INTRODUCTION

Thomas et al. (1979, 1979-_____) have presented concepts and data dealing with the habitat interrelationships of several hundred wildlife species in the Blue Mountains of Oregon and Washington, and the Great Basin of Southeastern Oregon.

These concepts and data, with supplementation and modifications to reflect local conditions, were used to create an ADP data base for the Brothers EIS area in central Oregon. This report contains the most commonly used tables which can be extracted from that data base. Other tables are generated on an "as needed" basis for local application.

Complete descriptions of the concepts used are contained in the cited references. In general, a data matrix is formed which relates wildlife species grouped on the basis of habitat requirements for reproduction and feeding (life forms) with habitats grouped on the basis of plant community structure.

The species orientation shown is based upon the assumption that a particular species will use the kind of habitat (plant community structure) shown if other essential habitat components are present.

For example:

The spotted frog is in life form 2 (reproduces in water and feeds on the ground, in bushes, and/or in trees). This species will reproduce and feed in a juniper-grass habitat, if the habitat contains the water component required by life form 2.

This "if other essential habitat components are present" assumption must be kept in mind when using the tables in this report.

The habitats are given names representing the kind of plant community structure provided by that habitat, not necessarily the specific species composition.

For example:

Low sagebrush-grass, stiff sagebrush-grass, and shrubby buckwheat-grass are some of the kinds of plant communities which could be grouped in the "Short sage-grass" habitat.

Several codes are used on a number of different tables. These are as follows:

Relative Abundance

V = very common
C = common
U = uncommon
R = rare
E = extremely rare

Species Orientation

R = reproduces
F = feeds
L = orientation determined from literature
X = orientation determined from local observation
P = preferred habitat
O = occasional or secondary habitat
