolton, lord chancellor of Ireland, John lord bishop of Derry, sir Gerard Lowther, and sir George Ratcliff aforesaid, and every of them; and also of replying to their, and every of their Answer and Answers, which they and every of them shall make to the said Articles, or any of them, and of offering proof also of the premises, or of any other impeachment or Accusation, as shall be by them exhibited, as the case shall, according to the course of parliament, require.

And the said knights, citizens, and burgeses, do pray that the said sir Richard Bolton, kt. lord chancellor of Ireland, John lord bishop of Derry, sir Gerard Lowther, kt. lord chief justice of the said court of Common-Pleas, and sir George Ratcliff, kt. and every of them, be put to answer all and every the premises; and that all such proceedings, examinations, trial, and judgment, may be upon them, and every of them, had and used, as is agreeable to law and justice."

July 31st 1646. Upon the petition of adjutant Grey and Mr. Steward against an illegal decree made by sir George Ratcliff in Ireland against them, 1500*l.* were ordered to Mr. Steward, and 400*l.* to adjutant Grey, out of sir George Ratcliff's estate. (Whitl. 222.)—He was one of 57 persons excepted from Pardon in the Parliament's Proposition, July 11th, 1646. (6 Rush. 313.) and again in 1648. (Whitl. 340, 343.)

What was the end of these Prosecutions does not appear.

157. Proceedings against JOHN GOODMAN, a Seminary Priest,* condemned for High Treason; 16 CHARLES I. A. D. 1641.
[4 Rushw. Coll. 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 710.]

ON Saturday, Jan. 23, 1641, the House of Commons appointed Mr. Hampden, Mr. St. John, sir John Culpeper, sir John Hotham, sir Peter Hayman, sir Walter Earle, Mr. Glyn, sir Tho. Barrington, and sir Gilbert Gerard, to prepare heads for a Conference with the Lords, concerning the Reprieval of Thomas Goodman, Priest and Jesuit, and upon such other matters as they in their judgments shall think fit.—Mr. Recorder of London was sent for, who at the bar made a Narrative of the whole passage of the Indicting, Condemning, and Reprieval of Goodman the Priest.—Mr. Glyn reports the heads of the Conference to be desired with the lords, concerning the Reprieval of Goodman, &c. Sir John Culpeper was sent up to the lords to desire a Conference by a committee of both houses presently, if it might stand with their lordships occasions, in the Painted Chamber, concerning the Repriving of John Goodman, a Priest lately condemned of High Treason. Which Conference, it appears, was presently had: After which the Lord Privy Seal reported to the Lords, "That Mr. Glyn had acquainted them with the Commons tending to the city of London, to advance money for his majesty's service, and that of the Commonwealth; answer was returned, That there was a general discontent amongst the citizens, for the Reprieval of one Goodman, a seminary priest, lately condemned for High Treason, who had been formerly so for the same offence, and banished this kingdom. By which they found that there was a great connivance at Jesuits and Priests through the kingdom, to the great

* By statute 23 Eliz. c. 2, s. 2, it was enacted, "That it shall not be lawful to or for any Jesuite, Seminary Priest, or other such Priest, Deacon, or religious or ecclesiasticall person whatsoever, being borne within this realme, or any other her highnesse dominions, and heretofore since the Feast of the Nativitie of Saint John Baptist, in the first yeere of her majestie reigne, made, ordeined, or professed, or hereafter to be made, ordeined or professed by any authoritie or jurisdiction, derived, challenged or pretended from the see of Rome, by or of what name, title or degree soever, the same shall be called or known to come into, bee or remaine, in any part of this realme, or any other her highnesse dominions, after the end of the same fortie dayes, other then in such speciall cases, and upon such speciall occasions onely, and for such time onely as is expressed in this Acte, and if he doe that, then every such offence shall be taken and adjudged to be High Treason. And every person so offending shall for his offence be adjudged a Traytor, and shall suffer, lose and forfeite as in case of High Treason." See 31 G. 3, c. 32.

disheartening of the people in this time of parliament, when they expect a thorough reformation. The Commons, therefore, desired their lordships assistance to discover such instruments as have dared to intercede for the interruption of public justice against such offenders, &c."

The Lords thought proper to acquaint the King with this Message from the Commons: and appointed the Lord Privy Seal and the Earl Marshal to deliver it.

The same day, the King being attended at Whitehall by the two Houses, made a Speech to them, and afterwards, the Commons being withdrawn, his majesty spoke a few words to the Lords, to tell them, "That he heard of a Conference to be that afternoon, about the business of Goodman the Priest; and that, in a day or two, he would send them the Reasons for what he had done in that matter, which he hoped would satisfy them."

On Monday, the 25th, the Lords at a Conference communicated to the Commons the following Message from the King.

"That the occasion of his majesty's knowledge of the Conviction of John Goodman the Priest, lately reprieved, was upon the constant order that hath been taken for divers years, That the Recorder hath at the end of every sessions attended his majesty with the Names of the persons convicted, with an expression of their offences, to the end that his majesty might be truly informed of the nature of their crimes, and consequently, not be induced by information to reprieve such as were not fit for grace and mercy: And thereupon, That Goodman was lately condemned for being in orders of a priest merely, and was acquitted of the charge of perverting the king's people in their belief, and had never been condemned or banished before. His majesty is tender in matter of blood, in cases of this nature; in which queen Elizabeth and king James have been often merciful: but to secure his people that this man shall do no more hurt, he is willing that he be imprisoned or banished, as their lordships shall advise; and if he return into the kingdom, to be put to execution without delay; and he will take such fit course for the expulsion of other Priests and Jesuits, as he shall be counselled unto by your lordships; and he doth not intend by this particular mercy to lessen the force of the law."

On the next day, both Houses agreed on the following Remonstrance to the King, which the Lord-Keeper that same afternoon in presence of both Houses, delivered to his majesty:

"May it please your majesty; Your loyal subjects the Lords and Commons now assembled by your majesty's writ in the high court of Parliament, humbly represent unto your gracious consideration, That Jesuits and Priests ordained by authority from the see of Rome, remaining in this realm by a statute made in the 21st year of queen Elizabeth, are declared Traitors, and to suffer as Traitors. That this law is not so rigorous as some apprehend, or would have others to believe; for that it is restrained to natural born subjects only, and doth not extend to any strangers at all. That it is enacted in the first year of king James, That all Statutes made in the time of queen Elizabeth against Priests and Jesuits, be put in execution; and for a further assurance of the due execution of these laws, the Statute of the 3rd year of king James invites men to the discovery of the offenders, by rewarding them with a considerable part of the forfeiture of the recusants estates.—So that the Statute of queen Elizabeth is not only approved, but by the judgments of several parliaments in the time of king James of happy memory, adjudged fit and necessary to be put in execution.

“That considering the estate and condition of this present time, they conceive this law to be more necessary to be put in strict execution, than at any time before; and that for divers weighty and considerable reasons, viz. for that by divers Petitions from the several parts of this kingdom, complaints are made of the great increase of Popery and Superstition, and the people call earnestly to have the laws against Recusants put in execution; seeing Priests and Jesuits swarm in great abundance in this kingdom, and appear here with such boldness and confidence, as if there were no laws against them.

“That it appears unto the House of Commons by proof, That of late years about the city of London, Priests and Jesuits have been discharged out of prison; many of them being condemned of High Treason. They are credibly informed, That at this present the pope hath a Nuncio or Agent resident in the city, and they have just cause to believe the same to be true. The Papists as publicly, and with as much confidence and impunity, resort to mass at Denmark house, and St. James's, and the ambassadors chapels, as others do to their parish churches. They conceive the not putting of these statutes in execution against Priests and Jesuits, is a principal cause of the increase of popery.

“That the putting of these Laws in execution, tendeth not only to the preservation and advancement of the true Religion established in this kingdom; but also the safety of your majesty's person, and security of the state and government, which were the principal causes of the making of the laws against Priests and Jesuits, as is manifestly declared in the preamble of the laws themselves, which are the best interpreters of the minds of the makers of them.

“And because the words being penned by the advice and wisdom of the whole state, are much more full and clear than any particular man's expression can be; they were therefore read as they are vouched, those of the 27th year of queen Elizabeth, being thus: viz. ‘That the Priests and Jesuits come hither, not only to draw the subjects from their true obedience to the queen, but also to stir up sedition, rebellion, and open hostility within the realm, to the great endangering of the safety of her royal person, to the utter ruin, desolation, and overthrow of the whole kingdom, if not timely prevented.’ And the tenour of the words of the statute of the 3rd year of king James, are in this manner: viz. ‘Whereas divers Jesuits and Priests do withdraw many of his majesty's subjects, from the true service of Almighty God, and the religion established within this realm, to the Romish religion, and from their loyal obedience to his majesty; and have of late secretly persuaded divers recusants, and papists, and encouraged and emboldened them to commit most damnable treasons, tending to the overthrow of the whole state and commonwealth, if God of his goodness and mercy had not within few hours of the intended time of the execution thereof, revealed and disclosed the same.’

“The Houses do further inform, That some Jesuits and Priests had been executed in the time of queen Elizabeth, and king James of happy memory; and when any of them have received mercy, it was in such time, and upon such circumstances, as that the same might be extended unto them without danger. Whereas now of late, there hath been a great apprehension of endeavours by some ill agents to subvert religion; and at this present both kingdoms have a general expectation of a thorough reformation. And there is already found so ill consequence of the late reprieve of John Goodman the priest, that the House of Commons having sent to the citizens of London for their assistance in the advancement of money, for the present and necessary supply of his majesty's army, and the relief of the Northern counties; upon this occasion they have absolutely denied to furnish the same: And how far the like discontents may be diffused into other parts of the kingdom, to the interruption of the levying the subsidies, the houses leave to your majesty's consideration. It is found that Goodman the priest hath been twice formerly committed and discharged; that his residence now about London, was in absolute contempt of your majesty's proclamation, as the houses are credibly informed; that he hath been sometimes a minister in the church of England, and consequently is an apostate; and both houses are very sensible, that no person should presume to intercede with your majesty in a case of so high a nature. They humbly desire, That a speedy course may be taken for the due execution of the laws against the Priests and Jesuits: that all mischiefs before mentioned may be timely remedied by your majesty's great wisdom. And lastly, That Goodman the Priest be left to the justice of the law.”

On February 3, the King spoke to the two Houses as follows:

“My lords and gentlemen; Having taken into my serious consideration, the late Remonstrance of the houses of parliament, I give you this Answer. That I take in good part your care of the true Religion established in this kingdom, from which I will never depart: As also your tenderness of my safety, and the security of this state and government. It is against my mind that Popery or superstition should any way increase within this kingdom, and will restrain the same by causing the laws to be put in execution.

"I am resolved to provide against the Jesuits and Papists, by setting forth a Proclamation with all speed, commanding them to depart the kingdom within one month; of which if they fail, or shall return, then they shall be proceeded against according to the laws.

"Concerning Ro-etti," [One said to be the Pope's Nuntio,] "I give you to understand; That the Queen hath always assured me, That to her knowledge he hath no commission, but only to retain a personal correspondence between her and the Pope, in things requisite for the exercise of her Religion, which is warranted to her by the Articles of Marriage; which gave her a full liberty of conscience: yet I have persuaded her, that since the misunderstanding of the person's condition gives offence, she will in a convenient time remove him.—Moreover I will take a special care to restrain my subjects from resorting to mass at Denmark house, St. James's, and the chapels of ambassadors.

"Lastly, Concerning John Goodman the priest, I will let you know the reason why I reprieved him, and it is, That, as I am informed, neither queen Elizabeth, nor my father did ever avow, That any priest in their times was executed merely for religion, which to me seems to be this particular; yet seeing I am prest by both houses to give way to his execution, because I will avoid the inconveniency of giving so great a discontent to my people, as I conceive this mercy may produce; therefore I do remit this particular cause to both the houses, but I desire them to take into their consideration the inconveniencies, as I conceive may upon this occasion fall upon my subjects and other Protestants abroad, especially since it may seem to other states to be a severity. Which having thus represented, I think myself discharged from all ill consequence that may ensue upon the execution of this person."

The next day, his majesty likewise caused a Petition of this Goodman, to be communicated to the House of Lords by the Lord Keeper, which Petition was in these words:

"To the King's Most Excellent Majesty, the Humble Petition of John Goodman, condemned.

"Humbly Sheweth; That whereas your Petitioner hath been informed of a great discontent in many of your majesty's subjects, at the gracious mercy your majesty was freely pleased to shew unto your petitioner, by the suspending the Execution of the Sentence of Death pronounced against your petitioner for being a Romish priest.—These are humbly to beseech your majesty, rather to remit your Petitioner to their mercy that are discontented, than to let him live the subject of so great discontent in your people against your majesty; for it hath pleased God to give me the grace, to desire with the prophet, That if this storm be raised for my sake, I may be cast into the sea, that others may avoid the tempest.—This is, most sacred sovereign, the Petition of him, that should esteem his blood well shed, to cement the breach between your majesty and your subjects upon this occasion. Ita testor.

JOHN GOODMAN."

Whether this Priest was executed or not, does not appear.

158. Proceedings against the TWELVE BISHOPS; namely, Dr. JOHN WILLIAMS Archbishop of York, Dr. THOMAS MORETON Bishop of Durham, Dr. ROBERT WRIGHT Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, Dr. JOSEPH HALL Bishop of Norwich, Dr. JOHN OWEN Bishop of St. Asaph, Dr. ROBERT SKINNER Bishop of Oxford, Dr. WILLIAM PIERS Bishop of Bath and Wells, Dr. GEORGE COKE Bishop of Hereford, Dr. MATTHEW WREN Bishop of Ely, Dr. GODFREY GOODMAN Bishop of GLOCESTER, Dr. JOHN WARNER Bishop of Peterborough, and Dr. MORGAN OWEN Bishop of Llandaff, upon an Accusation of High Treason: 17 CHARLES I. A. D. 1641. [4-Rushw. Coll. 466. 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 993.]

ON the 30th of December, 1641, the Lord Keeper signified to the House of Lords. That the king had commanded him to deliver a Pe-tion to their lordships, which had been presented to him. The said Petition was ordered to be read, and was in these words:

To the KING's Most Excellent Majesty, and the LORDS and PEERS now assembled in Parliament.

The Humble PETITION and PROTESTATION * of all the Bishops and Prelates, now called by his Majesty's Writs to attend in Parliament, and present about London and Westminster for that purpose.

“That whereas the Petitioners are called up by several and respective Writs, and under

* “Lord Clarendon, having previously given the history of the Archbishop's suggestion and preparation of this Protestation, proceeds:

“It was great pity, that though the Archbishop's passion transported him, as it usually did; and his authority imposed upon the rest, who had no affection to his person, or reverence for his wisdom; his majesty did not take a little time to consider of it, before he put it out of his power to alter it, by putting it out of his hands. For it might easily have been discerned by those who were well acquainted with the humour, as well as the temper of both houses, that some advantage, and ill use would have been made of some expressions contained in it; and that it could produce no good effect. But the same motive and apprehension that had precipitated the Bishops to so hasty a resolution (which was, that the house of peers would have made that use of the Bishops being kept from the house, that they would in that time have passed the bill itself for taking away their votes) had its effects likewise with the king; who had the same imagination, and therefore would lose no time in the transmission of it to the house. Whereas it is more probable the lords would never have made use of that very season, whilst the tumults still continued, for the passing an act of that importance; and the scandal, if not invalidity of it, would have been an unanswerable ground for the king to have refused his royal assent to it.

“As soon as this Protestation, which, no doubt, in the time before the house was to meet, had been communicated to those who were prepared to speak upon it, was delivered by the Lord Keeper with his majesty's command, and read; the governing lords manifested a great satisfaction in it; Some of them saying, ‘that there was digitus Dei to bring that to pass, which they could not otherwise have compassed;’ and without ever declaring any judgment or opinion of their own upon it, which they ought to have done, the matter only having relation to themselves, and concerning their own members; they sent to desire a Conference presently with the House of Commons, upon a business of importance; and at the Conference, only read, and delivered the Protestation of the Bishops to them: which, the Lord Keeper told them, he had received from the king's own hand with a command to present it to the house of peers. The house of commons took very little time to consider of the matter: but, within half an hour, they sent great penalties, to attend in Parliament; and have a clear and indubitable right to vote in bills, and other matters whatsoever debatable in parliament, by the antient customs, laws, and statutes of this realm; and ought to be protected by your majesty, quietly to attend and prosecute that great service.

“They humbly remonstrate and protest before God, your majesty, and the noble lords and peers now assembled in parliament, that, as they have an indubitable right to sit and up to the lords; and, without further examination, accused them all who had subscribed the Protestation, of High Treason: and, by this means, they were all, the whole twelve of them, committed to prison; and remained in the Tower till the Bill for the putting them out of the house, was passed, which was not till many months after.

“When the passion, rage, and fury of this time shall be forgotten, and posterity shall find, amongst the Records of the Supreme Court of judicature, so many Orders and Resolutions in vindication of the Liberty of the Subject against the imprisoning of any man, though by the king himself, without assigning such a crime as the law hath determined to be worthy of imprisonment: and in the same year, by this high court, shall find Twelve Bishops, members of this court, committed to prison for High Treason, for the presenting this Protestation; men will surely wonder at the spirit of that Reformation: and even that Clause of declaring all acts null, which had been, or should be done in their absence, in defence of which no man then durst open his mouth, will be thought good law, and good logic; not that the presence of the Bishops in that time was so essential that no act should pass without them; which had given them a voice, upon the matter, as negative as the king's; and themselves, in their instrument, disclaimed the least pretence to such a qualification; but because a violence offered to the freedom of any one member, is a violation to all the rest: as if a council consist of three-score, and the door to that council be kept by armed men, and all such, whose opinions are not liked, kept out by force; no doubt the freedom of those within is infringed, and all their acts as void and null, as if they were locked in, and kept without meat till they altered their judgments.

“And therefore you shall find in the Journals of the most sober parliaments, that, upon any eminent breach of their privileges, as always upon the commitment of any member for any thing said or done in the house, sometimes upon less occasion, that house, which apprehended the trespass, would sit mute, without debating, or handling any business, and then adjourn; and this hath been practised many days together, till they had redress or reparation. And their reason was, because their body was lame; and what was befallen one member, threatened the rest; and the consequence of one act might extend itself to many vote in the House of Lords, so are they (if they may be protected from force and violence) most ready and willing to perform their duties accordingly; and that they do abominate all actions or opinions tending to Popery, and the maintenance thereof; as also all propension and inclination to any malignant party, or any other side or party whatsoever, to the which their own reasons and consciences shall not move them to adhere.

other; which were not in view; and this made their privileges of so tender and nice a temper, that they were not to be touched, or in the least degree trench'd upon; and therefore that in so apparent an act of violence, where it is not more clear that they were committed to prison, than that they durst not then sit in the house, and when it was lawful in the house of peers for every dissenter in the most trivial debate, to enter his protestation against that sense he liked not, though he were single in his opinion; That it should not be lawful for those, who could not enter it themselves, to present this Protestation to the king to whom they were accountable under a penalty for their absence; and unlawful to that degree, that it should render them culpable of High-Treason; and so forfeit their honour, their lives, their fortunes, expose their names to perpetual infamy, and their wives and children to penury, and want of bread; will be looked upon as a determination of that injustice, impiety, and horror, as could not be believed without those deep marks, and prints of confusion that followed, and attended that resolution."

"And yet the indiscretion of those Bishops, sway'd by the pride, and passion of that Archbishop, in applying that remedy at a time, when they saw all forms and rules of judgment impetuously declined; and the power of their adversaries so great, that the laws themselves submitted to their oppression; that they should, in such a storm, when the best pilot was at his prayers, and the card and compass lost, without the advice of one mariner, put themselves in such a cock-boat, and to be severed from the good ship, gave that scandal and offence to all those who passionately desired to preserve their function, that they had no compassion, or regard of their persons, or what became of them; insomuch as in the whole debate in the house of commons, there was only one gentleman, who spoke in their behalfs, and said; 'he did not believe they were guilty of high treason, but that they were stark mad; and therefore desired they might be sent to Bedlam.'"

Bishop Kennett, however, (3 Complete Hist. 115,) alleges something in excuse for this Protestation. "Some hard reflections," says he, "are made upon this act of the Bishops in vindication of their parliamentary rights, in the late 'History of the Rebellion.' But whatever passion there might be in archbishop Williams the penner of it, and however improper to purge themselves of inclination to any malignant party, and however indiscreet to make the king personally concerned in the conveyance of it to the lords, and however conscious

"But whereas they have been, at several times, violently menaced, affronted, and assaulted, by multitudes of people, in their coming to perform their service in that hon. house; and lately chased away and put in danger of their lives; and can find no redress or protection, upon sundry complaints made to both houses, in these particulars*. They likewise humbly protest, before your majesty and the noble house of peers, that, saving unto them-they themselves might be, that at this juncture of violence it could have no good effect; yet it was certainly their duty in honour and conscience, to make some such public Protestation of their lawful rights; especially when their lordships had already too much suffered in their reputation by silence and absence, and a voluntary recess from voting in the lord Strafford's bill."

Mr. Laing, in his History of Scotland, after noticing that king Charles's approbation of the Protestation of the Bishops has been ascribed to haste and surprise, observes, that "the Protestation was, however, the same in effect with that, which the Scottish Prelates had formerly prepared and presented by the King's orders; and as both were directed against the authority of the Assembly or Parliament, from which the prelates were excluded, so the one was calculated to insinuate a secret, and the other to establish a public nullity and produce a dissolution."

* "By this, and other means," says lord Clarendon, "all obstacles of the law being removed, and the people taught a way to assemble lawfully together, in how tumultuous a manner soever, and the Christmas holidays giving more leave and licence to all kind of people, the concourse grew more numerous about Westminster; the rabble sometimes, in their passage between the city and Westminster, making a stand before White-hall, and crying out, 'No bishops, no bishops, no popish lords,' would say aloud, 'That they would have no more porters lodge, but would speak with the king when they pleased;' and when they came near the two houses, took papers out of their pockets, and getting upon some place higher than the rest, would read the names of several persons, under the title of 'Disaffected members of the house of commons;' and called many lords, 'False, evil, and rotten-hearted lords.' But their rage and fury against the Bishops grew so high, that they threatened to pull down their lodgings where they lay; offered to force the doors of the Abbey at Westminster, which were kept locked many days, and defended by a continual guard within; and assaulted the persons of some of the Bishops in their coaches; and laid hands on the Archbishop of York, in that manner, that, if he had not been seasonably rescued, it was believed they would have murdered him: So that all the Bishops, and many other members, of both houses, withdrew themselves from attending in the houses, out of a real apprehension of endangering their lives."

selfes all the rights and interests of sitting and voting in that house, at other times, they dare not sit or vote in the house of peers, until your majesty shall further secure them from all affronts, indignities and dangers, in the premises.

“ Lastly, Whereas their fears are not built upon phantasies and conceits, but upon such grounds and objects as may well terrify men of good resolutions and much constancy, they do, in all duty and humility, protest, before your majesty, and the peers of that most hon. house of parliament, against all laws, orders, votes, resolutions, and determinations, as, in themselves, null, and of none effect; which, in their absence, since the 27th of this instant Dec. 1641, have already passed; as likewise against all such as shall hereafter pass in that most hon. house, during the time of this their forced and violent absence from the said most hon. house: not denying, but, if their absenting of themselves were wilful and voluntary, that most noble house might proceed in all these premises; their absence, or this their Protestation, notwithstanding: and humbly beseeching your most excellent majesty, to command the clerk of the house of peers to enter this their Petition and Protestation amongst his records, they will ever pray God to bless and preserve, &c.

This Petition being read, the Lords sent a Message to the Commons, to desire a present Conference by a committee of both houses, touching matters of dangerous consequence. A Conference being held immediately, the Lord Keeper, in the name of the house of peers, declared, “ That this Petition and Protestation of the Twelve Bishops, containing matters of high and dangerous consequence, and such as the Lords are very sensible of, and such as require a speedy and sudden resolution, it extending to the deep intrenching upon the fundamental privileges and being of parliaments; therefore the lords have thought fit, that this matter concerning the whole parliament, may be communicated to the commons, it being a thing of so great, and so general a concernment.”

The Bishops' Petition being thus communicated to the House of Commons, they came to a Resolution, to accuse those Twelve Bishops of High Treason, for endeavouring to subvert the Fundamental Laws and being of Parliaments.

And Mr. Glynn was ordered to go to the Lords, and, at their bar, in the name of the House of Commons and all the commons of England, to accuse these Twelve Prelates of High Treason, for endeavouring to subvert the Fundamental Laws of the realm and the very being of Parliaments, manifested by preferring that Petition and Protestation; and to desire the Lords, that they may be forthwith sequestered from Parliament and put into safe custody; and that their lordships would appoint a speedy day for the Commons to charge them, and for them to answer; for that the Commons were ready to make good their Charge.

Hereupon it was ordered, “ That the Gentleman Usher bring the said Bishops, so accused, before this house, that they may be committed to safe custody.” In the mean time, a Conference having been desired by the Commons, concerning the Safety of the Kingdom and both houses of parliament, the Lords went to the Conference; and, being returned, the Lord Keeper reported it to the house to this effect:

He first repeated the former Message from the Commons, with their Reasons for desiring a Guard, to which the Commons said they had yet no Answer. They now desired their lordships to take the following Reasons into consideration, as an addition to their former;

“ 1. The insolent and traitorous Petition and Protestation of the Bishops preferred this day to their lordships; which the Commons conceive they durst not to have done without some back to their design. 2. They desire to have a Guard, because they hear the King hath a guard at Whitehall, as apprehending it fit; and the Commons conceive, that those that are enemies to the King, are likewise enemies to the Parliament; and so vice versa: Therefore that house desired their lordships to consider of these things, and give them an Answer, Whether they will join with the Commons in a Petition to the King or not.”

Upon this, another debate arose in the Lords, Whether that house would recede, upon these further Reasons, from the Vote given last night: and this question being put, it again passed in the negative. Afterwards, both the Vote of last night and this, were ordered to be sent down to the Commons, as an Answer to them about a Guard.

The Lords being informed, that the Bishops accused of High Treason, were at the door, they were severally called in; and, first,

The Archbishop of York*, being brought to the bar, and kneeling there as a delinquent, was commanded to stand up, when the Lord Keeper told him, “ That the House of Commons, in their name, and in the name of all the commons of England, had accused him and other Bishops with High Treason, for endeavouring to subvert the fundamental laws of this realm, and the being of parliament, by preferring their Petition and Protestation, this day, to that house.” The said Archbishop, at his request, having leave to speak, said, “ He would not, at that time, make any demurrer to the Charge, as having never heard it before; but he desired their lordships would give him leave to do as he should be advised, when he came to his Answer; and so he withdrew.

The Bishop of Durham was next brought to the bar in the same manner, who said, "That this was the greatest misery that ever befel him, and what he did, was not with any malicious or treasonable intent; but he, going by chance, to the Archbishop of York's house, about two days ago, he found some Bishops there, and the Petition signed by many of them; and, being desired to subscribe the said Petition, he read it over, and took some exceptions to it; but he was drawn in by inducements, or rather seducements, and he did subscribe only to preserve his right of voting in parliament;" and, desiring their lordships to have pity upon him, being a man of great years, he withdrew.

The Bishop of Norwich said, "This was the heaviest affliction ever came to him; and professed it was far from his thoughts to be guilty of an offence of so high a nature, and confessed he subscribed the Petition and Protestation; but desired the rest of his brethren, the Bishops, that it might be very well considered before it was presented; but whether it was so he knew not*."

* The following Account is given by this Bishop, in a piece of his, intitled "Hard Measure," wherein, after reciting the tumults about the house of lords, and the resolution of the Bishops to forbear any longer attendance on that account, he proceeds thus: "The Archbishop of York sent for us to his lodging at Westminster; lays before us the perilous condition we were in; advices, for remedy, (except we meant utterly to abandon our right, and to desert our station in parliament) to petition both his majesty and the parliament, That, since we were legally called by his majesty's writ to give our attendance in parliament, we might be secured in the performance of our duty and service, against those dangers that threatened us; and, withal, to protest, against any such acts as should be made during the time of our forced absence, for which he assured us there were many precedents in former parliaments, and which if we did not, we should betray the trust committed to us by his majesty, and shamefully betray and abdicate the due right both of ourselves and successors. To this purpose, in our presence, he drew up the said Petition and Protestation, avowing it to be legal, just, and agreeable to all former proceedings, and, being fair written, sent it to our several lodgings for our hands, which we accordingly subscribed, intending yet to have had some further consultation concerning the delivering and whole carriage of it: but ere we could suppose it to be in any hand but his own, the first news we heard was, that there were messengers addressed to fetch us in to the parliament upon an accusation of High Treason. For whereas this paper was to have been delivered, first to his majesty's secretary, and, after perusal, by him to his majesty, and after from his majesty to the parliament, and for that purpose to the Lord Keeper, the lord Littleton, who was the Speaker of the house of peers: all these professed not to have perused it at all; but the said Lord Keeper, willing enough to take this advantage of ingratiating himself with the house of commons and the faction, to which he knew himself sufficiently obnoxious, finding what use might be made of it by prejudicate minds, reads the same openly in the house of lords; and, when he found some of the faction apprehensive enough of misconstruction, aggravate the matter as highly offensive, and of dangerous consequence; and thereupon, not without much heat and vehemence, and with an ill preface, it is sent down to the house of commons; where it was entertained heinously, Glynn, with a full mouth, crying it up for no less than an High Treason, and some comparing, yea preferring, it to the Powder Plot."

The Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield said, "He subscribed the Petition, but craved their lordships best construction of it, for he did it not with any traiterous intention, and submitted himself to the pleasure of the house."

How apt the Commons were for seizing any advantage offered to them against the Bishops, these Prelates must have known, for on the 30th July preceding they had ordered, "That a Committee shall prepare an Impeachment against the Bishops, the makers of the New Canons and Oath, upon the Votes that have passed both houses concerning these Canons and Oath; and that no Popish lords ought to have vote in the house of lords in matters of religion." And on the 3d of August, the Commons received a Report from their Committee appointed to prepare an Impeachment against the Bishops concerned in making the New Canons, by serjeant Wyld, one of the knights of the shire for Worcester-shire; and, next day, the said gentleman was sent with it to the Lords. Upon delivering the said Impeachment at the bar, he spoke as follows: "My lords; The knights, citizens, and burgeses of the Commons house of parliament being sensible of the great infelicities and troubles which the commonwealth hath sustained by the exorbitant courses of the Bishops; and knowing well what the wise man saith, 'Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil,' (the timely redress whereof doth better become the wisdom of a parliament than a too late woful repentance) have commanded me to represent unto your lordships, That Walter, bp. of Winchester, Robert, bp. of Coventry and Litchfield, Godfrey, bp. of Gloucester, Joseph, bp. of Exeter, John, bp. of St. Asaph, William, bp. of Bath and Wells, George, bp. of Here-

The Bishop of St. Asaph confessed "He subscribed the Petition; but he did it for matter of form, because the rest of the Bishops his brethren had done so: that thoughts of Treason were far from his heart, and desired their lordships favour and compassion towards him."

The Bishop of Bath and Wells acknowledged, "That he set his hand to the said Petition, without any ill intent, and desired of his brethren that it might be well considered before it was delivered; and that all the bishops had set their hands thereto."

The Bishop of Hereford said, "That when time was fitting he would make his humble Answer to the Charge; but desired to say nothing for the present."

The Bishop of Ely desired their lordships to excuse him now from speaking, lest he should do himself more hurt by that than by silence.

ford, Matthew, bp. of Ely, William, bp. of Bangor, Robert, bp. of Bristol, John, bp. of Rochester, John, bp. of Peterborough, Morgan, bp. of Landaff, together with William, abp. of Canterbury, and others of the Clergy of that province, at a Convocation, or Synod for the same province, begun at London, in the year 1640, did contrive, make, and promulge several Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical, containing in them divers matters contrary to the king's prerogative, to the fundamental laws and statutes of the realm, to the rights of parliament, to the property and liberty of the subjects, and matters tending to sedition and of dangerous consequence. And, to add more weight and efficacy to this their monstrous designs, they did, at the same synod, under a specious and fair title, grant a Benevolence, or Contribution, to his majesty, to be paid by the Clergy of that province, contrary to law. It rested not there; for though this had been enough to have affrighted and terrified the king's people with strange apprehensions and fears; yet, that these might not seem to be contrivances of the brain or fancy only, they were put in execution, and were executed upon divers with animosity and rigour, to the great oppression of the clergy of this realm and other his majesty's subjects, and in contempt of the king and of the law. Whether those persons, my Lords, that are culpable of these offences, shall be thought fit to have an interest in the legislative power, your lordships wisdom and justice is able to judge. But, for these matters and things, the knights, citizens, and burgeses of the Commons House in parliament, in the name of themselves and of all the commons of England, do impeach the said Bishops before-named, of the Crimes and Misdemeanors before expressed; and do therefore pray, That they may be forthwith put to their Answers in the presence of the Commons, and that such further proceedings may be had against them, as to law and justice shall appertain." See 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 893, 895, and 918 et seq. 936, 4 Rush. 359.

The Bishop of Oron owned, "He signed also; but his offence was through ignorance; and therein craved their lordships compassion."

The Bishop of Gloucester said, "That it did appear he was one of the last that subscribed; that it was not done with any traitorous intent, but through ignorance, and submitted himself humbly to the wisdom of the house."

The Bishop of Peterborough made the same confession as the former.

The Bishop of Landaff said, "That it was done through ignorance, and indiscretion, and that he had no design to overthrow the fundamental laws of the land; he desired he might not feel the weight of their lordships justice, but mercy, and that he might be bailed upon good security."

After hearing all these Arraignments, the Lords ordered ten of the Bishops to be committed prisoners to the Tower; but the bishops of Durham and of Coventry and Litchfield were remitted to the custody of the Black Rod.*

The Bishop of Winchester (Dr. Walter Curle) being all this time in the House, it was moved, That it should be put to him to answer, Whether he consents to or disclaims the said Petition, before he be allowed to sit and vote in the house. The said Bishop answered, "That he never knew any thing of the matter:" hereupon the Lords gave him leave to read the Petition; after which he said, "He never read it before, and he did now utterly disclaim it." With which Answer the house was satisfied.

A Committee of the House of Commons being present, the twelve bishops were severally brought in, to the house of lords. First, the Archbishop of York was brought to the bar; and, after he had kneeled as a delinquent, he was commanded to stand up; and then the Speaker, by direction of the house, told him, "That this day being appointed for the Twelve Bishops to put in their several Answers to the Impeachment of High Treason brought up from the house of commons against them, their lordships to require him to put in his Answer thereunto."

His grace answered, "That he had received an Order, dated the 30th of December last, with an Impeachment against himself and eleven other Bishops, of High-Treason, from the House of Commons; and likewise he had received divers Orders of several days that were appointed, for them to put in their Answers; and the last order for this day, which accordingly he is come to obey their lordships command; and for his own Answer to the aforesaid Impeachment of High-Treason, gave this Answer, in this manner: viz.

* Bishop Hall says, "These two had this favour by reason of their great age; which though desired by a noble lord on his behalf, would not be yielded."

‘ I John Archbishop of York, saving to myself all Advantages of Exceptions to the insufficiency of the said Impeachment, for myself say, That I am not Guilty of the Treason charged by the said Impeachment, in manner and form as the same is therein charged.’

Then he desired a present and speedy Trial, and so withdrew. In the same manner, the rest of the Bishops were brought to the bar, and gave the same Answer.

These Twelve Bishops having given in their several Answers as aforesaid, the Committees of the House of Commons went to their own house.

Then a Petition of the Twelve Bishops was read in hac verba :

“ To the Right Honourable the Lords assembled in the House of Peers.

“ The humble Petition of John Archbishop of York, and other the Bishops impeached by the House of Commons of High Treason, the 30th of December last.

“ Humbly sheweth; That your Petitioners, by your honourable Order of the date of the Impeachment, were to put in their Answers thereunto the 7th of this instant, and have had since several days for that purpose assigned them, and are now the 11th of this instant brought hither by your lordships order.—They always having been, as now they are, ready to obey your lordships command, and many of them being already much impaired both in their healths and estates; Do humbly pray, that a speedy proceeding may be had therein; and that, in the mean time, they may be admitted to bail.

“ And the Petitioners shall ever pray for all increase of honours and divine blessings upon your lordships. Jo. Eborac, Godfrey Gloucester, Jos. Norwic, Tho. Duresme, Joh. Asaph, Guil. Bath and Wells, Geo. Hereford, Ma. Elie, Ro. Oxon, Jo. Petir. burgs, Mor. Landaffe, Rob. Co. and Lich.’

Hereupon it was ordered, That the Trial of the Twelve Bishops, shall be on the 25th instant: in the mean time the bishop of Durham and the bishop of Coventry and Litchfield shall be remanded to the custody of the Black Rod, and the rest be presently remanded to the Tower.

Feb. 15th, having been appointed for the Trial of the Bishops, a Message came up from the Commons, That in regard of the many great and important occasions, now depending before them, they desire the Trial might be put off till Friday come se’nnight, and that they would then desire no further time. The Lords agreed to this; but ordered, “ That, in regard the Bishops had been so many times put off, from day to day, from trial, and that many of them were aged men, they should be bailed; provided they found such security as the house should approve of, for their appearance on the said day, which was to be peremptory on all sides.”

Feb. 16. A Message was brought from the Commons by Mr. Hollis, importing, “ That they understood their Lordships had bailed the Twelve Bishops impeached by them of High Treason; but that they had voted they ought not to be bailed; and therefore desired their lordships to remand them back to the place where they were;” which the Lords also ordered accordingly; but sent to let the Commons know, that they had ordered the Trial to be on the 19th instant; which was agreed to by the Commons.

February 19.

This being the day, last appointed, for the Trial of the Twelve Bishops, they were brought to the bar of the House of Lords, where the Managers for the Commons attended. The Lord-Keeper told those gentlemen they might now proceed against them; whereupon Mr. Glynn desired the Impeachment might be read; which being done, the Answer, or Plea, of the Bishops was also read; importing, That they were not guilty of the Treason charged against them.

Then the Petition of the Bishops was read, on which the said Impeachment was grounded; after which Mr. Glynn proceeded to open the Charge; and first desired, That the Bishops might be asked, “ Whether they did subscribe the Petition now read, and whether it was their hand-writing?” To this question the Bishops refused to Answer, because they alleged, “ That it was not charged in the impeachment; neither were they bound to accuse themselves.” Another question was then put to them, “ Whether they consented not to the exhibiting and preferring of the Petition?” To this they said, “ That they would stand to their former answer of Not Guilty.” Then Mr. Glynn, desired, That the Bishops Answer which they made voluntarily, in this house, on the 30th December last, might be read out of the Journal Book; which being done, all the Bishops, except the archbishop of York, voluntarily confessed, That they subscribed the said Petition, and did own the hand-writing; but denied that they consented to the preferring of it.

The Committee of the Commons then proceeded, and desired leave to examine some Witnesses to prove the falsity of the Bishops Petition, in styling it, “ The Petition of all the Bishops and Prelates, now called by his majesty’s writ to attend in Parliament, and present about London and Westminster.” Likewise to prove that several Bishops did never give their consents to the said Petition, or ever absented themselves from Parliament, on any occasion, or reason of fear or menace; and that some of the petitioners, viz. the Bishops of Gloucester and Bath and Wells, sat in the house of lords the 28th of December last.

To prove this the Bishop of Salisbury was sworn, who said, “ That he was present about London and Westminster, at the time when the other bishops presented their Petition to the king and parliament: That he was not absent from parliament on any other occasion, than his attendance on the Prince, and not out of any force or menace: neither did he hear or know of that Petition, before it was brought into the house of peers, or ever consented to it before it was preferred, or since."

Next the Bishop of Winchester, upon oath, deposed, "That, ever since the last recess, he hath been resident in and about London and Westminster, and attending the Parliament; that he was sent for to come to the archbishop of York the day after the great tumult, at the dean of Westminster's house, where were several other Bishops present; the said archbishop then said, That they had been affronted, and shewed a draught of a Petition, and read it to them. Some speaking of Amendments to it, the archbishop said, "It was hastily done, and might be made better," or words to that effect: That then the Archbishop left them, and, it being late, he went home himself. Afterwards he heard no more of this matter, until he, being in the Parliament House, saw a Petition there under the Twelve Bishops hands; and thinks that it was, in effect, agreeable with the aforesaid draught, although, he said, there have been some alterations made therein. He further said, That he never gave any consent to the delivery of the said Petition to the king or to the lords in parliament. Also, that on the 29th of December last, he, being coming to the parliament by water, met the earl of Newburgh, between the landing place at the Parliament-stairs and the Parliament-house; who asked him, Whither he was going, and told him there were none of his brethren, the Bishops, in the house; and thereupon he turned back. He likewise said, that either on that day, or some other about that time, he was coming in a boat towards the shore, to land at the Parliament-stairs; and seeing a company of 'Prentices, and others standing on the shore, crying, 'No Bishops!' some called out to him, and advised him not to land there; and thereupon he caused the boat where he was to turn off, and to carry him to Lambeth, where he sent for his coach to carry him home. He further said, that he never absented himself from parliament, at any other times, except upon private occasions."

Then the Bishop of London was sworn, who said, "He had been resident in and about London, ever since the last recess of this parliament: that, being at the latter place the day the Twelve Bishops were committed to the Tower, he was told of it, and the reason of their commitments: That the next day he came to the house of lords, where he saw the Petition which the said Bishops had presented; but did never hear of it before: that the only reason he came not to parliament, was because of the frost. Lastly, that he never did consent to the delivery of the said Petition to his majesty, nor to the lords in parliament."

would make their several Answers to their Charge, if they had any thing to say.

Hereupon every Bishop for himself made his Answer for the matter of fact; the effect whereof was: "That, by reason of the great concourse of people, and their menaces, they were afraid to come to the Parliament, which was the cause of preferring the aforesaid Petition and Protestation, to preserve their Rights in Parliament, without any intention to commit any treasonable act, or destroy the fundamental laws and being of parliaments, as is charged in the impeachment against them."

After this, Mr. Glyn replied, and made some observations of the words of the Protestation in the Petition; and observed the circumstances of the body of the Petition, which he pressed by way of aggravation:

"It is said, in their Petition, that they can find no redress or protection upon sundry complaints made to both houses; and they do protest against all votes, laws, orders, resolutions, and determinations, as in themselves null and of none effect, which, in their absence since the 27th Dec. last, have already passed, as likewise against all such as shall hereafter pass in this house, during the time of their absence from this house. 1. Which words are an express denial of the king's authority in giving the royal assent in parliament, because the Bishops were not present. 2. Their crime tends to the subversion and undermining the foundation and power of Parliaments; it deprives this house of all being, and makes it a body without life or motion, and to be less than a Piepowder Court, unless the Bishops were present. 3. It overthrows the fundamental laws of the kingdom; for, by the taking away the foundation, being, and power of Parliaments, it takes away the fundamental laws which uphold the kingdom. 4. It is a high derogation of the honour and privileges of parliament, charging both houses of parliament with denial to give them redress, upon complaints to them made, of the particulars in the Petition; whereas in truth no such complaint was ever made to the houses of parliament. 5. That the Bishops, in the Petition, endeavour to make sedition, and to fix an impression in the hearts of the people that the parliament at that time had no power to act or proceed in any businesses, to relieve them in their grievances, without the Bishops being present. 6. That, when the Bishops Petition and Protestation was preferred, there was a great rebellion in the kingdom of Ireland; and the remedy to subdue that kingdom to obedience was Aids and Supplies, as the wisdom and power of parliament should provide, which was well known to the said bishops; therefore the Petition and Protestation of the bishops was a direct act to endeavour the loss of that kingdom. 7. That, at the same time when this Petition and Protestation was preferred, there was depending in this house a bill to take away bishops sitting and voting in parliament. 8. Their evil intentions will be discovered: 1. By the many falsities in their Petition and Protestation, which have been disproved by witnesses. 2. By the time when this Petition and Protestation was preferred, it being the next day but one after a vote had passed in this house, That this parliament is a free parliament; therefore it was an endeavour to make an assault upon that vote, and to annul it. These, Mr. Glyn said, were the streams that flow from this fountain.

The Matter of Fact being ended; the Bishops desired that they might be heard, by their counsel, concerning the Matter of Law in point of Treason. Hereupon the lords, taking the same into consideration, ordered, That the Trial of the Twelve Bishops shall be further proceeded in on the 24th instant.

Feb. 24.

This being the day for the further proceedings against the Twelve Bishops, the Lords sent down word to the Commons, That they had appointed that afternoon, to hear their counsel, in point of Law, concerning the Treason alleged against them. Soon after the Commons returned for Answer, That they had resolved to proceed against the said Bishops who were impeached by them for High Treason, by Bill; and are proceeding in it accordingly. Hereupon, the Bishops were called in, and told this matter; on which they said, They had lain long under a charge of Treason, and have had many days assigned them to be heard; and since the matter of Fact had been heard, they desired the justice of this House, that they might be heard by their Counsel in point of Law; and either be acquitted, or judgment given against them upon the Charge.

The Bishops being ordered to withdraw, the Lords took their Desires into consideration, and it was ordered, "That, before the matter against the Twelve Bishops shall be concluded in any proceeding in that House, they shall be heard by themselves and their counsel, as their cause shall require."

The Bishops were called in again and told of this Order, which was all the satisfaction they had at that time. The Committee of the Commons, appointed to manage the Evidence against the Bishops, had been ordered to draw a bill, "For the forfeiting of the Issues and Profits of their Estates, temporal and ecclesiastical, and the disposing thereof as the Parliament shall think fit: for the Imprisonment of their persons during their lives; and for the disposal of all livings that may fall within their gift."

March 4.

The Bill against the Twelve Bishops being now depending in the House of Commons, an Order was made, That they should be heard by themselves, or by petition, at the bar of that house, this day. The bishops of Durham, and Litchfield and Coventry, appeared there; and spoke in their own defence.

The Speech of the Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry * was published at that time, and is still preserved in our Collections; which w give here as follows:

"Mr. Speaker; As it hath been ever in fashion, and in truth it is my disposition, to endeavour, at the least, to give satisfaction to every man, even to the meanest, that hath any sinister conceptions of me, be it Scandalum dolum, or acceptum; so hath it been my ambition, and I have sought it with affection; and to all men, so much more to this honourable assembly, especially concerning the late Petition and Protestation exhibited unto his sacred majesty, and the lords and peers in parliament. But, in the first place, Mr. Speaker, I am, as it becomes me, to give most hearty and condign thanks to the noble knights, citizens, and burgesses, of this honourable House of Commons for that they have been pleased, by a general Vote, and I hope unanimously, to give me leave to speak for myself; and to lay open the truth of my cause, concerning the said Petition and Protestation before them.

"And now, Mr. Speaker, to address myself to the business; whereof I shall not speak as a lawyer, for I have no head for law; neither shall I need to touch upon any point thereof, as a flourishing orator desirous to hear himself speak: I have long since laid aside my books of rhetoric; my desire is, Mr. Speaker, to tread in the steps of an old Divine, of whom Sozomen writes in his Ecclesiastical History: who, groaning under the like heavy burden and accusation as I do, chose rather to vent his own sense, and express the truth of his cause in plain language, than to colour or cloak falsehood; or to extenuate his offence, by forced, trapped, and new varnished eloquence: And to that purpose my conceptions and narration shall stand only upon two feet, Negation and Affirmation.

"There are some things that I must deny, and yet justly; somewhat I must affirm, and that I shall do ingenuously and fully. First, for the Negative; I never framed, made nor contrived, compiled or preferred, any such Petition or Protestation; I never was at any meeting, consultation or conference about any such business; nay, I never heard of any intention, much less execution of any such thing, until it was the Wednesday in Christmas, being the 29th of Dec.; at which time it was brought unto my house in Covent Garden, being betwixt 6 and 7 at night, (subscribed by some of my brethren) with a request, that I would subscribe suddenly also.

"Now for the affirmative; presuming that so learned, grave, and wise men, well versed in matters of that nature, would not have attempted any such thing, without good counsel, to the endangering of themselves and their brethren, and to the distaste of the Lords; and that all the rest of the Bishops in and about the city of London and Westminster, should subscribe thereunto; and that it should not be preferred, without the approbation and mature deliberation of good counsel, and of us all, I made one; and set my hand thereto, which I do now acknowledge, and never yet denied; nay, the first time that I came to the bar in the Lords house, I acknowledged that my hand was to it; and divers of this honourable presence heard it so read unto them, out of the Journal of the Lords house.

“Now, Mr. Speaker, if these my deceived and deceiving thoughts (to use St Bernard’s phrase) have led me into an error, the error is either ‘ex ignorantia juris,’ an unskilfulness in the law, or ‘debilitate judici,’ a weakness of my apprehension; else ‘ex nimia credulitate,’ out of my too much confidence in others; not of any preposed malice, or out of a spirit of contradiction, as the Lord knoweth. The School-men tell me, that ‘duo sunt in omni peccato,’ there is ‘actio et malitia actionis;’ I own the action, the subscription is mine; but that there was any malice in the action (to cross any vote, at which I was not present) I utterly disavow.

“And therefore, Mr. Speaker, I shall become an humble suitor, that I may recommend three most humble requests, or motions, to this honourable house. This first motion is, That you would be pleased to tread in the steps of Constantine the Christian emperor, who had ever this resolution, That if he should see sacerdotem peccantem, an offending divine, he would rather cast his purple garment upon him, than reveal the offence, for the Gospel’s sake of Christ. My second motion is, That if my Subscription shall make me a Delinquent, and worthy of any censure, that then the censure may not exceed, but, at the highest, be proportionable to the offence. The third and last motion is, That that of Plautus (after my 58 years painful, constant, and successful preaching of the Gospel of Christ, in the kingdom of England, and in foreign parts) may not be verified of me, ‘Si quid bene feceris, levior pluma est gratia; si quid mali feceris, plumbeas iras gerunt.’

“And now, Mr. Speaker, I might here tender divers motions to the consideration of this honourable house, for favourable construction of my rash Subscription, I may say commiseration; yet all without ostentation, that is far from me; but rather for the consolation of my perplexed soul; for the great affliction, restraint and disgrace, which I have long sustained: (which is far greater than ever I endured before, and transcends the dangers and jeopardies of the sea, and the miseries of the wars, whereof I have had my share) and partly for the vindication of my former reputation, calling, and profession; which is now so clouded, eclipsed and blackened in the eyes of the world, and scandalized in the mouths of the vulgar multitude; that, without reparation, and restoration to my former esteem, I shall never have heart to shew my face in the pulpit any more, wherein I have wished to end my days.

“But I waive all these, because I will not detain you from other occasions of greater importance; and desire my ways may be made known unto you, rather by inquisition, than my own relation; only I shall appeal to the noble knights, citizens, and burghesses of the diocese where I now live; and of the other wherein formerly I did live, as namely the honourable city of Bristol; which I can never name without that title, not only in respect of their piety, unity, and conformity, but also in respect of their love, kindness, and extraordinary bounty unto me. I appeal to them for their testimonies and knowledge of my courses amongst them: nay, I appeal to the records of that honourable house, where, I am confident, after 16 months sitting, there is nothing found that can trench upon me, neither, I hope, will nor may be.

“And therefore my humble suit is for expedition, if you intend accusation; or rather for your mediation, that I may speedily return to my own home and cure, ‘to redeem the time because the days are evil,’ as the Apostle speaks; and to regain the esteem and reputation which I was long in getting, and long enjoyed, but lost in a moment; for if I should out live (I say not my bishopric, but my credit,) my grey hairs and many years would soon be ‘brought with sorrow to the grave.’

“I have done, Mr. Speaker; and there remains nothing now but that I become a Petitioner unto Almighty God, that he will be pleased to bestow upon you all the patriarch’s blessing, even the dew of Heaven, and the fatness of the earth: and I end with that of St. Jude, ‘mercy, peace, and love be multiplied unto you;’ I say again, with a religious and affectionate heart, ‘mercy, peace, and love be multiplied unto you.’”

March 29. Mr. Glyn, one of the Committees on the Bill against the Bishops, made a Report of it to the House, on which they came to the following Resolutions: 1. “That a question shall be put upon every particular Bishop. 2. That by this bill the archbishop of York shall not forfeit the inheritance of his temporal estate.” The like question was put upon Thomas, bishop of Durham, and so, severally on all the rest, and resolved negatively. But upon another question, Whether the Archbishop and the rest, separately, should by that Bill, forfeit the profits and issues of their temporal estates, freehold lands, and lands of inheritance, during their lives; It was carried in the affirmative. Resolved, That the archbishop of York shall be allowed 100*l.* per annum.

May 5, 1642. On the humble Petition of the twelve Bishops, imprisoned now in the Tower above eighteen weeks, they were released by the Lords, upon bail. The Archbishop of York and his sories were bound in 5,000*l.* and he ordered not to go to his diocese during the disturbances in that county.

159. Proceedings, by the King's Command, upon Charges of High Treason and other high Misdemeanors, against Lord KIMBOLTON* and Five Members of the House of Commons; namely, Mr. DENZIL HOLLIS, Sir ARTHUR HASLERIG, bart. Mr. JOHN PYM, Mr. JOHN HAMPDEN, and Mr. WILLIAM STRODE :† 17 CHARLES I. A. D. 1641. [Rushw. Coll. Whitlocke's Memoirs. 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1005.]

January 3, 1641-2.

THE Lord Keeper told the House of Lords, That he was commanded by the King to let them know, his majesty had given commands to his Attorney General (sir Edward Herbert), to acquaint their lordships with some particulars from him.

Hereupon, the said Attorney standing up at

* Lord Kimbolton was the eldest son of the earl of Manchester, and had, some years before, been called up to the house of lords, by Charles 1. He had, after this period, a considerable share in the conduct of affairs, as General of the Parliament Forces during the Civil War.

† "On the application of the Commons for their former Guard, the King assured them, on the 'word of a monarch,' his favourite asseveration, that there was no cause of apprehension or alarm, for his care should extend to the protection of each member, as much as to the preservation of himself or of his children. The same day was selected to prefer an Impeachment of Treason against lord Kimbolton and the Five Commoners, Hampden, Pym, and Hollis, Haslerig and Strode. Their persons were first demanded by a serjeant at arms. Next day, the king, attended by his guards and retinue, claimed the members in person from the commons; and proceeded to expose his dignity to the contempt of the city, by the same vain requisition at Guildhall:" says Mr. Laing whose reflections on these transactions are very valuable. See 3 Hist. of Scotland, 219, et seq.

Concerning the effect of these Proceedings, lord Clarendon says, "The truth is, it cannot be expressed how great a change there appeared to be in the countenance and minds of all sorts of people, in town and country, upon these late proceedings of the king. They, who had before even lost their spirits, having lost their credit, and reputation, except amongst the meanest people, who could never have been made use of by them, when the greater should forsake them; and so despaired of ever being able to compass their designs of malice, or ambition (and some of them had resumed their old resolutions of leaving the kingdom) now again recovered greater courage than ever, and quickly found that their credit and reputation was as great as ever it had been; the court being reduced to a lower condition, and to more disesteem and neglect than ever it had undergone. All that they had formerly said of Plots and Conspiracies against the Parliament, which had before been laughed at, was now thought true and real; and all their fears and jealousies looked upon as the effects of their great wisdom and foresight. All that had been whispered of Ireland, was now talked aloud and printed; as all other seditious pamphlets and libels were. The shops of the city generally shut up, as if an enemy were at their gates ready to enter, and to plunder them; and the people in all places at a gaze, as if they looked only for directions, and were then disposed to any undertaking.—On the other side, they, who had, with the greatest courage and alacrity, opposed all their seditious practices, between grief and anger were confounded with the consideration of what had been done, and what was like to follow. They were far from thinking that the Accused Members had received much wrong, yet they thought it an unseasonable time to call them to an account for it. That if any thing had been to be done of that kind, there should have been a fitter choice of the persons, there being many of the house, of more mischievous inclinations and designs against the king's person, and the government, and who were more exposed to the public prejudice, than the lord Kimbolton was; who was a civil, and well natured man, and had rather kept ill company, than drank deep of that infection and poison, that had wrought upon many others. Then sir Arthur Haslerig, and Mr. Strode, were persons of too low an account and esteem; and though their virulence, and malice was as conspicuous, and transcendent as any man's, yet their reputation, and interest to do mischief otherwise than in concurring in it, was so small, that they gained credit and authority by being joined with the rest, who had indeed a great influence. However, since there was a resolution to proceed against those men, it would have been much better to have caused them to have been all se-which he received from his majesty, and was commanded to desire their lordships to have it read:” which Articles were read, in hæc verba:

ARTICLES of HIGH TREASON, and other high MISDEMEANOURS, against the Lord KIMBOLTON, Mr. DENZIL HOLLIS, Sir ARTHUR HASLEBRIG, Mr. JOHN PYM, Mr. JOHN HAMPDEN, and Mr. WM. STRODE:

I. That they have traiterously endeavoured to subvert the fundamental Laws and Government of this kingdom, to deprive the King of his regal power, and to place in the subjects an arbitrary and tyrannical power, over the Lives, Liberties, and Estates of his majesty's liege subjects.

II. That they have traiterously endeavoured, by many foul aspersions upon his majesty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and to make his majesty odious to them.

III. That they have endeavoured to draw his majesty's late Army to disobedience to his commands, and to side with them in their traiterous designs.

IV. That they have traiterously invited and encouraged a foreign power to invade his majesty's kingdom of England.

V. That they have traiterously endeavoured to subvert the Rights and very Being of Parliaments.

VI. That, for the completing of their traiterous designs, they have endeavoured, as far as in them lay, by force and terror, to compel the Parliament to join with them in their traiterous designs; and, to that end, have actually raised and countenanced tumults against the King and Parliament.

VII. That they have traiterously conspired to levy, and actually have levied, War against the King.

Then Mr. Attorney said, “That he was further charged to desire on his majesty's behalf, 1. That a Select Committee of Lords, under a command of secrecy, may be appointed to take the examination of such Witnesses as the King will produce in this business, as formerly hath been done in cases of like nature, according to the justice of this house. 2. Liberty to add verally arrested, and sent to the Tower, or to other prisons, which might have been very easily done before suspected, than to send in that manner to the houses with that formality, which would be liable to so many exceptions. At least, they ought so far to have imparted it to members in both houses, who might have been trusted, that in the instant of the accusation, when both houses were in that consternation (as in a great consternation they were) somewhat might have been pressed confidently towards the king's satisfaction; which would have produced some opposition and contradiction, and might have prevented that universal concurrence and dejection of spirit, which seized upon, and possessed both houses.”

and alter, if there should be cause. 3. That their lordships would take care for the securing of the Persons, as, in justice, there should be cause.”

Mr. Rushworth says, “That Lord Kimbolton, being present in the House, stood up and offered to obey whatever the lords should order; but prayed that, as he had a Public Charge, he might have a Public Clearing.” Accordingly, the Lord Steward, the Lord Chamberlain, earls of Bath, Southampton, Warwick, Bristol, and Holland, with the assistance of Mr. Serjeant Whitfield and Mr. Serjeant Glanville, were appointed a Committee to consider Precedents and Records, touching the regularity of this Accusation; whether there had ever been any such Proceedings before in this house, and whether such an Accusation may be brought by Mr. Attorney, into this house, against a peer.—Lord Clarendon adds, “The House of Peers was somewhat appalled at this alarm; but took time to consider of it till the next day, that they might see how their masters the Commons would behave themselves; the lord Kimbolton being present in the house, and making great professions of his innocence, and no lord being so hardy as to press for his commitment on the behalf of the king.” This general silence was the more remarkable, since the noble historian assures us, “That the lord Digby had promised the king to move the House for the commitment of lord Kimbolton, as soon as the Attorney General should have accused him, which, if he had done, would probably have raised a very hot dispute in the house, where many would have joined him. On the contrary, he seemed the most surprized and perplexed with the Attorney's Impeachment; and sitting at that time next the lord Kimbolton, with whom he pretended to live with much friendship, he whispered him in the ear with some commotion, (as he had a rare talent at dissimulation) ‘That the king was very mischievously advised; and that it should go very hard, but he would know whence that counsel proceeded; in order to which, and to prevent further mischief, he would go immediately to his majesty;’ and so went out of the House: whereas he was the only person who gave the counsel, named the persons, particularly the lord Kimbolton, (against whom less could be said than against many others, and who was more generally beloved) and undertook to prove that the said lord Kimbolton told the rabble, when they were about the parliament house, that they should go to Whitehall.

The day before, the King had sent Mr. Francis, serjeant at arms, to the House of Commons; where, being admitted without his mace, he delivered this Message;

“I am commanded by the king's majesty, my master, upon my allegiance, that I should come and repair to the House of Commons, where Mr. Speaker is; and there to require of Mr. Speaker Five Gentlemen, members of the House of Commons; and that these Gentlemen being delivered, I am commanded to arrest them, in his majesty's name, of High Treason. Their names are, Mr. Hollis, sir A. Hasleig, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, and Mr. William Strode."

The Commons immediately ordered the Chancellor of the Exchequer, lord Falkland, sir Philip Stapleton, and sir John Hotham, to attend his majesty; and acquaint him, "That this Message was a matter of great consequence, as it concerned the Privilege of Parliament, and therein the Privileges of all the Commons of England: That this House will take it into serious consideration, and will attend his majesty, with an Answer in all humility and duty, and with as much speed as the greatness of the business will permit: And that, in the mean time, the house will take care that those gentlemen, mentioned in the Message, shall be ready to answer any legal charge laid against them."

The Speaker did then, by command of the house, enjoin those Five Members, particularly, one by one, to give their attendance on this House, de die in diem, until further Orders: And, in the afternoon of the 4th, there is a Memorandum entered, "That all the Five Members, aforementioned, did appear in the house, according to yesterday's injunction."

January 4.

The King came into the House of Commons and took Mr. Speaker's Chair.*

* The imprudence of this Proceeding against the Five Members, and the detriment which it occasioned to the royal cause, are thus described by lord Clarendon: "In this sad condition was the King at Windsor, fallen in ten days from a height and greatness that his enemies feared, to such a lowness, that his own servants durst hardly avow the waiting on him. For though, it is true, the acts of the House of Commons, and the Tumults, were as great affronts to majesty, before this last act upon the members, as any that could be imagined possible to succeed, yet the house of peers was then well disposed, and might have been managed with a little patience, to have blasted all the extravagances of the Commons. And the truth is, the greatest extravagances appeared to the standers by to be but the attempts of persons in despair, and the strugglings of men at the last gasp. And, without doubt, if the king could have had the patience to have sate still a spectator of the dissensions between the two houses, and encouraging the lords, who were firm to him, and putting those matters in issue, wherein the commons had invaded both his and the lords privileges; if he had commanded his counsel at law and the judges, to have proceeded by the strict rules of the law against seditious persons at large, for preaching and printing against the peace of the kingdom, and put the commons house either to have been quiet, whilst their champions were exemplarily punished, which would have put a speedy end

"Gentlemen; I am sorry to have this occasion to come unto you, *****"

Resolved, upon the question, "That it to their licence, or to have appeared the champions for an infamous act against the law and the justice of the kingdom, their jurisdiction would probably in a short time have been brought within the due limits, and the stoutest factor for the violent party been glad to have compounded for an act of oblivion.

"And I have heard from credible persons, that the chief of that faction afterwards confessed, that if that extraordinary accident had not happened to give them new credit and reputation, they were sinking under the weight of the expectation of those whom they had deluded, and the envy of those whom they had oppressed. I am sure, they who out of conscience, and loyalty to their king and country, diligently attended the public service, were strangely surprized at the matter and manner of that accusation; and foresaw, from the minute, the infinite disadvantage it would bring to the king's affairs. Not that they thought the gentlemen accused, less guilty; for their extreme dishonest acts in the house were so visible, that nothing could have been laid to their charge incredible; but the going through with it was a matter of so great difficulty and concernment, that every circumstance ought to have been fully deliberated, and the several parts distributed into such hands, as would not have shaken in the execution. And the saying, that the king had not competent persons enough, whom he might trust in so important a secret (which I believe was true) is rather an argument, that the thing was not to be attempted at all, than that it was to be attempted in that manner; for whoever would have betrayed the trust, would be sure to find fault with it, when it was endeavoured without him, especially if it miscarried. The truth is, there was little reason to believe, that the house of peers would commit the lord Kimbolton upon the accusation of Mr. Attorney in that conjuncture of time; and less that the house of commons would deliver up their members to the serjeant at arms, when they should be demanded; which was an irregular thing, and implied unreasonably, that they had some power to keep them, who were desired to deliver them. Yet if the choise had been better made, and the several persons first apprehended, and put into distinct close custodies, that neither any body else should have heard from them, nor they one from another, all which had not been very difficult, the high spirit of both houses might possibly have been so dejected, that they might have been treated withal. But even that attempt had been too great for the solitary state the king was in at that time; which was most naturally to have been improved by standing upon his guard, and denying all that was in his power to deny, and in compelling his ministers to execute the law in those cases that demonstrably concerned the public peace."

This is all that is entered in the Journals of the Commons relating to this extraordinary affair. Probably the great confusion the House was in, at this juncture, broke off all punctualities in the Clerk, and prevented any further entry about it there: But Mr. Rushworth, then Clerk-Assistant to the House, is very explicit in his printed Collections: which, to make the matter as clear as possible, we shall give in his own words.

He begins with telling us, That when the five accused Members came this day, after dinner, into the house, they were no sooner sat in their places, but the house was informed by one captain Langrish, lately an officer in arms in France, that he came from among the officers and soldiers at Whitehall; and understanding by them that his majesty was coming with a guard of military men, commanders and soldiers, to the House of Commons, he passed by them, with some difficulty, to get to the House before them, and sent in word how near the said officers and soldiers were come; whereupon a certain Member of the house* having also private intimation from the countess of Carlisle, sister to the earl of Northumberland, that endeavours would be used this day to apprehend the Five Members, the House required the Five Members to depart the House forthwith, to the end to avoid combustion in the House, if the said soldiers should use violence to pull any of them out. To which command of the house four of the said Members yielded ready obedience; but Mr. Strode was obstinate, till sir Walter Earle, his antient acquaintance, pulled him out by force, the King being at that time entering into the New Palace-yard, in Westminster: and as his majesty came through Westminster-Hall, the commanders, reformadoes, &c. that attended him, made a lane on both sides the hall, through which his majesty passed, and came up the stairs to the House of Commons, and stood before the guard of Pensioners and Halberteers, who also attended the King's person; and the door of the House of Commons being thrown open, his majesty entered the House, and as he passed up towards the Chair, he cast his eye on the right hand, near the bar of the house, where Mr. Pym used to sit; but his majesty not seeing him there, knowing him well, went up to the Chair, and said, ‘By your leave, Mr. Speaker, I must borrow your Chair a little!’ Whereupon the Speaker came out of the Chair, and his majesty stepped up into it. After he had stood in the Chair a while, he cast his eye upon the members as they stood up uncovered, but could not discern any of the Five Members to be there; nor, indeed, were they easy to be discerned, had they been there, among so many bare faces all standing up together. Then his majesty made this Speech:

* This member was Mr. Pym. See sir Philip Warwick's Memoirs, p. 204.

‘Gentlemen, I am sorry for this occasion of coming unto you. Yesterday I sent a Serjeant at arms upon a very important occasion, to apprehend some that by my command, were accused of High Treason, whereunto I did expect obedience, and not a Message. And I must declare unto you here, that, albeit, no king that ever was in England shall be more careful of your privileges, to maintain them to the uttermost of his power, than I shall be; yet you must know, that in cases of Treason no person hath a privilege; and therefore I am come to know if any of these persons that were accused are here: for I must tell you, Gentlemen, that so long as these persons that I have accused, for no slight crime, but for Treason, are here, I cannot expect that this House will be in the right way that I do heartily wish it; therefore I am come to tell you, that I must have them wheresoever I find them. Well, since I see all the birds are flown, I do expect from you, that you shall send them unto me as soon as they return hither. But I assure you, on the word of a king, I never did intend any force, but shall proceed against them in a legal and fair way, for I never meant any other.—And now, since I see I cannot do what I came for, I think this no unfit occasion to repeat what I have said formerly, That whatsoever I have done in favour, and to the good of my subjects, I do mean to maintain it. I will trouble you no more, but tell you, I do expect, as soon as they come to the House, you will send them to me; otherwise I must take my own course to find them.’

When the King was looking about the House, the Speaker standing below, by the Chair, his majesty asked him, Whether any of these persons were in the House? Whether he saw any of them; and where they were? To which the Speaker, falling on his knee, thus answered:

‘May it please your majesty; I have neither eyes to see nor tongue to speak in this place, but as the house is pleased to direct me, whose servant I am here; and humbly beg your majesty's pardon, that I cannot give any other answer than this to what your majesty is pleased to demand of me.’

The King having concluded his Speech, went out of the House again, which was in great disorder, and many members cried out aloud, so as he might hear them, Privilege! Privilege! and forthwith adjourned till the next day at one o'clock.

The same evening his majesty sent James Maxwell, usher of the House of Peers, to the Commons, to require Mr. Rushworth, the clerk-assistant, whom his majesty had observed to take his Speech in characters, at the table in the house, to come to his majesty; and when Maxwell brought him to the king, his majesty commanded him to give him a copy of his Speech in the house. Mr. Rushworth humbly besought his majesty, hoping for an excuse, to call to mind how Mr. Francis Nevil, a Yorkshire member of the House of Commons, was committed to the Tower, but for telling his majesty what words were spoken in the House by Mr. Henry Bellasis, son to the lord Faulconbridge; to which his majesty smartly replied, 'I do not ask you to tell me what was said by any member of the house, but what I said myself.' Whereupon he readily gave obedience to his majesty's command, and in his majesty's presence, in the room called the Jewel-House, he transcribed his majesty's speech out of his characters, his majesty staying in the room all the while; and then and there presented the same to the King, which his majesty was pleased to command to be sent speedily to the press, and the next morning it came forth in print.*

January 5.

The Commons met again; when the Door

* The following very curious Account of this transaction is transcribed from some Minutes, taken at the time, by sir Edmund Verney, knight marshal, who afterwards bore the king's standard at the Battle of Edgehill, and was killed in that action:—"On Tuesday, the 4th January, 1641, when the house met after the adjournment, till one o'clock, it was moved, (considering there was an intention to take the Five Members by force) to avoid all tumult, 'That they be commanded to absent themselves,' but entered no orders for it, and then the Five Gentlemen went out of the house: a little after the King came with all his guards, and all his pensioners, and 2 or 300 soldiers and gentlemen. He commanded all the soldiers to stay in the Hall, and sent us word, he was at the door. The Speaker was commanded to sit still, with the mace lying before him; then the King came to the door and took the Palsgrave in with him, and commanded all that came with him, upon their lives, not to come in; so the doors were kept open, and the earl of Roxborough stood within the door, leaning upon it. Then the King came upwards towards the Chair with his hat off, and the Speaker stepped out to meet him; when the King stepped up to his place, and stood upon the step, but sat not down in the Chair. Then he said, 'He expected obedience to his Message of yesterday, and not an answer.' On the Speaker's saying, 'That he had neither eyes or tongue to see or say any thing but what the house commanded him,' The king said, 'He thought his own eyes as good as his, but that the words were flown; but he expected that the house would send them to him, for their treason was told, and such a one as we should all thank him to discover;' and so went out, putting off his hat till he came to the door. Upon this, the House resolved to adjourn immediately till to-morrow, at one o'clock, and consider what was to be done."—These Minutes taken at the time, in pencil, were found among the Papers of the late earl Verney, written by his ancestor, sir Edmund Verney; and though at so distant a period, were plain enough to be legible.—Hatsell's Precedents, vol. 4. p. 106.

being ordered to be locked, the key brought up the outward rooms cleared of all persons, except servants to members of the House; and also that some of those servants should be sent forth to see what numbers of people are repairing towards Westminster, and to bring notice to the House; a Committee was named to consider of some way for vindicating the Privilege of Parliament, and for providing for the Sale of both Kingdoms, and to present it to the house with all speed.—A debate then arose, Whether this House should be adjourned to Tuesday next, Jan. 11, and a Committee be appointed to sit in Guildhall, in London, during that time. The question was put, and on a division of the house, there appeared to be 170 members for it, and 86 against it.

The House then agreed upon a Declaration to be forthwith printed and published concerning the late Breach of Privilege; which was done in these words:

"Whereas his majesty, in his royal person yesterday, being the 4th day of January, 1641 did come to the House of Commons, attended with a great multitude of men, armed in a warlike manner, with halberds, swords, and pistols who came up to the very door of this House and placed themselves there, and in other places and passages near to the House, to the great terror and disturbance of the Members thereof, then sitting, and, according to their duty, in a peaceable and orderly manner, treating of the great affairs of both the kingdoms of England and Ireland; and his majesty having placed himself in the Speaker's Chair, did demand the persons of divers Members of this House to be delivered unto him: It is this day declared by the House of Commons, That the same is a high Breach of the Rights and Privilege of Parliament, and inconsistent with the Liberties and Freedom thereof; and therefore this house doth conceive they cannot, with the safety of their own persons, or the indemnity of the rights and privileges of parliament, sit here any longer, without a full vindication of so high a breach, and a sufficient guard wherein they may confide; for which both Houses jointly, and this House by itself, have been humble suitors to his majesty, and cannot as yet obtain.—Notwithstanding which, this House, being very sensible of the great trust reposed in them, and, especially at this time, of the manifold Distractions of the kingdom, and the lamentable and distressed condition of the kingdom of Ireland, doth order, That the House shall be adjourn'd until Tuesday next at one of the clock; and that a Committee, to be named by this House, and all that will come to have voices, shall sit at the Guildhall in the City of London, to-morrow morning at 9 of the clock, and shall have power to consider and resolve of all things that may concern the good and safety of the city and kingdom; and particularly, how our Privileges may be vindicated, and our persons secured, and to consider of the affairs and relief of Ireland; and shall have power to advise and consult with any person or persons, touching the premises, and shall have power to send for parties, witnesses, papers, and records. —And it is further ordered, That the Committee for Irish Affairs shall meet at the Guildhall aforesaid, at what time they shall think fit; and consult and do, touching the affairs of Ireland, according to the power formerly given them by this House; and that both the said committees shall report the results of their considerations and resolutions to the House.”

Mr. Fiennes was sent up to the Lords, to acquaint their lordships with the Reasons why the Commons adjourned till Tuesday next, and had fixed a Committee to act at Guildhall; which are much the same as those expressed in the above Declaration. Adding, that they still desired their Lordships to move his majesty for such a sufficient Guard about the Parliament, as both Houses might approve of. The Lords returned for Answer to this last affair, That they had already sent to the King about it, and his majesty's Answer was, That he would do it speedily; but their Lordships would renew it again. The Lords ordered also, That the Report from the Committee appointed to consider of the Accusation the Attorney-General had brought against the lord Kimbolton and the five Members of the Lower House, should be considered of; and that all the capital proceedings in parliament be searched into on this occasion.

The following Speeches were made by Mr. Pym, sir A. Haslerig, and Mr. Strode, in vindication of themselves against the Articles of High Treason, exhibited by sir Edward Herbert, the king's Attorney-General.

Mr. Pym spoke as follows: “ Mr. Speaker; These Articles of High Treason, exhibited by his majesty against me, and the other gentlemen in the Accusation charged with the same crime, are of great consequence, and much danger to the state. The Articles in themselves, if proved, are, according to the laws of the land, High Treason. 1. To endeavour to subvert the fundamental laws of the land, is, by this present parliament, in the case of Strafford's case, adjudged High Treason. 2. To endeavour to introduce into this kingdom an arbitrary and tyrannical form of government, is likewise voted High Treason. 3. To raise an Army to compel the parliament to make and enact laws, without their free Votes and willing proceedings in the same, is High Treason. 4. To invite a foreign force to invade this land, to favour our designs agitated against the king and state, is High Treason. 5. To animate and encourage riotous assemblies and tumults about the parliament, to compel the king to assent to votes of the house, is Treason. 6. To cast aspersions upon his majesty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and to make his majesty odious unto them, is Treason. 7. To endeavour to draw his majesty's army into disobedience, and to side with us in our designs, if against the king, is Treason.

“ I desire, Mr. Speaker, the favour of this house to clear myself, concerning this Charge; I shall only parallel and similize my actions, since the sitting of this parliament, with these Articles. 1. Mr. Speaker, if to vote with the Parliament, as a member of the house, wherein all our Votes ought to be free, (it being one of the greatest privileges thereof to have our debates, disputes, and arguments in the same unquestionable) be to endeavour to subvert the fundamental laws; then am I guilty of the first Article. 2. If to agree and consent with the whole state of the kingdom, by vote, to ordain, and make laws for the good government of his majesty's subjects, in peace and dutiful obedience to their lawful sovereign, be to introduce any arbitrary and tyrannical form of government in the state; then am I guilty of this Article. 3. If to consent, by vote with the parliament, to raise a Guard or Trained Band, to secure and defend the persons of the Members thereof, being environed and beset with many dangers in the absence of the king; and, by vote with the house, in willing obedience to the royal command of his sacred majesty, at his return, be actually to levy arms against the king; then am I guilty of this Article. 4. If to join with the Parliament of England, by free vote, to crave brotherly assistance from Scotland, (kingdoms both under obedience to one sovereign, both his loyal subjects) to suppress the Rebellion in Ireland, which lies gasping every day in danger to be lost from his majesty's subjection, be to invite and encourage foreign power to invade this kingdom; then am I guilty of high treason. 5. If to agree with the greatest and wisest Council of State, to suppress unlawful Tumults and riotous assemblies; to agree with the house, by vote, to all Orders, Edicts, and Declarations for their repelling, be to raise and countenance them in their unlawful actions; then am I guilty of this Article. 6. If, by free vote, to join with the parliament in publishing of a Remonstrance, in setting forth Declarations against Delinquents in the state; against Incendiaries between his majesty and his kingdom; against Ill Counsellors, which labour to avert his majesty's affection from parliaments; against those ill-affected Bishops that have innovated our Religion, oppressing painful, learned, and godly ministers, with vexatious suits and molestations in their unjust courts; by cruel Sentences of pillory and cutting off their ears; by great fines, banishments, and perpetual imprisonment; if this, Mr. Speaker, be to cast aspersions upon his majesty and his government, and to alienate the hearts of his loyal subjects, good Protestants and well-affected in religion, from their due obedience to his royal majesty; then am I guilty of this Article. 7. If to consent by vote with the parliament, to put forth Proclamations, or to send Declarations to his majesty's army, to animate and encourage the same to his loyal obedience; to give so many Subsidies, and raise so many great sums of money, willingly, for their keeping on foot to serve his majesty upon his royal command, on any occasion; to apprehend and attach, as Delinquents, such persons in the same as are disaffected both to his sacred person, his crown and dignity, to his wise and great council of Parliament; to the true and orthodox doctrine of the Church of England, and the true Religion, grounded on the doctrine of Christ himself, and established and confirmed by many acts of parliament in the reigns of Hen. 8, Edw. 6, Eliz. and king James, of blessed memory: If this be to draw his majesty's army into disobedience, and side with us in our designs; then am I guilty of this Article.

"Now, Mr. Speaker, having given you a touch concerning these Articles, comparing them with my actions ever since I had the honour to sit in this House as a member thereof, I humbly crave your consideration and favourable judgment of them; not doubting, they being weighed in the even scales of your wisdoms, I shall be found innocent and clear from these crimes laid to my charge. I humbly crave your further patience, to speak somewhat concerning the exhibiting of this Charge: which is to offer to your consideration these Questions, viz. 1. Whether to exhibit Articles of High Treason by his majesty's own hands in this house, agrees with the Rights and Privileges thereof? 2. Whether for a Guard armed to come into the Parliament, to accuse any of the Members thereof, be not a Breach of the Privilege of Parliament? 3. Whether any of the Members of Parliament being so accused, may be committed upon such accusation, without the whole consent thereof? 4. Whether a Parliament hath not privilege to bail any member so accused? 5. Whether if any of the Members of a Parliament so charged, and by the House discharged, without release from his majesty, may still sit in the house as members of the same?" And thus Mr. Speaker, I humbly crave pardon for my presumption in so far troubling this honourable house, desiring their favourable consideration of all my actions; and that I may have such Trial as to this wise council shall seem meet, cheerfully submitting myself and actions to the righteous judgment of the same."

Sir Arthur Haslerig spoke as follows: "Mr. Speaker; This misfortune of mine seems to me, at the first, exceeding strange; not only in respect of the crimes laid to my charge, but most of all having thereby incurred not only the disfavour but ireful displeasure of his sacred

* We do not find, by the Journals, that the Commons came to any formal Resolution on this or any of the foregoing Questions: They seem to have thought it unnecessary; for it appears from those authorities, that Mr. Pym, Mr. Strode, and Mr. Hollis, were of a committee inter alios upon a Bill 'For enabling the Lords and Commons to adjourn this present Parliament from place to place, as they shall see cause,' on the 11th of January, being the first day of their meeting after the late adjournment.

majesty. For the first, knowing the innocence and integrity of my heart, that it is free from any such crime, either in thought, word, or deed, against either my gracious sovereign, or my native country, I shall the more easily bear the burden of the charge; but to groan under the burden of a most pious and wise prince's displeasure, wounds me sore.

"Mr. Speaker, I humbly desire so much favour of this honourable house, to speak something of my innocence in all these crimes I am charged with. This House can, I hope, witness for me the manner of my carriage and disposition in any debate or arguments wherein I have been one. I hope nothing hath proceeded from me that can come, any ways, within the compass of treason. In all disputes and conclusions of any matter by vote of the house, my vote hath commonly agreed with the major part; then I hope my vote in parliament, being free, cannot be treason.

"The Articles, exhibited against me and the other gentlemen, are of a most dangerous and pernicious consequence, if we should be found guilty of them; which God defend. I would to God those persons, that incensed his majesty against us, which is easily conceived who they are, were as free from thoughts and words, nay actions within the limits of treason, as I hope we shall prove ourselves, by God's blessing.

"Mr. Speaker, it is alledged we have endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws of this land, abridge the king's power, and deny his royal prerogatives. Give me leave, I beseech you, to speak concerning this Article. There are not, as I conceive, two forms of government in this kingdom; there are not two sorts of fundamental laws; there is but one form of government; one sort of fundamental laws; that is, the common laws of this land, and acts, statutes and ordinances of parliament. These two depend and hang one upon another, so that they cannot be separated; and he that subverts the one, breaks and infringes the privileges of the other; and he that breaks the privileges of the one subverts the other. Now, to speak freely in parliament, freely called and assembled by his majesty's most royal authority; to vote freely in the same, upon the conclusion of any bill to be made a law by the whole consent of parliament, and assented to by his majesty; to agree in voting with the whole parliament, against delinquents and malefactors in the state, to bring them to condign punishment for the same; to give my vote, in the house, for removing evil counsellors from his majesty, and to place loyal and faithful ones in their place; to assent, with the whole state assembled together in council, for the settling of peace and tranquillity in the same; to ordain and enact such wholesome laws and ordinances, whereby his majesty's good subjects may be governed in righteousness and good obedience; to vote, with the house, for redressing the many grievances of the commonwealth; if these be to subvert the fundament-tal laws of the land, then, Mr. Speaker, am I guilty of this Article, in giving my vote against the earl of Strafford; in voting those acts already made and passed by his majesty; in voting against the Bishops; in protesting to maintain the fundamental laws of the land, and the true Protestant religion, according to the true doctrine of the church of England. I say then, in this am I guilty; but if this be not to subvert the laws of the land, then am I clear from being guilty of this Article.

“ Mr. Speaker, I come now to the other Articles of the Charge: To endeavour to bring in an arbitrary and tyrannical form of government: To invite tumults and unlawful resorts of multitudes of people to the parliament, to be a colour for our designs: to raise forces and armies in this land to assist us in our practices: To invite foreign princes to bring an army into the land: To endeavour, by Declarations, Proclamations, and otherwise, to alienate the hearts of his majesty’s loyal subjects from their lawful sovereign, thereby to avert their due obedience from him; and, having an evil opinion of his sacred majesty, to persuade them to side with us, and take their parts to effect our designs. Give me leave, I beseech you, to speak concerning these crimes: And first, Mr. Speaker, to endeavour to bring in an arbitrary power and tyrannical form of government in the subject, is to deny parliamentary proceedings: To oppose the laws, enacted by parliaments; to incense his majesty against parliaments; to protest and petition against the proceedings thereof; is to bring in an arbitrary form of government: but to agree with the parliament, being a member thereof, by vote, to make and enact laws, I conceive this cannot be termed arbitrary; neither, I persuade myself, can the effects thereof be tyrannical.—2dly, Concerning the late Tumults about the house, I am innocent thereof; neither came they by my invitation or encouragement; I always thought their resorts, in that sort, were illegal and riotous: I have voted with this house for suppressing; have assented to all orders for their appeasing; agreed with the parliament, in all things, concerning their petitions and requests: then I hope this honourable house will not conceive me guilty of this crime: If it be one, and granted, yet I conceive far without the limits of treason, for these reasons: 1. They came not with arms to force any thing to be done in parliament; but humbly, by petition, shewed their grievances, and desired redress thereof; which is one privilege, and one of the greatest, to make their griefs known to a parliament, and by them to be relieved. 2. They offered no assault; but, being assaulted, preserved themselves, and departed. 3. The matter of their clamour was not against the king, nor any of his council; it was not against the lords, nor the house of commons; it was only against delinquents, against such as had been the greatest oppressors of them. 3dly, I come, in a word, to other Articles of the Charge, which I intend to speak of, under favour, altogether: I pray you, who raised any Army, actually, in this land, but the Trained Bands? which was done by the parliament, for the security of their own persons in the king’s absence; and, in obedience to his commands, at his return home, they were discharged, and afterwards again raised by his majesty’s own royal authority. And for inviting or procuring any foreign princes to aid me with an army, I am altogether innocent therein; I know of no aid required but from Scotland, which is done by the parliament; my vote, as a member thereof, only agreeing with them in the same; and that aid is procured for his majesty’s assistance, in subduing the rebellion, in Ireland, and, as I conceive, for no other purpose.

“ And for the last Article wherewith I am charged, I hope to be cleared by this whole house: For what Declarations, or Proclamations, have been published but by authority of the parliament, joined with his majesty’s most royal power and assent thereunto? It is manifest to all people that nothing is published by the parliament, or any of the members thereof, but tendeth to the winning of the hearts of his majesty’s subjects to dutiful obedience, to intire love and tender affection, towards their gracious sovereign. And I dare confidently say, that there is none of his majesty’s subjects, that are true Protestants and well-affected to religion, but, upon the least command of his majesty will spend their dearest blood in defence of his sacred person, his queen and princely issue; the laws and constitutions of this kingdom; parliaments and the rights and privileges thereof; religion and the doctrine of the church of England: and, therefore, I conceive I am far from intending any treason either against his majesty or his kingdoms.”

Mr. Strode spoke thus:—“ Mr. Speaker; It is the saying of the wise man, even of a king, Solomon, the wisest of all kings that ever reigned on this earth, ‘ That in the countenance of the king is life and death;’ like to the sun, which, by the sending forth of his glorious beams upon the fruits of the earth, nourisheth, and causeth the same to fructify and grow, gives vigour and strength to all the creatures that live in and upon the same; and, by withdrawing his light, being overshadowed with clouds, keeps back the growing and flourishing of the creature; yea, and by continuance in that his hidden motion, procureth at last the utter withering and perishing thereof.

“ His gracious majesty is our sun and comforter; at such time as his glorious beams of grace and favour reflect upon his good subjects, they increase and grow in an intire and tender affection towards his majesty, so that no distempers, or troubles whatsoever, can separate between him and them. But this our sun, when overshadowed with clouds, and mists of discontent and disfavour towards his people, causeth them to wander in obscurity and darkness, even ready to faint and despair of any design they take in hand, for the safety and security of his majesty and his kingdoms; yea, strikes them, as it were, with death and utter destruction.

“ Mr. Speaker, I persuade myself our gracious sovereign, in his own natural disposition, is altogether bright and comfortable; he never causeth, or retracts to himself, any discontent towards his loving subjects, but by suggestion, information, or instigation, of malignant spirits, disaffected both to the tranquillity and peace of his majesty and the whole state of this kingdom. It is the policy only of desperate and evil-minded persons, that have been the only troublers of our Israel, finding themselves in danger (by calling of them to an account for their misdeeds and misdemeanors) to be brought to punishment for the same, to cast aspersions upon those faithful counsellors of the king and state, who strive to prevent their malicious and wicked designs from overthrowing and destroying the same. It cannot, sir, enter into my thoughts that ever his majesty, of himself, could have gone about to interrupt and hinder the happy proceedings of this his great and wise council, by accusing and impeaching the members thereof of high treason; as if they, whose hearts are united to their lawful sovereign, by nature bound to the defence and security of their country, and, by covenant with God, tied to the maintenance of his true religion, should be the betrayers and destroyers of them all together.

“ These Articles exhibited against myself and the other gentlemen, are, I conceive, not really intended against us as if we were actually guilty of the same; but only to procure our absence from this honourable house, that we may not have our free votes in the trial of the Twelve Bishops accused; by whom, I verily believe, these Articles were drawn; and only by their advice and such as favour their cause, exhibited. And I persuade myself, were we to be apprehended and taken from this house, under pretence of trial, we should, by force, immediately be cut off; although his majesty conceives, and is really minded, we should be legally proceeded against; of such powerfulness are those persons that were the authors of them.—These Articles, if we were actually guilty, are, many of them, I confess, high treason; as to endeavour to subvert the fundamental laws; to introduce an arbitrary form of government in the state, &c. I need not speak much to clear myself of these crimes. I hope this honourable house will make such a favourable construction of all my actions, that it will be manifest to all the world, that they have been far without the compass of treason either against my king or country. And if it shall be conceived by this honourable assembly, (as learnedly it hath already been delivered by that worthy gentleman that spake first) that, as members of a parliament, to agree with the same in all their votes, for the punishment of delinquents, settling of religion, securing of their own persons by a guard, or desiring assistance of our brethren in Scotland to suppress the rebellion in Ireland, be treason; then, I think, we are all guilty of these Articles; otherwise are we clear and innocent of the same.

“ Mr. Speaker, I humbly desire of this honourable house, that I may have a speedy trial upon the same; that, as I shall be found guilty by the judgment of this high court, I may know my sentence, which I shall willingly submit unto; be it to my condemnation, or preservation; wishing and praying with all my heart, that none of these evil and malicious designs, in agitation against the parliament, by any malignant persons whatsoever, may take effect to hinder the blessed proceedings thereof; but that you may go on, with courage and cheerfulness, to settle all things aright, both in church and state, for the government thereof in perpetual peace and tranquillity.”

The Accused Members having withdrawn themselves into the city of London, the King went thither on the 5th of January, and made a Speech to the Common Council assembled at the Guild-hall, requiring their assistance in apprehending the said Members; and dined with one of the Sheriffs, where he was nobly entertained. On the 8th he issued a Proclamation, commanding all magistrates and officers to apprehend and carry them to the Tower. And on the 10th, the day before the Parliament met again, the King removed himself and royal family to Hampton Court; from thence to Windsor; and, after several other removes, went down to York on the 19th of March following.

January 11.

The Accused Members were triumphantly brought from London to Westminster by water, by a great number of citizens and seamen, in boats and barges, with guns and flags, braving as they passed by Whitehall, and making large protestations, at Westminster, of their adherence to the parliament.

The lord Kimbolton, one of the Accused Members, moved the lords, “ That he lying under so great a Charge, which concerned his life, his estate and his honour, which is dearest to him, the Attorney General might be commanded to prosecute the Accusation against him, and he is ready to answer it: but if he be not ready, his lordship said, he tendered himself to their disposal and commands, his own innocency making him thus confident.”—The Attorney General being commanded to speak about this matter, along with the other prosecutions, said “ That what he did was by the express command of the King his master, and not done by his advice; since that he had attended the King to take his further directions therein. His Majesty told him, That when he went out of town he would leave somewhat with the Lord Keeper to be laid before this House; but upon his asking the Lord Keeper, he told him the King had not left any, but had sent for him to attend him speedily.”

The Lord Keeper reported what his Majesty had commanded him to deliver, concerning the lord Kimbolton and the Five Members: "that his majesty taking notice that some think it disputable, whether this Proceeding against that Lord and those Gentlemen be legal and agreeable to the Privileges of Parliament, and being very desirous to give satisfaction to all men in all matters that may seem to have relation to Privilege, is pleased to wave his former Proceedings; and all doubts being by this means settled, when the minds of men are composed, he intends to proceed therein, in an unquestionable way; and assures his Parliament that, upon all occasions, he will be as careful of their Privileges, as of his life and his crown."

The Attorney General was then heard what he could say to justify himself, for charging the lord Kimbolton and the Five Members, and to prove it was a Parliamentary Proceeding, and no Breach of Privilege. And, first, he said, "That for the matter of the Charge, and the framing of the Articles, he had nothing to do with them, neither did his Majesty advise with him therein; but the bringing of the Charge into this house, which he did by his Majesty's command, and only in obedience thereunto: and for the legality of this proceeding, he insisted upon, and opened at large, the whole proceedings of the king's Attorney in the earl of Bristol's Case, 2 Caroli*," which being done, the House appointed to take this business into further consideration the next day.

The lord Kimbolton, upon his Majesty's late Message concerning himself and the Five Members, moved, "That since his Majesty waved the former Proceeding, the House would become suitors to his Majesty, that he may be brought to as speedy a Trial as may be, that so he might not lie under this accusation; but be cleared or judged."

The Commons also having desired liberty to examine the Attorney General, upon certain interrogatories, he made it his humble request to the lords, "That he may be excused from answering to any questions to discover what the King hath committed to him as secret council, which, by his oath, he is bound not to reveal; but what concerns himself he would willingly and ingenuously answer unto." And it was the sense of the House, That if Mr. Attorney, at the Conference, shall desire not to answer to some questions that may be asked him, the house will take it into consideration whether it be fit for him to answer or not.

January 14.

The Lord Keeper acquainted the Lords, That he had just then received a Letter and a Message from the King; both which were ordered to be read, and were in these words:

"My Lord Keeper; This is to command you to deliver that which is contained within the inclosed Paper, as a Message from me to both houses; and that instantly, and without delay. And so I rest your assured friend, Windsor, Jan. 14, 1641. CHARLES R."

The MESSAGE was as follows:

"His Majesty being no less tender of the Privileges of Parliament, and thinking himself no less concerned, that they be not broken, and that they be asserted and vindicated whensoever they are so, than the Parliament itself, hath thought fit to add to his last Message, this profession, That in all his Proceedings against the lord Kimbolton, and the Five Members, he had never the least intention of violating the least Privilege of Parliament; and in case any doubt of Breach of Privilege remains, he will be willing to clear that, and assert those, by any reasonable way that his Parliament shall advise him to: upon confidence of which he no ways doubts his Parliament will forthwith lay by all jealousies, and apply themselves to the public and pressing affairs, and especially to those of Ireland; wherein the good of this kingdom, and the true religion (which shall ever be his majesty's first care) are so highly and so nearly concerned; and his majesty assures himself, that his care of their privileges will increase their tenderness of his lawful prerogative, which are so necessary to the mutual defence of each other; and both which will be the foundation of a perpetual perfect intelligence between his majesty and his parliament, and of the happiness and prosperity of his people."

January 15.

Serjeant Wylde reported the Conference had on Thursday night last with the Lords, concerning Mr. Attorney's exhibiting Articles in the Lords house against Members of this house, as follows: "The Conference consisted of two parts; 1. The Narrative Part, That these Articles exhibited by Mr. Attorney, and entered in the lords house, was a Breach of Privilege of Parliament; and that, in due time, this house would desire that justice may be done upon Mr. Attorney. The second part was, To examine Mr. Attorney upon certain Questions, and to receive his Answer: 1. He being asked, Whether he contrived, framed, or advised the said Articles, or any of them; if not, then whether, he doth know or hath ever heard, who did frame, contrive, or advise the same or any of them? To this he answered, 'That he would deal clearly, freely, and ingenuously, and that he should say the same which he had before delivered to the lords, and should need no long time to answer this; for, that he had done none of these three, that is, neither framed, advised, or contrived these Articles, or any of them; and would be contented to die if he had.' 2. Being demanded, Whether he knew the truth of these Articles, or any of them, of his own knowledge, or had it by information? To this he answered, 'He did know nothing, of his own knowledge, of the truth of these Articles, or any part of them, nor hath heard it by information.' All that ever he hath heard concerning this was from his master. 3. Being asked, Whether he will make good these Articles, when he shall be thereunto called in due course of law? To this he answered, 'He cannot do it, nor will not do it, otherwise than as his master shall command him and shall enable him, no more than he that never heard of them can do it.' 4. Being asked, From whom he received these Articles, and by whose direction and advice he did exhibit them? He answered, 'He did exhibit them by his master's command, and from his hands he did receive them.' 5. Being asked, Whether he had any testimony, or proof, of the Articles before the exhibiting of them? He gave this Answer, 'That he received the command of his majesty: but whether he had any proof then offered, or intimation of testimony, to make good those Articles, he desired time to consider of it.' He was pressed again to make Answer to this, but desired time to consider of it, saying, 'There was a secret trust between a master and a servant, much more in this case.'—Hereupon it was ordered, "That some way be thought of for charging Mr. Attorney, by this house, as criminous, for exhibiting those Articles in the lords house, against members of this house, without any information or proof that appears; and that this house, and the gentlemen charged by him, may have reparation from him; and that he may put in good security to stand to the judgment of parliament." It was also resolved, "That a committee be appointed to prepare a charge against Mr. Attorney, upon these Votes of the house."

The Lord Keeper reported the effect of another Conference held this afternoon, by the desire of the Commons, concerning the King's last Messages, about the Impeachment of their Five Members, "That the Commons had taken them into serious consideration, and had resolved upon the Question, That the said Impeachment, and the Proceedings thereupon, is a high Breach of Privilege of Parliament: That, in order to vindicate this Breach, they propose a Committee of both Houses may meet to consider about it; and to petition his majesty, That those who informed him against these Members, may come in five days time to charge them; or else that they may be cleared, in such a way as the Parliament shall think fit." The Lords, hereupon, passed the same Vote of the Commons, and appointed a committee of 21 of their house to meet with a proportionable number of the Commons, to consider of this affair.

January 19.

The following Declaration, in pursuance of three Reports from the late Committee at Guildhall and Grocers-hall, appeared in print, according to an Order of the 19th:

A DECLARATION of the House of Commons touching a late Breach of their Privileges for the Vindication thereof, and of divers Members of the said House.

"Whereas the chambers, studies, and trunk of Mr. Hollis, sir A. Haslerig, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, and Mr. Strode, members of the house of commons, upon Monday the 3d of the instant Jan. by colour of his majesty's warrant have been sealed up by sir W. Killegree, and sir W. Fleming, and others; which is not only against the Privileges of Parliament, but the common liberty of every subject; which said members, afterward the same day, were, under the like colour, by serjeant Francis, one of his majesty's serjeants at arms, contrary to all former precedents, demanded of the Speaker, sitting in the house of commons, to be delivered unto him, that he might arrest them of High-Treason: And whereas afterwards, the next day, his majesty, in his royal person, came to the said house, attended with a great multitude of men, armed in warlike manner with balberts, swords, and pistols; who came up to the very door of the house, and placed themselves there, and in other places and passages near to the said house, to the great terror and disturbance of the members, then sitting, and according to their duty, in a peaceable and orderly manner, treating of the great affairs of England and Ireland: And his majesty, having placed himself in the Speaker's chair, demanded of them the persons of the said members to be delivered unto him; which is a high breach of the rights and privileges of parliament, and inconsistent with the liberties and freedom thereof; And whereas afterwards his majesty did issue forth several warrants to divers officers, under his own hand, for the apprehension of the persons of the said members; which, by law, he cannot do, there being not, all this time, any legal charge or accusation, or due process of law, issued against them, nor any pretence of charge made known to that house: All which are against the fundamental liberties of the subject and the rights of parliament. Whereupon we are necessitated, according to our duty, to declare, and we do hereby declare, That, if any person shall arrest Mr. Hollis, sir A. Haslerig, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, and Mr. Strode, or any of them, or any other member of parliament, by pretence or colour of any warrant issuing out from the king only, he is guilty of the breach of the liberties of the subject, and of the privilege of parliament, and a public enemy to the common-wealth; and that the arresting of the said members, or any of them, or of any other member of parliament, by any warrant whatsoever, without a legal proceeding against them, and without consent of that house whereof such person is a member, is against the liberty of the subject, and a breach of privilege of parliament; and the person which shall arrest any of these persons, or any other member of the parliament, is declared a public enemy of the commonwealth: Notwithstanding all which, we think fit further to declare, That we are so far from any endeavour to protect any of our members that shall be, in due manner, prosecuted, according to the laws of the kingdom, and the rights and privileges of parliament, for treason, or any other misdemeanour, that none shall be more ready and willing than we ourselves, to bring them to a speedy and due trial; being sensible, that it equally imports us, as well to see justice done against them, that are criminous, as to defend the just rights and liberties of the subjects and parliament of England.—And whereas, upon several examinations taken the 7th day of this instant Jan. before the committee appointed by the house of commons to sit in London, it did fully appear, that many soldiers, papists and others, to the number of about 500, came with his majesty on Tuesday the 4th instant, to the said house of commons, armed with swords, pistols, and other weapons; and divers of them pressed to the door of the said house, thrust away the door-keepers, and placed themselves between the said door and the ordinary attendants of his majesty, holding up their swords; and some holding up their pistols ready cocked near the said door; and saying, 'I am a good marksman; I can hit right, I warrant you;' and they not suffering the said door, according to the custom of parliament, to be shut; but said, 'They would have the door open; and, if any opposition were against them, they made no question, but they should make their party good; and that they would maintain their party.' And, when several members of the house of commons were coming into the house, their attendants desiring that room might be made for them, some of the said soldiers answered, 'A pox of God confound them;' and others said, 'A pox take the house of commons; let them come, and be hanged; what a-do is here with the house of commons.' And some of the said soldiers did likewise violently assault, and by force disarm, some of the attendants and servants of the members of the house of commons, waiting in the rooms next the said house; and, upon the king's return out of the said house, many of them, by wicked oaths, and otherwise, expressed much discontent, that some members of the said house, for whom they came, were not there: And others of them said, 'When comes the Word?' And no word being given at his majesty's coming out, they cried, 'A Lane, A Lane.' Afterwards, some of them, being demanded, 'What they thought the said company intended to have done,' answered, 'That, questionless, in the posture they were set, if the Word had been given, they should have fallen upon the house of commons, and have cut all their throats.' Upon all which, we are of opinion, that it is sufficiently proved, that the coming of the said soldiers, papists, and others, with his majesty, to the house of commons, on Tuesday, being the 4th day of this instant January, in the manner aforesaid, was to take away some of the members of the said house; and, if they should have found opposition or denial, then to have fallen upon the said house in a hostile manner: And we do hereby declare, That the same was a traitorous design against the king and parliament. And whereas Mr. Hollis, sir A. Haslerig, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, and Mr. Strode, members of the said house of commons, upon report of the coming of the said soldiers, papists, and others, in the warlike and hostile manner aforesaid, did, with the approbation of the house, absent themselves from the service of the house, for avoiding the great and many inconveniences which otherwise apparently might have happened: Since which time, a printed Paper, in the form of a Proclamation bearing date the 6th day of this instant January, hath issued out, for the apprehending and imprisoning of them; therein suggesting that, through the conscience of their own guilt, they were absent, and fled; not willing to submit themselves to justice: We do further declare, That the said printed Paper is false, scandalous, and illegal; and that, notwithstanding the said printed Paper, or any warrant issued out, or any other matter yet appearing against them, or any of them, they may and ought to attend the service of the said house of commons, and the several committees now on foot.—And we do further declare, That the publishing of several Articles, purporting a form of a Charge of High Treason against the lord Kimbolton, one of the members of the lords' house, Mr. Hollis, sir A. Haslerig, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, and Mr. Strode, members of the house of commons, by sir Wm. Killgree, sir Wm. Fleming, and others, in the Inns of Court, and elsewhere, in the king's name, was a high breach of the privileges of parliament; a great scandal to his majesty, and his government; a seditious act, manifestly tending to the subversion of the peace of the kingdom; and an injury and dishonour to the said members, there being no legal charge or accusation against them.—That the privileges of parliament, and the liberties of the subject, so violated and broken, cannot be fully and sufficiently vindicated, unless his majesty will be graciously pleased to discover the names of those persons, who advised his majesty to issue out warrants for the sealing of the chambers and studies of the said members: to send a serjeant at arms to the house of commons to demand the said members: to issue out several warrants, under his majesty's own hand, to apprehend the said members: his majesty's coming thither in his own royal person; the publishing of the said Articles and printed paper, in the form of a Proclamation, against the said members, in such manner as is before declared: to the end that such persons may receive condign punishment.—And this house doth further declare, That all such persons as have given any counsel, or endeavoured to set or maintain division or dislike, between the king and parliament; or have listed their names, or otherwise entered into any combination or agreement, to be aiding, or assisting, to any such counsel or endeavour, or have persuaded any other so to do; or that shall do any the things above-mentioned: and shall not forthwith discover the same to either house of parliament; or the Speaker of either of the said houses respectively, and disclaim it; are declared public enemies of the state and peace of this kingdom, and shall be inquired of, and proceeded against accordingly."

January 20.

The Commons drew up a Petition, and sent it to the Lords; which was in these words:

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty; The humble PETITION of the Lords and Commons, now assembled in Parliament,

"Sheweth; That whereas, of late, there have been sundry and great Breaches of the Privileges of Parliament; and your majesty, in a Message to both houses, was pleased graciously to express, that you would be willing to clear and assert them, by any reasonable way your parliament should advise you to; we shall, in convenient time, present the particulars to you, together with our advice and desires, for the asserting our privileges; and whereas your majesty by another Message to both houses, hath expressed an apprehension of some treasonable matter to have been committed, by the lord Kimbolton, Mr. Hollis, and the rest; and declared, That you will, hereafter, proceed against them in an unquestionable way: We your lords and commons do humbly beseech your majesty that you would be pleased to give directions, that your parliament may be informed, in a few days, what proof there is against them; that, accordingly, there may be a parliamentary and a legal proceeding against them; and they receive, in justice, what shall be their due, either for their acquaintance or condemnation.—This we humbly conceive we are bound to crave, both in regard of ourselves, and of them; being unfit that we should have any of our members liable to so great a charge; and thereby hindered from doing the service they respectively owe to their several houses; as that they, if innocent, should longer lie under so great a weight; or, if guilty, avoid their deserved punishment."

The Lords agreed to this Petition, and ordered some of their body to join a Committee of the Commons to present it to the King the next day.

January 24.

The King's Answer to the above Petition, was reported to the lord, by the earl of Newport, to this purport:

"That he doth well approve of the desire of both Houses, for the speedy proceedings against the persons mentioned in the Petition; wherein his majesty finding the great inconveniences, by the first mistake, hath endured some delay, that he might be informed in what order to put the same. But, before that be agreed upon, his majesty thinks it unusual to discover what proof there is against them; and therefore thinks it necessary, lest a new mistake should breed more delay, which his majesty to his power will avoid, that it be resolved, Whether he be bound, in respect of Privilege, to proceed against them by Impeachment in parliament, or whether he be at liberty to prefer an indictment at the common law, in the usual way, or have his choice of either: whereupon his majesty will give such speedy directions for the prosecution, as will shew his desire to satisfy both houses, and put a determination to this business."

February 1.

This day the House of Commons sent up a draught of a Petition to the king, concerning the lord Kimbolton and the Five Members, in which was recited all that was passed in that business; and that they once again besought his majesty to give directions that they might be informed, in two days time, what proofs there were against them, that they might be brought to a legal trial, it being the undoubted right and privilege of parliament, that no member can be proceeded against without their consent. To which Petition they desired their lordships concurrence; which was granted.

To this Petition, his Majesty returned this Answer:

"That as he once conceived that he had ground enough to accuse them, so now his majesty finds as good cause wholly to desert any further prosecution of them: and, for a further testimony of his majesty's real intention towards all his loving subjects, some of whom haply may be involved in some unknown or unwilling errors; for the better composing and settling of fears and jealousies, of what kind soever; his majesty is ready to grant as free and general a pardon, for the full contentment of all his loving subjects, as shall, by the approbation of both Houses of Parliament, be thought convenient for that purpose."

February 17.

The Commons prepared another Petition to the King, concerning the Accused Members, which they sent up to the Lords for their concurrence, who joined with them in it. This Petition was as follows:

"To the King's Most Excellent Majesty; The humble PETITION of the LORDS and COMMONS, now assembled in Parliament.

"Sheweth; That whereas your majesty, in Answer to their late Petition touching the proceedings against the lord Kimbolton, Mr. Hollis, &c. members of the parliament, was pleased to signify, That as your majesty once conceived that you had ground enough to accuse them, so now your majesty finds as good cause, wholly to defer any further prosecution of them: notwithstanding which, they remain still under that heavy charge so imputed unto them, to the exceeding prejudice not only of themselves, but also of the whole parliament: and whereas, by the express laws and statutes of this your realm, that is to say, by two acts of parliament, the one made in the 37th, and the other in the 58th year of the reign of your most noble progenitor king Edw. 3. If any person whatsoever make suggestion to the king himself of any crime committed by another, the same person ought to be sent, with the suggestion, before the chancellor or keeper of the great seal, the treasurer, and the great council, there to find surety to pursue his suggestion; which if he cannot prove, he is to be imprisoned till he hath satisfied the party accused of his damages and slander, and made fine and ransom to the king. The said lords and commons, therefore, humbly beseech your majesty that, not only in point of justice to the said members in their particular, but for the vindication of the rights and privileges of parliament, your majesty will be pleased to send the person, or persons that in this case made the suggestions or informations to your majesty against the said members of parliament, together with the said suggestions or informations, to your parliament; that so such fruits of the said good laws may be had as was intended by them, and the rights and privileges of parliament may be vindicated; which of right and justice, ought not to be delayed."

To which Petition, the King, on the 21st, desired further time to consider of his Answer.

March 4.

A Bill had been sent up by the Commons intitled, "An Act for the clearing and vindicating of the lord Kimbolton, and the Five Members, from a late feigned Charge or Accusation, of High Treason;" which was read a second time this day by the lords, and committed.

March 16.

The Bill, "For clearing the lord Kimbolton and the Five Members from a feigned Charge of High Treason;" also another Bill "For raising Money for the great Affairs of the kingdoms of England and Ireland," was read a third time by the lords, and passed. Ordered, "That the clerk of the crown, in Chancery, do forthwith draw up two commissions, and prepare them ready for the great seal, for his majesty's royal assent to be given to these two Bills."

Lord Clarendon thus represents the circumstances attending the triumphal Return of the Five Members to Parliament, "The Accused Members about two of the clock in the afternoon, on the 11th of January, being the next day after the King went to Hampton-Court, came from their lodgings in the city to Westminster, guarded by the Sheriffs, and Trained-bands of London and Westminster, and attended by a conflux of many thousands of people besides, making a great clamour against Bishops, and Popish Lords, and for the Privileges of Parliament; some of them, as they passed by Whitehall, asking with much contempt, 'what was become of the King and his Cavaliers?' and whither he was gone?"

"From London bridge to Westminster, the Thames was guarded with above a hundred lighters and longboats, laden with small pieces of ordnance, and dressed up with wast-cloaths and streamers, as ready for fight. And that the Trained-bands of London might be under the command of a person fit to lead them, they granted a Commission to captain Skippon, who was Captain of the Artillery Garden, to be Major-general of the Militia of the city of London; an office never before heard of, nor imagined that they had authority to constitute. The man had served very long in Holland, and from a common soldier had raised himself to the degree of a Captain, and to the reputation of a good officer; he was a man of order and sobriety, and untainted with any of those vices which the Officers of that Army were exercised in; and had newly given over that service upon some exceptions he had to it, and, coming to London, was by some friends preferred to that command in the Artillery Garden, which was to teach the citizens the exercise of their arms. He was altogether illiterate, and having been bred always abroad, brought disaffection enough with him from thence against the church of England, and so was much caressed and trusted by that party.

"This man marched that day in the head of their tumultuary army to the Parliament House; where the Accused Members were no sooner entered, than they magnified 'the great kindness and affection they had found in the City, and their zeal to the Parliament, and if their expressions of it, upon this extraordinary occasion, had been somewhat unusual, that the house was engaged in honour to protect and defend them from receiving any damage.' Whereupon the Sheriffs of London were called into the House of Commons, and thanked by the Speaker for their extraordinary care and love expressed to the Parliament; and told, 'that they should have an Ordinance of Parliament for their Indemnity, declaring that all their actions of respect and kindness, which they had shewed to the lords and commons in London, and their attending them to, and at Westminster, was legal and justifiable.' The masters and officers of ships were likewise called in, and most heartily thanked for their kindness; and serjeant major-general Skippon appointed every day to attend at Westminster, with such a guard as he thought sufficient for the two houses. There was one circumstance not to be forgotten in the march of the citizens that day, when the shew by water was little inferior to the other by land, that the pikemen had fastened to the tops of their pikes, and the rest in their hats of their bosoms, printed Papers of the Protestation which had been taken, and enjoined by the House of Commons the year before for the defence of the Privilege of Parliament; and many of them had the printed Votes of the King's breaking their privileges in his coming to the house, and demanding their members.

"As soon as the citizens and mariners were discharged, some Buckinghamshire men, who were said to be at the door, with a Petition, and had indeed waited upon the triumph with a train of several thousand men, were called in;

who delivered their Petition in the name of the inhabitants of the county of Buckingham, and said it was brought to the town by about 6,000 men. They commended the unwearied pains of the House of Commons, for the redress of the pressures they had lain under, but complained that the success was not answerable, their endeavours being frustrated or retarded by a Malignant Faction of Popish Lords, Bishops, and Others; and now of late, to take all that little hope, was left, from them, of a future reformation, the very being of the Parliament was shaken, the Privileges thereof broken in a desperate and unexampled manner, and the Members thereof unassured of their lives, in whose safety, the safety of them, and their posterity was involved. They held it therefore the duty according to their late protestation, to defend and maintain the persons and privilege thereof, to the utmost power of their lives and estates; to which purpose, they said, they were then come to make the humble tender of the service, and would remain in expectation of their commands and order; to the execution whereof they would with all alacrity address themselves, ready to live by them, or to die at their feet, against whomsoever should in any sort illegally attempt upon them."

THE Lord Keeper having reported the Conference, concerning the Petitions for a Reformation in Church and State, a motion was made in the House of Lords for joining with the Commons in petitioning his majesty about putting the Forts and Militia of the Kingdom into safer hands, &c. upon the new Reasons offered at the said Conference. This occasioned a long debate, the House being in a committee; when, being resumed, some Lords desired the house might be adjourned, to which the Duke of Richmond answered, "Let us put the question, Whether we shall adjourn for six months?" which words the house taking exception to, the Duke explained himself, "That he did not speak these Words positively, but meant that the House might be adjourned as well for six months, as to a time not limited." But this not satisfying, the Duke withdrew; when, after some more debate, the question was put, "Whether it shall be sufficient satisfaction to this house, That the lord

* "This," says Clarendon, "was the term they imposed upon all those they meant to render odious to the people."

† As to the non-trial of persons impeached after January 1, 1641-2, see 3 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 45. "Although a Vote had passed on the 19th Dec. 1642, concerning Delinquents, 'That they were not all to be included in their designed Propositions to the king for Peace,' the House of Commons had got that Order overruled in some measure: for though a Committee of Lords had been appointed to consider of the naming of such Delinquents as were to be excepted out of their act of grace, who this day brought in their opinion, 'That those only who had been impeached before the 1st of January last should be proceeded against in Parliament;' yet the lord Digby, particularly, though he had been impeached since that time, was left to the Judgment of Parliament. And after a long debate, the following question was put: 'Those that are of opinion to agree with the committee, That at this time, such as the committee have named to be impeached by the commons should be left to the Trial of Parliament, omitting the rest of those which are impeached, say Content;' and it passed affirmatively. On which the following Lords entered their Dissent thus: 'We whose names are subscribed do conceive that the demanding, by

' this House, of some to be left to justice, and ' leaving out of others, who are under the like ' Impeachment of High Treason, and have been, ' by force of arms, protected from being brought ' to a Trial, in the highest court of judicature, ' is an example of very ill consequence; because ' we conceive that it is not proper for this ' House to move the House of Commons, in the ' stopping of their Proceedings upon Impeach- ' ments; and that it doth not only give encour- ' agement to a king to attempt the like stop- ' page of justice by force, and from this preced- ' ent to stand upon the protecting of persons ' impeached; but to subjects also, who may be ' induced to undertake any thing in hopes of ' impunity, even from the desires of this house; ' which hath not demanded any one of those to ' be left to trial, who, since his majesty's going ' to York, have been impeached of High Treason, for actually levying war against the king ' and kingdom. Upon these, amongst other ' reasons, we have demanded our right of Pro- ' testation; and do now accordingly enter it, to ' clear ourselves from any inconveniences that ' may follow from these Votes; which are, in ' our opinion, very prejudicial to the privileges ' of parliament and the liberty of the subject. ' —(Signed) Warwick, Peterborough, Man- ' chester, Say and Sele, Wharton, Bolingbroke, ' Wiltoughby of Parham, Brook Grey de Werk.' ' 3 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 45.

duke of Richmond shall come to his place, and make an humble Submission and acknowledgment that he hath offended the house in speaking these Words inconsiderately and unadvisedly; and that he had no intention to have the House adjourned for six months, and that he craves their lordships pardon for it?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

Against which the following Protest was entered: "That, in respect the words spoken by the duke of Richmond tended much to the prejudice of the king and kingdom, we do protest against this vote, as not sufficient punishment for words of that dangerous consequence: Northumberland, lord Admiral; Bedford, Essex, Pembroke, Suffolk, Lincoln, Leicester, Warwick, Holland, Bolingbroke, Stamford, Conway, Wharton, Paget, Huusden, Chandois, St. John, Spencer, Kymbolton, Brooke, Grey de Werk, Roberts, Howard de Escrick, Wiltoughby de Parham."

Then the Duke was called in, and, standing in his place, made this Acknowledgment: "That he doth, with all humility, acknowledge his great offence in speaking of Words concerning an Adjournment for Six Months, which he confesseth to have uttered unadvisedly and inconsiderately; but professeth he did not intend or mean that any such adjournment should be; and craves the Pardon of the house for his offence therein.*"

January 29.

A Message to the Lords came up from the Commons, brought by sir Peter Wentworth, desiring a Conference, touching the duke of Richmond.† The Lords fixed upon a present meeting; when, being returned from it, the Lord Keeper reported the substance of it to this effect:

"That Mr. Glynn said, He was commanded by the House of Commons to acquaint their lordships with what Information had been given to them about the said Duke. 1. That he did write unto the town of Hithe, to chuse one captain Wimberley to serve for one of the barons there in this Parliament, but he was not chosen. A Letter was produced, wrote by one of the Duke's officers, said to be by his grace's direction, to prove this: as also, another to captain Collins, deputy lieutenant, directed to the mayor and jurats of Hithe, for the return of the said election. 2. Mr. Perd, a member of the house of commons, informed that house, That whilst the affair of Mr. Percy and Mr. Jernyn were before the house, and before their offences were declared High Treason, one Mr. Scroop, the duke's steward, came to him, and, in his master's name, desired Mr. Perd to forbear to press the matter concerning those gentlemen; affirming, that it would be an acceptable service, and would do him good. Which last words Mr. Perd construed to mean, that the King and Queen would take notice of it as an acceptable service. This he would not say positively, but he believed it, &c. 3. That, by a copy of a Record* then in their house, it did appear, that the duke of Richmond did, on the 26th of January instant, desire that the question might be put for the adjournment of the house of lords for six months.

"Upon the whole, the house of commons passed this vote, That they had sufficient cause to accuse the duke of Richmond as one of the Malignant-Party, and an Evil Counsellor to the king, for these Reasons: 1. That he endeavoured to have such Members chosen as he should name; and his way of menacing afterwards shews an intention to overthrow the Freedom of Election, and making a party in Parliament. 2. That he endeavoured to corrupt the Members of the House of Commons after they were elected, even in matters of the highest nature; for support of the Delinquents that were in question for endeavouring to bring the army upon the parliament. 3. The motion made in the house, if elected, would certainly be the loss of Ireland, and hazard the ruin of this kingdom; there being distractions at home, and imminent danger in Ireland, and no way to help both but by parliament; which, if it had been adjourned, in consequence that necessary and good act, for the continuance of this parliament, would have been ineffectual.

"Upon all which the House of Commons desire their lordships forthwith to join with them to petition his majesty, That the Duke may not have any access to the persons or courts of the king or queen; and that he may be removed from all offices and places of public trust. And that this may be done with all speed, in regard of the great places of trust and confidence he now holds."

Mr. Glynn concluded with telling their lordships, "That it was the care of the House of Commons to prevent the evils that hang over our heads; and they can do no less, in regard to the duty they owe to the King, who has called them as his council; to their country that hath intrusted them; and, lastly, they do it to satisfy their own consciences. They say they saw the stone that hit them, but could not discover the arm that threw it. They say they wash their hands of the ill consequences of these things, and lay it at their lordships door."

This Report being ended, the Duke of Richmond stood up, and made his humble desire,

* This Record was probably the Votes or Journals of the Lords. It may be noticed, that this difference in the evidence of the offence charged, distinguishes this case from those of bishop Neile, vol. 2, p. 885, and of the lord Digby, No. 162, of the present volume.

"That he might have a copy of the Heads of this Information against him; and that he be allowed some short time to give in his Answer." The Lords agreed to this, and ordered the 31st instant, for that purpose.

January 31.

The Duke of Richmond brought in his Answer to the Charge against him from the Commons, which his grace, standing in his place, read in these words:

"My Lords, I take it this Vote of the House of Commons, which to me must prove very heavy, if it light upon me, is grounded on these three Reasons."—Then his grace repeated the substance of the three Articles brought by the Commons against him; and proceeded thus:

"Upon these three Reasons the House of Commons have desired your lordships to join with them in petitioning his majesty, That I might not have any access to the persons or court of the king and queen, &c. This is the Charge. Though these requests, if put in execution, would much afflict me; yet the sense of the House of Commons, and their ill opinion of me, which I judge by their Vote, is a greater cross than any that hath yet befallen me: but I have this comfort, that as the House of Commons have passed this Vote, and made these Requests upon me without hearing my Defence; so that, when your lordships shall hear my clear and ingenuous Answer, you, I hope, will be so far from joining with them in any such request to his majesty, that I shall presume to be an humble suitor to your lordships to clear my innocence to the House of Commons; and to set me right in their good opinion; which I much desire; who, I doubt not, are so just as to acquit or condemn, according as the cause shall appear unto them.

"And to your lordships I affirm, by all that may procure belief, that I did never malign the prosperity and happiness of the King, Kingdom, or Parliament; my interest in all may be some persuasion to justify what I say; or did give the King, my master, any council whatever, but what, in my own heart, I conceived to tend to the advancement of his honour, and maintenance of the public good of the kingdom; the union of the King and his People each to the other, and a right understanding and correspondence between him and his Parliament; and, from my heart, I cannot but declare against any, if there be any, of a contrary opinion.

"So far am I from a thought of prejudice to the kingdom of Ireland, that I would rejoice as much to see the Protestants there settled in peace and their possessions, the Protestant religion there established, the rebels there suppressed, and that kingdom reduced to obedience, as any of his majesty's subjects, and be as ready to join in giving assistance to effect it; for I crave leave to let your lordships know, that I have, some months since, sent into Ireland, of my own, 39 barrels of powder, 120 muskets and pikes, 60 cornets and head-pieces, besides match and bullets, both for great ordnance and muskets, to Colmore castle, for the defence of that, Londonderry, and the country about it; and I left 200*l.* sterling in my agent's hands, for defraying the charge of transporting those things.

"But to apply myself to the particular Reasons of the Charge against me; it rests upon the truth of the fact, and your lordships judgment of it, either to acquit or condemn me, which I shall wholly submit to. I must crave your lordships pardon for giving any Answer at all to the third Reason, touching what passed from me in this house; as well in respect of the privilege of this house, where things of that nature, as I conceive, are to be questioned; as for that your lordships have already taken the same into your consideration, and I have undergone and performed your lordships Censure thereon before this Accusation. I know it will not seem just to your lordships, that I should be in a worse case than any other subject, to receive a double punishment for one and the same offence; and I know your lordships cannot but conceive it to be of more than ordinary consequence in the precedent.

"For the other, I shall give your lordships a distinct Answer. I must beg your leave to deny some things which have been charged upon me; but shall ingenuously confess whatsoever I know to be a truth, touching these things, how prejudicial soever it may prove to me; and rely more upon my own innocence, than to defend myself by denying a truth, or defending what is not so. 'Magna est veritas et prevalebit.' I wish it may do so in what concerns me. 'Regnet Justitia et ruat Cælum.'

"I conceive the Proof for the first Reason, inducing the House of Commons to believe an intention in me to overthrow the Freedom of Election, and make a party in Parliament, is upon the information of sir Henry Hayman, That I did write to the town of Hithe to chuse one captain Wimberly, to serve for one of the barons there, in this present Parliament, but he was not elected. The gentleman that gave the information I do not know; but it is true in this; and if it be an offence, I shall be so far my own accuser, that I have here brought a true copy of that Letter which I sent to that port, with a witness, who is without, to attest it. Other recommendation, than by that Letter only, I never made to that town; but I was so far, before this Accusation, from thinking it an offence, that I confess to your lordships I wrote the like Letter to other places, within the jurisdiction of the Ports; and I was informed, that the Warden of the Cinque Ports had, in all times, done the like.

"But this being no more than a bare recommendation, their choice was left free, and in some of those places my request prevailed, in some not: but I had never so much as a thought of ill against any who gave his vote against the party recommended; and will hazard my honour and fortune, that no man can affirm that I ever gave them the least check upon this occasion.

“For the Copy of the Letter written by captain Collins, suggested to be one of my officers, and signified to be by my directions; I confess that Captain was Deputy of the Lieutenantcy of Dover Castle, which is under my command; but whether the Captain wrote such a Letter to the port of Hithe, I know not; but this I know for certain, that my directions imported not so much; and I hope your lordships will not think it just to charge me with a high crime, drawing on so heavy a punishment, for what an under-officer shall do without my knowledge. Yet, in this, I will not conceal one tittle of truth; for it is true I did write to captain Collins, and shall shew your lordships the very Letter itself, which I have sent for since your last sitting; and when I have told your lordships the occasion, which I shall make good by proof, I am confident you will find it far from a crime. It was this: I being warden of the Cinque Ports, and the Writ of Summons of Parliament directed to me, I make warrant to the several ports, for election of their barons; which, when done, they return them to me, and I return them with the writ of summons. Now, I having made warrants, accordingly, to the ports, and received and returned their barons elected, I was informed from the port of Sandwiche, that some had given voices in their election who received alms from the town, with some other questions about elections in other places, particularly Rye, for which I was informed there was a Petition in parliament; and because I might be able to give an account touching all these Elections, if occasion were, I wrote to all the Ports in general, to be certified how the elections went by the poll; that is, to know how many voices went for the one, and how many for another; but for their names, I wrote not, though I had ground enough given me by the complaint of Sandwiche; and, if captain Collins, upon this Letter of mine, have been too exact, I hope that shall not turn to my prejudice or his, since there was no ill intent, nor hath been any ill consequence from it: for this I affirm, confidently, to your lordships, That not one elector, in any of the ports, was ever menaced or ill used by me, or my direction. I cannot be disproved in this, and your lordships will hardly believe I wrote to captain Collins out of any intention of revenge; when, by the same letter, I desired to be certified of the poll in all the ports, as well where the party recommended by me was elected, as where he was not.

“This is the whole truth, and my Answer touching that business; and if it be an offence to write a Letter to recommend a gentleman for an election, yet, I hope, it will not deserve so severe a punishment. Sure I am, I never understood it an offence; for, if I had, I should not have done it myself, or believe it to be generally done by others, who, I hope, will never come in danger of punishment for it. And now, before I go to the second Head, I desire your lordships to hear the Letters, and the witness upon the occasion of them.”—Then the Letter to the Mayor and Jurats of Hithe was read, with their Answer to his grace, which contained much the same as is expressed in his Defence; as also, the Letter to captain Collins, in relation to the sending up the Polls of all the ports. Then the Duke proceeded:

“The second and only thing to be now answered, is, The endeavouring to corrupt the Members of the House of Commons, after they were elected, for support of Delinquents. The offence which is charged, I am confident your lordships will not find me guilty of; all the instance of proof is only upon a Message pretended to be delivered to one Mr. Perd, a member of the house of commons, by my Steward, who is my cousin, Adrian Scroop; and some speeches and gestures of mine to Mr. Perd, some time after that message. I know your lordships will not take this upon an implicit faith, that it is true, because it is charged against me. But I must crave your noble justice, as a free subject as well as a peer, to be judged secundum probata as well as allegata; and, notwithstanding this misfortune which is fallen upon me, I hope you believe I will not tell you an untruth. I confess I sent my steward to Mr. Perd; and he being one who has long been with me, and ever carried himself honestly and like a gentleman, gives me confidence that he delivered no such Message to Mr. Perd from me, as is charged. I protest to your lordships, upon my honour, that the Message I sent was no more than to this effect, ‘That if, in the business of Mr. Percy, it fell in his way to do him any just favour, that I should take it as a courtesy, and express it to him upon any fair occasion.’ This was without any other intimation or particular request whatsoever, and I am confident my servant delivered it to him no otherways; for he brought me a civil answer of his readiness to do any thing he might, with a good conscience, which was as much as I desired. And I was so far from taking offence, that, when I spoke to Mr. Perd, it was only to avow my servant, and to give him thanks; and no such thing happened as has been informed by him.

“Now, my Lords, Mr. Percy being my old acquaintance at school; in our travels, and here at home, having lived friends together; I thought I could do no less than to ask just favours for him in his distress. There was no unlawful thing desired; no bribes offered; if this be an offence, as I hope it is not, I am confident it will not be so heinous as to draw so heavy a censure upon me.

“And because, my Lords, I would be quit of this great burthen, I have caused Scroop to attend without; and desire your lordships to examine him, upon his oath, touching the truth of the message, and what passed between Mr. Perd and him; for I am guilty of no tittle more than what I have confessed to you. I know not what passed in the house of commons, or that Mr. Perd had ever spoken as that business; or if Scroop had desired him not to press that business, or persuaded him not to call upon it, or intimated any thing of the king or queen, which I believe he did not, it was without any direction from me, and let him answer for it. But I rather believe there was no ill in the message, because Mr. Perd did not then, nor at any time since, till this question in the house of commons, call upon him or me concerning it.

“ My Lords, I am no lawyer or orator, but I am a gentleman; and, in that consideration, so much concerned in what is moved against me, as though life or a total confiscation may not be desired, yet, upon the consequence of it, so much of honour and reputation depends, that I esteem it equal to any of those censures. But I have so much innocence in me, as makes me confident that I cannot miscarry by your lordships judgment; and therefore have adventured to make my own Defence, who best know the truth of my own heart; and so I submit myself and cause, which concerns you all, to your lordships judgment.

The Duke having ended, he desired that Thomas Webb, his Secretary, might, upon oath, relate the occasion of writing the Letters to the Port Towns; which was one Complaint against his grace. Then the Lords sent a Message to the Commons, “ That, in regard of their offer made at the last Conference, they desire that sir Henry Hayman and Mr. Perd may come to this house, and, upon oath, testify what they know in the business concerning the duke of Richmond ”

The House of Lords proceeded in the business of the duke of Richmond; when Mr. Perd gave his Evidence, upon oath, nearly in the same manner as is before related. The Duke, having heard this Evidence, denied it; he gave his steward, Mr. Scroop, any such directions as Mr. Perd alledged, and then withdrew. The house went into a debate, whether Mr. Scroop ought to be examined, upon oath, to know what directions the Duke gave him; because, thereby, he might accuse himself. The Judges Opinions being asked on this question, they were all in a mind, That, in their ordinary courts of justice, Mr. Scroop might, by law, be examined on oath.—Here upon Mr. Scroop was sworn and examined who said, “ That the Duke directed him to go to Mr. Perd, and to desire him, that, in the business of Mr. Percy, he would, if it fell fairly in his way, rather incline to do good offices than press in rigour; and that thereby he might engage my Lord Duke to render him thanks, and return him such favours as fell in his way; and that he had no directions to speak of any favours intended from the king or queen.”

This being done, the Lords considering of the Evidence on both sides, the affair of the Cinque Ports being dropped, the question was put, Whether that house should join with the Commons in the Petition against the Duke? It passed in the Negative.

161. Proceedings against Sir EDWARD HERBERT, knt. the King's Attorney General, upon an Impeachment for High Crimes and Misdemeanors: 17 CHARLES I. A. D. 1642. [4 Rushw. Coll. 489. 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1089.]

THE dissatisfaction of the House of Commons with the conduct of the Attorney General has already appeared in the Case of lord Kimbolton, and the Five impeached Members. On the 14th of February 1641-2, the Commons sent up to the Lords an Impeachment against sir Edward Herbert the king's Attorney General, for High Crimes and Misdemeanors; which was read in hæc verba :

“ That he the said sir Edward Herbert, knight, his majesty's Attorney General sworn, the 3rd of Jan. 1641, contrary to his oath and the duty of his place, did, falsely, scandalously, and maliciously advise, contrive, and publish, certain false, scandalous, and malicious Articles of High Treason, against the lord Kimbolton, one of the members of the house of peers in parliament. Denzil Holle, esq. sir Arthur Haslerig, bart. John Pym, John Hampden, and William Strode, esquires, being then and yet Members of the House of Commons in Parliament; a copy of which Articles the House of

“ And the said sir Edward Herbert, the said 3rd of Jan. did falsely and maliciously exhibit the said Articles in the said house of peers, and caused the same to be entered into the Clerk's book of this house, intending and endeavouring thereby falsely, unlawfully, and maliciously to deprive the said houses of their said several Members, and to take away their lives, estates, and good names.

“ All which doings of the said sir Edward Herbert, and every of them, were and are high Breaches of the Privileges of Parliament, tending to sedition, and to the utter subversion of the ancient Rights and being of Parliament, and Liberty of the Subject, and to the great scandal and dishonour of his majesty and his government, and were and are contrary to the oath of the said Attorney General, and to the great trust reposed in him by his majesty, and contrary to the laws of this realm, and a great derogation to his majesty's royal crown and dignity.

“ For which high Crimes and Misdemeanors, the said House of Commons, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting any further or other Impeachment or Accusation against the said sir Edward Herbert, do impeach him; and do pray, that he may be forthwith put to answer the premises, in the presence of the commons, and desire that his person may be secured.”

Hereupon the Attorney General was sent for, and standing in his place, as Assistant, the Charge was read to him, who answered, “ That he humbly desired to have a Copy of the Impeachment and such time allowed as their lordships do in justice give to others.” The lords gave him eight days to bring in his Answer; and the earl of Monmouth offering himself as bail for his appearance, he was bound in 5,000*l.* bond for it.

February 22.

This day, the Attorney General delivered in his Answer to the Charge of the Commons against him, which was read before a Committee of that house in these words:

“ The said Defendant, saving to himself now, and at all times hereafter, all just exception to the said Impeachment, as the same is charged, for Answer saith, and acknowledgeth, That he is, and the 3d day of January last past was, his majesty's Attorney General sworn: But whereas he is charged with the malicious, false, and scandalous advising and contriving the Articles in the said Impeachment mentioned, he saith; That he was, and is so far from any malice, falshood or scandal, in the advising and contriving of the same, or any of them, that he did not at all advise or contrive the said Articles, or any of them: nor ever knew or heard of them, or any of them, until he received them from his majesty's hands, the said 3rd day of January last past, ready ingrossed in paper.

“ And as to that part of the said Impeachment, which chargeth this Defendant with the exhibiting of the said Articles to this honourable house, he saith, That, upon the said 3rd day of January he repaired to his majesty by his command, who then delivered unto this Defendant a Paper containing the Articles in the said Impeachment mentioned, and did command him, in his majesty's name to acquaint this honourable house that divers great and treasonable Designs and Practices, against his majesty and the State, were come to his majesty's knowledge; for which his majesty commanded this Defendant, in his majesty's name, to accuse six Members, in the said Paper mentioned, of High Treason, and other High Misdemeanors, by delivering that Paper to your lordships, and to desire to have it read: And further to desire, in his majesty's name, that a Select Committee of lords might be appointed to take the examinations of such Witnesses as his majesty should produce, as formerly had been done in cases of like nature, according to the justice of this house; and that Committee to be under a command of secrecy, as formerly; and further, in his majesty's name, to ask liberty to add and alter, if there should be cause, according to justice: And likewise, that their lordships would take care of the securing of the said persons as in justice there should be cause.

“ That, according to his majesty's said command, this Defendant did come to this honourable house, the said 3rd day of January, and then, after the right honourable Edward lord Littleton, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, had declared to this honourable house, that he was commanded by his majesty to let your lordships know, that his majesty had given this Defendant command to acquaint your lordships with some things from his majesty: this Defendant thereupon, the said 3rd day of January in this honourable house, before your lordships, then and there sitting in parliament, in obedience to his majesty's said commands, as a Message from him, did declare the aforesaid commands of his majesty: by acquainting your lordships, that the King had commanded him to tell your lordships, that divers great and treasonable Designs and Practices, against him and the state, had come to his majesty's knowledge, for which the king had given his command to accuse six persons of high treason, and other high misdemeanors, by delivering these Articles: And that he was commanded, to desire your lordships to have them read; which, by your lordships command, were accordingly read by the clerk: And then further declared, that he was also commanded by his majesty to desire, on his majesty's behalf, that a select committee might be appointed to take the Examination of such Witnesses as the king would produce, as formerly had been done in cases of like nature, according to the justice of this house; and this committee to be under a command of secrecy, as formerly: And that he was commanded to ask liberty to add according to justice; and that he was commanded to desire that your lordships would take care for the securing of those persons, as, in justice, there should be cause.

“ And saith, he did not conceive there could be any offence, in what was so done by him, in this honourable house, in obedience to those his majesty's commands; being wholly thereby left to your lordship's wisdoms and judgments, being his majesty's great council and greatest court for advice and justice.

“ And as touching the false, scandalous and malicious advising, contriving, or publishing the said Articles, or any other Articles against the said persons in the said papers mentioned, or any of them; or any breach of this Defendant's oath of Attorney General; and to the false, unlawful, and malicious exhibiting the said Articles into this honourable house, or causing any entry thereof to be made; and the intent and endeavour falsely, unlawfully, and maliciously to deprive this honourable house or the honourable house of commons, of any of the members of the said houses, or to take away any of their lives, estates, or good names; and every offence and misdemeanor charged by the said Impeachment upon this Defendant, he saith he is not guilty of them, or any of them, in such manner and form as by the said impeachments is charged. All which matters and things this Defendant is, and will be ready to aver and prove in such sort, as to this honourable house of parliament shall seem meet."

The Earl of Monmouth was again bail for Mr. Attorney, in 5,000*l.* bond for his appearance to abide the Judgment of the Lords in parliament, in this cause, and so the matter was dismissed for that time.

March 8.

This day a Letter from the King, directed to the Lord Keeper, was read in the House of Lords: viz.

"C. R. Right trusty and well-beloved Counsellor, we greet you well; We have thought good hereby to certify, that we did, on the 3rd of January last, deliver unto our Attorney General certain Articles of Accusation, ingrossed in a Paper, (a Copy whereof we have sent here inclosed) and did then command him, in our name to acquaint our House of Peers, that divers great and treasonable Designs and Practices against us and the state, had come to our knowledge; for which we did command him in our name, to accuse the Six Persons, in the said Paper mentioned, of High Treason, and other High Misdemeanors, by delivering the Paper to the said house, &c. [as before recited.] We further declare, That our said Attorney did not advise or contrive the said Articles, nor had any thing to do with, or in, advising any Breach of Privilege that followed after; and for what he did, in obedience to our commands, we conceive he was bound by his oath and the duty of his place, and by the trust by us reposed in him, so to do; and had he refused to have obeyed us therein, we would have questioned him for the breach of his oath, duty, and trust; but now having declared, That we find cause wholly to desist from proceeding against the Persons accused, we have commanded our Attorney to proceed no farther therein, nor to produce or discover any proofs concerning the same. Given at our court at Royston, the 4th day of March, 1641."

The Lords conceiving this Letter to be a prelimiting the Judgment of their House, ordered to proceed in the business against the Attorney General, now; and this Letter to be taken into consideration afterwards, as a matter of great consequence. A Message was also sent to the Commons, to inform them of the Letter, and that their Lordships were ready to proceed against the Attorney General, if they would send a Committee of their house to manage the Evidence.

Accordingly, the Committee being come, the Lord Keeper told them they might begin their Evidence; whereupon,

Mr. Serjeant Wyld, one of them, said "That they were appointed by the house of commons, to make good their Charge against sir Edward Herbert, his majesty's Attorney General; a person of eminency in the common law, both eminent in place, and eminent in crime; the nature and deformity of which is set forth in the Impeachment, which he desired might be read. Then he observed, That his Charge was of three parts: 1. The advising and contriving of these foul Articles. 2. The publishing and exhibiting of them in this House. 3. The falshood, scandal, malice, and other ingredients, mixed and incorporated so together, that they could not be more separated than blackness from the Æthiopian; or, if they could be separated, yet each of them was sufficient to call for Judgment against Mr. Attorney.—He then mentioned the exhibiting of these Articles, Jan. 3, 1641, and they were read out of the Journal Book of that day. Also the king's Proclamation, reciting, That his Attorney General, by his majesty's command, had accused the six Members of High Treason in the House of Lords. Likewise his majesty's Letters to Dover, and other ports, for the apprehending of them, reciting that they were accused by the Attorney General. Next, he desired that Mr. Attorney's Answer might be read; wherein, he said, there was matter enough to condemn him: In which he confessed the exhibiting the Paper of Articles, as a Message from his majesty, and by his command; on which it was recorded in the Clerk's Book; put into a course of proceeding; a committee appointed for examination of Witnesses, under a command of secrecy; and a desire to the Lords that their persons might be secured. These were the steps and degrees of his Proceedings; but, in his Auswer, he denies the advising and contriving of these Articles; and saith, That he was so far from that, that he knew nothing at all of them, till he received this command from his majesty for the exhibiting of them; being sent for, immediately before, by his majesty for that purpose. But this, he said, was so far from satisfaction to the Commons, or qualification of the offence, that it aggravated and augmented it.

"For the exhibiting and promoting of those Articles, is, in judgment of law, an evident demonstration of his contrivance of them: As, in the case of stolen goods, the receipt and possession of them, is an evidence, to a jury of life and death, of the stealing of them, unless the party can shew how he came by them. In case of Trover and conversion of Goods, though the denial of them, upon demand, be no conversion, in law, whereon to ground an action, upon Not Guilty pleaded; it is a good evidence to a jury to find him Guilty of the conversion. In case of a Libel, the finder and publisher shall be adjudged the author and contriver of it, unless he can produce some other author. So, in this case, the publishing and exhibiting of these Articles, by the Attorney General, is a clear evidence that he contrived them; the one doth necessarily imply the other. The contriving, without the publishing, is but an inception of an offence; the publishing is the consummation of it, and therefore the more heinous. The publisher is the grand offender; he blows the coals and the trumpet. If it could be imagined that there was another author, or contriver of these, than Mr. Attorney, as he would pretend, yet the exhibiting and promoting of them is an offence so heavy, as needs no other additional weight to press him down to the ground; who, by such an act of injustice and false accusation, would so grievously have oppressed them. Mischiefs, hatched in the brain, are only mischievous to the inventor; but the vegetation and life is from the publisher; he gives motion and agitation to it, which, otherwise, would be but an abortive and inanimate creature.

"But for the Excuse, under which he seeks to shelter himself, that is, the King's Command, this adds more to his offence; a foul aspersion on his majesty, and wrong to his gracious master; for he could not but know that the King's command, in things illegal, is utterly frustrate, and of no effect: his Patents and Grants, if against the crown, in matter of interest, are merely void, quia in deceptione regis; if against the weal-public, they are, ipso jure, vacua; much more his command, in matters criminal, because no action lies against him.—The Serjeant, next, proceeded to cite several cases, from the Statute Books, &c. to prove that the Attorney General had broken all those laws, and infringed all those liberties; even the Rights of Parliament, by which no member of either house ought to be impeached, either for felony, treason, or other offences, without representing the cause first to that house whereof he is a member, and their consent and direction therein desired: for, otherwise, all members of each house may be pulled out, one after another, upon a pretence of treason; which, perhaps, he said, was now Mr. Attorney's design. Besides, he said, that the Attorney had done contrary to his oath, in this business; for he is sworn to the king, duly and truly to issue out the king's writs, and give the king true advice according to the law; which, in this action, he hath not done, contrary to his oath.—The Serjeant then said, That many aggravating circumstances might be added; as, the Attorney's profession and knowledge in the law; his long experience in the course and privileges of Parliament, having been so often, and of late, a Member of the House of Commons, and obliged to them by many favours; and now an assistant or attendant in the house of lords: Then considering the qualities of the persons accused; their singular parts, integrity, and merit; their indefatigable labours and travail for the public good, which could not expect such a reward as this, the odious name of traitors: the woful and dangerous consequences that have, de facto, ensued upon this; for, by colour of these Articles, they were proclaimed, posted, sold up and down, for traitors; they were hunted and sought for by officers, demanded even from the horns of the Altar; their studies, chambers, and trunks sealed up; the House of Commons strongly besieged; their privileges strangely invaded; their last and uttermost hopes ready to be confounded. As these are beyond expression, so the consequences that might have happened are beyond imagination; bloodshed, horror, devastation, and confusion; all the evils, dangers, troubles, and distractions which have happened since, and what now the houses lie under, may be imputed to this act of Mr. Attorney. Had he stood in the gap, and humbly besought or advised the forbearance of this, or declined the doing of it, as in all equity he ought to have done, all these miseries had been prevented; and a happy reconciliation, in all likelihood, settled between his majesty and his people before this time. It remains, therefore, that he who, willingly, judicially, and upon record, hath contracted to himself the guilt of all these evils and calamities, should receive, from their lordships, such a measure of punishment as may make the fact more odious, and himself the mark of their exemplary justice to this and after ages."

Mr. Serjeant Wyld having made an end of this Charge, desired, That if Mr. Attorney would make any Answer to it, he might speak himself; but the Attorney desired that his Counsel might be heard for him: To this the Serjeant objected, and said, That they were a Committee representing the House of Commons, and it did not stand with the dignity of that house to have counsel come to confront them. He further alledged, That this Offence of Mr. Attorney's had been voted, by both houses of parliament, an high Breach of the Privileges of Parliament, which no counsel can, neither ought they to judge of. And because it concerned the House of Commons, in an high degree, in their privileges, as well as it did their lordships, he desired that Mr. Attorney might not be allowed counsel, but that he might speak for himself.—The Attorney replied, That their lordships had been pleased, upon his humble Petition, to assign him Counsel in this cause; that his Answer is put in by their advice, and they are ready to maintain it; which if their lordships should not allow of, he was not provided to make a defence to his charge; therefore desired their lordships to hear him by his counsel, and the committee to take the judgment of the house upon it.

Hereupon, both sides being commanded to withdraw, the Lords put themselves into a Committee, for the more free debate in this matter; it being a mixed case, consisting of breach of privilege of parliament, matter of fact, and matter of law. The House being resumed, the question was put, Whether Mr. Attorney should have counsel, in matter of Privilege, in this case? And it was resolved in the affirmative. The Committee of the Commons, the Attorney and his counsel, being called in again; were told of this Resolution; and that their lordships had appointed to proceed further in this cause the next day.

The Lords proceeded in the Attorney General's Cause, and his Counsel, were told, that they were to begin with assisting him in his defence, upon their perils. The counsel craved their lordships pardon therein, for they came not now provided for his Defence; because the business concerned the Privilege of Parliament, as was alledged yesterday. The Lords not being satisfied with this Answer, directed the Attorney and his counsel to withdraw; and, upon consideration of it, it was ordered, "That they should be commanded to give a direct Answer, severally, whether they would plead or not; and if they would not it should be taken as a denial."—Being called in again, the Lord Keeper commanded them to proceed; when sir Thos. Beddingfield, one of the counsel, answered, He desired some time to prepare for it, not being now provided. Sir Thos. Gardiner, recorder of London, another counsel, answered in like manner. The rest of them said, That they were willing to plead now, at their Lordships command, and thought it was their duty so to do; but the chief part of Mr. Attorney's Defence being committed to the aforesaid Gentlemen, by that means they are not provided now, but desired some further time, as their lordships should please to appoint. On this, all being commanded to withdraw again, the Lords considering the refusal of sir Thos. Beddingfield and sir Thos. Gardiner, to plead, as a contempt of that House, ordered them both to be committed to the Tower, there to remain during the pleasure of the house: and further ordered, "That if Mr. Attorney desire other Counsel, in the room of the former, that he bring in the names of such as he desires, the next morning for the better expediting of this cause."

March 10.

The Attorney made his humble Petition to the Lords, That they would assign him Mr. Serjeant Green, and Mr. Serjeant Pheasant, as Counsel in the room of the former two committed; which was granted, and the 12th instant was preempторily appointed to proceed in that business.

Accordingly, on that day, the Lords ordered the Attorney General and his Counsel to be called in, and proceed in his Defence. Serjeant Pheasant desired to be excused from pleading in a business which required so much pains to attend, by reason of his bodily infirmities; and the other, Serjeant Green, saying, That being assigned so lately to this business, he found it so intricate to be put in a method, and the Records to be perused so many, that he could not, upon so short warning, undertake to make this Defence; he therefore humbly craved their lordships to excuse him then, and allow him some further time to prepare himself for this purpose.

But, upon consideration of this, the Lords resolved to allow no longer time; on which M Hearn, another of the Attorney's Counsel, desired that the Impeachment might be read which being done, he said: "That for the matter of fact, nothing appears by way of Charge, but the exhibiting of the Articles; and that no Witness was produced, in all the cause to prove any crime; that there was but an Impeachment and a Denial; and no act prove but what was confessed, which is the exhibitin the Articles. He further alledged, that where as the Attorney was charged to do the fact maliciously, he did nothing but by the command of the king, and knew not of the Articles until they were delivered to him by his majesty."

Next Mr. Chute, another of Mr. Attorney's Counsel, argued, "That it was the duty of the Attorney to prosecute the King's causes in all Courts at Record, when he shall be called, and be assistant in all these matters; to this purpose he read the Attorney's oath. Further he alledged, That the King's 'Datum est nobis intelligi,' is warrant enough to the Attorney to proceed against any person, as in the Record of Ed. 3, rot. 38, where William archbishop of York, upon "Datum est nobis intelligi," was brought before the King and his Council, and prosecuted by the Attorney General. He also urged the Reports of the Judges in the Earl of Arundel's Case, April 1626." He said, "That the Attorney General is bound, by his Oath, to proceed in all Courts of Record, though the king gave him no command; and that in parliament he hath prosecuted a Commoner at large, as 31 Ed. 1, rot. 22, where Nicholas de Segrave was summoned, by the sheriff of Northampton, to appear 'Coram domino rege in proximo parlamento suo apud Westmonasterium primo adventu domini regis, ibidem ad audiendam voluntatem domini regis, super his quæ tunc ibidem proponere intenderet versus eum; et ad faciendum et recipiendum ulterius quod curia domini regis consideraret in premissis.' The said Segrave appearing in parliament, he was prosecuted for the king, and accused by Nicholas de Warwick, That he maliciously stirred up discord and contention against John de Crumbwell, who was employed by the king in the war against the Scots. A day being given to make answer, Segrave submitted and acknowledged his offence; upon this the king desired the advice of the lords, what punishment should be inflicted upon Segrave for such a fact, so fully and expressly confessed; the lords gave this judgment, That, for his fault, he deserved to lose his life; yet the king, out of his special grace and piety, remitted the judgment of life and members; and ordered the said Segrave to find seven good and sufficient men to be bail for him, body for body. Also 4 Edw. 3, Sir Thomas Berkeley and John Maltravers were prosecuted in parliament, for the murder of Edw. 2. and were tried and acquitted by a jury. And 3, rot. 7, No. 17, Rauf de Ferrers was prosecuted in parliament, upon suspicion of treason: So in the parliament 17 Rd. 2, No. 20, Tho. Talbot, chevalier, was accused in parliament, for conspiring the death of two of the king's uncles."

The Counsel having spoken concerning the matter of fact, Mr. Attorney made his own Defence to that which concerned the matter of Privilege of Parliament; and cited the Case of Philip Courney, 16 Rd. 2, No. 16, and the Case of the earl of Arundel, and his remonstrations made therein, April 19, 2 Caroli. He also insisted, lastly, on the Case of the Earl of Bristol, the same year. And concluded with observing, That he did not conceive any thing urged against him could make up the crime that he is charged with, but only the Vote, passed by both Houses, touching the Breach of the Privileges of Parliament; and so submitted himself to the justice of that house.

Nothing more was done in this Cause at this time. Sir Thomas Beddingfield and sir Thomas Gardiner, on their humble Petition to the Lords, were released from the Tower.

March 15.

The Lords again took the cause of Mr. Attorney into consideration, What Judgment was to be given on the impeachment of the Commons against him? After a long debate, it was put to the question, 1. Whether, upon the whole matter, Mr. Attorney had committed a crime for which he ought to be sentenced by that house? Resolved in the affirmative. 2. Whether for his Offence, he shall lose his place? Resolved negatively. To this last Vote the following lords dissented; earls of Northumberland, Essex, Leicester, Warwick, Holland, Bolingbroke, Stamford; lords, Hastings, Willoughby de Parham, St. John, Spencer, Paget, Grey de Werk, Roberts, 3. Whether the Attorney shall pay a Fine to the king for his offence? Resolved negatively; the same Lords, as above, dissenting. 4. Whether Mr. Attorney shall pay Damages for this offence to the parties that were accused? 5. Whether the Attorney shall be committed to the Tower for this offence? Both these were, also, resolved in the negative; the same Lords still dissenting.

April 23.

A Message was sent to the Commons, to let them know that their Lordships were ready to give Judgment against Mr. Attorney-General, if they would come, with their Speaker, to demand it. Accordingly, the Commons being come up, and the peers in their robes, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, in the absence of the Lord Keeper, pronounced Sentence upon him as follows:

"Whereas sir Edward Herbert, knight, his majesty's Attorney General, hath been impeached by the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the House of Commons, for the advising, contriving, and publishing certain false, scandalous, and malicious Articles of High Treason against the lord Kimbolton, one of the members of the house of peers; sir A. Haslerig, D.

Hollis, John Pym, John Hampden, and William Strode, esqrs. being then, and yet Members of the House of Commons; and for causing Articles of High Treason to be entered into the clerk's book of the said house of peers, which was done against the Privileges of Parliament, tending to the subversion of the ancient rights and being of Parliaments, and against the Liberty of the Subject, and contrary to his oath and the laws of this realm: The Lords, having taken the said Charge into due consideration, do find him Guilty of exhibiting the said Articles unto the House of Peers, and causing the same to be entered in the clerk's Book of the said house; intending thereby falsely, unlawfully, and maliciously to deprive the said houses of the said several members: all which doings were, and are, high breaches of the Privileges of Parliament, tending to the subversion of the ancient Rights and Being of Parliaments, and contrary to the Liberty of the Subject, and are of great scandal to his majesty and his government, and against the laws of this realm; for which offences this high court doth award and adjudge, 1. That the said sir Edward Herbert, his majesty's Attorney-General, is, by Sentence of this house, disabled, and made incapable of being a Member-assistant, or pleader, in either House of Parliament, and of all offices, saving that of Attorney-General, which he now holds. 2. That Mr. Attorney-General shall be forthwith committed to the prison of the Fleet during the pleasure of this house."

The following is Lord Clarendon's Account of this business: "The king's Declarations, which were now carefully published, gave the parliament some trouble, and made great impression, in sober men, who were moved with the reason, and in rich men, who were startled at the commands in them. But that Clause in the king's Answer to their Declaration presented to him at Newmarket, in which he told them, 'That if they had not been informed of the seditious words used in, and the circumstances of the tumults, and would appoint some way for the examination of them, that he would require some of his learned counsel to attend with such Evidence as might satisfy them,' troubled them much more. For if there were still so much courage left in the king's counsel, that they durst appear to inform against any of those proceedings, which they favoured, they should find men grow more afraid of the law than of them; which would destroy all their designs. Therefore they resolved to proceed with all expedition, and severely against the Attorney General for his trespass and presumption upon their privileges, in the Accusation of the five members, and the lord Kimbolton: of the circumstances of which proceeding, and judgment thereupon, being as extraordinary, and as distant from the rules of justice, at least of practice, as any thing that then happened, it will not be amiss to set down two or three particulars.

“ A third act of the 14th day of February 1642, was the carrying up an Impeachment to the lords against the king's Attorney General, for maliciously advising and contriving the Articles upon which the lord Kimbolton, Mr. Hollis, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Strode, and sir A. Haslerig, were accused by his majesty of High Treason; it being not thought security and reparation enough, that the king had waved any further proceeding against them, except they left such a monument of their power, that, upon what occasion or provocation soever, no man should presume to obey the king in the like command: so that the same 14th of February, that was celebrated for the king's condescension to that Act for putting the Bishops out of the house of peers, is famous likewise for those three unparalleled acts of contempt upon the sovereign power; the demand of the sole power over all the Militia of the kingdom; the opening Letters directed to the sacred person of the Queen; and the impeaching the Attorney General, for performing, what he took to be the duty of his place, by his master's command. All which were very ill instances of that application and compliance his majesty had reason to expect, and some men had promised him he should receive.

“ Shortly after they had impeached him, and the king had found it necessary to give over any prosecution against the others, his majesty being desirous now he had freed them, that they should free his Attorney, wrote a Letter from Royston, when he was in his way to York, to the Lord Keeper; in which he told him, ‘ That the Articles, which had been preferred against the Members, were, by himself, delivered to his Attorney General engrossed in paper; and that he had then commanded him to accuse those persons, upon those Articles of High Treason, and other Misdemeanors; and, in his name, to desire a Committee of Lords might be appointed to take the examination of such Witnesses as should be produced, as formerly had been done in cases of like nature, according to the justice of the house. And his majesty did further declare, that his said Attorney did not advise or contrive the said Articles, nor had any thing to do with, or in advising, any breach of Privilege that followed after. And for what he did in obedience to his commands, he conceived he was bound by oath, and the duty of his place, and by the trust reposed in him by his majesty, so to do: and that if he had refused to obey his majesty therein, his majesty would have questioned him for breach of oath, duty, and trust; but now having declared that he found cause wholly to desist from proceeding against the persons accused, he had commanded him to proceed no further therein, nor to produce, nor discover any proof concerning the same.’

Trial, and sharpened the edge, that was befallen enough against him; and the day of the being come, when the members of the Commons, who were appointed for the prosecution found that counsel was ready (which had been assigned by the Lords) for the defence of the Attorney General, they professed, ‘ that they would admit no counsel; that it was beneath the dignity of the house of commons to plead against fee'd counsel; that whoever presumed to be of counsel with a person accused by the Commons of England should be taught better to know his duty, and should have cause to repent it.’ The Lords seemed much moved with this reproach, that their acts of judicature should be questioned, and the counsel, which had been justly, and regularly assigned by them should be threatened for submitting to their order. But that which troubled them most was, that the Counsel, which was assigned by them, upon this reprehension, and threat of the Commons, positively refused to meddle further in the business, or to make any Defence for the Attorney. Hereupon, they put off the Trial, and commit to the Tower of London sir Thomas Bedingfield, and sir Thomas Gardner, for their contempt in refusing to be of Counsel with the Attorney upon their assignment: standers by looking upon the justice of parliament with less reverence, to see the subject, between the contradictory, and opposite commands of both houses (the displeasure of either being insupportable) punished and imprisoned for doing, by one, what he was strictly inhibited from doing by the other.

“ However, this difference gave only respite for some days to the Attorney, who was quickly again called before his Judges. To what was passionately and unreasonably objected against him, ‘ of breach of privilege and scandal,’ he confidently alledged ‘ the duty of his place; that his master's command was warrant for what he had done; and that he had been justly punishable if he had refused to do it, when commanded: that there had never been a pretence of privilege in case of treason, the contrary whereof was not only understood by the law, but had been by themselves confessed, in a petition delivered by them in the beginning of this king's reign, upon the imprisonment of the earl of Arundel; in which it was acknowledged, that the privileges of parliament extended not to treason, felony or refusal to find sureties for the peace; that he had no reason to suspect the executing the duty of his place would have been imputed to him for any trespass, since the very same thing he had now done and of which he stood accused, was done in the first year of this king's reign, by sir Robert Heath, the then Attorney General; who exhibited Articles of High Treason before their lordships, against the earl of Bristol, which was not then understood to be any breach of privilege; and therefore, having so late a precedent, most of their lordships being then Judges, he hoped he should be held excusable for not being able to dis‘cern that to be a crime, which they had yet ‘never declared to be so.’ The undeniable reasons of his Defence (against which nothing was replied, ‘but the inconvenience and mis-‘chief, which would attend a parliament, if ‘the members might be accused of high trea-‘son without their consent’) prevailed so far with the major part of the House of Peers, though the prosecution was carried on with all imaginable sharpness, and vehemence, by the House of Commons, and entertained by those peers, who were of that party, as a matter of vast concernment to all their hopes, that the Questions being put, whether he should be deprived of his place of Attorney? whether he should be fined to the king? whether he should pay damages to the persons accused? and whether he should be committed to the Tower? which were the several parts of the Sentence, which many of the Lords had pressed he should undergo, the Negative prevailed in every one of the particulars; so that the Attorney was understood by all men who understood the rules and practice of parliament, to be absolutely absolved from that Charge and Impeachment, by the Judgment of the House of Peers.

“The House of Commons expressed all possible resentment, and declared ‘that they would ‘not rest satisfied with the Judgment;’ and some Lords, even of those who had acquitted him, were very desirous to find out an expedient, whereby the House of Commons might be compounded with; and it was believed, that the Attorney himself was much shaken with the torrent of malice and prejudice, which the House of Commons seemed now to threaten him with; conceiving, that he and his office now triumphed over the whole body, and not over six Members only: and therefore, after some days, the House of Peers considering, “that his discharge was but negative, that he should not be punished in this and that degree; and that he had no absolution from the crimes, with which he was charged,” proceeded to a new judgment (contrary to all course and practice of parliament, or any other judicial court) and complying with all their other votes, resolved by way of judgment upon him, “that he should be disabled from ever being a parliament man; incapable of any place of judicature, or other preferment, than of Attorney General;” which they could not deprive him of, by reason of the former Vote: and “that he should be committed to the prison of the Fleet.” Which Sentence was with all formality pronounced against him, and he committed to the Fleet accordingly: with which sentence the Commons were no more satisfied than with the former; some of them looking that their favourite, the Solicitor, should have the place of Attorney; others, that the accused Members should receive ample damages by way of reparation; without which they could not think themselves secure from the like attempts.”

162. Impeachment of GEORGE Lord DIGBY,* eldest Son of the Earl of BRISTOL, for High Treason: 17 CHARLES I. A. D. 1642. [4 Rushw. Coll. 554. 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1103.]

IN the month of February, 1642, a packet of Letters from lord Digby being intercepted, directed to secretary Nicholas, was ordered to be opened; but one of them being directed to the Queen, the Lords disputed the opening of it, and sent to know the opinion of the Commons about it. They returned for Answer, That they had voted it should be opened; on

* “The lord Digby,” says Clarendon, “was a man of very extraordinary parts by nature and art, and had surely as good and excellent an education as any man of that age in any country: a graceful and beautiful person; of great eloquence and becomingness in his discourse (save that sometimes he seemed a little affected) and of so universal a knowledge, that he never wanted subject for a discourse: He was equal to a very good part in the greatest affairs, but the unfittest man alive to conduct them, having an ambition, and vanity superior to all his other parts, and a confidence in himself, which sometimes intoxicated, and transported, and exposed him. He had from his youth, by the disobligations his family had undergone from the duke of Buckingham, and the great men who succeeded him, and some sharp reprehension himself had met with, which obliged him to a country life, contracted a prejudice and ill will to the court; and so had in the beginning of the parliament, engaged himself with that party which discovered most aversion from it, with a passion and animosity equal to theirs, and therefore very acceptable to them. But when he was weary of their violent counsels, and withdrew himself from them with some circumstances which enough provoked them, and made a reconciliation, and mutual confidence in each other for the future, manifestly impossible amongst them; he made private and secret offers of his service to the king, to whom in so general a defection of his servants, it could not but be very agreeable; and so his majesty being satisfied both in the discoveries he made of what had passed, and in his professions for the future, removed him from the house of commons, where he had rendered himself marvellously ungracious, and called him by writ to the house of peers, where he did visibly advance the king’s service, and quickly rendered himself grateful to all those who had not thought too well of him before, when he deserved less; and men were not which the Lords, conceiving this affair to be a thing of great consequence, desired a Conference; the Report of which was, "That the Commons said, they saw no reason to alter their Vote; 1. Because it concerned the safety of the kingdom; for, by this means, the evil spirit and counsels of the lord Digby might be discovered and prevented. 2. If this Letter be delivered to the Queen unopened, the Parliament will be put to a deal of trouble to discover what is presented to her majesty in these letters. 3. Since, of late, they had very good reason to suspect the lord Digby as an ill instrument, they conceive they ought not to lose so happy an occasion offered to do the state service; which, if neglected, they shall not be able to answer."

On this, a great debate arose in the Lords, but at last, it was ordered, That the Letters should be opened.

February 15.

Mr. Glynn reported to the Commons, the Resolutions of a Committee, appointed to consider how Evil Counsellors might be found out and removed from the King, as follows: "1. That all Privy-Counsellors and Great Officers of State may be removed for the present, excepting such as have offices by inheritance. 2. That his majesty shall be humbly desired that he will be pleased to receive only such, to be Counsellors and Great Officers of State, as shall be recommended unto him by the humble advice of both houses of parliament. 3. That such of the said Counsellors and Great Officers, whose names shall be presented by both houses, shall not have access to the persons or courts of the king and queen's majesty. 4. That Mr.

only pleased with the assistance he gave upon all debates, by his judgment and vivacity, but looked upon him, as one who could derive the king's pleasure to them, and make a lively representation of their good demeanor to the king, which he was very luxuriant in promising to do, and officious enough in doing as much as was just."

He had been member in this parliament for the county of Dorset, but having given great offence to the commons by his conduct respecting the earl of Strafford, and particularly by the celebrated Speech which he made against that measure, he was shortly afterwards called up to the house of peers by writ, in the lifetime of his father. It has been said, that he was expelled the house of commons the same day, see 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 749, 822. For other particulars, see Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, vol. 2, p. 359, 360, 383, 384, 704, et seq. Of this Impeachment lord Clarendon says, "It may be, posterity may look upon the severe prosecution of a young nobleman of admirable parts, and eminent hopes, in so implacable a manner, as a most pertinent instance of the tyranny, and injustice of that time, not possible to end, but in so much wickedness as hath since been practised."

Wm. Murray, of the bed-chamber, is thought fit to be removed from the persons and court of the king and queen, as one that is conceived to give dangerous counsel." In like manner Mr. Porter, the lord Digby, Mr. Wm. Crofts and sir John Winter, Secretary to the Queen were excepted against.

February 17.

A Message came from the King, this day, to the Lords, which was read in these words:

"His majesty, at the earnest desire of his consort, the Queen, hath thought fit to acquaint the Parliament, that she understanding a Letter, addressed to herself, had been opened by them, and remains in their custody, desired that a transcript of it might be speedily sent her; and declares, That if the Parliament should desire to be further satisfied from her, of any particulars mentioned in that Letter, or any circumstances concerning the same, so far forth as may any ways relate unto or reflect upon her person, or any whatsoever concerning her, she is ready and very willing to give them due satisfaction therein."

A copy of this Message was dispatched to the Commons; but, this not contenting that house, they desired to see the original Message, which was sent them.

February 19.

The Commons sent up Mr. Pym, with an Answer to the King's last Message about the lord Digby's Letters, with the copies of them, and desired their lordships concurrence in it: it was to this effect:

"Most Gracious Sovereign; Your majesty's most loyal and faithful subjects, the Lords and Commons in Parliament, have received your Message of the 17th instant, sent at the instance of the Queen; and, upon consideration thereof, we find, to our great joy and content, clear expressions of grace and favour from both your majesties, for which we return you our most humble thanks; and have herewithal sent the transcript of that Letter required by your majesty, as, likewise, of two other Letters directed to Mr. Secretary Nicholas and sir Lewis Dives; all which were brought to us, under one cover, directed to Mr. Secretary, with information that they were written by the lord Digby; who being a person fled from the justice of Parliament, and one who had given many evidences of his disaffection to it, we conceived it necessary to open the two latter; and finding sundry expressions in them full of asperity and malignity to the Parliament, we thought it very probable the like might be contained in the Letter to her majesty; and that it would be dishonourable for her and dangerous to the kingdom if it should not be opened; wherein we were no wit deceived, as your majesty may well perceive by the contents of it. And although we cannot but be very sensible of the great dishonour therein done to your majesties, and the malicious endeavours of fomenting and increasing the jealousies betwixt your majesty and your people; yet we are far from reflecting any thing on the Queen, or expecting any satisfaction from her majesty, but impute all to the bold and envenomed spirit of the man. Only we most earnestly beseech your majesty to persuade the Queen, That she will not vouchsafe any countenance to, or correspondence with, the lord Digby, or any other of the fugitives or traitors; whose offences now depend under the Examination and Judgment of Parliament; which we assure ourselves, will be very effectual to further the removal of all jealousies and discontents betwixt your majesty and your people, and the settling of the great affairs of your majesty and the kingdom in an assured state and condition of honour, safety, and prosperity."

The Lords agreed to this Message, and ordered it to be presented to the King.

The LETTER from the Lord DIGBY to the QUEEN herein mentioned, was as followeth:

"Madam; I shall not adventure to write unto your majesty with freedom but by express, till such time that I have a cypher, which I beseech your majesty to vouchsafe me. At this time therefore I shall only let your majesty know, where the humblest and most faithful servant you have in the world is here at Middleborough, where I shall remain in the privatest way I can, till I receive instruction how to serve the king and your majesty in these parts, if the king betake himself to a safe place, where he may avow and protect his servants from rage (I mean) and violence (for from justice I will never implore it) I shall then live in impatience and in misery till I wait upon you: But if after all he hath done of late, he shall betake himself to the easiest and compliantest ways of accommodation, I am confident that then I shall serve him more by my absence than by all my industry; and it will be a comfort to me in all calamities, if I cannot serve you by my actions, that I may do it in some kind by my sufferings for your sake, having, I protest to God, no measure of happiness or misfortune in this world, but what I derive from your majesty's value of my affection and fidelity.—Middleborough, Jan. 21, 1641."

Lord Digby's LETTER to Sir Lewis Dives.

"Dear brother; I hope you will have received the letter which I wrote unto you from aboard sir John Pennington, wherein I gave you account of the accident of O'Neal's man, and why I thought fitting to continue my journey into Holland; going still upon this ground, that if things go on by way of accommodation, by my absence the king will be advantaged. If the king declare himself and retire to a safe place, I shall be able to wait upon him from hence, as well as out of any part of England, over and above the service I may do him here in the mean time. Besides that, I found all the ports so strict, that if I had not taken this opportunity of sir John Pennington's forwardness in the king's service, it would have been impossible for me to have gotten away at any other time.—I am now here at Middleborough, at the Golden Pleece upon the Market, at one George Peterson's house, where I will remain till I receive from you advertisement of the state of things, and likewise instructions from their majesties, which I desire you to hasten unto me by some safe hand, and withal to send unto me a cypher, whereby we may write unto one another surely. If you knew how easy a passage it were, you would offer the king to come over for some few days yourself; God knows I have not a thought towards my country to make me blush, much less criminal, but where traitors have so great a sway, the honestest thoughts may prove most treasonable. Let Dick Shirley be dispatched hither speedily with such black cloaths and linen as I have, and let your letters be directed to the baron of Sherburn, for by that name I live unknown, let care be taken for bills of exchange. Yours, &c.

February 22.

The Commons sent up an Impeachment of High Treason against George lord Digby, desiring their lordships to prefix some short time for him to come and appear, before which time the Commons would be ready to come up to make good their charge against him. Upon this the Lords ordered out a Proclamation, through England and Wales, for the lord Digby to appear and answer to this charge, within 15 days after date, on pain of conviction.

February 26.

The Commons, at a Conference this day, exhibited the following Articles against lord Digby, which were sent up by sir John Evelyn:

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT against GEORGE Lord DIGBY, by the Commons in this present Parliament assembled, in maintenance of their Accusation, whereby he standeth charged with High Treason, in their name, and in the names of all the Commons of England.

I. That the said George lord Digby, in or about the month of January, 1641, maliciously and traiterously endeavoured to persuade the king's majesty to levy Forces against his majesty's liege subjects within this kingdom; and the said George lord Digby did, in or about the same month, actually levy forces within the realm, to the terror of his majesty's subjects.

II. That the said George lord Digby, in and about the said month of January, and at other times, falsely, maliciously, and traiterously, laboured to raise a jealousy and dissension between the king and his people, and to possess his majesty that he could not live with safety of his person amongst them; and did thereupon traiterously endeavour to persuade his majesty to betake himself to some place of strength for his defence.

III. That the said George lord Digby, in or about the same month of January, and at other times, did maliciously and traitorously endeavour to stir up jealousies and dissensions between the king and his parliament; and, to that end and purpose, did, the same month of January, wickedly advise the framing of certain false and scandalous Articles of High Treason, against the lord Kimbolton, Denzil Hollis, esq. sir Arthur Haslerig, bart. John Hampden, John Pym, and William Strode, esquires, and did persuade his majesty, accompanied with divers soldiers and others, in warlike manner, to come in person into the house of commons sitting in parliament, to demand the said members of the said house, to the apparent endangering of his majesty's person, and the high violation of the privileges and being of parliaments.—All which matters were done by the said George lord Digby, traitorously and wickedly to alienate the hearts of his majesty's liege people from his majesty, and set division between them, and stir up war within this kingdom.—For which the said Commons do impeach him the said George lord Digby of High Treason; and the said commons, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any other Accusation or Impeachment against the said George lord Digby, and also of replying to the Answer which he shall make to the said Articles, or any of them, or of offering proof of the premises, or any of them, or of any other impeachment or accusation that shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall, according to the course of parliament, require; do pray that the said George lord Digby* may be put to answer all and every the premises, in the presence of the commons; and that such proceedings, examinations, trial, judgments, and executions, may be upon every of them had and used, as is agreeable to law and justice.

In support of this Accusation,

Sir John Evelyn said, That this is a heavy Accusation, and such a one as needs no aggravation, but pity, that a noble gentleman, as he was, should fall into so foul a crime, as to study the destruction of his country. In the House of

* "This nobleman was the eldest son of John, earl of Bristol, and was born at Madrid in 1612, during his father's first embassy into Spain. He was entered of Magdalen college, Oxford, in 1626, and lived in great familiarity with the well-known Peter Heylyn, a fellow of that house. He soon became distinguished by his remarkable advancement in all kinds of literature, and was created master of arts in 1636. In the beginning of the long parliament he was disaffected to the court; in a short time afterwards, he appeared as a declared enemy to the parliament, and having testified his dislike of their proceedings against lord Strafford, he was expelled the house of commons in June 1641. In the following year he went on a message from Charles the first to certain gentlemen at Kings-

Commons, they observed him to appear much for his country till he had dived into the secrets of that house; and then he quickly fell into ill discourses and bitter railings against that house; as in a Speech of his touching the earl of Strafford, wherein the Commons, your lordships, and the king, were involved in murder: Being questioned for it, he fled from that house, and came to yours, where we found him in the same way; there he said, This was no free parliament: Not long after, followed that high breach of parliament, in which time he was observed to be a diligent attendant on the courts of the king and queen: After that Plot discovered, and the king retired to Hampton Court, there we found him tampering with the Soldiers, saying, The king went out of town but to save them from being trampled in the dirt; and, by offering all strong obligations to the soldiers for doing the worst service that ever was done to a king, scelere tegendum scelus.—After this, he endeavoured to list men; getting names, offering himself and all he could for that purpose;

ton, with a coach and six horses, which was construed into a warlike appearance. On this occasion he drew up "The Lord George Digby's Apologie for Himselfe. Printed at Oxford, and published the fourth of January, a. d. 1642:" a quarto tract; written with ingenious plainness and apparent veracity; and he was accused of high treason by the parliament, upon pretence of levying war at Kingston upon Thames. Lord Clarendon mentions this prosecution, as a pertinent instance of the tyranny and injustice of those times. Finding what umbrage he had given to the parliament, he obtained leave to transport himself into Holland. In a secret expedition afterwards to the king, he was taken by one of the parliament's ships, and carried into Hull, but by artful management of the governor, brought himself off. In 1643 he was made one of the secretaries of state and high steward of the university of Oxford. In 1645 he was constituted lieutenant-general of the king's forces north of Trent; he afterwards went over to Ireland, and exposed himself to many hazards in the royal cause. Upon the death of the king, he was exempted from pardon by the parliament, and obliged to live in exile, till the restoration of Charles the second, when he recovered all he had lost, and was made a knight of the garter; after which he grew very active in public affairs, spoke frequently in parliament, and made himself conspicuous for his enmity to lord Clarendon while he was chancellor; though the earl of Bristol's history and character have been drawn at considerable length in the Clarendon State Papers, with every appearance of impartiality, and with consummate skillfulness. After a life, says the Biog. Dram. which at different periods commanded the respect and the contempt of mankind, lord Bristol died, neither loved nor regretted by any party, in 1676." See Walpole's Noble Authors, Park's edition, vol. 3, p. 193.

the particulars whereof they will make by proof to appear unto your lordships.—That nobleness and honour, that hath prompted your lordships so long to stand in the gap for the good of the state, will easily suggest what he deserveth that would destroy it. He that will not omit to lay jealousies between king and people, deserveth ill: But he that will foster them, and nourish them, the state will spew him out; they cannot digest him.—He concluded, they would by Proof shortly make good the Articles now exhibited to your lordships.

163. Impeachment of Mr. GEORGE BENYON, Citizen of London, for contriving a Petition against the Ordinance for the Militia :* 18 CHARLES I. A. D. 1642. [Journals of both Houses. 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1149.]

March 31, 1642.

AT a Conference, the Commons exhibited to the Lords the following Articles of Impeachment against George Benyon, citizen of London, for several High Crimes and Misdemeanors:

“ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT of GEORGE BENYON, of London, Silkmán, by the Commons assembled in Parliament, on the behalf of themselves and of all the Commons of England, of High Crimes and Misdemeanors by him committed, as followeth:

“Whereas, upon due and serious consideration of the imminent dangers and present dis-

* Lord Clarendon gives the following account, of the passing of this Ordinance:

“The same day [Feb. 14, 1641-2] on which those two Acts (that for taking away the Votes of Bishops in the House of Lords, or, as it was called, for taking away all Temporal Jurisdiction, from those in Holy Orders, and that about Pressing, as to which latter see 2 Clar. Hist. 326) were by his majesty's Commission passed, and as soon as a very short Message of Thanks for that favour, as much importing the safety of both kingdoms, of England and Ireland, was consented to, an Ordinance for the settling the Militia was agreed on by both houses, and, together with a List of the names of such persons, as for the present they meant to confide in, was immediately sent to the king for his approbation: the which, being the most avowed foundation of all the miseries that have followed, will be here necessary to be inserted in the very terms and form it was agreed upon, and presented; and was as followeth:

“Whereas there hath been of late a most dangerous and desperate design upon the House of Commons, which we have just cause to believe to be the effect of the bloody Counsels of the Papists, and other ill affected persons, who have already raised a Rebellion in the kingdom of Ireland, and, by reason of many discourses, we cannot but fear they will proceed, not only to stir up the like rebellion, and insurrection in this tractions of this kingdom, by means of the Rebellion in Ireland, and of divers hostile preparations and malicious practices both of foreign and domestic enemies, against the peace and safety of this kingdom; an Ordinance of Parliament was thought fit, and agreed upon by both houses of parliament, to be presented to his majesty, for his royal assent thereunto, for the speedy settling of the Militia of this kingdom in safe hands, and particularly that of the city of London (being of so high importance) in the hands of such persons as were agreed upon by the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of the same city, by and with the approbation of both houses of parliament; the kingdom of England, but also to back them with forces from abroad; for the safety thereof of his majesty's person, the parliament, and kingdom, in this time of imminent danger, It is ordained by the king, the lords, and commons, now in parliament assembled, That shall have power to assemble, and call together all and singular his majesty's subjects within the county of as well within liberties, as without, that are meet and fit for the wars, and them to train, exercise, and put in readiness, and them, after their abilities, and faculties, well and sufficiently, from time to time, to cause to be arrayed, and weaponed, and to take the muster of them in places most fit for that purpose. And shall have power within the said county to nominate and appoint such persons of quality, as to him shall seem meet, to be his deputy lieutenants to be approved of by both houses of parliament: and that any one, or more of the said deputies, so assigned and approved of, shall in the absence, or by the command of the said have power and authority to do and execute within the county of all such powers and authorities before in this present ordinance contained; and shall have power to make colonels, and captains, and other officers, and to remove out of their places, and to make others from time to time, as he shall think fit for that purpose. And his deputies, colonels, and captains, and other officers, shall have further power and authority to lead, conduct and employ, the persons aforesaid arrayed, and weaponed, as well within the county of said George Benyon, well knowing the premises, and being a man of power and credit in the said city, to the intent to cross and hinder the said Ordinance; and to set division between his majesty and the parliament, and between the parliament and the said city, in or about the month of February, 1641, did wickedly and maliciously contrive and frame a false, dangerous, and seditious Petition, for and on the behalf of himself and divers other citizens (which Petition is hereunto annexed); a copy whereof was afterwards, by himself and others; by his instigation, presented to both houses of parliament, containing therein divers false and seditious matters, particularly that the ordering of the arms of the said city of London had time out of mind been annexed to the mayoralty for the time being, and insinuating that, if the same should be conferred upon others, it would reflect upon the government and customs of the said city, which every freeman of the said city was, by his oath of freedom, bound to maintain, to the utmost of his power; and the said Benyon by false and sinister persuasions, solicitations, and practices, procured divers citizens to subscribe their hands to the said Petition, contrary to their intent and true meaning, being thereunto misled and seduced as within any other part of this realm of England, or dominion of Wales, for the suppressing of all rebellions, insurrections, and invasions, that may happen, according as they, from time to time, shall receive directions by his majesty's authority, signified unto them by the lords and commons, assembled in parliament. And it is further ordained, that such as shall not obey in any of the premises, shall answer their neglect and contempt to the lords and commons, in a parliamentary way, and not otherwise, nor elsewhere: and that every the powers, granted as aforesaid, shall continue, until it shall be otherwise ordered, or declared by both houses of parliament, and no longer. This to go also to the dominion of Wales."

And in another place, he thus describes the conduct of the Parliament towards the Petitioners against this Ordinance, and towards other persons who expressed dissatisfaction with any of their proceedings. "In this particular, in oppressing all those who were of different opinions from them, their carriage was so notorious and terrible, that spies were set upon, and inquiries made upon all private, light, casual discourses, which fell from those who were not gracious to them: As Mr. Trelawny, a member of the house of commons, and a merchant of great reputation, was expelled the house, and committed to prison, for having said, in a private discourse in the city, to a friend, "that the house could not appoint a guard for themselves without the king's consent, under pain of High Treason." Which was proved by a fellow, who pretended to overhear him; when the person himself, with whom the conference was held, declared, "that he said, it might be imputed to them for High Treason:" and it was confessed on all parts, that the words were spoken long before the discovery, and some days before the house had resolved, "That they would have a guard." And afterwards, upon the old stock of their dislike, when the war begun to break out, they again imprisoned this honest gentleman: seized upon all his estate, which was very good; and suffered him to die in prison for want of ordinary relief and refreshment.

"And in this very time, we speak of, and in the very business of the Militia, when every day very great multitudes of Petitions from most of the counties of England, and from the city of London, were presented to both houses, to desire they might be put into a posture of defence; and that they would cause the Ordinance for the Militia to be speedily executed, which was alleged to be an instance of the people's desire throughout the kingdom, and the chief ground of their proceeding; the most substantial citizens of London both in reputation, and estate, finding that the Militia of that city, with which by their Charter, and constant practice, the lord mayor had been always intrusted, was now with a most extravagant power to be committed to a number of factious persons of the city, part of whom consisted of men of no fortune, or reputation, resolved to petition both houses 'not to alter the original constitution, and right of their city:' and, to that purpose, a Petition was signed by some hundreds, and very probably would in few days have been subscribed by all, or most of the substantial citizens of London. The House had notice of this Petition, which they called another Conspiracy and Plot against the Parliament, and immediately employed a Member of their own to procure a sight of it; who, under a trust of re-delivering it, got it into his hands, and brought it the house of commons; upon which, some principal citizens, who had subscribed it, were examined, and committed to prison; and a direction given, that a Charge and Impeachment should be prepared against the Recorder of London, who, they heard, had been of council in the drawing up, and preparing that Petition, and, they knew, was opposite to their tumultuary proceedings. So when the chief gentlemen of Oxfordshire heard, that a Petition had been delivered to the House of Commons in their name, and the name of that county, against the established government of the Church, and for the exercise of the Militia, they assembled together to draw up a Petition disavowing the former, and to desire, "that the settled laws might be observed:" of which the lord Say having notice, he procured the chief gentlemen to be sent for as Delinquents, and so suppressed that Address: And this was the measure of their justice in many other particulars of the same nature, receiving and cherishing all mutinous, and seditious petitions, and discountenancing such as besought the continuance, and vindication, of the so long celebrated by the said Benyon: which Petition was so contrived, framed, and published, by the said Benyon, on purpose to divert his majesty from assenting to the said Ordinance, and to work a distraction in the said city, and to bring the parliament, city, and whole kingdom, into disorder and confusion.

“ That the said George Benyon, out of a malignant and wicked disposition, to scandalize the parliament, and to interrupt the proceedings thereof, in or about the month of August last past, upon and at several other times, did falsely and maliciously give out and utter divers bold, arrogant, false and scandalous and happy government in church and state; the prime leaders of that faction not blushing, in public debates in the house, to aver ‘ that no man ought to petition for the government established by law, because he had already his wish; but they that desired an alteration, could not otherwise have their desires known; and therefore were to be countenanced.’

“ Upon the Petition, that was framed in London against their settling the Militia, they committed one George Benyon, a citizen of great reputation for wealth and wisdom, and who was indeed a very sober man. After he had lain some time in prison, the Lords, according to law, bailed him; but the Commons caused him the next day to be recommitted, and preferred an Impeachment against him, for no other crime but ‘ advising and contriving that Petition.’ The gentleman defended himself, ‘ that it was always held, and so publicly declared this parliament to be lawful, in a modest way, to petition for the removal, or prevention of any grievance: that observing very many petitions to be delivered, and received, for the settling the Militia, in another way than was then agreeable to the law, or had been practised, and conceiving that the same would prove very prejudicial to the city of London, of which he was a member, he had joined with many other citizens, of known ability and integrity, in a Petition against so great an inconvenience; which he presumed, was lawful for him to do.’ How reasonable soever this defence was, the House of Peers adjudged him ‘ to be disfranchised, and incapable of any office in the city; to be committed to the common goal of Colchester,’ for his reputation was so great in London that they would not trust him in a city prison, and fined him 3,000*l*.

“ About the same time, at the general assizes in Kent, the Justices of Peace, and principal gentlemen of that county, prepared a Petition to be presented to the two houses, with a desire, ‘ That the Militia might not be otherwise exercised in that county, than the known law permitted: and that the Book of Common Prayer, established by law, might be observed.’ This Petition was communicated by many to their friends, and copies thereof sent abroad, before the subscription was ready; whereupon the House of Peers took notice of

Speeches, in derogation and contempt of the privileges of Parliament, and of the Peers therein assembled, and particularly that the Privileges of Parliament were become the greatest Grievance of the kingdom; and that he had the power of the Chamber of London in his hands; and, if the Bill of Protections (which bill was then depending in parliament) did not pass, he had made that stop in the Chamber of London, that there should not be one penny lent to the parliament out of the said city; and swore by God, He would have the said Bill pass, and would not leave a groat in the Chamber of London, but he would have the

of it, as tending to some commotion in Kent; and, in the debate, the earl of Bristol taking notice, ‘ that he had seen a copy of it, and had had some conference about it with Judge Mallet,’ who was then Judge of assize in Kent, and newly returned out of his circuit, both the Earl and Judge, for having but seen the petition, were presently committed to the Tower: and a Declaration published, ‘ that none should presume to deliver that, or the like Petition to either house.’ Notwithstanding which, some gentlemen of Kent, with a great number of the substantial inhabitants of that county, came to the city; which, upon the alarm, was put in arms; strong guards placed at London Bridge, where the petitioners were disarmed, and only some few suffered to pass with their Petition to Westminster; the rest forced to return to their county. And, upon the delivery thereof to the House of Commons (though the same was very modest, and in a more dutiful dialect than most Petitions delivered to them) the bringers of the Petition were sharply reprehended; two or three of them committed to several prisons; the principal gentlemen of the county, who had subscribed and advised it, sent for as Delinquents; Charges, and Articles of Impeachment, drawn up against them; and a Declaration published, ‘ That whosoever should henceforth advise, or contrive the like Petitions, should be proceeded against, as enemies to the common-wealth.’ So unlike, and different were their tempers and reception of those modest Addresses, which were for duty and obedience to the laws established; and those which pressed, and brought on alteration and innovation. But that injustice gave great life, and encouragement to their own proselytes; and taught others to know that their being innocent would not be long easy or safe: and this kind of justice extended itself in the same measure to their own members who opposed their irregular determinations; who, besides the agony and vexation of having the most plain reason, and confessed law, rejected, and overruled with contempt and noise, were liable to all the personal reproaches and discountenance, that the pride and petulance of the other party could lay upon them; and were sometimes imprisoned and disgraced, for freely speaking their opinions, and conscience in debate.”

privileges of the lords down, and make them honest, and would make the peers of this realm as subject and liable to arrest, as the noblemen of France, Spain, Poland, and other foreign countries; and said, he had computed the lords Debts, and that they owed more than would drive the great trade of the kingdom; and further said, Now we shall see, when the Clothiers come up in a multitude, what the Lords will do; for, said he, If the multitude had not come, Strafford had not lost his head, meaning thereby the earl of Strafford, lately executed for High Treason: And the said George Benyon, in a further manifestation of his hatred and disaffection towards the Parliament, and to stir up the like hatred in others, in or about the month of July last past, he the said Benyon, speaking of the parliament, did falsely and maliciously utter these false and scandalous words touching the same; viz. 'That they much complained of the king's arbitrary power; and yet they go about an arbitrary government themselves, which, being 400, will be more grievous than the other.'

"All which matters and things were committed and done, by the said George Benyon, wittingly and maliciously, contrary to the rights and privileges of Parliament, and to the laws of this realm, to the evil example of others, and to the great danger of the said city and kingdom: And the said Commons, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting any other Accusation or Impeachment against the said George Benyon, and also of replying to the Answer that he shall make to the said Articles, or any of them, or of offering proof of the premises, or of any of them, or of any other Accusation or Impeachment that shall be exhibited, as the case, according to the course of parliament, shall require; do pray, that the said George Benyon may be put to answer the said several crimes and misdemeanors, and to receive such condign punishment as the same shall deserve, and that such proceedings upon them, and every of them, may be had against him, as is agreeable to law and justice."

The PETITION was as follows:

• To the Right Honourable the Lords and Commons, now in Parliament assembled.
 'The humble PETITION of the Citizens of London whose names are underwritten,
 'Sheweth; That the City of London hath, time out of mind, enjoyed the ordering of their own Arms, which hath successively been annexed unto the mayoralty for the time being; the Lord Mayor having always been a person of worth and quality, and of their own choice, and hath still advised with the court of Aldermen in the execution thereof; so that, if the same should be conferred upon others, we humbly conceive it would not only be a personal dishonour to the Lord Mayor, but also reflect upon the government and customs of the city of London, granted to the citizens by the Great Charter of England, and confirmed by divers acts and charters since that time, and which every freeman of the said city is, by the oath of his freedom, bound to maintain, to the uttermost of his power.—This honourable assembly may be pleased to take into their grave consideration, that alteration in the ancient government in this renowned city may breed greater distractions and inconveniencies than for the present can be discerned, or in the future can be amended.—Wherefore our humble desire is, That, since the government hath by experience been found for the honour of his majesty, the good of this city and whole kingdom, and that in the most troublesome times, as that it hath been admired and commended by strangers, before any other city in the known world; that the same, by your honourable favour, may be continued as in former times, without alteration:

 'And they shall pray, &c.'

The Articles being read; it was observed, and offered to their lordships consideration, "Of what a condition and spirit this Benyon was, and how fit a person to act such a mischief: that he is a man of a turbulent spirit and unruly tongue, a citizen and freeman of the city of London, which is the metropolis and epitome of the kingdom, the strength whereof is in the government of the common council.

"That this Plot was like another Trojan horse, full of variety of mischiefs, and pestilential designs of discord, according to Machiavell's rule 'Divide et impera;' to divide between the king and his people, the parliament and the city, and the city between itself; like a worm gnawing between the bark and the tree.

"The circumstances and gradations of this Offence ascend to a great height; as having reference to the common council, whereto he ought to have submitted, being involved in the votes; but he abounds in his own sense, and spurns against it. 2. It hath reference to the annihilating and opposing the Ordinance of both houses of parliament for settling the Militia, the parliament having power of declaring what the law is concerning itself; and also it lays a great charge on both houses, for arbitrary power, ambition, and injustice, and hath scandalized their members and privileges. 3. Concerning the time when Benyon committed these offences; it was when the kingdom was full of fears, dangers, and distractions; and, taking advantage of this opportunity, he endeavoured to put all into confusion; so as the bark was not to be saved, but by casting anchor, and standing together, and opposing these mischiefs.

"He did not only act his part himself, but persuaded others, both at the Exchange and at the scrivener's shop, to subscribe the Petition, which was a thing contrary to the opinion of the Common Council, as being a matter of great presumption, and tending to sedition; for, it is feared, the consequence of this example will be an occasion to other places to follow the same steps, whereof some passages have already appeared—The House of Commons desires, for these Offences, that exemplary punishment may be inflicted upon the said George Benyon, according to justice."

This Report being made of the Charge, it was ordered, "That the said George Benyon should be brought to the bar to hear it read;" which being done, and he asked what Answer he would make to it, he humbly desired he might have time given him to put in his Answer; and, for the enabling him thereto, he desired to have counsel allowed him, and to have a copy of his Charge. All which was granted, and the 4th of April was appointed for his Trial.

April 4.

Mr. Benyon delivered in his Answer to the Impeachment of the Commons, importing, his denial of having preferred the Petition there mentioned, with any intent to cross or hinder the Ordinance of Parliament concerning the City Militia; or much less to set division between the parliament and the city, &c. He owned, That he and one Gardiner, merchant, did draw the said Petition, and that divers citizens did subscribe the same; but denied that it was wickedly or maliciously contrived; or that he, by false and sinister persuasions, did go about to procure any citizen to subscribe, contrary to their own intention and true meaning. That he, being a freeman and citizen of London, had taken an oath to defend and maintain the Franchises and Customs of the same; and, for above thirty years, had observed that the making and allowing of Captains, and ordering of the Trained Bands and Arms within the said city, were, from time to time, directed and disposed by the lord mayor and aldermen, and done by warrant of the lord mayor, for the time being, and not otherwise. Therefore this Defendant, conceiving himself bound by the said Oath, and not upon any wicked or malicious principles, did draw the said Petition, which he afterwards laid before learned counsel, by whom the same was approved, &c. That, as to the words charged in the Impeachment, to be spoken by him against the Parliament and their Privileges, he denied them; and said, That he never spoke any other words than such as were lawful and necessary to be used in prosecuting the Petitions, which had been some time before preferred to parliament, touching the granting of Protections, &c. and on which a Bill was then depending in the upper house. He denied also the words charged on him for hindering the loan of money for the public use, and all other circumstances relative thereto.

This Answer being read, the Lords ordered the further hearing of this cause to be at the bar of their house the 6th inst.

April 6.

The Lords proceeded in the Trial of Mr. Benyon, and the Committee of the Commons being come up, he was brought to the bar as a delinquent; when Mr. Serjeant Wylde desired that the Impeachment against him might be again read; after which,

Mr. Glynn opened part of his Charge, which he made to consist of two Articles: 1. "Benyon's maliciously contriving, subscribing, procuring, and getting hands to a false, dangerous and seditious Petition, containing therein divers false, scandalous, and seditious matters, 2. For speaking divers false and scandalous Speeches in derogation of the privilege of Parliament." To prove the first, these Witnesses were produced, and deposed as follows: Moss, scrivener, said, "That Mr. Gardiner brought the Petition to his shop to be subscribed, and Benyon brought many persons along with him to subscribe the same. That he appeared in it more than any other, coming four or five times a day, to enquire how the Subscription went forward. He further said, That he subscribed the said Petition himself, because he heard Benyon say that it was approved of by counsel. And he asking Benyon if it was not too late to present the said Petition to parliament, now that the Ordinance for the Militia was settled, he answered, 'It was not.' Edm. Harvey said, 'He went with Benyon to see the said Petition, at Moss's shop; and, after he had read it, he told Benyon he would not subscribe it, because it was full of untruths; for the Lord Mayor hath no power over the Militia, because he cannot draw out any of the Trained Bands, on Shrove-Tuesday, without authority from the king; and farther he told Benyon, He heard the Ordinance for settling the Militia was passed already in parliament; and therefore thought it would come too late. Benyon answered, 'That he had taken Mr. Recorder's opinion on the Petition, and he thought it right; and said, it would not come too late.'" S. Edmonds and J. Offley deposed much to the same purpose; and for the words, there was only Robert Steevens produced to prove them.

After this Mr. Glynn observed, "That the time when the Ordinance for the Militia passed in Parliament, was the 9th of Feb. last, and the discourse concerning this Petition was on the 19th. That the time when Benyon presented this seditious Petition was, when both houses had declared that the kingdom was in imminent danger. The consequence of this ill example was, that other counties had taken the same boldness to contrive Petitions of this nature; and the king's Answer of Feb. the 28th last, had succeeded it. For these great Crimes and Misdemeanors the Committee desired, in the behalf of the House of Commons, that their lordships would give some severe Judgment against the said Benyon."

Mr. Benyon then made it his humble desire, That he might Answer by his counsel; and that the same Witnesses, which were produced now against him, might be present when his Defence was made; and he to have liberty to cross-examine them; which was granted.

April 6.

The Commons proceeded in Mr. Benyon's cause; when divers Witnesses were produced to shew, That there was nothing of Sedition or malice in Benyon, in the management of the Petition; as is charged; but that, by the command of the Lord Mayor, he advised with the Recorder about it, who approved of it both for the legal and customary part. He likewise shewed, That the practices had been for the Lord Mayor of London to make choice of the Trained Bands belonging to the city. To the second part of his Charge, concerning scandalous words, he proved, by four other witnesses, that he spoke no such words as were charged against him.

April 7.

The Lords took into serious consideration the Impeachment against Benyon, and likewise his Answer and Defence; and, after several questions, at last resolved on the following Sentence against him.

"1. That the said Benyon, for the first offence charged, (the second, for words, being dropped) shall be disfranchised the city of London. 2. That he shall for ever, hereafter, be incapable of bearing any place or office in the commonwealth. 3. That he shall be fined 3,000*l.* to the king. 4. That he shall be imprisoned in the castle of Colchester for two years; and, after that time, to find such sureties for his behaviour as this house shall thinke fit."

All which Sentence, in the presence of the Commons, was pronounced against him*.

* The same day, the Commons sent up an Impeachment against sir Win. Wilmer, knt. then High Sheriff of the county of Northampton, for high crimes and misdemeanors, for breaking the Privileges of Parliament, and for endeavouring to disturb the peace of the kingdom by seditious words and actions. The principal Complaint against this gentleman was, for publishing, by virtue of his majesty's warrant, a printed Book, entitled, "Several Petitions and Messages of Parliament, concerning the Militia of the Kingdom, with his Majesty's Answers thereto," and granting a warrant of his own to enforce it. All which the said gentleman had confessed: the consideration of this affair was deferred to another time.—But nothing further has been met with concerning it.

March 28, 1642.

A Conference was held between the two Houses; when the Commons informed the Lords, That a Petition had been framed in Kent, and intended to be delivered to Parliament, which was of dangerous consequence. This was on the Information of one Francis Jones, who averred, That the Petition was produced and read at the Assizes, at Maidstone, the 25th of March last, and consisted, to the best of his memory, of these particulars: "That the government of Bishops might still remain, they being as antient as Christianity in England: that the Liturgy and Common Prayer might still remain: that such might be punished who either absent themselves from it, or speak against it; and that all ministers and people might be brought into this uniformity: that no Order should issue out of either House, to oblige the people, unless it was an act of parliament: that no Order should issue concerning the Militia, from either house, without the king's hand to it: that they would presently apply themselves to his majesty's Message of the 20th of January last; that they would establish the civil law: that they who were civil lawyers might not lose their studies: that they would speedily relieve their brethren in Ireland: that they would be pleased to establish the privilege of parliament, and the king's regal power. Lastly, That sir Edward Dering pressed, with great earnestness, to have a copy of this Petition sent to the King; but, as he thought, it was denied."

The Commons further informed the Lords, That they found sir Edward Dering, sir Roger Twisdell, sir George Strode, and Mr. R. Spencer, had been active men in contriving and presenting this Petition; they therefore desired the said gentlemen might be sent for, as Delinquents, which was accordingly ordered by the Lords, and a Select Committee, of both houses, appointed to examine this business to the bottom*.

* He had brought in the bill "For the utter eradication of Bishops, Deans, and Chapters, &c." "Which," says lord Clarendon, "the governing party prevailed with sir Edward Dering, (a man very opposite to all their designs, but a man of levity and vanity, easily flattered, by being commended), to present into the House."

* "This same day, a copy of the Kentish Petition was produced in the House of Lords by the earl of Bristol, who said he had it delivered to him by Judge Mallet. This being read, which was no more than an enlargement on the foregoing Heads, the earl was asked, Whether he had taken a copy of this Petition? who answering Yes, he was commanded to withdraw. Then Mr. Justice Mallet was examined, who said, "That he had the Petition from sir George Strode, and that he shewed it to the earl of Bristol, who took a copy of the same." Hereupon the Lords taking this affair into con-

April 6.

The Commons by Message informed the Lords, that sir Edward Dering being committed to the custody of the Serjeant had effected his escape. They therefore desired that some speedy course might be taken to stop him at the Ports, and bring him back; which the Lords ordered accordingly.

April 26.

The Lord Keeper reported to the Lords a Conference had with the Commons, concerning sir Edward Dering, That they had presented the following Impeachment against him:

consideration, conceived that the Judge had committed a great offence, contrary to his duty, as Judge of the Assize, and as an assistant to this house, in not revealing the Petition to them till he was forced to it. And, after a long debate, the question was put, Whether there were not some words, in this Petition, scandalous, dangerous, and tending to sedition? It passed in the affirmative. Likewise the earl of Bristol, because he had this Petition delivered to him, being of so dangerous a consequence, and took a copy of it without doing his duty in acquainting the house of Lords therewith, was committed to the Tower, for the present, until this business should be further examined. The earls of Bath, Dover, Portland, Monmouth, with the lords Mowbray, Grey, Howard, and Capel, dissenting. Judge Mallet, also, underwent the same sentence." 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. p. 1148.

Clarendon says, "Judge Mallet was committed to the Tower the last Lent, for having seen a Petition prepared by the grand jury of Kent, for the countenance of the Book of Common Prayer, and against the imposition of the Militia by Ordinance without the royal assent. This judge (being, this summer circuit, again judge of assize for those counties) sitting at Maidstone upon the great assize, some members of the house of commons, under the stile and title of a committee of parliament, came to the bench; and, producing some votes, and orders, and declarations of one or both houses, 'required him, in the name of the parliament, to cause those papers,' (being on the behalf of the ordinance of the militia, and against the commission of array), 'to be read.' He told them, 'that he sat there by virtue of his majesty's commissions; and that he was authorized to do any thing comprised in those commissions; but he had no authority to do any thing else; and therefore, there being no mention, in either of his commissions, of those papers, or the publishing any thing of that nature, he could not, nor would not do it;' and so (finding less respect and submission, than they expected, both to their persons and their business, from the learned judge, and that the whole county, at least the prime gentlemen and the grand jury, which represented the county, contemned both much more) this committee returned to the house with great ex-

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT of Sir EDWARD DERING, knt. and bart, by the Commons assembled in this present Parliament, in the name of themselves and of all the Commons of England, for high Crimes and Misdemeanors by him committed as follows:*

I. "That whereas an Ordinance was lately made and agreed upon by both Houses of Parliament, for the settling of the Militia of this kingdom, for the safety and preservation thereof in these times of imminent danger; the said sir Edward Dering, knowing thereof, and having been lately a Member of the Commons House in Parliament, and by order of the said House, for offences by him committed, expelled the same,† out of a malicious and wicked intention to cross and hinder the said Ordinance; to interrupt and scandalize the proceedings of Parliament; to set division between his majesty and the parliament; and to raise sedition and tumult in the county of Kent, and in other parts of this realm; in or about the month of March last past, by practice and combination with R. Spencer, esq. sir Roger Twisden, and sir Geo. Strode, and others, did wickedly and maliciously contrive and frame certain dangerous and seditious Heads or Articles of a Petition to be presented to the parliament, for and on behalf of the gentry, ministers, and commonalty of Kent; amongst which some were to this or the like effect, viz. 1. 'That no Memclamations against Mr. Justice Mallet, 'as the fomentor and protector of a malignant faction against the parliament.' And, upon this charge, a troop of horse was sent to attend an officer; who came with a warrant from the houses, or some committee (whereas Justice Mallet, being an assistant of the house of peers, could not regularly be summoned by any other authority) to Kingston in Surrey; where the judge was keeping the general assizes for that county; and, to the unspeakable dishonour of the public justice of the kingdom, and the scandal of all ministers or lovers of justice, in that violent manner took the Judge from the bench, and carried him prisoner to Westminster; from whence, by the two houses, he was committed to the Tower of London; where he remained for the space of above two years, without ever being charged with any particular crime, till he was redeemed by his majesty, by the exchange of another whose liberty they desired."

* These Proceedings against sir Edw. Dering are taken from the Lords Journals: There is no mention made of them in Rushworth or Whitlocke. Lord Clarendon, indeed, tells us, "That several gentlemen of the county of Kent, who had subscribed and advised the Petition, were sent for as delinquents; and Charges and Articles of Impeachment drawn up against them." Vol. 2. p. 487.

ber of the House of Commons should be put out of the said house, without shewing a reason for the same; and that they shew some cause why the said sir Edward Dering was put out of the said house. 2. That his majesty's subjects should not be bound by any Order of either of the said houses. 3. That no Ordinance of the said house touching the Militia should bind the subjects, without his majesty's assent thereunto.' And for the better effecting thereof, at the assizes holden for the said county, on Tuesday the 22nd of March 1641, the said sir Edward Dering, being then, and yet, a justice of the peace of the said county, together with the said sir George Strode, and divers other justices of the peace of the said county, then present in court, by the practice and combination aforesaid, did offer himself to serve on the grand inquest at the said assizes; albeit there was another sufficient grand jury then returned by the sheriff, (whereof he was none) and no exception taken to the same; and that no justice of peace, or other gentlemen of that rank and quality in that county, had served upon any grand jury at the assizes, for many years then before: and the said sir Edward Dering, together with the other said justices of the peace, upon their said offer, being sworn and impanelled of the said jury, the said sir Edward Dering, with the said sir George Strode, by the practice and combination aforesaid, and to the intent and purpose aforesaid, did tender the said heads to the said grand jury; and did then and there wickedly and unlawfully persuade, labour and solicit the rest of the grand jury to agree to the same; and have them drawn into a Petition to the parliament, to be presented by the said grand jury to the judge of the said assizes and the rest of the bench there, to be, by them, assented to and approved of; and did then and there wickedly conjure the said grand jury to secrecy, and not to discover any thing touching the said Petition, till it should be, by them, agreed upon and presented as aforesaid; falsely persuading them that they were thereunto bound by their oath.

II. That whereas the said grand jury did not, nor would agree to the said Petition or Heads; but a great part of them did utterly refuse and oppose the same, and resolve to protest against it; yet the said sir Edward Dering, together with the said sir George Strode, by the practice and combination aforesaid, did, at the same assizes, wickedly and seditiously contrive and frame a dangerous, scandalous, and seditious Petition, to be presented to the parliament, consisting of many of the heads aforesaid, and others, and the same did present to the bench at the said assizes; and, by false and sinister suggestions, persuasions and solicitations, caused the same to be voted and assented to in open court; and did further say, That the same should be accompanied with 40,000 persons, and that they should meet at Deptford, Greenwich, or Blackheath, to go to the parliament; and did likewise openly move in court, That there might be three copies made of the said Petition, one to the house of lords, another to the commons, and a third to his majesty.

III. That the said sir Edward Dering, together with the said R. Spencer, sir R. Twisden sir G. Strode, and others, by the practice and combination, and to the intent aforesaid, at the said assizes, and at other times, did wickedly and seditiously publish the said Petition; and caused the same to be put into the hands of one Pope, an attorney at law, dwelling at Maidstone aforesaid, to make and deliver out copies thereof, to be dispersed throughout the said county, and divers copies thereof were given out and dispersed accordingly.

IV. That the said sir E. Dering, together with the rest of the said confederates, by the practice and combination aforesaid and to the intent aforesaid, did unlawfully, wickedly and maliciously, procure many hands to the said Petition; and did labour and solicit divers of the inhabitants of the said county to assemble and meet at Deptford or Greenwich, in the said county, or some other place, thereabouts, in great multitudes, to go along with the said Petition; intending thereby to have raised commotion and sedition amongst the people, and to have awed the parliament.

All which doings of the said sir E. Dering and his confederates, were, and are, great and high breaches of the privileges of parliament; and contrary to his oath and the duty of a justice of peace; tending to sedition, and to the apparent danger of both his majesty's kingdoms of England and Ireland: and the said sir E. Dering being sent for to the house of commons, and under examination of a committee of both houses of parliament for the said offence, is since fled, in great contempt of both the said houses.

And the said Commons, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any other Accusation or Impeachment against the said sir E. Dering; and of replying to the Answer which he shall make to the said Articles, or any of them; and of offering proof of the premises, or any of them, or of any other Impeachment or accusation which shall be exhibited against him, as the case, according to the course of parliament, shall require; do pray that the said sir E. Dering may be put to answer to all and every the premises in the presence of the commons; and that such further proceedings, examinations, judgments and executions may be, upon every of them, had and used against him as is agreeable to law and justice."

This being read, his Lordship reported,

"That the Gentleman of the House of Commons, that managed the Conference, made some observations, and said, That your lordships see by this that hath been read unto you, that 'Nondum recentis Illi fatam stetit,' that notwithstanding the many strange and variable attempts against the parliament, and their wonderful and miraculous preservations, yet mischief is so fruitful and generative as to produce a new brood of serpents; which are continually hissing, maligning, and practising against the pious and noble endeavours of both houses, and against the peace, prosperity and happiness of this afflicted kingdom. If the evil and seducing spirit, which doth animate these designs, were asked from whence he comes, doubtless his answer would be, 'From compassing the earth;' having removed his scene into many several parts, and found so many friends and patrons of his audacious achievements, amongst whom this gentleman, sir E. Dering, is one; a man of mark and eminency; of wit, learning, and zeal, at least in shew and appearance; and yet all these miserably shipwrecked upon the shelves and sands of the Kentish shore. The thing itself appears to your lordships to be a manifest breach of the rules of law, justice, and religion; and yet under the cloak of all three, a fast must be proclaimed to take away Naboth and his vineyard. The yeomanry of Kent, heretofore in great esteem, is now become vile and contemptible; an extraordinary grand jury must be prepared of knights, gentlemen, and justices of the peace, for some extraordinary service, which your lordships have heard what it is; they must descend from their places on the bench, and from themselves too, not to serve their country, (for that were no disparagement) but to serve their own unworthy, ambitious, and seditious ends.

"This gentleman, a ringleader, late a member of the house of commons, the great grand jury of the whole kingdom; and there so highly esteeming of his own wisdom, is contented now to descend so low as to become one of the common jury of the county; such is the meanness and pusillanimity of high thoughts, as, for compassing of their own ends, to stoop to any condition how low soever it may be.

"Having thus set the cards, he plays the game very foully: he leads his fellows out of the way; and makes them, like ill hunters, instead of following the chace, at the queat of one ill mouth, to fall upon a flock of sheep. Their duty was to have enquired, diligently, of the matters given them in charge. Surely this was out of the charge, because the judge had told them it was out of his commission; and yet they leave other matters, which they were charged with, as accidents and trifles; and insist upon this, which they had nothing to do with, as the principal business.—He obtrudes on them divers monstrous and seditious heads; and, by sinister suggestions, labours and solicitations, which ought not to be used to a jury; and, by a kind of violence offered them, seeks to inforce them to a consent contrary to their own reason, judgment, and consciences, when they refused, opposed, and protested against it. Failing of this, 'Flectere si nequeam superos, Acheronta movebo.' Instead of inquiring upon the statute of witchcraft and conjuration, he useth his conjurations and enchantments upon them, to conjure them to secrecy; falsely persuading them that they will be bound unto it by their oath:

when all this would not serve, he then applies himself to the bench; and, by the enchantments and conjurations used there, prevails so far as to have it there voted and assented to by such as were present: and to give the more strength and countenance to it, wants not the aid and concurrence of some appearing reverend divines, and of civilians also; and sticks not to affirm, that he can have 40,000 persons to attend the Petition; proclaims a meeting at Blackheath, a place fatal and ominous for actions of this nature; and all this under colour of a Petition; being, in truth, a challenge, an abjuration, and a scandal upon the parliament; and purporting nothing else but a desperate design to put not only Kent, but, for ought is known, all Christendom into combustion, carrying the sails full swollen with spite, arrogancy, and sedition. The particular instances he forbore to trouble your lordships with, because you will find some of them upon perusal of the Petition. He said many arguments he might use in aggravation of them, from the eminency of the power of the person, and the arrogancy of his mind; the acrimony of his spirit, and from the topping place of Kent, which former ages hath found obnoxious to these infelicities; which this gentleman, so well read in story, should have been mindful of in these troublesome times; but all these, and other circumstances, he left to your lordships noble and judicious consideration; desiring, amongst other motives, that your lordships will be pleased to reflect upon the acts of your own justice in a case of like nature*; which, being first begun here, near at hand, might have spread the flame and contagion over all England; had not the great wisdom and justice of both houses, in due time, prevented it.

"He said, He should add no more at this time, but what he had read of a people in Africa which sent a challenge to the wind; whereupon, at the meeting, the wind blew down mountains upon them, and overwhelmed them; he hoped those bold and insolent adventurers, who have presumed to send a challenge, or defiance, to the great houses, shall find the like stroke of their wonted power and justice; and that they shall meet with such a wind as will blow down their high thoughts upon themselves, return their votes into their bosoms, and their mischievous designs upon their own heads. All which he was warranted, in the name of the house of commons, and of all the commons of England, to desire of their lordships; and that they will be pleased to make this gentleman, the principal author of this foul act, a spectacle and pattern of exemplary justice to present and future times."

Ordered, "That sir Edw. Dering, knt. and bart. shall appear before the lords in parliament on the 2nd day of May, and put in his Answer unto an Impeachment of the House of Commons brought up against him, or else the house will proceed against him by default."

Whether sir Edward Dering had been taken or not is not said, nor does any thing more upon the subject of this prosecution appear, except that,

On the 30th of April, the Commons proceeded further in the affair of the Kentish Petition: Sir Edward Dering's Book of Sentences being lately reprinted, they referred the consideration of that matter to a Committee; ordered the impression to be seized; and also to inquire who printed the said Petition, of which several bundles of copies had been found upon some of the petitioners. But notwithstanding these vigorous Resolutions of the commons, the men of Kent had the courage to come up to London with their Petition: for we find in the Journals the following entry, "The house being informed, that divers Gentlemen of the county of Kent were at the door, that desired to present a Petition to the house, they were called in, presented their Petition, and then withdrew: and their Petition was read, and appeared to be the same that was formerly burnt, by order of both houses, by the hands of the common hangman." Hereupon, some of the Petitioners were called in, and examined: capt. Lovelace who said he preferred the Petition by command of the gentlemen assembled at Blackheath, was committed to the Gatehouse; and Wm. Boteler, who was also concerned therein having been at York since the seizures at Marston, was committed to the Fleet: but, the other gentlemen that presented the said Petition being called in, Mr. Speaker, by command of the House, told them, "The house has considered of the Petition that you presented. And they know you cannot be ignorant who printed both houses have formerly expressed of the same Petition: yet, considering that you are young gentlemen, misled by the solicitation of some not affected to the peace of the kingdom; and that, howsoever they intend to proceed against the chief agents and prime actors in this business, yet they are willing that you should be dismissed, hoping that you may hereafter prove good members of the commonwealth."

165. Proceedings against Sir RICHARD GURNEY,* knt. and bart. Lord Mayor of London, on an Impeachment of High Crimes and Misdemeanors: 18 CHARLES I. A. D. 1642. [4 Rushw. Coll. 779, 783. 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1406.]

ON the 5th of July, 1642, the Commons sent up Mr. Serjeant Wyld to the House of Lords, with the following:

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT of the House of Commons against Sir RICHARD GURNEY, knight and baronet, Lord Mayor of the city of London.

I. That the said sir Richard Gurney being nominated, elected and chosen, Lord Mayor of

* This sir Richard Gurney, whom king Charles created a Baronet in Dec. 1641, had very much exerted himself in repressing the Tumults in the City excited during the Proceedings against the earl of Strafford, by which conduct he conciliated the favour of the King, and incurred the enmity of the Parliament, by whom he was specially excepted in the Militia Bill. A few days before this Impeachment he had been censured by the Commons for publishing a Proclamation of the king. See 4 Rush. 686, 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1203, 1103. Lord Clarendon repeatedly mentions him with high commendation, calling him, "a man of wisdom and courage; who expressed great indignation to see the City so corrupted by the ill artifices of factious persons," and in another place saying, "Sir Richard Gurney cannot be too often or too honourably mentioned." Speaking of the Tumults about Whitehall, after the king had removed thither from Hampton Court, the noble historian thus expresses himself: "These the said city of London, for this present year 1642, and in the year of our sovereign lord king Charles, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, &c. the 18th; whereby the ordering, rule and government of the said city of London, was committed to the trust, care, and charge of him the said sir Richard Gurney; he the said sir Richard Gurney, in or about the month of June last past, and during the time of his mayoralty as aforesaid, in contempt and insurrections were so countenanced, that no industry or dexterity of the lord mayor of London, sir Richard Gurney, could give any check to them; but instead thereof, himself (with great and very notable courage opposing all their fanatic humours, both in the Court of Aldermen and at the Common Council) grew to be reckoned in the first form of the Malignants (which was the term they imposed upon all those they meant to render odious to the people) insomuch as his house was no less threatened and disquieted by the Tumults, than the House of Lords; and when he apprehended some of those who were most notorious in the Riot, and committed them to the custody of both the Sheriffs of London in person to be carried to Newgate, they were, by the power and strength of their companions, rescued from them in Cheapside, and the two sheriffs compelled to shift for their own safety. And when it was offered to be proved by a member in the House of Commons, that the wife of captain malice against the parliament, and the proceedings thereof; and contrary to his oath, and the faith and trust reposed in him; and with an intent, purpose and resolution, to overthrow the ancient customs and usages of the said city; and with an intent, purpose and resolution, to bring in an arbitrary and tyrannical government, contrary to the laws and statutes of this realm, and the settled government established in the same kingdom; and with an intent and endeavour to levy war against the parliament, did, in or about the month of June last past, proclaim and publish, or did cause and procure to be openly read and published, within the said city of London, and suburbs of the same, divers illegal proclamations, containing in them matters of dangerous consequence, and contrary to the votes and orders of both houses of parliament, and likewise contrary to the rights and privileges thereof, and the liberty and property of the subject.

II. That wherein or about the month of December last past, a great number of his majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, in and about the city of London, did contrive and draw up a certain Petition, wherein were contained many of their grievances, with an intent to present the same to the honourable house; he the said sir Richard Gurney being then and now Lord Mayor of London, did earnestly labour and endeavour to suppress the said Petition, and to hinder the same from being delivered to this honourable house; and did threaten and menace the said petitioners, and imprisoned divers of them, contrary to the laws and statutes of this realm, and contrary to the liberty of the subject.

III. The said sir Richard Gurney, together with one Benyon, did further plot and contrive one seditious and scandalous Petition, containing matters of dangerous consequence, endeavouring thereby to raise tumults and discords within the said city, and to make and increase the difference between his majesty and the parliament; whereupon many insolent persons, ill-affected to the state, and the proceedings of parliament, did, in a riotous and unlawful manner, assemble and gather themselves together in Cheapside within the said city, and then and there committed many riotous acts, contrary to the peace of our sovereign lord the king, and contrary to the civil government of the said city. And he the said sir Richard Gurney, did purposely, wittingly and willingly permit and suffer the aforesaid riotous persons to escape, without due and deserved punishment of law.

IV. That whereas, by order of both houses of parliament, the said Lord Mayor was appointed to call a common-council: He refused so to do; And when a common-council was called by the said sir Richard Gurney, it was moved, on the behalf of both houses of parliament, that great quantity of arms, and other ammunition, should be laid into some store-houses within the said city, for his majesty's

Venn (having received a letter from her husband to that purpose) who was one of the citizens that served for London, and was known himself to lead those men, that came tumultuously down to Westminster and White-Hall, at the time of the passing the Bill of Attainder of the Earl of Strafford, and with great industry solicited many people to go down with their arms to Westminster, upon a day (that was named) when she said, her husband had sent her word, that in the House of Commons they were together by the ears, and that the worse party was like to get the better of the good party; and therefore her husband desired his friends to come with their arms to Westminster to help the good party; and that thereupon many in a short time went thither: They who offered to make proof of the same, were appointed to attend many days; but notwithstanding all the importunity that could be used, were never admitted to be heard. And the king in his Message to both Houses, April 28, 1642, tells them, That "the demeanour of the Lord Mayor of London had been such that the city and the whole kingdom was beholden to him for his example." See 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1203.

Of this prosecution Clarendon thus speaks: "Towards such, as any ways (though under the obligation of oaths or offices) opposed or discountenanced what they went about, the parliament proceeded with the most extravagant severity that had been ever heard of; of which I shall only mention two instances; the first, of the lord mayor of London, sir Richard Gurney, a citizen of great wealth, reputation, and integrity; whom the lords had, upon the complaint of the House of Commons, before their sending the last petition to the king (of which his majesty gave them a touch in his Answer) committed to the Tower of London; for causing the king's Proclamation against the Militia, by virtue of his majesty's writ to him directed, and according to the known duty of his place, to be publicly proclaimed. And shortly after, that they might have a man more compliant with their designs to govern the city, notwithstanding that he insisted upon his innocence, and made it appear that he was obliged by the laws of the land, the customs of the city, and the constitution of his office, and his oath, to do whatsoever he had done: He was by their lordships, in the presence of the commons, adjudged 'to be put out of his office of Lord Mayor of London; to be utterly incapable of bearing office in city or kingdom, and of all honour or dignity: and to be imprisoned, during the pleasure of the two houses of parliament.' And upon this Sentence alderman Pennington was, by the noise and clamour of the common people, against the customs and rules of election, made mayor; and accordingly installed; and the true, old, worthy mayor committed to the Tower of London; where with notable courage and constancy, he continued almost to his death."

service, and the good and safety of the kingdom; he the said sir Richard Gurney, being ill-affected to the state, and the proceedings of parliament, did, in a most obstinate and malicious manner, withstand, refuse or gainsay the same, contrary to the order of both houses of parliament, giving many insolent speeches against the authority thereof, with an intent and purpose to discourage all well-affected persons to yield obedience to the orders of parliament, and to make difference and division between his majesty and the parliament. All which matters and things have been perpetrated, committed, and done by him, the said sir Richard Gurney, during the time of his mayoralty aforesaid.

Upon this, the Lord Mayor was brought to the bar, as a Delinquent, kneeling upon his knees, until he was wished to stand up. And then the Speaker told him, he was impeached by the House of Commons of High Crimes and Misdemeanors. The Impeachment being read unto him, the Speaker desired his Answer; and he confessed he caused the said Proclamation to be published. Then he was commanded to withdraw; and being called in again, he was asked by the Speaker, whether he will justify and stand to this Answer or no. He answered, That he desired to have counsel to advise him in his Answer, and some time to answer. Hereupon he withdrew; and it was Ordered, That the said sir Richard Gurney shall have Counsel allowed him; and that he shall put in his Answer to this Impeachment in person on the 8th instant.

July 8th being the day appointed for the Lord Mayor to make Answer to his Charge, he was called to the bar, as a Delinquent, where he delivered in the following Answer:

“The Humble Answer of sir Richard Gurney, knt. &c. This Defendant, saving to himself all benefit of exceptions to the Impeachment against him exhibited by the honourable house of commons, saith, That he, this Defendant, is not guilty of all or any of the Crimes and Misdemeanors, in and by the said Impeachment against him charged.

At a Conference the Commons exhibited, to the Lords, a further Impeachment against the Lord Mayor; which being afterwards read to him at the bar, he desired more time might be given him to answer by counsel. And being asked, Why he refused, at the last Common Council, to put the Question for stowing the magazine that came from Hull, in the city; according to order of both houses, but protested against it? The Lord Mayor answered, He thought not fit to lay so much powder in the city, being dangerous; there being much there already, and more they cannot find room for. Afterwards he withdrew, and then it was resolved, “That the Lord Mayor of London, for his contempt to this House, shall be committed to the Tower; and that the Lieutenant there shall take care to keep him in safe custody, as he will answer it at his peril.”

July 13.

Both Houses having been at some trouble to get any Alderman of London to act for the Lord Mayor during his Imprisonment, several of them having absolutely refused it, as not consisted with their oath to the City: It was ordered That the Lord Mayor be commanded to depute some person to be locum-tenens, for the government of the City of London, and calling of common councils. On the 14th sir John Conyers, Lieutenant of the Tower, who was ordered to deliver the foregoing Message, acquainted the Lords, That the Lord Mayor said, He had no power to appoint a deputy for the government of the City, during his absence. Hereupon the Lords ordered, That sir George Whitmore, knt. and alderman, in the absence of the Lord Mayor, do cause a court of Aldermen to be summoned, to meet at Guildhall the next day; and they, so summoned, are strictly enjoined to appear accordingly; then to make choice of a locum-tenens, or to consider of what other way will be according to the custom and charters of the city, for the safety and good government thereof; and to give account of their Proceedings therein to the said lords in parliament, on the 16th instant.

July 15.

The Lord Mayor was brought to the bar as a Delinquent, the Commons being present: where, kneeling till he was bid to rise, the Speaker asked him, if he had brought his Answer to the Commons additional Impeachment against him; which he delivered in, and it was read in hæc verba:

The Humble Answer of Sir-RICHARD GURNEY, Knt. and Bart. Lord Mayor of the City of London, to a Second Impeachment exhibited against him to the right hon. the Lords in Parliament, by the hon. the house of Commons.

“The Defendant, saving to himself all benefit of exception to the said Impeachment, as to all and every the wicked and malicious advising, countenancing, persuasions, solicitations, and practices mentioned; and as to the illegal Imprisonment of John Carter, Wm. Ginch, and Rd. Arnold, or any other Apprentices within the city of London; as also to the charge of Breach of his Oath, and neglect of the duty of his place; and to all and every, or any other offences, practices, contempts, and misdemeanors, by the said Impeachment laid to this Defendant, he saith, That he is not of them, or any of them, guilty in such manner and form as the same are in and by the said Impeachment charged.”

July 20.

A Certificate from the Aldermen of London, concerning the election of a locum-tenens, in the room of the Lord Mayor, was presented and read, importing, “That they had met together according to the direction, and on the day prefixed by the house; and that having called unto them the City Counsel, and others experienced in the customs and charters of the said city, and, after diligent search of their records, they did humbly certify, That it did not appear that ever, at any time, the aldermen had made choice of a locum-tenens to execute the office of a Lord Mayor: but they found, That in the time of a Lord Mayor's sickness, he being within the franchise, there had been a locum-tenens appointed by himself, the sword still remaining with him; all which they humbly presented, &c." Signed by 15 Aldermen.

August 12.

The Commons with their Speaker came to the Bar of the Lords' house, and demanded Judgment against sir Richard Gurney, knight and baronet, Lord Mayor of the city of London, impeached by them before the Lords in Parliament; whereupon the Lord Mayor was brought to the bar, and the lord Kimbolton being then Speaker, pronounced the Sentence following, viz.

"Whereas sir Richard Gurney, knight and baronet, lord mayor of the city of London, hath been impeached by the knights, citizens and burgeses of the House of Commons, for causing proclamations to be made in several places of the city of London, for the putting in execution the Commission of Array, tending to the raising of forces against the parliament, and the subversion of the laws and peace of this kingdom; and for the framing of two false and scandalous Petitions, to set division between his majesty and the parliament, and the parliament and the city; and for imprisoning certain Apprentices, who had framed a petition unto the parliament; and for not punishing or proceeding against certain rioters, or misdoers within the city of London acted on or about the 2nd of February, 1641. And for refusing or neglecting to call a Common-Council for the good and safety of the said city and kingdom, being thereunto commanded by the authority of both houses of parliament.

"The lords having taken the said Charges into their due consideration, do find the said sir Richard Gurney, lord mayor of the city of London, guilty of causing the said proclamation for putting the Commission of Array in execution, to be published, tending to the disturbance of the peace of this kingdom, and of not suppressing the said riots and misdemeanors, and of not calling a common-council, as he was by order of parliament required.

"And for the said offences this high court doth award and adjudge, 1. That the said sir Richard Gurney shall be no longer lord mayor of the city of London. 2. That he shall be hereafter incapable to bear any office in the said city of London. 3. That he shall be incapable to bear or receive any further honour hereafter. 4. That he shall be imprisoned in the Tower of London during the pleasure of this house."

August 18.

This day, the Lords were informed, That, according to their Order, sir Nich. Raynton, senior alderman of London, had called a common-hall, and that the citizens had elected alderman Pennington their new Lord Mayor; and it was necessary and consistent with the ancient customs of the city, that he be sworn and presented at Westminster, &c. That the city having sent to sir Richard Gurney for the sword, cap, mace, and collar of SS's, he pretended that they were locked up at his house, and he could not come at them: but being asked, again, Whether he would deliver them if he had them? He denied to deliver the sword to any but the king from whom he received it. Upon this it was first ordered, "That the thanks of the House should be given to sir Nich. Raynton and the rest of the Aldermen, for their cheerful, ready, and orderly obedience to the commands of this house: that they approved of alderman Pennington for Lord Mayor, as his good affections were well known to be for king, kingdom, and privileges of parliament: that he should have the usual oaths given him by the court of aldermen: and two barons of the Exchequer should attend the next day for the lord mayor to be presented and sworn." Lastly, it was ordered, "That the gentleman usher, attending that house, should go to the house of sir Richard Gurney and demand the sword, &c. and if he denied, to break open any doors or locks whatsoever, and possess himself of them, and deliver them to alderman Pennington, now lord mayor elect of the city of London."

The next day, the gentleman usher gave the Lords this account, "That, according to their Order, he had taken out of sir Richard Gurney's study four swords, belonging to the city, one cap of maintenance, one embroidered crimson cap, one collar of SS's with a great jewel and a pendant pearl, and one great mace, belonging to the city; all which particulars he had delivered to the lord mayor elect, and had his receipt for them."

166. Articles of Impeachment against Sir THOMAS GARDINER Recorder of the City of London, for High Crimes and Misdemeanors: 18 CHARLES I. A. D. 1642. [4 Rushw. Coll. 780

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT against Sir THOMAS GARDINER, Recorder of the city of London.

I. THAT the said sir Thomas Gardiner being now, and for six years last past having been Recorder of the city of London, and having taken an oath for his faithful discharge of his said office, and to maintain the franchises and customs of the said city, and not to discover the counsel thereof to the hurt of the same, did in the year of our Lord God 1633, contrary to the laws of this kingdom, and contrary to his oath, wickedly advise, direct, and earnestly press sir Maurice Abbot, knight, then Lord Mayor of London, the aldermen and common-council of

* He was one of the counsel for the earl of Strafford. Vide ante. Whitelock's Mem. 43. He was one of the King's Commissioners for the Treaty at Uxbridge. See Whitelock's Mem. p. 120. His son was an active officer in king Charles's Army.

"From the time the calling a parliament [the Long Parliament] was resolved upon, the king designed sir Thomas Gardiner, who was Recorder of London, to be Speaker in the house of commons; a man of gravity and quickness, that had somewhat of authority and gracefulness in his person and presence, and in all respects equal to the service. There was little doubt but that he would be chosen to serve in one of the four places for the city of London, which had very rarely rejected their Recorder upon that occasion; and lest that should fail, diligence was used in one or two other places that he might be elected. The opposition was so great, and the faction so strong, to hinder his being elected in the city, that four others were chosen for that service, without hardly mentioning his name: nor was there less industry used to prevent his being chosen in other places; Clerks were corrupted not to make out the writ for one place, and ways were found out to hinder the writ from being executed in another, time enough for the return before the meeting: so great a fear there was, that a man of entire affections to the king, and of prudence enough to manage those affections, and to regulate the contrary, should be put into the Chair. So that the very morning the parliament was to meet, and when the king intended to go thither, he was informed that sir Thomas Gardiner was not returned to serve as a member in the house of commons, and so was not capable of being chosen to be Speaker; so that his majesty deferred his going to the house till the afternoon, by which time he was to think of another Speaker." Clarendon.

the said city, and others at several times since to impose, levy, and take of the said citizens and inhabitants, without their consent in parliament; the illegal tax of Ship-Money. At being told by some of the said common-council, that the tax of Ship-Money was against law: he the said sir Thomas Gardiner replied There would be law found for it ere long.

II. That the said sir Thomas Gardiner, in the said year 1633, did wickedly advise and persuade the said Lord Mayor, aldermen and common-council of London, that they ought at their own will and pleasure, by force and power of the acts of that court, tax and levy on the said citizens and inhabitants, without their consent in parliament, a certain sum of money by way of loan, to furnish his majesty for his wars; affirming, that such acts would bind and compel the citizens to pay the same. And also in the said year 1638, contrary to his oath, and against the said laws of the land, did wickedly advise and direct the then Lord Mayor, aldermen, and common-council, to raise and levy an army of 3,000 men of the Trained Bands of the said city, to serve his majesty in his wars in the north, against his majesty's subjects of Scotland. And therein he affirmed, That every subject was bound by his allegiance to serve the king; and that neither the statute-law nor their charters could excuse them: Saying also at the same time, It is now no time to plead statutes and charters.

III. That about the month of February, 1639, he the said sir Thomas Gardiner, contrary to his oath, and to the laws of the land, did earnestly persuade and press sir Henry Garraway, knight, then Lord Mayor, the aldermen and common-council of London, to impress, clothe, and conduct 200 men of the said citizens and inhabitants, to serve the king in his wars in the north, against his majesty's subjects of Scotland: And although the same was refused to be done by the said court of common-council, as a thing against law; yet by the persuasion of the said sir Thomas Gardiner, the same was then performed by the then Lord Mayor, and the money paid for the same out of the chamber of London, without any consent or approbation of the said court of common-council, contrary to the liberties and customs of the said city, and in subversion of them.

IV. That a Petition directed to his majesty, being prepared in the said year, 1638, by the said then Lord Mayor, aldermen and common-council, setting forth the laws and statutes of this kingdom, and the charters of the said city, to exempt the said citizens and inhabitants of London, from certain illegal taxes and services, whereby his majesty might be pleased not to continue such his demand of men and money from them, He the said sir Thomas Gardiner, contrary to his oath, and duty of his place, did reveal and disclose to his majesty their counsel and intention of delivery of that Petition, and then told the persons appointed to deliver the same Petition, that his majesty would receive no Petition from them.

V. That the said sir Thomas Gardiner, to the end to preserve himself from being questioned for the same crimes, laboured to hinder the calling of parliaments; and therefore in the month of May, in the year 1640, presently after the dissolving of the parliament, he the said sir Thomas Gardiner, advised and persuaded the then Lord Mayor, aldermen and common-council of London, to lend the king 100,000*l.* for his wars against his majesty's subjects of Scotland. And albeit they told him, it was not safe for them to do it, when the parliament and the kingdom had refused it, yet he earnestly persuaded them thereunto; and in or about July in the said year 1640, when many thousands of the said citizens of London joined in a Petition to be delivered unto his majesty to call a parliament, for settling the distractions of this kingdom, and for the peace and welfare thereof, and of his majesty's kingdom of Scotland; he the said sir Thomas Gardiner did earnestly dissuade them from it, saying, it was dangerous and needless, and the Petition would come unseasonably to interrupt the king's affairs.

VI. That in December last, when a Petition was prepared and subscribed by many thousands of the said citizens to be presented to the house of commons, to assure them of their good affection to the king and parliament, and not to divert the parliament in their just ways; he the said sir Thomas Gardiner, caused some of the Petitioners to be sent for before the lord mayor and himself, and questioned them as rioters and disturbers of the peace, saying, that the putting their hands to a Petition was the way to put all together by the ears. And being then answered by some of the said Petitioners, that they sought nothing but peace; he replied in these or the like words, Is this your way to peace? no, it tends to sedition and blood, and to cutting of throats; and if it come to that, you may thank yourselves, your bloods be upon your own heads. And he used other threatening speeches to discourage and terrify the petitioners from further proceeding in their said Petition, which Petition was afterwards presented to the lords and commons in parliament, and well approved by them, and doth not contain any dangerous matter, as was maliciously by him pretended, as may appear by a Copy of the Petition hereunto annexed.

VII. That in January last at a court of common-council in London, an order of the house of commons was sent and delivered to the lord mayor, aldermen and common-council of the said city, appointing them to make choice of meet persons to have the ordering of the militia; whereat the said sir Thomas Gardiner was present, and took notice of the said order, and declared his opinion, that the persons of the committee formerly chosen for the safety of the said city, were the fittest men to take that service upon them. Whereunto the lord mayor and sheriffs desiring to be excused, the persons of the said committee were chosen by a clear vote, and their names sent to the house of commons, and by them and the house of peers allowed and approved of: Yet afterwards he the said sir Thomas Gardiner endeavouring and plotting to hinder the proceedings in parliament, the pence and safety of this kingdom, did most maliciously and wickedly advise, and direct the making and framing of two false and seditious Petitions; and he the said sir Thomas Gardiner, upon perusal of them, affirmed the matters contained in them to be agreeable to law, and to the custom of the said city, thereby encouraging divers of the said city to subscribe the same, and to send the one of them to be presented to his majesty, and the other unto the lords and commons in parliament; which Petitions do contain in them divers false, scandalous, and seditious matters; and in particular, that Petition annexed hereunto, a copy whereof was afterwards subscribed by divers citizens, and presented to the house of commons, containing false matter, that the ordering of the arms of the said city of London had been, time out of mind, annexed to the mayoralty for the time being; and insinuating, that if the same should be conferred upon others, it would reflect upon the government and custom of the said city, which every freeman of the said city was by his oath of freedom bound to maintain to the uttermost of his power; which Petitions were so contrived, framed and published, on purpose to divert his majesty from assenting to the said ordinance, and to work a distraction in the said city, and to bring the parliament, city and whole kingdom into disorder and confusion. All which matters committed and done by the said sir Thomas Gardiner, were and are high crimes and misdemeanors, contrary to the laws of this realm, and in subversion of them, and contrary to the rights and privileges of parliament, the liberty and property of the subject, tending to sedition, and to the disturbance of the public peace of this realm.

And the said Commons by protestation saving to themselves, the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any other Accusation or Impeachment against the said sir T. Gardiner, and also of replying to the Answers that the said sir T. Gardiner shall make unto the said Articles, or to any of them, and of offering further proof of the premisses, or any of them, or of any other impeachment or accusation that shall be exhibited by them, as the cause shall, according to the course of parliament, require, do pray that the said sir Thomas Gardiner may be put to answer all and every the premisses, and that such proceedings, trials, judgments and executions may be upon every of them had and used, as is agreeable to law and justice.

Nothing further relating to this Impeachment has been found.

167. Impeachment of HENRY HASTINGS, esq. (second Son to the Earl of Huntingdon) Sir RICHARD HALFORD, Sir JOHN BALE, and JOHN PATE, esq. for High Crimes and Misdemeanors : 18 CHARLES I. A. D. 1642. [Lords' Journals. 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1407.]

July 8, 1642.

THE Commons, at a Conference, delivered to the Lords an Impeachment against Henry Hastings, esq. second son to the earl of Huntingdon, sir Richard Halford, sir John Bale, and John Pate, esq. for High Crimes and Misdemeanors; in which Impeachment the Commons desired the Lords to use all expedition. A Copy of which Articles were as follows :

“ The IMPEACHMENT of Henry Hastings, esq., (second son of the Earl of Huntingdon), sir Richard Halford, kt. and bart., sir John Bale, kt., and John Pate, esq., by the Commons assembled in Parliament, for High Crimes and Misdemeanors by them committed, as followeth :

“ Whereas, by order and command of the Lords and Commons in parliament, for the safety and defence of the county of Leicester, the magazine of the said county was delivered into the hands of Henry earl of Stamford, who, in June, 1642, removed a great part thereof to his dwelling-house, called Broadgate, in the said county, for the more safety and security thereof :

“ And whereas, in the said month of June, several Warrants is-ued out, by order of both houses of Parliament, the one directed to the gentleman usher of the house of peers, his deputy or deputies, the other to the serjeant at arms attending on this house, his deputy or deputies, for the apprehending of the said Henry Hastings, sir Richard Halford, sir John Bale, and John Pate, for High Crimes and Misdemeanors by them committed against the said houses of parliament, to answer the same before the said houses :

“ He the said Henry Hastings, sir Richard Halford, sir John Bale, and John Pate, well knowing the premises ; and the said sir Richard Halford, sir John Bale, and John Pate, being then and yet justices of the peace of the said county ; in or about the 22nd day of the said month of June, wickedly and maliciously, without warrant of law, did raise and draw out of the several counties of Derby, Lincoln, and Leicester, forces of horse and foot, to the number of 300 persons, or thereabouts, some of them being colliers, and other mean and desperate persons, and divers of them Papists, and them unlawfully assembled at Loughborough, in the said county of Leicester ; where the said Henry Hastings, the day aforesaid, made proclamation, That, if any persons affected to that service wanted arms, and would repair to the town's end, they should be furnished therewith ; and they, the said Henry Hastings, sir Richard

Halford, sir John Bale, and John Pate, together with the said other persons so assembled, being armed with swords and pikes, and with pistols, muskets, and calivers, ready charged with powder and bullets, and other habiliments of war, marched along in a warlike manner, with drums beating and colours flying, and their matches lighted, to the great terror and affrightment of his majesty's subjects, divers miles within the said county of Leicester, to the town of Leicester, and so through the said town, with great noise and shouting, to a certain place near to the said town, called Horse Faire Leases, to the intent to keep themselves from being arrested by the said officers of both houses of parliament, and, in case they should be so arrested, then to rescue themselves by force, and to the intent likewise to take away the said magazine by force and arms, and to kill and destroy the said earl of Stamford ; he the said Henry Hastings, and some other of his said complices, giving out that they would fetch away the said magazine with a vengeance, and that they would have the said earl's life before they left, and would fire his house, and have his heart's blood out, with divers other such like desperate speeches ; And the said Henry Hastings, sir Richard Halford, sir John Bale, and John Pate, with the rest of their said confederates, being so assembled at the said Horse Faire Leases, John Chambers and James Stamford, being authorized thereunto by deputations under the hands of the officers aforesaid, together with Archdale Palmer, esq., then high sheriff of the said county of Leicester, and divers other persons in their aid and assistance, repaired to the said place, to execute the said warrants from both houses of parliament ; and the said Henry Hastings, well knowing thereof, did then tell the said Chambers, that he knew he had warrants from the parliament as well for others as for himself ; whereupon the said Chambers produced the said warrants, and read the same openly, in the hearing of the said Henry Hastings, sir Richard Halford, sir John Bale, and John Pate, to yield obedience to the said warrants, which they refused to do ; but, instead thereof, they and other their said adherents did violently assault the said high sheriff, Chambers, and Stamford, and rode upon them with their horses ; and one of the said confederates, named Mr. Walter Hastings, with his pistol charged, gave fire upon the said Chambers ; and some others of them drew out their pistols, and presented their muskets, upon the said high sheriff and Chambers, using other force and violence upon them, to the great danger of their lives ; and so the said Henry

Hastings, sir Richard Halford, sir John Bale, and John Pate, by force and arms, and in a warlike manner, at the time and place aforesaid rescued themselves from the said officers and high sheriff, in contempt of justice, and to the high affront and scorn of the parliament, and afterwards marched back again in warlike manner into the said town of Leicester: All which doings of the said Henry Hastings, sir Richard Halford, sir John Bale, and John Pate, were and are contrary to the laws of this realm, the rights and privileges of parliament, tending to sedition, and to the danger of effusion of much blood:

“Wherefore the said Commons do, in the name of themselves and of all the Commons of England, impeach the said Henry Hastings, sir Richard Halford, sir John Bale, and John Pate, of the said several high crimes and misdemeanors.

“And the said Commons, by Protestation, saving to themselves now, and at all times hereafter, the liberty of exhibiting of any other Accusation or Impeachment against the said Henry Hastings, sir Richard Halford, sir John Bale, and John Pate, or any of them, and of replying to the Answers which they, or any of them, shall make, or of offering any proofs of the premises, or any of them, or of any other Accusation or Impeachment against them, or any of them, as the case, according to the course of justice, shall require; do pray, that he the said Henry Hastings, sir Richard Halford, sir John Bale, and John Pate, and every of them, may be forthwith put to answer the premises, in presence of the Commons; and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments, may be upon them, and every of them, had and used, as shall be agreeable to law and justice.”

Ordered, That the aforesaid Gentlemen should appear before the House, at a time prefixed, to hear the Impeachment read, and to put in their Answers to it.

It has not been found, that the parties impeached put in any Answer to these Charges, or appeared before the House respecting them; or that any farther proceedings were had in the matter.

168. Impeachment of JAMES Lord STRANGE, for High Treason: 18 CHARLES I. A. D. 1642. [4 Rushworth, 680. 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1466.]

THE Lord Strange, son to the earl of Derby, was made by the king Lord-Lieutenant of Lancashire and Cheshire, and vigorously endeavoured to put the Commission of Array in execution, but met with great opposition from sir Thomas Stanly, Mr. Holland, Mr. Holcraft, Mr. Egerton, and Mr. Booth: as also by Mr. Ashton and Mr. Moor, both members of the house of commons. On the 15th of July 1642, the said lord Strange made an attempt to gain Manchester, but was repulsed; yet one man by name Richard Parcival, was slain by my lord's forces (which some say* was the first blood drawn in those unhappy wars.) Upon which on the 14th of September 1642 the House of Commons caused the said lord Strange to be impeached, as followeth:

The Impeachment of JAMES, Lord STRANGE, and son and heir apparent of William Earl of Derby; by the Commons assembled in Parliament, in the name of themselves and all the Commons of England, of High-Treason.

“That the said James, lord Strange, to the intent and purpose to subvert the fundamental laws

* May (B. 2, c. 6.) says, “This Lord was not at all fortunate in service against the Parliament, who not long after returned again with a great force, consisting of 3,000 men, to the town of Manchester, where after he had sharply besieged it for the space of two whole weeks, he was at last quite beaten with the loss of many of his men.”

and government of this kingdom of England; and the rights and liberties, and very being of parliaments: and to set sedition between the king and his people, did upon the 15th day of July, in this present year of our Lord God; 1642, at Manchester in the county of Lancaster, and at several other times and places, actually, maliciously, rebelliously and traiterously, summon and call together great numbers of his majesty's subjects; and incite, persuade, and encourage them to take up arms, and levy war against the king, parliament, and kingdom; That the said James, lord Strange, in further prosecution of his fore-said wicked, traiterous, and malicious purposes, did upon the said 15th day of July, at Manchester aforesaid, and at several other times and places, actually, maliciously, rebelliously and traiterously, raise great forces of men and horse, and levied war against the king, parliament and kingdom. And in further prosecution of the aforesaid wicked, traiterous and malicious purposes, the said James, lord Strange, and divers other persons whom he had drawn into his party and faction, did also, upon the said 15th day of July, at Manchester aforesaid, maliciously and traiterously, with force and arms, and in an hostile and warlike manner, kill, murder and destroy Richard Parcival of Kirkman-Shalme in the said county of Lancaster, linen-webster; and did then, and at divers other times and places, in like hostile manner as aforesaid shoot, stab, hurt and wound divers others of his majesty's good subjects, contrary to the laws and peace of this kingdom of England, and contrary to his majesty's royal crown and dignity: And the said James, lord Strange, hath set sedition between the king and his people, and now is in open and actual rebellion against the king, parliament and kingdom: for which matters and things, the knights, citizens and burgesses of the house of commons in parliament assembled, do, in the name of themselves, and of all the commons of England, impeach the said James, lord Strange, of High-Treason.

“ And the said Commons, by protestation saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any other Accusation or Impeachment against the said lord Strange, and also to replying of the Answers, that the said James lord Strange shall make to the premises, or any of them, or of any other Impeachment or Accusation that shall be exhibited by them, as the cause, according to the course and proceedings of parliament, shall require, do pray, that the said James lord Strange may be put to answer all and every the premises, that such proceedings, examinations, trials and judgments, may be upon them, and every one of them, had and used as shall be agreeable to law and justice.”

Ordered by the Lords, That the Answer to be returned to the House of Commons shall be, That this House hath received the Impeachment against the lord Strange; and that they will take the best course they can to have the lord Strange brought to answer the said Impeachment.

The Lords taking into consideration what course to take for sending to summon the lord Strange to appear, and answer his Impeachment of High Treason: and considering that, if messengers be sent they will be imprisoned, and if proclamation-writs be sent down they will not be sealed; therefore they thought fit to communicate this to the House of Commons, to advise in this case how Delinquents may be brought up to Trial: A Message was accordingly sent, to desire a Conference with the Commons, concerning the Impeachment of the lord Strange.

The following Order was made, in the nature of a Proclamation, against the lord Strange, to be printed and published in all churches and chapels, and all market towns, viz.

September 16, 1642.

“ Whereas the lord Strange having continued a long time, and still remaining in actual rebellion against his majesty and the parliament, is for the same impeached of high-treason by the house of commons, in the name of themselves, and all the commons of England: It is therefore ordered, by the lords and commons in parliament assembled, that publication thereof be made in all churches and chapels, by the curates and church-wardens thereof; and in all markets and towns, by the constables and officers of the towns within the counties of Lancaster and Chester, to the end that all his majesty's loving subjects may have notice thereof; lest they being deceived by the specious pretences made by the said lord Strange should assist him with men, money, munition, or any other provision, and so make themselves guilty of the like treason and rebellion: And all sheriffs, and other his majesty's subjects, are hereby required to do their best endeavour for the apprehension of the said lord, and the bringing him up to the parliament, there to receive condign punishment according to his demerits.”

Nothing further occurs respecting this prosecution.

169. Proceedings against the NINE LORDS at York; namely, SPENCER Earl of NORTHAMPTON, WILLIAM Earl of DEVONSHIRE, HENRY Earl of DOVER, HENRY Earl of MONMOUTH, CHARLES Lord HOWARD of Charlton, ROBERT Lord RICH, CHARLES Lord GREY of Ruthen, THOMAS Lord COVENTRY, and ARTHUR Lord CAPEL, for High Crimes and Misdemeanors: 18 CHARLES I. A. D. 1642. [4 Rushw. Coll. 737. 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1296.]

ON May 25, 1642, the Lords took notice of several of their House being absent on the King's Letters to attend him at York; and judging it contrary to the privileges of that House, resolved to consider what course was fit to be taken with these Deserters. Hereupon it was ordered, “ That the Lords gone to York, or other places, contrary to a former Order of this House, shall be sent for, and taken into custody, to answer their Contempt done to this House; and, in case they refuse to come, then the House would give Judgment against them for the same.” The lords North and Brooke were appointed to put down the names of such peers as were absent without leave, &c. This was done accordingly.

On May 30, Mr. Pickering, a messenger, declared upon oath what Lords he saw at York, and what he met going thither; on which it was ordered, That the said Lords should be sent for to appear here, on the 8th of June next, or else the house would proceed to give Judgment against them for their offence.

June 7.

A Letter directed to the Speaker of the house of lords, was read as follows :

“ My Lord; We, whose names are underwritten, have received a Summons, dated the 30th day of May, to appear, the 8th of June, at the bar of the House of Peers; we are come here to York, at this time, to pay a willing obedience to his majesty's commands, signified by letter under his hand, which commands remain upon us still; and so we rest Your lordships affectionate servants,

NORTHAMPTON,	GREY OF RUTHIN;
WILL. DEVONSHIRE,	C. HOWARD,
MONMOUTH,	THO. COVENTRY,
R. RICH,	ARTHUR CAPEL.
HEN. DOVER,	York, June 5, 1642.”

Ordered, That this Letter be taken into consideration to-morrow; and that all the lords in town have notice to be present.

June 8.

This day, the Lords took into consideration the Letter from the Nine Peers at York, and agreed upon a Conference with the other House about it, expressing their sense of the matter in the following manner:

“ The Lords having received a Letter from diverse of their Members, who have withdrawn themselves from their attendance in Parliament, contrary to the express Orders and commands of this House; though this affront be to their own House, and by their own Members, yet, as it concerns the safety of the kingdom, and the very being of parliament, in the consequence of it, the Lords, in that respect, thought it fit to communicate it to the Commons; that both Houses may, jointly, endeavour to prevent such practices and designs as, by the Malignant Party and the ill-affected members of both houses, may be undertaken, to the Dissolution of the Parliament, unvalidating the acts and authority thereof, or raising a power in opposition thereunto; which the Lords cannot but conceive those lords are encouraged unto by the counsels now prevailing, and the forces now raising at York; otherwise it is not imaginable, after a Vote passed by both Houses, That it appeared the king, seduced by wicked counsel, intended to make war against his parliament, they would have taken the boldness to have left the house, in contempt of the command thereof, and have gone to York; and, being summoned to appear, would have remained there notwithstanding, and have returned so slight and scornful an answer.”

June 10.

Mr. Hollis having reported to the House of Commons the opinion of the Lords concerning the Letter from the Nine Peers at York, a motion was made,

“ That the departing of these Nine Lords, from the Parliament, without leave, after such time as both Houses had declared, that the king, seduced by wicked counsel, intended to make war against the Parliament; and their still continuing at York, notwithstanding their summons and commands, is a high affront and Contempt of both houses: and that the said Lords therein did as much as in them lay, that the service of Parliament might be deserted; and are justly suspected to promote a war against the Parliament.”

The previous question being put, it was carried in the affirmative by 109 voices against 51. The Tellers on this remarkable occasion were, for the Yeas, Mr. Hollis and Mr. Cromwell; for the Noes, Mr. Waller and Mr. White. Then it was resolved, That a committee be appointed to draw up an Impeachment against the said Nine Peers.

June 16.

A Message was brought from the Commons by Mr. Denzil Hollis, containing an Impeachment against the Nine Lords who had written and signed the Letter from York; which he introduced with the following Speech: *

“ My Lords; By the command of the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons, I come hither unto your lordships in the behalf of the parliament; or rather in the behalf of the whole kingdom, labouring with much distraction, many fears, great apprehensions of evil and mischief intended against it; and now hatching and preparing by that Malignant Party, which thirsts after the destruction of religion, laws, and liberty; all which are folded up, cherished, and preserved in the careful bosom of the parliament.

“ My lords, the parliament is the foundation and basis of government, and consequently of the peace and happiness of the kingdom. As it creates the law by which we are ruled and governed in peace and quietness, so it preserves the law in power and authority: it watches over our religion, that it be not supplanted and changed by superstitious innovations; the truth and substance of it eaten up with formality, vain pomp, and unnecessary ceremonies; the gross errors of Popery and Arminianism imposed upon us, as the doctrine of our church; a way opened to all licentiousness; and occasion, hereby, taken to oppress and persecute all religious and conscientious men that shall oppose these proceedings, as hath been used of late. It is the conservative of the rights and liberties of the subject, and the corrective of injustice and oppression; whereby equal right is distributed to all, and every man hath that benefit and protection of justice, which is due unto him. It is that by which alone common necessities can be provided for, and public fears prevented: so that I may say, not only the peace, happiness, and well-being, but the very being of this kingdom, can have no other bottom to stand upon but the parliament, it being the foundation upon which the whole frame of the commonwealth is built.

“Therefore those who would destroy the building, apply themselves to undermine the foundation. If they can take away parliaments, or but weaken the power and authority of parliament, which is all one, (for if it once have no power, it will soon have no being) they know then all will be at their mercy, nothing will stand in their way to oppose them; but a flood of violence will run over and cover the whole surface of the kingdom, and carry away all, both present enjoyment, and future hope of religion, liberty, and whatsoever else is precious and dear unto us. And, accordingly, it hath ever been the policy of evil counsellors (who are the greatest enemies we have in the world, or can have) to strike at parliaments, keep off parliaments, break parliaments, or divide parliaments, by making factions, casting in diversions and obstructions, to hinder and interrupt the proceedings of parliament: all against the parliament. Your lordships have had experience of this truth in this parliament; a succession of designs upon it: first to awe it, and take away the freedom of it by the terror of an army; then to bring force against it, actually to assault it, and, with the sword, cut in sunder this only band, which ties and knits up king and people, the people among themselves, and the whole frame of this government, in one firm, and, I hope, indissoluble, knot of peace and unity.

“God diverted those designs, and did blow upon them; presently another is set upon, which was to obstruct and hinder our proceedings, that, in the mean time, the flame of rebellion might consume the kingdom of Ireland; and distempers, distractions and jealousies be fomented here at home, to tear out the bowels of this kingdom; the parliament being disabled from helping it, by occasion of so many diversions, so much business cut out unto it, many obstructions and difficulties; especially that great one from which all the rest receive countenance and support, his majesty’s absenting himself, and not concurring with us; thus withdrawing both his presence and influence; by which means such remedies could not be applied as were necessary; and what was done, was done with infinite trouble to the parliament, and excessive charge to the subject, double, treble, what otherwise would have served the turn: so the subject is grieved and oppressed with charge, and the blame of all is laid upon the parliament; and the parliament unjustly said to be the cause of all those evils, which the authors of them had made so great; and so confirmed and secured by the frequent interruptions of the parliament, that they could not suddenly, nor easily, be suppressed or removed.

through this likewise; and though the night had been black and stormy, some day began to appear: miraculously our arms have prospered in Ireland, and, God be praised, the malevolent practices of these vipers at home, as they appeared, were in some sort mastered; and the parliament began to act and operate towards the settling of the great affairs both of church and state, and providing for the defence and safety of this kingdom, against either foreign invasion, or any stirring of the disaffected party among themselves. Then three ways are together essayed for the weakening and invalidating the proceedings and power of the parliament, and making way for the utter subversion of it. One, Force is gathered together at York, under pretence of a Guard for his majesty’s person, to make an opposition against the parliament; and, by a strong hand, to support and protect delinquents, so as no order of parliament can be obeyed, but on the other side slighted and scorned; so to make the parliament of no reputation, to be but ‘Imago Parliamenti,’ a mere shadow, without substance, without efficacy. Another, To send out, in his majesty’s name, (and as Declarations and Messages from him) bitter invectives against the parliament, to perplex it, and engage it, in the expence of time, to answer them; and beside, cunningly to insinuate and infuse into the people, by false colours and glosses, a disposition and dislike of the parliament; and, if it be possible, to stir up their spirits to rise against it, to destroy it, (and, in it, all other parliaments) to the ruin of themselves, their wives and children. The third Plot, is, The members are drawn away, and persuaded to forsake their duty and attendance here, and go down to York; thereby to blemish the actions of both houses, as done by a few and inconsiderable number, and rather a party than a parliament; and, perhaps, to raise and set up an anti-parliament there.

“My Lords, this is now the great design whereby they hope, by little and little, the parliament shall even bleed to death, and moulder to nothing, the members droppung away, one after another; a desperate and dangerous practice, and as your lordships well observed (when you were pleased to communicate this business to us) an effect of the evil counsels now prevailing, and tending to the dissolution of the parliament: of this parliament, which, under God, must be the preserver of three kingdoms, and keep them firm and loyal to their king, subject to his crown, save them from being turned into a chaos of disorder and confusion, and made a dismal spectacle of misery and desolation: this parliament, which is the last hope of the long-oppressed, and in other countries, even almost wholly destroyed, Protestant religion: this parliament, which is the only means to continue us to be a nation of freemen, and not slaves, to be owners of any thing; that we may call our wives, our children, our estates, nay our bodies our own: in a word, which must stand in the gap to prevent an inlet and inundation of all misery and confusion.

“ My lords, this parliament they desire to destroy; but I hope it will destroy the destroyers, and be a wall of fire to consume them as it is a wall of brass to us, to defend king and kingdom, us, and all we have. Your lordships wisely foresaw this mischief, and as wisely have endeavoured to prevent it, by making your Orders, to keep your members here; as that of the 9th of April, and several other Orders enjoining them all to attend; thereby restraining them from repairing to York, where the clouds were observed to gather so fast, and threaten a storm, and such preparations to be made against the parliament that it necessitated both houses to pass a vote:—‘ That the king, seduced by wicked Counsel, intended to make war against the parliament; and all who shall serve, or assist, in such wars, are declared to be traitors,’ which Vote passed the 20th of May; so setting a mark upon that place, and declaring their opinion concerning those who should at this time resort thither.—Yet now, in such a conjuncture of time, when the kingdom had never more need of a parliament, and the Parliament never more need of all the help and assistance of the best endeavour and advice of every member; the safety, and even the being, of the three kingdoms depending upon it; after such Orders and commands of your lordships house to the contrary; such a Vote of both houses; and expressly against their duty, being called thither by writ, under the Great Seal; which is the king’s greatest and highest command, and not controulable, nor to be dispensed with, by any other command from him whatsoever; and called to treat and consult de arduis regni, the great, urgent, and pressing affairs of the kingdom, never more urgent, never more pressing: notwithstanding all this, these lords, the earls of Northampton, Devonshire, Dover, and Monmouth, the lords Andover, Rich, Grey, Coventry, and Capel, have left their stations, withdrawn themselves, and are gone to York; and being summoned to appear by an Order of the 30th of May, instead of obedience, return a refusal, by a slighting and scornful Letter, which hath been so adjudged both by your lordships and the house of commons.

“ My lords, the house of Commons hath likewise, upon the consideration and debate of this business, finding it so much to concern the safety of the kingdom and the very being of the parliament, passed this Vote:—‘ That the Departing of these Nine Lords from the parliament, without leave, after such time as both houses had declared, That the king, seduced by wicked counsel, intended to make war against the parliament; and their still continuing at York, notwithstanding their summons and command, is a high affront and contempt of both houses; and that the said lords, therein, did as much as in them lay, that the service of the parliament might be deserted, and are justly suspected to promote a war against the parliament.’—And the house, in further prosecution of their duty in this particular, and in pursuance of their Protestation, which obliges them to endeavour to bring to condign punishment all such high offenders against not only the privileges, but the very essence of parliament, have sent me up to impeach these Lords, and desire that speedy and exemplary justice may be done upon them.

“ And, accordingly, I do here, in the name of the knights, citizens and burgesses of the Commons house assembled in parliament, and in the name of all the Commons of England, impeach Spencer earl of Northampton, William earl of Devonshire, Henry earl of Dover, Henry earl of Monmouth, Charles lord Howard of Chariton, Robert lord Rich, Charles lord Grey of Ruthen, Thomas lord Coventry, and Arthur lord Capel, for these high Crimes and Misdemeanors following, viz. For that contrary to their duty, they being peers of the realm, and summoned by writ to attend the parliament; and contrary to an Order of the house of peers of the 9th of April last, and several other Orders, requiring the attendance of the members of that house; and after a Vote passed in both houses the 20th of May last, ‘ That the king, seduced by wicked counsel, intended to make war against the parliament, and that whosoever served or assisted him in that war, was adjudged a Traitor;’ did notwithstanding, afterwards, in the same month of May, contemptuously, having notice of the said Votes and Orders, withdraw themselves from the said house of peers, and repair to the city of York; where the preparations of the said war were, and yet are, in contrivance and agitation, they knowing of such preparations; and being, by an Order of the 30th May, duly summoned by the house of peers, to make their appearance before that house upon the 8th day of June instant, they refused to appear; and returned a scornful answer, by a Letter under their hands directed to the Speaker of the lords house, and remaining there upon record. For which Crimes and Misdemeanors, to the interruption of the proceedings of parliament and great affairs of the kingdom: tending to the dissolution of the parliament, and disturbance of the peace of the kingdom; I am commanded, in the name of the said Commons, to demand of your lordships, That the said Lords may be forthwith put to their Answer, and receive speedy and exemplary punishment, according to their demerits: The Commons saving to themselves liberty, at all times hereafter, to exhibit any other or further Impeachment or Accusation against the said Lords, or any of them.”

Ordered, That the impeached Lords should have notice to answer in 16 days time. And both the houses agreed to recal their joint committee which they had sent to the king at York.

THE SENTENCE against the LORDS that went to York.

Upon this Impeachment they afterwards passed this Judgment, viz.

July 20.

The Commons with their Speaker came this day to the bar, and demanded Judgment in their own names and in the names of all the Commons of England, against Spencer earl of Northampton, William earl of Devonshire, Henry earl of Dover, Henry earl of Monmouth, Charles lord Howard of Charlton, Robert lord Rich, Charles lord Grey of Ruthen, Thomas lord Coventry, Arthur lord Capel (members of this house) formerly impeached by them before the Lords in parliament.

At which time, the Lords being in their robes, the lord Kimbolton, Speaker pro tempore, pronounced the Sentence against the said Nine Lords, viz.

“Whereas Spencer earl of Northampton, William earl of Devonshire, Henry earl of Dover, Henry earl of Monmouth, Charles lord Howard of Charlton, Robert lord Rich, Charles lord Gray of Ruthen, Thomas lord Coventry, and Arthur lord Capel, were the 16th of June 1642, impeached by the knights, citizens and burgesses of the house of commons for these high crimes and misdemeanors following, viz. For that, contrary to their duty, they being peers of the realm, and summoned by writ to attend the parliament; and contrary to an Order of the house of peers of the 9th of April last, and several other Orders requiring the attendance of the members of that house, and after a Vote passed in both houses the 20th of May last, That the king, seduced by wicked counsel, intended to make war against the parliament; and that whosoever served or assisted him in that war, was adjudged a traitor, did notwithstanding afterwards in the same month of May contemptuously, having notice of the said Votes and Orders, withdraw themselves from the said house of peers, and repair to the city of York, where the preparations of the said war were, and yet are in contrivance and agitation, they knowing of such preparations: And being by an Order of the 30th of May duly summoned by the house of peers, to make their appearance before that house upon the 8th day of June last past, they refused to appear, and returned a slighting and scornful Answer by a Letter under their hands, directed to the Speaker of the lords house, and remaining there upon record. For which crimes and misdemeanors to the interruption of the proceedings of parliament, and great affairs of the kingdom, and tending to the dissolution of the parliament, and disturbance of the peace of the kingdom. The said knights citizens and burgesses do demand, That the said Spencer earl of Northampton, William earl of Devonshire, Henry earl of Dover, Henry earl of Monmouth, Charles lord Howard of Charlton, Robert lord Rich, Charles lord Grey of Ruthen, Thomas lord Coventry, and Arthur lord Capel, should be put to their answers, and receive exemplary punishment, according to their demerits. And whereas it was ordered upon the said 16th of June, That the said Spencer earl of Northampton, William earl of Devonshire, Henry earl of Dover, Henry earl of Monmouth, Charles lord Howard of Charlton, Robert lord Rich, Charles lord Grey of Ruthen, Thomas lord Coventry, and Arthur lord Capel, should appear before the lords in parliament, and make their several answers before their lordships on Monday the 27th of the said June to the said Impeachment, or else this house would proceed to Judgment against them by default. And whereas the said Spencer earl of Northampton, William earl of Devonshire, Henry earl of Dover, Henry earl of Monmouth, Charles lord Howard of Charlton, Robert lord Rich, Charles lord Grey of Ruthen, Thomas lord Coventry, and Arthur lord Capel, in contempt of this high court, have refused to appear and make answer to the said Impeachment.:

“The lords having taken the said Charge into their due consideration, do find the said Spencer earl of Northampton, William earl of Devonshire, Henry earl of Dover, Henry earl of Monmouth, Charles lord Howard of Charlton, Robert lord Rich, Charles lord Grey of Ruthen, Thomas lord Coventry, Arthur lord Capel, guilty of the crimes charged as aforesaid. And thereupon, and for their said contempt, this high court doth award and adjudge, 1. That Spencer earl of Northampton, William earl of Devonshire, Henry earl of Dover, Henry earl of Monmouth, Charles lord Howard of Charlton, Robert lord Rich, Charles lord Grey of Ruthen, Thomas lord Coventry, Arthur lord Capel, shall not sit or vote in the lords house during this present parliament. 2. That they shall not enjoy the privilege of parliament as members of parliament. 3. That they shall stand committed to the Tower during the pleasure of this house.”

170. The Trial of Colonel NATHANAEL FIENNES,* before a Council of War at St. Albans, for cowardly surrendering the City and Castle of Bristol: 19 CHARLES I. A. D. 1643. [Taken out of the Account given thereof by Mr. Prynn and Mr. Walker.]

COLONEL Fiennes having been taxed with a cowardly Surrender of Bristol, thought proper to justify himself by a set Speech in the House of Commons, and also by a printed Relation of the fact, in both which he desired that the affair might be examined in a Council of War, for which purpose he obtained an Order of the House. To this Relation Mr. Walker published an Answer, and Mr. Prynn, in a Book intitled "Rome's Masterpiece," stiles this action, "the most cowardly and unworthy Surrender of Bristol."

Hereupon Mr. Prynn and Mr. Walker were summoned to the Council of War, to make good what they had alledged against Colonel Fiennes. Mr. Prynn and Mr. Walker being thus made parties, petitioned his excellency the Lord General (earl of Essex) to appoint a proper time and place within London or Westminster for the Trial and Examination of this affair: They also drew up Articles of Impeachment against Col. Fiennes, and presented them, together with a Petition, to the House of Commons, who upon reading the Petition came to the following Resolutions:

Die Mercurii 15 Novembris 1643.

"The humble Petition of Clement Walker and William Prynn, esquires, concerning Mr. Nathanael Fiennes, and the Surrender of Bristol, was this day read in the House of Commons; and Articles of Accusation of the said Mr. Fiennes touching the Surrender of the said City of Bristol, and Castle, were this day likewise presented to the said House. A Letter from Mr. Prynn to Mr. Nathanael Fiennes was likewise read.

"Ordered by the House of Commons, That as they shall be careful that there shall be a fair and equal Trial of Mr. Nathanael Fiennes, so they will take the Petition of the Petitioners, and the Articles, after the Trial, into consideration insomuch as it shall concern my Lord General and the Council of War, and as it shall concern the privilege of parliament.

"Resolved, &c. That the Articles, entitled, 'Articles of Accusation and Impeachment against colonel Nathanael Fiennes, late governor of the City and Castle of Bristol, touching the dishonourable Surrender thereof to the Enemy, contrary to his trust and duty, by Clement Walker, and William Prynn esquires,' shall be now read. The said Articles and Impeachment were accordingly read.

"The Petition and Articles were signed 'Clement Walker, and William Prynn;' and they were both called in, and at the bar being demanded, whether the Names subscribed were of their own hand-writing, did avow the names to be of their own hand-writing, and did avow the said Petition and Articles.

"Ordered that a Copy of these Articles, attested under the Clerk's hand, be forthwith sent to my Lord General.

H. ELSYNGE Cler. Parl. D. Com."

Soon after these Resolutions, viz. on Thursday December 14, came on the Trial before the Council of War at St. Albans.

The Council being assembled in a room adjoining to the Town-hall, Mr. Prynn and Mr. Walker appeared there, when Dr. Dorislaus, Judge-Advocate of the Army, there demanded of them, whether they had any Articles of Impeachment drawn against Colonel Fiennes? To which Mr. Prynn replied, That he being a member of the House of Commons, they had exhibited their Articles to that house, who by Order had sent a Copy of them to his Excellency, upon which they were to proceed. Which the Advocate thereupon acknowledging, my lord Roberts, President of the Council of War, commanded him to read the said Order and Articles sent together with it. As soon as the Order was read, Mr. Prynn tendered a Copy of the Articles of Impeachment under Mr. Walker's and his own hands, agreeing with those delivered to the house, which he averred they were there ready to make good in each particular; desiring the Council to proceed upon them, because the other was but a copy which they had not subscribed, but this they now tendered an original; which was assented to.

Upon this Dr. Dorislaus the Judge-Advocate was commanded to read the Articles; but Mr. Prynn then perceiving the doors kept close, contrary to expectation, and all persons, auditors, but themselves alone, excluded; and fearing that by this means a door would be opened to misreport the Proceedings of this Trial, before the reading of the Articles made this request to the Council, that this hearing might be as public as the cause itself, and as that place could afford, the door set open, and none excluded; the rather, because himself and Mr. Walker (being no challengers, but challenged) were engaged in this prosecution, not in their own particular interests but the Republic's, and that by special Order of Parliament (the representative body of the kingdom) which had ordered 'a fair and equal Trial,' which they humbly conceived to be a free and open one, agreeable to the proceedings of parliament, and all other courts of justice in the realm; which stand open to all, and from whence no auditors are or ought to be excluded.

Colonel Fiennes opposing this motion, alledged, That we suspected the integrity of that court, as appeared by this request for an open Trial, and our endeavours to appeal therefrom by several Petitions to the parliament, for a Trial before the house in London or Westminster: whereas he had cast himself freely and clearly upon their justice, (which he no ways suspected) to whom the cognizance of such causes properly belonged; and therefore desired the hearing might be private, according to the proceedings used in such courts. Upon which Dr. Dorislau, Judge-Advocate, intervening, told the Prosecutors and Council that it was against the Stile and Course of a Court Martial to be public and open: therefore it might not be admitted upon any terms.

To which Mr. Prynn replied, That he no ways distrusts the justice or integrity of this honourable Council, for then he would not have appeared before them at this place and time to crave justice from them: That he was a common lawyer, and by his profession, his late Protestation, and Solemn Covenant, bound to maintain the fundamental laws of the Kingdom and Liberty of the Subject: That the members of this honourable Council, as well as himself, had not only taken the like solemn Protestation and Covenant, but also put themselves in arms, to maintain and defend the said Laws and Liberties of the Subject to the uttermost: That by the Laws and Statutes of the realm, all courts of justice ever have been, are, and ought to be held openly and publicly, not close like a Cabinet-Council; witness all courts of Justice at Westminster, and elsewhere, yea, all our Assizes and Sessions, wherein men, though indicted but for a private felony, murder, or trespass, (which nothing near concerns the republic so highly as this dishonourable Surrender of Bristol) have always open trials: And if such petty causes, then much more this of most general concernment to the whole realm, recommended to 'a fair trial,' by the Parliament itself, ought to be as open and public as possible, to satisfy both the parliament and people: That not only in courts of Common Law, but in the admiralty itself, and all other courts, proceeding by the rules either of the civil or canon law, the proceedings have ever been public, the courts open. And even in late proceedings by martial law before a Council of War, the Trials of Delinquents in England have been public, as appears by the Trials of Yeomans and Butcher at Bristol, before Colonel Fiennes himself, which were public; and by the Trial of Mr. Tomkins, Challoner, and others since, before a Council of War at the Guild-Hall of London, in the presence of both houses of parliament and the whole city, no comers being thence excluded. Wherefore this case being of the same public nature, and as much or more concerning the kingdom as theirs, ought to receive as public a Trial as theirs did.

To which Dorislau answered, That himself protested against the open Trial of Tomkins and Challoner, as a breach upon the Council of War's privileges, but was over-ruled therein, to give the parliament and city content: adding, that all councils of war in foreign parts were ever private, and ours now used not to be guided by common or statute laws, or the course of other courts, but by their own orders; and this being a Council, it was against the nature and constitution of it to be public.

To which Mr. Prynn rejoined: First, That there was as great cause to give the parliament, city, and kingdom satisfaction, in this, as in the other fore-named case, it being of as public concernment. Next, That we of England are not to be guided by foreign laws or precedents, but by our own domestic: That the common law, the statutes of the realm, and constant practice of all our other courts of justice, ought to regulate the proceedings of the Council of War, not the Council of War's to repeal and controul them: especially in an army which hath taken up arms, which are waged by the Parliament of purpose to defend the fundamental Laws and Subjects Liberties, not to thwart them: That it was both against the Laws and Subjects Liberty (as he humbly conceived) to deny any prosecutor or subject an open trial, and thus to chamber up or restrain justice intra privatos parietes, in any, much more in this public cause. That the Judge-Advocate could produce no one precedent for such a close Trial within our realm in any former age; and therefore he should make no such new precedent now. That all Cases of this nature touching the cowardly Surrendering of Towns and Castles, were in former times, tried only in full parliament, as appears by the cases of Gomines, Weston, the bishop of Norwich, and others, and that upon very good reason: since cases, which concern all, are fittest to be determined in that highest court which represents all the realm. That this Council of War had a double capacity and consideration; First, as a Council of War only, to deliberate of things necessary for the regulating and managing of military affairs; and in this regard it ought to be secret in all such debates, and not communicate their councils: But in this capacity we were not now before it. Secondly, as a Court of Justice, to proceed criminally against malefactors; and in this respect it ought (as he believed) to be public and open to all comers. To put this out of doubt, he would instance only in one example: The high court of parliament is both the supremest great general council for peace and war, and the highest court of justice in the realm: as it is a Council to consult, debate, or deliberate of the military or civil affairs of the kingdom, so it is always private, none but the members and officers of either house being admitted to their consultations or debates. But as it is a Court of Justice to punish malefactors, so the proceedings of both or either house are always open and public; as appears by the late Trial of the earl of Strafford in Westminster-Hall, and infinite other precedents of antient and present times. If then this supremest Council of all others, as it is a court of justice, stands ever open unto all, and the proceedings of it be always public, without any infringement of its privileges as a supreme Council of War and Peace; then certainly this honourable Council of War (inferior to it both in power and jurisdiction) as it is now a Court of Justice, may and ought to hold their proceedings and sessions publicly in this common cause, without any violation of its privileges as a Council. What therefore the peers in parliament once answered the prelates in a case of Bastardy, he hoped this honourable Council would now answer the Advocate in this Case of our Impeachment. 'Nolumus leges Angliæ mutare, quæ hucusque usitatæ sunt et approbatæ *.' and so allow us a public Trial, to satisfy both the Parliament and people, whose eyes are fixed on it; else, if it should be private, they would be apt to report, 'it was huddled up in a corner.' For which innocent expression, as we intended it, (St. Albans and this Council, in respect of London and the Parliament being but a Corner) so much exception was taken in the house against our Petition. In fine, he alledged, That colonel Fiennes himself, who had made such public professions of his innocency, both before the House of Commons, his Excellency, and the world, in printed Speeches, Relations, and Letters, had most cause to desire, and least reason to decline an open trial, 'since truth and innocency seek no Corners.' And his honour, his honesty now openly charged, could not otherwise than openly be discharged; no Trial being public enough for him who presumes his innocency able to endure, and professeth a desire to bring it to the touch, that it may be cleared. And if he should now decline an open Trial, after so many public bravadoes in London and elsewhere, it would draw upon him a just suspicion of guilt in most mens opinions, since no man 'fleeth the light but he whose works are evil.'

Upon this, the lord Roberts demanded of Mr. Prynne, what he meant by a public Trial? Whether only the reading of the Articles, Answers, producing of Witnesses, and managing the Evidence to make good the Articles; or else, the council's private debates of the cause among themselves, after the hearing?

To which Mr. Prynne replied, That he meant only the former of these, the Judges debates many times in cases of difficulty being private after hearings, till they come to deliver their Resolutions in public.—Hereupon all were commanded to withdraw; and then one of the Council, after a short Debate, was sent to his Excellency to know his pleasure, whether the Trial should be public, as the prosecutors desired, or private? Who returned answer, that it should be private; with which Resolution the prosecutors (being called in) were acquainted.

Mr. Prynne upon this Answer desired, that he might put in writing the Reasons he had suddenly offered to the Council for an open Trial, that so they might be presented to his Excellency; for that, as he conceived, he had not been made acquainted with them, who upon consideration of them, might happily alter his Resolution.—Upon which motion, the Council ordered the Judge-Advocate and prosecutors to repair to his Excellency, to acquaint him with the former Reasons by word of mouth, which they did very briefly: But the Advocate informing his Excellency, that it was against the Privileges of the Council that the Trial should be open; he answered that he would not infringe the Privileges of the Council, whom he thought the prosecutors seemed to distrust by demanding a public Trial.

The manner of the Trial being thus settled, the Articles of Impeachment were first read, and then his Answer delivered in writing unto them.

ARTICLES OF ACCUSATION AND IMPEACHMENT against Colonel NATHANAEL FIENNES, late Governor of the City and Castle of Bristol, touching his dishonourable Surrender thereof to the Enemy, contrary to his Trust and Duty; exhibited by CLEMENT WALKER and WILLIAM PRYNN, esqrs. in behalf of the Commonwealth of England.

1. Imprimis, That he, the said colonel Nathanael Fiennes, did suddenly apprehend, imprison, and remove colonel Thomas Essex, late Governor of the said City and Castle, from his government there, upon pretence that he intended to deliver up the same (not then fully fortified, or sufficiently provided to withstand any long siege) into the hands of the common Enemies of the kingdom and parliament, contrary to the trust reposed in him; and that hereupon, he, the said colonel Fiennes, obtained the Government of the said City and Castle for himself, and undertook to defend and keep the same, to the uttermost extremity, against the said Enemy, for the use of the King and Parliament, and not to surrender the said City and Castle, or either of them to the said Enemies, or to any other person whatsoever, without the previous consent, and order of the Parliament.

2. Item, That the said Colonel, soon after he became Governor of the said City and Castle, did, by martial law, apprehend, condemn, and execute some chief citizens thereof; namely, Mr. Yeomans, Mr. Butcher, and others, only for intending to deliver up the same to prince Rupert, when he came first before Bristol, (not then fully fortified and stored) though they did not actually surrender the same.

3. Item, That he, the said Colonel, did put the parliament, kingdom, country, and city to a vast expence, in fortifying and furnishing it, and the Castle thereof, with forts, sconces, cannons, ammunition, arms, victuals, provisions of all sorts, and with garrisons sufficiently able to defend and maintain the same for three months space or more, against all the power of the enemies, that might or did come against the same; and did likewise promise and undertake to divers gentlemen and inhabitants thereof, to defend the same for so long space or more, in case they should be besieged.

4. Item, That he, the said Colonel, notwithstanding the premisses, when the enemy came before the said City and Castle, with no extraordinary forces or ammunition able to force the same, and besieged them not above three days at the most, did, before ever the enemy had taken any of the out-forts, or sconces about the same, or had made so much as the least battery or assault upon the walls of the said City or Castle, or any mine or breach into any of the forts thereof, contrary to his former trust, promises, duty, and the honour of a soldier, most dishonourably, cowardly, and traitorously delivered up the said City and Castle, with all the prisoners, cannons, ammunition, artillery, arms, military provisions, magazines, victuals therein, and the very colours too, without and against the consent of the Parliament, or his Excellency their general, into the hands and power of prince Rupert, and other common enemies of the Kingdom and Parliament, to the extraordinary great danger, dishonour, loss and prejudice of the whole Kingdom and Parliament, the evil example of other governors and towns, the loss of most of the Western Parts of England, and great encouraging, enriching and strengthening of the said enemies, both by land and sea; and that upon very dishonourable Articles, to which he was no ways necessitated, and had no care to see them punctually performed by the enemy, when complaint thereof was made to him for relief; to the great prejudice and impoverishing of the inhabitants and garrison-soldiers there.

5. Item, That the said Colonel, without the privity or consent of any general Council of War, did, of his own head, send out for a Parley with the enemy, when divers officers and soldiers advised and persuaded the contrary, and would have repulsed the enemy, and defended the said City and Castle to the utmost: that the surrendering up of the same was principally occasioned by the earnest persuasion, advice, and cowardice of the said Governor, contrary to his trust and duty to keep the same. And that the said Governor, when as the Council of War unanimously voted upon the Parley, that it was neither safe nor honourable for them to depart the town, unless they might march thence with half their arms at least, and with their colours; thereupon, after some private conference with colonel Gerrard, one of the enemy's Commissioners, in the garden, without the privity, and contrary to the Vote, of the said Council, did make and insert the last Article, that they should leave all their cannon and ammunition, with their arms and colours, behind them; and returning to them out of the garden, told them plainly, that they must now deliver up all to the enemy, but what was expressed in the Articles he then produced, and leave their arms and colours behind them, to the said Council's and Soldiers great discontent. And whereas by those very Articles, the said Town and Castle were not to be delivered up till nine of the clock the next morning, nor the enemies to enter them till the soldiers, and other gentlemen were marched out; the said Governor was so over-hasty to surrender up the same, that he delivered them up to the enemy above one hour or more before the hour agreed on; and suffered the enemies to enter and possess them before the soldiers were marched out: whereby many of the soldiers were pillaged in the Castle and Town, and divers of the inhabitants best affected to the Parliament, were plundered before the hour of surrender came, to their great loss and undoing.

6. Item, That he the said Colonel, during the three days siege of the said City and Castle, did not give any such encouragement to the soldiers and officers (who bravely defended the same, and slew near 1,000 of the enemy's best men, by his own printed Relation, with the loss only of eight persons) as his duty and place required, and they expected, which much discouraged them: And that when a small number of the enemy, not 200 (who gave themselves for lost) had entered the Line of Communication at the weakest place, which was worst guarded, on Wednesday morning the 26th of July last, being bravely repulsed by the soldiers with great loss in all places else; he the said Colonel, for two hours space or more (during which time no more enemies entered or approached the said breach) both neglected and refused to command or encourage the officers and soldiers who offered to beat them out in due time, as he was advised and pressed to do by captain Bagnall, lieut. col. Davison, and divers others, who would have undertaken that service; and instead of encountering the said enemies (against whom the very women offered to go on with their children to dead the cannon, if the soldiers were afraid, rather than the City and Castle should be yielded) called off the soldiers and officers from the line and out-works, that the enemy might the better enter them without resistance, upon pain of death, much against their wills, who should and would have hindered and repulsed the enemies; and discouraged and hindered such as were forwards to have cut them off, sounding a parley when the enemy were so beaten, that they threw down their arms and cried for quarter: inso-much that divers of the soldiers and inhabitants cried out they were betrayed, and some of the soldiers brake their arms in discontent, swearing they would serve the Parliament no more.

7. Item, That the said Governor, notwithstanding his promises to defend the said City and Castle, and dispute it to the last, had yet a real intention to deliver up the same to the enemy before ever they were besieged by them, and no thought at all to defend them to the uttermost, or till they might be relieved by his Excellency; as appears by the premised Articles, by the said Governor's refusal to send the prisoners, formerly taken, out of the said Castle, before the enemy approached, when moved to it by sir William Waller; saying to him and others, that he would detain those prisoners still there, to make his own conditions, and composition the better with the enemy, if they came before it; by his commanding Mr. Hassard, the master-gunner there, to lay aside a reserve of 30 barrels of powder, with match and bullet answerable, to which when he was reduced he would then treat with the enemy; (which he did long before he was reduced to this large reserve) by other speeches to the like effect; and by his moving sir William Waller to depart from Bristol before it was besieged, who otherwise would have adventured his life in its defence.

8. Item, That he the said Governor, when he surrendered the said Castle to the enemy, had at least 60 barrels of powder therein, besides what was in the City and Forts, being above 20 more than were in Gloucester when it was first besieged, five hundred cannon-shot, fifty great granadoes, fourteen hundred weight of match or more, great store of musket-bullets, and tin to make more; a match-maker, a bullet-maker, with materials to make match and bullets; and all manner of provisions and victuals, sufficient to maintain 1,000 men for three or four months space at least; eleven cannons therein mounted; besides 44 cannons mounted in the City and Forts: all which were surrendered to the enemy before any battery or assault made against the said Castle, though he had men more than enough by his own relation to defend it, contrary to his promise made to divers inhabitants of the said City, best affected to the Parliament, to defend the same to the uttermost, and dispute every foot thereof with the enemy, and to keep it, or to lay his bones therein; who thereupon sent their estates with provisions for them and their families, for three months space or more, into the said Castle, where the said Colonel promised to secure and defend the same, most of which their estates were there seized on by the enemy to their undoing; by reason the said Colonel admitted the enemy into the said Castle, and delivered up the keys thereof unto them, before the hour agreed on in the Articles, such was his extraordinary haste to quit the same.

9. Item, That the said Colonel, to aggravate this his dishonourable action, hath presumed to justify the same, not only before the honourable House of Commons, by word of mouth, but likewise before the whole kingdom, and world, in printed relations and letters, wherein he hath laid an extraordinary great bléish both upon the honourable Houses of Parliament, and his Excellency the earl of Essex, their Lieut. General, by publishing in print, that had he manfully held out the said City and Castle to the last, yet he could not have expected any relief from them in six or eight weeks space at the least; when as Gloucester, since besieged with far greater force than Bristol, was yet relieved by them in less than half the time (as Bristol doubtless might and would have been) and held out a full month's siege or more, as Bristol might have done: though he the said Colonel, to add to his former offence, and hinder or anticipate the relief of Gloucester, that it might be lost as Bristol was, gave out in speeches to some members of the House of Commons and other, and namely to master Samuel Browne, and master John Sedgwick, that he would lose his head, or be hanged, if Gloucester could or would hold out three days siege, if the enemy once came before it, or words to the like effect.

10. Item, That the said City and Castle were so cowardly and unworthily delivered up to the enemies, that they have since published in print, and given out in speeches, 'That the said Colonel Fiennes did bestow the same upon his majesty;' that 'they were delivered up to them beyond their expectation, and that they could not have taken the same had it been defended by the Governor;' who eventually at least, if not intentionally, did but strongly fortify, and plentifully store the same with all manner of provisions to make it tenable, at the kingdom's and the country's extraordinary expence, to render up the same to the enemy with greater advantage to them, and far more prejudice and damage to the commonwealth, as soon as it was made defensible.

CLEMENT WALKER.
WILLIAM PRYNE.

The ANSWER of Col. NATHANAEL FIENNES, to the ARTICLES exhibited by CLEMENT WALKER, and WILLIAM PRYNE.

1. To the first Article, colonel Fiennes denieth, That he did suddenly apprehended, imprisonment, and remove from the government of the City and Castle of Bristol, col. Thomas Essex, the Governor thereof, upon pretence that he intended to deliver up the same into the hands of the common enemies of the Kingdom and Parliament; or upon any pretended cause whatsoever, or that col. Thomas Essex was ever governor of the said City or Castle; but doth acknowledge that soon after his coming to Bristol, by an express order from his Excellency, written all with his own hand, he did send unto him col. Thomas Essex, who at that time commanded a regiment in that City; and as he is well assured that his Excellency had very good cause to send that order to him, although he knew nothing before it came unto him; so he did not put it in execution, but upon mature deliberation and advice with most of the wisest and best affected gentlemen to the Parliament, and of the best quality in the town and country, and upon good cause appearing unto him; and that for the security and preservation of that City, which in all probability could not otherwise at that time have been secured. And he doth further deny, that thereupon or at any time after, he did seek or desire the government of that City for himself: But on the contrary, that he did seek and endeavour to be freed from that employment, and that not in compliment, but really, earnestly, and frequently, as he is ready to make good by proof. And lastly, he doth deny, That ever he undertook to the Parliament, or my Lord General, to make good that City or Castle; or that ever he had any charge of the Castle as a fort, or otherwise than he had of any church or house in the City; But on the contrary, That he did from time to time declare, that he could not keep the City in the condition it was, and that it would certainly fall into the hands of the enemy, unless better provision were made for it; and that he would not be answerable for it, unless certain propositions which he sent to the Parliament, or something equivalent thereunto might be granted unto him, which he could never obtain. And further he affirmeth, That he never did undertake not to surrender the said City or Castle, both or either of them without the previous consent and order of the Parliament, or that the Parliament ever did, or in reason and justice could require any such undertaking of him, or that he ever did or would have undertaken it. All which he is ready to make good by proof.

2. To the second Article, col. Fiennes doth acknowledge that not many days after his sending away col. Essex, by the blessing of God upon his care and vigilance, he discovered and defeated a wicked Conspiracy, plotted between divers inhabitants of the City of Bristol and some of the officers of col. Essex his regiment, for the delivering up of the City into the hands of prince Rupert, and other common enemies of the Kingdom and Parliament; and thereupon apprehending and imprisoning divers of the Conspirators, and thereby disappointing the design of the enemy, he was a means under God, at that time, of preserving that City; for which he received public thanks by a Letter from both Houses of Parliament, which he hath to shew: and after, by virtue of a Commission from his Excellency, by order of both Houses of Parliament, he called a Council of War, whereof himself was appointed President by the said Commission, and by that Council of War divers of the Conspirators, after due Trial, were condemned, and the Sentence of Death passed upon them, which Sentence col. Fiennes did forhear to put in execution till such time as he had acquainted the House of Parliament, and his Excellency therewith, and the grounds thereof; and then by his Excellency's command, according to a Vote of the House of Commons, he did execute two of the principal Conspirators, (viz. M. Yeomans and M. Bucher) notwithstanding the importunity and most earnest intercession of the mayor and aldermen, and divers of the City to the contrary, and the threats and desperate Speeches given out by the Malignants, although it so happened at that time, that a considerable strength was drawn forth of that town to the assistance of sir William Waller; insomuch that some ill-affected persons in the town conceiving us so weak that the Malignants were able to master us, had procured his majesty to send a trumpeter with a letter from himself to the City, to stir them up, and command them to rise and rescue the said Conspirators, and to kill and slay all those that should oppose them therein: yet for all this col. Fiennes, in obedience to the Parliament and his Excellency, did put the Sentence in Execution, and that at midday, and in the middle of the town; in all which he conceiveth that he discharged his duty faithfully, temperately, and resolutely.

3. To the third Article, he answereth, That notwithstanding, that without any, or very little help at all, by his own proper industry, and incessant travail and pains, he endeavoured to fortify and furnish that place in such sort that it might be in posture of defence, and that without troubling the Parliament at all; he had well nigh brought a line or rampart of earth round about the town; whereupon there were some small works or redoubts, which in this Charge are called forts and sconces; and that he had procured some proportion of powder, artillery, guns, granadoes, and other provisions, whereof he found the town very much destitute; yet he denies that there ever was, or that he ever did, or could raise a sufficient garrison to defend and maintain that City against all the power of the enemy, that might or did come against it, for the space of three months or more, or for three days; or that he did undertake or promise to any gentlemen or inhabitants of the same, to keep it for so long space, in case that they should be besieged.

4. To the fourth, He denieth, that he deliver up the City or Castle of Bristol, with all the arms therein; or that he did deliver the same up, with all the prisoners, cannons, ammunition, &c. against the consent of the Parliament, or his Excellency their General; or that he did deliver them up traitorously, cowardly, or dishonourably, or contrary to any former promise of his, or contrary to his trust or duty, to the extraordinary great danger, dishonour, loss, or prejudice of the whole Kingdom and Parliament; and the evil example of other governors, and towns, upon dishonourable Articles, to which he was no ways necessitated; or, that he had no care to see the Articles agreed upon, punctually performed by the enemy, when complaint was made to him for relief, to the great prejudice and impoverishment of the inhabitants and garrison-soldiers there: But on the contrary, is ready to justify, that over and above his former good services, in sending away col. Essex without disorder or blood-shed, in discovering and preventing that wicked Conspiracy, and preserving the City thereby, notwithstanding a Proclamation set forth of purpose by the king, wherein he offered Pardon to all, both soldiers, citizens, and others, except himself, within the City of Bristol, at that time, in case they would peaceably yield up the said City; And over and above, his great pains and care to put the City in as good a posture of defence as possibly he could; and notwithstanding, he never undertook to make good the City or Castle, or either of them, declaring that he could not, nor would not undertake it; and that also he could never obtain a sufficient garrison for the defence of that place for any considerable time, or monies to maintain it, or means to raise it; Yet he did defend that Town and Castle to the utmost point, not only of duty, but also of honour, that any soldier could, or ought to have maintained the same: And that he surrendered them upon good and honourable conditions, in respect to the state he was in: And that he did take all the care that any Governor could or ought to do, that they might be punctually performed; and that the breaking of them was not any fault of his, but principally by the failing and unfaithfulness of the enemy, and partly by the disobedience and disorder of some of his soldiers: all which he is ready to justify in every particular. Notwithstanding that after the line or principal rampart of the Town was entered, and the enemy lodged within it, he did surrender the Town and Castle, with all the prisoners, cannons, ammunition, artillery, military-provisions, magazines, victuals, and part of the arms therein, before the enemy had taken any of the out-forts about the same, or had made the least assault or battery upon the walls of the City, (which had none at all on that part against which the enemy then lay, nor at all defensible in any part on that side the Town) or upon the walls of the Castle, or any mine or breach into any of the forts thereof: All which, nor the Castle, could not prevent the enemy being lodged in the suburbs by Froom-Gate, from immediately entering the Town by force. And neither could, nor ought to have been kept in the condition that things then stood, to the prejudice of the City and Garrison, and the surrender thereof upon terms of composition, but ought to have been surrendered together with it, as they were by the constant practice and policy of war in all places, the principles of justice and honesty, and the rules of wisdom and discretion, for the honour, profit, and best advantage of the kingdom and parliament.

5. To the fifth Article he answereth, That he did not of his own head, without the privy of any Council of War, send out for a Parley with the enemy, when the officers and soldiers advised and dissuaded the contrary, and would have repulsed the enemy, and defended the City to the uttermost: and that the surrendering of the Town was not principally, or not at all could possibly be, by his earnest persuasion or advice, nor that it was by his advice or cowardice, contrary to his trust and duty to keep the same: But on the contrary he was advised to the Treaty by the far major part, if not by the unanimous consent of his whole Council of War, and of the gentlemen there present, unless it were Mr. Strode (who also, to the remembrance of many present, was not heard to give any dissent when the question was put; and all that he said, tended only to a deferring, rather than a denial of the Treaty, without any good reason, that he either then did, or yet can give for his opinion;) and that by many expressions and other clear evidences, it did, at the time of the first proposition of the Treaty, appear, that col. Fiennes had for his principal aim therein, the honour and advantage of those by whom he was intrusted. And he doth deny that when the Council of War unanimously voted upon the Parley, that it was neither safe nor honourable for them to depart the Town, unless they might march thence with half their arms at least, and their colours, he did thereupon offer some private conference with col. Gerrard, one of the enemies Commissioners, in the garden; at which, without the privy, and contrary to the Vote of the said Council, he did make and insert the said Article, that they should leave all their cannons, and ammunition, with their arms and colours behind them, and returning to them out of the garden, told them plainly; that they should now deliver up all to the enemy, or that it was expressed in the Articles he then produced, that they should leave their arms and colours behind them, to the said Council's and soldiers great discontent: But on the contrary, he doth affirm, and will justify, that, he bid the soldiers make conditions for themselves, the gentlemen of the country for themselves, and the citizens for themselves, which was done accordingly: And after, when upon the treaty the gentlemen of the country and citizens were satisfied with their demands; Colonel Fiennes was the first, and the chief, not the only man that took exception at the condition for the soldiers; the Commissioners of the enemy standing upon it, that they would allow only the officers their horses and arms; and he on the other side standing as peremptorily for all their horses and arms, and colours: whereupon he was about to break off the Parley, and the Commissioners of the enemy ready to return to the army, but by the earnest persuasion of the mayor and citizens, the Commissioners of the enemy were persuaded to walk into the garden, and to leave us at the Council of War to debate amongst ourselves concerning that point of the arms and colours: Whereupon col. Fiennes stood very stiffly, till at length he was persuaded by the Council of War to rest satisfied with half arms, and our colours, if we could obtain them; whereunto col. Fiennes expressed a great deal of resolution to adhere, and he had done it to the end, had the soldiers upon their guards done their parts as well as he did; but returning into the garden with this resolution, many of his officers following him, and it being free for any to enter, openly and before the mayor and divers of his officers, he began to insist upon his former propositions for all his arms and colours; whereupon they yielded that our troopers should have their horses and swords, and then col. Fiennes descended to the propositions of half arms and our colours, but being not able to obtain it, he yielded so far to the intreaty of the mayor and citizens, that he would not break upon that point of his own head without the advice of his officers; and thereupon withdrawing into a room with all his officers, that there were present, he debated the matter a good while with them, and could not be brought to yield thereunto, till six or seven of his officers came out of the town, and told him, that they could not get six men a-piece of their companies together, they ran so fast over the key to the enemy: Whereupon, although with much reluctancy, he was content to yield to that condition, for fear of putting ourselves into a far worse condition; and after calling in the Commissioners of the enemy, we fell to set down all the Articles in writing, there being liberty to any man to take his exceptions upon the penning of them: At which time captain Birch coming in, and desiring a more clear expression for the citizens and inhabitants to have liberty to carry away their estates, which col. Gerrard bogglug at, colonel Fiennes rose up, and with great earnestness protested, 'That he would rather die than not provide for his friends and their estates, as well citizens as soldiers;' whereupon col. Gerrard consented to it: and it was further expressed, that they should have three days liberty, to resolve whether they would stay or depart with their goods; and the last Article was no new Article inserted at the latter end, but only a clear expression of what was before agreed upon, and fully contained in the first Article, as by the Article itself doth appear. And lastly, col. Fiennes doth deny, that he was so over-hasty to surrender up the Town and Castle, that he delivered them up to the enemy one hour or more before the time agreed, or that he suffered the enemy to enter and possess them before the soldiers were marched out. But on the contrary, that he gave order to all his officers that came to him for orders, to keep their soldiers upon their guards, until one hour before we were to march out of the Town: at which time having given order to his captain lieutenant Stokes with his company to stay in the Castle, and to keep it till prince Rupert sent to demand it, and then to deliver it up unto him according to the Articles, he gave order to the rest of his officers, to draw their men into the marsh, whither he did repair unto them, and about nine of the clock marched out with the greatest part of them to the gate which leadeth to Warminster, where he stayed within the Town for an hour or two after: But the enemy did enter the Town, contrary to their faith, and the Articles agreed upon, an hour or more before nine of the clock, about the time that we were drawing off to a rendezvous, and fell upon our men, disarming, dismounting, and pillaging them, by means whereof, and by no fault of col. Fiennes, many, both soldiers and citizens, were pillaged and plundered.

6. To the sixth, he acknowledgeth and owneth the Clause mentioned to be in his printed Relation, and that the enemy having entered in one place on Wednesday morning the 26th of July, were valiantly repulsed in all places else with great loss; but doth deny, that to his knowledge any women made any such offers as in the Articles is expressed, or that he should have thought it a fit means to dead the cannon bullets, or that any such speeches were given out, or any such actions done by any inhabitants or soldiers to his knowledge, as that they brake their arms, and said they were betrayed; or that he would have suffered them unpunished, if he had heard or known any such thing: and for the rest of the Articles he denieth it in the whole, and in every part thereof; and on the contrary affirmeth, and is ready to prove, that during the whole siege, he did both by his words and actions encourage the soldiers and officers to do their duty, thanking some, praising others, stirring up others, sending them bread, wine, victuals, and giving them monies, and promising them further rewards, but especially by his own example, going constantly the round at all hours of the night, sometimes in the beginning of the night, and sometimes in the latter end thereof, and repairing upon all occasions to the places of most danger, and standing most usually with his troop, in the place of greatest danger, and by all other ways and means that could be expected from any Governor. And he further affirmeth, that the place where the enemy entered, was not a likely place for the enemy to enter by, was weakest assaulted; could not have been better guarded without drawing forces from other places, which were in more apparent danger and more strongly assaulted, was more strongly guarded than some other places that were more strongly assaulted, and yet the enemy repulsed, and that the enemy might have been in all probability repulsed there also, had the guards of foot or horse that were to second them done their duty, as well as they did elsewhere, or had col. Stephens or his major sent down some foot together with the Governor's troop when they went to charge the enemy, out of the men that were under their command upon the next adjoining guards, which they might and ought to have done, and could only well do it. And he further affirms, that when the enemy first entered they were at the least two hundred; that soon after they dug down the rampart of earth all flat for their horse and foot to enter, and that then immediately they possessed themselves of walls, houses, Essex-fort, and other places of advantage; that within one hour's space at the farthest, after the entry of the first, there entered at least 300 foot more, and a regiment of horse with ordnance, and after both horse and foot entered as fast as they could; that col. Fiennes, so soon as he had notice of the entry of the enemy at that place, made all the haste he could to repair thither, but that before he got thither, his men were come off the lines for half a mile together, and his own troop (unto which he was going up) beaten off also: that afterwards both by his commands and his own person, he used the best, the safest, the speediest, and the most effectual means that any then could, or yet can shew for the securing of the city, the safeguard of his soldiers, and for the repulsing of the enemy, but divers of his soldiers did disobey, and other of the soldiers and commanders did refuse to yield ready obedience to his commands, especially maj. Lewes, to whom he was constrained to send an order upon pain of death to yield obedience before he would do it; and by his and others disobedience, the service was hindered and retarded, that a sally could not be made so seasonably as otherwise it might have been, and with better success than it was, although when it was made, it was performed with such resolution, that it gave a stop to the enemy, who otherwise had, in all probability, entered the rest of the Town by force, being already possessed of two of the greatest works thereof; and col. Fiennes did not cause any Parley to be sounded till such time as his men were beaten back again with fresh regiments of foot and horse brought down upon them, but was still ready to have seconded them with his own company, had there been any hopes to have beaten them off, and till such time as going round the Town with his Lieutenant Colonel, he spake with great earnestness to all his officers that he could meet to get their men to their colours again; commanding them to repair to the marsh, and that there should be victuals, and twelve pence a man given them, which accordingly was given to as many as came together, but could never get together, or to their guards, two hundred, of ten or twelve hundred of the men that were on that side the Town: whereupon by the advice of his Council of War, he sent forth a Parley; all which he is ready to prove.

To the seventh, He answereth, That notwithstanding he declared that he could not keep the Town with the force he had in it, yet he denieth that he had a real intention to deliver up the same to the enemy before ever it was besieged by them, or that he had no thought at all to defend it to the uttermost, or till it might be relieved by his Excellency, or that he refused to send the prisoners, formerly taken, out of the Castle before the enemy approached, or that he commanded Mr. Hasard the master-gunner, to lay aside a reserve of thirty barrels of powder, with a purpose to treat when he was reduced thereunto; or that he moved sir William Waller to depart from Bristol; or that sir W. Waller would otherwise have adventured his life in its defence; or that it doth appear by any of the premised Articles, or any speeches of his concerning the prisoners, or a reserve of powder, of sir W. Waller's departure from Bristol, or any other speeches of his, that he had not a real intention to keep the Town and Castle to the uttermost, that in honour, wisdom, and faithfulness, unto those by whom he was intrusted, he ought to have done: but that the contrary doth appear by very many deeds and speeches of his, and by those very particulars instanced in, so far, and in such a manner as they were spoken and done by him. And he further affirmeth, that he did often move sir W. Waller to free him from the care and danger of so many prisoners, but could never obtain it; but when he thought neither Town nor Castle safe enough to keep them, he spoke to him to send them away to a place of more safety, but neither shewed him the means how to do it, nor offered to take any of the most considerable with him, although he had an absolute command over them at all times, whensoever he pleased to signify his pleasure concerning the discharge or disposal of them, as he did discharge maj. gen. Bret, and divers others (whereof some led on those that assaulted us at Bristol.) That col. Fiennes spoke to sir Arthur Haslerigge, when he took leave of him, to take some of the prisoners away with him in the ship, but he refused it: that he spake to capt. Birch (who seemed forward to undertake such a matter) to see if he could find means to send them away speedily and safely by sea, and that he would contribute his best assistance thereunto, but he also gave it over: That he commanded Hasard the master-gunner, when the enemy was approaching the town, to lay apart a reserve of thirty barrels of powder, and to keep it private, that every man might be careful to husband that which appeared, and to make no waste thereof; and that in case he was forced to retreat into the Castle before he came to Treaty, he might have wherewith to defend himself: but Mr. Hasard did so overdo his command, that though afterward at several times he commanded him to give a perfect account of all his ammunition to his brother col. John Fiennes, who was to have the chief care thereof over him, yet he did conceal from him this reserve; insomuch that when col. John Fiennes was required to declare at the Council of War, what store of ammunition was left, he informed us that he had taken a particular account thereof, and that there was not above three or four hundred weight of match, and between twenty and thirty barrels of powder (as indeed he knew of no more;) and that they were spending of that too: whereby (as by like speeches of the master-gunner to the like purpose) col. Fiennes did believe he had broken up his reserve, and that he was spending of that also, and that there was not above twenty barrels of powder left; and did not certainly know the contrary, till such time as he was come to London, and had particularly informed himself by Mr. Hasard of the truth: and that the enemy knew not of more powder in the Castle than twenty barrels, for divers weeks after the surrender of the Town, he is able to prove. And lastly, he doth affirm, that sir W. Waller was so far from needing to be stirred up to depart the Town, that on Friday, the day after he came to Bristol, commanding some of his officers to draw forth some of their men into the marsh, and they conceiving that it would not be possible to do it till the next morning, he replied, that then it might be too late: and the next day drawing them out upon Durdam Down, where col. Fiennes there asked, in case the enemy should advance towards Bristol, how he would dispose of himself and his horse, he answered, that he must retreat. And it is evident in many respects, that it was necessary for him to draw out of the Town; for it is most likely, that had he not done it, the Town would have been left sooner than it was, and the dishonour and loss of the state been greater; and that if he had, when he first came to Bristol, followed the advice given him by col. Fiennes and his officers, or done according as he promised col. Fiennes, when he took his leave of him, he would have done better service, both for the preservation of that city, and the rest of England, than by the course he took: all which he is ready to prove and justify.

8. To the eighth Article, he doth deny that there were sixty barrels of powder in the Castle when it was surrendered, or that he did promise to any inhabitant of the City to defend the same, but in case he was forced to retreat into it; nor any longer than he thought fit, for the honour and best advantage of them by whom he was intrusted; or that there was in it all manner of provision and victuals sufficient to maintain 1,000 men for three months space; or that he delivered up the keys of the Castle before the hour agreed on in the Articles; or that by reason thereof many inhabitants of the City, or any other person whatsoever, had their estates which they brought into the Castle seized upon; But on the contrary he affirmeth, that there were but 30 barrels in the Castle when it was surrendered, and that was 30 more than either he or his Council of War knew of before they came to London; and that therefore he was less able to defend the Town four days, or the Castle 14 days, than Gloucester might with the like proportion be defended 24 days; That there were about 11 cannons mounted in and about the Castle, and that there was need of more, to supply the many defects and universal weakness thereof; but that there was never any one amongst them all, or in the Town, fit for battery, or to hinder the approach of the enemy in any effectual way; but he had sent to London for 3 to that purpose, and that they were at hand, but not yet come to him; that although he had no charge of the Castle, more than of any house in the Town, nor was obliged to hold it further than he judged it for the good of the public, yet he did resolve to make use of it for the advantage of the state, and of their friends and soldiers; as also he did, by making the terms of composition the better by the countenance thereof, which was the best use he could make of it in that condition he was in, and would have been as ready to have done it by the defence thereof, if he had been forced thereunto, or that it had been fit in wisdom and justice to have taken this course, as if succours had been at hand, and in some other cases it might have been. And for this, and divers other reasons, he did take some pains, and was at some cost, for the strengthening of it, and furnishing of it with great and small shot, and granadoes, and provision of victuals, and other necessaries, whereof what was the quantity of each sort he is uncertain; but is certain, that none was employed but where there was occasion, nor should have been spared, if there had been occasion to use them; but doth affirm, that he never gave order to the commissary of victuals, to make provision of victuals for more than 1,000 men for a month, wherein he aimed at a double proportion to what he thought he should have need of; or that he ever hoped to keep the Castle for more than a fortnight, or three weeks at the farthest: That he was content, for divers good reasons, to suffer the best affected persons to carry into the Castle some of their principal goods, but was very angry when he saw them offer to carry in their lumber, and straitly forbade it. That a special Article was made for them that carried in their goods, that they might have free liberty to carry them out at leisure: That the citizens themselves, being divers of them upon the guard in the Castle, that had their goods there, made such haste to get them out on Thursday morning, that leaving their guards, and major Wood, and others that had charge of the soldiers in the Castle, suffering their soldiers to go from their guards without and against order, the passage into the Castle was so thronged, that none could pass in nor out, and by that means some of the prisoners got loose in the Castle, and grew disorderly, and some of the enemies got in before the time: but colonel Fiennes coming thither, and seeing this disorder, with his sword in his hand beat back the people that thronged the draw-bridge, drew up the bridge, and got some of his soldiers to their guards again, put their arms into their hands, and had drawn all his soldiers into it, had he not received news while he was doing this, that the enemy was broken into the Town, contrary to the Articles, and were dismounting, disarming, and pillaging our men; Whereupon he gave order unto his captain-lieutenant Stokes, to keep the Castle with his company, and to deliver it up to prince Rupert when he sent to demand it; and was forced himself to go into the marsh with captain Terringham, one of the enemies hostages, with him, for the safeguard of his soldiers, both horse and foot, and of his friends in the Town, as is expressed in answer to the fifth Article. And lastly, He doth affirm, and will justify, That the Castle was in no sort tenable, neither in respect of the strength thereof, or of the provision wherewith it was furnished, for one quarter of the space, wherein possibly he could have had succours; nor for half the quarter of the time, where, in possibility, he could have expected them: And that if it had been tenable, yet neither by the constant practice or maxims of war in all places, nor by the rules of honesty or Christianity, that he ought to have held the same; or that it had been for the honour and advantage of those by whom he was so intrusted to have done; and therefore ought to surrender it together with the Town, without disputing it at all, as he did.

9. To the ninth, he denieth that he hath done any dishonourable action, or that he hath said or done any thing amiss, or unduly, or untruly, in the justification which he made of the Surrender of the City and Castle of Bristol in the honourable house of commons, or any other ways. And the rest of the Article he denieth in the whole, and in every part thereof; and doth affirm, and doubteth not but to make appear to any that are versed in military affairs, that, without detracting any thing from the worthy Governor, who did as much as the enemy put him to, and as honourably as any man could do, that he had a harder task to hold Bristol in the condition it was in, and in the manner that it was assaulted 4 days, than col. Massy had to defend Gloucester 4 weeks; and that he was so far from declaring that Gloucester would not hold out 3 days, that he often declared, that if they had ammunition enough, they might do well enough, and hold out till relief came to them; but oft he feared they might be strained therein, as having good cause to know it: for had he not supplied them with ten barrels of powder; and had they not had two or three more out of Berkley Castle, which he sent thither but a week or two before, the Town had been lost for want of powder. And in this respect, he desired those whom it concerned to relieve them, not to be too confident of their holding out and to hasten relief unto them; so far was he from desiring to hinder relief to be sent unto them, that it might be lost as Bristol was.

10. To the tenth He answereth, That it is an Article without a Charge, an Argument without a proof; for that the testimony of the enemy can make nothing against him, it being their parts to dishonour and disgrace their enemies as much as they can; but the testimony of an enemy, though it be of no validity against him, yet it is strong for him; and as he doth deny, that those that are soldiers on the enemies side have any such sense of the action, so he doth affirm that they had, and have expressed the contrary.

The first Day's Hearing upon the three first ARTICLES.

The Articles and this Answer to them being read, the Prosecutors proceeded presently to the Proof of their Articles: And whereas they conceived the Defendant would have granted the three first Articles, being but introductive to the Impeachment, yet he put the Prosecutors to their Proofs; 1. That col. Essex was ever Governor of Bristol. 2. That he ever removed or sent col. Essex thence. 3. That himself was ever Governor of Bristol.

And then bid Mr. Prynne prove these particulars ere he proceeded farther.

Mr. Prynne thereupon replied, that he much admired how a man of his birth and breeding should so much forget himself, as to deny that in private before the Council, which himself had not only confessed, but professed before the House of Commons, (the representative body of the realm) the City of Bristol, and published in print to all the world in public: But since he denied these Particulars, he would easily make them good against him.

(1.) For the first it is clear, that col. Essex was both acknowledged and stiled Governor of Bristol, by the Parliament, his Excellency, the Committees of Somersetshire, Gloucestershire, Wiltshire, the citizens and garrison of Bristol, and all the gentlemen of those parts, and by col. Fiennes himself at his first coming to Bristol, who gave him the title of Governor.

(2.) That he made out his warrants, commands, and ordered all things for the City's defence and fortification, as Governor, having the command in chief of the City, Castle, and Forces there, as absolutely as any Governor whatsoever.

(3.) That in the Book, intituled, 'A full Declaration of Colonel Fiennes's March to, and Proceedings at Bristol,' compiled and published by himself, or his major Langrish, with his approbation, p. 3, 4, 10, 12 to 16, col. Essex is both acknowledged and stiled Governor of Bristol, and that by himself, in his own printed Letter to his father to justify his removal; and the Depositions which he took and published against him, attest him to be the Governor. Therefore he must even blush to deny all these pregnant evidences, and to put us thus to prove that only now, which he ever confessed before.

Whereupon col. Fiennes said, I confess he was a Governor de facto, but not de jure.

To which Mr. Prynne replied; 1. That he was sent thither, and placed there, by his Excellency's special command, and the Parliament's approbation; therefore he was as much Governor de jure as himself or any other. 2. That he was obeyed as a rightful Governor till he sent him thence, and so esteemed by the Parliament, his Excellency, the Garrison, City, and Committee. 3. If he was not Governor de jure, then all his commands and acts there done, during his government, were injurious, unwarrantable, which he presumed the Defendant durst not affirm.

Then he replied, That col. Essex had no Commission, and therefore was no rightful Governor.

To which Mr. Prynne rejoined, 1. That for ought he knew he had a Commission. 2. That his Excellency's sending of him thither, to take in command the city, and his confirming him there as Governor, with the Parliament's consent, was a Commission sufficient to make him Governor de jure. 3. That if his Excellency commanded an officer by word of mouth alone, without a Commission under seal, to lead any brigade out upon service, or to take in any Town or Castle, (as he had lately commanded major Skippon to take in and fortify Newport-Pannel) this was warrant enough to make him Governor both of the brigade, town and fort; and if he should betray, or basely deliver up that brigade, town, or fort, when taken in, he should be condemned for it by martial law as a traitor, and the want of a Commission would he no excuse to acquit him from being a Governor, and betraying his trust.

Secondly, 'That he removed and sent away col. Essex from Bristol.'

(1.) Mr. Prynn proved it, first by his own printed Letter, and the Depositions published by his direction, in 'A full Relation,' &c. p. 4, 6, 10, 11, 12, where he useth these expressions: 'Col. Fiennes,' (writes his major Langrish) 'who communicated unto me an order ' that he had received from his Excellency, ' whereby he was enjoined to send col. Essex to Windsor, or the Parliament, in case he saw cause for it; and having given me Reason to see and know that there was cause so to do, he asked me, whether I would assist him in the execution of it or no? The which, seeing cause for, I promised to do. But it will be necessary here to annex the Reasons which caused col. Fiennes to put in execution the Order given him by my Lord General, to send up col. Essex from Bristol; not as an accusation against col. Essex in this place, let that be followed by those to whom it appertains) but by way of vindication of col. Fiennes, that he had done nothing herein, but what the trust reposed in him, and the safety of that important place did require him; and that the rather, because it begins so far to reflect upon col. Fiennes, as if he had done him injury, and there had been no Plot at all, but a Plot to put himself in the Governor's place. The Malignants in the town taking up this, and spreading it, and adding strength to it by col. Essex's own speeches and carriages, it will be a great injustice to him, who hath done his duty, and therein no inconsiderable services, to be requited with calumny, &c.' Besides, col. Fiennes writes thus in a printed Letter to his father: 'My lord, &c. I have sent a Letter long enough, and full enough of particulars, concerning col. Essex, and which I think were sufficient to satisfy any man, that it was necessary he should be removed from hence, before the town could be put in any possibility of security, although he had not been touched in the point of his fidelity: His being here, I found inconsistent with the good and safety of this city; and though there were no apparent proof of his falshood, which I never affirmed, yet there were shrewd grounds of jealousy, as may appear by the Depositions, whereof I have sent your lordship a Copy, together with this Letter. For my part, so my Lord General and the world be satisfied, that I had good reason to send him away from hence, according to his direction, I would not have things prosecuted too hard against him, although I am very much deceived, if many a Governor of a town hath not been called to an account, in point of his fidelity, upon weaker grounds than those which I have sent.'

(2.) By his own express Confession, in the latter end of his Answer to the second Article, though he denies it in the beginning, that he did it not upon any Pretended Cause.

To the Third, 'That himself was never Governor of Bristol,' Mr. Prynn answered, That it seemed he had carried himself so dishonourably in that government, that he was now ashamed or afraid to confess himself Governor, for fear he should suffer for it, else he could not have the impudntce to deny it. But since he thus denied himself Governor, he would quickly prove him so; 1. By his own Warrants, during his government, wherein he stiled himself Governor of Bristol. 2. By his acceptance of that title from his officers, soldiers, the committee, and all others. 3. By the Parliament's, his Excellency's, and own father's intitling of him Governor of Bristol, in their letters and directions to him. 4. By his exercising all the authority, and receiving the pay of a Governor. 5. By the full Declaration concerning his March to Bristol, set forth by his major Langrish: who, in his Letter from Bristol, March 6, 1643, p. 3, 4, 6, stiles col. Fiennes 'our Governor,' and 'now Governor of Bristol,' three several times, long before he had a commission to be Governor there. 6. By his own draught of an Ordinance presented to the House of Commons by the lord Say, for the settling of a sufficient Garrison at Bristol; printed by himself, in his "Relation made to the House of Commons concerning the Surrender of the City of Bristol," p. 17 to 23, in which we find this gentleman no less than eight several times expressly stiled, 'Colonel Fiennes Governor of Bristol.' And are you not ashamed so confidently to deny that here in the presence of this honourable council, which yourself have so lately published to all the world? 'Oportet mendacem esse memorem.' 7. In the very Articles of the Surrender of the City and Castle of Bristol to the enemy he intituled himself 'Governor,' witness the Title of them: 'Articles agreed on at the city of Bristol, between col. Nathanael Fiennes Governor of the said city on the one party, and col. Charles Gerard and captain Wm. Teringham, for and on the behalf of prince Rupert, on the other party, July 26, 1643.' And Article 1. 'That the Governor col. Nathanael Fiennes,' &c. Certainly if he were not Governor before to keep, yet these very Articles prove he was then Governor to surrender it. And now, sir, take your choice; If you were not Governor, then you had no power to treat or surrender the City or Castle, and so must be condemned (by your own confession) as a betrayer of them: If you were Governor of them, then you shew yourself most unworthy your birth and breeding in denying it now; especially since you have given an Account in a printed Relation, of your Proceedings and Surrender of Bristol, which is in law a confession of this trust. To conclude: His Excellency's own Proclamation, posted up at Westminster by the Defendant's procurement, and summoning us to give information against him, doth no less than three several times together stile him, 'col. Fiennes, late Governor of Bristol;' and therefore eternally concludes him to deny it.

The Colonel confessed at last, That he was Governor of Bristol; but he next denied, in the Fourth place, That he was ever Governor of the Castle of Bristol, though he was of the Town.

And Fifthly, That he had ever any Commission to be Governor of Bristol.

To the first whereof Mr. Prynne replied, 1. That he had the chief command of the Castle, and none else. 2. That he placed his own brother, col. John Fiennes, as commander in chief, and all other officers under him, in the castle. 3. That he only gave order for the fortifying, victualling, and garrisoning of it. 4. That he laid up the stores and magazines of the City there, disposed of all the lodgings in it, intending to make it the place of his last retreat: therefore certainly he was Governor of it. 5. That though Bristol Castle and the City were divided heretofore, the Castle lying in Gloucestershire, and being no part of the City, yet since queen Anne's entertainment at Bristol, king James at her request gave and united the Castle to the City, making it part thereof, and so it continueth to this day: Wherefore since he confesseth he was Governor of the City, he must necessarily be Governor of the Castle too, it being no parcel of the City, and having no other Governor that had charge of it in chief but himself alone, and his brother under him.

To this the Defendant, in the Sixth place, replied, That he had no Charge of it as a Fort, no more of any one house in the City.

To which Mr. Prynne rejoined, 1. That the Castle was never reputed a house, but always a fort, a castle, and a very strong one too; therefore he must needs have the government of it as a fort, not as a house. 2. Himself esteemed it the strongest fort in and about the city, bestowed much cost in fortifying it, laid up his magazines in it; kept a special garrison there, made it the place of his last retreat, promised to hold it out till the last, if the city were taken, and to lay his own bones there rather than yield it up; therefore certainly he took charge of it as a fort, and must answer for surrendering it as a fort.

Upon this col. Fiennes replied, 'That the Castle was not mentioned in his Commission, and so he was not chargeable with it as a Fort.'

Which Mr. Prynne presently laying hold of, rejoined, 1. My lords, We have now a clear confession that col. Fiennes had a Commission to be Governor of Bristol, the fifth thing he even now denied. 2. Though the Castle be not particularly named as a fort in his Commission, yet this will not help him, for it is therein included as part of Bristol. This I shall undeniably evidence by a case or two: col. Fiennes, by virtue of his Commission, hath built several Forts and Sconces about Bristol, without, not within the City limits, though adjoining to it, as we have done the like about London; these Forts are properly no part of the City, as the Castle is, nor are they mentioned or included within his Commission, being built for the most part since the Commission was granted; yet no man will doubt but if col. Fiennes, or any other officer, had treacherously or cowardly delivered up any of these out-forts to the enemy, though no part of the City, it had been treason in him, and he should have suffered for it: So had he in like manner yielded up or betrayed any one house in the City or Castle, were it fortified or not fortified, to the loss or hazard of the City, it had been treason by the laws of war; many cities and castles having been lost, by the loss or yielding of one house or postern; much more then must he suffer for surrendering such a considerable fort as Bristol Castle to the enemy, without any battery, assault, or necessity, though he found it not specified in his Commission, which extends to the whole City, and so to every house, fort, and parcel of it, though not particularly mentioned in it.

The Colonel then said, 'That he had no Commission to be Governor of Bristol, and by consequence was not Governor of it.'

To which Mr. Prynne replied: 1. That since he undertook the charge of the Town and Castle, as Governor, it mattered not much whether he had a Commission or not; for he writ, and carried himself as Governor, even from the sending away of col. Essex, till the surrender of the Town and Castle, which he surrendered as Governor. 2. That himself had formerly unawares confessed, That he had a Commission to be Governor, and that he was stiled Governor by Langrish, and others, even in print, before he had his Commission to the Governor.

Thirdly, he should prove hereafter, That himself sent one captain Bagnall twice up to London to procure not only a Commission, but 'an independent Commission,' from his Excellency, that so he and his garrison might not be subject to sir Wm. Waller's commands, (which capt. Bagnall afterwards attested upon oath, and that he spent 16*l.* in these two journeys, to obtain this Commission, which the Colonel out of his liberality never yet paid him) and the Colonel himself confessed afterwards to the council upon Bagnall's testimony, he sent for and received an independent Commission; that so he and his garrison-soldiers might not be liable to sir Wm. Waller's commands, as they formerly were.

The Colonel hereupon told the Council, "That he sent for this Commission, not to guard the City against the enemy, as Governor of it, but only to keep his soldiers in order, who when they were commanded on any service, grew mutinous, and would still be calling on him to see his Commission: for which he gave an instance in col. Poplam's regiment; who disobeyed him when they returned from the taking of Sherborne: And this made him to send for a Commission, only to order his soldiers, and keep them in obedience; but he never had nor sent for any Commission to keep the Town or Castle."

To which Mr. Prynn replied, "That this was the most absurd, irrational, if not unsoldierly distinction, that ever was heard of in the world, and that he might be ashamed to propound it before soldiers, in such an honourable Council of War as this: for what need was there either of a garrison or Governor of Bristol, or of such a Commission to keep his soldiers there in obedience and order, but only to preserve the City? This was the only end why he and his garrison were there placed, maintained by the Parliament and his Excellency to keep the City, which else would have as well or better kept itself without them. 2. That he was confident his Excellency never granted any such commission to any Governor (nor any other prince or general in the world) only to keep his garrison in order, but not to defend the garrisoned place, whereof he was Governor: such an absurd Commission was never yet heard of, nor such a nonsense distinction made by any soldier. And thereupon he desired the Commission might be produced, to the end it might appear whether it warranted this distinction, That it was only to discipline his soldiers, but not to hold the Town against the enemy. 3. That their lordships now saw the true reason why col. Fiennes so soon delivered up Bristol to the enemy; he pleads he had (or would have) no Commission to keep it, therefore it was he thus surrendered it up to the enemies almost as soon as they came before it: who doubtless would keep it better, defend it longer than he, though they wanted a Commission for it. 4. That this pretended disobedience of col. Popham's regiment was long after his Commission received, and that upon this occasion: col. Fiennes, and his major Langrish, would have taken from col. Popham's regiment that little plunder they had gained at Sherborne, with the hazard of their lives, at the country's charge, without any direction from Fiennes, who sent them not on that service; which injurious, avaricious act of his they justly opposed by standing on their guard, and so kept that booty he would have carried from them into Bristol castle. This occasion then being subsequent to his Commission, could not be the ground of its procuring, but rather that which himself unawares confessed; his desire of independency and exemption from sir William Waller's commands.

The Colonel then insisted: First, 'That he received his Commission only upon this condition, and with this intention, to keep his soldiers in order, but not to make good the Town and Castle: therefore he could be no further chargeable by it than as he received it.'

To which Mr. Prynn replied: (1.) That every Governor must receive his Commission at his peril, as it is granted and intended by him that granted it, (as tenants do their leases, and donces in tail their lands) and hath no power to annex any conditions thereunto: his Commission then being absolute, to keep the town for the Parliament, that being the sole use and end thereof, his conditional accepting of it being repugnant to it was void and idle.

(2.) That the common and martial law* of the realm annex this condition to every Governor and officer of trust, That he ought to discharge his trust and government, and keep that safe which is committed to his custody to his utmost power, though it be not expressed in his Commission; and therefore this pretended conditional acceptance, directly against his trust and government, was most ridiculous.

Secondly, he alledged, That he never sought after the governorship of Bristol, but really desired not to accept it, and to be acquitted from it: to which end he produced and read divers Letters of his own to the lord Say his father, and one or two to his Excellency, which took up near two hours time in reading. In the reading of these Letters, the Colonel casually desired the council to observe, that many of them were written before he had his Commission for Bristol, which was not till the 1st of May 1643.

This Mr. Prynn taking present hold of, desired their lordships in the first place, to observe his voluntary confession of that Commission which at first he so obstinately denied.

To these Letters read, Mr. Prynn gave these short Answers:

1. That all these letters were either his own or his father's, and not above two or three of them proved true copies, and that by Mr. Sprig the lord Say's secretary; therefore no Evidence at all to justify or excuse him, himself and his own Letters being no competent witnesses in his own cause; and his father but testis domesticus at the best, if present.

2. That the substance of the chief Letter to his Excellency, was only a modest excuse of his own insufficiency for that Charge; a common compliment in every ingenious man's mouth, that is preferred to any great place of trust; who in words at least pretends insufficiency for that place which he perchance desires: just like our bishops usual Answer, nolo, nolo, to vis episcopari? now used as a formality, for fashion sake only, even when they come to be consecrated; when in truth they make all the friends and means they can to compass that Bishopric, which (for fashion sake, out of a dissembling modesty) they pretend, and twice together answer solemnly (when demanded openly before the Congregation) that they desire by no means to accept of. Therefore this letter of his can be no proof, that he was unwilling to undertake this government, since his subsequent acceptance and actions disprove this pretended refusal.

3. He observed, that in one of his letters dated the 4th April, he writ earnestly to his father, to procure and send him his Commission: Therefore he was so far from refusing, that he sought the government, and sent captain Bagnall twice to his Excellency to procure his Commission: as was after attested upon oath.

* Littleton, sect. 378, 379. See Coke's Institutes on it, fol. 232, 233, 234.

4. That by divers of his Letters then read, it clearly appeared, himself was the chief informer against col. Essex, and the chief actor in his removal, to intrude himself into his place; for that we had now his own hand against his words and answer.

5. That the scope of all his Letters was only to complain and cry out to the parliament for more monies from London, or to get more authority to raise monies in the country, to pay the garrison, without which monies, he writ, he could not long hold the town; but there is not one clause in all the letters, that he wanted arms, ammunition, powder, men, provision, or that the town or castle was not tenable. If then he complained only of default of monies, with which if he were furnished, he made no doubt of keeping the town; and it is clear he lost not the town for want of money, (for he hath not hitherto either in his printed relation, letters, or answer, affirmed, that he surrendered the City or Castle for want of money) then by his own confession, he must surrender them either out of treachery or cowardice, they being tenable, and furnished with all other necessaries for a siege but money.

6. He observed that col. Fiennes did never refuse the place of governor, as he should have done had he been unwilling or unable to discharge it; that his importunity to quit it, in case he could get no monies, was with no intent to leave the place, but only to hasten the supply of monies; it being the argument and rhetoric of most other commanders in their letters to the parliament, to cry out for monies, else all would soon be lost, and they must disband.

7. That he took on him the power and place of a governor long before he had a Commission; that he drew and sent up ordinances to pass the house to enlarge his power and territories for 20 miles space round Bristol, and to settle himself in an absolute government there. That he both earnestly writ and sent up twice to his Excellency for a Commission by a special agent, that so he might be independent; that he accepted of the Commission when it came; yet never acquainted the city or committee of parliament with it, doing all things in a high imperious manner for the most part, of his own head, without their privity or advice; that he held his Commission without surrendering it till he surrendered the Town and Castle to the enemy, so unwilling was he to depart with his governorship. From all which he concluded, it was apparent he was so far from refusing, that he did ambitiously affect, if not injuriously usurp, this government, for his own private lucre, to the prejudice of the former governor, and irreparable damage of the whole realm.

In fine, col. Fiennes desired Mr. Prynne to prove, First, That he ever undertook to his excellency or the parliament to make good the City or Castle, and not to surrender the same to the enemy without their consents,

To which Mr. Prynne answered, That the very law itself and common reason informs us, that every governor of a Town, or Fort, is to make them good, and not to surrender them to the enemy without the consent of those who committed their custody to them, else every governor might betray his trust at pleasure. This therefore being a condition in law annexed to all governors and officers, and he confessing himself to be governor, (and that by a commission which no doubt enjoined him to make good and keep the place in manner aforesaid) needs no other proof at all; the law resolves it, and therefore none must doubt or contradict it.

With this debate the Proof of the first Article was concluded.

Article 2. The second Article was proved by his own printed Proceedings mentioned in 'A full Declaration,' &c. p. 5, 6, 7, 8, 15, by his Answer to the Article, and Relation to the house of commons, p. 15. And Mr. Prynne informing the Council, that he did not charge it criminally, being a lawful action done by direction of parliament, but only by way of introduction and aggravation of the subsequent Articles, and crime in surrendering the Town so treacherously and cowardly, after this his sentence against, and execution of those Conspirators, it was passed over without further pressing.

Article 3. The third Article being likewise introductive, to aggravate his Offence in the 4th 5th 6th and 8th Articles, was briefly proved by his own printed Relation, p. 4, 5, 6, 23, by his printed Letter to his Excellency, confessed in part in his Answer, and to be further proved in the Proof of the ensuing Articles, was thereupon briefly run over: and so the first day's Hearing ended.

The Second Day's Hearing, together with the 3rd 4th 5th 6th and 7th, spent wholly in the Proof and Defence of the 4th Article, to which most of the others in the Reply and Rejoinder were reduced.

The three first introductive Articles being run over the 1st day, the Prosecutors, the next session, proceeded to the 4th, where the criminal and capital charge of the Impeachment began; The Defendant first demurred to the Depositions taken upon oath against him, both before the Judge-Advocate himself, and by sir William Waller and col. Carre, by commission from his Excellency; alledging,

1. That no Paper-Deposition ought to be allowed by the law, in cases of life and death, but the Witnesses ought to be all present and testify in voce, else the testimony ought not to be received.

2. That sir William Waller was his enemy, and by confederacy with the prosecutors, had been the chief instrument of prosecuting this impeachment against him: to which end he produced one major Dowet a Frenchman, whom sir William Waller had displaced, and so disgusted, to attest, that Master Walker's reply to col. Fiennes's Relation, was shewed to sir William and his lady before it was printed, and that sir William had spoken to his officers to acquaint Mr. Walker with all such passages as they knew concerning col. Fiennes, touching the siege and surrender of Bristol: therefore he was neither a fit commissioner nor witness in this cause, nor yet any of his officers under him.

3. That he had not joined with the prosecutors in Commission, neither had he notice thereof, that so he might cross-examine the Witnesses. Therefore for these reasons, he desired, that all the Paper-Depositions might be suppressed, and not given in evidence against him.

To the first of these Objections Mr. Prynne returned this Answer: First, That himself had formerly used this kind of proceeding in the case of col. Essex, against whom he had not only taken, but printed divers paper-testimonies, in things which might have proved capital if the proof had been full. That himself in this very case had sued forth a commission to examine witnesses on his behalf, without our privy, before we took forth any commission, who did but imitate him therein, and that by the Judge-Advocate's own advice, who directed us to this course, which he affirmed to be both legal and usual; That in the civil law, especially in courts martial, trials were as usual testimoniis, as testibus viva voce: That in the Admiralty, (a civil law court) as likewise in the Chancery, Star-Chamber and English courts, formed after the civil law, they proceed usually by way of deposition: That even at the common law in some cases, depositions taken before the coroner, and examinations upon oath before the chief justice, or other justices, are usually given in evidence even in capital crimes: That the high court of parliament hath upon just occasion allowed of paper-depositions in such cases: That in all courts-martial, both in England and elsewhere, they have been constantly allowed, and particularly in the late famous case of Tomkins, Challoner, and other London conspirators, whose examinations were read, and given in as evidence one against the other, upon which they were condemned and executed. Besides, there was both very great reason and necessity that such depositions should be admitted in this case, and in all martial proceedings of this nature, because divers of our material witnesses, being officers or soldiers now in actual service, and dispersed upon several occasions into divers brigades, and parts of the kingdom remote from St. Albans, could not without great danger, disservice to the state, inconvenience to themselves, and excessive costs, be drawn together personally to attend this trial, which had been so frequently adjourned, not only from week to week, but place to place: That we several times petitioned both the commons house and his Excellency, that the council appointed for this trial might be held at a certain day and place, with- in London or Westminster, before our witnesses were dispersed, and where we could with less trouble and expence to ourselves and them, have produced all or most of them viva voce; but yet we could not (through the Defendant's procurement, as we conceive) obtain this reasonable request: Therefore himself being both the cause and precedent of these our depositions, and of removing the Trial to this place, for our greater incommodation and expence, ought not to take advantage of his own wrong, against a maxim of law, the constant practice of the court-martial, and his own leading example, which we did but imitate. Which point the council did upon solemn debate among themselves clearly over-rule against the Defendant, upon the premised reasons.

To the second Exception, concerning sir William Waller, Mr. Prynne most solemnly protested for himself to the council, that it was a most false and malicious slander; that neither sir Wm. Waller, nor his lady, nor any other in their behalf, did ever directly or indirectly excite, advise, or encourage him in this prosecution; that the delinquent himself was the only man who unadvisedly put himself upon this trial, as appears most evidently to all the world, by the close of his printed Relation in the Parliament House, where, page 18, 'He desires the house of commons, that they would be pleased to let the truth of what he had then affirmed to them (concerning the surrender of Bristol) be examined at a council of war, that so he might be cleared or condemned, as they should find the truth or falsehood of what he had delivered;' by his, and his officers Petition to his Excellency, and his Excellency's Proclamation upon their Petition, posted up at Westminster and the Exchange, wherein he summoned Mr. Walker and Mr. Prynne by name, in the most public manner that might be, and after that by private notes, and sundry other public adjournments, to be his prosecutors; Which thankless office he was not altogether unwilling to undertake, when thus openly engaged by the Defendant; not out of any private malice to the delinquent, whom he formerly honoured, and to whom he never bore any particular spleen, having never received the least injury from him; much less out of any dangerous respects, instrumentally to wreck the private malice or revenge of any others upon him, (it being below his spirit, and most averse to his genius, his conscience, to be subservient or instrumental to any man's malice or revenge whatsoever) but merely out of a real desire to do his country faithful service, and vindicate the truth of this unworthy state-ruining action, under which the whole kingdom now lay languishing, from those false disguises which the Defendant in sundry printed papers had obtruded on the world, to save his own irreparable dishonour. The prosecution therefore proceeding thus merely from himself, as all the premises infallibly demonstrate, he had laid a most scandalous imputation upon sir William Waller (a noble well-deserving gentleman then absent,) and on himself, in the fore-mentioned exception, for which he demanded justice against him from that honourable council, unless he could make good this calumny, for which he was most certain the Defendant had not the least shadow of proof; the testimony of Dowet, the ground of this aspersion, not referring to him, but only to Mr. Walker's Relation, published long before any impeachment of, or prosecution against the Defendant: which charge Mr. Walker himself there present was ready to answer, as to that particular.

Hereupon Mr. Walker informed the council, That he acknowledged in the Epistle to his Answer to the Defendant's Relation, 'That it was 'but a collection out of the several reports of 'divers gentlemen and commanders in that 'service, before and when Bristol was besieged: 'which when he had drawn up, having occasion to go to Southampton, he left in the hand of a friend, desiring him to shew it to whomsoever he should think fit, (and especially to those gentlemen out of whose mouths he compiled it) to see if he had hit their sense aright; and that this party (as he was since informed) shewed it to sir W. Waller. He said further, that the written copy was shewed to the Defendant himself, and therefore he doth not wonder if it were shewed to sir W. Waller: and that sir William's speaking to his officers, 'only to declare what they knew touching that business, 'with reference simply to his Answer,' could not be intended either malice, or combination, or prosecution of this impeachment, not then so much as thought of, nor any prejudice to the truth, since no man can know a falshood, because it is a Non-entity, and can be no object of man's knowledge: That therefore this could be no just exception to sir William as a commissioner, the rather because col. Carre (a man indifferent) was joined with him; much less any legal exception to any officers or soldiers testimony then under his command, who did but testify what they knew for truth. Besides, Mr. Pryn added, that col. Fiennes himself had examined divers of sir W. Waller's officers by commission, before we examined any of them, and some of those whom we examined; and why we should be deprived of the benefit of their examinations for the kingdom's advantage, when himself had examined them only for his private defence, there could be neither reason nor equity alledged, it being a mere artifice, to deprive us of our most material witnesses, and to suffocate the truth.

To the third, of his wanting notice to join in Commission, and cross-examine the witnesses on the other side, Mr. Pryn answered:

1. That himself had begun the precedent, in taking forth several commissions to sir W. Waller's, and the earl of Manchester's army, to examine witnesses there, without our privy or consent, who neither had any the least notice of the commissions to join in them, nor of any the witnesses names, till the hearing, nor had not, nor could not cross-examine them, nor ever yet saw their depositions: And why our depositions, being prosecutors, should not be admitted as well as his, being not taken so publicly before the Judge-Advocate, as most of ours were, he saw no reason.

2. That we could not enforce col. Fiennes to cross-examine any witnesses, or to join with us in their examination; therefore if he neglected to do it, or went before us in his commissions, as he did, by virtue of which he might have examined all our witnesses if he would, before we had taken their testimonies against him, the default was his, not ours.

That we left all our Depositions, and the Witnesses names, with the Judge-Advocate, to whom he oft repaired, and from whom he might have received the catalogue of them, to cross-examine them, if he pleased; which since he neglected to do, after so many adjournments, and taking no exceptions till now he came before the Council, of purpose to evade his trial, and to elude both them, us, the parliament, and people, whose eyes are on the issue of this business, there was no reason to allow the frivolous exceptions. All which the Council, upon short debate, over-ruled against the Defendant, resolving, that the testimonies ought to be used, unless some particular just exception could be alledged against any of them.

These Obstacles being removed, Mr. Pryn then proceeded to prove the fourth Article; which he did,

First, By the Defendant's own Answer thereunto, wherein he doth confess the whole Article in substance; yea, more than it chargeth him withal, as namely,

1. 'That he never undertook to make good 'the City or Castle, or either of them, against 'the enemy; declaring that he would not, nor 'could not undertake it.' Which is in plain English as much as to confess, that he had never any thought or resolution to hold them out to the utmost extremity, as he ought to have done in honour and duty; but a professed purpose to surrender them to the enemies, traiterously or cowardly, as soon almost as they came before it.

2. 'That soon after the enemy entered the 'line' (with a very inconsiderable number, not above 150 at first, and three or four hundred in all at last, as the witnesses attest) 'he did surrender the Town and Castle, with all the prisoners, cannons, ammunition, artillery, military provisions, magazines, victuals, and part 'of the arms,' (all but the horsemen's swords, most of which were likewise taken from them ere they departed the Town) 'before the enemy had taken any of the Out-forts about the 'same, or had made the least assault or battery 'upon the walls of the City, or of the Castle, or 'any mine or breach into the chief fort thereof, '(and that before the Town had been three 'whole days besieged,' which he denieth not, and therefore granteth by his Answer:) Which whether it were not a most clear confession and demonstration of a treacherous and cowardly Surrender, in the superlative degree, he humbly submitted to the honourable Council's judgment, and the determination of all men en-dued with common reason; and yet the Defendant hath the confidence, in the same branch of his Answer, to deny 'that he did deliver them 'up traiterously, cowardly, or dishonourably, 'or contrary to his former promises,' (which were to dispute every inch of the Town, from the line to the City-gates, and from thence to the Castle-walls, which he would defend to the utmost, and there lay his bones if he could not keep it, and make his flag of truce his winding-sheet, as is proved by divers witnesses,) [Mr. Powel, col. Strode, col. Stephens, Mr. Hassard, capt. Bagnal.] 'or contrary to his trust and 'duty;' and the impudence to affirm, 'that he 'did defend the Town and Castle to the utmost 'point, not only of duty, but also of honour, 'that any soldier could or might have maintained the same.' Which whether it were not the greatest paradox and contradiction, that any military man in his right senses durst ever affirm before a Council of experienced, valiant commanders, he referred to the resolution of all there present.

3. He confesseth, that though 'neither any 'of the outworks were taken, nor the Town 'walls once battered or assaulted, when the 'enemy entered the line, yet as things then 'stood, neither the Forts nor Castle ought to 'have been kept, to the prejudice of the City 'and Garrison, but ought to have been surrendered together with the City, as they were, 'by the constant practice and policy of war in 'all places, the principles of justice and honesty, and the rules of wisdom and discretion.' And he further adds in the clause of his Answer to the eighth Article, 'That he doth affirm and will justify, that if the Castle had 'been tenable, yet neither by the constant 'practice and maxims of war in all places, nor 'by the rules of honesty and Christianity, he 'ought to have held the same.' A riddle which Mr. Prynne professeth transcended the limits of his understanding to enucleate, if not of all men's else, but the Defendant's; and a passage which carried Treachery and Cowardice engraven with capitals in its very front, proclaiming openly to all men, that had the Out-Forts and Castle been never so strong and tenable against the enemy, yet he was so far from resolving to keep them for the Kingdom's and Parliament's security, that he professeth, 'he ought not to have held the same, neither 'by the constant practice and policy of war, 'nor rules of piety or Christianity, but ought 'to have surrendered the same with the Town.' Certainly this gentleman was either resolved to lose his head when he penned this Answer, or else was intoxicated with the panic fear that surprized him at Bristol, (which hath made his pen and brains to stagger ever since) else he durst not put in such an Answer in writing to this Impeachment.

Fourthly, He saith, 'That this surrender of 'the city, castle, forts, with all the ammunition, cannon, magazines, arms, (but troopers 'swords) prisoners, ships, and his very colours, 'before any out-fort taken, or battery made 'against city or castle, was upon good and honourable conditions, in respect to the estate 'he was in.' I think he means himself was in an ill condition, should the king's forces have forcibly taken him prisoner, for that the king had excepted him out of the pardon mentioned in his Answer to the third Article: And therefore out of base fear and self-respects he would rather redeem his head, and buy his peace with the voluntary surrender of a place of such consequence to his majesty, than hazard his life in defending it to the utmost. And withal he adds, 'That this surrender was for the honour, profit, and best advantage of the kingdom, and parliament, by whom he was entrusted? which when he shall be able to demonstrate, or make the parliament and kingdom believe, I shall profess this honourable Council may in justice acquit him; till then, I hope, you cannot but condemn him, even out of these several passages of his own Answer.

Secondly, From his Answer I shall descend to our Proofs, which extend to all the ensuing Articles as well as this: by which it appears:

1. That the Defendant wanted neither men nor ammunition, nor any manner of provision, to defend the City and Castle against the enemy: Not men, for he had 2,000 foot, and 300 horse, besides volunteers, to defend the town; and he might have raised at least 6 or 8,000 able men more in the City, if he had wanted men, which were as many, or more, as besieged it. Proved by the depositions of col. Stevens, Anthony Gale, Arthur Williams, Able Kelly, James Powel, and others.

2. That they wanted not ammunition, for we proved there were 60 (say 70 double) barrels of powder in the castle, with match and bullet proportionable, besides what was in the city and forts, and might have been made weekly in the town, if held out against the enemy; and that by the depositions of Mr. Edward Bainton, Arthur Williams, Joan Bateau, major Wood, and others: Besides, himself confesseth in his relation 50 barrels in the Castle only, when surrendered; Mr. Hassard deposeth 50 at least.

3. That they had all manner of provision both in the City and Castle, for three months space or more; the particulars whereof will appear in the Deposition of Nicholas Cowling, Able Kelly, James Powel, Dorothy Hassard, Mary Smith, and others: That himself and others [col. Strode, col. Stephens, capt. Bagnal, Mr. Powel, Mr. Cowling, major Wood, Richard Lindon, Edward Watlin, Mr. Hassard,] deemed the City and Castle strong and tenable; that he promised to hold the same to the utmost; to dispute every inch of ground with the enemy; to retire into the Castle when he could hold the City no longer; to lay his bones there rather than yield it, and make his flag of truce his winding-sheet. If then the place were so strong and tenable, and he wanted neither men, nor ammunition, nor victuals, to defend the City and Castle, his surrender of them must of necessity be adjudged traitorously, or cowardly.

ardly at least, if not both: for what else but treachery, or cowardice, or both conjoined, could move him to this surrender, in less than three days siege, before the utmost extremity, contrary to the laws and ordinances of war, whenas he wanted nothing necessary for a brave defence?

Secondly, We have proved that the town and castle were not besieged three whole days: for the siege itself began but the Monday morning, and the articles of surrender were agreed on before Wednesday night, and the surrender executed before 9 of the clock the Thursday morning: as col. Stephens, col. Strode, Able Kelly, and others testify.

Thirdly, That the enemies were generally repulsed on all quarters of the city, with extraordinary great loss of men, near 700 of them being slain, and as many wounded, with the loss only of six or eight of our men: and that but 150 of them, or 200 at most, entered the line the Wednesday morning before sun-rising (near three of the clock) and were so afraid of being cut off, that they gave themselves all for dead men, and might have easily been cut off, none of their own party knowing of their entry till two hours after they entered, nor sending them any relief. Attested by Arthur Williams, Joseph Proud, James Coles, Mary Smith, serjeant Wm. Hill, Stephen Radford, Michael Sparks, and others.

Fourthly, That major Langrish and his horse-troops, which had the guard of that place, and two other captains of horse under him, never once offered to charge the enemy, whom they might easily have cut off, but retired into the city without charging them: That Langrish (very intimate with the Defendant) had been formerly complained of to him, by lieutenant Clifton, col. Stephens, and others, for his extraordinary cowardice and negligence, who desired he might be cashiered to walk the street, as unfit for any charge; yet the Defendant continued him in his place, and set him to guard that very weak place, where the enemy was likeliest to enter. Proved by Joan Battin, col. Popham, col. Stephens, and capt. Nevil, lieutenant Clifton, capt. Husbands, and capt. Vaughan, (Fiennes's own witnesses) upon cross-examinations before the Council.

Fifthly, That the day before the enemy entered, one Thomas Munday, a soldier under capt. Henry Lloyd (as both their Depositions witness) pointing with his finger to the very place where the enemy entered the next morning, told major Langrish in the hearing of col. Fiennes: 'Captain, yonder is a very suspicious place not fully fortified, and it is very doubtful; unless you set 100 musketeers more there, it being weakly manned, the enemies will there make their first breach.' Whereupon col. Fiennes for this his good advice, in an angry manner asked him, 'What, doth he prate?' and called him 'Saucy Knave.' And Langrish having the guard thereof, suffered the enemy the very next morning to enter that line at the same place, from which he retired with his horse without any charge or resistance; whenas he might easily have repulsed and beat them off. Yet the Defendant never questioned nor complained against Langrish for this his Cowardice and Treachery, which was the only real occasion of surrendering the City, but countenanced and justified him all he could, affirming in print, that he was acquitted by a council of war of cowardice, (which was false;) and endeavoured to lay the blame of not charging upon one lieutenant Rouswell, who was so far from being guilty of this fact, that seeing Langrish with his troop quit the breach without charging, he called him coward, and with three or four musketeers only marched up to the enemy, and made good the breach for a time, till he received so many wounds (whereof he after died) as forced him to retreat for want of seconding; he affirming, that if he had been seconded by the horse, or with 20 musketeers more, he could easily have repulsed the enemy, and made good the breach. Yet this dead man must be thus traduced to save Langrish's credit, though capt. Husbands (one of the Defendant's own witnesses) confessed, that Langrish's cowardice, in not charging, was the loss of Bristol, and that he told him so openly to his face, at a meeting in London, since the surrender.

Sixthly, That for two or three hours space at least, the few enemies who first entered had no relief nor supplies sent to them, neither indeed could have, the enemy being bravely repulsed with great loss in all other places, so as they retired in disorder to their quarters; and one whole regiment of their horse retreated as far as White-Church, four miles from Bristol, with a resolution never to come on again, had not the message of the unexpected parley, and hopes of the city's surrender thereupon, drawn them back to their quarters: And that divers of the enemies confessed, if they had then been repulsed or beaten out of this breach, they had raised their siege, and never come on again. Serj. Hill, major Wood, James Coles, depose all this, and the Defendant's witnesses confessed it.

Seventhly, That from three in the morning, when the enemy entered, till about 10 or 11 o'clock at least, there was no charge at all made, except only with Rouswell, and after by capt. Nevil, who charged them down-hill only with 20 horse, an hour or more after their entry, and could have then beaten them out, as he verily believed, and attested upon oath, had he been seconded with 30 or 40 horse or musketeers. A very strange neglect, to suffer the enemy to lodge so long within the line, ere they were encountered.

Eighthly, That upon the enemies entry col. Fiennes, instead of commanding the next guards and companies then at the out-works, to fall upon and beat them out, as he was pressed to do by lieutenant Davison, major Wood, capt. Bagnal, Mr. Denne, serj. Hill, and others, commanded upon pain of death by his lieutenant Clifton, to draw off the line and works on that side of the city the enemy entered, and to retire into the city with all speed to the market-place, full sore against their wills: whereat divers of the soldiers [Joan Battin, Wm. Whitehorn, serjeant Gale, captain Bagnall, Thomas Munday] were very much discontented and discouraged, and many of them said, 'They were betrayed.' Whereupon they retreated from the line and out-works in great disorder, many of them leaving not only their swords, muskets, powder, bullets, but their very cannons behind them, which might have been easily drawn off, being down the hill, and many colliers horses ready at hand for that service; at which the gunners were so discontented, that some of them spiked and nailed up their touch-holes, to make their cannons unserviceable to the enemy, and the city garrison too, in case they had returned to the works and line; which by this strange soldiery, were left naked of all defence near two miles space together, so as the enemy might have entered the line where they pleased, in sundry places of greater advantage, nearer to the City, Castle, and Suburbs, by much, than where they had made their first entry. Which strange device and unilitary policy, if it savoured not of apparent treachery, yet at least it cannot be excused from extreme folly, and want of skill in martial affairs; which made major Lewis, and other of the best experienced soldiers (who advised not to draw off the line into the City, but to fall presently on the enemy from the line itself, which was the nearer, best, and speediest way) exceedingly discontented.

Nimblely. That when the soldiers were thus hastily and confusedly called from the line into the market-place, they there stood idle, looking one upon another, without any command to make a sally, or do any other service to secure the City [captain Bagnall]; whereupon, for want of command and employment, divers of the soldiers who had been upon duty at the line four or five days and nights together, departed from their colours, some to the tavern, some to the ale-house to drink, others to their beds to sleep, so as their companies were broken, and not half full: whereas if they had marched orderly from the line, against the enemies, when they first entered it, which was far the best and shortest way; or made a sally as soon as they retreated from the line, these inconveniences had been prevented, the soldiers kept in heart, the enemies cut off, or beaten out, the breach made up, and the City preserved.

Tenthly, That when the sally was made [major Wood, William Whitehorn], not before, but much about eleven of the clock, it consisted not of above 300 men, and that of those called off the line, the fresh men at the main guard, and capt. Stoke's company purposely kept for a reserve, with the garrison soldiers in the castle, (who were not in the fight at the line, and might have made a present sally, without calling any from the line) being not employed on this service.

Eleventhly, That when the enemy upon the sally, though late, were driven from house to house, and so beaten that they let fall their arms, and cried for quarter; and when the women were so courageous, that they proffered to go with their children unto the cannon's mouth, to dead the bullets, in case the soldiers were afraid, rather than the City should be yielded, and thereupon encouraged both the gunners and soldiers to fight, working in the very face of the enemy, and stopping up Froom-gate with a very thick work (made with earth and wool-sack) where the enemy should have entered the City; yet such was the defendant's extraordinary cowardice, that he even then sent twice out to the enemy for a parley, whereas the soldiers generally desired and offered to fight it out to the utmost [serjeant Gale, Joan Battin, Mr. Hassard, Thomas Munday]: which so much discontented divers soldiers, that they said they were betrayed, and in very anger brake their muskets, swords, pikes, lest the enemy should gain them, swearing that they should never serve the Parliament more, and taxing the Governor for his parley and cowardice.

Twelfthly, That the castle was surrendered, the prisoners released [major Wood, colonel Strode, and others], the enemy admitted into the town, long before the hour agreed on, through the defendant's hastiness; yea, the soldiers and townsmen pillaged before his face: yet he took no care to see them righted, but left them to the spoil, neglecting to take hostages to see the Articles performed; which, contrary to the rules of war, were not made between prince Rupert, the king's general, [Richard Winstone, capt. Husband, and others] and the Governor, but between him and the prince's commissioners only: and that he made such haste to quit the town, that he left capt. Blake, and capt. Husbards, in Brandon-Hill and Prior-Hill forts behind him, never giving them notice of the articles, nor any warrant under his hand to surrender them to the enemy, to the endangering of their lives and liberties.

Thirteenthly, That col. Fiennes being moved to send away the prisoners before the siege, refused, saying, 'He would keep them there to make his own conditions the better;' thinking of nothing before-hand, but to surrender the City, to save himself: that he told [Mr. Talboy's deposition] Mr. Tolboy, that he should not be in Bristol for ought he knew at St. James-tide then next ensuing; and used such expressions to him, as made him believe he meant to surrender the town by that time, (as he did the very next day after St. James's feast) who thereupon left the City, as intended to be surrendered by the governor. That he commanded Mr. Hassard to lay by a reserve of 30 barrels of powder, with match and bullets proportionable, to which when he was reduced he would treat [Richard Butler's testimony]: that there were about 140 granadoes in the Castle, and one new mortar-piece, and that John

Warden, one of the gunners of the Castle, did often importune the defendant to give him leave to make a shot at the enemy out the said mortar-piece, but the defendant commanded him, under pain of death, not to make any shot at them: whereat the said gunner was so grieved, that he oft complained the Town was betrayed. All which granadoes with the mortar piece were surrendered to the enemy, and not one of them shot against them, though they shot many granadoes at the town and garrison.

fourteenthly, That the Castle and Forts were very strong and tenable, if not the Town; that the Defendant himself, the Colonel Stephens, colonel Strode, Mr. Powel, major Wood, captain Bagnal, Thomas Munday, Richard Lindon, Edward Watlin, Nicholas Cowling, Joan Battin, Nicholas Coles, Mary Smith, Ethelred Huddy, Michael Sparks, and others, attest this; townsmen and soldiers reputed them so; that they might have been held divers months, yea to this very time, had not they been surrendered; that the enemy could not have taken them by force, even by their own confessions, nor all the devils in Hell have taken the Castle, had not the defendant, beyond their expectation, surrendered them basely into their hands, and bestowed them upon him; for which surrender the very enemy called him a base coward, and said he deserved to be hanged for delivering up such a town and castle as that to them so easily, for which they might thank Fiennes, else they could not have won them by force, had not he bestowed them on them beyond their hopes. From all which particulars, fully proved, we conclude, 'That the Town, Castle, Ammunition, Cannons, Arms, &c. were most dishonourably, cowardly, and treacherously delivered up to the enemy, and that without and against the Parliament's or his Excellency's previous consents, who abhorred the fact, and never gave the least way thereunto, being executed before they had any thought or tidings of it, and before the City and Castle was reduced to any extremity.' And thus was concluded the second Day's Work.

The sum of the Defendant's tedious Defence, consisted of the ensuing Particulars, to every of which, for brevity and perspicuity sake, we shall subjoin the distinct Replies then given, not in a continued Speech, as they were uttered, but in parcels, as each part of the Reply, Rejoinder, and Surrejoinder was applied to each part of the Defence.

First, The Defendant denied, 'That all the arms were surrendered to the enemy; for it appeareth, by the first Article of the Surrender, that all the officers of horse and foot were to march out with their full arms, and the troopers with their swords.'

To which Mr. Prynne answered, 'That by the first and tenth Articles of Surrender, all the common foot soldiers were to march out without arms, and the troopers only with their swords, leaving their other arms, together with all their cannons, ammunition, and colours, behind them; therefore since all the arms of the foot, all the troopers arms but their swords, (which were not many nor considerable) with all the cannons, ammunition, colours, were thus surrendered, the words of the Article of Impeachment, 'that all the cannons, ammunition, arms, &c. were surrendered,' were sufficiently and literally proved.

2. That all, both in scripture, law, and common parlance, is frequently taken for the 'greatest part' or 'well nigh all;' as Mat. ii. 'Herod was troubled and all Jerusalem with him.' Mat. xxi. 10. 'All the City was moved, saying, Who is this?' 'All men think so;' 'all affirm it;' they have taken all their 'arms, baggage,' and the like: where all is taken for the 'greatest part,' or 'all in effect.' And in this sense the Article is true, since the officers arms, and troopers swords, in respect of all the other arms there left, were not considerable.

3. Most of all the officers arms and troopers swords were taken from them by the enemy, as the Defendant confesseth in his Answer, and we have proved; and if any escaped with their arms by chance, yet all their arms were quite lost as to the state, which had no benefit by, nor account of them: therefore in this regard the Article is most true.

Secondly, He denied 'he surrendered the City and Castle against the Parliament's and his Excellency's consents, though it is true he did it without their previous consents.'

To which Mr. Prynne replied, That this was a very frivolous distinction: For 1. Christ himself by this speech, 'He that is not with me is against me,' resolves, that what is done without the Parliament's and his Excellency's consents (especially if they dislike and disavow it afterwards) is done 'against their consents,' and that in strict propriety of speech: hence, if a man's servant, cattle, without his privacy or approbation, commit a trespass, in his neighbour's ground, or if one casually tread upon another's toe, he usually saith in these and such like cases, 'It was against my will, or against my liking and consent.' Bristol therefore being undoubtedly surrendered not only beyond, but contrary to the Parliament's and his Excellency's expectations and desires, was certainly surrendered against their wills and consents, as well as without them.

2. The Parliament's and his Excellency's express will and intention was, that Bristol should be kept to the utmost extremity, and not surrendered to the enemy, this being the end wherefore they placed a governor and garrison there, and made works about it: the surrendering therefore of it, contrary to both their express wills and directions, must needs be not only without, but against their wills and consents. This all the world knows, unless the Defendant can shew their express consents thereto.

3. The House's and his Excellency's former opinions of, and calling him to an account heretofore, and now into judgment for this Surrender, as directly contrary to his trust, and their directions, is a sufficient proof it was not only besides, but against their consents: and to think or speak otherwise, is but to lay a grand imputation on the Parliament and his Excellency, in making them accessaries to this dishonourable, traitorly action, which hath almost lost the kingdom.

Thirdly, He alledged that four days before the siege he sent one Scotten with a Letter to his Excellency, to acquaint him with the weakness of the garrison, that he had not above 900 men besides citizens, as likewise to see the estate of his army, and crave speedily succours from him: That he found his Excellency had but 4,000 foot able to march, many of his men being then sick, and not in a marching condition to relieve him; that it was clear, they could not expect, nor have had any relief in six or eight weeks time. And to justify this despair of timely succours, he produced a Letter written by his Excellency to the lord Say, his father, to this effect; 'That he was sorry Bristol was in so much danger, as by col. Fiennes Letter to him it seemed to be; and that himself at that present was not in a fitting posture to relieve it, which troubled him the more, for that his lordship's son was engaged there;' (which Letter being read, Mr. Prynne inquiring the date thereof, found it dated the 28th July, two days after the Surrender of Bristol, which was on the 26th of that July.) From all which the Defendant inferred the necessity of surrendering the Town and Castle, for want of succours: which had they been near, he could have made a shift to have held out three or four days longer, and would have done it: but being hopeless of relief, he could not in point of soldiery or policy have held it longer than he did.

To which Mr. Prynne replied, 1. That he did but his duty in sending thus to his Excellency, and that this would no more excuse his Treachery and Cowardice in surrendering the Town, than Weston, Gomineys, and the bishop of Norwich, their sending to the governor of Calais, and the lords of the council, for timely relief, did excuse them.

2. That in this Message and Letter to my Lord General, but four days before the siege, he complained neither of want of ammunition, victual, monies, nor of the weakness or intenuability of the works, town, or castle, (which doubtless he would have done had there been real cause) but of the smallness of the garrison, which he said were then but 900, besides citizens. But our Witnesses [Colonel Stevens, Arthur Williams, Able Kelly, major Wood, and others.] prove expressly, that at the time of the siege he had at least 2,000 foot and 300 horse, besides volunteers, which were near 200 more: and major Allen attested, that he brought near 200 men well armed from Malmsbury, but a day or two before the Siege; so as his 900 men were increased to 2,500 men, or more; and he might have raised (as Mr. Powel his own witness attested) at least six or eight thousand able men more, to bear arms, in the City, had he wanted men: Therefore the want of men was but a pretence. Besides, had he needed only men, why did he advise sir W. Waller to march out with at least 500 horsemen lest they should have helped to have spent the provision of Bristol? as he confesseth in this Relation; p. 12. Certainly, either he thought the Town tenable with the men he had, till all the provision in it were spent, and so the garrison strong enough to defend it whilst they had victuals, or else he desired rather to spare the victuals for the enemy, (to whom they were surrendered) than for sir W. Waller's men who (had they staid in the City) would have made up his garrison 800 horse, besides 2,000 foot, and in all probability have preserved the City, which was partly lost (as himself confesseth) by the cowardice of the horse, who refused to charge the enemy when they entered, whom they might easily have cut off, had they but charged them, as they might and should have done. In brief, the Defendant's own Relation and Letter to his Excellency inform us, that his garrison consisted of at least 2,000 foot, and 300 horse, and was so strong and sufficient, that when the enemy stormed the Town on every side with all their forces, they were valiantly repulsed, with the loss of near 1,000 of their best men, besides 700 wounded; whereas he lost not above six or eight men at most, and had very few or none wounded. If then the garrison were thus sufficiently strong to repulse the enemy with so great loss, when their army was strongest and best in heart, much more must it be sufficient to repulse them, and keep the Town, when near 1,000 of their best men were slain, and 700 more wounded, with the loss of six or eight only of the garrison, the assailants being much weakened, and defendants as strong or stronger, and more courageous, by reason of their good success, than they were at first.

3. To his despair of succours in six or eight weeks time, by reason of the weakness or sickness of the army, it was answered, (1.) That as hope is the last thing that forsakes a valiant man, so it is the first that deserts a coward, who placeth his confidence any where rather than at home in his own bosom.

(2.) That no man, much less a Christian and soldier too, ought to despair of God's providence and protection in a just cause, even where he can see no human probability of succours; but ought to 'wait and trust on God to the utmost extremity,' who many times sends relief, 'exceeding abundantly, beyond all men can ask or think,' as he did to Jerusalem, Samaria of old, and to Rachel of late. Audaces fortuna juvat, was the heathen observation: fortes Deus adjuvat, the Christians. His causeless despair then of timely relief from God or man, the Parliament or his Excellency, argued not only want of courage, but faith too, both in God and man.

(3) Valiant Massey, if this plea might be admitted, had far more cause to despair of timely relief than the Defendant, for both Fiennes and Clifton his lieutenant professed openly, after the Surrender of Bristol, 'That they would be hanged if Gloucester could hold out two days, if the enemy came before it;' and col. Pury and capt. Parry deposed, 'That the walls and works about it were weaker than Bristol's, their garrison not above 1,500, club men, and all their powder not above 32 single barrels, besides what they made during the siege, their provisions not so plentiful as Bristol's, their cannon but seven or eight;' whereas Bristol had 55 cannon, besides sir Francis Popham's pieces; the enemies before Gloucester almost 10,000 more than those that besieged Bristol, and likewise accompanied with the King's personal presence. Besides, his Excellency's Army by reason of sickness, was now far weaker, and more unable to relieve Gloucester, than it was when it should have marched for Bristol's relief; yet notwithstanding all these discouragements, and the great damage and discouragement the sudden unexpected loss of Bristol struck into all mens spirits, Massey and Gloucester men did not basely yield up the Town to the enemy, as soon almost as they came before it: but relying on God's providence, and the Parliament's care to the uttermost, received timely relief from both; in less than three weeks after they sent for succours: as Bristol doubtless would have done, had col. Fiennes had so much true faith and valour as Massey had.

Now, that Bristol would have been relieved far sooner than Gloucester, Mr. Prynne proved by these Arguments:

1. Because my Lord General's Army was in a far better condition almost by half to march when Bristol was besieged, than it was at the siege of Gloucester, the number of it being much decreased by sickness in the interim, and their courage and spirits much daunted by Bristol's unexpected Surrender in so short a time, upon such dishonourable terms, which he doubted not all the whole Council present could experimentally attest.

2. The Parliament, his Excellency, London, and the whole kingdom, looked upon Bristol as a place of the greatest consequence of any in England, next to London, as the metropolis, key, magazine of the West, which would be all indangered, and the kingdom too by its loss; as a town of infinite more consequence than Gloucester; by the gaining whereof the enemy would be furnished with all manner of provisions and ammunition by land, with a navy and all merchandize by sea, and enabled to bring in the strength of Wales and Ireland for their assistance: Therefore being of so great concernment; the Parliament, his Excellency, London, and the kingdom, would have been far more careful to relieve it in due time, than they were or would have been to relieve Gloucester, of which they had yet a special care.

3. Bristol was a town of far greater commerce with London than Gloucester, many Londoners having a great part of their trading and estates too in it; therefore this particular interest would have made the Londoners more forward to march to relieve Bristol than Gloucester.

4. Col. Fiennes and the citizens of Bristol had more powerful active friends in both houses, and about his Excellency, (as his letter to the lord Say imports) to solicit and expedite their relief, than Massey or Gloucester had; therefore though the Parliament and his Excellency were very ready to have sent timely relief to both, yet in all probability Bristol, in these respects, had been sooner relieved, had it held out, than Gloucester was or could have been; the rather, because the loss of Bristol made many men fall off from the Parliament, more to stand as neutrals, and damped the activity and spirits of most men.

(4.) It was answered, that the Defendant produced no Proof of his despair, but only his Excellency's letter written and sent to the lord Say, not to him, and dated two days after the Surrender made. This therefore could be no ground, no cause at all of the Surrender, which so long preceded it.

To supply this oversight and defect, colonel Fiennes next day produced a witness, to prove, that the day before the Surrender there came one into Bristol, who reported that the Lord General's army was very weak, and in no posture to march. But who it was, or whence he came, or how he came in thither, the Town being beleaguered, or whether the Governor ever had any certain information of this report, there was not the least shadow of proof.

(5.) It was replied that if a Governor's groundless surmise of an improbability of timely supplies, might be a good excuse to surrender a Town, the strongest, best furnished Towns and Forts in the kingdom might be betrayed, surrendered to the enemy in a moment under this pretence. Col. Massey might then upon far better grounds have surrendered Gloucester to the king the first day: the earl of Stamford, Exeter; and col. Warnlow, Plymouth, the second day they were besieged; than the Defendant Bristol on the third day, since there was a far greater improbability of relieving any of these in time, than of Bristol. And by this reason, had col. Fiennes been furnished with men, ammunition, victuals, to have kept the Town five or seven weeks longer, yet, by this way of arguing, he would certainly have surrendered it when he did, (in less than three days space) and not have kept it to the fifth or seventh week's end; because he conceived an improbability of relief in eight weeks time, out of a panic fear, or out of a mere design to colour his Surrender. He should have therefore held it to the uttermost extremity, and God, or our vigilant Parliament, no doubt, by that time would have sent relief, as they did to Gloucester; or if none had come, he had then discharged his duty, and been excused; but since he kept it not to the last, but prejudged God's, the Parliament's, and his Excellency's care to relieve him in due season, his fault is inexcusable and capital.

Fourthly, He alledged, 'That he did not surrender the City, Castle, Arms, &c. traitreously,' and that that no treachery was proved against him.

To which Mr. Pryn answered: 1. That though there were no direct proof of any correspondence or intelligence with the enemy; yet if they were surrendered before uttermost extremity, the very law itself, and the Letter of the Ordinances for war, resolve this to be Treason. And being thus Treason, even in point of law, he needed no other proof that it was traitreously surrendered, but the law and fact itself: And we ought to charge it in the impeachment, that it was 'traitreously surrendered,' as the law resolves it to be, else the impeachment was not good in law, neither could judgment be given on it. Hence by the rules of the common law, if a man be indicted of any crime which is treason, felony, or burglary by the law, the indictment must run, that he committed the crime, proditorie, felonice, or burglariter, else the Indictment is vicious and defective. Therefore, by like reason, the surrendering of any Fort, before utmost extremity, being treason, it ought to be charged in the Articles, 'That it was treasonably surrendered,' and for this end was inserted the word 'Treasonably,' in the Articles.

2. It was answered, That Fear and Cowardice were the most traitorly passions of all others: These have caused many to betray their own reason, senses, liberties, laws, estates, trusts, friends, countries, kingdoms, souls; whence we find the fearful, marshalled in the very front of those, 'Who shall have their part in the lake that shall burn with fire and brimstone;' and quite 'exploded out of God's temporal and spiritual militia.' Therefore if he surrendered them out of fear or cowardice only, though without any traitorly compact with the enemy, the surrender is properly styled 'Traitorous,' as well as 'Cowardly,' even in reality and law.

3. It was answered, That though there were no direct treachery charged or proved in the 4th Article, yet there were vehement presumptions, suspicions of it, which oft-times cast and condemn persons, murderers, traitors, as experience manifests, as well as positive proofs, directly charged, and should be proved against him in the seventh; which we would here make use of and bundle up together. First then, his own frequent Confessions in his Answers, 'That he never undertook to keep or not deliver the City or Castle to the enemy without the Parliament's and his Excellency's previous consents: That they neither in honour nor justice could expect such a promise from him: That he ought not to have kept the Castle when the enemy had entered the line, but ought to have surrendered the same, although tenable, to the enemy, together with the City, by the principles of honesty and justice, the rules of wisdom and discretion,' &c. coupled with this wilful 'misinforming of the council of war,' when they met about a parley, 'that there were not above 20 barrels of powder left in the Castle,' (whenas they were 70 French barrels, besides what was in the Forts and City) and not above 3 or 400 weight of match: and commanding Mr. Hassard the store-keeper to say there was no more, as he confessed to capt. Birch, whenas Mr. Hassard deposeth there were 50 barrels of powder, and at least 1,400 weight of match, besides as much more as 4 horses could draw, brought into the Castle that morning (as Arthur Williams and Joan Batten deposed) and 140 bundles, as capt. Bushe affirmed, of purpose to draw the council to a present parley and surrender, were vehement presumptions, and circumstantial proofs of treachery and indirect dealing: All which being compared with the Depositions of capt. Lloyd and Thomas Munday, That the Defendant called Munday 'saucy knave, when he informed him and Langrish of the danger and weakness of the very place where the enemy the next morning entered, refusing to strengthen the guards there as he was advised by him,' and appointing major Langrish (a noted coward, formerly complained of to him for his cowardice and negligence) to guard this weakest place, who never once offered to charge the enemy, but gave them leave to enter, and yet he never questioned him for this treachery, but countenanced him by his favour, justified him in print, and produced him before the council as a competent witness: With his refusing to send away the prisoners in the Castle before the siege, upon sir William Waller's advice; saying, 'That he would detain them there to make his conditions the better if the enemy came before Bristol' (attested by sir William, col. Cook, and confessed by himself with his speeches to Mr. Talboyes, (who moved him to respite a Delinquent's payment of a sum of money till St. James-tide, then ensuing; that he knew not whether he should be at Bristol, at St. James-tide, &c. which made Mr. Talboyes then presently conceive he intended to surrender the City about that time, (as he did the next day after St. James's day, viz. July the 26th, 1643,) whereupon Mr. Talboyes presently removed and left the City; with his prohibiting John Warden the Gunner, (as Richard Butler deposeth) 'under pain of death, to shoot any granadoes at the enemy, when he pressed him that he might do it,' which made him say 'they were betrayed.' All these particulars laid together, and coupled with capt. Roper's Deposition, that the lady Newport told this as a special secret to the countess of Desmond, at her being in Oxford, a little before Bristol was besieged, that this city would be surrendered to the king as soon as his forces came before it; (which capt. Roper further attested from the mouth of the right hon. the earl of Denbigh, that there were divers wagers laid at Oxford, and offered to be laid in and near London, as soon as the siege of Bristol was spoken of, that this Town would be surrendered the 26th of July, the very day it was afterwards yielded up; the calling his men off the line under pain of death, and not suffering them to fall on the enemy, which made many then say, 'they were betrayed,' with his late and slender salley. All these particular circumstances annexed to the premises, and subsequent matters seriously pondered, are sufficient to make a vehement suspicion, if not a punctual evidence, that Bristol was not only cowardly, but traitersly delivered, as well in a proper as a legal sense, notwithstanding the Defendant's flourishes to the contrary, till time shall discover the obscured secrets of this mystery more apparently to the world.

His Fifth Allegation was, 'That the Town and Castle were not cowardly surrendered.' Before he came to make this good by Proofs and Arguments, he first excepted against our Witnesses to prove the Surrender cowardly, because some of them were women, others enemies, who were not competent witnesses, and were ready to slander their opposites.

To which Mr. Prynne replied, 1. That some of the witnesses only were women, and those seconded by men. 2. That they declared not their own weak opinions, but the judgments of men; yea of the enemy's own commanders, in private serious conference among themselves, as well as in open discourse to others. 3. That these women-witnesses, and other females in the City, shewed more true courage and undauntedness than the Defendant and some of his officers, working boldly in the face of the enemy, where they durst not appear; opposing a Parley when he sent out twice for it, and offering to go in person with their children into the very mouth of the cannon to dead the bullets, if the soldiers were afraid, rather than the City should be surrendered; Being then such masculine females as these, he thought them meet witnesses to prove the Surrender cowardly. 4. To the testimonies of the enemy he answered, that it was in this case the best and strongest of any other, it being the natural disposition of every soldier that takes any strong Fort or City, to extol the enemy's valour, and difficulties of winning it as much as possible, the more to advance their own prowess. It is no great honour, in any man's judgment, to conquer a coward, or place not tenable; therefore those who detract from their enemy's valour or strength, derogate most from their own honour, conquest, prowess, and as much disparage themselves as their enemies thereby. Since then the enemy, both in private discourses among themselves, and in conference with others, so frequently censured this surrender as cowardly, taxed the Defendant for a coward, and confessed they could not have taken the Town, nor all the devils in Hell the Castle, had the Defendant held them valiantly out against them, and not cowardly surrendered them beyond their expectation; their testimonies, backed with the premises, [Mary Smith, Ethelred Huddy, Joan Battin, Joseph Proud, Mich. Sparkes, Nich. Collins,] must be a most convincing evidence in this particular.

Secondly, he objected, That Mr. Prynne had been tampering with some witnesses, and urging them to testify against him; for which he produced two instances: The first was, that Mr. Prynne urged Mr. Hassard, who kept the stores in Bristol castle, to attest there were no more than fifty barrels of powder therein when it was surrendered; insomuch that Mr. Hassard told him, he would not go against his conscience. Secondly, that he meeting with lieutenant col. Davison in the street, offered him a quart of wine, pressing him to go to a tavern, and to set down what he could attest touching his advising col. Fiennes to sally out upon the enemy as soon as they entered, and his dislike of drawing his men from the line, and his refusing to follow this advice: which he denying to do, Mr. Prynne told him that he was engaged to give in his testimony, because col. Fiennes had given him the lye in print, in his reply to Mr. Walker. And for proof hereof he produced two witnesses, that Davison told him this story in his chamber in Arundel house, in the presence of the lord Say his father.

To which unexpected false calumny, Mr. Prynne returned this answer, which he was ready to attest on his oath: First, That being summoned by the Defendant himself to appear before a Council of War, to make good what he had written concerning the Surrender of Bristol, he did thereupon repair to Mr. Hassard, and other witnesses present at the siege, to desire them to witness the truth only of what they knew touching that action, which he might lawfully do: and because Mr. Hassard kept the magazine, he desired him to inform him how many barrels of powder there were in the Castle when it was surrendered; who thereupon answered, there were fifty: upon which he demanded, whether there were no more than fifty? for he had sundry witnesses to prove that he confessed to capt. Birch and Arthur Williams, that there were sixty; and to major Wood, that there were seventy barrels left when it was surrendered; and capt. Bushel (then prisoner) affirmed he found no less than seventy barrels there: if then there were no more than fifty, he should do well to declare the utmost number which he certainly knew to be there. To which he answered, he did think there were more than fifty barrels, but how many more he could not certainly depose; and therefore he would rather testify less than there were, in setting down fifty generally, without adding his negative to it, 'and no more', which he durst not swear, for then he was sure not to wrong his conscience. To which master Prynne replied, that he desired him by no means to wrong his conscience in testifying more than the truth, but to keep a good conscience in witnessing the full truth, and not concealing any thing to smother truth. At last Hassard said, that he was not willing to appear against col. Fiennes, for he had lost most of his estate in Bristol, and that there were arrears of pay due unto him, for payment whereof the Colonel had lately given him a bill under his hand, and if he should lose his arrears, it would go hard with him. Whereupon master Prynne then answered, he would not press him to any thing to his prejudice, and so left him, he promising to give in his Deposition in writing to the Advocate, which he never did. And whether this were tampering with witnesses, or who had tampered most with Hassard, he or the Defendant, against whom he was unwilling to testify the truth, or all the truth, he humbly submitted to their honourable judgments.

Secondly, For licut. Davison, Mr. Prynne protested, he never saw the man till he came voluntarily to him in Westminster-Hall, and told him freely, without any inducement on his part, that he was in the siege of Bristol under col. Fiennes, and after that in the siege of Gloucester; from whence coming lately to London, he met with a printed book writ by col. Fiennes in disgrace of Mr. Walker, wherein he had given him the Lye, and a base Lye in the margin, to his dishonour; whereupon being sensible of this open injury, he repaired to col. Fiennes to Arundel house, and there in the lord Say's presence, challenged him for giving him the Lye in print without cause, desiring him to give him public satisfaction, or else he would take satisfaction himself, for he would not take the Lye from any man in England: and withal told him to his face, that he did advise him not to draw the soldiers from the line, but to fall upon the enemies presently, and cut them off, as they might have done with ease; but he rejected his advice, called off the men, and so not making a timely salley, lost the town. Whereupon the lord Say answered, 'See, you must take heed how you wrong any gentleman of quality, especially in print; and if you have wronged this gentleman, you may do well to right him.' Upon which col. Fiennes confessed before his father, he did give him such advice, and that he had done him wrong in putting the Lye over against his name: but it was much against his will, through his boy's negligence; for after he had sent the copy of his reply to the press, wherein the Lye was written in the margin against his name, he remembering this mistake, sent his boy purposely to the printer to charge him to blot it out and not print it, which it seems his boy then neglected; but he would see it put out in the next edition. Whereupon I seeing his freeness with me, and thinking his testimony material, told him that the Surrender of Bristol was now brought into question before a Council of War by Mr. Fiennes himself, whom I and Mr. Walker were summoned to prosecute; and therefore we should desire his presence as a witness there, and so we parted then. Soon after the Council of War was adjourned; and then meeting with licut. Davison (who made the same relation to above twenty more, in Westminster-Hall, as he had done to me) he told me he was going suddenly out of Town to Gloucester: I desired him to testify his knowledge touching the premises before the Advocate ere he departed; whereupon he told me, that the lord Say was his very good friend, and had promised to help him to his arrears, and therefore he was loth to appear in the business, there being other witnesses sufficient. To which I answered, I would have the Judge-Advocate's warrant to bring him in as a witness, and then no exceptions could be taken; which warrant when I had procured, I coming from the Advocate's, casually met Davison on horse-back above Ludgate, near the Advocate's lodging in Paul's Church-yard, where asking of him how long he stayed in Town, he answered, that he was to depart to Gloucester the next morning: Whereupon I told him, I had a warrant to bring him in as a witness from the Advocate, who was then in his lodging, which was close by; and therefore since he was to depart so soon, I desired him to go with me then to the Advocate to set down his testimony upon oath; which he excused, saying, he had promised to meet some friends to drink a quart or two of wine with them before his departure; and so we parted without more discourse. And was this a tampering, only to desire a witness to set down what he voluntarily informed me, before the Advocate, when I had a warrant to examine him? As for offering him a quart of wine, or inviting him to a tavern to drink, I protest I never did it; and am so averse from such a courtesy, that, to my remembrance, I have never these eighteen years space, gone into any one tavern in London, or elsewhere, to give or receive one quart of wine, but only to eat of breakfast or dinner; and therefore it is very improbable I should proffer this courtesy, unto him, who, as I discovered then by his discourse, had drank sufficiently before, and was going (as he told me) to drink more. But what I proffered him a quart of wine, and that in the open street, was a quart of wine, think you, so considerable a thing as to tempt or corrupt a witness of that quality? or the open street a fit place for such a purpose, where so many saw and over-heard us? Certainly if this gentleman were so ignoble as to be corrupted with so poor a courtesy as a quart of wine in the open street, I am certain his arrears of pay, in col. Fiennes's own private chamber in Arundel house, where he had fair promises to receive them, are far more prevalent temptations to corrupt, and keep him back from appearing here in person, whither the Defendant might have brought him to testify my tampering with him, had he pleased, he being still in London, and under his command, though he will not appear upon our summons to testify the truth. But if he be such a one as col. Fiennes would intimate him, (though I have a better opinion of the gentleman's honesty) that a quart of wine will buy him more than truth, I should rather want his testimony, than put him to his oath, were he now present: But being neither examined by us, nor yet intended to be, this imper-

But because col. Fiennes hath now given me this just occasion, I shall in the third place (which otherwise I should have concealed, but that his aspersions have provoked me to allege it by way of just defence) truly inform your lordships: First, what advantages, obligations, and engagements he hath upon his own witnesses, which may probably sway them to over-much partiality in their testimonies, of which we are wholly destitute in respect of ours. Secondly, How the Colonel and his agents have tampered with, affronted, threatened and abused our witnesses. 1. Most of the material witnesses in this cause were the Defendant's own officers and soldiers, from whom they expect not only future preferments, but their arrears of pay, which they were in danger to lose if they should either appear against him, or he miscarry in this Case. Upon this ground not only Mr. Hassard, as you heard, was unwilling, and Davison refused to give in his testimony, but one capt. Oland, (as appears by capt. Harrington's Deposition) with sundry other material witnesses, denied to speak what they knew: and some of his officers, since they came hither to witness for him, have said, that if the cause went with him, (as they made little question but it would) they should have all their arrears paid, else they should lose them. Now whether the promise of arrears be not a tampering with, and the loss of them a threatening or terrifying of witnesses, we leave your lordships to resolve. Besides, Mr. Sprig (secretary to the lord Say) went to a noble knight's lodging at St. Albans, produced as a witness by the Defendant, that same morning he was to give in his testimony, with this strange prologue to an evidence, 'that col. Fiennes presented his respects to him, and desired him to come that morning to the council of war to give in his testimony for him; and that his lord likewise desired to be remembered to him, and to let him know that 200*l.* (of the 500*l.*) doe unto him, was ready for him at London upon his return, and the rest of the money should be ready for him as soon as it could be provided,' which capt. Harrington, then present in the knight's chamber, heard and deposed; nor could, nor did Sprig deny he delivered such a message, but said he had no ill intentions in it. To which I replied, that whatever his intentions were, the words spoken at that season, and upon that occasion, tended more to corrupt a witness, than my offering a quart of wine in the open street did (had I offered it, as I did not) which was so much insisted on. And though I knew the knight so well, that no offers whatever could corrupt him; yet how such speeches might work on other witnesses who expected debts and arrears from the Colonel, I could not divine; and those who durst use such tempting speeches so openly in St. Albans during the Trial, would probably make use of the like, or worse temptations in private to witnesses, to corrupt or take off their testimony. However the court by this might clearly discern, which side was most guilty of tampering with witnesses. 2. That some of our witnesses sent for thither by the Defendant, had been openly abused, affronted, quarrelled with by the Defendant and his witnesses, even in the Council's presence, and elsewhere: as namely capt. Bagnal, who, though an extraordinary friend to the Defendant, (for whom he took two journies to London for a Commission at his own charge, and raised a company to defend the Town) yet merely for testifying the truth impartially, was strangely questioned and affronted by the Defendant himself, abused with ill language, taxed with perjury, quarrelled with by Scotten, who gave him the lie in the Council-Chamber, before your honours were departed thence) challenged, scorned, reviled, threatened to be mischiefed, (for all which affronts we crave your justice.) And if our witnesses be thus affronted, menaced, abused in your very presence, how think you were others dealt with behind your honours and our backs, to strangle truth? A vehement argument all hath not been rightly carried on that side.

I shall next consider the great difficulties on our parts to procure, and the impossibility to suborn the Witnesses we produce. First, All our witnesses for the most part, are strangers to us, all of them better known and more obliged to the Defendant than to us: they are persons disinterested, disengaged, who neither gain nor lose by the Trial, however the sentence go; they were never under our service, power, or commands, most of them were such who served the state gratis, and were no mercenaries in that service. We are no ways allied to them, have no command over them, no arrears or debts to pay them, no rewards or preferments to bestow upon them, no engagement to allure or enforce them; whereas, on the contrary, the Defendant hath all the advantages and bonds that can be, tending to partiality over his witnesses. Many of them are testes domestici, as his brother, kinsmen, servants, footboys; most of the rest his officers and soldiers, against whom we excepted as incompetent. First, Because they were parties in this case, joining with the Defendant in a Petition to his Excellency for this Trial, which was granted at their request, as the Proclamation of his Excellency attests. Secondly, Because they were confederates, and equally guilty with him in this Treason of surrendering Bristol, most of them being of his Council of War, and consenting to this act; which if it prove capital and criminal in him, will likewise be so in them: in swearing therefore to acquit him of this Treason in which themselves are involved, they do in verity swear to acquit themselves, and one to justify and excuse the other, which ought not to be admitted; for then the foulest treachery that is might and would be excused, yea, the greatest Traitors acquitted, if one might testify for the other in that particular crime whereof they all stand guilty,

3. Because they all depose, as for their own lives and safeties, so likewise for their own honour, reputation and reparation; some of them in their speeches now, and most of them in their Petition to his Excellency, demanding reparation in their honour from us by this very Trial: and so are both parties and witnesses in this respect, very unequal to be admitted.

4. Some of them have carried themselves as passionately in this case as parties, in menacing and abusing our witnesses, and ourselves too, threatening no less than hanging to us for questioning this Surrender, if the Defendant be acquitted; and can such be competent witnesses?

5. He hath very strong obligations upon most of them, the bond of consanguinity and alliance; they are his kinsmen: of superiority and command; they were his officers, soldiers, servants, advanced by him at first, and preferred or promised preferment by him since: the bond of sundry debts and arrears due to them from him, which they are promised to receive if he be acquitted, and expect to lose if once condemned. And what strong engagements, what great advantages all these are to tempt or corrupt witnesses on his part, and silence them from testifying ought against him on our part; and how far forth such witnesses, who appear thus to be parties, shall be allowed of in this case, especially such as are participes criminis (adjudged incompetent by all laws) and guilty of the same Surrender, we shall humbly refer to your just considerations.

3dly. The Defendant answered to an objection made by Mr. Prynne; To wit, That it must needs be cowardly surrendered, because the enemies that very morning were valiantly repulsed in all places (but that one, where only 150 of them entered) with the loss of 700 men's lives, and as many more wounded, whereas the garrison then lost not above 3 or 4, and had scarce any one man dangerously hurt in the assault; so as the enemy by this great loss was far weaker, the garrison much stronger, and more courageous than before: Whereto he briefly answered, that the slaying of 700, and wounding 700 more, was not so great a loss and discouragement to the enemy, as the entry of the line was an encouragement.

To which Mr. Prynne replied, 1. That those who entered the line, by their own confessions, were so far from receiving encouragement by it, that they gave themselves all for dead men, and had no other hopes but to be quite cut off. 2. Their companions, discouraged with the general repulse in all other places, knew not of their entry in two full hours space, during which time their powder was quite spent, that they might have been all cut in pieces, had the Defendant done his duty. 3. A whole regiment of their horse retreated four miles off, with a resolution never to come on again. Therefore the entry of so small a party, compared with their great loss, could be but a very poor encouragement, since they might have been so easily repulsed at the first, and sent back by Weeping-Cross unto their retreated companies.

After this he descended to his Arguments, to prove the Surrender not cowardly.

His first Argument was this, That he was no coward, as appeared; 1. By his apprehending and sending away col. Essex: 2. By his apprehending and executing the conspirators at Bristol in the midst of the city, even at noon-day: 3. By quelling the malignants, and disarming the Train-Bands of the city! 4. By his valiant behaviour at Worcester, where he and his brother, when the forces were there routed, were some of the last officers that came off the field: 5. By his charging at Keinton Battle, one of the next to sir William Balfour, up to the cannon of the enemy, when the horse killed the cannoneers, as they lay under the carriages; and by other following particulars: Ergo, he did not cowardly surrender Bristol.

To which Argument, Mr. Prynne replied: 1. In general, That they did not charge him in the Articles to be a coward, which was not now in issue; nor yet, that he had shewed himself cowardly in all actions since he was Governor of Bristol; but only, 'That he had cowardly surrendered Bristol;' And, in hoc individuo he did and might deal cowardly, though he might be valiant in other particulars.

2. That the Argument was a gravis non sequitur; for as a very coward may now and then do valiantly upon occasion, and yet be no valiant man; (as sometimes 'desperatio timidos fortes facit,' an experimental proof whereof we find in timorous stags, who run away at the barking of the smallest cur, yet will encounter both dogs, horses, and men in extremity, when they are at a bay, and can run no farther;) so a valiant man may sometimes commit a cowardly action, and yet be no habitual coward. To put this out of question, We have a memorable example in the apostle Peter, who though he were of a bold resolute spirit, and no doubt the stoutest of the Apostles; as appears by his adventuring (at Christ's command) to walk out of the ship upon the sea itself in the midst of a storm; his resolute telling our Saviour, 'That though all else should be offended and forsake him, yet he would not; and though he should die with him, yet he would not deny him,' (which all the other Apostles likewise protested, each for himself;) by his resolute drawing out his sword to rescue Christ when he was apprehended by the high-priest's servants, his cutting off Malchus's ear therewith, his not putting up his sword, nor giving over fighting till Christ commanded him; and by his following our Saviour into the very high-priest's hall, when the other disciples forsook him and fled: (all acts and arguments of extraordinary courage) yet after he saw Christ brought into question for his life, he suddenly degenerates so far from his former magnanimity, through a pusillanimous fear then seizing on him, that at the very voice of a silly maid, and a high-priest's servant, he no less than thrice denied the knowledge of his master Christ, and that with bitter oaths and execrations: Should Peter in this case argue, 'I was valiant when I walked on the sea; in the chamber when I told Christ I would rather die than deny him; in the garden where I fought for him; and in following him into the high-priest's hall, whither the other disciples durst not accompany me.' Ergo, I did not cowardly nor unworthily, in thus denying him thrice with oaths and curses in the high-priest's hall? Certainly, this were a most irrational, false argument; because courage in some actions, is no negation or extenuation of cowardice in others, almost in the self-same nick of time. Yet this is col. Fiennes's objected Argument; I have shewed myself courageous, (as well as Peter) in some actions; in removing col. Essex, executing the delinquents, disarming the malignants of Bristol, in the fights at Worcester and Edgehill; yea, altogether as valiant as Peter, in my vaunting words and promises, [See the Depositions of col. Strode, James Powel, capt. Bagnal, Mr. Hassard, and others.] 'That I would dispute every foot of ground with the enemy to the utmost, who should win it from me by inches; that my flag of truce should be my winding sheet: that I would keep the City, or it should keep me, or I would lay my bones therein?' (O brave vaunting Peter!) yea, I was pretty full of courage during the Siege, till the enemy entered the line, and then I was just like Peter entering the high-priest's hall; I followed the enemy afar off, and fell from fighting to parling; from defending to surrendering the City and Castle; before any out-fort taken, or one shot or assault made against City or Castle; Ergo, I did not cowardly or unworthily surrender them now, having shewed myself so valiant in deeds before.—But since Peter's pristine valorous acts, and speeches, did no ways mitigate nor extenuate, but aggravate his subsequent cowardly denials of Christ, so will the Defendant's his surrender.

3. His forementioned valourous exploits have no relation at all to the Surrender of Bristol, being of a different nature from them; his prowess therefore in the one, can never expiate, nor disaffirm his cowardice in the other, the only thing we now charge and prove, these other objected actions not being here in question.

4. He gave this Answer to the objected Particulars; so far forth only as they were applied to Bristol's Surrender, (1.) That the sudden surprisal of col. Essex, being done at a private house out of Bristol, when the Defendant had his troops about him, and col. Essex only three or four servants near him; was a greater act of prudence than courage, and a man not really valiant would have done as much: (2.) That when he apprehended the conspirators, he had the absolute command of the City and Castle, a strong garrison in both, and the major part of the City and county, siding with him: It was therefore no great argument of extraordinary valour, to apprehend them, being but few in number, weak in power, and suddenly surpris'd at unawares. And when he executed them, all the malignants were disarm'd, the whole City and country generally incens'd against them for their horrid treachery, and their party unable to make the least residence, so as a child might have put them to death as securely as the Defendant. Therefore this could be no convincing evidence of his courage. (3.) That the malignants were quell'd by the discovery of the plot; and the disarming of the Train-Bands, to arm his own soldiers and best affected citizens, was by the general consent of the mayor, sheriffs, and most part of the citizens, after the Conspiracy detected, without any the least resistance; Ergo, no act of courage, but rather of discretion or distrust. (4.) That at Worcester, all the horse were routed and fled, and his own and brother's troops among the rest, is no great argument of their valours, which received some blemish by that action: and that he and his brother were some of the last officers of horse, who there came off the field, it might be, as well because they were in the rear of all the horse and so could not possibly fly out of the field before the rest, as by reason of any extraordinary valour in them more than others, and so no convincing proof of valour in them. (5.) That his valiant charging in sir William Balfour's regiment at Edgehill, where every man did valiantly, and none turned their backs in all that brigade, can be no special proof of his courage, since every coward will charge in company where no man turneth his back, and where there is greater danger in flying than charging: However admit it were good evidence, yet this is a very ill sequel, if put into a logical form: Col. Fiennes charged valiantly with sir William Balfour at Edgehill; Ergo, he did not cowardly surrender Bristol.

His second Argument to prove the Surrender not cowardly, was his not quitting Bristol immediately upon sir William Waller's defeat at the Devises, and his raising of men, arms, and perfecting the works even after that to defend it, when many of the country-gentlemen left the town, and marched to London, with sir William Waller.

To which Mr. Prynne answered: 1. That he did but his duty in all this, which was rather an argument of his diligence than courage.

2. That it had been the greatest treachery and cowardice in the world upon sir William's bare defeat, to quit a City of so great consequence, which he was charged to keep by his commission, and in fortifying whereof he had spent so great costs, before the enemy came before it: who might probably, as things then stood, have no real intention presently to besiege it, upon that defeat.

3. Extraordinary diligence in fortifying, is the greatest argument of fear and cowardice, if not seconded with answerable prowess in defending what is fortified. A coward will sooner provide armour of proof, than a truly valiant man; since therefore the City was no longer defended, fortified and manned, this reason will rather convict than acquit him of cowardice.

4. The true reason why so many gentlemen then deserted the City, was (as themselves have confessed) not for that they deemed it untenable; but because they feared and discerned, the Defendant intended not to keep it to the last, but to surrender it to the enemy's hand; which he hath clearly enough confessed in his answer.

5. This argument in verity, is no more in effect, but a Governor provides arms, soldiers, cannons, ammunition, to defend a Town of importance, or to encounter the enemy, and then surrenders (as he hath done) in less than three days siege; or runs away after he hath stood a charge or two; Ergo, he did not cowardly herein; because he provided men and arms, whose valiant use, not diligent preparation, is the only proof of valour.

His third argument was, No man could have expected less safety of conditions than himself, he only being excepted out of the general pardon offered to the soldiers and citizens; Ergo, he surrendered it not cowardly.

To which was answered: 1. That it is probable his speedy, unexpected Surrender of the Town and Castle, before extremity, proceeded either from a fear to lose his life in holding them out till the last, or a desire to purchase his peace and pardon out of which he was formerly excepted from the King, with so rich a prize of consequence as Bristol was, which would most certainly procure it, with infinite advantage to the King, and greatest prejudice to the Parliament. 2. That if he could have expected less safety of conditions than any other, for the reason alledged, this should have rather engaged him to hazard his life in defending it to the utmost extremity, than to yield it upon any terms prejudicial to his own security, which is first provided for in the Articles.

His fourth was, That he could never have undergone more danger in the Castle had he held it, than he did in the guards, which he diligently visited; Ergo, he surrendered it not cowardly.

To which was answered, he received no hurt at the guards, and lost but six or eight men at most in the siege. Ergo, if he might with as little danger and loss have held out the Castle, his crime and cowardice was the greater in surrendering it so dishonourably without stroke, or once retiring to it.

His fifth was, from his Carriage when the enemies entered, to prevent whose taking the City, he had only two means left. The first was, to fire the suburbs, for which he issued out a warrant, which warrant was not executed, but revoked for want of men to fire them: The second was, to fire the City behind them, and so to retreat into the Castle; which he could not possibly do without the death of many innocents, men, women, children, and ruining of many men's estates: A fact so horrid, that his conscience would no ways permit its execution, he being loth to begin so ill a precedent, which would have infinitely redounded to the Parliament's dishonour. Besides, the Castle being not large enough to contain half his horse and foot, and the streets very narrow, he could not have retired into it, without great difficulty and danger of being cut off by the enemy, and those horse and foot which could not be received would have been utterly lost, and exposed to the enemy's cruelty. Upon which considerations only, not out of any cowardice, he did by Clifton's advice call a Council of War, and proposed a Parley, whereupon the Surrender ensued: Therefore it was not cowardly.

To which Mr. Bynne replied, 1. That it is apparent by this argument, that if the suburbs had been fired, the City and Castle might have been saved, and the enemy beaten out when lodged in the suburbs; therefore he ought in this case, both by the common and martial law, to have fired the suburbs to preserve the City and Castle, and must answer his negligence in not doing it; his want of men to fire the suburbs being a frivolous excuse, since he had at least 2,300 garrison soldiers; and Mr. Hassard the gunner (as he acknowledged to divers) and major Wood, with others, offered to beat, or fire them out of the suburbs, but could not be permitted, though it might have been done with ease, the houses being combustible, most of them built with timber, and that part of the suburbs not very large.

2. That between that part of the suburbs and body of the City, there was a key on the west-side of Froom-bridge, unfordable by horse or foot every tide, by reason of the waters, and at low water too, through the deepness of the mud, being so deep in most places, that men must stick fast in it (as some of the conspirators did upon the discovery of the conspiracy, who were taken sticking in the * mud :) That there is no marching over the key in file or rank, but only one by one, in confused order. That on the key-side next the City, there is a wall of stone near eight or nine foot high above the mud, which no horse can enter, nor no foot scale, unless at a slip or two, which are but narrow, and stand four or five foot above the water: That there are houses all along the key, which commanded the college-side, where the enemy entered in such sort, that none of them could offer to wade over the key, but they might be cut off with ease; that two or three pieces of ordnance planted at the head and lower-end of the key, would so scour all that passage, that none could have passed over without loss of life, and the passage there would have been so difficult, that 100 men would easily have kept out 10,000, all which was attested by col. Popham, licut. col. Paleologus, major Wood, licut. col. Andrews, capt. Bagnal, and some of his own witnesses upon cross examinations; therefore there was no danger of the enemies entry there. For Froom-gate itself, it had a new portcullis, and after the enemies entering the line, and late sally on them, the very maids and women, in the face of the enemy, made a barricado and bulwark against it 15 or 16 foot thick, with earth and sacks of wool, to keep them from entering there, being their only passage into the City from that suburbs; that above the gate was the river Froom (which runs under it) with a wall and houses between the City and it, so as the enemy might easily have been kept from entering the body of the Town, and could not have entered it without infinite loss and disadvantage.

3. That had they gotten over the key, or Froom river into the body of the City, yet the streets were so narrow and disadvantageous to the enemy, that their passage might have easily been hindered, the streets blocked up with casks, carts, sleids, stools, and a piece of ordnance or two placed at the head of every street, and the houses lined with musketeers would have scoured and secured it, that the enemy must have sustained extraordinary loss, at least 50 or 100 men for one of ours, as they lost before in the storming. Besides, they must have all marched up the hill, in paved streets, which are so slippery that the foot could have hardly stood to charge, and the horse would certainly have slipt and fallen: in regard of which disadvantages, our men having the hill, flankers, the shelter of houses, and charging downwards, must needs have repulsed them with extraordinary loss had they forcibly entered, and made a most safe retreat into the Castle at any time when they saw just cause, without any such difficulty or danger as was suggested.

4. Admit they had taken the body of the Town beyond the key, adjoining to the Castle, which they could not have done without excessive loss and great difficulty; yet all that part of the Town being commanded either by the Castle, or other forts and outworks all in our possession (as Clifton himself with other of the defendant's witnesses confessed, and major Wood proved) they could not possibly have held it long, and would have been in worse condition within it than before, and so no absolute necessity of firing it, had not his courage and conscience served him to do it.

5. For his horse and foot, incontinability in the Castle, in case he had been forced to retire into it, there were sundry other places to bestow them in besides the Castle: As, (1.) The body of the City adjoining to the Castle, which would have billeted them all till the enemy had forced it. (2.) That part of the suburbs, under the command of the Castle next to Lawford's gate, distinct from the body of the City if taken, and very defensible, the Castle and outworks then remaining ours. (3.) The out-forts, where the guards might have been doubled or trebled as there was cause, especially now when he had an overplus of men that he knew not how to bestow. (4.) That part of the City beyond the bridge in Somersetshire side, which was very capacious, able to contain all his supernumerary foot and horse, though the other suburbs and body had been taken; which part (the bridge being broken down or defended) had been inaccessible, strong, and tenable for a long time against all his majesty's forces, we having then all the out-forts in possession which commanded other parts of the Town, and Ratcliff church, Tower-Harris, and the Castle (three extraordinary strong forts) commanding and securing that part beyond the bridge; which being fenced with extraordinary strong outworks, and deep watery dikes, Tower-Harris and Ratcliff church on the one side, with the River and Castle on the other side, and strongly garrisoned with the soldiers retired from other parts, had been almost impregnable, and might have held the enemies play for sundry months, had the Defendant resolved to hold it to the utmost. Having therefore so many several safe retreats and receptacles for his horse, foot, and not making use of any of them, though he promised to dispute every inch of ground with the enemy (as he might have done with honour and great advantage) his pretence is false, his Surrender cowardly beyond all excuse.

6. He hath oft inculcated this to your honours, that the citizens were generally very malignant, and disaffected to the Parliament: and we have proved, that the most of the best affected, had carried their estates and three months provision into the Castle, where their persons and goods were by the defendant promised to be secured. His forbearing therefore to fire the City in case he had been necessitated to it, proceeded not from any public care he had of the Parliament's friends or kingdom's safety, but from his private respects to the persons and estates of malignants, which he would rather carefully preserve, to enrich, encourage, and strengthen the enemy, than fire or endanger to preserve the Parliament and kingdom. Mercy and compassion are doubtless commendable virtues in a Governor, who should not use cauteries or firing till the utmost extremity: but when such an exigency happens, that a City must be fired, or both it and the kingdom lost or hazarded, it is foolish cruelty, not Christian mercy, to be over-pitiful in such a case. It is a cruel destructive mercy to save a City (especially a malignant one, as this is averred then to have been) to destroy a kingdom, yea, our religion, laws, and liberties with it: better the greatest part of the City had been turned into ashes to preserve the Castle and other parts of it to the Parliament, and secure the realm, than to surrender the whole so cowardly, so unexpectedly, to the loss of the West, and kingdom in all probability.

7. The defendant well knew of what extraordinary concernment the loss of Bristol would be to the kingdom, of what infinite advantage to the enemy, as is evident by his own letter to my lord Say (dated March 20, 1643, before it was fortified or fully garrisoned) published in his printed Relation, page 13, where thus he writes:

' May it please your lordship to understand
' first the importance of this city of Bristol,
' &c. The enemy hath lately cast his eye
' upon it, prompted by the witty malice of ' our malignants, to espy his advantage: if he

'possesseth this city, he will reap these benefits by our loss. 1. He will get much money, arms, and ammunition, in a more cheap and less hazardous way, than he can have them out of the Low Countries; all which he will pay for with monopolies, and engrossments of trade, things with which the great ones of this town have been well acquainted, and are therefore malignant. 2. If he gain this town, he will soon subdue Gloucester, and become master of all the tract between Shrewsbury and the Lizards-Point in Cornwall, a quarter so plentiful as his plundering army yet never saw. 3. He will become master of all the traffic of that inland sea the Severn, and make all the shipping both of the Welsh and English coast his own. 4. His neighbourhood to Wales will from time to time supply him with a body of foot. 5. We shall lose a great port-town very important for the service of Ireland, and fit to give landing to the rebels of that place, or any other enemy.' Since therefore he knew this city to be of so great importance to the kingdom, and the loss of it so extraordinarily advantageous to the enemy, he should in this respect have held it out to the utmost extremity, and rather hazarded the firing of it by the enemy, which would not have done it, (especially being malignant) or by himself, than quitted both it and the Castle too, with all the ammunition, cannon, arms, provisions, colours, ships, merchandize, wealth therein, upon such poor dishonourable terms, before any out-fort taken, or one shot made against the City or Castle walls, he wanted nothing but courage to defend them, the enemy having lost so many, and himself so few in the former stormings.

His sixth Argument was, that he stood in places of greatest danger with his troop, near alderman Jones's house, where a granado falling into the midst of his troop, and hurting no man, he thereupon encouraged his soldiers, saying, That God did protect them.

To which was answered, 1. That not one of his troop, for aught appears, was ever hurt in that or any other place where he stood with them; therefore the danger was not very great. 2. That this place under alderman Jones's house, was more than cannon-proof, and more secure against the enemies shot, which the house and garden-walls guarded off, being between the enemy and his troop; therefore no place of danger but security. 3. That this granado's falling in among the troop at that time, was merely casual, and hurt not any, though it frightened many, and made the Defendant and his troop presently to remove from thence, as his own witnesses deposed. 4. Himself never charged the enemy in person with his troop after their entry within the line; his standing therefore with them in this secure place before the entry, was no great proof of his valour, much less that the Surrender was not cowardly.

His seventh Argument, to prove the Surrender not cowardly, was, That the Parley and Surrender were both agreed on by the Council of War; Ergo not cowardly.

To which was answered, 1. That himself was both the first mover, persuader of this Parley, this Surrender, and the principal man that advanced it, drawing on the rest to consent to it, and not making the least opposition against it. 2. That the Council of War, wherein the Parley was first propounded, was not general, as it ought to have been, but private, few of his officers or the gentlemen there, having notice of it, till a Parley was concluded, and a drummer dispatched twice to the enemy before they would take notice of it. At this Council no country gentlemen were present, but sir John Horner, who gave no vote, and col. Strode who voted against it, and not above six or seven officers, of which lieutenant. col. Davison, and major Holmes, were two who opposed the Parley; as for Mr. Edward Stephens, whom col. Fiennes averred in print to be present at it, he denies upon oath, that he had ever any notice of it, and so doth col. Stephens too. Being therefore such a private conventicle and no general Council, and these thus voting against the Parley, it is a greater evidence than disproof of a cowardly surrender. 3. The Defendant, and his brother John, to circumvent the Council, and draw them on both to a Parley and Surrender, misinformed them that there were but 20 barrels of powder, and 400 weight of match left; as he confesseth in his Answer to the eighth Article, commanding Mr. Hassard (who kept the stores) to affirm there was no more, when as you have heard it proved there was above three times as much more than in the Castle. His misinformation therefore being the chief motive to sway the Council to this Parley and Surrender, their consents will not excuse but aggravate his cowardice and treachery in seducing them. 4. If the Town and Castle were tenable, sufficiently provided with all necessaries for a defence, and not reduced to extremity, as we have proved, the Surrender by a Council of War will not make the cowardliness and treachery less but greater, and subject the whole Council to censure, as appears by the cases of Weston, Gormineys, and others adjudged in parliament: Otherwise, if this plea should be admitted for a justification, a governor and his officers might safely without danger betray any fort or place through cowardice or treachery, by voting it in a Council first, and then putting it in execution.

His eighth Argument was, That when he sent to the enemy for a Parley, and their hostages came to Froom-gate, which was barricadoed up, they swore, 'God damn us we will come in at Froom-gate,' (which was the nearest way) 'or have no Parley at all:' whereupon he sent them this resolute Answer, 'That they should not come in there, but at Newgate,' which they were enforced to do after much contest: Ergo the Surrender was not cowardly.

To which Mr. Prynns answered; 1. That at that time Froom-gate was barricadoed up with a bulwark of earth and wool-sacks 15 or 16 foot thick to keep out the enemy, made by the very women and maids, with the help of a few men, in a short space; and when the hostages came to that gate, the work was raised so high, that capt. Taylor, the Defendant's own witness, confessed, 'He could not see nor confer with them over it, but was enforced to go to speak with them through a window, when he received their God-damn-me Message, that they would come in at that gate, or else return;' from which window likewise he returned the Governor's Answer to them. Now to demolish such a barricado as this, to let in these peremptory hostages, and the enemy too, who might then have clear passage into the City, had been such an indiscreet and cowardly act, as was not only below the spirit of a Governor, or soldier, but of a sucking child; and would have argued the Defendant (if condescended to) a man utterly destitute, not only of courage but common discretion. 2. This braving unreasonable request argues plainly, that the enemies had a very mean conceit of the Defendant's valour, else they would never have presumed to send him such a disdainful message, which an heroic spirit would have so far resented, as not to brook a Parley upon any terms; and his not yielding to it, is no greater evidence that the Surrender following was not cowardly, than that the building of Tinterton steeple was the cause of the increase of Goodwin Sands.

His ninth Argument, was his courage and speeches at the Parley, wherein he confessed, 1. That the motion of the Parley proceeded merely from himself. 2. That the Parley was concluded on before ever the Mayor repaired to the Council. 3. He said, 'The Mayor was extraordinary fearful, and pressed earnestly for an agreement with the enemy.' 4. That when the enemy's commissioners at the Parley, upon the motion of capt. Birch, that the citizens might have liberty to carry away their estates if they pleased, stuck at this demand, he thereupon rose up, and with great earnestness protested, that he would break off the Parley, and rather lose his life, and hold and put it to the utmost extremity, than not provide for the security of the citizen's estates: which speeches he proved by the testimonies of capt. Birch and Mr. Prickman. Ergo he did not cowardly surrender the Town and Castle.

To which Mr. Prynne replied, 1. That the motion of the Parley proceeding originally from himself before any solicitation from the Mayor or Citizens, argued that himself was more fearful than the Mayor, though thus extraordinary timorous; and that both the Parley and Surrender proceeded from his excessive fear. 2. That he had here confitentem reum, that he held not the Town till utmost extremity, as his duty bound him: For he told the Commissioners, if they would not yield to secure the citizens' goods (whom he frequently brands for desperate malignants) he would then venture his life, and put and hold it to the utmost extremity; therefore he held it not, by his own confession, till such extremity: and so by the very Articles of War, and construction of law, is guilty of a cowardly and traitorly Surrender, for which he ought to die. And here observe the strange temper and guilt of the Defendant: My lords, he was constituted Governor of Bristol, not by the Mayor and Citizens, but his Excellency and the Parliament, to preserve it from the enemy's hands, rather for the kingdom's safety, than security of the malignant citizens' goods. He had formerly oft protested to the best affected soldiers and citizens, [James Powell, col. Strode, capt. Bagnal, Abel Kelly,] that, 'he would dispute every-inch of ground with the enemy, from the out-works to the gates, from thence to the Castle, whither he would make his last retreat, and there lay his bones, making his winding-sheet his flag of truce,' and the like, for the common good and security of them and the realm. But now alas, as soon as the enemy entered the line, Heu quantum mutatus ab illo? he became a quite other man; and forgetting all former valiant promises, heroic resolutions for the republic, he presently sends for a Parley, and disputes not so much as one inch of ground with the enemy near the gates or body of the City, retires not one foot towards the Castle; and instead of adventuring his life to preserve the City for the Parliament's and kingdom's safety, against the Irish rebels, and Welsh malignants incursions, he hath not so much as one word or thought tending that way: but all public engagements set aside, he now only looks after the security of his own person, and of the malignant citizens' persons and estates, for the enemies future advantage, and rather than these shall not be saved, he now protests he will lose his life, and put all to utmost extremity. Had he really intended to make good this his protestation for the citizens' benefit and safety, in case the enemies had denied his demand in their behalf, (which I much doubt of, since notwithstanding his foresaid protestations, he would not do it for the public;) I humbly conceive he ought much more in point of honour and duty to have executed it for the whole kingdom's preservation and utility; which since he did not really perform nor intend to do it, you have here confitentem reum an evidence dropping from his own mouth sufficient to condemn him: And therefore my humble motion to your honours is, that his person may presently be secured as by law it ought. The rather, because it plainly appears by all the carriages of the Defendant, from the enemy's first entry till his return to London, that this Surrender proceeded merely from timidity and cowardice at the best, as I shall evidence by these particulars.

1. By his [capt. Bagnal, William Deane, William Whithorn,] calling the soldiers from the line under pain of death, and not permitting them presently to encounter the enemy, as he was importuned by divers; and bringing them off in such confusion, that many of them left their arms, ammunition, and ordnance behind them, which might have been easily drawn off, there being so many colliers horses in the city for that purpose.

2. By giving no order nor direction to the soldiers drawn off, for any present service or salley in divers hours, by means whereof, many of them deserted their colours, [capt. Bagnal.]

3. By not employing his reserve under capt. Stokes, nor his main-guard, nor soldiers in the castle, consisting of at least 500 men, who were fresh and had been upon no service, to make a present salley on the enemy, who might with ease have been cut off by them without calling any from the line [major Wood, William Whit-horn.]

4. By his contradictory commands, and pale looks, attested by William Deane, Mary Smith, capt. Bushel, Thomas Thomas, and generally taken notice of by the soldiers.

5. By his hastiness to propound and send for a parley to the enemy, even before the salley made, as col. Strode deposed, contrary to his advice; and then again presently after the salley.

6. By the forgetfulness of all his former promises and of the very Castle itself, formerly accounted by him the strongest rampart and last retreat, where he would lay his bones [James Powel, Mr. Hassard, capt. Bagnal, col. Strode;] which was not now so much as thought on, although the magazine, ammunition, and provisions lay therein, whereby he betrayed, cheated, and undid the best affected citizens.

7. By his own confession in his Relation, p. 10, he writes, 'That all the conditions they desired were yielded to;' yet had he not then so much heart or brain left within him, as to demand or make more honourable conditions, than to deliver up the Town and Castle, with all artillery, arms, ammunition, cannon, victuals, prisoners, and colours too, which was all that could be lost or given away from the state, or to demand convenient time or carriages to convey away their goods from thence.

8. By accepting Articles in the commissioners names, when as they should have been in prince Rupert's then present, who else was not obliged to observe them; and not exacting an oath of due sufficient caution for performing them, after so many experiences of their treachery and truce-breaking.

9. By suffering one of the enemies hostages to depart the town, as soon as the Articles were concluded, and giving liberty to the other to do the like; but that major Allen coming casually into the room withstood it; by means whereof they had all been wholly exposed to the enemies mercy and sudden assaults, having no security for himself, his soldiers or the city; whereas both his hostages continued still in the enemies hands [major Allen.]

10. By his not publishing the Articles after they were concluded, till capt. Bushel, a prisoner of the enemy's party, put him in mind thereof, and published them at his request [Mr. Baynton.]

11. By suffering his men to fall off their guards, the prisoners to get loose, the enemies to enter the Town and Castle before the time appointed for the Surrender, [major Wood, Mr. Powel, capt. Bagnal,] whereby many rapines and violences were committed both on the soldiers and townsmen in the very streets and Castle, which the enemy could not prevent, and the colonel never endeavoured to see righted; which caused col. Gerrard (foreseeing some complaints would be made) to desire major Wood (who in these disorders suffered three days imprisonment there) to carry a letter from him to Nath. Fiennes, which he shewed to major Wood, to this purpose: 'That whereas many outrages had been committed contrary to the tenor of the Articles, which might haply be imputed to the king's grace, he gave him to understand that the fault was in himself, who had most unsoldierly neglected to look to the performance of them upon his party: and if this declaration did not give him satisfaction, he should be ready for further clearing of himself to wait upon him with his sword in his hand.—Your friend whom you call cavalier, Charles Gerrard.' Which letter major Wood delivered.

12. By his leaving capt. Blake, and capt. Husbands with their soldiers in Windmill-Hill and Brandon-Hill forts [capt. Husbands, Rich. Winston,] when he marched out of Bristol, and given them no notice of the Articles of Surrender, no warrant under his hand to deliver up these forts according to the Articles; the first notice they had both of the Articles and the defendants leaving the town, being given them by the enemy, who demanded the forts which they held after the governor's departure, from whom they received no order to quit them, which might have endangered their lives.

13. By his taking no care [major Wood] to march away with his men in a body, which they could not well do, because their colours and drummers were surrendered by agreement, whereby they might have been kept together for the service of the Parliament: and yet the preservation of his men and horse in a body for their present service, is the best and only reason he gives for the surrender of the City and Castle, both in his Relation, Letter, and Answer to the Articles.

14. By his cowardly and unadvised speeches concerning the intenablety of Gloucester for three day's space, if the king's forces came before it, and his discourse to Mr. Pury [Mr. Brown, Mr. Pury,] after its relief; his fear transporting him into such an uncharitable opinion, as to judge brave col. Massey as pusillanimous and cowardly as himself.

15. By his very printed Relation, Letter, Replies and Answer to the Articles; in all which the intelligent reader may palpably discern a spirit of trepidation and cowardice to have seized both on his brain and pen, which made him invent so many unworthy shifts, untrue surmises, (as of close decked boats prepared by the enemy, a resolution to storm the Castle, and to take it in two days at most, &c.) And utter so many strange paradoxes, yea contradictions unworthy a man of honour; and deny, not only col. Essex, but himself to be Governor of Bristol, or of the Castle there; of which before. If all those evidences may be credited against his bare proofless allegation, the Surrender must needs be cowardly and unworthy at the best.

Upon this col. Fiennes affirmed, That the report that Bristol was cowardly and unworthy surrendered, was first raised by Mr. Prynne, the prosecutor, in his book intitled 'Rome's Master-Piece,' p. 35, published the 1st of August 1643, within five days after the surrender of Bristol; and that before the publishing of this book, it was not so reported, nor reputed by any.

To which Mr. Prynne replied; That this was a most false calumny without the least shadow of truth; for first, though the title of his 'Rome's Master-Piece' was written and licensed for the press by a Committee of the Commons House (who earnestly desired him to translate and publish the letters and plot therein comprized, with such observations as he thought meet, and they should approve) on August 1, 1643, yet the book itself was not compiled, nor fully printed off till the end of August or after; the publication being near a month's space after the silence; before which time, not only Mercurius Aulicus had informed the world in print, 'That Nathanael Fiennes (by name, whom I named not) had bestowed Bristol on the king, &c.' which words were read out of Aulicus; but likewise many London Mercuries (and namely, that from Monday the 31st of July, till Aug. 7, p. 17.) had divulged in print, 'That Bristol was cowardly delivered to the enemy; that if col. Massey had been governor in his place it had not been surrendered at all, but held out still, &c.' And, in truth, the surrender thereof to the enemy in so short a space, was so far beyond all mens thoughts or apprehension, that the very first tidings of it made most men openly aver in every place, it was most cowardly and unworthily at least, if not treacherously surrendered to the enemies. This was not only vox populi in London, Westminster, and elsewhere, but vox parliamenti, the opinion of the Commons House (if not the Lords too) who were much dejected at the news; which the Defendant himself took notice of upon his very first entry into the House, after his return from his noble exploit; where every one looked strangely on him with a discontented aspect, and few or none of his dearest friends once moved their hats unto him, (as they usually do to all other members upon their arrival from any public service after some time, of absence;) and some of them minded him of Gominey's and Weston's case. Whereupon he, conscious to himself of the Commons general ill opinion of this action, to avoid their examination and censure, was enforced to make his apology for it openly in the House, August 5, 1643, in the close whereof (containing his bare relation, no ways satisfactory) he desired, 'That what he had affirmed might be examined at a Council of War, that so he might be cleared or condemned according as they should find the truth or falshood of what he had declared.' Which Passage of his, published in print long before 'Rome's Master-Piece,' is a pregnant evidence and acknowledgment, that the very House of Commons conceived this Surrender proceeded either from his cowardice or treachery; else there had been no need of any long apology, or such a reference as this to a Council of War. And indeed, his own printed Relation is so full of palpable shifts, and expressions of a timorous spirit, that the very reading of it confirmed me and others in this opinion, that the Surrender was cowardly or treacherous; and my passage in 'Rome's Master-Piece' concerning the inconveniencies of Bristol's surrender, with reference to the Welch and Irish rebels, were taken verbatim out of his own printed 'Relation,' p. 13, where thus he writes, 'If the enemy possessed Bristol, his neighbourhood of Wales will from time to time supply him with a body of foot. We shall lose a Port-town very important for the service of Ireland, and fit to give landing to the rebels of that place, or any other.' By all which it is clear, that I was not the first raiser of the report of its cowardly surrender, but that himself, and others then in print, had raised this report, before I published any thing to this purpose. Secondly, to put this out of question; 1st. It evidently appears by the deposition of Mr. Edward Stephens, Thomas Monday, William Deane, John Battin, Abel Kelley, Arthur Williams, Mrs. Hassard, Richard Butler, Mary Smith, Ethelred Huddy, Joseph Proud, Jeremy Halway, Anthony Gale, and others, that 'both the soldiers and citizens of Bristol were much discontented with the governor's Parley and Surrender, when it was but in agitation, and openly said they were betrayed; and that not they only, but the very enemies, concluded the Surrender to be cowardly, before we had any tidings of it. 2dly, sir John Horner, his own witness, deposeth, that in their coming up to London, before we had any notice of it, (they being the first who came thence and brought tidings of it) two or three ministers spake against it, 'as cowardly and unworthy.' 3d, Major Allen attesteth, that he and some other officers present in the siege, concluded it so in their private discourse, as they retreated from Bristol before they came to London. 4th, It was generally reported cowardly or traitorly both in London and Westminster upon the first notice of it; and some women in the streets openly called the Defendant a coward, for this unworthy action; which his own lady-mother condemned, and would not believe at first (affirming, that her son was of a more valorous spirit, and honourable extraction, than to deliver up a place of such consequence as Bristol in so short a time, where he had promised to spend his life, and lay his bones, rather than quit it;) and all this before I took any special notice of

it. Whereupon having some relation to Bristol, in and near which I had divers friends, I made a more particular enquiry into this action, from such soldiers and citizens present in the siege, who could give me the best information; and upon due examination of what was alledged on either part, I found the surrender such as I published it to be in 'Rome's Master-Piece,' by approbation of a Committee of the commons house; who both authorized the book, and concurred with me in this opinion. From all which it will appear, that I was not the raiser, nor first inventor of this bruit, 'That Bristol was cowardly and unworthily surrendered,' it being published in print by divers, and the common received opinion of all men in city and country, before I gave my censure of it, which I have here made good.

His tenth Argument was, That both the City and Castle were untenable against the enemy; Therefore the Surrender not cowardly, nor unworthy. Their intenablety, he endeavoured to prove,

1. From the weakness and insufficiency of the line, outworks, walls, fortifications both of the City and Castle.

2. From the want of a sufficient garrison to defend the town; to manifest which, he alledged, that he had not above 2,000 foot and horse to guard the place, which were not half enough, the works being near 5 miles in compass, and divided by a river, so as his men stood very thin upon the line, and had no reserves at all, unless for some particular places; by means whereof his soldiers, in most places, continued 4 or 5 days and nights together upon duty without relief. And to prove the Garrison insufficient, he insisted, (1.) On the Letter printed in his Relation, p. 14, complaining of the weakness of the Garrison of Bristol, and desiring 'an augmentation of it.' (2.) On his Excellency's Opinion, ibid, p. 16, 'who thought it necessary this Garrison should consist of 3 regiments of foot, 2 troops of horse, and 1 company of dragoons.' (3.) On a draught of an Ordinance presented to the House of Commons by the lord Say; for the settling of 'a sufficient Garrison at Bristol (ibid, p. 17,) wherein 'he propounded, that the Garrison might consist of 2 regiments of foot, the first, consisting of 1,200, the second of 1,000, the third of 800 men, and of 2 troops of horse, and one company of dragoons;' with less than which he could not possibly, as he said, maintain the City against the enemies forces that came then against it, who had few less than 70 colours of foot (lieut. Clifton affirmed, who told them) on Gloucestershire side, which capt. Husbands, telling them with his prospective-glass, multiplied the colours to 100.

3. From his want of Powder and Ammunition, 'he having no match at all, and but 50 barrels of powder left, which would not have served them above 2 days;' which he endeavoured to prove by the proportion of powder they spent in 2 days before, and by a letter from col. Waraloe from Plymouth, attested by Master Nichols, who writ, that they spent 40 barrels of powder there in 1 day, when they beat the enemy out of their works.

The City and Castle being therefore untenable in all these respects; and no succours near to relieve them in due season, his Surrender could not be deemed cowardly, but discreet and honourable to preserve the citizens goods, and the Garrison, consisting of above 1,500 foot, and horse, to serve the Parliament, (which then wanted men) in other places of advantage.

To which Particulars Mr. Prynne gave these ensuing Answers, First, That the Works about the City and Castle were very strong, defensible, tenable, against all the enemy's power, which he proved; 1. By the judgment and opinion of the Defendant himself, who never once complained of the weakness or insufficiency of the works or Castle till the Surrender, but oft affirmed the works to be very strong, sufficient, and tenable, before the siege, and that he doubted not to make them good against all the enemy's power, as col. Stephens, col. Strode, capt. Bagnal, Master Powell, with others, depose. And he publicly confesseth in his printed Relation, p. 10, that 'himself (and some others too) had a great opinion of the strength of the Castle,' before it was surrendered; though now upon a sudden, he would make your honours believe, and endeavours to prove it, the weakest most untenable piece in the world, having spent one whole day's time in demonstrating its several weaknesses, or rather in them his own, who, notwithstanding all these imbecilities, had so 'great an opinion of its strength.' And indeed did not the Defendant deem the works sufficient, the City and Castle strong, he must discover himself guilty, either of extraordinary folly, in putting the Parliament, Country, City, to so great costs to fortify, garrison, furnish the City and Castle with all necessaries to hold out a siege, if it were not really tenable, and of no considerable strength at all in the upshot; or else of extraordinary treachery, if he knew it not tenable, and yet gave it out to be very defensible, on purpose to induce the gentry and country in those parts to bring their money, plate, estates, provisions thither, as to places of strength and security, as we know they did, upon his promises to defend them to the last, that so they might become a prey to the enemies, who had all the ammunition, provisions, arms of those parts delivered into their hands at once, which they could have never gained, had not the Defendant fortified the Town and Castle, and affirmed them to be strong and tenable. Besides, his own many liberal promises to defend the Castle to the utmost, in case he was forced to retreat into it, and there to secure the best affected citizens and their goods, argues its tenability in his own apprehension. 2. As the Town, but Castle especially, was tenable in his own judgment, so likewise in the opinion of others. (1.) Of the gentry and country who repaired thither, as to a most secure sanctuary against the enemy, towards whose fortification and defence they liberally contributed. (2.) Of the citizens, who all deemed the Town, but the Castle especially, to which they carried their estates, and above 3 months provisions, to be defensible against all the enemy's power, as appears by the Depositions of James Powel, Abel Kelly, Wm. Deane, Mistress Hassard, and others, and by the 'Tragedy of Bristol,' lately published by capt. Birch, Mr. Powel and other citizens of it; who writ thus of the Castle, p. 5. 'The Castle being strongly fortified and victualled, as being the last place to retreat unto, if the Town should be taken; being assured we should be able to keep it, till relief came, as a sanctuary for the persons and estates of such as were most active for the parliament; divers of us accordingly brought in our goods, with provisions for ourselves, and to help victual the soldiers that were to be entertained in it,' &c. (3.) By the opinion of divers soldiers of our own party, as col. Stephens, col. Strode, lieut. cols. Paleologus and Andrews, major Wood, major Allen, captain Bagnal, Nicholas Cowling, Mr. Hassard, Richard Linden, Edmund Warthorne, Thomas Munday, and Richard Butler attest. (4.) By the Speech of the enemy's own commanders, who viewing the Works of the said Castle soon after its surrender, swore 'God damn them, all the Devils in Hell could not have taken the Castle, it was so fortified, had not the governor cowardly surrendered it; that they might thank Fiennes for it: and that they could not have taken the Castle, had it not been yielded up to them beyond expectation:' as Mary Smith, Ethelred Huddy, Joan Battin, T. Thomas, and Michael Spark senior, witness.

And whereas he alledged, that sir William Waller, and sir Arthur Haslerig, deemed Bristol not tenable, which he endeavoured to prove by this passage in their letter to him, dated July 1, 1643.—(attested by Mr. John Ash, and printed in his Relation, p. 27,) 'We think the enemy will fall on this night, if not, to-morrow morning; and if so, what good will this regiment do Bristol if we perish? It is a wonder to us to see our friends delay help where there is safety, &c.'—Mr. Prynne answered, 1. That this letter declares not their opinion concerning the intenable of Bristol, but their importunity to have speedy supplies from thence. 2. It expresseth that Bristol's greatest security consisted in their army's success, there being no danger of a siege as long as their army were masters of the field. 3. It proves nothing, that either the City or Castle might not have held out till relief should arrive from his Excellency, or that it could not hold out above three days longer. 4. The Defendant confesseth that had col. Popham's regiment continued in the Town, it had not been lost, and that his sending of them to sir William Waller, was the loss of the Town: therefore the Castle and Town in respect of the fortifications were both tenable, and had no want at all but of col. Popham's men, which he supplied by his new-raised regiments before the siege.

VOL. IV.

2. Whereas he alledged, that divers gentlemen left the Town, and went away with sir W. Waller, and sir Arthur Haslerig, because they deemed it not tenable;—It was answered, That the reason of their departure, as themselves have confessed, was, the fear and assurance they had, the Defendant would not hold it out to the last; whereas col. Strode, col. Stephens, and others, who had his promise to hold it out to the utmost, continued with him still.

Fourthly, It was answered, That the objected weaknesses and defects of the works and Castle, were mere inventions of the Defendant since the Surrender, not thought or spoken of before, nor once propounded at the Council of War when the Parley was in agitation; where the debate of this particular of the tenability of the Town and Castle was never disputed, for if it had, the Town would have been held some four days longer, while this point had been debated, which hath taken up four days here. As for the Castle, the Defendant himself confesseth, and his lieutenant Clifton with major Holmes depose, that in the whole debate of the Parley and Surrender, the Castle was never mentioned nor thought on: therefore the weakness and untenability of it was no ground of its Surrender, as is now pretended. Finally, the Defendant in his printed Relation, p. 9, 10, and in his Answer, affirms; 'that the cause why the Castle was not tenable against the enemy, was for want of match and powder,' not in regard of its inconvenient situation and weak fortification, the only causes now insisted on; therefore this is but a mere pretence invented since the Surrender.

To the second pretence of wanting a sufficient garrison to hold it; master Prynne answered, 1. That the Defendant had 2,000 foot besides 200 volunteers, and 300 horse and dragoons at least; which were sufficient to defend the Town against all the enemy's power, as is infallibly evident by the repulses every where given to the enemies when they stormed it, and the great slaughter of hundreds of their men, with the loss but of three or four of ours, attested by his own witness, and published in his own 'Relation' and 'Letter to his Excellency.' And if the garrison were sufficient thus to repulse the enemy in his greatest strength and assault at the very outworks, then certainly they were abundantly able to defend the Town and Castle after the slaughter and wounding of above 1,700 of the enemies, had they been discreetly and courageously commanded by him; but doubtless they were more than enough to have defended the Castle, the body of the City, and that part beyond the bridge, after the suburbs entered, and the line wholly quitted on Gloucestershire side. 2. If the garrison had been too weak, he might have raised 6 or 8,000 able men more in the City, or retained 500 of sir William Waller's soldiers, whom he sent out of the Town to save the expence of provisions. 3. The garrison soldiers that were in it, would have fought, and held the City and Castle out against the enemy, thinking themselves strong enough to do it, but the defendant would not permit them, as sundry witnesses attest; the want therefore of a sufficient garrison is but a mere pretence. 4. A garrison must be judged to be sufficient or insufficient to defend a place, only in regard of the enemy's strength that comes before it; that garrison being sufficient to defend a town against 7 or 8,000 besiegers, which perchance is insufficient to guard it against 20,000. Now we confidently affirm, that the garrison then in it, was sufficient to guard it against all the power then before it, as appears by the enemy's several general repulses with extraordinary loss to them and none to the garrison; by the enemy's paucity, not being above 7 or 8,000 at most, (most of them horse) and their quarters divided with an unfordable river, so as they could not come to rescue or relieve one the other. And whereas he pretended the enemy was near 14,000 strong, because they had about 70 or 100 foot colours only upon Durdham Down; this is a most fallacious argument: because every puny soldier knows it is a common policy in wars, to carry and display a multitude of colours more than there are companies afar off, at a distance, of purpose to amaze or terrify the opposites, and make themselves appear more numerous than in truth they are; which policy was now used. And whereas captain Husband's affirmed, that he told one hundred foot colours on Durdham Down; he saith, that it was but with his prospective-glass (an uncertain instrument to tell colours with) which multiplied the colours more than they were, lieutenant Clifton telling not seventy at most. And how full these companies under those colours were we shall produce only the testimony of Mr. Savidge a late soldier in Ireland, who deposed visa voce, 'That he was in Bristol within two days after its Surrender, when there was a general muster of prince Rupert's foot in the marsh there, at which both prince Rupert and Maurice were present, where he told, to his best remembrance, 52, but for certain above 42, of the enemies colours, which had not above 1,400 soldiers at the most belonging to them, for he particularly told, and took special notice of them: Whereupon he demanded of one of the officers on the place, why they had so many colours, and so few men? who answered, that they had many of their men slain and wounded in the siege.' So as by this account, they had more foot in the City by seven or eight hundred, when it was surrendered, than prince Rupert had without it, whose forces were most horse; and therefore a sufficient garrison to defend it against so small a force, besides, it appears by the Relation of Gloucester siege, p. 1, (attested by Mr. Pury to be true) that there were about 9,000 men more before Gloucester than there were at Bristol siege.' If then Gloucester garrison, consisting at the most but of 1,500 men, were sufficient to guard it against 9,000 more than were before Bristol, then Bristol garrison of about 2,000 foot and 300 horse, must needs be abundantly sufficient to defend it against 9,000 enemies less than were before Gloucester. And whereas the Defendant alledged his letter of complaint for want of a sufficient garrison; this was in March 20, 1643, when he had but one complete regiment of foot, and but two troops of horse, not at the siege, when he had above twice double the number. 5. For his Excellency's opinion, and his own propositions, 'that the garrison should consist of three regiments of foot and three troops of horse and dragoons.' It was answered, that he had above that number of horse, and almost his full number of foot at the siege, and might have raised more had he pleased; therefore a competent garrison, according to his own desire. But that which quite takes off this objection, is, That such a large garrison as this, was not desired by him, or thought meet by his Excellency, only to defend Bristol against a siege, but likewise to defend Bath, Berkley-Castle, and the country round about for twenty miles space, and to suppress insurrections, if any should happen in the Western parts; as appears by his Excellency's letter and his own propositions. Therefore this pretence, that he had not a full garrison to defend the Town, because he wanted some of his number of foot, which should have defended Bath, and the country 20 miles round about, is but an impertinent plea. 6. For his want of reserves to relieve his men, himself confesseth, that reserves might have well been drawn from the main guard and Castle garrison, who were not in any fight or action during the siege; that he had some few reserves for some particular places, as there was occasion; that capt. Stokes, whose company was a mere reserve, stood in St. James's church-yard, when the enemy entered, though not employed to repulse them at the first, nor afterwards in the salley. If then he had reserve for some special services, he had, no doubt, a competent garrison; it being unusual to have a whole reserve, and a vast unnecessary expence to maintain a double garrison in any place. 7. Whereas he alledged that his men, for want of relief and reserves, would have quite been tired out in three or four days more, having been near five days on duty without relief; and that a man might die of a lingering consumption as well as of a fever. It was answered, That the garrison of Gloucester had no reserves at all, and were constantly upon duty without relief, above thirty-five days and nights together, yet held it out courageously, without dying of a consumption; and why Bristol garrison might not have done the like, being furnished with good store of Bristol milk, strong wines and waters, with as good success, had the Defendant put them to it, especially having some reserves to relieve one another, he could see no reason, but only his willingness to yield up the town to the enemy, for fear of a consumption, of which none are willing, or use to die, till nature be totally spent. 8. There was then no sickness at all in the City, no want of provisions or necessaries; no loss but of eight men at the most when yielded: how then the City and Castle could be surrendered upon this pretence of an impossibility to keep them longer, for want of a sufficient garrison, we cannot conceive, especially since the women with their children proffered to go into the cannonsmouth to dead the bullets.

Thirdly, To the pretended want of match, powder, ammunition; (for a sufficiency of all other provisions and victuals was acknowledged) it was answered, 1. That we had proved [Joan Battin, Arthur Williams, major Wood,] there were 1,400 weight of match, besides a dray-load more of match in the Castle itself, when surrendered; and a match-maker with materials to make more match in the Castle as fast as they could spend it, besides much match in the City: and he might as soon have alledged want of water in the river Avon, as of match in Bristol, which makes match and cordage for all the West of England, and other parts. 2. For powder, we have proved by some witnesses, that there were at least 60 barrels in the Castle only, besides as many more in the City, Forts, and what was weekly made in the Town: yea some witnesses prove there were 70 double barrels in the Castle, left to the enemy. Captain Husbards confesseth he had two barrels of powder in his fort, Arthur Williams attesteth there were 60 barrels in the Town, and major Allen brought nine barrels more from Malmesbury: And by his own printed Relation, there must be at least 90 barrels left; For he therein confesseth that he found 45 barrels of powder in the Town, when he first entered upon the charge thereof; after which he received 30 barrels more from London, 126 barrels from France, besides six or seven barrels weekly made in the City, all the powder taken out of shops, ships, and the nine barrels from Malmesbury; all which (admit the barrels out of France single) amount to 210 barrels; but to 336 barrels, if those from France were double, as they were: Of these he saith, sir William Waller had about 60 barrels, and that he spent about 60 more in the siege: deduct then 120 barrels out of 336, there remained no less than 216; or 120 out of 210, there were left 90 barrels at least by his own confession, allowing him all that was made or found in the City and ships merely for waste and musters. And whether there were a necessity of surrendering the Town for want of powder, when so many barrels remained only in the Castle, besides what was in the Forts and City, let all men judge: there being 60 barrels more than col. Massey had when Gloucester was first besieged.

But his grand pretence is, That this Powder would have lasted them only two or three days at most; whence this prodigal of his powder, pot blood or coin, writes thus in his 'Relation,' p. 9, 10, 'That which made it evident, we could not hold out the Castle above 2 or 3 days, was, because we had ammunition for no longer time, having only 50 barrels of powder, and no match at all,' (no match for himself, he means for cowardice, else there was match enough) 'and according to the proportion of powder, we had spent the days before, would not have served us above two days, and it is clear we should not have had any relief in six or eight weeks.' A pretty prejudicating fancy, not to be admitted on any terms: For by the same argument he surrendered it up now when he had 90, or admit but 50 barrels left; he would have then yielded it had he 500 remaining: For thus he would have argued, 500 barrels after the rate of 50 barrels we spent the two first days, would have lasted us but 20 days at most; and we could have no succour in six or eight weeks, therefore I was necessitated to surrender the Town for want of powder to hold out till relief might come: Nay, if he had 1,000 barrels then left, he would by this reason have yielded the Town up, for want of powder: for he argued thus; Col. Warnslow at Plymouth spent 40 barrels in one day; Ergo, I should have spent so many every day at Bristol, and by this computation 1,000 barrels would have lasted me but 30 days: and I had no hopes of relief in 40 or 50 days at nearest; Ergo, I was necessitated to yield for want of powder to serve me till relief might come. Had valiant Massey argued thus at Gloucester, he might have surrendered it to the king on this pretence the very first day and hour he came before it. He might have alledged (with better reason than col. Fiennes) we have but 30 barrels of powder in all to defend the Town with, and these will not last above one day, for col. Fiennes spent thirty barrels a day at Bristol, and col. Warnslow 40 in one day at Plymouth: Therefore 30 barrels against a far greater army of enemies, will not last above one day, and we lawfully may and ought, in true military policy, to surrender Gloucester to the enemy the first hour they come before it, for want of powder, since col. Fiennes surrendered Bristol for this very cause, when he had twice as much powder as we. Had Massey done or argued thus, what had become of Gloucester and the kingdom ere this? But since he made no such anticipating argument, but with his little store of powder (far less than was in the castle of Bristol only) maintained the siege for 31 days, and preserved the Town when he had more cause to despair of relief than col. Fiennes, Why the Defendant might not, should not have done the like at Bristol, I cannot yet conjecture. Indeed, he saith, in his Answer to the eighth Article, 'That he was less able to defend the Town 4, or the Castle 14 days, than Massey was to defend Gloucester 24 days with the same proportion of powder.' Certainly, if it were possible for Massey to defend Gloucester against a far greater force than was at Bristol with 50 barrels of powder for 31 days, it was more possible for the Defendant to have defended the Castle of Bristol of less circumference by three parts than it, with 90 single or 70 double barrels (which he surrendered) for 3 times 30 days, and till succours had arrived.

But to exclude all pretences, Mr. Pryn affirmed, that there must the same rule and law be observed in case of powder, ammunition, and men, as there is in case of victuals: And what that is, the king of Sweden's and his Excellency's Articles of War, newly reprinted, define, to wit, 'a present and absolute want of victuals, and all edible things to sustain nature.' And so a present absolute want and expence of all powder and ammunition; else any fort may be betrayed upon remote pretended necessities. A Governor must not argue thus, It may be I may spend 50 barrels of powder in two days: Ergo, 50 being all my store, I will presently surrender before I put it to the hazard, and yield up my present stores to the enemy before the two days expire: for then what place can be secure, or will hold out to real extremity? But on the contrary, he must thus resolve, I have thus much powder yet left, and by good husbandry it may last much longer than I apprehend; the enemy's ammunition, for ought I know, may fail before it, who knows not how small our stores now are; however it is better I should spend that little I have left against the enemy, rather than yield it up to supply their wants and annoy our friends: Therefore I will, yea, I ought in reason and duty to be reduced to a present real, not a surmised possible, want of powder, before I would yield up the fort, committed to my trust, to the whole kingdom's prejudice. This was col. Massey's resolution, this ought to be the conclusion of every Governor whatsoever, and of the Defendant at Bristol, which wanted neither fortifications, men, victuals, ammunition, cannon, powder, wine, beer, match, water, nor any necessaries when it was surrendered, to defend it till supplies might have arrived. Therefore it was yielded up before any the least extremity, and so unworthily, and cowardly, both in law and real verity.

Fourthly, as to his best and most special plea or inducement, That he 'surrendered the City and Castle so speedily as he did, of purpose to preserve a body of 1,500 foot and horse for the service of the state, then wanting men; and the lives and estates of divers of our friends.'

Mr. Pryn answered, 1. That he might be ashamed of such a poor absurd pretence as this, to veil his cowardice: his Surrender in truth being but to save his own life and estate, not the garrison's, who were safer in the Town and Castle, than in any other place whatsoever, and lost both themselves and their estates by surrendering them, which they had preserved (as Gloucester men did their City and estates) had they manfully held them out to the last.

2. The Parliament had no less than 2,000 armed foot, and 300 horse in the city to serve them there immediately before the Surrender: yet this thrifty Governor would for their service and advantage surrender both City and Castle, with all the cannon, ammunition, arms, magazines, provisions, wealth, ships, prisoners, colours in it, to preserve them only 1,500 disarmed, plundered, dismounted men, to serve them God knows where or how. A very frugal steward surely for the republic, to lose them no less than 800 men in the very bargain, with the City, Castle, arms, and premises to boot.

3. Neither did he save those 1,500 naked men, as he pretended, nor yet a body of 300 to serve them elsewhere, he bringing scarce 100 of them with him into London. He lost the City, Castle, arms, all else in them before; only to save the men, and their estates; and after lost both the men and their estates, to save himself, never reserving so much as one ensign, drum, trumpet, upon the parley, to call or keep his men together, nor yet mustering them into order, nor marching away with them in a body, nor relieving them when dismounted, plundered, abused in his sight, leaving every man to shift for himself the best he might. And was not this a pretty saving of men to serve the Parliament elsewhere, thus carelessly to lose them, and of 2,300 men completely armed to serve them, to preserve scarce 200, stript of all their arms, and quite disbanded? God preserve the republic from such frugal stewards, such pernicious bargains!

4. Admit he had saved full 1,500 unarmed men to serve the state, was not this a sweet purchase, think you, to save so many mens' persons with the loss of such a place of consequence, strength, shipping, trade, command by sea and land, with the hazard of the whole kingdom? Better himself, and all those 1,500, nay, better 10,000 men had bravely lost their lives in defence thereof; yea, better the whole City had been ruined, if not possible otherwise to be secured to the state, than that the enemy should have so easily possessed it, to the City's, country's, and whole kingdom's infinite prejudice.

5. The Parliament needed no man at that time to serve them elsewhere, but they would extremely want Bristol were it lost, far more than they wanted men. It was a bootless service, then, to lose what they should certainly most of all want, to preserve only what they needed not.

6. These mens service was useful no where but in Bristol, where the state only needed and expected it; and those who would not do them the best, the uttermost service there where they most needed it, with the hazard of their lives, would hardly do them service elsewhere, unless they might have victory in a bag, (as Ulysses had the winds) and might fight only where they were sure of no resistance, to gain 'Sarmacida spolia, sine sanguine et sudore.'

7. They could do the Parliament no such good service any where as there, in keeping Bristol; there most of them were in their proper center, their native soil, where they fought for their lives, estates, lands, houses, wives, children, liberties, in the very height and strength of their spirits; there they were entrenched in strong forts and bulwarks, well manned, victualled, ammunitioned; where, in respect of the enemy's disadvantage in assailing, and their own conveniency in defending, they might have slain one hundred enemies for one of ours, as they had done before, killing and wounding above 1500 of the enemies, with the loss only of eight of the garrison; after which rate they might have slain the enemy's whole army with the loss only of one hundred men, (a service they could never hope to attain to in the open fields) and also have saved not only 1,500, but 2,400 of their own men, to serve the state, together with the City, Castle, ships, arms, magazines, and western parts, all depending on them; and that with the total ruin of the enemies forces.

8. It is very improbable that these garrison soldiers and citizens would adventure their lives to serve the state in any place else, who would not do it on their own dunghill, and in their proper charges, where they were most concerned; those that will not fight it out to the utmost in a fort where they have all advantages, will certainly not do it in the open fields, where the enemy and they are upon equal ground. And it is not very likely, that men disarmed, discouraged, left to the scorn and plunder of the enemies, stript of all their fortunes, driven from their native habitations, and brought to trust to the enemy for their lives, rather than to God and their own swords for victory and security, should fight for the Parliament without arm, or any other encouragement in the open fields.

9. Admit he secured the Parliament 1,500 pillaged, naked friends to serve them elsewhere; yet sure I am, he hath truly gained them 15, nay, 50,000 enemies, with all the arms, strength, ports, forts, traffick, provisions, wealth, that the West of England, Wales, or Ireland can afford, whence divers thousands of enemies and rebels are lately arrived in Bristol ships, to cut our throats, possess our estates, yea, lay our kingdom waste. And was not this a good piece of public service worthy our highest applause?

10. The very loss of Bristol (for aught any wise man can yet perceive) is like to cost the Parliament and kingdom the lives of above 15,000, nay, 30,000 men, (as it hath cost them some thousands already) ere Bristol and the West be reduced to that condition they were when the City was surrendered. And is not this a sweet piece of good husbandry, to endanger the loss of 30,000 mens lives, but to save the lives of 1,500 only, and that when they were in greatest security, and no danger at all of being lost, had they stood it out?

11. The Defendant and his men were purposely placed in the City and Castle (to the kingdom's vast expence) to this very end, that they might preserve them from the enemy, even with the loss of their lives, rather than the enemy should possess them to the public prejudice: And yet this valiant gentleman is so discreetly sparing (at leastwise of his own, if not of their lives) as rather certainly to lose the Town and Castle, than to hazard the loss of all or any of their lives, contrary to his very trust and duty.

12. Might not every Governor and General upon this pretence deliver up any Fort, City, Town, Country to the enemy, without shot or stroke, to preserve the lives of their men to serve the Parliament elsewhere? Had col. Massey at Gloucester, or col. Warnslow at Plymouth, made this plea of saving their own and their garrisons lives, to serve the Parliament elsewhere, these Towns might have yielded up upon better Articles than Bristol long ago. Had his Excellency been acquainted with this frugal state-policy by col. Fiennes, at the famous battles of Edge-Hill and Newbury, he might easily before the fights began, have sounded a Parley, and yielded up all his ammunition, cannons, arms, carriages, colours, drums, cornets, prisoners to the enemy, and given them the honour of the field, of purpose to save the effusion of Christian blood, and preserve the lives of his soldiers to serve the commonwealth in other places (there being the same pretence of reason in these cases as in Bristol:) And then I pray, what had become of our Parliament, religion, laws, liberties, estates, and lives too ere this? I doubt they had all been lost by this new kind of saving. And then what service could these men do the Parliament or state when all was certainly lost? We owe our lives, limbs, fortunes, all we have, to our dear country; delete this principle out of mens hearts, and you dissolve, yea ruin all civil society. It is therefore no excuse at all for the Defendant to lose this place of consequence to save a few mens lives, or estates, together with his own.

13. It is the greatest honour of a Governor, and a soldier, to die fighting; to lose his life to save his country. The very heathen Romans, and Tully, teach us thus much martial divinity: 'Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori.' But this unmanly Governor was clear of another mind; he will neither hazard his own nor other mens lives to save a City, a Parliament, a Kingdom. Better all these were lost than his life or garrison endangered by any bloody assaults. And is not then this his principal excuse the highest manifestation of a degenerate cowardly spirit? Our Saviour Christ informs us, 'He that loseth his life' (by adventuring it for his religion, God, and country) 'shall save it; yea, and the place committed to his trust, as Massey and others have done: but he that will save 'his life' (or others) by a cowardly and unworthy Surrender, as this gentleman did, 'shall lose 'it,' and that deservedly, by the ax of justice, for such unmanly cowardice. It was Caiaphas's divinity concerning Christ himself, 'It is expedient for us that one man should die for the 'people, that the whole nation perish not.' And it should have been the Defendant's honour and integrity to have said the like; better that I, being but one man, yea, better my whole garrison had died in defending this noble City, than that the whole nation should perish through its Surrender, to preserve our lives. It was the Defendant's promise before the siege, 'to die in Bristol's defence, and lay 'his bones therein;' but this he now professeth, was spoken only in policy, to incourage and keep the soldiers in heart, not in reality with any intent to perform it. Certainly if it be a sign of a good shepherd or Governor 'to lay 'down his life for his Sheep,' his country, it is an undoubted badge of an evil and timorous one, to refuse to do it after so many promises. This is the Defendant's case, who would rather adventure his head in a martial trial, than his life in a breach, and for this deserves the loss of both.

The next Debate was of a point of principal concernment; namely, 'What should be judged 'utmost extremity in regard of men, ammunition, victuals, or intenablety of any fort, to 'justify the Governor's Surrender of it to the 'enemy? And whether the Defendant were reduced to any such extremity ere he surrendered Bristol?

For resolving of this grand question, Mr. Prynne alleged, that his Excellency's Ordinances of War determined, 'That whosoever 'yieldeth up any town, fort, magazine, victuals, 'ammunition, arms, or that moveth any such 'thing but upon Extremity, and that to the 'Governor, or in council, shall be executed as 'a traitor.' This is the general law. Now what this Extremity is, will be the sole question; for resolution whereof we need go no further than to the several cases of Gominney, Weston, Cressingham, Elmham, and the bishop of Norwich, antiently resolved in Parliament, to the late king of Sweden's military laws, and his Excellency's own explanation of this point (taken out of them) in the second edition of his "Laws and Ordinances of War," which reduce Extremity to these three Heads (where there is no absolute present want of men through slaughter or mortality to defend the place,—1. 'If the 'garrison be reduced to an utter extremity of 'all eatable things whatsoever, so as they have 'no kind of food whereby to subsist, but must 'necessarily perish by famine, if they yield not 'presently.—2. If there be no hope at all left 'them in such a case of any succour or relief.—3. If without parleying at the very instant, 'both the forts, men, and arms, must of necessity fall into the hands of the enemy.' If the Governor can prove by pregnant witnesses that he was really reduced to all these extremities, then he is to be acquitted; but if he fail in real proof of any one of these, then he is to be condemned and executed as a traitor, both by the king of Sweden's and his Excellency's martial laws: and this is the general law-martial of all nations, approved by our own common law, of purpose to establish military discipline against cowardice, negligence, and treachery, which are apt to be varnished over with specious though false pretences.

To prove this definition of Extremity, Mr. Prynne produced the last edition of his Excellency's Ordinances of War, printed by his special command, and the Judge-Advocate's licence. But the Judge-Advocate opposed the reading of them, pretending they were not yet approved by his Excellency so far as to be used at a Council of War, and that they were made since the loss of Bristol.

To which Mr. Prynne replied, That they were printed by his 'Excellency's special direction, and enjoined to be observed by all,' as appears by the Title, having been first voted and agreed on at a Council of War; that the publishing of them in print, by special command, was the highest approbation that might be; and it were in vain to ratify and publish them, if we might not make use of them at this Council of War, in a case which falls punctually within their resolution: and though Bristol was surrendered before the last edition of these ordinances, yet this clause which defines Extremity being only an exposition of the former laws, and no new additional law not formerly published, we might and ought to read it of right, to determine this difficulty, for which it was purposely added. But the Advocate being very earnest against the reading thereof, the Council referred it to my Lord General, whether the Explanation in the new printed Ordinances and Laws of War should be used at this Trial? Who declared his judgment, they should not now be read, or used.

Whereupon Mr. Prynne laid down this conclusion for a positive and necessary principle in war, 'That utmost extremity to justify the surrender of any garrison, town, fort, or place of 'consequence, must not be an imaginary, or 'possible extremity, or a conjectural improbability of holding out any long time, but a real, 'necessary, and present impossibility of holding out any longer against the enemy: 'affirming, 'That no Governor of any fortified 'town or castle ought to surrender the same 'upon any pretence of extremity, but where 'there is an absolute, real, and present impossibility of holding out any longer than that 'very instant time wherein he makes the Surrender.' The Reasons whereof (he said) were very observable, grounded upon the highest principles of policy and war; as namely,

1. To retard the enemy's progress and conquests, lest a whole kingdom should be lost in a moment, as all England would have been long ere this, had Gloucester, Hull, Plymouth, Exeter, and other places, made no longer nor better resistance than Bristol, though not of such importance to the realm, nor so well furnished as Bristol with all manner of provisions for a siege. A general of an army, governor of a town, must defend his part with respect to the whole kingdom; and therefore though he cannot hold his ground, or guard his fort absolutely, or for any long space against the enemy, yet he must lose ground but by inches, not give it away by whole towns or countries; and though he cannot defend his charge still, yet he must hold out till the last minute to stay the enemy's progress, and prevent a sudden total conquest of the realm.

2. To spend the enemy's men, ammunition, provisions, a long siege being the usual bane of any army; an infinite charge, disadvantage, discouragement to the besiegers, but great advantage, encouragement to the opposite party.

3. To give a good precedent and encouragement to other governors, garrisons, forts, adjacent counties, and to uphold martial discipline thereby; the holding out of a place of consequence (as is evident by the late example of Gloucester) giving great encouragement to the adjoining places to hold out strenuously to the last, and animating all the party adhering to them: whereas the sudden loss or yielding up of any eminent city, strikes terror into all adjoining towns, forts, counties, who presently wheel about to the conquering enemy, as appears by the example of Bristol; whose unexpected surrender drew on the loss of Dorchester, Barnstaple, Exeter, Dartmouth, with most of the western parts; and it had hazarded the loss of London, yea of the whole kingdom, had the enemies pursued their victory to London-walls, and not been unexpectedly beaten off at Gloucester, endangered by Bristol's Surrender, and quite given for lost by col. Fiennes and his officers.

4. To give advantage of surprizing other places, or quarters of the enemies, to cause either a raising of the siege by such diversions, or to get something equivalent to the place besieged, in case it should be lost, or not relievable: whereas a sudden unexpected surrender forestals all such diversions and compensations of losses. Had Bristol been held out to the utmost, in case his Excellency could not have timely relieved it; yet he might have carried Oxford, or surprized divers of the enemy's garrisons, forts, men, arms, horse, in other quarters, whilst they were occupied at Bristol; whereas its sudden surrender before three full days siege, anticipated all diversions, and recoveries in value, to help balance Bristol's loss.

5. To deprive the enemy of the ammunition, provision, victuals, and magazines in the Town and Castle; which if spent in their defence, to the enemy's loss and slaughter, the cannons cloyed, the arms made unserviceable to the enemy, they could not have readily been supplied from other parts, and so the Town and Castle might have been easily regained by a present siege, in case they had not been seasonably relieved: however, the victory at least had been less honourable, less advantageous to the enemy; who by an unworthy speedy surrender gained a City and Castle ready fortified, victualled, ammunitioned, provided with all necessaries to their hands, fit for present defence, without any cost or labour; with cannon and arms almost sufficient to furnish an army by land, and shipping enough to set out a strong fleet by sea.

6. To preserve the adjacent towns, forts, counties depending upon the holding out of the place besieged, who by a cowardly present surrender may be in danger to be surprized on a sudden, and taken unprovided of ammunition, men, arms, victuals, or sufficient fortifications. If a town well fortified, manned, victualled to hold out three months siege in most men's opinions, shall be cowardly yielded up before extremity, in three days space, as Bristol was; all the neighbouring garrisons, counties, cities, castles, who depend upon its three months defence, are in danger of surprisal, and being taken unfurnished at unawares, as infinite historical examples evidence; and the unexpected Surrender of Bristol (as the Relation of Gloucester siege truly stiles it) was likely to have endangered Gloucester, whose vigilant Governor would doubtless have been better furnished with men, ammunition, victuals, had not Bristol's over-hasty Surrender forestalled his intentions. And who knoweth not, that this Surrender might have endangered the loss of London through an unexpected surprize, had the enemy presently advanced towards it, as some advised?

7. If any town be yielded up before absolute extremity and necessity of holding out longer, there is a most certain present loss to the state, (perchance irrecuperable for the future too) but if held out till extremity, there is still either a probability or possibility of securing and preserving it left, even to the utmost minute of its tenability, and that by infinite casualties, contingencies, and passages of Divine Providence, transcending all human apprehensions. As, (1.) By unexpected supplies from other parts. (2.) By diversions or invasions of the enemy's quarters elsewhere, engaging them to raise their siege. (3.) By successful sallies. (4.) By extraordinary slaughters of the enemies upon disadvantageous assaults, of which they of Bristol had former experiences, where the enemy lost 100 men to one of ours, and had near 1,700 slain and hurt in less than three days, with the loss only of 7 or 8. (5.) By sudden sickness in the enemy's camp. His Excellency, as this Defendant affirmed, had 2 or 300 men that fell sick about this time in his army in one day, and 1,000 or more in one week's space, and the enemies, for aught he knew, might have undergone the like mortality. We read that God's Angel in one night slew in the king of Assyria his host, an hundred fourscore and five thousand men, and thereby raised Jerusalem's siege: And for aught the Defendant knew, God might have sent an equivalent destroying plague among the God-damn-me army of cavaliers, who besieged Bristol. (6.) By unseasonable tempestuous weather, which had broke up many leaguers. (7.) By the death or slaughter of some principal officers or commanders. (8.) By sudden panic fears and apprehensions of approaching rescues, of which we have an eminent Scripture precedent in the besiegers of Samaria; to omit profane histories. (9.) By sudden mutinies and discords among themselves, which in Scripture, and stories, are copious. (10.) By scarcity of provisions, with which the enemy before Bristol was very much pinched, as Mr. Savidge deposeth. (11.) By want of ammunition, the enemy's condition at Bristol, who had spent most of their powder and shot, of which they had far less in their camp than the Defendant surrendered to them in the Castle. (12.) By despair of success, for which very reason the enemies had retreated from Bristol in two or three days more, had those who entered the lines at first been repulsed, as they might have been with ease, though the Defendant alledged they had taken a solemn oath not to raise the siege till they had taken the Town; which might have been as easily frustrated as the oath of the Jewish conspirators, 'Who vowed they would neither eat nor drink till they had murdered Paul;' yet missed of their design. Besides all these, whereof histories afford plenty of examples, there are infinite other contingencies frequent in story, whereby God, out of his Divine Providence, hath many times miraculously preserved forts and cities, even in their utmost extremities, against their potent enemies; when they have been resolute to stand out to the last, especially in the cause of God, religion, or their country. And in such a case as this is, where we may with confidence expect the best and speediest assistance the Lord of Hosts, and God of Heaven can provide for us, (if we dare rely upon his promises or providence without distrust) he deserves not the title of a soldier, much less of a Christian soldier, governor, or commander, who will not trust God to the utmost exigency, and rely upon his power, wisdom, faithfulness for reasonable deliverance and relief; which the Defendant, for want of faith as well as courage, durst not do, and so yielded up all.

8. If absolute and present impossibility of longer defence be not made the only rule of utmost extremity, we shall open a wide gap to the treachery, cowardice, negligence, indiscretion, avarice, ambition, discontent of every governor and commander, to the overthrow of all martial discipline, and expose the whole kingdom to speedy loss and ruin; it being an easy matter for any governor or commander, how cowardly, false or treacherous soever, to invent many plausible excuses, many forged, supposed, probable extremities, and to find witnesses under his command to attest them; and by pretext thereof to betray and yield up the most considerable towns, castles, forts, throughout the realm, to the enemy, without any stroke at all, or after a few days counterfeit siege, the better to palliate his treacherous designs. And therefore upon all these grounds, as likewise to reduce extremity to a certainty, no other extremity ought to be admitted, but only a present absolute impossibility of holding out any longer; to which the Defendant was no ways reduced, as we have already proved.

In opposition to these Reasons, col. Fiennes maintained these three things. The first was this, That whenever the principal rampart of any town was once entered by the enemy, this was a sufficient extremity to justify both a parley and surrender. But the line of communication which the enemies entered at Bristol was the principal rampart, as he pretended:

Therefore his surrender of it upon their entering the line, was justifiable.

To which was answered: 1. That the enemies entering the principal rampart, is no lawful sufficient ground of a parley or surrender, no, nor yet the taking of the principal fort (for the reasons aforesaid), as long as the other forts or towns are tenable; by holding whereof the enemy may in time be repulsed out of the works they have entered. If this were true military doctrine, then London should by like reason be surrendered to the king, in case he came before it, together with the Tower, as soon as the line of communication (the chief rampart) were entered, or any out-fort taken; and an whole army should yield the field, if one troop or company of the forlorn hope were routed. 2. Though the line of communication of Bristol were entered in only one place, yet not one of the out-forts was taken; the body of the City defended by the key, and all that part beyond the bridge, together with the Castle (the chiefest fort, rampart, scouce), and every street in the Town both tenable and defensible, as we have formerly proved; therefore the enemies bare entry within the line of communication only, was no extremity at all to justify its Surrender, in the judgment of any but extreme cowards. 3. That the maintaining of such a cowardly paradox to excuse this surrender, was an argument it proceeded from cowardice, and a sufficient proof of a timorous spirit.

The Second was, That if the enemy had once entered or possessed the Town, the Castle ought not to be kept to the prejudice of the citizens, but ought to be surrendered together with the Town, by the constant practice and policy of war in all places, all ages. In which he was so confident, that he challenged Mr. Prynne to shew one precedent to the contrary, and produced divers examples in foreign parts, out of French Mercuries and Gallobelgicusses, with some late examples at home to justify this assertion: As namely, the example of Leipsick, Mentz, Philipsburg, Prague, Augsburg, the Burse, Breda, and other Towns abroad; of Portsmouth, Exeter, Lincoln, Worcester, Winchester, Chichester, Malmesbury, Hereford, Taunton Town and Castle, Bridgewater, Dorchester, Dartmouth, Lime, Reading; where he saith, the towns and castles were both surrendered together, and not the Castles held out when the Towns were taken; yet none of these Governors were ever questioned by the King or Parliament. And he gave this reason to prove this paradox, that if Castles should hold out when the Towns were taken or yielded, it would much dishearten the citizens, and make them unwilling to entertain or assist any Garrisons in the Castles.

To which Mr. Prynne retorted, That this was the grossest absurdity that ever was broached by any man in his right senses; and had he not been intoxicated with a spirit of pusillanimity, he would never have invented such a poor subterfuge, or made such an ignorant challenge as this to save his endangered life. For, 1. Castles and citadels, in most towns, are usually the strongest, most tenable, most impregnable places of all others, best able to resist and annoy the enemies; the out-works, line, and towns themselves less tenable and resistible than they: to argue therefore, that the Castle ought to be surrendered as soon as the Town is entered or taken by the enemy, is in effect to aver, That the strongest fort of all must be yielded, because the weakest part of all is entered. If this were a good soldiery argument, then, by the self same reason, if there were twenty strong forts or castles about a town, and but one weak one, the whole twenty strong ones, though tenable, must be yielded, because only the weakest one was forced; and the Lord Mayor of London (in case that City were besieged) might yield up both the Tower, Town, and all the other forts to the king, if the weakest part of the line were but entered, or Hyde-Park or Islington fort once entered by the enemy; yea, by this kind of soldiery, if the weakest troop or company in an whole army be routed, the main body and battalion of it must presently yield up themselves and the field too, because this weak party thereof is defeated: and his Excellency at Edge-hill fight, where some of his horse and foot ran shamefully away upon the first charge, should by this senseless policy have fled or yielded, and not won the day, (as he did with greater honour) because the most and weakest part of his army was routed. But since all men know, that the strongest forts and parties are to defend the weakest, not the feeblest them; and the Castles in cities made more strong and tenable than other parts, for this very purpose, that they might hold out when the weaker parts are taken, (this being the only use for which they were built and made so strong) the reason holds good on the contrary part; that because the Town, which is the weakest, is taken, therefore, for this very reason, the Castle, which is the strongest part, ought to be held out, and not surrendered.

2. Castles in most towns command the whole towns where they are, and those who are masters of them are still masters of the places, and will soon regain the towns; but if once surrendered, the enemies become presently absolutely masters of both; and no hope is left of regaining either Town or Castle again, without a siege, or infinite expence and danger. Therefore there is all the reason in the world to maintain the Castles to the utmost, when the Towns are entered, and not to yield them up together both to preserve the dominion of the place, and regain the Towns with ease and speed.

3. As long as the Castles hold out, the enemy can enjoy little benefit by the Towns, and have less security in them. Besides, their conquest is incomplete, less terrible, not advantageous; their progress from thence to other places retarded, unless they leave the Castles unbesieged. And their forcing of the Castles will consume them far more men, ammunition, money, than the entering of the Towns, which, without the Castles commanding them, are little worth. Therefore for all these reasons it is apparent, that Castles ought to be kept by the constant exquisitest grounds and policy of war, whenas the Towns themselves are taken or surrendered.

4. Neither will this be a discouragement, but the greatest encouragement that may be to the citizens, that the Castles must thus hold out to utmost extremity: (1.) Because the persons and estates of the wealthiest citizens will be there secured against the enemy's rage and plunder, (as the honest Bristolians thought to have saved their persons and estates, by retiring into the Castle when the Town had been forced, which were lost by surrendering it). (2.) Because by keeping the Castles the Towns are certain to be preserved or regained in a short time, and thereby their liberties and privileges. (3.) Because by this means they shall not be long under the absolute power of the enemy, and new lords to controul them; whereas if the Castles be yielded, their persons, estates, laws, liberties, will be wholly exposed to the enemies will and pleasure, and subjected to their tyranny. Therefore, upon all these grounds, the Defendant ought to have kept the Castle of Bristol, being strong and tenable, to the utmost extremity, and not to have surrendered it with the Town, though the City had been taken, or yielded by composition.

5. For example, Mr. Prynne answered, That if he had his books about him, he could shew him at least one thousand examples in story to one of his, where Castles have held out when the Towns were taken or yielded; but since his challenge was to produce but one example to the contrary, he should out of present memory furnish him with divers. The first was a very ancient and memorable one recorded in scripture, (which he wondered the Defendant, who had read the Scriptures, could forget) to wit, that of Thebez, Judg. ix. where we read, 'That Abimelech went to Thebez, and encamped against it, and took it. But there was a strong Tower (or Castle) within the City, and thither fled all the men and women, and all they of the City, and shut it to them; and got them up to the Tower; but did not yield it up, though the City was taken. And Abimelech came to the Tower, and fought against it, and went hard to the door of the Tower to burn it with fire: And a certain woman cast a piece of a millstone upon Abimelech's head, and all to break his skull: Then he called hastily to his armour-bearer, and said unto him, Draw thy sword, and slay me, that men say not of me. A woman slew him; and he thrust him through, and he died; and when the men of Israel saw that Abimelech was dead, they departed every man to his place.' Thus the siege was raised, the Town preserved, regained, and that by a woman. Had col. Fiennes, in case the City of Bristol had been taken, retired to the Castle, according to his promise, and there stood upon his guard, perchance prince Rupert coming for to assail it, as Abimelech did the Tower of Thebez, might have been slain with a millstone by one of those valiant women who offered to go up to the cannons mouth to dead the bullets, in case he or his soldiers were afraid to charge; or at least by some musket or cannon-bullet; and so the siege might have been raised and the Town regained: No man could tell whether such an accident might not have happened, had the Defendant patiently expected the issue of God's providence in the Castle till utmost extremity, which no man ought to despair of, since, as the Wise Man informs us, 'Time and chance happen alike to all men.' Besides, the siege might by sundry other forementioned casualties have been raised, and the City preserved. But alas, the Defendant was so far from having the faith and courage of a man, that he fell infinite short of the courage and prowess of this woman of Thebez; styling the holding out of the City and Castle, though but a day or two longer, a desperate resolution, &c. not staying till they were assaulted, but presently yielded up both without any assault, contrary to this Scripture precedent, which he had neither heart nor courage to imitate. But lest he should pretend this one example to be singular, I shall furnish him with sundry others, which I wonder he could forget. If he had read the Roman story, he should have found the Capitol defended against the Gauls when the City of Rome was taken; and preserved from surprize only by the crying of a goose. In our unhappy antient civil wars, the Tower of London hath oft-times been held out when the City hath been yielded; the like we read of the Castles of Edinburgh, Berwick, Northampton, Salisbury, Devizes, Oxford (in the time of Maud the empress), Rochester, Bedford, Nottingham, Pomfret, frequently kept in former times when the towns were yielded, or taken: and, not to rove farther for precedents, even Bristol-Castle itself was held out by king Edward 2, and the younger Spencer, in the last year of this king's reign, against the queen and her son prince Edward, after the town was yielded up to them by compositions to save their lives and goods; and in these days Bristol was stiled and reputed a good Town, and a strong, well closed, standing on a good port of the sea, having a strong Castle, and the sea beating round about it, writes the historian. Certainly had this gentleman well studied the history of Bristol while he was there, he might have found a precedent for holding out this very Castle after the City surrendered, and then he would not have made such a silly challenge, to show him one such example. But if these antient examples had been forgotten, yet we have fresh precedents enough of this kind, which we cannot but remember. The Castles of Warwick and Nottingham both held out lately against the king's forces, when the towns were taken. Nay, the very Close at Lichfield, though no Castle, but a Cathedral, held out against the lord Brooks, when the town was yielded: and since the Parliament took it, against all prince

Reput's forces, almost as many weeks as Bristol itself did days, and against near as great an army, though it had not above 160 soldiers in it: Yea, when the prince had drained the mote about it, sprung a mine, blown up a great part of the wall, and entered the breach with above 200 men, being 50 more than first entered the line at Bristol, yet the garrison there was so far from yielding the place by a Parley, that they encountered the enemies, took 200 of their prisoners, beat the rest out, made good the breach, till all their powder within half a barrel was spent; and then came off upon more honourable terms by far than the Defendant at Bristol, (which was not so much as assaulted, much less entered) even with their colours displayed, their bag, baggage, arms, and restitution of their prisoners taken by the enemy: which conditions were most punctually performed, because they shewed themselves men of valour, and had their arms about them to defend themselves from violence; whereas the Defendant yielded up both arms and colours. To these I might add the examples of Limerick and Galloway Castles in Ireland, who held out many months against the Irish rebels, after the towns were yielded; Of Stafford Castle, defended long against the parliament after the Town taken; and the fresh example of Lincoln, where the Close was kept against the earl of Manchester, after the Town surrendered. But examples of this kind are so frequent in all stories, and so experimentally known to every one who hath been bred a soldier, that I shall forbear to trouble this honourable council, so well versed in histories and war, with any more precedents of this kind.

6. To his objected precedents, Mr. Prynne answered: (1.) That they were only alledged, not proved by witnesses or records; Gallo Belgicus being neither a legal testimony nor record to be given in evidence at a trial. (2.) That many of his precedents were foreign, and it did not legally appear what were the grounds of those towns or castles speedy surrenders; which in all probability was want of food, there being such a scarcity of it in Germany by reason of the long continued wars, that few towns or castles were victualled for one fortnight's siege: and perchance they wanted ammunition as well as food. (3.) It appears not whether those governors were not questioned, and capitally punished for delivering up these towns and castles; since we find that in these late German wars, some have been condemned and executed for yielding up towns too suddenly. (4.) Many of our towns he named had no castles in them, at least none fortified to keep out an enemy. (5.) Although the surrendering and quitting of these towns to the enemy, was connived at, and never brought legally into question as the Surrender of Bristol now is; yet they deserved to be both questioned and punished, as the quitting and yielding of Taunton, Dorchester, Lincoln, Banbury, Oxford, and other places: And if so, these examples can be no justification or extenuation of the Defendant's crime. It is no plea for a thief, when taken and arraigned, to say, such and such thieves have robbed others, and yet were never indicted nor punished for their robberies: Ergo, my robbery is lawful, and I must not be condemned for it. Had they been apprehended and indicted, it had been no plea for them, that some other thieves escaped without questioning, therefore no justification or excuse for him who is arraigned; yet this is the sum of the Defendant's argument: Other governors in Germany and England, who have cowardly and treacherously surrendered and quitted garrison-towns, have not been questioned for it; Ergo, I must not be condemned or blamed for my cowardly traitorously surrendering of Bristol, now I am actually impeached and convicted for it. If this be a good plea, to what end are martial laws? Every coward and traitor shall then escape scot-free, though he undo and betray a whole kingdom.

7. Some of the Towns he instanced in, were cowardly quitted, or yielded up upon his Surrender of Bristol, (as Barnstaple, Dorchester, &c.) whose loss must be put upon the Defendant's score. As for the loss of Exeter, which he instanced, it was answered: (1.) That Exeter was besieged, and held out more months than Bristol did days; being beleaguered above three months space ere it yielded: and had he held out Bristol so long, as he easily might, it would have been relieved in half the time, and kept safe till now. (2.) That the yielding up Bristol was the loss of Exeter, which was much discouraged by its ill precedent, and left destitute of all hopes or probabilities of relief by its Surrender; being too remote for his Excellency to relieve it, without endangering the loss of Kent, London, and Essex, during his absence hence; and there being no other forces near, that could in any possibility or probability relieve it: yet though it were thus hopeless of all succours, and much discouraged with the ill examples of Bristol, Barnstaple, Dorchester, Bridgwater, Taunton, and other western towns, it held out till the principal fort was taken, and all their powder spent; yea, the garrison and citizens were all resolved to have kept it with their pikes and swords, when their ammunition was exhausted, had they but any probable hopes of succours from any part; of which being utterly hopeless, they did for want of powder, after above three months siege, surrender the Town and Castle upon somewhat more honourable terms than the Defendant did Bristol. Wherefore this precedent was so far from justifying his ignoble act, that it was a pregnant testimony and conviction of his guilt in not holding out Bristol three days, when Exeter held out above three months siege, and spent all their ammunition before they fell to parley.

The third thing maintained by col. Fiennes was, That some generals had sentenced commanders to death for being too obstinate in defence of forts, and standing it out over-long; and that a French author (there produced) affirmed, it was a capital offence to stout out a place over-long.

To which Mr. Prynn answered, 1. That this new doctrine was certainly calculated only for that meridian where this great soldier was born, and fit for none but it. 2. That the Defeudant was so far from this fault of stouting it out over-long, that he deserves to lose his head for yielding Bristol up too soon; which certainly, in all mens judgments, is the more capital crime of the two. 3. That no one precedent could be produced in story, where ever any Governor of a town or fort was judicially condemned or executed by the prince or state that intrusted him to keep them, for holding them against the enemy over-long: And if the Defendant had been guilty of this crime, we would have been so far from impeaching, that we and the whole kingdom should have honoured him highly for it, though we have both just cause to prosecute him for the contrary; for which sundry governors have legally been condemned. 4. That it was a most ingrate requital to execute any man for his over-much valour and fidelity; and if this were once allowed for martial law, it would quickly make all governors and soldiers cowards or traitors; therefore certainly the Defendant had much mistaken his French author, who writes only in general, that some have been put to death for stouting and holding out a town over-long, without defining by whom this was done. He pretends it was done by those who intrusted them with the towns, of which no example can be produced; but certainly the author meant it only of the enemies, who have sometimes put a governor to death when a town hath been forced, for holding it over obstinately out against them, for which there are divers precedents. And in this sense (which doubtless is the true) it suits very well to the Defendant's case. The poor man was excepted (as he tells us) out of the king's pardon sent to Bristol, and so like to suffer if he held the Town or Castle till it were forced by the enemy: Wherefore to prevent all danger, and save his best-beloved life, he thought good to avoid the rigour of this law, by purchasing his impunity with the over-hasty surrender of them to the king; and so by this unworthy shift, 'Incidit in Scyllam qui vult vitare Charybdis.' Forfeiting his head to the Parliament and Kingdom, to secure it from the King.

Mr. Prynn concluded his Reply to the Defence of the fourth Article, and those that followed it, with col. Fiennes's Commission for Bristol, and some precedents in point resolved in parliament; the transcripts whereof out of the parliament rolls, proved upon oath to be true copies, he there delivered to the council.

Col. Fiennes's Commission (the original whereof he there produced) was read as followeth:

'Robert Earl of Essex, &c. To Col. Nathanael Fiennes. By virtue of an Ordinance of the Lords and Commons in Parliament, I do

* See these Records at large, with some others to the same purpose, at the end of this Trial.

‘ constitute and appoint you Governor of the ‘ City of Bristol, as also Commander in Chief ‘ of all the forces raised, or to be raised and ‘ employed for the defence of the said City, and ‘ the liberties of the same, and of the garrison
 ‘ there, to serve for the defence of the King, ‘ Parliament, and Kingdom. These are there‘ fore to will and require you by virtue of this ‘ Commission to take the said City and forces ‘ into your charge as Governor in Chief, and by ‘ all possible ways and means (except in point ‘ of civil government) to provide for the defence ‘ and security of the same, and to maintain the ‘ same against all enemies and opposition what‘ soever: and from time to time diligently to ‘ exercise the said forces within the said City
 ‘ and liberties, in arms; commanding all officers ‘ and soldiers to obey you as their Governor
 ‘ and Commander in Chief, for the service ‘ above-mentioned, according to this Commis‘ sion given you. And you are likewise to ob‘ serve and follow such further order and direc‘ tion as you shall receive from myself, or from ‘ both Houses of Parliament. Given under my ‘ hand and seal of arms this first day of May,
 ‘ 1643.—ESEX.’

From this Commission it appears, 1st, That
 col. Fiennes was constituted Governor of Bristol by Commission from his Excellency, under his hand and seal. 2dly, That he had the command in chief of all the forces and garrisons there, who were to be employed for the defence of the said City, and the liberties of the same; and to serve for the defence of the King, Parliament, and Kingdom. 3dly, That he was specially charged by that Commission, to take the said City and forces into his charge as Governor, and by all possible ways and means to provide for the defence and security of the same, and to maintain the same against all enemies and opposition whatsoever; and that all officers and soldiers were there to obey him as their Governor and Commander in Chief for this service: Therefore he and his officers were expressly enjoined by this Commission to defend and keep it against the enemy, to the uttermost extremity, and were there placed for that very purpose: and that he sent for and accepted this Commission upon these very terms, and not only to rule his soldiers, not to keep the Town and Castle, as he falsely at first pretended.
 4thly, That he was to observe and follow such further order and direction from time to time, as he should receive from his Excellency and both Houses of Parliament; therefore not to surrender the City and Castle without their special order or direction, which he never had to do it, as himself confesseth. His very Commission therefore being expressly violated in all these particulars by this his Surrender, before he was reduced to utmost extremity, is a sufficient evidence to declare and condemn him for a traitor, by the very Ordinances of War, especially since he knew the grand importance of the place, for the kingdom’s safety.

For precedents adjudged in point, I could produce many out of foreign histories, which I shall pretermit, because they are no binding evidence in law;* wherefore I shall confine myself to such domestic examples of this nature, as have been formerly adjudged in parliament, (the supremest council of war, whose judgments must direct all others) registered amongst our parliamentary records, which cannot be controlled, and are the best evidence of any other.

 The Records themselves (examined by the Parliament Rolls) are long, and written in law French, which perchance some of this honourable council understand not; I shall therefore briefly present them in English, and apply them to the present case, in order as they are opened.

The first Precedent† is the case of John lord of Gomineys, who in the parl. of 1 R. 2, n. 38, 40, was indicted and arraigned before the Lords, ‘ For that he being made Governor ‘ of the Town and Castle of Arde, in France, ‘ by king Edward 3, to this intent, That he ‘ should safely keep the same for the king and ‘ his heirs, without surrendering them to any ‘ person without their command, did yet in king ‘ Richard 2’s reign deliver and surrender the ‘ same to the king’s enemies, without any com‘ mand from him, to the dishonour and disin-‘ heriting of the king and his crown, and of the ‘ realm of England, against his undertaking ‘ aforesaid, without any duress or default of ‘ victuals or artillery, or of any other things ‘ necessary for the defence thereof. To which ‘ Indictment the Defendant pleaded, that the ‘ Town and Castle were so weak, that he could ‘ not well keep them against so great a power ‘ of the enemies as was then ready to assault ‘ them: Whereupon he assembled all the ‘ knights, esquires, and others in the Town,
 ‘ and informed them of the dangers the Town ‘ was in, and of the enemies forces; and by ‘ common counsel and consent of them all, he ‘ entered into a treaty with the enemies, to ‘ save the lieges of the king within the Town ‘ and Castle; and thereupon yielded up the ‘ same upon terms of composition, receiving no ‘ reward at all for surrendering the Town or ‘ Castle. But because one Geoffrey of Argen‘ tine, knt. affirmed in parliament, that he was ‘ then in person within the said Town and Cas‘ tle, in the defence whereof he was always ‘ ready to live and die, never consenting to the ‘ Surrender thereof; and because sir Ralph de ‘ Ferrers, knt. had valiantly defended them in ‘ former times against a great force of the ene‘ my, when they were not so strong as at the ‘ time they were surrendered: And because ‘ de Gomineys had undertaken to keep them, ‘ and if he could not have done it, he ought in ‘ no wise to have undertaken to keep them;
 ‘ and that another should and would have un‘ dertaken the safe keeping of them, had he ‘ not undertaken it; and for that he yielded ‘ them up in this sort before utmost extremity,
 ‘ when he wanted neither men, nor victuals, ‘ nor ammunition; he was adjudged to lose his head, notwithstanding his plea, that he did it by the advice of a general Council of War, to save the king's liege people's lives and estates, and that the Town and Castle were weak, unable to resist the enemy's power.'

This Town was of far less importance to the realm of England than Bristol; no treachery at all appeared in the Surrender, made by the vote of a general Council of War; yet we see the Governor, adjudged to lose his head, for not holding it out to the utmost extremity, according to his duty. And if his plea could not secure him from such a sentence, col. Fiennes's plea being the very same with his, that he surrendered the City and Castle of Bristol to the enemy before utmost extremity, because they were weak and untenable for any long time, to save the lives and estates of the garrison, and Parliament's friends, and that by the counsel and assent of all the knights, esquires, soldiers, and inhabitants thereof, must needs be frivolous, and can no way extenuate his fault, nor save his neck from the block; the rather because Bristol was of far greater consequence to the kingdom now, and better provided, fortified, manned, victualled, and more likely to be relieved, than Arde was then.

The second Precedent was of Pierce de Cressingham, and John de Spikesworth, esqrs., who were arrested and arraigned in parliament 7 Rich. 2, n. 17, 'For yielding up the Castle of Drinkham in Flanders to the enemies, from whom it was gained by the bishop of Norwich, though it were well and sufficiently stored with victuals and other necessaries, and strong enough to be held against the enemies, without the will or command of the king or his lieutenant. To which Spikesworth pleaded, That he had never the custody of that Castle, or any thing to do therewith, but was chased into it by the enemy, it being then in the custody of Pierce de Cressingham: That soon after the enemy assaulting the barbican, he was unhappily routed, and one of his varlets slain close by him: That he had never any thing to do in the Castle, neither as a soldier thereof, nor in any other manner whatsoever, but only continued in it in manner aforesaid, till it was surrendered by the said Pierce; and therefore prayed, that it would please the king to have him excused. Whereupon it was ordered he should be set at liberty, if nothing else could be said against him. Pierce Cressingham, who had the custody of the Castle, alleged, That upon the yielding up of the Town and Castle of Burburgh to the enemy, of all the garrison-soldiers he had with him at Drinkham, none would continue with him for the safeguard of that Castle but only five persons; by reason of which great necessity he was constrained, for the safety of his own person and people, to enter into a treaty with the enemies to deliver up that fort; and thereupon he yielded it up, and not for any other cause, nor in any other manner, but only by constraint of the power of the enemies aforesaid; denying that he ever received any thing from the enemies by way of gift, or in any other manner: Whereupon he conceived that no man ought to impute any manner of blame or reproach unto his person; but if it should be thought he had done ill in any manner, he most humbly cast himself upon the grace of his liege lord. But because this excuse was held insufficient, he was committed to prison, till the king should otherwise declare his opinion concerning him.'

Here was a case of far greater extremity than Bristol, without any apparent mixture of treachery; but only five of the garrison left to defend the Castle, whenas the Defendant had 2,300 soldiers at least in Bristol; and a Surrender by common advice for the Governor's and inhabitants' safety: yet because Cressingham the Governor, by virtue of his office, was bound to hold it till the utmost extremity, he was for the present adjudged to prison, and to expect a farther sentence afterwards; whereas Spikesworth was acquitted, because he came casually into the Castle, as forced by the enemy, and had no charge of it, as a Governor, officer, or garrison-soldier; all which, as appears by this resolution, are answerable and punishable for delivering up the smallest fort before utmost extremity.

The third Precedent is the case of the bishop of Norwich, accused in parliament 7 R. 2, n. 32, 'For surrendering the Town of Gravelin to the enemy, before utmost extremity, upon condition that it should be totally demolished. To which the bishop pleaded, that by reason of the disobedience of his captains, who quitted the field, and betook themselves to their forts, he was constrained to retire with his forces to the Town of Gravelin, which he would have held out well enough against all men, and did hold out till the other captains had surrendered their forts adjoining to the French; and after that, until speedy supplies might have arrived from England: But because there were 6 or 7,000 Englishmen, who came out of the forts surrendered, lying on the sands near Calais, who could not get into the Town, and were in danger to be slain by the French within two or three days, (the truce being then expired) whose loss would have been charged principally upon him; thereupon he was commanded by the king himself to render the town to the enemies, or else to demolish it, and then to march to succour the said English, and after that towards England, to save himself and others of his army, in case they were in any great want of victuals, as in truth they were: and because it behoved him to abate and void the town, as it was lawful for him to do at his pleasure, being gained by his proper conquest from the enemy; it seemed to him, that he ought to be well excused of whatever was surmized against him (for compounding with the French to raze the Town to the ground, and to depart whither he would with his bag, baggage, and men *). To which was answered by the Lord Chancellor, That there was sufficient victuals in the Town when the king's letter came there; after which the king sent other victuals thither in great plenty, with letters importing, how he had appointed his uncle to come speedily to his aid and succour: yet notwithstanding he departed thence, leaving the Town to the enemies, against the form of his indenture, by which the king granted him whatsoever he should conquer, not at all to surrender, sell or leave the same to the enemy, but to hold and possess it. And as for the disobedience and defaults of his officers, and their surrender of the fortresses, they neither could nor ought at all to excuse him, seeing they were all named and chosen by himself, not by the king or his council, and the Articles of the Surrenders sealed between them and the enemies, were made without the authority and consent of the king: Wherefore by the assent of the earls, barons, and other lords temporal present in parliament, it was assented and decreed, That the bishop should be in the king's mercy (who out of his grace would forbear to lay hands on his body in regard of his function, though he might justly have proceeded against him as a layman;) that he should be put to a fine and ransom, according to the quantity and quality of his offence, for which his temporalities should be seized; and whatever monies he had received from the king, and employed to his own use, he should presently make full payment thereof into the king's treasury, without delay or difficulty. Had he been a layman, his censure had proved capital, and more rigorous.

Here we have all col. Fiennes's excuses pleaded to justify this action: 1. The saving not of a body of 1,500, but 7,000 Englishmen to serve the state, whose lives were all endangered, not in a Garrison-Town or Castle well victualled, or ammunitioned, as those in Bristol were, but lying on the open sands without defence, and that not in their own native soil, but beyond the seas in an enemy's country. 2. Despair of timely relief, and greater want of victuals than was in Bristol, where there was too much plenty. 3. A letter from the king himself, enjoining the bishop to quit the Town to the enemy in case they wanted victuals, as he alledged they did; whereas col. Fiennes received no such letter from the Parliament or his Excellency, to quit or yield up Bristol. 4. This Town was won from the enemy by the bishop himself, not immediately committed to him to guard by the king or parliament, as Bristol was to the Defendant, who had less right to surrender Bristol, than this bishop Gravelin, being his own conquest. 5. He did not yield up the Town, with all the cannon, arms, and provisions in it, to the enemy, as the Defendant did Bristol; but only demolished it and slighted the fortifications, departing thence with bag, baggage, cannon, and his men: yet notwithstanding all these particulars, and the gallant service this martial bishop had done in this expedition, he incurred this heavy censure, and had his temporalities seized divers years for his fine and ransom. And if he deserved such a censure, no doubt the Defendant deserves a far greater, notwithstanding his excuses.

The fourth Precedent is that of sir William de Elmham, sir John Tryvet, sir Henry de Ferrers, and sir William de Farendon, knights, and Robert Fitz-Ralph, esq., impeached in the parliament of 7 R. 2, (rot. par. n. 24.) 'for surrendering the Town and Castle of Burburgh to the enemy, and receiving monies for the arms, victuals, prisoners, and goods within the same. To the which sir Wm. de Elmham and most of the others pleaded, that they were enforced to surrender the Town and Castle to the enemy of fine force, for the salvation of themselves, the garrison and people therein; the enemy having besieged and assaulted it in very great numbers, and set the Town on fire within, who would have taken it by force, and taken or slain all those within it, had they not yielded it by agreement: And that the monies they received, was only for the prisoners, victuals, and other goods within the same, not for the surrendering of the Town itself. Yet notwithstanding, this excuse was adjudged insufficient, and the parties ordered to make full payment to the king of all the monies received from the enemy, to stand committed to prison, to make ransom at the king's will according to the quantity of their several offences; and sir William de Farendon left to the king's mercy, both for his body and goods, to do with them what he pleased.'

Here we have a Town assaulted by a multitude of enemies, fired in part, and thereupon a Surrender upon composition, to save the officers and soldiers from being taken or slain by the enemy; yea, a better market than the Defendant made at Bristol, even a sale of the prisoners, victuals, and goods in the Town to the enemy for money, when endangered to be all surprized by force; yet this was judged no excuse: Therefore certainly the Defendant's pretended necessity, and danger of forcing the Town by the enemy, not half so real as this, cannot excuse his crime, nor extenuate his guilt, nor yet his pretence of saving his officers and garrison's lives and estates, to do the parliament service elsewhere.

The fifth precedent is that famous case of William de Weston in the parliament of 1 R. 2, (num. 38, 39, 40.) 'The commons in this parliament prayed, that all those captains who had rendered or lost Castles or Towns through their default, might be put to answer it in this present parliament, and severely punished according to their deserts, by award of the lords and barons, to eschew the evil examples they had given to other governors of Towns and Castles. Whereupon John de Gumineys

‘(whose case I began with) and William de ‘Weston, then detained prisoners in the Tower, ‘because they had lost and rendered the king’s ‘Towns and Castles to the enemies, were ‘brought by the constable of the Tower before
 ‘the lords, in full parliament in the White-cham‘ber; where Weston, by the Lords’ command,
 ‘was arraigned by sir Richard Lescrop, steward
 ‘of the king’s house, in manner following :

‘William de Weston, you took upon you ‘from the most puissant prince (whom God as‘soil) sir Edward late king of England, grand‘father to our lord the king that now is, safely
 ‘to keep to him and his heirs, kings of Eng‘land, the Castle of Outhrewyke, without sur‘rendering it to any one but to the said grand‘father, or to his said heirs, or by command
 ‘from him, or from his said heirs: Have you, ‘William, who are a liege-man of our lord the ‘king, in times of the same our lord the king ‘who now is, true heir to the said grandfather, ‘delivered and surrendered the same to the ‘enemies of our lord the king, without com‘mand from him, to the dishonour for damage, ‘of him and his crown, of the estate of his ‘realm of England, against your allegiance
 ‘and undertaking aforesaid? What will ye say ‘hereunto?’

Whereupon the said William put in his final answer in this behalf; ‘To the most sage ‘council of our lord the king, and to the other ‘lords and commons of the parliament, suppli-‘cates and sheweth William de Weston, That ‘albeit he be accused of this, that he hath ma‘liciously rendered the Castle of Outhrewyke, ‘of which he had the custody, by delivery and ‘assignment of our lord the king; may it please ‘your sage and just discretion to have the said
 ‘William excused thereof, for these causes en‘suing; First of all, may it please you to re‘member how that the said William was lately ‘informed by a spy, that a great power of the ‘enemies would come upon him to besiege the ‘said Castle, with very great and very grievous ‘ordnances; whereupon he the said William pre‘sently by his attorney, and by his letters, requir‘ed of the said council that it would please them ‘to re-inforce the said Castle with more men, for ‘the defence and safe-guard thereof, in regard ‘that the garrison of the said Castle that then ‘was, were not half sufficient in respect of multi‘tude to resist so great a force in so large a place;
 ‘but in conclusion, for all this, he could not ‘have any succour from the said council; And ‘so the said William, not at all through his de‘fault, was left without people sufficient for to ‘keep and defend the said Castle any long ‘time; which he beseecheth you to take into ‘your just and benign consideration. Also ‘please you to know, how upon a Monday ‘about one of the clock, the enemies came to ‘besiege the said Castle, to the number of ‘2,600 men of arms, and 700 arblasters Gene-‘voyes, and with 5,000 of the commonalty of the ‘country, having nine great cannons, divers en‘gies, and one great mortar-piece, beyond all ‘measure greater than ever they had seen any

‘before in those marches; and the same hour
 ‘presently a great number of the men of arms
 ‘and arblasters aforesaid came before the gates
 ‘for to assail the said Castle, and at this time a ‘knight of theirs was slain, who was cousin to ‘the lord de Clifton as was reported, and many ‘others were likewise then slain and wrecked.
 ‘And within a short time after they began to ‘shoot with their ordnances and other engines,
 ‘and so continued their assault upon one day
 ‘to another, that is to say, Tuesday, Wednes‘day, Thursday; and then were the walls ‘and houses of the Castle battered down, and ‘bruised in many places; and they had like‘wise by force trenched the ditches of the said ‘Castles in three places, so as the water was ‘drained out; and that night came a great ‘party of them, and by fine force made an as‘sault, and abated the barricades; and the ‘next day (which was Friday) they came about ‘day-breaking with all their forces to assault
 ‘the said Castle, but with God’s assistance they ‘were yet repulsed with force from their assault, ‘and of the one part and the other were some ‘slain and wounded. And the same day the ‘marshal of Burgoyne sent to the said William,
 ‘and others of the said Castle, to render it;
 ‘whereupon having consideration that the said ‘Castle could not be kept, as well in regard of ‘the small number of the people, as by reason ‘that the walls in many places were enfeebled
 ‘by their marvellous ordnance, there was a ‘treaty with the lords to this end: That the said
 ‘William and his company might advise them‘selves against the next morning; and so they ‘departed each to his own. Also this same ‘night the enemies caused all their ordnances, ‘engines, mortar-piece, cannons, and faggots,
 ‘with scaling-ladders, galleries, and all other ne‘cessaries, to be drawn up near to the very ‘ditch of the aforesaid Castle, and the next ‘day (which was Saturday) they made all things ‘ready plainly for to assault the place: And ‘then first of all sent an herald to the said ‘William, to know if the said Castle should be ‘rendered to them or not? Whereupon the ‘said William, by advice of the wisest of his ‘companions, taking consideration how that ‘the said place was destroyed and enfeebled ‘with their ordnance, and also that they were ‘too few men for its defence, by reason that ‘twelve of their companions were in this time ‘slain, wounded and sick, so as there remained ‘of all the people in the garrison in health, but ‘only 38 men to defend the same; hereupon
 ‘by common assent the said Castle (which ‘could be kept no longer) was by force surren‘dered, for to save their lives granted to them, ‘and their goods. And that all these things ‘aforesaid are true, the said William put him‘self upon his proof, according to your most dis‘creet ordnances. Also it is to be remembered, ‘that when the said Castle was thus rendered
 ‘as aforesaid, certain French people bargained
 ‘with the said William, for his victuals, to buy ‘them together with certain prisoners which ‘the said William held imprisoned within the ' said Castle, for which things he received of ' them for his payment 1,500 franks; of which ' he paid his companions for part of their wages

 ' which was behind unto them for one quarter ' of a year and a half, 78 franks; likewise after
 ' was paid at Calais for the victuals of the said
 ' Castle before that time due 442 franks; also ' for the passage of the said William and of his ' companions into England, and likewise for ' the expences of the said William being at ' Calais, 135 franks. And therefore the said
 ' William prayeth in this regard your justice
 ' and benignity, seeing, by envious suggestion,
 ' he hath against all reason been accused,
 ' whereby his estate and name, by the grievous
 ' sin of mis-informers, and he also, is ruined;
 ' having likewise consideration, that out of his ' proper goods he hath for the greater part paid
 ' his companions their wages which were due ' unto them as aforesaid, and also for the great
 ' costs he hath been at before this time for to ' victual the said Castle, (for which he hath ' given his obligations in divers places, and ' oweth great sums, by reason whereof he is on ' all sides undone, if your just benignities do ' not succour him) that you would be pleased
 ' for God's sake, and for pity, to ordain like' wise for him, that he may, by your discreet
 ' nobleness, recover his estate and goods. Also ' the said William Weston sheweth, how the first ' day when the enemies came before Arde, that ' he went in haste to Calais unto the captain,
 ' and desired of him more succour and aid of ' men, for the better guarding of his fort of ' Outhrewyke, and to defend it if the enemy
 ' should come thither: and the captain answer' ed him briefly, that he would not deliver nor
 ' give him aid nor succour at the same time,
 ' because he doubted that the said enemies
 ' would come before the town of Calais.—But ' notwithstanding all these pleas, the lords in ' this parliament, together with the most valiant ' and discreet knights, and other members there-
 ' of, after good and mature deliberation here-
 ' upon, delivered their judgment and resolution
 ' against Weston in form following: It seemeth
 ' to the lords aforesaid, that you, William, who ' had taken upon you safely to keep the Castle
 ' of Outhrewyke, as before is said, that you ' have without any duress or default of victuals
 ' evilly delivered and surrendered the same to
 ' the enemies of our lord the king, by your own
 ' default, against all apparent right and reason,
 ' and against your allegiance and undertaking
 ' aforesaid: and having by due information read
 ' the case of the late baron of Graystock, who ' was a lord, and one of the peers of the realm,
 ' who had taken upon him safely to keep for the ' foresaid grandfather the town of Berwick; the ' said baron perceiving afterwards that the said
 ' grandfather addressed himself to go into the ' realm of France, the said baron (without com' mand of the said grandfather) committed the ' said town of Berwick to a valiant esquire,
 ' Robert de Ogle, as lieutenant to the said
 ' baron, for to keep safe the said town of Ber' wick to the said grandfather; and the said

' baron went as an horseman to the parts of ' France to the said grandfather, and there re' mained in his company; during which time
 ' an assault of war was made upon the said
 ' town of Berwick by the Scots; and the said
 ' Robert, as lieutenant of the said baron,
 ' valiantly defended the same; and at last by ' such forcible assaults the said town was taken ' upon the said Robert, and two of the sons of ' the said Robert there slain in the defence of ' the same. Notwithstanding because that the ' said baron himself had taken upon him the ' safeguard of the said town to the said grand' father, and departed himself from thence with' out command of the said grandfather, and the ' said town of Berwick was lost in the absence ' of the baron, he being in the company of the ' said grandfather in the parts of France, as is ' aforesaid; it was adjudged, by advice of the ' said grandfather, the king of Castile, who is ' present, the nobles, dukes, and counts, Henry ' late duke of Lancaster, the late earl of ' Northumberland and Strafford, and sir Walter
 ' de Manny, that the said town was lost in de' fault of the said baron: and for this cause he ' had judgment of life and member, and that he ' should forfeit all that he had: and to render ' his judgment in these words, the said sir
 ' Walter had a command from the said grand' father. Which things considered, and this ' also, that you, William, surrendered the cas' tle of Outhrewyke to the enemies of our lord
 ' the king aforesaid, without any duress or want ' of victuals, against your allegiance and un' dertaking aforesaid, the lords above-mention' ed sitting here in full parliament adjudge you
 ' to death, and that you shall be drawn and ' hanged. But because that our lord the king ' is not yet informed of the manner of this judg' ment, the execution thereof shall be respited
 ' until the king be informed thereof: Where' upon it was commanded to the said constable
 ' safely to keep the said William, until he had
 ' other command from our lord the king.'

This case is very punctual, this judgment fatal to the defendant; wherein all his former pleas, and far better than he could make, are over-ruled against him long since, even in full parliament. (1.) This Weston, as soon as he heard of the enemy's approaches and intent to besiege Outhrewyke castle, sent post to the council, and to the governor of Calais, acquainting them with the weakness of the garrison, and craving present aid, (as the Defendant pretended he sent to his excellency) yet could receive no supplies from either. (2.) His garrison was not half enough to resist the enemies great power, neither had he means to increase it; whereas Bristol garrison was abundantly sufficient to resist the enemy, and the Defendant might have doubled it, had he pleased, there being 6 or 8,000 able men more in the Town, whom he might have employed in its defence. (3.) There were 8,400 enemies before it, as many or more than were before Bristol, and but 50 men only in the castle to defend it; whereas there were 2,000 foot and 300 horse at least to guard Bristol; a vast proportion. (4.) They had nine great pieces of battery, a great ram, or mortar-piece, greater than ever were seen in those parts before, with many other engines, as many or more than the enemy had at Bristol. (5.) The siege, battery, and assault thereof, continued from Monday till Saturday; whereas Bristol was besieged only from Monday till Wednesday noon, not half so long, and then yielded upon parley. (6.) All the walls and houses of the castle were beaten down and battered exceedingly, and the ditches drained of the water by trenches, and all their barricadoes beaten down, yet they still held it out; whereas not one shot at all was so much as made against the Castle or walls of Bristol, but against the out-works only. (7.) After the walls and barricadoes were thus broken down, and the ditch drained, they manfully repulsed the enemy, who fiercely assaulted it, and slew divers of them, with the loss and wounding of some of the garrison; whereas Bristol Castle and the body of the Town were yielded up before the least battery, mine, or assault. (8.) They made all things ready for an assault, planting all their ordnance, engines, galleries and faggots close to the Castle ditch, and sent two several heralds and messengers to him for a Parley ere he would treat; whereas the Defendant, before any battery or assault against the City or Castle, sent out twice to the enemy for a Parley, with so much haste, that he would not hearken to any who would beat them out, or oppose or delay the treaty. (9.) Twelve of his 50 men were by this time slain, sick and wounded; so that he had only 38 left to make good the Castle, thus battered and assaulted with so great a power; whereas the Defendant lost but 8 men at most, and had at least 2,300 horse and foot when he fell to parley. (10.) He surrendered the Castle by the advice of a general Council of War, upon better grounds than the Defendant yielded up Bristol; to wit, because the walls were beaten down, the garrison over-small to defend it, the enemy very likely to force it by the assault, no present relief near at hand, and to save his own, with the soldiers lives and goods, which else were endangered to be lost; none of which the Defendant can justly alledge, as we have manifested. (11.) He made the most of an ill bargain, by selling the victuals and prisoners in it to the French for 1,500 franks, with which he paid his soldiers their arrears of wages, discharged the debts of the Castle owing for victuals, and defrayed the charges of their passage into England; whereas the Defendant yielded up all the prisoners and victuals to the enemy gratis, with which provisions the ships that brought over the Irish soldiers were victualled, and left the state to pay the soldiers arrears and other debts contracted by him there, amounting to many thousand pounds, which ought to be made good out of his own estate. Therefore, in these respects, he ought to undergo the self-same judgment of death, and to be drawn and hanged, much more justly than he.

To these Precedents colonel Fiennes answered, 1. That these governors had all of them Commissions under the great seal of England to keep these Towns and Castles, and that made their offence so great; but he had no such Commission under the Great Seal of England to be governor of Bristol: and this he conceived differed the cases much.

To which Mr. Prynne replied, (1.) That the Defendant was much mistaken in this point; for these Towns and Castles lying in France, if the commissions of their governorships were under any seal, it was under the great seal of France, not of England, as appears by the express statute of 14 Ed. 3, stat. 4, and 1 H. 6, rot. parl. num. 14, 15. (2.) That the great seal being carried from the parliament when his commission was granted, he could not expect any such commission under the great seal, but from the king himself in opposition to the parliament, to whom he surrendered Bristol, perchance for want of a commission under the great seal to keep it. (3.) If this were a good plea, or warrantable distinction, then all the governors of Towns and Castles within the parliament's power might treacherously or cowardly surrender them forthwith to the king without punishment or danger, because they wanted a commission under the great seal to keep them. (4.) He had a commission under his excellency's hand and seal to keep the City; under whose authority he took the custody of it for the parliament's and kingdom's safety, in these distracted times, by virtue of a commission of both houses granted to his excellency: therefore his offence is as great and capital for surrendering it contrary to his trust, and his excellency's commission to keep it, as if it had been under the great seal. (5.) When his commission was first granted, the parliament had not made a new great seal to seal it, but since his surrender of Bristol they had made one: and he durst assure the Defendant, had his courage and fidelity been such as to hold out Bristol till the new seal was made, he would have procured him a commission under it to keep Bristol, rather than he should have yielded it up cowardly to the enemy, for want of a commission under the great seal of England. But because he held it not till such commission might be obtained, he must be condemned for rendering it contrary to that commission, which he both sent for and received from his excellency under his seal of arms alone.

Col. Fiennes's second Answer was, That it appeared not in these records what other matters and proofs were produced against these persons, besides those mentioned in them; and therefore, for aught he knew, they might be condemned for something else besides what is alledged in these records; else the cases might seem very hard, and the sentences none of the justest.

To which Mr. Prynne replied, That the Defendant by this strange answer betrayed his extraordinary ignorance in matters of law and records, into which no depositions of witnesses are wont to be inserted, but only the true state of the case itself, and the judgment given thereupon; and therefore to surmise they were condemned for any thing else than what is expressly mentioned in the records and judgments themselves, is to aver against the very records, and the judges that gave the sentences, and so to falsify and nullify all records. The cases therefore being admitted to be really such as the records relate, in nature of a demurrer or confession, and the judgments determining them to be such: this answer must rather be deemed an ignorant mistake than any solid reply.

Col. Fiennes's third Answer was, That the Castles of Outhreyke, Arde and Burburgh, were places of no great consequence or wealth, and therefore ought to be held out to the utmost: but Bristol being one of the richest, chiefest cities in the realm, and of great importance, ought not to be endangered or ruined by holding it to the utmost extremity, as castles and other such places of less concernment might be.

To which Mr. Prynne answered, (1.) That if places of smallest concernment ought to hold out to extremity, and if it be death to yield them up before; then certainly Bristol, and places of greatest consequence to the ruin or safety of the realm, ought much more to be kept to extremity, and the yielding of them up must be more capital; else he that betrayeth the greatest trust, and doth most mischief to the state, shall be less culpable, and undergo a milder censure, than he that betrays the smallest fort: yea, if this were either good justice, law or logic, the Defendant might argue, that he who steals 10,000*l.*, or murders a man, deserves not death; but he who steals 13*½d.*, or strikes a man, ought to be hanged without pity. The precedent and argument thereof held a minori ad majus: If these were condemned for their cowardly surrendering of those inconsiderable Towns and Castles before utmost extremity, which did but little prejudice to the republic; then much more ought the Defendant to lose his head for yielding Bristol thus, a place of highest concernment to the kingdom, which is almost lost in and by its loss. And doubtless the Defendant, who would not adventure his life to preserve such a considerable City as Bristol to the utmost exigence, would never adventure it to hold out any other inferior places till the last, but yield them up without resistance. Since therefore it appeared by these precedents, that the parties impeached for surrendering up any forts were always detained under custody during their trial; he desired the council the second time, that col. Fiennes might presently be put under safe custody, and judgment given against him according to these precedents and the laws of war; he rather because they were seconded by his own late judgment against Yeomans and Butcher, whom he condemned and executed, by martial law, only for endeavouring to deliver up Bristol to the enemy before it was fully fortified, whereas himself thus cowardly and traiterosly surrendered it to them after it was fortified, and abundantly furnished with all necessaries to hold out a siege; their intentional surrender being not so criminal or fatal to the republic as his actual.

When we had thus made good the several Articles of our Charge, and fixed the Loss of Bristol and the West too on col. Fiennes, who by his not denying it, in his Answer to the fourth Article, did thereby in point of law confess it; the Colonel, to free himself from this heavy charge, averred before the Council, That Bristol and the West were not lost by him, but sir William Waller: to prove this he produced several allegations. Upon which Mr. Prynne humbly moved the Council, that a gentleman of his worth and honour might not be thus publicly traduced, where he was neither present to make his defence, nor a party to the Articles; desiring that either he might substantially prove this palpable slander by pregnant evidences, or else be exemplarily punished for it.

Hereupon the Defendant first alledged, that he sent sir William Waller twelve hundred foot out of Bristol (to wit, col. Popham's whole regiment) very well armed, who at the rout of sir William near the Devises lost all their arms (not many of these men returning to Bristol, and those without arms); the loss of which regiment so weakened the garrison, that it lost both Bristol and the West, which he could not defend for want of men.

To which Mr. Prynne answered, (1.) That Bristol was not lost for want of men; and that this regiment was fully made up and supplied, by the Defendant's own confession, with a great over-plus; sir William Waller not receiving above seven or eight hundred foot out of Bristol, in lieu whereof the Defendant raised 1,100 or 1,000 at the least, besides those from Malmesbury. (2.) That when he sent forth that regiment he had an independent commission, and could not be enforced to it, nor ought to have sent them, if the City were thereby endangered, without special command from the Parliament or his Excellency: His sending out, then, of this regiment being his own voluntary act, (as his own letter to col. Popham attests, and he confessed) it is clear that himself only was the loss both of Bristol and the West: and if there were no other evidence, this alone would endanger his head; it being capital by all laws of war for any governor to send out his garrison, or to absent himself from his charge, without special command, if the place be by this means lost or surprized, as was adjudged in Parliament in the case of the baron of Greystock, cited in Weston's case; of the earl of Northumberland*, Henry Percy, in 7 R. 3, and others. Upon which ground we find the governor of Calais refused to part with any of his garrison for the defence of Outhreyke castle: And the reason is apparent, because if governnors might draw out their garrisons, or desert their charges at their pleasure, their forts might be easily surprized, betrayed, and a gap opened to infinite treacheries.

2. He produced his cousin capt. Temple to testify, that a gentlewoman of his acquaintance, and of kin to col. Fiennes, overtook another gentlewoman upon the highway, newly come from Oxford; of whom asking what news, she answered, that the greatest news now at Oxford was, that though sir William Waller had occasioned the loss of Bristol and the West, yet col. Fiennes was like to suffer for it, and become his sacrifice; who being the great Diana of the people, and so necessary a man to the Parliament, now in the field with an army, they would forbear to question him, and sacrifice col. Fiennes to humour him and his party.

To which Mr. Prynne answered, (1.) That this extravagant report, testified only at the third or fourth hand, was no evidence at all, and savoured rather of a direct plot to traduce sir William Waller than to justify col. Fiennes. (2.) That all the western gentlemen had a quite contrary opinion of this business, that Bristol and the West were lost by the Defendant, not by sir William, as appeared both by their extraordinary respects unto him, and present employment of him to regain the West. (3.) Admit this fabulous report to be bruited in Oxford, (to asperse sir William and the Parliament, and justify the Defendant) yet it signified no more, but that col. Fiennes had better friends and respect at Oxford than sir William Waller, perchance for his good service in surrendering up Bristol to them at so easy a rate in so short a time (enough to purchase him both friends and favour at the court;) where sir William was not so grateful, because he never did them so great a courtesy, or good piece of service, nor the republic so grand a mischief.

3. Col. Fiennes, for a conclusion of his Defence, informed the Council, 'That this trouble, prosecution, and disgrace had never befallen him, but for that constant affection and service which he and his family had always shewed to his Excellency and his army, for which sir William Waller and his party did malign him.'

To which Mr. Prynne replied, That this was a most false, scandalous and seditious speech, discovering who they were that raised and fomented the late unhappy differences between his Excellency and sir William, and to what sinister end; that nothing could be uttered more effectual to set all the Parliament's several armies into a faction against one another, instead of joining against the public enemy; and therefore having neither the least ground nor proof to justify this calumny, he desired he might be exemplarily proceeded against for it.

In fine, after some hear-say Proofs, what opinion the enemies had of his valorous defence of Bristol, and the intennability thereof, and a recapitulation of all the heads of his Defence, he concluded with this peroration:

'My lords, I have at last ended my Defence,

'and (as I hope) sufficiently cleared both my honour, valour, and fidelity to the state in the defence of Bristol: And now I beseech you to consider, whose honour or life can be in safety, if lawyers (see'd by their own malice) may sift and turn up all his actions, and snail at his words; if such who are no soldiers may, upon the information of attorneys, and testimony of shop-keepers, ale-wives, enemies, but of no soldiers at all, (except such who appear out of particular spleen) be brought thus upon the stage for their lives, and the great privileges of Parliament broken by such an impeachment of a member of it, which could not be paralleled but by that accusation of the Five Members. Wherefore I desire, that as I have served my country faithfully, and done many good services for it, so I may by this honourable council be justified in my faithfulness, and repaired against the prosecutors in my honour, more dear unto me than my life; that so after all my public services, I may not now be cast behind the door like a disclout, unfit for any further employment.'

To which Mr. Prynne replied, (1.) That he wondered much why the defendant should thus except against him as an unfitting prosecutor, since himself (without his privity or desire) had by a proclamation under his excellency's hand and seal, posted up at Westminster and the Exchange, selected him and Mr. Walker by name to prosecute this business against him: if then we were unmeet prosecutors, it was his own, not our error, and he must blame only his own judgment in the choice, not us. (2.) That though he were but a common lawyer, yet he deemed one of that profession a very fit prosecutor of him who had betrayed his trust, and in it the kingdom, contrary to law: and whereas the defendant scandalously objected, that he was see'd by his own private malice, he protested that there was never any malice, nor cause thereof between them; that he formerly honoured the defendant for his pen, but never for his sword, and bestowed some courtesies on, though he never received any from him; that he was born not far from Bristol, bred up some years therein, had many friends and kindred in or near it, who lost much, and himself not a little, by its surrender; that nothing had engaged him in this prosecution but the defendant's own summons, nor see'd him but the public service of the parliament, and security of the realm: and although he had lost and suffered much for the church and state, yet he never received nor expected the least recompence, much less reward from either, nor ever had any pay for public services; whereas the defendant received good wages for all his services, and for losing Bristol too: that himself had never lost any thing of the state's, as he had done, but only what was his own, (his liberty, calling, estate, members) and that only for doing the church and kingdom service; none of all which the defendant had parted with for the public. And therefore whereas the defendant boasts of his public actions, he could without vanity or prejudice truly affirm, he had done ten times more service for church and state, and suffered a thousand-fold more for both, not only gratis, but even with the loss of all his earthly comforts, than this boaster had done upon pay; and that he doubted not, through God's assistance, he should be able to do the church and state as good or better service for the future as he: wherefore he had little reason to extol himself so much, or depress him so low, as not to be a fitting prosecutor of such an unworthy action. That though he were no professed soldier, yet he doubted not but he had read as many or more treatises of military affairs than himself; that he had for eight years space, of his restraint in the Tower of London and Mount-Orgueil castle, conversed with old soldiers (and by name with sir William Balfour for five years in the Tower); from whom he gained so much experience in martial affairs, as he would have undertaken to have kept the City and Castle of Bristol till this day, had he been governor there as the defendant was, notwithstanding their pretended untenability, and the enemy's power: that in the managing of this very business before this honourable council, he had in sundry particulars manifested himself, if not a better, yet at least as good a soldier as the defendant, for which he appealed to the council) and in regard of his long suffering and restraint in castles, was the antienter soldier of the two: that the defendant had confessed to the lieutenant-colonels Paleologus and Andrews, when he first undertook the government of Bristol, 'That he was no soldier;' and his yielding it up in a short time, before extremity, upon such poor conditions, manifested him in truth to be no man at arms; and therefore though he were no professed soldier, yet why he should not be a soldier sufficient to prosecute him, who, by his own confession and action, is no real soldier, he could yet discern no reason. For his witnesses, whom he here vilified and traduced, they were many of them persons of quality and honour, some of them members of parliament; others more expert soldiers, and persons better versed in martial affairs, than any of the defendant's witnesses; all of them persons of good fame and conversation, disinterested and disengaged in the cause, against whom no exceptions can be taken: when all his material witnesses were his own officers, brother, kinsmen, servants, creditors, and parties in the cause, most of them involved with him in the self-same guilt. That his life and honour were now drawn in question only by himself, upon his own motion and engagement of us; and if he lost them (as he lost Bristol), he might thank himself for interesting us in this public service, for our country's honour and future security, the only thing we aimed at in this present prosecution. That his pretended breach of privilege of parliament was but a fancy, already answered and over-ruled in the commons house, who referred him to a trial before a council of war, by two several orders, upon his own motion and pretended voluntary waving of his privilege, before any impeachment put in against him; which impeachment was first tendered to the house of commons; who, upon the reading of it, with one unanimous vote referred it to his excellency, to be proceeded on by a free and fair hearing before this honourable council: and if the proceedings on this impeachment upon his own motion, by the commons direction, be a breach of privilege, it is only in himself and the parliament, not in us; and it hath no more resemblance to the case of the Five Members, than an ape to a lion. That he was now questioned, not for his faithful but unfaithful service to the republic and parliament, in the surrender of Bristol, in which he presumed he durst not manifest himself so far a papist as to plead a justification by works, or absolution by preceding merits. That he needed not to crave reparation of his honour and reputation from us or any other in this case, since they were both impaired and ruined by himself through this ignoble action: that he had given the whole kingdom an incurable fatal wound, and irreparable loss, (which the loss of his head and estate could no way recompence) by this surrender, for which in the whole kingdom's behalf we here demand judgment against him according to the quality of his offence: that our services for the republic were every way equivalent to, if not transcending his; our credits, our reputations, as dear to us as his to him, which he hoped should no ways suffer for our zeal and fidelity in this public prosecution upon our own expences, without thought of recompence. That if the defendant should be pronounced guiltless by this honourable council, after so full a charge and hearing, he was obliged to us for bringing him to such a public vindication of his suspected fidelity, which else would have lain eclipsed under a black cloud of jealousies: but if he were pronounced guilty of the impeachment, (as we made no doubt he would, the evidence being so clear, the proofs and precedents in point so punctual) we should deserve thanks, if not from him, (who pretended a desire to be tried to the uttermost) yet at least from the parliament, kingdom, and our native country, for bringing such a grand, politic, daring delinquent to his trial and condign judgment; who by surrendering Bristol hath endangered the loss of three whole kingdoms, and of our laws, religion, liberties, lives, and present parliament.

And now (my honoured lords and gentlemen) lest we should incur your just censure (according to the defendant's doctrine) for stouting out this cause over-long, which, by the defendant's tediousness hath lasted nine days dispute, (though the city's siege continued not three full days) we shall close up all in a word or two: we render you many hearty thanks, in our own and the kingdom's names, for your nine days pains, patience, and that fair, honourable, impartial hearing you have afforded both parties in the trial of this great public cause, in which the whole realm is interested, and whereon their eyes are fixed; not doubting but as you have granted us a most full, fair, indifferent hearing, so you will in due season, after serious perusal of your notes and the evidence on both sides, give such a just and equal sentence as shall chronicle your justice to, and make this case a leading precedent for, all future times, to deter all governors of towns or castles from cowardly, traitorly, or unworthy surrenders of them.

Thus ended the long debate of this great cause, begun on Thursday the 14th of December 1643, and concluded on Saturday the 23d of December. After which both parties were ordered to attend the council again on Friday following, being the 29th of December, to hear sentence, the council desiring so much respite to peruse their notes, and prepare their judgment. Who sitting again, and we attending them, on the designed day, the council first delivered their several judgments of the cause among themselves in private; after which col. Fiennes was disarmed at the council-chamber-door, (whereat he was much appalled) and then he and we being called in, the Judge Advocate read his Sentence out of a paper in hæc verba :

‘Colonel Nathanael Fiennes, you have been arraigned and convicted before this honourable Council, for surrendering and delivering up the Town and Castle of Bristol, with the forts, magazines, arms, ammunition, victuals, and other things thereunto belonging, and for not holding the same to the utmost extremity, according as by your duty you ought to have done: for which offence this honourable council hath adjudged you to be executed according to the tenor of the Articles of War, by having your head cut off. God have mercy on your soul.’

The Defendant, astonished at this Sentence, told the council, that he little expected such a Sentence from them; and demanded upon what grounds and reasons they thus condemned him? and whether they did allow of our paper-witnesses, or disallow the testimonies of his officers? Whereupon all being commanded to withdraw for a short space, and then called in again, the Defendant was told, ‘it was against the style and honour of the Council, to be demanded the reasons of their Judgment after it was once pronounced.’ Upon this the Defendant alleged, that he was a parliament-man, and claimed his privilege; that he ought not to be condemned without the privy of the Commons House, to which he appealed against this Sentence, and desired his Appeal might be entered.

To which Mr. Prynne answered, That he had formerly appealed from the parliament (the antient proper judge of his cause) to a council of war, and by his own voluntary motion waves his privilege to put himself upon this trial, as appeared by two orders of the house; therefore he could not now appeal back again to the house, or resume or claim his waved privilege after judgment. Notwithstanding, upon his request, his Appeal was entered; yet guard was set upon his person at his lodging; and upon better consideration he sent to withdraw his Appeal that night.

He was afterwards pardoned by the Lord General.

CASES OF COWARDICE,

Referred to in the foregoing TRIAL, as stated from the Records by Mr. Prynne.

BY the laws* of king Edward the Confessor, he who flieth from his lord or fellow-soldier for fear of war, or death, in the conduct of the heretock (or captain) in any expedition by sea or land, let him lose all that is his, and his very life, and the lord may lay hands on the land which he had formerly given to him. And he who shall be slain in war before his lord, be it in the land or elsewhere, let his reliefs be pardoned, and his heirs enjoy his money and land without any diminution, and divide it among themselves.

By the Statutes of 18 Hen. 6, c. 19. 7 Hen. 7, c. 1. 3 Hen. 8, c. 5. 2 Edw. 6, c. 2. 4 & 5 Phil. & Mary, c. 2. 3. 5 Eliz. c. 15, it is made no less than felony and death for any soldiers to depart from their captains without their licence under hand; for which many soldiers have been condemned and executed. Coke’s 6 Rep. f. 27, in the Case of Soldiers:

And before these Statutes, Thomas earl of Lancaster was proclaimed † a traitor by the whole army, in the 12th year of king Edw. 2, for departing in discontent from the army at the siege of Berwick, by means whereof it was not taken, and the siege raised.

Henry de Essex’s Case, 2 Hen. 2.

Henry de Essex, † standard-bearer to the kings of England by right of inheritance, was accused of high treason in the 2nd year of king Henry 2, by Robert de Montford his near kinsman, and vanquished by him in a duel at Reading for his cowardly abandoning and throwing down the standard-royal in North-Wales, in the battle against prince Owen, amidst the mountains, and flying when fiercely assaulted by the Welsh, whereby the king's army was endangered to be routed: whereupon though his life was pardoned, yet his lands were seized into the king's hand, and he shorn and shut up a monk in the abbey of Reading, where he died.

Thomas Katrington's Case, 50 Ed. 3.

Sir John Anneley, knt. in the parliament of 50 Ed. 3, (commonly stiled, The Good Parliament) had accused Thomas Katrington, esq. of treason for selling and delivering up the Castle of St. Saviour's (built by the lord John Chaundois within the isle of Constantine) to the French, for an inestimable sum of money, when as he wanted neither means of defence, nor victuals: which castle, had it not been thus traitorously alienated, had descended to the said sir John in right of his wife, being next heir to the lord Chaundois, offering to make good this accusation, and try it out by duel: whereupon the said Thomas Katrington was then apprehended and imprisoned; but soon after, by means of the duke of Lancaster and the lord Latimer, who then did what they pleased, released, being formerly their instrument and creature in peace and war, in all just and unjust, in true and false things; neither could the said sir John obtain the effect of his suit till the parliament of 3 R. 2, A. D. 1380, some men affirming, That it was against the laws of the realm for any man of the realm to fight such a duel for such a cause; many who feared the like tax and accusation did most of all hinder this trial: but at last, in this parliament, the antientest and truth-speaking knights of the realm being assembled, it was resolved, that for a foreign cause, such as the present was, which arose not within the limits of the kingdom, and for the possession of transmarine things, it was lawful for any man to fight a duel, if the cause were before certified to the constable and marshal of the realm, and the duel accepted by the parties in their presence. Whereupon a day of battle, and lists, were appointed them in the court at Westminster, where this duel being solemnly fought on the 7th of June between these two champions, in the presence of the king, nobles, and an infinite multitude of people; the traitorous esquire was vanquished by the knight, to the joy of the common people, and to the grief of traitors: The esquire, who fainted in the place, died the next morning.

Gomey's and Weston's Case, 1 Ric. 2.

In the parliament rolls of 1 R. 2, num. 38, 39, 40. The record is thus: Item, 'Whereas it was prayed by the commons, that all those who were rendered or lost castles or towns through the very default of the captains, might be put to answer it to this parliament, and severely punished according to their desert, by Award of the lords and baronage, to eschew the evil examples which they have given to others who are governors of towns and castles, it was commanded to sir Alexander de Buxhall, constable of the Tower of London, that he should cause to come before the lords in parliament at Westminster, on Friday the 27th of November, in the year aforesaid, sir John de Gomeneys and William de Weston, apprehended and detained in the said Tower by the command of our lord the king, because they had lost and rendered castles and towns to the enemies of our lord the king, to answer thereunto, upon the articles which shall be surmised against them for the said cause, on the behalf of our lord the king. Upon which day of Friday the said John and William, being brought by the said constable before the lords aforesaid in full parliament, sitting in the White-Chamber, they were severally arraigned at the commandment of the said lords, by sir Richard Lecrop, kt. steward of the house of our lord the king, in manner as ensueth:

'William de Weston, you took upon you from the most puissant prince, whom God assol, sir Edward late king of England, grandfather of our lord the king that now is, safely to keep to him and his heirs, kings of England, the castle of Outhrewyke, without surrendering it to any one but to the said grandfather, or to his said heirs, or by command from him or from his said heirs: Have you, William, who are a liege-man of our lord the king, in times of the same our lord the king who now is, true heir to the said grandfather, delivered and surrendered the same to the enemies of our lord the king, without command from him, to the dishonour, or damage, of him and his crown, and of the estate of his realm of England, against your allegiance and undertaking aforesaid? What will you say hereunto?

'Whereupon the said William said, that he had put his answers in writing, and produced before them a schedule containing many things comprised within the same, and came and read the said schedule in full parliament. Whereupon it was demanded of him by the said steward, if he presented before them this schedule for a final answer in this behalf, or not? And hereupon the said William prayed that this schedule might be re-delivered to him, and that he might put in his final answer; which schedule, for the cause aforesaid, was re-delivered to him; and after the said William delivered the said schedule, with an addition put thereunto in full parliament for his final answer in this behalf; the tenor of which schedule is such as followeth: To the most sage council of our lord the king, and to the other lords and commons of the parliament, supplicates and sheweth William de Weston, That albeit he be accused of this, that he hath maliciously rendered the castle of Outhrewyke, of which he had the custody by delivery and assignment of our lord the king; may it please your sage and just discretion to have the said William excused thereof, for these causes ensuing: First of all, may it please you to remember, how that the said William was lately informed by a spy, that a great power of the enemies would come upon him to besiege the said Castle, with very great and very grievous ordnances; whereupon he the said William presently by his attorney and by his letters, required of the said council, that it would please them to reinforce the said Castle, with more men for the defence and safeguard thereof, in regard that the garrison of the said Castle that then was, were not half sufficient in respect of multitude to resist so great a force in so large a place; but in conclusion for all this, he could not have any succour from the said council. And so the said William, not at all through his default, was left without people sufficient for to keep and defend the said Castle any longer time, which he beseecheth you to take into your just and benign consideration. Also, please you to know, how upon a Monday about 1 of the clock the enemy came to besiege the said Castle, to the number of about 2,600 men of arms, and 700 Arblasters Genevoyes, and with 5,000 of the commonalty of the country, having 9 great cannons, divers engines, and one mortar-piece, beyond all measure greater than ever they had seen any before in those marches; and the same hour presently a great number of the men of arms, and arblasters aforesaid, came before the gates for to assail the said Castle; and at this time a knight of theirs was slain, who was cousin to the lord de Clisson as was reported, and many others were likewise then slain and wrecked; and within a short time after they began to discharge and shoot with their ordnances, and other engines, and so continued their assault from one day to another, that is to say, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, and then were the walls and houses of the Castle battered down and bruised in many places; and they had likewise by force trenched the ditches of the said Castle in three places, so as all the water was drained out: and that night came a great party of them, and by fine force made an assault and abated the barricadoes; and the next day, which was Friday, they came about day-breaking with all their forces to assault the said Castle; but with God's assistance they were yet repulsed with force from their assault, and of the one part and other there were some slain and wounded. And the same day the mareschal of Burgoyne sent to the said William and others of the said Castle to render it, whereupon having consideration that the said Castle could not be kept, as well in regard of the small number of the people, as by reason that the walls in many places were enfeebled by their marvellous ordnances, there was a treaty with the lords to this end, that the said William and his companions might advise themselves against the next morning; and so they departed each to their own. Also this same night the enemies caused all their ordnances, engines, mortar-piece, cannons, and faggots, with scaling ladders, galleries, and all other necessaries, to be drawn up near to the very ditch of the aforesaid Castle; and the next day, which was Saturday, they made all things ready plainly for to assault the place; and then first of all they sent an herald to the said William, to know if the said Castle should be rendered to them or not? Whereupon the said William by advice of the wisest of his companions, taking consideration how that the said place was destroyed and enfeebled with their ordnances, and also that they were too few men for its defence, by reason that 12 of their companions were in this time slain, wounded, and sick, so as there remained of all the people of the garrison in health but only 38 men to defend the same: Hereupon by common assent the said Castle, which could be kept no longer, was by force surrendered for to save their lives granted to them, and their goods. And that all these things aforesaid are true, the said William puts himself upon his proof, according to your discreet ordnances. Also it is to be remembered, that when the said Castle was thus rendered as aforesaid certain French people bargained with the said William for his victuals to buy them, together with certain prisoners which the said William held imprisoned within the said Castle, for which things he received of them for his payment 1,500 franks; of which he paid to his companions for part of their wages which was behind unto them for one quarter of a year and a half 78 franks; likewise after was paid at Calais for the victuals of the said Castle before that time due, 442 franks; also for the passages of the said William and of his companions unto England, and likewise for the expences of the said William being at Calais, 135 franks: And therefore the said William prayeth, in this regard, your justice and benignity, seeing by envious suggestion he hath against all reason been accused, whereby his estate and name, by the grievous sin of misinformers, and he also are ruined; having likewise consideration that out of his proper goods he hath for the greater part paid his companions their wages which were due unto them as aforesaid, and also for the great costs he hath been at before this time for to victual the said Castle, (for which he hath given his obligations in divers places, and oweth great sums, by reason whereof he is on all sides undone, if your just benignity does not succour him; that you would be pleased for God's sake, and for pity, to ordain likewise for him, that he may, by your discreet nobleness, recover his estate and goods. Also the said William Weston sheweth how, the first day when the enemies came before Arde, that he went in haste to Calais unto the captain, and desired of him more succour and aid of men for the better guarding of his fort of Outhrewyke, and to defend it if the enemies should come thither. And the captain answered him briefly, That he would not deliver, nor give him aid nor succour at the said time, because he doubted that the said enemies would come before the town of Calais. And the same schedule being viewed and read in full parliament, immediately after was the said John brought thither by the said Steward in the manner following:

‘ John lord of Gomeney, you took upon you to the most puissant prince, whom God assoil, sir Edward late king of England, grandfather to our lord the king that now is, safely to keep to him and his heirs, kings of England, the town and castle of Arde, without surrendering the same to any person, except to the said grandfather and his heirs, or by commandment of him or of his heirs. These have you, lord of Gomeney, in time of our lord the king that now is, true heir to the said grandfather, delivered and surrendered to the enemies of our lord the king without commandment from him, to the dishonour of him and of his crown, and of the estate of the realm of England, against your undertaking aforesaid: What will you say thereunto? Whereupon the said John answered, That the said town and castle of Arde were so weak, that he could not well keep them against so great a power of the enemy’s, which was then ready to assault the same town and castle; and therefore he caused to assemble all the knights, esquires, and others, being in the said town, and informed them of the perils of the said town, and force of the said enemies; and by common counsel and assent of the said knights, esquires, and others, he issued out to the enemies to treat with them for to save the lieges of our lord the king, being within the said town and castle of Arde; without that, that he ever took any thing for to surrender the said town and castle of Arde. Upon which one Geoffry of Argenton, knt. said in full parliament to the said John, that he the said Geoffry was at that time in the said town in company of the said John, and that the town and castle of Arde were never delivered nor surrendered by his counsel nor assent, but that he was always ready to die and live upon the safeguard of the same; and the said Geoffry offered to prove it, if any would deny it. And further, it was demanded of the said John, if he would say any thing else? And he said he would not. Whereupon the said constable was charged with the safe custody of the said John and William until the next day, the Saturday next ensuing, and to bring them again safe before the said lords in the said parliament, at the place and day aforesaid. At which day of Saturday, that is to say, on the 20th day of November in the year aforesaid, it was shewed unto them severally by the said steward on the same day, by the commandment of the lords aforesaid, how upon the answers that the said John and William had given in the said parliament, as before is said, the lords of the said parliament, that is to say, the king of Castile and of Leon, and duke of Lancaster, Edmund earl of Cambridge, Edmund earl of March, Richard earl of Arundel, Thomas earl of Warwick, Hugh earl of Stafford, William earl of ‘ Suffolk, Wm. earl of Salisbury, Henry earl of Northumberland, John lord Nevil, Roger lord Clifford, and many other lords, barons, and bannerets being in the said parliament, who had assembled and advised together from the time that the said answers were given in parliament the Friday, until this Saturday at three of the clock, of things touching the answers aforesaid, and came and examined diligently the said answers and other articles touching those matters, and taking thereupon good and mature deliberation, and due information of the most valiant and most discreet knights, and others, being in the said parliament, it was thus said: First of all, in manner as followeth, to the said William by the Steward, reciting the things aforesaid touching the said William: It seemeth to the lords aforesaid, that you, William, who had taken upon you safely to keep the castle of Outhrewyke, as before is said, that you, William, have without any duress or default of victuals, evilly delivered and surrendered the same to the enemies of our lord the king by your own default, against all apparent right and reason, and against your allegiance and undertaking aforesaid: and having by due information read the case of the late baron of Graystock, who was a lord, and one of the peers of the realm, who had taken upon him safely to keep to the aforesaid grandfather the town of Berwick; the said baron perceiving afterward, that the said grandfather addressed himself to ride into the realm of France, the said baron (without command of the said grandfather) committed the said town of Berwick to a valiant esquire, Robert de Ogle, as lieutenant of the said baron, for to keep safe the said town of Berwick to the said grandfather, and the said baron went as a horseman to the said parts of France to the said grandfather, and there remained in his company. During which time, an assault of war was made upon the said town of Berwick by the said Scots, and the said Robert, as lieutenant to the said baron, valiantly defended the same; and at last by such forcible assaults the said town was taken upon the said Robert, and two of the sons of the said Robert there slain in the defence of the same. Notwithstanding, because that the said baron himself had taken upon him the safeguard of the said town to the said grandfather, and departed himself from thence without command of the said grandfather, and the said town of Berwick was lost in the absence of the baron, he being in the company of the said grandfather in the parts of France, as is aforesaid: It was adjudged by advice of the said grandfather, the king of Castile, who is present, the nobles, dukes, and counts, whom God assoil, Henry late duke of Lancaster, the late earls of Northampton and Stafford, and sir Walter de Manny, that the said town was lost in default of the said baron; and for this cause he had judgment of life and member, and that he should forfeit all that he had:

and to render this judgment in these words, the said sir Walter had a command from the said grandfather. Which things considered, and this also, that you, William, surrendered the said castle of Outhrewyke to the enemies of our lord the king aforesaid, without any duress or want of victuals, against your allegiance and undertaking aforesaid, the lords above-named sitting in parliament, adjudge you to death, and that you shall be drawn and hanged: but because that our lord the king is not yet informed of the manner of this judgment, the execution thereof shall be respited until the king be informed thereof. Whereupon it was commanded to the said constable safely to keep the said William, until he had other command from our lord the king. And as to the said John lord of Gumeney, touching his answers aforesaid, it was shewed unto him by the said Steward, how the said lords had assembled and considered of the said answers as afore said; and moreover it was shewed to him, how that in the time that sir Ralph de Fevers, knight, had the custody of the said town and castle of Arde, the said town of Arde was not half so strong as it was at the time the said John surrendered the same; and the said Ralph had a command from the said grandfather to surrender the same for the feebleness thereof, before that the said Ralph would put himself into very great peril for safeguard thereof; notwithstanding the said Ralph valiantly defended and maintained the same against a very great and strong assault of war. And thereupon, and the things aforesaid, and other evidences touching the answers of the said John in this behalf; it was said in manner as followeth to the said John, being in parliament, by the said Steward, reciting all things aforesaid touching the aforesaid John; and also the forecited judgment of the said baron, and the cause thereof in manner abovesaid, That it seemed to the lords aforesaid, sitting here in parliament, considering your answers in this behalf, and the examinations and informations had thereupon as before, and having regard also to this, that there were lately sent unto you to the said town and castle of Arde, above the number of men with which you had at another time undertaken the safeguarding of the said town and castle, twenty men of arms, and twenty archers to enforce the same, according to your request then made to certain lords, late being upon a message at Calais on the behalf of the said grandfather; and this also, that at that time it was said unto you by the king of Castile, who is here present, that if you could not well keep them, you ought in no manner to undertake to keep the same, and that another should have and keep them, who would take upon him safely to keep the same to the said grandfather and his heirs aforesaid; and thereupon you undertook to keep them safely without surrendering them to any, except in manner as aforesaid; and now you, John, without duress or default of victuals or artillery, or of other things necessary for the defence of the said town and castle of Arde, without command of our lord the king, have evilly delivered and surrendered the same to the enemies of our lord the king, by your own default, against all appearance of right or reason, and against your undertaking aforesaid; wherefore the lords aforesaid, here in full parliament, adjudge you to death; and because that you are a gentleman and a baronet, and have served the said grandfather in his wars, and are no liege-man of our lord the king, you shall be beheaded, without having other judgment; and because also that our lord the king is not yet informed of the manner of this judgment, the execution thereof shall be put in respite, until our lord the king be informed thereof. Whereupon the aforesaid constable was commanded safely to keep the said John until he had other command from our lord the king.*

Cressingham and Spikesworth's Case, 7 Rd. 2.

In the Parliament-Rolls of 7 R. 2, numb. 17, there is this case: Item, Upon the complaint which hath been made to the king, of Pierce de Cressingham and John de Spikesworth, esqrs. concerning this, That whereas there were made in the said voyage (to wit, of the bishop of Norwich into Flanders with an army) captains and guardians of the castle of Drinkham in Flanders, which was gained from the enemies, and after that well and sufficiently stored with victuals and other necessaries, and strong enough to be held against the enemies, that they left and rendered the said castle to the said enemy, receiving of them for this delivery and surrender, by treaties made with the enemy, a sum of gold, and that by covenant made with the king's enemies, without the will and command of our lord the king himself, or of his lieutenant: for which the said esquires were arrested by command of the king, and after put to their answer in parliament. And the said John Spikesworth excused himself before the king in parliament in this manner: That he had never the custody of the said castle, nor any thing to do therewith, save only that as he was riding into the country, somewhat near the said castle of Drinkham, to make his best advantage upon the enemy, by force of the said enemy he was there chased to the said castle, then being in the custody of the said Pierce de Cressingham; and soon after he saith, That upon an assault made to the bar-bican there, by the enemy, he was unhappily routed, and one of his varlets slain in the garrison very near him, where he remained continually until the said Pierce rendered the same; and otherwise he had never any thing there to do, neither as a soldier thereof, nor

‘in any other manner whatsoever; praying, that therefore it would please our lord the king to have him well excused. To whom it was answered on the behalf of the king, That if any man knoweth not to say more against the said John, contrary to his said answer now made, that the king will hold him well excused, and wills that he shall be dis-arrested, and suffered to go at large. And the said Pierce of Cressingham well knowing that he had the guard of the said castle said, That as soon as the enemies were come before Burburgh, in which were the lord Beaumont, sir William of Elingham, sir Thomas Tryvet, sir William Farrinden, and many other Englishmen; and the town and castle of Burburgh being surrendered to the enemy, of all the soldiers which he had with him at Drinkham, none would there continue with him upon the safeguard of the said castle, but only five persons in all; by reason of which great necessity he was forced, in safeguard of his own person and his people, to make a treaty with the enemy, for to deliver up the said fort; and thereupon he did it, and not for any other cause, nor in any other manner, but only by constraint of the power of the said enemy as aforesaid. And further he saith, That he never received any thing from the said enemy by way of gift, or in any other manner; whereupon he conceiveth, that no man ought to impute any manner of blame, nor of reproach unto his person. But if it shall be thought that he hath done ill in any manner, he puts himself most humbly into the grace of his liege lord. And because that this excuse seemed not at all to be sufficient, he was committed to prison, there to remain until the king our lord had otherwise declared his pleasure concerning him.’

In the same parliament of 7 R. 2, numb. 22. The bishop of Norwich, general of the forces sent over into Flanders, having four Articles exhibited against him in this parliament, touching that expedition, and the surrendering of Graveling to the enemy, to which he had given some former Answer, (see num. 15, 17, 20, 21), upon his second arraignment had this proceeding: ‘At which day the said bishop rehearsing the four Articles surmised against him formerly in parliament, and in presence of the king himself, gave there his Answers, such almost as before, concerning all the things aforesaid; adjoining thereunto, that the time when he heard the news that the vanguard of the host of France was entered the country of Flanders, and that thereupon the said siege of Ipre was thereby removed, he took a resolution to have encountered the vanguard, for to have fought with them; which purpose of his he could not perform by reason that the captains of his host would not assent thereunto, but those captains and others of his host contrained him, insomuch that of necessity,

‘and for doubt of the enemies they ought to depart, and betake themselves to their fortresses; and thereupon the said bishop returned to the town of Graveling, and the same would he have held out well enough against all men, and did hold out until the other captains had rendered their forts to the French; and after that, until that some English might come unto him incontinently, although there were well-nigh about six or seven thousand English lying upon the sands near Calais, who were made to come out of the said forts rendered, to their great mischief and prejudice, because they had not wherewith to live, neither could they have entrance into the town of Calais. And forasmuch as the truce made before that time ought to cease within two or three days then next ensuing, the French had a purpose to run upon them and slay them all, as soon as the said truce was ended; which slaughter, if it had been made, would principally have turned upon the said bishop, and after on the other captains, to far greater villany and mischief than any other thing could bring. The bishop was thereupon required and charged on the behalf of the king himself, that he should render the town to the enemy, or else demolish it, and go his way to succour the said people, and after that towards England, in salvation of himself and others of his host; for they said, That if any thing else but good had happened to the said people lying on the sands, they would have truly called the said bishop to an account before the king himself: whereupon it behoved him the said bishop to abate and void the said town of Graveling, as it was lawful for him to do at his pleasure, being gained by his proper conquest from the enemy. And for this, and for the other reasons formerly alledged by him, as also because that a letter from our lord the king came to him before, commanding him, that if there were great want of victuals in the said town, as in verity there was, that then in salvation of himself, and of the said people, he should void the town and succour the said people, and after return into England; it seems to him, that he ought to be well excused of whatever is surmised against him.’ To which the said Chancellor (No. 27), replied and said: ‘Master bishop, as to this your last reason, it is true that you had sufficient victual when this letter came unto you; and besides this, the king sent you other victuals in great plenty; and also with it other good letters, containing, how he had appointed his uncle of Spain to come speedily to you for your aid and succour; and all this notwithstanding, you departed thence, leaving the said town to the enemies, against the form of your indenture, by the which the king hath given and granted you whatever

‘ you might conquer, not at all to render, sell ‘ or leave the same to the enemy, but to hold
‘ and possess. And also to that which you ‘ have said in your first answer, that by your ‘ said voyage truces had been agreed between ‘ the realms, and happy offers of peace made ‘ by the adversaries of France, which you say ‘ shall be an introduction to a good and final ‘ peace, which God grant, it contains no truth
‘ at all: for true it is, that the news spread ‘ in the army of France of the coming of our lord
‘ the king, and of Monsieur of Lancaster, who ‘ was at the sea-side ready to pass for your suc‘ cour, was the principal cause of the truce and ‘ proffers aforesaid, and of the treaty to be ‘ commenced; for it is no probable thing at ‘ all, nor in any wise agreeable to reason, that ‘ you who were with your people chased by ‘ force of the enemies out of the field, and after‘ wards besieged by them within your fortresses, ‘ should be the cause of the said treaty by any ‘ way. And so as to this, nor yet as to any ‘ other of the reasons before alleged, nor for ‘ the rebellion of your captains or other of ‘ your retinue, nor any other defaults which ‘ you have or may surmise unto them, (con‘ sidering that you had them all of your pro‘ per choosing and election, and not at all by ‘ the nomination of our lord the king, or of ‘ his council) you neither can or ought to be at ‘ all excused of the damages, deceits, villanies, ‘ contempts, and the other losses and mispri‘ sions surmised to you, nor in especial of the ‘ treaty made with the enemy upon the deli‘ verance of the said fortresses, of which there ‘ are certain indentures made and drawn be‘ tween you and your captains on the one part,
‘ and the enemies of the king on the other part, ‘ sealed with their seals, and the seals of the ‘ other captains, without the authority or con‘ sent of the said our lord the king, as before is ‘ said. And moreover the said Chancellor said ‘ in the behalf of the king, Sir bishop, although ‘ the king our lord might clearly handle and ‘ judge you as a temporal person of his realm, ‘ because you have behaved and carried your‘ self as a temporal person; for you expressly ‘ obliged yourself to the king our lord by your ‘ indentures, to be a soldier of the king, to go‘ vern the Christian people after the term of ‘ your Crossado ended, and you used commonly ‘ to have your sword carried before you; and ‘ you did many other such like things every ‘ day publicly as a lord temporal, against the ‘ common custom of the estate of a prelate of ‘ England: notwithstanding, by reason of your ‘ estate, the king our lord, of his grace, will ‘ forbear for the present to lay his hands upon ‘ your body. But forasmuch as he is informed, ‘ that you yourself have complained to many ‘ lords of the realm, that wrong hath been lately ‘ done you on the last day, affirming by your ‘ words, that that which was done passed not ‘ at all by assent or knowledge of your peers
‘ of the realm; this is greatly to be marvelled
‘ of you, and of these your words, seeing the ill ‘ success touched nothing at all your perality,

‘ but only certain misprisions which you have ‘ made and perpetrated as a soldier of the king, ‘ against the form of your indentures and coven‘ nants which you have made with the king our ‘ lord, to the great damage of the king as be‘ fore is said, whereof the connisance and pu‘ nishment of common right and antient cus‘ tom of the realm of England, only and totally ‘ appertaineth to our lord the king, and to no ‘ other. And true it is, that you have not at ‘ all by this your last answer any whit amended ‘ your matter in excuse of yourself, upon the ‘ things surmised against you, but as it seems ‘ have more greatly impaired the same. Where‘ fore by the assent of the earls, barons, and ‘ other lords temporal present in this parlia‘ ment, it is assented and accorded, that you ‘ shall be in the mercy of the king, and put to a ‘ fine and ransom for your misdoing, according ‘ to the quality and quantity thereof. And to ‘ do this you shall be compelled and constrained ‘ by the seizure of the temporalities of the bi‘ shopric of Norwich. And the king commands
‘ you, that from henceforth you shall not cause
‘ nor suffer any sword to be carried before you,
‘ as it hath been done, under the peril which ‘ shall follow. And it is expressly accorded in ‘ this parliament, that whatsoever hath been ‘ expended on your use of the said Franks of ‘ gold, you shall make full payment thereof in ‘ the treasury of our lord the king, without ‘ delay or difficulty.’

Upon this judgment the temporalities of this bishop were immediately seized into the king's hands, and detained in them a long time for this his surrender of Graveling; as Walsingham, Holingshed, Grafton, Speed, Trussel, in their histories, and Godwin (in the life of this bishop) attest.

The Earl of Northumberland's Case, 7 Ric. 2.

In the same parliament,* 7 R. 2. News came from the northern parts, that the Castle of Berwick was taken by the Scots, whose custody Henry Percy earl of Northumberland then possessed by antient right; the Scots, for money, fraudulently getting entrance into the said castle by one who had the custody of it at the second-hand, under the earl. Hereupon, by duke John's procurement (as was reported), the said earl on the fourth of December, for the loss of the said royal Castle, by the judgment of the lords, and of the king then present in the said parliament, had a sentence of condemnation publicly pronounced against him, notwithstanding that the said earl had been summoned to the said parliament by the king's writ, and would rather have tarried at home for the defence of his country. But the execution of the said sentence was soon after released by the king, and the earl by his indulgence restored to his life and possessions, which he was adjudged to lose. Whereupon he posted into the North, and calling his forces and friends together, strongly besieged the said castle, and in a few days took it by composition, he giving the besieged their lives, moveables, and 2,000 marks to surrender it.

The Case of Sir William de Elmham, and others, 7 Ric. 2.

In the Parliament-Rolls of 7 Ric. 2. nom. 24. there is this record: Item, sir William de Elmham, sir Thomas Tryvet, sir Henry de Ferriers, and sir William de Farndon, knights, and Robert Fitz-Ralph, esq. who by the said charge formerly given in parliament, had been with the chancellor, and acknowledged and confessed to him, how that they had received certain sums of Franks of gold of the French, in lawful and due manner, and not otherwise. To which they said, ' First of all, that is to say, ' the said sir William de Elmham, Thomas Tryvet, and William Farndon, in one parcel 3,000 franks of gold. Item, In another parcel, &c. ' Item, the said sir William Elmham received another parcel of the French for the castle of Burburgh, whereof master William de Hoo was then captain; and for the victuals of the said master William de Hoo, being in the said castle of Burburgh, 2,000 franks; whereof the said William de Elmham presently paid, as he said, 1,000 franks to the said master William de Hoo, and the other thousand franks he promised to pay at a certain term to the same master William de Hoo, &c. Item, ' There is another great misprison that some sieges of the king rendered and delivered to the said enemies of the king, castles, fortresses, victual, armour and other refreshment, without special command and authority of the king, or of his lieutenant; but yet it is far worse to sell or alien to the said enemies any fort, victuals, armour or other refreshment, by receiving money or other goods of the said enemies, without authority of the king, or of the same his lieutenant. And, Sirs, you know well, and cannot deny, that by certain covenants made between the said French enemies, and you the said sir William de Elmham, Thomas Tryvet, Henry de Ferriers, and William de Farndon, and others, of which there are certain indentures made and sealed with your seals, you lately made a treaty with the said enemies, without the will or authority of the king, or of his lieutenant; and by this treaty, and your sale of the said forts, victuals and arms, you received the said sums of gold; and by this, and by other your affairs, and rebellions made to your general, the said host was spoiled and destroyed, to the grievous damage, villany, and contempt of the king our lord, and very great profit and comfort of the said enemies, for which you are worthy to undergo reproach and grievous punishment. For you, sir William de Elmham, received of the said enemies the said 2,000 franks, for the sale and surrender of the said castle of Burburgh, and of the victuals, arms, and other goods therein, then being to a great number and value, without the leave and authority of the king our lord, and the consent of the said master William de Hoo, captain of the same, although that the said castle was well able to have held out for a long time against all men. And also you the said William de Elmham, Thomas Tryvet, and William de Farndon, received to your proper use in common, the said 3,000 franks of the gift of the said enemy, for your consent and aid to the said treaty, made upon the voidance of the English out of that country, and the deliverance of the town of Graveking, and of the other fortresses then occupied in those parts, &c. And you the said sir William Farndon are in another very great default, because you would not carry back to the said enemy the 5,000 franks by you left at Graveking, against the will and command of the said bishop your chief tain, &c. And the said sir William de Elmham saith, That although he hath so received the sums aforesaid, yet it was done for victuals, prisoners, and other goods which he had within the fortress of Burburgh, and elsewhere in those parts, and which, with the said fortress, he rendered by the said treaty, as of fine force he ought to do for the salvation of himself and his people; for otherwise the Town of Burburgh, where the lord Beaumont, sir Thomas Tryvet, sir William Tryvet, sir William de Elmham, and a great number of the people of their army were besieged, and assaulted by the enemies in very great number, and the town within set on fire had been taken by them by force, and all those within it taken or slain: and therefore he conceiveth, that in doing this he hath done nothing amiss. But notwithstanding, if it appears to the king our lord that he hath done any thing amiss, he puts himself upon his noble grace, &c. And the said chancellor, in replying to the said sir William de Farndon, Henry, and Robert, saith, &c. And certainly as to this which you sir William de Farndon say, That it had been better to cast the said gold into the sea, than to have sent it back to the said enemy: this is not true; for it had been better that the enemy had received their own gold, than any traitor of the king our lord: and he who shall hereafter sell the fortresses of the king to the enemy for gold, or other goods, may excuse himself in such manner as you would now excuse yourself. And after these matters, thus by the same persons alledged for their excuse, being considered, and held and adjudged insufficient for their excuse, in this behalf; the said chancellor, in behalf the king, spake thus: It is accorded in parliament, that you sir William de Elmham, Thomas Tryvet, Henry Ferriers, William de Farndon, and Robert Fitz-Rauf, shall make agreement and full payment to our lord the king of whatsoever you or any of you have so received and taken of the enemy aforesaid; and further, that all you the said sir William de Elmham, Thomas, Henry, and Robert, be committed to prison, and there ransomed at the will of the king for your misdeeds aforesaid, having due consideration of ' the quality and quantity of that deed which every one of you hath done. And that you sir William de Farndon, because that you have received of the said enemies divers sums of gold, and have given them horses to their great refreshment, for which you had no licence of the king, nor of his lieutenant, shall be in the mercy of the king, body and goods, to do with them what he pleaseth.'

The Duke of Suffolk's Case, 28 Hen. 6.

In the Parliament of 28 Hen. 6. Rot. 50, 51, 54, the Commons preferred divers Articles of High-Treason to the King and Lords against the Duke of Suffolk; among others these ensuing: That he being Ambassador for the king of England to Charles, calling himself French king, promised to Reynor king of Sicily, and to Charles Dangers his brother, oncaies to the king, the release of Angeou, with the deliverance of the county of Main, and the city of Mault or Mauns; which promise, after his return, he caused to be performed, to the king's disinherittance and loss irrecoverable, and to the strengthening of his enemies, and feeblishment of the duchy of Normandy. To the which Article he answered, That his commission was, to conclude and do all things according to his discretion, for the obtaining of a peace; and because, without delivery of those countries, he perceived the truce could not be obtained, he agreed to the release and deliverance of them.

Item, The said duke, within this your realm, hath entruely counselled you to grant fro you, without due consideration, the castle of Mawlyon de Sool, and full many divers other great lordships, seignouries, places, offices, profits, revenues, casualties, and commodities within your said duchy of Guyen, whereby your power there to support your wars and arms, and to pay the wages of your great counsellors, captains and soldiers, hath been so enfeebled, that your people of the same duchy, neither your land there, might in no wise be defended.

Item, The said duke of Suffolk, without liberation and advice of your council, hath caused your highness to grant to divers persons, many captains, offices, towns, lordships, places, interests, profits and revenues within your realm of France, and duchy of Normandy, to such persons as were not to you profitable, nor able, nor convenient to have or govern any of the premises, nor ever had deserved to obtain of your grace any such grant; which hath been done by him for his great avail and lucre, and hath been one of the greatest means of the loss of the said realm of France, and duchy of Normandy.

The duke upon these Articles was committed to the Tower for one month's space, to pacify the people, and then released by the queen's means, who entirely loved him: whereupon the Commons were so far from being pacified, that they were more enraged; openly denouncing, that it was a shame to all the whole realm to see such a person, guilty of so many misdeeds, either to rule about a prince, or to be had in honour, or suffered to go unpunished. Upon this the commons rising up in divers places of the realm in companies under captain Blewbeard, the commons in parliament earnestly beseeched the king, that such a person as assented to the release of Angeou, and deliverance of France, &c. might be extremely punished and tormented; and to be privy to this fact, they accused as principal the said duke of Suffolk, with John bishop of Salisbury, sir James Fines, lord Say, and others. Whereupon, the king plainly seeing, that neither glossing would save, nor dissimulation appease the continual clamour of the importunate commons against the queen's darling and his complices; to begin a short pacification of so long a broil, first, he sequestered the lord Say, being treasurer of England, from his office (who for the same offence was after committed to the Tower, and after that beheaded by Jack Cade, and the Kentish mutineers, at the stand-ard in Cheapside, who carried his head about the streets of London fixed on a pole, &c.): and then by his own authority, assembling all his lords spiritual and temporal together, on the 17th day of March, in a chamber over the Cloysters at Westminster, he arraigned and banished the said duke for five years, against the lords and commons consent, who would have capitally proceeded against him; meaning by this exile to appease the present furious rage of the people, and that pacified, to recal him to his old estate, as the queen's chief friend and counsellor. But fortune would not that he should so escape; for when he was shipped in Suffolk, intending to be transported into France, he was encountered by a ship of war appertaining to the duke of Exeter, of which the constable of the Tower of London was captain; who entering the duke's ship, with small fight brought him to Dover road, and there on the side of a cock-boat cut off his head as a traitor, and there left his body and head upon the sands. Such was the end of these two ill counsellors, only for advising this weak king himself thus dishonourably and cowardly to surrender up these towns, forts, and territories in France, to his enemies, to purchase an unhappy peace, to the king's and kingdom's irreparable great damage, dishonour, and weakening, and the enemy's extraordinary advantage, strengthening and encouragement.

The Lord Wentworth's Case, 1 Eliz.

The lord Wentworth, governor of Calais, delivering up that town to the French, (after they had taken the castle by force, made a breach in the town-walls, and slain above fourscore of the garrison at one assault when they took the castle, together with sir Anthony Ager, marshal of the town, and his son and heir) and that upon dishonourable terms, not without some suspicion of treachery; he was thereupon indicted in queen Mary's days for his cowardly and treacherous surrender of this town, contrary to his trust; and after that was arraigned at Westminster in the first year of queen Elizabeth, the marquis of Northampton being his judge, and lord chief steward of England for that day. But that nobleman so nobly defended himself, that he was acquitted by his Peers.

Van Hemert's Case, 29 Eliz.

Meteranus,* Grimstone,† Thuanus, and others relate, A. D. 1587: 'That Van Hemert, a very wise and brave young nobleman, one of the chief houses of the Netherlands, and governor of the town of Grave, together with two of his captains, Du Banck and Corfe, were imprisoned, condemned by a council of war, and then beheaded and executed at Bommel, by command of Robert Dudley earl of Leicester, (governor of the Low Countries under queen Elizabeth of famous memory) for that they surrendered the said town of Grave to the prince of Parma, when he had besieged it above three months space, with a puissant array, and beaten down the walls of it level to the ground, with perpetual batteries and assaults: and although there appeared no treachery at all, nor any intelligence held with the enemy, in this case; and that the governor condescended to a treaty, and surrendered the town to the enemy only upon the citizens importunity, who earnestly intreated him upon their knees with tears in their eyes to embrace a parley, for the saving of their lives, estates, and liberties, which were granted them upon the Articles of Agreement; and although the garrison-soldiers likewise marched away with their arms (which they left behind them at Bristol), and had all the articles punctually fulfilled; and although himself and his potent friends earnestly besought the earl of Leicester, that he might serve the queen of England either by sea or land at his own charges, and by his valour and fidelity make recompence of his fault committed only through want of understanding and martial policy, contrary to the will and intent of the earl, then governor-general under the queen; yet the earl, for upholding martial discipline, and to prevent all future surrenders of this kind, would on no wise dispense with the execution; whereupon they were all three openly beheaded at Bommel, June 28, 1587.'

171. The Trial of Dr. WILLIAM LAUD,* Archbishop of Canterbury, for High Treason: 16-20 CHARLES I. A. D. 1640-1644. [Written by himself during his Imprisonment in the Tower. History of the Trial and Troubles of Archbishop Laud, published by Henry Wharton, 1695.]

[ON the 16th of December 1640, upon the Condemnation of the New Canons in the House of Commons, as being against the King's Prerogative, the fundamental Laws of the realm, the Liberty and Property of the Subject; and containing divers things tending to Sedition, and of dangerous consequence; Dr. William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, was there accused to be the Author of, and chief Actor in them, and was ordered to be impeached of High-Treason; whereupon a special Committee was appointed to enquire into all his actions, and prepare a Charge against him, which is thus entered in the Journal of the House of Commons:

"December 16, 1640. This Committee is to prepare the several Votes concerning the

In order to make this Trial the more complete, what was wanting is supplied out of Rushworth's Collections, vol. 5, p. 763, &c. and Pryn's Complete History of this Trial. The Additions are inserted in their proper places; but to preserve the Archbishop's own Account entire, they are distinguished by being within brackets. See also 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. p. 680, and Stammers' Tracts, 2 Coll. vol. 2, p. 287.

New Canons, and to make them ready for this House to present the same to the Lords, and to consider and examine who were the promoters of these New Canons, and who the principal actors, and what execution hath been made upon them, and by whom; and to consider how far the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury hath been an actor in all the proceedings of them; and further, to examine how far he hath been an actor in the great design of the Subversion of the Laws of the realm, and of the Religion, and to prepare and draw up a Charge against him, and such others as shall appear offenders in these particulars, and have power to send for parties, witnesses, papers, books, records, and to do any other act, which they in their judgments should think fit to conduce to the business, and are to meet at 4 a'clock this afternoon in the Star-Chamber."

On the 18th of December, the Archbishop was impeached in the house of Commons of High-Treason, and voted by the whole House to be a Traitor, thus entered in their Journal:

"December 18, 1640. Resolved upon the question, That a Message shall be sent from this House to the Lords, to accuse William Laud, archbishop of Canterbury, of High-Treason, in the name of this House; and of all the Commons of England, and to desire that he may be sequestered from parliament, and committed; and that within some convenient time, this House will resort to their lordships with particular Accusations and Articles against him; and that Mr. Hollis go up with the same."

Upon this Accusation, divers remarkable Speeches were made against him in the House of Commons; among others one by

Mr. Harbottle Grimstone, as follows:

"Mr. Speaker, there hath been presented to the house a most faithful and exact Report of the Conference we had with the lords yesterday, together with the opinion of the Committees that we employed in the service, That they conceived it fit that the archbishop of Canterbury should be sequestered; and I must second the motion. And with the favour of this house I shall be bold to offer my reasons, why I conceive it more necessary we should proceed a little further than the desire of a bare sequestration only.

"Mr. Speaker, Long introductions are not suitable to weighty businesses; We are now fallen upon the great man, the Archbishop of Canterbury; Look upon him as he is in Highness, and he is the sty of all pestilential filth, that hath infested the state and government of this Commonwealth; Look upon him in his Dependencies, and he is the only man, the only man that hath raised and advanced all those that, together with himself, have been the authors and causers of all our ruins, miseries, and calamities we now groan under. Who is it but he only that hath brought the earl of Strafford to all his great places and employments? A fit spirit and instrument to act and execute all his wicked and bloody designs in these kingdoms. Who is it but he only that brought in secretary Windebank into this place of service, of trust, the very broker and pandar to the whore of Babylon?

"Who is it, Mr. Speaker, but he only that hath advanced all our Popish Bishops? I shall name but some of them, bishop Manwaring, the bishop of Bath and Wells, the bishop of Oxford, and bishop Wren, the least of all these birds, but one of the most unclean ones. These are the men that should have fed Christ's Flock; but they are the wolves that have devoured them; The sheep should have fed upon the mountains; but the mountains have eaten up the sheep. It was the happiness of our Church, when the zeal of God's house eat up the Bishops, glorious and brave Martyrs, that went to the Stake in defence of the Protestant religion; but the zeal of our Bishops have been only to persecute and eat up the Church.

"Who is it, Mr. Speaker, but this great Archbishop of Canterbury, that hath sat at the helm, to steer and manage all the Projects that have been set on foot in this kingdom this 10 years last past? And rather than he would stand out, he hath most unworthily trucked and chaffered in the meanest of them. As, for instance, that of Tobacco, whereby thousands of poor people have been stripped and turned out of their trades, for which they have served as apprentices. We all know he was the compounder and contractor with them for the licences, putting them to pay Fines and a Fee-farm Rent to use their trade. Certainly, he might have spent his time much better, and more for his grace in the pulpit, than thus sherking and raking in the Tobacco-shops. Mr. Speaker, we know what he hath been charged withal in this House, crimes of a dangerous consequence, and of a transcendent nature, no less than the Subversion of the Government of this kingdom, and the alteration of the Protestant Religion; and this is not upon a bare information only, but much of it is come before us already upon clear and manifest Proofs; And there is scarce any Grievance or Complaint come before us in this place, wherein we do not find him intermentioned, and, as it were, twisted into it; like a busy angry wasp, his sting is in the tail of every thing. We have this day likewise heard the Report of the Conference yesterday, and it is the Accusation which the Scotch Commissioners have charged him withal; and we do all know he is guilty of the same, if not more, here in this kingdom.

"Mr. Speaker, He hath been the great and common enemy of all goodness and good men; and it is not safe that such a viper should be near his majesty's person, to distil his poison into his sacred ears; nor is it safe for the commonwealth that he sit in so eminent a place of government, being thus accused. We know what he did in the earl of Strafford's case; This man is the corrupt fountain, that hath corrupted all the streams; and till the fountain be purged, we can never expect nor hope to have clear channels. I shall be therefore bold to offer my opinion; and if I err, it is the error of my judgment, and not my want of zeal and affection to the public good: I conceive it is most necessary and fit that we should now take up a Resolution to do somewhat, to strike while the iron is hot, and to go up to the Lords in the names of the Commons of this House, and in the names of the Commons of England, and to accuse him of High-Treason; and to desire their lordships, his person may be sequestered, and that in convenient time we may bring up his Charge."]

December 18, 1640, being Friday. Upon this day, Mr. Denzil Hollis, second son to John earl of Clare, by order from the house of commons, came up to the Lords, and accused me of High-Treason; and told the Lords, they would make proof thereof in convenient time: but desired in the mean time, that I might be committed to safe custody. This was strange news to my innocency; for this I can say of myself, without falshood or vanity, that to the uttermost of my understanding I served the king, my gracious master, with all duty and faithfulness; and without any known or wilful disservice to the state there-while. And this I did, with as true and free a heart as ever any man did that served a king. And, I thank God, my care was such for the public, that it is well known I much neglected my own private fortunes there-while. The more was I amazed at the first apprehension of this heavy and undeserved Charge.

Upon this Charge, I was commanded to withdraw. But I first desired leave to speak a few words: and I spake to this effect, That I was heartily sorry for the offence taken against me; and that I was most unhappy, to have my eyes open to see that day, and mine ears to hear such a Charge: but humbly desired their lordships to look upon the whole course of my life, which was such, as that I did verily persuade myself, not one man in the House of Commons did believe in his heart that I was a Traitor. Here my lord the earl of Essex interrupted me, and said, 'That Speech of mine was a scandal put upon the whole House of Commons, that they should bring me up charged 'with so high a crime, which themselves did not believe.' I humbly desired then, that I might be proceeded with in the ancient parliamentary way of England. This the lord Say excepted against; as if I would prescribe them how they should proceed. So I withdrew, as I was commanded, and was presently called in again to the bar; and thence delivered to Mr. James Maxwell, the officer of the Black Rod, to be kept in safe custody, till the House of Commons should farther impeach me.

[December 18, 1640. "It is this day ordered, That the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury (being accused of High-Treason by the House of Commons in their own names, and in the name of the whole kingdom of England) be committed to the safe custody of the Gentleman Usher attending this high court, and that he be sequestered from the said house, until his Grace shall clear himself of the Accusation that shall be laid against him by the said house."—The Lords further ordered, "That no member of the house should visit the Archbishop without leave of the house."]

Here I humbly desired leave, that I might go home to fetch some Papers necessary for my Defence. This was granted me with some difficulty; and Mr. Maxwell was commanded to attend me all the while I should stay. When I was gone to Lambeth, after some little discourse (and sad enough) with my steward, and some private friends, I went into my Chapel to Evening-Prayer. The Psalms for that day, [Psal. lciiii, and lciiv. In vulgata Editione, Psal. lciii, and lciiii.] gave me much comfort, and were observed by some friends then present, as well as by myself. And upon the comfort I then received, I have every day since (unless some urgent business prevented me) read over both these Psalms; and God willing, purpose so to do every day of my life. Prayers being ended, I went with Mr. Maxwell, as I was commanded: hundreds of my poor neighbours standing at my gates to see me go, and praying heartily for my safe return to my house; for which I blessed God, and them.

Upon Friday, Feb. 26, 1640-1, I had been full ten weeks in restraint, at Mr. Maxwell's house: and this day, being St. Augustine's Day, my Charge in general Articles was brought up from the House of Commons to the Lords, by sir Henry Vane the younger. It consisted of 14 Articles. These Generals they craved time to prove in particular; and that I in the mean time might be kept safe. Upon this I was presently sent for to the house, and the Articles were read to me at the bar.

They were carried up by Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden and Mr. Maynard. And Mr. Pym coming to the Lords' bar to present them, spake as followeth:

Mr. Pym's Speech.

My lords; I am commanded by the knights, citizens, and burghesses, now assembled for the Commons in parliament to deliver to your lordships these Articles, in maintenance of their Charge against the Archbishop of Canterbury. Their desire is, That first your lordships would be pleased to hear the Articles read; and then I shall endeavour to present to you the sense of the Commons concerning the nature of the Charge, and the order of their proceedings. (The Articles being mentioned hereafter, are here omitted.) The Articles being read, Mr. Pym proceeded as follows:

My lords; There is an expression in the Scripture which I will not presume either to understand, or to interpret; yet to a vulgar eye it seems to have an aspect something suitable to the person and cause before you. It is a description of the evil spirits, wherein they are said to be 'Spiritual wickednesses in high places.' Crimes acted by the spiritual faculties of the soul, the will and understanding, exercised about spiritual matters, concerning God's worship and the salvation of man, seconded with power, authority, learning, and many other advantages, do make the party who commits them very suitable to that description, 'Spiritual wickednesses in high places.' These crimes, my lords, are various in their nature, heinous in their quality, and universal in their extent. If you examine them Theologically, as they stand in opposition to the Truth of God, they will be found to be against the rule of faith, against the power of godliness, against the means of salvation.—If you examine them Morally, as they stand in opposition to the Light of Nature, to right reason, and the principles of human society, you will then perceive pride without any moderation; such a pride as that is which exalts itself above all that is called God: malice without any provocation; malice against virtue, against innocence, against piety; injustice, without any means of restitution; even such injustice as doth rob the present times of their possessions, the future of their possibilities.—If they be examined, my lords, by legal rules in a Civil way, as they stand in opposition to the public good, and to the laws of the land, he will be found to be a traitor against his majesty's crown, an in-condemner against the peace of the state; he will be found to be the highest, the holdest, and most impudent oppressor that ever was, an oppressor both of king and people.

This Charge, my lords, is distributed and conveyed into 14 several Articles, as you have heard; and those Articles are only general, it being the intention of the House of Commons (which they have commanded me to declare) to make them more certain and particular by preparatory Examinations, to be taken with the help of your lordships house, as in the Case of my lord of Strafford. I shall now run through them with a light touch, only marking in every of them some special point of venom, virulency and malignity.

1. The first Article, my lords, doth contain his endeavour to introduce into this kingdom an arbitrary power of Government, without any limitations or rules of law. This, (my lords) is against the safety of the king's person, the honour of his crown, and most destructive to his people. Those causes which are most perfect have not only a power to produce effect, but to conserve and cherish them. The seminary virtue and the nutritive virtue in vegetables do proceed from the same principles. It was the defect of justice, and for the restraining of oppression and violence, that first brought Government into the world, and set up kings, the most excellent way of government; and by the maintenance of justice all kinds of government receive a sure foundation and establishment. It is this that hath in it an ability to preserve and secure the royal power of kings, yea to adorn and increase it.

2. In the second Article, your lordships may observe absolute and unlimited Power defended by Preaching, by Sermons, and other Discourses printed and published upon that subject. And truly (my lords) it seems to be a prodigious crime, that the Truth of God and his Holy Law should be perverted to defend the lawlessness of men; that the holy and sacred function of the Ministry, which was ordained for instruction of mens souls in the ways of God, should be so abused, that the ministers are become the Trumpets of Sedition, the promoters and defenders of violence and oppression.

3. In the third Article, my lords, you have the Judges, who under his majesty are the dispensers and distributors of Justice, frequently corrupted by fear and solicitation: you have the course of justice, in the execution of it, shamefully obstructed. And, if a wilful act of injustice in a judge be so high a crime, in the estimate of the law, as to deserve death; under what burden of guilt doth this man lie, who hath been the cause of great numbers of such voluntary and wilful acts of injustice?

4. In the fourth Article he will be found in his own person to have sold Justice in causes depending before him; and by his wicked counsel endeavouring to make his majesty a merchant of the same commodity: only with this difference, that the king by taking money for places of judicature should sell it in gross, whereas the Archbishop sold it by retail.

5. In the fifth Article there appears a power usurped of making Canons, of laying obligations on the subjects in the nature of law; And this power abused to the making of such Canons as are in the matter of them very pernicious, being directly contrary to the Prerogative of the king, and the Liberty of the people. In the manner of pressing them, may be found fraud and shuffling; in the conclusion, violence and constraint, men being forced by terror and threatening to subscribe to all. Which power thus wickedly gotten, they labour to establish by perjury, enjoining such an Oath for the maintenance of it, as can neither be taken nor kept with a good conscience.

6. In the sixth Article you have the king robbed of his supremacy; you have a Papal Power exercised over his majesty's subjects in their consciences, and in their persons; you have Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction claimed by an incident right, which the law declares to proceed from the crown.—And herein your Lordships may observe, That those who labour in Civil matters to set up the king above the Laws of the kingdom, do yet in Ecclesiastical matters endeavour to set up themselves above the king. This was first procured by the Archbishop to be extra-judicially declared by the Judges, and then to be published in a Proclamation: in doing whereof, he hath made the king's throne but a footstool for his own and their pride.

7. You have, my lords, in the seventh Article, Religion undermined and subverted: you have Poperie cherished and defended; you have this seconded with power and violence, by severe Punishment upon those which have opposed this mischievous intention: And by the subtle and eager prosecution of these men, hath the Power of Ecclesiastical Commissioners, of the Star-Chamber and Council-Table, been often made subservient to his wicked designs.

8. My lords, you may observe in the eighth Article, great care taken to get into his own hand the Power of nominating to Ecclesiastical Livings and Promotions: You have as much mischievous, as much wicked care taken in the disposing of these Preferments, to the hindrance and corruption of religion. And by this means, my lords, the king's sacred majesty, instead of Sermons fit for spiritual instructors, hath often had invectives against his people, encouragement to injustice, or to the overthrow of the laws. Such chaplains have been brought into his service as have, as much as may be, laboured to corrupt his own household, and been eminent examples of corruption to others; which hath so far prevailed, as that it hath exceedingly tainted the Universities, and been generally dispersed to all the chief cities, the greatest towns and auditories of the kingdom. The grievous effects whereof are most manifest to the Commons House, there being divers hundred Complaints there depending in the house against scandalous Ministers; and yet I believe the hundredth part of them is not yet brought in.

9. The ninth Article sets out the like care to have chaplains of his own, that might be promoters of this wicked and traitorous design, men of corrupt judgments, of corrupt practices, extremely addicted to superstition. And to such mens care hath been committed the licensing of Books to the press: by means whereof, many have been published that are full of falshood, of scandals, such as have been more worthy to be burnt by the hand of the hangman in Smithfield, (as I think one of them was) than to be admitted to come into the bands of the king's people.

10. In the tenth Article it will appear, how he having made these approaches to Popery, comes now to close and join more nearly with it: he confederates with Priests and Jesuits; he, by his instruments, negotiates with the Pope at Rome, and hath correspondence with them that he authorised from Rome here; he hath permitted a Roman Hierarchy to be set up in this kingdom. And though he hath been so careful, that a poor man could not go to the neighbour-parish to hear a Sermon, when he had none at home, could not have a sermon repeated, nor prayer used in his own family, but he was a fit subject for the High-Commission Court; yet the other hath been done in all parts of the realm, and no notice taken of it by any Ecclesiastical Judges or Courts.

11. My lords, you may perceive Preaching suppressed in the eleventh; divers godly and orthodox ministers oppressed in their persons and estates. You have the king's loyal subjects banished out of the kingdom; not as Eli-melech, to seek for bread in foreign countries, by reason of the great scarcity which was in Israel; but travelling abroad for the Bread of Life, because they could not have it at home, by reason of the spiritual famine of God's Word, caused by this man and his partakers. And by this means you have had the trade, the manufactory, the industry of many thousands of his majesty's subjects carried out of the land.—It is a miserable abuse of the Spiritual Keys, to shut up the Doors of Heaven, and to open the Gates of Hell; to let in profaneness, ignorance, superstition, and error. I shall need say no more: these things are evident, and abundantly known to all.

12. In the twelfth Article, my lords, you have a Division endeavoured between this and the foreign Reformed Churches. The Church of Christ is one body; and the members of Christ have a mutual relation, as members of the same body. Unity with God's true Church every where, is not only the beauty, but the strength of religion; of which beauty and strength he hath sought to deprive this Church, by his manifold attempts to break this Union. To which purpose he hath suppressed the Privileges granted to the Dutch and French Churches: he hath denied them to be of the same faith and religion with us: and many other ways hath he declared his malice to those churches.

13. In the thirteenth Article, as he hath sought to make an Ecclesiastical Division of religious difference between us and foreign nations, so he hath sought to make a Civil Difference between us and his majesty's subjects of the kingdom of Scotland: and these he hath promoted by many Innovations there, pressed by himself and his own authority. When they were incapable of such Alterations, he advised his majesty to use violence. He hath made private and public Collections towards the maintenance of the war, which he might justly call his own war; and with an impudent boldness hath struck Tallies in the Exchequer for divers sums of money procured by himself, pro Defensione Regni; when, by his counsels, the king was drawn to undertake, not a defensive but an offensive war.

14. He hath, lastly, thought to secure himself and his party, by seeking to undermine Parliaments, and thereby hath laboured to bereave this kingdom of the legislative power, which can only be used in parliaments; and that we should be left a kingdom, without that which indeed makes and constitutes a kingdom, and is the only means to preserve and restore it from distempers and decays. He hath hereby endeavoured to bereave us of the highest Judicatory; such a judicatory, as is necessary and essential to our government, some for cases of treason, and others concerning the Prerogative of the crown, and Liberty of the people. It is the Supreme Judicatory, to which all difficult cases resort from other courts. He hath sought to deprive the king of the love and counsel of his people, and of that assistance which he might have from them; and likewise to deprive the people of that Relief of Grievances, which they most humbly expect from his majesty.

My Lords, The Parliament is the Cabinet wherein the chiefest jewels both of the crown and kingdom are deposited. The great prerogative of the king and liberty of the people are most effectually exercised and maintained by Parliaments. Here, my lords, you cannot pass by this occasion of great thanks to God and his majesty for passing the Bill, whereby the frequent course of parliaments is established; which I assure myself he will by experience find to be a strong foundation both of his honour and of his crown.

This is all, my lords, I have to say to the particulars of the Charge. The Commons desire your lordships, that they may have the same way of Examination that they had in the Case of the earl of Strafford; that is, to examine members of all kinds, of your lordships house and their own, and others, as they shall see cause: and those Examinations to be kept secret and private, that they may with more advantage be made use of when the matter comes to trial. They have declared, That they reserve to themselves the power of making Additional Articles; by which they intend to reduce his Charge to be more particular and certain, in respect of the several times, occasions, and other circumstances of the offences therein charged. And that your lordships would be pleased to put this cause in such a quick way of proceeding, that these great and dangerous crimes, together with the offenders, may be brought to a just judgment.

When the Clerk of the Parliament had done reading, I humbly craved leave of the Lords to speak a few words; which were to this effect:

‘ My Lords, this is a great and a heavy Charge, and I must be unworthy to live; if it can be made good against me: For it makes me against God, in point of Religion; against the king, in point of Allegiance; and against the public, in point of safety, under the justice and protection of law. And though the king be little, if at all mentioned; yet I am bold to name him, because I have ever been of opinion, that the king and his people are so joined together in one civil and politic body, as that it is not possible for any man to be true to the king, as king, that shall be found treacherous to the state established by law, and work to the subversion of the people: though perhaps every one, that is so, is not able to see through all the consequences, by which one depends upon the other. So my Charge, my lords, is exceeding heavy in itself; though I, as yet, do not altogether feel the weight of it. For it is yet (as your lordships see) but in generals; and generals make a great noise, but no proof: whereas it is Proof upon particulars that makes the weight of a charge sit close upon any man. Now, my lords, it is an old and a true rule, ‘Errare contingit descendendo,’ Error doth most often happen, and best appear, when men descend to particulars: and with them when I shall be charged, I hope my innocence will furnish me with a sufficient Answer to any error of mine, that shall be thought criminal, or any way worthy the cognizance of this high and honourable Court. As for human frailties, as I cannot acquit myself of them, so, I presume, your lordships will be favourable judges of them: since in the transaction of so many businesses as passed my hands, men, far abler than ever I can be, have been subject to them; and, perhaps, to as many and as great. But for Corruption in the least degree (I humbly praise God for it), I fear no Accuser that will speak truth. But, my lords, that which goes nearest unto me among these Articles, is, That I should be thought foul and false in the profession of my Religion: As if I should profess with the Church of England, and have my heart at Rome, and labour by all cunning ways to bring Romish superstition in upon the kingdom. This, my lords, I confess, troubles me exceedingly: and if I should forget myself, and fall into passion upon it, I should but be in that case which St. Jerome confessed he was in, when he knew not how to be patient,

‘ when falsehood in religion was charged upon him. And yet that was nothing so high a charge as this which is laid against me; which is not only to be basely false myself, but withal, to labour to spread the same falsehood over the whole kingdom.’

And here I humbly besought their lordships; that I might a little enlarge myself, and I did so. But because I purpose here to set down the general Articles that were brought up against me, and that one of them comes home to this point of Religion; I shall put it off till I come to that Article, and there set it down at large, what I now said. And this I do to avoid an useless and tedious repetition. Here then follow the Articles themselves, as they were that day charged upon me.

ARTICLES of the Commons assembled in Parliament, in Maintenance of their Accusation against WILLIAM LAUD, Archbishop of CANTERBURY, whereby he stands charged with High Treason, and other High Crimes and Misdemeanors.

I. THAT he hath traitorously endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws and government of this kingdom; and instead thereof, to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical Government against law: And to that end hath wickedly and traitorously advised his majesty, that he might, at his own will and pleasure, levy and take Money of his subjects without their consent in parliament. And this, he affirmed, was warrantable by the law of God.

II. He hath, for the better accomplishment of that his traitorous Design, advised and procured divers Sermons, and other Discourses, to be preached, printed and published, in which the Authority of Parliaments, and the Force of the laws of this kingdom, are denied; and an absolute and unlimited power over the persons and estates of his majesty's subjects is maintained and defended, not only in the king, but also in himself, and other Bishops, above and against the law. And he hath been a great protector, favourer and promoter of the Publishers of such false and pernicious Opinions.

III. He hath by letters, messages, threats, promises, and divers other ways, to Judges and other Ministers of Justice, interrupted and perverted; and at other times, by the means aforesaid, hath endeavoured to interrupt and pervert, the course of Justice in his majesty's Courts at Westminster, and other courts, to the subversion of the laws of this kingdom; whereby sundry of his majesty's Subjects have been stopped in their just suits, and deprived of their lawful rights, and subjected to his tyrannical will, to their utter ruin and destruction.

IV. That the said Archbishop hath traitorously and corruptly sold Justice to those that have had Causes depending before him, by colour of his ecclesiastical jurisdiction, as Archbishop, High-Commissioner, Referee, or otherwise: and hath taken unlawful Gifts and Bribes of his majesty's subjects: And hath, as much as in him lieth, endeavoured to corrupt other courts of justice, by advising (and procuring) his majesty to sell places of Judicature, and other Offices, (and procuring the sale of them) contrary to the laws and statutes in that behalf.

V. He hath traitorously caused a Book of Canons to be composed and published, (and those Canons to be put in execution) without any lawful warrant and authority in that behalf. In which pretended Canons many matters are contained contrary to the king's Prerogative, to the fundamental laws and statutes of this realm, to the right of parliament, to the propriety and liberty of the subjects; and matters tending to sedition, and of dangerous consequence; and to the establishment of a vast, unlawful, and presumptuous power in himself and his successors: Many of the which Canons, by the practice of the said Archbishop, were surreptitiously passed in the last Convocation, without due consideration and debate: others by fear and compulsion were subscribed to by the prelates and clerks there assembled, which had never been voted and passed in the Convocation, as they ought to have been. And the said Archbishop hath contrived, and endeavoured to assure and confirm the unlawful and exorbitant power which he hath usurped and exercised over his majesty's subjects, by a wicked and ungodly Oath, in one of the said pretended Canons, enjoined to be taken by all the clergy, and many of the laity of this kingdom.

VI. He hath traitorously assumed to himself a papal and tyrannical Power, both in Ecclesiastical and Temporal Matters, over his majesty's subjects in this realm of England, and other places, to the dishonour of the crown, dishonour of his majesty, and derogation of his supreme authority in ecclesiastical matters. And the said Archbishop claims the king's Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, as incident to his episcopal and archiepiscopal office in this kingdom; and doth deny the same to be derived from the crown of England; which he hath accordingly exercised, to the high contempt of his royal majesty, and to the destruction of divers of the king's liege people in their persons and estates.

VII. That he hath traitorously endeavoured to alter and subvert God's true Religion by law established in this realm; and instead thereof, to set up Popish Superstition and Idolatry; and to that end hath declared and maintained in Speeches and printed Books divers Popish Doctrines and Opinions, contrary to the Articles of Religion established by law. He hath urged and enjoined divers popish and superstitious Ceremonies, without any warrant of law; and hath cruelly persecuted those who have opposed the same, by corporal punishment and imprisonment; and most unjustly vexed others who refused to conform thereto, by Ecclesiastical Censures of Excommunication, Suspension, Deprivation, and Degradation, contrary to the law of the kingdom.

VIII. That for the better advancing of his traitorous purpose and designs, he did abuse the great power and trust his majesty reposed in him; and did intrude upon the places of divers great officers, and upon the right of divers of his majesty's subjects; whereby he did procure to himself the Nomination of sundry persons to Ecclesiastical Dignities, Promotions and Benefices, belonging to his majesty, and divers of the nobility, clergy, and others; and hath taken upon him the commendation of Chaplains to the king; by which means he hath preferred to his majesty's service, and to other great promotions in the Church, such as have been popishly affected, or otherwise unsound and corrupt both in doctrine and manners.

IX. He hath for the same traitorous and wicked intent, chosen and employed such men to be his own domestical Chaplains, whom he knew to be notoriously disaffected to the Reformed Religion, grossly addicted to popish Superstition, and erroneous and unsound both in judgment and practice. And to them, or some of them, he hath committed Licensing of Books to be printed; by which means divers false and superstitious Books have been published, to the great scandal of Religion, and to the seducing of many of his majesty's subjects.

X. He hath traitorously and wickedly endeavoured to reconcile the Church of England with the Church of Rome; And for the effecting thereof, hath consorted and confederated with divers Popish Priests and Jesuits; and hath kept secret intelligenc with the Pope of Rome; And by himself, his agents and instruments, treated with such as have from thence received authority and instruction. He hath permitted and countenanced a Popish Hierarchy or Ecclesiastical government to be established in this kingdom. By all which traitorous and malicious practices this church and kingdom have been exceedingly endangered, and like to fall under the tyranny of the Roman see.

XI. He in his own person, and his Suffragans, Visitors, Surrogates, Chancellors, or other officers, by his command, have caused divers learned, pious, and orthodox ministers of God's word to be silenced, suspended, deprived, degraded, excommunicated, or otherwise grieved and vexed, without any just and lawful cause; whereby, and by divers other means, he hath hindered the Preaching of God's Word, caused divers of his majesty's loyal subjects to forsake the kingdom, and increased and cherished ignorance and profaneness amongst the people; that so he might the better facilitate the way to the effecting of his own wicked and traitorous design of altering and corrupting the true religion here established.

XII. He hath traitorously endeavoured to cause Division and Discord between the Church of England and other Reformed Churches; and to that end hath suppressed and abrogated the Privileges and Immunities which have been by his majesty and his royal ancestors granted to the French and Dutch Churches in this kingdom: And divers other ways hath expressed his malice and disaffection to these churches, that so, by such disunion, the Papists might have more advantage for the overthrow and extirpation of both.

XIII. He hath maliciously and traitorously plotted and endeavoured to stir up War and Enmity betwixt his majesty's two kingdoms of England and Scotland; and to that purpose hath laboured to introduce into the kingdom of Scotland divers Innovations both in Religion and Government; all or the most part tending to Popery and Superstition: to the great grievance and discontent of his majesty's subjects of that nation. And for their refusing to submit to such Innovations, he did traitorously advise his majesty to subdue them by force of arms: And by his own authority and power, contrary to law, did procure sundry of his majesty's subjects, and enforced the Clergy of this kingdom, to contribute toward the maintenance of that war. And when his majesty, with much wisdom and justice had made a Pacification betwixt the two kingdoms, the said Archbishop did presumptuously censure that Pacification, as dishonourable to his majesty; and, by his counsel and endeavours, so incensed his majesty against his said subjects of Scotland, that he did thereupon, by advice of the said Archbishop, enter into an offensive War against them, to the great hazard of his majesty's person, and his subjects of both kingdoms.

XIV. That to preserve himself from being questioned for these and other his traitorous courses, he hath laboured to subvert the Rights of Parliament, and the antient course of Parliamentary Proceedings; and by false and malicious slanders to incense his majesty against Parliaments. By which words, counsels, and actions, he hath traitorously, and contrary to his allegiance, laboured to alienate the hearts of the king's liege-people from his majesty, to set a division between them, and to ruin and destroy his majesty's kingdoms. For which they do impeach him of High-Treason against our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity.

The said Commons do farther aver, that the said William Archbishop of Canterbury, during the time in which the Crimes aforementioned were done and committed, hath been a Bishop or Archbishop in this realm of England, one of the king's Commissioners for Ecclesiastical matters, and one of his majesty's most honourable Privy Council: And that he hath taken an Oath for his faithful discharge of the said office of counsellor, and hath likewise taken the Oath of Supremacy and Allegiance. And the said Commons, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any other Accusation or Impeachment against the said Archbishop, and also of replying to the Answers that the said Archbishop shall make unto the said Articles, or to any of them; and of offering farther proof also of the premises, or any of them, or of any other Impeachment or Accusation that shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall, according to the course of parliaments, require; do pray that the said Archbishop may be put to answer to all and every the premises; and that such Proceedings, Examinations, Trial and Judgment, may be upon every of them had and used, as is agreeable to law and justice.

When these Articles had been read unto me in the Upper House, and I had spoken to the Lords, in a general Answer to them, what I thought fit, as is before expressed; I humbly desired of the Lords (this being upon Friday, Feb. 26, 1640-1) that my going to the Tower might be put off till the Monday after, that so I might have time to be the better fitted for my lodging. This, I humbly thank their lordships, was granted.

[February 20, 1640-1. Ordered by the Lords in Parliament, that the lord archbishop of Canterbury his grace, shall stand committed to the Tower of London. But the pleasure of this House is, that he continue still in the safe custody of the Gentleman Usher of this house, till Monday the 1st of March 1640-1, and then that the Lieutenant receive his grace in his safe custody, until the pleasure of this House be further known; and in the mean time, Mr. Maxwell is to be responsible for him, and not to permit him to go abroad, and that the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Earl of Strafford shall not come together.]

I returned to Mr. Maxwell's custody, and that afternoon sent my steward to sir William Balfore, then lieutenant, that a lodging might be had for me with as much convenience as might be. On Monday, March 1, Mr. Maxwell carried me in his coach to the Tower. St. George's Feast, having been formerly put off, was to begin that evening. By this means Mr. Maxwell (whose office tied him to attendance upon that Solemnity) could not possibly go with me to the Tower at evening, as I desired. Therefore noon, when the citizens were at dinner, was chosen as the next fittest time for privateness. All was well till I passed through Newgate shambles, and entered into Cheapside. There some one Prentice first hollowed out; and more followed the coach, (the number still increasing as they went) till by that time I came to the Exchange the shouting was exceeding great. And so they followed me with clamour and revilings even beyond barbarity itself; not giving over, till the coach was entered in at the Tower-Gate.

[Afterwards the Lords made the following Orders:

AN ORDINANCE of the Lords and Commons, assembled in Parliament, concerning the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Die Martis, 16 Maii 1643.

"Whereas William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, standeth impeached in this present Parliament for High-Treason, and for divers other great offences and misdemeanors; and by reason of many great and weighty businesses he cannot yet be brought to Trial for the said Offences and Misdemeanors; and he, in respect of his said Archbishopric of Canterbury, hath power to give and collate fit Clerks to divers Parsonages, Vicaridges, Prebends, and other Ecclesiastical Promotions and Preferments; and if any of them should become void, and he left to prefer whom he please to the same, the same may prove very inconvenient, he bestowing them upon unfit and unworthy persons.—Be it therefore ordered and ordained, by the Lords and Commons in this present parliament, That in case any of the aforesaid Parsonages, Vicaridges, Prebends, or other Ecclesiastical Promotions or Preferments, now be, or shall hereafter, and before the Trial of the said Lord Archbishop, become void; That the said Lord Archbishop of Canterbury shall forbear to present or collate any person or persons thereunto, without the leave and order of both Houses of Parliament. And it is further ordered and ordained, That the said Lord Archbishop shall, from time to time, until his said Trial, present and collate such fit person or persons, to every such Parsonage, Vicaridge, Prebend, and other Ecclesiastical Preferment, as aforesaid, which now are, or hereafter before his said Trial shall become void, as by both Houses of Parliament shall be nominated and appointed. And it is further ordered by the said Lords and Commons in Parliament, that all Archdeacons, Registers, and other officers, ministers, and persons whatsoever, shall forbear to give or make any Admission, Institution, Collation, or Induction, of any person or persons whatsoever, which by the said Archbishop shall be presented in or to any such Parsonage, Vicaridge, Prebend, or other Ecclesiastical Preferment, other than such person and persons as shall be nominated and appointed by both houses of parliament, as aforesaid. And it is lastly ordered, That the Lord Archbishop, and the Churchwardens of every parish, and other officers of the Church, where any Parsonage, Vicaridge, Prebend, or other Ecclesiastical Promotions or Preferments, in the donation or gift of the said Archbishop, are; shall, within two months after the respective avoidance thereof, give notice of such avoidance to the Lord Speaker of the House of Peers, for the time being.”

An Ordinance of the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament; That all the Temporal Livings, Dignities, and Ecclesiastical Promotions, belonging unto William Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, be forthwith sequestered by and unto the Parliament.

Die Sabbati 10 Junii, 1643.

“Whereas by an Ordinance of parliament, of the 16th of May 1643, the Archbishop of Canterbury is required from time to time, until his Trial, to collate such fit persons unto any Ecclesiastical Preferment in his patronage, as shall by both houses be nominated unto him; and, in pursuance of the said Ordinance, another Ordinance of the Lords and Commons past the 20th of the same month, requiring the said Archbishop to collate upon Edward Corbet, Fellow of Merton-College in Oxford, the rectory of Chartham in the county of Kent, void by the death of Dr. Burchgrave, the last incumbent; and whereas the said Archbishop of Canterbury refuseth obedience to the said Ordinance; it is therefore ordered, and be it so ordained by the Lords and Commons in parliament, That all the Temporalities of the Archbishop of Canterbury be hereby sequestered by and unto the parliament, and William Lord Archbishop of Canterbury be suspended ‘ab officio & beneficio, et omni et omnimoda jurisdictione archiepiscopali’ until he be either convicted or acquitted of High-Treason, for which he stands now accused. And whatsoever Livings, Dignities, or Ecclesiastical Promotions, in the said Archbishop's gift or collation, are, or hereafter shall be void, shall henceforth be instituted or inducted into by the Archbishop's Vicar-General, or any other having authority in his behalf, upon the nomination and recommendation of both Houses of Parliament, during the time of the suspension and sequestration aforesaid. And upon this Ordinance it is ordered, and be it so ordained by the Lords and Commons in parliament, that the said Edward Corbet be, and is hereby nominated and recommended forthwith, upon sight hereof, to be admitted, instituted, and inducted by the Vicar-General aforesaid, or any other having authority in his behalf, into the said rectory of Chartham, ‘ratione Suspensionis Domini Gulielmi Archiepiscopi Cantuariensis, et Sequestrationis Temporalium Archiepiscopatus in manibus supremæ Curie Parliamenti jam existentium,’ the same belonging unto their Gift. And it is hereby further ordained by the Lords and Commons in Parliament, that during the Suspension and Sequestration aforesaid, the jurisdiction of the said Archbishop shall be executed and exercised by his Vicar-General, and other his inferior Judges and Officers, as formerly the same hath been.”]

On Tuesday, October 21, an Order was brought me from the Lords, dated Oct. 23, with a copy of ten Additional Articles, brought up by the Commons against me. This Order required me to make my Answer in writing by the 30th of the same month. These Articles charged me not with Treason only, as the former did, but with Treason, and other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

[Further ARTICLES of IMPEACHMENT by the Commons assembled in Parliament, against WILLIAM LAUD, Archbishop of CANTERBURY, of High-Treason, and divers High Crimes and Misdemeanours; as followeth:

1. That the said Archbishop of Canterbury, to introduce an Arbitrary Government within this realm, and to destroy Parliaments, in the 3rd and 4th year of his majesty's reign that now is, a Parliament being then called and sitting at Westminster, traitorously and maliciously caused the said Parliament to be dissolved, to the great grievance of his majesty's subjects, and prejudice of this Commonwealth. And soon after the Dissolution thereof, gave divers Propositions under his hand to George then duke of Buckingham; casting therein many false aspersions upon the said Parliament, calling it a factious Parliament, and falsely affirming that it had cast many scandals upon his majesty, and had used him like a child in his minority; stiling them Puritans, and commending the Papists for harmless and peaceable subjects.

II. That within the space of 10 years last past, the said Archbishop hath treacherously endeavoured to subvert the Fundamental Laws of this Realm; and to that end hath in like manner endeavoured to advance the Power of the Council-Table, the Canons of the Church, and the King's Prerogative, above the laws and statutes of the realm. And for manifestation thereof, about 6 years last past, being then a Privy-Counsellor to his majesty, and sitting at the Council-Table, he said, 'That as long as he sat there, they should know, that an Order of that Board should be of equal force with a Law or Act of Parliament.' And at another time used these words, 'That he hoped ere long, that the Canons of the Church and the King's Prerogative should be of as great power as an Act of Parliament.' And at another time said, 'That those that would not yield to the King's Power, he would crush them to pieces.'

III. That the said Archbishop, to advance the Canons of the Church, and Power Ecclesiastical, above the law of the land, and to pervert and hinder the course of Justice, hath at divers times within the said time, by his letters, and other undue means and solicitations used to Judges, opposed and stopped the granting of his majesty's Writs of Prohibition, where the same ought to have been granted for stay of Proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court; whereby justice hath been delayed and hindered, and the judges diverted from doing their duties.

IV. That for the end and purpose aforesaid, about 7 years last past, a Judgment being given in his majesty's court of King's-Bench against one Burley a parson, being a man of bad life and conversation, in an Information upon the Statute of 21 Hen. 8, for wilful Non-Residency; the said Archbishop, by solicitations and other undue means used to the Judges of that Court, caused Execution upon the said Judgment to be stayed; and being moved therein, and made acquainted with the bad life and conversation of the said parson, he said, 'That he had spoken to the Judges for him, and that he would never suffer a Judgment to pass against any clergyman by nihil dicit.'

V. That the said Archbishop about 8 years last past, being then also a Privy-Counsellor to his majesty, for the end and purpose aforesaid, caused sir John Corbet of Stoke in the county of Salop, baronet, then a justice of peace of the said county, to be committed to the prison of the Fleet, where he continued prisoner for the space of half a year, or more, for no other cause, but for calling for the Petition of Right, and causing it to be read at the Sessions of the peace for that county, upon a just and necessary occasion. And during the time of his said imprisonment, the said Archbishop, without any colour of right, by a Writing under the seal of his Archbishoprick, granted away a parcel of the Glebe-Land of the church of Adderly in the said county, whereof the said sir John Corbet was then patron, unto Robert viscount Kilmurray, without the consent of the said sir John, or the then incumbent of the said church; which said viscount Kilmurray built a Chapel upon the said parcel of Glebe-Land, to the great prejudice of the said sir John Corbet, which hath caused great suits and contentions between them. And whereas the said sir John Corbet had a Judgment against sir James Stonehouse, kt., in an Action of Waste, in his majesty's Court of Common-Plens at Westminster, which was afterwards affirmed on a Writ of Error in the King's-Bench, and Execution thereupon awarded: yet the said sir John by means of the said Archbishop could not have the effect thereof, but was committed to prison by the said Archbishop and others at the Council-Table, until he had submitted himself unto the Order of the said Table, whereby he lost the benefit of the said Judgment and Execution.

VI. That whereas divers Gifts and Dispositions of divers sums of Money were heretofore made by divers charitable and well-disposed persons, for the buying in of divers Improvements for the Maintenance of preaching the Word of God in several Churches; the said Archbishop about 8 years last past wilfully and maliciously caused the said Gifts, Feoffments, and Conveyances made to the uses aforesaid, to be overthrown in his majesty's Court of Exchequer, contrary to law, as things dangerous to the Church and State, under the specious pretence of buying in Appropriations; whereby that pious work was suppressed and trodden down, to the great dishonour of God, and scandal of Religion.

VII. That the said Archbishop at several times, within these 10 years last past, at Westminster, and elsewhere within this realm, contrary to the known laws of this land, hath endeavoured to advance Popery and Superstition within the realm; And for that end and purpose hath wittingly and willingly received, harboured, and relieved divers Popish Priests and Jesuits; namely, one called Saucta Clara, alias, Dampport, a dangerous person and Franciscan Friar; who having written a Popish and Seditious Book, entitled, 'Deus, Natura, Gratia,' wherein the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, established by act of parliament, were much traduced and scandalized; the said Archbishop had divers Conferences with him, while he was writing the said Book; and did also provide maintenance and entertainment for one Monsieur S. Giles, a Popish Priest, at Oxford, knowing him to be a Popish Priest.

VIII. That the said Archbishop about four years last past, at Westminster aforesaid, said, 'That there must be a Blow given to the Church, such as had not been yet given, before it could be brought to conformity;' declaring thereby his intention to be, to shake and alter the true Protestant Religion established in the Church of England.

IX. That in or about the month of May, 1640, presently after the Dissolution of the last Parliament, the said Archbishop, for the ends and purposes aforesaid, caused a Synod or Convocation of the Clergy to be held for the several provinces of Canterbury and York, wherein were made and established by his means and procurement divers Canons and Constitutions Ecclesiastical; contrary to the laws of this realm, the rights and privileges of parliament, the liberty and propriety of the subject, tending also to Sedition, and of dangerous consequence. And among other things, the said Archbishop caused a most dangerous and illegal Oath to be therein made and contrived, the tenour whereof followeth in these words:— 'That I A. B. do swear that I do approve the Doctrine and Discipline or government established in the Church of England, as containing all things necessary to Salvation; and that I will not endeavour by myself or any other, directly or indirectly, to bring in any Popish doctrine, contrary to that which is so established; Nor will I ever give my consent to alter the Government of this Church by Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, and Archdeacons, &c. as it stands now established, and as by right it ought to stand; nor yet ever subject it to the Usurpations and Superstitions of the See of Rome. And all these things I do plainly and sincerely acknowledge and swear, according to the plain and common sense and understanding of the same words, without any equivocation, or mental evasion, or secret reservation whatsoever. And this I do heartily, willingly, and truly upon the faith of a Christian; So help me God in Jesus Christ.' Which Oath the said Archbishop himself did take, and caused divers other Ministers of the Church to take the same, upon pain of Suspension and Deprivation of their Livings, and other severe penalties; and did also cause Godfrey, then bishop of Gloucester, to be committed to prison for refusing to subscribe to the said Canons, and to take the said Oath; and afterward the said Bishop submitting himself to take the said Oath, he was set at liberty.

X. That a little before the calling of the last Parliament, A. D. 1640, a Vote being then passed, and a Resolution taken at the Council-Table, by the advice of the said Archbishop, for assisting of the King in extraordinary ways, if the said Parliament should prove peerish, and refuse to supply his majesty: the said Archbishop wickedly and maliciously advised his majesty to dissolve the said Parliament, and accordingly the same was dissolved: and present after the said Archbishop told his Majesty, 'That now he was absolved from all rules of government, and left free to use extraordinary Ways for his Supply.'

For all which Matters and Things, the said Commons assembled in Parliament, in the name of themselves and of all the Commons of England, do impeach the said Archbishop of Canterbury of High Treason, and other High Crimes and Misdemeanors, tending to the subversion of our Religion, Laws, and Liberties, and to the utter ruin of this Church and Commonwealth. And the said Commons by protestation saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further or other Accusation or Impeachment against the said William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, and also of replying to the Answer that he shall make unto the said Articles, or any of them; or offering Proof of the premises, or any other Impeachments or Accusations, that shall be exhibited by them, as the cause shall (according to the course of parliament) require: do pray that he the said William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, may be called to answer the said several Crimes and Misdemeanors, and receive such condign punishment as the same shall deserve; and that such further proceedings may be upon every of them had and used against him as is agreeable to law and justice.

Die Lunæ, 23 Octob. 1643.

Ordered, &c. "That the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury shall put in his Answer in writing into this House by the 30th day of this instant October, unto the particular Articles in maintenance of their former Impeachment of High Treason and divers High Crimes and Misdemeanors, brought up from the House of Commons against him, and remaining now before the Lords in Parliament."

I sent instantly by the same messenger a Petition for longer time; for means out of my Estate to fee my counsel, and bear the necessary Charge of my Trial; for Counsel, and for a Solicitor and some servants to attend my business. The Lords, I humbly thank them, gave me longer time, and assigned me Mr. Hearne, Mr. Chute, Mr. Hales; and at my Petition added Mr. Gerrard. For Money, they referred me to the Committee of Sequestrations; but delayed their Answers concerning my Servants, and the Papers of my Defence, which Mr. Prynne took from me. For though he promised me a faithful restitution of them within three or four days, yet to this day (being almost five months after) I had received but three bundles of the twenty and one which he had from me.

[To the Honourable the Lords assembled in the High Court of Parliament, the Humble PETITION OF WILLIAM LAUD, Archbishop of Canterbury,

"Humbly sheweth; That he hath received your lordships' Order of Oct. 23, 1643, with a Copy of the Articles charged against him, and requiring him to make answer.—Most humbly prayeth, That according to an Order of that Honourable House, he may have Counsel assigned him, and that master Hearne and master Chute may be his Counsel, and may have free liberty to come unto him; and that he may have some Money out of his Estate to fee his Counsel, and defray his other Charges, he having been for this last whole year burdensome to his friends. And further, That he may have all his Papers and Books, most of which belong to his Defence, which master Prynne took from him by Order of the Lords, delivered unto him, that he may be able to answer for himself. That also he may have time and means to send for his Witnesses, which can hardly be done in the time limited: and that he may have his Servants about him, to send about his necessary occasions. And lastly, That he may have longer time, the Articles being large and many. And he shall ever pray, &c.

“WILLIAM CANT.”

Which Petition being read in the lords' house, Oct. 24, 1643, this Order was made:

Die Martis, 24 Octob. 1643.

Upon the reading of the Petition of the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury this day in the House, it is ordered, &c. “That time is given him until Monday the 6th of Nov. for the putting in his Answer in writing into this house unto the particular Articles brought up from the House of Commons, in maintenance of their former Impeachment of High Treason, and divers High Crimes and Misdemeanors against him. That master Hearne and master Chute are hereby assigned of Counsel for the drawing up of his Answer, who are to be permitted to have free access in and out to him. That this House doth hereby recommend to the Committee of Sequestrations, that the said Lord Archbishop shall have such Means afforded him out of his estate, as will enable him to pay his Counsel, and defray his other Charges. That when his lordship shall set down particularly what Papers and Writings are necessary for his Defence that should be restored unto him, their lordships will take it into their consideration. That upon his lordship's nominating who shall be his Solicitor, the lords will return their Answer. And for the Witnesses, when a day shall be appointed for his lordship's Trial, this house will give such directions therein as shall be just.”]

Friday, October 27. I petitioned again, that the Papers of my Defence being, as I was informed, in the hands of the Close Committee, might be delivered unto me; and sent my Petition, with the Order of the Lords annexed, to the Committee for Sequestrations. There many were very favourable, till Mr. Glyn was pleased to say, They were not to allow me means, and there was a known course in law, which was, that I might go on in forma pauperis; and so was left without any allowance out of my Estate, to fee my counsel, or supply other wants. This succeeding so ill with me, I petitioned the Lords again on Saturday, Oct. 28, 1643, and then Mr. Dell, my Secretary, was assigned me for my Solicitor; and I was allowed two servants more to go about my business.

[Die Sabhati, 28 Oct. 1643.

Ordered, &c. “That master Hales is hereby appointed to be of Counsel with the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, with his other Counsel already appointed for the drawing of his Answer to the Charge of the House of Commons against him. And that Master W. Dell, Richard Cobb, and master George Smith, his lordship's Servants, shall have liberty to attend the said Archbishop's several Affairs, and be permitted to come in and out unto him, as there shall be occasion.”]

And the House of Commons, by their Order, agreed to the Lords, that I should have copies of any of the Papers taken from me, but it should be at my own Charge. Wonderful favour this, and as much justice! My estate all taken from me, and my goods sold, before ever I came to hearing; and then I may take copies of my Papers at my own Charge.

On Tuesday, October 3, I humbly petitioned the Lords for Direction of my Counsel, how to carry themselves towards me and my Defence; and that they would honourably be pleased, in regard the Articles charged me with Treason and Misdemeanor, and were intermixed one with another, to distinguish which were for Treason, and which for Misdemeanor; as also for longer time to put in my Answer. The Lords upon this gave an Order, that I should have time till Nov. 13, but would declare no Opinion touching the distinguishing of the Articles, but left me to my Counsel to advise as they pleased.

[To the Right Honourable the Lords assembled in Parliament, the Humble PETITION of WILLIAM Archbishop of CANTERBURY.

“Most humbly sheweth; That your Petitioner having presented against him, by the honourable house of Commons, to your lordships, an Impeachment, intitled, ‘Further Articles of Impeachment by the Commons assembled in Parliament, of High-Treason and divers High Crimes and Misdemeanors;’ to which, by your honourable Order of the 24th of Oct. annexed, he is directed to put in his Answer in writing by Monday the 6th of Nov.; and hath thereby counsel assigned him to draw up the same:—That your Petitioner's Counsel, upon reading of the Articles, finding that as well in the frame, as the conclusion thereof, the matters of Crime and Misdemeanors are so interwoven with references to the matters thereby charged as Treason, as they cannot take upon them to distinguish them: and conceiving it not to have been your lordships intention, by their assignments that they should advise an Answer to any part of the Impeachment charged against your Petitioner as Treason son, do forbear to advise your Petitioner's Answer to the said Articles, without some Declaration first had, which of the said Articles are intended to be a Charge of High-Treason, and which of them of Crimes and Misdemeanors; without which your Petitioner is like to be deprived of the assistance of Counsel, granted by your lordships Order.—Your Petitioner humbly beseecheth your Lordships, in this so heavy a Charge on him, from so great and honourable a body, in such a straight of time, that it may be declared which of the said Articles are intended to be Charges of Crimes and Misdemeanors only, in which your Petitioner may have the assistance of his Counsel assigned him, to advise him in his Answer thereunto: And that your lordships will be further honourably pleased to enlarge your Petitioner in the time allotted for his Answer. And your Petitioner shall pray, &c. WILLIAM CANT."

Upon which Petition, this Order was formed:

Die Martis, 31 Octob.

Ordered, &c. "That the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury shall have time to put in his Answer to the Impeachment of the House of Commons, until Monday the 13th of Nov. next. And that this House doth forbear to declare any Opinion concerning the several Articles of the said Impeachment, but leaves it to his Counsel to do and advise as his Counsel shall think most fitting.]"

My Counsel told me plainly, I might as well have no Counsel, if the Articles were not distinguished; for they were so woven one within another, and so knit up together in the conclusion, that they might refer all to Treason, and so they be suffered to give me no Counsel at all in matter of fact. Hereupon they drew me another Petition to the same effect, which I caused to be delivered Nov. 6, but it received the same Answer. Then Nov. 7, being Wednesday, I petitioned the House of Commons to the same purpose: and Nov. 8, this my Petition was read in the House of Commons; and after a short debate, the Resolution was, That they being my Accusers, would not meddle with any thing, but left all to the Order of the Lords, before whom the business was, and my Counsel's own judgment thereupon. This seemed very hard, not only to myself and my counsel, but to all indifferent men that heard it. In the mean time, I could resort no whither but to patience and God's mercy.

[Die Veneris, 10 Novemb. 1643.

Ordered, "That the Lieutenant of the Tower, or his Deputies, shall bring in safety the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury before their lordships on Monday the 13th of this instant Nov. by ten of the clock in the morning, to put in his Answer into the House to the Impeachment of the House of Commons, remaining now before the Lords in Parliament; and this to be a sufficient warrant in that behalf.]"

November 13. I appeared in the Parliament

House according to the Order, and was at the bar. That which I spake to the Lords, was this: "That I had no skill to judge of the streights into which I might fall by my Plea which I had resolved on, being left without all assistance of my Counsel, in regard of the nature and form of the Impeachment that was against me. That yet my innocency prompted me to a ready obedience of their lordships Order, casting myself wholly upon God's mercy, their lordships justice, and my own innocency." Then I humbly desired that their Lordships Order first, and the Impeachment after might be read. This done, I put in my Answer in Writing, as I was ordered to do, and humbly prayed it might be entered. My Answer was: 'All advantages of law against this Impeachment saved and reserved to this Defendant, he pleads Not Guilty to all and every part of the Impeachment, in manner and form as it is charged in the Articles: and to this Answer I put my hand.

["The Humble ANSWER of WILLIAM Archbishop of CANTERBURY, to the further Articles of Impeachment of High-Treason and divers High-Crimes and Misdemeanors exhibited against him by the Honourable House of Commons, according to Direction of an Order of this Honourable House of the 13th of Oct. last.

"All advantages of Exception to the said Articles of Impeachment, to this Defendant saved and reserved, this Defendant humbly saith, That he is not guilty of all or any the matters by the said Impeachment charged, in such manner and form as the same are by the said Articles of Impeachment charged.]"

My Answer being thus put in, I humbly besought their Honourable Lordships, "To take into their consideration my great years, being threescore and ten complete, and my memory, and other faculties, by age and affliction much decayed; my long Imprisonment, wanting very little of three whole years, and this last year little better than close Imprisonment: my want of skill and knowledge in the Laws to defend myself: the generality and uncertainty of almost all the Articles, so that I cannot see any Particulars against which I may provide myself. In the next place, I did thankfully acknowledge their lordships honourable favour, in assigning me such Counsel as I desired: But I told their lordships withal, that as my Counsel were most ready to obey their Lordships in all the commands laid upon them, so there were certain doubts arisen in them, how far they might advise me without offence; considering the charges against me were so interwoven, and left without all distinguishing, what is intended as a Charge of Treason, and what of Crime and Misdemeanor: That to remove these Doubts, I had humbly besought their Lordships twice for distinguishing, by several Petitions: That their lordships not thinking it fit to distinguish, I have without advice of Counsel put in my Plea, as their lordships see: But do most humbly pray, that their Lordships will take me so far into consideration, as that I may not lose the benefit of my Counsel for Law in all, or any; and for Law and Fact, in whatsoever is not charged as treason, when it shall be distinguished: As still my Prayers were, that by their lordships wisdom and honourable direction, some way might be found to distinguish them; and that having (not without much difficulty) prevailed with my Counsel to attend, their lordships would be pleased to hear them speak in this perplexed business." While I was speaking this, the Lords were very attentive, and two of them took pen and paper at the table, and took Notes: And it was unanimously granted, that my Counsel should be heard; and so they were. And the Order then made upon their bearing was, that they should advise me, and be heard themselves in all things concerning Matter of Law, and in all things, whether of Law or Fact, that were not charged as Treason; and that they would think upon the distinction in time convenient.

[Die Lunæ, 13 Nov. 1643.

Ordered by the Lords in Parliament, "That the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury's Counsel shall provide themselves to advise him in point of Law, in all the Articles of the whole Charge; and for the Matter of Fact, when the cause comes to be prosecuted by the House of Commons, as there shall be need, their lordships will give further directions in due time."

On the 11th of Dec. 1643, the House of Commons made this ensuing Order:

"Ordered, That the Committee for the Trial of the Archbishop of Canterbury do meet this afternoon at two of the clock in the Star-Chamber, to prepare the Evidence against the Archbishop of Canterbury; and to summon such Witnesses as are needful, and prepare the business fit for Trial, and to acquaint the House when they are ready; and this they are to do with all convenient speed they can, and to have power to send for parties, witnesses, papers, records, &c. And the care thereof is particularly committed unto serjeant Wilde."

Wednesday at night, Jan. 3, 1643, I received an Order for my appearance, and to answer to the Impeachment against me, on the Monday following, January 8.

[Die Mercarii, 3 Jan. 1643.

It is this day ordered by the Lords in Parliament, That this House will proceed against William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, upon the Impeachment brought up from the House of Commons for High Crimes and Misdemeanors, on Monday morning next at ten of the clock, being the 8th of this instant Jan. 1643. At which time the said Archbishop is to prepare himself for his defence.

To the Gentleman Usher attending this House, or his Deputy, to be delivered to the Lieutenant of the Tower, or his Deputy, for the Archbishop.

Jan. 3, 1643. A Message sent from the Lords by sir Robert Rich, and Mr. Page, "The lords commanded us to put you in mind, That the Archbishop of Canterbury hath put in his Plea to the Impeachment of this House sent up to the Lords some time since, which they desire you to take into consideration what is fit to be done in it."

Jan. 5. The House of Commons desired the Lords to appoint a Committee to examine some Witnesses upon Oath, against the Archbishop, in the presence of the Committee of the Commons; which was granted.]

This Summons seemed sudden, after so great an intermission; yet I could not petition for more time, till Saturday, Jan. 6, because, as the Messenger told me, the House sat not again till then. Then I petitioned for more time, in regard my Counsel were not in town; and I had time given till Tuesday, Jan. 16, and that day set preempitorily.

[To the Right Honourable the Lords assembled in the High Court of Parliament, the humble PETITION of WILLIAM LAUD, Archbishop of CANTERBURY, Prisoner in the Tower,

"Humbly sheweth; That your Petitioner having received your Lordships command, by your honourable Order of the 3d of this instant January, annexed, to attend and answer the Impeachments against your Petitioner, from the honourable House of Commons, on Monday the 8th of this instant January, which is but five days distance, and at a time when two of his three Counsel assigned are out of town, and your Petitioner's Witnesses residing in several remote places, cannot be summoned in so short a time, nor willing happily to come upon their summons, without warrant from your lordships:—Your Petitioner's most humble suit to your lordships is, That you will honourably vouchsafe him some more convenient time to send for his Counsel and Witnesses, to testify in the Matters of Fact charged against him; and withal, to grant the Petitioner your honourable Order, to command the Witnesses summoned to attend at the time by your lordships to be appointed. Which his humble request your Petitioner had sooner presented to your Lordships, but that no sitting hath been (as your Petitioner is informed) until this day, since your honourable Order in this behalf made known to him. And your Petitioner shall pray, &c. "WILLIAM CANT."

Sabbati, 6 Jan. 1643.

"Whereas the House formerly appointed Monday, being the 8th of this instant January, 1643, to proceed against William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, upon the Impeachment brought up against him from the House of Commons for High Treason and High Crimes and Misdemeanors; upon reading the Petition of the said Archbishop, it is this day ordered by the Lords in Parliament, to the end that the Counsel and Witnesses of the said Archbishop may have competent time to attend the hearing of the Cause, That this House will repute the Proceedings against the said Archbishop, upon the said Impeachment, until Tuesday the 16th of this instant Jan. 1643, at ten of the clock in the morning. At which time the said Archbishop is peremptorily appointed to provide his Witnesses, and prepare his Defence unto the said Impeachment.

“To the Gentleman Usher, &c.”]

Notwithstanding the shortness of this time, my Counsel being out of town, as not expecting it, I was on Sunday, Jan. 7, ordered again to appear in Mr. Smart's suit the next day. The Warrant bare date a fortnight before; yet partly to sanctify the Sabbath, and partly to shew his great civility to me in giving me warning, I was not served with it till Sunday night at seven of the clock. The next morning I went to Westminster, as I was commanded: but I was sent back, and not so much as called upon. So, beside the charge I was at, that day was lost and taken from me and my business, as short time as I had given me.

Then Tuesday came on January 16. And whereas I was ordered to appear at the Lords House at nine in the morning, I was by another order put off till one in the afternoon.

[Die Lunæ, 15 Jan. 1643.

“It is this day ordered by the Lords in Parliament, that the Lieutenant of the Tower of London, or his deputy, shall bring in safety the Archbishop of Canterbury before their lordships, on Tuesday the 16th this instant January, by one of the clock in the afternoon; at which time this House will proceed against the said Archbishop upon the Impeachment brought up from the House of Commons against him for High Treason, and High Crimes and Misdemeanors, and this to be a sufficient Warrant in that behalf.”] Then I appeared.

[About three o'clock that afternoon the Lords sent down this Message to the House of Commons.

16 Jan. 1643.

A Message from the Lords, by sir Robert Rich and Mr. Page, to acquaint the House, That they are ready to hear the Charge upon the Impeachment against the bishop of Canterbury.

Upon this Message, the Committee of the House of Commons, appointed to manage the Evidence against him, went up to the Lords House. And then the Archbishop being brought to the bar, after he had there kneeled a little space, was commanded to stand up. Which ceremony ended,]

The Committee, that were to press the Evidence against me, began to proceed upon the former general Articles, as well as upon the latter. But to the first Articles I had never been called to answer, nor ever joined issue. Upon this, there was much looking one upon another, as if they meant to ask where the failure was.

[Hereupon Mr. Maynard spake to the Lords to this effect:

Mr. MAYNARD'S Speech on this Occasion.

“My lords; It now appears to your lordships, how unwilling the Archbishop is, out of consciousness of his own guilt, to come to his Trial, that in all this space, from his first Impeachment, he hath not so much as put in any Answer to the original Articles, though he had long since counsell assigned him for that purpose. My Lords, this is none of the Commons fault, but his own; For your lordships well know, that the Commons can take no notice what is done in the house of peers in a parliamentary way, but by a Message from your lordships, who, after our Articles exhibited, were to call upon the Archbishop for an Answer to them. And your Lords sending us several Messages heretofore, that the Archbishop had put in his Answer to the Articles, and that you were ready to hear our Charge against him, and appointing this day for his Trial, the Commons thereupon conceived that he had formerly put in his Plea and Answer, in due form, to all their Articles: But the contrary now appearing both to your lordships and us, it is impossible for us to proceed at this time on his Trial, there being no issue joined upon the Original Articles, for want of an Answer to them: and to proceed upon the Additionals before any Answer given to the Originals, will be very preposterous. Wherefore we humbly pray your lordships, to order that the Archbishop may forthwith put in his Answer both to the Original and Additional Articles, by the advice of his counsel, or otherwise, in such a sort as he will stand to it; And then we shall without any delay join issue with him, proceed on his Trial and Evidence against him, when your lordships shall appoint.”]

But by this means there could not then be any Proceeding. So I was there peremptorily ordered to put in my Answer on Monday, Jan. 22, both to the original and additional Articles, and in writing.

[The Archbishop desired the Lords that he might advise with his Counsel, whether the Articles were certain and particular enough to be answered unto; and that if their Lordships should over-rule him to put in his Answer to them, he might have convenient time to do it.

Upon this all being commanded to withdraw, the Lords, after some short debate among themselves, and upon reading the Archbishop's Petition to have Mr. Gerrard of Grays-Inn assigned for his Counsel, to join with those formerly assigned him, made this ensuing Order;

Die Martis, 16 Jan. 1643.

“Upon the reading the Petition of William Archbishop of Canterbury, it is this day ordered by the Lords in parliament, That Mr. Richard Gerrard of Grays-Inn be added to the former Counsel assigned to the said Archbishop, to be likewise of his counsel. It is also ordered by the Lords in Parliament, That William Archbishop of Canterbury shall put in his Answer in writing into this House, to the first and further Articles of Impeachment brought up from the House of Commons against him, by Monday morning next peremptorily; and that the same Counsel formerly assigned him shall be of counsel with him."

On the 19th of January the Archbishop sent this Petition to the Lords.

To the Right Hon. the Lords assembled in Parliament, the humble PETITION of William Archbishop of Canterbury, Prisoner in the Tower.

"Sheweth; That whereas your Petitioner having formerly answered the particular Articles exhibited against him by the honourable House of Commons; and now by your Lordships Order of the 16th of this instant, is commanded to put in his Answer to the first and further Articles of Impeachment brought up against him by Monday morning next; for the doing whereof his former counsel is assigned him;—That your Petitioner having advised with his Counsel concerning the first Articles, which were exhibited now almost 3 years since, finding upon Perusal and debate of the same, that the said former Articles are such that no Answer can be made thereunto, nor your Petitioner in any wise enabled to prepare for his Defence of the same, as they now stand;—That forasmuch as the said Articles of Impeachment import no less than a Charge of High-Treason; and forasmuch as your Petitioner is by his counsel informed, that, especially in cases of Life, the Defendant is allowed to offer to the Court, where the same depends, his Exceptions by his Counsel before any Plea pleaded;—Your Petitioner most humbly beseecheth your Lordships to appoint a day for the hearing of your Petitioner's Counsel concerning the same. And your Petitioner shall pray, &c. WILLIAM CANT.]

At this day and time I appeared, as I was ordered to do; but could not obtain of the lords either to take my former Answer off from the file, if I must put in another; nor to distinguish the Articles, which were Treason, and which Misdemeanour; nor leave for my Counsel to speak to the generality and uncertainty of the original Articles; which they professed were such, as no man living could prepare Answer for. But I must put in my Answer presently, or be taken pro confesso. So in these straits I put in my Answer to both Articles.

The humble ANSWER of WILLIAM Archbishop of CANTERBURY, to the first and farther Articles of Impeachment brought up by the Honourable House of Commons against him, and by Order of the right hon. the Lords in Parliament of the 16th of this instant directed to be put in.

"As to the 13th Article of the said first Articles, and the matters therein charged, and all matters or things in the same, or any of the rest of the Articles contained, which concern any act of hostility, whether between the king and his subjects, or between subject and subject, or which may be conceived to arise upon the coming of any English Army against Scotland, or the coming of the Scottish Army into England; or upon any action, attempt, assistance, counsel, or device, having relation thereunto, and falling out by the occasion of the late Troubles, preceding the late conclusion of the Treaty, and return of the Scottish Army into Scotland: This Defendant saith, That it is enacted by an act made during the sitting of this present Parliament, that the same, and whatsoever hath ensued thereupon, whether trenching upon the laws and liberties of the church and kingdom, or upon his majesty's honour and authority, in no time hereafter may be called in question, or resented as a wrong, national or personal; and that no mention be made thereof in time coming, neither in Judgment, nor out of Judgment: but that it be held and reputed, as though never such things had been thought or wrought; as by the said Act may more at large appear: With this, That this Defendant doth aver that he is none of the persons excepted by the said Act, or the said offences charged upon this Defendant any of the offences excepted by the said act.

"And as to all the rest of the said first and farther Articles, this Defendant, saving to himself all advantages of Exception to the said Articles, humbly saith, He is not guilty of all, or any of the matters by the said Articles charged, in such manner and form as the same are by the said Articles charged against him.

[The same day the Lords, by sir Robert Rich and Mr. Page, sent down this Answer of the Archbishop's to the House of Commons; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee appointed to manage the Evidence against the said Archbishop, and accordingly delivered to serjeant Wilde.

And it was further the same day, ordered by the Commons, That the said Committee appointed to manage the Evidence at the Trial of the Archbishop of Canterbury do peremptorily meet this afternoon, at three of the clock, in the Court of Wards, upon the distribution of the parts of the Evidence.]

All February passed over, and Mr. Prynn not yet ready; he had not yet sufficiently prepared his Witnesses. But on Monday, March 4, an Order passed to call me to the House, to answer my Charge of High-Treason, on Tuesday March 12, following.

[Die Lunæ, 4 Martii, 1643.

A message to be sent to the Lords to desire them to appoint a day for the Trial of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Mr. Serjeant Wilde went up to the Lords, to appoint a day for the Trial, and brings Answer, That the Lords have appointed to-morrow seven-night for the Trial of the Archbishop of Canterbury.

For which purpose the Lords made the following Order:

Die Lunæ, 4 Martii, 1643.

Ordered, "That the Archbishop of Canterbury shall appear before their lordships on Tuesday the 12th of this instant March, at nine of the clock in the morning. At which time this House will proceed against the Archbishop upon the first and further Articles of Impeachment, brought up from the House of Commons against him, for High-Treason, and High Crimes and Misdemeanors: whereof the said Archbishop is hereby to take notice, and provide himself accordingly."

And on Saturday March 9, I received a Note from the Committee which were to press the Evidence against me, what Articles they meant to begin with; which had a shew of some fair respect. But the generality and uncertainty of the Articles was such, as rendered it a bare shew only; no Particular being charged, concerning which I might provide for any Witnesses or Counter-proof.

[After this, the Archbishop petitioning the Commons House, That sir Henry Mildmay, a member thereof, might be examined as a witness for him at his Trial; this order was thereupon conceived.

9 Martii, 1644.

"The humble Petition of William Archbishop of Canterbury, desiring that sir Henry Mildmay may be examined as a Witness in his business, he being to come to his Trial on Tuesday next, was this day read; and it is ordered according to his Petition, That he shall be examined as a Witness at the Trial of the said bishop accordingly. It was likewise then ordered, That divers Members of the House of Commons shall be examined as Witnesses against him; and that the Lords be moved by serjeant Wilde, that some Members and Attendants of the Lords House be examined at the Archbishop's Trial. And that it be referred to the Committee of Sequestrations, to consider of some convenient recompence for such Clerks, Solicitors, and others, as have been or shall be employed in the transcribing of Breviats, and other services done by them to the Committee for the bishop of Canterbury's Trial."

And now being ready to enter upon the Hearing and the Trial itself, I hold it necessary for me to acquaint the Reader with some general things before that begin: partly to the end he may see the course of this Trial, and the carriage which hath been in it; and partly to avoid the often and tedious Repetition, which else must necessarily be of some of them; and especially, that they may not be mingled either with the Evidence, or my Answers; to wit, to interrupt the current, or make any thing more obscure.

1. The Committee appointed by the House of Commons to manage and press the Evidence against me were, serjeant Wilde, Mr. Browne, Mr. Maynard, Mr. Nichols, Mr. Hill. But none spake at the bar but the first four. Mr.

Hill was Consul Bibulus; Mr. Prynn was trusted with the providing of all the Evidence.

2. Mr. Prynn took to him two young men to help to turn his Papers, and assist him; Mr. Grice and Mr. Beck, Mr. Grice was son to Mr. Thomas Grice, fellow of St. John Bapt. College in my time, and after beneficed near Stanes.

3. And though my hopes, under God, were upon the Lords; yet when my Trial did come on, it did somewhat trouble me to see so few Lords in that great house: For at the greatest presence that was any day of my hearing, there were not above 14, and usually not above 11 or 12. Of these one third part, at least, each day took, or had occasion to be gone before the Charge of the day was half given. I never had any one day the same Lords all present at my Defence in the afternoon, that were at my Charge in the morning; some leading Lords scarce present at my Charge four days of all my long Trial, nor three at my Defence; and which is most, no one Lord present at my whole Trial but the right hon. the lord Gray of Werk, the Speaker, without whose presence it could not be a House. In this case I stood in regard of my honourable Judges.

4. When my Hearing came on, usually my Charge was in giving till almost two of the clock. Then I was commanded to withdraw: And upon my humble Petition for time to answer, I had no more given me than till four the same afternoon; scarce time enough advisedly to peruse the Evidence: My Counsel not suffered to come to me till I had made my Answer, nor any friend else, but my Solicitor Mr. Dell, to help to turn my Papers; and my Warder of the Tower to sit by to look to this. And this was not the least cause why I was at first accused of no less than Treason, "Ne quis necessarium juvaret periclitantem, majestatis crimina subdebantur;" (Tacit. l. 3, Annal.) as it fell out in Silanus's case, who had more guilt about him (yet not of Treason) than (God be thanked) I have, but was prosecuted with like malice, as appears in that Story." At four o'clock, or after, the house sat again, and I made my Answer: and if I produced any Witness, he was not suffered to be sworn; so it was but like a testimony at large, which the Lords might the more freely believe, or not believe, as they pleased. After my Answer, one or more of the Committee replied upon me. By that time all was done, it was usually half an hour past seven. Then in the heat of the year (when it overtook me) I was presently to go by water to the Tower, full of weariness, and with a shirt as wet to my back with sweat, as the water could have made it, had I fallen in. Yet I humbly thank God for it, he so preserved my health, as that though I were weary and faint the day after, yet I never had so much as half an hour's head-ach, or other infirmity, all the time of this comfortless and tedious Trial.

5. Now for the Method which I shall hold in this History of my Trial, it shall be this: I will set down the Evidence given on each day by itself, and my Answer to it. But whereas all the Evidence was given together, and so my whole Answer after; to avoid all looking back and trouble of turning leaves to compare the Answer with the Evidence, I will set down each particular Evidence and my Answer to it, and so all along, that the indifferent Reader may, without farther trouble, see the force of the one, and the satisfaction given in the other, and how far every particular is from Treason. And if I add any thing to my Answers in any place, either it is because in the shortness of time then given me to make my Answer, it came not to my present thoughts; or if it did, yet I forbore to speak it with that sharpness, holding it neither fit nor safe, in my condition, to provoke either my Accusers, or my Judges. And whatsoever is so added by me in either of these respects, the Reader shall find it } thus marked in the margin, as here it stands { in this:*

6. Nor did I wrong Mr. Prynne, where I say, "That for all the haste to put in my Answer Jan. 23, he could not make this broken business so soon ready against me:" For it is well known he kept a kind of School of Instruction for such of the Witnesses as he durst trust, that they might be sure to speak home to the purpose he would have them. And this an Uter Barrister, a man of good credit, knows; who, in the hearing of men beyond exception, said, "The Archbishop is a stranger to me; but Mr. Prynne's tampering about the Witnesses is so palpable and foul, that I cannot but pity him, and cry shame of it." When I heard this, I sent to this gentleman, to know if he tendered my Case so far as to witness it before the Lords. The Answer I received was, That the thing was true, and that very indignation of it made him speak; but heartily prayed me I would not produce him as a Witness; for if I did, the times were such, he should be utterly undone: And it is not hard to guess by whom. Upon this I consulted some friends; and upon regard of his safety on the one side, and my own doubt, lest it forced to his undoing, he might through fear blanch and mince the truth to my own prejudice who produced him, I forbore the business, and left Mr. Prynne to the Bar of Christ, whose mercy give him repentance, and amend him. But upon my Christianity this story is truth.

The First Day of my Hearing.

And now I come to Tuesday, March 12,

* Note, That where entire set Speeches were made by the Archbishop, although spoken by him at the bar, the same Marks are put to them. But wheresoever those marks are found in the History, from the second to the last day of the Trial inclusive, the Words to which they are affixed were not spoken at the bar at that time, but either added afterwards by the Archbishop at the Recapitulation of his Answer, or inserted in writing the History. H. W.

1643, the day appointed for my Trial to begin: and begin it did.

[The Archbishop about three of the clock in the afternoon was brought by the Lieutenant of the Tower and Usher of the Black Rod to the bar in the Lords House; where after he had kneeled a little space, the lord Gray of Werk, Speaker pro tempore, commanded him to rise up. And the Committee of the House of Commons, appointed to manage the Evidence at his Trial, demanded that the several Articles of their Impeachment against him might be read. Whereupon one of the Clerks of the Lords House read both the Original and Additional Articles before mentioned, and after that his Answer, Plea, and Demurrer thereunto.

The Archbishop then desired the Lords, that the House of Commons might give in all their Charge and Evidence to all the Articles against him together, before he should be put to give his Answer to any particular Charge, because he was ancient, his Memory very short, and the Articles general; and that he might answer all his Charge together, and not each day's Evidence by piece-meal. To which, on the behalf of the Commons, it was answered by Mr. Maynard,

"1. That if the Archbishop's Memory was so bad, it would be far worse for him to charge it with answering many particulars, and the whole Evidence against him together, than to answer every particular Charge each day, as it should be given in against him, whilst it was fresh in memory. 2. That it might and would be a great inconvenience to have Witnesses cross-examined upon other days than those whereon they gave in their testimony against the prisoner. 3. That the Lords themselves would find it difficult to pass their Judgment upon all the Charge together, without hearing his punctual Answer to every particular Proof as it should be given in Evidence, whilst it was fresh in their memories. 4. Because else all the Witnesses, which were very many, must of necessity attend, and be kept in town from the first to the last day of his Trial; which would be a very great charge and inconvenience. 5. In the earl of Strafford's Case, this very parliament, he was put to answer every day to the particular Evidence given against him on the same day."

Upon which Reasons the House of Peers ordered, that the Archbishop should make his particular Answer to every particular Charge on the same day it was given in against him.

Then the Archbishop desired, that the House of Commons would sever the Articles which were Treason from those other Articles which were matter of Crime and Misdemeanour only; that so he might know which of them were Treason, and which not. Hereto Mr. Maynard answered, That this they might not do, because they were now only to try the matter of fact, not law; and because all the Articles taken together, not each or any particular Article by itself, made up the Treason wherewith he was charged; to wit, his endeavours to subvert and destroy Religion, the fundamental Laws of the land, and government of the realm, and to bring in Popery and an arbitrary tyrannical government against law.]

When I was come, and settled at the bar, Serjeant Wilde made a solemn Speech for Introduction. I had a character given me before of this gentleman, which I will forbear to express; but in this Speech of his, and his future proceedings with me, I found it exactly true. His Speech my decayed memory cannot give you at large; but a Skeleton of it I here present, according to such Limbs as my Brief Notes then taken can now call to my memory.

He began, and told the Lords, That the children which I had travailed with, were now come to the birth; and that my actions were foul, and my Treason so great, as that the like could not be read in any history; nay, so great, as that nullus poeta fingere, no poet could ever feign the like. And that if all Treason were lost, and not to be found in any author wh. t it is, it might be recovered and found out in me and my actions; with divers pieces of Latin sentences to this effect. [And though these high and loud expressions troubled me much at the present, yet I could not but think, that in this Canto of his he was much like one of them which cry up and down the City, "Have you any old ends of Gold and Silver?"]

After this, he proceeded to give Reasons why I was not sooner proceeded against, having now lain by it above 3 years. The first Reason he gave was the Distractions of the Time. [And they indeed were now grown great; but the distractions which were now, can be no argument why I was not proceeded against at the beginning of the Parliament, when things were in some better quiet.] His second Reason was the death of some persons*. [But this could be no Reason at all: For if the persons he speaks of were Witnesses against me, more might die, but the dead could not be made alive again by this delay; unless Mr. Serjeant had some hope the Resurrection might have been by this time, that so he might have produced them. And if the persons were members of the House of Commons, as all men know Mr. Pym was in the Chair for preparation of my Trial; then this is known too, That Mr. Pym came up to the Committee of Lords full of great hopes to prove God knows what against me. The persons to be examined were William lord bishop of London, and Matthew lord bishop of Ely, my very worthy friends, and men like to know as much of me as any men. A Lord then present told me, there were some 18 or 19 Interrogatories, upon which these Bishops were to be examined against me, concerning my Intercourse with Rome; but all were built upon the first, which was their knowledge of the man who, it seems, was thought to be my chief agent in that secret. But both the Bishops denying upon their oaths that they, or either of them, ever knew any man, all the rest of the Interrogatories, what relations he had to me, and the like, must needs fall to nothing, as they did. And the Lord told me farther, he never saw Mr. Pym, and the rest, so abashed at any thing in his life. After this Mr. Pym, as it is well known, gave over that Chair, despairing to do that against me which was desired.] His third Reason was a good large one, and that was other Impediments. [And that is true; some Impediments there were, no doubt, or else I had come sooner to hearing. And, as I conceive, a chief Impediment was, that there was not a man whose malice would make him diligent enough to search into such a forsaken business, till Mr. Prynne offered himself to that service. For I think I may be confident, that that honourable and great house would not seek any man out of their own body for any such employment, had not suit some way or other been made for it.]

After these Reasons given for the delay of my Trial, he fell upon me again as foul as at first; as that I was the Author of all the Extravagancies in the Government, and of all the Concussions in the state; That the quality of my person aggravated my crime: That my abilities and gifts were great, but that I perverted them all; and that I was guilty of Treason in the highest altitude. [These were the Liveries which he liberally gave me; but I had no mind to wear them; And yet I might not desire him to wear this cloth himself, considering where I then stood, and in what condition.]

This Treason in the Altitude, he said, was in my endeavour to alter the Religion established by law, and to subvert the Laws themselves: And that to effect these, I left no way unattempted. For Religion, he told the Lords, That I laboured a reconciliation with Rome; That I maintained Popish and Arminian Opinions; That I suffered Transubstantiation, Justification by Merits, Purgatory, and what not, to be openly preached all over the kingdom; That I induced superstitious Ceremonies, as Consecrations of Churches, and Chalice, and Pictures of Christ in Glass-windows; That I gave liberty to the prophanation of the Lords-Day; That I held intelligence with Cardinals and Priests, and endeavoured to ascend to Papal dignity; Offers being made me to be a Cardinal. [And for the laws, he was altogether as wild in his assertions, as he was before for Religion; And if he have no more true sense of Religion, than he hath knowledge in the Law (though it be his profession), I think he may offer both long enough to sale, before he find a chapman for either.] And here he told the Lords, That I held the same method for this, which I did for Religion. [And surely that was to uphold both, had the kingdom been so happy as to believe me.] But he affirmed, with great confidence, That I caused Sermons to be preached in Court to set the king's Prerogative above the Law, and Books to be printed to the same effect; That my actions were according to these. Then he fell upon the Canons, and discharged them upon me. Then, that I might be guilty enough, (if his bare word could make me so) he charged upon me the Benevolence, the Loan, the Ship-Money, the illegal pulling down of Buildings, Inclosures; saying, That as Antichrist sets himself above all that is called God; so I laboured to set the king above all that is called law. And after a tedious stir he concluded his Speech with this, That I was like Naaman the Syrian, a great person (he confessed), but a leper. [So ended this noble Celeustes.]

" My Lords; This great cause of the Archbishop of Canterbury, after a long and painful travail, is now come to the birth; of which it may be truly said, as it was in a like case; ' Reperitum est hodierno die facinus, quod nec Poeta fingere, nec Illetrio sonare, nec Mimusi imitari potuerit.'—For if all the Oppressions, all the pernicious practices and machinations, which have been in each time to ruin our Religion, Laws, and Liberties, were lost, I think here they might have been found and drawn out again to the life. So that your lordships, who have been the great assertors of our Liberties, and stood so fast to the rules and principles of your noble progenitors, (which others have ignobly deserted) may, after a long conflict with so many great and matchless difficulties, say now as a great commander once did upon an extraordinary danger, ' Tandem par animo meo periculum video.' Here is a cause proportionable to yourselves, apt and proper for the justice and power of this honourable court.

" Had they been faults of common frailty, error, or incogitancy, which this man hath committed, we should gladly have stepped back, and cast a cloke over them; but being so wilful, so universal, so destructive to the laws of God and man, so comprehensive of all the evils and miseries which now we suffer, the sin would lie upon our own heads, if we should not call for justice. Which that it hath been so long uncalled for, (not deferred or delayed) I suppose no man will think strange, who considers the present distractions, the death and dispersion of our Witnesses, the loss of some of our Members who have been employed and taken pains in this business, the multitude of diversions we have had, and have daily, occasioned by the acts and influences of this meteor.

" But the Truth survives, and matter enough survives; so copious and so full of variety, that if all the particulars should be examined, for his three years Imprisonment, which he complains of, there would be three years time of Trial and Hearing of the heavy Charge that lies against him. A Charge of High Treason: treason in all and every part: treason in the highest pitch and altitude. For what greater Treason can there be, than to betray the whole realm, and to subvert the very foundations, leaving nothing for posterity but a curse upon him that shall go about to build again?

" That which of itself is so heinous, is much more enhanced and aggravated by the quality of the person, a Churchman, a great Prelate, a man in great trust, place, and authority in Church and Commonwealth. A man endued with so great gifts of nature, and so many of grace and favour from his majesty; and for all these to be perverted to a contrary end, even to the destruction of the public, and the ruin of the womb that bare him, how daep a dye do these impose upon this foul crime!

" How Churchmen in all ages, as hath been often observed, should come to be the archest Seedsmen of Mischief, and principal actors in all the great distractions and alterations that have happened, is a destiny that may seem strange. But the Reason is, ' Ex boho Theologo malus Medicus,' their intermeddling with temporal things and matters heterogeneal to their Calling, wherein God is pleased to smite them with blindness, and to infatuate their counsel. Whereof a perfect pattern we have in this great Prelate; who, by abusing his profession, and making the business of State the customary subject of all his endeavours, became the Author of all the illegal and tyrannical Proceedings in the Star Chamber.*

* Hume (note A to vol. 7), says, " That Laud's severity was not extreme, appears from this fact, that he caused the Acts or Records of the High Commission Court to be searched, and found that there had been fewer suspensions, deprivations, and other punishments by three, during the seven years of his time, than in any seven years of his predecessor Abbot." If it be admitted that the fact of the comparative numbers of punishments is sufficiently established (the authority is Troubles and Trials of Laud, p. 164), it may yet be reasonably questioned, whether this proves any thing as to the comparative severity of the two Archbishops. Abbot is not now before us, but that Laud's severity was extreme is abundantly proved by the barbarous Sentences pronounced by him in the Star Chamber recorded in this work. See also Felton's Case, vol. 3, p. 371. It is not in human nature, that a man who was known zealously to have concurred in and promoted such cruelties, should escape popular detestation. It is observable, that lord Clarendon, in setting forth the causes of the deserved odiousness of lord Cottington (1 Hist. of the Rebellion, 151), omits to mention that he was the man, who, in the Star Chamber, proposed the high fine on the bishop of Lincoln, the severe Sentence of removal from his office, and a fine of 1,000*l.*, upon Sherfield (ante, v. 3, p. 519), and the barbarous sentences against Prynne, Bastwick and Burton (ante, v. 3, p. 711.) In lord Cottington's Sentence against Prynne, the ordering the book to be burned by the hang-

High Commission Court, and other Courts; of all the Innovations in Doctrine and Discipline; of the suppressing of godly Ministers and Preaching; of the advancing of others, who were the promoters of Popery and Arbitrary Power: and, indeed, of all the concussions and distractions in Church and State, whereby Religion hath been jostled out, laws and parliaments trodden down with contempt.

“For Matter of Religion, surely those times were happy, when by the magnanimity of princes, and the wisdom and piety of our predecessors, the Antichristian yoke of popery was shaken off.—And now after so many bloody Massacres in France, such fiery persecutions here in queen Mary’s days, so many treacherous Conspiracies in time of queen Elizabeth, that execrable and horrid Powder-Plot in the time of the late king James, such streams and rivers of blood in Germany and Ireland, and other parts of the Christian world ever since, by those restless and cruel Firebrands of all mischief: for any man now to go about to rebuild these Walls of Jericho, and to reduce us to those rotten principles of error and darkness, how can it be expected better than that the people should be even ready to stone him, as they did him that did but act the part of Belerophon in Rome?”

“But to avoid this danger, he conveys this poison in a gilded pill, with baits and pretences of Reconciliation; a pleasing snare, ‘Laqueus Diaboli ad miserorum animas ad infernum detrudendas.’ A bead-roll of particulars might be recited, wherein this Reconcilement was to be wrought in points of Free-Will, Merits, Justification, Universal Grace, Purgatory; and, in effect, all the rest. To draw on these, there must be an introducing of Popish Ceremonies in all the particulars contained in the Mass-Books, and Pontificals themselves: and to make way for these, the Book of Sports must be published, and pressed beyond the king’s intention or declaration, which was but a civil command: But he subjoins Ecclesiastical Penalties, even the sharpest, Suspension, Deprivation, and the like; these executed on divers good and godly men with a high hand. Thus a liberty proclaimed not to Captives, but to man, was a circumstance, introduced for the first time. Lord Clarendon speaks, (1 Hist. Reb. 64), contemptuously of secretary Coke, of whom he says, among other slighting expressions, that “his cardinal perfection was industry, and his most eminent infirmity, covetousness.” Coke, however, seems to have possessed a much milder and more conciliating temper than most of king Charles’s courtiers; and his speeches in the Star Chamber in the Cases of Sheffield, and of Prynne, for the Hieriomastix, seem to have been the most judicious and the best which were delivered on those occasions. In the Case of Chambers, (ante, vol. 3, p. 873), Laud supported the imposition of a fine, six times as great as that which had been proposed by Cottington.

profane Caitiffs; this day set apart by God ab eterno, exposed and prostituted to all looseness and irreligion, and that by a law; this lamb taken out of his bosom.

“Jehosaphat sends Priests and Levites into all the Cities and Tribes to instruct them: This Prelate sends Declarations and Injunctions to corrupt them, and to extinguish the lamp and light of Religion. In the former Acts, he destroys the Protestants; in this, Religion itself. In the one, he leaves Superstition; in the other, nothing but Atheism and Profaneness: in the one, he destroys Presbyters, as did Dioclesian; in the other, Presbyterium; as did the apostate Julian. Yet to shew his love to Religion, (the Pope’s only) he holds correspondency with those of Rome, cardinals Barberino, Panzani, Con, Rosetti, the Pope’s nuncios, sir Toby Matthews, Saint Clara, Saint Giles, the most dangerous and desperate Jesuits, and many others ejusdem Farinae. And by all these steps and rounds he makes a ladder for himself to climb up to papal dignity; in example of Anselme, whom (though famous for his contumacy and rebellion) yet he calls him his worthy predecessor, (as was Becket also) and is contented to take upon him the plenitude of power, the title of Holiness, of Archangel of this Church, the Lineal Successor of Gregory the First, rather of Gregory the Seventh; and for all this was well worthy to have these great offers made him, recorded in his own Memorials, by those that had ability to perform it (viz.) a Cardinal’s Cap. But such was his modesty to forbear it; because, though Rome be a true visible Church in his opinion, yet something dwelt with him that hindered it for a time, to wit, I suppose his dwelling here.

“For his attempts against the Laws, the Subjects’ birth-right, and the Rights of Parliaments, their chief support and refuge, how little regard he had to them; how much he did despise and abhor them, making it his ambition to prefer the contemners and abusers of them, and to set up his Canons and Constitutions above them, imposing of unjust and unlawful Oaths, Exactions, Monopolies, all sorts of oppressions, stopping of Prohibitions and Course of Justice, rescinding of Acts of Parliament, advancing of Proclamations, and all kind of Arbitrary Power above the laws of God or Man; is fully expressed in the Articles, and will more fully appear in the Evidence. To conclude, Neaman was a great man; but he was a leper. This man’s leprosy hath so infected all, as there remains no other cure but the sword of justice; which we doubt not but your Lordships will so apply, that the Commonwealth shall yet live again and flourish.”]

I was much troubled to see myself, in such an honourable assembly, made so vile: yet seeing all men’s eyes upon me, I recollected myself, and humbly desired of the lords two things: “One, That they would expect Proof, before they give up their belief to these loud, but loose assertions: especially since it is an easy thing for men so resolved, to convictate, instead of accusing; when as the rule given by Optatus holds firm, "Quum intenditur Crimen,"* when a crime is objected, (especially so high a crime as this charged on me) it is necessary that the Proof be manifest, which yet against me is none at all. The other, That their Lordships would give me leave, not to answer this gentleman's Particulars, (for that I shall defer till I hear his Proofs) but to speak some few things concerning myself, and this grievous impeachment brought up against me."

Which being yielded unto, I then spake as follows :

" My Lords; My being in this place, and in this condition, recalls to my memory, that which I long since read in Seneca, "Tormentum est, etiamsi absolutus quis fuerit, causam dixisse.† It is not a grief only, no, it is no less than a torment, for an ingenuous man to plead criminally, much more capitally, at such a bar as this; yea, though it should so fall out, that he be absolved. The great truth of this I find at present in myself: and so much the more, because I am a Christian; and not that only, but in Holy Orders; and not so only, but by God's grace and goodness preferred to the greatest place this Church affords: and yet now brought, causam dicere, to plead, and for no less than life, at this great bar. And whatsoever the world thinks of me, (and they have been taught to think more ill than, I humbly thank Christ for it, I was ever acquainted with;) yet, my lords, this I find tormentum est; it is no less than torment to me to appear in this place to such an Accusation. Nay, my Lords, give me leave, I beseech you, to speak plain truth: no Sentence that can justly pass upon me, (and other I will never fear from your lordships) can go so near me as causam dixisse, to have pleaded for myself, upon this occasion, and in this place. For, as for the Sentence (I thank God for it), I am at St. Paul's Ward; "If I have committed any thing worthy of death, I refuse not to die," Acts xxv. 11. For, I bless God, I have so spent my time, as that I am neither ashamed to live, nor afraid to die. Nor can the world be more weary of me, than I of it: for seeing the malignity which hath been raised against me by some men, I have carried my life in my hands these divers years past. But yet, my Lords, if none of these things, whereof these men accuse me, merit death by law; though I may not in this case, and from this bar, appeal unto Cæsar, yet to your lordships justice and integrity I both may and do appeal; not doubting but that God of his goodness will preserve my innocency. And as Job, in the midst of his affliction, said to his mistaken friends, so shall I to my Accusers; "God forbid I should justify you; till I die I will not remove my integrity from me; I will hold it fast, and not let it go: my heart shall not reproach me as long as I live." Job xxvii. 5.

" My Lords, I see by the Articles, and have now heard from this Gentleman, that the Charge against me is divided into two main Heads; the Laws of the Land, and the Religion by those Laws established."

" For the Laws first; I think I may safely say, I have been, to my understanding, as strict an observer of them all the days of my life, so far as they concern me, as any man hath; and since I came into place, I have followed them, and been as much guided by them, as any man that sat where I had the honour to sit. And for this I am sorry I have lost the witness of the Lord Keeper Coventry, and of some other persons of honour, since dead. And the Learned Counsel at law, which attended frequently at the Council-Table, can witness (some of them) that in references to that board, and in debates arising at the board, I was usually for that part of the cause where I found law to be: and if the Counsel desired to have their Clients Cause referred to the law, (well I might move in some cases for charity or conscience to have admittance, but) to the Law I left them, if thither they would go. And how such a carriage as this through the whole course of my life, in private and public, can stand with an intention, nay, a practice to overthrow the Law, and to introduce an Arbitrary Government, which my soul hath always hated, I cannot yet see. And it is now many years since I learned of my great Master (in humanis) Aristotle, periculosum esse; that it is 'a very dangerous thing to trust the Will of the Judge, rather than the written law.'* And all kingdoms and commonwealths have followed his Judgment ever since; and the School-disputes † have not dissented from it. Nay more, I have ever been of opinion, that human Laws bind the conscience; and have accordingly made conscience of observing them. And this doctrine I have constantly preached, as occasion hath been offered me. And how is it possible I should seek to overthrow those Laws, which I held myself bound in conscience to keep and observe? Especially, since an endeavour to overthrow law, is a far greater crime than to break or disobey any particular law whatsoever; all Particulars being swept away in that General. And, my Lords, that this is my judgment, both of Parliaments and Laws, I beseech your lordships that I may read a short passage in my Book against Fisher the Jesuit, which was printed and published to the world before these Troubles fell on me, and before I could so much as suspect this Charge could come against me; and therefore could not be purposely written to serve any turn. [I had leave, and did read it; but, for brevity-sake, refer the reader to the book itself.]]

" As for Religion, I was born and bred up in and under the Church of England, as it yet stands established by Law. I have, by God's blessing, and the favour of my prince, grown up in it to the years which are now upon me, and to the place of preferment which I yet bear: And in this Church, by the grace and goodness of God, I resolve to die. I have ever since I understood aught in Divinity, kept one constant tenor in this my profession, without variation or shifting from one opinion to another, for any worldly ends: and if my conscience would have suffered me to shift tenets in Religion with time and occasion, I could easily have slid through all the difficulties which have pressed upon me in this kind. But, of all diseases, I have ever hated a palsy in religion; well knowing that too often a dead-palsy ends that disease in the fearful forgetfulness of God and his Judgments. Ever since I came in place, I laboured nothing more, than that the external public Worship of God (too much slighted in most parts of this kingdom) might be preserved, and that with as much decency and uniformity as might; being still of opinion, that Unity cannot long continue in the Church, where Uniformity is shut out at the Church-Door. And I evidently saw, that the public neglect of God's Service in the outward face of it, and the nasty lying of many places dedicated to that Service, had almost cast a damp upon the true and inward Worship of God; which while we live in the body needs external helps, and all little enough to keep it in any vigour. And this I did to the uttermost of my knowledge, according both to law and Canon, and with the consent and liking of the people: nor did any command issue out from me against the one, or without the other, that I know of.

"Farther, my Lords, give me leave, I beseech you, to tell you this also: That I have as little acquaintance with Recusants of any sort, as I believe any man of place in England hath: and for my kindred, no one of them was ever a Recusant, but sir William Webb, grandchild to my uncle sir William Webb, sometime lord-mayor of London; and him, with some of his children, I reduced back again to the Church of England, as is well known, and I as able to prove.

"One thing more I humbly desire may be thought on; it is this: I am fallen into a great deal of obloquy in matter of Religion, and that so far as that it is charged in the Articles, That I have endeavoured to advance and bring in Popery. Perhaps, my Lords, I am not ignorant what party of men have raised this scandal upon me, nor for what end, nor perhaps by whom set on: but howsoever, I would fain have a good reason given me (if my conscience led me that way, and that with my conscience I could subscribe to the Church of Rome), what should have kept me here (before my Imprisonment) to endure the libels and the slanders, and the base usage in all kinds, which have been put upon me, and these to end in this question for my life: I say, I would fain know a good reason of this.

"For, first, my Lords, Is it because of any pledges I have in the world to sway me against my conscience? No, sure. For I have nor wife nor children, to cry out upon me to stay with them; and if I had, I hope the call of my conscience should be heard above them.

"Or secondly, Is it because I was loth to leave the honour and the profit of the place I was risen unto? Surely no: for I desire your lordships and all the world else should know, I do much scorn Honour and Profit, both the one and the other, in comparison of my conscience. Besides, it cannot be imagined by any reasonable man, but that if I could have complied with Rome, I should not have wanted either honour or profit. And suppose I could not have so much of either, as here I had; yet sure, would my conscience have served me that way, less of either with my conscience would have prevailed with me, more than greater against my conscience.

"Or thirdly, Is it because I lived here at ease, and was loth to venture the loss of that? Not so neither: for whatsoever the world may be pleased to think of me, I have led a very painful life, and such as I could have been very well content to change, had I well known how. And had my conscience led me that way, I am sure I might have lived at far more ease; and either have avoided the barbarous libellings, and other bitter and grievous scorns, which I have here endured, or at the least been out of the hearing of them. Nay, my Lords, I am as innocent in this business of Religion, as free from all practice, or so much as thought of practice for any alteration to Popery, or any way blemishing the true-Protestant Religion established in the Church of England, as I was when my mother first bare me into the world. And let nothing be spoken against me but truth, and I do here challenge whatsoever is between heaven and hell, to say the worst against me in point of my Religion; in which, by God's grace, I have ever hated dissimulation; and had I not hated it, perhaps it might have been better with me for worldly safety, than now it is. But it can no way become a Christian Bishop to halt with God.

"Lastly, If I had any purpose to blast the true Religion established in the Church of England, and to introduce popery, sure I took a very wrong way to it. For, my lords, I have staid as many that were going to Rome, and reduced as many that were already gone, as (I believe) any Bishop or other minister in this kingdom hath done; and some of them men of great abilities, and some of them persons of great place. And is this the way, my Lords, to introduce Popery? I beseech your Lordships consider it well. For surely, if I had blemished the true Protestant Religion, I could not have settled such men in it; and if I had purposed to introduce Popery, I would never have reduced such men from it. And though it please the Author of the 'Popish Royal Favourite' to say, 'That scarce one of the swaying Lord Prelates is able to say, that 'ever he converted one Papist to our Religion; yet how void of charity this Speech of his is, and how full of falshood, shall appear by the number of those persons, whom by God's blessing upon my labours I have settled in the true Protestant Religion established in England: and with your Lordship's leave, I shall name them, that you may see both their number and their condition; though I cannot set them down in that order of time in which I either converted or settled them.*

" 1. And first, Henry Birkhead of Trinity-College in Oxford was seduced by a Jesuit, and brought up to London to be conveyed beyond the seas. His friends complained to me: I had the happiness to find him out, and the blessing from God to settle his conscience. So he returned to Oxford, and there continued.†

" 2, 3. Two daughters of sir Rich. Lechford in Surrey were sent to sea, to be carried to a nunnery. I heard of it, and caused them to be brought back, before they were got out of the Thames. I settled their consciences, and both of them sent me great thanks since I was a Prisoner in the Tower.

" 4, 5. Two Scholars of St. John's-College in Cambridge, Topping and Ashton, had whipped away from the College, and here at London had got the French Ambassador's pass (I have the pass to shew): I found means to get them to me, and I thank God settled both their minds, sent them back to their College. Afterward's hearing of Topping's wants, I allowed him means till I procured him a Fellowship: and he is at this time a very hopeful young man, as most of his time in that University, a minister, and Chaplain in house at this present to the right honourable the earl of Westmorland.

6, 7, 8. Sir William Webb, my kinsman, and two of his daughters: and the better to secure them, in Religion, I was at the charge (their father being utterly decayed) to marry them to two Religious Protestants; and they both

Yet after all, Prynne, in publishing this Speech, hath the impudence to affirm in the margin of his Book, That this Convert of the Archbishop's was the Author of all the libellous Popish Oxford Aulicus's; although he knew full well, that his name was John Birkenhead: and adds, that at the naming of this Convert, most of the Lords and Auditors smiled; but saith not one word of the Archbishop's correction of their mistake." continued very constant. 9. And his eldest son I took from him, placed him with a careful divine, maintained him divers years, and then settled him with a gentleman of good worth.

" 10, 11. The next, in my remembrance, was the lord Maio of Ireland, who with another gentleman (whose name I cannot recal) was brought to me to Fulham, by Mr. Jefford, a servant of his majesty's, and well known to divers of your lordships.

" 12. The right hon. the lord Duke of Buckingham was almost lost from the Church of England, between the continual cunning labours of Fisher the Jesuit, and the persuasions of the lady his mother. After some Miscarriages, king James, of ever-blessed memory, commanded me to that service. I had God's blessing upon me so far as to settle my lord Duke to his death. 13. And I brought the lady his mother to the Church again; but she was not so happy as to continue with us.

" 14. The lady marchioness Hamilton was much solicited by some priest, and much troubled in mind about it. My Lord spake with me of it; and though at that present I was overlaid with business, that I could not (as I much desired) wait upon that honourable person myself, yet I told my lord I would send one to his lordship, that should diligently attend that service, and that I would give him the best direction I could. And this I did, and God be thanked she died very quietly and very religiously, and a good Protestant: and my lord marquis told me, he had acknowledged this service of mine to an honourable lord, whom I now see present.

" 15. Mr. Chillingworth's learning and abilities are sufficiently known to all your lordships. He was gone and settled at Doway. My letters brought him back; and he lived and died a Defender of the Church of England. And that this is so, your Lordships cannot but know; For Mr. Prynne took away my Letters and all the Papers which concerned him, and they were examined at the Committee.

" 16, 17. Mr. Digby was a Priest; and Mr. James Gentleman, a school-master in a Recusant's house. This latter was brought to me by a minister, as far as I remember, in Buckinghamshire. I converted both of them, and they remained settled.

" 18. Dr. Hart a Civilian, son to a neighbour of mine at Fulham. He was so far gone, that he had written part of his Motives which wrought, as he said, that change in him. I got sight of them, shewed him wherein he was deceived, had God's blessing to settle his conscience, and then caused an able divine to answer his Motives, and gave him the Copy.

" 19. There were, beside these, Mr. Christopher Seburne, a gentleman of an antient family in Herefordshire; and 20. Sir William Spencer, of Yarrton in Oxfordshire. 21. The sons and heirs of Mr. Wintchome and Mr. Willisot, whom I sent with their friend's good-willing to Wadham College in Oxford; and I received a Certificate, anno 1638, of their continuing in conformity to the Church of England; nor did ever any of these relapse again to Rome, but only the old countess of Buckingham and sir William Spencer, that ever I heard of. And if any of your Lordships doubt of the truth of any of these particulars, I am able and ready to bring full Proof of them all. And by this time I hope it appears, that one of the swaying prelates of the time is able to say, he hath converted one Papist to the Protestant Religion. And let any clergyman of England come forth, and give a better account of his zeal to this present Church.

“And now, my lords, with my most humble thanks for your Lordships favour and patience in bearing me, I shall cease to be farther troublesome for the present; not doubting but I shall be able to answer whatever shall be particularly objected against me*.”

After I had ended this Speech, I was commanded to withdraw. As I went from the bar, there was alderman Hoyle of York, and some other which I knew not, very angry, and saying, It was a very strange conversion that I was like to make of them; with other terms of scorn. I went patiently into the little Committee-Chamber, at the entering into the House. Thither Mr. Peters followed me in great haste, and began to give me ill language, and told me that he and other ministers were able to name Thousands that they had converted. I knew him not, as having never seen him, to my remembrance, in my life, though I had heard enough of him. And as I was going to answer him, one of my Counsel, Mr. Hearn, seeing how violently he began, stept between us, and told him of his uncivil carriage towards me in my affliction; and indeed he came as if he would have struck me. By this time, some occasion brought the earl of Essex into that room, and Mr. Hearn complained to him of Mr. Peters's usage of me; who very honourably checked him for it, and sent him forth. Not long after, Mr. Hearn was set upon by alderman Hoyle, and used as coarsely as Peters had used me, and, as far as I remember, only for being of Counsel with such a one as I; though he was assigned to that office by the Lords.

What put them into this choler, I know not; unless they were angry to hear me say so much in my own defence; especially for the Conversion of so many, which I think they little expected. For the next day a great lord met a friend of mine, and grew very angry with him about me; not forbearing to ask what I meant, to name the particulars which I had mentioned in the end of my Speech, saying many godly ministers had done more. And not long after this, the day I now remember not, Mr. Peters came and preached at Lambeth, and there told them in the pulpit that a great Prelate, their neighbour (or in words to that effect), had bragged in the Parliament-House, that he had converted 32; but that he had wisdom enough not to tell how many thousands he had perverted; with much more abuse. God of his mercy relieve me from reproaches, and lay not these mens causeless malice to their charge!

After a little stay, I received my dismissal for that time, and a command to appear again the next day at nine in the morning: which was my usual hour to attend, though I was seldom called into the house in two hours after.

The Second Day of my Hearing.

I came as commanded, March 13. 1643. But here before the Charge begins, I shall set down the Articles upon which, according to the Order of March 9, they which were intrusted with the Evidence meant this day to proceed. They were the first and second Original Articles, and the second Additional Article; which follow in these words:

I. “That he hath traitorously endeavoured to subvert the Fundamental Laws and Government of the kingdom; and instead thereof to introduce an Arbitrary and Tyrannical Government against law; And to that end hath wickedly and traitorously advised his majesty, that he might, at his own will and pleasure, levy and take Money of his subjects without their consent in parliament. And this, he affirmed, was warrantable by the law of God.

II. “He hath, for the better accomplishment of that his traitorous Design, advised and procured divers Sermons and other Discourses to be preached, printed and published, in which the Authority of Parliaments, and the Force of the Laws of the kingdom are denied: and an absolute and unlimited power over the persons and estates of his majesty's subjects is maintained and defended, not only in the king, but also in himself and other Bishops, above and against the law. And he hath been a great Protector, Favourer and Promoter of the Publishers of such false and pernicious Opinions.

Second Additional Article.

II. “That within the space of 10 years last past, the said Archbishop hath treacherously endeavoured to subvert the Fundamental Laws of this realm: and to that end hath in like manner endeavoured to advance the power of the Council-Table, the Canons of the Church, and the king's Prerogative, above the laws and statutes of the realm. And for manifestation thereof, about 6 years last past, being then a Privy-Counsellor to his majesty, and sitting at the Council-Table, he said, ‘That as long as he sat there, they should know that an Order of that Board should be of equal force with a law or act of parliament.’ And at another time used these words, ‘That he hoped ere long, that the Canons of the Church and the king's prerogative should be of as great power

'as an act of parliament.' And at another time said, 'That those which would not yield to the king's power, he would crush them to pieces.'

These three Articles they begun with; and the first man appointed to begin was Mr. Maynard: And after some general things against me, as if I were the most violent man for all illegal ways;

I. The first Particular charged against me, was out of my Diary; the words these: 'The king declared his Resolution for a Parliament in case of the Scottish Rebellion. The first movers of it were my lord deputy of Ireland, the lord marquis Hamilton, and myself; and a Resolution voted at the Board; to assist the king in extraordinary ways, if parliament should prove peevish, and refuse, &c.' The time was December 5, 1639. That which was enforced from these Words was, First, that I bestowed the epithet 'Peevish' upon the parliament; and the second, that this voting to assist the king in extraordinary ways, in case the parliament refused, proceeded from my counsel.

1. To this I replied: And first I humbly desired once for all, that all things concerning law may be saved intire unto me, and my Counsel to be heard in every such particular.

2. That the epithet Peevish was a very peevish word, 'if written by me. I say, if: For I know into whose hands my Book is fallen; but what hath been done with it, I know not. This is to be seen, some passages in that Book are half burnt out, whether purposely or by chance, God knows; and some other Papers taken by the same hand from me, are now wanting. Is it not possible, therefore, some art may be used in this?' Besides, if I did use the word Peevish, it was in my private Pocket-Book, which I well hoped should never be made public; and then no disgrace thereby affixed to the Parliament. And I hope, should a man forget himself in such an expression of some passage in some one Parliament (and this was no more), it is far short of any thing that can be called Treason. And yet farther, most manifest it is in the very words themselves, that I do not bestow the Title upon that Parliament, in that case; but say only, 'If it should prove peevish; which is possible, doubtless, that in some particulars a parliament may; though for the happiness of this kingdom, I would to God it were impossible. But suppose the word peevish had been absolutely spoken by me, is it lawful upon record to say the parliament An. 42 Hen. 3 was insanum parlamentum, a mad parliament; and that in the 6 Hen. 4, Indoctum, an unlearned parliament; and that in the 4 Hen. 6, a Parliament of Clubs! And shall it be High-Treason in me, to say a parliament in some one particular was peevish? or but to suppose if it were? Can any man think,

'that an unlearned, or a mad parliament, or one of clubs, did not do something peevishly? Might my predecessor, Thomas Arundel*, tell the commons openly in parliament that their Petitions were sacrilegious? And may not I so much as suppose some one action of a parliament to be peevish, but it shall be Treason? May an ordinary Historian say of that unlearned parliament, That the commons were fit to enter common with their cattle, for any virtue they had more than brute-beasts? And may not I in my private notes write the word Peevish of them without Treason?'

3. Whereas it is said, That the "voting at the Council-Table to assist the king in extraordinary ways, if, &c. was by my counsel;" there is no such thing in my Diary. There is, that I, with others, advised a Parliament; but there is not one word, that the Voting mentioned at the Council-Table proceeded from any advice of mine. 'So there is no Proof from my Diary, and other Proof beside that was not so much as urged; which was not in favour, but because they had it not: For had they had any other Proof, I see already it should not have been lost for want of urging.' Where I desired their Lordships also to observe in what a difficulty I have lived with some men, who will needs make me a great enemy to Parliaments, and yet are angry with me, that I was one, with others, who moved for that Parliament. So it seems nothing that I do can content some men: for a Parliament, or against it; nothing must be well, if the counsel be mine.

4. For "the voting of assistance in extraordinary ways," I was included in the general Vote of the table; and therefore that cannot be called or accounted my counsel.

5. It is expressed in my Diary, whence all this Proof is taken, that it was in and for the Scottish business; and so is within the Act of Oblivion. 'And these Answers I gave to Mr. Browne, when in the summing up of the Charge against me in the honourable House of Commons, he made this to be my Counsel to the king; and he began with it in his charging of the points against law.'

II. The second Particular this day charged against me was, That after the ending of the late Parliament I did use these words to the king, "That now he might use his own power," or words to that effect. This was attested by sir Henry Vane the elder, then a Counsellor, and present.

1. To this my Answer was, That I spake not these Words, either in terms or in sense, to the uttermost of my knowledge.

2. If I had spoken these Words, either they were ill advised words, but no treason, and then they come not home to the charge; or they are treasonable, and then I ought by law [1 Eliz. c. 6, § antepenult] to have been tried within six months. 'Mr. Browne in his Reply to me in the House of Commons, said, That this Statute expired with the Queen, because it concerned none but her, and the heirs of her body. I had here urged sir Edward Coke, [Part 4. Inst. c. 74], as urging this Statute, and commending the moderation of it. But I was therein mistaken, for he speaks of 1 Eliz. cap. 1. And that statute [1 Eliz. cap. 1, & 1 Ed. 6, c. 12.] is in force, and is for trial within six months, for such crimes as are within that statute. So it comes all to one for my Cause, so either of the statutes be in force. And to this Charge in general, I gave the same Answers which are here.*

* Sir Ed. Coke, Inst. p. 8, c. 1.

* Speed in H. 4, §. 4.

3. Sir Henry Vane is in this a single Witness; whereas by law [1 Ed. 6, c. 12, § ult. & 1 El. c. 6, § ult.] he that is accused of Treason must be convicted by two Witnesses, or his own Confession without violence; neither of which is in this Case. And strange it is to me, that at such a full Table no person of honour should remember such a Speech but sir Henry Vane.

4. Both this and the former Charge relate to the Scotch Business, and so are within the Act of Oblivion, which I have pleaded. Besides, here is nothing expressed in the Words charged which savours of practice, conspiracy, combination, or force, and cannot therefore possibly be adjudged Treason; especially since there is no expression made in the Words witnessed, what Power is meant: for what should hinder the king to use his own power? But legal still; since nothing is so properly a king's own power, as that which is made or declared his own by law. As for the inference, That this was called his own in opposition to Law: First, sir Henry Vane is a Witness to the Words only, and not to any inference; so the Words have but one witness, and the inference none. And perhaps it were as well for themselves, as for persons questioned in great Courts, if they who are employed about the Evidence would be more sparing of their Inferences, many men taying hold of them without Reason or Proof.—Lastly, For the honour of sir Henry Vane, let me not forget this: He is a man of some years; and memory is one of the first powers of man on which age works; and yet his memory so good, so fresh, that he alone can remember Words spoken at a full Council-Table, which no Person of Honour remembers but himself: Had any man else remembered such Words, he could not have stood single in this Testimony. But I would not have him brag of it: for I have read in St. Augustine, that *quidam pessimi, sive, even the worst of men, have great memories, and are tanto peiores, so much the worse for having them. God bless sir Henry!

I have staid the longer upon these two, because they were apprehended to be of more weight than must which follow.

III. The next was a Head containing my

illegal Pressures for Money, under which the next Particular was, That in the Case of Ship-Money I was very angry against one Samuel Sherman, of Dedham in Essex: That I should say Dedham was a Maritime Town; and that when the sum demanded of him was named, I should say a proper sum; whereas the Districts came to eleven Subsidies.

To this I answered, 1. Here was no Proof but Sherman; and in his own cause. 2. He himself says no more, than that he believes I was the Instrument of his Oppression (as he called it); whereas his Censure was laid upon him by the Council-Table, not by me: nor was I in any other fault than that I was present, and gave my Vote with the rest. So here is no Proof at all but his belief. Lastly, Here can be no Treason, but against Dedham or Sherman, that I can discover.

IV. The next to Sherman comes in my great friend, alderman Atkins; and he testifies, That when he was brought to the Council-Table, about the Ship-Money, none was so violent against him as I was; and that this Pressure for Ship-Money was before the Judges had given Sentence for the king. And that at another time I pressed him hard to lend Money, the king being present: at which time he conceived that I favoured alderman Harrison for country-sake; because himself was committed, and not the other.

To this, I must confess, I did use to be serious and zealous too in his majesty's service; but not with any the least intention to violate law. And if this, here instanced, were before the Judgment given for the king; yet it was long after the Judges had put the legality of it under their hands. And I for my part could not conceive the Judges would put that under their hands to be law, which should after be found unlawful. Therefore is this, as I erred with honourable company at the Council-Table, so both they and I had, as we thought, sufficient guides to lead us.

As for the Partiality which he puts upon me in preserving my country-man, alderman Harrison, from prison: 1. He himself durst not affirm it upon his Oath, but says only, that he conceives I favoured him; but his conceit is no Proof. 2. If I had favoured him, and sent him that office, it is far short of Treason. But the truth is, alderman Harrison gave a modest and a civil Answer; but this man was rough, even to unmanliness: and, so far as I remember, was committed for that.—And whereas he says, I pressed him hard to lend Money, and that none was so violent as I; he is much mistaken: for of all men in that fraternity, I durst never press him hard for any thing, least of all for Money. For I knew not what stuffing might fly out of so full a cushion, as afterwards it is said did, when being a Colonel he was pressed, but not hard, in a little skirmishing in Finsbury-Fields.

V. Then it was urged, That I aggravated a Crime against alderman Chambers, and told him, That if the king had many such Chambers, he would have never a Chamber to rest in: That in the Case of Tunnage and Poundage, he laboured to take bread from the king; and that I pressed upon him in the business of Coat and Conduct-Money.

To this I gave this Answer, That by the affection Mr. Chambers then shewed the king, I had some reason to think, he desired so many Chambers to his use; that if the king had many such subjects, he might want a Chamber for himself; or to that effect. And the violence of his carriage in that honourable assembly gave just occasion to other men to think so. But as for the business of Tunnage and Poundage, and of Coat and Conduct-Money, I conceived both were lawful on the king's part. And I was led into this opinion by the express Judgment of some lords present, and the silence of others in that behalf; none of the great Lawyers at the Table contradicting either. And no witness to this, but alderman Chambers himself.

VI. The sixth particular was, That I urged the Business of Ship-Money upon alderman Adams.

To this my Answer was, That I never pressed the Ship-Money, but as other Lords did at the Council-Table, nor upon other grounds: nor doth alderman Adams say any more, than that he was pressed to this Payment by me and others. And to me it seems strange, and will, I hope, to all men else, that this, and the like, should be a common act of the Lords at the Council-Table, but should be High-Treason in nobody but in me. And howsoever, if it be Treason, it is against three aldermen, Atkuis, Chambers, and Adams.

VII. The seventh particular was, That I was so violent about the slighting of the King's Proclamations, as that I said, A Proclamation was of as great force, or equal to a Statute-Law; and that I compared the king to the Stone spoken of in the Gospel; that "who-soever falls upon it, shall be broken; but upon whomsoever it falls, it will grind him to powder." St. Matth. xxi. 34. And for this they brought three Witnesses, Mr. Griffin, Tho. Wood, and Rich. Hayles.

1. This was in the Case of the Soap-business, and two of the Witnesses were Soap-boilers. They and their Company slighted all the Proclamations which the king set out; and all the Lords in the Star-Chamber were much offended, (as I conceived they had great reason to be) at the great and open daring of that whole Company. And whatsoever Sentence passed upon them in that whole business, was given by the Court of Star-Chamber, not by me.—For the Words: 1. These men have good memories, that can punctually, being plain ordinary men, swear words spoken full 12 years since; and yet, as good as their memory is, they swear doubtfully touching the time, as that the Words were spoken in May 1632, or 33.

2. My Lords, it is impossible these Words should be spoken by me. For I think no man in this honourable presence thinks me so ignorant, as that I should not know the vast difference that is between an Act of Parliament and a Proclamation. Neither can these gentlemen, which press the Evidence, think me so wilfully foolish so to speak, considering they accuse me here for a cunning delinquent. 'So 'God forgive these men the falshood and the 'malice of this Oath!

3. For the Words spoken of, the Stone in Scripture, it is so long since, I cannot recall whether I said it or no: Nor have I any great reason to observe these angry Witnesses in their own cause. But if by way of allusion I did apply that place to the King and them, it is far enough from Treason. 'And let them, 'and their like take heed lest it prove true 'upon themselves: for seldom do Subjects fall 'upon their King, but in the end they are 'broken; and if it so happen that he falls 'upon them, they are ground to powder.' And Solomon taught me this Answer, where he says, "The anger of a King is death." Prov. xvi. 14. And yet I would not be mistaken: For I do not conceive this is spoken of a King and his natural anger (though it be good wisdom to stir a little passion in Kings as may be), but of his legal anger: According to which, if the Stone roll strictly, few men can so live, but for something or other they may be in danger of grinding.

4. And for these Soap-boilers, they have little cause to be so vehement against me. For if the Sentence passed against them in the Star-Chamber were in any thing illegal, though it were done by that Court, and not by me; yet I alone, so soon as I heard but muttering of it, was the only means of resetting them and their Trade, which none of all the Lords else took care of. 'And the Sum of these Answers 'I gave to Mr. Browne, when he gave up the 'Sum of his Charge against me.'

VIII. The next particular was about Depositions. A Commission of Grace, to compound with some Delinquents in that kind, was issued under the broad-seal, to some Lords, and other persons of honour of the Council, of which I was one. One Mr. Talboys was called thither: and the Charge about this was, That when he pleaded, that by Statute 39 Eliz. he might convert some to pasture; I should say, "Do you plead law here? Either abide the order, or take your Trial at the Star-Chamber:" and that he was fined 50*l*.—In this particular Mr. Talboys is single, and in his own cause: but I was single at no sitting of that Commission: nor did I ever sit, unless the Lord Privy-Seal and Mr. secretary Coke were present, that we might have direction from their knowledge and experience. And for the Words (if spoken), they were not to derogate from the law; but to shew, that we sat not there as any Judges of the law, but to offer his majesty's grace to such as would accept it.

As for the Fine mentioned, we imposed none

upon him or any other, but by the consent of the parties themselves. If any man thought he was not faulty, and would not accept of the favour shewed him, we left him to the Law: but the plain truth is, this gentleman being tenant to the Dean and Chapter of Christ-Church in Oxford, offered them (as they conceived) great wrong in the land he held of them; insomuch as they feared other their tenants might follow his example, and therefore complained of him. And because I laid open his usage of his landlords before the commissioners, he comes here to vent his spleen against me. 'And it is observable, that in all the business of Depopulations, in which so many appeared, no one complained either against me or any other lord, but only this Talboys. Mr. Browne, when he pressed the sum of this charge against me, added, 'That at the Council-Table I was for all illegal projects, as well as for those Inclosures. But, 1. I was neither for this nor any other, either longer or otherwise than I understood them to be lawful. And, 2. I opposed there the business of Salt and the Base Money; and I alone took off that of the Malt and the Brewing: and three gentlemen of Hertfordshire (which county was principally concerned in the Case of the Malt) came over to Lambeth to give me thanks for it.'

IX. Then was charged upon me the Printing of Books which asserted the King's Prerogative above Law, &c. The instance was in Dr. Cowel's Book, word 'King.' That this Book was decreed by Proclamation: That complaint was made to me, that this Book was printing in a close house without license, and by Hodgkinson, who was my printer; that I referred them to sir John Lamb; that they came to me again, and a third time, and I still continued my reference; which sir John Lamb slighting, the Book came forth. The Witnesses to this, were Hunt and Wallye, if I mistook not their names.

1. For this Book of Dr. Cowel's, I never knew of it till it was printed; or so far gone on in printing, that I could not stay it. And the Witnesses say 'it was in a close house, and without license,' so that neither I nor my chaplains could take notice of it.

They say, they informed me of it, but name no time, but only the year 1638. But they confess I was then at Croydon: So being out of town (as were almost all the High Commissioners), I required sir John Lamb, who, being a High Commissioner, had in that business as much power as myself, to look to it carefully, that the Book proceeded not; or if it were already printed, that it came not forth. If sir John slighted his own duty and my command (as themselves say), he is living, and may answer for himself; and I hope your lordships will not put his neglect upon my account.

3. As for Hodgkinson, he was never my Printer; but Badger was the man whom I employed, as is well known to all the Stationers.

Nor was Hodgkinson ever employed by me in that kind or any other: upon just Complaint I turned him out of a place, but never put him into any. And therefore those terms which were put upon me, of 'my Hodgkinson,' and 'my sir John Lamb,' might have been spared. Sir John was indeed Dean of the Arches, and I employed him, as other Archbishops did the Deans which were in their times: otherwise no way mine. And Hodgkinson had his whole dependence on sir Henry Martin, and was a mere stranger to me. 'And this Answer I gave to Mr. Browne when he summed up the Charge. Nor could any danger be in the printing of that Book to mislead any man; because it was generally made known by Proclamation, that it was a Book condemned, and in such particulars; but for other things the book very useful.'

X. The next Charge was, That when Dr. Gill, School-Master of Paul's school in London, was warned out by the Mercers (to the care of which Company that School some way belongs); upon Dr. Gill's Petition to the king, there was a reference to some other lords and myself to hear the business. The Charge is, That at this Hearing I should say, the Mercers might not put out Dr. Gill without his Ordinary's knowledge: and that upon mention made of an act of parliament, I should reply, "I see nothing will go down with you but Acts of Parliament; no regard at all of the Canons of the Church:" and that I should farther add, "That I would rescind all Acts which were against the Canons; and that I hoped shortly to see the Canons and the King's Prerogative of equal force with an Act of Parliament."

To this I answered, That if all this Charge were true, yet this is but the single testimony of Samuel Bland, an officer belonging to the Company of Mercers, and no small stickler against Dr. Gill, whose aged reverend father had done that Company great service in that School for many years together.—The Reference, he grants, was to me and others; for I neither thrust myself into the business, nor was alone in it.—And as there is a Canon of this Church (Can. 77.), That no man may be allowed to teach School, but by the bishop of the Diocess; so à paritate rationis, it stands good they may not turn him out, without the said Bishop's knowledge and approbation. And it is expressed in another Canon (Can. 79.), "That if any School-Master offend in any of the premises (there spoken of), he shall be admonished by his Ordinary; and if he do not amend upon that his Admonition, he shall then be suspended from teaching:" which, I think, makes the case plain, that the Mercers might not turn out Dr. Gill, without so much as the knowledge of his bishop.

And for the Words, "That I saw nothing would down with them but an Act of Parliament, and that no regard was had to the Canons;" I humbly conceive there was no offence in the Words. For though the superiority by far in this kingdom belongs to the Acts of Parliament: yet some regard, doubtless, is or ought to be had to the Canons of the Church. 'And 'if nothing will down with men but Acts of Parliament, the Government cannot be held 'up in many particulars.'

For the other Words, God forgive this Witness; for I am well assured I neither did nor could speak them. For is it so much as probable, that I should say, "I would rescind all acts that are against the Canons?" What power have I, or any particular man, to rescind Acts of Parliament? Nor do I think any man that knows me will believe I could be such a fool as to say, That "I hoped shortly to see the Canons and the King's Prerogative equal to Acts of Parliament;" since I have lived to see (and that often) many Canons rejected, as contrary to the Custom of the place: as in Choice of Parish-Clerks, and about the Reparation of some Churches, and the King's Prerogative discussed and weighed by law: Neither of which hath or can be done by any judges, to an act of parliament. 'That there is malice in 'this man against me, appears plainly; but 'upon what it is grounded, I cannot tell; unless it be that in this Business of Dr. Gill, and 'in some other about placing Lecturers (which 'in some cases this Company of the Mercers 'took on them to do), I opposing it so far as 'Law and Canon would give me leave, crossed 'some way either his opinion in religion, or his 'purse-profit. I was (I confess) so much moved at the unworthiness of this man's testimony, that I thought to bind this sin upon his 'soul, not to be forgiven him till he did publicly ask me forgiveness for this notorious 'public wrong done me. But by God's goodness I mastered myself: and I heartily desire 'God to give him a sense of this sin against 'me his poor servant, and forgive him.' And if these Words could possibly escape me, and be within the danger of that Statute; then to that statute which requires my trial within six months, I refer myself.

XI. The eleventh Charge of this day, was the Imprisonment of Mr. George Waker, about a Sermon of his preached to prove (as he said), That it is Sin to obey the greatest Monarchs in things which are against the Command of God; that I had Notes of his Sermons for 4 or 5 years together, of purpose to entrap him; that I told his majesty he was factious; that sir Dudley Carlton writ to keep him close: that in this affliction I protested to do him kindness, and yet did contrary.

My Answer was, That for the scope of his Sermon, 'to obey God rather than man,' no man doubts but it ought to be so, when the commands are opposite. But his Sermon was viewed, and many factious Passages, and of high nature, found in it. And yet I did not tell the king he was factious, but that he was so complained of to me; and this was openly at the Council-Table.

And whereas he spake of Notes of his Sermons for divers years, with a purpose to entrap him; all that he says is, That he was told so, but produces not by whom. And truly I never had any such notes, nor ever used any such art against any man in my life. For his commitment, it was done by the Council-Table; and after, upon some miscarriages of his there by the court of Star-Chamber, not by me; nor can that be imputed to me, which is done there by the major part, and I having no negative. And if sir Dudley Carlton writ to keep him close at his brother's house, contrary to the Lords order, let him answer it; And if he supposes that was done by me, why is not sir Dudley examined to try that truth? As for the Protestation, which, he says, I made to his wife and his brother, that I complained not against him: it was no denial of my complaint made against him at the first, that I heard he was factious; but that after the time, in which I had seen the full testimony of grave ministers in London that he was not factious, I made no complaint after that, but did my best to free him. And the Treason in these two Charges is against the company of the Mercers and Mr. Waker.

XII. The next Charge was, That Dr. Manwaring having been censured by the Lords in Parliament for a Sermon of his against the Liberty and propriety of the Subject, was yet after this preferred by me in contempt of the Parliament-Censure, both to the deanery of Worcester, and the bishoprick of St. David's: And my own Diary witnesses that I was complained of in Parliament for it; and that yet after this I did consecrate him bishop*.

1. To this I answered, that he was not preferred by me to either of these; and therefore that could not be done in contempt of the Parliament-Censure, which was not done at all. For as for St. David's it is confessed, secretary Windebank signified the king's pleasure, not I. And whereas it was added, that this was by my means; this is only said, but not proved. And for Worcester, there is no Proof but the Docket-Book; Now, my Lords, it is well known in court, that the Docket doth but signify the king's pleasure for such a Bill to be drawn; it never mentions who procured the Preferment. So that the Docket can be no proof at all against me; and other there is none.

2. For the Sermon, 'tis true, I was complained of in Parliament, that I had been the cause of licensing it to the Press; and 'tis as true, that upon that complaint I was narrowly sifted, and an honourable lord now present and the lord bishop of Lincoln were sent to bishop Montague, who licensed the Sermon, to examine and see whether any warrant had come from me, or any message; but when nothing appeared, I was acquitted in open parliament, to somebody's no small grief. 'God forgive 'them, and their malice against me; for, to

' my knowledge my ruin was then thirsted for. ' And as I answered Mr. Browne's summary charge, when he pressed this against me, ' could this have been proved, I had been undone long since; the work had not been now ' to be done.'

That he was after consecrated by me, is true likewise; and I hope, 'tis not expected I should ruin myself, and fall into a Præmunire, by refusing the king's royal assent; [25 Hen. 3, c. 20, §. ult.] and this for fear lest it might be thought I procured his preferment. But the truth is, his majesty commanded me to put him in mind of him when preferments fell; and I did so; But withal, I told his majesty of his censure, and that I feared ill construction would be made of it.

To this it was replied, That I might have refused to consecrate, the cause why being sufficient, and justifiable in parliament, and excepted in that law. ' But how sufficient soever ' that cause may be in parliament, if I had been ' in a Præmunire there-while, and lost my liberty, and all that I had beside, for disobeying the royal assent; I believe I should have ' had but cold comfort when the next Parliament ' had been summoned; no exception against the ' man being known to me, either for life or ' learning, but only this Censure: nor is there ' any exception which the Archbishop is by ' that law allowed to make, if my book be truly ' printed.'

XIII. Then followed the Charge of Dr. Heylin's Book against Mr. Burton; out of which it was urged, That an unlimited power was pressed very far; and out of p. 40, "That a way was found to make the subject free, and the king a subject." [Heylin cont. Burton. p. 40.] that this man was preferred by me; that Dr. Heylin confessed to a committee, that I commanded him to answer Mr. Burton's Book; and that my chaplain Dr. Braye licensed it.

I answered as follows: I did not prefer Dr. Heylin to the king's service: it was the earl of Danby, who had taken honourable care of him before in the University. His preferments I did not procure: For it appears by what hath been urged against me, that the lord viscount Dorchester procured him his parsonage, and Mr. Secretary Coke his prebend in Westminster.

For his Answer to the Committee, that I commanded him to write against Burton, it was an ingenious and a true Answer, and became him and his calling well; for I did so. ' And neither I in commanding, nor he in ' obeying, did other than what we had good ' precedent for in the Primitive Church of ' Christ. For when some Monks had troubled ' the church of Carthage, but not with half ' that danger which Mr. Burton's Book threatened to this; Aurelius, then bishop, commanded St. Augustine to write against it; and ' he did so. His words are, "Aurelius scribere ' iussit, et fecit." [Aug. 2. Retract. c. 21.] But tho' I did, as by my place I might, command him to write an Answer; yet I did neither command nor advise him to insert any thing unsound or unfit. If any such thing be found in it, he must answer for himself, and the Licensor for himself. For as for licensing of Books, I held the same course which all my predecessors had done: and when any chaplain came new into my house, I gave him a strict charge in that particular. And in all my predecessors times, the chaplains suffered for faults committed, and not their lords; though now all is heaped on me. ' As for the particular Words ' urged out of Dr. Heylin's Book, p. 40, there ' is neither expression by them, nor intention ' in them, against either the law, or any lawful ' proceedings; but they are directed to Mr. ' Burton and his doctrine only. The words are, "You have found out a way" (not the law, ' but you Mr. Burton) "to make the subject ' free, and the king a subject." Whereas it ' would well have besemed Mr. Burton, to ' have carried his pen even at the least, and left ' the king his freedom, as well as the subject his.'

XIV. From this they proceeded to another Charge; which was, That I preferred Chaplains to be about the king and the prince, which were disaffected to the public welfare of the kingdom. The instance was in Dr. Dove; and a passage read out of his Book against Mr. Burton: And it was added, that the declaring of such disaffection was the best Inducement or bribe to procure them preferment.

To this I then said, and it is true, I did never knowingly prefer any Chaplain to the king or prince, that was ill-affected to the public. And for Dr. Dove, if he uttered by tongue or by pen any such wild speech concerning any members of the honourable house of commons, as is urged, thereby to shew his disaffection to the public; he is living, and I humbly desire he may answer it. But whereas it was said, That this was the best Inducement or Bribe to get Preferment; this might have been spared, had it so pleased the gentleman which spake it; but I know my condition, and where I am, and will not lose my patience for language.

And whereas 'tis urged, That after this he was named by me to be a Chaplain to the prince his highness; the thing was thus: His majesty had suit made to him, that the prince might have sermons in his own chapel for his family. Hereupon his majesty approving the motion, commanded me to think upon the names of some fit men for that service. I did so: but before any thing was done, I acquainted the right hon. the Lord Chamberlain that then was, with it; my lord knew most of the men, and approved the note, and delivered it to his secretary Mr. Oldsworth to swear them. This was the fact; and at this time, when I put Dr. Dove's name into the List, I did not know of any such passage in his book, nor indeed ever heard of it till now. For I had not read his book, but here and there by snatches.

XV. I am now come (and tis time) to the last particular of this day. And this Charge was, the giving of Subsidies to the king in the Convocation without consent in parliament: That the penalties for not paying were strict, and without appeal, as appears in the act; where it is farther said, that "we do this according to the duty which by Scripture we are bound unto;" which reflects upon the liberties of parliaments in that behalf. But it was added, they would not meddle now with the late Canons for any thing else, till they came to their due place.

1. My Answer to this was, That this was not any single act, but the act of the whole convocation, and could not be applicable to me only.—2. That this Grant was no other, nor in any other way, mutatis mutandis, than was granted to queen Elizabeth in archbishop Whitgift's time. This Grant was also put in execution, as appeared by the originals which we followed. These originals (among many other records) were commanded away by the hon. House of Commons, and where they now are I know not; but for want of them, my Defence cannot be so full.—3. For the Circumstances, as "that the penalties are without appeal," and the like, it is usual in all such grants. "And that we did it according to our duty and the rules of Scripture," we conceived was a fitting expression for ourselves, and men of our calling, without giving law to others, or any intention to violate the law in the least. For thus, I humbly conceive, lies the mutual relation between the king and his people, by rules of conscience: The subjects are to supply a full and honourable maintenance to the king; and the king (when necessities call upon him) is to ask of his people, in such a way as is per pacta, by law and covenant, agreed upon between them, which in this kingdom is by parliament: yet the clergy ever granting their own at all times. And that this was my judgment long before this, appears by a Sermon of mine appointed to be preached at the opening of the Parliament, in the year 1625. My words are these: "If you would have indeed a flourishing both state and church, the king must trust and endear his people, and the people must honour, obey, and support their king, &c." [My Sermon on Psal. lxxv. 2, 3. p. 14.] This, I hope, is far enough from derogating from any law: and if I should privately have spoken any thing to him contrary to this, which I had both preached and printed, how could his majesty have trusted me in any thing?

This brought this tedious day to an end. And I had an Order the same day to appear again on Saturday, March 16, 1643, with a Note also from the Committee which were to charge me, that they meant then to proceed upon part of the second Additional Article, and upon the third Original, and the third and fifth Additional Articles. The second Additional Article is written down before: And here follow the rest now mentioned to be next proceeded upon.

The Third Original is,

III. "He hath by Letters, Messages, Threats,

Promises, and divers other ways, to Judges and other ministers of justice, interrupted and perverted; and at other times, by the means aforesaid, hath endeavoured to interrupt and pervert the course of justice in his majesty's courts at Westminster, and other courts, to the subversion of the laws of this kingdom: whereby sundry of his majesty's subjects have been stopped in their just suits, and deprived of their lawful rights, and subjected to his tyrannical will, to their utter ruin and destruction.

The Third and Fifth Additional follow:

III. "That the said Archbishop, to advance the Canons of the Church and power ecclesiastical above the law of the land, and to pervert and hinder the course of justice, hath at divers times within the said time, by his letters and other undue means, and solicitations used to Judges, opposed and stopped the granting of his majesty's Writs of Prohibition, where the same ought to have been granted for stay of proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court; whereby justice hath been delayed and hindered, and the Judges diverted from doing their duties.

V. "That the said Archbishop, about eight years last past, being then also a Privy-Counsellor to his majesty, for the end and purpose aforesaid, caused sir John Corbet, of Stoke, in the county of Salop, bart. then a justice of peace of the said county, to be committed to the prison of the Fleet, where he continued prisoner for the space of half a year or more; for no other cause but for calling for the Petition of Right, and causing it to be read at the sessions of the peace for that county, upon a just and necessary occasion. And during the time of his said imprisonment, the said Archbishop, without any colour of right, by a Writing under the seal of his Archbishoprick, granted away parcel of the Glebe-Land of the church of Adderly in the said county, whereof the said sir John Corbet was then patron, unto Robert viscount Kilmurrey, without the consent of the said sir John, or the then incumbent of the said church: which said viscount Kilmurrey built a chapel upon the said parcel of Glebe-Land, to the great prejudice of the said sir John Corbet, which hath caused great suits and dissensions between them. And whereas the said sir John Corbet had a Judgment against sir James Stonehouse, knight, in an Action of Waste, in his majesty's court of Common Pleas at Westminster, which was afterwards affirmed in a Writ of Error in the King's-Bench, and execution thereupon awarded; yet the said sir John, by means of the said Archbishop, could not have the effect thereof, but was committed to prison by the said Archbishop and others of the council-table, until he had submitted himself unto the order of the said table; whereby he lost the benefit of the said judgment and execution.

The Third Day of my Hearing.

Saturday, March 16, 1643. In the interim, between the 13th and this 16th of March, upon some strict charge, to look to the Tower, my Solicitor was not suffered to come in to me. Whereupon, so soon as I was settled at the bar, before the Evidence began to be opened, I spake to the lords as follows: "My Lords, I stand not here to complain of any thing, or any man; but only am enforced to acquaint your lordships with my sad condition. Your lordships have appointed my Secretary to be my Solicitor, and given him leave to assist me in the turning of my Papers, and to warn in such Witnesses, and to fetch me the copies of such Records as I shall have occasion to use. And I humbly desire your lordships to consider, that myself being imprisoned, and so utterly disenabled to do these things myself; it will be absolutely impossible for me to make any Defence, if my Solicitor be denied to come to me, as now he is."* This was granted, and the Hearing adjourned till Monday following; and I humbly thanked their lordships for it.

The Fourth Day of my Hearing.

The fourth Day of my Hearing was Monday, March 18, and was only my Answer to the third day's Charge, and the only time in which I was not put to answer the same day.

I. The first Charge of this day was about St. Paul's. And first out of my Diary (where I confess it one of my projects to repair that ancient fabrick;) and three strict Orders of the Lords of the Council, for the demolishing of the houses built about that church. One was Nov. 21, 1634, the demolishing of the houses commanded by this before Jan. 6, for one, and for the rest by Midsummer. Another was March 26, 1631, a Committee appointed, with power to compound with the tenants, and with order to pull down, if they would not compound. The third was March 2, 1631, which gives power to the sheriffs to pull down, if obedience be not yielded.

To this, I confess I did, when I came first to be bishop of London, project the repair of that ancient and famous Cathedral of St. Paul, ready to sink into its own ruins. And to this I held myself bound in general, as Bishop of the place; and in particular for the body of the Church, the repair of which is by the local statutes laid upon the bishop. And the bishop was well able to do it, while he enjoyed those lands which he had when that burden was laid upon him. 'But what sacrilegious hands despoiled that hishoprick of them, it is to no purpose to tell.' And truly, my Lords, since I am in this present condition, I humbly and heartily thank God, that St. Paul's comes into my sufferings; and that God is pleased to think me worthy to suffer either for it, or with it any way: though I confess, I little thought to meet that here, or as a Charge any where else. And so God be pleased, as I hope in Christ he will, to pardon my other sins, I hope I shall be able (human frailties always set aside) to give an easy account for this. But whereas I said, "the repair of St. Paul's was a strange piece of Treason;" and they presently replied, that they did not charge the Repair upon me, but "the manner of doing it, by demolishing of men's houses:" To that I answered as follows; with this first, That the work hath cost me above 1,200*l.* out of my own purse, besides all my care and pains, and now this heavy Charge to boot: no one man offering to prove, that I have mis-spent or diverted to other use, any one penny given to that work; or that I have done any thing about it, without the knowledge, approbation, and order of his majesty, or the Lords of the Council, or both.

To the Particulars then. For the three Orders taken out of the Council-Books, I shall not need to repeat them. But what is the mystery, that these Orders are reckoned backwards, the last first? Is it to aggravate, as if it rose by steps? That cannot well be; because the first Order is the surest, if I conceive it right. Besides, here was real Composition allotted for them, and that by a Committee named by the Lords, not by me. And I think it was very real; for it cost eight or nine thousand pounds, (as appears upon the Accounts) merely to take down the Houses, which had no right to stand there, before we could come at the Church to repair it.

And if any thing should be amiss in any of these, which is more than I either know or believe, they were the Council's orders, not mine. And shall that be urged as Treason against me, which is not imputed to them so much as a Misdemeanor? Besides, the Lords of the Council are in the ancient constitution of this kingdom one body; and whatsoever the major part of them concludes, is reputed the act of the whole, not any one man's. And this I must often inculcate, because I see such public Acts like to be heaped upon my particular.

1. The first Witness about this business of St. Paul's is Mich. Burton, and it is charged that his House was pulled down in king James's time; that he was promised relief, but had none; that hereupon he got a reference from his majesty that now is, and came with it to the Council, and was referred to the Committee: That sir Henry Martin told him, that the Archbishop was his hindrance; that he reported to me, and that I bid him go to king James for his recompence.

To this my Answer was, That this House, which he says was his, was, as is confessed by himself, taken down in king James's time, when an attempt was made about the repair of this Cathedral, but nothing done. If he desired satisfaction, he was to seek it of them who took down his house, not of me. If his majesty that now is gave him a reference, he was by the Lords of the Council, or by me, if to me it were referred, to be sent to the Sub-Committee, because satisfaction for each house was to be ordered by them. Nor had I any reason to take it on my care, which was done so long before. He says, that sir Henry Martin told him that I hindered him: but that is no Proof that sir H. Martin told him so; for it is but his report of sir H. Martin's Speech; and I hope sir Henry neither did, nor would do me such apparent wrong. He was the third man to whom I brake my intentions touching the Repair and the difficulties which I foresaw I was to meet with; and he gave me all encouragement. And it may be, when nothing would satisfy the eager old man, I might bid him go to king James for recompence: but it is more than I remember, if I did so. And this man is single, and in his own case; and where lies the Treason that is in it? Besides, least consideration was due to this house: for not many years before the demolishing of it, it was built at the west end of St. Paul's for a Lottery, (it was said to be the house of one Wheatly) and after the Lottery ended, finished up into a dwelling-house, to the great annoyance of that Church: the Bishop and Dean and Chapter being asleep while it was done.

2. The next Charge about St. Paul's was witnessed by Mary Berry, That her husband was fain to set up his trade elsewhere, and that every man reported the Bishop was the cause of it.

Her husband was forced by this remove to set up his trade elsewhere; so she says: and perhaps in a better place, and with satisfaction sufficient to make him a better stock: Where is the wrong? Beside, she is single, and in her own cause, and no Proof, but that every man reported the Bishop was the means to remove him. And it is observable, that in king James's time, when the Commission issued out for the demolishing of these very houses, the work was highly applauded; and yet no care taken for satisfaction of any private man's interest: 'That now great care hath been taken, and great sums of Money expended about it, yet I must be a Traitor, and no less for doing it. This makes me think some party of men were heartily angry at the Repair itself, though for very shame it be turned off upon the demolishing of the houses.'

3. The next that came in was Tho. Wheeler: He says, that his house was pulled down by the Committee, by my direction, about 11 years ago; and that word was brought him of it.

His house was pulled down; but himself confesses it was by the committee. It was, he says, above 11 years ago, and the time limited in that article is six years.* He says, that word was brought him that I was the cause, or gave the direction. Word was brought him, but he names not by whom, nor from whom; so all this proof is a single hearsay of he knows not whom: whereas I had the broad seal of England for all that was done. It was replied here, That for demolishing of these houses the king's Commission was no full and legal warrant: I should have procured authority from parliament. I replied to this interruption, That houses more remote from the Church of St. Paul's were pulled down by the king's Commission only in king Edward the 3rd's time; and humbly desired a salvo might be entered for me till I might bring the Record:* which was granted.

4. The last Instance for this Charge of St. Paul's, was the House of W. Wakern; who witnessed, That he had 100*l.* recompence for his House, but then was after fined in the High Commission Court 100*l.* for profanation, of which he paid 30*l.*

To this I gave this Answer, That his Charge is true; and that after he had received 100*l.* composition, the cry of the Profanation brought him into the High Commission. It was thus: The skulls of dead men (perhaps better than himself) were tumbled out of their graves into his draught, and part of the foundation of the Church (as appeared in the taking down of his house) was broken, or pared away, to make room for the uncleanness to pass into the vault: And surely were I to sit again in the High-Commission, I should give my vote to censure this Profanation. But himself confesses, he paid but 30*l.* of it, which was too little for such an offence. And besides, my lords, this was the act of the High-Commission, and cannot be charged singly upon me.

And I cannot forbear to add thus much more, That the Bishop and Dean and Chapter, whoever they were, did ill to give way to these Buildings, and to increase their rents by a sacrilegious revenue; no law, that I know, giving way to build upon consecrated ground, as that Church-yard is. But howsoever, the present tenants being not in dolo, I ever thought fit they should have recompence for their estates, and they had it.

II. The next Charge was about the shops of the Goldsmiths in Cheapside and Lombard-street. An Order was made at the Council-Table, Nov. 12, 1634, That within six months the Goldsmiths should provide themselves shops there, and no where else, till all those shops were furnished; and this under a penalty, and to give bond.

These two were the ancient places for Goldsmiths only, time out of mind: and it was thought fit by the Lords, for the beauty of the place, and the honour of the City, to have these places furnished as they were wont, and not to have other trades mixed among them. Beside, it concerned all mens safety; for if any Plate were stolen, the inquiry after it might be made with more ease and speed: whereas if the Goldsmiths might dwell here and there, and keep their shops in every by-place of the city, stolen plate might easily be made off, and never heard of. But howsoever, if in this Order there were any thing amiss, it was the order of the Council-Table, not mine; and far enough off from Treason, as I conceive.

* See this Record twice referred to afterwards. In the latter place the useful words of it are recited.

* Ten. Vide the second Additional Article.

1. Upon this Charge there were two instances. The first is Mr. Bartley; who said his house was taken from him, by order to the Lord Mayor, 1637. That my hand was to the order; that he was imprisoned six months, and recovered 600*l.* damages of sir Ed. Bromfield; That after this he was committed to Flansted, a messenger belonging to the High-Commission about Dr. Bastwick's and Mr. Burton's Books; that after this he was sent for to the council, and there heard my voice only; That when he desired some help, sir Thomas Ailsbury's man told him, He were as good take a bear by the tooth; That all this was for his entertaining a man that came out of Scotland. And lastly, That Dr. Haywood, my chaplain, had licensed a Popish Book.

To which I gave this Answer: That if the Lord Mayor put him from his house, by Order from the lords, (being a Stationer among the Goldsmiths) then it was not done by me; and though my hand were to the Order, yet not mine alone; and I hope my hand there subscribed no more Treason than other lords hands did. And if he did recover 600*l.* against sir Ed. Bromfield, who (I think) was the Lord Mayor spoken of, surely he was a gainer by the business. And whereas he says, he was after seized again, and committed to Flansted about the Books named; if he were (as was informed) a great vender of those and such like Books, less could not be done to him than to call him to answer. He says farther, That he was sent for to the Council-Table, and there he heard my voice only against him. It may be so, and without all fault of mine: for that heavy office was usually put upon me and the Lord Keeper to deliver the sense of the Board to such as were called thither, and examined there; and by this means, if any sour or displeasing Sentence passed, (how just soever, it mattered not) it was taken as our own, and the envy of it fell on us. And that this was so, many lords here present know well. He adds what sir Thomas Ailsbury's man said, when he would have petitioned again: but since Mr. Bartley is single here, and in his own cause, why doth he rest upon a hearsay of sir Thomas Ailsbury's man? Why was not this man examined to make out the Proof? And if this man did so far abuse me, as to speak such words of me, shall I be abused first, and then have that abuse made a Charge? That he was troubled thus for a Scotchman's coming to him, is nothing so, nor is any Proof offered; though then the Troubles were begun in Scotland; and therefore if this had any relation to that business, I pleaded again the act of oblivion. For that of Dr. Haywood, I shall give my Answer in a more proper place; for it is objected again.

2. The second instance was in Mr. Manning's Case. He speaks also of the Order of the Council, Nov. 12, 1634. That the Goldsmiths in their Books make an Order upon it, June 15, 1635. That they which obey not should be suspended (I think it is meant from use of their trade), that when some intreated them to obedience, I should say, 'This Board is not so weak, but that it can command;' or to that effect.

For the Council's Order, it was theirs, not mine. For the Order which the Company of Goldsmiths made upon it, it was their own act, I had nothing to do with it. For the Words, if I did speak them (which is more than I remember), he is single that swears them, and in his own cause. But, my lords, I must needs say, whether I spake it then or not, most true it is, that the Council-Table is very weak indeed, if it cannot command in things of Decency, and for Safety of the Subject, and where there is no law to the contrary. And this was then my Answer.

III. The third Charge of this day was, That I forced men to lend Money to the Church of St. Paul's: and Mrs. Moore was called upon. But this was deserted.

IV. The next Charge was concerning a long and tedious Suit between Rich and Poole, about the Parsonage of North-Cerney, in Gloucestershire: That Rich was turned out, after three years possession, by a Reference procured by Poole to my Lord Keeper Coventry and myself; and that I did in a manner act the whole business at the Reference: That letters were sent from the Council to sir William Masters, one of the patrons, to see Poole instituted, and to imprison Rich if he refused obedience: that after by the Lord Marshal's procurement, there was another reference obtained to thirteen lords, who awarded for Rich.

I was never more weary of any business in my life than I was of this Reference. And I was so far from acting the whole business, as that I did nothing but as the Lord Keeper directed, the cause was so entangled with Quare Impeditis, and many other businesses of Law. Our Judgments upon full hearing went with Poole, and we certified accordingly. And upon this (it may be) the letters mentioned were sent down for Poole. And if the Lord Keeper that now is, then his majesty's Solicitor, could not or durst not meddle, but gave back his fee (as was farther urged), his lordship is living to tell the cause himself; for here was none set down, tho' it were urged as if he did it because I was a Referee. And in the mean time, this is but a bare report concerning him. If the thirteen lords, to whom it was after referred, were of another opinion, that was nothing to us, who, without any touch of Corruption, did as our knowledge and conscience guided us. And, my lords, it seems this Title was very doubtful; for after all this, it came into this parliament, and was referred to a committee, where Mr. Rich was very willing to compound the business. 'And well he might; for I was since certified by a gentleman, a lawyer, that understood well, and was at the hearing of that cause, that it was one of the foulest causes, 'on Rich's side, that ever he heard. And out

‘ of this I took the sum of my Answer, which I gave to Mr. Browne, when he summed up my Charge.’

The Witnesses to this Charge were Mr. Rich's brother, and my good friend Mr. Talboys. But this latter witnesses nothing but that he heard me say that Poole's behaviour was unfit; so there I checked the one party: And that upon some words given me by Rich, I should say, “ Do you throw dirt in my face?” And why might I not ask this question, if his words deserved it? So upon the matter, here is Rich single in his brother's case, and nothing throughout that looks like Treason.

Here I had a snap given me, That I slighted the Evidence: Whereas they, as 'twas said, did not urge these particulars as Treason, but as things tending to the violation of law, and should be found to make Treason in the result. ‘ The truth is, I did then think within myself, that such evidence might very well be slighted in an Accusation of Treason. But I thought better to forbear; and so in my continued patience expected the next Charge.’

V. Which was Mr. Foxlie's Imprisonment about Popish Books. That he was tendered the Oath ex Officio, then brought before the Council, and imprisoned again by a warrant under my hand, and others, and my hand first to the warrant, his wife not suffered to come to him till he was sick; that the chief cause of all this was the Imprisonments, because he desired to name the men for the Feoffment.

My Lords, this man confesses he was called in question about Popish Books; but expressing no more, I cannot tell what to make of it; nor can I tell how to accuse him of Popish Books. ‘ For I cannot tell which is least, ‘ his understanding of them, or his love to ‘ them.’ And for tendering him the Oath ex Officio, that was the usual proceeding in that Court. When he was brought before the lords of the Council, he says the Warrant for his Imprisonment was under my hand and others: This was according to course; so the commitment of him was by the lords, not by me. But my hand was first; so was it in all things else, to which I was to set it. And the restraint of his wife from coming to him, was by the same Order of the Lords: And upon her Petition, when her husband was sick, both of them confess she had admittance. But whereas he says the chief cause of his commitment was the Feoffment, he is much mistaken: Himself says before, it was about Popish Books. This I am sure of, the Feoffment was not so much as mentioned against him; though he freely confesses that he got twelve men to undertake that Feoffment: which was a great deal more power than he could take to himself by law. And his wife speaks not one word to the cause of his Imprisonment. So he is single, and in his own cause, and no treason, unless it be against Mr. Foxlie.

VI. The next Charge of this day was Mr. Vassal's Imprisonment: And to save repetition,

I shall weave all the circumstances of Aggravation and my Answer together.

First, He is single in all, both Substance and Circumstance. Secondly, He says, “ That he conceives I was the cause of his Imprisonment.” But his conceit is no Proof. He says again, That I said at the Council-Table, whither he was called, “ Why sit we here, if we be not able to judge?” It may be, my lords, I said so: I remember not now: But if I did say so, it was of such things only as were fit and proper for that honourable board to judge of. Then he charged, that I should there say, “ That he did eat the bread out of the king's children's mouths; and that if he were in another country, he would be hanged for it.” ‘ I ‘ doubt this gentleman has borrowed some of ‘ sir Henry Vane's memory.’ But I remember no such thing. Yet if I did say it, it was no Treason; For if I did say he might be hanged for the like in some other countries, it was because the laws and customs of other countries, and this of ours, differ in many things. So that by this Speech he was to thank the law of the land for his preservation, notwithstanding his opposition against majesty; which, where the laws were not so favourable to the subject, would not be endured.

He says, “ He was fain to deposit 300*l.* into the hand of sir Abra. Dawes, and that it was taken out the next day.” But he says withal, it was done by a Decree at the Council-Board; and I hope I shall not be held author of all Decrees which passed there. He says that I called him “ Sirrah:” A high crime, if I did so! high treason at least! But sure this gentleman's spleen swelled up “ Sir” into “ Sirrah:” For that is no language of mine to meaner men than Mr. Vassal is. The main of this Charge is Words; ‘ and those, if uttered, hasty, ‘ not treasonable. And as M. Lepidus spake ‘ in the case of C. Lutorius Priscus, Vana ‘ a scelestis, dicta a maleficiis differunt, [Tacit. ‘ L. 3. Annal.] Vain things differ from ‘ wicked, and words from malicious deeds. ‘ And let any man else be sifted as I have been ‘ for all the time I have been a Bishop, which ‘ is now upon the point of 25 years, and I ‘ doubt not but as high words as these will be ‘ heard from him upon less occasion, and of ‘ greater personages than Mr. Vassal is. Besides, Mr. Vassal, at the end of his testimony, ‘ desired the Lords he might have Reparation; ‘ which altogether in law infirms that which he ‘ testified.’

VII. After this followed a Charge about a Grant passed from his majesty to one Mr. Smith. The difference was between Mrs. Burrill and him. As far as I can recall, it was thus: The king had made a Grant to Mr. Burrill in his life-time, of a Wharf, or something else belonging to the Thames. Mr. Smith conceals this, and gets a Grant from his majesty over the head of the widow and her children: and as himself confesses, his majesty being informed that Mrs. Burrill was sister to the reverend prelate bishop Andrews, being then dead, should say, 'That he would not have granted it to Mr. Smith, had he known so much.' This was an honourable memory of his faithful servant, her worthy brother. But whatsoever was done in this business, was by order of the Council-Board, and not by me; as was also the 250*l.* which (he says) was paid in to sir William Beacher (by way of deposit, as I conceive). In which, if he had any hard measure, the law was open for his right. And in the whole business he is single, and in his own cause.

VIII. The next Charge was sir Jo. Corbet's; which, because it is expressed at large in the Article before recited, I shall not here repeat, but apply the Answer to it, which I then gave.

Sir John says he "was sent for about reading the Petition of Right at a sessions in the country; and that the earl of Bridgewater should say he was disaffected to the king." This concerns not me in any thing. He says, "That for this he was committed, lay long in the Fleet, and was denied bail." But he says it was denied by the whole Board. So, by his own Confession, this was the act of the council, not mine. And this Answer I gave to Mr. Browne, when he put this part of the charge into his sum.

In his Cause with sir John Stonehouse about a Waste, I cannot recal the particulars: but whatever was done therein, himself confesses was by Order of the Council-Table, and his majesty present, April 18, 1638.

For the Isle built by the lord viscount Kilmurrey, the Grant which I made, was no more than is ordinary in all such cases; and it is expressed in the body of the Grant, "Quantum in nobis est, et de jure possumus." So there is nothing at all done, to the prejudice of sir John's inheritance: for if we cannot grant it by law, then the Grant is voided by its own words. And that the Grant was such, and no other, I shewed the deeds ready attested out of the Office. Besides, had I wronged him, there was an ordinary remedy open by Appeal to the Delegates. And this was well known to him; for he did so appeal from a like Grant against him by the now lord bishop of Duresme, then of Litchfield, and sir John's Diocesan. And whereas it is alledged, "That I made this Grant without the consent of him the patron, or the then incumbent;" sir John acknowledges, like a gentleman, that I sent unto him for his consent, if it might have been had. And this I foresaw also, that if I had denied the lord viscount that which was not unusual, then the complaint would have fallen more heavy on the other side that I made persons of quality in a manner Recusants, by denying them that conveniency which was in my power to grant. So I must be faulty, whatever I do.

IX. Then the business of the Tythes of London was raised up in Judgment against me. And it was read out of my Diary, that I projected to give the ministers assistance therein.

I had been much to blame, having been bishop of London, should I have had other thoughts: for their Case is very hard; all their Offerings being shrunk away into nothing but a poor Easter-Book. The ministers of London had often petitioned about some relief long before my time; and I did then, and do still think it most just they should have it. 'For they are now under the task-masters of Egypt; (Exod. v. 7.) the tale of brick must be made; they must preach twice a Sunday, get straw where they can.' And yet I never thought of any thing contrary to law, had all been done which I desired: for that was no more than that the citizens would voluntarily yield to some reasonable addition, where right and need appeared. And this, I am sure, nor did nor could cross with the act of parliament concerning the Tythes of London. And Mr. Moss, who is their only Witness in this particular, says no more against me, but that "I pressed this business much and often." Which is most true I did; and held it my duty so to do; but still in the way before mentioned.

X. After this came the great Charge (as at present it is accounted) concerning the Censure of Mr. Prynne, and Burton, and Bastwick, in the Star-Chamber, and their Banishment (as it is called, upon it.* The Witnesses produced in some circumstances of that Cause, were Mr. Cockshott, Tho. Edwards, William Wickens, Mr. Burton, Mrs. Bastwick, and Mr. Prynne himself. The Censure is known and urged to be against law: but so far as any particular is put upon me, my Answer is present to it.

1. And, first, for Mr. Cockshott, he says, "Mr. Attorney Banks sent him (being then his servant) to give me an Account of that business." Hence it is inferred, that I took care of it. This might have had some shew of proof, if I had sent to Mr. Attorney to give me an Account of it. But there is no word of any such Proof. And yet, considering what relation their cause had to the Church, if I had sent and desired some Account of the Proceedings, I humbly conceive (my place in the Church considered) it could have been no great crime.

2. Then were read certain Warrants, one Feb. 1, 1632, for commitment, another of Feb. 2, 1636, to bar access to them. These were acts of the lords sitting in Star-Chamber, not mine. Then was read a third Order, after Sentence given, of May 13, 1634, for the seizing of his Books. But this, as the former, was an act of the Court, not mine: and it is expressed in the Order (as the Charge itself lays it down) for the disposal of the Books according to law. Then the Warrant of their commitment to the islands, Aug. 27, 1637. This commitment was no device of mine; nor did I ever hear of it till it was spoken by others in the Star-Chamber. Nor do any one of these Warrants prove any thing that can be called my act. And I humbly conceive that I ought not by law, nor can by usage of parliamentary proceedings, be charged single for those things which were done in public courts. The last Order was, Nov. 12, 1637, about the aldermen of Coventry, and the Quo Warranto resolved upon against the Charter of that city, "only for supposed favours shewed to Mr. Prynne in his passage that way." First, it is confessed in the Charge, that this was an act of the Lords. Secondly, That it was made at a full board. Thirdly, It is not urged that any one man disliked it. Fourthly, The complaint which caused it, was, that both aldermen and their wives, and other citizens, were not content to shew Mr. Prynne kindness; but they both did and spake that which was disgraceful to the Star-Chamber Sentence. But howsoever, there is no particular in that order that is or can be charged upon me.

3. This for the Warrants. The next Witness concerning this charge was Tho. Edwards.

He says, "That three hampers of Mr. Prynne's Books were taken out of his house," (whither it seems they were conveyed for safety) "and no warrant shewed to take them." The weaker man he, to let his friend's Books go so. But this Witness hath not one word of me.

4. The next witness was William Wickens. He says, "He knew of no Warrant neither; but that License was given by the Sheriffs about six years since." Here is never a word concerning me: nor am I to answer for the Sheriffs act. And whereas it is an aggravation in the Charge, "That all Mr. Prynne's Books were sold;" Tho. Edwards says there were but three hampers of them; and this Witness says he bought them for two-and-thirty pounds. And these neither by number nor price could be half of Mr. Prynne's Books, if I have heard truth of his Library.

5. After this man's testimony, comes Mr. Prynne himself in his own cause. He made a long relation of the business, and full of bitterness against me. This I doubt not was purposely done, to represent me as odious as he could to the Lords and the hearers. But I shall assume nothing to myself, that was done by Order of the court of Star-Chamber: whatsoever was done there by common consent, was their act, not mine; and if any Treason be in it, they are as guilty as I; for treason admits no accessories. Nor will I meddle with the language: God forgive him that, and whatever else he hath done against me. Only I shall answer to all such particulars of his as seem to touch upon myself.

(1.) First then he says "He brought a Prohibition, An. 1629, and that was the ground of my hatred against him." For Prohibitions, I shall answer when they are charged: but as I remember not this, so I bare him no hatred; and bearing him none, it could not be for that cause: nor doth he so much as offer to prove it was.

(2.) Next he says, "I gave direction to Mr. Attorney Noy, and that Dr. Heylin drew some Informations for him." Dr. Heylin was well acquainted with Mr. Attorney; but how long, or upon what grounds, I know not: Nor did I give Mr. Attorney any direction. What Dr. Heylin did, if he did any thing, is nothing to me, unless I set him on; which is not proved, nor sworn.

(3.) He farther says, That "Mr. Attorney read his Book twice over, and said, that he found nothing amiss in it." I know not what Mr. Attorney said to him, nor what he may say of Mr. Attorney now he is dead: this I am sure of, and it is well known to some of your lordships, he said far otherwise in open court.

(4.) He says, That "his Book was licensed to the press, and after that seized; and that the Messenger told him it was done by me." This was done by warrant of the High Commission, not by me: Nor doth he offer any Proof against me, but that the Messenger told him so; which is a bare hearsay, and no proof.

(5.) Then he says, That "there was another Order given about his business, and that I did it." But he brings no Proof for this, but that Mr. Ingram, the then Keeper of the Fleet, told him so. But this is as bare a hearsay as the former, and Mr. Ingram not produced to make out the Proof.

(6.) Then he says, "He writ me a Letter, and that I sent it to Mr. Attorney, to have him yet farther proceeded against." It is true, my Lords, he did write unto me; but whether it were a Letter, or a Libel, I leave other men to judge. This Letter I did send to Mr. Attorney; but only to let him see how I was used, not to have any farther proceedings against him. But Mr. Attorney was so moved at the sight of it, that when he saw me next, he told me he would call him Ore tenus for it. Therefore, it seems, somewhat was very much amiss in it, call the Writing what you will.

(7.) He says, "Mr. Attorney thought he had not kept the Letter; but he was deceived, for he had it." But how was Mr. Attorney deceived? I'll tell your lordships what himself told me. When Mr. Attorney saw that I would not agree to any farther Prosecution, he sent for Mr. Prynne, shewed him the Letter, and thought, after he had read it, to give him some good counsel, to desist from that libelling humour of his. But Mr. Prynne, after he had got the Letter into his hands, went to the window, as if he meant to read it; and while Mr. Attorney was otherwise busied, he tare it into small pieces, and threw it out at the window; and then said unto him, "This shall never rise in judgment against me." Now he confesses he hath the Letter still, and that Mr. Attorney was deceived: Belike he tare some other Paper for it, and put the Letter in his pocket. "But that you may see the honesty of this man, and what conscience he makes of that which he speaks upon his Oath; here he says he had the Letter still, and that Mr. Attorney was deceived: And yet after this, when he sets out his Breviate of my Life, he confesses, in an unsavoury marginal Note, (p. 19.) "That he tare it, Mr. Attorney having need of such a paper." And for this Breviate of his, if God

‘lend me life and strength to end this first, I shall discover to the world the base and malicious slanders with which it is fraught.’

(8.) He went on, and said, “There was an Order made against him when Term was done, so that he could have no remedy.” This is directly against the Court and their Order, not against me.

(9.) Then he cites out of the Epistle before my Speech in the Star-Chamber, “That I censured him for having his hand in the Pamphlets of those times, and yet was doubtful of it.” The words are, “For I doubt his pen is in all the Pamphlets.” But, first, it is acknowledged I gave no Vote at all in his Censure; and if I did not judicially censure him, then sure I was not doubtful, and yet censured. Secondly, He was censured upon his own Pamphlet; and his hand was certainly in his own, what doubt soever I might make of its being in theirs. And, thirdly, if the Words be extended to their Pamphlets also, that is nothing to prove I doubted of the justness of the Sentence. For the words are not, “I doubt his pen is in all those Pamphlets of Mr. Burton and Dr. Bastwick;” but in all the Pamphlets, whether their libels, or any others: so I might be doubtful of the one, and yet certain enough of the other.

(10.) And whereas he adds, “That he was jointly charged with Dr. Bastwick and Mr. Burton, yet could not be suffered to speak together for a joint Answer; and that his Cross-Bill was refused:” All this was done by the Court of Star-Chamber, not by me. And your lordships know well the Lord Keeper managed the affairs of that Court, not I.

(11.) Then he says, “That at last Mr. Holt came to him, but was threatened that very afternoon for it.” But he doth not tell your lordships by whom; and for my part, more than civil giving him the time of the day, I never spake with him in all my life.

(12.) He tells your lordships next, “how he passed through Coventry,” (to which I have spoken already) “and how through Chester, and how some Chester men were used concerning him and his entertainment.” But, my Lords, whatsoever was done in this, was by the High-Commission at York; and if any thing be therein amiss, they must answer that did it.

(13.) Lastly, he spake of sending sir William Balfore to me, and some other like particulars. Of all which there is no Proof, but a bare relation what Mr. Hungerford, Mr. Ingram, and sir William Balfore said; which is all hearsay, and makes no evidence, unless they were present to witness what was said. ‘And here give me leave to observe, that Mr. Prynne hath in this Charge woven together all that he could say concerning both causes, for which he was censured: For in the third Particular he speaks of his Book, for which he was first censured; and in the ninth and tenth of his Cross-Bill, and the like, which were in his second cause.’

6. The sixth Witness was Mr. Burton, a party too. For that which he said agreeable to Mr. Prynne; it received the same Answer. And he added nothing new, but “that his wife was kept from him by Warrant from the Lords.” And if it was by the Lords Order, then was it not by me. And when it was replied, That till he was sentenced to Guernsey, his wife had access to him: Mr. Burton answered, “Yea; but, my Lords, she was not suffered to be with me at nights.” At which the Lords fell a laughing, and there ended his Charge.

7. The last Witness was M. s. Bastwick; and she also said nothing different from Mr. Prynne, but that she was kept from her husband, and that she petitioned the Lords about it; but of me in particular, not one word. ‘And though Mr. Brown, in his last Reply upon me,’ said, The time of these mens Censure, was the noted time of the oppression of the Subjects Liberty; yet I shall crave leave to say of these men, as St. Augustine once said of two great Donatists in his time, who (it seems) had received some Sentence, and afterwards a return, not altogether unlike these men: (they were Felicianus and Pretextatus) of those thus St. Augustine; “if these men were innocent, why were they so condemned? And if they were guilty why were they with such honour returned and received?” [Si innocentes erant, quare sic damnati sunt? si scelerati, quare sic recepti? Aug. Epist. 172.] This applies itself. And here I am willing to put the reader in mind too, That Mr. Brown drawing up an exact sum of my Charge, and pressing it hard against me, to my remembrance (and I think my Notes could not have slipped it) passed by this Charge concerning Mr. Prynne; and I cannot but think he had some reason for it.’

XI. This tedious Charge being over, the world ran round, and I was brought back again to another Charge about demolishing the Houses at St. Paul’s; and here three Witnesses more came against me.

1. The first was Mr. Bentley: He said, “There were above 60 houses pulled down.” I answered, I know not the number: but if there be so many, the recompence given was sufficient for more. He said farther, That “there were 20 yards between the Church and some of the houses.” There were very few, if any such (let him look to his Oath;) but then some were close upon the wall of the Church. And suppose all had been 20 yards distant; that was not room enough to bring in, and lodge materials for the repair, and to turn the carriages. And here again I made mention of my Salvo, before desired, for the Record of Ed. 3, touching the like Buildings, and their Demolition.

2. The second Witness was Mr. Goore. For the 60 Houses, as was before testified, I gave the same Answer; as also, that the act of the Council-Table cannot be said to be my act. For St. Gregory’s Church they were not left without a place for Divine Service, (as he would fain have it thought;) For they were assigned to a part of Christ Church, till another church might be built for them. And for the pulling down of St. Gregory's it is well known to divers of that parish, that I was not so much as one of the Referrees, to whose view and consideration it was referred. But the truth is, this man rented the Parsonage-House, and had a good penny-worth of it to gain by his under-tenant. The going down of that house troubles him, and not the Church.

3. The third Witness, Walter Biggs, says nothing different from the two former; "but that I said I was opposed for the pulling down of the Houses." Whence it was inferred, that it was my Act: because I was opposed. But my Lords, I hope, I might say, "I was opposed" without any offence, or without taking the Order of the Council-Table to myself; For it is well known the work of that Repair, under God, was mine; and I took no indirect, no oppressing way to it; nor can I now be ashamed of that, which, in future times, in despite of the present malice, will be my honour. So that the care of the work lying upon me, I might well say 'I was opposed,' though the opposition went higher, against the Orders of the lords.

XII. The last Charge of this Day, was about the putting down of two Brewers in Westminster, because the excessive and noisome smoke from thence much annoyed the King's House, Gardens and Park at St. James's. These two were Mr. Bond and Mr. Arnold.

1. For Mr. Bond, he begins with somewhat that I should say at the Council-Table; as namely, that he must seal a Bond of 2,000*l.* to brew no more with sea-coal. Now this argues, if I did so speak, that it was in delivering to him the sense of the Board; which office (as I have before expressed, and is well known) was usually put upon me, if I were present. And your lordships may here again see what envy hath followed me upon that which I could not decline. He says farther, That upon this Mr. Attorney Banks "proceeded against him in the Exchequer;" That there upon some occasion the Lord Chief Baron should say, "Ye are wise Witnesses for the king;" That "his counsel were forbid to plead, and so a Verdict passed for the king;" All this is nothing to me: I was neither Chief Baron nor Witness, nor one of the Jury that gave the Verdict. He says, "He was informed, that there was an Order of Council made, that no man should put up a Petition for him;" But himself doth not so much as mention, that this Order was procured by me; And it is but a report that no Petition might be delivered for him; and none of them that told him so, produced for proof. So he scandalizes the Lords by hearsay.

Next he says, That the "King graciously sent him with a reference to the Council for satisfaction." First, I must believe if he were so sent, the wrong being only the king's, and he willing he should have satisfaction however for his loss; 'That the lords would never re'fuse, in such a case, whatsoever is here said to the contrary. Secondly, It may be observed 'how gracious the king was to the subject; 'that though the annoyance was great to that 'house of his recreation and retiring near the 'City, yet he would not have Mr. Bond suffer 'without satisfaction: notwithstanding which 'goodness of the king, he comes into this great 'Court; and so he may have a blow at me, 'blasts, as much as in him lies, all the king's 'proceedings, under the name of oppression, 'and that in a high degree.' He says also, "That a friend of his persuaded him to come to me, and offer me somewhat to St. Paul's; and that he did come to me accordingly, and that I said I must have of him 1,000*l.* to St. Paul's; That he was not unwilling to give it, because his brewing was worth twice as much to him." My lords, I humbly desire your lordships to consider this part of the Charge well. First, What friend of his this was, that came so to him, he says not, nor do I know, and so have no possibility to examine. Secondly, He says not that I sent this friend of his to him, thus to advise him; and then his coming no way concerns me. Thirdly, when he was come upon this friend's persuasion, if he were willing to give 1,000*l.* to St. Paul's, in regard of his double gain from his Brew-house, as himself confesses: I do not see, under favour, what crime or oppression is in it. Lastly, I remember none of this, and let him well weigh his oath with himself; for I cannot call to mind one penny that he gave to St. Paul's; nor yet shall I ever think it a sin, to take 1,000*l.* to such a work, from any rich and able man that shall voluntarily offer it; especially upon hope of gaining twice as much.

To make this Charge the heavier, he says, I sent him to the Queen-Mother, who lay then at St. James's; and that there he was laboured by some about her to change his Religion, and then he should have all favour. This is a bold oath; let him look to it, for I sent him not. It may be I might tell him, that if the Queen-Mother were offended with the annoyance from his house, it would not be in my power to help him: which was true. And that about his Religion, was added to make your lordships think that I sent him thither for that purpose: but God be thanked, this witness says not any one word tending that way. And for the Queen-Mother, since she is thus mentioned, I shall crave leave to say two things: the one, That I did both in open council, and privately, oppose her coming into England, with all the strength I had; though little to my own ease, as I afterwards found: the other, That after she was come, the lords of the council went in a body to do their duty to her; that time I could not but go; but never either before or after was I with her.—Then he concludes, That there was a Capias out for him, and that he was fain to make an escape by night; which he did to alderman Pennington, who very nobly succoured him privately in his house. All which concerns me nothing.

2. The other Witness is Mr. Arnold; who told as long a tale as this, to as little purpose. He speaks of three Brew-houses in Westminster all to be put down, or not brew with sea-coal; that secretary Windebank gave the order. Thus far it concerns not me. He added, that I told him they burnt sea-coal: I said, indeed, I was informed they did; and that I hope was no offence. He says, That upon sir John Banks's new Information, four lords were appointed to view the brew-houses, and what they burnt. But I was none of the four, nor did I make any report, for or against. He says, Mr. Attorney Banks came one day over to him, and told him that his house annoyed Lambeth, and that I sent him over. The truth is this; Mr. Attorney came one day over to dine with me at Lambeth, and walking in the garden before dinner, we were very sufficiently annoyed from a brew-house; the wind bringing over so much smoke, as made us leave the place. Upon this, Mr. Attorney asked me, why I would not shew myself more against those brew-houses, being more annoyed by them than any other? I replied, I would never be a means to undo any man, or put him from his trade, to free myself from smoke. And this Witness doth after confess, that I said the same words to himself. Mr. Attorney at our parting said, he would call in at the Brew-house: I left him to do as he pleased, but sent him not. And I humbly desire Mr. Attorney may be examined of the truth of this.

He farther says, That he came over to me to Lambeth, and confesses the Words before-mentioned; and that he offered me 10*l.* yearly to St. Paul's, and that I said he might give 20*l.* He says, That I sent him to Mr. Attorney; but withal told him, that if he found not such favour as I wished him, it was a sign he had more powerful adversaries than my friendship could take off. In all this I cannot see what fault I have committed. And I foretold him truth: for though the business were after referred to Mr. Attorney and myself, as himself says, yet we were not able to end it. Then he says, I would not suffer sir Edw. Powel, Master of the Requests, to deliver his Petition to the king. But first, this is but sir Edward Powel's Report, and so no Proof, unless he were produced to justify it. Secondly, the world knows I had no power in sir Edward; he would then willingly have delivered Petition, or any thing else, that he thought might hurt me: and the cause is known.

Lastly, he says, Mr. Attorney sent out a Capias for him; that the sheriff came by force to take him, and what hard shift he made to escape: That after, upon his Petition, the lords gave him six months time to provide himself elsewhere; and that he was fain to give 500*l.* bond not to brew there. To all this I then said, and say still, First, Here is no one thing charged upon me in particular. Secondly, here is not a word of my Advice or endeavour to set on Mr. Attorney, or to move the Lords to any thing against him. And whereas it hath been urged, that my power was such, that I swayed the Lords to go my way; this cannot be said, without laying an imputation upon the Lords, as if they could so easily be overwrought by any one man and that against law: which is a most unworthy aspersion upon men of honour. And if all this were true, it is but Treason against a Brew-house. Nor yet may this be called slighting of any Evidence, which is but to answer home in my own just Defence. 'And out of this I gave my answer to Mr. Browne's summary Charge against me 'in the House of Commons, for that which 'concerned these two Brewers.'

And here, before I close this Day, give me leave, I beseech your Lordships, to observe two things: 1. That here have been 13 witnesses at least produced in their own cause. 2. That whereas here have been so many things urged this day about the Star-Chamber and the Council-Table; the act made this parliament, for the regulating of the one, and the taking away of the other, takes no notice of any thing past: and yet Acts past (and those joint-acts of the Council, and not mine) are urged as treasonable, or conducing to Treason, against me. Nay, the Act is so far from looking back, or making such offences treason, as that if any offend in future, and that several times, yet the act makes it but Misdemeanor, and prescribes punishments accordingly.

The Fifth Day of my Hearing.

Friday, March 22, 1643. The first Charge of this day was concerning the Indictment of Mr. Newcommin a minister at Colchester, for refusing to administer the Sacrament, but at the rails; and the prosecution which followed against Burrowes for this. The two witnesses of the particulars, are Burrowes and Mr. Aske.

1. The testimony which Burrowes gave, was, That Mr. Newcommin would not administer the Communion, but at the rail; that he indicted him for receiving it there; that the foreman threw it out, &c. If Mr. Newcommin did this, complaint might have been made of him; but howsoever here is no one word of any command from me. And it seems the factious malice of Burrowes was seen, that the foreman at first threw away the indictment. He says, That upon this he was called into the High-Commission; a warrant from me; his house beset; Stockdall left the Warrant with the mayor; a Habeas Corpus not obeyed. The warrant, by which he was detained, was from the High-Commission, not from me: and himself says, there were six or seven hands to the warrant. But then he says, my hand alone was to another warrant, which is impossible, for there must be three hands at the least, or no warrant can issue out. And all his Proof of this latter is, that he saw my hand; which I hope he may do, though other hands besides mine were to it. For the Habeas Corpus, if the mayor said (for so Burrowes adds) he would obey my warrant, rather than the king's writ, because it came first; he was extremely ill advised: but if a mayor of a town give an un-discreet, or a worse answer, I hope that shall not be imputed to me. And if there be any thing in this business, why is not Stockdall the messenger produced, that knows those proceedings? Lastly, he speaks of a Letter sent to judge Crawley, and shewed to judge Hutton. But first, he says not that letter was sent by me, or by my means. Secondly, he names not the contents of the Letter; without which, no man can tell whether it charge any thing upon me or not. And until the Letter be produced, or sufficiently witnessed, (neither of which is offered) it is but like a written hearsay. And I humbly pray you to observe from himself, that the two reverend judges looking into the business, said, it was a mere cheat for money, and returned him back to Colchester: which is a proof too, that the Habeas Corpus was obeyed; for if he were not brought up before them, how could he be returned by them?

2. Then Mr. Aske, the second Witness, was produced. He said, there came players to town, and that some, which said they came from me, were taken in a Tavern upon Easter-Eve at unseasonable hours. I know not of any that were sent from me: but if any were, and kept any disorder in the town, especially at such a time, Mr. Aske did very well to question them. He says, That upon the matter I referred him twice to sir John Lambe, and that, at the second time, he found the plot was to make him an instrument about the rails, which he absolutely refused. I did refer him (and it may be twice) to sir John Lambe; but if sir John spake to him about the rails, he had no commission from me so to do. 'I understood Mr. Aske too well, to offer to make him an instrument in such a business. His zeal would have set the rails on fire, so soon as ever he had come near them.' [Frigidius dictum. W. S. A. C.]

Next he says, That Mr. Newcommin was indicted, as is aforesaid, and that Indictment found: That Letters missive were sent for him and his wife, by Stockdall. If letters missive by Stockdall, then they were sent by the High-Commission, whose joint act cannot be charged upon me: And if any thing can be proved, why is not Stockdall produced? He says, that he went into Holland to avoid the oath ex officio. The oath ex officio was then the common, and, for ought I yet know, then the legal course of that Court: so I could not help the tender of that oath unto them, had they staid and appeared. But the truth is, he was too guilty to appear; for his wife was a Separatist, and himself confesses that she came not to the Prayers of the Church. And as for him, I ever found him the great maintainer of all wilful opposition against the Church. He farther says, he came to me to Croydon, and that there I told him he might have put the Indictment against Mr. Newcommin in his pocket. Indeed, my Lords, if I did say so, I think I spake it truly. For if he had borne any respect to the reputation of the Clergy, I think he might have pocketed it for one sessions, without any prejudice at all to the law, or any thing else. God knows, this is often done. And if thereupon I added, (as Mr. Aske says I did) That if he were so strictly set against Churchmen in the Temporal Courts, he must look for as strict proceedings in the High-Commission; I see no great crime in it: for we are as strictly bound to prosecute in the one, as he was in the other. And if his clerk (as he says) was attached, who read the Indictment, yet it is not said by himself, that he was attached for reading it. And if it were so, that some jurors were attached, and not Mr. Aske's clerk only, (as Mr. Browne pressed it in the sum of his charge) yet the answer comes all to one. For no witness says, these jurors were called into the high-commission for being jurors, or discharging that legal duty. And then I hope a man's being of a jury shall not excuse him from answering any crime in any court, that hath power to call him; provided he be not called off at the time of his service, or while he is under the privilege of that court, in which he is a juror. And according to this, I gave Mr. Browne my answer. And howsoever the attachment goes of course out from the commission, and not from me.'

II. The second Charge of this Day was about the Censure which fell on the inhabitants of Beckington in Somersetshire, about their refusing to remove the Communion-Table according to the order of their Diocesan; about which were produced three Witnesses, to whose Evidence I shall answer in order.

1. The first was William Longe, who says he was foreman of the jury, when these men were indicted for a riot; and that, as he conceives, the parson spake with the judge about it, which caused a sudden verdict. The parson of the place spake with the judge, and he conceives that produced a sudden verdict: first, he doth but conceive so, and that can make no Proof. If it did make proof, it is only against the parson, not against me. And if the parson speaking of it, did say, (as Mr. Longe affirms he did) That this Riot was like a Waldensian or Swisserland Commotion; he must answer for his own distempered language, the it cannot concern.

2. The second witness was George Longe. He says the bishop of Bath commanded the Communion-Table to be removed, and set at the upper end of the chancel; that the Church-Wardens refusing, were excommunicated: but he says withal, that they appealed to the Arches, and had remedy. Then he adds farther, That the bishop proceeded again, but the Church-Wardens would not remove it, saying it was an Innovation, and against law. But, my Lords, it is neither: and therefore these Church-Wardens were in a great contempt against their bishop, to the ill-example of all that country. And that it is no Innovation against law, appears by the Injunctions of queen Elizabeth, where it is commanded expressly to be set there. The Words are; "The Holy Table in every Church" (not Cathedrals only) "shall be decently made, and set in the place where the Altar stood." Now all men know, that with us in England the altar stood North and South, at the upper end of the Chancel; and to set it East and West, had been cross the place where the Altar stood, and not in it. And this being law in the beginning of the Reformation, cannot now be an Innovation.

When they came to me again, (as they say they did) if I then told them they deserved to be laid by the heels for the contempt of their Bishop; under favour, my Lords, I spake truth. And give me leave, I beseech you, to tell you this: It began to be a general complaint, not of the bishop of Bath only, but of other bishops also, that they could do little or no service in their several countries, by reason of the Inhibitions which issued out of my courts to stay their Proceedings. And I wanted no good friends in court to tell the king as much, when any thing was complained of. By this I was brought into great straits: deny Appeals, I might not; frequent granting in my courts destroyed in a manner the Bishops Jurisdictions. In this difficulty, seeing the wilfulness of these men, and knowing they had received full benefit by their Appeal once already in the same case; I did refuse to hear any more of it, (unless there were new matter) but yet left them free to appeal to the delegates.

For Mr. Hughes, the parson there, if he gave ill words, or laid violent hands on any of his neighbours, it concerns not me; let him answer for what he hath said or done. It is farther said, That Mr. Hughes was with me at Windsor, and had letters from me to the Lord Chief Justice Finch. But this Witness delivers not this upon his own knowledge; I sent no Letter by him, nor did he see me send by any other: so this is merely a report, and he doth not so much as tell from whom. Yea, but then he says, That Mr. Morgan (a man inward with the Judge) told him, that the judge told him, that the little man had put a spoke in their cart; and thereupon (as he conceives) the petty-jury was changed. Here are, if your lordships mark them, two great Proofs. The one is the Witness's report of Mr. Morgan's report, that the Judge had said so of me: But why is not Mr. Morgan produced to clear this? The other is not the knowledge, but the conceit only of the Witness: He conceives, which I am confident cannot sway with your lordships for a Proof. 'Besides, were Mr. Morgan never so inward with that Judge, yet it follows not, that he must know all. And if that judge did mean me, (for name me he did not) he did me the more wrong. For I never desired any thing of any judge, him or other, but what was according to law. Nay, I so expressed myself, as that if by mistake or mis-information I had desired any thing which was not according to law, I humbly desired my motion might be, as if it had never been made.

3. The third Witness is Mr. Jo. Ash. That which this gentleman says, is, That sir John Lambe told, that the man which came about that business, could have no Appeal admitted without me; and that if he would be so troublesome, he should be laid by the heels. I have given your lordships an account, why he could not have an Appeal without me: he had had the benefit of an Appeal before in the same cause. And for this Witness, he delivers no knowledge of his own; but only he says, the man employed related it to him: so it is a relation, no Proof. He says, the Penance was enjoined them in three Churches. And truly, my lords, their disobedience to their Bishop was great; but if the Penance enjoined were too heavy, it was the act of their own bishop, not mine. Then he says, That the lord Finch told him, another powerful hand was upon him; intimating me. 1. This is no knowledge of the witness, but a speech of the lord Finch. 2. If the lord Finch did say so of a powerful hand, he wronged me much, but himself more, to confess he could be drawn awry in judgment. 3. This Witness says not that he named me, but that he intimated me: I pray your lordships judgment, what a forward witness this man is, that can upon oath deliver what is intimated and of whom.

He says farther, That upon Petition to sir William Portman for some assistance, the bishop of Bath laid all upon me; and that when himself came to me at the Tower; since my restraint, I told him the bishop of Bath did like an obedient bishop to his metropolitan. For this, my lords, there is no proof, that the bishop laid this business upon me, but sir William Portman's report. Sir William is a worthy gentleman, why is not he produced? Why is not the bishop, that is said to lay all upon me, brought into the court, that he may clear himself and me, if he had said it not; or that I may make him ashamed, if he said it? For it is confessed, that in the first business, the churchwards had their remedy by their Appeal to me; but that then the bishop began again, as the former witness declared. Nor knew I any thing of this business till the Appeal came. As for my Answer to himself, that, under favour, is quite mistaken: For I did not say, That in this particular, but that in his general proceedings in his diocese, the bishop of Bath carried himself like an obedient bishop to his metropolitan. Nor can any words be drawn to mean this particular: For how could I say that in this particular he carried himself like an obedient bishop to me, when after remedy given to these men by their first Appeal into my court, he began with them again upon the same cause? Besides, my Lords, this is not the first time Mr. Ash hath mistaken me. 'Mr. Browne, in summing up this Charge against me, falls twice very heavily upon this business of Beckington. 'First, For the point of Religion: And there he quoted a passage out of my speech in the Star-Chamber, where do I reserve the indifference of the standing of the Communion

' Table either way; and yet (saith he) they were thus heavily sentenced for that which I myself hold indifferent. But 1. This Sentence was laid upon them by their own bishop, not by me. 2. The more indifferent the thing was, the greater was their contumacy to disobey their ordinary. And had it not been a thing so indifferent, and without danger of advancing Popery, would queen Elizabeth, who banished popery out of the kingdom, have endured it in her own chapel all her time? 3. The heaviness of the Sentence, so much complained of, was but to confess their contumacy in three churches of the diocese, to example other mens obedience. Secondly, For the same point, as it contained matter against law, I answered Mr. Browne, as I had before answered the lords.'

III. The 3rd Charge was about certain houses given to St. Edmund's Lombard-Street, where old Mr. Pagget is parson. The witnesses are two.

1. The first is Mr. Symms, who says, That after a verdict, Mr. Pagett the incumbent, upon a pretence that these tenements were church-land, got a reference to the lord bishop of London, then Lord-Treasurer, and myself. My Lords, we procured not the reference; but when it was brought to us under the king's hand, we could not refuse to sit upon it. Upon full hearing, we were satisfied that the cause was not rightly stated; and therefore we referred them to the law again for another Trial, and for costs to the barons of that court. And this was the Answer which I gave to Mr. Browne, when he instanced in this case.' He says the houses were given to superstitious uses; But possessions are not to be carried away for saying so. If men may get land from others by saying it was given to superstitious uses, they may get an easy purchase. And Mr. Symms is here in his own case. But whether the houses were given to superstitious uses or not, is the thing to be tried in law, and not to be pleaded to us. He complains that I would not hear his Petition alone: And surely, my Lords, I had no reason, since it was referred to another with me. And yet I see, though I was not in the reference alone, nor would hear it alone, yet I must be alone in the Treason. And here I desired that Mr. Pagett, the incumbent, might be heard.

2. The other Witness was Mr. Bernard: He says he was present at the hearing: and that Mr. Symms said he was undone, if he must go to a new Trial. But, my Lords, so may men say, that by their troublesomeness in lawsuits go about to undo others. He says that Mr. Pagett named his own Referees; If that be so, it is no fault of mine. He says the reference was made to us only to certify, not to make any Order in it: If this be so, here is no Proof so much as offered that we did not certify, as we were required, and then had power given to order it; which we did. And he confesses the counsel on both sides had full hearing before ought was done.

IV. The fourth Charge of this day was concerning the imprisonment of one Grafton, an upholsterer in London. The Witnesses three; Of which,

1. The first is Grafton, in his own cause: And it is much if he cannot tell a plausible tale for himself. He says first, That 12 years ago he was committed, and fined 50l. by other Commissioners. By others, my Lords; therefore not by me: And an act of the high-commission, by his own words, it appears to be. He says, He was continued in prison by my procurement, as he verily believes. First, "as he verily believes" is no Proof. And the ground of his belief is as weak: For he gives no reason of it but this, That Dr. Ryves, the king's Advocate, spake with the barons; but he doth not say about what, or from whom. He adds farther, That Mr. Ingram, Keeper of the Fleet, would not give way to his release, notwithstanding the barons orders, till he heard from me. Here is no man produced that heard Mr. Ingram say so; nor is Mr. Ingram himself brought to testify. Lastly, he says, That he then made means in court, and so repaired to the barons again, but all in vain; and that bacon Trevor cried out, "O the Bishop! O the Bishop!" First, here is a confession of means in court made to the Judges: So belike they may have means made to them, so it be not by me. For the particular, I did humbly desire the baron, being then present, might be asked. He was asked: He blushed, and fumbled. The lords laughed, and I could not hear what he said.

2. The second Witness was Mr. Lenthall. But he said nothing, but that there was an Order for Grafton's liberty; which is not denied.

3. The third was Mr. Rivett. He says, That Mr. Ingram said that Grafton was a Brownist, and must be brought into the Fleet again, because he did much hurt among the king's subjects. This is a bare report of a Speech of Mr. Ingram; it no ways concerns me. And a Separatist he is from the Church of England: But whether a Brownist, or no, I cannot tell, there are so many sects, (God help us.) And much harm he hath done among weak people: For most true it is, which St. Cyril observes, πρῶτον μὲν ἡ Διαιρέσις τὰ χρισματα τῶν λαῶν, ἵνα ἰσχυρότερον γίνωνται ἡ ἐρήμωσι. "That the devil prepares these schismatical separations, that so much the more easily the enemy may be received." As for this man, he was in his way cunning enough: for under pretence that he suffered by me, he got madam Vantlet, and other of the French, to negotiate with the queen's majesty in his behalf. And this I found, that sometimes, when her majesty knew not of it, they sent to the Barons for favour for him. And yet I never heard that baron Trevor ever cried out, "O the French! O the French!" Nor can I tell what stopped his mouth in this cry, and opened it so wide in the other, when we moved to defend ourselves and our proceedings. Where, I humbly desire, this passage of the law may be considered; in the case of depraving the Common-Prayer-Book, (so much scorned and vilified at this day) and for not coming to church. The words of the law are, "For due examination hereof, the queen's most excellent majesty, the lords temporal, and all the commons in this present parliament assembled, do in God's name earnestly require and charge all the Arch-bishops, bishops, and other ordinaries, that they shall endeavour, to the uttermost of their knowledge, that the due and true execution hereof may be had throughout their diocesses and charges, as they will answer before God, &c." 1 Eliz. c. 2. Now, if I do not this, here is an apparent breach of the law: And if I do it against the common and great depraver of this Book, then the Judge, who by this law should assist me, cries, "O the Bishop!" And this answer I gave Mr. Browne, when he summed his charge against me.

V. The fifth Charge of this day was Mr. John Ward's Case, in a suit about Simony in the High-Commission.

He says, (for he also is in his own cause) That upon a pretence of a lapse by Simony, I procured a Presentation from the king to the church of Dinnington. His majesty trusted me with the tithes, which did accrue to him in that kind: And because Simony had been so rife, commanded me to be careful I might not betray his trust. And therefore the Simony being offered to be proved, I procured his majesty's presentation for trial of the tithes. And this I conceive was no offence; though this be that which he calls the leaviness of my hand upon him. He farther says, That I sent to the bishop of Norwich to admit the king's clerk, the Church being void, 7 Junii 1638. Nor do I yet see, my Lords, what crime it is in me, trusted especially as before, to send to the Bishop to admit when the church is void: Many Lay-Patrons do that, upon allegation of Simony, before proof. And Mr. Bland, produced as a Witness also, says, That the lord Goring prevailed with the lord bishop of Norwich not to admit. And I hope an arch-bishop, and trusted therein by his majesty, may as lawfully write to the Ordinary for admission of the king's clerk, as any Lay-Lord may write against it. But Mr. Ward says nothing to this of the lord Goring; but adds, That sir John Rowse prevented this admission by a Ne Admittas, Junii 12. And that thereupon I said, "It was to no purpose for us to sit there, if after a long trial, and judgment given, all might be stopped." If I did say so, I think it is a manifest truth that I spake; for it were far better not to have Simony tried at all in ecclesiastical courts, than after a long trial to have it called off into Westminster-hall, to the double charge and trouble of the subject. But if the law will have it otherwise, we cannot help that. Nor is this Expression of mine any violation of the law.

Then he says, a Letter was directed from the Court of the High-Commission to the Judges, to revoke the Ne Admittas; and that I was forward to have the letter sent. How forward soever I was, yet it is confessed the Letter was sent by the Court, not by me; and let the Letter be produced, it shall therein appear, that it was not to revoke the Ne Admittas, but to desire the Judges to consider, whether it were not fit to be revoked, considering the church was not void till Jun. 14. And it hath been usual in that Court, to write or send some of their body to the temporal Judges, where they conceive there hath been a misinformation, or a mistake in the cause; the Judges being still free to judge according to law, both for the one and the other. And here he confesses the writ of Ne Admittas was revoked by three judges, and therefore I think legally.

But here he hopes he hath found me in a contradiction. For when I writ to the bishop of Norwich, Junii 7, 1638, I there said the church was void; whereas this Letter to the Judges says it was not void till Junii 14. But here is no contradiction at all: For after the Trial past, and the Simony proved, the church is void to so much as the Bishop's giving of institution; and so I writ Junii 7. But till the Sentence was pronounced in open court, and read, the Church was not void, as touching those legalities, which, as I humbly conceive, do not till then take place in Westminster-Hall: And the reading of the Sentence was not till Junii 14. However, if I were mistaken in my own private Letter to the Bishop, yet that was better thought on in the letter from the High-Commission to the judges. He says, lastly, That upon a Quare Impedit, after taken forth, it was found that the king had no right. Why, my Lords, if different courts judge differently of Simony, I hope that shall not be imputed to me. In the court where I sat, I judged according to my conscience, and the law, and the proof, as it appeared to me. And for Dr. Ryves's Letter, which he says was sent to the Cursitor to stop the Ne Admittas, let Dr. Ryves answer it. The Witness himself confesses that Dr. Ryves says the command to the Cursitor was from the Lord Keeper, not from me. And here ends the Treason against Mr. Ward; and, till now, I did not think any could have been committed against a minister.

VI. Then followed the Case of Ferdinando Adams, his Excommunication, and the Suits which followed it: As it will appear by the Witnesses following, which were four.

1. The first was Mr. Henry Dade, the Commissary then, before whom the Cause began. And he confesses, He did excommunicate Adams for not blotting out a Sentence of Scripture, which the said Adams had caused to be written upon the church-wall, as in many churches Sentences of Scripture are writteu. But he tells your lordships too, that this Sentence was, "My house shall be called a house of prayer: but ye have made it a den of thieves."

[Mat. 21. 13.] The Commissary's Court was kept, as usually it is, at or towards the West end of the church; and just over the court Adams had written this Sentence upon the wall, merely to put a scorn and scandal, though I hope an unjust one, upon that court. 'He was commanded to blot it out. He would not, because it was Scripture; as if a man might not revile and slander, nay, speak Treason too, if he will be so wicked, and all in Scripture-Phrase: Witness that lewd speech lately uttered, "To your Tents, O Israel, &c." [Reg. 12. 16.] Upon this he was excommunicated; and I cannot but think he well deserved it. For the suit which followed against Mr. Dade in the Star-Chamber; the motion that Mr. Attorney would leave him to the common prosecutor, and not follow it in his own name, himself confesses, was made in open court by Mr. Bierly, and that from me he had no instructions at all.

2. The second Witness is Adams in his own cause. To the place of Scripture I have spoken already. And the next that he says, is, That sir Nath. Brent, in my visitation, commanded the setting of the Communion-Table at the upper end of the Chancel; That upon his blotting out the passage of Scripture, he had an action; and that his Solicitor was committed by J. Jones, till he relinquished his suit. In all this there is not one word of any thing that I did. And for that which sir Nath. Brent did about placing the Communion-Table, it is answered before. [In the second Charge of this day.] He says also, That when he saw he must prosecute his suit against commissary Dade in his own name, he left the kingdom. And surely, my Lords, if he would leave the kingdom rather than prosecute his cause in his own name, it is more than a sign, that his cause was not very good.

3. The third Witness was Mr. Cockshot, one of Mr. Attorney Banks's servants. He says, That Adams moved him, and he Mr. Attorney; and that thereupon Mr. Attorney gave his warrant against Dade. By which your lordships may see how active Mr. Cockshot was against a church officer, and in so foul a Scandal. He says also, That Mr. Dade came to Mr. Attorney, and told him, that I did not think it fit, a prosecution in such a cause should be followed in Mr. Attorney's name. First, it is true, I did not think it fit; nor did Mr. Attorney himself, when, upon Mr. Bierly's motion, he fully understood it. Secondly, The cause being so scandalous to a church officer, I conceive I might so say to Mr. Dade, or any other without offence. But then, Thirdly, here's not one word that I sent Mr. Dade to Mr. Attorney about it: he came and used my name, so Mr. Cockshot says; but not one word that I sent him. Lastly, He says, That Mr. Attorney told him, that I blamed him for the business, and that thereupon he chid this Witness, and sent him to me; and that I rebuked him for it: but he particularly remembers not what I said. Nor truly, my lords, do I remember any of this. But if I did blame Mr. Attorney for lending his name in such a scandalous cause as this, I did, as I conceive, what became me. And if he chid his man, he did what became him. And if I rebuked Mr. Cockshot when he was sent to me, sure he deserved it; and it seems it was with no great sharpness, that he cannot remember any thing of it. And so I answered Mr. Brown when he instanced in 'this.'

4. The last Witness was Mr. Prynne, who says, no Appeal was left him. But that, under favour, cannot be: For if my Courts refused him (which is more than I know) he might have appealed to the Delegates. He says, That he advised Adams for an action of the case; that he blamed Lechford for deserting the suit, and that he advised him to go to Mr. Attorney. So here is no assistance wanting to Adams, but the church-officer Mr. Dade must have none. Yet I blame not Mr. Prynne, because he says he did it as his counsel. He says farther, That when Adams was put to prefer his Bill in his own name, that then the Excommunication was pleaded in bar: But he doth not say it was pleaded by me, or my advice; nor do I hear him say, it was unjustly pleaded. And had not Adams been wilful, he might have taken off the excommunication, and then proceeded as it had pleased him.

VII. Then the Charge went on against me, about the stop of Mr. Bagshawe the Reader of the Middle-Temple. The Witnesses are two lawyers, who accompanied Mr. Bagshawe to Lambeth, Mr. White and Mr. Peyps. They say, That Mr. Bagshawe insisted upon these two points; First, That a Parliament might be held without Bishops; and, secondly, That Bishops might not meddle in civil affairs. My Lords, these things are now settled by an act of this parliament, but then they were not. And I conceive, under favour, that Mr. Bagshawe (the craziness of these times considered) might have bestowed his time better upon some other argument: And sure no man can think, that either myself, or any Church-Governor, could approve his Judgment in that particular. And whereas they say, That the Lord Keeper Finch, and the Lord Privy Seal told them, that I was the man that complained of it to the king and the lords: It is most true, I did so; and I think I had been much to blame if I had not done it. And if when they came over to Lambeth about it, they heard me tell Mr. Bagshawe (as they also say they did) that he should answer it in the High-Commission Court next term; I humbly conceive this no great offence; but out of all question no Treason to threaten the High-Commission to a Reader of the Inns of Court.

VIII. The last Charge of this day was concerning the Lord Chief Justice Richardson, and what he suffered for putting down Wakes and other disorderly Meetings in Somersetshire, at the Assizes there holden.

The single witness to this is Edward Richard- son, a (kinsman of the Judge's, as I suppose.) He says, That complaints were made to the Judge of Wakes and Feasts of dedication; That his majesty writ Letters about it to sir Robert Phillips and others. They certify a command comes by the Lord Keeper to revoke the Order next assizes. First, It is not done. Then by command from the Lords of the Council, the Judge, upon that second command, revokes it; but, as it is certified, not fully. In all this here is not one word that concerns me. Then he says, That upon this last certificate, the business was referred to the Lord Marshal and myself, and the Judge put from that circuit. I cannot now remember what report we made: But whatever it was, the Lord Marshal agreed to it as well as I. Then a Letter of mine was produced of Octob. 4, 1633. But the Letter being openly read, nothing was found amiss in it. And, under your lordship's favour, I am still of opinion, that there is no reason the Feasts should be taken away for some abuses in them; and those such as every justice of peace is able by law to remedy, if he will do his duty. Else by this kind of proceeding, we may go back to the old cure, and remedy drunkenness by rooting out all the vines; the wine of whose fruit causes it. As for the Prentences, which this Witness spake of; they were none of mine, as appears evidently by the Letter itself.

As an Appendix to these, was added a Letter of my secretary Mr. Dell, to sir John Bridgman, Chief Justice of Chester, in a Cause of one Ed. Morris. It was (as I think it appears) upon an Incroachment made in the Marches Court upon the church; in which case, I conceive, by my place, I may write to any judge for information: And there is nothing peremptory in the Letter. The words are ("If things be rightly suggested"). But howsoever, the Letter is Dell's; and if he have done amiss in it, he is here present to answer. And it will be a hard business with men of honour, if when any lord shall command his Secretary to write, and give him directions for the matter, he shall afterwards be answerable for every slip of his Secretary's pen; especially in so high a way, as it is charged on me. But the best is, here is nothing amiss that I know.

The Sixth Day of my Hearing.

I. Thursday March 28, 1644. The first Charge of this day concerned the Censure, Deprivation and Imprisonment of Mr. Huntly. The Witnesses produced are four.

1. Mr. Merifield comes on first. He says, That himself was committed by the Lords of the Council; and that there I said, That he the said Merifield deserved to be laid by the heels, and to be called into the Star-Chamber. This man was (as I take it) Mr. Huntly's Attorney; and if I did speak those Words concerning him, surely his words and carriage deserved it; else I am confident the lords would not have committed him for a naked, and an orderly following of his Client's cause; especially in the presence of two Judges, justice Jones and justice Crook, who, he says himself, were present. And this Answer I gave Mr. Brown; who, in the sum of his Charge against me, omitted not this Case of Mr. Merifield; for so was this Attorney's name.

2. The next Witness is Mr. Huntly himself. He says, that I said unto him, That he being an Ecclesiastical person, and in an Ecclesiastical cause, ought not to decline the Church-Censure. Then followed his Imprisonment, and his action for false imprisonment, and the rest of his proceedings. In all which the High Commission proceeded against him, and he proceeded against the High Commissioners; nothing done by me, or against me, in particular. So nothing of his charge falls upon me, but the Words; and for them, they are very far from offering to exempt any clergyman, him, or other, from the temporal laws, if things cognizable by them. But I humbly conceive, his Oath of Canonical Obedience considered, that he ought not to decline the Ecclesiastical judicature, in things merely Ecclesiastical. And if in this my judgment I do err, yet it is error without crime; and surely, my lords, no Treason.

3. The third Witness is John Dillingham. He says, That Mr. Huntly moved before the Lord Chief Justice Richardson; and that the Judge replied, By his faith he durst not do him justice. To this, my Lords, I answer: Here is never a word that he durst not do him justice for fear of me; that is not said by the Witness, and ought not, by conjectures, to be enforced against me. But howsoever, if he spake these Words; the more shame for him.* He is dead, and I will not rake into his grave; but if he so spake, it seems he was none of those Judges, which Jethro advised Moses to make for the ease of himself, and the good of the people, Exod. xviii. 21. Mr. Browne, in summing up of his Charge, pressed this Speech of the Judge hard upon me; which inforces me to add thus much more, That this Witness lays it hard upon the Judge, not upon me: for no Proof is offered, that I did solicit him in that cause: and if he wanted courage to do justice, why sat he there?

4. The fourth Witness was Mr. Pit, a sworn officer; he says, The Order concerning Mr. Huntly was from the Council, and that there was then a full Board; so this was no single act of mine. He says farther, That he was not simply prohibited, but only till he had acquainted the Lord Keeper with it, or those Judges whose courts it concerned. And this was so ordered, as I conceive, to remedy the tedious and troublesome-interpositions of Mr. Huntly. Where it is not unfit for me to inform your lordships, that this cause of Mr. Huntly's was in my predecessor archbishop Abbot's time; I had nothing to do in it, but as any other ordinary commissioner then present had.

And here, at the entering upon my Answers this day, I did in general put the lords in mind, That nothing of late times was done, either in Star-Chamber, or at Council-Table, which was not done in king James and queen Elizabeth's times, before I was born; and that many Parliaments have been since, and no man accused of Misdemeanor for things done there, much less of Treason. Nor is there any one Witness that hath charged me, That that which I did, was to overthrow the Laws, or to introduce Arbitrary Government: 'That is only the construction made on it at the Bar; which, as it is without all Proof for any such intention, so I am confident they shall answer for it at another Bar, and for something else in these Proceedings.'

II. Then followed the Charge about Prohibitions; in which are many Particulars, which I shall take in order, as the several Witnesses charged them upon me.

1. The first is Mr. Prynn. He says, That in an. 4to Caroli, he brought a Prohibition, and that thereupon I should say, "Doth the King give us power, and then are we prohibited? Let us go and complain." First, If this were anno 4 Caroli, it was long before the Article; so that I could neither expect the Charge, nor provide the Answer. Secondly, I humbly conceive there is no Offence in the Words: For if a Prohibition be unjustly granted upon Misinformation, or otherwise; or if we do probably conceive it is ill-grounded, I hope it is no sin to complain of it to the king, the Fountain of Justice in both Courts. Yea, but he says farther, that I said I would lay him by the heels that brought the next: 2. And this Mr. Burton witnesses with him. First, If I did say so, they were but a few hasty words; for upon second thoughts it was not done. Next, I desire your lordships to consider what manner of Witness Mr. Burton is; who confesses here before your lordships, that he brought the next with a purpose to tempt me: You know whose office that is; and so Mr. Burton hath abundantly shewed himself, and proclaimed his religion.

3. As for Mr. Combs, he says just the same with Mr. Prynn, and I give the same Answer.

Then about taking down of a Pew in a Church in London, (my Notes are uncertain for the name) which pew was set above the Communion-Table; that I required to have it pulled down; that they came to me to have an Order for it: and that thereupon I should say, "You desire an Order of Court, that you may have it to shew, and get a Prohibition; but I will break the back of Prohibitions, or they shall break mine." 4, 5. And this is jointly witnessed by Mr. Pocock and Mr. Langham: and this they say was 13 or 14 years ago. Excellent memories, that can punctually swear words so long after! But, my Lords, I confess to your lordships, I could never like, that Seats should be set above the Communion-Table:

if that be an error in me, be it so. For the Words, I did not speak them of Prohibitions in general, but of such as I did conceive very illegal; as, for ought I yet know, this must have been. 'And this was the Answer which I gave Mr. Browne, when, in summing up the Charge, he instanced in this against me.' 6. To these Rowland Tompson adds new Words; "That I wondered who durst grant a Prohibition, the High Commission Court being above all." But he confesses, he knows not the time when this was spoken. Let him look to his Oath, for I am as confident he knows not the thing. And I further believe, that neither he, nor any the rest of my Accusers think me so ignorant, as to say the High Commission Court was above all.

7. Francis Nicolas says, That about four years since he delivered a Prohibition, and was committed for it. 8. To this, Quaterman comes in and says more than Nicolas himself: for he says, he delivered it in upon a stick, and was committed for it. First, if he were committed, it was not for bringing the Prohibition, but for his unmannerly delivery of it; and to reach it into the Court upon a stick to call the people to see it, was no handsome way of delivery. And one that brought a Prohibition (whether this man or no, I cannot certainly say) threw it with that violent scorn into the Court, that it bounded on the table, and hit me on the breast, as I sat in Court. Howsoever his commitment was the act of the Court, not mine: and for Quaterman, he is an exasperated man against me and that Court, as hath appeared to the world many ways.

9. Mr. Edwards was called up next; and he says, It was a common thing to lay them by the heels which brought Prohibitions. And they were commonly brought by bold impudent men, picked out of purpose to affront the Court. And then if the Court made their imprisonment as common as they their rudeness, where is the fault? And I pray mark, this is still the act of the Court, not mine.

10. Mr. Welden says, That there was a command given to lay hold of a man, which brought a Prohibition: but more he says not. Nor did he offer to make himself Judge of the justice of the Court in that behalf. And considering what affronts have been put upon the court of High-Commission by the bringers of Prohibitions, I hope it shall not be accounted a crime to stay him that brings it, till the Prohibition be seen and considered.

11. The next witness is Mr. Ward, 'and he is an angry witness, for his cause before mentioned about simony.' That which he says, is, That Ann. 1638, he that brought a Prohibition in a cause of Mr. Foetrougts, was laid by the heels: but he himself confesses, the Court then declared, that they were affronted by him; and then he was punished for that Misdemeanor in his carriage, not for bringing the Prohibition. He says farther, That I directed some Commissioners to attend the Judges about it, and that the party had no benefit by his Prohibition. For my directing attendance upon the Judges, I think I did what well became me; for there came a rule before the Prohibition, which required the Court so to do: 'And Mr. Prynne objected, because this was not done; and now I am accused, because I gave direction to do it.' And if the party had no benefit by his Prohibition, it must needs follow, that either the Judges were satisfied by our Information of the Cause; or if not, that they did Mr. Foetroughts the wrong, and not we.

12. The last Witness about Prohibitions, was Mr. Wheeler. He says, that in a Sermon of mine long since, I used these words; "They which grant Prohibitions to the disturbance of the Church's Right, God will prohibit their entrance into the kingdom of Heaven:" and he says he writ down the words, that he might remember them. If this gentleman will tell me what Text I then preached on, I will look upon my Sermon, (if that, with my other Papers, be not taken from me) and shew the place. In the mean time, with that limitation with which he confesses I spake them, I conceive there is no fault at all in the words. For it will be found no small fault in Judges to grant Prohibitions to the disturbance of the Rights of the Church, which no law of God or man warrants them to do. So the words I spake, must needs be understood of illegal Prohibitions. For they which are legal, do only stop the Church from doing wrong, but do no wrong to the Church by disturbing her rights. 'Mr. Browne charged this Sermon-Note upon me also, and I gave him this Answer. Nevertheless, I cannot but be sorry to hear it from Mr. Wheeler's own mouth, that he was so careful to write this Passage, and so ready to come to witness it against me, considering how many years I have known him, and how freely he hath often come to my table, and been welcome to me; yet never told me, this passage in my Sermon troubled him. It seems some malignity or other laid it up against this wet day.'

Here, having thus answered all Particulars, I humbly craved leave of their lordships, to inform them some few things concerning Prohibitions. As first, that there was a great contestation about them, between my predecessor, Archbishop Bancroft, and the then Judges, and this before king James and the Lords of the Council; and Mr. Attorney Hobart pleaded for the Church against them: Sir Henry Martin gave me copies of all those Papers on both sides. No final end made, that I could ever hear of. This calling them all in question, was far more than ever was done by me, or in my time; and yet no Accusation at all, much less any of Treason, put up against Archbishop Bancroft for this. Secondly, I have here Papers* attested of all the Prohibitions, which have been admitted in my Courts of Arches, and Audience; and I find, there are as many (if not more) admitted in my seven years time, as in any seven years of my predecessor Archbishop Abbot. And these Papers I delivered into the Court. As for the High-Commission, the Records are all taken from us; else I make no doubt, but it would soon appear by them, that as many have been admitted there also. Thirdly, There is a great difference touching Prohibitions, and the sending of them, since the times of Reformation, and before. For before, the Bishops Courts were kept under a foreign power; and there were then weighty reasons for Prohibitions, both in regard of the King's Power, and the Subjects indemnity. But since the Reformation, all power exercised in the Spiritual Courts is from the king, as well as the Temporal; so that now there neither is nor can be so much cause as formerly was. And yet all that I did humbly and earnestly desire, was, that some known bounds might be set to each Court, that the Subject might not, to his great trouble and expence, be hurried, as now he was, from one court to another. And here I desired a Salvo, till I might bring archbishop Parker's Book,* to shew his Judgment in this point, in the beginning of the Reformation, if it shall be thought needful. 'According to whose Judgment (and he proves it at large) there is open wrong done to the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction by Prohibitions.'

III. The next Charge is about my undue taking of Gifts: a Charge which I confess I did not think to meet here. And I must and do humbly desire your lordships to remember, that till this day I have not been accused, in the least, for doing any thing corruptly: and if I would have had any thing to do in the base dirty business of Bribery, I needed not have been in such want as now I am. But my innocency is far more to my comfort, than any wealth so gotten could have been: for I cannot forget that of Job, That "Fire should consume the Tabernacle of Bribery." (Job. xv. 34.) And in the Roman Story, when P. Rutilius, a man Summâ Innocentiâ, of greatest integrity, was accused, condemned, and banished, it is observed, by the Story, that he suffered all this not for Bribery, of which he was not guilty, but ob Invidiam, for envy; against which, when it rages, no innocency, no worth of any man is able to stand.' (Calvis. Chro. p. 251.)

1. But to come to the Particulars: The first is the Case of sir Edward Gresham's Son, unhappily married against his father's will; a suit in the High-Commission about it; and that there he had but 50*l.* Damages given him. That was no fault of mine: My Vote gave him more; but it was carried against me. The bond of 200*l.* which was taken according to course in the court, (Can. Ec. Ang. 101.) was demanded of me by sir Edward, to help himself that way; and it is confessed I granted it.

But then it is charged, That in my reference to sir John Lambeth, to deliver him the bond, I required him to demand one half of the forfeiture of the bond toward the Repair of St. Paul's. It is true, I did so: but, 1st, I desire it may be considered, that it was wholly in my power, whether I would have delivered him the Bond, or not. 2dly, That upon this gross abuse, I might have sued the bond in my own name, and bestowed the money upon what charitable uses I had thought fit. 3dly, That I did nothing herein but what the letters-patent for Repair of St. Paul's gave me power to do. 4thly, That this is the third time St. Paul's is urged against me: which I am not sorry for; because I desire (since it is once moved) it may be sifted to the uttermost. And whereas, to make all Ecclesiastical Proceedings the more odious, it was urged, That the Rubric in the Common-Prayer Book mentions no Licence, but Asking of Banes: That Rubric is to be understood where no licence is granted: for else no licence at all for Marriage without banes-asking can be good; which is against the common both law and practice of the kingdom. (Can. 62, Ec. Ang.)

2. The second Particular was charged by one Mr. Stone, of London; who said, He sent into Lambeth two butts of sack, in a cause of some Chester-men, whom it was then in my power to relieve, and mitigate their Fine set upon them in the High-Commission at York, about Mr. Prynne's entertainment, as he passed that way; and that this sack was sent in before my Composition with him what should be mitigated, and so before my return of the Fine mitigated into the Exchequer. The business, my Lords, was thus: His majesty having taken the Repair of the West-end of St. Paul's to himself, granted me to that end all the Fines in the High-Commission Court, both here and at York, and left the power of mitigation in me. The Chester-men, which this Witness speaks of, were deeply sentenced at York for some Misdemeanors about Mr. Prynne, then lately sentenced in the Star-Chamber. One or more of them were debtors to this Mr. Stone, to the value of near 3,000*l*. (as he said.) These men, for fear of the Sentence, kept themselves close, and gave Mr. Stone to know how it was with them; and that if he could not get me to moderate the Fine, they would away, and save themselves, (for they had now heard the power was in me.) Upon this, Mr. Stone, to save his own debt of 3,000*l*. sends his son-in-law Mr. Wheat and Dr. Bailie, men that were bred in the college of St. John under me, and had ever since good interest in me, to desire my favour. I at first thought this a pretence, and was willing to preserve to St. Paul's as much as fairly I might. But at last, upon their earnest pleading that the men were not rich, and that Mr. Stone was like (without any fault of his) to be so much damnified, I mitigated their Fines, which were in all above 1,000*l* to 200*l*. I had great thanks of all hands; and was told from the Chester-men, that they heartily wished

I had the hearing of their cause from the beginning. While Mr. Wheat and his brother Dr. Bailie were soliciting me for favour to Mr. Stone, he thinks upon sending sack into my house, and comes to my Steward about it. My Steward acquaints me with it. I gave him absolute command not to receive it, nor any thing from any man that had business before me: so he refuses to admit of any. Mr. Stone presses him again, and tells him he had no relation to the Chester-Mens Cause; but would give it for the great favour I had always shewed to his son-in-law. But still I commanded my Steward to receive none. When Mr. Stone saw he could not fasten it, he watches a time when my steward was out of town, and myself at court, and brings in his sack, and tells the yeoman of my wine-cellar he hath leave to lay it in. My steward comes home, finds the sack in the cellar; tells me of it: I commanded it should be taken out, and carried back. Then Mr. Stone comes, intreats he may not be so disgraced; protests, as before, that he did it merely for my great favour to his son-in-law; and that he had no relation to the Chester-Mens business: and so after he protested to myself, meeting me in a morning, as I was going over to the Star-Chamber. Yet afterwards this religious professor (for so he carries himself) goes home, and puts the price of the sack upon the Chester-Mens Account. Hereupon they complain to the House of Commons; and Stone is their Witness.

This is the truth of this business, as I shall answer it to God. 'And whether this do not look like a thing plotted by the Faction, so much embittered against me, let understanding men judge.' Mr. Wheat, his son-in-law, was present in Court, and there avowed that he transacted the business with me, and that he went not out of town till I had agreed to the Mitigation; that in all that time there was no tender of sack, or any thing else, unto me; and he and Dr. Bailie were the only men with whom I transacted the whole business. 'And so much could Dr. Bailie also witness, but that, as the times are, I could not bring him from Oxford.' With Mr. Stone himself I never treated. For my Steward, he is dead three years since, who could have been my Witness clean thorough the business. And when I pressed Mr. Stone at the bar with the Protestation which he made to me, that he had no relation herein to the Chester men, he that remembered every circumstance else, said he remembered not that. Then I offered to take my voluntary oath of the truth of it; but that was not admitted. Then it was pressed, That this Bribe must needs be before the agreement; for he says the sack was sent into my house —, and the Mitigation of the Fine into the Exchequer not till —. But that is nothing: for my agreement was passed, and I meddled no more with it. Yea, but he says, that Mr. Holford, my servant, had 40*l* more than I agreed upon, before he would finish their business. Mr. Holford was the king's officer for those returns into the Exchequer: and if after my agreement made, he either unduly delayed their business, or corruptly took any money from them, he is living, and must answer for his own fault; me it cannot concern, who did not so much as know of it.

Mr. Wheat, having thus testified in open Parliament, before the Lords, was within a day or two called before the Committee; there re-examined in private, and very strictly, touching the time of my Agreement made: Then, not without some harshness, commanded not to depart the town, till he heard farther from them. This himself afterwards told me. Hereupon I resolved to call him again for farther Evidence, and, if I saw cause, to acquaint the lords with this usage. And I did call for it divers times after; but one delay or other was found, and I could never obtain it: and such a kind of calling my Witnesses to a private after-reckoning, is that which was never offered any man in parliament. And here Mr. Browne, in summing up my Charge, did me a great deal of right: for neither to the Lords, nor in the House of Commons, did he vouchsafe so much as to name this false, base, and unworthy Charge; of which my greatest enemies are ready to acquit me.

3. The third Particular was charged by one Mr. Delbridge; who says, He was oppressed at the Council-Table by the Lord Keeper Finch; that he was advised by Mr. Watkins to give my Secretary, Mr. Dell, money to get my hand to a Petition to the Lord Keeper, who, he said, would not oppose me: That Dell took of him 150*l.* and procured my hand to his Petition. I remember nothing of this business, and it lies wholly upon my Secretary; who being my Solicitor, is here present in Court, and desires he may answer the scandal.

There is no touch at all upon me, but that (he says) my Secretary got my hand to his Petition to the Lord Keeper. This Petition of his was either just or unjust: If just, I committed no fault in setting my hand to it; if unjust, he must confess himself a dishonest man, to offer to get my hand to bolster out his injustice: And yet if the injustice of it were varnished over with fair pretences, and so kept from my knowledge, the crime is still his own, and nothing mine, but an error at most. As for Mr. Watkins, he did me much wrong, if he sent any man to my house on such an errand.

Here my Secretary had leave to speak: denied the whole Business; and produced Mr. Hollis, with whom it was said the 150*l.* before-named should be deposited, who, to my remembrance, said he knew of no such thing.

4. The fourth Instance was a Bond for the payment of money as a Fine: The Bond found in sir Jo. Lamb's Chamber, with a Note upon the back of it, for 100*l.* received, and sir John, by my direction, was to call for the rest. And here it was said, That I used the name of St. Paul's in an illegal way to get money; which might well have been spared. For, as is aforesaid, I had a broad-seal, which gave me all Fines in the High Commission Court to the repairing of the West-end of St. Paul's, and with power to mitigate. And the Fines are to the king's, and he may give them by law. The broad-seal is in the hands of Mr. Holford, who is thereby appointed Receiver of all such Fines; but is upon Record to be seen: And if it be doubted, I humbly desire a Safvo till the Record can be taken out, and shewed. But I presume these gentlemen have seen it. And Commutations for such crimes, as sir James Price's was, are according to law, and the ancient custom and practice in this kingdom, especially where men of quality are the offenders. And the power of commuting is as legal in that Court as any other: and if that be doubted, I humbly desire my Counsel may argue it.

5. The fifth Instance was a Charge concerning a Lease in Lancashire, held in three lives by sir Ralph Ashton. It is said by his son Mr. Ashton, the only Witness in the Cause, That I by power at Chester and York, and the High Commission here, being landlord in right of my Archbishoprick, did violently wrest this Lease of the Rectory of Whally in Lancashire out of his hands against law, and made him take a lease for years, and pay a great Fine besides, and other fines besides towards the repair of St. Paul's, and raised the rent 60*l.* Truly, my Lords, I am not any whit solicitous to answer this Charge. I challenged this Lease as void, and had great reason so to do, both for the invalidity of the lease itself, and the unworthiness of the tenant, both to me and my See. If in the preparations for trial at law, the judge at Chester (altogether unknown to me, and unlaboured by me) did say, as Mr. Ashton says he did, That for higher powers above he durst not, he was the more unworthy. And for York, I needed no power there; for I resolved to have him called into the High Commission here: which was after done.

This gentleman his son came to me about the Lease: I told him plainly, it was void in law, and that I meant to overthrow it: That if his father would surrender, I would renew it for years at a reasonable rate; but if he put me to expence in law, I would secure myself as well as legally I might. He replied, That Mr. Solicitor Littleton, (for so then he was) said, he durst not be against me. And there was good reason for it; he was my counsel, and feed in that particular. And what a poor evasion was this? Were there no other lawyers for him, because Mr. Solicitor was for me? The truth is, all that ever I did in this business, was not only with the knowledge, but by the advice of my Counsel, which were Mr. Solicitor Littleton and Mr. Herbert.

And at last this gentleman submitted himself and the cause; and if, as he says, Dr. Eden persuaded him to it, that nothing to me. As for the Fine, I referred the moderation of it wholly to my Counsel; they pitched upon 1,600*l.*, and gave such days of payment, as that a good part is yet unpaid; and this sum was little above one year's rent; for the parsonage is known to be well worth 1,300*l.* a year, if not more. And after the business was settled, my lord Wimbleton came to me, and gave me great thanks for preserving this gentleman, being, as he said, his kinsman, whom he confessed, it was in my power to ruin.

For the raising of the rent 60*l.*, it was to add means to the several curates to the Chapels of Ease: And I had no reason to suffer sir Ralph Ashton to go away with so much profit, and leave the curates both upon my conscience and my purse. And for his Fine to St. Paul's I gave him all the ease I could. But since his son will force it from me, he was accused of Adultery with divers women, and confessed all; And whether that Fine went, and by what authority, I have already shewed. And thus much more, my lords, at Mr. Bridgman's intreaty, I turned this Lease into lives again without Fine: But since I have this reward for it, I wish with all my heart I had not done it. For I am confident in such a case of Right, your lordships would have left me to the law, and more I would not have asked. And I think this, though intreated into it, was my greatest error in the business.

6. The last Instance was about the conversion of some Money to St. Paul's, out of administrations: By name, 3,000*l.* taken out of Wimark's estate, and 500*l.* out of Mr. Gray's. First, whatsoever was done in this kind, I have the broad seal to warrant it. And for Mr. Wimark's Estate, all was done according to law, and all care taken for his kindred. And if I had not stirred in the business, four men, all strangers to his kindred, would have made themselves, by a broken will, executors, and swept all away from the kindred. Secondly, for Mr. Gray's estate, after as odious an expression of it as could be made, and as void of truth as need be, the proceedings were confessed to be orderly and legal, and the charge deserted.

Then there was a fling at sir Charles Cæsar's getting of the Mastership of the Rolls for money, and that I was his means for it: And so it was thence inferred, that I sold Places of Judicature, or helped to sell them. For this they produced a Paper under my hand: but when they had thrown all the dirt they could upon me, they say, they did only shew what probabilities they had for it, and what reason they had to lay it in the end of the Fourth Original Article; and so deserted it. And well they might; for I never had more hand in this business, than that when he came to me about it, I told him plainly as things then stood, that place was not like to go without more money, than I thought any wise man would give for it: Nor doth the Paper mentioned say any more, but that I informed the Lord Treasurer what had passed between us.

This Day ended, I was ordered to appear again, April 4, 1644, and received a Note from the Committee, under serjeant Wild's hand, dated April 1. That they meant to proceed next upon the Fifth and Sixth Original Articles, and upon the Ninth Additional; which follow in hæc verba.

V. "He hath traitorously caused a Book of Canons to be composed and published, and those Canons to be put in execution, without any lawful warrant and authority in that behalf. In which pretended Canons many matters are contained contrary to the king's Prerogative, to the fundamental Laws and Statutes of this realm, to the Right of Parliament, to the Propriety and Liberty of the Subjects; and matters tending to Sedition, and of dangerous consequence; and to the establishment of a vast, unlawful, and presumptuous power in himself and his successors; Many of which Canons, by the practice of the said Archbishop, were surreptitiously passed in the late Convocation, without due consideration and debate; others by fear and compulsion were subscribed unto by the prelates and clerks there assembled which had never been voted and passed in the Convocation, as they ought to have been. And the said Archbishop hath contrived and endeavoured to assure and confirm the unlawful and exorbitant Power which he hath usurped and exercised over his majesty's subjects, by a wicked and ungodly Oath, in one of the said pretended Canons, enjoined to be taken by all the Clergy, and many of the laity of this kingdom."

VI. "He hath traitorously assumed to himself a Papal and Tyrannical Power, both in Ecclesiastical and Temporal Matters, over his majesty's subjects in this realm of England, and in other places, to the disinheritment of the crown, dishonour of his majesty, and derogation of his supreme authority in Ecclesiastical Matters. And the said Archbishop claims the king's Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, as incident to his Episcopal and Archiepiscopal office in this kingdom; and doth deny the same to be derived from the crown of England: which he hath accordingly exercised, to the high contempt of his royal majesty, and to the destruction of divers of the king's liege people in their persons and estates."

The Ninth Additional Article.

IX. "That in and about the month of May 1641," [1640. Rush.] "presently after the dissolution of the last Parliament, the said Archbishop, for the ends and purposes aforesaid, caused a Synod or Convocation of the Clergy to be held for the several provinces of Canterbury and York; wherein were made and established, by his means and procurement, divers Canons and Constitutions Ecclesiastical, contrary to the laws of this realm, the rights and privileges of parliament, and liberty and property of the subject; tending also to sedition, and of dangerous consequence. And, amongst other things, the said Archbishop caused a most dangerous and illegal Oath to be therein made and contrived; the tenor whereof followeth in these Words: 'That I. A. B. do swear, that I do approve the Doctrine and Discipline of Government established in the Church of England, as containing all things necessary to Salvation; and that I will not endeavour, by myself or any other, directly or indirectly, to bring in any Popish Doctrine, contrary to that which is so established: Nor will I ever give my consent to alter the government of this Church by Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, and Archdeacons, &c. as it stands now established, and as by right it ought to stand; nor yet ever to subject it to the usurpations and Superstitions of the see of Rome. And all these things I do plainly and sincerely acknowledge and swear, according to the plain and common sense and understanding of the same words, without any equivocation or mental evasion, or secret reservation whatsoever. And this I do heartily, willingly and truly, upon the faith of a Christian. So help me God in Jesus Christ. Which Oath the said Archbishop himself did take, and caused divers other Ministers of the Church to take the same, upon pain of suspension and deprivation of their livings, and other severe penalties: And did also cause Godfrey, then bishop of Gloucester, to be committed to prison for refusing to subscribe to the said Canons, and to take the said Oath; and afterward the said Bishop submitting himself to take the said Oath, he was set at liberty."

On Thursday April 4, 1644. I was again brought to the house, made a sufficient scorn and gazingstock to the people; and after I had waited some hours, was sent back, by reason of other business, unheard; but ordered to appear again on Monday April 8. Then I appeared again, and was used by the basest of the people as before. I did not appear any day but it cost me six or seven pounds: I grew into want. This made my Counsel and other friends to persuade me, the next time I had admittance to speak, to move the Lords again for some necessary allowance, notwithstanding my former Petition had been rejected. This advice I meant to have followed that day: But after some hours attendance I was sent back again unheard, and ordered to come again on Thursday April 11. This day I did not come to the House; a Warrant being sent to the Tower, which stayed me till Tuesday April 16.

The Seventh Day of my Hearing.

I. April 16. I appeared, and (as I remember) here Mr. Maynard left off (save that now and then he interposed, both in the Reply, and otherwise) and Mr. Nicolas, a man of another temper, undertook the managing of the Evidence. And the first Charge was concerning the late Canons, which he said, were against law to sit, the parliament being dissolved. No, my Lords, nothing against law that I know: For we were called to sit in Convocation by a different writ from that which called us as Bishops to the parliament. And we could not rise, till his majesty sent us another writ to discharge us: And this is well known to the Judges, and the other lawyers here present. So we continued sitting, though the Parliament rose. Nor was this sitting continued by any advice or desire of mine: For I humbly desired a writ to dissolve us. But the best counsel then present, both of Judges, and other lawyers, assured the king we might legally sit. And here is a Copy attested under their hands.

Then he urged, out of my Diary, at May 29, 1640. That I acknowledged there were seventeen Canons made, which I did hope would be useful to the Church. It is true, my Lords, I did hope so. And had I not hoped it, I would never have passed my consent unto them. And when I writ this, there was nothing done or said against them. And if by any inadvertency, or human frailty, any thing erroneous or unfit have slipped into those Canons, I humbly beseech your lordships to remember, it is an Article of the Church of England, That General Councils may err (Art. 21.) and therefore this National Synod may mistake. And that since (if any error be) it is not wilfully, it may be rectified, and in charity passed by.

For the bishop of Gloucester's refusing to subscribe the Canons, and take the Oath; which is here said by the Counsel, but no Proof offered; the truth is this: He first pretended, to avoid his Subscription, that we could not sit, the Parliament risen. He was satisfied in this by the Judges hands. Then he pretended the Oath. But that which stuck in his stomach, was the Canon about suppressing of the Growth of Popery, (Can. 3.) For, coming over to me to Lambeth about that business, he told me, he would be torn with wild horses before he would subscribe that Canon. I gave him the best advice I could; but his carriage was such, when he came into the Convocation, that I was forced to charge him openly with it, and he as freely acknowledged it; as there is plentiful proof of Bishops and other Divines then present. And for his lordship's being after put to take the Oath, which was also urged, it was thus. I took myself bound to acquaint his majesty with this proceeding of my lord of Gloucester's, and did so. But all that was after done about his commitment first and his release after, when he had taken the Oath, was done openly at a full Council-Table, and his majesty present, and can no way be charged upon me, as my act: For it was my duty to let his majesty know it, to prevent farther danger then also discovered. But I am here to defend myself, not to accuse any man else.

Next he urged, That I had interlined the original copy of the Canons with my own hand. But this is clearly a mistake, if not a wilful one. For, perusing the place, I find the interlining is not in my hand, but my hand is to it, as I humbly conceive, it was fit it should. And the words are in the ratification of the Canons, and therefore were necessarily to be in the original, howsoever slipped in the writing of them.

As for the oath so bitterly spoken of at the bar, and in the Articles; either it was made according to law, or else we were wholly misled by precedent, as that such was never excepted against. For in the Canons made in king James's time, there was an Oath made against Simony; and an Oath for Church Wardens; and an Oath about Licences and Marriages; and an Oath for Judges in ecclesiastical courts: And some of these Oaths as dangerous as this is accounted to be. And all these established by no other authority than these late were. And yet neither those Canons, nor those Oaths, were ever declared illegal by any ensuing Parliament, nor the makers of them accused of any crime, much less of Treason. So that we had in this Synod unblamed precedent for what we did, as touching our power of doing it.

But, after all this, he said he would pass these things by, (that is, when he had made them as odious as he could) and would charge nothing upon me but the Votes of both Houses; namely, that these Canons contain matters contrary to the King's Prerogative, to the Fundamental Laws of the realm, to the Rights of Parliament, to the Propriety and Liberty of the Subject, and matters tending to Seditious, and of dangerous consequence. So these Votes of the honourable Houses made so long after, and therefore cannot well be an Evidence against the making of that which was done so long before, is the task lying now upon me to answer; which with your lordships honourable favour, I shall in all humbleness address myself unto.

Before these Words were well out of my mouth, Mr. Nicolas with much earnestness interposed, That he hoped their lordships would not endure that the "solemn Votes of both Houses" should be called into question by any Delinquent; and was sure the House of Commons would not endure it. Upon this the Lords presently gave their Resolution, that I might not speak to any thing that was declared by Votes; but was to answer only to the Fact, whether I made the Canons or no. To this, with leave humbly asked, I replied, That if I might not answer to the Votes, I must yield the Evidence, which I could not do; and that if I might answer, I must dispute the Votes, which their lordships resolved I should not do: That then I was in a perplexity, and must necessarily offend either way; and therefore humbly besought them to consider not my case only, but their own too. For I did conceive it would concern them in honour, as much as me in safety, That no Charge might be brought against me in that great Court, to which I should not be suffered to make answer: or else that they in honour would not judge me for that, to which my answer is not suffered to be given. With this, that all these Canons were made in open and full convocation, and are acts of that body, and cannot be ascribed to me, though President of that Synod, but are the joint acts of the whole body: So by me they were not made; which is my Answer.

And according to this I framed my Answer to Mr. Browne's Summary of my Charge, both hinting the Canons in general, and concerning the Instance before given about the bishop of Gloucester.—But tho' I was not allowed there to make any farther Answer in defence of these Canons; nor can hold it fit to insert here so long an Answer as these Votes require; I humbly desire the courteous Reader, if he please, to look upon the Answer which I have made to a Speech of Mr. Nathaniel Fiennes, in the House of Commons, against these Canons. In which Answer I humbly conceive, I have satisfied whatsoever these Votes contain against them. Howsoever, I cannot but observe this in present. The words in the sixth Original Article are, as they are above cited; That the late Canons contain matters contrary to the king's Prerogative, the Laws, &c. But in the ninth Additional all the rest of the Exceptions are in against them, but these words about the king's Prerogative are quite left out. I would fain know, if I could, what is the reason of this omission in these added Articles: Is it for shame, because there was a purpose to charge me, as serjeant Wild did in his Speech the first day, That I laboured to advance the king's Prerogative above the Law? To advance it, and yet made contrary Canons against it: which is the way to destroy it. What pretty nonsense is this? Or is it because the framers of these Additionals (whom I conceive were some Committee, with the help of Mr. Prynne) thought the time was come, or coming, in which the king should have no more prerogative? Or if there be a third Reason let them give it themselves.

This was all concerning the Canons. Then followed the sixth Original Article about my assuming of Papal Power; where Mr. Browne, in summing up of his Charge, was pleased to say 'That no Pope claimed so much as I had done. But he was herein much mistaken: For never any pope claimed so little. For he that claimed least, claimed it in his own right, which was none; whereas I claimed nothing but in the king's right and by virtue of his concession: between which there is a vast latitude.' The first Proof upon this Article was read out of certain Letters sent unto me by the University of Oxford, I being then their Chancellor. Which great titles were urged to prove my assuming of Papal Power, because I did not check them in my Answers to those letters.

(1.) The first Title was Sanctus tua, which Mr. Nicolas said, was the Pope's own title; but he is deceived: for the Title was commonly given to other bishops also clean through the Primitive Church, both Greek and Latin. He replied in great heat, as his manner it seems is, That it is Blasphemy to give that Title (Sanctitas) in the abstract, to any but God. And though by the course of the Court I might not answer then to the Reply, yet now I may: And must tell Mr. Nicolas, that it is a great presumption for him, a lawyer, and no studied divine, to charge Blasphemy upon all the Fathers of the Primitive Church. It is given to St. Augustine by Hilarius and Euodius, and in the abstract. (Apud Aug. Epist. 83, 93.) And which is the charge laid to me, St. Augustine never checks at, or finds fault with the Title, nor with them for writing it. And St. Augustine [Aug. Epist. 102.] himself gives that Title to Euodius, answering his Letters, which I was not to do to theirs: and after that to Quintianus. [Aug. Epist. 103.] Neither is any thing more common than this style among the Fathers, as as all learned men know. And it is commonly given by St. Gregory the Great [Greg. Eulogio Episcopo Alexandrino. Apud H. Spelman. in Concil. p. 80, et Episc. Arelatensi. Ib. d. p. 95.] to divers bishops; who being Pope himself, would not certainly have given away his own Title, had it been peculiar to him, to any other bishop. Nor would any of the Fathers have given this epithet to their brethren, had any savour of Blasphemy been about it. But there is a twofold Holiness, the one original, absolute and essential, and that it is in God only, and incommunicable to any creature: * the other derivative and relative; and that is found in the creatures, both things and persons; or else God should have no Saints, no Holy Ones. For no man can be said to be Sanctus, Holy, but he who in some degree hath Sanctitatem, Holiness, residing in him. And this I answered at the present. But according to Mr. Nicolas his divinity, we shall learn in time to deny the Immortality of the Soul: For Immortality, in the abstract, is applied to God only, 1 Tim. 6, 16. "Who only hath Immortality." Therefore, if it may not in an under and a qualified sense, by participation, be applied to the Creature, the soul of man cannot be immortal.

(2.) The second Title in "Spiritu Sancto effusissime plenus." My Lords, I had sent them many hundred Manuscripts, and in many languages. Upon this, in allusion to the Gifts of Tongues, (and it was about Pentecost too that I sent them) the luxurious pen of the University orator ran upon these phrases; which I could neither foresee before they were written, nor remedy after; And finding fault, could not remedy that which was past. Besides, all these Letters were in answer to mine; I was to answer none of theirs: that might have made me work enough, had I wanted any.

(3.) The third style is "Summus Pontifex." But this was in my lord of London's Letters; and he must answer, if any thing be amiss. But Pontifex, and Summus too, is no unusual style to and of the chief prelate in any nation.

(4.) The fourth style is "Archangelus, et ne

* The Managers against the Archbishop in another place pretend, that this Title was never given to any English bishop at least: But herein they are much mistaken; for it was often given to them. To produce but one instance: Pope Leo III. gave this title to Ethelard Archbishop of Canterbury, and that in a Letter wrote to Kenulphus king of Mercia. Ang. Sacr. par. 1, p. 460. H. W.

quid nimis." Yes, sure, the meanest of these titles is multum nimis, far too much, applied to my person and unworthiness: Yet a great sign it is that I deserved very well of that University in the place I then bare, or else they would never have bestowed such titles upon me. And if they did offend in giving such an unworthy man such high language, why are not they called in question for their own fault?

(5.) The last which I remember, is, "Quo rectori non stat Regula," &c. And this is no more than an absolute Hyperbole; a high one I confess; yet as high are found in all Rhetorical Authors: and what should make that Blasphemy in an University Orator, which is every where common, and not only allowed, but commendable, I know not: Especially since the rule of the interpretation of them is as well known as the figure. Where the Words are not to be understood in their proper and literal sense, but as St. Augustine speaks, when that which is spoken, longe est amplius, is far larger than that which is signified by it. [St. Aug. 16, Civ. Dei, c. 21.] And if I had assumed any of these Titles to myself, which I am, and ever was far from doing; yet it is one thing to assume Papal Title, and another to assume Papal Power, (which is the thing charged) though I thank God I did neither. If I have here omitted any Title, it is mere forgetfulness; for one part or other of the Answers given will reach it, whatever it be. And, as I told Mr. Browne, when he charged this on me, Dr. Strowd, the University Orator, who writ those Letters, and gave those Titles, was called up before a Committee of this Parliament, examined about them, acquitted, and dismissed.

(6.) These Titles from the Letters being past, he quoted another, which he called a blasphemous Speech too, out of my Book against Fisher; [§ 25, p. 171.] where, he said, I approved of Anselme, an enemy to the crown: and took on me to be Patriarch of this other world. Let any man look into that place of my Book, and he shall find that I make use of that Passage only to prove that the pope could not be appended unto out of England, according to their own doctrine: which I hope is no Blasphemy. And for St. Anselme, howsoever he was swayed with the Corruptions of his time, yet was he in other things worthy the testimony which the Authors by me cited give him. And if any man be angry that the Archbishop of Canterbury is called the Patriarch of this other World, he may be pleased to remember that St. Jerom gives St. Augustine, who was Bishop of Hippo, and no Archbishop, a greater Title than that: for he writes, Beatissimo Papæ Augustino, more than once and again, as appears in his Epistles to St. Augustine. [St. Hieron. apud Aug. Epist. 11, 13, 14, 17, 18, &c.]

(7.) To these sir Nath. Brent's testimony is produced; who says, That he over-heard me say to another "That I would not so easily quit the Plenitude of my Power," or to that effect. He confesses he was coming in, and finding me speaking with another, made stay, and stood afar off, and knows not of what I spake, (for so he said) but over-heard the words. I beseech your lordships observe this Witness: He confesseth he knows not of what I spake, and yet comes here upon his oath, to testify of Plenitude of Power in relation to my assuming Papal-Power. If he meant not this, his testimony is nothing; for Plenitude of Power may extend to many other things; and I might justly say, (if I said it) "That I would not easily part with the Plenitude of my Power," in relation to other bishops of my Province, who by law have not so full power as I have. But if he did mean this, then his testimony is worse than nothing: nothing, in regard he confesses he knows not of what I was speaking; and worse than nothing, that not knowing, he would give such a testimony upon oath.

II. The next Charge of this day was, That I went about to exempt the Clergy from the Civil Magistrate.

1. The first Witness is Mr. Pincen. He says he heard me say at the High-Commission, "That the Clergy were now debased; that heretofore it was otherwise, and I hope to see it so again." Truly, my Lords, if I did say this (which is more than I can call to memory) I spake truth: They were debased; and I did hope to see it otherwise: for the debasing of the Clergy will make their Office and their Doctrine base, as well as their persons. But here is not a word of freeing them from laws or the temporal magistrate. It was replied, He did mention the Civil magistrate. 'If he did,' he mentions no time; by which I might be enabled to make counter-proof. He is single. 'They are Words, and if within the statute, then triable by it within six months. And I desire this grave gentleman to consider his oath: for if I spake of any such exemption, I must speak against my conscience and judgment; which, I humbly thank God, I used not to do. Nor is it altogether impossible for the civil magistrate sometimes to oppress poor clergymen. But a little will be thought too much of this. And therefore to Mr. Browne's summary Charge, I gave the former Answer, That I spake of exemption from oppression, not from law.'

2. The second Witness was alderman Railton, about the carrying up of the Sword in the Church when he was Lord Mayor. He says, I once sent him word about it, but knows not by whom; and after heard no more of it, but refers himself to Mr. Marsh. He says, There was an Order of the Council-Table, May 3, 1633, concerning the submitting of the Sword in time and place of Divine Service. If an Order of Council, then was it no act of mine, as I have often pleaded, and must as often as it comes. He says farther, That I spake these Words, or to this effect, "That the Church had been low for these 100 years; but I hoped it would flourish again in another hundred." But here is no one word of Exemption from Civil Magistracy. And I hope your lordships will take witnesses as they speak, not as men shall infer and descant upon them. And then, my Lords, under favour, 'I see no harm in the words.' Only I shall recall my hope: For if I had then any hope to see it flourish in another hundred years, it is that which I cannot hope for now. He says, there was a reference to the Counsel on both sides; and that under that reference the business died. And if it died then, what makes it here before the resurrection? Yea, but says Mr. Nicolas, Here is agitation about the submitting of the Sword, which is the emblem of Temporal power. But neither to foreign nor home power, but only to God; and that in the place, and at the performance of his holy worship; At which time and place Christian kings submit themselves, and therefore cannot stand upon the emblems of their power. Nor would the Lords of the Council have made either Order or Reference, had there been any thing of danger, or against law, in this kind of submitting. Mr. York was produced as another Witness, but said just the same with Marsh; and so the same Answer served him.

III. Then followed a Charge about the Charter of York to be renewed; and that I did labour to have the Archbishop of York, his Chancellor, and some of the Residentiaries, named in it to be Justices of Peace within the city.

To prove this, Alderman Hoyle is produced; who says, There was an Order of the Council about this; but cannot say that I procured it. So far then this Proof reaches not me. For the Bishop, his Chancellor, and some of the Residentiaries, to be Justices of Peace within the city; if I were of this opinion, (as then advised) I am sure there is no Treason in it, and I believe no crime. And, under your lordship's favour, I could not but think it would have made much peace, and done much good in all the cities of England where Cathedrals are. Lastly, he says, There was a debauched man committed about breach of the Sabbath; and being casually smothered, I should say, "They deserved to be hanged that killed him." Concerning this man: he lost his life, that is confessed. His debauchery, what it was, is not proved. And were he never so disorderly, I am sure he was not without legal trial to be shut up into a house, and smothered; that is against both law and conscience: And the officers then in being had reason to smother the business as much as they could: and, it may be, deserved somewhat, if not that which this Alderman says I said, to his best remembrance: For so, and with no more certainty he expressed it. This I am sure I said, That if the Bishop, or any of the church, had been then in their charter, the poor man's life had not been lost.

IV. The fourth charge was just of the same nature, concerning the Charge of Shrewsbury, For this there were produced two Witnesses. Mr. Lee and Mr. Mackworth. But they make up but one between them; For Mr. Lee could say nothing but what he acknowledges he heard from Mr. Mackworth. And Mr. Mackworth says first, That the school-master's business was referred to other lords and myself. That is no crime; And, to my knowledge, that has been a troublesome business for these 30 years. He says, I caused that there should go a Quo Warranto against the town. This is but as Mr. Owen informed him; so no proof. Beside, it is no crime, being a Referee, if I gave legal reason for it. Nor is it any crime that the Bishop and his Chancellor should be justices within the town, as is aforesaid in the case of York: considering especially, that then many clergymen bare that office in divers counties of England. He adds, that an old alderman gave 50*l.* to St. Paul's. But out of what consideration, I know not, nor doth he speak. And if every alderman in the town would have given me as much to that use, I would have taken it, and thanked them for it. Then he says, There was an Order from all the Lords Referrees, for settling all things about their Charter. So, by his own confession, the whole business was transacted publicly, and by persons of great honour, and nothing charged upon my particular. If Mr. Owen sent me in a butt of sack, and after put it upon the Town account, (for so he also says) Mr. Owen did ill in both; but I knew of neither. And this the Counsel, in their Reply, said they urged not in that kind. Lastly, The Charter itself was read to both points, of the Bishop and his chancellor being justices of peace within the town, and the not bearing up of the sword: To both which I have answered already. And I hope your lordships cannot think his majesty would have passed such a Charter, or that his learned counsel durst have put it to him, had this thing been such a crime as it is here made.

V. The next Charge was out of my Diary, at March 5, 1635. The words are; "William Juxon, lord bishop of London, made Lord High Treasurer of England. No churchman had it since Henry 7's time. I pray God bless him, to carry it so, that the Church may have honour, and the king and the state service and contentment by it. And now if the church will not hold up themselves, under God, I can do no more." I can see no treason in this, nor crime neither. And though that which I did to help on this business, was very little, yet aim I had none in it, but the service of the king, and the good of the church: And am confident it would have been both, had not such troublesome times followed, as did.

VI. Then they instanced in the Case of Mr. Newcomin. But that Cause being handled before, they did only refer the lords to their Notes: And so did I to my former Answers.

VII. Then followed the Case of Thora and Middleton, which were fined in the High-Commission, about some clergy-mens business, Thorn being constable. The Witnesses in this case are three.

1. The first is Hunsford, (if I took his name right:) And for the Censure of these men, he confesses, it was in and by the High-Commission: and so no act of mine, (as I have often pleaded.) But then he says, that I there spake these words, "That no man of their rank should meddle with men in holy orders." First, he is in this part of the Charge single, and neither of the other witnesses comes in to him. Secondly, I humbly desire the Proceedings of the High Commission may be seen, (which are taken out of our hands.) For so far as I can remember any thing of this cause, the minister, Mr. Lewis, had hard measure. And perhaps thereupon I might say, That men of their rank should not in such sort meddle with men in Holy Orders. But to tax the proceedings of a violent busy constable, was not to exempt the clergy from civil magistracy.

Upon this, he falls just upon the same Words, and says, That I uttered them about their offering to turn out a corrector from the Printing-house. This corrector was a minister, and a well-deserving man. The trust of the press was referred to the High-Commission court. And I hope your lordships will not think, that not to suffer the printers to turn out a deserving man at their pleasure, is to exempt the clergy from the civil magistrate. The business, my Lords, was this: This Corrector was principally entertained for the Latin and Greek Press especially, which I had then not without great pains and some cost erected. They were desirous to keep only one for the English, and him at the cheapest. Among them their negligence was such, as that there were found above 1,000 faults in two Editions of the Bible and Common-Prayer-Book. And one which caused this search was, that in Exod. 20, where they had shamefully printed, "Thou shalt commit adultery." For this the Masters of the Printing-House were called into the High-Commission, and censured, as they well deserved it. As for this corrector, whom they would have heaved out, they never did so much as complain of him to any that had power over the press, till this fell upon themselves for so gross an abuse. Nor did they after this proceed against him, to make him appear faulty; and till that were done, we could not punish. And for this business of the Press, he is single too. And I have told your lordships that which is a known truth. "And Hunsford being bit in his credit, and purse, and friends, by that Censure, for so gross an abuse of the Church and Religion, labours to fasten his fangs upon me in this way."

2. The second Witness is Mr. Blond. But all that he says is, That there was once a dismission of this Cause, out of the Court, and that though I disliked it, yet I gave way to it, because all parties were agreed. And no word of Proof, that I was any cause of bringing it back into the court again. What is my fault in this?

3. The third Witness was Thorn in his own Cause: and it is plain, by his own words, that this cause was depending in court before my time. And I believe, were the Records of the Court here, Mr. Lewis would not be found so great an offender as Mr. Thorn would make him. This I am sure of, both the High Commission and myself have been quick enough against all ministers which have been proved to be debauched in their life and conversation. And he says nothing against me, but that I sided with his adversaries; which is easy to say against any Judge that delivers his sentence against any man. But neither of these come home to Hunsford.

VIII. The next Charge is in the Case of one Mr. Tomkins, about the taxing of a minister in a case of Robbery, and repayment by the country.

To this Mr. Newdigate is produced: who says, as he remembers, that I should speak these words, "That Ministers were free from such Taxes, and I hoped to see the times in which they might be free again." First, this gentleman is single. Secondly, He speaks not positively, but "as he remembers." Thirdly, This Tax, I do humbly conceive, is not by law to be laid upon any minister. For no man is subject to this Tax, but they which are to keep watch and ward; which ministers in that kind are not bound unto. And this I learned of the Lord Keeper Coventry at the Council-Table. So I might well then hope to see ministers free from all such taxes, by the right understanding and due execution of our own laws, without assuming any Papal power.

IX. The last instance of this day was the bringing of sir Rich. Samuel into the High-Commission, for doing his office as justice of the peace upon some clergymen. First, For this, this gentleman is single, and in his own case. Secondly, himself confesses, that his bringing into the High-Commission was long after the fact. Therefore in all probability not for that; nor doth he say that I caused his bringing in. He says farther, That one Article for which he was called into the Commission, was, that he was an enemy to the Clergy. But he doth not say, that I preferred these Articles against him: nor doth he tell, or can I remember, what the other Articles were, which with this may be had enough to merit what was there laid against him. And whatsoever was done, appears by his own Narration to be the act of the High-Commission, or the Council-Table, and so not chargeable upon me alone. And whereas he says, I blamed him much at the Council-Table; let him tell why, and then I will give him a farther Answer; And sure if I did blame him, I had just cause so to do. Lastly, he says, I did use the word "base" to him, when he came to me. Sure I cannot believe I did; it was not my language to meaner men. If it did slip from me, it was in relation to his enmity to the clergy, not to his person or quality. ' And ' I conceive it is no genteel part, for a man of ' place and power in his country, to oppress ' poor clergymen which neighbour about him. ' In which kind this gentleman, passime audiebat, heard extremely ill.'

This Day thus ended, I was ordered to appear again on Monday, April 22. I came, and my former Answers having taken off the edge of many men, (for so I was told by good hands) the scorns put upon me at my landing, and elsewhere, were somewhat abated, though when it was at best I suffered enough. After I had attended the pleasure of the House some hours, I was remitted without hearing, and commanded to attend again upon Thursday, April 25, but sent back again then also, and ordered to appear on Tuesday, April 30. And when I came, I was sent away once more unheard: no consideration had of myself, or the great charge which this frequent coming put me to. I was then ordered to appear again on Saturday, May 4. Then I was heard again: and the day proceeded as follows.

My Eighth Day of Hearing.

Saturday, May 4, 1614. To raise up envy against me, Mr. Nicolas falls first to repeating the Titles which were given me in letters from Oxford; to which I gave answer the day before. From thence he fell again upon the former Charge, my endeavour to exempt the Clergy from the Civil Power. And very loud he was, and full of sour language upon me. To this general, I answered with another more true; That I never did attempt to bring the Temporal Power under the Clergy, nor to free the Clergy from being under it: But I do freely confess, I did labour all I could to preserve poor clergymen from some laymens oppression, which lay heavy on them. And de Vi Laica hath been an old, and a great, and too just a complaint. And this I took to be my duty, doing it without wrong to any man; as sincerely I did to the best of my knowledge: And assuring myself, that God did not raise me to that place of eminency, to sit still, see his service neglected, and his ministers discountenanced; nay, sometimes little better than trampled on. ' And my standing thus to the Clergy, and their ' just Grievances, is not the least cause of my ' present condition. In which my case (though ' not my abilities) is somewhat like Cicero's. ' For having now for many years defended the ' public state of the Church, and the private of ' many church-men, as he had done many citizens; when he by prevailing factions came into danger himself, ejus Salutem defendit nemo, [Paterc. l. 2. Hist.] no man took care to defend him that had defended so many: ' which yet I speak not to impute any thing to ' men of my own calling, who, I presume, would ' have lent me their just defence, to their power, ' had not the same storm which drove against ' my life, driven them into corners to preserve ' themselves.'

I. The first Instance was in Mr. Shervil's

Case;* in which Mr. John Steevens tells what I said to the counsel pleading in the Star-Chamber, which was, That they should take care not to cause the laws of the Church and the kingdom to clash one against another. I see, my lords, nothing that I spake was let fall, nor can I remember every speech that passed from me; he may be happy that can. But if I did speak these words, I know no crime in them: it was a good Caveat to the counsel, for ought I know. For surely the laws of church and state in England would agree well enough together, if some did not set them at odds. And if I did farther say to the then Lord Keeper, (as it is charged) "That some Clergymen had sat as high as he, and might again:" which I do not believe I said: yet if I did, it is a known truth. For the lord Coventry, then Lord Keeper, did immediately succeed the lord bishop of Lincoln in that office. But though I dare say, I said not thus to the Lord Keeper, whose moderation gave me no cause to be so round with him, yet to the counsel at the bar, I remember well, upon just occasion given, that I spake to this effect; That they would forbear too much depressing of the Clergy, either in their reputation or maintenance, in regard it was not impossible that their profession, now as high as ours once was, may fall to be as low as ours now is; 'if the professors set themselves against the church, as some of late are known to have done: And that the sinking of the Church would be found the ready way to it.'

II. The second Instance was about calling some Justices of the Peace into the High-Commission, about a sessions kept at Tewksbury.

1. The first Witness for this (for three were produced) was Mr. Jo. Steevens. He says, That the isle where the sessions were kept, was joined to the Church. If it were not now a part of the church, yet doubtless being within the church-yard, it was consecrated ground. He says, That sessions were kept there heretofore. And I say, the more often the worse. He says, That I procured the calling of them into the High-Commission. But he proves no one of these things, but by the report of sir Rob. Cook of Gloucestershire, a party in this Cause. He says again, That they had the bishop's licence to keep the sessions there. But the Proof of this also is no more than that sir Rob. Cook told him so: so all this hitherto is hearsay. Then he says, the 88th Canon of the Church of England was urged in the Commission-Court, which seems to give leave in the close of the Canon, that temporal courts or leets may be kept in church or church-yard. First, that clause in the end of the Canon, is referred to the ringing of bells, not to the profanations mentioned in the former part of that Canon. Nor is it probable, the minister and church-wardens should have power to give such leave, when no Canon gives such power to the bishop himself. And were it so, here is no

Proof offered, that the minister and church-wardens did give leave: And suppose some Temporal Courts might upon urgent occasion be kept in the church with leave, yet that is no warrant for sessions, where there may be trial for blood. He says farther, That the civilians quoted an old Canon of the Pope's and that that prevailed against the Canon of our church, and sentence given against them. All those Canons which the civilians urged, are law in England, where nothing is contrary to the law of God, or the law of the laud, or the king's prerogative royal: and to keep off profanation from churches, is none of these. Besides, were all this true which is urged, the act, was the High-Commission's not mine. Nor is there any thing in it that looks towards Treason. [25 H. 8. c. 19. § ult.]

2. The second Witness is Mr. Edward Steevens. He confesses that the Sentence was given by the High-commission, and that I had but my single Vote in it. And for the place itself, he says, the place where the sessions were kept, was separated from the Isle of the Church by a wall breast-high; which is an evident proof that it was formerly a part of that Church, and continued yet under the same roof.

3. The third Witness is Mr. Talboyes, (who, it seems, will not be out of any thing which may seem to hurt me.) He says, the parish held it no part of the church. Why are not some of them examined, but this man's report from them admitted? They thought no harm, he says, and got a license. But why did they get a license, if their own conscience did not prompt them that something was irregular in that business? He says, he was informed the sessions had been twice kept there before. And I say, under your lordships favour, the oftner the worse. But why is not his Informer produced, that there might be proof, and not hearsay? Upon this, I said, (so he concludes) That I would make a precedent against keeping it any more. If I did say so, the cause deserved it; men in this age growing so bold with Churches, as if profanation of them were no fault at all.

III. The third Instance concerning sir Tho. Dacres, a justice of peace in Middlesex, and his warrant for punishing some disorderly drinking. The Witnesses the two church-wardens, Colliar and Wilson; two plain men, but of great memories: for this business was when I was bishop of London, and yet they agree in every circumstance, in every word, though so many years since. Well, what say they? It seems Dr. Duck, then my Chancellor, had cited these churchwardens into my court? therefore either there was, or at least in his judgment there seemed to be somewhat done in that business against the jurisdiction of the Church. They say then, that the court ended, Dr. Duck brought them to me. And what then? Here is a cause, by their own confession, depending in the Ecclesiastical Court; Dr. Duck in the king's quarters, where I cannot fetch him to testify; no means left me to know what the Proceedings were; and I have good cause to think, that were all the merits of the cause open before your lordships, you would say, sir Tho. Dacres did not all according to law. But what is the heart of this Charge? It is, say they, That I commanded Dr. Duck to prosecute them. And what fault was in this? For if it were just, why should not Dr. Duck go on with his prosecution? If Dr. Duck and I were both mistaken in the particular, it was easy getting a Prohibition. Yea, but they say I said, "If this must be so, sir Thomas Dacres shall be bishop of London, and I will be sir Thomas Dacres." For ought I see in the weight of it, this whole Charge was but to bring in this speech. And truly, my lords, my old decayed memory is not such, as that I can recal a speech 13 or 14 years since. But if I did say it, I presume it is not High-Treason for a bishop of London to say so much of sir Tho. Dacres. 'Mr. Browne, in the summing up the Charge against me, laid the weight of the charge in this, That these church-wardens were prosecuted for executing the warrant of a justice of peace upon an ale-house keeper, for tipping on the Sabbath-day, contrary to the statutes Jac. 7. et Car. 3. To which I answered, That those statutes did concern the ale-house keepers only, nor were the church-wardens called in question for that; but because being church-officers, and a churchman tipping there, they did not complain of that to the chancellor of the diocess. Mr. Browne replied, There was no clergyman there. I am glad I was so mistaken. But that excuseth not the church-wardens, who being church-officers, should have been as ready to inform the bishop, as to obey the justice of peace.'

IV. The fourth Instance was about Marriages in the Tower, which I opposed against law. The witness sir William Balfore, then lieutenant of the Tower. He says, that I did oppose those Marriages: and so say I. But I did it for the subject of England's sake: for, many of their sons and daughters were there undone. Nor Banes, nor licence, nor any means of fore-knowledge to prevent it. Was this ill? He says, That when he spake with me about it, I desired him to speak with his majesty about it, because it was the king's house. What could I do with more moderation? He confesses he did so, and that he moved the king that the cause might be heard at the Council-Table, not at the High-Commission. To this his majesty inclined, and I opposed nothing, so the general abuse might be rectified. Then he says, Mr. Attorney Noye said at the Council-Table, it was the king's free chapel, and that no pope in those times offered to inhibit there. First, if Mr. Attorney did so say, he must have leave to speak freely in the king's case. Secondly, (as I humbly conceive) the Chapel for ordinary use of prisoners and inhabitants of the Tower, where these disorderly Marriages are made, is not that which is called the king's free chapel; but another, in the side of the White Tower by the king's lodgings. Thirdly, if it be, yet I have herein not offended; for I did all that was done by the king's leave, not by any assumption of papal power. Then he tells the lords, That in a discourse of mine with him at Greenwich, about this business, I let fall an oath. I am sorry for it, if I did, but that is no Treason. 'And I know whom the Deponent thinks to please by this interposition: for to the matter it be- longs not.' In conclusion, he says truly, That the king committed the business to some lords and judges, that so an end might be put to it; and in the mean time ordered, that till it were ended, there should be no more Marriages in the Tower. How this business ended, I know not. It began, I am sure, by authority of his majesty's grant of the High-Commission to question and punish all such abuses, 'tam in locis exemptis, quam non exemptis.' And his majesty having graciously taken this care for the indemnity of the subject, I troubled myself no more with it; my aim being not to cut off any privileges of that place, but only to prevent the abuses of that lawless custom. 'And if cui bono be a considerable circumstance, as it uses to be in all such businesses, then it may be thought on too, that this gentleman the lieutenant had a considerable share for his part out of the fee of every marriage. Which I believe was as dear to him as the privilege.'

V. The next Instance is broke out of the Tower, and got as far as Oxford. The Witness, alderman Nixon. He says, the mayor, and the watch set by him, were disturbed by the proctors of the University, and a constable imprisoned. The night-walk, and the keeping of the watch, is the antient, known, and constant privilege of the University for some hundred of years; and so the watch set by the town (purposely to pick a quarrel) was not according to law. He adds, That when the right hon. the earl of Berkshire would have referred the business to the king's counsel learned, I refused, and said, I would maintain it by my own power, as chancellor. If I did say this (which I neither remember nor believe) I might better refuse lawyers, (not the law, but lawyers) than they a sworn judge of their own nomination, which they did.

The Case was briefly this. There were some five or six particulars which had, for divers years, bred much trouble and disagreement between the University and City; of which, to my best remembrance, this about the Night-Watch, and another about Felons Goods, were two of the chief. The University complained to me. I was so far from going any by-way, that I was resolved upon a Trial at Westminster-Hall, thinking, as I after found, that nothing but a legal trial would set those two bodies at quiet. The townsmen liked not this; came some of the chief of them to London; prevailed with their honourable Steward my lord the earl of Berkshire, to come to me to Lambeth, and, by his lordship, offered to have all ended without so great a charge at law, by reference to any of the Judges. I said I had no mind to wrong the town, or put them to charge, but thought they would fly off from all awards; and therefore stuck to have a legal trial. After this, some of the chief Aldermen came to me with my lord, and offered me, That if the University would do the like, they would go down and bring it up under the mayor and aldermen's hands, that they would stand to such end as Judge Jones, who rode that circuit, should, upon hearing, make. They did so, and brought the Paper so subscribed; and therefore I think alderman Nixon's hand is to it as well as the rest: upon this I gave way; the University accepted; the Judge heard and settled. And now when they saw my troubles threatening me, they brake all, whistled up their Recorder to come and complain at the Council-Table, his majesty present. And I remember well, I told his lordship, (then making the aforesaid motion to refer to the king's learned counsel) that his lordship well knew what had passed; and that being so used as I had been by the townsmen, I would trouble myself with no more references to lawyers, or to that effect. And I appeal to the honour of my lord, whether this be not a true relation.

VI. The sixth Instance concerns the putting of one Mr. Grant out of his right. He says, but he is single, and in his own cause, That Mr. Bridges was presented to an Impropriation; and that suing for tythe, he, the said Grant, got a Prohibition, and Mr. Bridges a reference to the then Lord Keeper Coventry and myself; That we referred them to the law, and that there Grant was non-suited, and so outed of his right. 1. In all this there is nothing said to be done by me alone. 2. The Lord Keeper, who well understood the law, thought it fittest to refer them to the law; and so we did. If he were there non-suited first, and outed after, it was the law that put him out, not we. 'Yet your lordships see here was a Prohibition granted a case, which the law itself after rejected.'

VII. Then follows the Instance, That I had a purpose to abolish all Impropriations. The first Proof alleged was a Passage out of bishop Mountague's Book, p. 210, That Tythes were due by divine right, and then no Impropriations might stand. And Mr. Prynne witnessed very carefully, That this Book was found in my own study, and given me by bishop Mountague. And what of this? Doth any bishop print a book, and not give the Archbishop one of them? Or must I answer for every proposition that is in every book that is in my study, or that any author gives me? And if bishop Mountague be of opinion that Tythes are due by divine right, what is that to me? Your lordships know many men are of different opinions in that difficulty; and I am confident you will not determine the controversy by an act of parliament. They were nibbling at my Diary in this, to shew that it was one of my projects to fetch in Impropriations; but it was not fit for their purpose: for it is expressed, That if I lived to see the Repair of St. Paul's near an end, I would move his majesty for the like grant for the buying in of Impropriations. And to buy them from the owners, is neither against law, nor against any thing else that is good; nor is it any Usurpation of Papal Power.*

2. The second Proof was my procuring from the king such Impropriations in Ireland, as

* This opinion, "That Titles are due to the Clergy of Divine Right," he here cautiously avoids to admit or to deny. What were his sentiments on this matter, appears in "Gibson's View of the ancient and present State of the Churches of Door, &c." from which, p. 28, the following passage is extracted:

"Furthermore, his lordship" (John viscount Scudamore) "had the happiness of having an intimate friendship with bishop Laud, whom he consulted upon the validity of his ancestor's purchase of the Rectory of Door; and the conveyances of other Tythes, by other means, so far as his conscience was concerned. To him he stated his case in all its circumstances, set forth what his titles were, and what pleas might be brought in defence or favour of them; as is evident from a Letter of the Bishop's, written with his own hand. So much of which as relates to my purpose, I shall here transcribe.

"I. Your first Quære is, Whether the retaining of Impropriations to your own use, being sold to your ancestors by king Henry 8, with the reservation of annual rent to his heirs and successors, be in you a sin?

"To this, you know, that all Impropriations, except a little glebe, consist of Tythes. So your doubt will be wholly upon this question, Whether Tythes be due to the priest, and him only. Jure Divino, by Divine Law, or by Ecclesiastical Constitution. Neither my time, nor my leisure, will give me leave to dispute this question. But thus lies your doubt upon it. If Tythes be due by divine law, and that law of God be indispensable either by church or state, as if it be moral law it is, then Impropriations being Tythes, no doubt can be made but you sin the sin of Sacrilege by retaining them to your own use.

"Yea, but your ancestors bought them.— True. But it was of him that had no right to sell, and they had as little to buy. For if one man be so daring as to sell God's Altar, yet his daring is no warrant for him to sell, or another to buy it.

"Yea, but Henry 8. reserved an annual pension to his heirs, which is still paid. Be it so. Yet still if Tythes be due by the moral law of God, he did but sell one part of the sin, and reserve the other. Loth he was, it were in the king's power, to the Church of Ireland. 'Which Mr. Nicolas, in his gentle language, calls robbing of the crown.' My Lords, the case was this. The Lord Primate of Armagh writ unto me, how ill conditioned the state of that Church was for want of means; and besought me that I would move his majesty to give the Impropriations there, which yet remained in the crown, for the main-

'seems, to part with it all; and thin he would his heirs should inherit some little of it. The less the better. And I cannot but pray for his successor's sake, that no canker be in that little. Yet you see his name is gone.

" 'Yea, but it was made a lay-fee by an act of parliament.—Well, if any man think an act of parliament is an absolution from sin against the moral law of God, he is much out of his way, and it will be a poor plea at another bar.

" 'Yea, but the Pope and the Church of Rome had inappropriated Tythes to abbeyes, and monasteries, and churches, and colleges, from the priest that served, before Hen. 8. took and sold them.—Tis true; and let the Church of Rome answer that sin. Their fault cannot excuse another; and yet their sin was this much the less, because the Tythes went to that which they then thought was the true service of God. But Hen. 8. put them into lay-hands, and lay-use, and what use most lay-men put them to, I forbear to speak.

" 'So I think this is clear: If Tythes be due Jure Divino auctori, which is the opinion of many great divines, you cannot hold Impropriations to your own use, without sin.

" 'If Tythes be due to the priest, only by Judicial or Ceremonial Law, as some are of opinion, at least for the quota, i. e. the precise tenth part, yet if they hold, that less than the tenth (as the eleventh or twelfth part, &c.) may not be paid, the matter will be much about one. For if the divine moral law hath not defined the quota at the tenth just, yet if it hath settled that nothing under the tenth is sufficient, then it leaves a liberty for any to give more, but warrants none to give less, or diminish that, or hold it when it is diminished.

" 'If Tythes be due only by ecclesiastical and civil laws, or either of them, then the church and the state may alter the law of Tythes upon just and good grounds. And that law, once altered (as it was here in England upon the lay-side, but whether the church consented, or how far, I cannot tell) it may then be thought lawful for men to hold such Tythes and Impropriations as they have; buy more, or sell them, or do what they will upon a fair commerce.

" 'So, for your first doubt, a great part of it will lie upon your own conscience. For if in your conscience you be persuaded that Tythes be due to the priest for his service, by an indispensable moral law of God; you cannot hold them to your own use, nor sell them to tenance and encouragement of noble ministers to live among the people, and instruct them; assuring me, they were daily one by one begged away by private men, to the great prejudice both of crown and church. And the truth of this, the Lord Primate is now in this kingdom, and will witness. I acquainted the king's great officers, the Lord Treasurer, and the Chanceller of the Exchequer, with it. And after long de-

'another without sin, and that sin against your conscience.

" 'But if your conscience be persuaded, that Tythes are due only by church or state law, then you are either truly or erroneously so persuaded. If truly, then the church and the state having first by another law expressed themselves, (as here the state did, and involved the church, but, with what consent of her's, I know not); then, supposing the church's lawful consent, you may safely either keep or sell, and both without sin; because, according to such law as is not sinful, and without any contradiction in your own conscience. If you be erroneously so persuaded, then you should nor keep nor sell, because you should have a better guide than an erring conscience.

" 'Yet this you gain by the persuasion (if it be a persuasion indeed, and not assumed), that though you sin by following an erring conscience, yet you sin not against your conscience, and so commit no sinful sin, whether you keep Impropriations, or sell them. Now, what you are persuaded in conscience, concerning the right which the priesthood have to the Tythe, that you must ask yourself, and not me.

" 'II. Your second Quære, Whether the selling these Impropriations free you from sin, though the money received for them be otherwise employed than upon the Church?

" 'To this, there is answer enough given in the former; for it rests upon the same foundation altogether. For if Tythes be due by divine right, that is indispensable, then, as you have no right to hold them, so have you none to sell them, and bestow the money to other uses than the church; nor can the sale free you from sin, because you sell that which by divine law is God's, not yours.

" 'And the reason you give, that perhaps you may sell though you cannot keep, because your ancestors bought them, is of no force; for you know it is carcat emptor; it is the buyer should consider what he buys, and of whom: and if they bought what they should not, you sell from the church what you should not; and your conscience in this as in the former, must be a great part of your own direction, though I cannot say it is fit you should follow it alone.

" 'How you stand persuaded in conscience for the right of Tythe I know not. How I myself stand, I can easily tell: and were the liberation, the king was pleased, at my humble suit, to grant them in the way which I proposed: which was, That when they came into the clergy's hands, they should pay all the rents respectively to the king, and some consideration for the several renewings. And the truth of this appears in the deeds: so here was no robbery of the crown. For the king had all his set rents reserved to a penny, and consideration for his casualties beside. And, my lords, the increase of Popery is complained of in Ireland: Is there a better way to hinder this growth, than to place an able Clergy among the inhabitants? Can an able clergy be had without means? Is any means fitter than Improvements restored? My lords, I did this, as holding it the best means to keep down Popery, and to advance the Protestant religion. And I wish with all my heart I had been able to do it sooner, before so many Improvements were gotten from the crown into private hands.

VIII. Next I was charged with another project in my Diary, which was to settle some fixed Commendams upon all the smaller bishop-case mine, if I could not give my Improvements back, I would beg God's mercy that I might be able to give; and when God had taken off my difficulty, and made me able, I would as really give; and if I could not give all, yet some I would; and charge it upon my heir at my death to give either the rest, or such a proportion as I thought fit; and then bind him to charge his heir for the remainder; that you and your posterity may restore that to the Church, which your ancestors consented to buy and take from it.

"I pray God bless you in the tenderness of your conscience; and for this, if in any particular I fall short of your expectation, if you cannot lay it upon the shortness of the time, spare not to lay it upon my weakness; so withal you deny me not your prayers for increase of God's strength in me. In great haste, I leave you to the grace of God, and rest your very loving friend,
'Westminster, 'GUIL. Batho. & Wellen.'

"Milord Clarendon disoit ici, que la premiere sentence des mouvemens d'Angleterre, qui n'ont que trop éclaté sous le regne de Charles I. venoit de ce que ce prince avoit témoigné, peu après qu'il fut monté sur le trone de son père, qu'il vouloit retirer les biens ecclésiastiques des mains de la noblesse avec qui Henry 8, auteur du schism, les avoit partagez." Vigneul-Marville, i. 149. Warton's edit. of Pope, i. 131, note. "This fact, which Clarendon used to mention when he retized to Rouen, and which the author gives as a circumstance not noticed in history," Mr. Laing says, "must relate to the revocation of tithes, &c. in Scotland; the only occasion on which Charles ever manifested his design to recover the ecclesiastical revenues from the nobles." Quere tamen.

rics. For this, I said, their own means were too small to live and keep any hospitality, little exceeding 4 or 500*l.* a year. I considered that the Commendams taken at large and far distant, caused a great dislike and murmur among many men; that they were in some cases matteria odiosa, and justly complained of. And hereupon I thought it a good church-work to settle some temporal lease, or some benefice, sine cura, upon the lesser bishoprics, but nothing but such as was in their own right and patronage; that so no other man's patronage might receive prejudice by the bishops' Commendam: which was not the least rock of offence, against which Commendams endangered themselves. And that this was my intent and endeavour, is expressed in my Diary; and I cannot be sorry for it. ❧

IX. Then I was accused for setting old Popish Canons above the laws. Mr. Burton is the sole witness. He says, It was in a case about a pew, in which those Canons did weigh down an act of parliament. 'I did never think till now Mr. Burton would have made any canons pew-fellows with an act of parliament.' But seriously, should not Mr. Burton's testimony for this have been produced at the second Instance of this day? For in the end of that is just such another charge; and the answer there given will satisfy this, and that by act of parliament too. (25 Hen. 8, c. 19, § ult.)

X. After this came a Charge with a great outcry; That since my coming to be Archbishop, I had renewed the High Commission, and put in many illegal and exorbitant clauses, which were not in the former. Both the commissions were produced. Upon this, I humbly desired that the docket might be read, by which their lordships might see all those particulars which were added in the new Commission, and to be able to judge how fit or unfit they were to be added. The Docket was read; and there was no particular found, but such as highly deserved punishment, and were of ecclesiastical cognizance: as blasphemy, schism, and two or three more of like nature.

1. In this Charge, the first exorbitant Clause they insisted on, as added to the new Commission, was the power given "in locis exemptis, et non exemptis;" as if it were thereby intended to destroy all privileges. No, not to destroy any privilege, but not to suffer enormous sins to have any privilege. Besides, this Clause hath ever been in all commissions that ever were granted. And I then shewed it to the Lords in the old Commission there present, p. 28, 32, 35, 42. 'Nay more, this proceeding "tam in locis exemptis quam non exemptis," is allowed to the governors of the Church, in the exercise of their Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, by act of parliament in queen Elizabeth's time [1 Eliz. c. 2.]; which would never have been allowed, had it then been thought such a dangerous business, as it is now made against me.'

2. The second Clause was Power to censure, by Fine and Imprisonment. This also I shewed in the old Commission, fol. 37, and is, I conceive, in plain pursuance of the act of parliament upon which the High-Commission is grounded. For the king says there, fol. 13, (and so it is in the new) That he grants this power by virtue of his Supreme Authority, and prerogative royal,* and of the said act. Nay farther, it is added in this latter Commission, "And by our Authority Ecclesiastical," which is not expressed in the former. And sure I would never have caused Authority Ecclesiastical to be added, had I any Plot, as it is urged, either to exalt the Clergy above the Laity, or to usurp P'apal Power; which all men know is far enough from ascribing Ecclesiastical Authority to the king. And as for Fine and Imprisonment, if that power be not according to law, why was it first admitted, and after continued in all former Commissions?

3. The third Clause was the Non Obstante, which he said was against all law, and of such a boundless extent, as was never found in Commission or other Grant in England. And he here desired the Lords that he might read it, which he did, with great assurance of a triumph. But after all this noise which Mr. Nicolas had made, I shewed the same Non Obstante in the Old Commission; fol. 62, word for word; which I humbly desired might be read and compared; It was so. The Lords looked strangely upon it; Mr. Nicolas was so startled, that he had not patience to stay till his Reply, (which he saw impossible to be made) but interrupted me, and had the face to say in that honourable assembly, That I need not stand upon that: for he did but name that, without much regarding it. And yet at the giving of the Charge, he insisted principally upon that Clause, and in higher and louder terms than are before expressed. Had such an advantage been found against me, I should have been accounted extremely negligent, if I compared not the Commissions together: or extremely impudent, if I did.

4. The fourth Exception was, That by this Commission I took greater Power than ever any Court had, because both Temporal and Ecclesiastical. 1. Whatsoever Power the High-Commission had, was not taken by them, till given by his majesty, and that according to use and statute, (for ought hath been yet declared.) 2. They have not power of life or limb, therefore not so great power as other courts have. 3. They may have more various power in some respects, but that cannot make it greater. 'As for the expression in which it is said, 'I took this power; that is put most unworthily and unjustly too, to derive the envy as much as he could upon my person only.' For he could not hold from comparing me to Pope Boniface 8, and saying, That I took on me the power of both swords. But this was only ad faciendum populum. For he knows well enough, that to take both the swords, as the Pope takes them, is to challenge them originally as due to him and his place: Not to take both, as under the prince, and given by his authority; and so not I alone, but all the Commissioners take theirs.

5. Fifthly, to prove that this vast Commission, as it was called, was put in execution, Mr. Burton is produced. He says, That when he was called into the High-Commission, he appealed to the king, and pleaded his Appeal; and that thereupon I and the bishop of London writ to the king to have him submit to the court. He confesses he was dismissed upon his appeal, till his majesty's pleasure was farther known. And it was our duty, considering what a breach this would make upon the jurisdiction of the court, to inform his majesty of it; and we did so. The king declared that he should submit to the court, as is confessed by himself. Then he says, Because he would not submit to the court, he was censured notwithstanding his appeal. And he well deserved it, that would not be ruled by his majesty, to whom he had appealed. And the Commission had power to do what they did. Besides, himself confesses, all this was done by the High-Commission, not by me. Nor doth he urge any threat, promise, or solicitation of mine, any way to particularize the act upon me: And farther, he is single, and in his own cause.

XI. Then followed the last Charge of this day, which was the Patent granted for the Fines in the High-Commission, for finishing the West end of St. Paul's, cried out upon as illegal, and extorted from the king, and such as took all power from him for the space of ten years, for which time it was granted. This is the fourth time that St. Paul's is struck at. My Lords, let it come as often as it will, my project and endeavour in that Work was honest and honourable to both church and kingdom of England. No man in all this search and pursuit hath been able to charge me with the turning of any one penny or pennyworth to other use than was limited to me. I took a great deal of care and pains about the work, and cannot repent of any thing I did in that service, but of human frailty. And whereas it is said, this Patent was extorted from his majesty; as there is no proof offered for it, so is there no truth in it. For his majesty's piety was so forward, that nothing needed to be extorted from him. Thus went I on, bona fide, and took the prime direction of the kingdom for drawing the Patent, the Lord Keeper Coventry, Mr. Noy, and sir Henry Martin. And therefore if any thing be found against law in it, it cannot be imputed to me, who took all the care I could to have it beyond exception. And I marvel what security any man shall have, that adventures upon any great and public work in this kingdom, if such counsel cannot be trusted for drawing up of his Warrant. 'And whereas it was said, This Patent 'for the 10 years apace took away both justice 'and mercy from the king; that is nothing so:

* The words of the statute are, 'By virtue of this Act.'

‘ For whatever the words be, to enable me the ‘ better for that work, yet these being insepa‘ rable from him, may be used by him, notwith‘ standing this or any other Patent. And if ‘ these be inseparable, (as it is granted they ‘ are) no inseparable thing can be taken away; ‘ or if it be taken, it is void in law, and the ‘ king is where he was in the exercise of his ‘ right, both for justice and mercy. And so I ‘ answered Mr. Browne’s summary Charge ‘ against me. And as for that which he farther ‘ argued concerning St. Gregory’s Church, Mr.
 ‘ Inigo Jones and others were trusted with ‘ that whole business, and were censured for it
 ‘ in this present parliament. In all which Ex‘ amination no part of the Charge fell on ‘ me.’ And because here are so many things ‘ urged about Free-Chapels, Lay-Fee, Patents, ‘ Appeals, and the like, I humbly desire a salvo
 ‘ may be entered for me; and that my counsel ‘ may be heard for matter of law, if any doubt ‘ stick with your lordships.

This Day ended, I did, according to my resolution formerly taken, move the Lords for means, considering my charge in coming, and how oft I had attended, and was not heard.
 Their lordships considered of my motion, and sent me out word I should petition them. I did humbly petition their lordships May 6.
 My Petition was presently sent down to the House of Commons, that so by both houses it might be recommended to the Committee for Sequestrations. But upon a Speech in the house of commons, that it was fit to see what would become of me, before they troubled themselves with thinking of means for me, my Petition was cast aside.

At my parting from the house, I was ordered to appear again on Thursday, May 9, but then fairly put off by an Order (sent to the Lieutenant of the Tower) to Monday, May 13. So the scorn and charge of that day was scaped.
 But then I appeared according to this Order, and had scorn plenty, for what I escaped the day before: And, after long attendance, was dismissed again unheard; and had Thursday, May 16, assigned unto me. That Day held, and proceeded thus.

The Ninth Day of my Hearing.

1. May 16, 1644. The first Charge of this day was about a Reversion of the Town-Clerk’s Office of Shrewsbury to one Mr. Lee, which he desired might be inserted into the new Charter.
 1. Mr. Lee is single here, and in his own case.
 2. It appears by his own confession, out of the mouth of Mr. Barnard, that there was a reference of this business to those lords to whom Shrewsbury Charter was referred; For he says, That Mr. Barnard told him his business was stayed, and he thought by me; but did not know whether the lord-keeper’s hand were not in it. So it seems by himself, this was done by the lords referees, and not by me. 3. I did not then think, nor do now, that the reversion of a place, to be sold for 300*l.* (as he confesses that was) was fit to be put into a Town-Charter.

But yet neither I, nor the Lord-Keeper, did any thing in that stop, but what we acquainted his majesty with, and had his approbation of.
 And whereas he says, That he acquainted the right hon. the earl of Dorset with the stay that was made, and that thereupon his lordship should say, ‘ Have we two kings?’ I cannot believe that honourable lord would so say, unless he were much abused by Mr. Lee’s information, both in regard of his love to me, and in regard it could not proceed from a man of so great a judgment as that lord is. For I beseech your lordships consider, may not lords, to whom a business is referred, give his majesty good reason to alter his mind in some particulars which they have debated, and not he? And may not this be done without any one of them taking on him to be a second king?

II. The second Charge was laid on me by sir Arthur Haselrig, (which should have come in the day before, as Mr. Nicols said, but that sir Arthur was absent in the necessary service of the state.) Sir Arthur, being single and in his own case, says, That sir John Lambe presented a blind parson to a living of his. If sir John did that, or any unworthy thing else, etatem habet, let him answer for himself. He says farther, That this living is an Inpropriation, and so a lay-fee by law; and that when he told me so much, I made him this Answer, “ That if I lived, no man should name or stand upon his Lay-Fee.” I conceive, my Lords, here is a great mistake in the main: For I have been credibly informed, and do believe, that benefice is presentative, and so no lay-fee.
 And then there is no fault to present unto it, so the clerk be fit. Secondly, There is a main mistake in my Words, which I remember well, and where it was that I spake them. My words, under this gentleman’s favour, and your lordships, were these, and no other; “ That I had good information that the Benefice was presentative; and that if I lived, I hoped to order it so, that no man should make a presentative benefice a lay-fee; there were too many of them already.” Thirdly, If I did speak the words as they are charged, if they come within that statute of six months, so often mentioned, to that I refer myself: “ whatsoever the bird at this time of the year sings,” as Mr. Nicols was pleased to put it upon me. And truly, my Lords, I could easily return all his bitterness upon himself, could it befit my person, my present condition, or my calling.

III. The third Charge was about the refusing of a Pardon, which Mrs. Bastwick said she produced in the High-Commission Court some nine or ten years since: And she adds, That I should then say, it should not serve his turn.
 But this was no rejecting of the Pardon; for she confesses I said I would move his majesty about it. So that if it did not serve his turn, it was from the king himself, upon motion made,
 and reason given, not from any power assumed by the High-Commission or myself. And the act, whatever it were, was the act of the whole court not mine. As for the Words, (if mine) I gave the same Answer as before, notwithstanding Mr. Nicolas his bird.

IV. The fourth Charge was, That whereas there was a Proclamation to be printed about the Pacification with the Scots, it was suddenly stopped: and an Order after for burning of the Pacification. 1. Mr. Hunscoth is single in this Charge. 2. Whatsoever was done in this, was by Order of Council: And himself names an Order which could not come from me. 3. He charges me with nothing but that I sent word the Proclamation was to be stayed; which, if I did, I did it by command. Howsoever, this concerns the Scottish business, and therefore to the Act of Oblivion I refer myself. 'With this, that I see by this testimony, Mr. Hunscoth (for I took his name uncertainly) hath not yet forgotten, 'Thou shalt commit Adultery;' so desirous he is to catch me at the press.'

V. The first Charge was about a Benefice in Northamptonshire, in the case of Mr. Fautrye and Mr. Johnson, and Dr. Beal's succeeding them. In which broken business, (for such it was) 1. That business was all along acted by the High-Commission, not by me. 2. That though in the case of Simony the benefice be lost, ipso facto, yet that must be proved before the incumbent can be thrust up, and another instituted, else churchmen were in a miserable condition for their livelihood. Excommunication is in many cases void in law, ipso facto; and yet, ante litem, Sententiam, till Sentence be orderly pronounced against it, no man shall be subjected to those fearful consequences which follow upon it. 'And upon this ground of natural equity, that in the Statute concerning the Uniformity of Common-Prayer proceeds:' Where it is said, "That a party once convicted for depraving the Common-Prayer-Book, and relapsing into the same crime, shall be deprived of all his spiritual promotions, ipso facto." (Eliz. c. 2.) But how? without any legal proceedings? No, God forbid! For the Words preceding immediately in the Statute, are, "That he must be first legally convicted of that criminal relapse;" and then follows ipso facto, and not before. And therefore the super-institution, before the Simony tried and judged, was illegal; beside the great danger to the parishioners, while two persons, and their several friends, are scrambling for the Tythes. Secondly, Fautrye was not censured for the original cause of Simony, but for an Intruder, and Colluder too with James, to abuse the king's grant of the benefice. Thirdly, it seems Fautrye had no better opinion of his own cause: for he went to his benefice in Jersey, and set not his title on foot again till after seven years; and that, I think, was when he heard that Mr. Johnson was a pretender to it. And his bond upon the Sentence was to make a final peace. For the Prohibition, which he says was refused, I have answered that before, in the charge about Prohibitions. Besides, it appears by law, (13

Edw. 1.) that as Prohibitions may be granted in some cases, so in some cases they may be refused. For Dr. Beal, there is not the least shew of Proof offered, that I brought him in, if to do so be a crime.

Thus far Mr. Fautrye went. As for Mr. Johnson's title, he says, That the lords ordered it for him, and declared that we in the High-Commission could put no man out of his freehold. Where first, if your lordships have ordered this business, I must crave to know how far I shall have leave to speak to it: for if there be any errors charged upon the Sentence given in the High-Commission, if they may not be spoken to they cannot be satisfied. This I am sure of, the commission hath power to deprive: for the Statute (1 Eliz. c. 1. § 8.) gives it power "to use all Ecclesiastical and Spiritual Censures;" of which deprivation is known to be one: and that power is expressly given to deprive some offenders of all their spiritual promotions, by the following statute. (1 Eliz. c. 2.) Therefore I think it follows necessarily, either that we have power over freehold in that case, or else that a benefice is not a freehold. But I have no reason, howsoever, to speak any thing (were I left never so free) against your lordships' Order, which very honourably left Dr. Beal to the law; as it is confessed by Johnson.

Besides these two in their own cause, one Mr. Jenkins is produced; but to what end I know not, unless it be to bespatter Dr. Beal. He says, That seven years since Dr. Beal was Vice-chancellor of Cambridge; that in his Sermon then he inveighed bitterly against the Power of Parliaments, and named some offensive speeches of his, both concerning their persons and proceedings. Surely, if Dr. Beal did as is testified, he was much to blame. But what is this to me? If it be said I did not punish him: how could I punish that I knew not? And I profess I heard not of it till now at bar. If it be said I did prefer him; that I do absolutely deny. And neither Mr. Jenkins, nor any other, offers the least proof that I knew the one, or did the other.

VI. The sixth Charge was concerning the Statutes of the University of Oxford; in which, and the Cathedrals of the new erection, Mr. Nicolas says I took on me to be an universal law-giver. Many such offices he bestows upon me, which God knows, and I believe he too, that I never affected. No, my lords, the great necessities of that University called upon me for it: their statutes lay in a miserable confused heap. When any difficulty arose, they knew not where to look for remedy or direction. Then into the Convocation-House, and make a new statute; and that many times proved contrary to an old one concerning the same business: men in the mean time sworn to both, which could not possibly be kept together. By this means perjury was in a manner unavoidable: and themselves confess in their register, (which is now in court) that till this was done, they did in a sort swear, that they might be forsworn. [Jurati ante ut Perjuri evaderent fol. 69.]

Besides, my Lords, I did not abolish any the old Books, in which the Statutes lay so confused, some in one book, and some in another; but left them all intirely in the University, in case in after-times any use might be made of them. Nor did I with them, as some ancient Philosophers are said to have done with the Works of some that went before them; that is, make them away, to advance their own honour the more, as if without any help of former pains, they had done all themselves: holding it honour more than enough for me, that God had so highly blessed me in this work, as to finish and settle those Statutes, which the greatest men in their times, cardinal Wolsey first, and after him cardinal Pool, assayed, but left as imperfect as they found them. Neither did I any thing in this work but by the consent of the University, and according to an Act (and a delegacy thereby appointed) of their own convocation.

Mr. Nicolas says, There is a Rasure in one of the acts, and supplied in other ink. I told your lordships then presently, (being loth to lie never so little under such an imputation) that if there be any such, it must be charged upon the University, not upon me, for those Records were never in my hands? nor is it so much as said they were. And since I withdrew to make my Answer, I have viewed the Record, and an alteration or addition there is; and it is a known hand. It is Dr. Doppa's hand, now lord bishop of Salisbury, and then Vice-Chancellor; who I doubt not but is able to give a good account of what he did therein, and why. And for aught appears, it is nothing but the amendment of some slip, which their ignorant register French had failed in, and the Vice-Chancellor thought it safest to mend with his own hand. And for my own part, if ever I did any thing worth thanks from the public in all my life, I did it in this work, for that University. And I wish with all my heart the times were so open, as that I might have the University's testimony both of me and it. 'Since I cannot, a great lord, present in the House when this Charge was laid against me, supplied in part their absence: for he was over-heard to say, to another lord, "I think my Lord Archbishop hath done no good work in all his life, but these men will object it as a crime against him before they have done."

With this Charge about the Statutes it was left fall, (and I well know why, 'Twas to heat a noble person then present,) That I procured myself to be chosen Chancellor of that University. If I had so done, it might have been a great ambition in me, but surely no treason. But, my Lords, I have proof great store, might I be enabled to fetch it from Oxford, that I was so far from endeavouring to procure this honour to myself, as that I laboured by my letters for another. And it is well known, that when they had chosen me, I went instantly to his majesty, so soon as ever I heard it, and humbly besought him that I might refuse it, as well foreseeing the envy that would follow me for it; and it did plentifully every way. But this for some reasons: his majesty would not suffer me to do.

Then were objected against me divers particulars contained in those Statutes: As, 1. The making of new Oaths. The Charters of the University are not new, and they gave power to make statutes for themselves, and they have ever been upon oath. 2. The next illegality is, That men are tied to obey the Proctors in singing the Litany. This is antient, and in use long before ever I came to the University; and it is according to the Liturgy of the church of England, established by law. 3. The Statute of Bannition from the University. But there is nothing more antient in the University-Statutes than this. 4. That nothing should be proposed in Convocation, but what was consented unto among the Heads of Colleges first; which was said to be against the liberty of the Students. The young Masters of Arts, void of experience, were grown so tumultuous, that no peace could be kept in the University, till my worthy predecessor, the right hon. William earl of Pembroke, settled this Order among them: As he did also, upon the same grounds, settle the present way of the choice of their Proctors. In both which I did but follow and confirm, for so much as lay in me, the good and peaceable grounds which he had laid in those two businesses. 'And Mr. Browne, who, in the summing up of my Charge, urged this against me, mainly mistook in two things. The one was, 'That he said this Inhibition of Proposals was in Congregations: whereas it was only in Convocations, where more weighty businesses are handled. The other was, That this stay of Proposals was made till I might be first acquainted with them. No; it was but till the Heads of Colleges had met, and considered of them, for avoiding tumultuary proceedings. 'And when my honourable predecessor made that Order, it was highly commended every where; And is it now degenerated into a crime, because it is made up into a statute?' 5. That some things are referred to arbitrary Penalties. And that some things are so referred, is usual in that University, and many Colleges have a particular Statute for it: Nor is this any more power than ordinary school-masters have, which have not a statute-law for every punishment they use in schools. And in divers things the old known statute is, That the Vice-Chancellor shall proceed grasso modo, that is, without the regular forms of law, for the more speedy ending of differences among the scholars. 6. That the Statute [Tit. 15. § 12.] made by me against Conventicles is very strict: But for these that Statute is express de illicitis Conventiculis: and I hope such as are unlawful may be both forbid and punished. Besides, it is according to the Charter of Richard 2d to that University. 7. The seventh was the Power of Discorramoning. But this also hath ever been in power, and in usage in that University, as is commonly known to all Oxford men: And no longer since than king James his tittle, bishop King, then Vice-Chancellor, discommoded three or four Townsmen together. 8. That Students were bound to go to prison upon the Vice-Chancellor's or Proctor's command. This also was ancient, and long before my coming to the University. And your lordships may be sure the delegacy, appointed by themselves, would not have admitted it, had it not been ancient and usual. 9. and lastly, [Tit. 9. § 2.] About the stay of granting Graces, unless there were testimony from the bishop of the diocess. This was for no Graces, but of such as live not resident in the University, and so they could not judge of their manners and conversation. And for their Conformity to the Church of England, none, as I conceive, can be a fitter witness than the Bishop of the diocess in which they resided. And, my Lords, for all these thus drawn up by some of their own body, I obtained of his majesty his broad-seal for confirmation; and therefore no one thing in them is by any assumption of papal power, as it is urged; but by the king's power only. 'As for the Statutes themselves, there was scarce one urged against me, but it was either a statute or a prescription of that University long before I was born into the world, and could not therefore be of my new making. And this was my Answer to Mr. Browne in the house of commons. And such Bannition, Discommoding, and the like, are well known to be.'

VII. Then followed the seventh Charge, About the Statutes of some Cathedral Churches. First, my lords, for this, I did it by letters-patents from the king, bearing date Mar. 31 decimo Caroli, and is extant upon Record. And all that was done, was per juris remedia, and so nothing intended against law, nor done that I know. They had extreme need of Statutes; for all lay loose for want of Confirmation, and men did what they listed: and I could not but observe it; for I was dean of Gloucester, where I found it so. In seeking to remedy this, I had nothing but my labour for my pains; and now this accusation to boot. The particulars urged are, 1. That I had ordered that nothing should be done in these statutes, me inconsulto. And I had great reason for it. For since I was principally trusted in that work by his majesty, the king, if any complaint were made, would expect the account from me. And how could I give it, if other men might do all, and I not be so much as consulted before they passed?

2. That I made a Statute against letting Leases into three lives. But first, my lords, the statute which makes it lawful to let leases for 21 years, or three lives, (13 Eliz. c. 10, § penult.) hath this limitation in it, "That they shall not let for many more years than are limited by the said colleges or churches." Now in Winchester church, and some other, the old local statute is most plain, that they shall let no Lease into lives. Let the Dean and Prebendaries answer their own acts, and their consciences, as they can. And in those Statutes which I did not find pregnant to that purpose, I did not make the statute absolute, but left them free to renew all such leases as were anciently in lives before. And this give me leave to say to your lordships without offence: If but a few more leases be granted into lives, no bishop nor Cathedral church shall be able to subsist. And this is considerable also, That, as the Statute of the Church yet stands, the laity have the benefit, by the leases which they hold, of more than five parts of all the bishops, deans and chapters, and college Revenues in England. 'And shall it be yet an eye-sore to serve themselves with the rest of their own? This evidence Mr. Browne, whose part it was to sum up the Evidence against me at the end of the Charge, wholly omitted: for what cause, he best knows.'

VIII. The next Charge was about my Injunctions in my visitation of Winton and Sarum, for the taking down of some houses. But they were such as were upon consecrated ground, and ought not to have been built there; and yet with caution sufficient to preserve the lessees from over-much damage. For it appears apud Acta, that they were not to be pulled down till their several leases were expired. And that they were houses not built long since, but by them; and that all this was to be done, to the end that the church might suffer no damage by them: and that this demolition was to be made justa decreta regni, according to the statutes of the kingdom. Therefore nothing enjoined contrary to law: or if any thing were, the Injunction took not place, by the very tenor of that which was charged. 'Mr. Browne omitted this Charge also, though he hung heavily upon the like at St. Paul's; though there was satisfaction given, and not here.'

IX. The ninth Charge was my intended Visitation of both the universities, Oxford and Cambridge. For my Troubles began then to be foreseen by me, and I visited them not. 1. This was urged as a thing directly against law. But this I conceive cannot be, so long as it was with the king's knowledge, and by his warrant. 2. Because all power of the king's Visitations was saved in the warrant, and that with consent of all parts. 3. Because nothing in this was surreptitiously gotten from the king, all being done at a most full Council-Table, and great counsel at law heard on both sides. 4. Because it did there appear, that three of my predecessors did actually visit the Universities, and that Jure Ecclesie sue Metropolitanae. 5. No immunity pleaded, why the Archbishop should not visit; for the instance against cardinal Pool is nothing. For he attempted to visit, not only by the right of his see, but by his power legatine from the Pope; whereas the University Charters are express, that such power of Visitation cannot be granted per Bullas Popales. And yet now it is charged against me, that I challenged this by Papal Power.* 'Mr. Browne wholly neglected this Charge also; which unmaking such a shew, I think he would not have done, had he found it well grounded.'

X. The tenth Charge was my Visitation of Merton College in Oxford. The witness, sir Nathaniel Brent, the warden of the college, and principally concerned in that business. He said, 1. That no Visitation held so long. But if he consult his own office, he may find one much longer, held and continued at All-Souls College by my worthy predecessor archbishop Whitgift. 2. He urged that I should say, I would be warden for seven years. If I did so say, there was much need I should make it good. 3. That one Mr. Rich. Nevil, fellow of that college, lay abroad in an ale-house; that a wench was got with child in that house, and he accused of it; and that this was complained of to me; and sir Nath. Brent accused for conspiring with the ale-wife against Nevil. I am not here to accuse the one, or to defend the other. But the case is this: This cause between them was public, and came to hearing in the Vice-Chancellor's court, witnesses examined, Mr. Nevil acquitted, and the ale-wife punished. In all this I had no hand. Then in my Visitation it was again complained of to me. I liked not the business; but forbore to do any thing in it, because it had been legally censured upon the place. 'This part of the Charge Mr. Browne urged against me in the house of commons, and I gave it the same Answer.' Lastly, When I sat to hear the main business of that College, sir Nath. Brent was beholden to me that he continued Warden. For in archbishop Warham's time, a predecessor of his was expelled for less than was proved against him. And I found that true which one of my visitors had formerly told me, namely, That sir Nath. Brent had so carried himself in that college, as that if he were guilty of the like, he would lay his key under the door, and be gone, rather than come to answer it. Yet I did not think fit to proceed so rigidly. But while I was going to open some of the Particulars against him, Mr. Nicolas cut me off, and told the Lords, this was to scandalize their Witnesses. So I forbore.

XI. Then followed the last Charge of this day, concerning a Book of Dr. Bastwick's, for which he was censured in the High Commission.

* The Archbishop had collected many Papers, Decrees, and Precedents, to assert his privilege of visiting the Universities, in right of his See, about the year 1635. Which being seized on by Prynne, among his other Papers at Lambeth, were by him, after the Archbishop's death, published in his own name, with this title, "The Plea of the University of Oxford refuted," &c. London, 1617, eight sheets in 4to. H. W.

The witnesses in this Charge were three. Mr. Burton, a mortal enemy of mine, and so he hath shewed himself: Mrs. Bastwick, a woman and a wife, and well tutored for she had a Paper and all written which she had to say; though I saw it not till it was too late. And Mr. Hunscoot, a man that comes in to serve all turns against me, since the Sentence passed against the Printers for "Thou shalt commit Adultery."

In the particulars of this Charge, it is first said, That this Book was written contra episcopos latiales. But how cunningly soever this was pretended, it is more than manifest, it was purposely written and divulged against the Bishops and Church of England. 2. That I said that Christian Bishops were before Christian kings: So Burton and Mrs. Bastwick. And with due reverence to all kingly authority be it spoken, who can doubt but that there were many Christian Bishops, before any king was Christian? 3. Mr. Burton says, That I applied those words in the Psalm, "Whom thou mayst make princes in all lands," to the Bishops. For this, if I did err in it, many of the Fathers of the Church misled me, who interpret that place so: And if I be mistaken, it is no Treason. But I shall ever follow their comments before Mr. Burton's. 4. Mrs. Bastwick says that I then said, 'No Bishop, and no King.' If I did say so, I learned it of a wise and experienced Author, king James, who spake it out and plainly in the Conference at Hampton-Court*. And I hope it cannot be Treason in me to repeat it. 5. Mrs. Bastwick complained, That I committed her husband close prisoner. Not I, but the High-Commission; not close prisoner to his Chamber, but to the prison, not to go abroad with his keeper; which is all the close imprisonment which I ever knew that court use. Lastly, The pinch of this Charge is, That I said "I received my jurisdiction from God, and from Christ;" contrary to an act of parliament, (37 H. 8, c. 17.) which says, bishops derive their jurisdiction from the king. This is witnessed by all three, and that Dr. Bastwick read the statute. That statute speaks plainly of jurisdiction in foro contentioso, and places of Judicature, and no other. And all this forinsecud jurisdiction, I and all bishops in England derive from the crown. But my order, my calling, my jurisdiction in foro conscientie, that is from God, and from Christ, and by divine and apostolical right. And of this jurisdiction it was that I then spake (if I named jurisdiction at all, and not my calling in general.) For I then sat in the High-Commission, and did exercise the former jurisdiction under the broad seal, and could not be so simple to deny the power by which I then sat. Beside, the Canons of the Church of England, to which I have subscribed, are plain for it. Nay further, the use and exercise of my jurisdiction in foro conscientie, may not be but by the leave and power of the king within his dominions. And if bishops and presbyters be all one order (as these men contend for), then bi-hops must be Jure Divino, for so they maintain that presbyters are. This part of the Charge Mr. Browne pressed in his report to the house of commons; and when I gave this same Answer, he in his reply said nothing but the same over and over again, save that he said, I fled to he knew not what inward calling and jurisdiction: which point, as I expressed it, if he understood not, he should not have undertaken to judge me.

The 16th of May I had an Order from the Lords, for free access of four of my servants to me.

On Friday, May 17, I received a Note from the Committee, that they intended to proceed upon part of the sixth Original Article remaining, and upon the seventh; which seventh Article follows in hæc verba:

VII. "That he hath traitorously endeavoured to alter and subvert God's true Religion by law established in this realm, and instead thereof to set up Popish Superstition and Idolatry: and to that end hath declared and maintained in Speeches and printed Books divers Popish Doctrines and opinions, contrary to the Articles of Religion established. He hath urged and enjoined divers Popish and Superstitious Ceremonies, without any warrant of law; and hath cruelly persecuted those who have opposed the same, by corporal punishment and imprisonment; and most unjustly vexed others, who refused to conform thereto, by ecclesiastical censures of excommunication, suspension, deprivation, and degradation, contrary to the law of this kingdom."

The Tenth Day of my Hearing.

Monday, May 20, 1644. This day Mr. Sergeant Wild undertook the business against me. And at his entrance he made a Speech, being now to charge me with matter of Religion. In this speech he spake of a Tide, which came not in all at once: and so he said it was in the intended alteration of Religion. First, a Connivance, then a Toleration, then a Subversion. Nor this, nor that: but a tide it seems he will have of Religion. And I pray God his Truth (the true Protestant religion here established) sink not to so low an ebb, that men may with ease wade over to that side, which this gentleman seems most to hate. He fears both Ceremonies and Doctrines: but in both he fears where no fear is; which I hope shall appear. He was pleased to begin with Ceremonies.

I. In this he charged first my Chapel at Lambeth, and Innovation in Ceremonies there.

1. The first Witness for this was Dr. Featly: he says, (1.) There were alterations since my predecessor's time. And I say so too, or else my chapel must lie more undecently than is fit to express. He says, I turned the Table North and South. The Injunction says it shall be so. (Injunct. of Eliz. fine.) 'And then the Innovation was theirs in going from, not mine in returning to that way of placing it.' Here Mr. Browne, in his last reply in the house of commons, said, That I cut the Injunction short, because in the Words immediately following it is ordered, "That this place of standing shall be altered, when the Communion is administered." But first, the Charge against me is only about the place of it: of which that Injunction is so careful, that it commands, "That when the Communion is done, it be placed where it stood before." Secondly, it was never charged against me, that I did not remove it at the time of Communion, nor doth the reason expressed in the Injunction require it; which is, "When the number of Communicants is great, and that the minister may be the better heard of them." Neither of which was necessary in my Chapel, where my number was not great, and all might easily hear.'

(2.) The second thing which Dr. Featly said, was in downright terms, That the Chapel lay nastily, all the time he served in that house. Was it one of my faults, too, to cleanse it?

(3.) Thirdly, He says, the windows were not made up with coloured glass, till my time. The truth is, they were all shameful to look on, all diversly patched, like a poor beggar's coat. Had they had all white glass, I had not stirred them. And for the Crucifix, he confesses it was standing in my predecessor's time, though a little broken: so I did but mend it, I did not set it up (as was urged against me.) And it was utterly mistaken by Mr. Browne, [In his Reply.] that I did repair the Story of those Windows, by their like in the Mass-Book. No; but I and my secretary made out the Story, as well as we could, by the remains that were unbroken. Nor was any proof at all offered, that I did it by the pictures in the Mass-Book; but only Mr. Prynne testified, that such pictures were there; whereas this argument is of no consequence: there are such pictures in the Missal, therefore I repaired my windows by them. The windows contain the whole Story from the Creation to the Day of Judgment: three lights in a window; the two side-lights contain the types in the Old Testament, and the Middle-Light the Antitype and Verity of Christ in the New: and I believe the types are not in the pictures in the missal. In the mean time, I know no crime or superstition in this history. And though Calvin do not approve Images in Churches, [Calv. 1 Instit. c. 11. § 12.] yet he doth approve very well of them which contain a history; and says plainly, that these have their use, in docendo et admonendo, in teaching and admonishing the people: and if they have that use, why they may not instruct in the church, as well as out, I know not. Nor do the Homilies in this particular differ much from Calvin. [Hom. of Idol. par. 2. to. 2. p. 27. fine.]

But here the statute of Edw. 6, (3 and 4

Ed. 6, c. 10.) was charged against me, which requires "the destruction of all Images, as well in Glass-Windows, as elsewhere." "And this was also earnestly pressed by Mr. Browne, when he repeated the sum of the Charge against me in the House of Commons." To which I answered at both times: first, That the statute of Edw. 6, spake of other Images; and that Images in Glass-Windows were neither mentioned, nor meant in that law: the words of the statute are, "Any Images of stone, timber, alabaster or earth, graven, carved or painted, taken out of any church, &c. shall be destroyed, &c." and not reserved to any superstitious use. So here is not a word of Glass-windows, nor the Images that are in them. Secondly, that the contemporary practice (which is one of the best expounders of the meaning of any law) did neither destroy all coloured windows, though Images were in them in the queen's time, nor abstain from setting up of new, both in her and king James's time. And as the body of this Statute is utterly mistaken, so is the Penalty too; which, for the first and second offence, is but a small Fine, and but imprisonment at the king's will for the third. "A great way short of punishment for Treason. And I could not but wonder, that Mr. Browne should be so earnest in this point, considering he is of Lincoln's-Inn, where Mr. Prynne's zeal hath not yet beaten down the Images of the Apostles in the fair Windows of that Chapel; which windows also were set up new, long since that statute of Edw. 6. And it is well known, that I was once resolved to have returned this upon Mr. Browne in the house of commons, but changed my mind, lest thereby I might have set some furious spirit on work to destroy those harmless godly windows, to the just dislike of that worthy Society."

But to the Statute Mr. Browne added, That the destruction of all Images, as well in windows as elsewhere, was commanded by the Homilies of the church of England, and those Homilies confirmed in the Articles of Religion [Art. 35.] and the Articles by act of parliament. This was also urged before; and my Answer was, 1. That though we subscribed generally to the doctrine of the Homilies, as good; yet we did not express, or mean thereby to justify and maintain every particular phrase or sentence contained in them. And 2. That the very words of the Article to which we subscribe, are, "That the Homilies do contain a godly and a wholesome doctrine, and necessary for those times." Godly, and wholesome for all times; but necessary for those, when people were newly weaned from the worship of Images: afterwards, neither the danger nor the scandal alike. "Mr. Browne in his Reply said, "That since the Doctrine contained in the Homilies was wholesome and good, it must needs be necessary also for all times. But this worthy gentleman is herein much mistaken. Strong meat, as well spiritual as bodily, is good and wholesome; but though it be so, yet if it 'had been necessary at all times, and for all men, the Apostle would never have fed the Corinthians with milk, and not with meat, 1 Cor. iii. 1, 2. The meat always good in itself, but not necessary for them which were not able to bear it.'

(4.) The fourth thing which Dr. Featly testifies, is, That there were Bowings at the coming into the Chapel, and going up to the Communion-Table. "This was usual in queen Elizabeth's time, and of old, both among Jews, as appears in the story of Hezekiah, 2 Chron. xxix. 18, and among Christians, as is evident in Rhenanus's Notes upon Tertullian." [B. Rhenani Annot. in Tert. de Coron. Mil. p. 40.] And one of them, which have written against the late Canons, confesses it was usual in the queen's time; but then adds, "That that was a time of ignorance." [Bp. Morton de Missa, l. 6. c. 5.] What, a time of such a Reformation, and yet still a time of ignorance! I pray God the opposite be not a time of profaneness, and all is well. "Mr. Browne, in the sum of his Charge given me in the house of commons, instanced in this also. I answered as before, with this Addition, "Shall I bow to men in each house of parliament, and shall I not bow to God in his house, whither I do, or ought to come to worship him? Surely I must worship God, and bow to him, though neither altar nor communion table be in the church."

(5.) For Organs, Candlesticks, a Picture of a history at the back of the altar, and Copes at Communions and Consecrations; all which Dr. Featly named: 1. These things have been in use ever since the Reformation. And 2. Dr. Featly himself did twice acknowledge that it was in my Chapel, as it was at Whitehall; no difference. And it is not to be thought, that queen Elizabeth and king James would have endured them all their time in their own chapel, had they been introductions for Popery. And for Copes, they are allowed at times of Communion by the Canons of the church. [Can. Eccles. Angl. 24.] So that these, all or any, are very poor motives from whence to argue an alteration of religion.

2. The second Witness against my Chapel was sir Nathaniel Brent: But he says not so much as Dr. Featly; and in what he doth say, he agrees with him, saving that he cannot say, whether the Picture at the back of the Communion-Table were not there before my time.

3. The third Witness for this Charge was one Mr. Boreman, who came into my Chapel at prayers-time, when I had some new plate to consecrate for use of the Communion; and I think it was brought to me for that end by Dr. Featly. This man says first, He then saw me bow, and wear a cope. That is answered. Secondly, That he saw me consecrate some plate; that in that consecration I used some part of Solomon's Prayer at the Dedication of the Temple; and that in my prayer I did desire God to accept those vessels. No fault in any of the three. For in all ages of the Church, especially since Constantine's time, that religion hath had public allowance, there have been Consecrations of sacred vessels, as well as of churches themselves. [Tho. p. 3. q. 63. A. 6. ad Secundum.] And these inanimate things are holy, in that they are deputed and dedicated to the service of God. And we are said "to minister about holy things," 1 Cor. ix. 13. And the Altar is said "to sanctify the gift," St. Matth. xxiii. 19, which it could not do, if itself were not holy. So then, if there be no dedication of these things to God, no separation of them from common use, there is neither thing nor place holy: And then no sacrilege; no difference between churches and common houses, between Holy Tables, so the Injunction calls them (Injunct. of Q. Eliz. in fine,) and ordinary tables. But I would have no man deceive himself; Sacrilege is a grievous sin, and was severely punished, even among the Heathen. And St. Paul's question puts it home, would we consider of it; "Thou which abhorrest Idols, committest thou Sacrilege?" Rom. ii. 22. Thou which abhorrest Idols, to the very defacing of Church-Windows, dost thou, thou of all other, commit Sacrilege, which the very Worshipers of idols punished? And this being so, I hope my use of a part of Solomon's Prayer, or the words of my own prayer ("That God would be pleased to accept them,") shall not be reputed faults.

But here stepped in Mr. Prynne, and said, This was according to the form in Missali purvo. But it is well known I borrowed nothing thence. All that I used was according to the copy of the late reverend bishop of Winchester, bishop Andrews, which I have by me to be seen, and which himself used all his time.

II. Then from my Chapel he went to my Study; and there the second Charge was, 1. That I had a Bible with the five wounds of Christ fair upon the cover of it. This was curiously wrought in needlework. The bible was so sent me by a lady, and she a protestant; I was loth to deface the work: but the Bible I kept in my study from any man's hand or eye, that might take offence at it. 'Mr. Browne touched upon this, and my Answer was the same, saying that I mentioned not the lady. 2. That I had in my study a missal, and divers other books belonging to the Roman liturgy.' My Lords, it is true, I had many; but I had more of the Greek liturgies than the Roman: And I had as many of both, as I could get. And I would know, how we shall answer their Errors, if we may not have their Books? I had Liturgies, all I could get, both ancient and modern. I had also the Alcoran in divers copies. If this be an argument, why do they not accuse me to be a Turk? 3. To this Charge was added my private Prayer-book, which Mr. Prynne had taken from me in his search. Where first I observed, That the secrets between God and my soul were brought to be divulged in open court. 'Nihil gravius dicam: But see whether it can be paralleled in Heathenism.' But what Popery was found in these prayers? Why, first, they said, My prayers were in canonical hours, hora sexta, et hora nona, &c. I enjoined myself several hours of prayer; that, I hope, is no sin: And if some of them were church hours, that is no sin neither: "Seven times a day will I praise thee," (Psal. cxix.) was the prophet David's, long before any Canonical hours. And among Christians they were in use before Popery got any head. God grant this may be my greatest sin! Secondly, The Prayer which I made at the Consecration of the chapel at Hammer-smith. I desire that might be read, or any other. No offence found. Thirdly, The word Prostratus in my private devotions, before I came to the Eucharist. If I did so to God, what is that to any man? But I pray, in all this curious search, ('and Mr. Prynne here, 'and all along, spared no pains') why were no prayers to the B. Virgin and the saints found, if I were so swallowed up in Popery?

III. From my Study he went on to my Gallery. The serjeant would find out Popery ere he had done. Thence I was charged with three pictures: The first of them was a fair picture of the four fathers of the western church, St. Ambrose, St. Jerome, St. Augustine and St. Gregory. It was as lawful to have this Picture as the picture of any other men. Yea, but there was a Dove pictured over them, and that stood for the Holy Ghost. That is more than any witness did or durst depose. The second was the Ecce Homo, as Pilate brought Christ forth, and shewed him to the Jews. This picture is common, and I yet know no hurt of it, so it be not worshipped: and that I detest as much as any man, and have written as much against it as any protestant hath: [Cont. Fisher. § 33. p. 279.] And it was then read in part. And for both these pictures I answered out of Calvin; [L. 1. Inst. c. 11. § 12.] That it is lawful to make, and have the picture of any things, quorum sint capaces oculi, which may be seen. Now the Dove was visible and seen, St. John i. 32, 33. That is for the first picture. And for the second, the Ecce Homo, why did Pilate say Ecce, but that the Jews might and did see him? John xix. So both Pictures lawful by the rule laid down by Calvin.

'Mr. Browne charged against both these Pictures very warmly. And when I had answered as before, in his Reply he fell upon my Answer; and said it was in the Homilies (but either he quoted not the place, or else slipped it), That every picture of Christ was a lye, because whole Christ cannot be pictured. But by this argument it is unlawful to picture any man; for the whole man cannot be pictured. Who ever drew a picture of the soul? And yet who so simple as to say the picture of a man is a lye? Besides, the Ecce Homo is a picture of the humanity of Christ only, which may as lawfully be drawn as any other man. And it may be I may give farther Answer, when I see the place in the Homilies.'

The third Picture found in my Gallery, I marvel why it was produced; for it relates to that of our Saviour, St. John x. 1, 2, where he says, "That the shopherd enters into the sheepfold by the door, but they which climb up to enter another way, are thieves and robbers." And in that picture the pope and the friars are climbing up to get in at the windows: So it is as directly against Popery as can be. Besides, it was witnessed before the Lords by Mr. Walter Dobson, an ancient servant, both to archbishop Bancroft and Abbot, That both the Ecce Homo and this picture were in the Gallery when he came first to Lambeth-house, which was about 40 years since: so it was not brought thither by me to countenance Popery*. And I hope your lordships do not think me such a fool; if I had an intencion to alter religion, I should hang the profession of it openly in my gallery, thereby to bring present danger upon myself, and destroy the work which, themselves say, I intended cunningly. And if there be any error in having and keeping such Pictures, yet this is no sufficient proof that I had any intencion to alter the religion established; which I desire may be taken notice of once for all.

IV. From my Gallery, the Serjeant crossed the Water to White-Hall (and sure in haste; for at that time he took no leave of captain Guest, or his wife, before he left Lambeth): At the Court he met sir Henry Mildmay. 1. This knight being produced by him against me, says, That in my time Bowings were constantly used in the Chapel there. But, 1. Dr. Featly told your lordships, there was nothing in my Chapel but as it was in use at White-Hall. So all the Popery I could bring, was there before. And, 2. If bowing to God in his own house be not amiss, (as how it should I yet know not) then there can be no fault in the constant doing of it: "Quod semel fecisse bonum est, non potest malum esse, si frequenter fiat." So St. Jerome teaches. [S. Hierom. adversus Vigilantium.] 3. I am very sorry, that any reverence to God in his house, and in the time of his worship, should be thought too much. I am sure the Homilies, so often pressed against me, cry out against the neglect of Reverence in the Church. [Tom. 2, Hom. 1. Princip.] This Passage was read; and by this it seems, the Devil's cunning was, so soon as he saw superstition thrust out of this church, to bring irreverence and profaneness in. Here Mr. Browne having pressed 'this Charge, replies upon me in his last, That 'I would admit no mean, but either there must 'be superstition or profaneness; whereas my 'words can infer no such thing. I said "this 'was the Devil's practice:" I would have 'brought in the mean between them, and pre-

* All these pictures were placed in the Gallery by Cardinal Poole, when he built it, and continue there still, having not been defaced in the time of the Rebellion, as were the Windows of the Chapel, and the Chapel itself converted into a Dancing-Room; Archbishop Parker's tomb in the middle of it being first beat down, and his bones cast upon the dunghill.

'served it too, by God's blessing, had I been 'let alone.'

2. Sir Henry says next, That he knew of no Bowings in that Chapel before my time, but by the right hon. the knights of the garter at their solemnity. No time else? Did he ever see the king his master offer before my time? Or did he ever see him offer, or the Lord Chamberlain attend him there, without Bowing and Kneeling too? And for the Knights of the Garter, if they might do it without superstition, I hope I and other men might do so too: Especially since they were ordered by Hen. 5, to do it with great reverence, admodum sacerdotum: Which proves the antiquity of this ceremony in England. [In Registro Windesoriensi, p. 65, it is commonly called the Black Book.]

3. He farther says, There was a fair Crucifix in a piece of hangings hung up behind the altar, which he thinks was not used before my time. But that he thinks so, is no proof. 4. He says, This fair piece was hung up in the Passion Week, as they call it. As they call it? Which they? Will he shut out himself from the Passion Week? All Christians have called it so for above 1,000 years together; and is that become an innovation too, as they call it? [Et observabatur ab omnibus. Videlicet (and he no way superstitious) in Ignat. Epist. ad Philip. Exercit. 16, c. 3.] 5. He says, The hanging up of this piece was a great scandal to men but indifferently affected to religion. Here I humbly crave leave to observe some few particulars. 1. That here is no proof so much as offered, that the piece was hung up by me, or my command. 2. That this gentleman came often to me to Lambeth, and professed much love to me; yet was never the man that told me his conscience, or any man's else, was troubled at it: which had he done, that should have been a scandal to no man. 3. That if this were scandalous to any, it must be offensive in regard of the workmanship; or quatenus tale, as it was a Crucifix; not in regard of the works certainly, for that was very exact. And then if it were because it were a Crucifix, why did not the old one offend sir Henry's conscience as much as the new? For the piece of hangings, which hung constantly all the year at the back of the altar, 30 years together, upon my own knowledge, and somewhat above, long before, as I offered proof by the vestry-men, and so all the time of sir Henry's being in court, had a crucifix wrought in it, and yet his conscience never troubled at it. 4. That he could not possibly think that I intended any Popery in it, considering how hateful he knew me to be at Rome, beyond any my predecessors since the Reformation: for so he protested at his return from thence to myself. And I humbly desire a Salvo, that I may have him called to witness it: which was granted.

When they had charged me thus far, there came up a Message from the House of Commons. I was commanded to withdraw: but that business requiring more haste, I was dismissed with a command to attend again on Wednesday, May 22. But then I was put off again to Monday, May 27. And after much pressing for some maintenance, considering how oft I was made attend, and with no small expence; on May 25, I had an Order from the Committee of Sequestrations, to have 200*l.* allowed me out of my own now sequestered estate: It was a month before I could receive this. And this was all that ever was yet allowed me since the Sequestration of my Estate, being then of above two years continuance.

The Eleventh Day of my Hearing.

I. Monday, May 27, 1644. This day Mr. Serjeant Wilde followed the Charge upon me; and went back again to my Chapel-windows at Lambeth: three Witnesses against them. The first was one Pember, a glazier. He says, there was in one of the glass-windows on the north-side, the picture of an old man with a Glory, which he thinks was of God the Father. But his thinking so is no proof; nor doth he express in which of the north-windows he saw it. And for the Glory, that is usual about the head of every saint. And Mr. Browne, who was the second Witness, and was trusted by me for all the work of the windows, both at Lambeth and Croydon, says expressly upon his oath, that there was no picture of God the Father in the windows at Lambeth. But he says, he found a Picture of God the Father in a window at Croydon, and archbishop Cranmer's arms under it; and that he pulled it down. So it appears this Picture was there before my time, and continued there in so zealous an archbishop's time, as Cranmer was well known to be; and it was pulled down in my time. Neither did I know till now, that ever such a picture was there; and the Witness deposes he never made me acquainted with it. The third Witness was Mr. Prynn. He says, He had taken a survey of the windows at Lambeth. And I doubt not his diligence. He repeated the Story in each window. I have told this before, and shall not repeat it. He says, the pictures of these stories are in the Mass-Book. If it be so, yet they were not taken thence by me. Archbishop Morton did that work, as appears by his device in the windows. He says, the Story of the Day of Judgment was in a window in atrio, that must not come into the chapel. Good Lord! whither will malice carry a man? The Story opposite is of the Creation; and what, must not that come into the Chapel neither? The chapel is divided into an inner and outer chapel: in this outward the two windows mentioned are; and the partition or skreen of the chapel, which makes it two, was just in the same place where now it stands, from the very building of the chapel, for aught can be proved to the contrary. So neither I, nor any man else, did shut out the Day of Judgment. He says, I had read the Mass-book diligently. How else should I be able really to confute what is amiss in it? He says, I had also a Book of Pictures concerning the Life of Christ in my Study. And it was fit for me to have it; for some things are to be seen in their Pictures for the people, which the writings do not, perhaps dare not avow.

II. The second Charge of this day was about the Administration of the Sacrament in my chapel. The Witnesses two.

The first was Dr. Haywood, who had been my chaplain in the house. They had got from others the Ceremonies there used, and then brought him upon oath. He confessed he administered in a Cope; and the Canon warranted it. [Can. Eccles. Angl. 24.] He confesses, as it was urged, that he fetched the elements from the Credential (a little Side-table as they called it), and set them reverently upon the Communion-Table. Where is the offence? For 1. the Communion-table was little, and there was hardly room for the elements to stand conveniently there, while the service was in administration. And, 2. I did not this without example; for both bishop Andrews, and some other bishops, used it so all their time, and no exceptions taken. The second witness was Rob. Cornwall, one of my menial servants: a very forward witness he shewed himself, but said no more than is said and answered before; both of them confessing that I was sometimes present.

III. The third Charge was about the Ceremonies at the Coronation of his majesty. And, 1. out of my Diary, Feb. 2, 1625, it is urged, that I carried back the Regalia, offered them on the Altar, and then laid them up in their place of safety. I bare the place at the Coronation of the dean of Westminster, and I was to look to all those things, and their safe return into custody, by the place I then executed; and the offering them could be no offence: for the king himself offers upon solemn days; and the right hon. the Knights of the Garter offer at their solemnity; and the Offertory is established by law in the Common-Prayer Book of this Church: and the prebendaries assured me it was the custom for the dean so to do. 2. They charged a Marginal Note in the book upon me, that the unction was in formâ crucis. That Note doth not say that it ought so to be done; but it only relates the practice, what was done. And if any fault were in anointing the king in that form, it was my predecessor's fault, not mine; for he so anointed him. 3. They say, there was a Crucifix among the Regalia, and that it stood upon the altar at the Coronation, and that I did not except against it.* My predecessor executed at that time, and I believed would have excepted against the Crucifix, had it stood there: but I remember not any there; yet if there were, if my predecessor approved the standing of it, or were content to connive at it, it would have been made but a scorn, had I quarrelled it. 4.

* Heylin affirmeth, that the old crucifix being found among the Regalia, was then placed upon the altar. Life of Laud, p. 144.

They say, One of the prayers was taken out of the Pontifical. And I say, if it were, it was not taken thence by me: and the Prayers are the same that were used at king James's coronation: and so the prayer be good, and here is no word in it that is excepted against, it is no matter whence it is taken.

Then leaving the Ceremonies, he charged me with two Alterations in the body of the king's Oath. One added, namely these words ("agreeable to the king's prerogative;") the other omitted, namely, these words, (quæ populus elegerit, "which the people have chosen, or shall chuse.") For this latter, the Clause omitted, that suddenly vanished; for it was omitted in the oath of king James, as is confessed by themselves in the printed Votes of this present parliament. But the other highly insisted on, as taking off the total assurance which the subjects have by the Oath of their prince for the performance of his laws. 1. I humbly conceive this Clause takes off none of the peoples assurance; none at all. For the king's just and legal prerogative, and the subjects assurance for Liberty and Property, may stand well together, and have so stood for hundreds of years. 2. That Alteration, whatever it be, was not made by me; nor is there any Interlining or Alteration so much as of a letter found in that book. 3. If any thing be amiss therein, my predecessor gave that Oath to the king, and not I. I was merely ministerial both in the preparation, and at the coronation itself, supplying the place of the dean of Westminster.

After this Day's work was ended, it instantly spread all over the city, that I had altered the king's Oath at his Coronation, and from thence into all parts of the kingdom; as if all must be true which was said at the bar against me, what Answer soever I made: the people, and some of the Synod, now crying out, That this one thing was enough to take away my life. And though this was all that was charged this day concerning this Oath; yet seeing how this fire took, I thought fit, the next day that I came to the bar, to desire that the Books of the Coronation of former kings, especially those of queen Elizabeth and king James, might be seen and compared, and the copies brought into the court, both from the Exchequer, and such as were in my study at Lambeth, and a fuller inquisition made into the business; in regard I was as innocent from this crime, as when my mother bare me into the world. A Salvo was entered for me upon this. And every day that I after came to the bar, I called upon this business: but somewhat or other was still pretended by them which managed the Evidence, that I could not get the books to be brought forth, nor any thing to be done, till almost the last day of my hearing. Then no Books could be found in the Exchequer, nor in my Study, but only that of king James; whereas, when the keys were taken from me, there were divers books there, as is confessed in the printed Votes of this parliament, and one of them with a watchet-sattin cover, now missing: And whether this of king James (had not my Secretary, who knew the Book, seen it drop out of Mr. Prynne's bag) would not have been concealed too, I cannot tell. At last, the Book of king James's Coronation, and the other urged against me concerning king Charles, were seen and compared openly in the Lords house, and found to be the same Oath in both, and no interlining or alteration in the Book charged against me.

'This business was left by the Serjeant to Mr. Maynard, who made the most that could be out of my Diary against me: and so did Mr. Browne, when he came to give the sum of the Charge against me, both before the Lords, and after in the House of Commons. And therefore for the avoiding of all tedious repetition, and for that the Arguments which both used are the same, and because I hold it not fit to break a Charge of this moment into divers pieces, or put them in different places, I will here set down the whole business together, and the Answer which I then gave.

'Mr. Browne, in the sum of the Charge against me in the Commons House, when he came to this Article, said, He was now come to the business so much expected. And I humbly besought that honourable house, if it were a matter of so great expectation, it might be of as great attention too, while I should follow that worthy gentleman step after step, and answer as I went.

'1. And, first, he went about to prove out of my Diary, that this Addition (of the king's Prerogative) to the Oath, was made by me. Thus he says, That Dec. 31, 1625, I went to Hampton-Court. That is true. He says, That there, Jan. 1, I understood I was named with other Bishops to meet and consider of the Ceremonies about the Coronation; and that, Jan. 4, we did meet at White-Hall accordingly; and that, Jan. 6, we gave his majesty an Answer. Not I, (as it was charged) but We gave his majesty answer. So if the Oath had been changed by me, it must have been known to the Committee, and broken forth to my ruin long since. Then he says, That Jan. 16, I was appointed to serve at the Coronation, in the room of the dean of Westminster. That is no crime: And it is added in the Diary, that this Charge was delivered unto me by my predecessor. So he knew that this service to attend at the Coronation was imposed upon me. He says next, That Jan. 18, the duke of Buckingham had me to the king, to shew his majesty the Notes we had agreed on, if nothing offended him. These were only Notes of the Ceremonies. And the other Bishops sent me, being puny, to give the account. Then he says, Jan. 23, 'It is in my Diary, librum habui paratum, 'I had a Book ready.' And it was time, after such meetings, and the Coronation being to follow Feb. 2, and I designed to assist and attend that Service, that I should have a Book ready: The Ceremonies were too long and various to carry them in memory. And whereas it is urged, That I prepared and altered this Book, the words in my Diary are paratum habui, I had the Book ready for my own use in that service. Nor can paratum habui, signify preparing or altering the Book. And, Thirdly, it is added there, That the Book which I had ready in my hands, did agree per omnia cum libro regali. And if it did agree in all things with the King's recorded Book then brought out of the Exchequer, where then is the Alteration so laboriously sought to be fastened on me? I humbly beseech you to mark this.

Yet out of these premises put together, Mr. Browne's inference was, That I made this Alteration of the Oath. But surely these premises, neither single nor together, can produce any such conclusion; but rather the contrary. Beside, inference upon evidence is not evidence, unless it be absolutely necessary; which all men see that here it is not. But I pray observe: Why was such a sudden stay made at Jan. 23, whereas it appears in my Diary at Jan. 31, that the Bishops were not alone trusted with this Coronation-Business, sed alii processerunt, but other great and noble men also? And they did meet that Jan. 31, and sat in council about it. So the Bishops Meetings were but preparatory to ease the Lords, most of the Ceremonies being in the Church-way. And then can any man think that these great lords, when they came to review all that was done, would let the Oath be altered by me, or any other, so materially, and not check at it? It is impossible.

2. Secondly, This Gentleman went on to charge this Addition upon me thus: There were found in my Study at Lambeth two Books of king James's Coronation; one of them had this Clause or Addition in it, and the other had it not; and we cannot tell by which he was crowned. Therefore it must needs be some wilful error in me, to make choice of that Book which had this addition in it, or some great mistake. First, If it were a mistake only, then it is no crime: and wilful error it could not be; for being named one of them that were to consider of the Ceremonies, I went to my predecessor, and desired a Book, to see by it what was formerly done. He delivered me this now in question: I knew not whether he had more or no; nor did I know that any one of them differed from other. Therefore no wilful error. For I had no choice to make of this Book which had the Addition, before that which had it not, but thankfully took that which he gave me. But, secondly, if one Book of king James's Coronation, in which I could have no hand, had this addition in it, (as is confessed) then was not this a new addition of my making. And, thirdly, it may easily be seen that king James was crowned by the book which had this addition in it; this being in a fair carnation-sattin cover, the other in paper, without a cover, and unfit for a king's hand, especially in such a great and public solemnity.

3. In the third place, he said, There were in this Book twenty Alterations more, and all, or most in my hand. Be it so; (for I was never suffered to have the book to consider of) they are confessed not to be material. The truth is, when we met in the committee; we were fain to mend many slips of the pen, to make sense in some places, and good English in other. And the book being trusted with me, I had reason to do it with my own hand, but openly at the committee all. Yet two things, as matters of some moment, Mr. Browne checked at.

(1.) The one was, That 'confirm' is changed into 'perform.' 'If it be so 'perform' is the greater and more advantageous to the subjects, because it includes 'execution,' which the other word doth not. Nor doth this word hinder, but that the laws and liberties are the people's already: for though they be their own, yet the king, by his place, may and ought to perform the keeping and maintaining of them, I say, (if it be so) for I was never suffered to have this book in my hands, thoroughly to peruse: nor, under favour, do I believe this alteration is so made, as it is urged. [In the book which I have by me, and was transcribed from the other, it is 'confirm'.]

(2.) The other is, That the king is said to answer 'I will,' for 'I do.' But when will he? Why, all the days of his life; which is much more than I do, for the present. So if this change be made, it is still for the people's advantage. [And there also it is I do grant.] And again, I say, (if) for the reason before given. Besides, in all the Latin copies there is a latitude left for them that are trusted, to add to those interrogatories which are then put to the king any other that is just, in these words, adjiciantur predictis interrogationibus que justa fuerint. And such are these two mentioned, if they were made.

4. Mr. Browne's fourth and last Objection was, That I made this Alteration of the Oath, because it agrees (as he said) with my judgment: for that in a paper of bishop Harnett's there is a marginal Note in my hand, that Salvo Jure Coronæ is understood in the oaths of a king. But, first, there is a great deal of difference between Jus Regis et Prærogative, between the right and inheritance of the king and his prerogative, though never so legal. And with submission, and until I shall be convinced herein, I must believe that no king can swear himself out of his native right. Secondly, If this were, and still be an error in my judgment, that is no argument at all to prove malice in my will: that because that is my judgment for Jus Regis, therefore I must thrust Prærogativam Regis, which is not my judgment, into a public oath which I had no power to alter. These were all the Proofs

‘ which Mr. Maynard at first, and Mr. Browne at last, brought against me in this particular. And they are all but conjectural, and the conjectures weak. But that I did not alter this oath by adding the ‘ Prerogative,’ the proofs I shall bring are pregnant, and some of them necessary. They are these :

‘ 1. My predecessor was one of the grand committee for these ceremonies. That was proved by his servants to the lords. Now his known love to the public was such, as that he would never have suffered me, or any other, to make such an alteration. Nor would he have concealed such a crime in me, loving me so well as he did.

‘ 2. It is notoriously known that he crowned the king, and administered the oath (which was avowed also before the lords by his ancient servants) : and it cannot be rationally conceived he would ever have administered such an altered oath to his majesty.

‘ 3. It is expressed in my Diary, at Jan. 31, 1625, (and that must be good evidence for me, having been so often produced against me) that divers great lords were in this committee for the ceremonies, and did that day sit in council upon them. And can it be thought they would not so much as compare the books ? Or that comparing of them, they would endure an oath with such an alteration to be tendered to the king ? Especially since it is before confessed, that one copy of king James’s coronation had this alteration in it, and the other had it not.

‘ 4. It is expressed in my Diary, and made use of against me, at Jan. 23, 1625, that this book urged against me did agree per omnia cum Libro Regali, in all things with the king’s book, brought out of the Exchequer. And if the book that I then had, and is now insisted upon, did agree with that book which came out of the Exchequer, and that in all things, how is it possible I should make this alteration ?

‘ 5. With much labour I got the books to be compared in the lords house ; that of king James’s coronation, and this of king Charles ; and they were found to agree in all things to a syllable. Therefore it is impossible this should be added by me. And this, I conceive, cuts off all conjectural proofs to the contrary.

‘ Lastly, In the printed Book of the Votes (p. 706) of this present parliament, it is acknowledged, that the oath given to king James and king Charles was the same. The same : therefore unaltered. And this passage of that book I then shewed the lords in my defence. To this Mr. Maynard then replied, that the votes there mentioned were upon the word elegerit, and the doubt whether it should be ‘ bath chosen,’ or ‘ shall choose.’ I might not then answer to the Reply, but the Answer is plain. For, be the occasion which led on the votes what it will, as long as the oath is acknowledged the same, it is manifest it could not be altered by me. And I doubt ‘ not, but these reasons will give this honourable house satisfaction, that I added not this particular of the prerogative to the oath.

‘ Mr. Browne, in his last Reply, passed over the other arguments I know not how. But against this he took exception. He brought the Book with him, and read the passage ; and said, (as far as I remember) That the Votes had relation to the word chuse, and not to this alteration. Which is in effect the same which Mr. Maynard urged before. I might not reply by the course of the court, but I have again considered of that passage, p. 706, and find it plain. Thus, first they say, They have considered of all the Alterations in the form of this Oath, which they can find : therefore of this Alteration also, if any such were. Then they say, “ Excepting that Oath which was taken by his majesty and his father king James.” There it is confessed, that the Oath taken by them was one and the same, called there ‘ that Oath’ which was taken by both. Where falls the Exception then ? For it is said, “ Excepting that oath, &c.” Why it follows, “ excepting that the word ‘ chuse’ is wholly left out, as well ‘ hath chosen’ as ‘ will chuse.” Which is a most manifest and evident confession, that the Oath of king James and king Charles was the same in all things, to the very leaving out of the word chuse. Therefore it was the same oath all along : no difference at all. For Exceptio firmat Regulam in non Exceptis ; and here is no exception at all of this Clause of the prerogative. Therefore the Oath of both the kings was the same in that, or else the votes would have been sure to mention it. Where it may be observed too, that Serjeant Wilde, though he knew these Votes, and was present both at the Debate and the voting, and so must know that the word ‘ chuse’ was omitted in both the oaths ; yet at the first he charged it eagerly upon me, that I had left this clause of ‘ chusing’ out of king Charles’s oath, and added the other. God forgive him ! But the world may see by this, and some other passages, with what art my life was sought for.

‘ And yet before I quite leave this Oath, I may say, it is not altogether improbable, that this Clause, “ And agreeing to the prerogative of the kings thereof,” was added to the Oath in Edward 6’s or queen Elizabeth’s time ; and hath no relation at all to “ the laws of this kingdom,” absolutely mentioned before in the beginning of this Oath ; but only to the words, “ The profession of the Gospel established in this kingdom.” And then immediately follows, “ And agreeing to the prerogative of the kings thereof.” By which the king swears to maintain his prerogative, according to God’s law, and the Gospel established, against all foreign claims and jurisdictions whatsoever. And if this be the meaning, he that made the alteration, whoever it were (for I did it not), deserves thanks for it, and not the reward of a traitor.’

IV. Now to return to the Day. The fourth Charge went on with ceremonies still. But Mr. Serjeant was very nimble; for he leaped from the Coronation at Westminster, to see what I did at Oxford.

1. There the first Witness is sir Nathaniel Brent. And he says, The standing of the Communion-Table at St. Mary's was altered. I have answered to this situation of the Communion-Table already. And if it be lawful in one place, it is in another. For the Chapel of Magdalen-College, and Christ-Church quire, he confesses he knows of no direction given by me to either: nor doth he know whether I approved the things there done or no. So all this is no evidence. For the picture of the Blessed Virgin at St. Mary's door, as I knew nothing of it till it was done, so never did I hear any abuse or dislike of it after it was done. And here sir Nathaniel confesses too, that he knows not of any Adoration of it, as men passed the streets or otherwise. When this witness came not home, they urged the Statute of Merton-College, or the University, (§ 11.) where (if I took my Notes right) they say, I enjoined debitum Reverentiam. And as I know no fault in that injunction or statute, so neither do I know what due bodily reverence can be given to God in his Church, without some bowing or genuflection.

2. The second Witness was Mr. Corbett. He says, that when decent reverence was required by my visitors in one of my Articles, he gave reasons against it, but sir John Lambe urged it still. First, my lords, if Mr. Corbett's reasons were sufficient, sir John Lambe was to blame in that; but sir John Lambe must answer it, and not I. Secondly, It may be observed, that this man, by his own confession, gave reasons (such as they were) against due reverence to God in his own house. He says, That Dr. Frewen told him from me, "That I wished he should do as others did at St. Mary's, or let another execute his place as proctor." This is but a hearsay from Dr. Frewen, who being at Oxford, I cannot produce him. And if I had sent such a message, I know no crime in it. He says, that after this he desired he might enjoy in this particular the liberty which the King and the Church of England gave him. He did so; and from that day he heard no more of it, but enjoyed the liberty which he asked. He says, Mr. Channel [Cheynell,] desired the same liberty as well as he. And Mr. Channel had it granted as well as he. He confesses ingenuously, that the Bowing required, was only toward, not to the altar. And to the Picture at St. Mary's door, he says he never heard of any reverence done to it; and doth believe, that all that was done at Christ-Church was since my time. [And the third Witness agrees in this.] But it must be his knowledge, not his belief, that must make an evidence.

3. The third Witness was one Mr. Bendye. He says, There was a Crucifix in Lincoln-College chapel since my time. If there be, it is more than I know. My lord of York that now is, when he was bishop of Lincoln, worthily bestowed much cost upon that chapel; and if he did set up a Crucifix, I think it was before I had aught to do there. He says there was Bowing at the name of Jesus. And God forbid but there should; and the Canon of the church requires it. (Can. 18.) He says, There were Latin Prayers in Lent, but he knows not who enjoined it. And then he might have held his peace. But there were Latin sermons and prayers on Ash-Wednesdays, when few came to church, but the Lent preceeeders, who understood them. And in divers colleges they have their morning-prayers in Latin, and had so, long before I knew the University. The last thing he said was, That there were Copes used in some Colleges, and that a traveller should say upon the sight of them, "That he saw just such a thing upon the Pope's back." This wise man might have said as much of a gown: He saw a gown on the Pope's back, therefore a protestant may not wear one. Or entering into St. Paul's he may cry, "Down with it! for I saw the Pope in just such another Church in Rome."

4. Then was urged the conclusion of a Letter of mine sent to that university; the words were to this effect: "I desire you to remember me a sinner, quoties coram Altare Dei procidatis." The charge lay upon the word procidatis; which is no more, than that when they there fall on their knees, or prostrate to prayer, they would remember me. In which desire of mine, or expression of it, I can yet see no offence. No, nor in coram Altare, their solemnest time of prayer being at the communion. 'Here Mr. Browne aggravated the things done in that university; and fell upon the titles given me in some Letters from thence: but because I have answered those titles already, I refer the reader thither, and shall not make here any tedious repetition. Only this I shall add, 'That in the Civil Law it is frequent to be seen, 'that not Bishops only one to another, but the great Emperors of the world have commonly given that title of Sanctitus vestra, to bishops of meaner place than myself; to say no more. 'But here Mr. Browne, in his last Reply, was pleased to say, This title was not given to any bishop of England. 1. If I had my books about me, perhaps this might be refuted. 2. Why should so grave a man as he so much disparage his own nation? Is it impossible (be my unworthiness what it will) for an English bishop to deserve as good a title as another? 3. Be that as it may, if it were (as certainly it was) lawfully given to other bishops, though they not English, then it is neither blasphemy, nor assumption of papal power, as was charged upon it.'

V. From Oxford Mr. Serjeant went to Cambridge. And I must be guilty, if aught were amiss there too. For this fifth Charge were produced three Witnesses, Mr. Wallis, Mr. Greece, and Mr. Seaman. Their testimonies agreed very near: so I will answer them together. First, they say, That at Peter-House there were copes and candlesticks, and pictures in the Glass-windows; and the like. But these things I have often answered already, and shall not repeat. They say, The chief authors of these things were Dr. Wren and Dr. Cosens. They are both living, why are they not called to answer their own acts? For here is yet no shew of proof to bring any thing home to me. For no one of them says, that I gave direction for any of these. No, (says Mr. Serjeant) but why did I tolerate them? 1. No man complained to me. 2. I was not chancellor, and endured no small envy for any little thing that I had occasion to look upon in that place. And 3. This was not the least cause, why I followed my right for power to visit there. And though that power was confirmed to me, yet the times have been such, as that I did not then think fit to use it. It would have but heaped more envy on me, who bare too much already. As for Mr. Greece, who hath laboured much against me in all this business, God forgive him; and while he inherits his father's ill affections to me, God preserve him from his father's end!

VI. From Cambridge he went to the Cathedrals, and first to Canterbury. Here the Charge is bowing versus Altare; the two Witnesses, two prebendaries of that church, Dr. Jackson and Dr. Blechenden. And first, Dr. Jackson says, the bowing was versus Altare; so not to, but toward the Altar: and Dr. Blechenden says, it was the adoration of the high majesty of God, to whom, if no Altar were there, I should bow. Dr. Jackson says, This bowing was to his grief. Strange! I avow to your lordships and the world, no man did so much approve all my proceedings in that church, as he; and for this particular, he never found the least fault with it to me: and if he conceal his grief, I cannot ease it. He says, This Bowing was not in use till within this six or seven years. Sure the old man's memory fails him. For Dr. Blechenden says, The Communion-Table was railed about, and Bowings before it, when he came first to be a member of that church; and saith upon his oath, that is above ten years ago; and that it was practised before their new statutes were made; and that in those statutes no punishment inflicted for the breach or not performance of this reverence. I could tell your lordships how often Dr. Jackson hath shifted his opinions in religion, but that they tell me their Witnesses must not be scandalized. As for the Statutes, my secretary Mr. Dell, who copied them out, testified here to the lords, that I left out divers Superstitions which were in the old Book, and ordained many sermons in their rooms.

The next Cathedral he instanced in, was Winchester. But there is nothing but the old objections, Copes. And the wearing of them is warranted by the canon; (Can. 21.) and Reverence at coming in and going out of the church. And that great kings have not (in better ages) thought much to do. And they did well to instance in the college of Winchester, as well as the Church; for it is confessed, the Injunction seat thither requires, that the Reverence used be such as is not dissonant from the Church of England. So this may be a comment to the other Injunctions. But for the Copes in Cathedrals, Mr. Browne in his last Reply was not satisfied. For he said, the Canon mentioned but the wearing of one Cope. Be it so: but they must have that before they can wear it. And if the Canon enjoin the wearing of one, my Injunction might require the providing and using of one. Besides, if there be no Popery, no introduction to Superstition in the having or using of one; then certainly there can be none in the having of more for the same use: the Superstition being lodged in the misuse, not in the number.

VII. From the Cathedrals Mr. Serjeant went to view some Parish-Churches. And first it is charged, That in a Parish-Church at Winchester two Seats were removed, to make way for railing in of the Communion-Table. But for aught I know, this might have been concealed. For it was liked so well, that they to whom the seats belonged, removed them at their own charges, that the other might be done.

The next instance was in St. Gregory's Church, by St. Paul's. The Charge was, the placing of the Communion-Table Altar-wise. To the Charge itself Answer is given before. The particulars which are new, are these: the Witness Mr. Wyan. He says, the Order for such placing of the Table was from the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's. And St. Gregory's is in their peculiar jurisdiction. So the Holy Table was there placed by the Ordinary, not by me. He says next, That the parishioners appealed to the Arches, but received an order to command them and the cause to the Council-Board: That it was a full Board when the cause was heard, and his majesty present; and that there I maintained the queen's Injunction (Q. Eliz. Injunct. fine.) about placing the Communion-Table. In all this, here is nothing charged upon me, but maintenance of the Injunction: and I had been much to blame, if I should not have maintained it. He says, sir Henry Martin came and saw it, and said it would make a good Court-Cupboard. If sir Henry did say so, the scorn ill became either his age or profession; though a Court-Cupboard be somewhat a better phrase than a Dresser. God forgive them who have in print called it so! He says, That hereupon I did say, "That he which spake that, had a Stigmatical Puritan in his bosom." This man's memory serves him long for words: this is many years since; and if I did speak any thing sounding this way, it is more like I should say "Schismatical," than "Stigmatical Puritan." But let him look to his oath; and which word ad-ever I used, if sir Henry used the one, he might well hear the other. For a prophane speech it was, and little becoming a Dean of the Arches. He says, That soon after this sir Henry was put out of his place. Not very soon after this; for I was at the time of this business (as far as I remember) bishop of London, and had nothing to do with the disposing of his place. After, when I came to be Archbishop, I found his patent was void, neither could sir Henry himself deny it. And being void, and in my gift, I gave it to another.

He says farther, That it was urged that this way of placing the Communion-Table was against the Word of God, in bishop Jewel's and Mr. Fox's judgment; and that I replied, "It were better they should not have these Books in churches, than so to abuse them." 1. For aught I yet know (and in these straits of time the Books I cannot come at), their judgment, rightly understood, is not so. 2. Though these two were very worthy men in their time, yet every thing which they say is not by and by the Doctrine of the Church of England. And I may upon good reason depart from their judgment in some particulars, and yet not differ from the Church of England. As in this very particular, the Injunction for placing the Table so, is the act of the Queen and the Church of England. And I conceive the Queen, then upon the Act of Reformation, would not have enjoined it, nor the Church obeyed it, had it been against the Word of God. 3. If I did say, "That if they could make no better use of Jewel and the Book of Martyrs, it were better they had them not in the Churches;" they gave too great occasion for the speech; for they had picked divers things out of those Books which they could not master, and with them distempered both themselves and their neighbours. And yet, in hope other more modest men might make better use of them, I never gave counsel to have those Books removed (nor is that so much as charged) but said only thus, That if no better use would be made of them, then that last remedy; but never till then. 'This last Passage Mr. Browne insisted upon: The taking of good Books from the people. But as I have answered; there was no such thing done, or intended; only a word spoken to make busy men see how they abused themselves and the church, by misunderstanding and misapplying that which was written for the good of both.' Lastly, It was urged, he said, that the Communion-Table must stand Altar-wise, that strangers which come and look into these churches, might not see such a disproportion; the Holy Table standing one way in the Mother-Church, and quite otherwise in the Parochial annexed. And truly, to see this, could be no commendation of the discipline of the Church of England. But howsoever, Mr. Clarke (the other Witness with Wyan, and agreeing with him in the most) says plainly, that it was the lord of Arundel that spake this, not I; and that he was seconded in it by the lord Weston, then Lord Treasurer, not by me.

VIII. The last Charge of this day was a Passage out of one Mr. Shelford's Book, p. 20, 21, "That they must take the Reverend Prelates for their examples, &c." And Mr. Prynne witnessed the like was in the Missal, p. 256. Mr. Shelford is a mere stranger to me, his Book I never read; if he have said any thing unjust or untrue, let him answer for himself. As for the like to that, which he says, being in the Missal, though that be but a weak argument, yet let him save it.

Here this day ending, I was put off to Saturday, June 1. And then again put off to Thursday, June 6, which held.

My Twelfth Day of Hearing.

Thursday, June 6, 1644. This day Serjeant Wilde, instead of beginning with a new Charge, made another long Reply to my Answers of the former day. Whether he found that his former Reply, made at the time, was weak, and so reputed, I cannot tell. 'But another he made, as full of premeditated weakness, as the former was of sudden. Mr. Prynne, I think, perceived it, and was often at his ear; but Mr. Serjeant was little less than angry, and would on.' I knew I was to make no answer to any Reply, and so took no Notes; indeed holding it all as it was, that is, either nothing, or nothing to the purpose. This tedious Reply ended;

I. Then came on the First Charge about the Window of coloured glass set up in the new chapel at Westminster: It was the History of the coming down of the Holy Ghost upon the Apostles. This was charged to be done by me, and at my cost: the Witnesses, Mr. Browne, employed in setting up the Window, and Mr. Sutton the glazier. These men say, that Dr. Newell, sub-dean of Westminster, gave order for the window, and the setting of it up; but they know not at whose cost, nor was any order given from me. So here is nothing charged upon me. And if it were, I know nothing amiss in the Window. As for the King's Arms being taken down, as they say, let them answer that did it. Though, I believe, that the King's Arms standing alone in a white window, was not taken down out of any ill meaning, but only out of necessity to make way for the History.

II. The Second Charge was the Picture of the Blessed Virgin set upon a new-built door at St. Mary's in Oxford. Here alderman Nixon says, That some passengers put off their hats, and, as he supposes, to that picture. But, my Lords, his supposal is no proof. He says, that the next day he saw it. But what did he see? Nothing, but the putting off the hat; for he could not see why, or to what, unless they which put off, told it. They might put off to some acquaintance that passed by. He farther says, he saw a man in that porch upon his knees, and, he thinks, praying; but he cannot say to that. 'But then, if the malice he hath long borne me would have suffered him, he might have staid till he knew to whom he was praying, for till then it is no evidence.' He says, he thinks that I countenanced the setting of it up, because it was done by bishop Owen. But Mr. Bromfeild, who did that work, gave testimony to the Lords, that I had nothing to do in it. He says, there was an Image set up at Carfax church, but pulled down again by Mr. Widdows, vicar there. But this hath no relation at all to me. 'This Picture of the Blessed Virgin was twice mentioned before: and sir Nath. Brent could say nothing to it but hearsay. And Mr. Corbett did not so much as hear of any abuse. And now alderman Nixon says, he saw hats put off; but the wise man knows not to what. Nor is there any shew of proof offered, that I had any hand or approbation in the setting of it up; or that ever any complaint was made to me of any abuse to it, or dislike of it. And yet Mr. Browne, when he gave the sum of the charge against me, insisted upon this also, as some great fault of mine, which I cannot yet see.'

III. In the next Charge, Mr. Serjeant is gone back again to Whitehall, as in the former to Oxford. The Witnesses are Mrs. Charnock and her daughter. They say, they went, being at court, into the Chapel, and it seems a woman with them, that was a papist; and that while they were there, Dr. Brown, one of the king's chaplains, came in, bowed towards the Communion-Table, and then at the Altar knelt down to his prayers. I do not know of any fault Dr. Brown committed, either in doing reverence to God, or praying there. And yet if he had committed any fault, I hope I shall not answer for him. I was not then Dean of the Chapel, nor did any ever complain to me. They say, that two strangers came into the chapel at the same time, and saw what Dr. Brown did, and said thereupon, "That sure we did not differ much, and should be of one religion shortly." And that the woman which was with these witnesses, told them they were priests. First, This can no way relate to me; for neither did these women complain to me of it, nor any from them. Secondly, If these two men were priests, and did say as is testified, are we ever a whit the nearer them in religion? Indeed, if all the difference between Rome and us consisted in outward reverence, and no points of doctrine, some argument might hence be drawn; but the points of Doctrine being so many and great, put stop enough to that. Thirdly, If Recusants, Priests especially, did so speak, might it not be said in cunning, to discountenance all external worship in the service of God, that so they may have opportunity to make more proselytes? And it is no small advantage, to my knowledge, which they have this way made. 'And this was the answer which I gave Mr. Browne, when he charged this upon me in the house of commons.'

Here, before they went any farther, Mr. Serjeant Wilde told the Lords, That when sir Nath. Brent was employed in my Visitation, he had Instructions for particular churches, of which some were tacit Intimations, and some express. I know not to what end this was spoken; for no coherent Charge followed upon it. But sure he thinks sir Nath. Brent very skilful in me, that he can understand my tacit intimations, and know to what particular church to apply them. 'And as I said no more at the bar, so neither did I think to say any more after; yet now I cannot but a little hemoan myself. For ever since Mr. Maynard left off, who pleaded, though strongly, yet fairly, against me; I have been in very ill condition between the other two. For, from Mr. Nicolas I had some sense, but extreme virulent and foul language: and from serj. Wilde language good enough sometimes, but little or no sense. For let me answer what I would, when he came to reply, he repeated the charge again, as if I had made no answer at all: or as if all that I expressed never so plainly, had been but tacit intimations; which I think he understood as much as sir Nath. Brent.'

IV. In the Fourth Charge, he told the lords he would not trouble them with repeating the Evidence, but only put them in mind of some things in the Case of Ferdinando Adams of Ipswich; of the men of Lewes suffering in the High Commission; of the parishioners of Beckington, and some others heard before, but would leave the Lords to their memory and their Notes: yet read over their Sentences given in the High Commission, and made a repetition of whatsoever might but make a shew to render me odious to the people. 'And this hath been their art all along, to run over the same thing twice and again, as they did here in the second Charge about the Picture of the Blessed Virgin, to the end that, as the auditors changed, the more of them might hear it; and that which wrought not upon some, might upon others. In all which I patiently referred myself to my former Answers, having no other way to help myself; in regard they pretended that they renewed the same Instances, but not the same way; but in one place, as against Law; and in another, as against Religion. But why then did they not, in both places, run over all circumstances applicable to both?' And on they went too with the men of Lewes; where,

1. One Mr. Parnlye, they say, was censured cruelly in the High Commission, for not removing the Communion-Table. The business was but this: sir Nath. Brent, and his own Ordinary Dr. Nevill, ordered the remove of the Table; he would not. For this contumacy he was censured, but enjoined only to make his Submission to Dr. Nevill. Which, I think, was a Sentence far from any barbarous cruelty, as it is called.

2. Another Instance, and the next, was Mr. Burket. He says, he was censured also about removing the Communion-Table, and for that only. But first, this was not simply for removing the Holy Table; but it was for abetting the Church-wardens to remove it back again from the place, where lawful authority had set it. And secondly, whereas he says, he was censured for this only, the very charge itself confutes him. For there it is said, that this, about removing the Communion-Table, appears in the sixth Article that was against him. Therefore there were five other Articles at least more against him: and therefore not this only.

3. The third Instance was Mr. Chancery: And he likewise is said to have suffered very much only about railing in of the Communion-Table. But this is not so neither: For he confesses that he spake reproachful words against Authority, and in contempt of his Ordinary; that he said the rails were fit to be set up in his garden; that he came 50 miles from his own church, on purpose to countenance this business: and all this he acknowledges upon his oath in his Submission. And yet nothing laid upon him but Suspension; and that no longer than till he submitted. And all this the act of the High-Commission, not mine. 'And so I answered Mr. Browne, who urged this against me also.' And the truth of all this appears apud Acta; though they were taken away, and kept ever since from my use, yet many things done in that court have been charged against me. And here stepped in a testimony of Mr. Genebrad's that I threatened openly in the High-Commission to suspend Dr. Merrick. And why might I not do it, if he will be overbold with the proceeding of the whole court? I have known ere now a very good lawyer committed from the Chancery-Bar to the Flect, though I shall spare names.

4. The fourth Instance was in Mr. Workman's Case; charged as if he were sentenced only for preaching a Sermon to the Judges against Images in Churches. (1.) The first Witness in the Cause was Mr. Langly. He says, Mr. Workman was censured for this Sermon only: The High-Commissioners were no such patrons of Images. He says, That when I was dean of Gloucester, I told them in the Chapel, that king James had heard of many things amiss in that church, and required me to take care of them. It is true, he did so. He says farther, that hereupon I placed the Communion-Table Altar-wise, and commanded due reverence at the coming into the Church. This I did, and I have given my reason often already for it out of the Injunctions of queen Elizabeth. He says, that bishop Smith took offence at this, and would come no more to the Cathedral. First, my Lords, this gentleman was then school-master there, and had free access unto me: He never discovered this. Secondly, the Bishop himself never said a word to me about it. If he had, I would either have satisfied his lordship in that, or any thing else that I did; or if he had satisfied me, I would have forborn it. He says, That Mr. Workman, after he was put from his lecture, was not suffered to teach children. First, If he had been suffered, this man had been like to make the first complaint for decay of his own school. But, Secondly, the Commission thought it no way fit to trust him with the education of children, who had been factious among men; especially not in that place, where he had so shewed himself. 'And this Answer I gave to Mr. Browne; who, in summing up the Evidence, stood as much, and inveighed as earnestly against this cruel proceeding with Mr. Workman, as upon any one thing in the Charge. At which time he added also, that he would not be suffered to practise physic to get his living. But, First, no Witness evidenceth this, that he was denied to practise physic. And, Secondly, he might have taught a school, or practised physic, any where else. But he had done so much harm, and made such a faction in Gloucester, as that the High-Commission thought it not fit to continue him there: And he was not willing to go from thence, where he had made his party.' He says farther, That some few of the citizens of Gloucester were called into the High-Commission, for an annuity of 20*l.* a year allowed Mr. Workman out of the town-stock. For the thing itself, it was a gross abuse and scorn put upon that court: that when they had censured a Schismatical Lecturer (for such he was there proved), the townsmen should make him an allowance of 20*l.* a year: A thing, as I humbly conceive, not fit to be endured in any settled government. And wherens clamour is made, that some few of the citizens were called to an account for it, that is as strange on the other side: For where there are many offenders, the noise would be too great to call all. And yet here is noise enough made for calling a few. Here it was replied by Mr. Maynard, That this was done by that Corporation, and yet a few singled out to answer; and that therefore I might be singled out to answer for things done in the High Commission. 'But, under favour, this learned and worthy gentleman is mistaken: For here the mayor and magistrates of Gloucester did that which was no way warrantable by their charter, in which case they may be accountable, all or some. But in the High-Commission we meddled with no cause not cognoscible there; or if by misinformation we did, we were sure of a prohibition to stop us. And meddling with nothing but things proper to them, I conceive still no one man can be singled out to suffer for that which was done by all. And this may serve to answer Mr. Browne also, who in his last reply upon me, when I might not answer, made use of it.'

(2.) The second Witness was Mr. Pury of Gloucester. He says, That Mr. Brewster, and Mr. Guies the town-clerk, were called to the Council-Table about this annuity: and that I desired it might be further examined at the High-Commission. If this were true, I know no offence in it, to desire that such an affront to government might be more thoroughly examined, than the Lords had leisure to do. But the witness doth not give this in evidence: For he says no more, than that he heard so from Mr. Brewster. And his hear-say is no conviction. He says farther, That the High-Commission called upon this business of the Annuity, as informed that the 20*l.* given to Mr. Workman was taken out of the monies for the poor. And this I must still think was a good and a sufficient ground justly to call them in question. He says also, that these men were fined, because that which they did was against authority. So by their own witness it appears, that they were not fined simply for allowing means to Mr. Workman, but for doing it in opposition to authority. Lastly, he says, they were fined 10*l.* a-piece; and that presently taken off again. So here was no such great persecution, as is made in the cause. And for the cancelling of this deed of annuity, it was done by themselves, as Mr. Langly witnesses.

After these two Witnesses heard, the Sentence of the High-Commission Court was read, which I could not have come at, had not they produced it. And by that it appeared evidently, that Mr. Workman was censured as well for other things, as for his Sermon about Images in churches. As first he said, So many Faces in Dancing were so many to hell. This was hard, if he meant the measures in the Inns of Court at Christmas; and he excepted none. Then he said, and was no way able to prove it, That Drunkards, so they were conformable, were preferred. Which was a great and a notorious slander upon the governors of the Church, and upon orderly and conformable men. Then he said, That Election of Ministers was in the people. And this is directly against the laws of England, in the right of all patrons. Then constantly, in his Prayer before his Sermon, he prayed for the States and the king of Sweden before his majesty, which was the garb of that time among that party of men. Then, that one of his common themes of preaching to the people, was against the government of the Church. And then, that Images in churches were no better than stews in the Commonwealth; which at the best is a very unsavoury comparison. But here it was replied, That Images were Idols, and so called in the Homilies [Hom. against the peril of Idolat. p. 3, p. 92.]; and that therefore the comparison might hold. Yea, but in the second Homily against the peril of Idolatry, images or pictures in glass or hangings are expressly and truly said not to be idols, till they be worshipped. And therefore Mr. Workman should not have compared their setting up, to stews, till he could have proved them worshipped. And in all this, were the act good or bad in the censuring of him, it was the act of the High-Commission, not mine.

V. After this followed the fifth Charge; which was Mr. Sherfeild's Case, his Sentence in the Star-Chamber for defacing of a Church-Window in or near Salisbury.* The witnesses produced were two.

1. The first was Mr. Carill. He said that Mr. Sherfeild defaced this Window because there was an Image in it, conceived to be the Picture of God the Father. But first, this comes not home: For many a picture may be conceived to be of God the Father, which yet is not, nor was ever made for it. And then suppose it were so, yet Mr. Sherfeild in a settled government of a state, ought not to have done it but by command of authority. He says, That in my Speech there in the court, I justified the having of the Picture of God the Father, as he remembers, out of Dan. vii. 22. This "as he remembers" came well in: For I never justified the making or having that picture. 'For Calvin's Rule, [Calv. 1 Inst. c. 11. § 19.] that we picture that which may be seen, is grounded upon the negative, that no picture may be made of that which was never, never can be seen. And to ground this negative, is the command given by Moses, Deut. iv. 15 and 16. "Take good heed to yourselves." For what? That you make not to yourselves this picture. Why? "For that you saw no manner of similitude in the day that the Lord spake unto you out of the midst of the fire. Out of the midst of the fire; and yet he still reserved himself in thick darkness," Exod. xx. 21. So no picture of him, because no similitude ever seen. And this rule having ever possessed me wholly, I could not justify the having of it.' I said, indeed, that some men in later superstitious times were so foolish as to picture God the Father, by occasion of that place in Daniel: But for myself, I ever rejected it. Nor can that place bear any shew of it: For Daniel says there, "That the Ancient of Days came." But in what shape or similitude he came, no man living can tell. And he is called the "Ancient of Days," from his Eternity, not as if he appeared like an old man. The text hath no warrant at all for that.

2. Yet the second Witness, Mr. Tomlyns, says also, That I did justify this picture. 'God forgive him the malice or ignorance of this oath, be it which it will!' He might have been as wary as Mr. Carill, and added "as he remembers:" For so many years since, as this Hearing was, he may easily mistake. But if I did say any such thing, why are not my own Papers here produced against me? I had that written which I then spake, and the Paper was in my Study with the rest, and came, (for aught I know) into their hands which follow the Charge against me. I ask again, why is not this Paper produced? Out of all doubt it would, had there appeared any such thing in it. He says also, That I said then, that if the Idol of Jupiter were set up, yet it were not lawful to pull it down in a popular tumult, but by order and authority. I did say so, or to that effect, indeed; and must say it still. For I find in St. Augustine almost the very words. And bishop Davenant, a man very learned, cites this place of St. Augustine, and approves it. And they both prove this doctrine from Deut. vii. 5. & xii. 2, where the command given for destroying of the Idols when they came into the Land of Canaan, was not left at large to the people, but settled in Moses the chief magistrate, and his power. And according to this rule, the temple of Æsculapius, though then grown very scandalous, was not pulled down but by Constantine's command. [Euseb. 3. de vita Constan. c. 54.] Which place I then shewed the Lords. But this witness added, That Mr. Sherfield had authority to do this from the vestry. If he had, that is as good as none; for by the laws of England there is yet no power given them for that, or any thing else. And all that vestries do, is by usurpation, or consent of the parish, but reaches not this. The Bishop of the diocess had been fitter to be consulted herein than the vestry.

Here, as if these Witnesses had not said enough, Mr. Nicolas offered himself to be a Witness; and told the Lords he was present at the hearing of this Cause; and that four Witnesses came in clear, that the Picture broken down was the Picture of God the Father; and that yet the Sentence of the Court passed against Mr. Sherfield. First, if this be so, it concludes against the Sentence given in the Star-Chamber, not against me: And he calls it here the "Sentence of the Court." Secondly, be it that it were undoubtedly the picture of God the Father; yet he ought to have taken authority along with him, and not to go about it with violence; which he did, and fell, and brake his leg in the business. Thirdly, By his own description of the Picture, it seems to me to be some old fabulous picture out of a legend, and not one of God the Father: For he then told the Lords, it was the picture of an old man with a budget by his side, out of which he was plucking Adam and Eve. 'And I believe no man ever saw God the Father so pictured any where. Lastly, Let me observe how Mr. Nicolas takes all parts upon him wherein he may hope to do me mischief.'

VI. The sixth Charge was concerning a Bible that was printed with Pictures, and sold. The Witness was Mr. Walsal a Stationer; who says, That this Bible was licensed by Dr. Weeks, my lord of London's chaplain, not mine: so thus far it concerns not me. 'Yes,' says Mr. Browne in his last Reply; for it appears in a List of my Chaplains, under my own hand, that Dr. Weeks was one. It is true, when I was bishop of Bath and Wells, he was mine; but my lord of London had him from me, so soon as ever he was bishop; and was his, not mine, when he licensed that book. And Mr. Browne knew that I answered it thus to the lords.' He says, That I gave him direction that they should not be sold openly upon the stalls, but only to discreet men that knew how to use them. The case was this: As I was at prayers in the King's Chapel, I there saw one of them in Mrs. Kirk's hand. She was far enough from any affection to Rome. And this being the first knowledge I had of it, many were vended and sold before I could prevent it. Upon this I sent for one, (whether to this Witness or another, I cannot say) and acquainted the Lords of the Council with it, and craved their direction what should be done. It was there ordered, that I should forbid the open sale of them upon their stalls, but not otherwise to learned and discreet men. And when I would have had this Order stricter, no man stuck to me but Mr. Secretary Cook. So according to this Order I gave direction to Mr. Walsal, as he witnesses.

Here Mr. Maynard replied, That I ought to have withstood this Order, in regard it was every way faulty. For, said he, either these Pictures were good or bad. And if they were good, why should they not be sold openly upon the stalls to all that would buy? And if they were bad, why should they be sold privately to any? 'To this Reply I was not suffered to answer. But when I heard Mr. Browne charge this Bible with pictures against me, then I answered the thing as before, and took occasion thereby to answer this dilemma thus; namely, That this kind of argument concludes not but in things necessary, and where no medium can be given. For where a medium can be given, the horns of this argument are too weak to hurt; and so it is here. For Pictures in themselves are things indifferent; not simply good, nor simply bad, but as they are used. And therefore they were not to be sold to all comers, because they may be abused, and become evil; and yet might be sold to learned and discreet men, who might turn them to good. And that Images are things indifferent of themselves, is granted in the Homilies, which are against the very peril of idolatry.' [Hom. par. 1, p. 11.] He said, There were some inconvenient Pictures among them, as the Assumption and the Dove. Be it so; the Book was not licensed by me nor mine: And yet, as I then shewed the Lords, they were not so strict at Amsterdam against these pictures; for the book which Mr. Walsal shewed me, was printed and sent thence, before it was printed here. Besides, our old English Bibles in the beginning of the Queen were full of pictures, and no fault found. As for that which was added at the bar, That one of these Bibles was found in secretary Windenbank's trunk, and another in sir John Lambes; that is nothing to me.

VII. The last Charge of this day was, That something about Images was expunged out of Dr. Featly's Sermons by my chaplain, Dr. Bray, before they could be suffered to be printed. But, first, he himself confesses, That I told him he might print them, so nothing were in them contrary to the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England. Secondly, he confesses, That when Dr. Bray made stay of them, he never complained to me; and I cannot remedy that which I do not know. Thirdly, He confesses, That all the time he was in Lambeth-House, my predecessor ever left that care of the press upon his chaplains; and why I might not do it as well as my predecessor, I do not yet know. But he said, That he complained to sir Edmund Scott, and desired to be advised by him what he should do; and that he answered, He thought I would not meddle with that troublesome business, more than my predecessors had done. 'Be this so, yet sir Edmund Scott never told me this; nor is there any the least proof offered that he did. But because this and the like passages about expunging some things out of Books, makes such a great noise, as if nothing concerning popery might be printed; and because Mr. Browne, in summing up of the charge in the house of commons, warmly insisted upon this particular; I thought it necessary to answer as follows: That what moved my chaplain to expunge that large Passage against images, I know not; nor could I now know, my chaplain being dead. But that this I was sure of, that elsewhere in those very Sermons there was as plain a passage, and full against images, left in. [Dr. Featly's Sermons, p. 447.] And in another place a whole leaf together spent to prove them idolaters (p. 791); and that as gross as the Baalists, and so he terms them. Yea, and that the Pope is Antichrist too (p. 808); and not only called so, but proved by divers arguments: and not so only, but in plain terms, that he is the Whore of Babylou (p. 810). And these Passages I then read out of the Book itself in the house of commons: and many other like to these there are. So my Chaplain might see good cause to leave out some passages, where so many upon as good cause were left in.'

But to the business of leaving the care of these Books, and the overview of them to my Chaplain, it was then urged, 'That the Commissary of John lord archbishop of York had excommunicated the lord bishop of Durham, being then in the king's service: and that the Archbishop himself was deeply fined for this act of his Commissary; and that therefore I ought much more to be answerable for my chaplain's act, whom I might put away when I would, than he for his commissary, who had a patent, and could not be put out at pleasure.*' Mr. Browne also followed this precedent close upon me. But first, there is a great deal of difference in the thing itself: my chaplain's case being but the leaving out of a Passage in a Book to be printed; but his Commissary's Case being the Excommunicating of a great Bishop, and he in the king's service, of whose honour the laws of this realm are very tender. And; secondly, the Bishop and his Official (call him Chancellor or Commissary, or what you will) make but one person in law; and therefore the act of the Commissary, to the full extent of his patent, is the act of the Bishop in legal construction, and the Bishop may be answerable for it. But the Bishop and his Chaplain are not one person in any construction of law. 'And say he may put away his chaplain when he will, yet that cannot help what is past, if aught have been done amiss by him. And this was the answer I insisted on to Mr. Browne.'

Upon my entrance on this Day's Defence, I found myself aggrieved at the Diurnal, and another Pamphlet of the week, wherein they print whatsoever is charged against me, as if it were fully proved; never so much as mentioning what or how I answered. And that it troubled me the more, because, as I conceived, the Passages, as there expressed, trenched deep upon the justice and proceedings of that Honourable House; and could have no aim but to incense the multitude against me. With some difficulty I got these Pamphlets received; but there they died, and the weekly abuse of me continued to keep my patience in breath.

The Thirteenth Day of my Hearing.

1. Whitson-Tuesday, June 11, 1644. The first Charge of this Day, was the Opinion which was held of me beyond the seas. The first Witness was sir Henry Mildmay, who, as is before related, told me without asking, That I was the most hateful man at Rome, that ever sat in my See since the Reformation. 'Now he denied not this, but being helped on by good preparation, a flexible conscience, and a fair leading interrogatory by Mr. Nicolas,' (Mr. Serjeant Wilde was sick, and came no more till the last day, when I made my Recapitulation) he minced it. And now he says, That there were two Factions at Rowe, and that one of them did indeed speak very ill of me, because they thought I aimed at too great a power here in England: but the other Faction spake as well of me, because they thought I endeavoured to bring us in England nearer to the church of Rome. But first, my Lords, this gentleman's words to me were round and general; That I was hated at Rome, not of a party or faction there; and my servants heard him at the same time, and are here ready to witness it, That he then said the Pope was a goodly gentleman, and did use to ride two or three great horses in a morning; and, but that he was something taller, he was as like auditor Philips, who was then at dinner with me, as could be. But I pray mark what wise men he makes them at Rome. One Faction hates me, because I aim at too much power; and the other loves me, because I would draw England nearer Rome. Why, if I went about to draw England nearer Rome, can any among them be such fools as to think my power too great? For if I used my power for them, why should any there condemn me? And if I used it against them, why should any here accuse me? Non sunt hæc bene divisa temporibus: These things suit not with the times, or the dispositions of Rome: But the plain truth is, I do not think that ever he was at Rome; I after heard a whisper, that he only stepped into France for another cure, not to Rome for curiosity, which was the only cause he gave the lords of his going thither.

2. The second Witness was Mr. Challoner. He says not much of his own knowledge, but of Fame, the tattling gossip; yet he told the Lords, I was a very obscure man, till within these 15 years. Be it so, if he please; yet I have been a bishop above 23 years: and it is 18 years since I was first Dean of his majesty's Chapel-Royal. He says; That after this time there was a strong opinion of reconciliation to Rome. A strong opinion, but a weak proof: for it was an opinion of enemies, and such as could easily believe what they over-much desired. He further said, That some of them were of opinion, that I was a good Roman Catholic; and that I wrought cunningly to introduce that Religion by inches; and that they prayed for me. First, my Lords, the opinion of enemies is no proof at all, that I am such as they think me. And secondly, this is a notable and no unusual piece of cunning, for an enemy to destroy by commending; for this was the ready way; and I doubt not but it hath been practised, to raise a jealousy against me at home, thereby either to work the ruin of my person, or utterly to weaken and disable me from doing harm to them, or good for the church of England. Besides, if the commendation of enemies may in this kind go for proof, it shall be in the power of two or three practising jesuits, to destroy any bishop or other church-man of England, when they please. At last he told a story of one father John, a Benedictine; that he asked him how Church-Livings were disposed in England, and whether I had not the disposing of those which were in the king's gift? And concluded, That he was not out of hope to see England reduced to Rome. Why, my Lords, this is not father John's hope alone; for there is no Roman Catholic* but hath some hope alive in him to see this day. And were it not for that hope, there would not have been so many, some desperate, all dangerous practices upon this kingdom to effect it, both in queen Elizabeth's time, and since. But if this I know not what father John hope so, what is that to me?

3. The third Witness was Mr. Anthony Childmoy; a man not thought on for a witness, till I called for his brother sir Henry. But now he comes laden with his brother's language. He says just as sir Henry did before,

* The Archbishop calls the English Papists Roman Catholics; not as allowing them to be such, but referring to that name, which some of them were before said to have affixed to him. H. W.

That there were two Factions at Rome, the Jesuits, and they abhorred me; but the other, the secular Priests, they wished me well, as he was informed. First, This is so one and the same testimony, that any man that will, may see, that either he informed his brother, or his brother him. Secondly, Here is nothing affirmed, for it is but as he was informed: And he doth not tell you by whom. It may be, my Lords, it was by his brother. Then he says, This was to make myself great; and tells a tale of Father Fitton, as much to the purpose as that which Mr. Challoner told of Father John. But whatsoever either of these Fathers said, it was but their own opinion of me, or hearsay; neither of which can prove me guilty of any thing. Thus much Mr. Anthony made a shift to say by 5 of the clock at afternoon, when I came to make my Answer. And this, as I have sufficient cause to think, only to help to shoar up his brother's testimony. But in the morning, when he should have come, as his brother did, he was by 9 in the morning so drunk that he was not able to come to the bar, nor to speak common sense, had he been brought thither: Nobile par fratrum.

II. The second Charge was the Consecration of two Churches in London; St. Catharine Cree-Church, and St. Giles in the fields. The witnesses two.

1. The first Witness was one Mr. Willingham. And he says, That I came to these churches in a pompous manner: But all the pomp that he mentions, is, that sir Henry Martin, Dr. Duck, and some other of the Arches, attended me, as they usually do their diocesans in such solemnities. He says, he did curiously observe what was done, thinking it would one day be called to an account, as now it is. So this man (himself being judge) looked upon that work with a malevolent eye, and God preserve him from being a malicious witness! He says, that at my approach to the Church-door was read, "Lift up your heads, O ye Gates, and be ye lift up, ye everlasting Doors, and the King of Glory shall come in," Psal. xxiv. 7. And this was urged over and over, as a jeer upon my person. But this place of Scripture hath been antiently used in Consecrations: and it relates not to the Bishop, but to God Almighty, the true King of Glory, who, at the dedication, enters by his servant to take possession of the house, then to be made his. He says, that I kneeled down at my coming in, and after used many bowings and cringings. For my kneeling down at my entrance, to begin with prayer, and after to proceed with reverence, I did but my duty in that; let him scoffingly call it Cringing, or Ducking, or what he please.

He says farther, That at the beginning I took up dust, and threw it in the air, and after used divers curses. And here Mr. Prynn put Mr. Nicolas in mind to add, that spargere cinerem is in the form of Consecration used in the Pontifical. 'And Mr. Browne, in his summary Account of my Charge, laid the very Consecration of these Churches as a crime upon me, and insisted on this particular.' But here my Answer to all was the same; That this Witne's had need look well to his oath, for there was no throwing up of dust, no curses used throughout the whole action: nor did I follow the Pontifical, but a copy of learned and reverend bishop Andrews, by which he consecrated divers churches in his time; and that this is so, I have the copy by me to witness, and offered them to shew it. Nor can this how-ever savour any way of Treason. No, said Mr. Browne; but the Treason is, to seek, by these Ceremonies, to overthrow the Religion established. Nor was that ever sought by me: and God of his mercy preserve the true Protestant Religion amongst us, till the Consecration of Churches, and Reverence in the Church, can overthrow it; and then I doubt not, but, by God's blessing, it shall continue safe to the world's end.

He says also, that I did pronounce the Place Holy. I did so: and that it was in the solemn act itself of the Consecration, according to the usual form in that behalf. And no man will deny, but that there is a derivative and a relative holiness in places, as well as in vessels, and other things dedicated to the honour and service of God. Nor is any thing more common in the Old Testament; and it is express in the New, both for place and things: 1 Cor. ix. 13. [Objectiva et adhærens, Jo. Prideaux, Concio in S. Luc. xix. 46.]

Then it was urged at the bar, that a Prayer which I used, was like one that is in the Pontifical. So in the Missal are many Prayers like to the Collects used in our English Liturgy, so like, that some are the very same, translated only into English; and yet these confirmed by law. And for that of Psal. xc. 6. Venite, prociadamus, &c. then also excepted against, that hath been of very antient use in the liturgies of the church. From which rejecimus paleam, numquid et grana? We have separated the chaff, shall we cast away the corn too? If it come to that, let us take heed we fall not upon the devil's winnowing, who labours to beat down the corn; it is not the chaff that troubles him, St. Luke xxii. 31. Then they urged my predecessor archbishop Parker, [In Antiq. Britannicis, p. 85.] that he found fault with the Consecration of new churches. I answered then upon memory, that he did not find fault simply with Consecrations of Churches, but only with the superstitious Ceremonies used therein. 'And this since, upon perusal of the place, I find to be true. For after he had in some sort commended the Popes for taking away some gross and superstitious purgations, he adds, that yet, for want of piety or prudence, their later Pontifical and Missal-books did out the antient in multitudine ceremoniarum, et peragendi difficultate et tedio, et exorcisationis amentia. So these were the things he found fault with, not the consecration itself; which he could not well do, himself being then a consecrated bishop.'

2. The second Witness was Mr. Hope. He says, That he agrees with the former witness, and saw all, and the throwing up of the Dust, &c. Since he agrees with the former witness, I give him the same Answer. Yet with this observation upon him and his oath: the former Witness says, that at the beginning of this action, I took dust and threw it up; this man agrees with him, and saw all; and almost in the very next words confesses, he was not there at the beginning. Not there; yet he saw it. My Lords, if you mark it, this is a wholesome oath. He says, that then the church-yard was consecrated by itself. It was ever so; the one act must follow the other, though both done the same day: for the places being different, the act could not pass upon them at the same time. Then he said, there were Fees required, and a good eye had to the money. This is a poor objection against me: if the officers did exact any money without rule, or beyond precedent, let them answer for it. But for that which was said to belong to me, I presently gave it to the poor of the parish: and this Mr. Dell my Secretary, then present, attested to the lords. Lastly he said, they were not new churches; let him look to his oath again; for it is notoriously known, they were both new built from the ground, and St. Giles not wholly upon the old foundation.

III. The third Charge was laid on me only by Mr. Nicolas, and without any witness. It was, That I out-went Popery itself; for the Papists consecrated churches only, but I had been so ceremonious, that I had consecrated chapels* too. My lords, the use of Chapels and of churches, in regard of God's Service, is the same. Therefore if Consecration be fit for the one, it must needs be for the other. And the Consecration of Chapels was long before Popery came into the world. For even Oratories newly built were consecrated in or before Eusebius's time: and he flourished about the year of Christ 310. [Euseb. l. 10. Hist. c. 3.] So antient they are in the course of Christianity; and for any prohibition of them, there is neither law nor canon in the state or Church of England that doth it.

The Chapels they instance in are three. First, they say I consecrated a Chapel of the right hon. the Lord Treasurer Weston's. I did so, and did no harm therein. As for the touch given by the way upon that honourable person, he is gone to God, I have nothing to do with it. Secondly, they instance in a chapel of sir John Worstenham's building. It is true, I consecrated that too; but that was a parishchurch, built in the place where he was born, and it was in my diocess, and so the work proper for me. The third instance was in my own chapel, in my house at Aberguilly, when I was bishop of St. David's; the room lay waste and out of repair, and I fitted it at my own cost, and consecrated it into a chapel, that house having no oratory before. Here they farther aggravated many circumstances; as first, That I named it at the Dedication, "The Chapel of St. John the Baptist." I did so name that Chapel, in memory of the College where I was bred, which bears the same name; but I dedicated it to God and his service. And to give the names of Angels and Saints to churches, for distinction-sake, and for the honour of their memory, is very antient and usual in the Church, as appears in St. Augustine, and divers others of the Fathers; [Tho. 2. 2æ q. 85 A. 2 ad 3.] but dedicated only to God: 'Which in the midst of superstitious times, the school 'itself confesses.' So yet no offence. Secondly, That I did it upon the 29th of August. And why might I not do it that day, as well as upon any other? But resolving to name the Chapel as I did, I the rather made choice of that day, both because it was the Day of the Decollation of St. John the Baptist, and because as upon that day God had wonderfully blessed me, in the hearing of my Cause concerning the Presidentship of St. John's College in Oxford, by king James of ever-blessed memory: so yet no offence. Thirdly, There was a Paper read, and avowed to be mine, in which was a fair description of Chapel-furniture and rich Plate, and the ceremonies in use in that chapel, and Wafers for the communion. At the reading of this Paper I was a little troubled. I knew I was not then so rich, as to have such Plate or Furniture; and therefore I humbly desired sight of the paper. So soon as I saw it, I found there was nothing in it in my hand but the indorsement, which told the reader plainly, that it was the model of the reverend bishop Andrews's Chapel, with the furniture, plate, ceremonies therein used, and all things else. And this Copy was sent me by the household chaplain to that famous bishop. 'This I laid open to the Lords, and it would have made any man ashamed, but Mr. Prynne, who had deliv'ered upon oath, that it was a Paper of my Chapel-Furniture at Aberguilly, contrary to his conscience, and his own eyesight of the paper.' And for Wafers, I never either gave or received the communion, but in ordinary bread. At Westminster I knew it was sometimes used, but as a thing indifferent. As for the slur here given to that reverend dead bishop of Winchester, it might well have been spared; he deserved far better usage for his service to the Church of England, and the protestant cause.

* Here in England, both before and since the Reformation, Chapels newly erected were always solemnly consecrated, as well as churches. I could produce innumerable instances of the time preceding, many of the time succeeding the Reformation. II. W.

IV. The Fourth Charge was the publishing the Book of Recreations: and it was ushered in with this scorn upon me, That I laboured to put a badge of Holiness, by my breath, upon places: and to take it away from days. But I did neither; the king commanded the printing of it, as is therein attested, and the warrant which the king gave me, they have. And though at consecrations I read the prayers, yet it was God's blessing, not my breath, that gave the holiness. And for the day, I ever laboured it might be kept holy, but yet free from a superstitious holiness. And first it was said, That this was done of purpose to take away Preaching. But first, there is no proof offered for this. And secondly, it is impossible; for till the Afternoon-Service and Sermon were done, no Recreation is allowed by that Book, nor then to any but such as have been at both: therefore it could not be done to take it away. Thirdly, the Book names none but Lawful Recreations; therefore if any unlawful be used, the Book gives them no warrant. And that some are lawful (after the public service of God is ended) appears by the practice of Geneva, where after Evening-Prayer, the elder men bow, and the younger train. And Calvin says in express terms, 'That one cause of the institution of the Sabbath was,* That Servants might have a day of rest and remission from their labour. And what time of the day fit, if not after Evening-Prayer? And what rest is there for able young men, if they may use no recreation? Then it was urged, That there was a great riot and disorder at Wakes kept on the Lord's-Day. That is a very sufficient cause to regulate and order those feasts, but not quite to take them away. I make no doubt, for my part, but that the Feast of the Dedication was abused by some among the Jews: and yet Christ was so far from taking it away for that, as that he honoured it with his own presence: St. John x. 22. As for the Paper which was read, containing three causes why that Book was published, that was a Note taken for my own private use and memory.

Then came in Mr. Prynne, who said, That the Lord Chief Justice Richardson had made an Order in his circuit against these Wakes, and was forced to revoke it. This was done by authority, as is before answered; to which I refer myself. Here it is added, to help fill up the noise. But Mr. Prynne says, That all the gentlemen in the country petitioned on the Judge's behalf. No; there was a great faction in Somersetshire at that time, and sir Robert Phillips and all his party writ up against the Judge and the Order he made, as was apparent by the certificates which he returned. And sir Robert was well known in his time to be neither Popish nor profane. He says farther, That William then earl of Pembroke was out of town, and the Book printed in the interim by my procurement. But for this last, here is not one word of proof offered, and so I leave it.

* Tertio, Servis et iis qui sub aliorum degerent imperio, quietis Diem indulgendum censuit, quo aliquam haberent a labore remissionem. Calv. L. 2. Inst. c. 8. § 28.

V. The Fifth Charge was, That some ministers were punished for not reading this Book. Witnesses for this were produced.

1. The first was sir Nath. Brent; who says, He had charge from me to call for an account of not reading this Book, both in my province at my Visitation, and in my diocess. His majesty having commanded this, I could do little, if I had not so much as inquired what was done. And he confesses, That for my province he gave time to them which had not read it, and then never asked more after it. So here was no eager prosecution. But then he says, that three in my diocess stood out, and asked time; and confesses that I granted it; but adds, that when he asked more time for them, I denied; and that they were then suspended ab officio only. I thought I had reason to deny, when I saw they did but daily by asking time. And it was then evident, that in the diocess of other bishops far more than three were punished, and their punishment greater. 'How'ever, this my proceeding was far from rigour. And this was the Answer that I gave Mr. Browne, who in the sum of his charge instanced in this particular against me.'

2. The second Witness was Mr. Culmer, one of the three ministers that was suspended. He says, That he was suspended by sir Nath. Brent, and that when he came to me about it, I said, "If you know not how to obey, I know not how to grant your Petition." Truly, my lords, finding him both willful and ignorant, I cannot tell what I could say less. He says, that his patron took away his benefice. Why, my lords, he had none: he was only a curate, and God knows, unfit for that. So being suspended from his office, this must needs be done. He says, he was not absolved till the Scots came in, and that he was conformable in all things else. For the time of his absolution, I leave that to the record: but for his conformity in other things, it is more than ever I heard of any.* "This I can say for him, he is good at purchasing a benefice; for he offered a servant of mine 150*l.*, so he could procure me but to name him to the parliament for Chartham in Kent. Since, I have heard he is as good at doing Reverence in the Church: for he pissed in the body of the Cathedral at Canterbury at noon-day, as will be justified by oath. And for this very particular, the Book of Recreations, he informed at the Council-Table against a gentleman of quality, for saying, "It was unfit such Books should be sent, for ministers to read in the Church." And was himself laid by the heels, for the falshood of this Information. So he is very good at the point of conscience too, that can refuse to read the Book, as being unfit, and

* This Mr. Culmer not only pissed in the Church of Canterbury, but also demolished the noble Glass-Windows of it with his own hands. The like he did in the Parish-Church of Minster in Thanet; which benefice he usurped during the Rebellion.

'complain to have another punished for saying 'it is so.' [Antidotum Culmerianum. p. 11. Ibid, p. 35.]

3. The third Witness is Mr. Wilson. He says, that I sent to sir Nath. Brent to suspend him. That is true; but it was when he would neither obey, nor keep in his tongue. He says, his Living was sequestered for almost four years. But it was not for not reading this Book. For himself confesses it was done in the High-Commission; and that for dilapidations, in not repairing his house.

4. The fourth Witness was one Mr. Snelling, a minister in the diocess of Rochester. All that was done against this man, was openly in the High-Commission Court: and there he was censured for other things, as well as for this. Himself confesses his open refusing to bow at the Name of Jesus, though the Canon of the Church command it. I kept him off from being sentenced a long time, and when he was sentenced, he confesses I was not present. He says, somewhat was expunged out of his brief. If it were, it was with the consent of the Counsel; which in that court was ordinary. However, it cannot touch me: for those things were done at Informations, where I was not present. He says, that when I heard of the nature of his Defence, I said, "If any such Defence were put in, it should be burnt." This was upon just complaint of the Judge then present at Informations, affirming it was against all the course of that court. He says, there is no penalty mentioned in that Declaration. And I say, his obedience, and other mens, should have been the more free and chearful. Well, I pray God keep us in the mean, in this business of the Sabbath, as well as in other things; that we run not into a Jewish superstition, while we seek to shun profaneness. This Calvin hath in the mean time assured me, "That those men who stand so strictly upon the morality of the Sabbath, do, by a gross and carnal sabbatization, three times out-go the superstition of the Jews." [Crassa carnalique Sabbatismi Superstitione ter Judæos superant. Calv. 2. Inst. c. 8. § 34.]

Here it was inferred, That there was a Combination for the doing of this in other dioceses. But no proof at all was offered. Then bishop Mountague's Articles and bishop Wren's were read, to shew that inquiry was made about the reading of this Book; and the bishop of London's Articles named, but not read. But if I were in this combination, why were not my Articles read? Because no such thing appears in them; and because my Articles gave so good content, that while the Convocation was sitting, Dr. Brown and Dr. Holdsworth came to me, and desired me to have my Book confirmed in Convocation, to be general for all bishops in future, it was so moderate, and according to law. But why then (say they) were other Articles thought on, and a Clause that none should pass without the approbation of the Archbishop? Why, other were thought on, because I could not in modesty press the confirmation of my own, though solicited to it. And that Clause was added, till a standing Book for all dioceses might be perfected, that no Quære in the interim might be put to any, but such as were according to law.

VI. The sixth Charge was about reversing of a Decree in Chancery (as it is said) about houses in Dr. Walton's parish, given (as was said) to superstitious uses.

1. The first Witness was serjeant Turner. He says, He had a rule in the King's-Bench for a Prohibition in this Cause. But by reason of some defect, what, is not mentioned, he confesses he could not get his Prohibition. Here is nothing that reflects upon me. And if a Prohibition were moved for, that could not be personally to me, but to my judge in some Spiritual Court, where it seems this cause depended, to which the Decree in Chancery was directed. And indeed this act, which they call a Reversing, was the act and seal of sir Nath. Brent, my vicar-general: And if he violated the Lord Keeper's Decree, he must answer it. But the Instrument being then produced, it appeared concurrent in all things with the Decree. The words are, "Juxta scopum Decreti hac in parte in curia cancellariæ factum, &c."

2. The second Witness was Mr. Edwards. And wherein he concurs with serjeant Turner, I gave him the same Answer. For that which he adds, That Dr. Walton did lett leases of these houses at an under value, and called none of the parishioners to it: If he did in this any thing contrary to justice, or the will of the donor, or the decree, he is living to answer for himself; me it concerns not. For his exception taken to my grant, of confirmation, I think he means, and to the words therein, Omnis et omnimoda, &c. it is the ancient style of such Grants for I know not how many hundred years; no syllable innovated or altered by me.

VII. Then followed the Charge of Mr. Burton and Mr. Prynn, about their Answer, and their not being suffered to put it into the Star-Chamber. Which though Mr. Prynn pressed at large before, yet here it must come again, to help to fill the world with clamour. Yet to that which shall but seem new, I shall answer. Two things are said: (1.) The one, that they were not suffered to put in their Defence modo et forma, as it was laid. There was an Order made openly in court to the Judges to expunge scandalous matter. And the two Chief Justices did order the expunging of all that which was expunged, be it more or less; as appears in the acts of that court. (2.) The other is, that I procured this expunging. The Proofs that I procured it, were these: First, Because Mr. Cockshot gave me account of the business from Mr. Attorney. I had reason to look after the business, the whole Church of England being scandalized in that Bill, as well as myself. But this is no proof that I either gave direction, or used any solicitation to the reverend Judges, to whom it was referred. Secondly, Because I gave the Lords thanks for it. It was openly in Court: It was after the expunging was agreed unto. And what could I do less in such a cause of the Church, though I had not been personally concerned in it? Thirdly, Because I had a copy of their Answer found in my Study. I conceive it was not only fit but necessary for me to have one, the nature of the cause considered. But who interlined any passages in it with black-lead, I know not: For I ever used ink, and no black-lead all my life. These be strange proofs that I procured any thing.

Then Mr. Prynn added, That the justice and favour which was afforded Dr. Leighton was denied unto him. As far as I remember, it was for the putting in of his answer under his own hand. This, if so, was done by order of the Court; it was not my act.

VIII. The last Charge followed: And that was taken out of the Preface to my Speech in the Star-Chamber. The words are, "That one way of Government is not always either fit or safe, when the humours of the people are in a continual change, &c." From whence they inferred, I laboured to reduce all to an arbitrary government. But I do humbly conceive no construction can force these words against me for an arbitrary government: For the meaning is, and can be no other, for sometimes a stricter, and sometimes a remisser holding and ordering the reins of government; yet both according to the same laws, by a different use and application of mercy and justice to offenders. And so I answered to Mr. Browne, who charged this against me as one of my ill counsels to his majesty. But my Answer given is truth: For it is not said, That there should not be one law for government, but not one way in the ordering and execution of that law. And the Observator upon my speech, an English author, and well enough known, though he pretends it is a translation out of Dutch, though he spares nothing that may be but carp at; yet to this passage he says, it is a good maxim, and wishes the king would follow it. [Divine and politic Observations upon my Speech, p. 78.] And truly, for my part, I learned it of a very wise and an able governor, and he a king of England too; it was of Henry 7, of whom the Story says, That in the difficulties of his time and cause he used both ways of government, severity and clemency; yet both these were still within the compass of the law. He far too wise, and I never yet such a fool, as to imbrace arbitrary government." [Speed in Hen. 7. § 16.]

June 14, 1644. This day I received a Note from the Committee, that they intended to proceed next upon the remainder of the Seventh, and upon the Eighth and Ninth Original Articles: Which follow in hæc verba:

VIII. "That for the better advancing of his traitorous purpose and design, he did abuse the great power and trust his majesty reposed in him: and did intrude upon the places of divers great officers, and upon the right of other of his majesty's subjects: whereby he did procure to himself the nomination of sundry persons to ecclesiastical dignities, promotions and benefices, belonging to his majesty, and divers of the nobility, clergy, and others; and hath taken upon him the commendation of chaplains to the king; by which means he hath preferred to his majesty's service, and to other great promotions in the church, such as have been possibly affected, or otherwise unsound and corrupt both in doctrine and manners.

IX. "He hath for the same traitorous and wicked intent, chosen and employed such men to be his chaplains, whom he knew to be notoriously disaffected to the reformed religion, grossly addicted to Popish superstition, and erroneous and unsound both in judgment and practice. And to them, or some of them, he hath committed the Licensing of Books to be printed; by which means divers false and superstitious books have been published, to the great scandal of religion, and to the seducing of many of his majesty's subjects."

The Fourteenth Day of my Hearing.

Monday, June 17, 1644. At the ending of the former day's Charge, I was put off to this day, which held.

I. The first Charge was concerning Mr. Damport's leaving his benefice in London, and going into Holland.

1. The first Witness for this was Quaterman, a bitter enemy of mine; God forgive him; He speaks as if he had fled from his ministry here for fear of me. But the second Witness, Mr. Dukeswell, says, that he went away upon a warrant that came to summon him into the High-Commission. The truth is, my lords, and it is well known, and to some of his best friends, that I preserved him once before, and my lord Vere came and gave me thanks for it. If after this he fell into danger again, majus peccatum habet; I cannot preserve men that will continue in dangerous courses. He says farther, (and in this the other witness agrees with him) That when I heard he was gone into New-England, I should say my arm should reach him there. The words I remember not. But for the thing, I cannot think it fit that any plantation should secure any offender against the church of England. And therefore if I did say my arm should reach him, or them so offending, I know no crime in it; so long as my arm reached no man but by the law.

2. The second Witness, Mr. Dukeswell, adds nothing to this, but that he says, sir Maurice Abbot kept him in before. For which testimony I thank him. For by this it appears, that Mr. Damport was a dangerous factious man, and so accounted in my predecessor's time, and it seems prosecuted then too, that his brother sir Maurice Abbot was fain, being then a parishioner of his, to labour hard to keep him in.

II. The second Charge was concerning Nathaniel Wickens, a servant of Mr. Prynne.

1. The first Witness in this cause was William Wickens, father to Nathaniel. He says, his son was nine weeks in divers prisons, and for no cause but for that he was Mr. Prynne's servant. But it appears apud Acta, that there were many Articles of great misdemeanour against him. And afterwards himself adds, That he knew no cause, but his refusing to take the oath ex officio. Why, but if he knew that, then he knew another cause, beside his being Mr. Prynne's servant: unless he will say all Mr. Prynne's servants refuse that oath, and all that refuse that oath are Mr. Prynne's servants. As for the Sentence which was laid upon him, and the imprisonment, that was the act of the High-Commission, not mine. Then he says, That my hand was first in the warrant for his commitment. And so it was to be of course.

2. The second Witness was Sarah Wayman. She says, That he refused to take the Oath. Therefore he was not committed for being Mr. Prynne's servant. She says, That for refusing the oath, he was threatened he should be taken pro confesso: And that when one of the doctors replied, "That could not be done by the Order of the Court," I should say, "I would have an Order by the next Court day." It is manifest in the course of that court, that any man may be taken pro confesso, that will not take the oath, and answer. Yet seeing how that party of men prevailed, and that one doctor's doubting might breed more difference, to the great scandal and weakening of that court; I publicly acquainted his majesty and the lords with it: who were all of opinion, that if such refusers might not be taken pro confesso, the whole power of the court was shaken. And hereupon his majesty sent his letter under his signet, to command us to uphold the power of the court, and to proceed. She says farther, That he desired the sight of his Articles, which was denied him. It was the constant and known course of that court, that he might not see the Articles till he had taken the oath, which he refused to do.

3. The Third Witness was one Flower. He agrees about the business of taking him pro confesso: But that is answered. He adds, That there was nothing laid to his charge: and yet confesses, that Wickens desired to see the Articles that were against him. This is a pretty oath: There were Articles against him, which he desired to see, and yet there was nothing laid to his charge.

4. Then was produced his majesty's Letter sent unto us. And herein the king requires us by his Supreme Power Ecclesiastical to proceed, &c. We had been in a fine case, had we disobeyed this command. Besides, my lords, I pray mark it, we are enjoined to proceed by the king's supreme power ecclesiastical; and yet it is here urged against me, that this was done to bring in popery. An excellent new way of bringing in Popery by the king's Supremacy. Yea, but they say, I should not have procured this letter. Why? I hope I may by all lawful ways preserve the honour and just power of the court in which I sat. And it is expressed in the letter, that no more was done, than was agreeable to the laws and customs of the realm. And it is known that both an oath, and a taking pro confesso in point of refusal, are used both in the Star-Chamber and in the Chancery.

5. The last Witness was Mr. Prynn; who says, That his man was not suffered to come to him, during his soreness, when his ears were cropt. This favour should have been asked of the Court of Star-Chamber, not of me. And yet here is no proof that I denied him this, but the bare report of him, whom he says he employed. Nor do I remember any man's coming to me about it.

III. The third Charge followed; it was concerning stopping of Books from the Press, both old and new, and expunging some things out of them.

1. The first Instance was about the English Bibles with the Geneva Notes. The Bibles with those Notes were tolerated indeed both in queen Elizabeth's and king James's time; but allowed by authority in neither. And king James said plainly, That he thought the Geneva translation was the worst, and many of the Notes very partial, untrue, seditious, and savouring too much of dangerous and traitorous conceits: and gave instance.* This passage I then read to the Lords: and withal told them, That now of late these Notes were more commonly used to ill purposes than formerly, and that that was the cause why the High Commission was more careful and strict against them than before.

Here Michael Sparks the elder came in as Witness, and said, He was called into the High Commission about these Books: but he confesses, it was not only for them. He says, "The restraint of those Bibles was for the Notes:" but he adds, "as he supposes." And his supposal is no proof. Besides, he might have added here also, that the restraint was not for the Notes only: for by the numerous coming over of Bibles, both with and without Notes, from Amsterdam, there was a great and a just fear conceived, that by little and little printing would quite be carried out of the kingdom. For the Books which came thence, were better print, better bound, better paper, and, for all the charges of bringing, sold cheaper. And would any one buy a worse Bible dearer, when he might have a better cheaper? And to preserve printing here at home, as well as the Notes, was the cause of stricter looking to those Bibles. And this appears by a letter of sir William Boswell's, his majesty's agent in the Low Countries; the letter written to me, and now produced against me: but makes for me, as I conceive. For therein he sends me word of two impressions of the Bible in English, one with Notes, and the other without; and desires me to take care to regulate this business at home. What should I do? Should I sleep upon such advertisements as these, and from such a hand? Especially since he sends word also, that Dr. Anyes was then printing of a book wholly against the Church of England. So my care was against all underminings, both at home and abroad, of the established doctrine and discipline of the Church of England, for which I am now like to suffer. And I pray God that point of Arminianism, Libertas Prophetandi, do not more mischief in short time, than is expressible by me.

2. The second Instance was about the new Decree of the Star-Chamber, concerning Printing. Four Articles of this Decree were read, namely, the 1st, 2d, 18th, 24th. What these are, may be seen in the Decree: and as I think that whole Decree made A. D. 1637, useful and necessary; so, under your lordships favour, I think those four Articles as necessary as any.

Mr. Waly and Mr. Downes, two stationers, Witnesses in this particular, say, That they desired some mitigation of the Decree, and that Judge Bramston said, he could not do it without me. I saw my Lord Chief Justice Bramston here in the court but the other day; why was not he examined, but these men only, who oppose all regulating of the press that opposes their point? And sure that grave judge meant, he could not do it alone without the consent of the court. Or if he would have me consulted, it was out of his judicious care for the peace of this Church, almost pressed to death by the liberty of printing. The chief Grievance they expressed against the new licensing of Books, was only for matter of charges; but that is provided for in the eighteenth Article. And Mr. Downes takes a fine oath, which was, That he makes no doubt, but that all was done by my direction; and yet adds, that he cannot say it. So he swears that which, himself confesses, he cannot say. And manifest it is in the Preface, that this Decree was printed by order of the Court, and so, by their command, sent to the Stationers-hall: and the end of it was to suppress seditious, schismatical, and mutinous books, as appears in the first Article.

3. The third Instance was, That I used my power to suppress Books in Holland. This was drawn out of a letter which John le Mare, one of the prime preachers in Amsterdam, writ to me; expressing therein, That since the Proclamation made by the States, no man durst meddle with printing any seditious Libels against either the State or Church of England. Where is the fault? For this gentleman did a very good office to this kingdom and church, in procuring that Proclamation: for till this was done, every discontented spirit could print what he pleased at Amsterdam, against either. And if he had any direction from me about it, which is not proved, I neither am, nor can be sorry for it. And the fear which kept men in from printing, proceeded from the Proclamation of the States, not from any power of mine.

*. Conference at Hampton-Court, see vol. 2, p. 70.

4. The fourth Instance was in the "Book of Martyrs." But that was but named to credit a base business, an Almanack made by one Mr. Genebrand;* in which he had left out all the Saints, Apostles and all, and put in those which are named in Mr. Fox, and yet not all of them neither; for he had left out the solemn days, which are in Fox, as Feb. 2, Feb. 25, Mar. 25. And Cranmer translated to Mar. 23. In this particular Mr. Genebrand, brother to this Almanack-maker, witnesseth, that the queen sent to me about this new Almanack. If her majesty did send to me about it, (as it is probable she would disdain the book,) is that any crime in me? Could I prevent her majesty's sending, who could not know so much as that she would send? He says, His brother was acquitted in the High Commission, but charged by me that he made a faction in the court. If I did say so, surely, my lords, I saw some practising by him in this new-found way. He says, The Papists bought up a great number of these Almanacks, and burnt them. It seems he could not hinder that, nor I neither; unless it shall not be lawful for a papist to buy an Almanack: for when he hath bought him, he may burn him if he please.

But since the "Book of Martyrs" was named, I shall tell your lordships how careful I was of it. It is well known how easily Abridgements, by their brevity and their cheapness, in short time work out the authors themselves. Mr. Young the printer laboured me earnestly and often for an Abridgment of the Book of Martyrs; but I still withstood it, as my Secretary here present can testify, upon these two grounds: The one, lest it should bring the large Book itself into disuse; and the other, lest if any material thing should be left out, that should have been charged as done of purpose by me, as now I see it is in other books. And I humbly pray your lordships cast your eyes upon the Frontispiece of the Book of Martyrs, printed A. D. 1642, since this parliament began, and when I was safe enough from having any hand in the business, and there you shall see as dangerous pictures as have been charged upon me, or any my Chapel Windows.

Upon occasion of Mr. Genebrand's Calendar, Mr. Prynne took occasion to tell the Lords, That I had made Notes upon the Calendar in the Missal. I desired they might be read: it was thought too tedious. They were nothing but some Additions of my own reading to the occurrences on some days. And because the Calendar in the Missal was open and large, I thought fit to write them there.

5. The fifth Instance is in Dr. Pocklington's Censure of —,† and of Flaccius Illyricus; and that this book was licensed by my chaplain Dr. Bray; and he was censured in this honourable house for that and like slips of his. Then it was inferred at the bar, That it must be taken as my act, if it were done by my chaplain: but inferences are no sworn proof. And, I conceive, no man can by law be punished criminally for his servant's fact, unless there be proof that he had a hand in it. Then it was urged, but without any proof too, that Dr. Pocklington was preferred by me. To which I shall answer when proof is made; and if I had, it is far enough from treason.

6. The next Instance was about the calling in of Thomas Beacon's Disputation of the Mass. The Witness Mr. Prynne. He says, The book was licensed, and that a papist thereupon said, Doth my lord of Canterbury license such books? That I was informed of these words, and the book called in the next day. First, Mr. Prynne is single in this part of the testimony for the words. Secondly, if any Papist did say so, it was not in my power to stop his mouth; and they which license books must endure many and various censures, as the readers of them stand affected. Thirdly, If any papist did so speak, I have reason to think it was to do me a mischief, as much as in him lay. Fourthly, This is a very bold oath; for he swears, that I was informed of these words. He was not present to hear it, and then he can have it but by hearsay; and no religion teaches him to swear that for truth, which he doth but hear. Lastly, The book was called in, because it was slipt out contrary to the late Decree for printing. Yea, but Mr. Prynne swears, and so doth Michael Sparks the other Witness, That the Book was sent to the printer before the Decree. But first, Sparks's Oath is uncertain; for he says, Mr. Prynne sent him the Book before the Decree; and then by and by after says, it was about that time. Now the Book is somewhat large, so that it might be sent him before the Decree, and yet not be printed till after, and that a good space too. And, secondly, Mr. Prynne himself confesses, the Book was sent when the Decree was in agitation.

7. The seventh Instance was about Arminianism, as maintained by me against the Declarations of both houses of parliament, and of king James, concerning Vorstius and Bertius. First, I have nothing to do to defend Arminianism, no man having yet charged me with the abetting any point of it. Secondly, King James's Declaration is very learned: but under favour, he puts a great deal of difference between Vorstius and Bertius; and his majesty's opinion is clear with the Article of the Church of England, and so expressed by himself; and to which I ever consented. And the passage in the Conference at Hampton-Court was then read to the Lords: and yet for the peace of Christendom, and the strengthening of the Reformed Religion, I do heartily wish these differences were not pursued with such heat and animosity, in regard that all the Lutheran Protestants are of the same opinions, or with very little difference from those which are now called Arminianism.

And here comes in Michael Sparks, who says, He was called into the High-Commission

* His name was Gellibrand. W. S. A. C.

about a book of bishop Carleton's. I cannot punctually remember all particulars so long since; but he confesses the business was in the High-Commission, and so not singly chargeable against me. Besides, he is single in this business. He says, he was eleven years in the High-Commission, and never sentenced. 'This is more than I know: but if it be so, he had better luck than some honest men; for a bitterer enemy, to his power, the church-government never had.' He was Mr. Pryn's printer. He says, I was a dean then, and he thinks of Hereford. I was never dean of Hereford: but howsoever, this is a dangerous oath; let him think of it. He swears that I was a dean then, and a High-Commissioner, or else what had I to do in the business? Now it is well known I was never a High-Commissioner, till I had been a bishop some years. For the book itself, Sparks says nothing what was the argument of it; but (so far as I remember) it was expressly against the king's declaration. 'And so I answered Mr. Browne, when he summed up the Evidence against me in the house of commons. And though in his reply he seemed to deny this, yet I remember no proof he brought for it.'

8. The last instance was pregnant, and brought forth many particulars. 1. As first, Dr. Featly's Parallels against bishop Mountague: but this was still-born; at least it says nothing of me. 2. Mr. Pryn's Perpetuity, and against Dr. Cosens, both burnt. But he doth not say absolutely burnt, but as he is informed; and he may be informed amiss. And howsoever he says, it was done by the High-Commission, not by me. 3. Some sheets of Dr. Succiff's Book prohibited the press at Oxford. I hope Oxford is able to give an account for itself. And whereas it was here said at the bar, They hoped I would shew some repressing of the contrary part; I would satisfy their hopes abundantly, could I bring witnesses from Oxford, how even and steady a hand I carried to both parts. 4. Mr. Burton questioned about his book called, "The Seven Vials:" but himself confesses, That upon sir Henry Martin's information, that, as that cause was laid, the High-Commission had no power in it, he was dismissed. 5. That about his Book, intitled, "Babel, no Bethel," he was questioned at a court out of term. This was very usual, whensoever the court was full of business, to hold one court-day out of term. This is warranted by the commission; and warning of it was always publicly given the court-day before, that all whom it concerned might take notice of it, and provide themselves. 6. He says he was there railed at by bishop Harsnet. It is more than I know that bishop Harsnet railed at him; but if he did, I hope I am not brought hither to answer all men's faults. 7. He says, He claimed the Petition of Right, yet was committed. This is more than I know or believe; yet if it were so, it was done by the High-Commission Court, not by me. 8. He says next, That he could never be quiet. But I am sure, my lords, the church for divers years could never be in quiet for him and his associates. 9. Lastly, they say, some passages against Arminianism were left out of two letters; one of bishop Davenant's, and the other of bishop Hall's, sent to be printed. First, here is no proof at all offered, that I differed in any thing from the doctrine expressed in those letters. And, secondly, for the leaving out of those passages, it was (it seems) done to avoid kindling of new flames in the Church of England. And it appeared on the other side of the paper, which was produced against me, and so read to the lords, that these passages were left out by the express order from those bishops themselves, under bishop Hall's own hand, and with thanks to Dr. Turner, then my chaplain, for his letter to them. And here this day's business ended; and I received command to attend again the twentieth of the same month.

The Fifteenth Day of my Hearing.

Thursday, June 20, 1644. This day I came again to the house. A day or two before, as now also, the landing-place at Westminster was not so full of people; and they which were there, much more civil towards me than formerly. My friends were willing to persuade me, that my Answer had much abated the edge of the people, saving from the violent and factious leaders of the multitude, whom it seems nothing would satisfy but my life (for so I was after told in plain terms by a man deeply interested in them); when I presently saw Quaterman coming towards me; who, as soon as he came, fell to his wonted railing, and asked aloud, "What the lords meant, to be troubled so long and so often with such a base fellow as I was? They should do well to hang me out of the way." I heard the words with grief enough, and so left them and him in the hands of God. My servants were earnest to have me complain to the lords. I remembered my late complaint about the Pamphlets had no redress, and so forbore it. They notwithstanding, out of their zeal, complained to Mr. Lieutenant of the Tower, who presently went forth, and said he would school him; but I hearkened no more after it.

When I came to the bar, Mr. Nicolas began with great violence, and told the lords, the business grew higher and higher against me. What the business did, will after appear; but I am sure he grew higher and higher: and from this time forward, besides the violence of expression, gave me such language, as no Christian would give a Jew. But God, I humbly thank him, blessed me with patience; and so I made my ears obedient. That which made him say "the business grew higher and higher," was this: upon my often calling to have the Oaths at the Coronation of king James and king Charles compared, some of them repaired again to my Study at Lambeth, to search for all such copies of Coronation-Books as could there be found. In this diligent and curious search ('for Mr. Pryn's malice made it') they found some Papers concerning Parliaments, no other (I praise God for it) than such as with indifferent construction might (I hope) well pass; especially, considering what occasion led me, and what command was upon me. And, as I have been told by able and experienced men, they would have been nothing, had they been found in any but this troublesome and distracted time about the rights of parliaments (as it is said). Howsoever, I was most unfortunate they should be now found; and I had not left them a being, but that I verily thought I had destroyed them long since: but they were unhappily found among the heaps of my papers. And so,

I. An Answer to the Remonstrance made June 17, 1628, (which is sixteen years since) was made the first Charge against me.

II. And the second Charge was, a Paper concerning a Declaration, Jan. 28, 1628. To both which I then answered; but because these are urged more than once, to help fill the people with new clamour, and because they are more closely pressed against me at the last day of my hearing; and because Mr. Browne, in his summary Charge, laid and charged all these papers together; to avoid tedious repetition, I will also make my whole and entire answer together, when that time comes.

III. The third Charge of this day was, a Letter of a Jesuit to his Superior, found in my Study, dated March 1628. Let the letter be dated when it will, I hope the Archbishop may get and keep the letters of any jesuits or others. How shall I be able to know or prevent their plots upon the Religion by law established, if this may not be done? Yet this I desire all men to take notice of, that this letter was not directed to me. I was then bishop of London: the letter was found in a search. But when by all possible care taken by the High-Commission, the author could not be found, I had (as I humbly conceive) great reason to keep it. And I then humbly desired the whole letter might be read. There was in it, That Arminianism (as it was used) was their drug, and their plot against us, &c. The Jesuit seeing a fire kindling about these opinions, might write what he pleased to help on his cause: yet this drug, which he says is theirs, is the received opinion of all the Lutherans, and they too learned protestants to use their drugs. And if it be their drug, why do the Dominicans so condemn it? Nay, why doth the Master of the Sentences, and the School after him, for the most, determine rigidly against it? And whereas it is said, That these men had instruments at the Duke's chamber-door; that belongs not to me, I was not porter there. As for that power which I had (called by Mr. Nicolas the command of his ear), I used it as much as I could to shut such instruments thence. Beside, it is barely said, no proof at all offered, that such instruments were about the Duke's chamber-door. Other Papers were found in my study, above sixty at least, expressing my continual labours for some years together, to reconcile the divided Protestants in Germany, that so they might go with united forces against the Romanists. 'Why are not these produced too? Would not Christianity and justice have my innocence cleared as well as my faults accused?'

IV. The fourth Charge was bishop Mountague's preferment. The Parliament (they say) called him in question,* and the king called in his Book; yet in affront to the parliament, that he was preferred by me. No, it was then publicly known in court (whether now remembered or no, I cannot tell) that he was preferred by my lord duke; but being a church-business, the king commanded me to signify his pleasure to the signet-office: and the docket (which is all the proof here made) mentions him only by whom the king's pleasure is signified, not him that procures the preferment: so the docket in this case is no proof at all.

V. The fifth Charge was a Paper, intitled, "Considerations for the Church." Three exceptions against them. The Observation of the King's Declaration, art. 3. The Lecturers, art. 5. And the High-Commission and Prohibitions, art. 10, 11. The Paper I desired might be all read: nothing in them against either law or religion. And for Lecturers a better care taken, and with more ease to the people, and more peace to the church, by a combination of conformable neighbouring ministers, in their turns, and not by some one humorous man, who too often misleads the people. Secondly, My copy of "Considerations†" came from archbishop Harsnett, in which some sour expression concerning Emanuel and Sidney colleges in Cambridge, which the king in his wisdom thought fit to leave out. The king's Instructions upon these "Considerations" are under Mr. Baker's hand, who was Secretary to my predecessor; and they were sent to me to make exceptions to them, if I knew any, in regard of the ministers of London, whereof I was then bishop. And by this, that they were thus sent unto me by my predecessor, it is manifest, that this Account from the several dioceses to the archbishop, and from him to his majesty once a year, was begun before my time. Howsoever, if it had not, I should have been glad of the honour of it, had it begun in mine. For, I humbly conceive there cannot be a better or a safer way to preserve truth and peace in the church, than that once a year every bishop should give an account of all greater occurrences in the church to his metropolitan, and he to the king: Without which, the king, who is the Supreme, is like to be a great stranger to all church proceedings.

VI. The sixth Charge was about Dr. Sibthorp's Sermon, That my predecessor opposed

* See No. 124, vol. 2, p. 1257.

† I suppose these Considerations are those published in Frynne's Compl. Hist. p. 287. W. S. A. C.

the printing of it, and that I opposed him, to affront the parliament*. Nothing so, my lords: Nothing done by me to oppose, or affront the one or the other. This Sermon came forth when the Loan was not yet settled in parliament. The Lords, and the Judges, and the bishops, were some for, some against it. And if my judgment were erroneous in that point, it was misled by lords of great honour and experience, and by judges of great knowledge in the law. But I did nothing to affront any. It is said, that I inserted into the Sermon, "That the people may not refuse any tax that is not unjustly laid." I conceive nothing is justly laid in that kind but according to law, God's and man's: And I dare not say, the people may refuse any thing so laid. For Jus Regis, the Right of a King, (which is urged against me too) I never went farther than the scriptures lead me; nor did I ever think that Jus Regis, mentioned 1 Sam. viii. is meant of the ordinary and just Right of Kings, but of that power which such as Saul would be, would assume unto themselves, and make it right by power, 1 Sam. viii. 12.

Then they say I expunged some things out of it: As, 1. The "Sabbath," and put instead of it the "Lord's-Day." What is my offence? Sabbath is the Jews word, and the Lord's-Day the Christians. 2. About evil Counsellors, to be used as Haman. The passage, as there expressed, was very scandalous, and without just cause, upon the lords of the council. And they might justly have thought I had wanted discretion, should I have left it in. 3. That I expunged this, "That Popery is against the first and the second commandment." If I did it, it was because it is much doubted by learned men, whether any thing in Popery is against the first Commandment, or denies the Unity of the God-head. And Mr. Perkins, who charges very home against Popery, lays not the breach of the first Commandment upon them. 'And when I gave Mr. Browne this Answer; in his last Reply he asked why I left out both? Why, I did it because its being against the second is common and obvious, and I did not think it worthy the standing in such a Sermon, when it could not be made good against the first.'

But they demanded, Why I should make any animadversions at all upon the Sermon? It was thus: The Sermon being presented to his majesty, and the argument not common, he committed the care of printing it to bishop Mountain, the bishop of London, and four other; of which I was one. And this was the reason of the Animadversions now called mine; as also of the Answer to my predecessor's Exceptions, now charged also, and called mine. But it was the Joint-Answer of the Committee. And so is that other particular also, in which the whole business is left to the learned in the laws: For though the Animadversions be in my hand, yet they were done at and by the Committee, only I being unity bishop, was put to write them in my hand.

VII. The seventh Charge was Dr. Manwaring's Business and Preferment. It was handled before, only resumed here to make a noise, and so passed it over.*

VIII. The eighth Charge was concerning some Alterations in the Prayers made for the 5th of November, and in the Book for the Fast, which was published anno 1636, and the prayers on the Coronation-Day.

1. For the Fast-Book: The Prayer mentioned was altered, as is expressed; but it was by him that had the ordering of that Book to the press, not by me. Yet I cannot but approve the reason given for it, and that without any the least approbation of merit: For the abuse of Fasting, by thinking it meritorious, is the thing left out: whereas in this age and kingdom, when and where set Fastings of the church are cried down, there can be little fear of that erroneous opinion of placing any merit in fastings.

2. For the Prayers published for the fifth of November and Coronation-Day; the Alterations were made either by the king himself, or some about him when I was not in court: And the Book sent me; with a command for the printing, as there altered. I made stay till I might wait upon his majesty. I found him resolved upon the Alterations; nor in my judgment could I justly except against them. His majesty then gave warrant to the Books themselves, with the Alterations in them; and so by his warrant I commanded the printing. And I then shewed both the books to the lords, who viewed them, and acknowledged his majesty's hand, with which, not his name only, but the whole warrant was written.

And here I humbly desired three things might be observed, and I still desire it. 1. With what conscience this Passage out of my Speech in the Star-Chamber (p. 32.) was urged against me, (for so it was, and fiercely by Mr. Nicolas) to prove that I had altered the Oath at the King's Coronation, because the Prayers appointed for the Anniversary of the Coronation were altered. 'Which is absolute nonsense.' 2. He charged me that the word Antichristian was left out. But that is visibly untrue: for it is left in. 3. That though it be in, yet that the Alteration takes it off from the Papist, as also their rebellion. Neither: For the Change is this: "That Antichristian sect," altered into the "Antichristian sect of them which," &c. and, "whose religion is rebellion," altered into "who turn religion into rebellion." By which it is manifest, that the Alteration takes off neither imputation from the Papist, but moderates both. And for aught I yet know, it is necessary it should: For if their religion be rebellion, see what it will produce. Is not this the syllogism? The Religion of the Papist is Rebellion; but Christianity is the Religion of the Papist: Therefore Christianity is Rebellion. I may not enlarge; but you may see more, if you please, in my speech in the Star-Chamber. (p. 36.) 'And when Mr. Browne in the Sum of his Charge pressed these Alterations hard against me, he did not so much as mention that I had the king's both warrant and command to all that I did in that particular. And besides urged this as a great Innovation; because the prayers mentioned had continued unaltered for the space of above 30 years; not remembering therewith, that the liturgy of the church, established by act of parliament, must be taken away, or altered, though it hath continued above fourscore. Nay, and episcopacy must be quite abolished, though it have continued in the church of Christ above 1600.'

IX. The ninth Charge was from sir Edward Hungerford, who came to Lambeth to have a little Book licensed at the press. The author was sir Edward Hungerford; whether sir Edward's grandfather or his uncle, I remember not the relation. He says he came to my chaplain Dr. Bray to license it; and that Dr. Bray told him there were some harsh phrases in it, which were better left out, because we were upon a way of winning the Papists. 1. I hope I shall not be made answerable for my chaplain's words too. And 2. I hope there is no harm in winning the Papists to the church of England; especially, if so easy a cure as avoiding harsh language would do it. He says, my chaplain expressed a dislike of Guicciardin's censure of pope Alexander the 6th. Sure, if the censure be false, he had reason to except against it: If true, yet to publish such an unavowry business to the common people.—He says, he came and complained to me; and that I told him I was not at leisure, but left it to my chaplain. So the Charge upon me was, that my chaplain was in an error concerning this Book, and I would not redress it. To this I answered, 1. That my Chaplain was dead; and I not knowing the reasons which moved him to refuse licensing this Book, can neither confess him to be in an error, nor yet justify him. 2. For my own refusing to meddle with it, sir Edward took me in a time of business, when I could not attend it. 3. If I had absolutely refused it, and left it to my chaplain, I had done no more than all my predecessors did before me. And Dr. Featly then witnessed to the Lords, that archbishop Abbot, my immediate predecessor, and to whom the doctor was household chaplain, would never meddle with licensing books, but ever referred them to his chaplains. And Dr. Mockett, another of his chaplains (well known to Dr. Featly), suffered for a Book sharply; yet not one word said to my predecessor about it. 4. As the Liberty of the Press is in England, and of the books which are tendered to the press, the Archbishop had better grind than take that work to his own hands, especially considering his many and necessary avocations. Lastly, No man ever complained to me in this kind, but this gentleman only. So it is one only single offence, if it be any. But how this, or the rest, should be treason against sir Edward Hungerford, I cannot yet see. And so I answered Mr. Browne, who in his summary Charge forgot not this. But Mr. Nicolas laid load upon me in his Reply, in such language as I am willing to forget.'

X. The tenth Charge was out of a Paper of Considerations to Dr. Potter, about some few passages in his Answer to a Book intitled "Charity Mistaken." The business this: Dr. Potter writ to me for my advice. I used not to be peremptory; but put some few things back to his farther consideration: Of which three were now charged upon me. The first was, he used this phrase, "Believe in the Pope." I desired him to consider of "in." And in this I yet know not wherein I offend. The second was this phrase, "The Idol of Rome." I advised him to consider this phrase too, that men might not be to seek what that idol was. And here Mr. Nicolas cried out with vehemency, That every boy in the street could tell the Pope was the idol. I had not Dr. Potter's Book now at hand, and so could not be certain in what sense the doctor used it; but else, as many at least think the Mass the Idol of Rome, as the Pope; unless Mr. Nicolas's boys in the streets think otherwise, and then I cannot blame him for following such mature judgments.' The third was, that I bid him consider whether the Passage, p. 27, (as I remember) did not give as much power to the parliament in matter of Doctrine, as the church. But my Answer to this I shall put off to the Charge against me concerning Parliaments, because there Mr. Browne began with this. The two former he charged also, and I answered them as before. But he omitted, that I obtained of the Lords the reading of Dr. Potter's Letter to me; by which he drew from me those things which I determined not, but only put to his second thoughts and consideration. In which way, I humbly conceive, I cannot be in crime, though I were in error. Here ended the business of this day, and I was ordered to attend again June 27.'

The Sixteenth Day of my Hearing.

I. Thursday, June 27, 1644. I appeared this day again: And the first Charge laid against me, was my chaplain Dr. Bray's expungings out of Dr. Featly's Sermons. The same Charge ad verbum which was before; and I give it the same Answer: these repetitions of the same things being only to increase clamour, and to fill more men's ears with it.

II. The second Charge was certain Expunctions of some things against the Papists in Dr. Clark's Sermons. The Witness which swore to the passages left out was one Mr. White, a minister, and it seems some near acquaintance of Dr. Clark's. But, 1. This witness is single. 2. He brought only a Paper, in which he had written down what was expunged; but Dr.

Clark's Sermons he brought not with it: So it is not impossible he might be mistaken. Howsoever, I not having the book, could not possibly make an absolute and a perfect answer. S. This Witness confesses that Dr. Weeks, then chaplain to my lord of London, had the view of Dr. Clark's Sermons, and took Exceptions against some passages, as well as my chaplain Dr. Haywood did. So it seems there was cause for it. A. I answer, That for this, and for all other of like nature, my chaplain must answer for his own act, and not I. He is living, and an able man: I humbly desire he may be called to his account. For it is not possible for me to tell your lordships upon what grounds he did expunge these many and different passages, which are instanced against me. Lastly, In all the passages of Dr. Clark's Sermons, it is not any where distinguished which were expunged by my chaplain, and which by Dr. Weeks. So that the Charge in that behalf is left very uncertain.

For the Passages themselves, as they are many, so they are such as may easily be mistaken, the most of them. And whether Dr. Clark handled them in such manner as was not justifiable, either against Arminius or the Papists, cannot possibly be known, till each place in the Book be examined for the thing, and my chaplain Dr. Haywood for the meaning. 'This made a great noise in Mr. Browne's summary Charge against me: He alledging, that 22 Passages about points of Popery were dashed out of Dr. Clark's Sermons. To which I answered, That I conceived my Chaplain would be able to make it good, there were 200 left in for 22 left out; and that they which were left out, were not some way or other justifiable against the Papists, as set down and expressed by him. And if so, they are better out than in: for we gain nothing by urging that against the Papists, which, when it comes to the touch, cannot be made good against them.'

One Passage is here added out of Dr. Featly's Sermons, p. 225, where he inveighs against too much embellishing and beautifying the Church, and not the souls of men, &c. First, If there be not a care to beautify the soul, let men profess what religion they will, it is a just exception; and I believe no fault found with that. But, secondly, for the over-much beautifying of the Church, it is a point that might be well left out. Little necessity, God knows, to preach or print against too much adorning of churches among us, where yet so many churches lie very nastily in many places of the kingdom, and no one too much adorned to be found. Nay, the very Consecration of Churches cried down, as it before expressed. And this opinion, that no place is holy but during the service in it, made Mr. Culmer, though a minister, to piss in the Cathedral Church of Canterbury; and divers others to do so, and more against the pillars of St. Paul's, nearer hand, as may daily be both seen and smelt, to the shame of that which is called religion. 'Here Mr. Nicolas would fain

'have shovelled it to the out-side of the church, which had been bad enough; but it was the inside I spake of, and the thing is known.'

Then an Instance was made in a Book of Dr. Jones. The witness that any thing was expunged out of this, was only Mr. Chatwin. And he confesses, that this Book was licensed by Dr. Baker, and he my lord of London's chaplain, not mine. Here my friends at the bar infer, that Dr. Baker was preferred by me. First, That is not so; he was preferred by his own lord. Secondly, If he had been preferred by me, it could have made no charge, unless proof had been made that I preferred him for abusing Dr. Jones's Book. And for the Docket, which is the only Proof offered that I preferred him, I have already shewed that that is no proof. Yea, but they say, Dr. Baker was employed by me as one of my Visitors. And what then? Must I be answerable for every fault that is committed by every man that I employ in my Visitation, though it be a fault committed at another time and place? Though I humbly desire Dr. Baker may answer for himself, before I acknowledge any fault committed by him. 'And though I conceive this Answer abundantly satisfactory for any thing that may concern me, yet Mr. Browne omitted not this instance against me.'

III. The third Charge was personally against myself, and taken out of my Speech in the Star Chamber, (p. 47). The words these: "The altar is the greatest place of God's residence upon earth, greater than the pulpit; for there it is Hoc est Corpus meum. This is my Body; but in the other it is at most but Hoc est Verbum meum, This is my Word; and a greater reverence is due to the Body, than the Word of the Lord." Out of this place, Mr. Nicolas would needs infer, that I maintained Transubstantiation; because I say, there it is Hoc est Corpus meum. First, I perceive by him, he confounds, as too many else do, Transubstantiation with the Real Presence, whereas these have a wide difference. And Calvin grants a real and true Presence, yea, and he grants realiter too; and yet no man a greater enemy to Transubstantiation than he: as I have proved at large in my Book against Fisher, [Cont. Fisher, p. 202], and had leave to read the passage therein to the Lords. And Mr. Perkins avows as much. [Perkins's Opera in sol. p. 590.] And secondly, the word 'there' makes nothing against this. For after the words of Consecration are past, be the minister never so unworthy; yet it is infallibly Hoc est Corpus meum to every worthy receiver. So is it not Hoc est verbum meum, from the pulpit to the best of hearers, nor by the best of preachers since the Apostles time. 'And as Preaching goes now, scarce is any thing heard from many in two long hours, that savours of the Word of God.' And St. Paul tells us, 1 Cor. xi. 29, of a great sin committed in his time of "not discerning the Lord's Body," when unworthy Communicants received it. Where was this? Why it was there, at the holy table or altar where they received, yet did not discern. I hope, for all this, St. Paul did not maintain Transubstantiation. ‘Mr. Browne in his summary Charge pressed this also upon me. I answered as before, and added, That in all ages of the Church the touch-stone of Religion was, not to hear the Word preached, but to communicate. And, at this day, many will come and hear Sermons, who yet will not receive the communion together. And as I call the Holy Table the greatest place of God’s residence upon earth, so doth a late learned Divine of this Church call the celebration of the Eucharist, “the crown of public service, and the most solemn and chief work of Christian assemblies:” (Thorndike of Assemblies, c. 8, p. 260): and he a man known to be far from affecting popery in the least. And all divines agree in this, which our Saviour himself teaches, St. Mat. xxvi. 26. “That there is the same effect of the Passion of Christ, and of this blessed Sacrament worthily received.” [Idem est effectus Passionis Christi et Eucharistiæ. Thorn. p. 3, q. 79, A. 1. c.]

Another Passage taken out of my speech, was, “That due reverence be given to God, and to his Altar.” Hence Mr. Nicolas infers again, this reverence is one joint act, therefore it is divine to the altar, as well as to God, and so idolatry. First, The very next words in my speech are, that this reverence to the Altar comes “far short of divine worship.” What can prevent an objection, if such plain words cannot? Secondly, Having thus plainly expressed it, he may infer too, if he will, that I do not then worship God. For this reverence is one joint act; but it is confessed, that it is not divine worship to the altar, and therefore not to God. ‘But thirdly, This gentleman, by ‘his favour, understands not the mysteries ‘which lie hid in many parts of divinity. In ‘this for one.’ For when this reverence is performed, it is to God as to the creator, and so divine; but it is only toward, and not to the altar, and so far short. And though in outward performance it be one joint act, yet that which is not separated, is and must be distinguished one from the other. ‘To make a ‘good work acceptable to God, there must be ‘both faith and charity; they cannot be separated one from the other: what, shall they not ‘therefore be distinguished? He that speaks ‘(saith St. Augustine) [St. Aug. l. 1. de Gen. ad Lit. c. 15.] by one joint act sends out his ‘voice and his word; separated they cannot be, ‘shall not they be distinguished therefore? ‘But I have lived long enough, and taken pains ‘to small purpose, if Mr. Nicolas, or any layman else, at his bye and leisure hours from a ‘busy profession, shall be able to teach me ‘in that which I have laboured all my life. ‘And God bless the poor bishops and clergy ‘of England, if falling into a storm (as I ‘now am) they must have such judges as Mr. ‘Nicolas!’

IV. The fourth Charge is the licensing of Sales, and other Books which had Popery in them, by my chaplain Dr. Haywood.

1. To this Mr. Prynne (who is the single witness) says, That he tendered a Bill to the then Lord Keeper against my chaplain for licensing this Book, and that his lordship refused it. If the Lord Keeper Coventry refused his Bill, I believe, were he living, he would assign just cause why he did it. But whatever cause he had, it concerns not me, that he rejected the Bill. Mr. Prynne says farther, that this Book of Sales was printed heretofore, but purged first by Dr. James; but licensed now by Dr. Haywood, not according to that purgation, but with all the points of popery in. For this he produces Mr. Oakes, whose son printed it. And says, farther, that his corrector at the press found fault with some passages, and thereupon he was sent to Dr. Haywood, who returned answer (as they say), “That if he licensed it, he would justify it:” and that his son told him this. First, my lords, this under-testimony of Mr. Oakes, produced by Mr. Prynne, is nothing but a hearsay from his son, who is now dead, and cannot be examined; and while he was living, ran away, and would not be examined. Secondly, This was a most notable piece of villany practised against my chaplain, and, through his sides, against me. It was thus, my lords: Whether the Bill were rejected or no, I cannot tell; but the complaint of printing this Book came publicly into the Star-Chamber. And then was the first time that ever I heard of it. I then humbly desired their lordships, that Dr. Haywood might answer whatever he had done amiss, either there, or where they pleased. The Court presently commanded Mr. Attorney Banks to call all parties before him, examine them thoroughly, and then give his account what he found, that the Court might proceed farther according to justice. Dr. Haywood appeared, and shewed Mr. Attorney how he had corrected Sales in all popish points before he licensed it. But young Oakes, and he which brought Sales to be licensed (who was then thought to be some Jesuited Recusant, and, as I remember, lodged for that time of printing in Oakes’s house), ran both away, or hid their heads, and would not be found. And this was a mere plot of this recusant, if not priest, to have Sales printed with all his points of Popery in him, to work mischief to my chaplain and myself: and young Oakes was in all likelihood well paid for his pains. This account Mr. Attorney brought into that Court, and this relation Dr. Haywood (who I obtained might be after sent for) attested at this bar.

One circumstance my old decayed memory mistook. For I thought, and so at first told the Lords, that for this clamour raised upon him in this way, I did soon after dismiss him my house. But after, I found that he was gone out of my house before. Howsoever, I left him without any mediation to the justice of the court. And here I may not forget that which I then observed to the Lords, that whereas it is urged, that many points of Popery have passed the press; it is no wonder, if such art be used as was here to get out Sales. And this farther is observable, that all these quotations of popish opinions, mentioned here to fill up the noise, are out of four or five books at the most, of which more are out of this Sales than all the rest. 'And called in' he 'was, as soon as known. Which Mr. Browne 'in the sum of his charge acknowledges.'

2. After Sales, the next instance was in a Book intitled, Christ's Epistle to the devout Reader. Four particular points were urged out of this: but neither I nor my chaplains had aught to do with it. For it was licensed at London-House by Dr. Weeks. Nor was there ever any complaint brought to me to have it called in: nor was any such proof so much as offered.

3. The third Instance was of a Book called The Female Glory, where Mr. Prynne (who is single again) said, that Dr. Heylin answered Mr. Burton, and justified all the passages in this Book: and added, that this was by my direction. But upon my motion at the bar concerning the boldness of this oath, Mr. Prynne recalled himself, and said, that I appointed him to answer Mr. Burton. But it is one thing to appoint him to answer Mr. Burton, and another to direct him to justify all passages in The Female Glory.

4. The fourth Instance was in a Letter sent to me from one Croxton, a young divine in Ireland. He was bred in St. John's-College in Oxford. At the lord Mountnorris's intreaty, I sent Croxton into Ireland to be his chaplain. If he miscarried there, I could not help it, nor hinder his writing of a Letter to me, nor prescribe what he should write in it. But, to my remembrance, I never heard of any miscarriage of his in matter of religion: and whether he be living or dead, I know not. That Letter indeed had a cross at the top of it. But then was another Letter of his shewed without a cross, in which he calls Rome, "Monstrum Abominandum." Howsoever, I conceive all this is nothing to me.

5. The fifth Instance was a Book, which they said was licensed by Dr. Weeks. And if so, then not by my chaplain. But upon perusal, I find no licence printed to it, nor to any of the other, but only to Sales, which is answered.

6. The sixth Instance was in bishop Mountague's Books, the Gag and the Appeal. Here they said, that Dr. White told Dr. Featly, "That five or six bishops did allow these books." But he did not name me to be one of them. Then Mr. Prynne urged upon his oath, that these books were found in my study. And I cannot but bless myself at this argument. For I have Bellarmine in my study, therefore I am a Papist; or I have the Alcoran in my study, therefore I am a Turk, is as good an argument as this: I have bishop Mountague's books in my study, therefore I am an Arminian. May Mr. Prynne have books in all kinds in his study, and may not the archbishop of Canterbury have them in his? Yes; but he says, there is a Letter of the bishop's to me, submitting his books to my censure. This letter hath no date, and so belike Mr. Prynne thought he might be bold both with it and his oath, and apply it to what books he pleased. But as God would have it, there are circumstances in it as good as a date. For it is therein expressed, that he was now ready to remove from Chichester to Norwich. Therefore he must needs speak of submitting those his books to me, which were then ready to be set out, which were his Origines Ecclesiasticæ; not the Gag, nor the Appeal, which are the books charged, and which were printed divers years before he was made a bishop: and my receipt indorsed upon it, is Mar. 29, 1638. And I hope Mr. Nicolas will not call this the colour of an answer, as he hath called many of the rest given by me.

7. The seventh Instance was in a Book licensed by Dr. Martin, then my chaplain in London-House. This Book, Mr. Prynne says, was purposely set out to countenance Arminianism, as if it had been some work of moment, whereas it was answered twice in the queen's time. If Dr. Martin did this, it is more than I remember; nor can I so long after give any account of it. But Dr. Martin is living, and in town, and I humbly desired he might be called to answer. He was called the next day, and gave this account. [The account is wanting; a space left for it, but not filled up.]

Mr. Prynne says farther, that after this he preached Arminianism at St. Paul's Cross. Why did not Mr. Prynne come then to me, and acquaint me with it? which neither he nor any man else did. And I was in attendance at court, whither I could not bear him. And the Charge which came against him upon the next day's hearing, was this and no more, That one then preached at the Cross universal redemption; but he that gave testimony knew him not: only he says, one told him it was Dr. Martin.

8. The last Instance was of a Bible commonly sold, with a Popish Table at the end of it. This is more than I know, or ever heard till now; nor was any complaint ever brought to me of it. And I cannot know all things that are done abroad for gain; for that will teach them to conceal, as well as move them to act. Yet one of the popish heads mentioned in that table, was Confirmation, which is commanded in our Church-Liturgy, and ratified by law.

Here this day ended, and I was ordered to appear again July 4. That day I received a Note, under Mr. Nicolas's hand, that they meant to proceed upon the 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, and 14th Original Articles, and the 6th and 7th Additionals. The last warrant for other Articles came under serjeant Wilde's hand, and Mr. Nicolas signing this, it seems, mistook: for the 8th and 9th Original Articles are in part proceeded on before. Now they go forward with these, and then on to the rest ; which I will write down severally, as they come to them.

The same day, being Thursday, all my Books at Lambeth were, by Order of the House of Commons, taken away by Mr. — secretary to the right honourable the earl of Warwick, and carried I know not whither, but are (as it is commonly said) for the use of Mr. Peters. Before this time, some good number of my Books were delivered to the use of the synod ; the ministers which had them giving no Catalogue under their hands, which or how many they had. And all this was done contrary to an Order of the Lords, bearing date Novemb. 9, 1642, for the safe keeping of my Books there ; and before I was convicted of any crime. This day also I received an Order, which put off my Hearing till the next day.

The Seventeenth Day of my Hearing.

I. Friday, July 5, 1644. This day I appeared again : and the first Charge against me was, that I had preferred none to Bishoprics, Deaneries, Prebends, and Benefices, but men Popishly affected, or otherwise unworthy. And some they named :

1. As first, Dr. Manwaring, disabled by the parliament.

2. Mr. Mountague, excepted against by parliament. But for these no proof was now brought ; They referred themselves to what was said before, and so do I. And where they go to prove only by Dockets, I desire it may still be remembered that the Docket is a full proof who gave order for drawing the bill at the Signet-Office, but no proof at all who procured the preferment.

3. Bishop Corbett. But the earl of Dorset got my lord duke of Buckingham to prefer him, to make way for Dr. Duppa, his deserving chaplain, into Christ-Church. Nor was any thing charged against Dr. Corbett, but that he was preferred by me.

4. Bishop Pierce : against whom there was no proof offered neither. And he is living to answer it, if any be.

5. Nor was there now any proof offered against bishop Wren, who was named also : at the least, not till he was made a bishop. So if I did prefer him, it seems I did it when nothing was laid against him. And if after he had his preferment he did any thing unworthy, that could not I foresee ; and he is living to answer it.

6. The sixth was bishop Lindsey, a man known to be of great and universal learning, but preferred by the then lord treasurer Portland, not by me. Him they charged with Arminianism. The witnesses two : The first, Mr. Smart ; he is positive he was his fellow-prebendary at Durham. There was animosity between them. ' And Smart, not able to judge ' of Arminianism.' Secondly, Mr. Walker, who could say nothing, but that he heard so much from some ministers, and Dr. Bastwick. ' So here is as learned a man as Christendom

' had any of his time, debased in this great and ' honourable Court, by ignorance, and a hear- ' say ; and that, when the man is gone to that ' which should be his quiet, the grave.'

7. The seventh was archbishop Neile, a man well known to be as true to, and as stout for, the church of England established by law, as any man that came to preferment in it. Nor could his great enemy Mr. Smart say any thing now against him, but a hearsay from one Dr. Moor of Winchester. And I cannot but profess, it grieves me much, to hear so many honest and worthy men so used, when the grave hath shut up their mouths from answering for themselves.

8. The next was Dr. Cosens, to be Dean of Peterborough. I named four of his majesty's chaplains to him, as he had commanded me : and the king pitched upon Dr. Cosens, in regard all the means he then had, lay in and about Duresm, and was then in the Scots hands : so that he had nothing but 40*l.* a year by his Headship in Peter-House, to maintain himself, his wife and children.

9. The ninth was Dr. Potter, a known Arminian, to the Deanery of Worcester. What proof of this? Nothing but the Docket. And what of the crime? Nothing but Dr. Featly's Testimony ; who says no more but this, That Dr. Potter was at first against Arminianism (that is absolute) : But afterwards he defended it, as he hath heard (there is a hearsay).

10. The tenth was Dr. Baker.

11. The eleventh Dr. Weeks. Both very honest and able men ; but preferred by their own lord, the lord bishop of London.

12. The twelfth was Dr. Bray. He had been my chaplain above 10 years in my house ; I found him a very able and an honest man, and had reason to prefer him to be able to live well ; and I did so. Here is nothing objected against him, but his expungings and not expungings of some books ; which, if he were living, I well hope he would be able to give a good account for.

13. The thirteenth Dr. Heylin. He is known to be a learned and an able man ; but for his preferment, both to be his majesty's Chaplain, and for that which he got in that service, he owes it under God to the memory of the earl of Danby, who took care of him in the University.

14. After these, they named some, whom they said I preferred to be the King's Chaplains. The witness here Mr. Oldworth, the Lord-Chamberlain's Secretary. He says, the power and practice of naming Chaplains was in the Lord Chamberlain for these 25 years. And I say, it is so still, for aught I know. He says, that in all things concerning which the Lord Chamberlain's Warrant went in this form, " These are to will and require you, &c." that there his lordship did it without consulting the king ; and that the Warrants for Chaplains run all in this form. First, This is more than I know, or ever heard of till now. Secondly, Be it it so ; yet it is hard to deny the king to hear men preach, before they be sworn his Chaplains, 'if his majesty desire it, since it argues a great care in the king, especially in 'such a luctuous time as to overlay this church.' Thirdly, He confesses, that he knows not who put the king upon this way, but believes that I did it. He is single, and his belief only is no evidence. 'And whosoever gave the king 'that advice, deserved very well both of his majesty and the church of England: That 'none might be put about him in that service, 'but such as himself should approve of. But 'that which troubled this witness, was another 'thing. He had not money for every one 'that was made Chaplain; nor money to 'get them a month to wait in; nor money to 'change their month, if it were inconvenient 'for their other occasions; nor money for 'sparing their attendance when they pleased. 'In which, and other things, I would he had 'been as careful of his lord's honour, as I have 'been in all things. For it is well known in 'court I observed his lordship as much as 'any man.'

The men which are instanced in, are Dr. Heylin. But he was preferred to that service by my lord the earl of Danly. Then Dr. Potter. But the Lord-Keeper Coventry was his means. Dr. Cosens was preferred by bishop Neile, whose Chaplain he had been many years, and he moved the Lord Chamberlain for it. Dr. Lawrence was my Lord Chamberlain's own Chaplain, and preferred by himself; and in all likelihood by Mr. Oldsworth's means: for he was Fellow of Magdalen-College in Oxford, as Mr. Oldsworth himself was, and he once, to my knowledge, had a great opinion of him. Dr. Haywood indeed was my Chaplain; but I preferred him not to his majesty, till he had preached divers times in Court with great approbation; nor then, but with my Lord Chamberlain's love and liking. As for Dr. Pocklington, I know not who recommended him; nor is there any proof offered that I did it.

15. Then they proceeded to my own Chaplains. They name four of them: First, Dr. Weeks. But he was never in my house, never meddled with the licensing of any Books, till he was gone from me to the bishop of London: So he is charged with no fault, so long as he was mine. The second, Dr. Haywood. But he is charged with nothing but Sales, which was a most desperate Plot against him, as is before shewed. The third was Dr. Martin. Against him came Mr. Prynne, for his Arminian Sermon at St. Paul's Cross. But that is answered before. And Mr. Walker, who said, He proposed Arminian Questions to divers Ministers. Belike, such as were to be examined by him. But he adds, "As these ministers told him." So it is but a hearsay. And say he did propose such Questions, may it not be fit enough to try how able they were to answer them? The fourth was Dr. Bray. Against him Dr. Featly was again produced, for that which he had expunged out of his Sermons. But when I saw this so often inculcated to make a noise, I humbly desired of the Lords, that I might ask Dr. Featly one question. Upon leave granted, I asked him, Whether nothing were of late expunged out of a Book of his written against a priest? and desired him to speak upon the oath he had taken. He answered roundly, That divers passages against the Anabaptists, and some in defence of the Liturgy of the Church of England, were expunged. I asked, By whom? He said, By Mr. Rouse and the Committee, or, By Mr. Rouse or the Committee. Be it which it will, I observed to the lords, that Mr. Rouse and the Committee might expunge passages against the Anabaptists, nay, for the Liturgy established by law; but my Chaplains may not expunge any thing against the Papists, though perhaps mistaken.—From thence they fell upon men whom they said I had preferred to Benefices. They named but two. Dr. Heylin was one again, whom I preferred not. The other was Dr. Jackson, the late President of Corpus Christi-College in Oxford. Dr. Featly, being produced, said, Dr. Jackson was a known Arminian. If so to him, it is well; the man is dead, and cannot answer for himself. Thus far I can for him, without meddling with any of his opinions: He was very honest and very learned, and at those years he was of, might deserve more than a poor benefice.

16. Here Mr. Prynne came in again, and testified very boldly; That I gave many Benefices, which were in the gift of the Master of the Wards: and all preferments only to such men as were for Ceremonies, Poperie, and Arminianism. For the first of these two, the business was thus: There arose a difference between the then Lord Keeper Coventry and the lord Cottington, then Master of the Wards, about the disposing of those benefices. It grew somewhat high, and came to hearing by the king himself: His majesty, upon hearing, gave the right of sealing to the Lord Keeper; but for the time, till more might appear, reserved the giving to himself, that he might have some of those lesser preferments to bestow on such ministers as attended upon his navy then at sea. I never gave any one of these Benefices in my life. And that this story is of truth, the lord Cottington is yet living, and can witness it. 'And this very answer I gave to Mr. Browne, 'who in summing up the charge laid this also 'upon me, and without mentioning what answer I gave to it.' For the second, That I preferred none but such men; it is known I preferred bishop Hall to Exeter, Dr. Potter to Carlisle, Dr. Cook to Bristol first, and then to Hereford; that I gave Dr. Westfield the arch-deaconry of St. Albans; that I was Dr. Fell's means for Christ-Church, and Dr. Higgs's for the deanery of Litchfield; that I settled Dr. Downing at Hackney, and Mr. Herrick at Manchester, when the broad-seal formerly given him was questioned: That I gave two of my own Benefices to Mr. Palmer and Mr. Taylor, two of the now synod; an hospital to Dr.

Jackson of Canterbury, and a Benefice to his son-in-law, at his suit. I could not name all these upon the sudden, yet some I did; and no one of them guilty of this charge in the least.

Mr. Browne in his summary said, I could name but one or two. And when in my answer made in the house of commons I specified more, among which Mr. Palmer was one; Mr. Browne said in his reply, That Mr. Palmer had indeed his benefice of my giving, so himself told him, but it was at the intreaty of a great nobleman. Say it were; Mr. Palmer was then a stranger to me: somebody must speak, and assure me of his wants and worth, or I cannot give. But if upon this I gave it freely, is it worth no thanks from him, because a nobleman spake to me? Let Mr. Palmer rank this gratitude among his other virtues.

17. From hence they stepped over into Ireland, and objected my preferring of Dr. Chappel to be Master of the College at Dublin. Here the first Witness is Mr. Walker. He says, That all his scholars were Arminians. This is a great sign, but not full proof. He says, That Dr. Chappel was at first fierce against them, but afterwards changed his mind. Dr. Featly said the like of Dr. Potter. Some say Arminius himself was at first zealous against those opinions, but studying hard to confute them, changed his own mind. 'Take heed, Mr. Walker, do not study these points too hard.' For my own part, Dr. Chappel was a Cambridge man, altogether unknown to me, save that I received from thence great testimony of his abilities and fitness for government, which that Colledge then extremely wanted; and no man ever complained to me, that he favoured Arminianism.

The other Witness was Dr. Hoyle, a fellow of the college in Dublin. He says, That the doctor did maintain, in that college, Justification by Works, and in Christ-Church, Arminianism. In this he is single: But if it be true, why did not the Lord Primate of Armagh punish him? for he says, he knew it. That he opposed some things in the Synod: And it may be there was just cause for it. Lastly, he says, The late Lord Deputy liked not the Irish Articles, but gave them an honourable burial, as (he says) the Lord Primate himself confessed. I am a stranger to all this; nor doth Dr. Hoyle charge any thing against me; but says, That they which did this, were supposed to have some friend in England. And surely their carriage was very ill, if they had none.

18. Then were Letters read of my Lord Primate's to me, in which is testified my care of the patrimony of that church. And then a Paper of Instructions given by me to the Lord Deputy at his first going into that kingdom. For the first, though it be thrust in here among Matters of Religion, yet I pray your lordships to consider, it is about the patrimony of that church only; and I thank them heartily for producing it. For in this Letter is a full confession of my Lord Primate's, That the motion of getting the Impropriations from his majesty, (formerly objected against me) proceeded from him, as I then pleaded. And the Letter was read. For the second, my Lord Deputy, a little before his first going into Ireland, asked me what service I would command him for the church there? I humbly thanked him, as I had reason, and told him I would bethink myself, and give him my thoughts in writing: These are they which are called Instructions. They are only for the good of that poor church, as your lordships have heard them. This was all; and herein my lord shewed his honour, and I did but my duty. 'Though I very well understand why this paper is produced against me.'

After this they proceeded to the Eleventh Original Article, which follows in hæc verba:

XI. "He in his own person, and his suffragans, visitors, surrogates, chancellors, or other officers, by his command, have caused divers learned, pious, and orthodox Preachers of God's Word to be silenced, suspended, deprived, degraded, excommunicated, or otherwise grieved and vexed, without any just and lawful cause; whereby, and by divers other means, he hath hindered the preaching of God's Word, caused divers of his majesty's loyal subjects to forsake the kingdom, and increased and cherished ignorance and profaneness amongst the people; that so he might the better facilitate the way to the effecting of his own wicked and traitorous design of altering and corrupting the true-religion here established."

1. The first Instance to make good this Article, was a repetition of some Lecturers before-named. But when they thought they had made noise enough, they referred the Lords to their Notes; and so did I to my former Answers.

2. The second Instance was out of some Articles of bishop Mountague and bishop Wren, and their account given to me. Bishop Wren, Art. 16. speaks of the Afternoon-Sermons being turned into catechising: And Art. 5, (of his Account, I take it) that no Lecture in his diocese after, &c. It was made plain to the Lords, that this was spoken of some single and factious Lecturers; and that they had their Lectures read by a company of learned and orthodox ministers by turns; as appeared by the Monday Sermon at Bury, during that learned bishop's time. Nor were any forbid to preach in the afternoon, so the Catechising were not omitted, before it, or with it: And the bishop is living to answer it, if aught were then done amiss by him. In all which he did nothing as any deputy or surrogate of mine, but as diocesan of the place. As for the yearly Account to the king, according to his royal Instructions in that behalf, though it were pressed here again to multiply noise, yet nothing being new, I gave my answer as before, and to that I refer myself.

3. The third Instance was concerning Mr. Lee of Wolverhampton. The evidence was a Letter of my Secretary Mr. Dell, written by my command to my Visitors there, to this effect: That whether there were cause or no, they should either punish Mr. Lee, or bring him into the High-Commission. Had the words or the sense been thus, they might well say, It was hard for the Judge before whom the party was to answer, to write thus. But I called to have the Letter read again, and the words were these: If there were found against him that which might justly be censured, then they should punish, &c. And the reason why this strict care was taken, was, because the dean of Windsor his ordinary complained unto me, That Mr. Lee's carriage was so factious there, that he could contain him in no order. If he were a man after this approved at Shrewsbury (as Mr. Walker witnesses), I hope the proceedings at Wolverhampton did him good. But, my lords, had it so fallen out, that my Secretary had forgotten my instructions, and himself too, and expressed himself amiss, shall that slip of his (had it been such) be imputed to me? I believe your lordships would not willingly answer for every phrase of your Secretaries Letters, which yet you command them to write.

4. The last Instance was the Sentence in the High Commission against Mr. Barnard, for Words about Pelagian Errors and Popery. First, If he were sentenced in the High Commission, it was the act of the Court, and not mine, as has been often said. Secondly, No proof is offered that he was sentenced for those Words only. Thirdly, The Recantation (howsoever refused by him, as Mr. Pryn says it was) makes mention of four points for which he was censured, of which these Words are one: but not the Words themselves, but his unjust and scandalous application of them to me, which deserves them not. And lastly, Dr. Camber, Master of Trinity College in Cambridge, was Prosecutor against him; which office so grave and worthy a man would not, I suppose, have undertaken, had there not been great and just cause for it.

Hence they proceeded to the Sixth Additional Article, which follows in these words:

VI. "That whereas divers Gifts and Dispositions of divers Sums of Money were heretofore made by divers charitable and well-disposed persons, for the buying in of divers Improvements for the maintenance of preaching the Word of God in several Churches; the said Archbishop about eight years last past, wilfully and maliciously caused the said Gifts, Feoffments and Conveyances, made to the uses aforesaid, to be overthrown in his majesty's Court of Exchequer, contrary to law, as things dangerous to the Church and State, under the specious pretence of buying in Improvements; whereby that pious work was suppressed and trodden down, to the great dishonour of God, and scandal of religion."

This Article is only about the Feoffments. That which I did, was this: I was, as then advised, upon such information as was given me, clearly of opinion, that this was a cunning way, under a glorious pretence, to overthrow the church-government, by getting into their power more dependency of the Clergy, than the king, and all the peers, and all the bishops in all the kingdom had. And I did conceive the plot the more dangerous for the fairness of the pretence, and that to the state as well as the church. Hereupon, not maliciously, as it is charged in the Article, but conscientiously I resolved to suppress it, if by law it might be done. Upon this, I acquainted his majesty with the thing, and the danger which I conceived would, in few years, spring out of it. The king referred me to his Attorney and the Law. Mr. Attorney Noy, after some pause upon it, proceeded in the Exchequer, and there it was by judicial Proceeding and Sentence overthrown. If this Sentence were according to law and justice, then there is no fault at all committed: if it were against law, the fault, whatever it be, was the Judges, not mine; for I solicited none of them. And here I humbly desired, that the lords would at their leisure read over the Sentence* given in the Exchequer, which I then delivered in; but by reason of the length, it was not then read: whether after it were, I cannot tell. I desired likewise that my council might be heard in this, and all other points in law.

1. The first witness was Mr. Kendall. He says, That speaking with me about Presteen, I thanked God that I had overthrown this Feoffment.

2. The second witness, Mr. Millar, says, he heard me say, They would have undone the Church, but I have overthrown their Feoffment. These two witnesses prove no more than I confess: for in the manner aforesaid, I deny not but I did my best in a legal way to overthrow it. And if I did thank God for it, it was my duty to do so, the thing being in my judgment so pernicious as it was.

3. The third witness was Mr. White, one of the Feoffees. He says, That coming as Counsel in a cause before me, when that business was done, I fell bitterly on him as an underminer of the Church. I remember well his coming to me as counsel about a benefice; and it is very likely I spake my conscience to him, as freely as he did his to me, but the particulars I remember not; nor do I remember his coming afterwards to me to Fulham, nor his offer to change the men or the course, so the thing might stand. For to this I should have been as willing as he was: and if I remember right, there was order taken for this in the Decree of the Exchequer; and his majesty's pleasure declared, That no penny so given should be turned to other use. And I have been, and shall ever be as ready to get in Improvements, by any good and legal way, as any man (as may appear by my labours about the Improvements in Ireland). But this way did not stand either with my judgment or conscience.

1. First, Because little or nothing was given by them to the present Incumbent, to whom any thing be more fairly carried? And this Letter was read to the Lords. Yes, but they say, I disliked the giving of this title Antichrist to the pope. No, I did not simply dislike it; but I advised bishop Hall, if he thought it good, not to affirm it so positively. And the reason I gave was this: that king James being pressed upon a great occasion that he had maintained that the Pope was Antichrist, which might much trouble, if not quite cross some proceedings much desired by that prudent king; his majesty made answer, "I maintain it not as a point of faith, but as a probable opinion: and for which I have more grounds than the Pope hath for his challenge of temporal power over princes. Let him recall this opinion, and I will recall that." This I writ to the bishop, but left him free to do what he pleased.

Here Mr. Nicolas fell extremely foul upon me, insomuch that I could not but wonder at their patience which heard him. Among other titles bestowed upon me, many and gross, he called me, over and over again, Pandar to the Whore of Babylon. I was much moved; and humbly desired the Lords, that if my crimes were such as that I might not be used like an Archbishop, yet I might be used like a Christian; and that were it not for the duty which I owe to God and my own innocency, I would desert my defence before I would endure such language in such an honourable presence. Hereupon some Lords shewed their dislike, and wished him to leave, and pursue the evidence.

'Mr. Browne in summing up the Charge made this a great matter, the denial of the Pope to be Antichrist. But I did not deny it, nor declare any opinion of my own: and many Protestants, and those very learned, are of opinion that he is not. It is true, I did not, I cannot approve foul language in controversies. Nor do I think that the calling of the Pope Antichrist, did ever yet convert an understanding Papist. And sure I am, Gabriel Powel's peremptoriness (to say no worse) in this point, did the Church of England no good, no honour in foreign parts: for there he affirms,* "That he is as certain that the Pope is Antichrist, as that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and Redeemer of the World." As for the thing itself, I left it free to all men to think as their judgment guided them; as appears by the licensing of Dr. Featly's Sermons, where he proves the Pope, in his opinion, to be Antichrist; where he calls him also the Whore of Babylon. Which surely I should never have suffered to be printed, had I been her Pandar. And for bishop Hall, I only told him what king James had said, and left him to make what use he pleased of it.'

* "Tam certo scio Papam esse magnum illum Antichristum, quam Deum ipsum esse in Cœlis Creatorem, et Jesum Christum verum Messiam." Gab. Pow. de Antichristo. Epist. ad Lectorem.

III. The third Charge was out of a Paper, which bishop Hall, about the time when he wrote his Book in defence of Episcopacy, sent unto me, containing divers Propositions concerning Episcopal Government. In which either he or I, or both, say, (for that circumstance I remember not) "That Church-Government by Bishops is not alterable by human law." To this I answered, That Bishops might be regulated and limited by human laws, in those things which are but incidents to their calling: but their calling, as far as it is Jure Divino, by divine right, cannot be taken away. They charge farther, that I say this is the doctrine of the Church of England. And so I think it is: for bishop Bilson set out a Book in the queen's time, intitled, The Perpetual Government. And if the government by bishops be perpetual, as he there very learnedly proves through the whole Book, it will be hard for any Christian nation to out it. Nor is this his judgment alone, but of the whole Church of England. For in the Preface to the Book of Ordination are these words: "From the Apostles time there have been three Orders of Ministers in the Church of Christ, Bishops, Priests, and Deacons." Where it is evident, that in the judgment of the Church of England, Episcopacy is a different, not Degree only, but Order from Priesthood, and so hath been reputed from the Apostles times. And this was then read to the Lords. And the Law of England is as full for it, as the Church: for the statute of 8 Eliz. cap. 1, absolutely confirms all and every part of this Book of Ordination: where also the law calls it, "The high estate of prelacy." And Calvin, (if my old memory do not fail me) upon those words of St John, ver. 20, 21. "As my father sent me, so send I you, &c." says thus upon that place, "Eandem illis imponit personam ac idem juris assignat." And if our Saviour Christ put the same person upon the Apostles, and assigned to them the same right which his Father gave him, it will prove a sour work to throw their successors the Bishops out of the Church, after 1600 years continuance; and in the mean time cry 'out against innovation.' For either Christ gave this power to his Apostles only, and that will make the gospel a thing temporary, and confined to the Apostles times; or else he gave the same power, though not with such eminent gifts, to their successors also, to propagate the same gospel to the end of the world, as St. Paul tells us he did, Ephes. iv. 11. Now all the Primitive Church all along gives Bishops to be the Apostles Successors; and then it would be well thought on, what right any Christian State hath (be their absolute power what it will) to turn Bishops out of that Right in the Church which Christ hath given them.

IV. The fourth Charge was an Alteration made in a Brief for a third Collection for the distressed Ministers and others in the Palatinate. The queen of Bohemia was pleased to do me the honour to write to me about this: and because two Collections had been before, her majesty desired that this third might be only in London, and some few shires about it. I, out of my desire to relieve those distressed Protestants, and to express my duty to the queen, became an humble suitor to his majesty that this Collection also might go through England, as the rest had done. And it is acknowledged by all, that this I did. Now the witnesses which accuse me for some circumstances in this business, are two.

1. The first is Mr. Wakerly. He says, That Mr. Ruly (who was employed by the queen of Bohemia about this collection) was roughly used by me upon occasion of this Clause put into the Brief, and which, he says, I caused to be altered. This, first, is a bold Oath; for Mr. Wakerly was not present, but swears upon hearsay. Secondly, what kindness I shewed him and the business, is mentioned before; and if for this kindness he had been practising with Mr. Wakerly about the Brief, (as I had probable reason to suspect) I cannot much be blamed, if I altered my countenance towards him, and my speech too; which yet these witnesses (for the other agrees in this) have no reason to call rough carriage, only upon Mr. Ruly's unthankful report.

He says, that these words, "the Antichristian yoke," were left out. First, this is more than I remember; and the Briefs I had not to compare: nor is there any necessity that two Briefs, coming for the same thing, with some years distance between, should agree in every phrase or circumstance. Secondly, If I did except against this passage, it was partly because of the fore-recited judgment of king James, of which I thought his son king Charles ought to be tender; and partly because it could move nothing but scorn in the common adversary, that we should offer to determine such a controversy by a broad-seal. I remember well, since I had the honour to sit in this house, the naming of Tythes to be due Jure Divino cast out the Bill; a prudent Lord asking the Peers, whether they meant to determine that Question by an Act of Parliament. The other part of the Clause, which they say was altered, was, "The religion which we with them profess." Whence they infer, because "with them" was left out, that I would not acknowledge them of the same religion; which follows not: for we may be and are of the same religion; and yet "agree" not with them in those opinions, in which we differ from them. And Mr. Wakerly confesses that the words as altered are, "That they are persecuted for their religion," and their religion is the Protestant Religion, and so is ours. And therefore I could have no intention to make the religions different, but the opinions under the same religion.

' For Mr. Wakerly, he is a Dutchman born; and how far the testimony of an Alien may be of force by the law, I know not: And a bitter enemy to me he hath ever shewed himself, since I complained to the king and the lords that a stranger born and bred should be so near a Secretary of State, and all his papers ' and cyphers, as he was known to be to Mr. Secretary Coke. A thing which few states would endure. And how far the testimony of such a cankered enemy should be admitted, let the world judge. Admitted he was.'

2. The second witness was Mr. Hartlip. He acknowledges my improvement of the Collection, and my great readiness therein; which doubtless I should not have shewed, had I accounted them of another religion. He says, There was no Alteration but in that Clause; and that implies a manifest difference. But that is but in his judgment; in which I have already shewn that Wakerly is mistaken, and so is he. Beside, he comes here as a witness of the fact, not as a judge of my intentions or thoughts. He adds, that, if he remember well, the alteration was drawn by me. But if he do not remember well, what then? Surely here is no evidence to be grounded upon ifs. Here, upon the point of Antichrist, Mr. Nicolas stiled me as before, and was furious till he fumed again. But I saw a necessity of patience. Mr. Browne also in his summary Charge followed this business close: But I gave it the same Answer.'

5. The fifth Charge, and the last under this Article, was the calling in of a Book, anno 1637, shewing the doctrine and discipline of the Church in the Palatinate; but called in only because against Arminianism. The single witness Michael Sparks. He says this Book was called in; but he knows not by whom, nor mentions he for what. But he says the pursuivants which searched for it were mine. He means such as belonged to the High-Commission; for other than such I had none. And there was cause enough for calling in the Book, without thinking of Arminianism.

' But what is the reason why here is nothing urged against me about abrogating the immunities and privileges of the French and Dutch churches, which fill the body of this Article? Why, I conceive there may be two reasons of it. One, because there was taken by Mr. Prynne, among other Papers for my defence, a Letter under queen Elizabeth's own hand to the lord Pawlet, marquis of Winchester, then Lord Treasurer; in which she expresses her willingness that those strangers, distressed in and for point of conscience, should have succour and free entertainment; but should conform themselves to the English Liturgy, and have that translated into their own language. And they knew I would call to have this Letter produced, proved, and read. And had this Letter been stood unto, they had never been able to do the church of England half the harm they have since. The other was, because they found by their own search against me, that all which I did concerning those churches was with this moderation; that all those of their several congregations in London, Canterbury, Sandwich, Norwich, or elsewhere, which were of the second descent, and born in England, should repair to their several parish-churches, and conform themelves to the doctrine, discipline, and liturgy of the Church of England; and not live continually in an open separation, as if they were an Israel in Egypt, to the great distraction of the natives of this kingdom, and the assisting of that schism which is now broke forth. And as this was with great moderation, so was it with the joint approbation of his majesty and the lords of his council, upon the reasons openly given and debated. And all this before I proceeded to do any thing; as appears apud Actu.

Then they went to the Thirteenth Original Article; which here follows.

XIII. "He hath traitorously and wickedly endeavoured to reconcile the Church of England with the Church of Rome: And for the effecting thereof, hath consorted and confederated with divers Popish Priests and Jesuits; and hath kept secret intelligence with the Pope of Rome: And by himself, his agents and instruments, treated with such as have from thence received authority and instruction. He hath permitted and countenanced a Popish Hierarchy or Ecclesiastical Government to be established in this kingdom. By all which traitorous and malicious practices this Church and Kingdom have been exceedingly indangered, and like to fall under the tyranny of the Roman see."

The Seventh Additional Article.

"That the said Archbishop at several times within these ten years last past, at Westminster, and elsewhere within this realm, contrary to the known laws of this land, hath endeavoured to advance Popery and Superstition within the realm: And for that end and purpose hath wittingly and willingly received, harboured, and relieved divers Popish Priests and Jesuits; namely, one called Sancta Clara, alias Dampport, a dangerous person and Franciscan Friar: who having written a popish and seditious book, entitled, "Deus, Natura, Gratia," wherein the Thirty-nine Articles of the church of England, established by act of parliament, were much traduced and scandalized; the said Archbishop had divers conferences with him while he was writing the said book: and did also provide maintenance and entertainment for one monsieur St. Giles, a Popish Priest, at Oxford, knowing him to be a Popish Priest."

I. The first Charge (they say) was to be laid as a foundation; and it was, That I was generally reputed a Papist in heart, both in Oxford, and since I came thence.

1. The first witness for this was Dr. Featly. He says, There was such an opinion of me thirty years since there. But he says, he never heard any popish opinion maintained by me. So here is nothing of knowledge. And if I should say, that above thirty years ago there was an opinion that Dr. Featly, then in Oxford, was a Puritan, this could make no proof against him. Nor can his saying that I was reputed a Papist, make any proof against me.

VOL. IV.

He says farther, That one Mr. Russel, who had been bred in St. John's College, told him in Paris, that I maintained some catholic opinions. First, Mr. Nicolas would have it that this Mr. Russel was my scholar: But the whole college can witness it is not so; nor had he ever any relation to me in the least degree. After his father's death he left the college, and went beyond sea; where the weak man (for such he was) lost his religion. Secondly, Dr. Featly says expressly, that Mr. Russel said I was no Papist; which, for the countenance of his own charge, he would never have said, had he thought me one. Thirdly, If he did say that I maintained some catholic opinions; yet he named none, by which there might be trial and judgment whether they were such or no, in the sense he meant them. Lastly, Mr. Perkins, in his Reformed Catholic, sets down divers opinions in which they of Rome and we agree: Shall he be a Papist for this? Or shall not that which is lawful for him, be as lawful for me?

2. The second witness was one Harris. He says, That Mr. Ireland (who was some time student of Christ-Church in Oxford, and after schoolmaster at Westminster) told him that I would leave the church of England. This is a bare report from Mr. Ireland, with whom I never had any acquaintance, nor was scarce in his company twice in all my life. Nor is it in my power to hinder what Mr. Ireland will say, or Mr. Harris from him. He says, That one that called himself Leander, came over on purpose to make this reconciliation. If he did, (which is more than I know or believe) I think he would hardly make such a one, as Harris is reported to be, acquainted with it. But howsoever, if he did come with that purpose, was it in my power to hinder his coming? And here is no proof offered that I did help on his purpose, or so much as know of it. He says he often petitioned me for relief, but had none. It may be; I well knew he deserved none: And your lordships know, that by law I might not afford him any. Had I given him any, I should now have heard it with both ears. For I am informed he is a priest, and condemned in a Præmunire, and was let out of prison on purpose to be a witness against me. And having set that which is aforesaid, under his hand, is now slipped away, and gone. Who got him out of prison for this good purpose, I know not; but sure somewhat there is in it, for your lordships see his testimony is now read, but he appears not.

3. The third Witness was sir Nathaniel Brent (now absent, but came in the next day). He says, I was esteemed popishly-affected in Oxford; and he gave three instances very carefully to prove it. The first was, That in the Divinity-School there, I maintained the necessity of Baptism. I did so; and my predecessor Archbishop Abbot was then Vice-Chancellor and present, and approved my opinion, and my Grace passed for my degree to be Batchelor of Divinity, without any one man's opposition. He says, that Mr. Dale of Merton college then shewed him all my Supposition taken out of Bellarmine. This is a bold and dangerous Oath: He might swear that Mr. Dale shewed him in Bellarmine, that which he said was my Supposition; but that he shewed him all my Supposition there, is a strange oath for a man of learning and law to make, in such a presence. Besides, I have my Supposition, which I then made, yet by me; and if my tenet of that question be the same with Bellarmine's, or that there be any line taken out of him, but what I cite for my own advantage against him, I will utterly forfeit my reputation of any learning to your lordships. His second instance was, that I was acquainted with one Mr. Brown, Fellow of Corpus-Christi-college in Oxford, who was suspected to be a Papist, and after his death proved to be one, by a Book that was found in his study, proving that a man might be a Roman Catholic, and yet go to church, and conform in England. I was acquainted with this man; he was a very good scholar, and an honest man, and a good protestant, for aught I know. For the tract found after his death among his papers, that is no proof: for scholars get all the papers they can, especially such as belong to their own profession. And the more strange the opinions are, the more do they labour to get them. Nor is it any proof that the Tract was of his making, because written in his own hand, as it is urged. For the argument being so foul and dangerous, it could not be safe for him, nor any way fit, to commit it to any other to write for him. Nor is there any proof that I knew he had such a tract by him; neither indeed did I. The opinion is very base and unworthy, and was first broached by the Jesuit Azorius, [Instit. Moral. p. 1. l. 8. c. 27.] and it seems some of the fellows had enlarged him, and made this Tract out of his principles. His third instance was, That I petitioned king James in this business. I was complained of to king James by a great person, that I had inward acquaintance with this man. Hereupon, my waiting month being June, and not long after the complaint made, I took occasion in my first Sermon to confute this opinion, and then petitioned his majesty that it might be examined, that such an imputation might not lie upon me. His majesty referred it to the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, Bishops of London, Winchester, and Duresme; where, after full Examination, I was acquitted.

II. The second Charge was, that the same Opinion was held of me beyond the seas, that I was a cunning promoter of the Roman cause. And here the witnesses are the same which which were produced before; Mr. Challoner, who told over his old tale again of I know not what Plot he heard from a Jesuit: nothing but hearsay at the best. And it savours like an Almanack de post facto, 'or rather of some-what else, which I will spare to name, because he is upon his oath.' The other witness is Mr. Anthony Mildmay, who also tells over his old tale of his father Fitton. But he was out of the way again, and appeared not till the next day, with sir Nathaniel Brent. So here is a repetition again of the same witnesses, and same things to multiply the noise. 'Only noble sir Henry Mildmay appeared not the second time; but whether it were because he had enough at his first appearance, or whether his face was scratched then (as since men say 'it was), I cannot tell.'

III. The Third Charge was, That I had a damnable Plot, to reconcile the church of England with the Church of Rome. If to reconcile them with the maintenance of Idolatry, it were a damnable Plot indeed. But if Christian truth and peace might meet and unite together, all Christendom over, were that a sin too? Were I able to plot and effect such a reconciliation, I would think myself most happy, whatever I suffered for it. But how is this damnable Plot proved? Pope Gregory writ a Letter to his Nuncio in Spain, and a Letter also to king Charles; which Letter is printed: Copies of these Letters were found in my study. Could I hinder the Pope from writing to whom he pleased? Shall not I get copies of any Letter I can, to see what practising is abroad for private interest? Shall it be lawful for all my predecessors to get and keep copies of such Letters by them, and shall it be unlawful for me only? And here I produced Mr. Dobson, an ancient servant to my predecessors, who witnessed that Archbishop Bancroft had store of them, and kept them all his time. Nor do I know, how this Charge can fall upon me: for there is no one word in any of the Letters produced, that reflects upon me, or any Plot of mine. Nor indeed had I ever any such to reflect upon.

IV. The fourth Charge is, That I had a hand in the Plot for sending the king, when he was prince, into Spain, to be perverted in his religion. They follow their proof of this out of my Diary; And they begin with my friendship with the lord duke of Buckingham, who waited on the prince in this journey. And first they urged my Diary at June 9, 1622, where I mention, that there were then particulars, which are not for paper. But the words, which lead these in, were his entrance upon a near respect to me, the particular expressions whereof were not for Paper; Nor word, nor thought, of either Plot or Popery. Then they urged June 15, 1622, where it is said, that I became C. that is, Confessor to the lord duke. First, If my lord duke would honour me so much as to make me his confessor, as I know no sin in it, so it is abundantly proof, that the passages before-mentioned were not for paper. Should I venture them so, there is never a person of honour present, but would think me most unworthy of that trust. Next, they pressed June 13, 1623, where I confess, that I received Letters from my Lord Duke out of Spain. I did so; and I then held it great honour to me, and do so still. But then, and long before, it was known to all men whither he was gone, and with whom; nay, it was commonly known to all men of quality hereabout within three or four days; And till it was so commonly known, I knew it not. Yea, but then they enforced out of Feb. 17, 1622-3, That the prince and the marquis of Buckingham set forward very secretly for Spain. And Feb. 21, That I writ to his lordship into Spain. It is true, they went away that day, and very secretly; but I neither did, nor could set it down, till afterwards that I came to know it. And then so soon as I came to know it, which was about the 21st, I did write. To these was cunningly (how honestly let all the world judge) pieced a passage out of a Letter of mine to bishop Hall. But that Letter was read, at my humble motion to the lords, and the date of it was in 1634, so many years after this business of Spain. And the passage mentioned, was only about king James's manner of defending the Pope to be Antichrist, and how he salved it while the prince was in Spain. But king James related it after. Nor could any words of that Letter be drawn to the king's going thither, much less to any knowledge I had of it.

V. The fifth Charge was concerning his majesty's Match with France. And here again they urge my Diary at March 11, 1625, That the duke of Buckingham was then and there employed. And at May 19, and 29, That I then writ Letters to him. First, my Lords, I hold it my great honour, that my lord duke would write to me, and give me leave to write to him. Secondly, I have committed some error in these Letters, or none. If none, why are they charged? If any, why are they not produced, that I may see what it is, and answer it?

VI. The sixth Charge was, That I was an Instrument of the Queen's. This they endeavoured to prove by my Diary in three places. First, at August 30, 1634. Upon occasion of some service done, she was graciously pleased to give me leave to have immediate access unto her, when I had occasion. This is true, and I most humbly thanked her majesty for it: for I very well knew what belonged to addresses at second-hand in court. But what crime is in this, that the Queen was pleased to give me access unto her, when I had occasion? Here is no word of Religion. Secondly, at May 18, 1635, where it is said, That I gave her majesty an account of something committed to me. If her majesty sent or spake to me to do any thing, as it seems she did, shall I want so much duty, as not give her an account of it? So be-like I must be unmannerly with her majesty, or lie open to no less than a Charge of High-Treason. Thirdly, at April 3, 1639, it is made a great matter, that I should then dispatch a great business for the Queen, which I understood she would not move for herself: and that for this her majesty gave me great thanks. Mr. Nicolas's inference upon this was, that they conceive wherefore. But his conceit makes no evidence: he must not only conceive, but prove wherefore, before it can work any thing against me. As for Itligion, as there is no word of it in my Diary, so neither was it at this time thought on. Her majesty would therein have moved for herself: but it seems it must be a crime, if I be but civil and dutiful towards the Queen, though it be but thrice mentioned in so many years.

VII. The seventh Charge was, That I forbade ministers praying for the Queen's Conversion, and punished others. The first witness, Mr. Ratcliff, says, That sir Nath. Brent gave it in charge at Bow Church in my Visitation. The more to blame he, if so he did. Yea, but he says, it was by my command delivered unto him by sir John Lambe. Was it so? How doth Mr. Ratcliff know that? He doth not express. He was not present, when I spake with sir John Lambe. And if sir Nath. Brent told him of it, it is but hearsay. And sir Nath. having been so ready a witness against me, why is he not examined to this particular? And as for the Paper which was shewed, it appears plainly there, that it was no Paper of Instructions sent to my Visitors by me, but of particular informations to me: of which one was, that the Queen was prayed for in a very factious and scandalous way. And this appeared, when that Paper was read. And this I referred to my Visitors, as I not only might, but ought: not forbidding the prayers, but the scandalous manner of them. The second Witness was Mr. Prynne; who says, That one Mr. Jones was punished for praying for the Queen. He was punished in the High Commission for scandalous abusing the Queen, under a form of praying for her, and for divers other Articles that were against him. 'And this Answer I gave to Mr. Browne, who forgot not this in summing up my Charge.'

VIII. The Eighth Charge was, That I punished men for praying to preserve the Prince. No; God forbid! The High Commission Book was shewed, and that there in the year 1634, one Mr. Howe was censured for it. I got this Act of the High Commission to be read to the Lords: His Prayer went thus, "That God would preserve the Prince in the true Religion, of which there was cause to fear." Could this Prayer have any other operation upon the people, than to make them think his majesty was careless in the education of the Prince, especially in point of religion? And this was so grievous and graceless a scandal cast upon a religious king, as nothing could be greater. Upon the matter, it was the shew of a Prayer for the Prince, but was indeed to destroy the king in the hearts of his people. And had I not there consented to his punishment, I had deserved to be punished myself. 'Mr. Browne, when he repeated the sum of the Evidence, laid this Charge upon me, but spake not one word, to my remembrance, of this Answer given to it.'

IX. The ninth Charge, That I did extol queen Mary's days. The Proof for it was taken out of the Preface to the Statutes of the University of Oxford. I took a great deal of pains about those Statutes, and might justly have expected thanks for it, not such an accusation. But as for the Preface, it was made and printed at Oxford: I meddled not with it. I could trust the University with little, if not with making of a Preface. If they have done any thing amiss in it, let them answer it. The passage was about certain offers made to amend those confused old Statutes, both in Edward 6th's and queen Mary's days; but no effect came of the pains then taken; "Recruduit labor," says the Preface. So that this I can answer for them: there is not a word spoken of Religion, but of Manners only, and that as much in relation to the times of princes following, as hers. For the words, to my remembrance, are, "interim optanda temporum felicitate," &c. And that "interim" cannot be restrained to queen Mary's days only, but must include the whole "interim," or middle distance of time, to that present in which I settled the body of their Statutes; that is, all queen Elizabeth's and king James's days, which I think no man can deny was "Optanda temporum felicitas."

X. Here Mr. Nicolas confessed there was no downright Proof against me. That was his phrase: but he added, that was not to be expected in such a work of darkness. Then he produced a Paper found in my Study, printed at Rome. So were divers of my books printed there: what of this? They may print what they will at Rome, I cannot hinder it: and I may have and keep whatever they print, no law forbidding it. Then he shewed a Letter sent unto me from Mr. Graves. The gentleman is at this present fellow of Merton College in Oxford, a great traveller, and a man of great worth. As far as I remember, his Letter came to me from Alexandria. It was fit to be sent, and kindly received; as by me it was. I desired it might be read. Then were mentioned sir William Boswell's Letters, and the Papers sent by Andreas ab Habernfeld, about a great Plot to destroy the king and religion, and that I concealed these Papers. 'I might have been amazed at the impudence of this charge above all the rest: "Diaboli impudentia," the Devil's impudence, and no less, as St. Augustine speaks in another case.' [S. Aug. Epist. 167.] Did I conceal these Papers? First, the same day that I received them, I sent them by an express to his majesty. I had a speedy answer from his majesty, and that I returned with equal speed to his majesty's agent sir William Boswell, as I was commanded. And this Mr. Prynne and Mr. Nicolas knew: for Mr. Prynne took all these Letters and Papers from me, when he searched me at the Tower; and out of them made his book* called Rome's Master-Piece: excepting the slanders, which he hath juggled in of his own. So soon as his majesty came home, I humbly besought him, that he would be pleased to appoint a time, and call some lords to him, to hear and examine the business: and this examination continued till I was committed. What was after done, I cannot account for. Besides, my Lords, it appears by those Papers, that my life was sought for, because I would not give way to the change of religion; and Mr. Prynne himself hath printed this: and yet now Mr. Nicolas, from his testimony, presses these Papers against me. But the king, and the Lords, and both secretaries of state then present, can witness, that I took all the care and pains above-mentioned to have it sifted to the bottom. 'Notwithstanding all this, Mr. Nicolas falls upon this Plot again upon the next day of my Hearing; as if nothing had been said unto it: and was so shameless as to say, That I followed this business so long as I thought the Plot was against the Puritans; but so soon as I found it was against the Papists, I kept it secret, till Mr. Prynne discovered it in his search of my Papers. Where, first, there is no word in all the Papers to make me or any man think the Puritans were concerned in it. And, secondly, I did not sleep upon the receipt of these Papers, till I had sent them to his majesty. But I had reason to keep the Papers as safe as I could, considering how much they justify me against these foul calumnies put upon me.'

XI. Then followed the Charge of Sancta Clara's Book, alias monsieur St. Giles: so they expressed it; and I must follow the way they lead me.

1. First, then, they charge, that I had often conference with him, while he was writing his Book, intitled, "Deus, Natura, Gratia." No, he never came to me, till he was ready to print that Book. Then some friends of his brought him to me. His suit then was, that he might print that Book here. Upon speech with him, I found the scope of his Book to be such, as that the Church of England would have little cause to thank him for it: and so absolutely denied it. Nor did he ever come more at me after this, but twice or thrice at most, when he made great friends to me, that he might print another Book, to prove that Bishops are by Divine Right. My answer then was, that I did not like the way which the Church of Rome went, in case of Episcopacy. And howsoever, that I would never give way, that any such Book should be printed here from the pen of a Romanist; and that the Bishops of England were whereof being by his endeavours conveyed to the Archbishop, then a prisoner in the Tower, the Archbishop wrote Notes in the margin of it, so far, and so much, as to vindicate himself from the aspersions laid upon him therein. This Copy, with the said Notes, is now in the hands of that knowing and learned antiquary Mr. Anthony Wood.

* This Book was published by Prynne in the year 1643, in five sheets in quarto. A Copy able to defend their own cause and calling, without calling in aid from Rome, and would in due time. Maintenance he never had any from me, nor did I then know him to be a priest. Nor was there any proof so much as offered in contrary to any of this.

2. Secondly, they did specially except against a passage in the Licenser, and another at the end of the Book. The Book was printed at Lyons, where I could not hinder the printing, either of the whole, or any part. This might have been something, had I licensed it here; but that I constantly denied.

3. Thirdly, they produced a Letter written to me from Venice, by one Mr. Middleton, chaplain there to the right honourable the now earl of Denbigh, his majesty's ambassador. Therein he writes, "that S. Clara was homo nequissimus, and that one Monsieur S. Giles was the author of that Book." That Clara and S. Giles were the same person, is but Mr. Middleton's opinion. Such news as he there heard, some true, some false, he thought fit to write unto me: and he being absent, here's no proof upon oath, that they are one and the same person. And I hope a young man's Letter from Venice, or any other place, signifying only such things as he hears, shall not stand for good evidence in a case of life. And he was mainly deceived in this particular, as appears, first, because what Clara is, I know not: but Monsieur S. Giles is a great scholar, and a sober man: and one that gave the late lord Brook so good content, that he allowed him 100*l.* a year during his life. Secondly, because 'tis commonly known that Clara is an Englishman, and S. Giles a Frenchman born and bred. Thirdly because their own Article, upon which they bring this Charge, acknowledges them two distinct persons. Fourthly, because both Mr. Prynne and Mr. Nicolas had Monsieur S. Giles before them in examination, and could not but know him to be a Frenchman: as appears by a Warrant given to him by Mr. Prynne, to secure him after his examination; which Warrant follows in these words:

"These are to certify those whom it may concern, That the Committee of the House of Commons, appointed to prosecute the Archbishop of Canterbury, have examined and received satisfaction from Monsieur S. Giles, a domestick servant to the Resident of Venice; and therefore he is no farther to be examined or molested concerning the same."

'This licence came to my hands since my answering was passed, so I could not then shew it. Monsieur S. Giles was never the man that gave me notice of any of this, not so much as that he had been examined; but my secretary Mr. Dell came to hear of it by chance, and went to him, and had this Copy (with some labour) from him, and will make oath it is a true Copy. This is not the thankfullest part that ever S. Giles played, considering my carriage towards him.'

4. Then they charged upon Monsieur S. Giles directly, that I knew him to be a priest, and yet maintained him at Oxford. The case* was this: Mr. S. Giles was in good place about the queen's majesty at her first coming: Here he did so good services to this state, that he lost himself in France, and durst not go thither when the French were sent away. All this while the man was unknown to me, till his majesty one day at St. James's told me this, and that he was a priest, and that it lay upon him in honour to allow him some maintenance, and prescribed me a way how to order it, that he might receive one hundred marks a year as from him; and gave me charge, if the pension were at any time behind, I should acquaint him with it. After this Mr. S. Giles, by his friends, petitioned his majesty, that being a stranger, he might live in Oxford, to have the use of the library there, being resolved to meddle no more with the controversies of the time, but to apply himself to metaphysical learning. His majesty was desirous to have him placed in some College, to save charges: But this I most humbly deprecated, because it might be dangerous to the youth there, and scandalous to his majesty, the church, and the university; and dangerous to myself, being Chancellor: to the rest I submitted. So he was left to place himself in some town-house, as he could: And for this his majesty gave me his Warrant, which Mr. Prynne, in his search, took from me. But here follows the true copy of it.

'C. R. Canterbury; Mr. S. Giles, by serving us and this state, hath lost all his hopes in France, and desires to spend his time here at his private studies. I would have you think upon some way for his maintenance, and to place him in Oxford, that he may have use of that Library, which he much desires. And you may so order it, that his Profession in Religion may do no harm.'

And according to this direction of his majesty I did take order, but with assurance from himself, and with spite upon him there, besides the special care of the Vice-Chancellor, that he should not converse with young students, nor exercise his priestly office, nor do any thing against the laws. Nor did I ever hear that he failed in any of these assumptions.

5. Then they produced one Mr. Broad, who testified, That while S. Giles lived at Oxford, some Doctors came to him. Doctors were able to deal well enough with him; but all resort of young scholars was forbidden. He says farther, That Mr. S. Giles should say, That the bishops of England were cordially of his religion, but that he feared their rigour would spoil all. First, This is but a report of his speech. Secondly, Why was not S. Giles at his examination asked, whether he said it or no? And if he did, what ground he had for it?

* The Archbishop related this case more at large, and therewith defended himself in a written Paper; which being seized by Prynne in the Tower, was now produced and read before the Lords. It may be found in Prynne's Comp. Hist. p. 428. H. W.

At the most, it was but his opinion of the bishops, who were never the more cordial to Popery for his thinking so. 'And thirdly, I doubt it appears by this time, that all is overthrown, or near it, not by the rigidness, but by over-remissness of some bishops, who never would believe any danger could come from the Godly, as they were called.'

6. Lastly, What is the reason of this great endeavour, upon nothing but news in a letter, to make Clara and Mr. S. Giles to be one and the same man? 'Doubtless, nothing but an hydropical thirst after my blood.' For resort of priests to Lambeth was usual in both my last predecessors times, Bancroft's and Abbot's, and some lay in the house, and had relief. This was proved to the lords by two antient servants of that house: Neither of which have been done in my time. Archbishop Abbot made a Warrant, this Warrant was shewed, to secure Mr. Preston, an English priest, upon command of king James: Why may not I a French one, by the warrant of king Charles? King James justified bishop Bancroft for doing this, when he was bishop of London, and no privy-counsellor: And may not I do it, being archbishop and privy-counsellor, with as much privacy of the king and the state, as he did? But to let these pass, why should I say here was a thirst for blood? I will tell you why? The statute of 27 Eliz. makes it felony, without benefit of clergy, to maintain or relieve any Romish priest born in England, or any other of her majesty's dominions, knowing him to be such. Now they had laid their Article, That I had given maintenance to one Monsieur S. Giles, a popish priest at Oxford, knowing him to be such. But when, upon examination of S. Giles, they found him to be a Frenchman, and so not within the statute; (as the words of that statute are most plain, and so is sir Edward Coke's judgment upon them; [L. 3. Inst. c. 37.] both which I then read to the lords:) I say, when they saw this, then they cast about how to make S. Clara and Mr. S. Giles to be one man. And though they could find no shadow of proof of a thing that is not, but a Letter of News from Venice; yet against their own knowledge and conscience, they give that in evidence to reach my life any ways.

Here Mr. Nicolas, so soon as he had discovered whither I tended, would have broken me off, saying, They did not urge it for that now, they were not yet come to it. I replied, if they came to it after, I would be at the pains to answer again: But since it concerned my life, I would not slip it now, nor leave it unanswered in any circumstance. So I went on, but they never mentioned it after; and by this way meant certainly to have involved me within the law, Clara being an Englishman born. 'God of his mercy grant, that this thirst after my blood lie not too heavy another day upon their souls! Mr. Browne in summing up the charge fell upon this also. I made a brief Answer out of that which is aforesaid; Yet after in his Reply, he fell upon this Letter of Mr. Middleton's, and citos his news for evidence, That S. Clara and Mr. S. Giles were the same man: Which I much wonder so able and grave a man as he is should swallow from Mr. Prynne, who doubtless, being present, was angry to see himself so laid open in the house of commons.'

* After all Prynne would insinuate, that S. Giles was the same man with Sancta Clara, and wrote the Book intitled, Deus, Natura, and Gratia, although he fully knew the contrary, Compl. Hist. p. 427, 429. Nay, he hath the confidence at last (p. 430.) to add, that "it is most apparent." H. W.

XII. At last came in the last Charge of this day, That a Cardinal's Hat was offered unto me. My Diary quoted for this, at Aug. 4, and 21, 1633. I could hinder no offer, unless I could prophesy what each man came about, and so shun them. But why is not my Answer, there set down, expressed too? My Answer was, "That somewhat dwelt in me, which would not suffer me to accept that till Rome were other than now it is." Besides, I went presently to his majesty, and acquainted him with it; which is all that the law requires at my hands. [Coke, L. 3. Inst. c. 3.] And his majesty very prudently and religiously, yet in a calm way, the persons offering it having relation to some Ambassador, freed me speedily of that, both trouble and danger. They urged farther out of the papers of Andreas ab Habernfeld, which Mr. Prynne took from me in his search, That signior Con had power to offer me a Cardinal's Hat. The words which they cite, are, for I could never get sight of those Papers since, "mandatum habuit offerre, sed non obtulit." What power he had to make me such an offer, I know not, but themselves confess he did not offer it. Nor had I ever any speech with him during all the time he staid here. I was solicited as much by honourable friends to give him admittance to me at Lambeth, with assurance he should speak nothing about religion, as ever I had about any thing in my life. I still refused, and could not persuade myself to do other; and yet could not but inwardly (in verbo sacerdotis, this is true) condemn myself of gross incivility for refusing; for which yet now I see I am much bound to God for that unmannerliness. Had I held a correspondence with him, though never so innocent, where had I now been? Besides, I would not have it forgotten, that if to offer a Cardinal's Hat, or any like thing, shall be sufficient cause to make a man guilty of Treason, it shall be in the power of any Romanist to make any English bishop a traitor when he pleases: a mischief not to be indured. And thus this long and tedious day ended: and I had order to attend again on July 24, which I did accordingly.

The Nineteenth Day of my Hearing.

I. Monday, July 24, 1644. This day they went on with the same Article; And the first Charge was, my denying the Pope to be Antichrist. The proofs, the alteration of the clause in the letters patents for the Palatinate, and the letters between bishop Hall and me. These proofs are answered before, and repeated here only to make a noise. Nor did I in any of these deny the Pope to be Antichrist: For, to forbear that word, for some both temporal and ecclesiastical respects, is one thing; and to deny the thing itself, is another.

II. The second consists of a great many particulars, and most of them urged before, repeated only to help to make the ignorant clamorous and wild against me. God forgive them this practice!

1. The first particular was Shelford's Book: The whole Book. And Mr. Prynne very gravely said, that this Book, and the other two following, were found in my Study. Is he not yet ashamed of this argument? May I have no Book in my Study, but I must be of the same judgment with the author in all things? The author is altogether unknown to me; the Book was licensed at Cambridge: so nothing faulty in me, but the having of the Book in my Study.

2. The second was Dr. Heylin's Book against Mr. Burton. This Book was printed by my command, they say, and in it is a passage for Absolute Obedience to Kings, p. 229. This was before also. And I did command the printing of the Book, but gave no warrant to put any thing unjustifiable into it. This passage I caused to be read to the Lords; and the Doctor there says no more than what he learned of king James in the Conference at Hampton-court. But if any thing be amiss, he is ready to answer it: but I find not one word in him, that this Absolute Obedience ought to be in any thing that is against law. 'That is one of Mr. Nicolas's stretches.'

3. The third particular is bishop Montague's Appeal, p. 141. But nothing hence charged upon me, but only, that the Book was found in my Study. I would Mr. Prynne could find any books there now.

4. The fourth was, That divers Books of like nature were licensed by my chaplains. But none was of all they then named, but Dr. Heylin's and Sales, of which your lordships have heard the Plot how it came to be licensed. And for Dr. Heylin, he is ready to make all good, which he hath therein done.

5. The fifth particular is, That the Homilies which are authorized in the Church of England, make the Pope Antichrist, p. 216. And the Babylonish Beast of Rome, p. 316. But, first, this is nothing against me, till it be proved, which yet is not done, that I have positively denied the Pope to be Antichrist. And, secondly, I do not conceive, that the Article of the Church of England which confirms the Homilies [Art. 35], doth also confirm every phrase that is in them. Nor, thirdly, do I conceive that the Homilies in those places which are cited, do make the Pope the great Antichrist. For in the first place, the words are, "to the beating down of sin, death, the Pope, the Devil, and all the kingdom of Antichrist." Which words cannot possibly imply, that the Pope is that Antichrist. In the second place, he is only called the Babylonical Beast of Rome; which phrase doth not necessarily signify the great Antichrist. For the Beast so often mentioned in the Revelation (chap. xi. 7), is no where called the Babylonical Beast of Rome. And if that Beast do stand for the great Antichrist, I say, if, because those scriptures are very dark, then the Beast is primarily the Roman empire in the judgment of the Geneva Noters. 'And that there should be two great Antichrists, is more than any man hath yet said. Here Mr. Nicolas was up again with Pandar to the Whore of Babylon, and other foul language; not remembering all this while, (which yet I was loth to mind him of) that one of his zealous witnesses against the Whore of Babylon, and all her superstitions, got all his means, which are great, by being a Pandar to other lewd women; and loved the business itself so well, as that he was, not long since, men say, taken in bed with one of his wife's maids. Good Mr. Nicolas, do not dispense with all whores, save the Whore of Babylon.'

6. The sixth particular was the Articles of Ireland, which call the Pope the Man of Sin. But the Articles of Ireland bind neither this Church, nor me. And some learned Protestants do not understand that noted place of the Apostle, 2 Thes. ii. as meant of Antichrist or the Pope.

7. The seventh and last particular is a repetition of Sancta Clara and Mr. S. Giles, and the Letter of News, which were news indeed, to make them one man; though this were answered at large but the last day, and sir Ed. Hungerford's testimony brought up again. It is a sign Mr. Nicolas hath indeed no downright proof, as he said before, that so tumbles up and down in repeating the same things.

III. The third Charge is, That I say in my Book [contra Fisher, p. 376], that the religion of the Church of Rome and ours is all one. This is spoken only in opposition to other religions, in regard of Christianity. The words are, "Nor do the Church of Rome and the Protestants set up a different religion; for the Christian religion is the same to both," &c. And the like passage to this is in my speech in the Star-Chamber, and these passages were read to the Lords. So that either Papists must be denied to be Christians, or else this Charge can work nothing against me.

IV. The fourth Charge is out of Chouneus's Book, p. 45, & 46, licensed by my Chaplain Dr. Bray; where, they say, it is said, "That Rome is a true Church, and differs not in fundamentals." And that at the High Commission, when this Book was questioned by some, I did say, "That the Church of Rome and the Protestants did not differ in fundamentals, but in circumstances." And this latter part was testified by Mr. Burton and one Mr. Lane, who said they were present. First, Suppose this be false, and that they do differ in fundamentals, yet this then is but my error in divinity, no practice to overthrow religion. Secondly, I suppose, if I did so say, I did not err: for the foundations of the Christian Religion are the Articles of the Creed; and the Church of Rome denies no one of them. Therefore there is no difference in the fundamentals. If they of Rome differ in exposition of some of these, that must needs be a superstructure upon or beside the Article, not the Article or foundation itself. Nor did I follow my own judgment herein, but Calvin's,* who says expressly, "That in despite of Antichrist, the foundations of the Church remained in the Papacy itself, that the Church might not wholly perish." And this passage was then read to the Lords. Thirdly, these two learned witnesses, as they would be reputed, are quite mistaken in their very terms: for they report me, as if I said, "Not in fundamentals, but in circumstantialities;" whereas these are not membra opposita, but fundamentals and superstructures, which may sway quite beside the foundation. And this, though not the only, yet is a main failing in the Roman fabric; in which many things are built upon unwarrantable tradition, as is expressed in my Book at large, and their many superstitious named: and that passage read also to the Lords. For though they differ not in the prime foundations, yet they in many things grate close upon them, and in some things fall beside them, to no small hazard of their own souls. As for circumstantialities, it seems these men have forgotten, or never knew, that many times circumstantialities in religion do quite destroy the foundation. For example: The circumstances are these: Quis? Quid? Ubi? Quibus auxiliis? Quomodo? Quando?

1. Quis? What man believes; and that contains Fundamentals, and in the first place,

2. Ubi? Place, a mere circumstance; yet to deny that Christ took our flesh of the Blessed Virgin, and that in Judea, denies the foundation, and is flat Judaism.

3. Quibus auxiliis? By what helps a man believes, and in some measure obeys as he is commanded? For to believe that a man doth this by the strength of nature only, and not by aid and assistance of Grace, is with the Pelagian to deny the foundation, and to overthrow the grace of Christ.

4. Quando? When? That is time, a mere circumstance: yet to deny that Christ is already come in the flesh, denies the foundation utterly, and is flat Judaism, and an inseparable badge of the great Antichrist, 1 John iv. 3.

* "Quemadmodum sæpe diruuntur ædificia, ut fundamenta et ruinæ maneat; ita non passus est ecclesiam suam ab Antichristo vel a fundamento subverti, vel sole æquari, &c. sed ab ipsâ quaque vastatione semirutum ædificium superesse voluit." Calv. l. 4. Inst. c. 2, § 11.

And in the case of the Resurrection, to say it is past already, (which is time) St. Paul tells us, 2 Tim. ii. 18, is no less than "the overthrow of Faith." And the rule is general, That some circumstances dant speciem, give the very kind and form to a moral action. [Aliqua circumstantia dat speciem actui morali. Tho. 1, secundæ, q. 73, A. 7, ad primum.] 'This for their ignorance: but for the malice of their oath, I leave them to God's mercy. Here Mr. Browne, when he summed up the Evidence against me, fell upon this; and said, That when I gave divers instances what dangerous errors circumstances did sometimes breed in religion, I gave no instance in any point of Popery. But to this I answered, first, That it was not material what instances I made, so I was able to make some. Secondly, That it was not possible for me, or perhaps a readier man, to have all instances so present with his memory. Thirdly, If an instance in Popery, rank Popery, will serve the turn, you may take it in Transubstantiation. That is either a fundamental point, or it is not: if it be not fundamental, why did the Papist put the Protestant to death for it? And why did the Protestant suffer death? If it be fundamental, as it seems by both sides it was accounted, it is upon the bare circumstance of Quomodo, how Christ is present in the Sacrament.'

As for that which was said in the beginning of this Charge, "That Rome is a true Church:" I ever did, and ever must grant it, that such it is, veritate entis, in the truth of its entity and being. For as I have said against Fisher, ens et verum, being and true are convertible one with another. And every thing that hath a being, is truly that being which it is in truth of substance. But a right or an orthodox church I never said it was, either in doctrine or manners. As a thief is a true man in verity of his essence, that is, he is a creature indued with reason: but it doth not therefore follow and that he is a true man, veritate moris, in his life and conversation. 'And this I answered first to the Lords, and after to Mr. Browne's summary Charge; who in his last Reply said two things: First, That when I said Rome was a True Church, I spake it generally, without this distinction. But this is quite beyond the proof; for no witness says so. Besides, it is manifest by distinction of fundamentals from other doctrines, acknowledged by both the witnesses, that I did not speak it absolutely, but plain enough to any ordinary understanding. Secondly, which I was very sorry to hear from so grave a man, he added, That there was no truth of a church, but in the verity of doctrine and manners; and that in veritate entis, a company of Turks were a true church. Now God be merciful to us, whither are we posting? It is known that the Greek word Ἐκκλησία, which signifies Church, signifies also in heathen authors any kind of Company or Congregation of men, Turks if you will. But in ecclesiastical writers, and among all Christians, the word Church is used only (and Essensis too) for a company of men which profess the faith of Christ, and are baptized into his name. And will any man say that a company of Turks are such a church in veritate entis, in the verity of this being, as all the world knows Papists are? Or if he will not speak de ente tali, but change the suppositum, he may say what he please. But I was very much troubled to hear this, and from him. I had almost forgot that Mr. Nicolas here pressed the authority of the Homilies upon me again; where it is said, "That the bishop of Rome and their adherents are not the true Church." But the answer is easy: for I say as the Homily doth, and as it means too in that place; namely, that the Church of Rome is not the True; that is, not the Catholic Church, nor the head thereof. But there is a great deal of difference between the Church and a Church: the one is the general, the other a particular. The Church it cannot be: A Church it is; and a true one too, in the sense before specified. Upon occasion of this, Mr. Nicolas's mouth was open again, and said, That at the beginning I reckoned up some that I had converted; but if this were my opinion, and that if this might stand for good, I might convert the Devil and all. My ears had been so beaten with his language, that I was patient, and left him to insult. And to help on this business, while he was in these loud expressions, the earl of Pembroke came to Mr. Burton to the bar, and in my hearing desired him to repeat the testimony he had given; which Mr. Burton did, and his lordship seemed to be much pleased with it. Not long before, when the news was come hot to the house that York was taken, when I came at five in the afternoon to make my Answer, I was no sooner come to the bar, but the same lord came and sat just before me, and there with much joy told Mr. Lieutenant the news. I presume he did it in favour to me, because he thought it would put me in very good heart, being then instantly to begin to make my Answer. God forgive this lord! for I have deserved in my time far better of him, if he understood himself, or any man else.

V. The next Charge was out of Dr. Pocklington's Altare Christianum, p. 49, 50. where he speaks (they say, for I now have not his book) of a happiness that the bishops of England can derive their succession from St. Peter; which, in great scorn, Mr. Nicolas called the Archbishop's Pedigree. First, if there be any Crime in this, Dr. Pocklington is to answer it, not I. Secondly, he may scorn what he will; but wise men know it is a great honour to the church of England, and a great stopple in the mouths of the Romanists, that her bishops can derive their calling successively from St. Peter; especially considering how much they stand upon personal succession. Thirdly, Dr. Pocklington in this says no more for me and the bishops, than St. Augustin urged for himself and his brethren against the Donatists in the same words, save that St. Augustin* begins at St. Peter, and descends to his own time; and the Doctor begins at his own time, and ascends to St. Peter. 'But it seems, an upstart clergy, without a calling, will serve Mr. Nicolas well enough.'

VI. The sixth Charge was, that Books were written of purpose to maintain these opinions; and such men as writ them only preferred. He named Mr. Shelford, Mr. Butterfield, Dr. Cogens, and Dr. Pocklington. This hath been clamoured upon already: If any have set out unworthy Books, they may be called to account for it; I hope I shall not answer for all the divines in the kingdom. 'They whom I preferred were worthy and able men, and it will not be in the power of Mr. White's centuries to blast a man of them among any that know them.' For these that are named, Mr. Shelford I know not, Mr. Butterfield I saw punished in the High-Commission; neither of them preferred, that I know. 'The two last, by whomsoever they were preferred, deserved all the preferment they had, and more.'

VII. The seventh Charge is out of my Diary at June 15, 1632, where 'tis said, "that I preferred Mr. Secretary Windebank, my old friend." And here Mr. Nicolas laid all the correspondence open, which (he said) that gentleman had with the Pope's agents, with priests and Jesuits: and when he had made him this way as foul as he could, then I must be guilty of all, for preferring such a man to the king. This gentleman was indeed my ancient friend: In my many years acquaintance with him, I saw nothing in him but honesty and worth. If when he was preferred, he deceived my opinion, he is living to answer for himself. Many in all ages have been preferred to princes, which do not answer the hopes and desires of them that prefer them; and yet they not made answerable for them neither. But whether he did fail in any public trust, or no, I am not his judge. Yea, but some Letters were found from his son Thomas, what entertainment he had in foreign parts for his father's sake. But these letters were read to the lords, and there is not one word in them that relates to me: and 'tis both likely and fit the son of a Secretary of State should be worthily used in his travels. Yea, but his son Christopher was at Rome, and sent thither to insinuate himself with the Pope: So Andreas ab Habernfield writes in the papers which sir William Boswell sent over to me. If he did send his son to that end, then I discovered his Plot; for I caused those papers to be examined by the king and the lords, as is before related. Besides, in my poor judgment, the Pope must be a very simple man ('it may be Mr. Nicolas

* "Petro successit Linus, Lino Clemens, &c. et sic quoque ad Anastasium, qui nunc sedet. Et in hoc ordine successionis nullus Donatista Episcopus invenitur." §. Aug. Epist. 165.

'thinks him so, compared with himself'), that a youth of seventeen at the most, should insinuate himself to fish any thing out of him for his father's service. Lastly, he pressed, that my interest continued with Mr. Secretary in all these courses of his. 'Tis well known in court, the old interest did not continue between us: But for old friendship's sake I will not be drawn to say more. As for his releasing of any priests, he must give an account of that himself. But for myself, I was so careful in this particular, that I never put my hand, tho' public at Council-Table or Star-Chamber, to any release in all my time. I might be named, as present when such release was made, (which I could not avoid;) but act in any I did not. Nay, I was so careful, that I refused to set my hand to any licence to travel, lest, if any young man should be perverted abroad in his travels, any thing might be imputed to me. And thus all the clerks of the council can witness. 'But I see no wariness, no care, can prevent the 'envy and the malice of the many and the 'mighty.'

VIII. The eighth Charge was my correspondence with Popish Priests. And for proof of this they produced divers witnesses.

1. The first Witness was one Wadsworth, one of the common messengers used to attach such persons. He says, that Snath, alias Fludd, brugged to him that he had acquaintance with me. Here's nothing but a bragging report of Smith; who, what he is, I know not. So here's no proof. He says, that 4l. was sent to himself, to free him out of prison; and that Davis told him it came from me. This is but a hearsay from Davis, as the former was from Smith. But say, my lords, if I did send him 4l. to free him out of prison, doth he not now very thankfully reward me for it? The truth is, my lords, I did send him 4l.: and the motive that made me send it, was because I heard he was a convert from Popery to be a Protestant, and that his imprisonment was as much for that as for any thing else. And this was attested to the lords by my servant Mr. Snath, who was one of them that moved me for him.

2. The second Witness was Francis Newton, another messenger. He says, that when he had taken Henry Mors, a priest, he should have been carried to a private committee; that he disliked it, and complained to Mr. Secretary Cook, who (he says) sent him to me; and that when he came to Lambeth, Mr. Dell told him I was in my garden with sr Toby Matthew. My servant Mr. Dell being appointed my solicitor, was now present in court, and denied all this. And well he might; for sr Toby was never in my garden with me in all his life. And if Mr. Dell told him that I would not meddle in the business (as he says he did), Mr. Dell must give the account for it, not I. Yet if there were a reference of this Mors to a private Committee, the hindering of that was more proper to Mr. Secretary than to me. Howsoever, here was no hurt done: For he confesses that Mors was sent back to Newgate. And, if (as he farther says) he was discharged by Mr. Secretary Windebank, that is nothing to me. He says, he was informed by Stukely, that Smith, alias Fludd, was acquainted with me. But if he were but informed so himself, that's no proof to inform your lordships. He says, that Brown a priest was dismissed out of the high-commission. Thus it was: he was called in thither for very foul uncleanness. In process of this business, he there openly confessed himself a priest. Hereupon that court sent him to Newgate. 'What became of him after, I know not, save that I know he was 'strictly examined by Mr. Pym and others concerning me.' This Newton, upon what grudge I know not, calls me rogue, and all to naught in all companies; and with so much I acquainted the lords.

3. The third Witness was Tho. Mayo, a messenger also. He says, that sr Toby Matthew was accounted a priest when he was in parts beyond the seas; and that he saw him in a coach with me, and that he went over with me in my barge. First, I gave in two exceptions against this Witness: one, that he was a man of no conscience: for he had shifted his religion from Protestant to Papist, and back again, three or four times: Which was a thing known. The other was, that he kept a Brothel-House at this present, and that his fellow Wadsworth knew this, and called him pipping knave, saying he kept a brace of wenches at this time in his house. And these words he spake of him but the fifth of this present July, in the Bull tavern in the Palace-Yard. So I thought him no fit witness. But he was heard, for all this. 'And afterward Wadsworth meeting my servant Mr. Snath, he told him that he did say 'so to Mayo, and wondered how I should come 'to hear it.' Being admitted, and saying as he did, I told the lords that he began with a very bold oath, and like a shifter of his religion; For I had four servants there, three of which usually attended me when I went and returned from court, Mr. Dell, Mr. Snath, Mr. Goodwin, and Mr. Dobson, and they all attested the contrary; and I never went, but one of these, at least, was with me. Besides, he is single in this testimony. He says, that he saw sr Toby several times in my house. But he confesses withal, that he never saw him near me. For my own part, I cannot say that ever he was within my doors. But if he, or others of his quality, do come to pry out any thing in my house, how is it possible for me to hinder it? My porter could not see it written in their foreheads, who they were. He says, that one Price was often seen at my house. But he doth not say he was seen with me, or there with my knowledge. He says, that one Leander was reported to have been my chamber-fellow in Oxford. First, this is but a report, and so no evidence. Secondly, if he were my chamber-fellow in Oxford when we were boys together, I am sure he was then no priest; and he was but a boy when he left the College. He confesses that

I gave order to observe who and how many resorted to ambassadors houses, and Signior Con's, and says he thought I could prove it. But I believe he would never have confessed it, but that he knew I could prove it. And thereupon I shewed the lords many papers certifying me what numbers were found resorting to each place respectively; and Thomas Mayo's hand to many of those papers. He says, he took one Peter Willford, and brought him to me to Whitehall, while sir John Lambe was with me. But he confesses wialth, that Willford then shewed Mr. Secretary Windebank's Warrant to discharge him: And then what could I do to him? Nay, I have some cause to think he would never have apprehended him, had he not known he had that Warrant. Lastly, he says, that once at the Star-chamber I told him he was too quick and nimble for me. And I hope it is no treason, if I did say so. Nor could I mean he was too quick in apprehending priests, for I found both him and his fellows, after Crose's death, slow enough at that: But if I said so, it was because I could not tell how to trust his shifting and his williness.

4. The fourth Witness was Elizabeth Graye, wife to another messenger. And this is a very fine Witness. For first, she says, her husband was committed by my means, and then with a breath she says, she doth not know by whom he was committed, but she thinks by secretary Windebank and me. But since she doth not know, but think only, I hope her thinking can be no evidence. She says, that she delivered me a Petition, and that I flung it away, saying, "I would not meddle with any priest-catching knave." The witness single, and I doubt doubting, and the words far from treason.

5. The fifth Witness was John Cooke, a Messenger too, and one that for his misdemeanor had stood in the Pillory. This I urged against him, as unfit to witness against me: 'My Witness that saw him in the Pillory, was so threatened, that he sent me word he durst not come. I may not say from whom this threatening came.' But the thing was so true, that Cooke himself confessed it, but excused the cause; and his testimony received. He told how Fisher the Jesuit was taken by Graye; that when he was brought to the council-table, secretary Cook and I went to the king to know his pleasure about him; that we brought back word from his majesty to the lords, that he should be banished. All this while here is no hurt done. Then he says, that notwithstanding this order of his majesty, Graye and he met Fisher at liberty, by a Warrant from secretary Windebank: That hereupon Graye repaired to secretary Cook, and to me, and that Dell told him I would not meddle with it. My secretary must answer this, I remember it not. But if Mr. Dell received any such answer from me, that I would not meddle with it; there were two apparent reasons for it: One, that I would not meddle with it alone, his majesty's Order being to all the Lords; The other, that Fisher was the man

I had written against, and men would have been apt to say, that when I could not answer, I sought means to destroy. So I no way fit, alone at least, to meddle with him, of all men. He says, that Graye was committed to the Fleet for railing on me in my own house. Yet he confesses, that he was not committed by me. And I presume your lordships will think there was cause of his commitment, if he did rail upon me. And it is confessed by Mr. Prynne (though he had then received no answer from myself), That he said he saw now how the game went, and hoped ere long to see better days, &c. He says, That Smith, alias Fludd, desired sir Kenelm Digby, as he was going to Lambeth, to tell me that he could not dine with me that day, but desired his business might be remembered. No such man ever dined at my table, to my knowledge. And if any priest would say so to sir Kenelm, how could I possibly hinder it? And sir Kenelm, when this Cooke was examined, was a prisoner in Winchester-house; why was not he examined to sift out this truth, if truth be in it?

6. The sixth Witness was John Thresher, a messenger too: He says, that he took Moss and Goodwin, two priests; and that secretary Windebank took away his Warrant, and dismissed them, saying, he would speak with me about it: And that when he came to me, I was angry with him about the Warrant. Mr. Secretary Windebank will, I hope, be able to answer for his own actions. Why he dismissed the Priests, I know not; but he had great reason to take away his Warrant, and I had a greater reason to be angry with him for it. For no Warrant can issue from the High-Commission Court, but under three of their hands at least. Now Thresher having gotten my hand to the Warrant, never goes for more hands, but proceeds in his office, upon this unwarrantable Warrant. Had not I reason to be offended at this? He says, that at the same time I said that Graye was an ill-tongued fellow, and that if he kept him company, I should not regard him. I had good cause to say this and more, considering how Graye had used me: And I believe no Archbishop would have borne his words. Lastly, he says, That by a Warrant from me he arrested sir Toby Matthew, and that the earl of Strafford stayed him from going to prison, saying, he should answer it before the Lords. Here by the Witness himself it appears that I did my duty. And sir Toby did appear before the lords, as was assumed [assured] he should. In the mean time, I was complained of to the Queen: And a great lady, who perhaps made the complaint, stood by, and made herself merry to hear me chid. The Queen was pleased to send to the Lords, and sir Toby was released. Where my fault was in all this, I do not yet see.

7. The last of these famous Witnesses was Goldsmith; who says nothing, but that one day before the High-Commission Court began, I fore-warned the Messengers of that court of Grave, in regard he was openly spoke against at the Council-Table. Which, all things considered, I had great reason to do. He says likewise, that then Grave's wife tendered me a Petition, which I rejected, saying, "I would meddle with no priest-catching knives." I think his carriage deserved no better of me, than to reject his Petition: but as for the words, I cannot own them: let the Goldsmith look to it that he have not forged them. [Frigidè dictum. W. S. A. C.] And I would very willingly know, whether when the Apostle required, that "an accusation should not be received against an Elder, but under two or three Witnesses." (1 Tim. v. 19.) he had any meaning they should be such as these?

IX. The ninth Charge was about the ordering of Popish Books that were seized, and the disposing of them. The sole Witness here is John Egerton: He says, These Books were delivered to Mr. Mattershead, register to the High-Commission. And I say so too; it was the constant course of the High-Commission to send them thither, and have them kept in that office, till there was a sufficient number of them, and then to burn them. Yea, but he adds, That Mattershead told him they were re-delivered to the owners. This is but a report, and Mattershead is dead, who should make it good. And though this be but a single Witness, and of a dead man's report; yet Mr. Browne thought fit to sum it up with the rest. But surely if any Books were re-delivered to the owners, it was so ordered by the High-Commission, in regard the Books were not found dangerous: From me Mattershead had never any such command. Lastly, he says, He met sir Toby Matthew twice at Lambeth. But he confesses he never saw him with me; and then me it cannot concern.

X. The tenth Charge was concerning the Priests in Newgate; the Witnesses are Mr. Deuel, and Francis Newton. They both agree, and they say, That the Priests there had the best chambers, and liberty to go abroad without keepers. I hope these men do not mean to make the Archbishop of Canterbury Keeper of Newgate. If any man gave them this liberty, he is to be blamed for it, not I, who never knew it till now. Nor do either of these Witnesses say, that they called on me for remedy, or ever did so much as acquaint me with it. And they say this was 12 years since: and I had been Archbishop but seven years when I was committed.

XI. The eleventh Charge was about Words in my Epistle Dedicatory before my Book against Mr. Fisher. The words these: "For, to my remembrance, I have not given him, or his, so much as coarse language." So the Charge is, because I have not given ill words. And here Mr. Nicolas fell foul upon me again for taking such care, that the Whore of Babylon may have nothing but good words, &c. But first, my lords, I have always thought, and do still, that ill language is no proof against an adversary: All the good it can do, is, it may bring scorn upon the author, and work hardness of heart in the adversary, whom he doth or should labour to convert. And this I learned of two eminent fathers in the church, Gregory Nazianzen*, and St. Augustine.† The first would not use it, no not against the Arians, who, as he saith, made open war against the Deity of Christ. Nor would the other against the same adversaries. The one accounts it ignorance, though a fashion taken up by many; and the other loss of time. And here I desired the Lords, that I might read what immediately followed this passage, which was granted: And there, as their Lordships did, so may the reader see, if he please, that though my words were not uncivil, yet in the matter I favoured neither him nor his. And to avoid tediousness, thither I refer the reader, with this, that sometimes men apt enough to accuse me, can plead for this moderation in their own cases, and tell each other that "Christ will not own bitterness in maintaining any way, though consonant to his word." And another "finds just fault both with Papisit and Martin Mar-Prebate, for this reproachful language." And yet it must be a crime in me not to use it.

XII. The last Charge was the commitment of one Ann Hussey to the Sheriff of London. The business was this: She sent one Philip Bambridge to tell me of I know not what Plot against the king (nor I think she neither). Bambridge came to Whitehall toward the evening, and could make nothing of this dangerous Plot. Yet because it pretended so high, I sent him presently to Mr. Secretary Winderbank; I being the next morning to go out of town. The business was called to the Council-Table. When I came back, I was present there. Bambridge produced Ann Hussey, but she could make nothing appear. She says, I thought she was out of her wits. Not so, my lords; but I did not think she was well in them; nor do I yet. And whereas she complains of her imprisonment, it was her own desire she might be committed to the Sheriff; and Mr. Hearn, my counsel here present, was assigned by the lords to take her Examination. Therefore if any particular in this charge stick with your Lordships, I humbly desire Mr. Hearn may supply my want of memory. But it passed over, as well it might. Here this day ended, and I was ordered to attend again July 29.

The Twentieth, and the last Day of my Hearing.

Monday, July 29, 1644. This day I appeared again, and they proceeded upon the

* "Non imperitè docemus, nec adversarios contumelias incessimus, ut plerique faciunt, &c." Greg. Naz. Orat. 32.

† "Abstineamus nos à conviciis, ne tempus inaniter impendamus, &c." Aug. Epist. 177.

‡ In the Antiquaries to Mr. Prynne, p. 14.

§ Sid. Simpson's Anatomist, p. 2, and 6.

Fourteenth Original Article, which follows in these words :

XIV. "That to preserve himself from being questioned for these, and other his traitorous courses, he hath laboured to subvert the Rights of Parliaments, and the ancient course of Parliamentary Proceedings, and by false and malicious slanders to incense his majesty against Parliaments. By which words, counsels and actions, he hath traitorously, and contrary to his allegiance, laboured to alienate the hearts of the king's liege people from his majesty, to set a division between them, and to ruin and destroy his majesty's kingdoms. For which they do impeach him of High-Treason against our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity."

I. The first Charge of this day was prefaced with a Note out of my Diary at May 8, 1626. "That the duke of Buckingham was that day impeached to the lords by the house of commons." And at May 25, "The difference arising in the house of peers about the earl of Arundel's commitment to the Tower without a cause declared." No use made of these, but that I, then bishop of St. David's, took notice of these things. Then the Charge followed; and the first of it was, that I then being of the Lords House, and so to be one of the Duke's Judges, made a speech for him, and corrected his speech in some particulars; and of a Judge made myself an Advocate. Which Mr. Nicolas said was a great offence. I saw not these Papers, and therefore can say nothing, what is, or is not under my hand. But to the thing itself I say first, That if in that speech any particular fault had been found impeaching any Right or Power of Parliament, that I must have answered; but none is charged, but only the bare making of one speech, and the mending of another. And this is a very poor argument of any enmity against Parliaments. Secondly, seeing no fault is charged upon me in particular, it was but the office of a poor friend to a great one, to whom being so much bound as I was I could not refuse so much service, being intreated to it. And, thirdly, I do humbly conceive, that so long as there was nothing done against law, any friend may privately assist another in his difficulties. And I am persuaded, many friends in either house do what they justly may, when such sad occasions happen. And this Answer I gave to Mr. Browne, when he summed up my Charge in the House of Commons.

But Mr. Browne did not begin with this, but with another, here omitted by Mr. Nicolas; though he had pressed it before in the fifteenth day of my Hearing. Dr. Potter writ unto me for my advice in some passages of a Book writ by him (as I remember, against a book intitled, Charity Mistaken): I did not think it fit to amend any thing with my own pen, but put some few things back to his second thoughts, of which this was one; that if he express himself so, he will give as much power to the Parliament in matters of doctrine, as to the Church. This Mr. Browne said, took away all authority from Parliaments, in that kind. But, under favour, this takes away not all, nor any that is due unto them. Not all, for my words are about "giving so much power." Now he that would not have so much given to the one, as the other, doth not take away all from either: not any that is due to them; for my words not meddling simply with Parliamentary Power, as appears by the comparative words "so much," my intention must needs be to have Dr. Potter so to consider of his words, as that, that which is proper to the Church, might not be ascribed to parliaments. And this I conceive is plain in the very letter of the law. The words of the Statute, 1 Eliz. c. 1, are, "Or such as shall hereafter be ordered, judged, or determined to be Heresy, by the High Court of Parliament in this realm, with the assent of the Clergy in their Convocation." Where it is manifest, that the judging and determining part, for the truth or falshood of the doctrine, is in the Church. For "the assent of the Church" or clergy cannot be given, but in Convocation, and so the law requires it. Now, "assent in convocation" cannot be given, but there must precede a debate, a judging, a voting, and a determining. Therefore the "determining power" for the truth or falshood of the doctrine, heresy or no heresy, is in the Church: but "the judging and determining power," for binding to obedience, and for punishing, is in the Parliament, with this Assent of the Clergy. Therefore I humbly conceive the Parliament cannot by law, that is, till this law be first altered, determine the truth of doctrine without this assent of the Church in Convocation; and that such a Synod and Convocation, as is chosen and assembled as the laws and customs of this realm require.

To this Mr. Browne, in his Reply upon me in the House of Commons, said two things: the one, that this branch of the statute of 1 Eliz. was for Heresy only, and the adjudging of that; but meddles not with the Parliament's power in other matters of Religion. If it be for Heresy only, that the Church alone shall not so determine Heresy, as to bring those grievous punishments which the law lays upon it, upon the neck of any subject, without determination in Parliament; then is the Church in Convocation left free also in other matters of Religion, according to the first clause in Magna Charta, which establishes the Church in all her rights. And her main and constant right when that Charter was made and confirmed, "was power of determining in matters of doctrine and discipline of the Church." And this right of the Clergy is not bounded or limited by any law, but this clause of 1 Eliz. that ever I heard of.

The other was, That if this were so, that the Parliament might not meddle with Religion, but with the assent of the Clergy in ‘ Convocation, we should have had no Reformation: for the Bi-hops and the Clergy dissented. First, it is not, as I conceive, to be denied, that the King and his High Court of Parliament may make any law what they please, and by their absolute power may change Religion, Christianity into Turcism, if they please, which God forbid: and the subjects, whose consciences cannot obey, must fly, or endure the penalty of the law. But both King and Parliament are sub gravo i regno, and must answer to God for all such abuse of power. But beside this absolute, there is a limited power; limited, I say, by natural justice and equity, by which no man, no court, can do more, than what he can by right: and according to this power, the Church’s interest must be considered, and that indifferently, as well as the Parliament’s. To apply this to the particular of the Reformation: The Parliament, in the beginning of queen Elizabeth, would not endure Popish Superstition, and by absolute power abolished it,* without any assent of the Clergy in Convocation. And then in her first year, A. D. 1559, she had a Visitation, and set out her Injunctions, to direct and order such of the Clergy as could conform their judgments to the Reformation.

‘ But then so soon as the Clergy was settled, and that a form of doctrine was to be agreed upon, to shew the difference from the Roman superstition, a Synod was called: and in the year 1562, the Articles of Religion were agreed upon, and they were determined and confirmed by Parliament, with the assent of the Clergy in Convocation, and that by a just and orderly power. Nor is the absolute power of king and parliament any way unjust in itself, but may many ways be made such, by misinformation, or otherwise. And this gives the king and the parliament their full power, and yet preserves this Church in her just right: just, and acknowledged by some that loved her not over-well. For the lord Brooke tells us, [Discourse, § 1, c. 9, p. 51], “ That what a Church will take for true doctrine, lies only in Church.” Nay, the very Heathens saw clearly the justice of this; for M. Lucullus was able to say in Tully, “ That the priests were judges of religion, and the senate of law.” [Cic. l. 4, Epist. ad Att. Ep. 2.]

II. The second Proof is, That I made two Speeches for the king, to be spoken or sent to the Parliament that then was; and that they had some sour and ill passages in them. ‘ These Speeches were read to the Lords; and had I now the Copies, I would insert them here, and make the world judge of them.’ First, I might shuffle here, and deny the making of them: for no Proof is offered, but that they are in my hand, and that is no necessary Proof; for I had then many Papers by me written in my own hand, which were not my making, though I transcribed them, as not thinking it fit to trust them in other hands.* But, secondly, I did make them, and I followed the Instructions which were given me, as close as I could, to the very phrases; and being commanded to the service, I hope it shall not now be made my crime that I was trusted by my sovereign. Thirdly, As I did never endeavour to murther the king this way; so the smart passages which Mr. Nicolas says are there, I hope will not be thought such, when it is considered whose mouth was to utter them, and upon what occasion: yet if such they shall be thought, I am heartily sorry for them, and humbly desire they may be passed by. However, they can make no proof that I am an enemy to Parliaments. ‘ And this Answer I gave Mr. Browne in the House of Commons, ‘ for he there omitted it not.’

III. The third Proof that I am an enemy to Parliaments, is the testimony of one Mr. Bland: a forward witness he hath been against me in other particulars. Here he says, That sir Sackvil Crowe shewed him a Paper, in which were 15 or 16 passages concerning Parliaments, with some sour aspersions to boot; and that this paper was subscribed W. Laud. First, my Lords, this man is but a single Witness. Secondly, He says, he had this Paper from sir Sackvil Crowe, and he is now in Turkey, and cannot be produced, that the truth may be known. Thirdly, As I never gave sir Sackvil any such Paper, so had he come by any such, it is more than probable somebody else might have seen it beside Mr. Bland, to make a second Witness. Fourthly, This is a very bold oath; for he swears, the Paper was subscribed with my own hand, W. Laud: Whereas I being then bishop of St. David’s, never writ my name to any thing other than Guil. Meneven. Let him bethink himself of this oath, ne quid gravius dicam. Besides, it may be considered too, that this, with some particulars mentioned by Mr. Bland, was charged in the first Additional Article, and now brought in upon the fourteenth Original; partly to confound me, that I might not see how, or against what to defend myself; and partly to make me secure, because they had quite passed over the first Additional: but especially, because they had therein charged me, that these Propositions of mine had caused that Parliament to be dissolved; and yet in the same Article, and within three lines, it is said expressly, That my Propositions were delivered to my lord duke of Buckingham after that Parliament was dissolved. ‘ So this Article hangs as well together as Mr. Bland’s testimony concerning it. Mr. Browne pressed this also hard against me; but I answered according to the sum of that which is above written.’ And as for the particular said to be in that Paper, were it mine, as it is not, or were the words thought treasonable; as well they cannot be, yet the statute of queen Mary makes it, that no words, nor writings, nor cypherings, nor deeds, shall be Treason, but only such as are within the statute of 25 Edw. 3, and no other. And this statute I then read to the Lords, though I conceive there was no need of it.

IV. The fourth Proof was out of my Diary, at June 15, 1626. The words these: "Post multas agitationes privata malitia in Ducem Buckinghamiæ superavit et suffocavit omnia publica negotia; nihil actum est, sed parliamentum solum." And this was applied first by Mr. Nicolas, and after by Mr. Browne, as if I had charged this private malice upon the Parliament. But this is utterly mistaken: for I spake not this of the Parliament, but of some few particular men, some of the house, 'Men well enough known to the world;' and more, not of the house, but sticklers at large, who went between, and did very ill offices, and so wronged both the King and the Parliament: which is no new thing in England. That my words there cannot be meant of the Parliament, is two ways apparent. First, in that I say, privata malitia, private malice did it; but name not the Parliament, nor charge any thing upon it. Secondly, Because had I spoken this of the Parliament, it could not have been called private, but public malice; nothing being more public in this kingdom, than what is done in and by the Parliament.

V. The fifth Proof was, that a Proclamation for calling in of the Remonstrances, was found in my Study: And Mr. Nicolas said, they conceived I had a hand in it: It was as lawful for me to have and keep this Proclamation, as for any other subject. And their conceit that I had a hand in it, is no Proof. Mr. Nicolas says, that my preferments followed very quick upon this; and infers, that I was preferred for my ill services in this kind. But all the Proof that he brings for this his uncharitable inference, is the comparing of the times; and I shall be content to be tried by that. For by his own acknowledgment this Proclamation came out June 16, 1622, I being then bishop of St. David's: and he confesses I was not made bishop of Bath and Wells till June 20, 1626, full four years after; nor a privy-counsellor till April 29, 1627, which was five years after. Whereas rewards for such services are found to come much quicker. And Mr. Browne, 'when he made his summary Charge, slighted this, and passed it over.

VI. The sixth Proof of my Enmity to Parliaments, was a Paper of Reasons, Mr. Nicolas said, against Parliaments. But, First, when this Paper was shewed and read to the lords, it was found otherwise, and was but a Paper of Hopes and Fears, which were conceived of a Parliament: Not Reasons against them. Secondly, these Fears and Hopes were not of a Parliament then in being, but of one in deliberation, whether it should be or not at that time; which all men know is often disputed, and without offence. And any considering man may privately do it, for his own use and trial of his judgment. Thirdly, in this deliberation, I was not the author of these Fears and Hopes, but an Amanuensis to higher powers, in regard their hands were slower; though commanded also to set down my own opinion, which I did. Fourthly, I was then either a counsellor, or a sworn servant to the king, and required, upon my oath, to deliver truly both my Fears and my Hopes; and I durst not perjure myself: and I hope the keeping of my oath, and doing my duty in that kind, shall not now prejudice my life. Fifthly, these Fears and Hopes, whatever they contain, did relate to the being or not being of that one Parliament only, as appears in the very Paper itself; and the Hopes prevailed, and that Parliament sat. And this Answer I gave to Mr. Browne, 'who made all the use of this Paper, that could be, against me.'

Here Mr. Nicolas brings in Mr. Bland again, who says, that the four last heads in this Paper, were in that Paper also which was shewed him. This single Witness hath an excellent memory, that can remember four heads of a Paper punctually sixteen years ago. I asked why he did not complain of me then, when his memory was fresher, and his witness sir Sackvil Crowe nearer. 'Twas replied, "He durst not for my greatness." Why, but he knows well enough, that Parliaments, when they have a just cause of proceeding, do neither fear nor spare any man's greatness. And is it probable, that they which spared not the Duke of Buckingham's greatness, would have feared mine, being then a poor bishop of Bath and Wells? And a Parliament was held again in the very next year, 1627, so that he wanted not opportunity to complain. Nor can I believe any opinion of my supposed greatness stopped him: Let him look into himself.

Then Mr. Nicolas told the lords with great vehemency what venom there was in this Paper, which, he said, was in every particular. A right spider I see now he is, venom out of any thing.

[Here is a void space left, I suppose, with design to have the Paper (here mentioned) to be inserted: which was not done.]

VII. The seventh Proof out of my Diary at March 1628, where the words are "That the Parliament which was dissolved March 10, 1628, sought my ruin." 'This had been a better argument to prove Parliaments an enemy to me, than me to them.' But nothing can be meant by this, but that my ruin was sought in that Parliament by some particular men whose edge was too keen against me. And this appears in my Diary at June 14, preceding; at which time I was put into a Remonstrance, which, had I been found any way guilty, must needs have ruined me. But by God's blessing, the very same day I did clearly acquit myself in open Parliament, of all the expansions cast upon me about Dr. Madwar-ing's Sermons. 'This particular Mr. Browne

' charged upon me, and I answered as before :
' But Mr. Nicolas did not touch upon it this ' day.'

VIII. The eighth Proof that I was an Enemy to Parliaments, was taken from some marginal notes, which I had made upon a printed speech of sir Benjamin Rudyard, which he spake in the Parliament held anno 1627. Mr. Nicolas named four; but Mr. Browne, in summing up my Charge, insisted only upon two. The word "reducing;" and the "aim of gaining from the king." Sir Benjamin Rudyard is my old acquaintance, and a very worthy member of that house, both now and then. But be a man never so worthy, may he not use some phrase amiss? Or if he do, may not I or another observe, yea, check at it, but by-and-by I must be an Enemy to Parliaments?
Is there any argument in this? I said a gentleman in the House of Commons used an ill phrase in a speech of his in that house, therefore I am an Enemy to the Parliament in which he spake it? Say I am mistaken, and not lie, and that the phrase is without exception; yet this is but my error in judgment, no proof of enmity, either to the Parliament, or him that spake it. That which I said was this: First, "that the word reducing, as there placed, was a hard phrase." Let any man view that speech considerately, and tell me whether it be not so. Secondly, "that I dislike the word gaining being between the king and his people in Parliament." For (as I humbly conceive) there will always be work enough for both to join for the public good; and well it can never be, if they which should so join, do labour only to gain one from another.
For if the king shall labour to gain upon the liberty or property of the subject, or the subjects in Parliament labour to gain from the just power and prerogative of the king; can any prudent man think the public can thrive therewhile? Yea, but they say, that my marginal note upon this phrase was, that this gaining was the aim of the Lower House. If my note be so, yet that cannot be otherwise understood, than that according to this expression, this must be their aim. 'And the reason why
' I found fault with this phrase was, because I ' saw this must follow out of it. So, under ' favour, I was not so bold with this gentle' man, as he was with the house in using this ' speech.'

IX. The next Proof was, That I found fault with eight Bills that were then in the house.
This is a very poor proof of my Enmity to Parliaments, that I disliked some Bills proposed in them; though there be no proof of this urged at all, save only that I writ the time, May 27, 1628, upon the Paper where the Bills were mentioned. And I hope, to mention the time when any Bills were proposed, is not to dislike the Bills. But say I did dislike them, what then?
It is lawful for any Member of the House (and such was I then) to take exceptions which he thinks are just, against any Bill before it pass.

And shall not that which is lawful for any man to do, be lawful for me? Beside, almost all Bills are put in by private persons: The House is not interested in them, till they are passed and voted by them: So that till then any man may spend his judgment upon the Bill, without any wrong at all to the Parliament. 'Mr. Browne saw ' this well enough, and therefore vouchsafed not ' so much as to name it.'

X. The tenth Proof was, That I made an Answer to the Remonstrance set out by Parliament, anno 1628. This was pressed before, and here it is laid hold of on all hands, to make as full a cry as it can against me. 'Mr. Nico' las presses it here aloud, as he doth all things,
' and Mr. Browne lays it close in summing up
' the Charge.' My Answer the same to both.
1. They charge me, That I made that Answer to the Remonstrance which came forth anno 1628. I did this by the king's command, and upon such instructions as were given me. And as I obeyed the command, so did I closely pursue my instructions: and I durst do no other;
for I was then upon my oath as a sworn counsellor, and so employed in that service. And I hope no man will conceive, that I would, without such a command, have undertaken such a kind of service. 2. Yea, but they say, It doth not appear that I had any such command. Yes, that appears as plainly as that I made it. For they bring no proof that I made it, but because the Indorsement upon that Paper is in my hand, and calls it my Answer: and the same Indorsement says, I made it by his majesty's command.
So either the Indorsement is no sufficient proof for the one, or if it be, it is sufficient for both;
and must needs witness the one for me with the same strength that it doth the other against me. For a kind of confession that Indorsement is, and must therefore not be broken, but be taken with all its qualities. 3. Thirdly, They say there are some sour and bitter passages in the Answer. It is more than I perceived, if it be so. Nor was any sourness intended. And I hope no such passages found in it, the person considered in whose name the Answer was made. The expressions indeed might have been too big for a subject's mouth. 4. Fourthly, They say I was displeas'd that this Answer was not printed; but all the Proof for it is, that it is written upon the Paper, that there was an intention to print it, but that I know not what hindered it. 'But this argument can never ' conclude: John a Nokes knows not who hin' dered the printing of a Jewish catechism in ' England, therefore he was displeas'd the cate' chism was not printed. But I see every foot
' can help to trample him that is down.' Yea, but they instanced in three particulars, which they charged severally upon me. The first particular was, That by this Remonstrance they sought to fill our people's hearts more than our ears. A second was, That they swelled to that bigness, till they brake themselves. But new ther of these strike at any right or privilege of Parliaments; they only tax some abuses, which were conceived to be in the miscarriage of that one Parliament. And both these particulars were in my instructions. And though I have ever honoured Parliaments, and ever shall, yet I cannot think them infallible. General councils have greater promises than they, yet they may err. 'And when a Parliament, by what ill accident soever, comes to err, may not their king tell them of it? or must every passage in his Answer be sour, that pleases not?' And for that Remonstrance, whither it tended, let the world judge; the office is too dangerous for me. The third particular was, the excusing of Ireland, and the growth of Popery there, of which that Remonstrance, A. D. 1628, complained. This was in the instructions too. And I had reason to think, the king and his council understood the state of Ireland, for religion and other affairs, as well as other men. And I was the more easily led into the belief, that religion was much at one state in Ireland in queen Elizabeth's and king James's time, and now; because ever since I understood any thing of those Irish affairs, I still heard the same complaints that were now made. For in all these times they had their Romish Hierarchy; submitted to their Government; paid them Tythes; came not to the Protestant Churches; and rebelled under Tyrone, under pretence of Religion. And I do not conceive they have gone beyond this now. 'If they have, let them answer it who have occasioned it.' But to prove this great new Growth of Popery there, they produced first a Proclamation from the state in Ireland, dated April 1, 1629. Then a Letter of the bishop of Kilmore's to myself, dated April 1, 1630. Thirdly, a Complaint made to the state there, A. D. 1633, of this Growth, so that I could not but know it. Most true; when these informations came, I could not but know it: But look upon their date, and you shall find that all of them came after this Answer was made to the Remonstrance, and therefore could not possibly be foreseen by me, without the gift of prophecy. Then they produced a Letter of the earl of Strafford's in which he communicated to me, March 1633, That to mould the Lower House there, and to rule them the better, he had got them to be chosen of an equal number of Protestants and Papists. 'And here Mr. Maynard, who pressed this point of religion hard upon me, began to fall foul upon this policy of the earl of Strafford; and himself yet brake off with this, "But he is gone." Then he fell upon me as a man likely to approve those ways, because he desired the Letter might be communicated to me. This Letter was not written to me, as appears by the Charge itself: For if it had, no man else needed to communicate it to me. And I would fain know, how I could help any of this? If that lord would write any thing to me himself, or communicate any thing to another that should acquaint me with it, was it in my power to hinder either of these? And there were other passages in this Letter, for which, I conceive, his Lordship desired the communication of that Letter to me, much more than the particular urged, which could no way relate unto me. 'And Mr. Browne in his sum said very little, if any thing, to this business of Ireland.'

XI. After this Mr. Nicolas, who would have nothing forgot that might help to multiply clamour against me, fell upon five particulars, which he did but name, and left the Lords to their Notes. Four of these five were handled before. As first, the words, "if the parliament prove peevish." Secondly, "that the king might use his own power." Thirdly, the violation of the Petition of Right. Fourthly, the Canons. Fifthly, that I set Spies about the Election of Parliament-Men in Gloucestershire: and for this last, they produced a Letter of one Allibon to Dr. Heylin. To the four first, I referred the Lords to their Notes of my Answers, as they did. To this last, that Mr. Allibon is a mere stranger to me, I know not the man. And it is not likely I should employ a stranger in such a business. The Letter was sent to Dr. Heylin, and if there were any discovery in it of jugglings there in those Elections (as too often there are), and if Dr. Heylin sent me those letters, as desirous I should see what practices are abroad, what fault is there in him or me for this?

XII. Then Mr. Nicolas would not omit that which he thought might disgrace and discontent me, though it could no way be drawn to be any accusation: it was out of my Diary, at Oct. 27, 1640, this Parliament being then ready to begin. The passage there is, "That going into my upper Study, to send away some Manuscripts to Oxford, I found my picture which hung there privately, fallen down upon the face, and lying on the floor; I am almost every day threatened with my ruin, God grant this be no omen of it!" The accident is true; and having so many libels causelessly thrown out against me, and hearing so many ways as I did, that my ruin was plotted, I had reason to apprehend it. But I apprehended it without passion, and with looking up to God, that it might not be ominous to me. 'What is this man angry at? Or why is this produced?'

XIII. But though I cannot tell why this was produced, yet the next was urged only to incense your lordships against me: It is in my Diary again, at Feb. 11, 1640, where Mr. Nicolas says confidently, I did abuse your lordships, and accuse you of injustice. My lords, what I said in my Diary, appears not; if it did appear whole and altogether, I doubt not but it alone would abundantly satisfy your lordships. But that passage is more than half burnt out (as is to be seen), whether of purpose by Mr. Prynne, or casually, I cannot tell: yet the passage is confidently made up, and read to your lordships, as if nothing were wanting. For the thing itself, the close of my words is this: "So I see what justice I may expect, since here is a resolution taken, not only before my answer, but before my charge is brought up against me." Which words can traduce no man's justice: First, because they depend upon an if; if the Parliament-man there mentioned told me truth, that such a resolution was taken. And secondly, Because it can be no justice in any men, he the sentence never so moderate in itself, to take up a resolution what sentence shall pass, before Answer given, or Charge put: For else a man may be punished first, and tried after, which is contrary to all rules of justice. [Aug. L. 13, de Trin. c. 13.] And therefore if such a resolution were taken (as I believe not), I might well say that which followed after.

XIV. Then was produced a Paper concerning the subsidies or aids which had been given in divers parliaments, in which it is said, at the beginning of it, "That Magna Charta had an obscure birth, and was fostered by an ill nurse." 'I believe that no man that knows Mr. Nicolas, thinks that he spake softly upon this.' No, he spake loud enough: What laws would I spare, that spake thus of Magna Charta? First, here is no proof offered that this Paper is my collection, but only that it is in my hand: By which argument, as is said before, I may be made the author of any thing; and so may any scholar, that is able and willing to inform himself. Secondly, The main draught of that Paper is not in my hand, though some notes upon it be. Thirdly, There are Littleton, and other lawyers, quoted in that Paper, authors which I never read. Nor is this now any disgrace to Magna Charta, that it had an obscure birth; For say the difficulties of the times brought it obscurely forth, that is no blemish to the credit and honour to which it hath for many ages attained. Not only their laws, but the greatest empires that have been in the world, some of them have had obscure beginnings: Witness the Roman Empire. Fourthly, What if our stories agree upon it, that it had an obscure birth, and a worse nurse? What if some law-books (which Mr. Nicolas never read), and those of good account, use almost the same words of Magna Charta, which are in that Paper? Shall the same words be history and law in them, and treason in me? And somewhat certainly there is in it, 'That Mr. Browne, when he gave his summary Charge against me, first to the lords, and after in the house of commons, quite omitted this particular. Sure I believe he found nothing was in the Paper but known truth, and so passed it over, else he would never have denied a vindication to Magna Charta.' [Here is a void space left in the margin, with design, I suppose, to insert therein some passages out of law-books concerning the obscure birth of Magna Charta; which space was not filled up. H. W.]

XV. After all this, Mr. Nicolas concludes with a Dream, which he says was mine. The Dream, he says, was, that I should come to greater preferment in the church, and power in the state, than any man of my birth and calling had done before me, but that in the end I should be hanged. First, my lords, if I had had any such Dream, it is no proof of any thing against me. Dreams are not in the power of him that hath them, but in the unruliness of the fancy, which in broken sleep wanders which way it pleases, and shapes what it pleases; Numb. 11. But this Dream is brought in, as the fall of my picture was, to make me a scorn to your lordships and the people, and to try whether any thing will yet at last break my patience. This Dream is reported here according to Mr. Prynne's edition of my Diary, somewhat different from that which Mr. Prynne printed in a former book of his: But the beginning and the end agree. From Mr. Prynne, Culmer hath taken and printed it. And Mr. Prynne confessed before the lords, that one Mr. Badger, an attorney at law, a kinsman of mine, told it him. The truth, my lords, is this; This Badger married a near kinswoman of mine; he was a notorious separatist, and so nearer in affection to Mr. Prynne, than to me in alliance. This man came one day to me to Lambeth, and told me privately, which was more manners than usually the bold man had, that he heard I had such a Dream when I was young, in Oxford; I protested to him there was no such thing, and that some malicious fellow or other had set him on work to come and abuse me to my face. He seemed satisfied; But going to visit Mr. Prynne, then in the Tower, he told it him; and Mr. Prynne, without further proof, prints it in the next book he set out. When I saw it in print, and found that some in court took notice of it, I resolved to acquaint his majesty how I was used; and meeting with the earl of Pembroke, then lord chamberlain, and my great friend, as he pretended (the king being not then come forth of his chamber), I told his lordship how I was used; and when the king came forth, I told it him also. But the earl of Pembroke, then present in the house, and called up by them for a witness, forgetting the circumstances, but remembering the thing, took it upon his honour, that I said nothing of Mr. Prynne's printing it, but that I told him absolutely I had this Dream. Now, God forgive his lordship! I was much troubled in myself to hear him to take it upon his dishonour (for so it was), and yet unwilling, knowing his violence, to contest with him in that place, and in my condition; and observing what spleen he hath lately shewed against me, I stood a little still to gather up myself. When Mr. Nicolas, before I could make any reply, fell on with great earnestness, and told the lords, That the fore-part of my Dream was found true, to the great hurt of both church and state; and that he hoped they would now make good the latter, "That I might be hanged." To which I answered, That I had not forgotten our Saviour's prediction, St. John xvi. 33. "That in the world we should be sure to meet with affliction." Nor his prayer:

“ Father, forgive these men, for they know not what they do;” St. Luke xxiii. 24. No; nor is that out of my memory which St. Paul speaks, 1 Cor. iv. 3, de humano die. But for the public; with this I shall conclude; “ God of his infinite mercy bless the king and his people with love, and peace, and piety, and plenty, which is the worst I ever wished or endeavoured, whatsoever it shall please God shall become of me; to whose blessed will and pleasure, in all humility, I submit myself.” And here ended this last day of my Trial. But before I went from the bar, I made three motions to the lords; The one, That I might have a day to make a Recapitulation of this long and various Charge, or of the chief heads of it, that it might appear in a body together. The other, That after this, my counsel might have a day to speak to all points of law incident to my cause. The third, That they would be pleased to remember, that I had pleaded the Act of Oblivion to the thirteenth Original Article. Mr. Nicolas said, they would acquaint their house with it. And the lords promised to take all into consideration. And so I was dismissed sine die.

“ But here I may not go off from this Dream so, since Mr. Prynne hath printed it at the end of my Diary: where he shamelessly says, this Dream was attested from my own mouth at my Trial in the lords’ house. For I have set down all that passed exactly. Nor did I then give any attestation to it; only before I could gather up myself to answer the earl of Pembroke in a fitting manner, and not to hurt myself, Mr. Nicolas fell upon me with that unchristian bitterness, as diverted me from the Earl, to answer him. But once for all, and to satisfy any man that desires it, that is all true which I have here set down concerning this Dream: and upon my christianity and hope of future salvation, I never had this Dream, nor any like it; nor did I ever tell it this lord, or any other, any other way than in relation to Badger and Prynne, as is before related. And sure if I had had such a Dream, I should not have had so little discretion as to tell it any man, least of all to pour it into that sieve, the earl of Pembroke. For that which follows, and wherein his charity and words are almost the same with those of Mr. Nicolas, I gave him the same answer, and forgiving him all his most unchristian and insatiable malice against me, leave myself in the hands of God, not in his.’

Aug. 23, 1644, I received an Order from the Lords, that if I had a mind to make a Recapitulation, as I had formerly desired, of my long and various Charge, I should provide myself for it against Monday next (this Order came upon Friday); and that I should give in my Answer the next morning what I meant to do. The next day, Aug. 24, in obedience to this Order, I gave in my Answer; which was humble thanks that I might have liberty to make it, referring the day to their honourable consideration, wish this, that Monday next was a very short time for such a collection. Upon this Answer an Order was presently made, that I should provide to make my Recapitulation upon Monday, September 2. And about this time, the certain day I know not, it was resolved in the house of commons, that according to my plea I should enjoy the benefit of the Act of Oblivion, and not be put to answer the thirteenth Original Article, concerning the Scottish business. And truly, I bless God for it, I did not desire the benefit of that act for any sense of guiltiness which I had in myself; but in consideration of the times, and the malice of the now potent faction, which being implacable towards me, I could not think it wisdom to lay by any such power as might help to secure me. Yet in the former part of my history, when I had good reason to think I should not be called to answer such general Articles, I have set down my Answer to each of them, as much as generals can be answered. And thereby I hope my innocency will appear to this thirteenth Article also.

Then came Monday, September 2. And, according to the Order of the Lords, I made the Recapitulation of my whole Cause, in matters of greatest moment, in this form following. But so soon as I came to the bar, I saw every lord present with a new thin book in folio, in a blue coat. I heard that morning, that Mr. Prynne had printed my Diary, and published it to the world to disgrace me. Some Notes of his own are made upon it. The first and the last are two desperate untruths, besides some others. This was the Book then in the lords’ hands; and I assure myself that time picked for it, that the sight of it might damp me, and disenable me to speak. I confess I was a little troubled at it. But after I had gathered up myself, and looked up to God, I went out to the business of the day, and thus I spake.

MY RECAPITULATION.

“ My Lords, my Hearing began March 12, 1643-4, and continued to the end of July. In this time I was heard before your lordships, with much honour and patience, 20 days: and sent back without Hearing, by reason of your lordships greater employments, 12 days: The rest were taken up with providing the Charge against me.

“ And now, my lords, being come near an end, I am by your grace and favour, and the leave of these gentlemen of the honourable House of Commons, to represent to your lordships and your memories, a brief sum of my Answers to this long and various Charge: in which I shall not only endeavour, but perform also all possible brevity. And as with much thankfulness I acknowledge myself bound to your lordships for your patience; so I cannot doubt but that I shall be as much obliged for your justice, in what I am innocent from crime: and for your clemency, in what the common frailty of mankind hath made me err. And I humbly desire your lordships to look upon the whole business with honourable care of my calling, of my age, of my long imprisonment, of my sufferings in my estate, and of my patience in and through this whole affliction; the sequestration having been upon my estate above two years. In which, notwithstanding, I may not omit to give thanks for the relief which my Petitions found, for my present necessities in this time of my hearing, at your honourable hands.

1. First, then, I humbly desire your lordships to remember the generality, and, by occasion of that, the uncertainty of almost every Article charged upon me: which hath cast me into great straits all along in making my Defence.

2. Next, That your lordships will be pleased to consider what a short space, upon each day's hearing, hath been allowed me to make my Answer to the many Charges in each several day laid against me: indeed, some days scarce time enough to peruse the Evidence, much less to make, and then to review and weigh my Answers: especially considering, to my greatest grief, that such a Charge should be brought up against me from so great and honourable a body as the Commons of England. In regard of which, and all other sad occasions, I did at first, and do still in all humility desire, that in all particulars concerning law, my counsel may be heard before your lordships proceed to sentence; and that a day may be assigned for my counsel accordingly.

3. Thirdly, I heartily pray also, that it may be taken into your honourable consideration, how I have all manner of ways been sifted to the very bran, for that, whatever it amounts to, which stands in charge against me.

(1.) The key and use of my study at Lambeth, Books and Papers taken from me.

(2.) A search upon me at the Tower, made by Mr. Prynne, and 21 bundles of Papers, prepared for my Defence, taken from me, and not three bundles restored to me again. This search made before any particular Articles were brought up against me. My very pockets searched; and my Diary, nay, my very Prayer Book taken from me, and after used against me: and that in some cases not to prove, but to make a Charge. Yet I am thus far glad, even for this sad accident: for by my Diary your lordships have seen the passages of my life; and by my Prayer Book the greatest secrets between God and my soul. So that you may be sure you have me at the very bottom. Yet, blessed be God, no disloyalty is found in the one; no popery in the other.

(3.) That all Books of Council-Table, Star-Chamber, High-Commission, Signet-Office, my own Registeries, and the Registeries of Oxford and Cambridge, have been most exquisitely searched for matter against me, and kept from me and my use, and so affording me no help towards my Defence.

(4.) I humbly desire your lordships to remember in the fourth place, that the things wherein I took great pains, and all for the public good and honour of this kingdom and church, without any the least eye to my own particular, nay, with my own great and large expences, have been objected against me as crimes: as, namely, the Repair of St. Paul's, and the settling of the Statutes of the University of Oxford.

(1.) For St. Paul's: Not the Repair itself, they say (no, for very shame they dare not say that, though that be it which galls the faction); but the demolishing the houses which stood about it. Yea, but without taking down of these houses, it was not possible to come at the church to repair it; which is a known truth. And they were taken down by Commission under the broad-seal. And the tenants had valuable consideration for their several interests, according to the number of their years remaining, and according to the judgment of commissioners named for that purpose, and named by his majesty and the lords, not by me: nor did I ever so much as sit with them about this business. And if the Commission itself were any way illegal, as they urge it is, that must reflect upon them whose office was to draw and seal it; not on me, who understood not the legality or illegality of such commissions: nor did I desire that any one circumstance against law should be put into it; nor is any such thing so much as offered in proof against me. And because it was pressed, that these houses could not be pulled down but by order of parliament, and not by the king's commission alone; I did here first read in part, and afterwards, according to a salvo granted me, deliver into the court three records, two in Edward 1.'s time, and one in Edward 3.'s time, [1 Pars Pat. de an. 45 Ed. 3, m. 34], in which are these words: " Auторitate nostra regali, prout opus fuerit, cessantibus quibuscunque appellacionum et reclamacionum difugis, juris, scripti, aut patrie strepitu procedatis; nova edificia quæ, &c. auoveri, et divelli penitus faciatis, &c." And a little after, " Quousque per nos cum deliberacione et avisamento nostri consilii super hoc aliter fuerit ordinatum," &c. Here is no staying for a Parliament; here is no recompence given; here is barring of all appeal, nay, all remedy of law, though written. And all this by the king's own authority, with the advice of his council. And is a far more moderate way taken by me, yet under the same authority, and for the removal of far greater abuses, and for a more noble end, become Treason?

(2.) As for the Statutes of Oxford, the circumstances charged against me are many; and therefore I crave leave to refer myself to what I had already answered therein.

5. Fifthly, Many of the witnesses brought against me in this business are more than suspected sectaries and separatists from the Church; which by my place I was to punish, and that exasperated them against me, whereas by law, [Cod. l. 1, tit. 5, l. 12, and 21,

‘ Confer. at Hampton Court, p. 26], no Schismatic ought to be received against his Bishop. And many of these are witnesses in their own causes, and pre-examined before they come in court; at which pre-examination I was not present, nor any for me, to cross-interrogate. Nay, many causes which took up divers days of Hearing in Star-Chamber, High-Commission, and at Council-Table, are now upon the sudden easily overturned by the Depositions of the Parties themselves. And upon what law this is grounded, I humbly submit to your lordships. And such as these are the causes of Mr. Prynne, Mr. Burton, Mr. Wilson, alderman Chambers, Mr. Vassal, Mr. Waker, Mr. Huntly, Mr. Foxlye, and many other. Where I humbly represent also, how impossible it is for any man that sits as a judge to give an account of all the several motives which directed his conscience in so divers causes, and so many years past, as these have been, and where so many witnesses have been examined, as have been here produced against me: My Lords, above 150 witnesses, and some of them three, four, six times over; and Mr. Prynne I know not how often. Whereas the civil law says expressly, That “the judges should moderate things so, that no man should be oppressed by the multitude of witnesses; which is a kind of proof too, that they which so do, distrust the truth and goodness of their cause.”* Besides, my Lords, in all matters which came before me I have done nothing, to the uttermost of my understanding, but what might conduce to the peace and welfare of this kingdom, and the maintenance of the doctrine and discipline of this Church established by law; and under which God hath blessed this state with so great peace and plenty, as other neighbouring nations have looked upon with admiration. And what miseries the overthrow of it, which God in mercy forbid, may produce, he alone knows.

‘ 6. Sixthly, my Lords, there have been many and different Charges laid upon me about words. But many of them, if spoken, were only passionate and hasty; and such, upon what occasion soever drawn from me, and I have had all manner of provocations put upon me, may, among human errors, be pardoned unto me, if so it please your lordships. But for such as may seem to be of a higher nature, as those witnessed by sir Henry Vane the elder, I gave my answer again now fully to the Lords, but shall not need to repeat it here.

‘ 7. Seventhly, Then, my lords, for my actions; Not only my own, but other mens have been heavily charged against me in

* “Judices moderentur, &c. ne effrenata potestate ad vexandos homines superflua multitudo testium protrahatur.” Dig. l. 22, tit. 5, l. 1, § 2. “Adde et hanc rationem, quod qui prædicta licentia abutuntur, veniunt in suspicionem, quod non satis confidunt veritati.” Gloss. Ibid.

‘ many particulars, and that criminally, and I hope your lordships will think illegally: As secretary Windebank’s, bishop Mountague’s, my chaplains, Dr. Heylin’s, Dr. Cosen’s, Dr. Pocklington’s, Dr. Dove’s, Mr. Shelford’s, and divers others: And many of these Charges look back into many years past. Whereas the act made this present parliament takes no notice of, nor punishes any man for any thing done and past at the Council-Table, Star-Chamber, or High-Commission, much less doth it make any thing Treason. And out of this act I am no way excepted. Besides (as I have often pleaded), all acts done in the Star-Chamber, at Council-Table, High-Commission, or Convocation, are all joint acts of that body in and by which they were done; and cannot by any law be singly put upon me, it being a known rule of the law, “Refertur ad universos quod publice fit per majorem partem.” And Mr. Prynne himself can stand upon this rule against the Independents, and tell us, that the major voice or party ought to over-rule and bind the less; and he quotes scripture for it too. In which place, that which is done by the major part is ascribed to all; not laid upon any one, as here upon me. And in some of these courts, Star-Chamber especially, and Council-Table, I was accompanied with persons of great honour, knowledge, and experience, judges, and others; And it is to me strange, and will seem so to future ages, that one and the same act shall be Treason in me, and not the least crime, nay, nor misdemeanor in any other. And yet no proof hath been offered that I solicited any man to concur with me; and almost all the votes given preceded mine, so that mine could lead no man.

8. After this I answered to divers other particulars, as namely, to the Canons, both as they concerned aid to the king, and as they looked upon matters of the church and religion.

9. To the Charge about Prohibitions.

10. To the base Charge about Bribery. But pass them over here, as being answered before: Whither I may refer the reader now, though I could not the lords then.

‘ 11. My lords, after this came in the long and various Charge of my usurping Papal Power, and no less than a design to bring in all the Corruptions of Popery, to the utter overthrow of the Protestant Religion established in England. And this they went about to prove,

‘ (1.) By my Windows in the Chapel: An argument as brittle as the glass in which the pictures are.

‘ (2.) By Pictures in my Gallery; Which were there before the house was mine, and so proved to your lordships.

‘ (3.) By Reverence done in my Chapel; As if it were not due to God, especially in his church; and done it was not to any other person or thing.

‘ (4.) By Consecration of Churches; Which was long before Popery came into the world;

‘as was also the care of safe laying up of all hallowed and sacred things. For which, I desire your lordships I may read a short passage out of sir Walter Raleigh’s History; the rather because written by a lay-man, and since the times of Reformation.’

But this Mr. Maynard excepted against, both as new matter, and because I had not the Book present, though the Paper thence transcribed was offered to be attested by oath to be a true Copy. But though I could not be suffered to read it then, yet here it follows: ‘So sacred was the moveable Temple of God, and with such reverence guarded and transported, as 22,000 persons were dedicated to the service and attendance thereof, of which 8,580 had the peculiar charge, according to their several offices and functions, the particulars whereof are in the third and fourth of Numbers. The reverend care which Moses the prophet and chosen servant of God had in all that belonged even to the outward and least parts of the tabernacle, ark, and sanctuary, witnessed well the inward and most humble zeal borne toward God himself. The industry used in the framing thereof, and every and the least part thereof, the curious workmanship thereon bestowed, the exceeding charge and expence in the provisions, the dutiful observance in laying up and preserving the holy vessels, the solemn removing thereof, the vigilant attendance thereon, and the provident defence of the same, which all ages have in some degree imitated, is now so forgotten and cast away, in this superfluous age, by those of the Family, by the Anabaptists, Brownists, and other sectaries, as all costs and care bestowed and had of the church, wherein God is to be served and worshipped, is accounted a kind of popery, and as proceeding from an idolatrous disposition. Inasmuch, as time would soon bring to pass (if it were not resisted) that God would be turned out of churches into barns, and from thence again into the fields and mountains, and under the hedges; and the office of the ministry (robbed of all dignity and respect) be as contemptible as those places; all order, discipline, and church-government, left to newness of opinion and men’s fancies; Yea, and soon after as many kinds of religions would spring up, as there are parish-churches, &c.’ Do ye not think somebody set Mr. Maynard on to prohibit the reading out of this passage, as foreseeing whether it tended? For I had read one third part of it, before I had the stop put unto me.

‘(5.) But they went on with their proof, by my censuring of good men, that is, separatists and refractory persons.

‘(6.) By my chaplains expunging some things out of books which made against the Papists. It may be, if my Chaplains, whom it concerns, had liberty to answer, they were such passages as could not be made good against the Papists: and then it is far better they should be out than in. For as ‘St. Augustin* observed in his, and we find it true in our time, “The inconvenience is great, which comes to the church and religion by bold affirmers.” Nay, he is at a satis dici non potest, the mischief is so great as cannot be expressed.

‘(7.) Then by altering some things in a Sermon of Dr. Sibthorp’s. But my answer formerly given will shew I had cause.

‘(8.) By my preferment of unworthy men. So unworthy, as that they would be famous both for life and learning, were they in any other Protestant Church in Christendom. And they are so popishly affected, as that having suffered much both in state and reputation (since this persecution of the Clergy began; for less it hath not been), no one of them is altered in judgment, or fallen into any liking with the Church of Rome.

‘(9.) By the Overthrow of the Feoffment; But that was done by Judgment in the Exchequer, to which I referred myself. And if the Judgment there given be right, there is no fault in any man; If it were wrong, the fault was in the judges, not in me; I solicited none of them.

‘(10.) By a passage in my Book, where I say, The religion of the Papists and ours is one; But that is expressed at large, only because both are Christianity; and no man, I hope, will deny that Papists are Christians. As for their notorious failings in Christianity, I have in the same Book said enough to them.

‘(11.) By a testimony of Mr. Burton’s and Mr. Lane’s, that I should say, “we and the Church of Rome did not differ in fundamentals, but in circumstantialia.” [This I here followed at large; but, to avoid tedious repetition, refer my reader to the place where it is answered.]

‘(12.) By my making the Dutch Churches to be of another religion. But this is mistaken, as my answer will shew the reader; and if they do not make themselves of another religion, I shall never endeavour to make them.

‘(13.) By a pack of such witnesses, as were never produced against any man of my place and calling; Messengers and Pursuivants, and such as have shitted their Religion to and again; Pillory-Men and Bawds; and these the men that must prove my Correspondence with Priests.

‘(14.) In the midst of these, upon occasion of the Ceremonies at the Coronation, it was pressed against me, “that I had altered the king’s oath.”

‘(15.) And last of all, “that I had shewed myself an Enemy to Parliaments.” [Upon both these I did very much enlarge myself; But here also, that I may not be a burden in repeating the same things, I desire the reader to look upon them in their proper places, where I doubt not but my answer will give him full satisfaction, that I did not the one, nor am the other.]

* “Quid molestiæ et tristitiæ ingrant prudentibus fratribus temerarii assertores, satis dici non potest.” Aug. 1. de Gen. ad Lit. C. 19.

‘But, my lords, there are other strange arguments produced against me, to prove my compliance with Rome, which I most humbly desire your lordships may not be forgotten.

‘1. As, first, my lords, it hath been charged upon me, that I made the oath recited in the first of the late Canons; one clause whereof is this; “that I will never give my consent to subject this Church to the usurpations and superstitions of the Church of Rome.” Whence the argument drawn against me must be this, and can be no other: that I did endeavour to bring in Popery, because I made and took a solemn oath, never to give my consent to subject this Church of England to the usurpations and superstitions of the Church of Rome. I beseech your lordships mark the force of this argument; and they which follow are as pregnant against me.

‘2. Secondly, my Book against Fisher hath been charged against me; where the argument must lie thus: I have endeavoured to advance Popery, because I have written against it: and with what strength I have written against it, I leave posterity to judge, when the envy which now overloads me, shall be buried with me. This I will say with St. Gregory Nazianzen (whose success at Constantinople was not much unlike mine here, save that his life was not sought), “I never laboured for peace, to the wrong and detriment of Christian verity;” nor I hope ever shall. [And let the Church of England look to it: for in great humility I crave to write this (though then was no time to speak it), that the Church of England must leave the way it is now going, and come back to that way of defence which I have followed in my Book, or she shall never be able to justify her separation from the Church of Rome.]

‘3. Thirdly, all the late Canons have been charged against me; and the argument which is drawn from thence, must lie thus: The third of these Canons for suppressing the Growth of Popery, is the most full and strict Canon that ever was made against it in the Church of England; therefore I that made this Canon to keep it out, am guilty of endeavouring to keep it in.

‘4. Fourthly, I have by my industry, and God’s great blessing upon my labours, stayed as many from going, and reduced to the Church of England as many that were gone to Rome, as I believe any minister in England can truly say he hath done: I named them before, and had scorn enough put upon me for it, as your lordships could not but both see and hear; where the argument lies thus: I converted many from Popery, and settled them in the religion established in England; therefore I laboured to bring in Popery, which out of all doubt can be no sober man’s way.

‘5. Fifthly, the Plot discovered to sir William Boswell and myself, by Andreas ab Habernfield, hath been charged against me: That Plot for altering of religion, and by what ways, your lordships have heard already, and is to be seen at full in Rome’s Master-piece. Now if this Plot in the issue proved nothing but a confused information, and no proof of any particular, as indeed it did; what’s become of Rome’s Master-piece? But if it had any reality in it, as it appeared to be a sad Plot, not only to me, but to all men that saw the short propositions which were first sent, with an absolute undertaking to prove them; then it appears expressly, that I was in danger of my life, for stiffly opposing the bringing in of Popery; and that there was no hope to alter religion in England, till I was taken out of the way. And though in conclusion the proofs failed, yet what was consulted, and it seems resolved, concerning in me, is plain enough. And then the argument against me lies thus: There’s no hope to bring in Popery, till I am taken out of the way; therefore I did labour to bring it in. Do not these things, my lords, hang handsomely together?

‘6. Lastly, there have been above three-score Letters and other Papers, brought out of my Study into this honourable house; they are all about composing the differences between the Lutherans and Calvinists in Germany. Why they should be brought hither, but in hope to charge them upon them, I know not; and then the argument will be this: I laboured to reconcile the Protestants in Germany, that they might unanimously set themselves against the Papists; therefore I laboured to bring Popery into England.

‘Now that your lordships have heard the Arguments, and what proof they make against me, I must be bold to put you in mind of that which was said here at the bar, April 16, 1644. That they did not urge any of these particular actions as Treason against me; but the result of them altogether amounted to Treason. For answer to which, I must be bold to tell your lordships, that if no particular which is charged upon me be Treason, the result from them cannot be Treason; which will appear by these reasons following;

‘1. First, the result must be of the same nature and species with the particulars from which it rises. But it is confessed no one of the particulars are Treason: Therefore neither is the result that rises from them. And this holds in Nature, in Morality, and in Law.

‘In Nature, and that both for integral and essential parts; for neither can the body of a bear, and the soul of a lion, result into a fox; nor the legs of a bull, the body of a horse, and the head of an ass, result into a man.

‘In Morality, and that is seen both in virtues and vices: For neither can many actions of liberality, meekness and sobriety, rise up in a result of fortitude; neither can

‘ many actions of malice, drunkenness and covetousness, result into Treason.

‘ In Law it is so too; For be there never so many particular crimes, yet there is no law in this kingdom, nor any where else that I know, that makes a result of different crimes to be Treason, where none of the particulars are Treason by law. So this imaginary result is a monster in Nature, in Morality, and in Law; and if it be nourished, will devour all the safety of the subject of England, which now stands so well fenced by the known law of the land. And therefore I humbly desire your lordships, not for mine, but for the public’s sake, to weigh this business well, before this gap be made so wide, as there will hardly be power left again to shut it.

‘ 2. My second Reason is joined to the Answer of an Objection: For when this result was spoken of, it was added, that the particulars charged against me, are of the same kind, and do all tend to the Subversion of Law and Religion, and so become Treason. But, first, suppose that all the particulars charged, do tend to the Subversion of law, yet that cannot make them to be all of one kind: for all crimes tend more or less to the overthrow of virtue; yet no man can say, that all crimes are of the same kind. Secondly, be they of the same, or different kinds; yet neither all, nor any of these charged against me, do tend to the subversion of the law: for it is one thing to break, dislike or speak against some particular laws, and quite another to labour the subversion of the whole body of the law, and the frame of government. And that I have done this by conspiracy, force, or any overt action, is not so much as offered in proof: and for the breach of any particular law, if I be guilty, I am to be punished, by the sanction of that law which I have broken.

‘ 3. Thirdly, Whereas it hath been said, That many Actions of the same kind make a Habit; that is true: but what then? For, first, the actions urged against me are not of the same kind, but exceeding different. Secondly, if the habit be treasonable, then all those particular actions which bred that habit, must be several Treasons, as well as the result or habit itself; whereas it hath been granted all along, that my particular actions are not Treasons. And, thirdly, a habit in itself, neither is nor can be Treason; for all Treason is either Thought, Word or Overt-Act; but no habit is either of these, therefore not Treason. For a habit is that in the soul which inclines the powers of it, and makes a man apt and ready to think, speak, or do that to which he is habituated. [Tho. 1. 2 æ. q. 50. A. 5]. So an ill habit against Sovereign Power, may make a man apt and forward to fall into Treason; but Treason it is not.

‘ 4. Fourthly, Nor can this result be Treason at the common law, by which alone, I conceive, there is no Treason at all this day in England: for the main end of that excellent ‘ statute of 25 Ed. 3, was for the safety of the subject, against the manifold Treasons which variously fell upon them by the common law; and bounded all Treasons, and limited them to the things expressed to be Treason in and by that statute. And in all times of difficulty since, recourse hath still been had to that statute: and to that statute I refer myself, with this; That this result must be something within this statute, or some other known statute, or else it cannot be treason: and no proof at all hath been so much as offered, that this result is treason by any law.—My Lords, I do with all humble submission desire, that when the Reply is made to this Matter of Fact, a day may be assigned for my counsel to be heard in Matter of Law, in all and every particular which they shall find necessary for my just defence.

‘ And now, my Lords, I do in all humility lay myself low at God’s Mercy-seat, to do with me as he pleases; and under God, I shall rely upon your lordships justice, honour, and clemency, of which I cannot doubt. And without being farther tedious to your lordships, who have with very honourable patience heard me through this long and tedious Trial, I shall conclude with that which St. Augustine said to Romanianus, a man that had tried both fortunes as well as I: “If the Providence of God reaches down to us, as most certain it doth, Sic tecum agi oportet, sicut agitur: It must so be done with thee, and so with me also, as it is done. And under that Providence, which will, I doubt not, work to the best to my soul that loves God, I repose myself.”

Here ended my RECAPITULATION, and with it the work of that day: and I was ordered to appear again the Saturday following, to hear Mr. Browne sum up the whole Charge against me. But upon Tuesday, Sept. 3, this was put off, to give Mr. Browne more time, to Wednesday, Sept. 11.

On Wednesday, Sept. 11, Mr. Browne made in the Lords House a Sum or Brief of the Charge which was brought against me, and touched, by the way, at some things in my Recapitulation. But in regard I might not answer him, I took no perfect notes, but stood still, and possessed my soul in patience; yet wondering at the bold, free, frequent, and most false swearing that had been against me. When Mr. Browne had ended, I humbly desired again, that my counsel might be heard in point of law. And they were hereupon ordered to deliver in writing under their hands, what points of law they would insist upon, and that by Saturday, Sept. 14.

This day my counsel, according as they were ordered, delivered into the Lords House these two Points following, by way of question: 1. Whether in all, or any of the Articles charged against me, there be contained any Treason by the established laws of this kingdom? 2. Whether the Charge of the said Impeachment and Articles, did contain such certainty and particularity as is required by law, in a case where Treason is charged? This day I petitioned the lords, that my counsel might have access to, and take copies of all such Records as they thought necessary for my Defence; which was granted, and ordered accordingly.

My Counsel's Queries having been formerly sent down to the house of commons, they were there referred to a committee of lawyers to consider of: and on Friday, Sept. 27, they were earnestly called upon to hasten their Report. And on Friday, Oct. 4, Mr. Nicolas made a great noise about me in the house, and would have had me presently censured in the house; and no less would serve his turn, but that I must be hanged; and was at Sus. per Coll. till upon the reasons before given, that if they went on this way, they must condemn me unheard: this violent clamour ceased for that time. And a Message was sent up to the lords for my counsel to be heard, as touching the first Question concerning Treason; but not concerning any Exception that they shall take against the Articles in point of certainty. This Message the lords took into present consideration, and ordered it accordingly: and appointed the Friday following, being Oct. 11, for my counsel to be heard, and myself to be present.

This day, according to this Order of the Lords, I and my counsel attended. My counsel were Mr. Herne and Mr. Hale of Lincoln's-inn, and Mr. Gerard of Gray's-inn. When we were called into the house, and the lords settled in their places, Mr. John Herne,* who was the man that spake what all had resolved on, delivered his Argument very freely and stoutly, proving that nothing which I have either said or done according to this charge, is Treason, by any known established law of this kingdom. The Argument follows in these words, according to the Copy which Mr. Herne himself delivered me: †

“ My Lords; The work of this day, we humbly conceive, is in many respects of very great and high concernment. 1. In that it concerns matter of life, a thing of the highest consequence. 2. The life of an Archbishop, a person who had attained the highest dignity conferred in the Church of England. 3. Those

* “ The Lord Chancellor Finch told me, that this Argument was not Mr. Herne's, though he pronounced it, for he could not argue; but it was Mr. Hale's, afterwards Lord Chief Justice. And he said farther, that being then a young lawyer, he stood behind Mr. Herne, when he spoke at the bar of the lords house, and took Notes of it; and that it will be published among his Reports.” W. S. A. C.

† There is, in the Lambeth Collection, a second Copy of “ The Defence made in the House of Lords by John Herne, esq. on the behalf of William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury.”

happy laws, many years since enacted and confirmed by several parliaments, to be the boundaries what was Treason; a crime before so various, as it had no bounds; and so odious, that the punishment of it was an infamous death, a total confiscation, with a brand of infamy to all posterity. 4. In that the Charge against him moves from no less a body than the whole Commons of England, which presents him now a prisoner at this bar before your lordships, in the high and supreme court of judicature in parliament.—And if any thing shall fall from us, subject to any doubtful construction, we shall humbly crave your lordships pardon, and leave to make our explication: for as there is upon us a duty to be wary, not to offer any thing which may minister just offence; so neither may we be unfaithful, to omit what may justly tend to our client's Defence.

“ The Charge against him, we find to be made up of two several parcels of Articles, exhibited by the honourable house of commons. 1. The first, ‘ In maintenance of their Accusation, whereby he stands charged with High Treason.’ 2. The latter, entitled, ‘ Farther Articles of Impeachment of High-Treason, and divers High Crimes and Misdemeanours; for all which matters and things they have impeached him of High-Treason, and other High Crimes and Misdemeanors, tending to the subversion of religion, laws and liberties, and to the utter ruin of this church and common-wealth.’

“ Concerning this Charge, and the Archbishop's Defence he hitherto made before your lordships, we, by your lordships command assigned his counsel, neither have nor could, by reason of the mixed Charge, without distinguishing what was thereby intended to be a Charge of Treason, and what of Misdemeanour only, be farther useful to him, than to advise the form of his Plea and Answer, which we received from him, as to all the matters of fact, to be a Not Guilty.

“ We have not in all or any the facts charged or evidenced against him, in any sort intermeddled. But the same, how proved and how applicable to the Charges, without mention of any of them, shall wholly leave to your lordships notes and memories.

“ What Defence he hath offered hitherto, hath been wholly his own; he without us in that, and we without consulting him in the work of this day. Wherein, having received your lordships commands, we did present in writing the Points in Law we then humbly conceived fit for us to insist upon.

I. “ Whether in all, or any the Articles charged against him, there was contained any Treason by the established laws of this kingdom.

II. “ Whether the Charge of the said Impeachment and Articles, did contain such certainty and particularity, as is required by law in a case where Treason is charged.

"But being enjoined by your honourable Order, to speak only to the former; we shall, as in duty becomes, conform thereunto.

"For our method herein shall follow the course holden in the Reply made upon the whole Articles, whereby we conceived the Charges contained in them were reduced to these three generals:

"1. A traitorous endeavour to subvert the Fundamental Laws of the realm; and instead thereof, to introduce an Arbitrary and Tyrannical Government against law; contained in the first Original and first Additional Articles.

"2. A traitorous endeavour to subvert God's true Religion by law established; and instead thereof, to set up Popish Superstition and Idolatry; this contained in the seventh Original and seventh Additional Articles.

"3. That he laboured to subvert the Rights of Parliament, and the antient course of parliamentary proceedings, and by false and malicious slanders to incense his majesty against parliaments. And this contained in the fourteenth Original and tenth Additional Articles.

"All other the Articles, we humbly conceive to be but instances, conducting and applied to some of those generals.

"Concerning those three General heads of the Charge, we shall crave leave to propose two Questions to be debated: 1. Whether there be at this day any other Treason, than what is declared by the Statute of 25 Ed. 3, c. 2, or enacted by some subsequent particular statute? which we humbly conceive, and shall endeavour to satisfy your lordships there is not any. 2. Whether any the matters in any of the Articles charged, contain any of the Treasons declared by that law, or enacted by any subsequent law? which we likewise conceive they do not. And for the clearing of both these, shall humbly insist, That, (1.) An endeavour to subvert the Laws, an endeavour to subvert religion, a labouring to subvert the Rights of Parliament; are not Treasons, either within the statute of 25 Ed. 3, or by any other particular statute. (2.) That not any of the particulars, instanced in any other the Articles, is a Treason within the statute 25 Ed. 3, or any other statute.

"And to make good our tenet upon our first Question, shall humbly offer, That before this statute of 25 Ed. 3, Treasons at the common law were so general and uncertain, that almost any crime, by inferences and constructions, might be, and was often extended to be a Treason; insomuch as we find in 22^d of the Book of Assize, killing the king's messenger was Treason. And in the Parliament-Roll, 21 Ed. 3, num. 15, accroaching the royal power, wherein every excess was subject to a construction of treason, was Treason; for which divers having suffered, the Commons in parliament finding how mischievous and destructive it was to the subject, petitioned it might be bounded and declared. And this, not to give any liberty, but to give bounds to it; one while it being construed an accroachment of royal power, as in the case of the earl of Lancaster, temp. Ed. 2, for being over-popular with the people; and in the same king's reign to Spencer, for being over-gracious with the king.'

"The sense of these and other mischiefs by the uncertainty of Treason, brought on this law of 25 Ed. 3. And the benefit of it to the subject, says sir Ed. Coke in his Treatise of the Pleas of the Crown, begot that parliament the name of parliamentum benedictum; and that except Magna Charta, no other act of parliament had more honour given it by the king, lords, and commons. And this law hath been in all times the rules to judge treasons by, even in parliament; and therefore in the Parliament Roll, 1 H. 4, num. 141, the Trial and Judgment in cases of Impeachment of Treason, is prayed by the commons might be according to the antient laws. And in the Parliament-Roll 5 H. 4, num. 12, in the case of the then earl of Northumberland, this statute of 25 Ed. 3, was the guide and rule by which the lords judged, in a case endeavoured to have been extended to be a treason, the same to be no treason.

"And it is, as we conceive, very observable, That if at any time the necessity or excess of the times produced any particular laws in parliament, for making of Treasons not contained in that law of 25 Ed. 3, yet they returned and fixed in that law. Witness the statute of 1 H. 4, cap. 10, whereby all those facts which were made Treasons in the divided time of R. 2, were reduced to those of Ed. 3. In the time of H. 8, wherein several offences were enacted to be Treasons not contained in the statute of 25 Ed. 3, the same were all swept away by the statute of 1 Ed. 4, 12.—And again, where in the time of Ed. 6, several Treasons were enacted, they were all repealed, and by an act made 1 Maria, none other offence left to be treason, than what was contained and declared by the statute of 25 Ed. 3. And from 1 H. 4, to queen Mary, and from thence downward, we find not any judgment hath been given in parliament, for any Treason not declared and contained in that law, but by bill.—Thus in succession of all times, this statute of 25 Ed. 3, in the wisdom of former parliaments, hath stood and been the constant fixed rule for all judgments in cases of Treason.

"We shall now observe, what offences are in and by that law declared to be Treasons: whereby your lordships will examine, whether you find any of them in the Charge of these Articles: For which purpose we shall desire this statute of 25 Ed. 3, be read.—The Treasons by that act declared, are, 1. Compassing and imagining the Death of the king, queen, or prince, and declaring the same by some overt-act. 2. Murdering the Chancellor, Treasurer, &c. 3. Violating the queen, the king's eldest daughter, or the prince's wife. 4. Levying war against the king. 5. Or adhering to the king's enemies, within the realm or without, and declaring the same by some overt-act. 6. Counterfeiting the Seals and Coin. 7. Bringing in Counterfeit Coin.

“ Next we shall lay for a ground, that this act ought not to be construed by equity or inference. 1. For that it is a declarative law, and no Declaration ought to be upon a declaration. 2. It was a law provided to secure the Subject, for his life, liberty, and estate; and to admit constructions and inferences upon it, were to destroy the security provided for by it.

“ It hath been the constant opinion in all times, both in Parliament and upon judicial Debates, that this act must be literally construed, and not by inference or illation: nor would it be admitted in a particular declared by this law to be Treason; which a man would have thought might have been consistent with it.

“ Counterfeiting the Coin of the kingdom, is by this law declared treason.

“ Washing, filing, and clipping the Coin, is an abuse, an abasing, and not making it current: yet in 3 H. 5, when the question was in Parliament, whether that offence was Treason within the statute of 25 Ed. 3, it is declared by a special act then made, 3 H. 5, c. 6, That forasmuch as before that time great doubt and ambiguity had been, whether those Offences ought to be adjudged Treason, or not, inasmuch as mention is not thereof made in the Declaration of the Articles of Treason by that statute of 25 Ed. 3, the same was by that particular act made treason, which before was none: and counterfeiting of foreign coin made current here, an equal mischief with counterfeiting of the coin of this realm; yet because the words of the statute are ‘ his money,’ this not Treason until the act of 1 Maria, cap. 6, made it so. And sir Ed. Coke,* in his Book before-mentioned, saith, ‘ A compassing to levy war, is not a Treason within that law, unless it proceed into act; but only to compass the death of the king: yet if a constructive Treason should be admitted, it might happily, without any great straining, be inferred, That compassing to levy war is in some sort a compassing of the king’s death: and of this kind many more instances may be given.—So that the result of all this is, That whatsoever is not declared to be a Treason within the letter of this law, may not be adjudged a treason, by inference, construction or otherwise.

“ Having done with this first, we now shall come to our second Question. Whether any the matters in all, or any the Articles charged, contain any the Treasons declared by that law, or enacted by any subsequent law? wherein, although the Charges may appear to be great and enormous crimes; yet we shall endeavour, and hope to satisfy your lordships, the same, nor any of them, are treasons by any established law of the kingdom. For clearing whereof we shall pursue the order first proposed.

“ First, That an endeavour to subvert Fundamental Laws, is not Treason by any law in this kingdom established: and particular act to make it Treason there is none; so as we must then return to apply those former general Observations of that act of 25 Ed. 3, to this particular; and shall add for Reasons,

1. “ That it is not comprized within any the words of that law, nor may by any construction or inference be brought within it, for the reasons formerly alledged.

2. “ Because an endeavour to subvert Laws, is of so great a latitude and uncertainty, that every action not warranted by law, may be thereby extended to be Treason.

“ In the sixth Report, in Mildmay’s Case, fol. 42,* where a Conveyance was made in tale, with a Proviso, if he did go about or attempt to discontinue the entail, the same should be void: It was resolved the Proviso was void; and the principal reason was, That these words, ‘ attempt or go about,’ are words uncertain and void in law. And the words of the Book are very observable, viz. ‘ God defend, that inheritances and estates of men should depend upon such incertainties; for that ‘ misera est servitus, ubi jus est vagum, et ‘ quod non definitur in jure quid sit conatus;’ and therefore the rule of the law doth decide this point. ‘ Non efficit conatus nisi sequitur ‘ effectus;’ and the law doth reject conations and goings about, as things uncertain, which cannot be put in issue.’ These are the Words of the Book: and if so considerable in estates, your lordships, we conceive, will hold it far more considerable in a case of life, which is of highest consequence.

“ And if it should be said this law of 25 Ed. 3, takes notice of compassing and imagining: We answer, it is in a particular declared by that law to be Treason, in compassing the death of the king: but this of endeavouring to subvert laws, not declared by that or any other law to be a Treason. And if it should be granted, that this law might in any case admit any other fact to be Treason by inference or construction, other than is therein particularly declared, which we conceive it cannot:

“ Yet it is not imaginable, that a law introduced purposely to limit and ascertain crimes of so high consequence, should by construction or inference be subject to a construction of admitting so uncertain and indefinite a thing, as an endeavour to subvert the law is, it being not comprized within the letter of that law.

3. “ That the subversion of the law is an impossible thing; therefore an endeavour to do an act which cannot be effected, cannot be treason.

4. “ That in all times the endeavouring to subvert the Laws hath been conceived no determinate crime, but rather an aggravation only of a crime than otherwise: and therefore hath been usually joined as an aggravation or result of crimes below Treason.

“ As appears in the Parliament-Roll, 28 H. 6, num. 28 to num. 47, in the Case of the duke of Suffolk, where the Commons in Parliament having preferred Articles of Treason against him, did not make that any part of their charge.* Yet in the same parliament, and within few days after, the first being in February, the latter in March, exhibiting other Articles against him, they therein charged all the misprisions, offences, and deeds, therein mentioned, to have been the cause of the subversion of laws and justice, and the execution thereof; and nigh likely to tend to the destruction of the realm. So as it appears it was then conceived an offence of another nature, and not a Treason.

“ And it appears as well by the Articles exhibited in parliament, 21 H. 8, against cardinal Wolsey,† as by indictment in the King’s-bench against Ligham 23 H. 8, rot. 25, That the Cardinal did endeavour to subvert ‘ Antiquissimas leges hujus regni, universumq; hoc regnum Angliæ legibus imperialibus subjugare:’ which although it be a charge of subverting the ancient laws of the kingdom, and to introduce new and arbitrary laws; yet neither upon the Articles or Indictment was the same imputed to be Treason; but ended in a Charge of a Premunire.

“ And if it shall be said, that Empson,‡ 1 H. 8, had Judgment, and died for it; upon an indictment in London; we answer, 1. This was not the substance of the Indictment, but only an aggravation. 2. And if charged, it is with an actual subverting, not with an endeavour to subvert the laws; and is joined with divers offences. 3. Which is a full Answer, The Indictment upon which he was tried, was Paschæ, 2 H. 8, at Northampton, and was for levying war against the king, a Treason declared by the law of 25 Ed. 3, upon which he was convicted and suffered; and no proceeding upon the other indictment ever had.

“ And as to the second general Charge of endeavouring to subvert Religion: This no more than that former of subverting the laws is any Treason, within any law established in this kingdom.

“ And herein as to the Charge of the Endeavour, we shall rely upon what hath been already said upon the former. With this further; That until that happy Reformation, begun in the time of king Edward 6, there was another frame of religion established by law; which was conceived until then to have been the true Religion; and any endeavour to change or alter it, prosecuted with great extremities. Yet was not any attempt to alter it conceived to be Treason; but several special acts of parliament were made for particular punishments against persons who should attempt the alteration thereof; witness the statute of 5 R. 2. c. 5. and 2 H. 5. c. 7. In which latter, although mention is made of endeavouring to destroy and subvert the Christian faith, yet was not the offence made or declared to be Treason. And at this day heresy, of what kind soever, is not punishable, but according to the old course of the law.—And we may add the statute of 1 Ed. 6. c. 12. that of 1 Mar. 12. which makes it but felony to attempt an alteration of religion by force: The worst kind of attempt, certainly.

“ To the third and last general Charge, labouring to subvert the Rights of Parliaments. To the labouring to do it, we shall add nothing to what hath been said to the Charge of Endeavour in the two former; only thus much, we shall observe: That in the parliament of 11 R. 2. amongst the many articles preferred against the Duke of Ireland,* and others, the 14th article contains a Charge, much of this nature, viz. ‘ That when the lord and others in divers parliaments, had moved to have a good government in the realm, they had so far incensed the king, that he caused divers to depart from his parliament; so that they durst not for fear of death, advise for the good of the kingdom.’ Yet when the lords came to single out the Articles, what was, or what was not Treason, that, although a charge transcending this, was none of the Articles by them declared to be Treason.

“ My lords, having done with these Generals, it remains only that we apply ourselves to those other Articles, which we conceive were insisted upon as Instances conducing and applied to some of the Generals we have handled.

“ Wherein, if the General’s be not Treason, the particular Instances cannot be: and on the other side, if the Instances fall short of Treasons, the application to those Generals cannot make them Treasons.

“ We shall only single out two Particulars, and in those be very brief, in that most which hath been said to the former Generals is applicable to them; inasmuch as none of them is declared to be a Treason by the statute of 25 Ed. 3. or by any other law enacted. 1. The first of these in the 10th Original Article, viz. ‘ That he hath traitorously endeavoured to reconcile the Church of England with the Church of Rome.’ Which, if it be any Treason, must be a Treason within the statute of 5 Jac. c. 4, whereby is provided, That if any man shall put in practice to reconcile any of his majesty’s subjects to the Pope or see of Rome, the same is enacted to be Treason; which we conceive clearly is none of this Charge. (1.) First, for that here only is charged an Endeavour; there a putting in practice. (2.) Here a reconciling of the Church of England with the Church of Rome; there a reconciling some of his majesty’s subjects to the See of Rome. And a reconciling with, may as well be a reducing of that of Rome to England, as England to Rome.

“ The second, in the 7th Additional Article, for wittingly and willingly receiving and harbouring divers popish priests and jesuits, namely, Sancta Clara and monsieur St. Giles. Which Offence, as to the harbouring Priests and Jesuits born within his majesty's dominions, by the statute of 27 Eliz. cap. 2. is made Felony, not Treason; and extends only to priests English born, which these are not charged to be.

"My Lords, we have now gone through those Articles wherein we conceive the Treasons charged were intended, and have endeavoured to make it appear, that none of the matters in any of the Articles charged are Treason within the letter of any law. And if not so, then they cannot, by Inference or parity of reason, be heightened to a Treason. It is true, the crimes as they are laid in the Charge are great and many. Yet if the laws of this realm, which have distinguished crimes, and accordingly given them several names and inflicted punishments, raise none of these to a Treason; That we humbly conceive will be worthy of your lordships consideration in this case; and that their number cannot make them exceed their nature. And if they be but Crimes and Misdemeanours apart, below Treason or Felony, they cannot make a Treason by putting them together.

"Otherwise the Statute of 25 Ed. 3. which we have so much insisted upon, had been fruitless and vain; if after all that exactness any number of misdemeanours (in themselves no Treason) should by complication produce a Treason, and yet no mention made of it in that law, much less any determination thereby, that any number, or what number, and of what nature of crimes, below Treason, should make a Treason.

"It is true, my lords, that by the Statute of 25 Ed. 3. there is a clause in these words:

"It is accorded, That if any other case, supposed Treason, which is not therein specified, doth happen before any justices, the justices shall tarry without any going to judgment of the Treason, until the cause be shewed and declared before the king and his parliament, whether it ought to be judged Treason or Felony." And that hereby might seem to be inferred, That there should be some other Treasons than are mentioned in that law, which may be declared in parliament.

"But, my lords, we shall observe, 1. If such Declaration look only forward, then the law, making it Treason, precedes the offence, and is no more than an enacting law.—If it look backward to the Offence past, then it appears by the very clause itself of 25 Ed. 5, it should be at the least a Felony at the common law; and that a crime or crimes below a felony, were never intended to be by this law to be declared, or to be heightened to a treason. And we find not any crime declared Treason with a retrospect, unless it were a felony before. And in the late case of the earl of Strafford, attainted by bill, there is a treason within this law charged, and declared by the bill of his attainder to have been proved. 2.

We are not now in case of a declaration of a Treason, but before your lordships only upon an Impeachment; and in such case we humbly conceive the law already established, as it hath been, so it will be the rule.*

"Thus, my Lords, we have gone through that part which belongs to us, directed us by your lordships, viz. Whether in all or any the Articles exhibited before your lordships, there is contained any treason by any established law of this kingdom, without meddling at all with the facts or proof made of them; which, together with our weak endeavours, we humbly submit to your lordships great judgment. And for any Authorities cited by us, are ready (if so commanded) to produce them."†

* This which followeth, I transcribed from a loose Note, wrote by an unknown hand, and affixed to this place. H. W. 'Concerning the Proviso in 25 Edw. 3. (last mentioned) it is observable, that Mr. Lane, in the lord Strafford's Trial, saith, That that Clause of Provision 25 Edw. 3. is quite taken away by 6 Hen. 8, cap. 4, and 20. So that no Treason is now to be reckoned, but what is literally contained in 25 Ed. 3. See for this Whitlock's Memoirs, p. 48. See also Burnet's Hist. Reform. part 2, p. 253, about the Repeal of Treasons.'

† "To which Serjeant Wild in behalf of the Commonns replied thus, viz. 'Mr. Herne, we did never alledge that any one crime of the Bishop's did amount to a Treason or a Felony, but we do say, that all the Bishop's Misdemeanours put together, do, by way of accumulation, make many grand Treasons.' To which Herne answered, 'I crave your mercy, good Mr. Serjeant; I never understood before this time, that two hundred couple of black rabbits would make a black horse.'

"Archbishop Laud being condemned by the Long Parliament, two days before his death, Mr. Herne, his counsel, went to take his leave of him in the Tower, where the Bishop gave him to peruse the Speech he afterwards delivered upon the Scaffold, his grace walking to and fro in the room whilst he was reading it at the table, and observing him to make a stop with his finger upon the paper, would not suffer him to proceed, till he told him the occasion; the passage was this, 'and though I am not only the first Archbishop, but the first man, that ever died, by an Ordinance of Traitors:' for so it was in the Bishop's first writing; which term he did then resolutely maintain, nor would he, but upon great importunity, be persuaded to alter it; yet afterwards suffering the word 'Parliament' to be inserted in the room of 'Traitors,' being prevailed with thereunto by his counsel, in that his majesty himself had vouchsafed to own them for such, the more fairly to draw them to the ensuing Treaty at Uxbridge, to which the Archbishop prayed all good success.—At the same time his grace observing his counsel to have taken notice of some present discomposure in him, he then de-

Here this Day ended ; and I had a few days rest. But on Tuesday, Oct. 22, being a day made solemn for Humiliation, my chamber at the Tower was searched again for Letters and papers; but nothing found.

After this, there went up and down all about London and the suburbs, a Petition for the bringing of Delinquents to justice; and some preachers exhorted the people to be zealous in it, telling them it was for the glory of God, and the good of the Church. By this means they got many hands of men which little thought what they went about. In this Petition, none were named but myself and the bishop of Ely: so their drift was known to none but their own party; and was undoubtedly set on foot to do me mischief. Whose design this was, God knows; but I have cause to suspect Mr. Pryn's hand in it. This barbarous way of the people's clamouring upon great Courts of Justice, as if they knew not how to govern themselves and the causes brought before them, is a most unchristian course, and not to be endured in any well-governed state. This Petition, with a multitude of hands to it, was delivered to the house of commons on Monday, Oct. 28. Concerning which I shall observe this, That neither the Lord-mayor nor the sheriffs made any stop to this illegal and blood-thirsty course, though it were publicly known, and the people exhorted to set hands to it in the parish-churches. What this, and such-like courses as these, may bring upon this city, God alone knows, whom I humbly pray to shew it mercy.

November 1. This day, being All-halan-day, a Warrant came to the lieutenant from the house of commons to bring me to their bar, and to hear the Evidence formerly summed up, and given against me in the Lords house. I knew no law nor custom for this; for though our Votes, by a late act of parliament, be taken away, yet our baronies are not: and so long as we remain barons, we belong to the Lords house, and not to the commons. Yet how to help myself, I knew not: for when the warrant came to me, the Lords house was risen, and I was commanded to the House of Commons the next morning before the lords came to sit; so I could not petition them for any privilege. And had I done it, I doubt it would have been interpreted for an endeavour to make a breach between the houses: and should I have under clared; that he was indeed somewhat affected, but protested that his trouble proceeded more from his fear for the King, than for any thing that related to his own death. 'I am,' said the Bishop, 'to die this tenth of January; but I am very much afraid that this month of January will also prove fatal to my master the King, and I pray God it do not.' The Defence, with these two passages, are written verbatim according to that under my grandfather's hand. Jo. HERNE."

any pretence refused to go, Mr. Lieutenant would have carried me.

Therefore on Saturday, Nov. 2, I went, according to the warrant, to the House of Commons. So soon as ever I was come to the bar, Mr. Speaker told me, There was an Ordinance drawn up to attain me of High-Treason; but that they would not pass it till they had heard a Summary of the Charge which was laid against me; and that I was sent for to hear it also. I humbly besought them that my Counsel and my Solicitor (who were always present with me in the lords house) might stand now by me: but it would not be granted. Then Mr. Browne, by order from the Speaker, delivered the Collection and Sum of the Charge against me; much as one with that which he formerly made in the Lords house. Now I took Notes of it as exactly as I could. He had no sooner done, but Mr. Speaker pressed me to make Answer presently. I humbly besought the house I might not be put to that, the Charge being long and various; but that I might have time, and that my counsel might be heard for matter of law. I was commanded to withdraw. And when I was called in again, I received an Order peremptory, to answer the Monday sevennight after to such things as the reporter was mistaken in. But not a word of hearing my counsel. I returned to my prison.

This Wednesday, November 6, I got my Prayer-Book, by the help of Mr. Herne and Mr. Browne, out of Mr. Pryn's hands, where it had been ever since the last of May, 1643.

MY DEFENCE

IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, November 11, I came to the house of commons again; and, according to their peremptory order, made my Answer to the Summary Charge which Mr. Browne made against me. But here I shall advertise the reader, That, to avoid troublesome and tedious repetition, I shall not set down my Answer at large, as there I spake it; because there is nothing in it but what is in my former Answers, the beginning and the end only excepted. But it was necessary for me then to make a whole and an entire Answer, because the house of commons had then heard no part of my Defence. But I presume the charitable Reader will look upon my Answers in their proper place, rather than be troubled a second time with the same thing. Yet because Mr. Browne went a different way in his Summary from the Charge lately given, I shall represent a skeleton of my Answer, with all the limbs of it intire, that it may be seen, as it were, together; though I report nothing which hath been already said. And thus I began:

"Mr. Speaker, I was here November 2. It was the first time that ever I came within these doors. And here then you gave me the most uncomfortable breakfast that ever I came to; namely, that this honourable house had drawn up an Ordinance against me of High-Treason:

but that before they would proceed farther, I should hear the sum of the charge, which was against me, which was the cause I was sent for then: and to give my Answer to that which was then said, or rather mistaken in saying and inferring, is the cause of my coming now.

“ 1. And, first, Mr. Speaker, I give thanks to this honourable house that they have given me leave to speak for myself. 2. I do humbly desire, if any word or thing should be mistaken or unadvisedly expressed by me, (which shall be sore against my will) I may have liberty to recall and expound myself. 3. That you will favourably consider into what straits I am cast, that after a long and tedious hearing, I must come to answer to a sum or an epitome of the same charge; which, how dangerous it may be for me, all men that know epitomes cannot but understand.

“ Mr. Speaker, I am come hither to make a Brief of my Answer to a Sum of my Charge; wherein I may receive as much detriment by my own brief, for want of larger expression, as by the other of my Charge by omission or mistake: yet since your command is upon me, I shall without farther preface (which I conceive would be as tedious to you, as to me troublesome) address myself, and with as much brevity as the many Heads of the Charge will bear. And that my Answer may be the clearer both to this honourable house and to the gentleman who reported the Charge, I shall follow every thing in the same order he proceeded in: so far forth, at least, as an old slow hand could take them, a heavy heart observe them, and an old decayed memory retain them.

“ This worthy gentleman hath pressed all things as hardly against me, as the cause can any way bear. That was his duty to this honourable house, and it troubles me not: but his carriage and expressions were civil towards me, in this my great affliction; and for this I render him humble and hearty thanks, having from other hands pledged my Saviour in gall and vinegar, and drunk up the cup of the scorings of the people to the very bottom.

“ This gentleman began with four Generals, which he said I complained of, and I say I had cause so to do. 1. The First Complaint was, ‘ That I had lain three years in Prison before I was heard.’ And this, he said, was my own fault, because I delayed the putting in my full Answer when I was called. But herein he is quite mistaken: For I could not answer till I was called, and I was not called in three years; nor then could I plead to more Articles than were put to me. [Nor did this delay three months of the three years: yet this gentleman in his Reply said still, it was my fault, ‘ because ‘ I did not petition to be brought to hearing.’ But this, under favour, is a weaker reason than the former. For the condition of the times considered, neither my counsel, nor my other friends, nor myself, could think that a fit or a discreet way. Besides, it is well known, that had I petitioned I could not have been heard, my business being in a manner cast aside, till

Mr. Prynne’s malice, actuated by a search into my own Papers, undertook it.] 2. The gentleman said, my second Complaint was, ‘ That ‘ my Papers were seized.’ But he said, that was done by authority. And I never denied that: But that which he added is much mistaken; namely, That I ever seized any man’s Papers without authority, or by my own power; but what was done in that kind, was by the joint authority of that Court in which I then sat. Nor was my complaint general, that my Papers were seized; but that the Papers prepared for my Defence were taken from me, and not restored when I needed them, and petitioned for them. 3. He said, my third Complaint was, ‘ That many of the Witnesses produced against me were Separatists.’ I did indeed complain of this, and I had abundant cause so to do: For there was scarce an active Separatist in England, but some way or other his influence was into this business against me. And whereas the gentleman said, ‘ The Witnesses were some Aldermen, and ‘ some gentlemen, and men of quality.’ That’s nothing; for both gentlemen, and aldermen, and men of all conditions, (the more’s the pity) as the times now go, are Separatists from the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England established by law. And I would to God some of my Judges were not. 4. My fourth Complaint, he said, was, ‘ of the excessive number of the witnesses.’ And he added, ‘ That if I would not have so many witnesses, I should not have given occasion for it, by committing so many crimes. But, first, whether I have committed so many crimes as are urged against me, is yet in question. And secondly, it is one thing to give cause, and another thing to give occasion: For an occasion may be taken when it is pretended as given. And so I hope it will be found in my case. But the thing here mistaken is, That these are all said to be ‘ legal Witnesses;’ whereas almost all of them have at some time or other been before me as their judge, either at Star-chamber, or Council-table, or High-Commission, or as referee. And then I humbly desire it may be considered; 1. How impossible it is for a judge to please all men. 2. How improbable it is, that Witnesses displeased should be indifferent in their testimony. And, 3. how hard it is to convince a man by such interested witnesses, now (upon the matter) becoming judges of him that judged them. And (as St. Augustine speaks) ‘ Quomodo potest,’ how is it possible for one ‘ that is contentious and evil to speak well of ‘ his Judge?’

“ From these Generals the gentleman passed to the particulars of the Charge: and he caused the 7, 8, 9, 10, 11th Original Articles, and the 7th Additional to be read. That done, he divided the Charge into two main heads: The one, an Endeavour in me to subvert the Laws of the kingdom; and the other, a like endeavour to alter the true Protestant Religion into Popery. The Evidence given in the Lords house, began at the Laws and ended in Religion; but this gentleman in his Sum, both there and here, began with Religion, and ended with the Laws.

" 1. The Charge concerning Religion, he said, would bear two parts; the Ceremonial, and the Substantial Part of Religion.

" (1) and he professed he would begin at the Ceremonial; where having first charged in general, the Statute of the 3 and 4 of Ed. 6. c. 10. for the destruction of Images, he gave these particular Instances following, to shew my intention to alter Religion.

" 1. The setting up of coloured Glass with Pictures in the Windows of my Chapel; the Communion-Table altar-wise; Candlesticks thereon, with Reverence and Bowings.

" 2. A Bible in my study with the five wounds of Christ wrought upon the cover in needle-work.

" 3. Three Pictures in my gallery; the Ecce Homo, the four Latin Fathers, and the History of, (St. John x.) the true Shepherd entering in by the Door, and the Thief by the Window.

" 4. The Crucifix hung up in the Chapel at White-hall on Good-Friday; and what happened there upon Dr. Browne's coming in and doing Reverence.

" 5. The Copes and Bowings used in Cathedral-Churches since my time. The Ceremonies used at his majesty's Coronation.

" 7. The Abuses in the Universities, especially Oxford. 1. The Titles given me from thence, 2. Divers Particulars in the new Statutes. 3. Images countenanced there, by me, in divers Chapels. 4. The Picture of the Virgin Mary at St. Mary's church-door. 5. Nothing to be done without me in congregations.

" 8. The Ceremonies in some parish churches, and some punished for neglect of them. Instances in some of Beckington, some of Lewes, and in Mr. Chanoy of Ware.

" 9. That I preferred no men, but such as were active for the Ceremonies.

" 10. Passages expunged out of Books, if contrary to these courses; as that in Dr. Fearly's Sermons concerning Images.

" 11. Bibles with Pictures in them.

" 12. The severe Punishment of Mr. Workman of Gloucester, only for a Sermon against Images.

" 13. Words spoken to take Bishop Jewell's Works and the Book of Martyrs out of some parish-churches.

" 14. The Consecration of Cree-Church, and St. Giles in the Fields. In all which, as I humbly conceive, here is nothing, especially my Answers being taken to them, that can cooperate to any alteration of Religion. Nor is there any Treason, were all that is urged true.

(2.) " From hence, Mr. Speaker, this worthy gentleman passed over from the Ceremonies, to those things which, he said, concerned the substance of Religion: in which the Particulars which he charged were these:

" 1. A doubtfulness, if not a denial of the Pope's being Antichrist.

" 2. Dislike of the name, ' the Idol of Rome.'

" 3. The Alteration of some Passages in the Public Prayers appointed for Nov. 5, and the Coronation Day.

" 4. The Antichristian Yoke left out of the Brief for the Palatinate, with an Expression, as if we and those Reformed Churches were not of the same religion.

" 5. That men were punished for praying for the Queen and Prince.

" 6. That the Church of Rome is a true Church.

" 7. That the Communion-Table or Altar is the chief place; for there is Hoc est Corpus meum.

" 8. Restraint of all Books against Popery, instances in a Book of bishop Carleton's: one tendered by sir Edward Hungerford. Dr. Clarke's Sermons. Dr. Jones. None called in but Sales. That I myself did expunge some Passages out of a Sermon of Dr. Sibthorp's. Popish Books seized, re-delivered to the owners. That for these I must answer for my chaplains, since John, archbishop of York, was fined for his Commissary Act against the bishop of Durham; who having a Patent, could not so easily be put out of his place, as I might change my chaplains.

" 9. Three ministers in my diocese suspended for not reading the ' Book of Recreations' on the Lord's-Day.

" 10. The Offensiveness for buying in of Improvements overthrow, to the hindrance of Preaching, and scandal to Religion.

" 11. Inroad upon the Lord Chamberlain for naming of Chaplains to the king; and upon the Master of the Wards for giving of benefices.

" 12. Familiarity with Priests and Jesuits, S. Clara and M. S. Giles.

" 13. The testimonies of Mr. Chaloner, sir Henry Mildmay, and his brother Mr. Anthony, what opinion was held of me beyond the Seas, for my cunning introducing of Popery.

" 14. That an offer was made unto me to be a Cardinal. And thus far this gentleman proceeded in points of Religion.

" But because there hath passed divers things done at and by the Council-Table, the courts of Star-Chamber, and High Commission, and in Convocation; and because many more things so done, are to come in the next Head concerning the Law; I humbly crave leave, for avoiding tedious repetition, to say it once for all, That no act done by any of these, either by full consent, or major part, which involves the rest, ought to be charged singly against me: and that for these Reasons following:

" 1. Because this is not peccare cum multis: for they meet not there in a relation as multi, but as unum agere gatum, as bodies made one by law. And therefore the acts done by them, are acts of those bodies, not of any one man sitting in them. And in this sense a parliament is one body consisting of many; and the acts done by it are acts of parliament. For which, should any of them prove amiss, no one man is answerable, though many times one man brings in the bill.

"2. Because I could sway no man's Vote in any of those places (though this hath been often urged against me, as an over-potent Member), for my Vote was either last, or last save one, in all these places; so I could not lead. Nor is there any so much as shew of proof offered, that I moved, or prepared any man to a Sentence one way or other, in any one of these courts or places.

"3. Because in those courts of judicature, there was the assistance of able judges, lawyers and divines for direction. And how can that be a Treason in me, which is not made so much as a Misdemeanor in any of the rest?

"4. Because the act of this present Parliament, which hath taken away the Star-Chamber, and the High-Commission, and bounded the Council-Table, looks forward only, and punishes no man for any act past; much less doth it make any man's actions done in them to be treason: and I am no way excluded from the benefit of that act.

"5. Lastly, Because in all my proceedings, both in the High Commission and elsewhere, I kept strictly to the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England established by law, against both Papists and other Sectaries. And under this government, and doctrine of this Church, it hath pleased God, now for above fourscore years together, to bless this kingdom and people above other nations. And I pray God, if we forsake the one, it prove not a cause to deprive us of the other.

"II. And now, Mr. Speaker, I shall follow this worthy gentleman, as he went on to the second General Head, 'the Subversion of the Laws.' And here, when he had caused the 1, 2, 3, 5, and 14th Original Articles to be read, as also the 2, 9, and 10th Additional; he then said, That I had laboured this Subversion by my counsels, and by my actions.

"(1.) By my Counsels first; of which he gave three instances. 1. The Vote of the Council-Table to assist the king in extraordinary ways, if the Parliament should prove peevish, and refuse: and this out of my Diary at Dec. 5, 1639. 2. The Passage in the Epistle before my speech in the Star-Chamber; 'Not one way of government, since the humours of the people were in continual change.' 3. A Speech at Council-Table, 'That now the king might use his own power,' &c. witnessed only by sir Henry Vane the elder.

"(2.) From my Counsels. proceed was made to my Actions; where the Particulars were: 1. That I attempted to set Proclamations above the Law. 2. That I was for all illegal Projects at the Council Table; instanced in Inclosures, in Ship-money, and sir John Corbet's commitment. 3. The taking down of the houses about St. Paul's, with the large commission for the repair of the west-end. 4. The stopping of two Brewers in their trade, being in Westminster, and pretended to annoy the court. 5. Things done by me as Referee; instanced in a Case between Rich and Pool, and another of one Symmes. 6. Obstructing the course of law, by sending to Judges; instanced in the parishioners of Beckington, in the Case of Ferdinando Adams; in sir Henry Martyn's case about an Attorney at Law; judge Richardson's words in Huntley's case, and baron Trevor's words in Grafton's case. 7. The punishing men that came in a legal way; instanced in the case of Newcomin and Burrowes; that I said in the High Commission, I hoped to see the clergy exempt again the next hundred years: the two church-wardens of Chesham, with words concerning sir Thomas Dacres. 8. The Case of Prohibitions; and Mr. Wheeler's Note out of a Sermon of mine concerning them. 9. That no Pope ever claimed so much jurisdiction, not from the king. 10. The Canons; and I the main man; the overgrown member again. 11. The Statutes of Oxford enforced a second time; Nevil's case of Merton-college instanced in. 12. Books printed that are against the law; instanced in Cowell's Interpreter, and Dr. Manwaring's Sermons. 13. The Alteration of the King's Oath at his Coronation. 14. My enmity to Parliaments.

"To all which, as I then gave sufficient Answers, so I hope the courteous Reader hath found them at large in their several places. And for this last concerning Parliaments, I humbly and heartily desire, that this may be taken notice of and remembered, That there is not in any one of these Paper-Proofs produced against me, any one thing that offers to take away any Rights of Parliaments, rightly understood; much less any that offers to take away Parliaments themselves; which is a continued mistake all along this particular Charge. And if any rash or unweighed words have fallen from me, yet these cannot be extended to the disannulling of Parliaments, or their privileges in any kind, which I defended in print long since, before I could foresee any of this danger threatening me. It is in my Book against Fisher; [p. 211.] It was read in the Lords house, and I humbly desire I may read it here. And it was read.

"After this, it was inferred by this worthy gentleman, what a great offender I was, and 'greater than Cardinal Wolsey.' Mr. Speaker, I have seen the Articles against the Cardinal, and sure somebody is mistaken; for some of them are far greater than any thing that is proved against me. In which, I thank Christ for it, my conscience is at peace; whereas the Cardinal confessed himself guilty of them all, and yet no thought of Treason committed; and a præsumption was all that was laid upon him.

"Then he gave a touch, That in Edward 3's time, anno, 45, there was a Complaint that too much of the civil government was in the hands of the Bishops; and that in the 45th year of his reign, they were put out, and laymen put in. But 1. This concerns not me. 2. The late Act of this parliament hath taken sufficient order with that calling for meddling in civil affairs. 3. The time is memorable when this was done: it was in the 45th year of Edward 3; that's enough.

“ Mr. Speaker, I shall draw towards an end. Yet not forgetting what Ordinance you told me was drawn up against me; if that which I have now said may any way satisfy this honourable house to make stay of it, or mitigate it, I shall bless God and you for it. And I humbly desire you to take into consideration my calling, my age, my former life, my fall, my imprisonment, long and strict; that these considerations may move with you. In my prosperity (I bless God for it) I was never puffed up into vanity, whatever the world may think of me. And in these last full four years durance, I thank the same God, ‘gravem Fortunam constanter tuli;^{*} I have with decent constancy borne the weight of a pressing fortune; And I hope God will strengthen me unto and in the end of it.

“ Mr. Speaker, I am very aged † considering the turmoils of my life; and I daily find in myself more decays than I make shew of: and the period of my life, in the course of nature, cannot be far off. It cannot but be a great grief unto me, to stand at these years thus charged before ye: Yet give me leave to say thus much without offence, Whatsoever errors or faults I may have committed by the way, in any my proceedings through human infirmity; as who is he that hath not offended, and broken some statute-laws too by ignorance, or misapprehension, or forgetfulness, or some sudden time of action? Yet if God bless me with so much memory, I will die with these Words in my mouth: ‘That I never intended, ‘much less endeavoured the Subversion of the ‘Laws of the kingdom, nor the bringing in of ‘Popish Superstition upon the true Protestant ‘Religion established by Law in this kingdom.’

“ And now, Mr. Speaker, having done with the Fact, I have but this one thing to put to the consideration of this honourable house. My Charge hath been repeated, I confess, by a very worthy and a very able gentleman: But ability is not absolute in any. The Evidence given against me before the lords, was (as by the law it ought to be) given in upon oath: but the Evidence now summed up, and presented to this honourable house, is but upon the collection and judgment of one man how able or intire soever: and what he conceived is proved against me, is but according to his judgment and memory; which perhaps may differ much from the opinion and judgment of the Judges themselves, who heard the Evidence at large. Nor was this gentleman himself present every day of my Hearing; and then for those days in which he was absent, he can report no more here, than what others have reported to him. So for so much, his Repetition here is but a Report of a Report of Evidence given; and at the best but a Report of Evidence, and not upon oath. And, I suppose, never any Jurors, who are Triers of the Fact in any case, civil or criminal, did ever ground their verdict upon an Evidence only reported before them, and which themselves heard not.

“ And if this manner of proceeding shall be thought less considerable in my Person, yet I humbly desire it may be thoroughly weighed in the prudent judgment of this honourable house, the great preserver of the Laws and Liberties of the subject of England, how far it doth or may trench upon these in future consequences, if these great boundaries be laid loose and open.

“ And because my infirmities are many and great, which age and grief have added to those which are naturally in me, I most humbly desire again, That my counsel may be heard for point of Law, according to the former concession of this honourable house: for I assure myself, upon that which hath been pleaded to the Lords, That no one, nor all of the things together which are charged against me, if proved, which I conceive they are not, can make me guilty of High-Treason, by any known established law of this kingdom.

“ The Sum of all is this: Upon an Impeachment arising from this house, I have pleaded Not Guilty. Thereupon issue hath been joined, and Evidence given in upon oath. And now I must humbly leave it to you, your wisdom and justice, Whether it shall be thought fit, and just, and honourable, to judge me here, only upon a report, or a hearsay, and that not upon oath.”

Here ended the heavy business of this day. I was exceeding faint with speaking so long; and I had great pain and soreness in my breast for almost a fortnight after: then, I thank God, it wore away. I was commanded to withdraw; and to attend the House again on Wednesday, Nov. 13, 1644, which I did. Then Mr. Browne made a Reply to my Answer: the Reply had some great mistakes in it, but else was for the most part but a more earnest affirming of what he had delivered. And I conceived I was not to answer to his Reply, but that he was to have the last speech; for so it was always carried during my Hearing in the Lords house. Therefore being dismissed, I went away: And I was no sooner gone, but the house called for the Ordinance, which was drawn up against me, and without hearing my counsel, or any more a do, voted me guilty of High-Treason. And yet, when I came that day to the house, all men, and many of the house themselves, did much magnify my Answer before given: I will forbear to set down in what language, because it was high; and as no time can be fit for vanity, so least of all was this time for me. And vain I must needs be thought, should I here relate what was told me from many and good hands. But it seems the clamour prevailed against me.

On Saturday Nov. 16, this Ordinance was passed the house of Commons suddenly, and with so great deliberation, as you have heard, was transmitted to the lords, and by them the debate concerning it put off to Friday Nov. 22. Then the earl of Pembroke began more fully to shew his cankered humour against me: how provoked, I protest, I know not unless by my serving him far beyond his desert. There, among other coarse language, he bestowed (as I am informed) the 'rascal' and the 'villain' upon me: and told the lords, they would put off giving their consent to the Ordinance, till the citizens would come down, and call for justice, as they did in my lord Strafford's Case. Was there not justice and wisdom in this Speech? Hereupon the business was put off to Saturday, Nov. 23, and then to Friday Nov. 29. But then upon Thursday Nov. 28, Mr. Strowd came up with a Message from the Commons, to quicken the lords in this business; And at the end of his Message he let fall, That 'they should do well to agree to the Ordinance, or else the multitude would come down and force them to it.' At this, some lords very honourably took exception; and Mr. Strowd durst not bide it, that this was any part of the Message delivered him by the house of Commons. But the matter was passed over, and Mr. Strowd not so much as checked. This, it may be, was thought seasonable by some, to hearten on the violence of the earl of Pembroke.

The business not long heard on Friday, was put off again to Monday, Dec. 2, and the house of Lords put into a Committee, to examine particulars by their Notes: the earl of Northumberland on the wool-sack during the debate which continued, more or less, some days. Where their own Notes failed, they called to Mr. Browne, clerk of their house, for his. But at last finding him very ready and quick for any thing that was charged against me, but loth to be known what Answer I gave to any point, some lords observed it. And it did after appear, that the Notes which he put to the Lords, were not the Notes which himself took, but that he had a Copy given him, (whether by Mr. Prynne or any other, I know not) and I was informed that the earl of Warwick had another Copy of the very same. This is marvellous just and honourable in that earl; and most Christianlike in Mr. Browne. It may be, he learned it out of the Notes which his father-in-law takes at sermons.

Upon Monday Dec. 16, there was, the times considered, a very full house of lords; about twenty present, and my business largely debated, and ready to come to the question. I wish with all my heart it had, while the house was so full. But the earl of Pembroke fell again into his wonted violence, and asked the lords what they stuck at? And added, 'what,

' shall we think the house of commons had no conscience in passing this Ordinance? Yes, they knew well enough what they did.' One of the wits hearing this excellent passage of the earl's, protested, if ever he lived to see a parliament in Bedlam, this prudent earl should be Speaker, if he were able to procure him the place.

In the mean time, this unhappy clamour of his put the business off again to the next day, being Tuesday, Dec. 17. Then there were but 14 lords in the house. My business was assumed, and proposed in three Questions, and I was voted guilty of the fact in all three. Namely, Guilty of endeavouring to subvert the Laws; to overthrow the Protestant Religion; and that I was an Enemy to Parliaments. Then it being put to the Judges, whether this were Treason or no; the Judges unanimously declared that nothing which was charged against me was Treason, by any known and established law of the land, with many things to and fro concerning this business.

On Tuesday, Dec. 24, Christmas-Eve, the lords had a conference with the commons about it. In which they declared, that they had diligently weighed all things that were charged against me, but could not by any one of them, or all, find me guilty of Treason: and therefore desired that the Argument made by my counsel might be answered. And if it could be made appear unto them by any Law to be Treason, they would then proceed farther, as in honour and justice they should find it. Then came Christmas-day, Dec. 25, the last Wednesday in the month, and a most solemn fast kept on it, with as solemn an Ordinance for the due observance of this fast, and against the manner of keeping of that day in former superstitious times. A fast never before heard of in Christendom.

After this Conference, Mr. Serjeant Wilde speaking freely to some friends about this business, told them, he wondered the lords should so much distrust their Judgments, as to desire a Conference about it. To see how good wits agree! Surely, I believe he was of the earl of Pembroke's counsel, or the earl of his, they jumped so together. It seems in these men's opinions, the house of commons can neither err in conscience nor judgment. Howsoever, that house thought it fit the lords should be satisfied, that I was by law guilty of High-Treason: and to that end sent up a Committee, Jan. 9, 1644, to make proof of it to their lordships. At this meeting, two Judges were present, justice Reeves and judge Bacon. The managers of the business against me, were three lawyers, Mr. Browne, Serjeant Wilde, and Mr. Nicolas. Neither myself nor any of my counsel there. What this will effect upon the lords time must discover, as it doth the effects of other eclipses. And thus far I had proceeded in this sad History by Jan. 9, 1644. The rest shall follow as it comes to my knowledge.

[Next day, the Archbishop receiving the news that the Bill of Attainder had passed in the house of lords, broke off his History, and prepared himself for death. H. W.]

The Reasons of the Commons for the attainder of the Archbishop, were at a conference, Jan. 2, by Serjeant Wilde, Mr. Browne, and Mr. Nicolas, communicated to the lords; who thereupon, on the 4th of January, passed the following Ordinance of Attainder: whereby it was ordained, that he should suffer death, as in cases of High-Treason.* And on the 6th of January it was ordered by both houses that he should suffer accordingly on Friday the 10th.

Ordinance of Attainder.

Whereas the knights, citizens, and burghesses of the house of commons, in the present parliament assembled, have in the name of themselves, and of all the commons of England, impeached William Laud, archbishop of Canterbury, for endeavouring to subvert the fundamental laws and government of the kingdom of England; and, instead thereof, to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government against law, and to alter and subvert God's true religion by law established in this realm; and, instead thereof, to set up popish superstition and idolatry, and to subvert the rights of parliament, and the ancient course of parliamentary proceedings; and by false and malicious slanders, to incense his majesty against parliaments; for which the said archbishop deserves to undergo the pains and forfeitures of high-treason; which said offences have been sufficiently proved against the said archbishop upon his Impeachment: be it therefore ordered and ordained, by the lords and commons in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That the said archbishop, for the offences aforesaid, shall stand and be adjudged attainted of high-treason, and shall suffer the pains of death; and shall incur all forfeitures both of lands and goods, as a person attainted of high-treason should or ought to do. Provided, That no judge or judges, justice or justices whatsoever, shall judge or interpret any act or thing to be treason, or hear or determine any treason, in any other manner than he or they should or ought to have done before the making of this Ordinance; and as if this Ordinance had never been had or made; saving always unto all and singular persons and bodies politic and corporate, their heirs and successors, (other than the said archbishop and his heirs, and such as claim by, from, or under him) all such right, title, and interest of, in, and to all and singular such of the lands, tenements, and hereditaments, as he, or any of them, had before the first day of this present parliament, any thing herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.†

But on the 7th, the lords at a Conference acquainted the Commons with a Letter and Petition from the Archbishop, and a Pardon to him from the king, dated the 12th of April, 19 Car. of which he desired the benefit: but the same was over-ruled and rejected. His Petition was, That in case he must die, Dr. Stern, Dr. Haywood, and Dr. Martin, might be permitted to be with him before and at his death, to administer comfort to his soul; and that the manner of his Execution might be altered to beheading. To which the lords agreed, but the commons then refused both; only granted that Dr. Stern and Mr. Marshall, and Mr. Palmer, should go to him; and one or both of the latter to be constantly present, whilst Dr. Stern was with him. But the next day, upon another Petition of his, setting forth Reasons, from his being a divine, a bishop, one that had the honour to sit in the house of peers, and one of the king's most honourable Privy-Council, &c. praying, in those regards, not to be exposed to such an ignominious Death; the commons consented to remit the rest of the Sentence, and that he should suffer death by being beheaded.

Accordingly, on the 10th of January, he was conducted from the Tower to the scaffold on Tower-hill; where being arrived, holding a Paper in his hand, he spake to the people as followeth:

“ Good people; This is an uncomfortable time to preach, yet I shall begin with a text of Scripture, Heb. xii. 2. ‘ Let us run with patience the Race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith; who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God.’

“ I have been long in my race, and how I have looked unto Jesus, the author and finisher of my faith, he best knows. I am now come to the end of my race, and here I find the cross; a death of shame: but the shame must be despised, or no coming to the right hand of God; Jesus despised the shame for me, and God forbid but I should despise the shame for him! I am going apace (as you see) towards the Red Sea, and my feet are now upon the very brink of it; an argument, I hope, that God is bringing me into the Land of Promise, for that was the way through which he led his people; but before they came to it, he instituted a Passover for them, a lamb it was, but must be eaten with sour herbs. I shall obey, and labour to digest the sour herbs as well as the lamb; and I shall remember it is the Lord's Passover. I shall not think of the herbs, nor be angry with the hand that gathereth them, but look up only unto Him who instituted that, and governs these. For men can have no more power over me than what is given from above. I am not in love with this passage through the Red Sea, for I have the weakness and infirmity of flesh and blood plentifully in me, and I have prayed with my Saviour, ‘ ut transiret Calix iste,’ that this Cup of red wine might pass from me;

but if not, 'God's will, not mine, be done:' and I shall most willingly drink of this cup as deep as he pleases, and enter into this sea, yea, and pass through it in the way that he shall lead me; but I would have it remembered, good people, that when God's servants were in this boisterous sea, and Aaron amongst them, the Egyptians who persecuted them, and did in a manner drive them into the sea, were drowned in the same waters, while they were in pursuit of them.—And as for this people, they are at this day miserably misled; God of his mercy open their eyes, that they may see the right way! for at this day the blind lead the blind, and if they go on, both will certainly fall into the ditch. Though the weight of my Sentence be heavy upon me, I am as quiet within as ever I was in my life. And though I am not only the first Archbishop, but the first man that ever died by an Ordinance in parliament, yet some of my predecessors have gone this way, though not by this means.—Here is a great clamour that I would have brought in Popery: I shall answer that more fully by-and-by. In the mean time, you know what the Pharisees said against Christ himself, 'If we let him alone, all men will believe in him, et venient Romani, and the Romans will come and take away our place and nation.' Here was a causeless cry against Christ, that the Romans would come: and see how just the Judgment was; they crucified Christ for fear the Romans should come, and his death was it that brought in the Romans upon them: God punishing them with that which they most feared. And I pray God this clamour of venient Romani, for which I have given no cause, help not to bring them in: For the Pope never had such an harvest in England since the Reformation, as he hath now upon the Sects and Divisions that are among us.—This I shall be bold to speak of the King, our gracious sovereign: He hath been much traduced also for bringing in Popery, but in my conscience (of which I shall give God a very present account), I know him to be as free from the charge as any man living, and I hold him to be as sound a Protestant (according to the Religion by law established) as any man in this kingdom, and that he will venture his life as far, and as freely, for it. And I think I do, or should, know both his affection to Religion, and his grounds for it, as fully as any man in England.—I have been accused as an Enemy to Parliaments. No! I understand them, and the benefit that comes by them, too well to be so; but I did mislike the misgovernments of some Parliaments many ways, and I have good reason for it, for Corruptio optimi est pessima. There is no corruption in the world so bad as that which is of the best thing within itself; for the better the thing is in nature, the worse it is corrupted. And that being the highest court, over which no other hath Jurisdiction; when it is misinformed or misgoverned, the subject is left without all remedy: But I have done. I forgive all the world, all and every of those bitter Enemies which have persecuted me, and humbly desire to be forgiven of God first, and then of every man, whether I have offended him or not, if he do but conceive that I have: Lord, do thou forgive me, and I beg forgiveness of him; and so I heartily desire you to join in prayers with me.*

Having ended his Prayers, and finding the scaffold crowded, he desired they would give him room to die, that he might have an end of the miseries he had so long endured; and coming near the block, he said, 'God's will be done! I am willing to go out of the world, none can be more willing to send me;' and perceiving some people under the Scaffold through the boards, he desired the chinks might be stopped, or the people removed, for he did not desire his Blood should fall upon their heads.' Sir John Clotworthy demanded of him, 'what was the most comfortable Saying

* "His Speech and Prayer ended," says Kennet, "he gave the prayer which he read into the hands of his chaplain Mr. Stern; and seeing one Hind had been writing his Speech as it came from his mouth, he desired him 'Not to do him wrong in publishing a false or imperfect copy.' Sir John Clotworthy did rudely interrupt him with impertinent questions, which he answered with all Christian meekness. The first question was, 'What was the most comfortable saying which a dying man would have in his mouth?' He answered, 'Cupio dissolvi et esse cum Christo.' The other asked again, 'What was the fittest speech a man would use to express his confidence and assurance?' He answered, 'Such assurance is to be found within, and no Words are able to express it rightly.' The busy man demanding 'a place of Scripture, whereupon such assurance might be grounded.' He used some words to this effect, that 'it was the Word of God concerning Christ and his dying for us.'"

Even upon the scaffold, and during the intervals of his prayers, he was harrassed and molested by sir John Clotworthy, a zealot of the reigning sect, and a great leader in the Lower House. This was the time he chose for examining the principles of the dying Primate, and trepanning him into a confession that he trusted for his salvation to the merits of good works, not to the merit of the Redeemer." Hume.—The fact seems scarcely to warrant the Historians representation.

His last Character is thus given by lord Clarendon: "He underwent his Sentence with all Christian courage and magnanimity, to the admiration of the beholders, and confusion of his enemies. Much hath been said of the person of this great prelate before, of his great endowments and natural infirmities; to which shall be added no more in this place (his memory deserving a particular celebration) than that his learning, piety, and virtue, have been attained by very few, and the greatest of his infirmities are common to all, even to the best men."

‘ a dying man could have in his mouth.’ He answered, ‘ Cupio dissolvi et esse cum Christo.’ Sir John still pressed him with several impertinent questions, to which his grace answered with abundance of meekness; and turning to the Executioner, he gave him money, and said, ‘ Here, honest friend, God forgive thee, and I do, and do thy office upon me with mercy!’ Having made another short Prayer, he laid his head down upon the block, and prayed a little time to himself, after which he said aloud, ‘ Lord, receive my soul;’ and this being the signal, the Executioner immediately severed his head from his body at one blow.* He was buried after the manner of the Church of England, in the church of Allhallows, Barking; the very day the Liturgy was abolished by an Ordinance of Parliament, and the Directory set up in the room of it. A brass plate was nailed on his coffin with this inscription: ‘ In hac Cistula conduntur exuvie Gulielmi Laud, Archiepiscopi Cantuariensis, qui securi percussus immortalitatem adit die x. Januarii, ætatis sue 73, Archiepiscopatus xii.’

“Laud,” says Whitelocke, speaking of the Dissolution of the Parliament and continuance of the Convocation in 1640, “was more busy in temporal affairs and matters of state, than his predecessors of later times had been. Judge Whitelocke (the Author’s father) who was anciently and thoroughly acquainted with him, and knew his disposition, would say, ‘He was too full of fire, though a just and good man, and that his want of experience in state matters, and his too much zeal for the Church, and heat, if he proceeded in the way he was then in, would set this nation on fire.’” Memoirs, Apr. 13, 1640, p. 32.

Lord Clarendon, vol. 1, p. 89, says, “It was within one week after the king’s return from Scotland, that Abbot died at his house at Lambeth. The king took very little time to consider who should be his successor, but the very next time the bishop of London, who was longer on his way home than the king had been, came to him, his majesty entertained him very cheerfully with this compellation, ‘My Lord’s Grace of Canterbury, you are very welcome,’ and gave order the same day for the dispatch of all the necessary forms for the translation: so that within a month or there-

* There is in the Lambeth Collection, the following Extract given, in MS. 942, 19, from Spondanus, relating to the beheading of Laud, viz. “Spondanus in Continuacione Annalium Card. Baronii ad A. abouts after the death of the other archbishop, he was completely invested in that high dignity, and settled in his palace at Lambeth. This great prelate had been before in great favour with the duke of Buckingham, whose chief confidant he was, and by him recommended to the king, as fittest to be trusted in the conferring all Ecclesiastical Preferments, when he was but bishop of St. David’s, or newly preferred to Bath and Wells; and from that time he entirely governed that province, without a rival: so that his promotion to Canterbury was long foreseen, and expected, nor was it attended with any increase of envy, or dislike.

“He was a man of great parts, and very exemplary virtues, allayed and decredited by some unpopular natural infirmitates; the greatest of which was, besides a hasty, sharp way of expressing himself, that he believed innocency of heart, and integrity of manners, was a guard strong enough to secure any man in his voyage through this world, in what company soever he travelled, and through what ways soever he was to pass; and sure never any man was better supplied with that provision. He was born of honest parents, who were well able to provide for his education in the schools of learning, from whence they sent him to St. John’s college in Oxford, the worst endowed at that time of any in that famous university. From a scholar he became a fellow, and then the president of the college, after he had received all the graces, and degrees, the proctorship, and the doctorship, could be obtained there. He was always maligned, and persecuted by those who were of the Calvinist faction, which was then very powerful, and who, according to their usual maxim and practice, call every man they do not love, papist; and, under this senseless appellation, they created him many troubles, and vexations; and so far suppressed him, that though he was the king’s chaplain, and taken notice of for an excellent preacher, and a scholar of the most sublime parts, he had not any preferment to invite him to leave his poor college, which only gave him bread, till the vigor of his age was past: and when he was promoted by king James, it was but to a poor bishopric in Wales, which was not so good a support for a bishop, as his college was for a private scholar, though a doctor.

“Parliament in that time were frequent, and grew very busy, and the party, under which he had suffered a continual persecution, appeared very powerful, and full of design, and they who had the courage to oppose them, begun to be taken notice of with approbation, and countenance: under this style he came to be first cherished by the duke of Buckingham, who had made some experiments of the temper, and spirit of the other people, nothing to his satisfaction. From this time he prospered at the rate of his own wishes, and being transplanted out of his cold barren diocese of St. David’s, into a warmer climate, he was left, as was said before, by that great favourite in that great trust with the king; who was sufficiently indisposed towards the persons, or the principles of Calvin's disciples.

"When he came into great authority, it may be, he retained too keen a memory of those who had so unjustly, and uncharitably persecuted him before; and I doubt, was so far transported with the same passions he had reason to complain of in his adversaries, that, as they accused him of popery, because he had some doctrinal opinions which they liked not, though they were nothing allied to popery; so he entertained too much prejudice to some persons, as if they were enemies to the discipline of the Church, because they concurred with Calvin in some doctrinal points; when they abhorred his discipline, and revered the government of the Church, and prayed for the peace of it with as much zeal, and fervency as any in the kingdom; as they made manifest in their lives, and in their sufferings with it, and for it. He had, from his first entrance into the world, without any disguise, or dissimulation, declared his own opinion of that class of men, and, as soon as it was in his power, he did all he could to hinder the growth and increase of that faction, and to restrain those who were inclined to it, from doing the mischief they desired to do. But his power at court could not enough qualify him to go through with that difficult reformation, whilst he had a superior in the church, who, having the reins in his hand, could slacken them according to his own humour and indiscretion; and was thought to be the more remiss, to irritate his choleric disposition. But when he had now the primacy in his own hand, the king being inspired with the same zeal, he thought he should be to blame, and have much to answer for, if he did not make haste to apply remedies to those diseases, which he saw would grow apace.—In September 1633, he was invested in the title, power, and jurisdiction of Archbishop of Canterbury, and entirely in possession of the revenue thereof, without a rival in Church or State; that is, no man professed to oppose his greatness; and he had never interposed or appeared in matters of state to this time.—The Archbishop had, all his life, eminently opposed Calvin's doctrine in those controversies, before the name of Arminius was taken notice of, or his opinions heard of; and thereupon for want of another name, they had called him a papist, which nobody believed him to be, and he had more manifested the contrary in his disputations, and writings, than most men had done; and it may be the other found the more severe, and rigorous usage from him, for their propagating that calumny against him. He was a man of great courage and resolution, and being most assured within himself, that he proposed no end in all his actions and designs, but what was pious and just, as sure no man had ever a heart more entire to the King, the Church, or his country, he never studied the easiest ways to those ends; he thought, it may be, that any art or industry that way would discredit, at least make the integrity of the end suspected, let the cause be what it will. He did court persons too little; nor cared to make his designs, and purposes, appear as candid as they were, by shewing them in any other dress than their own natural beauty, though perhaps in too rough a manner; and did not consider enough what men said, or were like to say of him. If the faults and vices were to be looked into and discovered, let the persons be who they would that were guilty of them, they were sure to find no connivance of favour from him. He intended the discipline of the Church should be felt, as well as spoken of, and that it should be applied to the greatest and most splendid transgressors, as well as to the punishment of smaller offences, and meaner offenders; and thereupon called for, or cherished the discovery of those who were not careful to cover their own iniquities, thinking they were above the reach of other men, or their power, or will to chastise. Persons of honour and great quality of the court, and of the country, were every day cited into the High Commission Court, upon the fame of their incontinence, or other scandal in their lives, and were there prosecuted to their shame and punishment: and as the shame, which they called an insolent triumph upon their degree and quality, and levelling them with the common people, was never forgotten, but watched for revenge; so the fines imposed there were the more questioned, and repined against, because they were assigned to the rebuilding and repairing St. Paul's church; and thought therefore to be the more severely imposed, and the less compassionately reduced and excused: which likewise made the jurisdiction and rigor of the Star-Chamber more felt, and murmured against, and sharpened many men's humours against the Bishops, before they had any ill intention towards the Church."

Abbot, his old antagonist at Oxford, and his predecessor in the Primacy, speaks much less favourably of him. Burnet, noticing Laud's Defence of himself, says, that though "written with so much care, it is a very weak performance. He intended in it to make an Appeal to the world. In most particulars he excuses himself by this, That he was but one of many who either in Council, Star-Chamber, or High Commission voted illegal things. Now, though this was true that he was but one, yet a chief minister in high favour determines so much, that they are little better than machines acted by him. On other occasions he says the things were proved by one witness only. Now, how strong soever this defence may be in law, it is of no force in an appeal to the world; for if a thing is true, it is no matter how full or how defective the proof is. The thing that gave me the strongest prejudice against him in that Book is, that after he had seen the ill effects of his violent counsels, and had been so long shut up and so long at leisure, to reflect on what had passed in the hurry of passion in the exaltation of his pro-

perity: he does not, in any one part of that great Work, acknowledge his own errors, or mix in it any wise or pious reflections on the ill usage he met with, or the unhappy steps he had made."—Of the Committee appointed to prepare the Charge against Laud "I," says the wary Whitlocke, "was one, and particularly summoned to attend that business; which I declined, and gave my reasons to Mr. Miles Corbett the chairman of that Committee, why it was not fit for me to appear in it against one to whom I had been beholden for my education. This would not satisfy Mr. Corbett, but still he pressed me, and sent for me to come and attend the Committee, but I absolutely refused it. This so displeased Mr. Corbett, that he acquainted the house with my neglect, and moved them earnestly that I might be required by their order to attend the service of that Committee, and to be one of those that should manage the Evidence against the Archbishop. This was moved when I was in the house, and upon this alarm I held it fit for me to make my apology and endeavour to be discharged from that employment, by urging that the Archbishop did me the favour to take a special care of my reading at St. John's College, in Oxford, and that it would be disingenuous and ungrateful for me to be personally instrumental to take away his life, who was so instrumental for the bettering of mine. Upon which the house discharged me from this employment." Mr. Hatsell, in his very valuable "Precedents of the Proceedings in the House of Commons," vol. 4, pp. 128, 149, 170, notices some particulars of the course of these Proceedings against Archbishop Laud, but observes concerning the most important, that "They do not fall within the compass of his work; being in times from whence no precedents ought to be drawn to justify the proceedings of either house of parliament."

To what has been already said (see the Note to p. 354) of Laud's severity, it may be added, that his appetite for revenge was so fierce, as to devour the vilest food. To gratify this appetite, he descended so low, as formally to complain to the Council, of Archibald Armstrong, the King's Fool, for a shrewd saucy speech, uttered in his official capacity, to the Archbishop. This weighty cause was heard before the King, Laud himself, the Lord Keeper, and the other great officers: and poor Archy, for his offence, had his fool's coat pulled over his head (no very dignified application, it may seem, of the ceremonies of episcopal degradation; see ante, vol. 1, p. 841, and Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, Title Degradation), and was discharged the King's service, and banished the court. See Rushworth, under date March, 1637. 1 Oldmixon, 134.

In the Archbishop's Library at Lambeth, are several curious MSS. illustrative of different particulars of Laud's History.

A brief RELATION of the Death and Sufferings of the Most Reverend and renowned Prelate the Lord Archbishop of CANTERBURY: With a more perfect Copy of his SPEECH, and other Passages on the Scaffold, than hath been hitherto imprinted. From the Collections of Sir Fran. Eyles Haskins Styles, Baronet.

[From Sommers' Tracts, 2 Coll. vol. 2, p. 287.]

JEREMIAH xxvi. 14, 15.

14. "As for me, behold I am in your hands, do with me as seemeth good and meet unto you:
15. "But know ye for certain, that if ye put me to death, ye shall surely bring innocent blood upon yourselves, and upon this city, and upon the inhabitants thereof, &c."

It is a preposterous kind of writing to begin the story of a great man's life, at the hour of his death; a most strange way of setting forth a solemn tragedy, to keep the principal actor in the tying-house, till the play be done, and then to bring him on the stage only to speak the epilogue, and receive the plaudits. Yet this must be the scope and method of these following papers. To write the whole life of the most reverend and renowned prelate the lord archbishop of Canterbury, would require more time than public expectation can endure to hear of. Those that can judge (as all wise men may) of the brightness and glories of the sun in his highest altitude by the clearness of his going down; or that can "Ortuin solis in occasu quaerere:" [Justin. Hist. l. 11.] discern the rising of the sun (as once Stratton did) by the reflection of his beams in a western cloud; may by the glorious manner of his death and sufferings, presented in these short remembrances, conjecture at the splendour of those rare endowments both of grace and nature, wherewith his former life was adorned and beautified. The ordinary and unsatisfied reader may for his farther satisfaction repair to master Pryn's Breviate of his Life and Actions, though published of purpose to defame him, and render him more odious to the common people. Concerning which, the reader may observe in brief, that all which Mr. Pryn's industrious malice hath accused him of in those collections, is, that he was a man of such eminent virtues, such an exemplary piety towards God, such an unwearied fidelity to his gracious sovereign, of such a public soul towards church and state; so fixed a constancy in friendship, and one so little biassed by his private interests; that this age affords not many equals. And it would trouble Plutarch, if he were alive, to find out a fit parallel with whom to match him. All therefore I shall do at the present time, (and it is the last public office I shall do him) is, to lay down the story of his death and sufferings, together with a view of those plots and practices which were set on foot, to pluck a few years from a weak old man, and bring him to an unnatural calamitous end. For though that maxim in philosophy is most true and certain, that "corruptio est in instanti," that death comes to us in a moment, or "in the twinkling of an eye," as the scriptures phrase is; yet are there many previous dispositions which make way unto it; all which are comprehended in the name of Death. And in that latitude of expression do we take the word, in laying down the story of his death before you; which being writ out of an honest zeal to truth, and a sincere affection to his name and memory, shall either be approved of, or at least excused.

II. It was the practice and position of the ancient Donatists, the predecessors and progenitors of the modern Puritan, "occidere quemcunq; qui contra eos fecerit," [Opt. de Sahis. Donatist. l. 1.] to kill and make away whoever durst oppose their doings, or was conceived to be an hindrance to their growing faction. And by this card their followers in these kingdoms have been steered of late, imprisoning and destroying all who have stood against them. It is long since they entertained such desperate purposes against the life and person of the lord archbishop, threatening his death in scattered libels, telling him that his life was sought for, that neither God nor man could endure so vile a counsellor to live any longer. This was about the end of March, 1629, and was the prologue to those libels, full of threats and scandals, which year by year exasperated and inflamed the people, till they had made them ripe for mischief, and readily prepared to execute whatever their grand directors should suggest unto them. St. Paul did never fight more frequent and more terrible combats with the beasts of Ephesus, for the promotion of the Gospel, than he with these untractable and fiery spirits, who most seditiously opposed his religious purposes of settling unity and uniformity in this church of England. And in this state things stood till the year 1640, in which not only many factious and seditious people in and about the city of London, made an assault by night on his house at Lambeth, with an intent to murder him had they found him there: but the whole faction of the Scots declared in a Remonstrance to the English nation, that one of the chief causes which induced them to invade this realm, was to remove him from his majesty, and bring him to the punishment which he had deserved.

III. The parliament had not long continued, but he is named for an incendiary by the Scottish Commissioners; and thereupon accused of treason by the house of commons. And although no particular charge was brought against him, but only a bare promise to prepare it in convenient time; yet was he presently committed to the custody of the gentleman usher, and by him kept in duranee till the end of February, (being full ten weeks:) about which time his charge was brought unto the lords, but in generals only, and longer time required for particular instances. And yet upon this Lydford law, by which they used to hang men first and indict them afterwards, was he committed to the Tower, being followed almost all the way by the rascal multitude, who barbarously pursued him with reproach and clamours to the very gates; and there detained, contrary to all law and justice almost four years longer. This was the first great breach which was made by parliament in the liberties of the English subject; (save that their like proceeding with the earl of Strafford was a preparative unto it;) and was indeed the very gap, at which the slavery and oppression, under which this miserable nation doth now pine and languish, did break in upon them. What right could meaner persons look for, when as so great a peer was doomed to so long imprisonment, without being called unto his answer? What else hath filled so many prisons in most parts of the kingdom, with the best and wealthiest of the subjects, but the most dangerous effects and consequences of this woful precedent? which as it was the leading case unto all our pressures, so might those pressures have been remedied, had the subject made his case their own; and laboured to prevent it in convenient time. But such a miserable infatuation had befallen them generally, that "seeing they did see, but would not perceive."

IV. But yet the malice of his enemies was not so contented. For though some of the more moderate, or rather the less violent, lords, who did not pierce into the depth of the design, gave out that they intended only to remove him from his majesty's ear, and to deprive him of his archbishopric, which resolution notwithstanding being taken up before any charge was brought against him, was as unjust, though not so cruel, as the others: yet they shewed only by this overture, that they did reckon without their hosts, and might be of the court perchance, but not of the counsel. The leading and predominant party thought of nothing less, than that he should escape with life, or go off with liberty: only perhaps they might conceive some wicked hopes, that either the tediousness of his restraint, or the indignities and affronts which day by day were offered to him, would have broke his heart, not formerly accustomed to the like oppressions. And then like Pilate in the Gospel they had called for water: "and washed their hands before the multitude, and said, that they were innocent of the blood of that righteous person;" thinking that by such wretched fig-leaves, they could not only hide their wickedness, and deceive poor men; but that God also might be mocked, and his all-seeing eyes deluded, to which "all hearts lie open, all desires are known, and from which no secrets can be hidden." To this end, not content to inmate him up within the walls of the Tower, they rob him of his menial servants, restrain him to two only of his number, and those not to have conference with any others, but in the presence of his warder: and in conclusion make him a close prisoner, not suffering him to go out of his lodging to refresh himself, but in the company of his keeper. And all this while they vex his soul continually with scandalous and infamous papers, and set up fucious and seditious preachers to inveigh against him in the pulpit to his very face; so to expose him to the scorn both of boys and women, who many times stood up and turned towards him, to observe his countenance, to see if any alteration did appear therein. And to the same ungodly end, did they divest him of his archiepiscopal and episcopal jurisdiction, conferring it on his inferior and subordinate officers; sequester his rents under pretence of maintenance for the king's younger children (as if his majesty's revenues which they had invaded, were not sufficient for that purpose) convert his house at Lambeth into a prison, and confiscate all his coals and fuel to the use of their gaoler; deprive him of his right of patronage, and take into their own hands the disposing of all his benefices, seize upon all his goods and books which they found at Lambeth; and in conclusion rille him of his notes and papers, not only such as were of ordinary use and observation, but such as did concern him in the way of his just defence. In which they did not any thing from the first to the last, but in a proud defiance to the laws of the land, which they most impudently violated in all these particulars, and more than so, they had proceeded step by step, to this height of tyranny, a whole year almost before they had digested their general charge into particular accusations; or ever called him to his answer in due form of law.

V. But God had given him such a measure both of strength and patience, that these afflictions, though most great and irksome, did make no more impressions on him, than an arrow on a rock of adamant. For at his first commitment he besought his God (as master Prynne observes out of his Manual of Devotions) to "give him full patience, proportionable comfort, and contentment with whatsoever he should send;" and he was heard in that he prayed for. For notwithstanding that he had fed so long on the "bread of carefulness," and drank the "water of affliction;" yet, as the scripture telleth us of the four Hebrew children, "his countenance appeared fairer and fatter in flesh, than any of those who eat their portion of the king's meat, or drank of his wine." And he was wont to say to his private friends, that, "he thanked God he never found more sweet contentment in his greatest liberty, than in the time of that restraint." And certainly it was no wonder that it should be so, he being conscious to himself of no other crimes, which drew that fatal storm upon him, than a "religious zeal to the honour of God, the happiness of the king, and the preservation of the church in her peace and patrimony," as he professeth at his death before all the people. So that despairing of success in the way intended, his enemies fell upon another, but more desperate course, which was to ship him for New England, and make him subject to the insolencies of Wells and Peters, two notorious schis-matic. But this being put to the question in the house of commons, was rejected by the major part: not out of pity to his age, or consideration of his quality, nor in respect unto the laws so often violated; but to preserve him yet a while, as a stale or property, wherewith to cheat the citizens of some further sums, and to invite the Scots to a new invasion, when their occasion so required. For it was little doubted by discerning men, but that the Scots, who made their first invasion on a probable hope of sequestering the lord archbishop and the earl of Strafford from his majesty's counsels; and sped it so well in their design, that they who were recompensed already with the death of the one, would easily be tempted to a second journey, upon assurance to be glutted with the blood of the other.

VI. And this appears more plain and evident, in that about the coming on of the Scots, which was in the midst of January, 1643, they did again revive the business, which had long lain dormant; causing the articles, which they had framed in maintenance of their former accusation, to be put in print about that time, as is apparent by the test of John Browne their clerk, dated the 17th of that month. And as the Scots advanced or slackened in their marches southward, so did they either quicken or retard the work: till hearing of the great success which they had in Yorkshire, they gave command to master Prynne, a man most mischievously industrious to disturb the public, to prosecute the charge against him, and bring him to his long expected trial; as he reports it of himself, [in his Epistle to the Breviate,] who, having rifled him of his papers, and thereby robbed him of those helps, which he had purposely reserved for his just defence; and having personal quarrels of his own to revenge upon him, was thought to be the fittest blood-bound in the whole kennel, to pursue the scent. And now there was no talk but of quick dispatch. When hatred doth accuse, and malice prosecute, and prejudice and prepossession sit upon the bench, God help the innocent. There is nothing but a miracle can preserve him then; and so it proved in the event: they called him often to the bar, both before and after, caused a strict inquisition to be made into all his actions: they winnowed him like wheat, and sitted him to the very bran, (which was you know the devil's office;) they had against him all advantages of power and malice, and witnesses at hand upon all occasions: but still they found his answers and his resolutions of so good a temper, his innocence and integrity of so bright a die, that as they knew not how to dismiss him with credit, so neither could they find a way to condemn him with justice. And though their consciences could tell them, that he had done nothing which deserved either death or bonds; yet either to reward or oblige the Scots, who would not think themselves secure while his head was on, they were resolved to bring him to a speedy end. Only they did desire, if possible, to lay the odium of the murder upon the common people. And therefore serjeant Wild, in a speech against him, having aggravated his supposed offences to the highest pitch, concluded thus, "That he was guilty of so many and notorious treasons, so evidently destructive to the commonwealth, that he marvelled the people did not tear him in pieces as he passed between his barge, and the parliament houses." Which barbarous and bloody project when it would not take, and that though many of the rabble did desire his death, yet none would be the executioner; they then employed some of their most malicious and most active instruments, to go from door to door, and from man to man, to get hands against him; and so petition those to hasten to his condemnation, which must, forsooth, be forced to their own desires: (whereof, and of the magistrates' standing still, and suffering them to proceed without any check, he gave them a memento in his dying speech.) This being obtained, the business was pursued with such heat and violence, that by the beginning of November it was made ready for a sentence; which some conceived would have been given in the King's-Bench, and that their proofs, such as they were, being fully ripened, he should have been put over to a Middlesex jury. But they were only some poor ignorants which conceived so of it. The leading members of the plot thought of no such matter; and, to say truth, it did concern them highly not to go that way: for though there was no question to be made at all, but that they could have packed a jury to have found the bill; but by a clause in the attainder of the earl of Strafford, they had bound the judges not to declare those facts for treason in the time to come, for which they had condemned and executed that heroic peer. And therefore it was done with great care and caution to proceed by ordinance, and vote him guilty first in the house of commons; in which being parties, witnesses, and judges too, they were assured to pass it as they would themselves; which was done accordingly, about the 20th of November.

VII. But yet the business was not done, for the lords stuck at it. Some of which having not extinguished all the sparks of honour, did by the light thereof discover the injustice of so foul a practice; together with the danger that might befall themselves, if once disfavoured by the grantees of that potent faction. A thing so stomached by the commons, that after some evaporations of their heat and passion, which broke out into open threats, they presently drew and sent up an Ordinance to the lords, tending to dispossess them of all power and command in their armies. But fearing this device was too weak to hold, they fall upon another and a likelier project, which was to bring the lords to sit in the commons house; where they were sure they should be inconsiderable both for power and number. And to effect the same with more speed and certainty, they had recourse to their old arts, drew down sir David

Watkins with his general muster of subscriptions, and put a petition in his hands, to be tendered by him to the houses, that is, themselves: wherein it was required amongst other things, that they would vigorously proceed unto the punishment of all delinquents; and that for the more quick dispatch of the public businesses of the state, the lords would please to vote and sit together with the commons. On such uncertain terms, such a ticklish tenure do they now hold their place and power in parliament; who so officiously complied with the house of commons, in depriving the bishops of their votes, and the church's birth-right. And this was it which helped them in that time of need. For by this, though stale and common, stratagem, did they prevail so far upon some weak spirits, that the earls of Kent, Pembroke, Salisbury, and Bullingbrook, the lords North, Gray of Wark, and Brews, (a Scotchman, but an English baron, and generally called the earl of Elgin) resolved to yield unto the current of so strong a stream; and thought they made a gaining voyage, if by delivering the lord archbishop to the people's fury, they might preserve themselves in the people's favour. And we know well, both who it was, and what end he came to, who, though he knew that the accused party was delivered him out of envy only, and that he found no evil he was guilty of; yet being wearied with the clamours and crucifixes of the common people, and fearing that some tumult would be made about it, delivered him unto his enemies to be put to death. And for those other lords who withdrew themselves, and neither durst condemn nor protect the innocent; (though far the major part, as it is reported) it is not easy to determine, whether their conscience were more tender, their collusion grosser, or their courage weaker. All I shall say is only this, that Claudias Lynias in the Acts, had been as guilty of St Paul's death, as any of the forty who had vowed to kill him; if upon notice of the plot which was laid to murder him, he had brought him down unto the people, or not conveyed him with a strong guard to the court of Felix. The journey's end must needs be foul, which such lewd and crooked ways do conduct unto. And it is worth your observation, that the same day, the 4th of January, in which they passed this bloody ordinance, (as if therein they would cry quittance with his sacred majesty, who on the same accused the six guilty members) they passed another for establishing their new Directory; which in effect is nothing but a total abolition of the common-prayer-book, and thereby shewed unto the world, how little hopes they had of settling their new form of worship if the foundation of it were not laid in blood.

VIII. The bill being thus dispatched in the house of lords, (if still they may be called the lords, which are so over-loaded by the common people) there wanted yet the king's assent to give life to it: which they so far contemned, (they had more reason to despair of it) that they never sought it. They had screwed up their ordinances to so high a pitch, that never act of parliament was of more authority : and having found the subjects so obedient as to yield unto them in matters which concerned them in their goods and liberties ; it was but one step more to make trial of them, whether they would submit their lives to the self same tyranny : And thus they made the first experiment in this kind, both of their own power, and the people's patience ; he being the first man, as himself noted in his speech, (which words are purposely omitted in Hind's copy of it :) that was ever put to death by ordinance in parliament ; but whether he shall be the last, further time will shew. Certain it is, that by this ordinance they have now made themselves the absolute masters of the subject's life, which they can call for at their pleasure, as no doubt they will ; and left him nothing but his fetters he can call his own. Just as it was observed by our gracious sovereign, upon occasion of the ordinance for the 20th part, that " the same power which robbed the subject of the 20th part of their estates, had by that only made a claim and entitled itself to the other 19, whensoever it should be thought expedient to hasten on the general ruin." In which his majesty hath proved but too true a prophet. And though perhaps some of the people were well pleased with this bloody ordinance, and ran with joy to see it put in execution : yet all wise men do look upon it as the last groan or gasp of our dying liberty. And let both them and those who passed it, be assured of this, that they who do so gladly sell the blood of their fellow subjects, seldom want chapmen for their own in an open market.

IX. And here, as it was once observed, that the predominant party of the United Provinces, to bring about their ends in the death of Barneveldt, subverted all those fundamental laws of the Belgic liberty for maintenance whereof they took up arms against Philip 2, so would I know which of those Fundamental Laws of the English government have not been violated by these men in their whole proceedings : for preservation of which laws, or rather under colour of such preservation, they have bewitched the people unto this rebellion : It is a fundamental law of the English government, and the first article in the Magna Charta, that the church of England shall be free, and shall have her whole rights and privileges inviolable : yet to make way unto the condemnation of this innocent man, and other the like wicked and ungodly ends, the bishops must be voted out of their place in parliament, which most of them have held far longer in their predecessors, than any of our noble families in their progenitors. And if the lords refuse to give way unto it, as at first they did, the people must come down to the house in multitudes, and cry, " No bishops, no bishops," at the parliament doors, till by the terror of their tumults they extort it from them. It is a fundamental law of the English liberty, that no freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned without cause shewn, or be detained without being brought unto his answer in due form of law ; yet here we see a freeman imprisoned 10 whole weeks together, before any charge was brought against him ; and kept in prison 3 years more, before his general accusation was by them reduced into particulars ; and for a year almost detained close prisoner, without being brought unto his answer, as the law requires. It is a fundamental law of the English government, that no man be disseised of his freehold or liberties, but by the known laws of the land ; yet here we see a man disseised of his rents and lands, spoiled of his goods, deprived of his jurisdiction, divested of his right and patronage ; and all this done, when he was so far from being convicted by the laws of the land, that no particular charge was so much as thought of. It is a fundamental law of the English liberty, that no man shall be condemned, or put to death, but by lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land, i. e. in the ordinary way of a legal trial : and sure an ordinance of both houses, without the royal assent, in no part of the law of England, nor held an ordinary way of trial for the English subject, or ever reckoned to be such in the former times. And finally, it is a fundamental law in the English government, that if any other case (than those recited in the statute of 25 Ed. 3.) which is supposed to be treason, do happen before any of his majesty's justices, the justices shall tarry without giving judgment, till the cause be shewn and declared before the king, and his parliament, whether it ought to be judged treason or not : yet here we have a new found treason, never known before, nor declared such by any of his majesty's justices, nor ever brought to be considered of by the king and his parliament, but only voted to be such by some of those few members which remain at Westminster, who were resolved to have it so for their private ends. Put all which hath been said together, and then tell me truly, if there be any difference, for I see not any, between the ancient Roman slaves, and the once free-born subject of the English nation, whose life and liberty, whose goods and fortunes depend on the mere pleasure of their mighty masters.

X. But to return unto our story, the passing of the ordinance being made known unto him, he neither entertained the news with a stoical apathy, nor wailed his fate with weak and womanish lamentations, (to which extremes most men are carried in this case) but heard it with so even and so smooth a temper, as shewed he neither was afraid to live, nor ashamed to die. The time between the sentence and the execution, he spent in prayers and applications to the Lord his God ; having obtained, though not without some difficulty, a chaplain of his own, to attend upon him, and to assist him in the work of his preparation : though little preparation needed to receive that blow, which could not but be welcome, because long expected; For so well was he studied in the art of dying, especially in the last and strictest part of his imprisonment, that by continual fasting, watching, prayers, and such like acts of Christian humiliation, his flesh was rarified into spirit, and the whole man so fitted for eternal glories, that he was more than half in heaven, before death brought his bloody, but triumphant, chariot to convey him thither. He that had so long been a Confessor, could not but think it a release of miseries to be made a Martyr; And as is recorded of Alexander the Great that the night before his best and greatest battle with Darius the Persian, he fell into so sound a sleep, that his princes hardly could awake him when the morning came: so is it certified of this great Prelate, that on the evening before his Passover, the night before the dismal combat betwixt him and death, after he had refreshed his spirits with a moderate supper, he betook himself unto his rest, and slept very soundly, till the time came in which his servants were appointed to attend his rising. A most assured sign of a soul prepared. The fatal morning being come, he first applied himself to his private prayers, and so continued, till Pennington, and other of their public officers, came to conduct him to the scaffold; which he ascended with so brave a courage, such a cheerful countenance, as if he had spouted rather to behold a triumph, than to be made a sacrifice, and came not there to die, but to be translated. And to say truth, it was no scaffold, but a throne; a throne whereon he shortly was to receive a crown, even the most glorious crown of Martyrdom. And though some rude, uncivil people reviled him as he passed along with opprobrious language, as loth to let him go to the grave in peace, it never discomposed his thoughts, nor disturbed his patience. For he had profited so well in the school of Christ, that when he was reviled he reviled not again, when he suffered he threatened not, but committed his cause to him that judgeth righteously. And as he did not fear the frowns, so neither did he covet the applause of the vulgar herd, and therefore rather chose to read what he had to speak unto the people, than to affect the ostentation either of memory or wit in that dreadful agony: whether with greater magnanimity or prudence, I can hardly say. As for the matter of his speech, besides what did concern himself and his own purgation, his great care was to clear his majesty, and the church of England from any inclination unto popery; with a persuasion of the which the authors of our present miseries had abused the people, and made them take up arms against their sovereign. A faithful servant to the last. By means whereof, as it is said of Sampson in the book of Judges, that "the men which he slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his life;" so may it be affirmed of this famous Prelate, that he gave a greater blow unto the enemies of God and the king at the hour of his death, than he had given them in his whole life before; of which I doubt not but the king and the church will find speedy fruits. But this you will more clearly see by the speech itself, which followeth here according to the best and most perfect copies.

XI. A SPEECH of the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, spoken at his death upon the Scaffold on the Tower-hill, January 10, 1644.

Good People;—This is an uncomfortable time to preach, yet I shall begin with a text of Scripture, Heb. xii. 2. "Let us run with patience that race which is set before us, looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith, who for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God."

I have been long in my race, and how I have looked to Jesus the author and finisher of my faith, he best knows: I am now come to the end of my race, and here I find the cross, a death of shame; but the shame must be despised, or no coming to the right hand of God: Jesus despised the shame for me, and God forbid but I should despise the shame for him; I am going apace, as you see, towards the Red Sea, and my feet are now upon the very brink of it; an argument I hope, that God is bringing me into the land of promise, for that was the way through which he led his people. But before they came to it, he instituted a Passover for them, a Lamb it was, but it must be eaten with sour herbs, I shall obey, and labour to digest the sour herbs, as well as the Lamb. And I shall remember it is the Lord's Passover; I shall not think of the herbs, nor be angry with the hand which gathereth them; but look up only to Him who instituted that, and governs these; For men can have no more power over me than what is given them from above. I am not in love with this passage, through the Red Sea, for I have the weakness and infirmities of flesh and blood plentifully in me; And I have prayed with my Saviour, ut transiret Calix iste, that this cup of red wine might pass from me: But if not, God's will, not mine, be done, and I shall most willingly drink of this cup as deep as he pleases, and enter into this sea, yea and pass through it, in the way that he shall lead me.

But I would have it remembered, good people, that when God's servants were in this boisterous sea, and Aaron among them, the Egyptians which persecuted them, and did in a manner drive them into that sea, were drowned in the same waters, while they were in pursuit of them; I know my God whom I serve, is as able to deliver me from this sea of blood, as he was to deliver the three children from the furnace; and, I most humbly thank my Saviour for it, my resolution is now, as theirs was then: They would not worship the image the king had set up, nor will I the imaginations which the people are setting up; nor will I forsake the temple and the truth of God, to follow the bleating of Jeroboam's calf, in Dan and in Bethel. And as for this people, they are at this day miserably misled, (God of his mercy open their eyes that they may see the right way) for at this day the blind lead the blind, and if they go on, both will certainly fall into the ditch. For myself, I am, and I acknowledge it in all humility, a most grievous sinner many ways, by thought, word, and deed, and I cannot doubt, but that God hath mercy in store for me, a poor penitent, as well as for other sinners; I have now upon this sad occasion, ransacked every corner of my heart, and yet, I thank God, I have not found, among the many, any one sin which deserves death by any known law of this kingdom; And yet hereby I charge nothing upon my judges; for if they proceed upon proof, by valuable witnesses, I, or any other innocent, may be justly condemned; And I thank God, though the weight of the sentence lie heavy upon me, I am as quiet within, as ever I was in my life. And though I am not only the first archbishop, but the first man that ever died by an ordinance of parliament, yet some of my predecessors have gone this way, though not by this means; for Elphegus was hurried away and lost his head by the Danes; and Simon Sudbury in the fury of Wat Tyler and his fellows; before these, St. John the Baptist had his head danced off by a lewd woman: and St. Cyprian, archbishop of Carthage, submitted his head to a persecuting sword. Many examples, great and good, and they teach me patience; for I hope my cause in heaven will look of another die, than the colour that is put upon it here. And some comfort it is to me, not only that I go the way of these great men in their several generations, but also that my charge, as foul as it is made, looks like that of the Jews against St. Paul (Acts xxv. 3.) For he was accused for the law and the temple, i. e. religion; And like that of St. Stephen (Acts vi. 14.) for breaking the ordinances which Moses gave, i. e. law and religion, the holy place and the temple (verse 13.) But you will say, do I then compare myself with the integrity of St. Paul, and St. Stephen? No, far be that from me; I only raise a comfort to myself, that these great Saints and servants of God were laid at in their times, as I am now. And it is memorable, that St. Paul, who helped on this accusation against St. Stephen: did after fall under the very same himself. Yea, but here is a great clamour, that I would have brought in Popery; I shall answer that more fully by and by; In the mean time you know what the Pharisees said against Christ himself, "If we let him alone, all men will believe in him, et venient Romani, and the Romans will come, and take away both our place and the nation." Here was a causeless cry against Christ that the Romans will come; And see how just the judgment of God was? they crucified Christ for fear lest the Romans should come, and his death was it which brought in the Romans upon them, God punishing them with that which they most feared: and I pray God this clamour of venient Romani, of which I have given no cause, help not to bring them in; for the Pope never had such a harvest in England since the reformation, as he hath now upon the sects and divisions that are amongst us. In the mean time, by honour and dishonour, by good report and evil report, as a deceiver and yet true, am I passing through this world, 2 Cor. vi. 8.—Some particulars also I think it not amiss to speak of.

And first this I shall be bold to speak of, the king our gracious sovereign; He hath been much traduced also for bringing in of Popery; but on my conscience, of which I shall give God a very present account, I know him to be as free from this charge as any man living: and I hold him to be as sound a Protestant, according to the religion by law established, as any man in this kingdom: and that he will venture his life as far, and as freely for it: and I think I do, or should know, both his affection to religion, and his grounds for it, as fully as any man in England.

The second particular is concerning this great and populous city, (which God bless.) Here hath been of late, a fashion taken up to gather hands, and then go to the great court of this kingdom, (the parliament) and clamour for justice, as if that great and wise court, before whom the causes come, which are unknown to the many, could not, or would not do justice, but at their appointment. A way, which may endanger many an innocent man, and pluck his blood upon their own heads, and perhaps upon the city's also: And this hath been lately practised against myself: [the magistrates standing still, and suffering them openly to proceed from parish to parish without check;]* God forgive the setters of this, with all my heart I beg it, but many well meaning people are caught by it. In St. Stephen's case, when nothing else would serve, they stirred up the people against him: and Herod went the same way, when he had killed St. James, yet he would not venture upon St. Peter, till he found how the other pleased the people. But take heed of having your hands full of blood, for there is a time, best known to himself, when God, above all other sins, makes inquisition for blood, and when that inquisition is on foot, the Psalmist tells us, That God remembers, but that is not all, he remembers and forgets not the complaint of the poor, that is, whose blood is shed by oppression, vers. 9. take heed of this, It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God, but then especially, when he is making inquisition for blood; And, with my prayers to avert it, I do heartily desire this city to remember the prophecy that is expressed, Jer. xxvi. 15.

The third particular is the poor church of England. It hath flourished and been a shelter to other neighbouring churches, when storms have driven upon them. But, alas, now it is in a storm itself, and God only knows whether, or how it shall get out; and, which is worse than a storm from without, it is become like an oak cleft in shivers with wedges made out of its own body, and at every cleft prophaneness and irreligion is entering in, while as Prosper speaks, in his second book De vitæ contemptu. cap. 4. Men that introduce prophaneness are cloaked over with the name Religionis Imaginariae, of imaginary religion; for we have lost the substance and dwell too much in opinion, and that church which all the Jesuits machinations could not ruin, is fallen into danger by her own.

The last particular, for I am not willing to be too long, is myself; I was born and baptized in the bosom of the church of England established by law; in that profession I have ever since lived, and in that I come now to die; This is no time to dissemble with God, least of all in matter of religion; and therefore I desire it may be remembered, I have always lived in the Protestant religion, established in England, and in that I come now to die. What clamours and slanders I have endured for labouring to keep a uniformity in the external service of God, according to the doctrine and discipline of this church, all men know, and I have abundantly felt.

Now at last I am accused of high treason in parliament: a crime which my soul ever abhorred; this treason was charged to consist of these two parts, An endeavour to subvert the laws of the land, and a like endeavour to overthrow the true Protestant religion established by law. Besides my answers to the several charges, I protested my innocency in both houses. It was said prisoners protestations at the bar must not be taken. I can bring no witness of my heart and the intentions thereof, therefore I must come to my protestation not at the bar, but my protestation at this hour and instant of my death; in which I hope all men will be such charitable Christians, as not to think I would die and dissemble, being instantly to give God an account for the truth of it: I do therefore here in the presence of God, and his holy angels, take it upon my death, That I never endeavoured the subversion either of law or religion; and I desire you all to remember this protest of mine for my innocency, in these, and from all treasons whatsoever. I have been accused likewise as an enemy to parliaments: No, I understand them and the benefit that comes by them too well to be so; But I did mislike the misgovernments of some parliaments many ways, and I had good reason for it; For "corruptio optimi est pessima," there is no corruption in the world so bad, as that which is of the best thing in itself: for the better the thing is in nature, the worse it is corrupted. And that being the highest court, over which no other have jurisdiction, when it is misinformed or misgoverned, the subject is left without all remedy. But I have done, I forgive all the world, all and every of those bitter enemies which have persecuted me, and humbly desire to be forgiven of God first, and then of every man, whether I have offended him or not, if he do but conceive that I have, Lord do thou forgive me, and I beg forgiveness of him. And so I heartily desire you to join in prayer with me.

The Archbishop's PRAYER upon the Scaffold.

O Eternal God and merciful Father, look down upon me in mercy, in the riches and fullness of all thy mercies look upon me; but not till thou hast nailed my sins to the cross of Christ, not till thou hast bathed me in the blood of Christ, not till I have hid myself in the wounds of Christ: that so the punishment due unto my sins may pass over me. And since thou art pleased to try me to the uttermost, I humbly beseech thee give me now in this great instant, full patience, proportionable comfort, and a heart ready to die for thy honour, the king's happiness, and this church's preservation. And my zeal to these, far from arrogance be it spoken, is all the sin, human frailty excepted and all incidents thereto, which is yet known to me in this particular, for which I now come to suffer: I say in this particular of treason; but otherwise my sins are many and great; Lord pardon them all, and those especially, whatever they are, which have drawn down this present judgment upon me; and when thou hast given me strength to bear it, do with me as seems best in thine own eyes; and carry me through death that I may look upon it in what visage soever it shall appear to me, Amen. And that there may be a stop of this issue of blood, in this more than miserable kingdom. I shall desire that I may pray for the people too, as well as for myself, O Lord, I beseech thee; give grace of repentance to all blood-thirsty people; but if they will not repent, O Lord confound all their devices, defeat and frustrate all their designs and endeavours upon them, which are or shall be contrary to the glory of thy great name, the truth and sincerity of religion, the establishment of the king and his posterity after him in their just rights and privileges, the honour and conservation of parliaments in their just power, the preservation of this poor church in her truth, peace, and patrimony, and the settlement of this distracted and distressed people under their antient laws, and in their native liberties. And when thou hast done all this in mere mercy for them, O Lord fill their hearts with thankfulness, and with religious dutiful obedience to thee and thy commandments all their days: So Amen, Lord Jesus, Amen, and receive my soul into thy bosom, Amen. Our Father which art, &c.

XII. The Speech and Prayers being ended, he gave the Paper which he read unto Dr. Stern, desiring him to shew it to his other chaplains, that they might know how he departed out of this world, and so prayed God to shew his mercies and blessings on them. And

noting how one Hinde had employed himself in taking a copy of his Speech as it came from his mouth; he desired him not to do him wrong in publishing a false or imperfect copy. Which as Hinde promised him to be careful of, calling for punishment from above if he should do otherwise; so hath he reasonably well performed his promise: the alterations or additions which occur therein, being perhaps the work of those who perused his papers, and were to authorise them to the public view, to fit it more unto the palate of the city faction, and make it more consistent with the credit of those guilty men; who had voted to his condemnation. This done, he next applied himself to the fatal block, as to the haven of his rest. But finding the way full of people, who had placed themselves upon the theatre to behold the tragedy, he desired he might have room to die, beseeching them to let him have an end of his miseries, which he had endured very long. All which he did with so serene and calm a mind, as if he had been rather taking order for another man's funeral, than making way unto his own. Being come near the block, he put off his doublet, and used some words to this effect: God's will be done, I am willing to go out of this world, no man can be more willing to send me out of it. And seeing through the chinks of the boards, that some people were got under the scaffold, about the very place where the block was seated, he called on the officers for some dust to stop them, or to remove the people thence, saying it was no part of his desires, that his blood should fall upon the heads of the people. Never did man put off mortality with a braver courage, nor look upon his bloody and malicious enemies with more Christian charity. And thus far he was gone in his way towards Paradise with such a primitive magnanimity, as equalled, if not exceeded the example of ancient Martyrs, when he was somewhat interrupted in his quiet passage by one sir John Clotworthy, a firebrand brought from Ireland by the earl of Warwick to increase the combustions in this kingdom. Who finding that the mockings and revilings of malicious people had no power to move him, or sharpen him into any discontent or shew of passion; would needs put in, and try why he could do with his sponge and vinegar, and stepping to him near the block, asked him, (with such a purpose as the Scribes and Pharisees used to propose questions to our Lord and Saviour) not to learn by him but to tempt him, or to expose him to some disadvantage with the standers-by, what was the comfortabest saying which a dying man could have in his mouth. To which he meekly made this answer, "Cupio dissolvi et esse cum Christo;" i. e. I desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ. Being asked again what was the fittest speech a man could use, to express his confidence and assurance; he answered with the same spirit of meekness that such assurance was to be found within, and that no words were able to express it rightly. Which when it would not satisfy the troublesome and impertinent man, who aimed at something else than such satisfaction, unless he gave some word, or place of scripture, whereupon such assurance might be truly founded; he used some words to this effect, that it was the word of God concerning Christ, and his dying for us. And so without expecting any further questions, for he perceived by the manner of sir John's proceedings, that there would be no end of his interruptions, if he hearkened any longer to him, he turned towards his executioner, the gentler and discreeter man of the two, and gave him money, saying, without the least distemper or change of countenance, 'Here, honest friend, God forgive thee, and do thy office upon me with mercy,' and having given a sign when the blow should come, he knelt down upon his knees, and prayed as follows:

XIII. The Lord Archbishop's PRAYER, as he kneled by the Block.

Lord, I am coming as fast as I can. I know I must pass through the shadow of death, before I can come to see thee. But it is but umbra mortis, a mere shadow of death, a little darkness upon nature; but thou by thy merits and passion, hast broke through the jaws of death. So, Lord receive my soul, and have mercy upon me, and bless this kingdom with peace and plenty, and with brotherly love and charity, that there may not be this effusion of Christian blood amongst them, for Jesus Christ's sake, if it be thy will. Then laying his head upon the block, and praying silently to himself, he said aloud, Lord receive my soul, which was the signal given to the executioner, who very dexterously did his office, and took it off as a blow: his soul ascending on the wings of angels into Abraham's bosom, and leaving his body on the scaffold, to the care of men. A spectacle so displeasing unto most of those who had desired his death with much heat and passion, that many who came with greedy eyes to see him suffer, went back with weeping eyes when they saw him dead; their consciences perhaps bearing witness to them, as you know whose did, that they had sinned in being guilty of such innocent blood. Of those, whom only curiosity, and desire of novelty brought thither to behold that unusual sight, many had not the patience to attend the issue, but went away as soon as the speech was ended; others returned much altered in the opinion which before they had of him, and bettered in their resolutions towards the king and the church, whose honour and religious purposes they saw so clearly vindicated by this glorious martyr. And for the rest, the most considerable, though perhaps the smallest part of that great assembly, as they came thither with no other intention, than to assist him with their prayers, to imbalm his body with their tears, and so lay up his dying speeches in their hearts and memories: so when they had performed those offices of Christian duty, they comforted themselves with this, that as his life was honourable, so his death was glorious, the pains whereof were short and momentary to himself, the benefit like to be perpetual, unto them and others, who were resolved to live and die in the communion of the church of England.

XIV. But to proceed, for I have some few things to note, it was observed, that whereas other men, when they come to the block, use to look pale and wan, and ghastly, and are even dead before the blow, he on the contrary seemed more fresh and cheerful, than he had done any part of the day before: a clear and gallant spirit being like the sun, which shews greatest always at the setting. And as the scripture telleth us of St. Stephen the Protomartyr, that whilst he spake his last oration before the chief priests and elders of the Jews, they of the council looking stedfastly upon him, saw his face as it had been the face of an angel: so was it generally observed, not without astonishment, that all the while our Martyr prayed upon the block, the sun which had not shown itself all the day till then, did shine directly on his face, which made him look most comfortably, that I say not gloriously, but presently as soon as the blow was given, withdrew behind a cloud again and appeared no more, as we are credibly advertised by good hands from London, though it be otherwise reported in their weekly pamphlets. And if the bodies of us men be capable of any happiness in the grave, he had as great a share therein, as he could desire, or any of his friends expect; his body being accompanied to the earth with great multitudes of people, whom love, or curiosity, or remorse of conscience had drawn together, purposely to perform that office, and decently interred in the church of All-hallows Barking, a church of his own patronage and jurisdiction, according to the rites and ceremonies of the church of England. In which it may be noted, as a thing remarkable, that being whilst he lived the greatest champion of the common-prayer-book, here by law established, he had the honour being dead, to be buried in the form therein prescribed, after it had been long disused, and repro- bated in most churches of London. Nor need posterity take care to provide his monument. He built one for himself whilst he was alive: it being well observed by sir Edward Dering, [In his book of speeches] one of his most malicious enemies, and he who threw the first stone at him, in the beginning of this parliament, that St. Paul's church will be his perpetual monument, and his own book, against the jesuit, his lasting epitaph.

XV. Thus died this most reverend, renowned, and religious prelate: when he had lived 71 years, 13 weeks, 4 days; if at the least he may be properly said to die, the great example of whose virtue shall continue always, not only in the minds of men, but in the annals of succeeding ages, with renown and fame. But how he lived, what excellent parts he was composed of, and how industriously he employed those parts, for the advancement of God's honour, his sovereign's power and safety, and the church's peace, will be a work becoming a more able pen; unto whose care and diligence I commend the same. And so I leave him to that comfort which the Psalmist gives him, and it is the greatest comfort that can befall those men, who have been tortured on the rack of malicious tongues; viz. The righteous shall be had in everlasting remembrance, and shall not be afraid of any evil report. 1's. cxii. v. 6. 7.

172. Proceedings against Mr. TOMPKINS, Mr. WALLER, Mr. CHALLONER, and Others, before a Council of War, for a Plot against the Parliament: 19 CHARLES I. A. D. 1643. [5 Rushw. Coll. 322. 2 Clarendon's Hist. 247. 3 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 140.]

AT this time [Tuesday the 30th of May 1643.] happened the discovery of a notable Design, carried on by Mr. Tompkins, Mr. Waller, Mr. Challoner, and Others; The first notice whereof was given by one Mr. Roe, servant to Mr. Tompkins, who having over-heard some of their consultations, imparted the same to a member of the house of commons; whereupon a committee was appointed to inquire into the same; viz. Mr. Pym, sir Henry Vane, jun., Mr. Solicitor St. Johns, and Mr. Glyn, (not long before chosen Recorder of London) who having several days and nights traced the same, and divers of the persons concerned being secured, the house of commons desired a Conference with the lords, where Mr. Pym communicated to them the substance of the Design, and soon after set the same forth in print, with an Order that the same should be read in all churches and chapels in London and Westminster, and the suburbs thereof, as follows.

I. That the Conspiracy was formed of a mixture and conjunction of persons of several qualities, some whereof were of both Houses of Parliament, others of the City, and others belonging to the court, who in their respective places and employments, were to form and perfect the work, raised out of the ashes of the late Petition of London for peace.

II. The chief actors were Mr. Waller, a member of the house of commons, who pretended, and gave out to the rest, that many others of that house, and of the lords, were privy to and concerned therein: Mr. Tompkins, a gentleman living in Hulborn, brother-in-law to the said Mr. Waller, and a servant to the queen, as being secretary to the commissioners for her majesty's revenue; Mr. Challoner, an eminent citizen; one Mr. Blinkard, Mr. Alexander Hampden, who brought the last message from the king, Mr. Hassel one of his majesty's messengers, &c.

III. The method was for several persons in the City to dispose of themselves into a committee, to hold intelligence with both Armies, the Court, and the Parliament. To take a general survey of the affections of all the inhabitants within the Weekly Bills of Mortality, which was to be done under these 3 ranks; Right Men, (or of the king's party;) Averse Men, (or the well-affected to the Parliament;) and Moderate Men, (or neutrals;) To consider of Arms, Ammunition, and all Provisions of War: To appoint out of themselves select persons to treat with Mr. Waller, and Mr. Tompkins, in relation to the City, Court and Parliament: as also with sir Nicolas Crispe, sir George Binion, captain Roydon, and others then at Oxford.

IV. Mr. Waller's part was to engage a considerable part of the Lords and Commons, and to be a means of conveying Counsels, Resolutions, and intelligence between them and the said City-Committee. Mr. Tompkins was not only an assistant to Mr. Waller therein, but an instrument to convey, by Hassel, and others, their proceedings to the court, principally to the lord Falkland, and to receive thence directions, powers, and commands.

V. For preventing discovery, protestations of secrecy were taken, as they were Christians, not to disclose it; and no man in the city was to endeavour the engaging above two, whereby no one man could impeach many.

VI. From the court, Mr. Heron, and Mr. Alexander Hampden, and others employed upon Messages from the king to the parliament, were to convey directions, encouragements, and advice to those in London; and authority was to be given under the great seal, and warrants under the king's hand for settling a council of war, naming of generals, and other officers, execution of martial law, raising of money, and providing arms; and to facilitate the whole, part of the king's forces to be in readiness to assist the party here, as there should be occasion.

VII. The particulars of the Design itself, were, To seize the king's children, To secure several Members of Parliament, particularly the lord Say, the lord Wharton, Mr. Pym, sir Philip Stapleton, colonel Hampden, and colonel Strode; As also the lord mayor, and committee of the militia, under pretence of bringing them to a legal trial; To seize upon the outworks, forts, magazines, gates, and other places of importance in the city, and the Tower, and let in the king's forces; and in the mean time to resist and obstruct all payments imposed by authority of the two houses for support of their armies.

VIII. For their authority they had the following Commission brought up by the lady Au-

bigny, (who was now taken into custody) the said commission being found hid under ground in Mr. Tompkins's cellar.

Charles by the Grace of God, king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, defender of the Faith, &c. To our trusty and well-beloved sir Nicholas Crispe, sir George Stroude, knights, sir Tho. Gardiner knight, recorder of London, sir George Binion knight, Richard Edes, and Marmaduke Boydon esquires, Tho. Broom esq. Peter Paggon, Charles Jennings, sir Edw. Charlton, Robert Abbot, Andrew King, William White, Stephen Bolton, Robert Alden, Edmund Foster, Tho. Blinkhorn of London, gentlemen; and to all such other person and persons as according to the true intenu and purport of these presents, shall be nominated and appointed to be generals, colonels, serjeant-majors, or other officers, or of our council of War, greeting. Whereas in our cities of London and Westminster, and suburbs thereof, our borough of Southwark, and county of Middlesex, there are raised and continued great numbers of military forces, both horse and foot, who under the command of Robert earl of Essex, as their general, and under the conduct of divers others, pretending to derive their authority from the two houses of parliament, have traiterously levied war, and rebelled against us, their natural liege lord, and many of our subjects have been seduced by false informations, by the practice of a few, who have been the contrivers of these mischievous plots, and have joined with them either in person, or by aiding of them with men, money, horses, or other things; and many of our good and loyal subjects, overawed by the power of the rebels, have been enforced to contribute to them for the maintenance of this unnatural war, and others refusing, have been plundered and robbed of their estates, and some committed to several prisons, and others barbarously used, contrary to the liberty of free-born men, the laws of the land, and contrary to all humanity; of which injuries and calamities falling upon our good subjects, we are very sensible, and desirous to give relief to our good subjects by all the best means we can; and to resist the violence and insolence of the rebels and their adherents, We having no other end therein, but to preserve the true Protestant religion in the integrity and purity thereof; to maintain the laws of the land, and the liberty of the persons, and the property of the estates of our subjects, and the just privileges of parliament, have thought fit for our better service to settle a council of war, in or about our city of London, who may take those things into their sad considerations, which may conduce best to this end, and to have such commanders and officers settled in the places aforesaid, which may both raise, and govern, and lead such forces as may be raised there.—Know ye therefore, That we, reposing special trust and confidence in your fidelities, industries, and good discretions, have made choice of, nominated, and appointed you to be our council of war for the said cities of London and Westminster and suburbs thereof, our said county of Middlesex and borough of Southwark; and do hereby give and grant authority to you, or any four of you, to make choice of such other able and discreet persons as you shall think fit to nominate under the hands and seals of any four of you, which with yourselves shall make up in all the number of 21, and no more. And we do give and grant to you, or any four of you, power and authority, at such times and in such places as you shall think convenient, to assemble and meet together, and there to consult, advise, and resolve of all such things; and of such ways and means as you or any four of you shall think fittest, for the raising of forces, both of horse and foot, either of the inhabitants of the said cities, county and borough, or any adjacent counties, or other places, who will voluntarily associate themselves to that purpose; and these forces to arm, muster, conduct, order, lead and govern, in the places aforesaid, or in any the counties adjacent, or elsewhere, in such manner as you yourselves, or such other able and fit persons as you or any four of you shall appoint, according to these presents, shall think fit.

And the better to effect this our service, We do further give and grant to you or any four of you, power and authority, under your hands and seals, to make choice of and appoint such a fit person as you shall think meet, to be captain-general of all these forces thus to be raised, and such other person as you or any four of you shall in like manner make choice of and appoint to be colonel, lieutenant-colonels, and serjeant-majors, over the said forces, in such manner, and in such places as you shall so appoint; who by virtue thereof, and by virtue of these presents, shall have power and authority to do, execute and perform all such things which to these several offices and employments, according to law-martial, do belong. And we do hereby promise and grant, That with all convenient speed, after we shall have notice from you or any four of you under your hands and seals, of your nomination of any person or persons to those several places, we shall grant and confirm unto them and every of them respectively those several places to which you have nominated them, as aforesaid, under our great seal of England, or otherwise as shall be reasonably devised and required of us.

And we do further by these presents give and grant unto you full power and authority, by all such good ways as you or any four of you, under your hands shall agree upon, to raise money for the cloathing, arming, furnishing and paying of all such soldiers as shall be thus raised, and for the providing of all ammunition and other necessaries for the war;

all which money, upon a just account, we do, for us, our heirs and successors, promise, grant, and agree, well and truly to repay, so soon as we shall be enabled thereunto, and in the mean time to secure the same to those who for our service, and by your mediation and industry, shall lend or disburse the same. And we do further by these presents grant, That such generals, colonels, lieutenant-colonels, and other officers so by you nominated as aforesaid, shall have full power and authority, by virtue of these presents, to lead and order the soldiers severally under their charges, and with them to fight against our enemies and rebels, and them to slay and destroy, or them to save, according to the law-martial, or course of war: for the doing of all which, this shall be to you, them, and every of them, a sufficient warrant. Willing and commanding all such officers and soldiers, which by virtue hereof you shall retain, to obey readily, and receive and accomplish your directions, commands, and summons in all things hereto appertaining or necessary to be done: as also all mayors, sheriffs, justices of peace, commissioners of array, and all other our officers and loving subjects, to be aiding and assisting, both to you, and to all such officers and other persons whom you shall appoint under any four of your hands and seals, for the furthering and advancement of this our especial service: for which, this shall be to you, to them, and every of them, a sufficient warrant. In witness whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patent, witness ourself, at Oxford the 16th day of March, in the 18th year of our reign.

IX. In pursuance of this Commission, they had often consulted of a General, and treated with sir Hugh Pollard, prisoner in the Compter, (once a member of the house of commons, but expelled, being accused of having an hand in the Design to bring up the Northern Army against the Parliament,) about it. And a Declaration was ready drawn, setting forth the cause of their taking up of arms to be in pursuance of their late Protestation to maintain the true reformed Protestant religion against all Papists and Sectaries, to oppose illegal assessments, &c. Which was to be distributed to their friends, and on the night of their rising set upon the posts around about London. Concerning which time of their rising, they had also consulted, (of which precise notice was to be sent to Oxford, as to the day and hour,) and some moved to have it done on Wednesday the last of May, (being the Fast day, and the very next day after the first intimation was given towards a discovery,) but it had been put off, and not fully concluded, it being said 'it should be left to the lords to determine; whom Waller pretended should side with them. Mr. Haesel lay close at Beaconsfield, and had word sent, 'The great Ship was come into the Downs;' by which he was to understand that the Design was near ripe: and he acquainted the lord

Falkland at Oxford therewith, and received Answer, That they should hasten it with all speed. And when they were ready, 3,000 of the king's forces were to advance from Oxford within 15 miles of London, to be ready upon notice to fall into the works and assist. And white ribbons or tape was agreed to be worn by all concerned in this action to distinguish them, &c.

The Parliament, upon this Discovery, formed an Oath or Vow, to be taken by the Members of both houses, and by their Army; and appointed a General Thanksgiving to be kept throughout the kingdom; at which time a printed Narrative of this Design was to be read, and the said Oath or Covenant to be tendered to all persons; (but no penalty set on the refusers) the Oath being as follows :

'I, A. B. in humility and reverence of the divine majesty, declare my hearty sorrow for my own sins and the sins of this nation, which have deserved the calamities and judgments that now lie upon it : and my true intention is by God's grace, to endeavour the amendment of my own ways. And I do further in the presence of Almighty God, declare, vow, and covenant, that in order to the security and preservation of the true reformed Protestant religion and liberty of the subject, I will not consent to the laying down of arms, so long as the Papists, now in open war against the parliament, shall by force of arms be protected from the justice thereof : and that I do abhor and detest the wicked and treacherous design lately discovered; and that I never gave, nor will give my assent to the execution thereof, but will according to my power and vocation oppose and resist the same, and all other of the like nature. And in case any other like design shall hereafter come to my knowledge, I will make such timely discovery as I shall conceive may best conduce to the preventing thereof. And whereas I do in my conscience believe, that the forces raised by the two houses of parliament are raised and continued for their just defence, and for the defence of the true protestant religion and liberty of the subject, against the forces raised by the king; that I will, according to my power and vocation, assist the forces raised and continued by both houses of parliament, against the forces raised by the king, without their consent : and will likewise assist all other persons that shall take this oath, in what they shall do in pursuance thereof; and will not directly or indirectly adhere unto, nor shall willingly assist the forces raised by the king, without the consent of both houses of parliament. And this vow and covenant I make in the presence of Almighty God, the searcher of all hearts, with a true intention to perform the same, as I shall answer at the great day when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed.'

The Parliament sent to general Essex, desiring him to appoint a Council of War, for trying of Mr. Tompkins, &c. which was done; and on Friday the 30th of June a Council of War sat at Guildhall, consisting of 22 colonels of the city, and of the Lord General's Army, the earl of Manchester being President; before whom Mr. Tompkins, Mr. Challoner, Mr. Blinkhorn, Mr. Abbot, Mr. White, and Mr. Hampden, were severally brought to the bar, and their Examinations and Confessions produced by the Advocate-General, and read; and upon Monday July 3, Tompkins and Challoner received Sentence of death; and the next day, Blinkhorn and Abbot: but Hampden being fallen sick, his Trial was put off; and as for Mr. White, the Court agreed not in their Judgment.

On Wednesday July 5, Mr. Tompkins was executed on a gibbet, at the end of Fetter-lane in Holborn (near his own house.) And the same day Mr. Challoner suffered in like manner over against the Royal-Exchange. Their Speeches (as they were printed in those times) were as follow :

MR. TOMPKINS'S Speech upon the Ladder immediately before his Execution.

"Gentlemen; I do humbly acknowledge in the sight of Almighty God (to whom, and to angels, and to this great assembly of people, I am now a spectacle) that my sins have deserved of him this untimely and shameful death; and I humbly submit to it : and seeing all our times are in his hand, and that a sparrow falls not to the ground, but with his providence, much more man, that bears his image. I am no Atheist, but do acknowledge God's great protection to me, and his goodness and mercy, in that he hath, during all this trouble I have undergone, preserved my heart, and kept it from sin, and from thoughts of distraction : I acknowledge his great mercy. I am no Papist; I must tell you why I shall speak a little of this, because I have been desired by a good and ancient friend of mine to declare myself in this point : and therefore I shall say somewhat to you of this. I say, I was never Papist, nor Popishly inclined; and for some relations I have had to some that way, I did never make any shew of the least inclination to Popism. I have sometimes had conference and disputes with some Jesuits, (in foreign parts chieffy) I thank God, my principles of religion were so grounded, they could never shake me : I have been called by some of them an heretic in grain. But this is true, (which might make that worthy friend of mine put me in mind to clear myself in this point) in regard of some relations, and in regard I received very civil usage from those of that religion in foreign parts, where that religion is professed; I returned the like civility to them here, as I had occasion, and especially to those whom any civil affair brought into my conversation. And truly if I were to live, I should do the same thing, having no calling to the contrary : if I were an officer, it were something. I do forgive all the world, as I desire all the world, should forgive me. Touching the business for which I suffer, I do acknowledge, that affection to a brother-in-law, and affection and gratitude to the king, whose bread I have eaten now above 28 years: (I have been a servant to him 20 years, I have been a servant to him when he was prince, and ever since; it will be 28 years in August next) I confess, these two motives drew me into this foolish business. I have often since declared to good friends, that I was glad it was discovered; because it might have occasioned very ill consequences; and truly I have repented having any hand in it.

"Gentlemen, I thank God, God hath given me so good a heart, and such presence of mind, as I was confident he would either take me out of this danger, or that he would be present with me, to assist me in bearing this trouble. I do acknowledge this as a great mercy, either to take me away from the days of sin, or to take me away from the evils of the time to come, which God avert; or to take me away from the infirmities of age, now approaching upon me. I know not what more to say."

Then turning to the Executioner, he said,

"Honest friend, I forgive you, as the executioner of justice; I forgive you, and I do recommend myself into the hands of God Almighty; and one thing pray give me leave to say, I hope to be saved by faith in Jesus Christ."

Lieutenant Colonel Washborn asked Mr. Tompkins, "Do you acknowledge this your suffering to be just?" Mr. Tompkins answered, "I have said it already, pray do not trouble me." Then Lieutenant-colonel Washborn said to him, "Whereas you have had a hand in this you suffer for, if you know any other Plot that is prejudicial to the Parliament or State, pray reveal it." Mr. Tompkins answered, "Pray trouble me not; I have done my duty."

Then the Executioner performed his office: and it was to be noted, that in all this time, from the beginning to the end, he never so much as altered his countenance, nor by his outward appearance seemed in the least abashed with the apprehension of death.

Mr. CHALLONER's dying Words:

"Gentlemen; It hath pleased God to bring me to this place; God hath now returned my prayer upon me: My prayer was, That if this design might not be honourable to him, that it might be known: God hath heard me, and it is discovered, the very same thing hath satisfied me, that I was in an error, and that I am confident I was in a great deal of fault: and, I confess, I do now die justly; and I pray God, that I may now glorify the Lord. I shall only thus much declare to the world, that may take off the aspersion that was laid upon my partner and my wife, which neither of them did know of this design. I have declared my conscience freely to God and the world, in every particular that concerns the business. Thus much I shall say for my own particular; there were three things laid to my charge, which there was some mistake in, concerning the King's Letter, whereas it was thought to be another way: I thank God it was not that way. Then concerning the Seal, I had no hand in the procuring of it; nor knew not of it till the Friday. There is another thing, that is concerning the seizing of the magazines, which I had no hand in neither. But I die justly, and deserve this punishment.

"But now to you all that are here, Let my example be to you, that you never take yourself to any thing but what you have warrant for from the Lord: I had no warrant I vow to God, that hath now satisfied me: the Lord, I hope, will forgive me. I have heartily repented: and I beseech you all to take this as a warning. And whereas there is now a great deal of distraction and division in the city; and that we now make difference between God's ministers and God's ministers; despise no means: I acknowledge my fault: I did make some difference, and I now acknowledge it, and desire the Lord to forgive me: I have received more comfort from such men than ever I had before. I shall not now have much to say: but I desire heartily the whole world would forgive me. I do beg of my God, and of my Christ, whom I have not honoured so much as I should have done, that he would have mercy upon me. And now to you all I speak, I do now as freely forgive you, as I trust my Saviour Jesus Christ hath forgiven me. And so, Lord Jesus, into thy hands I commend my spirit, for thou hast redeemed me. O Lord God, and so the Lord take me, the Lord receive me."

Then his father tendered him the king's Pardon, saying: Here is the king's gracious Pardon. To which Mr. Challoner answered, 'Sir, I beseech you, trouble me not with it. Pray speak to my friends to take care of my corps, and carry me home.' Then Mr. Peters,* said to him, 'You are now before the Lord of Heaven; if you have any thing about the Lords you spoke of so often last night, I beseech you speak your conscience.' Mr. Challoner answering, said; 'Gentlemen, This is the happiest day that ever I had. I shall now, gentlemen, declare a little more of the occasion of this, as I am desired by Mr. Peters, to give him and the world satisfaction in. It came from Mr. Waller under this notion, 'That if we could make a moderate party here in London, to stand betwixt, and in the gap, to unite the king and the parliament, it would be a very acceptable work; for now the three kingdoms lay a bleeding, and unless that were done, there was no hopes to unite them.' Withal I made this reply: 'Sir, If I could assure you of three parts of London, none of them should stir unless we had the countenance of the Lords and Commons.' To this he replied, 'You shall have to countenance this business, the whole House of Lords, except three or four, and divers of the House of Commons. We were promised we should speak with these lords; and, in truth, except we had spoken with these lords, nothing could have been done: for Mr. Abbot, Mr. Blinkhorn, Mr. Luntloe, Mr. King, and myself, agreed, That we would not stir till these Lords had declared themselves, and would be engaged. And now, Gentlemen, I have another thing to declare, which shall be in the behalf of those that are condemned. As Mr. Waller was the mouth from the Lords, as he did declare, so I was the unhappy instrument from Mr. Waller to the rest: The Sentence is now past, I desire, if it might be, That it might be moved to the house, That no more might suffer in this cause. This is all I have to say, and desire your hearty prayers to God for me."

* "Mr. Challoner," says Heath, "at his execution spake little, being not suffered to have any of the sober pious clergy with him, but haunted by that stage divine Hugh Peters."

Then one Mr. Smart said to him, "Mr. Challoner, if you were to live longer, would you ever have done the like again?"

Mr. Challoner answered, "I am thus far confident, That if it had pleased God to lend me life, I think I should have ran another course, and I am confident of it. I hope this is the happiest day I ever saw; for I hope God is reconciled to me in my Saviour Jesus Christ, that hath given me repentance, and I am confident he will return my prayer for me." Then, at his request, Mr. Peters prayed with him; which being ended, he said these words; "Gentlemen, I do from my heart forgive you, and all the world, desiring you and all the world to forgive me also; and so I commend my soul into the hands of my God."

Mr. WALLER'S Speech in the House of Commons, on Tuesday the 4th of July, 1643.

Mr. Waller being a member of the House of Commons, could not be tried by the Council of War, whilst he continued so; and therefore, on Tuesday, July the 4th, was brought to the bar, and had leave given him by the Speaker, to say what he could for himself, before they proceeded to expel him the house; whereupon, he spake as follows:

"Mr. Speaker; I acknowledge it a great mercy of God, and a great favour from you, that I am once more suffered to behold this honourable assembly; I mean, not to make use of it to say any thing in my own defence, by justification, or denial of what I have done: I have already confessed enough to make me appear worthy, not only to be put out of this house, but out of the world too. All my humble request to you is, that, if I seem to you as unworthy to live, as I do to myself, I may have the honour to receive my death from your own hands, and not be exposed to a trial by the council of war: whatever you shall think me worthy to suffer in a parliamentary way, is not like to find stop any where else.

"This, sir, I hope you will be pleased for your own sakes to grant me, who am already so miserable, that nothing can be added to my calamity, but to be made the occasion of creating a precedent to your own disadvantage; beside the right I may have to this, consider, I beseech you, that the eyes of the world are upon you; you govern in chief, and if you should expose your own members to the punishment of others, it will be thought that you either want power or leisure to chastise them yourselves; nor let any man despise the ill consequences of such a precedent as this will be; because he seeth not presently the inconveniencies which may ensue: you have many armies on foot, and it is uncertain how long you may have occasion to use them. Soldiers and commanders, though I know well they of the parliament's army excel no less in modesty than they do in courage, are generally of a nature ready to pretend to the utmost power of this kind, which they conceive to be due to them, and may be too apt, upon any occasion of discontent, to make use of such a precedent as this. In this very parliament you have not been without some taste of the experience hereof: it is now somewhat more than two years since you had an army in the north, paid and directed by yourselves; and yet you may be pleased to remember, there was a considerable number of officers in that army, which joined in a petition or remonstrance to this house, taking notice of what some of the members had said, as they supposed to their disadvantage, and did little less than require them of you; it is true, there had been some tampering with them; but what has happened at one time may wisely be thought possible to fall out again at another.

"Sir, I presume but to point you out the danger, if it be not just, I know you will not do me the wrong to expose me to this trial; if it be just, your army may another time require the same justice of you, in their own behalf, against some other member, who, perhaps, you would be less willing to part with. Necessity has of late forced you into untrodden paths; and in such a case as this, where you have no precedent of your own, you may not do amiss to look abroad upon others, states and senates, which exercise the supreme power, as you now do here.

"I dare confidently say, you shall find none, either ancient or modern, which ever exposed any of their own order to be tried for his life, by the officers of their armies abroad, for what he did while he resided among them in the senate. Among the Romans the practice was so contrary, that some inferior officers in their army, far from the city, having been sentenced by their general or commander in chief, as deserving death by their discipline of war, have nevertheless, because they were senators, appealed thither, and the cause has received a new hearing in the senate. Not to use more words to persuade you to take heed that you wound not yourself through my sides, in violating the privileges belonging to your own persons: I shall humbly desire you to consider likewise the nature of my offence, not but that I should be much ashamed to say any thing in diminution thereof: God knows it is horrid enough for the evil it might have occasioned, but if you look near it, it may perhaps appear to be rather a civil than a martial crime, and so to have title to a trial at the common law of the land; there may justly be some difference put between me and others in this business.

“I have had nothing to do with the other army, or any intention to begin the offer of violence to any body. It was only a civil pretence to that which I then foolishly conceived to be the right of the subject. I humbly refer it to your considerations, and to your consciences. I know you will take care not to shed the blood of war in peace, that blood by the law of war which hath a right to be tried by the law of peace. For so much as concerns myself, and my part in this business, (if I were worthy to have any thing spoken or patiently heard in my behalf) this might truly be said, that I made not this business, but found it; it was in other mens hands long before it was brought to me, and when it came, I extended it not, but restrained it. For the propositions of letting in part of the king's army, or offering violence to the members of this house, I ever disallowed, and utterly rejected them.

“What it was that moved me to entertain discourse of this business, so far as I did, I will tell you ingenuously, and that rather as a warning for others, than that it makes any thing for myself: it was only impatience of the inconveniencies of the present war, looking on things with a carnal eye, and not minding that which chiefly, if not only ought to have been considered, the inestimable value of the cause you have in hand, the cause of God and of Religion, and the necessities you are forced on for the maintenance of the same; as a just punishment for this neglect, it pleased God to desert and suffer me with a fatal blindness, to be led on, and engaged in such counsels as were wholly disproportioned to the rest of my life; these, sir, my own conscience tells me, were the cause of my failing, and not malice, or any ill habit of mind, or disposition toward the common-wealth, or to the parliament: for from whence should I have it? If you look on my birth, you will not find it in my blood: I am of a stock which hath born you better fruit: If you look on my education, it hath been almost from my childhood in this house, and among the best sort of men; and for the whole practice of my life to this time, if another were to speak for me, he might reasonably say, that neither my actions out of parliament, nor my expressions in it, have procured of distrust or malice to the liberties of the people or privileges of parliament.

“Thus, sir, I have set before your eyes, both my person and my case, wherein I shall make no such defence by denying or extenuating any thing: I have done, as ordinary delinquents do, my address to you, and all my plea shall only be such as children use to their parents. I have offended, I confess it; I never did any thing like it before: it is a passage unsuitable to the whole course of my life beside; and for the time to come, as God that can bring light out of darkness, and hath made this business, in the event, useful to you; so also hath he to me: You have by it, made an happy discovery of your enemies, and God of myself, and the evil principles I walk by; so that if you look either on what I have been heretofore, or what I now am, and by God's grace assisting me, shall always continue to be; you may perhaps think me fit to be an example of your compassion and clemency.

“Sir, I shall no sooner leave you, but my life will depend on your breath, and not that alone, but the subsistence of some that are more innocent. I might therefore shew you my children, whom the rigour of your justice would make complete orphans, being already motherless. I might shew you a family, wherein there are some unworthy to have their share in that mark of infamy which now threatens us: But something there is, which, if I could shew you, would move you more than all this; it is my heart, which abhors what I have done more, and is more severe to itself, than the severest judge can be. A heart, Mr. Speaker, so awakened by this affliction, and so entirely devoted to the cause you maintain, that I earnestly desire of God to incline you so to dispose of me, whether for life or for death, as may most conduce to the advancement thereof.

“Sir, not to trouble you any longer, if I die, I shall die praying for you; if I live, I shall live serving you, and render you back the use and employment of all those days you shall add to my life.”

After this, having withdrawn himself, he was called in again, and, being by the Speaker required thereto, gave them an exact Account how he came first to the knowledge of this business, &c. However, they proceeded to expel him the house; and so being left to the Council of War, he was condemned to die, but had a reprieve from General Essex; and after about a year's imprisonment, paying a fine of 10,000*l.* was discharged, and travelled into France. The earl of Portland, and the lord Conway were taxed, as being privy to this Design, and for some time in custody; but it not being clearly proved, they were soon after discharged.

The following is lord Clarendon's Account of this business.

“There fell out now an accident at London, which gave great advantage to them in the fierce prosecution of the war, a discovery of a Plot, which produced a public thanksgiving to God for their deliverance, a wonderful animosity against the king, and a covenant, and union among themselves, and throughout the city a prejudice to all moderate men, who promoted an accommodation, and a brand upon all overtures of peace as stratagems upon the city, and the parliament. Of this plot, there being never such a formed relation made by those who made great use of it, that men can collect what the design was, or that it was laid with any probable circumstances, by which a success might be expected, I shall briefly, and faithfully set down all that I know, have heard, or can reasonably conjecture to be in it; and it was thought by many, and averred by others who I believe did not think so, that I knew as much of it as most men.

“ There was of the house of commons one Mr. Waller, a gentleman of a very good fortune and estate, and of admirable parts, and faculties of wit and eloquence, and of an intimate conversation, and familiarity with those who had that reputation. He had, from the beginning of the parliament, been looked upon by all men, as a person of very entire affections to the king's service, and to the established government of church and state; and by having no manner of relation to the court, had the more credit and interest to promote the rights of it. When the ruptures grew so great between the king and the two houses, that very many of the members withdrew from those councils, he, among the rest, with equal dislike absented himself: but at the time the standard was set up, having intimacy and friendship with some persons now of nearness about the king, with the king's approbation, he returned again to London; where he spoke, upon all occasions, with great sharpness, and freedom; which (now there were so few there that used it, and there was no danger of being over voted) was not restrained; and therefore used as an argument against those, who were gone upon pretence “ that they were not suffered to declare their opinion freely in the house;” which could not be believed, when all men knew, what liberty Mr. Waller took, and spoke every day with impunity, against the sense, and proceedings of the house. This won him a great reputation with all people who wished well to the king; and he was looked upon as the boldest champion the crown had in both houses; so that such lords, and commons, as really desired to prevent the ruin of the kingdom, willingly complied in a great familiarity with him, as a man resolute in their ends, and best able to promote them. And it may be they believed his reputation at court so good, that he would be no ill evidence there, of other mens zeal and affection; and so all men spoke their minds freely to him, both of the general distemper, and of the passions, and ambition of particular persons: all men knowing him to be of too good a fortune, and too wary a nature, to engage himself in designs of danger or hazard.

“ Mr. Waller had a brother-in-law, one Mr. Tomkins, who had married his sister, and was clerk of the queen's council, of very good fame for honesty, and ability. This gentleman had good interest and reputation in the city, and conversed much with those who disliked the proceedings of the parliament, and wished to live under the same government they were born; and from those citizens received information of the temper of the people, upon accidents, in the public affairs. And Mr. Waller, and he, with that confidence that uses to be between brethren of the same good affections, frequently imparted their observations, and opinions to each other; the one relating, how many in both houses inclined to peace; and the other making the same judgment upon the correspondence he had, and intelligence he received from the most substantial men of London; and both of them again communicated what one received from the other, to the company they used to converse with; Mr. Waller imparting the wishes and power of the well affected party in the city, to the lords and gentlemen whom he knew to be of the same mind; and Mr. Tomkins acquainting those he durst trust of the city, that such and such lords and gentlemen, who were of special note, were weary of the distractions, and would heartily, and confidently contribute to such an honourable, and honest peace, as all men knew would be most acceptable to the king. And from hence they came reasonably to a conclusion, that if some means were found out to raise a confidence in those who wished well, that they should not be oppressed by the extravagant power of the desperate party; but that if they would so far assist one another, as to declare their opinions to be the same, they should be able to prevent, or suppress, those tumults, which seemed to countenance the distractions; and the houses would be induced to terms of moderation.

“ In this time the lord Conway, being returned from Ireland, incensed against the Scots, and discontented with the parliament here, finding Mr. Waller in good esteem with the earl of Northumberland, and of great friendship with the earl of Portland, he entered into the same familiarity; and, being more of a soldier, in the discourses administered questions, and considerations, necessary to be understood by men that either meant to use force, or to resist it; and wished ‘ that they who had interest, and acquaintance in the city, would endeavour by a mutual correspondence to inform themselves of the distinct affections of their neighbours, that, upon any exigent, men might foresee whom they might trust;’ and these discourses being again derived by Mr. Waller to Mr. Tomkins, he, upon occasion, and conference with his companions, insisted on the same arguments; and they again conversing with their friends, and acquaintance, for of all this business, there were not above three who ever spoke together, agreed, ‘ that some well affected persons, in every parish, and ward, about London, should make a list of all the inhabitants; and thereupon to make a reasonable guess of their several affections,’ which at that time was no hard thing for observing men to do, and thence a computation of the strength, and power of that party, which was notoriously violent against any accommodation.

“ I am persuaded the utmost project in this

design was, I speak not what particular men might intend, or wish upon their own fancies, to beget such a combination among the party well affected, that they would refuse to conform to those ordinances of the twentieth part, and other taxes for the support of the war; and thereby, or by joint petitioning for peace, and discountenancing the other who petitioned against it, to prevail with the parliament to incline to a determination of the war. And it may be, some men might think of making advantage of any casual commotion, or preventing any mischief by it; and thereupon that enquiry where the magazines lay and discourse of wearing some distinguishing tokens, had been rather casually mentioned, than seriously proposed. For it is certain, very many who were conscious to themselves of loyal purposes to the king, and of hearty dislike of the parliament's proceedings, and observed the violent, revengeful, ruining persecution of all men, by those of the engaged party, were not without sad apprehensions that, upon some jealousy, and quarrel picked, even a general massacre might be attempted of all the king's friends; and thereupon, in several discourses, might touch upon such expedients, as might in those seasons be most beneficial to their safety. But that there was ever any formed design, either of letting in the king's army into London, which was impossible to be contrived; or of raising an army there, and surprising the parliament, or any one person of it, or of using any violence in, or upon the city, I could never yet see cause to believe; and if there had, they would have published such a relation of it, after Mr. Waller had confessed to them all he knew, had heard, or fancied to himself, as might have constituted some reasonable understanding of it; and not have contented themselves with making conclusion from questions that had been asked, and answers made, by persons unknown, and forcing expressions used by one, to relate to actions of another, between whom there had been never the least acquaintance, or correspondence; and joining what was said at London to somewhat done at Oxford, at another time, and to another purpose: for before I finish this discourse, it will be necessary to speak of another action, which, how distinct soever from this that is related, was woven together to make one plot.

“From the king's coming to Oxford, many citizens of good quality, who were prosecuted, or jealously looked upon in London, had resorted to the king, and hoping, if the winter produced not a peace, that the summer would carry the king before that city with an army; they had entertained some discourse ‘of raising, upon their own stocks of money and credit, some regiments of foot, and horse, and joining with some gentlemen of Kent, who were likewise inclined to such an undertaking.’ Among these was Sir Nicolas Crisp, a citizen of good wealth, great trade, and an active spirited man, who had been lately prosecuted with great severity by the house of commons, and had thereupon fled from London, for appearing too great a stickler in a petition for peace in the city. This gentleman industriously preserved a correspondence still there, by which he gave the king often very useful intelligence, and assured him ‘of a very considerable party, which would appear there for him, whenever his own power should be so near, as to give them any countenance.’ In the end, whether invited by his correspondents there, or trusting his own sprightly inclinations and resolutions too much, and concluding that all who were equally honest, would be equally bold, he desired his majesty, ‘to grant a commission to such persons, whom he would nominate, of the city of London, under the great seal of England, in the nature of a commission of array, by virtue whereof, when the season should come, his party there would appear in discipline, and order; and that this was desired by those, who best knew what countenance and authority was requisite: and being trusted to them would not be executed at all, or else at such a time as his majesty should receive ample fruit by it; provided it were done with secrecy, equal to the hazard they should run who were employed in it.’

“The king had this exception to it, ‘the improbability that it could do good, and that the failing might do hurt to the undertakers.’ But the promoter was a very popular man in the city, where he had been a commander of the trained-bands, till the ordinance of the militia removed him; which rather improved, than lessened, his credit; and he was very confident, it would produce a notable advantage to the king: however, they desired it who were there, and would not appear without it; and therefore the king consented to it; referring the nomination of all persons in the commission to him: who, he verily believed, had proceeded by the instruction, and advice of those that were nearest the concernment; and for the secrecy of it, the king referred the preparing, and dispatch of the commission, to sir Nicholas Crisp himself, who should acquaint no more with it, than he found requisite; so without the privacy, or advice of any counsellor, or minister of state then most trusted by his majesty, he procured such a commission as he desired, being no other than the commission of array in English, to be signed by the king, and sealed with the great seal.

“This being done, and remaining still in his custody, the lady Aubigny, by a pass, and with the consent of the houses, came to Oxford to transact the affairs of her own fortune with the king upon the death of her husband, who was killed at Edge-hill; and she having in a few days dispatched her business there, and being ready to return, sir Nicholas Crisp came to the king, and besought him, ‘to desire that lady, who had a pass, and so could promise herself safety in her journey, to carry a small box, in which that commission should be with her, and to keep it in her own custody, until a gentleman should

‘ call to her ladyship for it, by such a token;’ that token he said, ‘ he could send to one of the persons trusted, who should keep it by him, till ‘ the opportunity came in which it might be ‘ executed.’ The king accordingly wished the lady Aubigny, to carry it with great care and secrecy; telling her, ‘ it much concerned his own service;’ and to deliver it in such a manner, and upon such assurance, as is before mentioned: which she did, and, within few days after her return to London, delivered it to a person who was appointed to call for it. How this commission was discovered, I could never learn: for though Mr. Waller had the honour to be admitted often to that lady, and was believed by her to be a gentleman of most entire affections to the king’s service, and consequently might be fitly trusted with what she knew, yet her ladyship herself, not knowing what it was she carried, could not inform any body else.

“ But about this time, a servant of Mr. Tomkins, who had often cursorily over-heard his master and Mr. Waller discourse of the argument we are now upon, placed himself behind a hanging, at a time they were together; and there, whilst either of them discoursed the language and opinion of the company they kept, over-heard enough to make him believe his information, and discovery, would make him welcome to those whom he thought concerned; and so went to Mr. Pym, and acquainted him with all he had heard, or probably imagined. The time when Mr. Pym was made acquainted with it, is not known; but the circumstances of the publishing it were such as filled all men with apprehensions. It was on Wednesday the 31st of May, their solemn fast day, when, being all at their sermon, in St. Margaret’s church in Westminster, according to their custom, a letter or message is brought privately to Mr. Pym; who thereupon, with some of the most active members, rise from their seats; and, after a little whispering together, remove out of the church: This could not but exceedingly affect those who stayed behind; immediately they send guards to all the prisons, as Lambeth-House, Ely-House, and such places, where their malignants were in custody, with directions ‘ to search ‘ the prisoners;’ and some other places which they thought fit, should be suspected. After the sermons were ended, the houses met; and were only then told, ‘ that letters were intercepted going to the king and the court at Oxford, that expressed some notable conspiracy in hand, to deliver up the parliament, and the city, into the hands of the cavaliers; and that ‘ the time for the execution of it drew very near.’ Hereupon a committee was appointed ‘ to examine all persons they thought fit; and to apprehend some nominated at that time.’ And the same night, this committee apprehended Mr. Waller, and Mr. Tomkins; and, the next day, such others as they suspected.

“ Mr. Waller was so confounded with fear, and apprehension, that he confessed whatever he had said, heard, thought, or seen; all that he knew of himself, and all that he suspected of others; without concealing any person of what degree, or quality soever, or any discourse that he had ever, upon any occasion, entertained with them: What such and such ladies of great honour, to whom, upon the credit of his great wit, and very great reputation, he had been admitted, had spoke to him in their chambers of the proceedings in the houses; and how they had encouraged him to oppose them, what correspondence, and intercourse they had, with some ministers of state at Oxford; and how they derived all intelligence thither. He informed them, ‘ that the earl of Portland, ‘ and the lord Conway, had been particular ‘ in all the agitations which had been with the ‘ citizens; and had given frequent advice, and ‘ directions, how they should demean themselves; and that the earl of Northumberland ‘ had expressed very good wishes to any attempt, that might give a stop to the violent ‘ actions, and proceedings of the houses, and ‘ produce a good understanding with the king.’

“ When the committee were thus furnished, they took the examinations of Mr. Tomkins, and such other as they thought necessary, and having at the same time, by some other means, discovered, or concealed it till this time that commission which is before discoursed of, and gotten the very original into their hands, they kneaded both into one plot, and conspiracy; and, acquainting the houses with so much as they thought yet seasonable to publish, they declared, without naming any lords, or other persons, to be interested in the design, save those only who were imprisoned; among whom the lady Aubigny was one; and without communicating any of the examinations, which, they pretended, were not to be common till the conspirators were brought to trial, ‘ that ‘ the original of this conspiracy was from the ‘ late London petition for peace,’ which was spoken of about Christmas last in the book precedent; ‘ and that under pretence of ‘ peace and moderation, a party was to be ‘ formed which should be able to suppress all ‘ opponents, and to awe the parliament: ‘ That, to this purpose, some of those who ‘ were the principal movers, and fomenters of ‘ that petition, did continue in the nature of a ‘ committee, still to carry on the design: that ‘ they held intelligence in both armies, court, ‘ and parliament; took a general survey of ‘ the numbers, and affections of the several ‘ inhabitants throughout the wards, and parishes ‘ of the city, and places adjacent; and distinguished all under the titles of men affected, or ‘ averse to the king; or indifferent, and neutral ‘ persons, carried only by the success, and ‘ power of the prevailers: That they were ‘ well instructed in the number, and inclinations ‘ of the trained-bands of London; the places ‘ where the magazines were kept; where the ‘ commanders for the parliament dwelt; had ‘ thought of places for rendezvous, and retreat, ‘ upon any occasion, and of colours, and marks of distinction between the different parties.— That Mr. Waller and Mr. Tomkins were the principal persons employed, and trusted to give advertisement to, and correspond with, the king's ministers at Oxford; and receive advertisements and commands from thence, for the completing the work; that they two held constant intelligence, and intercourse with the lord Falkland, then principal secretary to the king; and that, from him, they received the signification of the king's pleasure; and that those directions, counsels, and encouragements, had been principally sent by those messengers which had been employed by his majesty to the parliament, under the pretence of peace; and, especially, by Mr. Alexander Hamden; who came with the last message, and was a cousin-german to Mr. Waller. That the lady Aubigney, who had been lately at Oxford, had brought thence a commission to them from the king, by force of arms to destroy, kill, and slay the forces, raised by the parliament and their adherents, as traitors and rebels; and that they had lately sent a message to Oxford by one Hassel, a servant of the king's, to acquaint the lord Falkland, that the design was come to a good perfection; unto which, answer was returned, that they should hasten it with all speed:—That the particulars of the design appeared to be: 1. To seize into their custody the king's children: 2. To seize several members of both houses, the lord Mayor, and committee of the Militia, under pretence of bringing them to a legal trial. 3. To seize upon the out-works, forts, Tower of London, magazines, gates, and other places of importance in the city. 4. To let in the king's forces to surprise the city, and to destroy all those who should oppose them by authority of the parliament. 5. By force of arms to resist all payments imposed by authority of parliament, raised for the support of the armies employed for their just defence, &c. To suspend, if not alter the whole government of the city, and, with assistance of the king's force, to awe, and master the parliament.

“When both houses were awakened, and startled with this report, the first thing agreed on, was, ‘a day of thanksgiving to God for this wonderful delivery,’ which shut out any future doubts, and disquisitions, whether there had been any such delivery; and, consequently, whether their plot was in truth, or had been so framed. Then it was said, ‘that as the design was the most desperate, so the carriage was the most subtle, and among persons of reputation, and not suspected; and that there was reason to suspect, many members of both houses were privy to it; and therefore there ought to be all possible care taken to make the discovery perfect, and to unite themselves for the public defence: that if any part were left undiscovered, it might prove fatal to the common-wealth.’ This finding a full consent, it was propounded, ‘that a protestation

‘might be drawn up, by which every member of the two houses might purge himself from any guilt of, or privity in, that conspiracy; and likewise oblige himself to resist, and oppose any such combination.’ They who were under the character of moderate men, and usually advanced all motions of peace, and accommodation, durst not oppose the expedient, lest they should be concluded guilty; most of them having had familiarity with Mr. Waller, and, no doubt, upon sundry occasions, spoken with that freedom to him, as might very well incur a severe interpretation, if, upon this occasion, what they had said should be scanned. And so, before the rising, there was framed by the house of commons, a Vow and Covenant to be taken by the members of both houses, and afterwards by the city, and their army; for their jealousy was now spread over all their own quarters; which covenant, for the rareness of it both in title and style, I think necessary here to insert in the very terms; which were these:

‘A Sacred Vow, and Covenant, taken by the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, upon the discovery of the late horrid and treacherous Design, for the destruction of this parliament and the kingdom; the 6th of June 1643.

‘Whereas there hath been, and now is, in this kingdom, a popish, and traitorous Plot for the subversion of the true protestant reformed religion, and the liberty of the subject; and, in pursuance thereof, a popish army hath been raised, and is now on foot in divers parts of this kingdom: and whereas there hath been a treacherous and horrid design, lately discovered by the great blessing and especial providence of God, of divers persons, to join themselves with the armies raised by the king, and to destroy the forces raised by the lords and commons in parliament, to surprise the cities of London and Westminster with the suburbs: by arms to force the parliament; and finding by constant experience, that many ways of force, and treachery, are continually attempted, to bring to utter ruin and destruction the parliament, and kingdom: and that which is dearest, the true Protestant religion; And that, for the preventing and withstanding the same, it is fit, that all, who are true hearted, and lovers of their country, should bind themselves each to other in a sacred Vow and Covenant.’

‘I. A. B. in humility, and reverence of the divine majesty, declare my hearty sorrow for my own sins, and the sins of this nation, which have deserved the calamities, and judgments, that now lie upon it; and my true intention is, by God's grace, to endeavour the amendment of my own ways; and I do farther, in the presence of Almighty God, declare, vow, and covenant, that in order to the security and preservation of the true reformed Protestant religion, and liberty of the subject, I will not consent to the laying down of arms, so long as the Papists, now in open war against the parliament, shall by force of arms be protected from the justice thereof. And that I do abhor and detest the said wicked, and treacherous design, lately discovered: and that I never gave nor will give my assent to the execution thereof, but will, according to my power, and vocation, oppose and resist the same, and all other of the like nature. And in case any other like design shall hereafter come to my knowledge, I will make such timely discovery, as I shall conceive may best conduce to the preventing thereof. And whereas I do in my conscience believe, that the forces, raised by the two houses of parliament, are raised, and continued for their just defence, and for the defence of the true Protestant religion, and liberty of the subject, against the forces raised by the king; that I will, according to my power, and vocation, assist the forces raised and continued, by both houses of parliament, against the forces raised by the king without their consent: and will likewise assist all other persons that shall take this oath, in what they shall do in pursuance thereof; and will not directly, or indirectly, adhere unto, nor shall willingly assist the forces raised by the king, without the consent of both houses of parliament. And this vow, and covenant, I make in the presence of Almighty God, the searcher of all hearts, with a true intention to perform the same, as I shall answer at the great day, when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed.

“ Though many were much startled at this covenant, and took time to consider of it, there being in the preamble, and positive part, much which very few believed, and in the promissory part a more direct denouncing war against the king, than had been in plain terms before avowed by them, and an absolute protestation against peace, till the king were at their mercy: yet the fear of being concluded guilty of the plot, made them swallow all the rest; and the example of one prevailing with many, there was not a member of either house that took it not: and being thus fettered, and intangled themselves, they sent their committee into the city, to acquaint them with their ‘ happy discovery, and how miraculously God had preserved them, and to engage them in the same sacred vow, and covenant:’ which was readily submitted to: and, by the industry of their clergy, sooner than can be imagined, taken throughout that people. Then it was, with equal diligence, and solemnity, transmitted to their army, that their fears of inconvenience from thence might be likewise purged: and thence it grew the mark of distinction, to know their friends and enemies by: and whosoever refused to take that covenant, needed no other charge to be concluded, and prosecuted, as the highest malignant.

“ Being this way secure from any future clamours for peace, they proceeded to try Mr. Tomkins; Mr. Chaloner, a citizen of good wealth and credit, and most intimate with Tomkins; Mr. Hambden, who brought the last message from the king; one Hassel a messenger of the king’s, who passed often between London and Oxford, and sometimes carried letters and messages to the lord Falkland: and some citizens, whose names were in the commission sent from Oxford; by a council of war; by whom Mr. Tomkins, and Mr. Chaloner were condemned to be hang’d; and were both, with all circumstances of severity, and cruelty, executed: the one, on a gibbet, by his own house in Holborn; where he had long lived with singular estimation; and the other, by his house in Cornhill, near the old Exchange. Hassel the messenger saved them farther trouble, and died in prison the night before his trial; And there being no evidence against Mr. Hambden, but what Mr. Waller himself gave, they gave no judgment against him, but kept him long after in prison, till he died; neither proceeded they capitally against those citizens whose names were in the commission, it not appearing that their names were used with their consent, and privacy; though the brand of being malignants served the turn for their undoing; for all their estates were seized, as theirs were who had been executed.

“ There is nothing clearer than that the commission sent from Oxford by the lady Aubigny, had not any relation to the discourses passed between Mr. Waller, Tomkins, and those citizens, or that they, who knew of one, had not any privacy with the other; which if they had had, and intended such an insurrection, as was alleged, Mr. Waller, and Mr. Tomkins, or some one of those lords who were supposed to combine with them, would have been in the commission. Or if the king’s ministers had been engaged in the consultation, and hoped to have raised a party which should suddenly seize upon the city, and the parliament, they would never have thought a commission granted to some gentlemen at Oxford, for the major part of the commissioners were there, and a few private citizens, would have served for that work. I am very confident, and I have very much reason for that confidence, that there was no more known, or thought of at Oxford, concerning the matter of the commission, than I have before set forth, nor of the other, than that Mr. Tomkins sometimes writ to the lord Falkland, for Mr. Waller, out of the cautiousness of his own nature, never writ word, and by messengers signified to him, ‘ that the number of those who desired peace, and abhorred the proceedings of the houses, was very considerable; and that they resolved, by refusing to contribute to the war, and to submit to their ordinances, to declare and manifest themselves in that manner, that the violent party in the city should not have credit enough to hinder any accommodation.’ And the lord Falkland always returned answer, ‘ that they should expedite those expedients, as soon as might be, for that delays made the war more difficult to be restrained.’ And if I could find evidence, or reason, to induce me to believe, that there was any farther design in the thing itself, or that the king gave farther countenance to it, I should not at all conceal it. No man can imagine, that if the king could have entertained any probable hope of reducing London, which was the fomentor, supporter, and indeed the life of the war, or could have found any expedient, from whence he could reasonably propose to dissolve, scatter, and disperse those who, under the name of a parliament, had kindled a war against him, but he would have given his utmost assistance, and countenance thereunto, either by public force, or private contrivance.

“There were very great endeavours used, to have proceeded with equal severity against the earl of Portland, and the lord Conway, (for the accusation of the earl of Northumberland, it was proceeded tenderly in; for though the violent party was heartily incensed against him, as a man weary of them, yet his reputation was still very great), who were both close prisoners; and, to that purpose, their lordships and Mr. Waller were confronted before the committee, where they as peremptorily denying, as he charging them, and there being no other witness but he against them, the prosecution was rather let alone than declined, till after a long restraint they procured enlargement upon bail. Mr. Waller himself, (though confessedly the most guilty; and by his unhappy demeanour, in this time of his affliction, he had raised as many enemies as he had formerly friends, and almost the same) after he had, with incredible dissimulation, acted such a remorse of conscience, that his trial was put off out of Christian compassion, till he might recover his understanding, (and that was not, till the heat, and fury of the prosecutors, was reasonably abated with the sacrifices they had made), and, by drawing visitants to himself, of the most powerful ministers of all factions, had, by his liberality, and penitence, his receiving vulgar and vile sayings from them with humility, and reverence, as clearer convictions and informations than in his life he had ever had; and distributing great sums to them for their prayers, and ghostly counsel; so satisfied them, that they satisfied others; was brought, at his suit, to the house of commons’ bar; where, (being a man in truth very powerful in language; and who, by what he spoke and in the manner of speaking it, exceedingly captivated the good will and benevolence of his hearers: which is the highest part of an orator) with such flattery, as was most exactly calculated to that meridian, with such a submission, as their pride took delight in, and such dejection of mind, and spirit, as was like to cozen the major part, and be thought serious; he laid before them ‘their own danger, and concernment; if they should suffer one of their own body, how unworthy and monstrous soever, to be tried by the soldiers, who might thereby grow to that power hereafter, that they would both try those, they would not be ‘willing should be tried, and for things, which they would account no crimes; the inconvenience, and insupportable mischief whereof, all wise common-wealths had foreseen, and prevented, by exempting their own members from all judgment but their own.’ He prevailed, not to be tried by a council of war; and thereby preserved his dear bought life; so that, in truth, he does as much owe the keeping his head to that oration, as Catiline did the loss of his to those of Tully: and by having done ill very well, he, by degrees, drew that respect to his parts, which always carries some compassion to the person, that he got leave to compound for his transgression, and them to accept of 10,000*l.* (which their affairs wanted) for his liberty; whereupon he had leave to recollect himself in another country, for his liberty was to be in banishment, how miserable he had made himself, in obtaining that leave to live out of his own. And there cannot be a greater evidence of the inestimable value of his parts, than that he lived, after this, in the good affection and esteem of many, the pity of most, and the reproach and scorn of few, or none.”

Whitelocke, speaking of the access to the King, of the Parliament’s Commissioners in the late treaty at Oxford, says “January. 28, 1642-3. All of them kissed his hand, not as they were ranked in the Safe Conduct, but according to their several degrees. Mr. Pierpoint before the knights, he being an earl’s son, and Mr. Winwood before Mr. Whitelocke, he being the eldest knight’s son; and Mr. Waller was the last. The king said to him ‘though you are the last, yet you are not the worst, nor the least in my favour.’ The discovery of a Plot then in hand in London, to betray the Parliament, wherein Mr. Waller was engaged with Challoner, Tomkins, and others, which was then in agitation, did manifest the king’s courtship to Mr. Waller to be for that service.”—Afterwards he says, “June began with the arraignment of Waller, a member of the house of commons, Tomkins, Challoner, and others, for conspiring to surprize the city militia, and some members of parliament, and to let in the king’s forces, to surprize the city, and dissolve the parliament.—Waller, a very ingenious man, was the principal actor and contriver of this Plot, which was in design when he and the other commissioners were at Oxford with the Parliament’s Propositions. And that, being then known to the king, occasioned him to speak the words to Waller when he kissed his hand, (‘though you are the last, yet you are not the worst, nor the least in our favour’) as is before remembered. When he was examined touching this Plot, he was asked whether Selden, Pierpoint, Whitelocke, and others by name, were acquainted with it: he answered, ‘That they were not,’ but that he did come one evening to Selden’s study, where Pierpoint and Whitelocke then were with Selden, on purpose to impart it to them all, and speaking of such a thing in general terms, those gentlemen did so inveigh against any such thing, as treachery and baseness, and that which might be the occasion of shedding much blood. That, he said he durst not, for the awe and respect which he had for Selden, and the rest, communicate any of the particulars to them; but was almost disheartened himself to proceed in it—They were all upon their Trial condemned, Tomkins and Challoner only were hanged, Waller had a reprieve from general Essex, and after a year's imprisonment, he paid a fine of 10,000*l.* was pardoned, and travelled into France."

Doctor Johnson in his Life of Waller informs us, that "he stayed some time at Roan, where his daughter Margaret was born, who was afterwards his favourite, and his amanuensis. He then removed to Paris, where he lived with great splendor and hospitality; and from time to time amused himself with poetry, in which he sometimes speaks of the rebels, and their usurpation, in the natural language of an honest man. At last it became necessary, for his support, to sell his wife's jewels; and being reduced, as he said, at last to the rump-jewel, he solicited from Cromwell permission to return, and obtained it by the interest of colonel Scroop, to whom his sister was married. Upon the remains of a fortune, which the danger of his life had very much diminished, he lived at Hall-barn, a house built by himself, very near Beaconsfield, where his mother resided. His mother, though related to Cromwell and Hampden, was zealous for the royal cause, and when Cromwell visited her, used to reproach him; he, in return, would throw a napkin at her, and say he would not dispute with his aunt: but finding in time that she acted for the king, as well as talked, he made her a prisoner to her own daughter, in her own house. If he would do any thing he could not do less. Cromwell, now protector, received Waller, as his kinsman, to a familiar conversation. Waller, as he used to relate, found him sufficiently versed in ancient history; and, when any of his enthusiastic friends came to advise or consult him, could sometimes overhear him discoursing in the cant of the times; but when he returned, he would say, 'Cousin Waller, I must talk to these men in their own way;' and resumed the common style of conversation."

Mr. Seward in the second volume of his "Anecdotes," p. 135, says, 'The original of the following letter of Mr. Waller to colonel Godwin, when he was accused of being concerned in the plot of 1643 against the parliament, is in lord Wharton's papers in the Bodleian Library at Oxford.'

'Sir; If you be pleased to remember what your poor neighbour has been, or did knowe what his heart now is, you might perhaps be inclined to contribute something to his preservation. I hearde of your late being in towne, but am so closely confined, that I knowe not how to present my humble servise and request unto you. Alas, Sir! what should I say for myself! Unless your own good-nature and proneness to compassion incline you towards me, I can use no argument, having deserved so ill; and yet, it is possible you may remember, I have heretofore done something better, when God blest me so as to take you and my dear cosen (your late friend now with God) for my example. Sir, as you succeed him in the general hopes of your country, so do you likewise in my particular hope. I knowe you would not willingly have that fall out, which he (if alive) would have wished otherwise. Be not offended (I beseech you) if I put you in minde what you were pleased to say to your servant, when the life of that worthy person was in danger, in a noble cause as anye is now in the country. You asked me then, if I were content my kinsman's blood should be spilt: and truly I thinke you found not by my words only, but my actions also, my earnest desire to preserve and defend him, having had the honour to be employed among those who perswaded the shreves (the sheriffs) with the trayned bands to protect him and the rest in the same danger, to the house. As then you were pleased to remember I was of his blood, so I beseech you forgett it not now, and then I shall have some hopes of your favour. Sir, my first request is, that you will be nobly pleased to use your interest with Dr. Dorislaus, to shew me what lawful favour he may in the tryall; and if I am forfeited to justice, that you will please to incline my Lord General to grant me his pardon. Your interest, both with his excellence, and in the house, is very great: but I will not direct your wisdom which way to favour me: only give me leave to assure you, that (God with his grace assisting the resolution he has given me) you shall never have cause to repent the saving a life which I shall make haste to render you again in the cause you maintain, and express, myself during all the life you shall lengthen.'

'Sir,

'Your most humble, faithful, and obedient Servant,

'EDMUND WALLER.'

173. The Trial of CONNOR Lord MACGUIRE,* at the King's-Bench, for High Treason, in being concerned in the Irish Massacre: †
20 CHARLES I. A. D. 1645.

ON Monday the 11th of November 1644, the prisoner was brought to the bar of the King's Bench to be arraigned; By the Indictment he was charged, That he, together with sir Phil. O-Neale, Philip O-Relly, Roger Moore, esq. Roger Macguire, esq. Toole O-Coule, clerk, being a Roman priest, Hugh Macmahune, and divers other persons, false traitors, unknown; as a false traitor against the king's majesty, his supreme liege lord, not having the fear of God in his heart, nor considering his duty or allegiance, but being seduced by the instigation of the devil, intending altogether to withdraw, blot out, and extinguish the cordial love and due obedience which faithful subjects owe to their sovereign; did, on the 20th of October, 17 Car. at Dublin in Ireland, in the parts beyond the seas, and at divers other times, both before and after, as well at Dublin as elsewhere, falsely, maliciously, and traitrously

* This Macguire was one principally designed for the surprize of the Castle of Dublin, and the securing or murdering the Lords, Justices and Council, for which intent he came purposely to Dublin the day before; but the Plot being detected that night, he fled disguised from his usual lodgings at one Nevil's, a chirurgeon in Castle-street, and secretly hid himself at one Ker's, a taylor in Cook-street, where he was found in a cook-loft by John Woodcock, one of the sheriffs of Dublin, standing with his cloak wrapt about him in an obscure place, in which posture he was apprehended and brought before the Lords Justices and Council, where he made some sort of a Confession, upon which he was committed prisoner to the Castle the 23d of October 1641, from whence he was sent into England the 12th of June following, and continued prisoner there till the 18th of August 1644, when he made his escape; but was retaken the 20th of Oct. following. Former edition.

The following is Rushworth's Account:

"These gentlemen," (Lord Macguire and Hugh Oge Mac Mahone, esq. who being arraigned with lord Macguire and pleading Not Guilty, and putting himself for trial upon God and his country, was convicted and executed in Nov. 1644), "were two of the principal contrivers of the Irish rebellion, and massacre of the Protestants in that kingdom; and taken upon the first discovery October 22, 1641, at Dublin, being come up thither on purpose to surprize the castle, the next day, the time appointed for the general insurrection; Mac Mahone upon his first apprehension freely confessed, and boldly avowed the Plot; but Macguire would then acknowledge nothing; but on the 26th of March following, being examined before the lord Lambert and sir Robert Meredith, Chancellor of his majesty's Court of Exchequer, he owned and set forth much of the Conspiracy, which examination you have before in the first chapter relating to Ireland. About July, 1642, they were sent over into England, and committed to the Tower, and by means of the multiplicity of affairs wherein the two houses were involved, and the difficulty of having the witnesses against them from Ireland, they continued there in custody till Saturday the 17th of August 1644. And then by confederacy with two priests that belonged to the Spanish ambassador, and one Mrs. Leviston over against the New Exchange in the Strand, in whose house the French agent lay, they having got a small steel saw, therewith in the night sawed asunder the door of their chamber, which was above two inches thick, and so with cords got over the Tower-wall, and swam over the ditch; whereupon the parliament set forth an order for their apprehension, promising 100*l.* to any that should bring them in, or either of them, dead or alive; and that whosoever should harbour or relieve them, should be prosecuted as traitors. No news was heard of them till the 19th of September, and then they having got lodgings in a constable's house in Drury-lane, and one of them looking out of the window or balcony to call a woman that cried oysters, it happened at that instant a servant of sir John Clotworthy's espied him, and instantly gave notice to his master and the lieutenant of the Tower, who came and seized them, and carried them back to the Tower; Mrs. Leviston's room was also searched and she taken into custody, but because the French minister had lodgings in her house, to prevent any occasion of offence, a declaration was drawn up to give his most Christian majesty satisfaction touching this affair. This breaking prison put the two houses upon expediting their trial."

† Of this shocking and terrific Massacre, May gives the following Account:

"About the end of October, 1641, during the king's abode in Scotland, the most barbarous and bloody rebellion that ever any age, or nation, were guilty of, broke out in Ireland. The atrocity of it is without a parallel; and as full of wonder was the close carriage of so black and far-reaching a design. The innocent Protestants were, upon a sudden, disseized of their estates, and the persons of above two hundred thousand men, women, and children, murdered, many of them with exquisite and unheard-of tortures, within the space of one month.

"That which increased the amazement of most men, was, the consideration that the an-conspire, imagine, and compass utterly to deprive and disinherit the king's majesty of his royal estate and kingdom of Ireland; to bring his majesty's person to death and destruction; to raise sedition, and breed and cause miserable slaughter and destruction amongst the king's subjects throughout all the whole kingdom; to make an insurrection and rebellion against the king his sovereign; to levy public, open, bloody, and fierce war against the king in that cient hatred, which the Irish, a thing incident to conquered nations, had borne to the English, did now seem to be quite buried and forgotten; forty years of peace had compacted those two nations into one body, and cemented them together by all conjunctures of alliance, intermarriages, and consanguinity, which was in outward appearance strengthened by frequent entertainments, and all kinds of friendly neighbourhood. There seemed in many places a mutual transmigration, (as was observed by a noble gentleman, whose place in that kingdom gave him means to know it, out of whose faithful relation of that rebellion and massacre, I have partly collected my discourse of it), into each others manners. Many English strangely degenerating into the Irish manners and customs; and many Irish, especially of the better sort, having taken up the English language, apparel, and decency of living in their private houses. The present government was full of lenity and moderation; and some redress of former grievances had then been newly granted by the king to his Irish subjects; the same gentleman in his History of the Irish Rebellion, where the reader may more fully inform himself of particulars, affirms, that he could never hear of any one Englishman that received any certain notice of this conspiracy, till that very evening before which it was to be put in execution. Some intimations had been given by sir William Cole, in a letter to the lords justices sir William Parsons and sir John Burlace, with the rest of the council, concerning dangerous resorts, and meetings of some persons who were judged fit instruments for such a mischief.

"This horrid Plot, contrived with so much secrecy, was to take effect upon the 23rd of October. The castle of Dublin, the chief strength of that kingdom, and principal magazine of the king's arms and ammunition, where all those arms which were taken from the late disbanded Irish army, and others which the earl of Strafford had provided, were deposited, was to be seized by nine o'clock that day by the rebels; to which purpose many of the Irish gentry of great quality were the night before come to Dublin, to be in readiness for the performing of that exploit. It was further agreed among those conspirators, that upon the same day, all other his majesty's forts and magazines of arms and ammunition in that kingdom should be surprized, and all Protestants and English that would not join with them, should be cut off. But it pleased God to prevent the seizure of that castle, and so to save the kingdom; to change and alter, according to their own wills, the government of the kingdom, and the Religion there established, and totally to subvert the well-ordered state of that commonwealth; to procure and bring in divers strangers and foreigners, not being the king's subjects, in a warlike manner to invade that kingdom of Ireland, and to levy war there.

And in execution of these their wicked treasons and traitorous conspiracies, 20th Oct.

dom from being wholly lost in one day, and that by a means strange and unexpected. Hugh Mac Mahon, esq. grandson to the famous rebel Tyrone, a gentleman of a plentiful fortune in the county of Monagan, and one that had served in armies under the king of Spain as lieutenant-colonel, a principal agent in this rebellion, and coming with others, as aforesaid, into Dublin the day before that great design was to be put in execution, being the 22nd of October, admitted into his company at a tavern in that city, one Owen Conally, of Irish extract, but a Protestant, and servant to sir John Clotworthy, a member of the English parliament. To this Owen he revealed so much, as they were drinking, that the honest man, escaping from him, (though not without great danger to himself, at the present) informed the lord justice Parsons that night about nine o'clock, of a dangerous design upon the whole kingdom; which being taken into present consideration, Mac Mahon was apprehended, and, after his examination, the lord Maguire also, another principal actor; who were both committed to close custody, and the castle secured with all diligence. But many conspirators of great note escaped that night out of Dublin, as Birne, More, Plunket, and others.

"The lords of the council, amazed at the discovery of so horrid a treason, did, notwithstanding, endeavour (since there was no prevention; for Mac Mahon had plainly told them, when he was examined, that by that time all the counties of Ireland were risen), to use the best remedies to that desperate disease; and hoping that perchance the news how the plot for seizing of Dublin castle was disappointed, might somewhat dishearten the conspirators in remote parts, and encourage the good subjects with more confidence to stand upon their guard; issued forth a Proclamation presently, and by careful messengers spread it into as many parts of the kingdom as they could. The effect of which proclamation was to signify the discovery of the treason, and exhort all men to their duty in suppressing of it.

"But the general design was past prevention; and that very day came in some poor English Protestants, and others in a short time, every day, and almost every hour; shewing how they had been robbed, their houses surprized by the rebels, whose outrage daily increased in rapine and murdering, and firing towns and villages in divers counties. To oppose therefore the growth of that desperate 17 Car. the defendant Connor Macguire, at Dublin, and divers other times and places, by one Toole O'Coule, and divers other messengers, by him sent to Owen O'Neale, being then in Flanders, did move and incite Phil. O'Neale to levy and raise an army in Flanders, and thence to bring that army over into Ireland in an hostile manner, to invade that kingdom.

And further to put in execution their traitorous purposes, the defendant, together with Hugh malady, the lords justices, dispatching letters to the king in Scotland, and the earl of Leicester, lately made lieutenant of Ireland by the king, and yet resident at London, of their lamentable condition, examined with all diligence how they were provided for such a war. They found in Dublin stores, arms for 10,000, with artillery, powder, match and lead proportionable, laid in by the late earl of Strafford, though designed by him another way, yet reserved by God's providence for this service. But the officers and soldiers of the old standing army were so much dispersed into remote places of the kingdom for the guard of other forts, that there was scarce any possibility of drawing a considerable company together to defend Dublin, or make head against the rebels in the north. The greatest mischief to the state, and advantage to the rebels, was, that there was no money in the Exchequer; besides, the king's revenues, and rents of English gentlemen due for that half year, were either in tenants', or collectors' hands in the country, and must unavoidably fall into the rebels' power; so that although their disease were present, the only means of cure was remote, which was a dependence upon some supplies from the parliament of England.

“ Upon the very day designed for surprisal of the castle at Dublin, the 23rd of October, the northern rebels broke out in the province of Ulster, and in a few days got possession of so many towns, forts, and gentlemen's houses, within the counties of that province, as might seem almost incredible, if we consider only the chief actors, men of no great skill in martial affairs, or any policy: such as sir Phelim O'neale, and his brother, with the rest; and not rather, which indeed was the true reason, the general engagements of the Irish, and their deep dissimulation, concurring with the great credulity of the English, upon the causes aforementioned, of so long intermixed cohabitation, and friendly relations betwixt them. Both these were the causes which afterward increased the massacre of the English, who when the fire brake out, implored the friendship of their Irish neighbours, landlords, or tenants; committing into their hands and protection their treasure, wives and children, with all that was dear unto them, in hope that former friendship might prevail. But they generally either betrayed them into the power of other rebels, or perfidiously and cruelly murdered them with their own hands: which extreme falsehood and cruelty in the Irish was thought to be much in-

Macmahune, Phil. O'Neale, Phil. O'Relly, Roger Moore, Roger Macguire, and Toole O'Coule the priest, 20 Oct. 17 Car. at Dublin, and divers other times and places in Ireland, before and after, did traitorously conspire to enter into, seize, get into their own power, and surprize the king's castle at Dublin, and all other the king's castles and forts in that kingdom, and the magazine therein. And at the same time unlawfully and traitorously did endeacreased by the charmings of their priests, who told them, that it was a mortal sin to protect, or relieve, any of the English.

“ That intermixture of the nations, did also at this sad time, make the English less able to defend themselves, than if they had lived singly by parties of their own. For where the English were able to make any head, or stand upon their guard, though in such an amazement and sudden surprisal, they defended themselves beyond belief, till the Irish, principled by their priests, offered them fair quarter, with assurance of lives and goods, safe conduct, and free passage to what places they pleased; confirming such covenants with deep oaths and protestations, and sometimes their hands and seals. But when they had the deceived English in their power, the soldiers spoiled, stripped, and murdered them at their pleasure. So were many served, as at Armagh by sir Phelim O'neale, and his brother; at Belterbert by Philip Orelley; at Longford, Tullough, and other castles in the county of Fermanagh by other of those rebels. But if the English, who stood to defend their private houses, and so were the more easily cut off, could have deserted their habitations at the first rising, and joined themselves into bodies, they might happily have made a better resistance. Whilst these inhuman cruelties and massacres were acting in miserable Ireland, and daily spreading themselves in every part of that kingdom, many counties in several provinces declaring themselves, and following the barbarous example of those in Ulster, the sad news was brought to the parliament of England.

“ The first letters, which before were mentioned, sent from the lords justices upon the 25th of October, were carried, and delivered at London on the last day of that month by Owen O'Coually the happy discoverer of the first plot; with a full information of all particulars within his knowledge: which by the lords, who were first acquainted with it, was delivered at a conference to the house of commons; who presently ordered, That the house forthwith should be resolved into a committee, to consider the matter offered concerning the rebellion in Ireland, as likewise to provide for the safety of England. By which committee it was agreed that 50,000*l.* should presently be provided; and that the loan of it should be entreated from the city of London upon public security. 2. That a select committee of both houses be named to consider the affairs of Ireland. 3. That Owen O'Coually, who disco-your and actually attempt to gain into their possession and power; and to surprize the said Castle of Dublin, and the munition therein.

That the defendant with the other persons named, Philip O-Neale and others, further to bring to pass their most horrid wicked treasons and conspiracies, on the 22d of October, 17 Car. at Charlemont, and other places, before and after, being armed and arrayed with a great multitude in a warlike manner, with vered this great treason, should have 500*l.* presently paid him; and 200*l.* per ann. pension, till provision in land of a greater value be made for him. 4. That papists of quality be secured in their several counties within England. 5. That no persons whatsoever, except those who are merchants, shall be admitted to go over into Ireland, without certificate from the Committee of both houses appointed for the affairs of Ireland.

“ These things were reported to both houses, and willingly assented to, within two days after the discovery first made unto them of that rebellion. And, notwithstanding those present distractions in England, which began then to appear, part of every day, during that November, was allotted to the consideration of Ireland. Within four days after the beginning of which month, they ordered many particulars of great import for the relief of it, consisting of supplies of money, magazines of victuals, ammunition of all sorts, courses to be taken for raising forces for the occasions of that kingdom; and shipping for guard of their sea coasts; as more particularly appeareth in the records of parliament.

“ Whilst the English parliament were thus ordering the affairs of bleeding Ireland, other letters from the lords justices, bearing date the 5th of November, were brought and communicated to both houses. Who, in earnest zeal to the promotion of that business, voted two hundred thousand pounds to be raised for suppressing the Irish rebellion, securing England, and payment of the public debts. For which, the city of London must of necessity be made use of, collections through the kingdom being too slow for such an urgency. And to encourage the city in it, an order was made to secure them for monies formerly lent, and to allow them the full interest of eight per cent. for all together.

“ Whilst the English parliament were thus busied about the relief of Ireland; the horrid rebellion with a swift motion run throughout that unhappy kingdom, many counties daily joining with them, and divers lords and gentlemen, who for many days had lived unsuspected in Dublin, went into the country to side with the rebels, and act their parts in those inhuman outrages. The lords justices, and privy council were enough troubled to secure Dublin, to victual the castle, and prepare defence against those dangers, which threatened the city, and were made much more by the fears of spoiled people resorting thither.

banners displayed, drums, swords, staves, guns, and other invasive and defensive weapons, did falsely and traitorously prepare and levy open fierce and bloody war against the king's majesty; and the same 22d of October, seized and surprized the king's fort at Charlemont, and then and there maliciously and traitorously did kill and murder Toby lord Calfield, Francis Davies, and others of the king's subjects that were Protestants.

“ But the care of the privy council extended further, notwithstanding the troubles there, than to the city of Dublin; and, having a magazine of arms within the castle, resolved so to dispose of them, as that resistance might be made against the rebels in other parts. Some arms were happily disposed to such gentlemen (sir Henry Tichborne, sir Charles Coote, and others, of whom more hereafter) as to their lasting honour did excellent service. But another part were worse than lost, those which were distributed to the lords and gentlemen of the English pale; who afterwards declared themselves for the rebels, and used the arms to the destruction of those, who put them into their hands. That English pale is a large circuit of land possessed at the first conquest of Ireland by the English, and ever since inhabited by them; containing divers counties, as Dublin, Meth, Lowth, Kildare, &c.

“ The lords of the council thought fit to trust those lords and gentlemen of the pale both with commissions and arms (though many of them professed Papists) hoping that this great confidence would work so far upon their hearts, if any truth or loyalty were left there, as to keep them at least, from joining with the enemy; but if they were honest, would enable them to oppose the threatening incursions of the northern rebels. This great trust the council were more encouraged to repose in these perfidious lords and gentlemen of the pale, because themselves had appeared at Dublin of their own accords, professing truth and loyalty, with deep and solemn protestations, and that they were most forward, and ready to concur with their lordships in that service.

“ But so great an affliction was to fall upon unhappy Ireland, that all those lords that were Papists, after they had received commissions, and arms, notwithstanding all their deep vows, did most perfidiously soon after desert their houses, and openly declare themselves in actual rebellion: such as were viscount Mongarret, Gormanston, and Costeloe, Dillon, Birne, Belleſer, Talbot, and many others.

“ The condition of Dublin was more lamentable every day than other; and not so much afflicted were they with fears and dangers which threatened themselves, as that extreme sorrow, which compassion must needs work in them, toward all the suffering English which resorted thither. Dublin was the sanctuary of all the despoiled Protestants; and by that means, the sad stage, upon which all horror was represented; and what mischiefs soever were acted

That the defendants, 4 Junii, 18 Car. at the castles of Kalagh and Cragan, and other times and places, before and after, levied war, seized and surprized those castles, and did kill and murder Owen Powel and William Cosens, and many other of the king's Protestant subjects in that kingdom.

in other parts, were there discovered and lamented. Their eyes were sad witnesses of the rebels' cruelty in those despoiled English which daily resorted to the city; but their ears much more afflicted with relation of those horrid tortures which had been used to those who died in other parts. Their eyes could not, but extremely suffer from such wretched spectacles as daily from all parts presented themselves; people of all conditions and qualities, of every age and sex, spoiled, and stripped, with no coverings, but rags, or twisted straw, to hide their privities; some wounded almost to death, others frozen with cold, some tired with travel, and so surbated that they came creeping on their knees; others famished beyond all relief. And besides the miseries of their bodies, their minds tortured with the loss of all their fortunes, and sad remembrance of their husbands, wives, or children most barbarously murdered before their faces. In this most lamentable plight, with wasted bodies and distracted minds did they arrive at Dublin; some to be relieved, some entombed, which was more than their murdered friends could obtain from the rebels, insomuch as they appeared like walking ghosts in every street, and all the barns, stables, and out-houses were filled with them, where they soon died after they had reached the city, in so great numbers, that all the church-yards of Dublin could not contain them; but the lords were enforced to take in large pieces of ground on both sides of the river, to set apart for burying places.

“But that part of this woeful tragedy, which was presented to their eyes, was the least, and but the shadow of that other, which was related to their ears, of which the readers and all posterity may share the sorrow. Many hundreds of those which had escaped, under their oaths, lawfully taken upon examination, and recorded with all particulars, as may be seen at large in the Records, delivered to the council what horrid massacres the bloody villains had made of men, women, and children; and what cruel inventions they had to torture those, whom they murdered; scarce to be equalized by any the most black and baleful story of any age.

“Many thousands of them at several places, too many to be here inserted, after all despites exercised upon them living, put to the worst of deaths; some burned on set purpose, others drowned for sport and pastime; and if they swam, kept from landing with poles, or shot, and murdered in the water; many were buried quick, and some set into the earth breast-high, and there left to famish. But most barbarous, as appears in very many examinations, was that cruelty, which was shewed to great belied women; whom the villains were not content to murder, but ripped up their bellies, and many times took delight to see the hogs eat the abortive infants. But I am loth to dwell upon so sad a narration.

The defendant pleaded Not Guilty. And being demanded how he would be tried;

men; whom the villains were not content to murder, but ripped up their bellies, and many times took delight to see the hogs eat the abortive infants. But I am loth to dwell upon so sad a narration.

“The greatest part of these inhuman cruelties were acted by the Irish upon the poor unarmed Britons; before any provocation given unto them: and the blood of so many thousand innocent persons sacrificed to their mere malice, as many afterwards were sacrificed to their revenge; as, whensoever the Irish received any blow from English forces, the English Protestants that lived among them, were murdered in great numbers.”

Rushworth gives many details, and our subsequent historians of these times relate the same dismal story with different degrees of minuteness, and with different expressions of eloquence. The Irish rebels pretended to have the king's authority for their proceedings, and pleaded a commission from him, and the king's enemies in England imputed all these barbarities to him. On this occasion, Hume expresses himself thus; “It is now so universally allowed, notwithstanding some mattering to the contrary, that the king had no hand in the Irish rebellion, that it will be superfluous to insist on a point which seems so clear. I shall only suggest a very few arguments, among an infinite number which occur. (1.) Ought the affirmation of perfidious, infamous rebels, ever to have passed for any authority? (2.) Nobody can tell us what the words of the pretended commission were. That commission which we find in Rushworth, vol. 5, p. 400, and in Milton's Works, Toland's edition, is plainly an imposture: because it pretends to be dated in October 1641, yet mentions facts which happened not till some months after. It appears that the Irish rebels, observing some inconsistency in their first forgery, were obliged to forge this commission anew, yet could not render it coherent or probable. (3.) Nothing could be more obviously pernicious to the king's cause than the Irish rebellion; because it increased his necessities, and rendered him still more dependent on the parliament, who had before sufficiently shewn on what terms they would assist him. (4.) The instant the king heard of the rebellion, which was a very few days after its commencement, he wrote to the parliament, and gave over to them the management of the war. Had he built any projects on that rebellion, would he not have waited some little time to see how they would succeed? Would he presently have adopted a measure which was evidently so hurtful to his authority? (5.) What can be imagined to be

The Copy of the Plea.

He pleaded the statute of Magna Charta, 10 Feb. 9 Hen. 3. That none should be condemned but by trial of his peers; and pleaded the statute of 10 Hen. 7. That all the statutes made in England should from thenceforth be in force in Ireland.

And pleaded, That before the time of the several treasons charged in the indictment, Bryan Macguire, his father, by letters patents was created baron of Enniskillen, in Ireland, to him and the heirs males of his body: By force whereof his father was seized of the barony in fee-tail, and 1 Feb. 12 Car. died so seized; after whose death the barony descended to the defendant, by virtue whereof he was a baron of Ireland: And that at a parliament held at Dublin, 16 March, 16 Car. which was there continued till the 7th of August after, the king's projects? To raise the Irish to arms, I suppose, and bring them over to England for his assistance. But is it not plain, that the king never intended to raise war in England? Had that been his intention, would he have rendered the parliament perpetual? Does it not appear, by the whole train of events, that the parliament forced him into the war? (6) The king conveyed to the justices intelligence which ought to have prevented the rebellion. (7) The Irish catholics, in all their future transactions with the king, where they endeavour to excuse their insurrection, never had the assurance to plead his commission. Even among themselves they dropped that pretext. It appears that sir Phelim O'Neale, chiefly, and he only at first, promoted that imposture. See Carte's Ormond, vol. iii. No. 100, 111, 112, 114, 115, 121, 132, 137. (8) O'Neale himself confessed the imposture on his trial and at his execution. See Nalson, vol. ii. p. 528. Maguire, at his execution, made a like confession." [This is rather overstated; Maguire's words are "There was no commission that I ever saw." See the account of his execution in the text, p. 688.] "(9) It is ridiculous to mention the justification which Charles 2, gave to the marquis of Antrim, as if he had acted by his father's commission. Antrim had no hand in the first rebellion and the massacre. He joined not the rebels till two years after: It was with the king's consent, and he did important service in sending over a body of men to Montrose."

The two houses of parliament, in their Declaration published in May 1642, say, "That the rebellion in Ireland was framed and cherished by the Popish and malignant party in England, is not only affirmed by the rebels, but may be cleared by many other proofs: the same rebellious principles of pretended religion, the same politic ends are apparent in both; and their malicious designs and practices are masked and disguised with the same false colour of their earnest zeal to vindicate his majesty's prerogative from the supposed oppression of the parliament: how much these and then adjourned to the 9th of November following, and then prorogued to the 24th of Feb. thence next following, and from thence continued till the 24th of June, 18 Car.

That he was as one of the noblemen and peers of that parliament; and that the 23d of October, 17 Car. he was arrested and imprisoned upon pretence of the several treasons in the Indictment mentioned, and there continued till the 12th of June, 18 Car. when he was brought against his will to Westminster, and thence committed to the Tower of London in strict custody. And averred his plea, and prayed that he might be tried and judged by his peers in Ireland.

Whereunto the king's counsel demurred in law, and the defendants joined in the demurrer.

Upon this Plea * of the lord Macguire, the treacherous pretences have been countenanced by some evil counsel about his majesty may appear in this, That the Proclamation, whereby they were declared traitors, was so long withheld as to the 2d of Jan. though the rebellion broke forth in Oct. before; and then no more but 40 copies appointed to be printed, with a special command from his majesty not to exceed that number; and that none of them should be published till his majesty's pleasure were further signified, as by the warrant appears; so that a few only could take notice of it. This was made more observable, by the late contrary proceedings against the Scots; who were, in a very quick and sharp manner, proclaimed traitors; and those Proclamations forthwith dispersed, with as much diligence as might be, through all the kingdom, and ordered to be read in all churches, accompanied with public prayers and execrations."

The Warrant above referred to was as follows: "It is his majesty's pleasure that you forthwith print, in a very good paper, and send unto me, for his majesty's service, forty copies of the Proclamation inclosed, leaving a convenient space for his majesty to sign above, and to affix the privy-signet underneath: and his majesty's express command is, That you print not above the said number of forty copies; and forbear to make any further publication of them, till his pleasure be further signified, for which this shall be your warrant.—EDWARD NICHOLAS. Whitehall, January, 2, 1641. To his Majesty's Printer." See 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1253. beginning of Hilary Term, judge Bacon delivered his Judgment, That a baron of Ireland was triable by a Jury in this kingdom. After which, the house of commons declared their assent unto his opinion in this following Vote :

Die Sabbati, 8 Feb. 1645.

“Resolved upon the question, That the house doth approve of the Judgment given by master Justice Bacon, in over-ruling the Plea of the lord Macguire, and of the manner of the Trial upon the indictment of High-Treason in the King's-Bench ; and the Judge is hereby required to proceed speedily thereupon, accord-and 4, after reciting that it may frequently happen, that felons and other malefactors in that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland, make their escape into that part of the united kingdom called Great Britain ; as also that felons and other malefactors in that part of the united kingdom, called Great Britain, may make their escape into that part of the united kingdom, called Ireland, whereby their offences often remain unpunished, there being no sufficient provision by the laws then in force in Great Britain, and Ireland, respectively for apprehending such offenders and transmitting them into that part of the united kingdom, in which their offences were committed ; for remedy thereof it is enacted that after August 1, 1804, if any person or persons, against whom a warrant shall be issued, by any of the judges of his majesty's court of King's-bench, &c. or other person having authority to issue the same, within Ireland, for any crime or offence against the laws in force in Ireland, shall “escape, go into, reside, or be” in any place in Great Britain, it shall and may be lawful for any justice of the peace, of the county, &c. in Great Britain, whither or where such person or persons shall “escape, go into, reside, or be” to indorse his name on such warrant, which warrant so indorsed shall be a sufficient authority to the person or persons bringing such warrant, and to all persons to whom such warrant was originally directed, and also to all constables or other peace officers of the county, &c. where such warrant shall be so indorsed, to execute the said warrant in the county, &c. where it is so indorsed, by apprehending the person or persons against whom such warrant is granted, and to convey him, her, or them, by the most direct way into Ireland, and before one of the justices of the peace, of the county, in Ireland, living near the place and in the county where he, she, or they shall arrive and land, which justice of the peace, is thereby required to proceed with regard to such person or persons, as if the said person or persons had been legally apprehended in the said county, in Ireland : and the like enactments are made with respect to offenders in Great Britain, escaping, going into, residing, or being in any place in Ireland. ing to law and justice. The lords concurrence to be desired herein ; master Recorder is appointed to carry it up.”

Upon this Vote of the honourable house of commons, the house of peers afterwards declared their concurrence ; and thereupon this ensuing Order was passed by both houses of parliament.

Die Lunæ, 10 Feb. 1645.

“Ordered by the lords and commons in parliament assembled, That the said houses do approve of the Judgment given by master Justice Bacon, in over-ruling the Plea of the lord Macguire, and of the manner of the Trial upon the Indictment of High-Treason in the King's Bench ; and the Judge is hereby required to proceed speedily thereupon, according to law and justice. JOHN BROWN, Cler. Parl. HENRY ELSING, Cler. Parl. D. C.”

On Monday Feb. 10, the lord Macguire was brought from the Tower of London, by the guard belonging thereunto, unto the King's-Bench bar ; where he was arraigned by the name of Connor Macguire, alias Cornelius Macguire, esq. (for his Plea of Peerage was found invalid, and so declared by the court ; and that opinion of the judge was since assented unto, and confirmed by both houses of parliament). At his coming to the bar, the prisoner spake as followeth :

Macguire. I do humbly move, that I may have time allowed me by this court to send for my witness.

Judge. (Mr. Justice Bacon.) You have had a long time ; you were indicted about the beginning of the last term, you might have prepared witnesses the last term.

Mac. I did not expect a trial.

Judge. You should expect it at your peril.

Mac. I was told, when I came into the kingdom that I might have witnesses.

Judge. The proof lies upon the king's part.

Mac. Though the proof be of the king's part, yet I must have time to clear myself.

Judge. But if every man should ask so much time as you require, he should never come to his trial.

Serj. Whitfield. Mr. Justice Bacon, we know that my lord Macguire was indicted here the last term ; he was arraigned at this bar, he pleaded Not Guilty, he could not but expect that he should then have been tried, if it had not been for the plea of peerage which he then put in : upon which he knows there was a deliberate dispute, and he could not tell but that there would be an end before this time ; and if he had any witnesses, he might have sent for them the last term. But it is a very unusual course, especially in that he could not but expect that he should be tried before this time, but then the court did conceive this was a legal information. No place is mentioned by the prisoner where the witnesses should be, nor are they named who they are, nor any particular thing that they should testify ; but the proof lies clear on our part, there is no justification in treason; if we prove that this lord hath committed treason, there is no justification of that by any witnesses he can produce.

Judge. The lord Greye, that was lord-deputy of Ireland, committed his treasons in Ireland, for which he was brought over hither, and tried here; yet the court did not stay for his sending over into Ireland for witnesses.

Mac. I desire witnesses.

Judge. What can your witnesses say for you? Can they say thus much, That you did not conspire, as this indictment charges you? That there was no taking of these castles? Can they swear in the negative? The proof lies in the affirmative on the king's part.

Mac. They may be mis-informed.

Judge. Who may be mis-informed?

Mac. The court. I have been kept close prisoner a long time, and could not provide my witnesses.

Serj. Whitfield. If we were not tied to that, to nothing but his own confession, there is enough to condemn him: for that he says he was kept close prisoner, he might have desired that the last term.

Serj. Roll. If we go upon your own examination, the witnesses concurring with that, what can you have?

Judge. If you had witnesses here, we would hear them; but to stay upon a mere verbal supposal for those witnesses in Ireland, they may be in that rebellion too, and they will never come hither, and so the matter must never come to a trial.

Mac. I desire that it may be the next term.

Judge. We cannot protract time; they are the king's witnesses, there are (I suppose) divers here, many witnesses of the king's come out of Ireland; if you will ask them any questions for your defence, you shall. There are many witnesses of the king's that know how things were in Ireland, the court shall put them to speak.

Mac. I humbly desire to have a formal trial.

Judge. In what respect do you mean? I think it is so now. Now you are come to be arraigned, and the evidence is to come in against you, I conceive it is a formal one.

Then the prisoner was required to hold up his hand at the bar; and it was demanded, if he would challenge any of the jury that were to pass upon him in the matter of life and death.

Then the Jury being called, he looked upon them, and challenged those which did appear, being twenty-three; there being only one absent. Being demanded whether his challenge was peremptory or no? he answered, It was, for causes best known to himself.

Jury challenged.

Sir W. Brownlow, kt. and baronet.	Edward Rogers, esq.
Sir Henry Row,	Edward Claxton, esq.
Sir M. Howland,	Richard Zachary, esq.
Thomas Marsh, esq.	H. Westwood, esq.
Thomas Wilcox, esq.	John Jackson, esq.
William Lane, esq.	John Pawlett, gent.
	Thomas Poltack, gent.

Henry Smith, gent.	John Arnold.
Francis Child, gent.	John Hucksley, esq.
Edward Wilford, gent.	Sir J. Harrington, kt.
Wm. Vincent, gent.	Thomas Moore, esq.
John Barnes.	Henry Arundell, gent.

Serj. Whitfield. The prisoner hath challenged all the jury that does appear; twenty-three appear, and he hath challenged them, and his challenge is for causes best known to himself, which is a peremptory challenge. Truly, it is that which the law doth allow, and we do not oppose it; but we do desire that we may have another writ returnable to-morrow.

Judge. You must have a Venire Facias.

Serj. Whitfield. This cause is a cause of very great weight; there are many witnesses that have long attended in court, we are informed that some of them are gone away into Ireland; that there is the sheriff of Dullin, and some others that are now present in court, that cannot be here, if we should defer this trial, as the prisoner doth desire: and we do desire that it may be referred till to-morrow, we shall be ready to give in evidence against him.

Judge. He hath spent three days this term already, this is the fourth: we would have proceeded now, but for his peremptory challenge; but if we stay till to-morrow, he must be content to be tried by a meaner jury.

Mr. Prynn. This being a public case, we desire a speedy progress in it: our witnesses have been long detained here and cannot attend till the next term, some of them being to depart within two days.

Judge. A public case must have public justice on both sides: for your witnesses, you shall stay your witnesses here. We must do that which the law doth allow.

Serj. Whitfield. The law does allow of his peremptory challenge; we desire to have a new writ, and that it may be returnable to-morrow. For the doing of it, we shall leave it to those that are to prosecute it; and to the sheriff. We see that this cause cannot be tried this day, we desire we may have a speedy end of it; there have been many days spent in it, and we that are of counsel for the king do desire that we may confer together, departing the court for some time; and when we have conferred together, we will return to the court, and then we will propound to you what course we do desire for the speedy trial of this cause.

To this motion the judge assented, and serj. Whitfield and the rest of the counsel went to consult together about it; and after a short stay, on their return, serj. Whitfield spake thus:

Serj. Whitfield. We that are counsel for the king have consulted together with the clerk of the crown, and the secretary; we have withdrawn ourselves, and perused several precedents, and we do find by several precedents, that whereas a peremptory challenge shall be, it is in the power of the court to order the course of trial, and the course is this; There goes a writ to the sheriff, that he shall distrain all them that make default, and that he shall remove those that are challenged by the prisoner; and further, that he return so many more for the trial. This we conceive to be the constant course of this court; and in this case my lord Macguire having challenged 23 of the 24, we are to distrain the other that made default, and to amove the 23 that he hath challenged of them, and have a Tales returnable to-morrow for a new jury.

Serj. Roll. That was in Standish's case and Friar's case.

Judge. I know the court may grant a Tales; but the matter is, whether it can be done so soon as to-morrow or no, if the sheriff can do it to-morrow.*

Serj. Whitfield. We do find this in the precedent of Friar, that in 3 Hen. 7, the jury did appear on Friday, and all those that did appear were challenged, and there was a Distringas returned the next day, which was Saturday. It may be immediatè.

Judge. Then make your Distringas against to-morrow morning, make out a Quadraginta Tales against to-morrow.

Mac. I desire I may not be so severely dealt with.

Judge. It hath been so often-times, and the court doth proceed in these cases de die in diem, from day to day; and there is no difficulty in the granting of it, but whether the sheriff can return it so soon. If the king's counsel will have it to-morrow, the other businesses of the court must be put off.

Hereupon the prisoner was discharged, and a rule granted to the lieutenant of the Tower, to bring him again the next day.

On Tuesday, Feb. 11, the lord Macguire was again brought to the King's-Bench bar, where he made a motion that his plea of peerage might be referred to another court. To which was answered, Serj. Whitfield. We know not for what end this motion is, and we know this, that this is no time for my lord to make his request; for you know how far we have proceeded: He hath been arraigned, and indicted for high-treason; and one jury he challenged, the other is returned, so as now he is in the way of his trial; we are now to proceed with such evidence as we have, to prosecute instantly. We do not desire this to be produced again, and if it be, we know not how it could be material one way or other.

After this, the lord Macguire further urged the court to the former purpose; to which it was answered, That he was then brought to his trial as a prisoner upon the indictment, and that both the lords and commons had approved of the opinion of the court therein.

Mac. Please you, sir, one word more: I desire to appeal to the lords.

Serj. Whitfield. When one is come here, to appeal to the lords, that was never known; now you have put yourself upon the country.

Mac. Under favour, I conceive I may, to an higher court.

Judge. It cannot be granted, the lords approved it: if you would have gone to an higher court before, you might have taken your course; now the jury is returned, and you are appointed to be tried here.

After this, the lord Macguire desired further to appeal; to which the answer was:

Serj. Whitfield. Here lies no such appeal here: you are out of the ecclesiastical court, there is no such plea here: you are now upon the middle of your trial, we desire you may go on; you have challenged 23 of the jury already.

Judge. We have no such course in the common law; if a man will appeal from me, I cannot let him appeal to any man.

Upon this, these of the jury following were named, which he challenged; viz. George Hanger, esq., sir Michael Wharton, James Hawley, esq. George Smith, esq., Edmund Besley, esq., William Ewrsby, esq., Stephen Bourman, gent., George Weaver-Basset, J. Nicolls the younger, Henry Walker gent., Randolph Nicoll, Andrew Brent. Upon his challenging of these, which being added to the rest, make 35 in all, the other jury being about to be called, the lord Macguire moved:

Mac. Under favour, I conceive that my lands being sequestered, those men that have bought my lands, should not pass upon my trial; and therefore I desire they may make answer to it upon oath, whether any of them have adventured or no.

Serj. Whitfield. To desire that a whole jury may be demanded such a question upon their oath, is that that hath not been known. If my lord Macguire have cause now against any, he hath run out the liberty which the law gave him to challenge 35 peremptorily. Now if he should challenge any more, he must make a particular challenge to every particular man that comes to be sworn, and he must have such a challenge notwithstanding as is warrantable by law; but this general challenge is not warrantable by law, and if it were particular, it were not warrantable neither.

Serj. Roll. If you will challenge any more, the law does not debar you to shew cause.

Mac. I conceive, that any that have given money for Ireland for my destruction, ought not to pass against me.

Serj. Whitfield. This is for the king, this is for no particular person whatsoever.

Mac. I beseech you hear me in it.

Judge. You know this, that the king cannot grant it without the consent of both houses, and in this case it may be put to the jury to try upon their oath. Thus far I shall agree, that if any of this jury be to have any particular benefit in Ireland, of lands or goods by his attainder, it is good; but if his lands come to the king, and that the king is no way bound to give it any of them, it is no challenge: look the statute.

Mr. Prynn. Under favour, Mr. Justice Ba-

* For the law respecting Challenges and Tales, see Blackst. Com. B. 3, c. 23, B. 4, ch. 27, s. 5, and Mr. Christian's Notes thereon.

con, it doth not appear to the court, that the prisoner hath any lands or goods in Ireland; and therefore no such question is to be demanded of the jury.

Judge. You may make needless disputes upon it.

Then the jury being accordingly required to answer upon oath, whether they had adventured, or had any share in Ireland for the rebels land; Macguire desired the question might be, Whether they themselves, their children, or brothers? But that would not be agreed unto, as being unreasonable. Then the jury following was sworn: I. Carpenter, John Cooper, A. Cordall, Rich. Atkinson, Josias Hendall, William Greenwood, William Barnes, Robert Stiles, George Norfolk, Edmund Hudson, John Wait, Esab Risby. The oath which they took was this:

You shall well and truly try, and true deliverance make, between our sovereign lord the king, and Connor Macguire, esq.; now prisoner at the bar, and a true verdict give according to your evidence.

The Jury being sworn, Macguire moved that he might have a Jury of 24; to which it was answered;

Judge. There have been 40 named.

Mac. Under favour, I conceive, I ought to be tried by 24; there were so many returned at first.

Judge. They returned 24; that is, because if any of them did fail, and some may be challenged, then there might be twelve left.

Mac. Under favour, I conceive, there should be 24 now left for my trial.

Judge. You are deceived in that. You challenged 23, and so there were 40 more added; now you have challenged 12 of this 40, and out of them there remains so many as will make up a Jury of 12.

Then the court proceeded to his trial, and the Indictment against him was read.

Clerk. Gentlemen of the Jury, upon this Indictment he hath been arraigned, and to his arraignment he hath pleaded Not Guilty; and thereupon put himself upon his country; and your charge is, to inquire whether he be guilty of the Indictments, or any of them: If you find him not guilty, you are to declare it; if guilty, then you are to give in your Verdict accordingly.

Then these witnesses following were sworn to give in evidence against the prisoner: The lord Blaney, lady Calfield, sir Arthur Loftus, sir John Temple, sir William Stewart, sir Francis Hamilton, sir Edward Borlacey, sir William Cole, sir Charles Coote, Mrs. Wordrose, John Carnick, Walter Gubson, M. Bunbury, captain Michael Balfoure, captain Berisford.

Sir William Cole's Testimony.

Serj. Whitfield. You know, sir William Cole, a great many of their names, which you have heard, that were conspirators with this lord; what religion were they of?

Sir W. Cole. They were all Papists.

Serj. Whitfield. Who were they?

Sir W. Cole. The lord Macguire, sir Phelim O'Neale, Roger Moore, &c.

Serj. Whitfield. Sir Francis Hamilton, upon what occasion was it, that the conspirators got an order to view the magazine?

Sir F. Hamilton. I was a member of the house of commons there, and I remember very well there came a message from the house of lords to the house of commons, to let them know, that there was some Plot for the blowing up of the parliament-house in Ireland; and they sent a message, to desire that they might search under the parliament-house: and there was search made, and (as I remember) the lord Macguire was one of the committee from the house of lords made search there; but what they found, I do not know. Afterwards they desired that they might search the castle at Dublin, and other magazines.

Counsel. What was the cause?

Sir F. Hamilton. There was a coachman of my lord Strafford's, that had uttered some big words, (as was given out) That the parliament house should be blown up: but what was the ground, I am persuaded in my conscience, it was to know where the store and ammunition lay, that they might know where to surprize it.

Sir William Stewart's Testimony.

I was one of the committee that was sent by the parliament, and by order from the house of lords, to search the parliament-house, and the lord Macguire was one of the lords: they made a very strict search, and then they inquired for the king's magazine, and I believe my lord Macguire now here was one of the committee that went to search for the house of lords, and he did search very narrowly, and they were desirous to know where the store was.

The Lord Blaney's Testimony.

Counsel. Whether this search were moved by lord Finghall, and what was the end of it?

Lord Blaney. So near as I can, I will give you the business; it is so long ago. This I remember, that there was one of the lords house, whether it were my lord Finghall or my lord Macary, moved it, I cannot certainly depose, but I am sure it was one of them. This occasion was, one of the earl of Strafford's coachmen said, he hoped to see some of the lords blown up for it; it was about a fortnight after the earl of Strafford was beleached here. Thereupon they got an order for it, and so they went down, and they did not find the powder, but they made as narrow a search as ever any was. I asked what the meaning was of this, for we had strange censures of it ourselves. Says one of them, the lord Clamorris, they are afraid of a Powder-Plot of the Protestants. I answered, that I had heard of a Powder-Plot of the Papists, but never of the Protestants in my life. But if you ask the reason of it, it was to assure themselves of their strength, for we found by woeful experience afterwards it was their end. My lord Borlacey said, Let them not be afraid, for upon my honour there is no powder below. It is a great house, the house of commons sit on one side, and the lords on the other, and the block-house in the middle.

Counsel. What religion is my lord Finghall and my lord Clamorris of?

Lord Blaney. The lord Finghall is a Papist, and Clamorris a pestiferous Papist.

Serj. Whitfield. All Papists. We shall now read the Examination of the manner of his taking, and then his own Examination. The first we shall read, is this of Mr. Woodcock, that was sheriff of Dublin; he was in town, but he could not stay, but he was examined before this court.

The INFORMATION of John Woodcock the 27th of October, 1644, taken upon Oath before J. Bacon.

The said examine deposeth and saith, That he being one of the sheriffs of the said city of Dublin, in the year 1641, having notice given him in the night upon the 22d of October in the same year, of some great design intended, did by virtue of his office walk up and down the city that night; and coming to the house of one Nevil, a chururgeon, in Castle-street, he understood by the said Nevil, that the lord Macguire with some ten or twelve others were there: this examine told him it was fit for his guests to be in bed at that time of night; but the said Nevil did bring this examine word, that the lord Macguire and his company were then going to bed. The said examine departed, setting a watch near his house; by which watch he was informed, that the said lord Macguire and the rest were gone from the house, and were at the house of one Kerne, a taylor: whereupon he searched the said house, and there found some hatchets, with the helves newly cut off close to the hatchets, five petronels, five or six swords, three or four small pistols, five or six skaines, with other arms of the lord Macguire's in an house of office in the said house; in another place divers pole-axes, and also behind a hen-roost some great weapons with sharp pikes of iron in one end of them: the said Kerne affirming, that he knew nothing of any of the particulars before-mentioned, nor how they came in his house. The said examine shewed all the said instruments unto the said lords justices and council of Ireland; and thereupon the said lords justices and council commanded search to be made for the said lord Macguire. Upon which, the said examine searching narrowly for him, at last found him in a cock-loft, with a cloke wrapt about him, standing by a bed, the door locked upon him, there being no key to be found; as also the master of the house flying away, and making an escape to the enemy.

After this the lord Macguire's own examination was read, taken the 26th of March, 1642, (for as sir John Temple declared to the court, the lord Macguire was then brought to the council-board, and they could get nothing out of him) whereupon he was sent back to prison for that time.

The EXAMINATION of Connor Lord Macguire, Baron of Enniskillen, taken before us, Charles Lord Lambert, and sir Robert Meredith, knt. Chancellor of his Majesty's Court of Exchequer, the 26th of March, 1642, by direction of the Right Honourable the Lords Justices and Council.

Who being examined, saith, That about the time when Mr. John Bellew came out of England with the commission for the continuance of the present parliament, Roger Moor, in the said Moor's chamber, in the house of one Peter de Costres of this city, acquainted him this examine, That if the Irish would rise, they might make their own condition, for the remaining of their own lands, and freedom of their religion. At which time the said Moor also acquainted him this examine, That he had spoken with sundry of Leinster, who would be ready for that purpose: and withal told him this examine, that he was assured a good part of Conaught would do the like; and thereupon moved this examine to join likewise with them, with all he could make: unto which motion, he this examine yielded. And the next day following, there was a meeting in his the said Moor's chamber aforesaid, where were colonel Mac Bryan, Macmahone, Tirelagh O'Neal, Philip Mac Hugh O'Rely, this examine, and Roger Moor; where discourse was had on that business, yet nothing concluded on, save that Roger Moor, and the rest should go and prepare their parties. And this examine further saith, That about May last he this examine, Roger Moor, Philip O'Rely, and Roger Macguire this examine's brother, dispatched a priest, one Toole O'Coole, who lived in Leinster, unto Owen O'Neale, into Flanders, to acquaint him with the business concerning the general rebellion then in preparation; which said priest returned about a month before the time appointed for execution thereof. And the answer which the said priest brought from the said Owen O'Neale, was, That he would, within 15 days after the people were up, be with them, with his best assistance and arms. And it being demanded why the said Owen should bring arms, considering that the castle of Dublin was to be taken, with the arms therein; this examine answered, That they so provided for arms, that they might not want any, in case they could not take the said castle, whereof they doubted. And this examine acknowledgeth, that the castle of Dublin was to have been surprized by himself, capt. Bryan O'Neale, capt. Con O'Neale, capt. Macmahone, one Owen O'Rely, Roger Moor, Hugh Macmahone, col. Plunket, and capt. Fox; and likewise further acknowledgeth, That Hugh McPhelim, captain Con O'Neale, and Bryan O'Neale, brought from Owen O'Neale, out of Flanders, the very same message which the said priest brought. And this examine further saith, That he was told by Roger Moor, that a great man was in the plot, but he might not name him for the present. And at another time, and during the sitting of the parliament the last summer, he this examinee was informed by one John Barnwell, a Franciscan friar, then resident in this city, That those of the pale were also privy unto the plot (meaning the present rebellion.) And lastly saith, That of those persons who came to attend him this examinee for the surprize of the said castle of Dublin, only Cohonogh Macguire was privy unto the business in hand; and that the last meeting, when the day appointed for execution thereof was resolved on, was at Lough Rosse, where were present only Ever Macmahone, vicar-general of the diocess of Clogher; Thos. Mac Kearnan, a friar of Dundack; sir Phelim O'Neale, Roger Moor, and Bryan O'Neale.

Concordat cum Originali Cuius LAMBERT,
Ex. per Parl. Harris. Rf. MEREDITH.

This being read, and opened unto the jury, being the lord Macguire's free and voluntary confession, which he afterwards acknowledged since his coming to the Tower, viz.

Memorandum, That this within written being shewed and read unto the within-named lord Macguire, and himself having perused the same, his lordship did acknowledge the same to be true in all things, saving that he doth not now acknowledge that Bernard told him, That those of the pale were privy to the plot; neither doth acknowledge, that Cohonogh Macguire was privy to the plot before his coming to Dublin.

This examination and acknowledgment was made and taken the 22d day of June, 1642. Anno Regni Caroli regis decimo octavo, before us, John Bramston, Thomas Mallet.—In the presence of John Conyers, William Aylloffe, Nathaniel Finch.

The EXAMINATION of Connor Lord Macguire, Baron of Enniskillen, taken before sir John Bramston, knt. Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench, June 24, 1642.

Who saith, that he is of the age of 26 years and upwards, and that he was born in the county of Ferrinanagh in Ireland; and saith, That his examination taken at Dublin the 26th day of March 1642, before Charles lord Lambert, and sir Robert Meredith, with his acknowledgment thereof the 2d of June before judge Bramston and justice Mallet, is true in such manner as in the said examination and acknowledgment is expressed.

CONNOR MACGUIRE.

The EXAMINATION of Cornelius Macguire, Lord Baron of Enniskillen in Ireland, taken before Isaac Pennington, esq. Lieutenant of the Tower of London, and Laurence Whitaker, esq. two of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the County of Middlesex, the first day of October, 1644.

He denieth the receiving of any letters or messages out of England, before the rebellion, nor did he ever hear of any. He saith, he was but a mean instrument in the design in Ireland; he confesseth he intended to seize upon the castle of Dublin, and the magazine there, and keep it till they had redress of some grievances, which they purposed to propound to the parliament there; one whereof was, to have a toleration of the Roman Catholic religion. He confesseth, that he came accidentally to Philip O'Rely's house, as he came up to Dublin; and, as he remembereth, Macmahone was then there: and that his intention of coming up to Dublin, was to put the aforesaid design in execution, and that then and there they had speech about that design; but he remembereth not the particulars: which design was to be put in execution the 23d day of October in that year; and that he was taken there that very day, being Saturday, upon search made for him, carried before the lords justices, examined, committed, and sent over into England.

He saith further, That he made his escape out of the Tower of London upon Sunday the 18th of August last about four o'clock in the morning.—Laurence Whitaker, Isaac Pennington.

John Carmick's Testimony.

That upon the 21st of October, 1641, Fergus O'Howen, one of the followers of Brian Macguire, esquire, came to his chamber in the castle of Enniskillen; and after he endeavoured to bind him to keep secret a matter of great consequence, which Fergus said he had to disclose, and particularly to conceal it from sir William Cole, and all other Englishmen, this examinee told him, he would be secret so far as it went with his allegiance and conscience. He discovered unto the said examinee, that the lord Macguire and Hugh Oge Macmahone, accompanied with several Irishmen of the counties of Fermanagh and Monaghan, did take their journey out of the said counties upon the 19th and 20th days of October, 1641, to the city of Dublin, with resolution and intent to murder and kill his highness's lords justices, and council of the kingdom of Ireland, and the rest of the protestants there; and also to possess themselves of the City of Dublin, and to put all the protestants there likewise to the sword: and that to that effect there were other great men, and others of the papists of that kingdom to repair unto, and meet them in Dublin on Saturday, the 23d of Oct. 1641, or thereabouts. And that all the castles, forts, sea-ports and holds that were in the possession of the protestants in the several counties and provinces in the kingdom of Ireland, were then also designed and resolved to be surprized and taken by the Irish papists, and the protestants in every of those castles, forts, sea-ports and holds, to be then also put all to the sword by the Irish papists in Ireland, in their own several parts and limits, by men thereunto chiefly and particularly appointed by the contrivers thereof: and that especially the town and castle of Enniskillen, with the rest, would be taken, and all the protestants in it put to the sword; and therefore advised the examinee to get himself and goods out of the town: whereat the examinee smiling,

Fergus bid him not to slight it, for he could assure those things would come to pass in seven days, or else he would be bound to lose his head. Whereupon the said Fergus O'Howen departed, and the examinee acquainting sir William Cole with it, there came one Flartagh Mac-Hugh, a gentleman and feeholder of that county, and admires to the same effect to sir William Cole, that the plot for surprizing the city and castle of Dublin, the castle of Enniskillen, and all the castles and strengths in Ireland, was to be put in full execution by the papists, Oct. 22 and 23, 1641, throughout the said kingdom; and that Brian Mac-Conagh Macguire, esq. did send him the said Flartagh Mac-Hugh to give notice and warning thereof to the said sir William Cole, whom he earnestly desired to be upon his guard upon Friday the 22d and Saturday the 23d of October; for the L. Macguire was gone with Macmahone and others, that week, with purpose to possess themselves of the castle and city of Dublin. And the lord Macguire had written his letters to Con O-Bourke, Owen O-Roreick, Martagh Oge O-Fantagon, and others, to go on with that Plot in those parts; and had appointed his brother Rori Macguire (in his absence) to command the Irish Papists of the county of Fermanagh, for the surprizing of the castles and houses of the Protestants. Of all which sir William advertised the lords justices and council of Ireland the same day. And this examinee saith, that captain Mac-Hugh, seven or eight days before the rebellion broke forth, declared, that the lord Macguire posted letters, and rode up and down to divers gentlemen and others of that county, to be very active in the business: That it was averred upon the oaths of Flartagh Mac-Hugh, John Oge Mac-Hugh, and Terlagh Oge Mac-Hugh, before the said sir William Cole, that 150 men were appointed to surprize the castle of Enniskillen, under the leading of Don Macguire and Rori Macguire, who were to murder the said sir William Cole, and his wife, children and servants, and throw them over the wall into the river, and then to do the like unto the Protestants in the town and corporation of Enniskillen: for which service they were not only to have the spoil and riches of the said castle and town, but to have also the barony of Clanawley granted and confirmed in fee to them and their heirs from the said lord Macguire and his heirs. The examinee then also produced a letter written in Irish, from the lord Macguire, to his cousin, Brian Macguire, wherein taking notice that he was abundantly inclined to the English, which did very much trouble him; and therefore desired him to banish such thoughts out of his mind, and not to pursue those resolutions which in the end might be his own destruction, as he thought it would be to all those that did not appear.

Presently after, upon the 29th of October, one captain Rori-Macguire took upon him the managing of all businesses in his absence; he fortifies first the Castle-Husen, the house wherein he dwelt himself, he took in the castle of one Edward Aldrith, esq. he put out all the English there; he went to the town, burnt that, but killed none of the men; went thence to another place, and hanged one Eleazer M. one that was clerk of the peace of the county; and from thence he went to Newton, four miles off from it, took in the town, stripped and disarmed all the Protestants that were in the church, the next day after marched away, and killed and destroyed most of the English in those parts; murdered Arthur Champion, esq. and many more. Two and twenty castles were seized upon, and the church of Moosh, with eighteen Protestants burnt in it: Seven hundred ninety-four Protestants were destroyed in that county; and I did hear there was about one hundred and fifty-two thousand, that they had destroyed in that province of Ulster, in the first four months of the rebellion.

JOHN CARMICK.

Then sir William Cole, being present in court, gave in his evidence much to the same effect as in Carmick's Testimony.

Serj. W. We desire to shorten, we have a great many witnesses; we shall go upon these particulars: 1. Captain O'Neale's landing in Ireland, and what he brought with him. 2. Guilo and Crocan. Lastly, how long besieged, and how many murdered.

Then sir William Stewart gave in testimony to this effect.

That Con Owen O'Neale landed in July the same year the rebellion began, brought many commanders, much arms and ammunition; many of his commanders, nine of the chief of them, were taken prisoners at one battle.

Serj. W. It is his own confession; that he sent a priest over to fetch arms to come into Ireland.

Then the lady Calfield was desired to declare her knowledge concerning the taking of Charlemont-castle.

Lady Calfield. The 23d of October 1641, Sir Phelim O'Neale and others came into the castle, they seized upon all, murdered his servants; and those that were alive, they bound them, and put them in prison; and at that time sir Phelim O'Neale himself, and other of this companions, told her, that Dublin castle and city, and most other forts of Ireland were surprized by their confederates the Papists; and that he was sorry for his cousin the lord Macguire, and that he was afraid he was taken.

Serj. W. What was done with my lord Calfield?

Lady Calfield. He was murdered; he begged for his life, and they durst not but do it.

Serj. W. When sir Phelim O'Neale had taken my lord Calfield, then they got this lady to write to the Lords/Justices, that my lord Macguire might be exchanged for her son, but that would not be; and thereupon they murdered my lord Calfield, Francis Davis, and others.

Mrs. Mary Wardrofe's Testimony.

That he came on Friday night about 10 or 11 o'clock to break into the castle: I hearing the noise asked what was the matter? I went to call up some of our gentlemen; when I came in again, they had taken some of our gentlemen and bound them.

She also testified the murdering of the lord Calfield, Francis Davis, and others; and the former words concerning my lord Macguire.

Serj. W. These two witnesses prove that of Charlemont, how far the rebels owned the lord Macguire, as to endeavour his exchange. We shall now come to the other castles, how long they besieged them, and who was murdered.

Walter Gubson's Testimony.

They besieged it a quarter of a year before they took it; divers of the chief conspirators, and Powell and Coscus took the castle by force in an hostile manner.

Sir Francis Hamilton's Testimony.

Philip O'Relly came to the castle, to Guilo and Crocan castles, and they lay before it a quarter of a year with 2,000 or 3,000 men, sometimes 1,500, but never less.

Sir Charles Coote's Testimony concerning the Generality of the Rebellion.

Sir Phelim O'Neale and Roger Moore were the actors in the massacres, and by public directions of some in place, and of the titular bishops, for the sending of an exact account of what persons were murdered throughout all Ulster, a fourth part of the kingdom of Ireland, to the parish-priests in every parish; and they sent in a particular account of it; and the account was 104,700 in one province, in the first 3 months of the rebellion.

Serj. W. What say you concerning the General Council and the Pope's Bull?

Sir Charles Coote. The Supreme Council, they took up a new form of government upon them of their own; and by this authority it was granted to the lady Macguire, that she should have the rent of such lands in recompence of the loss that he was at in their causes. They have made several judges of their own courts: They print, they coin, they do all in their own names.

Urbanus Octavus, &c. Having taken into our serious consideration the great zeal of the Irish towards the propagating of the Catholic faith, and the piety of the Catholic warriors in the several armies of that kingdom, which was for that singular fervency in the true worship of God, and notable care had formerly in the like case, by the inhabitants thereof, for the maintenance and preservation of the same Orthodox faith, called of old, 'The Land of Saints;' and having got certain notice how, in imitation of their godly and worthy ancestors, they endeavour by force of arms to deliver their thrall'd nation from the oppressions and grievous injuries of the heretics, wherewith this long time it hath been afflicted, and heavily burdened, and gallantly do in them what lieth to extirpate, and totally root out those workers of iniquity, who in the kingdom of Ireland had infected, and always striving to infect the mass of Catholic purity with the pestiferous leven of their heretical contagion: We therefore being willing to cherish them with the gifts of those spiritual graces, wherof by God we are ordained the only disposers on earth, by the mercy of the same Almighty God, trusting in the authority of the blessed apostles Peter and Paul; and by virtue of that power of binding and loosing of souls, which God was pleased, without our deserving, to confer upon us; to all and every one of the faithful Christians in the foresaid kingdom of Ireland now, and for the time militating against the heretics, and other enemies of the Catholic faith, they being truly and sincerely penitent, after confession, and the spiritual refreshing of themselves with the sacred communion of the body and blood of Christ, do grant a full and plenary indulgence, and absolute remission for all their sins, and such as in the holy time of jubilee is usual to be granted to those that devoutly visit a certain number of privileged churches, within and without the walls of our city of Rome: by the tenour of which present letters, for once only and no more, we freely bestow the favour of this absolution upon all and every one of them; and withal, desiring heartily all the faithful in Christ, now in arms as aforesaid, to be partakers of this most precious treasure.

To all and every one of these foresaid faithful Christians, we grant license, and give power to chuse into themselves, for this effect, any fit confessor, whether a secular priest, or a regular of some order; as likewise any other selected person approved of by the ordinary of the place; who, after a diligent hearing of their confession, shall have power to liberate and absolve them from excommunication, suspension, and all other ecclesiastical sentences and censures by whomsoever, or for what cause soever, pronounced, or inflicted upon them; as also from all sins, trespasses, transgressions, crimes and delinquencies, how heinous and atrocious soever they be, not omitting those very enormities in the most peculiar cases, which by any whatsoever former constitutions of ours, or of our predecessor popes, than which we will have these to be no less valued in every point, were designed to be reserved to the ordinary, or to the Apostolic see; from all which the confessor shall hereby have power granted him to absolve the foresaid Catholics at the bar of conscience, and in that sense only. And furthermore, we give them power to exchange what vow or vows soever they were formerly astricted to, those of religion and chastity excepted, into any other pious and good work or works, imposed or to be imposed on them, and every one of them to perform in all the aforesaid cases, by wholesome penance, according to the mind and will of the confessor.

Therefore, by the tenor of these present letters, and by the virtue of that holy strict obedience, wherein all Christians are bound unto us, we charge and command all and every one of the reverend brethren, archbishops, bishops, and other ecclesiastical prelates, and whatsoever ordinaries of places now residing in Ireland, together with all vicars, substitutes and officials under them; or these failing, we command all such to whom in those places the care of souls is incumbent: that as soon as they shall have received the copies of these our letters, they shall forthwith, without any stop or delay, publish them, and cause them to be published throughout all their churches, dioceses, provinces, countries, cities, towns, lands, villages, and places whatsoever.

Nevertheless we do not intend by these present letters, where any public or secret irregularity is made known, or any defection, apostacy, incapacity or inability in any manner or way contracted, to dispence therewith, or grant to any other any power or faculty of dispensation, rehabilitation, or restoring the delinquent to his former condition, though but at the bar of conscience: Neither can nor should these our present letters avail or be steadable to those, who by us and the Apostolic see, or by any prelate or ecclesiastic judge, have been excommunicated, suspended, interdicted, or declared, and publicly denounced to have justly incurred the sentences and censures of the church, till first they have satisfied and agreed with the parties therein concerned, notwithstanding all other constitutions and apostolical ordinations; whereby, nevertheless, the faculty of absolution in these, as well as other expressed cases, is so reserved to his holiness the pope for the time being, that no kind of jubilee, nor power of granting such indulgences can in any sort avail, unless express mention be made of the fault or faults in particular, and the whole tenour of them fully deduced by an individual relation from word to word, and not by general clauses importing the same thing. This, or some other requisite form of the like nature, being carefully observed, we in that case especially, expressly and namely, by the effect of these presents, do totally abolish and remit them all and every one of them their offences, notwithstanding any thing to the contrary.

Now that these principal letters of ours, which cannot be conveniently brought to every place, may the sooner come to the notice of all, our will and pleasure is, that any whatsoever copies of transcripts, whether written or printed, that are subscribed by the hand of a public notary, and which have the seal of some eminent person in ecclesiastical dignity affixed thereunto, be of the same force, power and authority, and have the like credit in every respect given unto them, as would be to these our principal letters if they were shewn and exhibited.

Dated at Rome in the Vatican, or St. Peter's palace, the 25th of May, 1643, and in the 80th year of our pontificat. M. A. MARAUDUS.

Serj. Whitf. We have troubled you with a long relation of the actions of the confederates with the lord Macquire, though not done in his own person, and his own particular act; but for this that was done by the generality, I heard my lord say at the bar, What's that to me? Yes, my lord, this is to you; you were one of the conspirators in the first Plot, and you contrived the business. And that had been treason alone, to send the priest to fetch Owen O'Neale into Ireland with arms and soldiers; but you contrived this, and conspired it, and you are as guilty in law, in all these cruel murders and burnings in every place: for the law of England is, in treason you are all principals and no accessories. Your son was there, your lady is rewarded; for the Supreme Council they have taken care of you: why! because you were one of the first complotters of it; and this will light upon you, and fall very heavy. And for your exchange, it was propounded for the lord Calfield; but when they could not have that agreed upon, then what becomes of the poor lord Calfield? murdered too! And you see what encouragement you have from the complotters, and from the Devil too; for they were both together in it. And now you have seen the indictment fully made good.

Then the lord Macquire proceeded to make his Defence, wherein he first of all denied his Examination, although testified, as before, by so many credible witnesses, and said, that he knew no such Examination.

That at the time of his apprehension at Dublin, he came about his own particular occasions, as his estate was in danger, if he did not follow it; that because he was found about the city, he was therefore apprehended; that his lodging was not within the city, but he lodged without the city; that he did lodge at Mr. Nevil's house formerly, but not at this time; that for some of the places mentioned, where he should be about the conspiracy, he had not been there a year before, he was certain of it. For the number of Protestants that were mentioned to be slain, he said he did not think there were so many Protestants in the whole kingdom; that he was continually either at his own house, or at Dublin, and knew nothing of the plot, but by hear-say.

Judge. You confess in your examination, when the day was for the rising, that you were in the conspiracy, and appointed for the taking of Dublin-Castle; and that you were taken when you came about it: also you rode about it, and provided arms.

Macg. I was in the house in the cock-loft where I was taken; I did not know where any army was.

Serj. Whitfield. My lord Macquire does forget himself, what he acknowledges under his own hand.

Then the examination being shewed him, he said, There's my name, but not my hand.

Judge. I am sorry to hear it: I did rather expect that you should have acknowledged it: here are two able witnesses that can testify it against you; your denying your own hand, which is so manifestly proved, will be a great discredit to what you say: you acknowledged it at two several times.

Macg. What did I acknowledge?

Judge. You say that you came to Dublin to settle your estate: by your own examination you acknowledged, That the castle of Dublin was to be surprized by yourself. But it is now time we should draw to the jury: you hear my lord Brampton and my brother Finch here justify it to you.

Then my lord Macguire's examination was shewed to my lord Blaney, being present in court, demanding whether he thought it to be Macguire's hand, or no?

Lord Blaney. It is my lord's own hand, he hath written to me many letters.

Macg. I don't think I have written many letters to your lordship.

Judge. Gentlemen of the Jury, you may go to the business; if there were nothing that you see in this case, but what is in the examination, if you believe it to be his, his confession does acknowledge it: you hear this by the testimony of my lord Brampton and my brother Finch expressly, who were present when he did acknowledge it, and set his hand to it; and yet you see, though it is here proved by my lord Blaney, he denies it. If you find this to be true, here is treason enough, and too much: too; for he does here confess, that Roger Moore did acquaint him, that if the Irish did rise, they might make their own conditions for regaining their lands: and he acquainted him, that he had spoken with sundry in Leinster, that would be ready for that purpose; and that a great part of Connaught would do the like: and then moved him (this lord) the prisoner at the bar, to join likewise with him, which he did; so then was the plot. The next day they met; he goes to Moore's chamber again, where colonel Mac Brian, Mac Mahone and others had discourse again about it. Then he says, that they did send over to Owen O'Neale, to acquaint him concerning the general rebellion in Ireland, then in preparation. He confesses expressly, that being demanded why the said Owen should bring over arms, seeing the castle of Dublin was to be surprized? He answered, that they so provided arms, that they might not want any thing, if they should not take it, whereof they doubted. And then you have him acknowledging, that the castle of Dublin was to be surprized by himself, and captain Brian O'Neale, and others. These words shew here expressly, that the day whereon the execution was appointed, by the lord Macguire's own confession, he was come to Dublin for the surprize of the castle. So that it is apparent, that he was about this plot expressly. If this be true, that you did conspire to make war or rebellion within that kingdom, though you were taken yourself before it was executed, yet it was your own conspiracy: and besides, endeavouring after that to bring it to perfection by sending over for arms; all these do discover your own intention to execute it.

Mac. I confess it not, I refer myself to the jury.

Judge. Gentlemen, you are to know, that to conspire to raise a war, if any of that conspiracy do act it, as you see here sir Phelim O'Neale did, if you observe the testimony of my lady Calfield, he came and surprized the castle of Charlemont, and then it was given out, that my lord Macguire had taken Dublin; so that though it did not take effect, that which is done by any, is testimony enough. Go together and consider of it.

Upon this the jury went together, and staying a short space, returned their verdict, which was, that they found him Guilty of all the treasons according to the indictment.

Clerk. Connor Macguire alias Cornelius Macguire, thou hast been indicted for several high treasons, and thou hast been arraigned. Upon the arraignment thou hast pleaded, Not Guilty; and for thy trial hast put thyself upon the country, which country have found thee guilty, according to the indictment: therefore prepare thyself to receive the sentence.

Macg. I desire to know by what law?

Judge. The law is well enough known: that is a treason within the statute without doubt.

Macg. I was not tried by my peers.

Judge. This is a general exception, formerly annexed in your plea: if you can shew some particular cause also, you shall be heard.

Macg. I desire counsel to advise me.

Judge. When you did put in a plea therein, you had counsel to advise you in your plea, and to argue it: now your time is past for counsel; you must have none assigned to pick holes in the indictment.

Macg. I desire the court would consider of it before they proceed to sentence.

Judge. You offer nothing to the court that is of any difficulty: you had counsel whether you should be tried by your peers, or the jury here; which jury are to try any man under a nobleman in this kingdom.

Macg. I desire to know under what seal you thus proceed against me; for I think you sit here by the new seal.

Judge. What seal do you mean? I sit here by virtue of the old, by order of parliament.

Macg. Under favour, I conceive that the ordinance of parliament for the new seal, makes all done by the old seal to be void.

Judge. Here is nothing done but by good authority and the parliament's approbation.

Macg. I conceive the ordinance for the new seal cuts off all proceedings of the old.

Judge. My authority is not cut off: I was made by the old seal before there was any new seal, and so I am continued by the parliament; and the parliament did take notice that I have been allowed to sit. Besides this, there is nothing done in this court by the new seal:

the sheriffs are here by a charter, and that comes in from year to year; and there is no seal in order of execution.

Judge. Well, if you have nothing to say for yourself, I am to pronounce sentence, as I am a minister of justice. You have been indicted here for several treasons contained in your indictment, as was here of late read unto you; and you have had a fair proceeding, and very deliberately: for your indictment came in about Allhallowmas last, three weeks or a month before the end of the last term, three weeks at least. You then made a question, Whether you ought to be tried by your peers in Ireland, or a jury here? The court did so far deliberate in it, as to allow you counsel to plead with the best advantage you could: and afterwards, this term there have been two arguments at the bar on each side, where hath been said as much for you as can be. The court over-ruled that, and so you are tried by a jury; and you had the liberty to challenge them, and had all the advantages that the law will afford, and take all the exceptions you could. Truly for my part, I see that there is not any one of them for me, to sway the judgment: the treason and the offences that you are charged withal are very heinous, your crimes very impious; great destruction hath followed upon your plot, which the jury have found you guilty of. What a mighty cruel war and great devastation in that kingdom? Most horrid to speak or rehearse! It is fitter for you now to bethink yourself what your offences are, and prepare yourself for death, rather than seek to mask or put colours upon those things which are so manifestly proved to all the world. And now you are found guilty: and therefore there is no contradiction or gain-saying will avail you: you ought to repent, and pray to God to forgive that offence whereof you are guilty. The judgment that I am by the law to pronounce against you, is this: Connor Macguire, esq. you being found guilty of the treasons whereof you are indicted, your judgment is, That you shall be carried from hence to the place from whence you came, that is the Tower, and from thence to Tyburn, the place of execution; and there you shall be hanged by the neck, and cut down alive, your bowels taken out, and burnt before your face, your head to be cut off, your body to be divided into four quarters, and the head of your body to be set up and disposed of as the state shall appoint. And the Lord have mercy upon your soul.

After judgment pronounced, the king's counsel demanded of him whether he would have any ministers come to him, to prepare him for his end, and to advise him for the good of his soul.

Macg. I desire none of them: but I desire I may be sent prisoner to Newgate.

Counsel. His reason is, because there are some popish priests there.

Judge. That cannot be: your judgment is to return to the Tower; where you may have ministers, if you please, to return to advise you for your soul.

Macg. I desire that some gentlemen of my own religion may have access to me, to confer with me; and some who are my fellow-prisoners in the Tower, to speak with me in my keeper's presence.

Judge. You must name somebody in particular.

Macg. I desire to confer with Mr. Walter Montague. [Belike he knew him to be a popish priest or jesuit.]

Judge. You must prepare yourself to die against Saturday next.

Macg. I desire a fortnight's time to prepare myself.

Judge. That is too long a space, and I cannot grant it; but you shall have convenient time.

Macg. I desire you that I may have three days notice at least to prepare myself.

Judge. You shall have three days warning; but however delay no time to prepare yourself.

Macg. I desire my execution may be altered, and not according to the judgment: and that I may not be hanged, and quartered.

Judge. This lies not in my power to grant: but here are some members of the house of commons in court, and you were best address yourself to them, that they may acquaint the house with your desires.

Macg. I shall desire the gentlemen of the house of commons, so many as are here, to move the house in my behalf; that I may have a fortnight's time to prepare myself, and that the manner of my execution may be changed.

Sir John Cloitworthy. My Lord, I have been your school-fellow heretofore, and I have found some ingenuity in you; and I have seen some letters of yours importing some remorse of conscience in you for this fact; and I should be glad to discern the like ingenuity in you still: and shall move the house that you may have some ministers appointed to come to you; and likewise acquaint them with your other desires.

Then the prisoner departing from the bar, Mr. Prynne advising him to confer with some godly ministers for the good and comfort of his soul; he answered, That he would have none at all, unless he might have some Romish priests of his own religion.

To which Mr. Prynne replied, My lord, these Romish priests are the chief instruments who have advised you to plot and perpetrate those execrable treasons, for which you are now condemned, and have brought upon you that shameful judgment of a traitor, the execution whereof you even now so earnestly deprecated. Since then they have proved such evil destructive counsellors to you in your life, you have great reason to disclaim them with their bloody religion, and to seek out better advisers for you at your death, lest you eternally lose your soul as well as your life, for the blood of those many thousand innocents which have been shed by your means.—To which he, pausing a little, answered, That he was resolved in his way. Whereupon another lawyer said, My lord, you were best to hear both sides. To which he answered in an obstinate manner, I am settled on one side already, and therefore I desire not to confer with any other. And so departed through the hall towards the Tower, the people crowding and running about to behold his person.

After the Sentence pronounced against the lord Macguire, as before said, he petitioned the Parliament as followeth:

“To the Right Honourable the Comons now assembled in Parliament, the humble Petition of the Lord Macguire; “Humbly sheweth; That your petitioner stands condemned for his life, and adjudged to be drawn, hanged, and quartered: the performance whereof (he humbly conceives) in some more favourable manner, will be satisfactory to justice. And forasmuch as your petitioner hath hitherto enjoyed the degree and dignity of a lord, which he humbly conceives your honours are well acquainted with: In tender consideration whereof, he desireth that your honours will graciously be pleased in mercy to mitigate the rigour of his sentence, and turn it to that degree which most befits the denomination he hath: and as he hath been looked on by the eye of justice in his condemnation, so in this particular he may be pitied, and have mercy. And he shall ever pray, &c.

CORNELIUS MACGUIRE.”

But this Petition was rejected by the parliament, and on Thursday, February the 20th, he was drawn on a sledge from the Tower through London, and so to Tyburn: where being removed into a cart, he kneeled and prayed a-while: after which, sheriff Gibbs spake to him, representing the heinousness of his crime, and the vast numbers who had been murdered by that Conspiracy, for which he was to suffer, and therefore exhorted him to express his sorrow for it; in answer to which he said, ‘I desire Almighty God to forgive me my sins.’

Sheriff Gibbs. Do you believe you did well in those wicked actions?

Macg. I have but a short time, do not trouble me.

Sher. Sir, it is but just I should trouble you, that you may not be troubled for ever.

Macg. I beseech you, Sir, trouble me not, I have but a little time to spend.

Sher. Sir, I shall give you as much time after as you shall spend to give satisfaction to the people: I do require you, as an instrument set in God’s stead here, to make an acknowledgment to the people, whether you are sorry for what you have done or no, whether it be good or no.

Macg. I beseech you do not trouble me, I am not disposed to give you an account. Pray give me leave to pray.

Dr. Sibbald. Give glory to God, that your soul may not be presented to God with the blood of so many thousand people.

Sher. You are either to go to heaven or hell. If you make not an ingenuous confession, your case is desperate; had you any commission, or no?

Macg. I tell you that there was no commission, that ever I saw.

Sher. Who were actors or plotters with you; or who gave you any commission?

Macg. For God’s sake give me leave to depart in peace.

Then they asked him, ‘If he had not some pardon or bull from the pope for what he did?’ To which he only answered, ‘I am not of the same religion with you.’ And being further urged about a Bull or pardon, said, ‘I saw none of it: all that I knew, I delivered in my examinations: all that I said in my examinations are true; all that I said, is right. I beseech you let me depart in peace.’ And so not returning them any answer to their question, he continued mumbling over a paper, which he had in his hand, as he had done from his first coming. The Sheriffs commanded his pockets to be searched, whether he had no bull or pardon about him; but they found in his pockets only some beads and a crucifix, which were taken from him. And then Dr. Sibbald said to him, Come, my lord, leave these, and acknowledge your offence to God, and the world; one drop of the blood of Jesus Christ is able to purge away all the heavy load of blood that is upon you: it is not your Ave Maria’s, nor these things, will do you any good; but it is ‘Agnus Dei qui tollit peccata mundi.’ The lord Macguire seemed not to regard his discourse, but read out of his Paper to the people as followeth.

“Since I am here to die, I desire to depart with a quiet mind, and with the marks of a good Christian; that is, asking forgiveness first of God, and next of the world. And I do forgive (from the bottom of my heart) all my enemies and offenders, even those that have an hand in my death. I die a Roman Catholic, and although I have been a great sinner, yet am I now by God’s grace heartily sorry for all my sins; and I do most confidently trust to be saved (not by my own works, but only) by the passion, merits and mercy of my dear Saviour Jesus Christ, into whose hand I commend my soul.” And, then added, “I beseech you, gentlemen, let me have a little time to say my prayers.”

Sher. Sir, If you answer ingenuously to these questions we shall ask you, you shall have time afterwards: whether do you account the shedding of the Protestant blood to be a sin, or not: and whether do you desire pardon of God for that sin?

Macg. I do desire pardon of God for all my sins: I cannot resolve you in any thing for my part.

Sher. You can tell what your conscience dictates to you: do you think it was a sin, or not?

Macg. For my part I cannot determine it.

Sher. Then now it seems nothing to you to kill so many.

Macg. How do you mean killing of them?

To tell you my mind directly, for the killing I do not know that, but I think the Irish had a just cause for their war.

Sher. Was there any assault made upon you? Had you not entered into a covenant? Had you not engaged by oath yourself to the king?

Macg. For Jesus Christ sake, I beseech you to give me a little time to prepare myself.

Sher. Have pity upon your own soul.

Macg. For God's sake have pity upon me, and let me say my prayers.

Sher. I say the like to you, in relation to your own soul; whether you think the massacre of 30 many thousand Protestants was a good act? For Jesus Christ's sake, have pity upon your own soul.

Macg. Pray let me have a little time to say my prayers.—All this while his eye was mostly upon his papers, mumbling over something out of them to himself. Whereupon one of the sheriffs demanded those papers of him. He flung them down; they were taken up and given to the sheriff. They asked him farther, Whether they were not some agreement with the recusants here in England? Whereunto he answered, I take it upon my death, I do not know that any man knew of it; and after some other such-like talk, the sheriff bidding him prepare for death, he said, I do beseech all the Catholics that are here to pray for me. I beseech God to have mercy upon my soul.—And so was executed.

The ARGUMENT of WILLIAM PRYNN, of Lincoln's-Inn, esq. Hil. 20 CAR. I. Banc. Regis, in the Case of the Lord CONNOR MACGUIRE, Baron of Ineskellin in Ireland, (the chief Contriver of the late Irish Rebellion and Massacre of the Protestant English) against whom he was assigned Counsel by both Houses of Parliament.

This Argument was published by Prynn himself, in a Pamphlet having this Title:

The Subjection of all Traitors, Rebels, as well Peers, as Common in Ireland, to the Laws, Statutes and Trials by Juries, of good and lawful Men of England, in the King's-Bench, at Westminster, for Treasons perpetrated by them in Ireland, or any foreign Country out of the Realm of England.

BEING

An Argument at Law made in the Court of King's-Bench, Hil. 20 Caroli Regis, in the Case of Connor Macquire, an Irish Baron (a principal Contriver of the last Irish Rebellion): Fully proving, That Irish Peers, as well as Commons, may be lawfully tried in this Court in England, by the Statute of 35 H. 8. c. 2, for Treasons committed by them in Ireland, by a Middlesex Jury, and outed of a Trial by Irish Peers: Which was accordingly adjudged, and he thereupon tried, condemned, and executed as a Traitor. Wherein are comprised many other particulars and notable Records, relating to the Laws, Peers, Statutes and Affairs of Ireland, not obvious in our Law Books, and worthy public knowledge.

By WM. PRYNN, esq.

A Bencher of Lincoln's Inn.

Numbers, xxxv. 31, 33.

“Ye shall take no satisfaction for the life of a murderer, which is guilty of death, but he shall be surely put to death. So ye shall not pollute the land wherein you are; for blood defileth the land, and the land cannot be cleansed of the blood that is shed therein, but by the blood of him that shed it.”

Immediately after the Title Page, followed a Preface or Dedication, which seems to merit insertion in this place. It illustrates the temper of its author, and the history of the time; and it furnishes an additional proof of Prynn's industry, learning, and sagacity:

TO THE

Ingenious Readers, especially Professors, Students of the Laws of England and Ireland.

HAVING lately published a much enlarged edition of my plea for the lords and house of peers, wherein the undoubted antient birth-right of all English lords and barons to sit, vote, and judge in all parliaments of England, and their trial by their peers, is irrefragably vindicated by histories and records in all ages, and larger discoveries made of the proceedings and judicature in our parliaments in cases as well of commoners, as peers, than in all former treatises whatsoever; I apprehended it neither unseasonable, nor unprofitable to publish this argument at law, concerning the trial of Irish peers for foreign treasons acted by them, made by me near 14 years past in the King's-bench court at Westminster, in the case of Connor Macquire an Irish baron, there indicted for high treason, in having a principal hand in the late bloody rebellion in Ireland; against whom I was, by special order, assigned counsel, among others, by the parliament then sitting; upon whose plea, and a demurrer thereunto, I first argued this new point in law, never formerly disputed, adjudged in open court; Whether an Irish peer, or commoner, committing treason in Ireland, sent over from thence into England against his will, might be lawfully tried for it in the King's-bench at Westminster by a Middlesex jury, and outed of his trial by Irish peers, of his condition, by the statute of 35 H. 8. c. 2? After two solemn arguments at the bar, by myself, and serj. Rolls against, and Mr. Hales, and Mr. Twisden for the prisoner, and

2 y

Mr. Justice Bacon's argument on the bench, his plea was over-ruled, adjudged against him; it being resolved, he might and ought to be tried only by a jury of Middlesex, not by his peers of Ireland: Whereupon he pleading, Not Guilty, to his indictment, was tried by a substantial jury, to whom he took both his peremptory and legal challenges, which the court allowed him of right, and after a very fair and full trial was found guilty by the jury, upon most pregnant evidence; and then condemned, executed as a traitor at Tyburn, as he well demerited.

The reasons inducing me to publish this argument were:

1. The near affinity and cognation it hath with my plea for the lords.

2. The novelty, rarity of the subject and points debated in it, not formerly discussed at large in our law-books.

3. The generality and public concernment thereof, extending to all Irish subjects, whether peers or commons, and so worthy their knowledge, perusal, and of all public officers in Ireland, especially lawyers.

4. The prevention of mis-reports of this case and argument, in this age, wherein many arguments at law, and reports of cases have been lately published by injudicious hands, mistaking, mangling, or misreciting the reasons, records, law-books cited both at bar and bench, and sometimes the cases, judgments themselves; to the prejudice, seduction of young students of the law, and scandal of the law itself.

5. The impertunity of some friends who formerly desired copies thereof from me, when I had no leisure to furnish them therewith.

6. The vindication, declaration both of the parliaments and King's-bench honourable, respectful, equal, untainted justice against this arch-Irish-Traitor and rebel, and that in these particulars;

1st. In trying this notorious offender, guilty of the horridest, universallest treason and rebellion that ever brake forth in Ireland; and that in a time of open war both in Ireland and England, only by a legal indictment, and indifferent sworn jury of honest and lawful freeholders, according to the known laws and statutes of the realm; not in a court martial, or any other new-minted judicature, by an arbitrary, summary, illegal or martial proceeding, without any lawful presentment, indictment or trial by a sworn, impartial, able jury, resolved, to be diametrically contrary to the fundamental laws, customs, great charters, statutes of the realm, and inherent liberty of the subject, especially in time of peace when all other courts of justice are open, and of very dangerous consequence, and thereupon especially prohibited, enacted against: as you may read at leisure in the statute of 5 R. 2, parl. 1, ch. 5, rot. parl. n. 57, 2 R. 2, rot. parl. n. 57, 1 H. 4, rot. parl. n. 44, 2 H. 4, rot. parl. n. 89. The votes of the house of commons and lords against it, May 7, 1628, the Petition of Right, 3 Caroli, Mr. Cambden's Annals of qu. Elizabeth, p. 242,

243, Coke's 3 Inst. p. 52, 124, and accordingly declared by the commons house in their Remonstrance of the State of the Kingdom, (a) 15 Dec. 1641, and by the whole parliament, and most now in power, in the case of the lord Mount-Norris; whose trial and capital condemnation in a court martial in Ireland by martial law, in time of peace, without a lawful indictment and trial by his peers, in a summary way, by the earl of Strafford's power, then lord deputy of Ireland, was one of the principal charges, (b) evidences against him, to make good his general impeachment of High-Treason, for which he was condemned and beheaded on Tower-hill for a traitor, by judgment and act of parliament; Namely, That he had traitorously endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws and government of the realm, and instead thereof to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government against law; though this lord was not executed or put to death by that sentence against him; Which if executed, had been wilful murder both in his judges and executioners, as sir Edward Coke resolves in his 3 Institutes, p. 52, 124, printed by the house of commons special order; and king Alfred long before him, who hanged up no fewer than 44 of his justices in one year as murderers, for condemning and executing some of his subjects, without a sworn jury of 12 men; and others of them for offences not capital by the known laws, or without pregnant evidence: as Andrew Horn records in his Myrrour des Justices; ch. 5, p. 296, 297, 298; who thence infers; "Abusion est, de la commen ley, que justices et lour ministers que occient la gens per faux jugement, ne sont destruits al foer de autres homicides, que fit le roy Alfred, que fist pendre 44 justices en un an, tant come homicides pur lour faux judgments," which others guilty of the like crimes (especially since these antient and Straffords, Caunterburys, with the Ship-money-judges, late precedents, impeachments, sentences, to the prejudice of the subject's lives, estates,) may do well to ruminute upon.

2dly, In assigning this arch-traitor such learned counsel as he desired, to advise and plead for him in this case of high-treason in all matters of law arising therein; which the parliament likewise allowed to Strafford and Caunterbury, though impeached of high-treason: and therefore cannot in point of justice (c) be denied to any other person or persons in like cases, if desired.

3dly, In admitting him free liberty to put in a plea in writing to the manner of his trial, and to the Jurisdiction of the King's Bench itself (though the highest court of justice (d) in all England but the parliament, and having lawful consance of all sorts of treasons whatsoever) and not peremptory over-ruling, rejecting it forthwith, and giving Judgment against him pro confesso, or as (e) standing mute, for not submitting to its jurisdiction, and a trial by an ordinary Middlesex jury, being a matter of law and right; but permitting, yea ordering his plea upon a demurrer thereunto, to be publicly argued pro et contra at the bar by counsel, and then solemnly argued at the bench by the judge, before it was over-ruled, being a case of general concernment to satisfy him and all the world of the legality and justice of his trial. And then permitting him according to law, to plead not guilty, and put himself upon his trial by his country; not sentencing him to death for treason without any trial or good evidence produced to convict him.

4thly, In allowing him a free honourable trial upon an Indictment, first found upon oath by the grand jury, and then suffering him to take not only his particular challenges by the poll to every of the jurors returned, upon a voyre dire (not formerly heard of, yet allowed him, as reasonable, to take away all colour of partiality or non indifference in the jurors,) whereupon every jury-man was examined before he was sworn of the jury, Whether he had contributed or advanced any monies upon the propositions for Ireland, or was to have any share in the rebels lands in Ireland by act of parliament or otherwise? But likewise in permitting him to take his peremptory challenge to 35 of the 2 juries returned, without any particular cause alledged; which liberty our laws (f) allowing men in favorem vitæ, and because there may be private causes of just exceptions to them known to the prisoner, not fit to be revealed, or for which he wants present proof, and that in cases of high-treason as well as of felony, the court thought just and equal to allow the same to him, though a notorious Irish rebel. Wherefore it ought much more to be allowed to all English freemen less peccant, and not so notoriously guilty as this transcendant traitor; the debarring the party indicted of his lawful challenges, being to debar him of a principal matter concerning his trial, yea a means to take away his life without just cause or guilt; much more than a trial by such jurors, committees, commissioners, or other judges nominated by persons interested, or parties, without the denomination or direction of sworn officers of justice alone, against the course of the common law, as the statute of 11 H. 4, c. 9. and Coke's 3 Instit. p. 32, 33, resolve.

In this argument the readers, especially Irish students of the law, may take notice; first, of some observable passages and records (g) touching the settling of the laws and great charter of England in Ireland, the endenization of Irish natives to make them capable of the laws and liberties of the English there; the statutes, peers of Ireland, and the trial of peers there for treasons, not obvious in other law-books; to which I at first intended to have added an appendix of the most remarkable passages in our histories, and chiefest records in the Tower relating to the sovereign jurisdiction of the kings and parliaments of England over Ireland, and to the parliaments, officers, government, and Affairs thereof, not hitherto published, and unknown to most, of very necessary and excellent use. Which being over-large for an appendix, I must reserve for a particular treatise by themselves; or joined with some other records and histories relating unto Scotland, most worthy of public view, if God send health and opportunity to communicate them to posterity. Only I shall here insert one pertinent record to manifest, that the trying of Irish malefactors in England, the binding them to appear, the recording their defaults and giving judgment against them for not appearing here for murders, robberies, and felonies committed or acted by them in Ireland, is no novelty (having omitted it in my argument) it being in use in the ninth year of king John, as this patent manifests.
