STEEL, stēl, n. any instrument of steel: an instrument of steel for sharpening knives on: extreme hardness: a chalybeate medicine: iron combined with a small portion of carbon. Steel usually contains also small quantities of silicon, phosphorus, manganese, and sulphur, but iron and carbon appear to be its only essential constituents. The relative proportions of iron and carbon vary in steel of different qualities: but in that used for ordinary purposes the carbon amounts from about 0.5 to 1.5 per cent. the toughness, tenacity, and hardness increasing with the increase of the carbon, the elasticity diminishing as the hardness increases, and vice versa. At a red heat steel is malleable and may be welded. The color is a bright grayish white, the texture closely granular, the specific gravity varying from 7.62 to 7.81. Steel formed from bar-iron by cementation is called blistered steel, from its surface acquiring a blistered character in the process. When blistered steel is rolled or beaten down into bars, it is called shear-steel, and if it be melted, cast into ingots, and again rolled out into bars, it forms cast-steel. Natural or German steel is an impure and variable kind of steel procured from cast-iron, or obtained at once from the ore. The natural steel yielded by cast-iron, manufactured in the refining houses, is known by the general name of furnace steel, and that which has only been once treated with a refining furnace is particularly called rough steel. The peculiarity of steel, upon which its high value in the arts in a great measure depends, is its property of becoming hard after being heated to redness and then suddenly cooled by being plunged into cold water, and of being again softened down to any requisite degree by the application of a certain temperature. This process is called tempering. It is found that the higher the temperature to which steel is raised, and the more sudden the cooling, the greater is the hardness; and hence, any degree of hardness can be given to steel which is required for the various purposes to which it is applied. According to the degree of hardness to which steel is tempered it assumes various colors, and formerly these colors served as guides to the workman. Now, however, a thermometer, with a bath of mercury or oil, is employed, and the operation of tempering is performed with a much greater degree of certainty. The uses of steel in forming various kinds of instruments, edge-tools, springs, etc., are well known.—adj. made of steel.—v.t. to overlay or edge with steel: to harden: to make obdurate. -STER, a termination as in maltster, gamester, spinster, songster, denoting occupation. In the earliest times, and up to about the end of the thirteenth century, it was generally the sign of the feminine gender, corresponding to the masculine -ere or -er. In the fourteenth century it began to give place as a feminine termination to the Norman -ess. In modern literary English there is now only one feminine word with this suffix, viz. spinster, but luckster was used very late as a feminine; and in Scotch and Provincial English sewster is still used. When the suffix -ster was felt no longer to mark the feminine distinctively, some new feminines were formed by the addition of the termination -ess to the -ster, as songstress and seamstress. "The suffix -ster now often marks the agent with more or less a sense of contempt and depreciation, as punster, trickster, gamester."—Dr. Morris. "But we cannot recognize the termination -ster as being, or as having been at some time past, a feminine formative in every instance. Not only does the present use of such old words as Baxster, luckster, maltster, songster, Webster, not to urge the more recent oldster, youngster, roadster, make it hard to prove them all feminines; but even if we push our inquiries further back we nowhere find the group clearly defined as such except in modern Dutch. There was in Anglo-Saxon bæccre and bæcistre, and yet Pharaoh's baker in Genesis xl. is bæcistre. Grimm conjectured that these nouns in -estre are all that is left of an older pair of declensions, whereof one was masculine in -estra, the other feminine in -estre."—J. Earle.

[Said to be from the Esterlings or Easterlings, the old popular name in England of traders from the north of Germany (east from England), whose money was of peculiar purity, and who in the reign of King John first stamped pure coin in England. But this origin is doubtful. According to Wedgwood sterling was originally the name of the English penny, the standard

STYLE, stil, n. anything long and pointed, esp. a pointed tool for engraving or writing: (fig.) manner of writing, mode of expressing thought in language: the distinctive manner peculiar to an author: characteristic or peculiar mode of expression and execution (in the fine arts): title: mode of address: practice, esp. in a law-court: manner: form: fashion: the pin of a dial: (bot.) the middle portion of the pistil, between the ovary and the stigma: in chronology, a mode of reckoning time with regard to the Julian and Gregorian calendar. Style is Old or New. The Old Style follows the Julian manner of computing the months and days, in which the year consists of 365 days and 6 hours. This is something more than 11 minutes too much, and in the course of time, between Cæsar and Pope Gregory XIII., this accumulated error amounted to 10 days. Gregory reformed the calendar by retrenching 10 days, and fixing the ordinary length of the civil year at 365 days; and to make up for the odd hours it was ordained that every fourth year (which we call leap-year) should consist of 366 days. But the true length of the solar year is only 365 days 5 hours 48 minutes 51.6 seconds; hence, four solar years would fall short of four years of 365 days 6 hours each, or of four Julian years, three of 365 days and one of 366 days, by 44 minutes 33.6 seconds, and 400 solar years would fall short of 400 Julian years by 74 hours 16 minutes, or by a little more than three days. This error it was ordained should be rectified by omitting three days in three of the four years which completed centuries; or, in other words, that the centuries divisible without remainder by 400, should alone of the centuries be accounted leap-years. Thus 1600, 2000, 2400 would be leap-years, but not 1700, 1800, 1900, 2100, 2200, 2300. This mode of correcting the calendar has been adopted at different times in almost all civilized nations with the exception of Russia and those countries where the Greek Church is predominant, which still adhere to the Old Style. In England the Gregorian or New Style was adopted by act of parliament in 1752, and as one of the years concluding a century in which the additional or intercalary day was to be omitted (the year 1700) had elapsed since the correction by Pope Gregory, it was necessary to omit 11 instead of 10 days in the current year. Accordingly 11 days in September, 1752, were retrenched, and the 3d day was reckoned the 14th. The difference between the Old and New Styles is now 12 days. All dates in U.S. history previous to 1752, may, therefore, be given in either Old or New Style.—v.t. to entitle in addressing or speaking of: to name or designate. They maintain that the sacred Scriptures contain three distinct senses, called celestial, spiritual, and natural, which are united by correspondences, and are accommodated respectively to particular classes, both of men and angels. They hold that there have been various general judgments ending particular dispensations of divine revelation. The last was in 1757, when Swedenborg received the office of teaching the doctrines of the new church promised in the Apocalypse. All parts of the plant, but especially the perennial rhizome (known as calamus-root), have a strong aromatic and slightly acrid taste; and hence the rhizome is used in medicine as a stimulant and tonic in some kinds of indigestion, and it is said to be useful in ague. (Rare): a reel or turning instrument for winding yarn: the common name of birds of the genus Cypselus, family Cypselidae. They have an outward resemblance to the swallows, but differ much from them in various structural points. The common swift

(C. apus) has the greatest powers of flight of any bird that visits Britain. Its color is in general a sombre or sooty black, with a grayish-white patch under the chin. The beak is black, shorter than that of the swallow, and without the lateral bristles. The wings are even longer than those of the swallow, and are sickle-shaped. The tarsi are short, and feathered to the toes, which are all directed forwards. The swifts pass most of their time in the air, where they pursue their insect prey. Their flight is swift and shooting, and their scream very different from the twittering of the swallow. They build their nests in holes in the walls of houses, in rocks, and sometimes in hollow trees. The swift reaches its summer quarters later, and leaves earlier than the swallows. Another species, the white-bellied or Alpine swift (C. alpinus), is known in Gt. Britain, but it is only a rare straggler. The weight of the swift is most disproportionately small to its extent of wing, the former being scarcely an ounce, the latter 18 inches, the length of the body being near 8 inches. The swift is widely spread through Europe, Asia, and Africa. The American swift (Chaetura pelagica) is smaller, has the hind-toe directed backwards, and the tail-feathers stiff as in woodpeckers. It is commonly called the chimney swallow: the common newt or eft, a species of lizard.

TANNING, tan'ing, n. the practice, operation, and art of converting the raw hides and skins of animals into leather by effecting a chemical combination between the gelatine of which they principally consist and the astringent vegetable principle called tannic acid or tannin. The object of the tanning process is to produce such a chemical change in skins as may render them unalterable by those agents which tend to decompose them in their natural state, and in connection with the subsequent operations of currying or dressing to bring them into a state of pliability and impermeability to water which may adapt them for the many useful purposes to which leather is applied. The larger and heavier skins subjected to the tanning process, as those of buffaloes, bulls, oxen, and cows, are technically called hides: while those of smaller animals, as calves, sheep, and goats, are called skins. After being cleared of the hair, wool, and fleshy parts, by the aid of lime, scraping, and other means, the skins are usually steeped in an infusion of ground oak bark, which supplies the astringent or tanning principle, and thus converts them into leather. Different tanners, however, vary much in the mode of conducting the process of tanning, and also the skins intended for different kinds of leather require to be treated differently. Various improvements have been made in the process of tanning, by which time and labor are much reduced; but it is found that the slow process followed by the old tanners produces leather far superior to that produced by quick processes.

TANSY, tan'zi, n. a bitter, aromatic plant, with small yellow flowers, common on old pasture, also a pudding or cake flavored with it. [Lit. "the immortal plant," Fr. танаисте, through late L., from Gr. athanasia, immortality.]

The siphon is concealed within the figure of a man, whose chin is on a level with the bend of the siphon. Hence, as soon as the water rises up to the chin of the image it begins to subside, so that the figure, like Tantalus in the fable, is unable to quench his thirst. [The name was given because from their voracity these birds seem never to have enough.]

TANTAMOUNT, tan'ta-mownt, adj. equivalent, as in value, force, effect, or signification: as, silence is sometimes tantamount to consent. Short lengths of thread of the special colors required for the design are worked in at the necessary places and fastened at the back of the texture. The term tapestry is also applied to a variety of woven fabrics having a multiplicity of colors in their design, which, however, have no other characteristic of true tapestry.—TAPESTRY CARPET, the name given to a very elegant and cheap two-ply or ingrain carpet, the warp or weft being printed before weaving so as to produce the figure in the cloth. TAR, tãr, n. a thick, dark-colored, viscid product obtained by the destructive distillation of organic substances and bituminous minerals, as wood, coal, peat, shale, etc. Wood-tar, such as the Archangel, Stockholm, and American tars of commerce, is generally prepared by a very rude process. A conical cavity is dug in the ground, with a cast-iron pan at the bottom, from which leads a funnel. Billets of wood (such as pine or fir) are thrown into this cavity, and being covered with turf are slowly burned without flame. The tar which exudes during combustion is conducted off through the funnel. In England wood-tar is chiefly obtained as a by-product in the destructive distillation of wood for the manufacture of wood-vinegar (pyroligneous acid) and wood-spirit (methyl alcohol). It has an acid reaction, and contains various liquid matters of which the principal are methyl-acetate, acetone, hydrocarbons of the benzene series, and a number of oxidized compounds, as carbolic acid. Paraffin, anthracene, naphthalene, chrysene, etc., are found among its solid products. It possesses valuable antiseptic properties, owing to the creasote it contains, and is used extensively for coating and preserving timber and iron in exposed situations, and for impregnating ships' ropes and cordage. Coal-tar is also extensively obtained in the process of gas manufacture. It is a very valuable substance, in as much as the compounds obtained from it form the starting-points in so many chemical manufactures: a sailor is called a tar from his tarred clothes, hands, etc. "Hearts of oak are our ships, jolly tars are our men."—Sea song.

of the Christian era. The most ancient and valuable of the extant Targums are those ascribed to or called after Onkelos and Jonathan Ben Uzziel. race was devastating Eastern Europe, news of their ravages were brought to the pious king, who exclaimed thereupon with horror, "Well may they be called Tartars, for their deeds are those of fiends from Tartarus." TASIMETER, ta-zim'e-ter, n. an instrument invented by Mr. Edison for measuring extremely slight variations of pressure, and by means of these other variations, such as those of temperature, moisture, etc. It depends on the fact that a piece of carbon introduced into the course of an electric current offers a resistance to the passage of the current, which diminishes in a very marked degree in proportion to the amount of pressure exerted on the carbon. A small disc of carbon and another of vulcanite are held together between two platinum buttons, which may be brought into connection with a galvanic battery, and a strip of some substance like gelatine, which contracts and expands with great readiness, is so placed that by its variations in magnitude it varies the pressure on one of the platinum buttons, and hence on the carbon disc. The variations thus produced in the force of the electric current are measured by a very delicate galvanometer, which is also placed in the circuit. So delicate is the instrument that the heat of the hand held a few inches off causes a deflection of the needle; while by a slight alteration in form the weight and vital heat of the minutest insect may be determined. [Gr. tasis, a stretching, tension, from temō, to stretch, and metron, a measure.]

This practice is very prevalent among the South Sea Islanders, among whom are used instruments edged with small teeth, somewhat resembling those of a fine comb. These are applied to the skin, and being repeatedly struck with a small mallet the teeth make the incisions required, while the coloring tincture is introduced at the same time. Degrees of rank are indicated by the greater or less surface of tattooed skin. Sometimes the whole body, the face not excepted, is tattooed, as among the New Zealanders.

[From St. Audrey, otherwise called St. Etheldreda, at whose fair, held in the isle of Ely, laces and cheap gay ornaments are said to have been sold. In this way tawdry would have meant originally showy, like things bought at St. Audrey's fair. But more probably the original notion was showy, like the necklaces that St. Audrey used to wear, the application coming from the legend which says she died of a swelling in the throat, an ailment that she recognized as a judgment for having been fond of wearing fine necklaces in her youth. According to the latter supposition the adjective would come from the noun tawdry as the name of a kind of necklace.—TAWDRY-LACE, a kind of necklace or girdle.]

TAXACEÆ, taks'a-së-ë, n.pl. a sub-order of Conifereæ, sometimes regarded as a distinct order, comprising trees or shrubs which inhabit chiefly the temperate parts of Europe, Asia, Africa, and America. They have a woody tissue marked with circular discs, with evergreen, and mostly narrow, rigid, entire, and veinless leaves, and are distinguished from the Cupressineæ by the succulent cup which surrounds their seeds. The order yields trees which are valued for their timber, and, like the Conifereæ, possess resinous properties.

TAXEL, tak'sel, n. the American badger (Meles Labradorica), at first regarded as a variety of the European badger, but now found to differ so considerably that it has been thought by some naturalists worthy of being raised into a distinct genus, Taxidea. Its teeth are of a more carnivorous character than those of the true badger, and it preys on such small animals as marmots, which it pursues into their holes, frequently enlarging them so as to make the ground dangerous for horses. Its burrowing powers are remarkable, its hole being 6 or 7 feet deep, and running underground to a length of 30 feet. Though termed Labradorica it is not found in Labrador, but abounds in the sandy plains near the Missouri and Rocky Mountains. Its hair changes from yellowish-brown in summer to hoary-gray in winter, becoming longer and more woolly.

It is a word of Anglo-Indian importation, viz. tipāi, an Urdu or Anglo-Indian corruption of the Pers. sipai, tripos (perhaps to avoid confusion with seapoy), and meaning a three-legged table, or tripod generally."—H. Yule.

TEAR, tēr, n. a drop or small quantity of the limpid fluid secreted by the lachrymal gland, and appearing in the eyes or flowing from them. The lachrymal fluid serves to moisten the cornea and preserve its transparency, and to remove any dust or fine substance that enters the eye and gives pain. The normally secreted fluid, after performing its ordinary functions, passes through the lachrymal ducts and sac into the nasal channels. Moral and physical causes, however, as strong passion (grief, sorrow, joy), uncontrollable laughter, pain, esp. in the eye itself, increase the secretion considerably, and when the lachrymal duct does not suffice to carry it off it runs over the eyelids. Tears are a little heavier than water; they have a saline taste, and an alkaline reactivity, owing to the presence of free soda.

TEASEL, TEAZEL, tēz'l, n. the English name of several plants of the genus Dipsacns, nat. order Dipsacæ. The fuller's thistle (D. Fullonum) is allied to the teasel (D. sylvestris) which grows wild in hedges. It is cultivated, in those districts of England where cloth is manufactured, for the sake of the awns of the head, which are employed to raise the nap of woollen cloths. For this purpose the heads are fixed round the circumference of a large broad wheel or drum so as to form a kind of brush. The wheel is made to turn round while the cloth is held against the brush thus formed, and the fine hooked awn of the teasel readily insinuates itself into the web, and draws out with it some of the fine fibres of the wool. These are afterwards shorn smooth, and leave the cloth with the fine velvet-like nap which is its peculiar appearance: the burr of the plant: any contrivance used as a substitute for teasels in the dressing of woollen cloth. TELEOLOGIST, tel-e-o-loj'ist, n. one versed in teleology: one who investigates the final cause or purpose of phenomena, or the end for which each has been produced. "It is a relief to us . . . to fall back on the more sober arguments of the teleologists, who, no doubt, cannot prove from the works of creation infinite wisdom, goodness, and power, but do prove an amount of wisdom, goodness, and power which satisfies the mind. Take for instance the . . . volume of Sir Charles Bell on 'the Hand,' and say whether it is possible to follow him through the niceties and beauty of adaptation which he demonstrates without acknowledging an inconceivable amount of ingenious contrivance and benevolent design."—Ed. Rev. "While the explanation of the teleologist is untrue, it is often an obverse to the truth; for though, on the hypothesis of evolution, it is clear that things are not arranged thus or thus for the securing of special ends, it is also clear that arrangements which do secure these special ends tend continually to establish themselves—are established by the fulfillment of these ends."—H. Spencer.

TELEPHONE, tel'e-fōn, n. in a general sense, any instrument or apparatus which transmits sound beyond its natural limits of audibility; thus the speaking-tube so much used in conveying the sound of the voice from one room to another in large buildings, or a stretched cord or wire attached to vibrating membranes or discs, constitutes virtually a telephone. But the name is generally restricted to an instrument transmitting sound by means of electricity and telegraph wires. About the year 1860 the idea that sound-producing vibrations could be transmitted through a wire by means of electricity began to be recognized by several men of science. Reis of Frankfort invented an apparatus which could reproduce at a distant station the pitch of a musical sound by means of a discontinuous current along a telegraph wire. A great step in advance was made in 1876 when Prof. Graham Bell, a Scotchman resident in this country, discovered an articulating telephone which depends upon the principle of the undulating current, and by means of which the very quality of a note, and therefore conversation itself, could be reproduced at a distant station. Several varieties of telephonic apparatus are now in everyday use for intercommunication between distant places. [Gr. tēle, at a distance, and phōnē, sound.]

intoxicating liquors. As the most strict-applied to, or assumed by, associations originated with some persons who, in 1118, devoted themselves to the service of God, promising to live in perpetual chastity, obedience, and poverty, after the manner of canons. Baldwin II., king of Jerusalem, bestowed on them their first place of residence in the city, close to the Temple, and an additional building was acquired from the abbot and canons of the church and convent of the Temple, whence the order received the name of the "poor soldiers of the Temple," afterwards converted into Templars, or Knights Templars. The knights wore a white cloak adorned with a red cross of eight points (the Maltese cross) on the left shoulder. In 1228 this order was confirmed in the Council of Troyes, and sub-

THERMOMETER, ther-mom'et-er, n. an instrument by which the temperatures of bodies are ascertained; founded on the property which heat possesses of expanding all bodies, the rate or quantity of expansion being supposed proportional to the degree of heat applied, and hence indicating that degree. The thermometer consists of a slender glass tube, with a small bore, containing in general mercury or alcohol, which expanding or contracting by variations in the temperature of the atmosphere, or on the instrument being brought into contact with any other body, or immersed in a liquid or gas which is to be examined, the state of the atmosphere, the body, liquid, or gas, with regard to heat, is indicated by a scale either applied to the tube or engraved on its exterior surface. The ordinary thermometer consists of a small tube, terminating in a ball containing mercury, the air having been expelled and the tube hermetically sealed. There are two points on the scale, corresponding to fixed and determinate temperatures, one, namely, to the temperature of freezing water, and the other to that of boiling water. In the thermometer commonly used in this country, that of Fahrenheit, the former point is marked 32° and the latter 212°; hence the zero of the scale, or that part marked 0°, is 32° below the freezing-point, and the interval or space between the freezing and boiling points consists of 180°. The zero point is supposed to have been fixed by Fahrenheit at the point of greatest cold that he had observed, probably by means of a freezing-mixture such as snow and salt. On the Continent, particularly in France, and nowadays in all scientific investigations, the Centigrade thermometer is used. The space between the freezing and boiling points of water is divided into 100 equal parts or degrees, the zero being at freezing and the boiling-point at 100°. Réaumur's thermometer, which is in use in Germany, has the space between the freezing and boiling points divided into 80 equal parts, the zero being at freezing. For extreme degrees of cold, thermometers filled with spirit of wine must be employed, as no degree of cold known is capable of freezing that liquid, whereas mercury freezes at about 39° below zero on the Fahrenheit scale. On the other hand, spirit of wine is not adapted to high temperatures, as it is soon converted into vapor, whereas mercury does not boil till its temperature is raised to 660° F. Mercury is most commonly used for thermometers employed for indicating all ordinary temperatures. For recording extremely high temperatures the pyrometer is used; and for indicating very slight variations the thermo-electric battery is employed. [Gr. thermos, warm, from thermē, heat, and metron, measure.]

In tropical countries it is planted, for the sake of its shade, about monasteries and convents, and hence it is looked upon with a sort of religious regard. Its wood is

When these undulations reach and act on the nerves of our retina, they produce in us the sensation of light. The only other theory of light which can be opposed to this, and which is variously called the corpuseular, emission, or material theory, supposes light to consist of material particles, emitted from the source, and projected in straight lines in all directions with a velocity which continues uniform at all distances, and is the same for all intensities. It would seem that every phenomenon which can be brought under the corpuscular theory can with equal facility be explained by the undulatory theory: while there are some known effects, as the phenomena of reflection and refraction, in strict accordance with the principles of the latter, which cannot, without great difficulty and the introduction of gratuitous suppositions, be accounted for by the corpuscular theory. The undulatory theory is therefore now generally adopted by physicists.

WASSAIL-BOWL, wos'sel-bōl, n. a large bowl in which wassail was mixed and placed on the table before a festive company. It was an old custom to go about with such a bowl, containing the liquor called wassail, at the time of the New Year, etc., singing a festival song, and drinking the health of the inhabitants, and collecting money to replenish the bowl. In some parts of England the wassail bowl still appears at Christmas. " When the cloth was removed the butler brought in a huge silver vessel. . . . Its appearance was hailed with acclamation, being the wassail-bowl so renowned in Christmas festivity."—W. Irving.

WATCH, woch, n. act of looking out : close observation : guard : one who watches or those who watch : a sentry : the place where a guard is kept : time of watching, esp. in a ship : a division of the night : a pocket timepiece. The essential parts of a watch are the dial on which the hours, minutes, and seconds are marked, the hands which move round the dial pointing to these divisions, the train of wheels which carry round the hands, etc., the balance which regulates the motion of the wheels, and the coiled spring (the mainspring), whose elastic force produces the motion of the whole machinery, the movement being inclosed in a protecting case usually of gold or silver.—A repeating watch or repeater has in addition a small bell, gong, or other sounding object on which the hours, half-hours, quarters, etc., are struck on the compression of a spring. A chronometer watch or pocket chronometer is one of the finest kinds of watches fitted with a compensation balance and other devices which prevent the variations of temperature from affecting the regular movement of the watch. Watches were invented at Nuremberg about the beginning of the sixteenth century, and for a long time the wearing of a watch was considered in some degree a mark or proof of gentility. Thus Malvolio remarks in anticipation of his great fortune. " I frown the while ; and perchance wind up my watch, or play with my—some rich jewel."—Shak. [A.S. wacce ; conn. with WAKE.]

In the following passage from the second part of Henry IV., iii. 1, some commentators define watch-case as the case or box of a watch (watchman) or sentry ; others as the case or framework of a watch or clock within which continual restless motion is kept up.

WATER, waw'ter, n. the fluid which forms the ocean, lakes, and rivers : any collection of it, as the ocean, a lake, river, etc. : urine : lustre of a diamond. Water, when pure, is transparent, inodorous, tasteless ; a powerful refractor of light, an imperfect conductor of heat and electricity ; it is very slightly compressible, its absolute diminution for a pressure of one atmosphere being only about 51.3 millionths of its bulk. Although water is colorless in small quantities, it is blue like the atmosphere when viewed in mass. It assumes the solid form, that of ice or snow, at 32° F., and all lower temperatures ; and it takes the form of vapor or steam at 212° F. under a pressure of 29.9 ins. of mercury, and retains that form at all higher temperatures. Under ordinary conditions water possesses the liquid form only at temperatures lying between 32° and 212°. It is, however, possible to cool water very considerably below 32° F. and yet maintain it in the liquid form ; the vessel containing the water must be perfectly clean, and the water must be maintained in a state of perfect rest.

Water may also be heated, under pressure, many degrees above 212° F. without passing into the state of steam. The specific gravity of water is 1 at 39° 2 F., being the unit to which the specific gravities of all solids and liquids are referred, as a convenient standard, on account of the facility with which it is obtained in a pure state ; one cubic inch of water at 62° F., and 29.9 inches, barometrical pressure, weighs 252.458 grains. Distilled water is 815 times heavier than atmospheric air. Water is at its greatest density at 39° 2 F. (= 4° C.), and in this respect it presents a singular exception to the general law of expansion by heat. If water at 39° 2 F. be cooled, it expands as it cools till reduced to 32°, when it solidifies ; and if water at 39° 2 F. be heated, it expands as the temperature increases in accordance with the general law. In a chemical point of view water exhibits in itself neither acid nor basic properties ; but it combines with both acids and bases forming hydrates ; it also combines with neutral salts. Water also enters, as a liquid, into a peculiar kind of combination with the greater number of all known substances. Of all liquids water is the most powerful and general solvent, and on this important property its use depends. Without water not only the operations of the chemist but the processes of animal and vegetable life would come to a stand. In consequence of the great solvent power of water it is never found pure in nature. Even in rain-water, which is the purest, there are always traces of carbonic acid, ammonia, and sea-salt. Where the rain water has filtered through rocks and soils, and reappears as spring or river-water, it is always more or less charged with salts derived from the earth, such as sea-salt, gypsum and chalk. When the proportion of these is small the water is called soft, when larger it is called hard water. The former dissolves soap better, and is therefore preferred for washing ; the latter is often pleasanter to drink. The only way to obtain perfectly pure water is to distil it. Distilled water is preserved in clean well stopped bottles, and used in chemical operations. Water is repositied in the earth in inexhaustible quantities, where it is preserved fresh and cool, and from which it issues in springs, which form streams and rivers. But the great reservoirs of water on the globe are the ocean, seas, and lakes, which cover more than three-fifths of its surface, and from which it is raised by evaporation, and, uniting with the air in the state of vapor, is wafted over the earth ready to be precipitated in the form of rain, snow, or hail. Water is a compound substance, consisting of hydrogen and oxygen, in the proportion of 2 volumes of the former gas to 1 volume of the latter ; or by weight it is composed of 2 parts of hydrogen united with 16 parts of oxygen.—v. t. to wet, overflow, or supply with water : to wet and press so as to give a wavy appearance to.—v. i. to shed water : to take in water. [A.S. water ; Dut. water, Ger. wasser ; Gr. hydōr, L. udus, wet, unda, a wave, Sans. uda, water ; conn. with WET.]

This quantity is 500 cubic feet very nearly.

WATER-SPOUT, waw'ter-spōwt, n. a remarkable meteorological phenomenon frequently observed at sea, and exactly analogous to the whirlwinds experienced on land. It occurs when opposite winds of different temperatures meet in the upper atmosphere, whereby a great amount of vapor is condensed into a thick black cloud, to which a vertical motion is given. This vertical motion causes it to take the form of a vast funnel, which, descending near the surface of the sea, draws up the water in its vortex, which joins in its whirling motion. The whole column, which after the junction extends from the sea to the clouds, assumes a magnificent appearance, being of a light color near its axis, but dark along the sides. When acted on by the wind the column assumes a position oblique to the horizon, but in calm weather it maintains its vertical position, while at the same time it is carried along the surface of the sea. Sometimes the upper and lower parts move with different velocities, causing the parts to separate from each other, often with a loud report. The whole of the vapor is at length absorbed in the air, or it descends to the sea in a heavy shower of rain. Sudden gusts of wind, from all points of the compass, are very common in the vicinity of water-spouts. What are sometimes called water-spouts on land are merely heavy falls of rain of a very local character, and may or may not be accompanied with whirling winds. They occur generally during thunder-storms, and differ only from severe hail-storms in point of temperature.

It grows to the height of 180 feet. The trunk is marked by rings, caused by the falling off of the leaves, which are 18 to 20 feet long, and is covered with a thick secretion, consisting of two-thirds resin and one-third wax. This substance is also exuded from the leaves, is whitish, almost inodorous, except when heated, when it gives out a resinous odor. In the region in which it grows the wax, usually mixed with bees'-wax and tallow, is made into candles. The only other palm which exudes wax, and that in a sort of scales from the palmate leaves, is the Carnauba palm, found plentifully in Brazil.

Both pronouns thus used may be translated by the French on and the German man; as we (or they) say—on dit, man sagt.

(Vice) seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.—Pope,

Everybody—nobody. They! They is a regular scandal-monger, an unknown, unacknowledged, unseen, unanswered, unauthorized creation quoted on all occasions."—Mrs. S. C. Hall. We is frequently used by individuals, as editors, authors, and the like, when alluding to themselves, in order to avoid the appearance of egotism which it is assumed would result from the frequent use of the pronoun I, though it is an open question whether or not we is any less egotistic than I, in authorship. The plural style is also used by kings and other potentates, and is said to have been first used in his edicts by King John of England, according to others by Richard I. The French and German sovereigns followed the example about the beginning of the thirteenth century.

We charge you, on allegiance to ourselves,

The initial w or v is supposed to represent m of the old radical ma, me, I, and the suffix s (Ger. old to be a relic of an old demonstrative smā joined to the first pronoun. Originally, therefore, wē=ma-smā=I+that (or he).]

Hence the exclamation of Falstaff." "I would I were a weaver! I could sing psalms, and all manner of songs."—Nares: the name Weaver-Bird is given to insessorial birds of various genera. They are so called from the remarkable structure of their nests, which are woven in a very wonderful manner of various vegetable substances. Some species build their nests separate and singly, and hang them from slender branches of trees and shrubs, but others build in companies, numerous nests suspended from the branches of a tree being under one roof, though each one forms a separate compartment and has a separate entrance. They are natives of the warmer parts of Asia, of Africa, and of Australia, none being found in Europe or America. Weaving is performed by the hand in what are called hand-looms, or by steam in what are called power-looms, but the general arrangements for both are to a certain extent the same. The origin of the usage is not clear, but perhaps the whetstone was regarded as to be used for sharpening the wits. "This will explain a smart repartee of Sir

Francis Bacon's before King James, to whom Sir Kenelm Digby was relating, that he had seen the true philosopher's stone in the possession of a hermit in Italy, and when the king was very curious to understand what sort of stone it was, and Sir Kenelm much puzzled in describing it, Sir Fra. Sometimes equivalent to "a thing or circumstance which," the relative clause preceding that which is referred to.

And, which was strange, the one so like the other
As could not be distinguished but by name.
—Shak.

Used adjectively or with a noun subjoined, the relative coming before the noun by an inversion which gives a certain brevity.

Refusing her grand hests, she did confine thee
Into a cloven pine: within which rift
Imprison'd thou didst painfully remain
A dozen years; within which space she died.
—Shak.

Which is used as an indefinite pronoun, standing for whichever, any one which, that which, those which, and the like; as, take which you will. —Which was often formerly preceded by the definite article the. "That worthy name by the which ye are called."—James ii. 7.

The party 'gainst the which he doth contrive Shall seize one half his goods.—Shak.

It was formerly often followed by that or as, having the effect of giving emphasis or definiteness. "This abbot which that was an holy man."—Chaucer. —

WHICH IS WHICH? which is the one, which the other? a common phrase implying inability to distinguish between two. [A.S. hwic, hwyle, contr. from hwite, lit. why-like, from hwit, instrumental case of whā, who, whet, what, and lic, like: similar are O. The meaning of flog comes from the noun, and the noun has probably got it from the resemblance of a whip to a swipe. Perhaps more than one word may be mixed up under this form; cf. W. chwip, a quick turn; chwipiau, to move briskly.]

WHIP, hwip, v.i. to move nimbly: to start suddenly and run: or to turn and run: as, the boy whipped away in an instant; he whipped round the corner.

WHIRLPOOL, hwerl'-pööl, n. a circular eddy or current in a river or the sea produced by the configuration of the channel, by meeting currents, by winds meeting tides, etc. The celebrated whirlpool of Charybdis between Sicily and Italy, and of the Malström, off the coast of Norway, are not whirlpools in the strict sense, but merely superficial commotions created by winds meeting tides, and in calm weather are free from all danger. Instances of vortical motion, however, do occur, as in the whirlpool of Corrievrekin in the Hebrides, between Jura and Scarba, and in some eddies among the Orkneys.

WHIRL-PUFF, hwerl'-puf, n. a whirlwind. Holland.

WHIRLWIND, hwerl'wind, n. a violent wind moving in a circle, or rather in a spiral form, as if moving round an axis, this axis having at the same time a progressive motion, rectilinear or curvilinear, on the surface of the land or sea. Whirlwinds are produced chiefly by the meeting of currents of air which run in different directions. When they occur on land they give a whirling motion to dust, sand, part of a cloud, and sometimes even to bodies of great weight and bulk, carrying them either upwards or downwards, and scattering them about in all directions. At sea they often give rise to waterspouts. They are most frequent and violent in tropical countries, where the thermal states of the atmosphere are most favorable for their production.

WHISK, hwisk, v. t. to move with a quick motion: to sweep or stir rapidly.—v. i. to move nimbly and rapidly.—n. a rapid sweeping motion: a small bunch of anything used for a brush: a small instrument for beating or whisking, esp. eggs. WHISKY, WHISKEY, hwisk'i, n. an ardent spirit distilled generally from barley, but sometimes from wheat, rye, sugar, molasses, etc. There are two chief varieties of whisky—viz. malt-whisky and grain-whisky. The former variety is of finer quality, and made chiefly from malted barley or bere, and sometimes, though rarely, from rye. The latter is made from various substances, as sugar, molasses, potatoes, but principally from unmalted grain, as Indian corn, barley, oats, etc., dried and ground up. The grain most largely used is Indian corn. Grain-whisky requires the same process of fermentation and distillation as malt-whisky, but is cheaper, from its greater yield, and because it saves the expensive process of malting. Though coarser it is stronger, but if kept long enough is equally free from fusel oil. [Ir. and Gael. uisge, water, uisge-beatha, whisky, usquebaugh, lit. water of life. WHISKY, therefore, means simply water, the latter part of the name being dropped.]

WHISKY-JACK, hwisk'i-jak, n. the familiar name of a species of jay common in North America. It is the Garrulus canadensis.

WHISPER, hwis'per, v. i. to speak with a low sound: to speak very softly: to plot secretly.—v. t. to utter in a low voice or under the breath.—n. a low, hissing voice or sound: cautious or timorous speaking. WHISPERER, hwis'per-er, n. one who whispers: (B.) a secret informer.

WHISPERHOOD, hwis'per-hood, n. the state of being a whisper: the initial condition of a rumor, that is, the time when it was only whispered or insinuated. "I know a lie, that now disturbed half the kingdom with its noise, which although too proud and great at present to own its parents, I can remember its whisperhood."—Swift. [Probably used only this once.]

WHISPERING, hwis'per-ing, p. and adj. speaking in a whisper; "For talking age and whispering lovers."—Goldsmith: making secret insinuations of evil; evil-speaking; backbiting;

—Coleridge:

making a low, sibilant sound;

As once we met
Unheeded, tho' beneath the whispering rain.
—Tennyson.

—WHISPERING GALLERY or DOME, a gallery or dome in which the sound of words uttered in a low voice or whisper is communicated to a greater distance than under any ordinary circumstances. Thus in an elliptical chamber, if a person standing in one of the foci speak in a whisper he will be heard distinctly by a person standing in the other focus, although the same sound would not be audible at the same distance under any other circumstances or at any other place in the chamber. The reason is that the sounds produced in one of the foci of such a chamber strike upon the wall all round, and, from the nature of the ellipse, are all reflected to the other focus. This serves in some measure to explain the effects of whispering galleries and domes in general.

WHIST, hwist, interj. silence! hush! be still!

WHIST, hwist, adj. not speaking: not making a noise: silent: mute: still—chiefly used predicatively. "So whist and dead a silence reigned."—Harrington. "Far from the town where all is whist and still."—Marlow.

The winds with wonder whist
Smoothly the waters kiss'd.—Milton.

WHIST, hwist, n. a well-known game at cards, said to be so called because the parties playing it have to be whist or silent, but this is doubtful. Another name was whisk. The game is played with the full pack of fifty-two cards by four persons, two being partners against the other two, each player receiving thirteen cards dealt out one by one in rotation. The last card dealt is turned face up, and is called the trump card; it gives a special power to the suit to which it belongs. The cards rank as follows: ace (highest), king, queen, knave, and the others according to their number of pips. Play is commenced by the person on the left hand of the dealer laying down a card face up on the table, the other players following in succession with cards of the same suit if they have them. When all have played the player who has laid the highest card takes the four cards laid down, which constitute a trick. The winner of the trick then leads, as the first of a new trick, the winner of which becomes the leader, and so on. When a player cannot play a card of the same suit, he may play one of the trump suit, and take the trick, or lay one of a different suit, which gives him no chance of winning the trick. When the hand is played out the score is taken as follows: the partners who conjointly gain the majority of tricks score one point for every trick taken above six. The ace, king, queen, and knave of the trump suit are called honors, and count one each for the side who holds them; if one side hold three honors, they count two by honors, as the opposite side can have but one; if one side hold all the honors, four by honors is counted; should the honors be equally divided neither side counts, the honors being then said to cancel each other.

WHISTLE, hwis'l, v. i. to make a shrill sound by forcing the breath through the lips contracted: to make a like sound with an instrument: to sound shrill.—v. t. to form or utter by whistling: to call by a whistle.—n. the sound made in whistling: a small wind instrument. Generally used in such phrases as to show the white-feather, to have a white-feather in one's wing—to show cowardice, to behave like a coward. "He has a white-feather in his wing this same Westburnflat after a'," said Simon of Hackburn, somewhat scandalized by his ready surrender. "He'll ne'er fill his father's boots."—Sir W. Scott.

WHITLOW, hwit'lō, n. in surg. paronychia, a swelling or inflammation about the nails or ends of the fingers, or affecting one or more of the phalanges of the fingers, generally terminating in an abscess. There are four or five varieties of this swelling, according to the texture primarily attacked. Should the skin be the primary seat of the inflammation vesicles appear, which soon discharge pus, giving rapid relief; should the cellular or connective tissue beneath the skin or under the nail be affected, there is a painful feeling of tenseness and throbbing of the part, often accompanied by febrile disturbance until pus can be evacuated, which should be done by incision as soon as the presence and seat of the disease has been discovered. The most dangerous form of whitlow occurs, however, when the tendons and their sheaths or the periosteum are affected; in this form suppuration may extend above the wrist, and may occasion the loss of the finger, the hand, and may seriously, in some rare cases fatally, affect the health of the patient: an inflammatory disease of the feet in sheep; it occurs round the hoof, where an acrid matter is collected, which ought to be discharged. WHIZZ'INGLY. [Imitative: cf. WHEEZE, WHIST, and HISS.]

WHO, hōō, pron. both rel. and interrog., always for persons: what person? which person.—WHO, WHICH, THAT. These agree in being relatives, who being used for persons, which for things, and that being used indifferently for either. Who and which have well-defined different uses: (a) they connect two co-ordinate sentences; as, I met a policeman who showed me the way; I studied geometry which I found useful. Each of these sentences could be turned into two propositions grammatically, as well as logically, independent: I met a policeman and he showed me the way; I studied geometry and it I found useful. Another use of the same nature is when the second clause is of the kind termed adverbial, where we may still resolve who and which into a personal or demonstrative pronoun and a conjunction: as, why should we condemn James who (for he, seeing that he) is innocent? why should we study phrenology which (seeing that it) is profitless? (b) They are often used to introduce subordinate or adjectival clauses, which serve to define or explain a noun regarding which a statement is made in the principal clause: as, I saw the man who first taught me to swim; the house which he built still stands. Now, in these latter uses, who and which cannot be turned into and he, and it. The following sentence, standing alone, is ambiguous: "I re-read the book which gave me much pleasure." This may mean either that the re-reading gave much pleasure, and in that case the sentence consists of two co-ordinate sentences and belongs to section (a), or it may mean I re-read the book which when formerly read gave me much pleasure. In the latter case the second clause limits or explains the object of the first and belongs to section (b). To remove such ambiguity, and the unpleasant effect arising from the too frequent use of who and which, it has been proposed by some grammarians (especially Professor Bain) always to employ that and not who or which, when the relative is used to introduce a restrictive or adjectival clause, and instead of saying "the man who hath no music in himself . . . is fit for treasons, etc.," "they are the books . . . which nourish all the world," to say, as Shakespeare says, "the man that hath, etc.," "they are the books . . . that nourish, etc.," reserving who and which for such cases as are noticed under section (a). [A.S. hwa; cog. with Goth. hwa-s, Ice. hver, Ger. ver; also with Sans. kās, Gr. pos, L. quis.]

The widgeons are migratory birds which breed occasionally in the most northern parts of Scotland, but the ordinary breeding place is in more northern regions, which they quit on the approach of winter, and journey southward. They are very numerous in the British Islands during the winter, where they spread themselves along the shores and over the marshes and lakes. They feed on aquatic plants, and on grass like the geese. They have always been in request for the table. The American widgeon is the Mareca americana. It is most abundant in the Carolinas, and is often called bald-pate from the white on the top of the head: from the widgeon being supposed to be a foolish bird, the word was applied formerly to a fool. The apostles of this false religion, Like Mahomet's, were as ass and widgeon.—Hudibras.

virtues, his casket of jewels."—Jer. Taylor. [A.S. wif, a woman, a wife (neut., pl. wif); Dut. wijf, Ice. wif, Dan. wiv, Ger. weib, woman. The root meaning is doubtful; often connected with weave. This word gives the first syllable of woman. See WOMAN.]

The wild-goose, known also as the GRAY-LAG, was formerly abundant in the fenny parts of England, and resided there all the year, but it is now only known as a winter visitant to the British Isles. It is the largest of the species found in Britain. The term wild-goose is also promiscuously applied to several species of the goose kind found wild in Great Britain, as A. palustris, A. segetum, and A. brachyrhynchus. The wild-goose of North America, also migratory, is a distinct species, the A. Cygnopsis or canadensis.—WILD-GOOSE CHASE, the pursuit of anything in ignorance of the direction it will take; hence, a foolish pursuit or enterprise. In England no will, whether of real or personal estate, is to be valid unless it be in writing, and signed at the foot or end by the testator, or by some person in his presence, and by his direction. Such signature must be made or acknowledged by the testator in the presence of two or more witnesses present at the same time, and such witnesses must attest and subscribe the will in the presence of the testator. Soldiers on actual service, or mariners at sea, have the power of making nuncupative wills. In the United States the law is in substantial agreement with that of England. In Scotland formerly only personal property could be disposed of by will, real property being conveyed by a disposition or deed in which the testator's liferent in the subject was reserved, but heritable property can now be so disposed of. [A.S. willa; Goth. vilja, Ger. wille; L. volo, to will, Gr. boulè, will, purpose.]

WILL, wil, v. aux., pres. I will, thou will, he will; past. would; no past participle. A word denoting either simple futurity or futurity combined with volition according to the subject of the verb. Thus, in the first person, I (we) will, the word denotes willingness, consent, intention, or promise; and when emphasized it indicates determination or fixed purpose; as, I will go, if you please; I will go at all hazards; I will have it in spite of him. In the second and third persons will expresses only a simple future or certainty, the idea of volition, purpose, or wish being lost; thus, "you will go," or "he will go," indicates a future event only. The second person may also be used as a polite command; as, you will be sure to do as I have told you.—As regards will in questions, Mr. R. Grant White lays down the following rules: "Will is never to be used as a question with the first person; as, will I go? A man cannot ask if he wills to do anything that he must know and only he knows. . . . As a question, will in the second person asks the intention of the person addressed; as, will you go to-morrow? that is, Do you mean to go to-morrow? . . . As a question, will in the third person asks what is to be the future action of the person spoken of, with a necessary reference to intention; as, will he go? that is, Is he going? Does he mean to go and is his going sure?" Simple futurity with the first person is appropriately expressed by shall. Among inaccurate speakers and writers, especially in Scotland, Ireland, and in some parts of the United States, there is some confusion in the use of shall and will; thus will improperly takes the place of shall in such frequently used phrases as, "I will be obliged to you," "we will be at a loss," "I will be much gratified," and so on.—Would stands in the same relation to will that should does to shall. Thus would is seldom or never a preterite indicative pure and simple, being mainly employed in subjunctive, conditional, or optative senses, in the latter case having often the functions and force of an independent verb; as, (a) conditional or subjunctive, "he would do it if he could:" "he could do it if he would:" "they would have gone had they been permitted." Here it will be seen would refers to the present only, the past being expressed by would have. In such sentences as "He was mistaken it would seem," or "it would appear"—in which should is sometimes used—would retains almost nothing of conditionality, having merely the effect of softening a direct statement. (Mr. R. Grant White regards "it should seem" as the normal expression, though he quotes "it would appear" from good English writers. He himself writes: "It would seem that a man of Mr. Lowe's general intelligence should know," etc.—Everyday English, chap. xiii.) (b) Optative; "I would that I were young again." In this use the personal pronoun is often omitted. "Would to God we had died in Egypt."—Ex. xvi. 3. "Would God I had died for thee, O Absalom."—2 Sam. xviii. 3. "Would thou wert as I am."—Shak.—Would most nearly has the force of a simple past indicative in such sentences as, "he would go and you see what has happened;" but this implies farther that he did actually go or at least set out, and the would is here emphatic.—Would is also used to express a habit or custom, as if it implied a habitual exercise of will; as, she would weep all day; every other day he would fly into a passion.—Will and would were formerly often used with adverbs and prepositional phrases to express motion or change of place, where modern usage would require will go, would go, or the like. "Now I will away;" "I'll to the ale-house;" "I will about it;" "I'll to my books;" "he is very sick and would to bed;" "there were wit in this head, and 'twould out."—Shak.—What may be called a similar elliptical usage occurs in such phrases as "what would you?" where present usage would supply have or do. [A.S. willan, pres. sing. 1 and 3 wile, 2 wilt, pl. willath (1, 2, and 3); pret. wolde, woldest; pt. woldon or woldan; Dn. willen. Ice. vilja, Dan. ville, to will; Ger. will, I will, he will, infin. wollen; Goth. viljan; cog. L. volo, I will, velle, to will; Gr. boulomai, I will. Akin WELL, WEAL, WILD.]

It is now, however, considered to be occasioned by the projectile itself striking the body in an oblique direction, the comparative escape of the external soft tissues being accounted for by the degree of obliquity with which the missile impinges on the elastic skin, together with the position of the internal structures injured relatively to the impingement of the ball on one side and hard resisting substances on another.

WIND-INSTRUMENT, wind'in-stroo-ment, n. an instrument of music, played by means of artificially produced currents of wind, as the organ, harmonium, etc., or by the human breath, as the flute, horn, etc., in all of which the vibration of a column of air produces the sound. The name is, however, generally restricted to the orchestral instruments of the second class, consisting of a tube (straight, bent, or curved), producing a fundamental tone with its harmonics or overtones when the vibrating column extends the whole length of the tube. This column may, however, be shortened by having holes of certain sizes and at certain distances along the tube, which are opened or stopped by the fingers or valves, the instrument being thus adapted to produce in its simpler forms the tones of the diatonic scale, and in its more complex forms the tones of the chromatic scale. The wind-instruments of an ordinary orchestra are divided into two classes: wood instruments, as the flute, oboe, clarinet, and bassoon; and brass instruments, as the horn, cornet-a-pistons, trombone, euphonium, bombardon, and ophicleide. The quality of tone of the woods is soft, smooth, light, and almost vocal; that of the brasses is somewhat harder, more powerful and majestic. Being all fixed toned they cannot, of course, play in perfect tune like stringed instruments, and they can only produce one sound at a time.

WINE, win, n. the fermented juice of the grape or fruit of the vine (Vitis vinifera). Wines are distinguished practically by their color, hardness or softness on the palate, their flavor, and their being still or effervescent. The differences in the quality of wines depend partly upon differences in the vines, but more on the differences of the soils in which they are planted, in the exposure of the vineyards, in the treatment of the grapes, and the mode of manufacturing the wines. When the grapes are fully ripe, they generally yield the most perfect wine as to strength and flavor. The leading character of wine, however, must be referred to the alcohol which it contains, and upon which its intoxicating powers principally depend. The amount of alcohol in the stronger ports and sheries is from 16 to 25 per cent; in hock, claret, and other light wines from 7 per cent. Wine containing more than 13 per cent of alcohol may be assumed to be fortified with brandy or other spirit. The most celebrated ancient wines were those of Lesbos and Chios among the Greeks, and the Falernian and Cecuban among the Romans. The principal modern wines are Port, Sherry, Claret, Champagne, Madeira, Hock, Marsala, etc., etc. The varieties of wine produced are almost endless, and differ in every constituent according to the locality, season, and age; but generally the produce of each vineyard retains its own leadin characteristics. The principal wine-producing countries are France, Germany, Spain, Portugal, Sicily, Greece, Cape Colony, Australia, and America. The name wine is also given to the juice of certain fruits prepared in imitation of wine obtained from grapes, but distinguished by naming the source whence it is derived, as currant wine, gooseberry wine; to the effect of drinking wine in excess, intoxication, as "Noah awoke from his wine."—Gen. ix. 24; to the act of drinking wine, as "Who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine."—Prov. xxiii. 29, 30; to a wine party at the English universities, as "The ex-coach was drinking brandy-and-water, and maundering about great wines, and patrician bear-fights."—Miss Braddon.—WINE OF IRON (vinum ferri of the Pharm. Brit.), sherry with tartrated iron in solution.—QUININE WINE, sherry with sulphate of quinine in solution.—OIL OF WINE, ethereal oil, a reputed anodyne, but only used in the preparation of other compounds.—SPIRIT OF WINE, alcohol. [A.S. win, borrowed (like Dut. wijn, Ice. vin, Dan. vin, Goth. vein or vein, Ger. wein) from L. vinum, wine, which corresponds to Gr. oinos, with digamma oinos or foinos, wine. L. vinum, wine, is what is produced by vitis, the vine, the twining plant (cog. with E. WITHY), the root meaning to twine or twist, seen also in vitium, vice, and in E. to wind, wire, etc.]

It is an evergreen shrub, with laurel-like leaves, corymbs of white flowers, and many-seeded berries. Star anise (Illicium) is closely allied to it. The bark is of a pale, grayish-red color externally, has an agreeable, pungent, aromatic taste, and contains an acid resin, an acid, volatile oil, and some tannin. It is an excellent aromatic, but not easily procured, other substances, particularly the bark of the Canella alba, being substituted for it. D. granatensis, New Granada Winter's-bark, is inferior to the former in its aromatic properties, and grows in New Granada and Brazil. [From Capt. John Winter, who first brought it from the Straits of Magellan in 1579.]

WIRE, wir, n. a thread of metal: any metallic substance drawn to an even thread or slender rod of uniform diameter by being passed between grooved rollers or drawn through holes in a plate of steel, etc. Wire is usually cylindrical, but it is also made of various other forms, as oval, half-round, square, and triangular, and of more complicated shapes for small pinions, for forming the pattern on blocks for calico-printing, and for other purposes. The term wire has also a collective signification, being frequently used to designate a quantity of metallic threads. The metals most commonly drawn into wire are gold, silver, copper, and iron; but the finest wire is made from platina. Used absolutely for telegraph wire; and hence, the telegraph; as, send on order per wire. "In India the wild beasts and monkeys destroy or play upon the wires, which are perhaps recording at the time a minute on Education."—W. H. Russell.—WIRE OF LAPLAND, a shining, slender substance made from the sinews of the reindeer, soaked in water, beaten, and spun into a sort of thread of great strength. These threads are dipped in melted tin, and drawn through a horn with a hole in it. The Laplanders use this wire in embroidering their clothes. [A.S. wir, Low Ger. wire, Ice. wirr, Dan. wire, Sw. wira, to twist, to wind. Probably allied to L. viria, bracelets. No doubt of same root as wind, to twist.]

WITCHCRAFT, wich'kraft, n. the practices of witches: sorcery: a supernatural power which persons were formerly supposed to obtain by entering into compact with the devil. Indeed it was fully believed that they gave themselves up to him, body and soul, while he engaged that they should want for nothing, and be able to assume whatever shape they pleased, to visit and torment their enemies, and accomplish their infernal purposes. As soon as the bargain was concluded, the devil was said to deliver to the witch an imp or familiar spirit, to be ready at call, and to do whatever it was directed. By the aid of this imp and the devil together, the witch, who was almost always an old woman, was enabled to transport herself through the air on a broomstick, and to transform herself into various shapes, particularly those of cats and hares; to inflict diseases on whomsoever she pleased, and to punish her enemies in a variety of ways. The belief in witchcraft is very ancient. It was a common belief in Europe till the sixteenth century, and maintained its ground with tolerable firmness till the middle of the seventeenth century: indeed it is not altogether extinct even at the present day. Numbers of reputed witches were condemned to be burned, so that in England alone it is computed that no fewer than 30,000 of them suffered at the stake. The word also means power more than natural: enchantment: irresistible influence: fascination.

WITCHES'-SABBATH, wich'ez-sab-bath, n. a stated meeting of witches and devils at night for communicating the mischief they had done, and concocting more at which the most obscene rites, or rather revels, were indulged in. The witches rode to the rendezvous on broomsticks, sometimes on their demon-lovers in the shape of goats, having previously anointed themselves with the fat of a murdered or unbaptized child. Neophytes were introduced to the devil at such meetings, where they received his mark on their bodies as evidence that they had sold their souls to him. In Germany the witches'-Sabbath was held on Walpurgis-night. [See WALPURGIS-NIGHT.]

WITENAGEMOTE, wit'en-a-ge-mōt, n. among the Anglo-Saxons, the great national council or parliament, consisting of athelings or princes, nobles or ealdormen, the large landholders, the principal ecclesiastics, etc. The meetings of this council were frequent; they formed the highest court of judicature in the kingdom; they were summoned by the king in any political emergency; their concurrence was necessary to give validity to laws, and treaties with foreign states were submitted to their approval. They had even power to elect the king, and if the sceptre descended in his race it was by means of the formal recognition of the new king by the nobles, bishops, etc., in an assembly convened for the purpose. WOLF, woolf (pl. WOLVES, woolvz). n. a quadruped belonging to the digitigrade carnivora, family Canidae, in habits and physical development closely related to the dog, some naturalists, indeed, considering it as the progenitor of some existing races of the dog, with which it has been known to interbreed. The common European wolf (Canis lupus) is yellowish or fulvous gray; the hair is harsh and strong, the ears erect and pointed, the tail straight, or nearly so, and there is a blackish band or streak on the forelegs about the carpus. The height at the shoulder is from 27 to 29 inches. The wolf is swift of foot, crafty, and rapacious; a destructive enemy to the sheep-cote and farm-yard; it associates in packs to hunt the larger quadrupeds, such as the deer, the elk, etc. When hard pressed with hunger these packs have been known to attack isolated travellers, and even to enter villages and carry off children. In general, however, wolves are cowardly and stealthy, approaching the sheepfolds and farm-steadings only at dead of night, making a rapid retreat if in the least scared by a dog or a man, and exhibiting great cunning in the avoidance of traps. Wolves are still plentiful in some parts of Europe, as France, Spain, Italy, Germany, Turkey, and Russia; they probably ceased to exist in England about the end of the fifteenth century; the last of their race in Scotland is said to have been killed by Cameron of Lochiel in 1680, while in Ireland they are known to have existed until at least the beginning of the eighteenth century. The black wolf (C. occidentalis) of America is a larger and finer animal than his European congener. The little prairie wolf or coyote (C. ochropus), abounding on the vast plains of Missouri and Mexico, is a burrowing animal, and resembles in many respects the jackal. The Tasmanian wolf is a marsupial, and allied to the kangaroo. [A.S. wulf, Dut. and Ger. wolf, Ice. úlfr, Dan. ulv, Sw. ulf (the Scandinavian forms showing the common loss of initial v); Goth. wulfs; cog. Bulg. wluku, Lith. wilkas, L. lupus, Gr. lukos (both with loss of the initial labial), Sans. wrika—wolf: all traced to a root wark, walk, meaning to tear.]

As the fetus advances they gradually disappear, their place being supplied by the true kidneys, except in fishes, in which they are permanent. [After Wolff, the discoverer.]

WOLF-FISH, woolf-fish, n. a teleostean acanthopterygious fish (Anarrhichas lupus), so called from its ferocious aspect and habits. It is found around the coasts of Britain, where it attains a length of 6 or 7 feet, but in southern seas it is said to reach a much greater size. The mouth is armed with strong sharp teeth, the inner series forming blunt grinders adapted for crushing the molluscs and crustaceans on which it feeds. The ventral fins are absent; the color is brownish-gray, spotted, and striped with brown over the upper parts, while the belly is white. The flesh is palatable, and largely eaten in Iceland, whilst the skin is durable, and manufactured into a kind of shagreen. When drawn up in a net it attacks its captors ferociously, and unless stunned with a blow on the head, is capable of doing great damage to both persons and nets with its powerful teeth. Called also SEA-CAT, CAT-FISH, and SEA-WOLF.

WOLFIAN, wol'fi-an, adj. pertaining to or promulgated by Frederick A. Wolf, the great German philologist.—WOLFIAN THEORY, a theory put out by Wolf in 1795 to the effect that the Iliad and Odyssey cannot be the works of one man, Homer, because writing was unknown at the time that these poems are said to have been composed. He supposes, therefore, that the Iliad and Odyssey consist of ballads or episodes, the work of different men, collected and arranged in a more or less consistent and homogeneous whole in the sixth century B.C. In Britain the term is sometimes applied generally to all natives of the United States. [A word of uncertain origin. The most common explanation seems also the most plausible, namely, that it is a corrupt pronunciation of English or of Fr. Anglais formerly current among the American Indians. In Bartlett's Dictionary of Americanisms a statement is quoted to the effect that Yengees or Yenkees was a name originally given by the Massachusetts Indians to the English colonists, and that it was afterwards adopted by the Dutch on the Hudson, who applied the term in contempt to all the people of New England. Bartlett also quotes a statement of Heckwelder (an authority on Indian matters), who affirmed that the Indians applied the term Yengees specially to the New Englanders as contradistinguished from the Virginians or Long Knives, and the English proper or Saggensash. As early as 1713 it is said to have been a common cant word at Cambridge, Mass., in the sense of good or excellent, being probably borrowed by the students from the Indians, to whom a "Yankee" article would be synonymous with an excellent one, from the superiority of the white man in mechanical arts.]
