† Cf. St. Aug., "Retract.," i. 13.
‡ Plato, "Apology," 41.

SECOND SIGHT.

TRANSLATED FOR THE LIVING AGE

BY E. W. LATIMER.

CHAPTER III.

WINTER was over. It was the month of March. I had been forced to accept a crowd of invitations, and for the first time since I knew Stachovitch several days had passed without my seeing him.

One day, as I was on my way home about eleven o'clock in the evening, I found myself before his door. Seeing a light burning in his room, I went up-stairs and found him busy writing.

"Very glad to see you," said he, coming to meet me. "I have something I want you to do for me."

He asked me to sit down, and took a chair opposite to me. I then perceived that he was greatly agitated.

"What has happened?" said I.

Stachovitch rose, and began walking rapidly up and down the room. Suddenly he stopped before me, and asked me point-blank the question, —

"Am I a coward?"

"Most certainly not," I said. "What do you mean by asking me?"

"I have been insulted — grossly insulted; and it is impossible for me to fight the man who has insulted me."

"Humph! That's a pity. There are people of course who won't fight on principle. With some men it is a matter of conscience — a matter of taste. It cannot be argued about; only ——"

"You mistake," cried Stachovitch eagerly, "I have fought several duels, and I may fight more. But it was Drieux who insulted me —— "

"What matter who it was," said I, "Drieux or another?"

"I cannot fight him."

"Why not?"

"I can't. I ought not." He spoke with great excitement.

"My dear fellow," said I, rising, "I am at your service with all my heart, on one condition however. It is that you will be pleased not to talk in riddles, and that you will tell me clearly what has taken place."

"Drieux insulted me."

"That's the third time you have said so."

"I ought to ask satisfaction."

"That is what we must see about presently, when you have been so good as to tell me all the particulars. Drieux is a man of honor. He will not refuse you any satisfaction that you have a right to demand."

"But I cannot fight him."

Here I began to lose patience.

"I'll come back to-morrow morning," I said. "I hope you will then be calm enough to explain yourself. Good evening."

"No, stay. Pray stay. Don't leave me. Help me."

"Well, then, I will remain. Calm yourself. Give me a light. Thank you. Do me the favor to light your own cigarette. Very well. Are you ready? Now tell me why you cannot fight Drieux."

He looked at me fixedly. His eyes, which were unnaturally wide open, had an indescribable expression of horror.

"Because I do not choose to be his murderer," he replied slowly at last, pausing on the syllables of every word.

"You are more and more mysterious."

"Because it is quite certain I shall kill him if I fight him."

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

I shrugged my shoulders, and gave unequivocal signs of impatience.

"Never mind about that," I said crossly, "we will talk about that by-and-by. Tell me now everything that passed. Till I know all I do not see how I can help you."

The story that Stachovitch at last decided to impart to me was very simple. For some time past the intimacy between himself and Drieux had cooled. Rivals in love, and each jealous of the other, they took small pleasure in meeting four or five times a week in the salon of Madame de Baudry. The vicomte at last asked Marie's hand: he was refused, and came no more to his aunt's house. His self-love suffered quite as much as anything else from his disappointment. He was ill-tempered with every one, and especially with Stachovitch. He still bowed to him very stiffly, but that was all. The young Russian was constantly expecting a quarrel with him, and tried to keep out of his way. That afternoon he had met him at the fencing-gallery. There Drieux had abruptly asked him if he would do him the honor to cross swords with him.

"I refused," continued Stachovitch, "and I am certain I refused with the utmost politeness. But Drieux would not give the matter up. He was evidently resolved to pick a quarrel with me. He went on in such a way that I should have been perfectly entitled to call him to account, had I not been anxious above everything to avoid a quarrel. Several persons present tried to interfere. They spoke to Drieux, blaming him for his persistency, and reminding him that everybody had long before agreed to put up with the apparently capricious selection I was accustomed to make of my opponents; that it had been agreed that no one should be offended if I refused to fence with him, and that Drieux, by acting otherwise, seemed to reflect on others. But Drieux would not give up his point; he raised his voice, and addressed me in such a way that I was forced at last to ask him to explain himself, or to take back what he had said. Then he laughed, and went on to say that his words were plain enough already, that he should not take them back; that I might either put up with them, or ask for satisfaction. That is how the affair stands. Now how do you advise me?"

I replied that the first thing to be done was to try every means of conciliation.

"I will go and see Drieux to morrow morning," I said. "He may be wiser when he has slept upon it. I will point out to him that he is only doing himself an injury by pushing the matter to extremities. Don't worry yourself meantime. Whatever comes of it, I will protect your honor."

The next morning I went early to see the Vicomte de Drieux. He was expecting me, and as soon as I began to speak stopped me, giving me the names of two of his friends, and requesting me to arrange the matter with them. In vain I tried to force him to make some explanation. He listened to me most politely, and behaved with all propriety, but would only answer that he was now in the hands of his friends.

Drieux had been careful to select young men not exactly of his own set, who were pleased with the distinction of being his seconds, and who would have been very sorry to have the meeting fall through. I could make no impression at all upon them.

"But, monsieur," they said, "why should these gentlemen not fight if they want to? A meeting is inevitable unless you decline to ask satisfaction. M. de Drieux assured us expressly that he would make no apology. He has asked us to be his seconds. We have accepted that honor, and all we have now to do is to settle the terms of meeting, provided Count Stachovitch thinks it his due. We are ready to fight, and wait your pleasure."

I went away and gave them time to reflect; then I had a second interview with these young fools, after which I went back to Stachovitch, and told him how all my attempts at reconciliation had failed.

"I knew they would fail beforehand," he replied, "but my conscience tells me I have now done all I could to avoid this unlucky duel. The blood that will be shed must fall upon the head of him who would not be reconciled."

The duel took place next morning at daybreak in the forest of Vincennes. I had been a little anxious lest Stachovitch should show some nervousness upon the ground, for in spite of my presence, he seemed almost beside himself the night before with anxiety. When I found myself with him the next morning in a carriage, he hastened to reassure me.

"You need not be anxious," he said, "I know what I have to do, and shall give you no occasion to be ashamed of me."

His whole bearing was excellent. He was grave, self-contained, and perfectly cool. As he stood sword in hand, after taking off his coat and waistcoat and unty-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

ing his cravat, I could not forbear admiring the strength and suppleness of his well-knit figure. Drieux attacked him vehemently. For some time all Stachovitch did was to parry the furious assaults of his opponent, but by degrees he warmed to his work and began to attack in his turn. More than once I fancied that I saw his sword touch the chest of the vicomte, but he did not wound him. All of a sudden he dropped his arm. We ran up to him. He was badly wounded through the right fore-arm. To continue the duel was impossible. Drieux prepared slowly to leave the ground, whilst his seconds earnestly begged to know if they could be of any use to me. I thanked them, but declined their help. After which, bowing low to us, they went away.

I turned to Stachovitch, who was already in the hands of the surgeon, and was amazed to see the look of perfect happiness upon his countenance.

"Thank God," he cried, "that it has ended thus! If you only knew what a weight has been taken off my mind."

This explosion of joy, on the part of a man who had been badly wounded, was at least surprising. I answered,—

"As far as I am concerned I had rather the vicomte had been hit; however, as you seem so charmed that it was you, I have no right to complain."

The wound having been dressed and the surgeon sent away, I got into our carriage with Stachovitch, and drove to the Avenue Friedland. As we drove along the young Russian seemed supremely happy. Every now and then he fell into deep revery, but his reflections must have been agreeable, for a smile of rest and satisfaction such as I had never seen before upon his face lighted up his features.

"I feel as if I had just got rid of an ugly dream," he said. "I am awake now, and I see that all that has been making me unhappy was unreal. This very day I will go to Madame de Baudry's, and ask her niece's hand. I know she will grant it me. I am full of happy hopes. I have been wretched for so long. Now my turn has come for being happy. Yes, I shall not be refused. I will see you this evening, dear friend. Congratulate me. I am so happy."

I could not in the least understand this new excitement; but I had no wish to trouble my friend's joy, so I said au revoir, after having taken him back to his own rooms, and retired, well satisfied with the result of the duel.

The proposal of Stachovitch for the hand of Marie de Massieux was accepted. My friend appeared indeed a happy man. He was altogether changed. His former sadness, of which he had never told me the cause, gave place to almost extravagant spirits and gaiety. I found it hard to get accustomed to the alteration; and it did not seem to me anything so very extraordinary that Stachovitch should be an accepted suitor. Mademoiselle de Massieux was a very charming person, and my friend's delight at his engagement was to a certain extent natural; yet it had been so obvious long before that he was encouraged to address her, that I could not imagine why his acceptance should appear to him a matter of surprise.

"I am the happiest man that lives!" he was forever saying to me. And I always made answer,—

"I am very glad of it, mon cher; but it is your own fault that your happiness did not begin three months ago."

When I spoke thus Stachovitch always had a strange way of looking at me, as if he were half inclined to tell me something. He never did, however, and I remained as ill-informed about the source of his new happiness as I had been about his former depression and misery.

The Vicomte de Drieux had left Paris. I heard accidentally that he was travelling in Greece.

"I wish him every good thing he can possibly desire," said Stachovitch, on hearing this news. "I owe him all my present happiness."

"Enigmas again!" I cried. "What possible connection can there be between De Drieux and your life's happiness?" Stachovitch smiled his most mysterious smile, as if to say,—

"I know — and am perfectly sure of it."

This conversation ended like all the rest. But after Boris had taken leave of me I began to ask myself, could anything be wrong in my young friend's brain?

A few days later the same idea recurred to me; and this was the occasion. One evening about ten o'clock I went to his rooms. We had agreed I should do so, and that we would go together and pass the evening with the Comtesse de Villiers. The servant of Count Stachovitch, knowing I was constantly there, showed me into the sitting-room without announcing my arrival. The room was empty. I crossed it without noise, for there was a very thick carpet on the floor, and I was about to enter my friend's bed-chamber when I was stopped upon the threshold by a very singular sight.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

On the chimney-piece burned two candelabra, which threw a blaze of light on a large looking-glass. Before this glass stood Stachovitch, making the most singular faces. He would look at his own face with the same look of looking it through that I remembered when he gazed so earnestly in the railroad carriage at the murderer Béchouard. Then he would draw back a few steps, still looking at his own face, but seeming to desire to view it from a new position. Then he winked his eyes, and drew down the corners of his mouth, and wrinkled up his forehead, so that his face got an expression of weariness and age. After looking at it thus for a few moments, he went back to the glass, when I saw him to my great astonishment pick up a little crayon de toilette, and proceed to draw wrinkles round his lips and eyes, like an actor getting himself up for an old man's part.

I was inexpressibly discomposed by what I saw. There I stood, spectator, as it seemed to me, of some lugubrious farce, or of some act of insanity. I walked back on tiptoe to the door by which I had entered the sitting-room, and after pausing a moment to recover myself, I opened and closed it violently, calling out to Stachovitch in his room to know if he was ready.

"I'll be with you in a moment," he cried, and there was no emotion whatever in his voice. "Take an evening paper, and sit down."

Then he closed his own door without having shown himself, left me to myself for a few minutes, and appeared smiling, as he always smiled since his duel.

I had the greatest mind to question him concerning the strange scene of which I had been the involuntary spectator. But I was afraid of intruding on his secret, so I held my tongue.

We went out. At the corner of the Avenue Friedland and the Rue St. Honoré we took a carriage.

"A lucky number," I said, looking at the ticket that the coachman gave me. "No. 1107."

"Why lucky?" asked Stachovitch.

"Because 1107 can be divided by 9."

Stachovitch still looked at me.

"I have a fancy," I said, "for noting the numbers on the hack carriages I engage, and the houses where I visit. If the figures when added together make nine, or a number that can be divided by nine, it is all right. If on the contrary they make thirteen, as for instance 643 does, I am made seriously uncomfortable. I like best to visit houses with lucky numbers, and I am always afraid of quarrelling with people who live at numbers 49, 67, and so on. Luckily there are not many such houses. In your Avenue Friedland there is no No. 13. The houses are numbered 11, 11 bis, 15."

Stachovitch looked at me a little anxiously.

"Really and truly," he said, "do you believe such things?"

Not knowing whether he were joking or in earnest, I answered, laughing, "Of course I believe them."

"Then," said he, "I suppose you are afraid of Friday, and would not choose to start upon a journey on that day?"

"Oh, no," I replied with mock gravity, "that is mere superstition. An interest in numbers is quite another affair. It is an excellent habit to cultivate. After a time you might develop it into quite a respectable mania. You can be always enjoying the use of it too without any inconvenience to others. I assure you I find it contribute greatly to the interest of my existence."

"Take care," said the young Russian eagerly, "you are playing with dangerous weapons. Believe me, for I know what I am saying. I have had sad experiences."

"Are you really in earnest?"

"Perfectly. All manias are dangerous. Mania, maniacus, are sad words, my dear fellow. As soon as a man gets out of the straight line of common sense, he finds himself upon the road to insanity."

I answered, "Yes — yes, you are quite right," well knowing that absolute consent cuts short discussion; for when I thought of the scene before the glass, I could not bear to allude in the presence of Stachovitch to anything connected with insanity.

However, the matter faded from my mind. I set it down at last to mere grimacing, to try effects of expression before a mirror. This certainly put Stachovitch in rather a ridiculous light, but in no way impaired my regard for him.

His marriage was to take place on the eighth of June.

It was the last week in May. Stachovitch dined nearly every day with Madame de Baudry, and came home about ten o'clock. I was accustomed to look in upon him nearly every evening, when we commonly strolled together down the Champs Elysées.

One evening when I went to his house his servant told me he had just gone out, but that he had left a message for me begging me not to go away without seeing him, as he had something very important

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd that he wished to say to me. I thought it was probably something about his marriage. So having nothing in particular to do I took a comfortable chair, and began to read. It was a lovely night. From the windows of the sitting-room I could see the trees of the avenue, I could hear the noise of the carriages in the streets. There was nothing to conduce to any sad or mysterious train of feeling.

All of a sudden I uttered a cry of terror. Before me, pale as a corpse, with haggard, burning eyes, stood Stachovitch, drawn up to his full height, looking like his own spectre.

"Read that!" he cried in a hoarse voice, "read that!" as, without giving me time to ask a question, he thrust a crumpled newspaper into my fingers.

Instead of looking at it however, I sat gazing into the face of my friend.

"What is the matter?" I asked.

"Read it — read it," he repeated; "you will see that I was right all along. Oh, my terrible presentiment!"

I took the newspaper and read the paragraph. It was a telegraphic despatch, and ran thus: —

"ATHENS. Vicomte René de Drieux was murdered yesterday by brigands, whilst making an excursion at no great distance from the city. His body was easily identified by the French consul. M. de Drieux was stabbed in the breast by a dagger. The police is actively engaged in endeavoring to discover those who committed the crime."

"Poor young man!" said I. "It is a sad piece of news indeed, and I am truly sorry."

"I knew — I always knew that Drieux would die like that," cried Stachovitch.

His exclamation startled me. I suddenly remembered how unwilling Stachovitch had been to fight with Drieux, because he was so sure that he would kill him. Involuntarily I began to feel very uncomfortable. Yet after all it might be merely a coincidence; and it was not for me to follow Stachovitch into all kinds of queer theories and vagaries, it was my duty rather to recall him by sober arguments to calmness and right reason. I therefore insisted that he must confide his trouble to me.

His excitement had made him lose all self-command, and with it the reserve he had hitherto maintained towards me. After a while he consented to tell me his story. His agitation, however, became greater than ever. He kept walking up and down his chamber, talking loud, and gesticulating violently. What he said was at first hardly intelligible; but by degrees I got the thread of the narrative, and when he had done I had learned all the particulars of his melancholy story.

I do not give it here just as he told it me. I only recapitulate it as it is graven in my memory.

CHAPTER IV.

THIS is the story of my friend Count Boris Stachovitch.

One day I found myself at a great dinner-party, sitting beside a beautiful young woman. Her figure was perfect. I never saw more lovely shoulders, or such faultless arms and hands. She had large blue eyes, limpid, and full of intelligence. Her lips were fresh and pink. Her eyebrows were exquisitely pencilled, and her long curved eyelashes added, whenever she looked down, an especial grace and softness to her features. I was perfectly bewitched by the union of so many charms, and all through the dinner did nothing but pay attentions to my neighbor. She listened to me with the most flattering attention; sometimes she smiled at me as if we had been old friends; sometimes she looked as if all I said demanded her most serious attention. Whatever she did became her. I found her growing more and more beautiful. After dinner the lady of the house invited her to play. She did not take much pressing, but played two or three difficult pieces with the brilliancy and ease of a professor. Then she sang. Her voice was a powerful voice, and highly cultivated. Never in my life had I met so accomplished a woman. All the party crowded round her, and paid her compliments. She had modest thanks for every one. I looked at her with all my eyes. I could not bear to look away from her. Suddenly I saw her walk towards a lady of a certain age seated near the piano, to whom nobody had been paying any attentions. This lady's face did not appear wholly unknown to me, but I could not remember where I had ever seen her. I looked at her attentively. She was not ugly, though her face had something about it singularly disagreeable. She looked stern, cold, and cruel. She was tall and thin. She wore a plain dress of some dark color. Her hands, which were covered by very shiny black gloves, were extraordinarily small. Her hair was thin, but black as jet, and was arranged very simply. Her skin, which looked like wax, was withered like the skin of a mummy. Her eyes were clear, intelligent, watchful

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

of all that passed, and deep sunk in their orbits. Her lips were thin and pale.

"Humph!" I said to myself, "what an unpleasant-looking creature! She must have a heart as hard as a stone."

At this moment she looked up at the ceiling. "Where can I have seen her face before?" I again asked myself.

Again she looked down, and I felt sure I had never before seen her.

"Do you know that lady that Mlle. Olga M—— is now speaking to?" said I, addressing an old gentleman, a great friend of my father's, who was very intimate in the house where I was visiting.

"She is mother to Mlle. Olga, your neighbor at dinner. She is Countess M——."

"Is it possible," I cried, "that so charming a creature should have such a mother?" My friend smiled.

"I knew the countess before she was married," said he; "we used to call her la belle Nathalie. She was ever so much prettier than her daughter Olga. And besides she was charmingly intelligent and amusing. Every man who saw her fell in love with her. Nobody could resist such an enchantress. Moi qui vous parle, I was wildly in love with her. And your own father too, Boris, — he came near dying of love for la belle Nathalie. But she was a young person who meant to get the most she could out of her advantages. She talked, and she laughed, and she danced, and she sang like a siren. Neither your father nor I would do for her. She had set her mind on Count M——, a rich man and nothing else; and of course she succeeded in marrying him. In five years she had given him three daughters, and by the time they had been married six years, she had sent him into another world by her coldness and her cruelty. Two of her daughters are married, but the youngest, Olga, is still free. If you will accept a piece of good advice, my young friend, let me recommend you to have nothing to do with so dangerous a beauty. Olga reminds me of her mother when she was eighteen. She has the same smile; she knows how to cast soft glances just as her witch of a mother could do. Look at them this moment! — both of them are casting down their eyes in the same way; they have the same hands, feet, forehead, and mouth. All that is sharp and withered in the countess is in her daughter fresh and fair. Years will transform your beautiful Olga as they have transformed my charming Nathalie. In thirty years she will be the living image of her mother. Good-night, Boris. Don't dream of Olga. If you must dream, dream of that pretty little girl yonder in a pink dress, who sits quietly and modestly beside her mother. The mother is as sweet and fresh as she is."

I went apart to think over what I had just heard. I have good eyes, and from the dark corner of the salon in which I stood I could see Olga as plainly as though I had been at her side. It was true she was like her mother. The likeness was not striking at first, but became very evident when her face was stripped of its youthful charms. Ah! what cold, cruel looks those lovely eyes were capable of giving, — how hard and stern the mouth when stripped of its attractive smile! "And that is how Olga will look in thirty years," I thought, as I gazed at her mother. I became afraid of the young girl who had so lately fascinated me. Somehow my thoughts went back to my own grandmother, and an old great aunt who was still living. They were sisters and extraordinarily like each other. And yet my grandmother had been a great beauty in her day, and my great aunt positively ugly. All kinds of queer ideas passed through my mind about the unchangeableness of the typical forms of face in every individual, though such typical forms may lie concealed for years under a veil of youth or happiness, sorrow, health, or sickness. Nevertheless, as every individual grew old I suddenly seemed to understand that his typical countenance, the primitive plan of his face, would inevitably declare itself. "It is the true essence of himself," I thought, "the rest is outward show." After this I came out of my retreat, and again joined the others. I chanced to pass near Olga. Her expressive look welcomed me back.

"What a pensive air, M. le philosophe!" she exclaimed, "what are you thinking about? Give me your arm, and take me out of this furnace. I can hardly breathe."

I took her into another room. She stood by a window, and, still leaning on my arm, she looked out into the starry night. A pensive sadness overspread her face; I felt the beating of her heart; a deep sigh rose from her soft bosom. And I knew — I knew with absolute certainty — that she was a living lie; that everything about her was false, her dreamy eyes, her smiling mouth, her gentle words, and every beat of her false heart of stone. As she stood silent and motionless beside me like a faultless statue, she appeared to me not what she was, but what she would

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

be thirty years to come. I perceived clearly her real, primitive type, — the same as her mother's, with her cruel mouth and evil eyes. I let her hand drop from my arm, and I drew apart from her.

"What is the matter?" she said, with some surprise. "You are quite pale!"

At the moment I could find no commonplace words of excuse to offer her. I was impelled to tell the truth. "You fill me with horror!" I exclaimed. She gave a merry laugh, probably supposing I was joking. But without another word I left her and went home.

From that day forward I began a new existence. Every face I saw became the object of my careful examination. Young people's faces especially interested me. If I saw them with their parents, I was not easy till out of the fair, fresh, youthful face I had picked out the family features. Youth withered under my glance. The desire to find the true face under the mask became a mania. It caused me many annoyances, for it often happened that strangers wanted to know why I was gazing at them. Several times I made a resolution to give up this unlucky propensity, but it was too strong for me. At concerts or at theatres I would fix my eyes on some young face, and then turn it into an old one; after which I would make every effort to obtain a glimpse of the father or mother of the young person whose face I was experimenting upon. At first I often found myself mistaken, but I grew more skilful as time went on. I laid down laws, fixed rules for my own guidance, and after a while became a master of the miserable art which had gained complete ascendancy over me.

What I may call my apprenticeship did not last long. I had been early struck with the fact that certain faces could not be subjected to my process of aging them. In vain I applied to them all the rules I found successful in other cases. They would not grow old.

One of these refractory faces, as I called them, was my brother's; another that of a young girl who was my sisters' friend; whom I saw every day either at our own house or at her father's, and who was the object of my secret love.

"Why cannot I transform these two faces?" I asked myself. If I covered my eyes with my hands, and tried to make them old, Alexis and Sophie would only look pale with their eyes closed. And it was not long before I saw their dead bodies just as I had so often seen them in imagination. They were out upon the lake in a party of pleasure. The boat upset; and they were drowned.

The grief that I felt for their loss was increased by my conviction that I possessed the fated gift of knowing who among those who surrounded me would die young. I almost went out of my senses. I became very ill. For weeks my life was despaired of. When I grew better I went to a retired country house owned by my family in southern Russia. There I lived for a year in the strictest possible seclusion.

One day, having nothing to do, I undertook to see if I could apply to my own face the same rules by which I had been in the habit of testing the faces of others. My face proved a refractory face. I could not make it grow old. "I shall die young, like Sophie and Alexis," I exclaimed, "and I am glad it should be so." Life had grown to be a heavy burden, and yet I was only twenty-two years old.

When the next winter came I dreaded a return to its long solitude. I went to Moscow, and thence I set out for Paris. I thought I would have all the enjoyment I could out of the few years I had to live. I also wanted to see my sister, the Comtesse de Villiers, before I died.

During my journey I resumed my old habit of analyzing the faces round me. I lived as it were surrounded by old faces. Some I liked, and those persons I tried to know; some were inexpressibly disagreeable to me. I was considered eccentric in my tastes; I did not care.

My illness — for I recognized my mania as such — seemed every day to make fresh progress. My first terrible experience was before I reached Paris.

When the train in which I was seated had just crossed the Belgian frontier, a railroad employé sprang on the step outside to examine the tickets of the passengers. His was a refractory face. I was looking at him with deep pity, for I knew he must die young, when suddenly I saw a broad red line, like a deep wound, across his forehead. I could not take my eyes from his face so long as he remained at the door of our carriage, and I looked out for him at every station. He was a young, active man, with a very pleasing countenance. Wherever we passed he seemed to have friends, and to exchange a pleasant word with them. He was never in a hurry. He would let the train begin to move, and then running alongside it jump upon the footboard. At Saint Quentin, however, he delayed too long. I watched him from my window. I

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

saw him make a spring to catch the last carriage. His foot slipped — he fell. I heard a cry, lost in the scream of the locomotive. The engineer had seen the accident, and stopped the train. In a few moments a corpse was borne past my window. The poor fellow had fallen on a rail, and had split open his skull. The dark red wound that I had seen was on his forehead.

It was the same with the murderer Béchouard, whom we met on our way from England. I saw him seated beside me with his eyes turned in his head, eyes such as we saw when we found him; and Drieux I always saw stabbed through the body.

After the duel that I had with our poor friend I came to life again. I had been certain I should kill him if I fought him. But the meeting had taken place, and I was the one wounded. I blessed him for having forced me into the quarrel. If I could have been deceived once, my gift of second sight was not infallible. The fated power that I thought I had might not be in my possession. I reasoned thus, and I was happy. I did so wish for happiness! Life seemed to me to become all at once so wonderful and beautiful. I hoped long to enjoy it. I hoped so yesterday — hoped so this morning, only a few hours since. Now all my hope has vanished. I know Drieux has been murdered. He died as I foreknew he would, I made no mistake — I cannot make mistakes, alas! on such a subject. And now I know I shall die soon. Life has no more to offer me. All is lost — all is over!

As Stachovitch ended his sad story he sunk back in his chair, covered his face with both hands, and sobbed aloud. I did all I could to calm him. When I found nothing would do I called in his old servant who began comforting him in Russian, and at last we got him to bed. While he was undressing I ran for a doctor, and was fortunate at that hour in getting my old friend. When we reached the bedside of Count Stachovitch he was in a troubled slumber. The doctor felt his pulse, and said he had high fever. He gave his servant some directions, and said he would be back next morning.

I spent nearly all night by the sick-bed of my friend. But at dawn, having grown very sleepy, and seeing that Stachovitch seemed quiet, I left him to his Russian servant, who promised not to quit his chamber.

It was late next morning when I woke. I dressed in haste and went to my friend's room. The concièrge stopped me at the foot of the staircase.

"You will not find any one at home," he said. "M. le Comte and his servant left this morning at seven o'clock."

"Gone? Where?" I asked.

"I do not know. M. le Comte went past my loge without even looking up. His servant, who had a little valise in his hand, said, "We shall be away for a day or two."

I heard no more. I next went to see Stachovitch's sister.

"Madame la Comtesse," they said, "is not at home." I next called upon Madame de Baudry. She received me immediately, and before I opened my mouth put a paper into my hand.

"What does this mean?" said she.

A few lines were written in haste, and ran as follows: —

"I am obliged to renounce forever my life's happiness. Do not blame me. I am innocent. Pity me; I am most wretched. Console Marie.

"BORIS STACHOVITCH."

What use would there have been of explanations? The only one that seemed possible was to say I thought the poor young man was mad. And that would have been no comfort to any one. I did not like to burn my ships. Something might occur to bring things right again. So I only told her that Stachovitch had been very ill the evening before, and had left early in the morning; that his letter was written under feverish excitement, and that I did not think it worthy of any great consideration. In short I begged Madame de Baudry not to think hardly of her niece's suitor, but to wait for further information.

A long time, however, passed before I heard anything more of Boris Stachovitch. The Comtesse de Villiers, upon whom I repeatedly called, was never at home to me. I understood at last that she did not wish to see me, but being deeply anxious as to the fate of my young Russian friend, I ventured at last to write to her.

"My brother is not well," she answered. "His physicians have ordered him to southern Russia, where he is at present, on one of my father's estates. He is getting better, though not very rapidly. I shall have great pleasure in writing to you, as soon as I have any good news to tell you."

Years have since passed. Madame la Comtesse has never again written to me, but I met with the cousin of Boris, the

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

same we spoke of the day when we first met, and when he first broached to me his theory of this "little, little world." From him I learned the fate of my poor friend.

After leaving Paris he went back to the same lonely country house, where he had gone once before after the death of his brother and the young girl he had first loved. There he lived six months in complete solitude, with nobody to speak to but his servant, who found him one morning lying dead before the looking-glass in his bedroom. He had stabbed himself to the heart, thus realizing by his own hand the vision that had haunted him of dying young.

I could not but feel I had expected this, and the news of his death caused me more sorrow than surprise.

Marie de Massieux did not die of grief for the loss of her lover; on the contrary she consoled herself before long, and I do not blame her. It is both brave and sensible to submit to an inevitable loss, and act accordingly. All oracles of wisdom — ancient or modern — tell us so. After all, this life is terribly deceptive. It promises a great deal that it has no intention to perform. Happy are those who having secured a little comfort, or a little happiness, enjoy it to the utmost, without anxiety or regret. Marie de Massieux must have been a woman of this kind. She married a kindly country gentleman, and her life seems very happy. I met her not long since walking in the Champs Elysées with her two children. She was proud, fair, and satisfied. One might have sworn that nothing had ever troubled her peace, and that when she should be eighty she would be as calm and smiling as I saw her there. Our eyes met, but she did not recognize me. She was wholly devoted to her present life; she had forgotten the past, and was trustful of the future. Was not this wisdom? I thought it better not to wake sad memories of a painful passage in her life, and I passed on without bowing to her.

R. L.

From The Church Quarterly Review.

THE POETRY OF DOUBT. — ARNOLD AND CLOUGH.*

In the account of Julius Hare, prefixed to the "Guesses at Truth," we are told that he made a special entry in some autobiographical memoranda as to the date when he first read Wordsworth. "To him, as to so many others, that was an epoch in his life," says his biographer; and we may add that the influence is to be traced in almost every line of his literary work. Again, every reader of J. S. Mill's autobiography will recollect his account of the prolonged melancholy which came over him when a young man. From this, he says, he was relieved chiefly by reading Wordsworth. These two instances are merely casual illustrations of the great influence which Wordsworth exerted on the minds of the generation immediately succeeding his own; and we have called attention to them now in order that we may have a standard whereby to compare the poets of our time with those of other periods. We have taken Wordsworth as perhaps the greatest instance in our own modern literature of a poet who was a definite teacher. But there are, of course, many similar instances. Byron had just as definite an influence over the minds of his contemporaries; he was an actual leader, if not of thought, at least of sentiment, and the Byronic tendency was plainly visible both in literature and in practice. And it is not only true of the beginning of this century, but in most periods poets have been leaders and teachers, with a definite "gospel," as Mr. Carlyle would call it, not so systematic, but quite as influential, as schemes of philosophy or morality. Of course there are many exceptions; there are many dramatic or purely artistic poets whose teaching is only indirect and vague; but, on the whole, it is not difficult to estimate the tendencies of the poetry of any period, inasmuch as those tendencies have been definite and patent. What a poet teaches is not to be found in his longer or more didactic poems only, for there it often misses its effect; it is generally more powerful in the purely lyrical pieces. Insight into Wordsworth's view of nature has been given with greater vividness by "Tintern Abbey," or by "Three Years she Grew in Sun and Shower," than by "The Excursion." The essential requisite is that the poet himself shall be so informed by some master truth that hardly an utterance of his shall fail to give some expression to it, and his purest poetry will convey it most fully.

Such being one, and surely the highest, of the poet's functions, we have to ask whether it is fulfilled by any of our contemporary poets. We feel that we must answer this question mainly in the nega-

* 1. Arnold's Poems: Narrative and Elegiac: Dramatic and Lyric. London: 1869.
2. Clough's Poems. London: 1869.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

tive. We have imitators of Mr. Tennyson, as he has informed us; echoes of Mr. Swinburne are everywhere audible; Mr. Browning's monologues have given rise to many uncouth travesties; but such imitations of popular writers do not imply that these poets have founded schools of thought, or that any one forms his opinions or controls his actions in accordance with their guidance. No doubt among our contemporary poets we can find those who can give expression to deep or lofty thoughts, but is there one whom we can call an original creator, one who can create an ideal, and by the power of his imagination or the universality of his expression can compel the minds of men to follow him in striving after it? The leaders who have really guided thought during our epoch have been, in England, great prose writers on morals or art, such as Mr. Carlyle or Mr. Ruskin, or great scientific thinkers like Mr. Darwin; we do not find a poet among the "kings of modern thought."

The question then arises, if, in our day, contemporary poetry does not lead the mind of the age, what function does it actually fulfil? The answer, in our judgment, is not far to seek; and we reply that it acts not so much as a guide, but as a reflection of contemporary tendencies. This is not the highest function of the poet, but still it is a high calling, and one which, as regards the present age, so singularly incoherent and confused, so full of vague and inarticulate movements, is no light task. And as a matter of fact, this summing up and expression of these otherwise unexpressed strivings and tendencies is the very office which one of their number calls upon poets to fulfil: —

> Come, Poet, come!
> A thousand laborers ply their task,
> And what it tends to scarcely ask,
> And trembling thinkers on the brink
> Shiver, and know not how to think.
> To tell the purport of their pain,
> And what our silly joys contain;
> In lasting lineaments portray
> The substance of our shadowy day;
> Our real and inner deeds rehearse,
> And make our meaning clear in verse:
> Come, Poet, come! for but in vain
> We do the work or feel the pain,
> And gather up the seeming gain,
> Unless before the end thou come
> To take, ere they are lost, their sum.
> (Clough, "Poems," p. 471.)

This incoherence of modern thought is, perhaps, one of the reasons why our poetry is its reflection and not its guide. For a poet to lead the thought of any period it is necessary that the minds of men should be predisposed to go in certain definite directions, that the paths of possible progress should be broad and well-marked, that there should be a store of energy ready to be directed with overwhelming force into some one of these paths. To be a leader a poet must himself feel the overmastering impulse by which he shall compel men to follow him. If there be no such impulse how can he lead? If the paths do not lie broad and clear before him, but confused and faint, and too numerous to be rightly discerned, the sensitive mind will turn from them, and its poetry will be no guide, but a mere echo of the hesitation and bewilderment of those who doubt whither to advance. Such an echo is the poetry of our age. If there be one characteristic common to most of our leading poets, it is that of doubt, hesitation, questioning of all things. Though Blake wrote,—

> If the sun and moon should doubt,
> They'd immediately go out, a thought which, in spite of its quaintness, expresses a great truth, yet this age has proved that poetry does not require such unhesitating certainty for its work, and a genuine music has been brought out of doubt and vagueness of belief.

We propose to examine the main characteristics of two of the poets of the day, in order to discover the peculiarity in their mode of echoing the confused murmurs of contemporary voices, and especially their treatment of the deeper questions which agitate modern literature. The two poets whom we shall discuss are not our leading poets, but we have selected them partly because they represent a certain large and important section, though only a section, of university thought and culture, and partly because of their position in regard to religion and faith.

Mr. Arnold is so keenly alive to the vagueness and confusion of modern thought,

> The hopeless tangle of our age, and the difficulty of obtaining a clear answer to the problems that haunt us, that we may almost say that his perception of this is the secret of his charm as a poet. He knows that the poet's work differs from the musician's and the artist's chiefly by reason of its complexity. In the "Epilogue to Lessing's 'Laocöon,'" he discusses the causes of the rarity of perfection in poetry compared to music or painting,

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd and finds it in the fact that while painters have only to show one aspect,—

> A moment's life of things that live, and musicians need only

> The feeling of the moment know, and give it utterance, the poet has to mirror life's movement,—

> The thread which binds it all in one,
> And not its separate parts alone.

And as a poet, scanning life in order to discover this thread, he feels himself hopelessly baffled by the complexity of the modern world. Once he thinks flowed unbroken in one deep channel; now it is parted and scattered and wasted, and the poet's efforts to explore its course are mere "misery and distress."

> The stream of life's majestic whole

Mr. Arnold's view, then, of the world is the view of one who feels himself in the turmoil and confusion of a crowd, who is unable to escape from it altogether, but is determined, as far as in him lies, to counteract the wasting and dispersion of his soul's powers. What he longs for is

> One mighty wave of thought and joy,
> Lifting mankind amain.

But this he knows is not to be felt yet in the present; he looks for it to come in the future. In the present we see only

> Blocks of the past, like icebergs high,
> Float on a rolling sea.
> Upon them ply the race of man
> All they before endeavored;
> They come and go, they work and plan,
> And know not they are severed.

Till the reunion, the consolidation of the new world out of the fragments of the old, man must endure. That is the great secret of Mr. Arnold's teaching — endurance. This teaching seems to him necessary because of the hopeless sadness of the age; there is no tone of hope or buoyancy in his finest poems. The world is sad, and the saddest thing is that so few see the sadness of it: —

> Ye slumber in your silent grave!
> The world, which for an idle day
> Grace to your mood of sadness gave,
> Long since hath flung her weeds away.
> The eternal trifler breaks your spell;
> But we — we learnt your love too well!
> There yet, perhaps, may dawn an age,
> More fortunate, alas! than we,
> Which without hardness will be sage,
> And gay without frivolity.
> Sons of the world, oh, haste those years;
> But, till they rise, allow our tears!

Endurance being our duty, we ask, how can man attain to it? It is in Mr. Arnold's answer to this that we perceive the connection between his prose and his poetry.

Few things are more remarkable, at first sight, than the great difference between Mr. Arnold in prose and Mr. Arnold in poetry. His poems are grave, or rather mournful; they have no irreverence, none of what some call "delicate banter," and others flippancy, no levity in the presence of great problems, and scarcely any bitterness: his prose, as we all know, is the very reverse. We prefer to think that his poetry expresses his mind more truly than his prose, and that we may estimate his tone of thought better by the "Stanzas from the Grande Chartreuse," than by "Friendship's Garland" or "Literature and Dogma."

But on more careful inspection one sees that the difference is little more than one of form, though in the case of so genuine an artist difference of form involves more than a mere superficial variation of expression. Still, one who has patience to penetrate beyond the form of his writings can see that the answer given, whether in prose or in poetry, to the great questions which he raises, is substantially the same.

Mr. Arnold is known as the preacher of culture; of the duty, under all circumstances, of self-improvement; not with a view to worldly advancement, not as machinery, but as an end in itself. Our duty in life is to aim at perfecting our nature on all its sides, securing for ourselves "spontaneity of consciousness," so that above all things we should avoid becoming fixed and immovable in any of our notions or habits. About these we must let "a stream of fresh thought play freely," lest we incur that "failure" which, to quote an extreme votary of culture, "is to form habits." Now whether Mr. Arnold's teaching be true or not we do not now attempt to decide; we wish only to point out that it is the teaching of his poetry as well as of his prose, though under a very different form. Whether culture be our duty or not, it is obviously a work that, at least primarily, concerns ourselves; a religion of culture has a tendency to become self-centred. And it is precisely this attribute of self-absorption that we find in Mr. Arnold's poetry. He is possessed with a feeling of the sadness, the vagueness and incompleteness of our life as it is, and the only thing that we can do now is to endure, and endurance is only possible by self-dependence: —

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

With joy the stars perform their shining,
And the sea its long moon-silvered roll;
Why? — self-poised they live, nor pine with noting
All the fever of some differing soul.

Bounded by themselves, and unregardful
In what state God's other works may be,
In their own tasks all their powers pouring,
These attain the mighty life you see.

With this conviction the whole problem of life becomes to the poet not any external truth, not any life or love without him, but the effort to "possess his soul." When, in a very beautiful poem, he would find some power in our life to correspond to the "palladium" which invisibly preserved Troy, he shows it to be the soul: —

Still doth the soul, from its lone fastness high,
Upon our life a ruling effluence send;
And when it fails, fight as we will, we die,
And while it lasts, we cannot wholly end.

This is the remedy for all that we suffer, so far as there is a remedy at all. This formula, for so we may almost call it, Mr. Arnold would apply to all the conditions of our life. And we must notice how it enters into every part of his emotional or intellectual being. It colors his view of human love, of philanthropy, of the world's progress, of religion.

Self-absorption is dominant in his treatment of human love. The series of poems entitled "Switzerland," which for the union of fine thought and delicate expression is almost unrivalled even among Mr. Arnold's writings, is the record of the struggle between the fascination of love and the soul which shrinks from love because it would be self-contained. The final separation which gains for the soul its bitter victory over the love that would have drawn it out of itself, is justified by the afterthought that isolation is not only a duty but a necessity ordained by God. The justification is a deep though partial truth, and is expressed in almost perfect language: —

Yes! in the sea of life enisled,
With echoing straits between us thrown,
Dotting the shoreless watery wild,
We mortal millions live alone.
The islands feel the enclasping flow,
And then their endless bounds they know.

But does it not leave the impression that to the poet the soul's instinctive longing for solitude was the first feeling, and the discovery that was the result, not the cause, of that feeling?

A God, a God their severance ruled

The proud eminence of the soul in its solitude can be rudely disturbed by the passion of human love, but both in "Switzerland" and in "Faded Leaves" the effort is not so much to quell the disturbance by giving a free course to the passion and resting upon an unselfish love, but to forget, to efface the passion, and to preserve to the soul its calmness and self-possession. And there is singularly little about love in these poems. It would seem as if the very mention of a feeling which is essentially unselfish, at least in its first impulse, is foreign to the poet's purpose. Even when he appears to feel the influence of another soul close to his, as in "The Buried Life," where he describes beautifully the peace of love,

When a beloved hand is laid in ours,
When, jaded with the rush and glare
Of the interminable hours,
Our eyes can in another's eyes read clear,
When our world-deafened ear
Is by the tones of a loved one caressed, what is to him the fruit of this, the gain of love? Still self-knowledge and self-possession —

The eye sinks inward, and the heart lies plain,
And what we mean we say, and what we would, we know.

Equally self-absorbed is Mr. Arnold when we might expect the "enthusiasm of humanity" to be a reality to him. It must be owned that very little of this feeling is to be found here. There is at times a fine vision of the progress of mankind, the ultimate goal of perfection to which even now we are tending; but there is no enthusiasm in the tone, it is not to him an inspiring or a joyous theme. We must notice that Mr. Arnold is not a pessimist in the ordinary sense; he believes in progress, and, as we saw in "Obermann Once More," he represents the new world as being even now formed from the fragments of the old. But this does not relieve his melancholy. It is belief, but not hope. What shall be in the future is not for him to share, for he is one of the past, and it is therefore no cause for rejoicing. He can endure present ills, not because he knows that they will end, but because nature and nature's works

Seem to bear rather than rejoice.

And if we would learn from nature we must not look onward so much as inward, and thus

Yearn to the greatness of nature,
Rally the good in the depths of thyself.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

The hope of a glorious future for the world gives him no joy because he feels so strongly the beauty and the charm of the past. He has not yet been caught up in the whirlwind of progress, he does not yet feel the glow of the rising sun, though he has an intellectual conviction that it will rise; and he is haunted by the recollection of what was, and cannot bear to see the world preparing to cast off the old emotions and faiths. Some of the most beautiful lines he ever wrote describe the calm after the "epoch" has ended, before the new world breaks in with its hurry and rushing successes. These he compares to the bacchanals breaking in upon the calm of the evening, and, called upon to admire the "bright new age," he can only answer, —

> Ah, so the silence was!
> So was the hush.

He feels himself neither of the new nor of the old, and in the "Grande Chartreuse" he does not wish to share their faith with "these, last of the people who believe," but only to shed his tears with them.

> Wandering between two worlds, one dead,
> The other powerless to be born,
> With nowhere yet to rest my head,
> Like these, on earth I wait forlorn.
> Their faith, my tears, the world deride;
> I come to shed them at their side.

He cannot throw himself forward into the brilliant future, nor can he feel himself at one with the past; his isolation is complete, he cannot find anything outside himself.

It is hardly necessary to ask whether Mr. Arnold's view of religion affords him a remedy for the sadness which he feels, or whether, here also, his prevailing self-absorption does not pursue him. For we know, from other sources, to what a thin abstraction he has reduced the object of religion, and even if the "eternal that makes for righteousness" be "not ourselves," yet it is not likely that so impalpable an object could draw out of itself a soul that resists the fascination of love and the contagious ardor of human progress. But we shall find that even "Literature and Dogma" is in advance of many of his poems in asserting the existing of something external to us, which we ought to worship.

The prevailing uncertainty and hesitation in religious belief affect him with sorrow; he looks back to the faith which "vigorous teachers" forced him to resign, and mourns that he can no longer share it. But his sorrow arises from a different cause from that which makes many an earnest sceptic lament the clouds of doubt which darken heaven for him: to Mr. Arnold unbelief is sorrowful, not because it darkens the vision of God within us, and covers truth with a cloud, but because it unfits the soul for action, or indeed for contemplation, because it makes us "fluctuate idly without term or scope." In "The Scholar Gipsy," he describes the paralysis of faith, as it might be called; and there is no word of that which faith reveals, and doubt hides from our eyes: —

> We,
> Light half-believers of our casual creeds,
> Who never deeply felt, nor clearly will'd,
> Whose insight never has borne fruit in deeds,
> Whose vague resolves never have been fulfill'd,
> For whom each year we see
> Breeds new beginnings, disappointments new;
> Who hesitate and falter life away,
> And lose to-morrow the ground won to-day.

These verses express well Mr. Arnold's complaint against the tendencies of our age. The vague rebuke of unbelief in the first line is diverted into a wail over the shattering effect of doubt on our own thoughts and actions; of all the charges brought against mankind in the stanza, we imagine Mr. Arnold lays most stress on the first, that "we never deeply felt;" but none of them concern any one but ourselves, and there is no reference to a being beyond us, nor even to the "white Star of Truth," which elsewhere he mentions.

But Mr. Arnold's chief statement of his philosophy of religion is in the fine poem entitled "Obermann Once More," in which he describes the weariness and satiety of the pagan world, the life-giving influence of Christianity poured upon it, and then the gradual waning of the faith which had given the life, and the hope of the new faith which is even now replacing it. But though here Mr. Arnold touches most closely upon the life of Christ, and the religion he founded, it is startling to find how little is said about him, how much about our belief, and the feelings it inspired. He longs for religion, not because that in which religion trusts is true, but because religion is trust. He yearns for the ages of faith, because in them his "ravished spirit" would also have been "caught away," and

> No thoughts that to the world belong
> Had stood against the wave
> Of love which set so deep and strong
> From Christ's then open grave.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

The life of Christ is forgotten or passed over, not because Mr. Arnold does not believe in it, because we know that in a certain sense he does, but because to him the importance of religion lies not in its external reality, but its sensible effect on the soul. So, a few stanzas later, we find the fact and our belief in the fact inextricably confused: —

And centuries came, and ran their course,
  And unspent all that time
Still, still went forth that Child's dear force,
  And still was at its prime.

Ay, ages long endured His span
  Of life, 'tis true received,
That gracious Child, that thorn-crowned Man!
  He lived while we believed.

While we believed, on earth He went,
  And open stood His grave;
Men called from chamber, church, and tent,
  And Christ was by to save.

Here then the highest faculty of man, the divinest thing in him, is employed in casting shadows upon the ground, and falling down and worshipping them. The inspiration and fervor of prayer is justified, not by the fact that there is One to whom we call, whether he will answer us or no, but by our belief that there is such an one. The poet would fain galvanize himself into this belief, but cannot, for

Now He is dead! Far hence He lies
  In the lone Syrian town,
And on His grave, with shining eyes,
  The Syrian stars look down.

What we would specially remark in this poem is not that Mr. Arnold takes little account of Christ's person, for that is not surprising in one who cannot believe that person to be divine, but that he should long for faith in that very person, and persuade himself that the whole force of Christianity was this imagined belief in what "the brooding East" had evolved from her own thought. It can only be explained by reference to that self-absorption which we have described as Mr. Arnold's special characteristic. The truth of religion matters not, so long as we can feel the religious emotion; when that is once passed, we must up and make to ourselves new gods which will afford us fresh emotions, and in their turn will pass and die. But the strangest thing is that the poet seems to fancy that this self-absorption, which in him leads to such results, is the teaching of Christ. The discovery of the East, that by which she converted the Western world, in fact, the secret of Christianity, he describes thus: — "Poor world," she cried, "so deep accurst!

  That runn'st from pole to pole
To seek a draught to slake thy thirst —
  Go, seek it in thy soul;"

or, as Mr. Arnold elsewhere expresses it, in words which by their very sound might have reminded him how contrary to Christ's real teaching they are, —

Resolve to be thyself! and know, that he
Who finds himself, loses his misery.

We do not mean to say that Mr. Arnold's religion is uniformly self-centred, for there are many passages which speak of a "way divine," of an "unseen power whose eye forever doth accompany mankind," of a "Friend of man;" but habitual reference to such a power is not the characteristic of his poetry. And even when he does dwell upon it it is more than doubtful whether his pantheistic tendencies do not make him regard this power as merely the sum of the individual souls of mankind: —

We
Myriads who live, who have lived,
What are we all, but a mood,
A single mood, of the life
Of the Being in whom we exist,
Who alone is all things in one?

We may be wronging Mr. Arnold in this; but whether pantheism or no, there are several passages in his poems which imply the loss of personality in death, and the reabsorption of soul into the one spirit. Yet at other times, notably in the lines to his father's memory, the contrary is suggested.

We have quoted, perhaps, to excess from Mr. Arnold's poems. But the thoughts which we have attempted to analyze cannot be better expressed than in Mr. Arnold's own language. There is a vagueness about the matter, and a pellucid clearness about the form of these poems that render it almost necessary to employ little but the poet's own words in presenting his thought. The matter is the matter, cloudy, varying, and intangible, of nineteenth-century speculation: the form is Greek in its exquisite lucidity and clearness. In reading these poems we are continually met by passages in which no word is superfluous, no phrase is jarring, but that which has to be expressed is expressed once for all. Such a stanza as

But each day brings its petty dust
  Our soon-choked souls to fill,
And we forget because we must,
  And not because we will,

takes us back from the age of word-paint-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ing and novel combinations in language and rhythm, of superabundant epithets and darkened meaning, to the age of Pope, or of Gray, when language was studied and yet clear, artificial and yet simple. Not Mr. Tennyson's richness of detail, not Mr. Browning's rugged power, not Mr. Swinburne's astonishing volume of words can afford to the jaded minds of modern readers the exquisite pleasure which is given by Mr. Arnold's self-restrained purity of language. And if, to correspond to this, there is not the "sad lucidity of soul" which he so much desires, and asserts that "fate" has given to the poet, we may ascribe the want in great measure to the "hopeless tangle of our age," though partly, no doubt, it is due to the vague and unsatisfactory character of the self-possession to which he strives to attain.

We would contrast with Mr. Arnold's tone of thought, with his hopes, his sympathies, and his beliefs, not one of the more definitely Christian poets such as Mr. Tennyson or Mr. Browning, nor one whose irreligion is as definite, such as Mr. Swinburne; but one whom Mr. Arnold would, we suppose, claim as a sympathizer in thought, and who was, indeed, much in the same perplexity and doubt, his friend, Arthur Hugh Clough.

He was one of those whose whole life was colored by the impressions received at Oxford during the stirring years 1837–42. Not one whose faith was raised and fortified by the discussions and the personal influences of the time, but one who, as he himself expressed it, was "like a straw drawn up the draught of a chimney" and afterwards left floating in the air without much of definite guidance or impulse. On first reading Clough's poems we seem to be in an atmosphere of doubt and of little else. Two of his longer poems are entirely occupied with the vacillations of mind which beset those who are starting on life's journey, and can see little before them but an uncertain road and a lowering sky. To one of these he has prefixed the motto, "Il doutait de tout, même de l'amour;" while the name of the other, "Dipsychus," expresses the state of division and wavering which seems to be the lot of "feeble and restless youths born to inglorious days." And the poet's characteristic humor, which is hardly absent from any of his poems, is not exactly a straightforward perception and enjoyment of the incongruities of life, with a consciousness all the while of the preponderating serious realities, but an irony, benevolent and natural, yet at times almost inscrutable, which makes the two sides of life seem inextricably confused. Most of his poems are concerned with the uprooting of old opinions. and share to the full the uncertainty that has invaded all provinces of thought; and his humorous irony tends to increase the appearance of utter confusion in which the world is lying. This causes the difficulty of really getting to the root of his meaning; he is not essentially dramatic like Mr. Browning, for he seldom hides himself behind the mask of another character; but the genial irony of his humor eludes at times any firm apprehension. Read such poems as the "Amours de Voyage," and especially the section beginning, — or the song of the spirit in "Dipsychus,"

> Juxtaposition, in fine; and what is juxtaposition?

> There is no God, the wicked saith; or the verses headed "Wen Gott betrügt, ist wohl betrogen," and the difficulty of disentangling the lines, so to speak, of Clough's thought will be evident. The humor is apparent on the surface, but it is not so easy to discover how deep it goes.

Clough, then, seems to be essentially the poet of doubt; more so, at first sight, than Mr. Arnold himself. It pervades his poems, and we do not find that, like Mr. Arnold, he seeks a refuge in the calm strength and certainty of nature, there to find the endurance so sorely needed; but he rather regards nature as a background to the mixed and confused drama of human life, which it cannot explain nor greatly relieve. His poems are mostly of purely human interest; even those which are speculative derive their impulse from the bearing of speculation on life and duty; and to fly from mankind to seek a higher teaching or a calmer security in nature would be foreign to Clough's instincts. Nature, indeed, is to him, as to Shakespeare or Chaucer (with whom Mr. Hutton has well compared him) an unfailing source of delight, but it is the childlike, unreflecting delight of an earlier period, something of the same kind of feeling as that which he describes in the "Piper" of the reading-party, who > Went, in his life and the sunshine rejoicing, to Nuneham and Godstowe;

> What were the claims of degree to those of life and the sunshine?

Life and the sunshine pervade Clough's poems, but he finds no deep lessons in the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

external beauty that he describes so well, nor does he dwell on nature for its own sake, but rather as the setting and accompaniment of human action. He can with genuine truth feel that > Life is beautiful, Eustace, entrancing, enchanting to look at;

> As are the streets of a city we pace while the carriage is changing,
> As a chamber filled in with harmonious exquisite pictures, but it is human life that he means, and the thought is inspired by what he sees in the streets of Rome, not in the solitudes of nature. Still, the very unself-consciousness of his love of nature makes the feeling all the healthier and happier; there is much of the breeziness of a Scotch moor, or of the open sea, in his poems. It is a strong contrast after Mr. Arnold's cool English scenery, the river bank with its lapping wavelets and the trailing wild-flowers washed by the waters, to come upon Clough's glimpses of the burns descending to the "great still sea," and to feel the keen air of the salt breezes. In his two finest lyrics the chief image is taken from the sea, in the boundless expanse of which he seems to get a special inspiration, while his verse often reminds one of the freedom and motion of the waves. But we do not turn to Clough for an insight into the hidden meanings of nature, nor for a portrayal of the calm and easily overlooked beauties of the world, as we turn to Wordsworth or to Mr. Arnold. What then is the special interest of Clough as a poet?

We have said that he seems to be the poet of doubt, and in this he apparently resembles Mr. Arnold. But it is not only in their view of nature that the two Oxford poets differ; it is impossible to read them without being struck by the essentially different way in which the same intellectual and spiritual facts come before them. And this is especially noticeable in regard to the absorbing question of the certainty of religious truth. Mr. Arnold, as we have seen, is chiefly interested in it as affecting his own consciousness, and regrets the old faiths, and has no very joyous expectation of the future, because he is self-centred. With Clough all this is changed. There is no restless longing for a rest, which is only attainable by means of a sort of stoical endurance, but a strong, buoyant, and somewhat proud confidence in a final truth, and a determination to abide its appearance. Mr. Arnold and Clough are both waiting for what the future shall bring forth; but, unlike the former, Clough waits for it in cheerful hope, not without sympathy for the past, but convinced that the ultimate manifestation will be vouchsafed to man in the future. Thus the different characteristics of the two poets are best illustrated by the differing modes in which they treat an almost identical subject. Both have written short poems on the subject of the final victory of good over evil, light over darkness, but the whole tone is entirely distinct. With Mr. Arnold the central idea is that of the individual soldier baffled and at last overcome in the struggle, and falling with a sort of sullen confidence in the final victory, which, however, seems to afford but little consolation in the prospect:—

> Creep into thy narrow bed,
> Creep, and let no more be said.
> Vain thy onset! all stands fast!
> Thou thyself must break at last.
>
> Let the long contention cease!
> Geese are swans, and swans are geese.
> Let them have it how they will!
> Thou art tired; best be still.
>
> They out-talked thee, hissed thee, tore thee?
> Better men fared thus before thee!
> Fired their ringing shot and passed,
> Hotly charged — and broke at last.
>
> Charge once more, then, and be dumb!
> Let the victors, when they come,
> When the forts of folly fall,
> Find thy body by the wall.

In Clough's poem the individual, far from being the centre, is depicted as the only hindrance to the success of the whole cause; the strife is conceived as almost ended already, and the despondent fighter is rebuked:—

> Say not, the struggle nought availeth,
> The labor and the wounds are vain,
> The enemy faints not, nor faileth,
> And as things have been they remain.
>
> If hopes were dupes, fears may be liars;
> It may be, in yon smoke concealed,
> Your comrades chase e'en now the fliers,
> And, but for you, possess the field.
>
> For while the tired waves, vainly breaking,
> Seem here no painful inch to gain,
> Far back, through creeks and inlets making,
> Comes silent, flooding in, the main,
>
> And not by eastern windows only,
> When daylight comes, comes in the light,
> In front, the sun climbs slow, how slowly,
> But westward, look, the land is bright.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Nothing can be finer than the two images by which he expresses the character of the struggle; the third stanza brings before us at once the whole scene of an incoming tide, with that peculiar sense of the vastness and openness of the sea which distinguishes Clough. The contrast of the whole with the bitter and sarcastic resignation of Mr. Arnold's poem; the different conceptions of the struggle itself; in the one a confused, smoke-enshrouded contest, but in the open field, in the other desperate charges against strongly-held forts; the buoyant hope of victory in the one, and the careless, hardly-mentioned belief in it in the other; all these points afford us some insight into the very distinct characteristics of the two sceptical poets. The difference goes beyond the mere superficial treatment of a subject in a few stanzas; it pervades all their poems. And the fundamental distinction that underlies this superficial unlikeness will, we think, be found to be that while it is doubtful whether Mr. Arnold really holds to, or is possessed by the idea of anything external to himself, in Clough's poems numberless passages express not only his unshaken trust in God, but the great influence which his trust has on all his nature, upon every thought and emotion. And this is the more remarkable, because he cannot define him, or even conceive him.

> I will not prate of "thus" and "so,"
> And be profane with "yes" and "no,"
> Enough that in our soul and heart
> Thou, whatsoe'er Thou may'st be, art.

With a feeling which, to him at least, may have seemed to deserve in some measure our Lord's blessing on "those who have not seen, and yet have believed," he can exclaim, —

> Be Thou but there — in soul and heart,
> I will not ask to feel Thou art.

It is evident that this attitude in regard to truth is very different from Mr. Arnold's emotional and subjective estimate of it. And it is an attitude which, though it must be called one of suspense, must still be distinguished from scepticism; for though Clough rejects all definiitons of God that have yet been promulgated, he does not take pride in believing in an indefinite being, whose only attribute is to be unknowable, but his faith is in a God whom hitherto man has been unable rightly to conceive, but who assuredly will reveal himself to us; and till he does so the poet can wait in patient confidence.

> No God, no Truth, receive it ne'er —
> Believe it ne'er — O Man!
> But turn not then to seek again
> What first the ill began;
> No God, it saith; ah, wait in faith
> God's self-completing plan;
> Receive it not, but leave it not,
> And wait it out, O Man!

The whole of this poem, "The New Sinai," is well worth studying, as a development of Clough's religious philosophy. God, he says, has already rebuked idolatry and polytheism by the declaration, "I am One;" he will hereafter rebuke both the new idolatries and "the atheistic systems dark," which have, like "baby-thoughts," dogged the growing man. Our duty is to wait, not in a forced endurance, but in the belief that

> Some lofty part, than which the heart
> Adopt no nobler can,
> Thou shalt receive, thou shalt believe,
> And thou shalt do, O Man!

The human soul, then, with Clough, is not the centre of the universe, to which all truth must be brought, the object for which all truth exists, but rather one of the attendants at the shrine of truth, of small interest compared with the paramount claims of some being external to us, who is truth and light. To this fact he clings, and here, diametrically opposed to Mr. Arnold, he finds relief from the confused turmoil of modern doubt and speculation.

> It fortifies my soul to know
> That though I perish, Truth is so;
> That, howsoe'er I stray and range,
> Whate'er I do, Thou dost not change.
> I steadier step when I recall
> That, if I slip, Thou dost not fall.

If we bear in mind Clough's conviction that truth is something greater than his soul, and that there may be all the difference in the world between truth and his confused apprehension of it, we shall the better understand his relation to Christianity as a possible form of truth. Though he cannot accept the historical facts of the gospel, yet he is in no hurry to turn away and seek for a new religion. He is earnest in pleading for a humbler attitude of mind, and his complaint against the world is not that its scepticism has perturbed his soul's calm, but that in its hurry and carelessness it may have passed by some essential truth, and therefore he adjures his brother-men to pause: —

> The souls of now two thousand years
> Have laid up here their toils and fears,
> And all the earnings of their pain, —
> Ah, yet consider it again.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

But though Clough's religious attitude is, at first sight, one of intellectual suspense, yet he does not hold truth to be perceptible to the intellect alone, or, at least, he is inclined to follow without reluctance the leadings of the emotions, even where the head cannot justify the conclusions of the heart. So in the wonderfully terse and thoughtful lines headed "Through a Glass Darkly," after suggesting as an alternative, which we know, from his whole tone of mind, he would have rejected with disdain, that we may for assurance sake,

Some arbitrary judgment take,
And wilfully pronounce it clear,
For this or that 'tis we are here;

he declares that the hope which is given to us constrains in a manner our intellect: —

Ah yet, when all is thought and said,
The heart still overrules the head;
Still what we hope we must believe,
And what is given us receive;

Must still believe, for still we hope
That in a world of larger scope,
What here is faithfully begun
Will be completed, not undone.

My child, we still must think, when we
That ampler life together see,
Some true result will yet appear
Of what we are, together, here.

The close of these verses leads us to a further result of Clough's firm trust in some external reality, namely, his longing for "faithful" work upon earth, his belief that genuine labor in the cause of good will have its fruit, either here or elsewhere; and if not, why still it is work, and action is our duty. Even his hesitating heroes, who cannot for themselves decide on any course of action, can see the beauty of definite work, and he pronounces his decision for deeds done in behalf of something not ourselves, rather than for self-culture in words which he puts in the mouth of Dipsychus: —

Ah, not for profit, not for fame,
And not for pleasure's giddy dream,
And not for piping empty reeds,
And not for coloring idle dust;
If live we positively must,
God's name be blest for noble deeds.

This, too, is the moral of "The Bothie of Tober-na-Vuolich;" that the beauty of life comes from its reality, that is, from the reality of the work which we can do on earth. But this is held without attacking culture in the one-sided way which is so common. What he rejects is the false culture which proceeds on the assumption that the object of life is to perfect oneself without regard to the work which has to be done. Some are meant for beauty, others for "subduing the earth and their spirit," and both should do their work. In spite of the longing for simplicity of life, in spite of the superficial flavor of Rousseau in this poem, it is obvious that Clough is far from rejecting either education or civilization. The beauty of Elspie's nature could only be really seen by one who, like Philip, had "the knowledge of self, and wisely instructed feeling." The very form of the poem, the buoyant refinement which the irregular hexameters suggest, the free Scotch life with the accompaniment of academic study and speculation, combine to give us the impression of a mind subtle yet curiously simple, vigorous, though apparently distracted by speculative hesitation. And though the abundant humor of the poem makes it not easy to be sure how far Clough was speaking his own opinions through the mouths of his dramatis personæ, yet both in this and in his other two long poems, "Dipsychus" and "Amours de Voyage," we can hardly doubt that the poet has himself experienced the difficulties and questionings which he depicts. And if this be so it is remarkable how Clough, through all this wavering and cloudiness, never really loses his stand on the firm earth. In most of his speculative poems he brings us back at the close to the solid reality of life and duty, which in the earlier part he has been refining away. He does not solve the problems, but he is certain that there is a solution; and it matters not much whether he individually has the solution or not.

And as limited beings
Scarcely can hope to attain upon earth to an Actual Abstract,
Leaving to God contemplation, to His hands knowledge confiding,
Sure that in us if it perish, in Him it abideth and dies not,
Let us in His sight accomplish our petty particular doings.

So, confident of this, he can afford to lose himself, as it would seem, in the subtle speculations of his poems, such as those which he well describes in "The Questioning Spirit," for they end with the thought, —

I know not, I will do my duty.

After apparently sharing fully in the doubts, and sympathizing with them, he

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

seldom fails, reverting to his secure standpoint, to rebuke the anxious intellect, and to point to that which, after all said, is unwavering and abiding. Take, for example, the fine conclusion of "The Stream of Life:" —

> O end to which our currents tend,
> Inevitable sea,
> To which we flow, what do we know,
> What shall we guess of thee?
>
> A roar we hear upon thy shore,
> As we our course fulfil;
> Scarce we divine a sun will shine
> And be above us still.

Timid unbelief could hardly be more simply and forcibly rebuked; and yet by the very form of the rebuke, "scarce we divine," the poet shows that he enters into the feeling, that he sympathizes with the mind which is confused by the roar of the waves, though at the same time he knows and must point out that the sun is "above us still." For a similar return from the uncertain quagmire of sceptical rationalism to the firm ground of hope and trust, take "Epi-Straussium," in which he accepts the worst that criticism can do, and then points to the sun of truth which still illumines the building, even though it has risen too high for the "pictured panes."

The contrast between Clough and Mr. Arnold can be carried further than the broad differences as to truth and duty. In Mr. Arnold's view of human relations we find the inevitable hopelessness which we believe to be the result of the self-centred attitude of his mind: —

> We leave behind —
> As, chartered by some unknown Powers,
> We stem across the sea by night —
> The joys which were not for our use designed,
> The friends to whom we had no natural right,
> The homes that were not destined to be ours.

Clough, too, imagines separation of friends; he also represents life as a voyage; but what a difference in the tone! What a buoyant motion in the very measure, as of a great ship leaping forward before a strong wind! —

> But, O blithe breeze! and O great seas,
> Though ne'er, that earliest parting past,
> On your wide plain they join again,
> Together lead them home at last.
>
> One port, methought, alike they sought,
> One purpose hold where'er they fare, —
> O bounding breeze, O rushing seas!
> At last, at last unite them there!

His thoughts instinctively turn, after he has felt the parting, to the final goal; the tone is that of joyful hope, while Mr. Arnold ends with calm sadness, looking at the present separation and loss, and at nothing beyond.

But perhaps the strongest contrast — and with this we will conclude — is to be found in their respective treatment of love. Mr. Arnold's we have seen; we have seen him resisting it, reluctantly giving way to the fascination, and wrenching his soul back to its loneliness once more. To Clough it is far more of an interest than it is to his fellow-poet. Many of his poems are occupied with the discussion of love in various aspects; and though this subject cannot escape from his subtle mind without undergoing, like all others, a process of refining away, yet generally in the end he reverts to an extremely simple, and, not conventional but, natural position; and at times raises the mingled selfishness and self-renunciation of love into a higher sphere by means of a lofty conception of duty, in the performance of which united lives are of more avail than solitary: —

> Yet in the eye of life's all-seeing sun
> We shall behold a something we have done,
> Shall of the work together we have wrought,
> Beyond our aspiration and our thought,
> Some not unworthy issue yet receive;
> For love is fellow-service, I believe.

Here we will conclude our examination of the deeper characteristics of these two poets. We have refrained as much as posible from criticising, in the more technical sense; our office has been to explain and to analyze, not to judge. No doubt, analysis and explanation involve, to a certain extent, criticism also; but we have endeavored to refrain, when dealing with men who are undoubtedly poets, and therefore have claims on our reverence, from that special function of modern criticism which consists in a fine perception of blemishes rather than beauties, which delights to tell its hearers not what the poet says, but what he does not say. As poetry, we will not criticise these writings; as containing schemes of life, we will only add, in conclusion, that Mr. Arnold stands self-condemned. From the general tone of his poems it is obvious that the sadness pervading the world remains in himself, in spite of the proud self-absorption which he extols as the remedy; and from one pathetic passage it would seem that he has at times a sense of the inconsistency between his professed object and his method, between the pantheistic absorption into nature at which he aims, and the studied

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd self-culture and isolation in which he would live: —

But mind — but thought —
If these have been the master part of us,
Where will they find their parent element?
What will receive them, who will call them home?
But we shall still be in them, and they in us —
And we shall be the strangers of the world,
And they will be our lords, as they are now;
And keep us prisoners of our consciousness,
And never let us clasp and feel the All
But through their forms, and modes, and stifling veils.
And we shall be unsatisfied as now;
And we shall feel the agony of thirst,
The ineffable longing for the life of life
Baffled forever; and still thought and mind
Will hurry us with them on their homeless march,
Over the unallied unopening earth,
Over the unrecognizing sea.

Self-culture cannot give us a religion; not even the religion of pantheism. And when we turn to Clough, we find that it is precisely in proportion as he feels himself able to cling to somewhat external to him that he is hopeful, energetic, and religious. Would it not therefore seem that, if these poets be representatives of our age, no teaching can satisfy it but that which will give it something external and objective wherein to rest; that no merely emotional, introspective religion will loose the chains which bind us, for they are the chains of self; but that now, as of old, it is only the truth that can make us free?

[Published by arrangement with HARPER & BROTHERS.]

MACLEOD OF DARE

BY WILLIAM BLACK.

CHAPTER XVI.

REBELLION.

AND where was she now — that strange creature who had bewildered and blinded his eyes and so sorely stricken his heart? It was, perhaps, not the least part of his trouble that all his passionate yearning to see her, and all his thinking about her and the scenes in which he had met her, seemed unable to conjure up any satisfactory vision of her. The longing of his heart went out from him to meet — a phantom. She appeared before him in a hundred shapes, now one, now the other; but all possessed with a terrible fascination from which it was in vain for him to try to flee.

Which was she, then — the pale and sensitive and thoughtful-eyed girl who listened with such intense interest to the gloomy tales of the northern seas; who was so fine, and perfect, and delicate; who walked so gracefully and smiled so sweetly; the timid and gentle companion and friend?

Or the wild coquette, with her arch, shy ways, and her serious laughing, and her befooling of the poor stupid lover? He could hear her laugh now; he could see her feed her canary from her own lips. Where was the old mother whom that mad-cap girl teased and petted and delighted?

Or was not this she — the calm and gracious woman who received as a matter of right the multitude of attentions that all men — and women too — were glad to pay her? The air fine about her; the south winds fanning her cheek; the day long, and balmy, and clear. The white-sailed boats glide slowly through the water; there is a sound of music and of gentle talk; a butterfly comes fluttering over the blue summer seas. And then there is a murmuring refrain in the lapping of the waves: Rose-leaf — Rose-leaf — what faint wind will carry you away to the south?

Or this audacious Duchess of Devonshire, with the flashing black eyes, and a saucy smile on her lips? She knows that every one regards her; but what of that? Away she goes through the brilliant throng with that young Highland officer, with glowing light and gay costumes and joyous music all around her. What do you think of her, you poor clown, standing all alone and melancholy, with your cap and bells? Has she pierced your heart too with a flash of the saucy black eyes?

But there is still another vision; and perhaps this solitary dreamer, who has no eyes for the great slopes of Ben-an-Sloich that stretch into the clouds, and no ears for the soft calling of the sea-birds as they wheel over his head, tries hardest to fix this one in his memory. Here she is the neat and watchful house-mistress, with all things bright and shining around her; and she appears, too, as the meek daughter and the kind and caressing sister. Is it not hard that she should be torn from this quiet little haven of domestic duties and family affection to be bound hand and foot in the chains of art, and flung into the arena to amuse that great ghoul-faced thing, the public? The white slave does not complain. While as yet she may she presides over the cheerful table; and the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

beautiful small hands are helpful, and that light morning costume is a wonder of simplicity and grace. And then the garden, and the soft summer air, and the pretty ways of the two sisters: why should not this simple, homely, beautiful life last forever, if only the summer and the roses would last forever?

But suppose now that we turn aside from these fanciful pictures of Macleod's and take a more commonplace one of which he could have no notion whatever? It is night — a wet and dismal night — and a four-wheeled cab is jolting along through the dark and almost deserted thoroughfares of Manchester. Miss Gertrude White is in the cab, and the truth is that she is in a thorough bad temper. Whether it was the unseemly scuffle that took place in the gallery during the performance, or whether it is that the streets of Manchester, in the midst of rain and after midnight, are not inspiriting, or whether it is merely that she has got a headache, it is certain that Miss White is in an ill-humor, and that she has not spoken a word to her maid, her only companion, since together they left the theatre. At length the cab stops opposite a hotel, which is apparently closed for the night. They get out; cross the muddy pavements under the glare of a gas lamp; after some delay get into the hotel; pass through a dimly-lit and empty corridor; and then Miss White bids her maid good-night and opens the door of a small parlor.

Here there is a more cheerful scene. There is a fire in the room; and there is supper laid on the table; while Mr. Septimus White, with his feet on the fender and his back turned to the lamp, is seated in an easy-chair and holding up a book to the light so that the pages almost touch his gold-rimmed spectacles. Miss White sits down on the sofa on the dark side of the room. She has made no response to his greeting of "Well, Gerty?"

At length Mr. White becomes aware that his daughter is sitting there with her things on, and he turns from his book to her.

"Well, Gerty," he repeats, "aren't you going to have some supper?"

"No, thank you," she says.

"Come, come," he remonstrates, "that won't do. You must have some supper. Shall Jane get you a cup of tea?"

"I don't suppose there is any one up below; besides, I don't want it," says Miss White, rather wearily.

"What is the matter?"

"Nothing," she answers; and then she looks at the mantelpiece. "No letter from Carry?"

"No."

"Well, I hope you won't make her an actress, papa," observes Miss White, with no relevance, but with considerable sharpness in her tone.

In fact, this remark was so unexpected and uncalled-for that Mr. White suddenly put his book down on his knee, and turned his gold spectacles full on his daughter's face.

"I will beg you to remember, Gerty," he remarked, with some dignity, "that I did not make you an actress, if that is what you imply. If it had not been entirely your wish, I should never have encouraged you; and I think it shows great ingratitude, not only to me but to the public also, that when you have succeeded in obtaining a position such as any woman in the country might envy, you treat your good fortune with indifference, and show nothing but discontent. I cannot tell what has come over you of late. You ought certainly to be the last to say anything against a profession that has gained for you such a large share of public favor —"

"Public favor!" she said, with a bitter laugh. "Who is the favorite of the public in this very town? Why, the girl who plays in that farce — who smokes a cigarette, and walks round the stage like a man, and dances a breakdown. Why wasn't I taught to dance breakdowns?"

Her father was deeply vexed; for this was not the first time she had dropped small rebellious hints. And if this feeling grew, she might come to question his most cherished theories.

"I should think you were jealous of that girl," said he petulantly, "if it were not too ridiculous. You ought to remember that she is an established favorite here. She has amused these people year after year; they look on her as an old friend; they are grateful to her. The means she uses to make people laugh may not meet with your approval; but she knows her own business, doubtless; and she succeeds in her own way."

"Ah, well," said Miss White, as she put aside her bonnet, "I hope you won't bring up Carry to this sort of life."

"To what sort of life?" her father exclaimed angrily. "Haven't you everything that can make life pleasant? I don't know what more you want. You have not a single care. You are petted and caressed wherever you go. And you ought to have the delight of knowing that the further you advance in your art the further

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

rewards are in store for you. The way is clear before you. You have youth and strength; and the public is only too anxious to applaud whatever you undertake. And yet you complain of your manner of life."

"It isn't the life of a human being at all," she said boldly — but perhaps it was only her headache, or her weariness, or her ill humor, that drove her to this rebellion; "it is the cutting one's self off from every thing that makes life worth having. It is a continual degradation — the exhibition of feelings that ought to be a woman's most sacred and secret possession. And what will the end of it be? Already I begin to think I don't know what I am. I have to sympathize with so many characters — I have to be so many different people — that I don't quite know what my own character is, or if I have any at all ——"

Her father was staring at her in amazement. What had led her into these fantastic notions? While she was professing that her ambition to become a great and famous actress was the one ruling thought and object of her life, was she really envying the poor domestic drudge whom she saw coming to the theatre to enjoy herself with her fool of a husband, having withdrawn for an hour or two from her housekeeping books and her squalling children? At all events, Miss White left him in no doubt as to her sentiments at that precise moment. She talked rapidly, and with a good deal of bitter feeling; but it was quite obvious, from the clearness of her line of contention, that she had been thinking over the matter. And while it was all a prayer that her sister Carry might be left to live a natural life, and that she should not be compelled to exhibit, for gain or applause, emotions which a woman would naturally lock up in her own heart, it was also a bitter protest against her own lot. What was she to become, she asked? A dram-drinker of fictitious sentiment? A ten-minutes' emotionalist? It was this last phrase that flashed in a new light on her father's bewildered mind. He remembered it instantly. So that was the source of inoperation?

"Oh, I see now," he said, with angry scorn. "You have learned your lesson well. A 'ten-minutes' emotionalist;' I remember. I was wondering who had put such stuff into your head."

She colored deeply; but said nothing.

"And so you are taking your notion, as to what sort of life you would lead, from a Highland savage — a boor whose only occupations are eating and drinking and killing wild animals. A fine guide, truly! He has had so much experience of æsthetic matters! Or is it metapheesics is his hobby? And what, pray, is his notion as to what life should be? That the noblest object of a man's ambition should be to kill a stag? It was a mistake for Dante to let his work eat into his heart; he should have devoted himself to shooting rabbits. And Raphael — don't you think he would have improved his digestion by giving up pandering to the public taste for pretty things, and taking to hunting wild boars? That is the theory, isn't it? Is that the metapheesics you have learned?"

"You may talk about it," she said, rather humbly, for she knew very well she could not stand against her father in argument, especially on a subject that he rather prided himself on having mastered, "but you are not a woman, and you don't know what a woman feels about such things."

"And since when have you made the discovery? What has happened to convince you so suddenly that your professional life is a degradation?"

"Oh," she said, carelessly "I was scarcely thinking of myself. Of course I know what lies before me. It was about Carry I spoke to you."

"Carry shall decide for herself, as you did; and when she has done so, I hope she won't come and blame me the first time she gets some ridiculous idea into her head."

"Now, papa, that isn't fair," the eldest sister said, in a gentler voice. "You know I never blamed you. I only showed you that even a popular actress sometimes remembers that she is a woman. And if she is a woman, you must let her have a grumble occasionally."

This conciliatory tone smoothed the matter down at once; and Mr. White turned to his book with another recommendation to his daughter to take some supper and get to bed.

"I will go now," she said, rather wearily, as she rose. "Good-night, papa — what is that?"

She was looking at a parcel that lay on a chair.

"It came for you, to-night. There was seven and sixpence to pay for extra carriage — it seems to have been forwarded from place to place."

"As if I had not enough luggage to carry about with me!" she said.

But she proceeded to open the parcel all the same, which seemed to be very care-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

fully swathed in repeated covers of canvas. And presently she uttered a slight exclamation. She took up one dark object after another, passing her hand over them, and back again, and finally pressing them to her cheek.

"Just look at these, papa — did you ever in all your life see anything so beautiful?"

She came to a letter, too; which she hastily tore open and read. It was a brief note, in terms of great respect, written by Sir Keith Macleod, and begging Miss White's acceptance of a small parcel of otter-skins, which he hoped might be made into some article of attire. Moreover, he had asked his cousin's advice on the matter; and she thought there were enough; but if Miss White on further inquiry found she would rather have one or two more, he had no doubt that within the next month or so he could obtain these also. It was a very respectful note.

But there was no shyness or timidity about the manner of Miss White when she spread those skins out along the sofa, and again and again took them up to praise their extraordinary glossiness and softness.

"Papa," she exclaimed, "it is a present fit for a prince to make."

"I daresay you will find them useful."

"And whatever is made of them," said she, with decision, "that I shall keep for myself — it won't be one of my stage properties."

Her spirits rose wonderfully. She kept on chatting to her father about these lovely skins, and the jacket she would have of them. She asked why he was so dull that evening. She protested that she would not take any supper unless he had some too; whereupon he had a biscuit and a glass of claret, which at all events compelled him to lay aside his book. And then, when she had finished her supper, she suddenly said, —

"Now, pappy dear, I am going to tell you a great secret. I am going to change the song in the second act."

"Nonsense!" said he; but he was rather glad to see her come back to the interest of her work.

"I am," she said seriously. "Would you like to hear it?"

"You will wake the house up."

"And if the public expect an actress to please them," she said saucily, "they must take the consequences of her practising."

She went to the piano, and opened it. There was a fine courage in her manner as she struck the chords and sang the opening lines of the gay song: —

"Threescore o' nobles rode up the king's ha',
But bonnie Glenogie's the flower o' them a',
Wi' his milk-white steed and his bonnie black e'e," but here her voice dropped, and it was almost in a whisper that she let the maiden of the song utter the secret wish of her heart —

"'Glenogie, dear mither, Glenogie for me.'"

"Of course," she said, turning round to her father, and speaking in a business-like way, though there was a spice of proud mischief in her eyes, "there is a stumbling-block, or where would the story be? Glenogie is poor; the mother will not let her daughter have anything to do with him; the girl takes to her bed with the definite intention of dying."

She turned to the piano again.

"There is, Glenogie, a letter for thee,
Oh, there is, Glenogie, a letter for thee.
The first line he looked at, a light laugh laughed he;
But ere he read through it, tears blinded his e'e."

"How do you like the air, papa?"

Mr. White did not seem over well pleased. He was quite aware that his daughter was a very clever young woman; and he did not know what insane idea might have got into her head of throwing an allegory at him.

"The air," said he coldly, "is well enough. But I hope you don't expect an English audience to understand that doggerel Scotch."

"Glenogie understood it, anyway," said she, blithely, "and naturally he rode off at once to see his dying sweetheart.

"Pale and wan was she, when Glenogie gaed ben,
But rosy-red grew she when Glenogie sat down.
She turned away her head, but the smile was in her e'e,
'Oh, binna feared, mither, I'll maybe no dee.'"

She shut the piano.

"Isn't it charmingly simple and tender, papa?" she said, with the same mischief in her eyes.

"I think it is foolish of you to think of exchanging that piece of doggerel ——"

"For what?" said she, standing in the middle of the room. "For this?"

And therewith she sang these lines — giving an admirable burlesque imitation of herself, and her own gestures, and her

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

own singing in the part she was then performing: —

"The morning bells are swinging, ringing,
Hail to the day!
The birds are winging, singing
To the golden day,
To the joyous day.
The morning bells are swinging, ringing,
And what do they say?
O bring my love to my love,
O bring my love to-day!
O bring my love to my love,
To be my love alway!"

It certainly was cruel to treat poor Mrs. Ross's home-made lyric so; but Miss White was burlesquing herself as well as the song she had to sing. And as her father did not know to what lengths this iconoclastic fit might lead her, he abruptly bade her good night and went to bed, no doubt hoping that next morning would find the demon exorcised from his daughter.

As for her, she had one more loving look over the skins, and then she carefully read through the note that accompanied them. There was a smile on her face — perhaps of pleasure, perhaps of amusement at the simplicity of the lines. However, she turned aside, and got hold of a small writing-desk, which she placed on the table.

"Oh, here is, Glenogie, a letter for thee," she hummed to herself, with a rather proud look on her face, as she seated herself and opened the desk.

CHAPTER XVII.

"FHIR A BHATA!"

YOUNG Ogilvie had obtained some brief extension of his leave, but even that was drawing to a close; and Macleod saw with a secret dread that the hour of his departure was fast approaching. And yet he had not victimized the young man. After that first burst of confidence he had been sparing in his references to the trouble that had beset him. Of what avail, besides, could Mr. Ogilvie's counsels be? Once or twice he had ventured to approach the subject with some commonplace assurances that there were always difficulties in the way of two people getting married, and that they had to be overcome with patience and courage. The difficulties that Macleod knew of as between himself and that impossible goal were deeper than any mere obtaining of the consent of friends or the arrangement of a way of living. From the moment that the terrible truth was forced on him he had never regarded his case but as quite hopeless; and yet that in no way moderated his consuming desire to see her — to hear her speak — even to have correspondence with her. It was something that he could send her a parcel of otter-skins.

But all the same, Mr. Ogilvie was in some measure a friend of hers. He knew her — he had spoken to her — no doubt when he returned to the south he would see her one day or another, and he would surely speak of the visit he had paid to Castle Dare. Macleod set about making that visit as pleasant as might be; and the weather aided him. The fair heavens shone over the windy blue seas; and the green island of Ulva lay basking in the sunlight; and as the old "Umpire," with her heavy bows parting the rushing waves, carried them out to the west, they could see the black skarts standing on the rocks of Gometra, and clouds of puffins wheeling round the dark and lonely pillars of Staffa; while away in the north, as they got clear of Treshanish Point, the mountains of Rum and of Skye appeared a pale and spectral blue, like ghostly shadows at the horizon. And there was no end to the sports and pastimes that occupied day after day. On their very first expedition up the lonely corries of Ben-an-Sloich young Ogilvie brought down a royal hart — though his hand trembled for ten minutes after he pulled the trigger. They shot wild-duck in Lock Scridain, and seals in Lock-na-Keal, and rock-pigeons along the face of the honey-combed cliffs of Gribun. And what was this new form of sport? They were one day being pulled in the gig up a shallow loch in hope of finding a brood or two of young mergansers, when Macleod, who was seated up at the bow, suddenly called to the man to stop. He beckoned to Ogilvie, who went forward, and saw, quietly moving over the seaweed, a hideously ugly fish with the flat head and sinister eyes of a snake. Macleod picked up the boat-hook, steadied himself in the boat, and then drove the iron spike down.

"I have him," he said. "That is the snake of the sea — I hate him as I hate a serpent."

He hoisted out of the water the dead dogfish, which was about four feet long, and then shook it back.

"Here, Ogilvie," said he, "take the boat-hook. There are plenty about here. Make yourself St. Patrick exterminating snakes."

Ogilvie tried the dogfish spearing with

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

more or less success; but it was the means of procuring for him a bitter disappointment. As they went quietly over the seaweed — the keel of the boat hissing through it and occasionally grating on the sand — they perceived that the water was getting a bit deeper, and it was almost impossible to strike the boat-hook straight. At this moment, Ogilvie, happening to cast a glance along the rocks close by them, started and seized Macleod's arm. What the frightened eyes of the younger man seemed to see was a great white and gray object lying on the rocks and staring at him with huge black eyes. At first it almost appeared to him to be a man with a grizzled and hairy face; then he tried to think of some white beast with big black eyes; then he knew. For the next second there was an unwieldy roll down the rocks, and then a heavy splash in the water; and the huge gray seal had disappeared. And there he stood helpless, with the boat-hook in his hand.

"It is my usual luck," said he, in despair. "If I had had my rifle in my hand, we should never have got within a hundred yards of the beast. But I got an awful fright. I never before saw a live seal just in front of one's nose like that."

"You would have missed him," said Macleod coolly.

"At a dozen yards?"

"Yes. When you come on one so near as that, you are too startled to take aim. You would have blazed away and missed."

"I don't think so," said Ogilvie, with some modest persistence. "When I shot that stag, I was steady enough, though I felt my heart thumping away like fun."

"There you had plenty of time to take your aim — and a rock to rest your rifle on." And then he added: "You would have broken Hamish's heart, Ogilvie, if if you had missed that stag. He was quite determined you should have one on your first day out; and I never saw him take such elaborate precautions before. I suppose it was terribly tedious to you; but you may depend on it it was necessary. There isn't one of the younger men can match Hamish, though he was bred a sailor."

"Well," Mr. Ogilvie admitted, "I began to think we were having a great deal of trouble for nothing; especially when it seemed as though the wind was blowing half a dozen ways in the one valley."

"Why, man," Macleod said, "Hamish knows every one of those eddies just as if they were all down on a chart. And he is very determined, too, you shall have another stag before you go, Ogilvie; for it is not much amusement we have been giving you since you came to us."

"That is why I feel so particularly jolly at the notion of having to go back," said Mr. Ogilvie, with very much the air of a schoolboy at the end of his holiday. "The day after to-morrow, too."

"To-morrow, then, we will try to get a stag for you; and the day after you can spend what time you can at the pools in Glen Muick."

These two last days were right royal days for the guest at Castle Dare. On the deer-stalking expedition Macleod simply refused to take his rifle with him, and spent all his time in whispered consultations with Hamish, and with eager watching of every bird whose solitary flight along the mountain-side might startle the wary hinds. After a long day of patient and stealthy creeping, and walking through bogs and streams, and slow toiling up rocky slopes, the party returned home in the evening; and when it was found that a splendid stag — with brow, bay, and tray, and crockets complete — was strapped on to the pony, and when the word was passed that Sandy the red-haired and John from the yacht were to take back the pony to a certain well-known cairn where another monarch of the hills lay slain, there was a great rejoicing through Castle Dare, and Lady Macleod herself must needs come out to shake hands with her guest and to congratulate him on his good fortune.

"It is little we have been able to do to entertain you," said the old silver-haired lady, "but I am glad you have got a stag or two."

"I knew what Highland hospitality was before I came to Castle Dare," said the boy modestly. "But you have been kinder to me even than anything I knew before."

"And you will leave the heads with Hamish," said she, "and we will send them to Glasgow to be mounted for you, and then we will send them south to you."

"Indeed, no," said he (though he was thinking to himself that it was no wonder the Macleods of Dare were poor); "I will not put you to any such trouble. I will make my own arrangements with Hamish."

"Then you will tell him not to forget Aldershot."

"I think, Lady Macleod," said the young lieutenant, "that my mess-companions will be sorry to hear that I have left Dare. I should think they ought to have drunk your health many times ere now."

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Next day, moreover, he was equally successful by the side of the deep brown pools in Glen Muick. He was a pretty fair fisherman, though he had had but small experience with such a mighty engine of a rod as Hamish put into his hands. When, however, he showed Hamish the fine assortment of salmon flies he had brought with him, the old man only shook his head. Thereafter, whenever Hamish went with him, nothing was said about flies until they neared the side of the brawling stream that came pouring down between the gray rocks and the patches of moist brown moor. Hamish would sit down on a stone, and take out a tin box and open it. Then he would take a quick look round — at the aspect of the clouds, the direction of the wind, and so forth; and then, with a nimbleness that any one looking at his rough hands and broad thumbs would have considered impossible, would busk up a weapon of capture that soon showed itself to be deadly enough. And on this last day of Ogilvie's stay at Castle Dare he was unusually lucky — though of course there were one or two heart-rending mishaps. As they walked home in the evening — the lowering day had cleared away into a warm sunset, and they could see Colonsay, and Fladda, and the Dutchman's Cap, lying dark and purple on a golden sea — Ogilvie said, —

"Look here, Macleod, if you would like me to take one of these salmon for Miss White, I could take it as part of my luggage, and have it delivered at once."

"That would be no use," said he, rather gloomily. "She is not in London. She is at Liverpool or Manchester by this time. I have already sent her a present."

Ogilvie did not think fit to ask what; though he had guessed.

"It was a parcel of otter-skins," Macleod said. "You see, you might present that to any lady — it is merely a curiosity of the district — it is no more than if an acquaintance were to give me a chip of quartz he had brought from the Rocky Mountains with a few grains of copper or silver in it."

"It is a present any lady would be glad to have," observed Mr. Ogilvie, with a smile. "Has she got them yet?"

"I do not know," Macleod answered. "Perhaps there is not time for an answer. Perhaps she has forgotten who I am, and is affronted at a stranger sending her a present."

"Forgotten who you are!" Ogilvie exclaimed; and then he looked round to see that Hamish and Sandy the red-haired were at a convenient distance. "Do you know this, Macleod? A man never yet was in love with a woman without the woman being instantly aware of it."

Macleod glanced at him quickly; then turned away his head again, apparently watching the gulls wheeling high over the sea — black spots against the glow of the sunset.

"That is foolishness," said he. "I had a great care to be quite a stranger to her all the time I was in London. I myself scarcely knew — how could she know? Sometimes I thought I was rude to her, so that I should deceive myself into believing she was only a stranger."

Then he remembered one fact, and his downright honesty made him speak again.

"One night, it is true," said he — "it was the last night of my being in London — I asked a flower from her. She gave it to me. She was laughing at the time. That was all."

The sunset had gone away, and the clear northern twilight was fading too, when young Ogilvie, having bade good-by to Lady Macleod and her niece Janet, got into the broad-beamed boat of the fishermen, accompanied by his friend. There was something of a breeze, and they hoisted a lug-sail so that they should run out to meet the steamer. Donald the piper lad was not with them: Macleod wanted to speak to his friend Ogilvie as he was leaving.

And yet he did not say anything of importance. He seemed to be chiefly interested in finding out whether Ogilvie could not get a few days' leave about Christmas, that he might come up, and try the winter shooting. He was giving minute particulars about the use of arsenic paste when the box of skins to be despatched by Hamish reached London. And he was discussing what sort of mounting should be put on a strange old bottle that Janet Macleod had presented to the departing guest. There was no word of that which lay nearest his heart.

And so the black waves rolled by them; and the light at the horizon began to fade; and the stars were coming out one by one; while the two sailors forward (for Macleod was steering) were singing to themselves, —

Fhir a bhata (na horo eile)
Fhir a bhata (na horo eile)
Fhir a bhata (na horo eile)
Chead soire slann leid ge thobh a theid u;

that is to say, —

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

O boatman,
And boatman,
And boatman,
A hundred farewells to you wherever you may go!

And then the lug-sail was hauled down; and they lay on the lapping water; and they could hear all around them the soft callings of the guillemots and razor-bills, and other divers whose home is the heaving wave. And then the great steamer came up and slowed; and the boat was hauled alongside, and young Ogilvie sprang up the slippery steps.

"Good-by, Macleod!"

"Good-by, Ogilvie! Come up at Christmas!"

The great bulk of the steamer soon floated away, and the lug-sail was run up again, and the boat made slowly back for Castle Dare. "Fhir a bhata!" the men sung; but Macleod scarcely heard them. His last tie with the south had been broken.

But not quite. It was about ten o'clock that night that word came to Castle Dare that Dugald the post had met with an accident that morning while starting from Bunessan; and that his place had been taken by a young lad who had but now arrived with the bag. Macleod hastily looked over the bundle of newspapers, etc., they brought him, and his eager eye fell on an envelope, the writing on which made his heart jump.

"Give the lad a half-crown," said he.

And then he went to his own room. He had the letter in his hand; and he knew the handwriting; but there was no wind of the night that could bring him the mystic message she had sent with it,—

"Oh here is, Glenogie, a letter for thee!"

From Macmillan's Magazine.

THOMAS ARNOLD, D.D.*

FEW men have left behind them a fairer or more enviable reputation than Dr. Arnold. He died at the age of forty-seven, and was head master at Rugby for only fourteen years; yet that brief life exercised a powerful influence, not only upon the generation to which he belonged, but still more upon that which has succeeded him; and in those fourteen years he achieved a work of almost immeasurable usefulness and importance. The sermons preached during this crowning epoch of his life have now been collected in six volumes by the loving care of his eldest daughter, Mrs. W. E. Forster. They are admirably arranged and edited. Those of the previously published sermons which had least of permanent value and interest have been excluded from the collection, and there can be little doubt that in their present form they will take their final and permanent place in English literature. The publication of this edition is the greatest service which has been rendered to the memory of a great and good man since the Dean of Westminster wrote that admirable "Life of Dr. Arnold" which has served to perpetuate his work, and has been deservedly welcomed as perhaps the best biography of recent times.

Some books may almost be said, without a paradox, to die of their own immortality. They do their work so effectually as to render themselves needless, and they are effaced because the thoughts to which they gave original expression have become the common heritage of even the least original minds. The unfamiliar views of one decade often pass into the commonplaces of the next, and the reputed heresies of our youth are sometimes the accepted orthodoxies of our manhood. The remark is illustrated both by these sermons of Dr. Arnold and by those of the eminent contemporary with whom he often found himself in respectful antagonism. When we read the sermons of Dr. Newman, we admire the subtlety of their insight, the loftiness of their spirituality, the curiosa felicitas of a style which, while it often seems to aim at an almost bald simplicity, keeps us spell-bound with an unaccountable fascination. Yet so completely have the religious thoughts, and even the phraseology, of "Mr. Newman of Oriel," passed into our current homiletic literature, so familiar has even his peculiar pronunciation and method of delivery become, that we can hardly account for the fact that his sermons were once regarded with intense suspicion, and were believed by large sections of the Church to teem with the subtlest insinuations of dangerous heresy. Different in all respects as were the sermons of Dr. Arnold, a similar remark applies to them. He says: "It would be affectation were I to dissemble my knowledge that these volumes will be received in many quarters with a strong prejudice against them;"* and he evidently antici-

* Arnold's Sermons. In Six Volumes. New Edition, Revised by his Daughter, Mrs. W. E. Forster. Longmans.

* Vol. iii., p. v.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

pates that they will have so far diverged from the accurate intonation of the then prevailing shibboleths, that they will be charged with being "latitudinarian." Few who now read them without traditional bias would think of reviving so obsolete a charge. When we read in the introductions to the various volumes, a plea that Christians should get over their extreme reluctance to admit the principles of Christianity into the concerns of common life, and not "ridicule as visionary and impracticable" an application of its spirit to their every-day practice,* we feel what a change has come over the popular views on such subjects. In these days we could hardly think it needful to argue that "a sermon addressed to Englishmen in the nineteenth century, should be very different from one addressed to Englishmen in the sixteenth, or even in the eighteenth;" or that it is most undesirable to reserve, for the use of religious exhortation, a stereotyped and conventional phraseology. The sermon on "The Unity of the Spirit" † might be preached in these days without its occurring to any critic that it would needlessly encourage an excessive indifference as to variety of religious opinions, and too low an estimate of the advantages of agreement even in the outward forms of Christianity. The famous sermons on "Moral Thoughtfulness," and those on "The Temptations of School Life," have had so many successors which are even stronger and plainer in their language, that, had they been preached in these days, they would have produced no further impression than such as was created by the noble and commanding personality of him who uttered them. Under these circumstances it might have been considered needless to collect and edit the sermons in any other form than those in which they have been hitherto accessible. Yet we cannot but rejoice on many grounds that this edition has been published. The sermons deserve preservation in the best possible form, not only because they belong to the history of English social life, in that phase of it which is most characteristic, and of which we have most reason to be proud; not only as having inaugurated a new form of literature, which, however humble, may tend to results of priceless value; not only because they throw light on the mind and character of a brave, enlightened, and noble-hearted teacher; but even from their own intrinsic merits. The truths which Arnold was the first to bring into prominence, in such aspects of them as bore most directly upon the life of public schools, have, since his time, found frequent expression, but have never been expressed in directer or manlier language. Even in style his sermons were fresh, forcible, and in the highest sense, eloquent. More than once, indeed, Arnold speaks of his style in a tone of apology. "In point of style," he says, "these sermons are wholly devoid of pretension; for my main object was to write intelligibly, and, if I have succeeded in this, I must be contented to be censured for much homeliness, and perhaps awkwardness of expression, which I had not the skill to avoid." * But if a man's style be but perfectly sincere, and perfectly natural, he can never alter it to advantage, nor is he likely to express in any better way the truths which he has to deliver. The very "defects" of his style may thus be "effective," and few men had less need than Arnold to apologize for any deficiencies in expression. His style is a very model of strength and straightforwardness, of lucid reasoning and manly good sense. As he was original in desiring to apply "the language of common life to the cases of common life, but ennobled and strengthened by those principles and feelings which are found only in the gospel," so there are no better specimens of this method of preaching than those which he has furnished. Arnold wrote his Rugby sermons for the most part between morning and afternoon service, and preached them before the ink was well dry on the last page. It is to this very fact that much of their charm and force is due. A man whose mind was less fresh, and pure, and strong, could not do this; but Arnold's thoughts were well-matured, and were held with a grasp unusually firm, and the rapidity with which they were thrown into form gave them all the eloquence which springs from the emotion of the moment, so that they have something of the fire and rapidity of the extempore orator. Arnold was too sure of the truth and value of what he had to say to need any ornament in its expression. He never seeks an illustration; he never consciously elaborates a closing paragraph. But when he does use an illustration, it is often an exceedingly happy one; and when his style rises to a more impassioned strain, it reaches a high level of natural eloquence. What can be more forcible than the com-

* Vol. i., p. viii.
† Vol. i., p. 50.

* Vol. i., p. viii.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

parison — perhaps the longest in these six volumes, and one so applicable to thousands at this period — of the condition of fallen man to that of "men who are bewildered in those endless forests of reed which line some of the great American rivers," * in danger from the venomous snakes and the deadly malaria, ignorant of the path, and "in doubt whether the tangled thicket in which they are placed has any end at all; whether the whole world is not such a region of death as the spot in which they are actually prisoned; whether their fond notions of a clear and open space, a pure air, and a fruitful and habitable country, are not altogether imaginary; whether there remains anything for them but to curse their fate, and lie down and die." † What again can be better than this? "As the vessels in a harbor, and in the open sea without it, may be seen swinging with the tide at the same moment in opposite directions; the ebb has begun in the roadstead, while it is not yet high water in the harbor; so one or more nations may be in advance of or behind the general tendency of their age, and from either cause may be moving in the opposite direction." And to take passages in which there is no illustration, what boy with a heart in him could have listened unmoved to such sermons as the two on "Christian Schools," ‡ or to the noble and stirring appeal, a rare example of glowing emotion expressed in the language of perfect self-control, which concludes the stern, yet touching, sermon on "Death and Salvation"? § Sermons like these will never become obsolete. There is not one master of any public school in England who might not profit from the study of them. There is not one, I suppose, who would not admit that as these are among the earliest specimens in our literature of school sermons, so even in a generation which possesses Bishop Cotton's Marlborough sermons, and Dr. Vaughan's "Memorials of Harrow Sundays," they still remain the best models of what school sermons ought to be. One, at any rate, who once had the honor of being a headmaster, may be allowed the humble testimony that he would have hailed these volumes, had they appeared a year or two ago, with the deepest gratitude, and might have reaped from them advantages which he regrets never to have possessed.

It must not, however, be supposed that the majority of these sermons would only be valuable to schoolmasters. It is one distinct element of their merit that very many of them do not bear directly upon school life at all; and that even when they were addressed to youthful audiences, they aimed at awakening interests which extended far beyond the narrow horizon of boyish vision. Three especially of these volumes — the third, fourth, and sixth — have a permanent theological value, and the notes and introductions to them might be read with great profit by many of our clergy as the best possible antidote to prevalent errors. The merits and influence of Arnold as a theologian have, I think, been underrated. At any rate I can recall but few modern clergymen whose opinions would furnish a more wholesome study. The note of disestablishment has been clearly heard, and nothing can avert that national disaster so surely and so satisfactorily as a timely wisdom and liberality on the part of Churchmen. Already the increase of diligence and faithfulness and devotion among the clergy have won for their entire order a respect which, but for other circumstances, would have gone very far to disarm all semblance of national, and almost of political, hostility. But side by side with this wide, self-denying energy has grown up a spirit of clericalism and sacerdotalism, which, unless checked, will be socially and religiously fatal to the existence of the Established Church. By clericalism I mean that elaborate separation from the laity which is but too plainly symbolized by peculiarities of dress, pronunciation, and bearing; and which, in its occasional developments, is made the excuse for that charge of effeminacy so unjustly brought against the clergy. But this effeminacy, if it can fairly be charged at all against any of the clergy in social matters, is less common, and far less injurious, than the timidity of thought, the cowardice in the expression of opinion, the dread of diverging a hairsbreadth from the current "orthodoxy," the want of fearless independence and honest forthrightness, the tendency to run in well-oiled grooves, the conventionality of language which serves to cloak real divergences of opinion, the adoption of a phraseology purely professional — in one word, the want of perfect reality, naturalness, and manly independence — which may at times be noted as a grave fault in some of our ordinary theological literature. To read Arnold's sermons, after reading too many of those which are now in vogue, is like passing out of the conservatory into

* Vol. iv., p. ii.
† Vol. iv., p. x.
‡ Vol. v., pp. 40-62.
§ Vol. v., p. 155.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the free air and eager breeze of heaven. And if the faults to which I have alluded be what is commonly meant by "clericalism," then "sacerdotalism" is its still more dangerous kinsman. By sacerdotalism I mean the assumption of supernatural privileges of such a kind as to glorify and elevate the individual and his order, to identify the Church more and more with the clergy, and to substitute the word "priest" in all its sacrificial, heathen, and mediæval connotations for the word in its sense of "presbyter," in which sense alone it is recognized by the New Testament, and by the English Church. To this social tendency, and this religious corruption, Arnold was a brave and uncompromising though a perfectly courteous and considerate foe. The manner of his controversial essays is as commendable as the matter is forcible. He never descends for one moment to that coarse and bitter railing by which fanatical ignorance strives to conceal the utter absence of ability and knowledge.

While directing many a powerful blow against the principles of the Oxford school, Arnold always spoke of the individual writers of that school not only with perfect kindness but even with sympathy and respect. Yet all his principles made him the severe opponent of every practice and theory which tended to draw ineradicable lines of distinction between the clergy and the laity. Want of intellectual manliness is the very last charge which any one could ever have brought against Thomas Arnold. There was nothing exotic about his sentiments, nothing conventional about his language. He was a model for all clergymen in this respect more than all others, that — like Canon Kingsley — he was every inch a man. And he had the faith of a man in all its vigor — the faith which would have scorned any mere respectful complaisance at the hands of an opponent — the faith which desired the pure air of heaven and the clear light of day. If there was one thing which he detested more than another it was an insincere argument. He saw no sanctity in pretentious incompetence. Ignorance never appeared to him any the more venerable because it uttered its dicta as from an oracle. He earnestly labored to destroy that un-christian superstition which, as a necessary consequence of straining at the gnat, forever swallows the camel. Clearly perceiving that the business of a theologian consists in the twofold work of interpreting the Scriptures and of applying them, — of which the first requires a study of criticism and philology, and the second a knowledge of our own and former times, together with the general constitution of the human mind and character, — he had but little respect for a large proportion of what is called divinity, and openly stated his opinion that the writings of unqualified divines were in theology particularly worthless. Arnold here hit upon a temptation to which some religious teachers are particularly liable. Accustomed to teach authoritatively, and to have their utterances accepted as authoritative by the majority of those immediately around them, they have been too apt in all ages to assume for themselves a monopoly of orthodoxy, and to attach a most extravagant importance to the assertion of their individual opinions, and that too on subjects with which they do not even possess an elementary acquaintance. We who are clergymen should not resent the warning that the intensity of our prejudices is no true measure of the value of our convictions, and that no spectacle is more saddening than that of

> Blind Authority beating with his staff
> The child that might have led him; or that of ignorance taking itself for infallibility, and anathematizing what it does not understand. Against such dangers — increased a thousandfold in those who breathe that intoxicating incense of support and flattery which is weekly burned for their adherents by our party religious newspapers — the writings of Arnold will form an admirable preservative. It is impossible, in the brief space at my disposal, to analyze his remarks on the value of historical study to all who are called upon to preach; but how different would have been the tone and the writings of some of our clergy if they had followed the advice given in the introduction to the "Sermons on Christian Life and Doctrine!" How unspeakably might many of them have profited by turning away from the perilous employment of perpetually contemplating narrow-mindedness and weakness in conjunction with much of piety and goodness, by turning to the great springs of truth, human and divine — to the Scriptures to remind us that Christianity is in itself wholly free from the foolishness thrown round it by some of its professors; to the great writers of human genius, to save us from viewing the Scriptures themselves through the medium of ignorance and prejudice, and lowering them by our perverse interpretations in order to make them countenance our errors.*

* Vol. iii., p. xiii. seq.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

All of us might learn a lesson of lifelong value if we would merely accept the advice which Arnold gave forty years ago — never to lay aside the greatest works of human genius of whatever age or country; to read the lives of the saints, and good Christian biography of all ages; not to misquote and misinterpret Scriptures by harping on isolated texts without sufficiently exercising our minds to master the meaning of profound and difficult writers; and to acquire comprehensive views of large portions of the sacred volume taken together.

It would carry me too far were I to speak of Arnold's views — liberal and enlightened as they were — on the true relations of Church and State, and his condemnation of that fatal tendency to which he does not hesitate to apply the term "the antichrist of priesthood." He held that the main truth of the Christian religion barred for all time the very notion of a mediatorial or sacrificial priesthood. He held that there was and could be but one priesthood — that of Christ; and one mediator — the Man Christ Jesus; and that there was no point of the priestly office properly so called in which the claim of the earthly priest was not absolutely precluded. There is no place at all for such a priest for sacrifice, since there is but one atoning sacrifice which has once been offered; nor yet for intercession, since there is One who ever liveth to make intercession for us. A priesthood in the sense in which that term is used by some modern Ritualists, Arnold regards as a high dishonor to our true priest — the Lord Jesus Christ.

But, leaving this subject, we must at least allude to the influence which Arnold exercised as a theologian. There may be some who will grudge him any such title, and if by a theologian is merely to be meant one who has busied himself with scholastic technicalities and transcendental metaphysics, then he would have been the first to repudiate the name. But it will be a disastrous day for theology when it comes to be identified with a range of inquiry so narrow, so dubious, and so unpractical; and if he is a theologian who wisely guides the religious views of churches, then Arnold has far more claim to be so regarded than "a hundred would-be's of the modern day." The clamor with which his opinions were received reminds us of Milton's lines —

> Men whose faith, learning, life and pure intent,
> Would have been held in high esteem by Paul,
> Must now be called and printed heretics
> By shallow Edwards and Scotch What-d'ye-call.

Arnold's main contributions to theology in these volumes are the essays on the "Interpretation of Prophecy," and on the "Interpretation of Scripture." On both subjects his views are now maintained by most thinking men. As regards prophecy, he saw that prediction is wholly subordinate to moral teaching, and that the mere announcement of events yet future is the lowest part of the prophet's office, being indeed rather its sign than its substance. The prophets dealt with eternal principles, not with chronological combinations. To startle the deathlike slumbers of selfishness, to fan the dying embers of patriotism, to curb the base oppression of power, to startle the sensual apathy of unbelief, were the prophets' noblest functions; nor is it possible to gather from these inspired poets a single prediction in which some deep moral purpose, some profound spiritual lesson is not involved. The school of interpretation which lays stress on material details met with no sympathy from Arnold, because he saw that such a method of illustration was often "accidental, generally disputable, and theoretically false." "It is a very misleading notion of prophecy if we regard it as an anticipation of history. . . . It is anticipated history, not in our common sense of the word, but in another and far higher sense. . . . It fixes the attention on principles, on good and evil, on truth and falsehood, on God and his enemy. . . . The earliest prophecy of Scripture is the sum and substance of the whole language of prophecy, how diversified soever in its particular forms." On these points, and on the ever-widening horizons of prophetic fulfilment, the reader will find many wise remarks in illustration of Arnold's fundamental principle that the prophets did not in the first instance cast themselves into the ocean of futurity; that the forms of their prophecies belong to their own times, the spirit of them to times that were to come; that their words have not only an historical sense originating in contemporary circumstances, but also a spiritual sense, "worthily answering to the magnificence of their language, but in its details of time, place, and circumstance indistinct to them; nay — as we still see through a glass darkly — indistinct, when it rises highest, even to us." *

Arnold's views of the interpretation of Scripture were marked by the same rev-

* Vol. iii., p. 335.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

erent sincerity and masculine wisdom. The dishonoring literalism which will defend even the most pernicious custom if some text can be quoted in its apparent favor; the ignorant unwisdom which strews the paths of social and moral progress with stumbling-blocks wrenched out of the sacred page; the irreligious religion which depraves God's best gift in support of man's worst inventions — these bad traditions still survive, and if they no longer flourish, they yet continue to be powerful for evil even in their decay. But to Arnold is due in no small degree the merit of having dealt to them their death-blow in the minds of reasonable men. His essay on this subject is stamped with the same high characteristics as his other writings, — calmness, courage, clearness, perfect consideration for the feelings of others. He points out the impossibility of rightly comprehending Scripture if we read it as we read the Koran, as though it were in all its parts of equal authority, all composed at one time, and all addressed to persons similarly situated.* He fearlessly exposes the incompetence of the majority of commentators, who are too often greatly insufficient in knowledge and still more so in judgment, "often misapprehending the whole difficulty of a question, often answering it by repeating the mere assertions of others, and confounding the proper provinces of the intellect and the moral sense, so as to make questions of criticism questions of religion, and to brand as profane inquiries to which the character of profaneness or devotion is altogether inapplicable." He laid down the broad principles that commands given in the Bible to one man or to one generation are, and can be, binding upon other men and other generations, only so far forth as the circumstances in which both are placed are similar; and that the revelations of God to man were gradual, and adapted to his state at the several periods when they were successively made. This principle of "accommodation" is liable indeed to grave abuse, but it is a principle distinctly recognized by Christ himself, and it will be always safely applied by strong and honest natures. Whether the reader be always inclined or not to accept the solutions which throughout this volume on Scriptural interpretation are offered for various moral and other difficulties of Scripture, he will not fail to profit by the fearless honesty with which they were met, and he will see them treated as though they were neither to be spoken of with bated breath, nor regarded as in any way dangerous to religion. In point of fact Arnold was a wise interpreter of Scripture, and a wise defender of Christian verity, because he clearly apprehended the truth on which his son, Mr. Matthew Arnold, has dwelt — less persuasively indeed, because from an immensely different standpoint, and with a large admixture of other elements, but with consummate literary skill. Even the rabbis and Talmudists could see, and could state, in direct opposition to their own methods of exegesis, that the law speaks in the tongue of the sons of men. The meaning of that maxim is that, in all interpretation of Scripture, allowances must be made for the human element; for that factor of the divine message which is tinged with the writer's individuality; for the necessary and inherent imperfections of all earthly expression; for the use of metaphor and hypallage and hyperbole, and that impassioned style of utterance which rejects the possibility of a wooden and soulless letter-worship; for the absurdities which arise when we turn the swift syllogisms of natural rhetoric with all their impetuous force into the hard syllogisms of unemotional logic; for the fact, in short, that human language, at its very best and greatest, is, and can be, but an asymptote to thought, and that this must more than ever be borne in mind when we deal in finite speech with conceptions which are infinite. Mr. Matthew Arnold calls the rabbinic maxim which I have quoted "the very foundation of sane Biblical criticism," though, as he truly adds, "it was for centuries a dead letter to the whole body of our western exegesis, and is a dead letter to the whole body of our popular exegesis still." No man can mistake the elements of a saving faith; even a wayfaring man, though a fool, cannot possibly err in deducing from the Scriptures all that is necessary for salvation. But when we pass from questions of practical religion to questions of Biblical interpretation it is not too much to say that every commentator, however learned, must go egregiously astray if he be devoid of literary culture. Exegesis is a domain from which mere ignorant convictions, even when they claim to speak ex cathedrâ, must be remorselesly expelled. Mr. Arnold has rendered a memorable service by the incontrovertible clearness with which he has proved this proposition, and in dwelling upon its importance he is, in one particular direction, continuing the theological influence of his illustrious father.

* Vol. ii., p. 280 seq.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

I have dwelt on the position of Dr. Arnold as a Churchman and as a theologian because in these spheres his merits are but partially recognized, whereas none deny, and all are grateful for, the reformation which he effected in English schools. To dwell on that reformation — its nature, its extent, its beneficence, the methods by which it was accomplished — is not possible in this paper, but those who are familiar with school life will be able with the aid of these volumes to trace it for themselves. Certain it is that English schools have undergone a very marked change for the better during the fifty years which have elapsed since he was elected head master of Rugby. Those changes have carried with them a change also of our whole social life. They began to work from the very day when — to recall the scene so beautifully described in the grateful pages of Arnold's two eminent pupils, Dean Stanley and Mr. T. Hughes — in the then mean and unsightly chapel of Rugby School, dimly lighted by the two candles of the pulpit, were seen above the long lines of youthful faces the strong form and noble face of the greatest of English schoolmasters, and the voice was heard, "now soft as the low notes of a flute, now clear and stirring as the call of the light infantry bugle, of him who stood there Sunday after Sunday, witnessing and pleading for his Lord." To trace the course and the issues of this social reformation might be an interesting task; but at present, as one of the least worthy of those who in a similar office to Arnold's own would fain have caught something of his spirit, I can but lay upon the base of his statue a wreath of respectful gratitude. Few teachers have arisen since his death who could reach high enough to place that wreath around his brow.

Ut caput in magnis ubi non est tangere signis
Ponitur hic imos ante corona pedes.

F. W. Farrar.

From The Popular Science Review.

THE CHINA-CLAY INDUSTRY OF CORNWALL AND DEVON.

BY J. H. COLLINS, F.G.S., SECRETARY OF THE ROYAL INSTITUTION OF CORNWALL.

Travellers by the Great Western Railway in the west of England, after crossing the great Albert Bridge at Saltash, passing over the tree-tops in the deep valleys about Liskeard, and leaving the deserted copper mines of St. Blazey and Par on their right hand, usually observe truckloads of peculiar white substances occupying the sidings, and are especially struck with the whiteness of the streams crossed by the railway — which closely resemble rivers of milk.*

Naturally they begin to ask what it means, and the writer has often been amused by the gravity with which some fellow-traveller, who seems to think it disgraceful to confess ignorance on any subject whatever, vaguely talks of lime, or more boldly of chalk. Perhaps some native happens to be present, who politely assures him that he is in error — that neither chalk nor lime are present in any form — and that the peculiar whiteness is caused by a refuse product from the china-clay works in the vicinity. This of course settles the question usually; but if the original querist happens to be inquisitive or persistent, he soon finds that the native in most cases is entirely ignorant of the methods of working, the extent of the works, and the uses of the product, and if this is true of the intelligent native, still more is it true of the general public. Out of Cornwall it is a rare chance to find either commercial men, or even scientific geologists, who have any knowledge whatever of the peculiar industry which characterizes many parts of Cornwall and Devon, and especially the centre of Cornwall. Yet this industry is interesting in itself, employs a large number of men, and supplies every year more than two hundred thousand tons of the dazzling white clay, which never fails to attract the attention of tourists.

The object of the present paper is to describe the salient features of this industry. Most people know that "china" was first brought by the Portuguese from China — hence the name. It was called by them porzellano, because it was supposed to be fabricated from sea shells; hence the term "porcelain;" but no real knowledge was obtained of the materials used until the publication of the reports of the Jesuit father D'Entrecolles, in 1712, and of Count Réaumur, in 1729. These reports led to the establishment of the manufactories at Dresden, Sevres, and Plymouth — the last-named having been established in 1733. Up to 1745, the fine porcelain materials used in the Plymouth works were imported; but soon after that time, Mr. Cookworthy, the founder of the works,

* Notwithstanding the apparent opacity of the water from suspended particles of clay and mica, I have seen trout eight or nine inches long taken from these streams.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

discovered "kaolin" (which he calls growan clay, now called china clay), and the "petuntze" (called by him growan or moorstone, and now known as china stone), similar to or identical with that used by the Chinese, in several parts of Cornwall in great abundance. In conjunction with Lord Camelford, he took out a patent for the use of these materials in 1768. How these materials are used in the manufacture of porcelain, earthenware, and more recently in many other British manufactures, forms no part of the subject of the present paper — this is limited to a description of the modes of occurrence and of preparation of the china clay and china stone.

China clay is prepared by washing a peculiarly white decomposed granite, which occurs very largely in the granite district, north of St. Austell, as well as in many other parts of Cornwall — and also in Devon. This natural china clay rock, which has been elsewhere called "carclazyte," is simply a granite composed of white or pale smoky quartz, white mica (lepidolite), sometimes a little greenish-yellow gilbertite, and white felspar, in which the latter is partly or completely metamorphosed into kaolin. This modification of granite occurs in areas of irregular form, generally much elongated in one direction, and extending to an unknown depth. It is in the west of England universally associated with quartzose and schorlaceous veins — evidently of later origin than the rock itself — which sometimes also contain oxide of tin. The greatest extension of the decomposed granite coincides with the "run" or "bearing" of the veins, and is more complete as the vein is followed downwards in depth.*

Many of the so-called "deposits" of clay extend for a distance of a quarter of a mile, half a mile, or even more, in the direction of the veins, while their breadth may be only a few inches, and seldom exceeds a few fathoms. It is true that very wide masses of china clay are wrought in many places, but these are invariably associated with a group of parallel veins.

The granite rock is usually covered by a layer, from four to thirty feet thick, of brown or yellow sandy earth, often full of angular pieces of hard granite, schorl rock, tourmaline schist, with sometimes a little tin ore, etc. This layer is called by the workmen "overburden," and it must be removed before the clay can be got at.* The process of working is usually as follows: let us suppose that a patch or band of suitable decomposed granite, called by the workmen a "bed of clay," has been discovered in a hillside. The first thing to be done is to drive an "adit-level" horizontally right into the hill beneath the bed of clay, the position and extent of which has been more or less accurately determined by systematic "pitting" through the overburden. This adit-level is a sort of tunnel — from six to nine feet high, and from three to six feet wide. While this level is being driven, a large piece of the overburden is removed so as to expose a considerable area of the bed of clay.† A vertical opening or shaft is then made from the inner end of the adit, to the surface of the uncovered clay bed — partly by digging downwards from above ("sinking"), partly by digging upwards from below ("putting up a rise"). A square wooden pipe, having holes at regular distances of a few feet in one of its sides, is then placed in the vertical opening, so as to keep open a communication with the level below; ‡ the remainder of the shaft is then either filled in or kept open for the removal of the coarse sand or stones produced in working; and the regular washing of clay may be proceeded with. Of course the arrangements for obtaining the clay vary very much in different works. These different arrangements were described by the author in the "Journal of the Society of Arts," 1875.

Granite, as is generally known, consists mainly of three distinct minerals, quartz, felspar, and mica. In the decomposed granite it is the felspar only which is decomposed, or converted into kaolin; but this renders the whole mass so soft that a pick or shovel may be readily driven into it to a considerable depth. The mode of working is to break up a portion with a pick to a depth of several feet, in a kind of slope, around the mouth of the pipe or launder which passes down into the adit

* In a paper read before the Royal Geological Society of Cornwall in 1876, I have given my reasons for believing that the decomposition has been produced in situ by fluids circulating within the fissures, joints, and shrinkage cracks of the granite — now occupied by the solid matter of the veins referred to above — and not as commonly stated in geological works by carbonic acid acting from above.

* This covering closely resembles some glacial deposits; but neither organic remains, nor scratched stones, nor stones of foreign origin have been found in it, to my knowledge, although many acres have been removed in the various clay works.

† The term "clay" is applied indiscriminately in Cornwall to the decomposed granite rock, and to the true clay washed out of it.

‡ The holes are — except the top one — temporarily covered with pieces of board nailed over them. The whole contrivance is called a "button-hole launder."

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

below. This is called a "stope." A stream of water is then made to flow over the broken lumps, which are kept well stirred up by a workman, called a "washer," whose duty it is to keep breaking and stirring them up. The water, clear at first, speedily becomes white and milky by washing out the soft decomposed felspar, and runs down to the bottom of the stope, carrying with it the quartz grains and flakes of mica. The quartz and the coarser mica flakes, called "sand" by the workmen, settle in a shallow pit, called the sandpit, from whence they are constantly shovelled out by a man placed there for that purpose — while the stream of clay water, carrying with it many minute flakes of white mica, passes on down the vertical launder and through the adit-level to be further treated.

The stream of clay water, if thick, contains usually about two per cent. of clay, and perhaps one-half per cent. of mica in suspension. This is made to flow slowly through a succession of narrow channels, called "drags" and "micas," in which the fine mica and a little clay are gradually deposited, while the bulk of the clay passes on with the water, and falls into a circular pit from twenty to thirty feet in diameter, and eight or ten feet deep, lined usually with granite blocks. Here it gradually settles to the bottom, while the clear water passes off at a little depression in the rim of the pit, and may either be pumped up to be used over again, or allowed to flow into the nearest river. This effluent water is often clear enough to drink.*

Once or twice a day it becomes necessary to clean out the long channels, called "drags" and "micas," in which case the fine mica and clay, which has settled at the bottom, is washed out into the nearest watercourse by a stream of water, and this it is which fouls the streams.

In some works, as at the celebrated Carclaze mine, worked as an open quarry for tin for four centuries, not only is the mica washed away in this manner, but the large quantity of sand produced is also washed away at night, and thus very large accumulations of sand have collected in the valleys below St. Austell, St. Blazey, and elsewhere.

The clay having settled in the pits to a consistency somewhat thicker than cream, is in old-fashioned works run out into shallow excavations called "pans." These are about two feet deep — the clay is put into them during the winter months, and is allowed to remain until nearly dry, when it is cut out in square blocks and piled up under sheds, or in the open air, till completely dry. By this mode of working a good deal of loss is experienced, as every block of clay is more or less injured at the surface by exposure for months to the vicissitudes of the weather, the invasions of sheep, cattle, and geese — which latter abound on the moors — and the mischief of stone-throwing boys. When thoroughly dry, therefore, every block has to be separately scraped before it is in a fit state to be sold.

The scraping operation is a peculiar and somewhat ghastly sight to those who see it for the first time. Gangs of tall women, white-aproned — every vestige of complexion hidden with white clay — stand at tables scraping the blocks all day long, with a little three-cornered scraper like a miniature Dutch hoe, and often dismally singing hymns which sound like dirges.

The advantage of air-drying is that no expense is incurred for fuel — the disadvantage is the loss incurred by scraping, the expense of scraping, and the large area required for the drying-pans.

In more modern works the air-drying is mostly replaced by kiln-drying. Long kilns are built of fire-clay tiles covering brickwork flues from sixty to one hundred or even one hundred and fifty feet long. The clay from the circular pits is first run into large tanks, where it remains for a month or two, till pretty stiff. It is then taken into the kiln or "dry" on tramwaggons, and dried by throwing it upon the hot tiles. When dry it is cut up into convenient-sized blocks and piled up ready for market. On the whole, the smaller amount of waste in kiln-dried clay, and the saving of expense for scraping, more than makes up for the expense of fuel, and few modern works are without kilns for drying.

The preparation of the china stone for the market is a much more simple operation. China stone is also a kind of granite, which is, however, only partially decomposed, but it is only valuable when it happens to be free from mica and all other minerals except the quartz and partially decomposed felspar. It occurs chiefly in the parishes of St. Stephens, St. Dennis, and Breage, and is often associated with china clay. The rock is simply quarried down, and the joints dressed over where discolored with oxide of iron, when it is

* Occasionally these pits are left filled with clay water, and undisturbed for several weeks, when the intense blueness of the water equals that of some Alpine lakes, and is due to the same cause — the suspension of minute particles of solid matter.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

at once ready for shipment, chiefly to Runcorn. From Runcorn it is sent to the potteries, where it is used with china clay in the manufacture of porcelain and earthenware.

It is not only in the potteries, however, that china clay is used. As stated above, more than two hundred thousand tons per annum are now exported from the two western counties, the value of which at the present exceptionally low prices may average, perhaps, 1*l.* per ton at the shipping port. Of this large quantity probably little more than one-third is used in the English potteries. Fully as much is used by the paper-makers of the United Kingdom, and probably twenty thousand tons are used by makers of alum and sulphate of alumina, and at least as much by "bleachers" of calico and yarn. Many thousands of tons are shipped to the Continent for all the above purposes, and also for the manufacture of ultramarine. So cheap and convenient an article is also no doubt used to a considerable extent by adulterators and sophisticators of various kinds, but it probably only needs to be more widely known to be used legitimately for many purposes to which hitherto it has not been applied.

We have spoken above of the "sand" of the "mica." Nowadays much of the fine mica is re-washed and sold as an inferior "mica clay" for making inferior kinds of paper and pasteboard, but the bulk of it must still be regarded as a waste product. The sand is also largely a waste product, and as there are from three to eight tons of sand yielded for each ton of clay, large accumulations exist at most of the principal works. Of late years some of this — mixed with refuse clay — has been made into excellent fire bricks, for which there is a considerable demand, especially for the copper-smelting furnaces of Chili and Mexico; but there are still millions of tons available when a proper use can be discovered.

Very good building-bricks have also been made from the discolored clay and mica, but the heavy cost of carriage usually prevents the use of building-bricks at great distances from the place of manufacture, so that, although there is a fair local demand, millions of tons of material are still available for any suitable purpose which may be hereafter discovered.

Some of the sand is very coarse, some very fine — but in all cases it consists mainly of angular fragments of quartz, admirably adapted from their extreme sharpness for mixing with cement or lime for making concrete blocks, or with asphalt for pavements.

The coarser varieties also make excellent gravel walks, as the small quantities of clay and mica usually present serve to bind the grains together under foot to form a firm roadway.

The following analyses, selected from the writer's paper read to the Royal Geological Society of Cornwall in 1876, fairly represent the composition of average specimens of the materials described above.

	China Clay	China Stone	Mica Clay	Coarse Mica	Sand
Silica . . .	45·40	71·66	46·70	56·41	81·50
Alumina . . .	40·30	18·79	35·20	29·60	13·40
Lime . . .	trace	1·70	trace	—	—
Magnesia . . .	trace	0.35	—	—	—
Peroxide of iron .	0·20	trace	1·90	2·72	2·50
Alkalies, insoluble and loss . .	0·60	6·60*	4·66	4·37	0·10
Fluorine . . .	trace	0·14	trace	trace	trace
Oxide of manganese	—	trace	—	trace	—
Water . . .	13·50	0·91	11·54	6·90	2·50
	100·00	100·15	100·00	100·00	100·00

* Chiefly potash.

All the older writers speak of "talc," "talcose granite," "protogine," etc., as being abundant in Cornwall and elsewhere. Even Mr. J. A. Phillips, writing in 1875, says: "In some districts mica is replaced by a talc-like mineral, and the granite rock itself passes into protogine." What there may be elsewhere I am unable to say, but there is certainly nothing of the kind known at present in Cornwall. From the whole of the granite districts of Cornwall and Devon talc seems to be entirely absent, and magnesia generally is an extremely scarce substance.

The number of china-clay works at present in operation in Cornwall and West Devon is little short of two hundred, and of course the conditions of working vary considerably in different localities and under different conditions. In some, a little washing only is done during the winter months by means of a small natural stream of water, the total annual produce being only a few hundred tons; in others, valuable machinery and extensive buildings enable the proprietors to turn out nine or ten thousand tons in the same time; but in the main the description given above as fairly describes the occurrence and preparation of china clay and china stone as is possible within the limits of such an article as the present.

The trade at present is much depressed — mainly, I believe, owing to the slackness on the part of those (potters, paper-makers, bleachers, and others) who use clay; but

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

partly, perhaps, owing to the over-production of a few years since. In consequence of this the prices have fallen more than thirty per cent. during the last five years, and the quantities produced have also shown a considerable falling off. With the general revival of English trade — whenever that may take place — no doubt this branch will also revive.

From The St. James's Magazine.

FLOWERS OF ANGLO-INDIAN LITERATURE.

THREE months is, I understand, the longest ascertained time of residence in India of the author of any book on the manners and customs of the people. If a man prolongs his stay, though he may have a desire to write, this desire seldom becomes effective. Perhaps our potential author succumbs to the enticement of too frequent pegs, or he finds the attractions of the Gymkhana and the gardens too powerful for his resolution, or some other of the varied forms of social duty conspire to silence his prophetic soul and to cause the labor of the mountain to bring forth not even the proverbial mouse. The longer a man stays the less chance there seems to be of the world deriving any profit from his observations. If, therefore, I wait till experience has mellowed and matured my judgment, there is every danger that this article will find its way to the limbo of unrealized ideas, and the invaluable extracts with which I mean to adorn it will be lost forever to posterity. Here, then, on the smooth waters of the Tirawaddy, gliding between well-wooded banks, marred now and then by an ugly village, with an English briar between my lips, and a gigantic topee on my head, I proceed, on the strength of three weeks passed principally in Indian trains and steamers, to deliver a verdict on Anglo-Indian literature.

It is not my intention to attempt any original criticism on the effects of English education on the native mind, but after briefly noting the opinions of qualified observers to illustrate their judgment from writings, almost, if not altogether, unknown in England. The course of reading by which a native student who aspires to honors, or even to an ordinary degree in arts at the Calcutta University, must prepare himself is perfectly appalling. The examiners seem to require, in addition to other qualifications, a close and accurate knowledge of English literature from Cædmon to Wordsworth, and an acquaintance with the details of English history which might fit the successful candidate to follow in the footsteps of Mr. Froude, Mr. Freeman, or Professor Stubbs. This high education and classical reading apparently excludes all chance of any familiarity with ordinary English as at present written and spoken; and the result is seen in the wonderful and awful productions which fall from time to time from native pens, couched in a jargon possible of utterance by no imaginable race either in heaven above or in the earth beneath or in the waters under the earth. Again, the educated native's conception of life and manners in English society is apparently acquired from a careful perusal of "Pamela" and "Tom Jones," tempered by some familiarity with second-rate romances of a later date, and an inappreciative reading of modern novels of a better class. I have in my hand a specimen of the Indian littérateur's picture of high life in England which may challenge comparison, though on different grounds, with the society sketches of the flunkeys of certain London weeklies. It is called "Lord Likely, a Drama," written by P. V. Ramdswami — this is the Madrasei equivalent for Jones — Raju, B. A., and published as lately as 1876. The scene is laid in England. The plot, which is of the simplest description, may be epitomized as follows: —

Some years before the opening of the story, Lady Homely, on a voyage home from India, suffers shipwreck and loses her infant son, whom she supposes to be drowned. At the beginning of the play she is living with her brother, Sir Strictly Sternface, and his daughter, the heroine, Miss Lovely; the confusion of names here is of minor importance. Miss Lovely's hand is sought by two wooers, Lord Likely, a dashing young fellow, and Sir Dreadful Dash, an Algerian colonel; the former wins the lady's affections, but the latter secures the support of Sir Strictly and Lady Homely. In order to drive this dangerous rival from the field, the hero, by means of his satellites, Gog and Wire, two city men, persuades the dreadful colonel to have two strings to his bow, and to make love to the aunt as well as to the niece. The plot is successful, and Sir Dreadful receives a shocking rebuff from Lady Likely, after which he is, somewhat unnecessarily as it seems to us, carried off bodily by Gog and Wire, and immured in a dungeon in the city kept by one Simon Twaddle, who is a compound of Fagin and

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the governor of Newgate. On his release from this imprisonment he takes himself off to Algiers and gives no further trouble. Lord Likely then turns out, as we had expected, to be the long-lost marquis, who had been rescued from the wreck, and adopted by Sir Stingy Lucre, a Kentish baronet; the cousins are married, and live happily ever afterwards.

Here is a specimen of the conversation indulged in by Miss Lovely and her aunt. It is the opening speech of the play: —

"MISS LOVELY. — Madam, many a day have I besought you, and you are yet to tell me what that picture means. Ah, 'tis a sickening sight — there the dread breakers, like steeds to combat spurred, toss their foam, and, as they approach, the poor ship uplifts itself and bends its head so low that it would seem to say, 'Dear masters, engulf me not.' And the crew — I find them not; sure, the storms had blown all hope away from them, and sent them to the hold to quaff their nectar; but, madam, yonder goes a life-boat, freighted with many a troubled soul, that, like Tantalus, looks at the shore and grows desperate. Then there is a lady, fair and dignified, that, with her kerchief, holds her face, and, as flashes the light of heaven amid the dreadful gloom, looks up with such pious agony as the very angels would have wept at the sight thereof."

Of course, no English girl could be imagined by the Hindoo as referring to sailors staving the casks to drown their fears in rum, in less refined terms than those used in the text; and equally of course the classical allusion is of a kind familiar in the mouths of our sisters as household words. The somewhat recondite nature of the illustration, and the care with which it is introduced, is especially characteristic of the prevailing azure. Lady Homely, at last softened, gives the story of the picture in the same strain, mentioning a phenomenal steward who was known apparently to his fellows or the ship's crew as a "brawny, stalwart wight," and who, perhaps on account of this characteristic, is is said to have "writhed and gasped for breath like a furnace." After this pathetic scene we note for the first time the eminently Shakespearian character of the drama in the next incident, which consists of some comic business by Gog and Wire, the city men, who are the clowns of the piece. We cannot refrain from quoting this in full, to illustrate this phase of our author's genius, and to let our readers behind the scenes of London commercial life.

"GOG. — Hallo, Wire!

"WIRE. — Come now, Gog, tell us how goes Lord Likely's love.

"GOG. — Oh, Lord Likely and his love, they are all right; but ——

"WIRE. — I know what you mean; has Sir Strictly made up his mind?

"GOG. — And Lady Homely, too.

"WIRE. — And Miss Lovely, too, I suppose.

"GOG. — Oh, yes, they've all made up their minds.

"WIRE — And I daresay, then, Lord Likely has the best hopes of them all — and the colonel, too.

"GOG. — Many he has; and like boys that are after a cab a-begging for pence and turn back empty, you'll find the chap soon undeceived.

"WIRE. — But Lord Likely.

"GOG. — Ah, he is a perfect gentleman: in the classics that retreat, and the physics that advance, he'll lick any professor; in his old Puritan gab, any parson; in his brag and bickering, the colonel; in his gravity, Sir Strictly; and in gay mischief, that ladies love, and gemmen hate, the devil!

"WIRE.— The classics that retreat and the physics that advance, what be these?

"GOG.— I'll tell you what — I daresay you were at school when you were a boy.

"WIRE.— Ay.

"GOG. — And so you read about the Romans that conquered the Britons.

"WIRE.— Oh, demmet, so my master told me; but I told him — 'Look ye, sir, I'll never read of a people that conquered the Britons!' But is this all you can tell us of Lord Likely?

"GOG. — Egad! tell me if any wight will show me his equal in a duel or a boat-race; and he is the best of the barons that ever trod the turf at Derby.

"WIRE.— And yet Sir Strictly would not have him.

"GOG.— But he'll have Sir Strictly and his daughter, and their money, too.

"WIRE. — I see — where the fish has caught the bait, the fins need follow. Miss Lovely likes him, and so Sir Strictly must."

It would be unfair to such readers as may be ignorant of the proper style in which these things are done in high life not to extract a specimen of the ardent speeches of Lord Likely and his love.

Here is a brilliant flower: —

"LORD LIKELY. — Like the robin that longs for the spring and the lark that waits for the morn, here am I, and yet she is to come! There! what do I see? Ah, no!

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

'tis but a rose that hasn't half the bloom of my Amelia's cheeks. Now, what do I hear? Ah, 'tis but the linnet or the thrush, meek denizens of the brakes, whose melody were but the plainest jargon to the voice of my love. Oh, that I were a wind from the west! — how I'd rob the best blooms of their sweet and play round her cheeks, and whisper into her ears! There! comes she not like a beam through the greenwood? Why so late? Sure love lingers not when holy thoughts await it, and now, even thus would I forget my being in thee, my Amelia! (Embraces her.)"

And, as a pendant to this, here is a speech of the lady a little later on.

"Nay, Harry, pelf and pedigree are but accidents; the soul is the soul (? soil) for all such freaks of fortune. True love, where'er 'tis found, has its odors even as the rose amid the brambles, so do I love my Harry, not for aught that bears him up, but for what he bears — for his noble virtues — for his greatness, goodness, faith, and should aught that mars the mind and cuts in twain the knot that lovers weave, come between, this heart shall find its solace but in —— "

Sir Dreadful Dash bears out his name, in words at least, and, like Meg March, Lady Homely seems to like it. To her he says of his rival, "I'll see him dammed," and the conversation proceeds without interruption or expostulation from the lady. Not that she is at all afraid of the blood-drinking colonel, for a couple of pages farther on, in the same scene, the following occurs: —

"SIR DREADFUL (kneeling). — Madam, thy sworn slave — that has so long eaten into himself for love of — oh, demmet! — what shall I say? — Love, lend me thy pistols, or, rather, thy shafts, that I may shoot myself! I feel so shy and stupid!

"LADY HOMELY. — O faith! O honesty! (Rises to go.)

"SIR DREADFUL. — Nay, madam, this is not charity. (Stands up and grasps her hands together with his.)

"LADY HOMELY. — Alas! Sir Dreadful, to what would you drive me! (Hits a severe blow at his mouth; his ivories fall down.)"

Facta non verba was evidently this lady's motto; and this home-thrust effectually routs the double-dealing Sir Dreadful. Another scene of a highly comical nature is the court of Sir Strictly Sternface. He is represented in all the pomp of an Eastern sahib, smoking in a sort of "museum in his mansion," while two gentlemen converse before him, passing to each other the ball of the knight's prowess and renown in India as skilfully as two players at lawn-tennis. The retired governor sits in silence, drinking in their adulation as an idol might snuff up incense. This picture of the greatness of the retired Indian civilian is, we are sorry to believe, scarcely warranted by facts, even the majesty of an English justice of the peace being far less we fear than this roseate sketch would cause us to imagine. Finally, we have Sir Stingy's description of the finding of Lord Likely, who gets his name from "a flash of something great" in his features, and from the humor of his original saviour who, thinking it likely that he is a lord, puts two and two together and bestows a peerage on his waif. It is notorious, as our readers well know, that nothing more than this is requisite to ensure recognition of the nobility of the bearer of the name in society, Burke and Debrett notwithstanding. The Shakespearian character of the play is vindicated to the close by the following sweet thing in puns: —

"GOG. — And this, madam, is the sun you hadn't seen so long.

"LADY HOMELY. — Ay, indeed, that's my son."

So much for our Indian bachelor.

The second book is of a different kind. It is a pious biography of a somewhat remarkable man, who, had he been gifted with any degree of prophetic vision, might have prayed with intense earnestness — "Save me from my friends." The full title of it is: "The Memoir of the late Honorable Justice Onoocool Chundee Moorkerjee, by Mohindro Nouth Mookerjee, aged twenty-four, author of 'The Effects of English Education on the Native Mind,'" and, we may add, himself a shocking example of the said effects. This is the prelude of this miraculous production: —

"Let me hold my penna after a few months to write the memoir of the individual above-named; but quid agis? if any one put me such a query, I will be utterly thrown into a great jeopardy and hurley-burley, and say, 'A fool of myself!' As a spider spins a web for its own destruction, or as when the clown, who was busy in digging a grave for Ophelia, was asked by Hamlet: 'Whose grave's this, sirrah?' said, 'Mine, sir,' so in writing one's memoir I am as if to dig my own grave in it."

After a description of the birth and parentage of the hero, we are introduced to his school life, during which he was noted

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

for an "unplayfulness of disposition," according to his biographer "an unsightly defect in boyhood." However, the reader may find some compensation in the following anecdote, the style and matter of which are alike remarkable: —

"Once, when the Hindoo college was about to be closed for the winter vacation, little Mookerjee, with some of his brothers and cousins, went to see the monument. When he had ascended a few steps, he received a severe blow on his head, which rendered him unpercipient for a few moments. He was then brought out with some difficulty by his companions. A few seconds after this a Cyclopean English sailor came out of the monument, and little Mookerjee asked him in a gentle voice why he had treated him thus. He answered that he took him to be a dog and not a man, but now when he saw that he was a man, but niggar at the same time, he might as well retain his first impression, as a niggar was no better than a dog. The reply stung little Mookerjee to the quick, and he addressed his rude assailant for more than an hour, dwelling chiefly on the principles of Christianity, and enlarging on the duty of regarding all men as fellow-brethren without distinction of creed or color. The words of Onoocool Chundee had a marvellous effect. The savage heart of the sailor was moved, and he went away making an apology for what he had done."

Later on the author moralizes on the relations of mother and child in these striking sentences: —

"Nothing in the world can make her facetious when her child is not so, and nothing in the world can make her lugubrious when her child is not so. Distressed in distress and pleased in pleasure, there can be no human being so sympathizing as the mother! Ergo, on the contrary, a mother is loved and respected in every age, in every realm, by every nation, and by everybody who can understand what transcendent and peerless wealth she is."

We must give the writer credit for having here conceived the greatest misery to which any human being could be subjected. A facetious child we had always considered the most detestable of all created things; but a facetious child and a facetious mother! A child saying smart things and his mother capping them! The idea is too awful. We refuse to attempt to realize it. We shudder and pass on, leaving our author to describe the struggles of his hero against adverse fortune, until, after achieving great success as a pleader, he became an "au fait" and "a transcendental lucre" to the Bengal council. Finally, he is appointed a judge of high court. The result of this can be adequately described only in the author's words.

"This was a desideratum to him. The hope which he so long hatched at last yielded him what he hankered after, and in seven-league boots. The law study, to which he had devoted so long his midnight hours, with indefatigable ardor and the zeal of a martyr, yielded him fruits most sacchariferous and wished-for, — position, respect, and wealth."

The unhappy judge's personal appearance is thus described: —

"When a boy he was filamentous, but gradually in the course of time he became plump as a partridge. . . . He was neither a Brobdignagian nor a Lilliputian, but a man of mediocre size, fair complexion, well-shaped nose, hazel eyes, and ears well-proportioned to the face, which was of a little round cut with a wide front and uniform lips. . . . His head was large; it had very thin hairs on it; and he had a moustache not close set, and a little brownish on the top of his upper lip."

The manner of his death is related with the fullest, and, in one instance, quite unreportable details, from the commencement of the evil symptoms, when a headache made him "feel like a toad under a harrow," to the fatal moment when, after remaining "sotto voce for a few hours, he then went to God at about six P.M."

The above extracts give a fair idea of the nature of this book, which is written with the most perfect bona fides and with the fullest intention of maintaining the dignity of a severe and chaste biographical style. The whole work is a gem of the purest water; my only difficulty has been to abstain from presenting it in its integrity.

One more flower, and, for the present, I have done with the educated native. This is a scrap found in an examination room in place of the answer to a paper which the luckless examinee found too much for his knowledge of the subject. There was a rough draft appended, in which the leading points of the prayer were jotted down, ending with the somewhat burlesque subscription — "Your obedient servant." This is the prayer as finally polished: —

God God God be kind to me

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Pardon my sins at least for the sake of my poor father and mother,
My long-suffering wife,
My innocent artless daughter,
My adored Bissessury
(If I may be permitted to name her)
Make me pass this Higher Grade Pleadership Examination, in the Higher grade surely successfully and creditably
God look kindly on me this last time
God, God help me in things that I may be successful in my examination
God God help me, help me, help me.

The result of this ingenious attempt to substitute faith for works is not known.

H. T. W.

From The Spectator.

THE LUXURY OF READING OLD NOVELS.

We wonder some novelist with a reputation, and money enough to risk a moderate loss, does not publish a novel with an "argument" at the beginning, a short sketch revealing his plot, giving an account of his principal characters, and stating frankly his own idea of his own work, when he had read it in three volumes, an account in which he shall be permitted to be a little vain. We suppose his publisher would object and he himself might feel a qualm at betraying a secret he had striven to keep through two volumes and a half, but we suspect he would lose very little. He would only, at the worst, anticipate the reviewers, and he would attract a public which exists, and which may be numerous, — the public which greatly enjoys reading old novels, or rather, novels it has read some time before. There must be such a public, or there would not be such a sale for cheap reprints, or such a willingness in houses where the inmates read, to endure the abominable litter they create, or such a demand at watering-places for novels that have reposed for years upon the shelves. The librarians by the sea have of late invented a new system, under which old novels go back to Mudie's, or are sent to the colonies, or are disposed of in some other way; but there are a few who adhere to the old paths, and they seem to have as many customers as the new men. Elderly people, and leisurely people, and literary people go to them, and potter over their shelves, and in spite of the dust carry away whole cargoes of books, which they afterwards seem to read. They are rather ashamed of their occupation, and do not praise their books, but they read very steadily, and do not throw them aside with half the weariness manifested by those who have just finished the "last new thing." They have, to all appearance, enjoyed themselves, and though their sons and their daughters despise them, they are able to push away contemptuous comments with a serene sense of ease and quiet not altogether unenviable. They do not seem eager for relief from their books, but rather hang over them with loving pleasure, and keep their pages as they talk, and are jealous of volumes when the children take them up, and generally beseem themselves like bibliomaniacs with rich little Elzevirs, just bought.

They are not silly at all, and they shall have an advocate, for once. The present writer belongs to that division of the public, and he maintains, without shame, that for those who can read novels at all, there is no enjoyment which transcends that of an afternoon spent over novels which have been read before. Of course, there are antecedent conditions. The reader must be mentally a little fatigued. He must not be in search of excitement. He must not be anxious to be taken absolutely out of himself and his surroundings, but be tolerably content with both, and only longing for that condition of complacent, but not exactly somnolent kef in which the practised smoker most delights. And he must have a lot of the novels. It is of no use to have one. It may not suit his mood, or he may remember it too well, or he may have learned to despise its author's later works — nothing spoils literary enjoyment like that; it is as bad as the taste of water when you have drunk enough, or — in short, he wants a boxful, to dip among and select the novel which seems most pleasant in its momentary promise. But the conditions granted, we maintain that reading that picked old novel is the most enjoyable form of intelligent indolence conceivable. The bore of unravelling the plot, or even attending to it, is wholly absent, for after a chapter or two its salient features come back to the memory. There is no difficulty about understanding the characters, for they are old friends, not new acquaintance, and the mental interest they create is not watchfulness, but a subdued amusement in seeing them do what you knew they would do, though you did not quite know how they would do it. There is none of the fatigue of attention, for if you do not attend, you still remem-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ber; and none of the ennui of disappointment, for the reader knows beforehand that the combination on which he had set his heart either will or will not be there. Above all, there is no burdensome sense of duty. You are not bound to read the story at all, still less to read it without skipping, — and you know precisely to a page or a paragraph what to skip. If anybody is impertinent enough or malicious enough to cross-examine you — and the people who will cross-examine about novels are a separate class, and in the next world will have to read first volumes only, for a cycle or two — the answers are all ready and all right; and as for duty to oneself, that has all been already performed. It is like visiting the Exhibition alone, without a catalogue, and with a certainty that, as no one knows you have been there, no one will ask you about the pictures, or think you tasteless for passing over acres of canvas you care nothing about. There is nothing to do but to enjoy, and to enjoy as one enjoys when enjoyment is softened by reminiscence. They are old friends, not new, who are coming up in troops, and how the old friends are changed! You thought that plot so adroit, and how obvious it is! You thought that style so simple, and what a contempt the authoress has for grammar! You deemed that heroine so charming, and what a little fool she is, with her blundering flirtations! The whole pleasure that a boy feels in measuring himself after the holidays comes unsought to the man who slowly and lingeringly gets through an oft-read but pleasant novel. Not that we would suggest that the involuntary criticism on a twice-read novel is always bitter. On the contrary it is frequently appreciative. The reader skips sometimes at new places, and discovers new beauties, or he sees art where he formerly saw carelessness, or he picks up a thread he had formerly lost, and obtains a new interest altogether. If he does none of these things, the book still arouses memories which, being fictitious, are pleasant, and puts him in a mood in which there is nothing acrid or even bitter, — in which, if truth is to be said, indolence prohibits the exertion involved in any use or menace of the rod. How is one to flog even mentally, when one is quite contented and half-asleep?

It is a fact — we appeal to all who indulge the taste — that the enjoyment derivable from old novels does not vary in the ratio of their excellence, even if that excellence be of the kind which the reader most appreciates. It may be that the recollection of a first-rate novel is too vivid, that there are too many unforgotten passages, and that the people are too seldom absent from the reader's imagination. Nobody fairly forgets Nancy Cass, or Mr. Trumbull, the auctioneer. Or it may be that there is too little of indolence in the re-reading for true enjoyment, the writing being too interesting, and the intellectual excitement produced too vivid. One does not really lounge over the "Shabby-Genteel Story." It is, however, certain that the very best books, and those which will most repay reading, are not those to which the reminiscent dilettante most readily turns, or those which he picks out most eagerly from the heap. He thinks he will read them, but he leaves them to the last, and if his stock is large, they very often pass unread. He prefers something like Marryat, who detains him in chapters only; or James, of whose stories he skips half, to wonder why critics are so blind to the merit in the remainder; or Fenimore Cooper, with his marvellous verbosity, verbosity which, especially in his later novels, is unequalled in literature; and Mrs. Wood's stories of that school, far the best books of Mrs. Wood; or about a dozen of Mrs. Oliphant's thirty, forty, or fifty tales. He can read all these, or the like, including, say, about a fourth of the novels of late years, with a sense of restful liking which novels like George Eliot's, nearly as superior to them all as "Hamlet" is to the "Colleen Bawn," do not produce.

We suppose the secret is that the sense of rest, which is the key to seaside enjoyment, is not perfect unless the reader can be indolent, and that the great writers forbid indolence. If they do not hurry you, they button-hole your mind, and that is nearly as bad, when you want not indeed to be attending to something else, but to be free from the sense of attending to anything at all; to be lazy ad unguem, and yet be free of that sense of guilt which, in the true-born Britisher — and in no other of mankind — laziness always leaves. There is, that we know of, but one exception to this rule. Miss Austen belongs to the two or three novelists whose superiors are not, and Miss Austen read, say, for the twelfth time — nobody quite enjoys her writing who is content with less than that — is of all writers the one that most promotes serenity. But then there are breezes which are breezes, and yet promote tranquillity and sleep. But Miss Austen excepted, the second-class novels are the novels to study in a holiday for the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

second time, amid ample leisure and without compulsion; and so studied, they yield a delight denied to higher efforts of the mind. This generation has forgotten what "leisure" means, and cannot regain its knowledge; but just take four hours under a cedar on a sunshiny day over Mrs. Oliphant's "White Ladies," read for the second time, and some faint notion of the past-away bliss which two centuries ago our ancestors enjoyed will return, or seem to return, to the wearied mind. You will feel almost as content as if "the steamship, and the railway, and the thoughts that shake the mind," and Lord Beaconsfield, and Mr. Morris's furniture, and all the other evils of the day, had never been born.

From The Saturday Review.

COURTESY AT HOME.

THERE is an element about most exotics which is more or less displeasing. They are surrounded by an atmosphere which impresses the observer with associations of restraint and artifice. This is certainly true of exotic courtesy, which is the direct opposite of the virtue of which we have now to speak. Courtesy which is not home-bred may seem, like a hothouse plant from the tropics, to be very fully developed, very luxuriant, and almost overpoweringly pungent; but take away its artificial adjuncts, expose it to the rough weather of every-day life, and it withers away, just as a gorgeous and expensive stove plant, when banished from the conservatory and exposed to the frosty air, becomes ugly and repulsive in comparison with the commonest field flower. By courtesy at home we do not mean the courtesy which is shown at home to guests, but that which is exhibited to the inmates of home in every-day life. On the other hand, in speaking of exotic courtesy we mean that form of civility which is rather an occasional effort than an habitual custom. It is not a pleasant trait in people's characters that they should treat their acquaintances with less and less deference as they become more and more familiar with them, decreasing their courtesy in proportion to the increase of their intimacy; but unfortunately this is too commonly the case. It is usually assumed that a true gentleman is always courteous at home, but this assumption can only be accepted with certain reservations. We have known men perfectly unimpeachable in the matters of education, culture, and refinement, whose manners, though most charming on first acquaintance, relapsed on intimacy into absolute unpleasantness. We admit that nobody whose apparent courteousness to strangers is only on the surface, and who thus seems to be that which he is not, can be a perfect gentleman in the highest sense of the word; but, taking the expression in its ordinary social acceptation, we fear it must be granted that, in the matter of courtesy, a great many gentlemen do occasionally seem to be that which they are not. These refined beings do not perhaps relapse into absolute rudeness among their relatives and intimates; but they replace their attractive manners by icy sarcasms, taciturnity, and irritability, which exceed the border line of courtesy. They seem to take a pleasure in demonstrating the unhappy fact that the refinement of the agreeable has its counterpart in the refinement of the disagreeable. We sometimes hear people comparing the manners of the present generation very unfavorably with those of its predecessors, and they do this with considerable justice; but we have known gentlemen of the old school, as it is termed, who, though very courteous in female society, were accustomed to use some very ugly words in the company of their own sex. Perhaps they could quote poetry far more readily than some of their descendants, and they were always prepared with a line from Homer or Virgil to suit the occasion; but, for all that, their mental daily bread, especially after dinner, consisted of a very coarse kind of food, and their anecdotes would scarcely be tolerated in the club smoking-rooms of the present day. There are a few specimens of this school still left, and they are generally ostentatiously polite in society. Their drawing-room manners towards ladies are almost too fine, but the elderly spinster daughters who have to attend upon them at home, especially in their gouty moments, could testify that they are not always so affable. We have in our minds old military men, but there is a more solemn class of ancients who enjoy an equal reputation for courtesy. We refer to the race of old-fashioned college dons. These worthies could be the best hosts in the world, and nothing could exceed the charms of their chastened bonhomie; but we recollect the time when we used to compare the suavity which they annually exhibited to their visitors at Commemoration with their conduct towards ourselves during the rest of the year. The breakfasts and luncheons in "gaudy week"

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

were all very well, but the private interviews at other times in the dean's study were by no means feasts of courtesy.

Although we cherish a conservative respect for the old-fashioned polished gentleman, we have a lurking suspicion that he was sometimes a rather artificial creature. Polished he certainly was, but with a polish that wore off with very little rough usage, and which but thinly glossed over an inner man almost guiltless of refinement. He could be very polite, but he could also be very blasphemous; and, if he was occasionally poetical, he was often indecent. We are far from maintaining that some past periods of English history have not been more distinguished for courtesy than our own; but when we hear people talk of the times of George IV. and Beau Brummel as the millennium of British politesse, we feel that either their memory or their judgment must be greatly at fault. There are other epochs which might claim, at the very least, an equal distinction. In these days it is unfortunately true that, even in the highest society, there is too little courtesy either at home or away from it; but that does not prove the early part of the present century to have been the golden age of English manners. Our own is an age of moderation. We are expected to be moderate in religion, in politics, and in everything else; and we have a noble example of moderation set us by the youth of the present day in the indulgence of courtesy. A very courteous man is now considered a bore in gay, and a humbug in grave society. What a miserable thing is civility in comparison with the charms of chaff, and how insincere is he who treats ladies with deferential politeness! Such appears to be the current creed, though there may be a certain number of nonconformists. In our opinion the best test of the difference between courtesy and humbug will be found in the observation of home life. Humbug may assume the form of courtesy, but it cannot stand the strain of continual use; whereas true courtesy becomes more developed by constant habit, and thrives best in its native soil. People often confuse courtesy with humbug because they imagine that it necessarily implies personal esteem and respect. Where, therefore, they observe a deferential manner in the absence of personal esteem and respect, they immediately suspect humbug. In this they are mistaken. A judge may be perfectly courteous to the murderer whom he is sentencing to be hanged, and the head master of a public school may show formal politeness to his pupils in the disciplinary interviews which he has with them "after school;" but neither functionary would thereby lay himself open to the charge of being a humbug. Then there are persons who are so utterly devoid of any innate courtesy that they are incredulous of its existence in others; and, when they meet with it, they mistake it for humbug. It must be admitted, however, that there are occasions when scepticism is quite legitimate. For instance, when we see ostentatious displays of affection and respect on the part of husbands towards their wives, or parents towards their children, in public, we are apt to form our own opinion of their private life, shrewdly suspecting that this profusion of good things is not an every-day affair. We recommend to the clergy "rude papas" as a subject for a course of sermons. "Nagging mammas" might form a second series. To treat your children like servants or retrievers, whose highest duty is to fetch and carry, is not the surest means of indoctrinating them with the virtue of courtesy. It may be considered a superannuated idea that husbands and wives ought to treat each other with any semblance of ceremony; but we are old-fashioned enough to fancy that the opposite tendency is carried rather to an excess just at present. It may be a prejudice to think that there can possibly be anything objectionable in smoking cigarettes in ladies' drawing-rooms and boudoirs; but there always will be some people who lag behind their times. There is surely a sufficiently wide margin between treating a husband as an utter stranger and calling him a beast; but it seems too narrow for some ladies to discover. Among brothers and sisters a little harmless banter is perfectly admissible, and even perhaps desirable; but a family whose members are always snapping at each other in the style at present approved as clever, both in fiction and in reality, can scarcely be upheld as a model of courtesy at home. Both among brothers and sisters and husbands and wives, a great deal of talk which begins with chaff ends in rudeness. In society conventional politeness sets certain limits to repartee, but at home there are no such barriers. In private life, when the more refined weapons of conversational dispute fail, the combatants are apt to resort to vulgar personal abuse. Servants could sometimes tell curious stories about the courtesy of their employers at home, or rather their want of it. There

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

are ladies renowned for their charming manners in society who use their maids as safety-valves for the innate rudeness which they contrive to repress and conceal in public. Doubtless they are hurt when, in dressing their heads, their maids drag the hair with the brush; but that is no excuse for pretty mouths permitting ugly words to escape from them. The master may be very fond of his horse, but, after speaking to the animal in tones of the gentlest affection, it is scarcely the sign of a courteous gentleman to swear at the groom because his stirrup leathers are too short.

Courtesy at home, like other virtues, cannot be practised too constantly, or be too well fortified by undeviating habit. Even when a man is alone, it is not well to throw aside too freely the restraints and observances of social usage. We do not hesitate to say that no one can, when alone, discard all customary forms and ceremonies in dress, meals, or the like, without incurring danger of self-degradation. A man who neglects his toilet when he is going to spend the evening in his own society is decidedly wanting in self-respect, and the bachelor who only makes his rooms comfortable and attractive when he expects visitors must be pronounced unworthy of promotion to the more dignified state of life to which all bachelors presumably aspire.

From The Spectator.

THE CHINESE RECONQUEST OF EASTERN TURKESTAN.

THE campaign which commenced with the sieges of Urumtsi and Manas in the autumn of 1876, and which was brought to a close with the fall of Kashgar in December last, is beyond doubt the most remarkable military enterprise which has been attempted by any Asiatic nation within the present century. If we simply consider the enormous distances over which large bodies of men have been transported, the feat must be admitted to have been no ordinary one, but when we have added thereto such difficulties as those caused by the barrenness of the region in which the war was to be carried on, the reputed strength of Kashgar, the hostility of the Mahommedan population, and the scarcely concealed distrust of Russia, we find that the task which a Chinese general and a Chinese army have accomplished is one that deserves to rank with many of the most celebrated of European campaigns. But during its progress we have remained in the most profound ignorance of its exact details. No adventurous correspondent accompanied the army either of the conqueror or of the conquered, and the public, which received no thrilling description of the sack of Manas or the fight at Turfan, refused to believe that Chinese valor in central Asia was more real than the myth-land in which it was being demonstrated. At last, however, we have an authentic official account of one portion of this little-understood campaign, in the "memorial" report of the governor-general of Kansuh, and by supplementing that document with the more recent information received through Tashkent and Semiretchinsk, we are able to arrive at a tolerably clear idea of the whole campaign. We propose, therefore, to describe as a connected whole that war of which the Pekin Gazette published in detail on January 4th the narrative of one portion.

In the year 1875, the Chinese government resolved to chastise the rebel powers which had broken away from its control in the country lying beyond the province of Kansuh. The chief of these were the Tungan rulers of Urumtsi and Manas, and Yakoob Beg, the ameer of Kashgar. At Lanchefu, the capital of Kansuh, troops were accordingly collected in large numbers, and the necessary stores and supplies of cannon and ammunition were forwarded with as little delay as possible to the same place. Chinese movements are proverbially slow, and it was not until the year 1875 had closed that the army, under the nominal command of General Kin Shun — now Liu Kin Tang — but really controlled by Tso Tsung Tang, the governor-general of Kansuh, advanced westwards. Its headquarters were, some months later, established at Guchen, and from this place the sieges both of Urumtsi and of Manas were conducted. Of these, Urumtsi was the first to fall, and in November, 1876, after having held out for more than two months, Manas shared the same fate. Several of the leading men of the Tungan movement perished in the course of the latter siege, or in the massacre that ensued upon the surrender of Manas. Before the close of the year 1876, therefore, the first of the rebel powers had been overthrown, and Chinese influence and prestige restored in what, for want of a better term, may be called the region of Ultra-Kansuh. It now only remained for the Chinese army to deal with the second and more formidable

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

power. At this period of the campaign, we may easily imagine that among the Chinese themselves there prevailed considerable doubt as to the prudence of risking their success by more arduous and far more complicated operations in the country south of the Tian Shan. The hesitation, if any such there was, of the more cautious was overruled by the military confidence and zeal of the commanders, and the winter was spent in bringing up every available man and every serviceable gun to the camp round Manas. In the mean while the ruler of Kashgar was straining every nerve in organizing a sufficient defence for his realm, and with his characteristic impetuosity had advanced to the town of Turfan, nine hundred miles east of his capital, for the purpose of defending his extreme frontier against the Chinese assault. The imprudence of this wrong-headed determination cannot be overstated, and his little army, outflanked by the more numerous invader, was driven in confusion from its positions in the defiles of the Tian Shan during the month of March, 1877. A general engagement ensued at Turfan, to be fought out again at Toksoun, and in both the Chinese were completely victorious. The fall of Manas had given the Chinese complete control of the country north of the Tian Shan, as far west as the Russian frontier in Kuldja; the capture of Turfan now gave them a base whence war could be carried on with great advantage south of that mountain range.

When these reverses became known, disorders broke out in all directions in Kashgaria. Yakoob Beg was assassinated at Korla, and his eldest son, Beg Kuli Beg, murdered his own brother, Hacc Kuli Beg, soon afterwards. Aali, or Hakim, Khan broke off from his allegiance to the new ameer, and set up an independent authority in Kucha. Other pretenders appeared in the southern portion of the state, and the Badakshis began to encroach in the district of Sirikul. All thought of opposing the Chinese seems to have died out in the breasts of a people who were distracted by civil war and disturbance in their very midst. The invading army was left to do exactly as it pleased in that portion of the country which it had occupied, and the Kashgari abandoned everything east of Kucha. This very important town is situated at the junction of a northern and of a southern road leading into western Kashgar, and between it and Turfan four hundred miles of country, desolated by the retreating army, intervened. Many weeks elapsed before the Chinese generals had made the necessary arrangements for an advance through this region, and it is of this portion of the campaign that Tso Tsung Tang gives a description in the Pekin Gazette of January 4th last.

The advance force of some fifteen hundred men set out from Toksoun early in September, along the high-road towards Korla and Kucha. Their chief object was to make that road practicable for the main body, and also the necessary excavations for water at fixed halting-places. The mass of the army did not follow this advanced guard until the end of the month, but its advance was extremely rapid. On October 7th, Karasher was occupied, and in the few skirmishes that ensued the Chinese were uniformly successful. Two days afterwards the Chinese entered Korla, which they found a desolate solitude. Here, for the first time, the Chinese intendance gave signs of being deficient. The advance of the army had indeed been so rapid that the troops had left their supplies far in the rear, and for some time it appeared that they would be compelled to abandon Korla through sheer want of food. At this crisis fortune intervened, and "the soldiers being set to work to dig in search of buried stores, several tens of thousand catties' weight were discovered." No long delay after this retarded the forward movement of the Chinese, and on the 18th October a decisive battle was fought underneath the walls of Kucha. Kin Tang was again victorious, and Kucha, the chief bulwark of eastern Kashgar, fell into the hands of the invader. In the short space of twenty-one days the Chinese had, therefore, marched close on four hundred miles, captured three cities, and won one pitched encounter. The very next day after this striking achievement Kin Tang set out on the northern road towards Aksu, and from Hoser, his first stage in this later advance, is dated the very graphic account of which we have made mention. He was then preparing to attack Bai, or more correctly, Kutchabai, a small town on the Aksu road. We have to derive our information on this latest phase in the campaign from a different source, but with the fall of Kucha, of which, strange to say, we heard nothing at all at the time, it was evident that the whole Kashgarian defence had collapsed. The advance of the Chinese army was now slackened, for the purpose of allowing the reinforcements under General Chang Yao to come up from Karashar, and also to permit Tso Tsung Tang to execute that

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

flanking movement across the Tian Shan which sealed the fate of Aksu. The division with which Kin Tang had executed his brilliant feat of arms was not, it should be remembered, the only Chinese army operating in the field. There was another and a larger force north of the Tian Shan, with its base at Manas, which was under the immediate command of Tso Tsung Tang, and it was the sudden appearance of this army north of Aksu which paralyzed all the preparations Kuli Beg had for three months been making. Early in November, Aksu surrendered, through the treachery of its governor, — that is to say, he thought a timely discretion the better part of valor; and later on in the same month, Ush Turfan (New Turfan), eighty miles nearer to the capital, fell also into the hands of the Chinese. The joint armies of Tso Tsung and Kin Tang pressed on against Kashgar itself, and after winning a battle underneath its walls, in which Kuli Beg was wounded, the capital of the dominions of the late Athalik Ghazi once more was entered by a conquering army from far distant China. Since then Yarkand and Khoten — in the telegrams misspelt "Khokand" — have either been occupied by, or have voluntaily acknowledged, the Chinese, and may by such timely allegiance have diverted from themselves some of that wrath which has been so manifested towards the other cities.

Such, briefly narrated, is the story of the Chinese reconquest of eastern Turkestan, and we think that no one will dispute the fact that, both in strategy among their generals and in endurance and courage among their men, this Chinese army has done much to revindicate the old and long lost prestige which attached to the soldiers of Kanghi and Keen Lung. We will say nothing here of the future, although there is the prospect of a war in this region between Russia and China for the possession of Kuldja, or of an arrangement between those powers of the difficulty, by a further advance of the Russian dominions in Manchooria, in exchange for the retrocession of Kuldja. Whichever be the solution of what at present appears to be no slight danger, the result must be interesting to us; but in order to comprehend the future ramifications of this intricate business, it is very necessary that the campaign just ended should be first mastered. With that object in view, we have placed the preceding description of it before our readers.

CURIOUS HABITS OF THE JAPANESE. — The Japanese habit of reversing everything, if we may regard our own way of doing as the proper way, is very curious, and in some of its details very interesting. Mr. Griffiths, in his work on Japan, discusses it thus: "Another man is planing. He pulls the plane towards him. I notice a blacksmith at work. He pulls the bellows with his feet, while he is holding and hammering with both hands. He has several irons in the fire, and keeps his dinner pot boiling with the waste flame. His whole family, like the generations before them, seem to get their living in the hardware line. The cooper holds his tubs with his toes. All of them sit down while they work. Perhaps that is an important difference between a European and an Asiatic. One sits down to his work, the other stands up to it. Why is it that we do things contrariwise to the Japanese? Are we upside down, or they? The Japanese say that we are reversed. They call our penmanship "crab writing," because, say they, "it goes backward." The lines in our books cross the page like a crawfish, instead of going downward properly. In a Japanese stable we find the horse's flank where we look for his head. Japanese screws screw the other way. Their locks thrust to the left, ours to the right. The baby toys of the Aryan race squeak when they are squeezed; the Turanian gimcracks emit noise when pulled apart. A Caucasian, to injure his enemy, kills him; a Japanese kills himself to spite his foe. Which race is left-handed? Which has the negative, which the positive of truth? What is truth? What is down? What is up?"

Scientific American.

THE THEORY OF SLEEP. — A. Strumpell (Pflüger's Archiv) reports the case of a patient, aged sixteen, the whole of whose cutaneous surface was completely insensible, so that the strongest stimuli applied to the skin did not excite any expression of pain. A similar anæsthesia was shown in nearly all the accessible mucous membranes of the body, and muscular sensibility was completely wanting. In addition to this, there was a complete loss of smell and taste. Finally, the right eye was amaurotic, and the left ear deaf; so that, when the left eye was bound up and the right ear stopped, there was no further avenue of stimulus to the patient's brain. When the latter experiment was actually carried out, the patient in about five minutes sank into a deep sleep, from which he could only be roused by the stimulus of light; he could not by shaking only. When he was left to himself, he awoke in the course of the day, after many hours' sleep, either through internal stimuli or from the excitation of the brain through slight and unavoidable stimuli from without.

British Medical Journal.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXII. | No. 1771.—May 25, 1878. | From Beginning, Vol. CXXXVII.

CONTENTS.

I. LECKY'S "HISTORY OF ENGLAND IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY," . . . . . Quarterly Review, ... 451
II. MACLEOD OF DARE. By William Black. Part IX., ... Advance Sheets, ... 471
III. FROM THE QUIRINAL TO THE VATICAN, . Macmillan's Magazine, . . . 479
IV. THE COMET, ... Argosy, ... 488
V. THE APOLLO BELVEDERE, ... New Quarterly Review, . . . 496
VI. CANOSSA, ... Cornhill Magazine, ... 504
VII. RETROSPECTIVE SYMPATHY, ... Saturday Review, ... 510

POETRY.

SORROW ON THE SEA, ... 450 | SUNSET, ... 450

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY
LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

FOR EIGHT DOLLARS, remitted directly to the Publishers, the LIVING AGE will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of THE LIVING AGE is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of LITTELL & GAY.

Single Numbers of THE LIVING AGE, 18 cents.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

SORROW ON THE SEA.

"There is sorrow on the sea — it cannot be quiet."
Jer. xlix. 23.

The following fine poem, written by the late Captain M. A. S. Hare, of the "Eurydice," in a friend's album some years since, will be read with mournful interest.

I STOOD on the shore of the beautiful sea,
As the billows were roaming wild and free;
Onward they came with unfailing force,
Then backward turned in their restless course;
Ever and ever sounded their roar,
Foaming and dashing against the shore;
Ever and ever they rose and fell,
With heaving and sighing and mighty swell;
And deep seemed calling aloud to deep,
Lest the murmuring waves should drop to sleep.
In summer and winter, by night and by day,
Thro' cloud and sunshine holding their way;
Oh! when shall the ocean's troubled breast
Calmly and quietly sink into rest?
Oh! when shall the waves' wild murmuring cease,
And the mighty waters be hushed to peace?

It cannot be quiet — it cannot rest;
There must be heaving on ocean's breast;
The tide must ebb, and the tide must flow,
Whilst the changing seasons come and go.
Still from the depths of that hidden store
There are treasures tossed up along the shore;
Tossed by the billows — then seized again —
Carried away by the rushing main.
Oh, strangely glorious and beautiful sea!
Sounding forever mysteriously,
Why are thy billows still rolling on,
With their wild and sad and musical tone?
Why is there never repose for thee?
Why slumberest thou not, O mighty sea?

Then the ocean's voice I seemed to hear,
Mournfully, solemnly — sounding near,
Like a wail sent up from the caves below,
Fraught with dark memories of human woe,
Telling of loved ones buried there,
Of the dying shriek and the dying prayer;
Telling of hearts still watching in vain
For those who shall never come again;
Of the widow's groan, the orphan's cry,
And the mother's speechless agony.
Oh, no, the ocean can never rest
With such secrets hidden within its breast.
There is sorrow written upon the sea,
And dark and stormy its waves must be;
It cannot be quiet, it cannot sleep,
That dark, relentless, and stormy deep.

But a day will come, a blessed day,
When earthly sorrow shall pass away,
When the hour of anguish shall turn to peace,
And even the roar of the waves shall cease.
Then out from its deepest and darkest bed
Old Ocean shall render up her dead,
And, freed from the weight of human woes,
Shall quietly sink in her last repose.
No sorrow shall ever be written then
On the depths of the sea or the hearts of men,
But heaven and earth renewed shall shine,
Still clothed in glory and light divine.
Then where shall the billows of ocean be?
Gone! for in heaven shall be "no more sea."
'Tis a bright and beautiful thing of earth,
That cannot share in the soul's "new birth;"
'Tis a life of murmur and tossing and spray
And at resting-time it must pass away.

But, oh! thou glorious and beautiful sea,
There is health and joy and blessing in thee:
Solemnly, sweetly, I hear thy voice,
Bidding me weep and yet rejoice —
Weep for the loved ones buried beneath,
Rejoice in Him who has conquered death;
Weep for the sorrowing and tempest-tossed,
Rejoice in Him who has saved the lost;
Weep for the sin, the sorrow, and strife
And rejoice in the hope of eternal life.

Naval and Military Gazette.

SUNSET.

MELODY to ancient air
Has touched my soul. O nand so fair
That hymned it forth,
In the golden sunset there,
Of noble worth!

Feeble, poor, and old am I.
What is this life? Alas, how nigh
Seemed it to fate;
When the song I used to try
Came whispering late.

Tears are gauge of purest mind,
Drop e'en a few the maimed and blind:
I loved that song —
Mother sang it, and the wind
Swept soft along.

As I think of saintly face,
The touch of tender, loving grace,
I silent turn
Where the sunbeams leapt — no trace
To find, no bourne.

So leave I the sunset song,
And hie me home to where I long
To bow my head;
Blessèd the hand that struck among
Chords long since dead,

Bringing back the golden time
Of love and hope in its familiar rhyme;
The corn in ear —
Breath of the bee-swarmed, murmuring lime,
To cottage dear.

Chambers' Journal.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The Quarterly Review.

LECKY'S "HISTORY OF ENGLAND IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.*

THE history of England in the eighteenth century comprises momentous events and brilliant episodes,— the age of Queen Anne with its galaxy of statesmen and wits, the victories of Marlborough, the legislative union with Scotland, the secure establishment of the Hanoverian dynasty on the throne, the final collapse of the Jacobite cause at Culloden, the splendid administration of Chatham, the loss of our American colonies, the more than compensating rise of our Indian empire, and the culminating period of Parliamentary eloquence as represented by the two Pitts and their contemporaries. But the eighteenth century is not marked out or placed in broad relief by any of those startling subversive movements or occurrences which give sometimes an elevating and sometimes a lurid grandeur to its predecessors. It presents nothing like the desolating Wars of the Roses, or the Reformation, or the religious struggles under Elizabeth, or the great Rebellion, or the Revolution of 1688. Its chief value and interest consist in its containing and (to the discriminating inquirer) unfolding the germs from which the England of 1700 has gradually, quietly, almost imperceptibly grown into the England of to-day. To Mr. Lecky must be assigned the high and distinctive merit of having been amongst the first to see this, and the first to undertake the task of explaining or indicating the causes and processes by which the most remarkable changes in our system of government, or the constitution of our society, during the entire period in question, have been brought about. His plan is stated in his preface.

I have not attempted to write the history of the period I have chosen year by year, or to give a detailed account of military events or of the minor personal and party incidents which form so large a part of political annals. It has been my object to disengage from the great mass of facts those which relate to the permanent forces of the nation, or which indicate some of the more enduring features of national life. The growth or decline of the monarchy, the aristocracy, and the democracy, of the Church and of Dissent, of the agricultural, the manufacturing, and the commercial interests; the increasing power of Parliament and of the press; the history of political ideas, of art, of manners, and of belief; the changes that have taken place in the social and economical condition of the people; the influences that have modified national character; the relations of the mother country to its dependencies, and the causes that have accelerated or retarded the advancement of the latter, form the main subjects of this book.

The subjects to which the greater part of the ensuing remarks will be devoted, are those mentioned in the passages we have italicized; but, before coming to them, we propose to take a cursory view of some political questions which Mr. Lecky has done his best to elucidate.

His opening paragraph is a condensed recapitulation of the political vicissitudes undergone from the Revolution of 1688 to the Reform Bill of 1832 by the two great parties, Whig and Tory, between which the whole country was once divided, much as it is divided between Liberal and Conservative now. "There is one theory," he proceeds, "on the subject of those vicissitudes to which it is necessary briefly to advert, for it has been advocated by an historian of great eminence, has been frequently repeated, and has, in some respects, considerable plausibility." The historian of great eminence is the late Earl Stanhope, who unfolds and lays marked stress on the theory in an introductory passage of his history.

It is very remarkable that, in Queen Anne's reign, the relative meaning of these terms (Whig and Tory) was not only different, but opposite to that which they bore at the accession of William IV. In theory indeed the main principle of each continues the same. The leading principle of the Tories is the dread of popular licentiousness. The leading principle of the Whigs is the dread of royal encroachment. It may thence, perhaps, be deduced that good and wise men would attach themselves either to the Whig or to the Tory party, according as there seemed to be the greatest danger at that particular period from despotism or from democracy. The same person who would have been a Whig in 1712

* A History of England in the Eighteenth Century. By William Edward Hartpole Lecky. Vols. 1 and 2. London, 1878.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

would have been a Tory in 1830. For, on examination, it will be found that in nearly all particulars a modern Tory resembles a Whig of Queen Anne's reign, and a Tory of Queen Anne's reign a modern Whig.

The facts on which Lord Stanhope principally relies are, that the Tories of Queen Anne's time assailed Marlborough during the French war, as the Whigs during the Peninsular war assailed Wellington; that the Tories upheld, whilst the Whigs opposed, free-trade principles at the peace of Utrecht; that the Whigs were the principal authors of the penal laws against the Catholics, the repeal of which subsequently became a standard article of their creed; that the Tories were for short Parliaments and an extension of the suffrage when the Whigs were carrying the Septennial Act and resisting all approach to what was afterwards their rallying cry under the name of Parliamentary reform; that, in financial reform again, the Whigs, for more than half a century, were untrue to their principles by refusing to concur in place bills or pension bills proposed or promoted by their antagonists.

Admitting the plausibility of the case as stated by Lord Stanhope, Mr. Lecky replies: —

I think, however, that a more careful examination will sufficiently show that, in spite of these appearances, the ground for assuming this inversion of principles is very small. The main object of the Whig party in the early part of the eighteenth century was to establish in England a system of government in which the will of the people as expressed by Parliament should be supreme, and the power of the monarch should be subject to the limitations it imposed. The substitution of a Parliamentary title for divine right as the basis of the throne, and the assertion of the right of the nation to depose a dynasty which had transcended the limits of the constitution, were the great principles for which the Whigs were contending. They involved or governed the whole system of Whig policy, and they were assuredly in perfect accordance with its later developments. The Tory party, on the other hand, under Queen Anne was to a great extent, and under George I. was almost exclusively, Jacobite. The overwhelming majority of its members held fervently the doctrines of the divine rights of kings and of the sinfulness of all resistance, and they accordingly regarded the power of Parliament as altogether subordinate to that of a legitimate king. The difference of dynasties was thus not merely a question of persons, but a question of principles. Each dynasty represented a whole scheme of policy or theory of government, the one being essentially Tory and the other essentially Whig. The maintenance of the Hanoverian dynasty on the throne was, therefore, very naturally the supreme aim of the Whig party. They adopted whatever means they thought conducive to its attainment, and in this simple fact we have the key to what may appear the aberrations of their policy.

Prominent amongst these means was the Septennial Act, carried by the Whigs, because they believed that a dissolution immediately after the accession of George I. and the Rebellion of 1715, would imperil the dynasty, would wreck the State vessel in which their political fortunes and principles were embarked. In like manner they passed penal laws against the Catholics so long as Catholic was another name for Jacobite, and labored unremittingly for the repeal of those laws when all fear of a divided allegiance was at end. Except when they were warped aside by paramount considerations of expediency, both parties were tolerably faithful to their creeds. The Whigs were always with the Dissenters, the Tories with the Church. The strength of the one always lay in the landed gentry and the country: that of the other in the commercial classes and the towns.

A striking specimen of Mr. Lecky's peculiarity of view and mode of treatment is presented by his inquiry into the immediate causes of the Revolution of 1688; from which it would appear that he inclines towards the historical school of Voltaire, who was fond of tracing up great events to accidents, like the delay (by the casting of a horseshoe) of the courier from Rome, whose timely arrival might have prevented Henry VIII.'s breach with the papacy and have indefinitely postponed the Reformation. The opposite theory was shadowed out by Lord Macaulay in one of the most splendid of his rhetorical amplifications: "The sun illuminates the hills whilst it is yet below the horizon;

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

and truth is discovered by the highest minds a little before it becomes manifest to the multitude. This is the extent of their superiority. They are the first to catch and reflect a light, which without their assistance must, in a short time, be visible to those who lie far beneath them. The same remark will apply equally to the fine arts." The same remark, so far as it is well founded, will apply to political and social progress.

Whoever [says Mr. Lecky] will study the history of the downfall of the Roman republic; of the triumph of Christianity in the Roman Empire; of the dissolution of that empire; of the mediæval transition from slavery to serfdom; of the Reformation, or of the French Revolution, may easily convince himself that each of these great changes was the result of a long series of religious, social, political, economical, and intellectual causes, extending over many generations. So eminently is this the case, that some distinguished writers have maintained that the action of special circumstances and of individual genius, efforts, and peculiarities, counts for nothing in the great march of human affairs, and that every successful revolution must be attributed solely to the long train of intellectual influences that prepared and necessitated its triumph.

It is not difficult, however, to show that this, like most very absolute historical generalizations, is an exaggeration, and several instances might be cited in which a slight change in the disposition of circumstances, or in the action of individuals, would have altered the whole course of history. There are, indeed, few streams of tendency, however powerful, that might not, at some early period of their career, have been arrested or deflected.

The stream of tendency, he thinks, was entirely in favor of James, and against William, when it was deflected by consummate statesmanship on the part of William and folly amounting to fatuity on the part of James. "By a very rare concurrence of circumstances a form of government was established and maintained in England, for which the mass of the people were intellectually wholly unprepared." So far was this form of government from being easily consolidated or gaining ready adaptation from being tried, that a quarter of a century later the restoration of the Stuarts hung upon a thread. Like the refusal of the Comte de Chambord to give up the white flag, the refusal of the Pretender to give up his religion was the chief, almost the sole, bar to the fullest realization of his hopes.

Accumulated proofs are adduced by Mr. Lecky to show that Jacobites and Hanoverians were agreed upon this point. Robethon, a secretary of the embassy at Hanover, wrote in January, 1712–13: "The Pretender, on the slightest appearance of pretended conversion, might ruin all — the religion, the liberties, the privileges of the nation." "The best part of the gentry and half the nobility," wrote a Jacobite in 1712, "are resolved to have the king, and Parliament would do it in a year if it could be believed he had changed his religion." "I am convinced," wrote the Duke of Buckingham in July 1712, "that if Harry [the king] would return to the Church of England all would be easy. Nay, from what I know, if he would but barely give hopes he would do so, my brother [Queen Anne] would do all he can to leave him his estate."

The Pretender, highly to his honor, stood firm. He would not palter with his conscience, or make a show of paltering with it, for a throne. In March, 1714, when Queen Anne was dying, and a crisis was at hand which he could have swayed by a word, he answered with his own hand a reiterated entreaty by saying: "I neither want counsel nor advice to remain unalterable in my fixed resolution of never dissembling my religion; but rather to abandon all than act against my conscience and honor, cost what it will . . . How could ever my subjects depend upon me or be happy under me if I should make use of such a notorious hypocrisy to get myself amongst them?"

Even this did not discourage his partisans, and Mr. Lecky thinks that when Bolingbroke, after the dismissal of Oxford on July 27, 1714, proceeded to sketch the outlines of a ministry almost exclusively Jacobite, "there is every reason to believe that such a ministry, supported by the queen, presided over by a statesman eminently skilful, daring, and unscrupulous, and disposing of all the civil and military

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

administration of the country, could, in the existing condition of England, have effected the restoration of the Stuarts." Bolingbroke subsequently declared that, so well taken were his measures, only six weeks were required to place matters in a condition which would have left him nothing to fear. The commanding position which justified this language had been obtained by artfully playing one female favorite against another; and that position, with all the startling consequences involved in it — the change of a dynasty, the overthrow of a constitution that has since become the envy of the world — depended on a contingency which no human foresight or prudence could anticipate or control. The chances fell out against him. The first meeting of the council after Bolingbroke's accession to the premiership, held in the presence of the queen, was too much for her. She left it, saying to those about her that she should never survive the scene: she fell into a state of stupor, in which she remained till she died on August 1st. On the 3rd, Bolingbroke wrote to Swift: "The Earl of Oxford was removed on Tuesday: the queen died on Sunday! What a world is this, and how does fortune banter us!"

A recent article on the "Age of Queen Anne"* relieves us from the necessity of dwelling further on the leading events and prominent features of her reign as sketched or summarized by Mr. Lecky. He pauses at the accession of George I. for an analysis of the Whig party, including the aristocracy, the commercial classes, and the Nonconformists.

Fully recognizing, perhaps rather exaggerating, the disadvantages of a titled and landed aristocracy, especially the false estimate of men and things, the servile and sycophantic dispositions, the tuft-hunting, the vulgarity of thought and feeling it tends to foster in the community, Mr. Lecky thinks that these are more than counterbalanced by its advantages, and declares it to be indispensable to our mixed form of government, in which > orders and degrees

> Jar not with liberty, but well consist.

The Whig aristocracy was clearly the mainstay of the new dynasty; but Lord Beaconsfield's favorite notion, that they aimed at and to a great extent succeeded in reducing the two first Hanoverian kings of England to the condition of a Venetian doge, is in flat contradiction to the facts.

* Quarterly Review for July, 1870.

The most influential men of these reigns were Walpole and the first Pitt, who neither of them relied on the great families. When Pitt's voice was swaying the House of Commons and resounding through the country, it was virtually the voice of the people; what gave him resistless sway was the public at his back; whilst Walpole's long tenure of office was owing to the adroitness with which he managed the court, and the organized system of corruption which he kept up. The manner in which Sir Spencer Compton was appointed to supersede him on the accession of George II., from a mere personal predilection of the king, and then set aside partly through the queen's interference and partly from the exposure of Compton's incapacity, shows how little force was put upon the royal inclination by any cabal or party. The precarious and qualified nature of Walpole's power may also be inferred from its perceptible decline after the death of Queen Caroline. In point of fact, no sovereigns, except at brief and rare intervals, were ever less in the condition of a doge than the English sovereigns from the Revolution downwards. Lord Beaconsfield admits that William III. was his own minister, and never came under the yoke of the oligarchy. Queen Anne, again, was enabled, by the division of parties, to indulge a mischievous extent of individual volition and caprice. Bullied by the Duchess of Marlborough, or cajoled by Mrs. Masham, it was by her female favorites, not by the great nobles, that she was controlled. But her successor, we are told, was comparatively defenceless against the alleged conspiracy.

"Unsupported by the mass of the people, ignorant of our language, phlegmatic in temperament, George I. entirely depended upon the Whig peers, and the Whig peers resolved to compensate themselves for the disappointment they had experienced under William III. They at once established the cabinet on its present basis."* They did nothing of the sort; yet, strange to say, Mr. Lecky seems to incline towards the same grave error. After dwelling upon the weakening of the monarchical principle by the denial of divine right and other causes, he says: —

> Another very important cause of the decline of the power of royalty was the increased development of party government. The formation of a ministry, or homogeneous body of

* Vindication of the English Constitution in a Letter to a Noble and Learned Lord (Lyndhurst). By Disraeli the Younger. London, 1835, p. 170.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ruling statesmen of the same politics, deliberating in common, and in which each member is responsible to the others, has been justly described by Lord Macaulay as one of the most momentous and least noticed consequences of the Revolution. It was essential to the working of Parliamentary government, and it was scarcely less important as abridging the influence of the crown. As long as the ministers were selected by the sovereign from the most opposite parties, as long as each was responsible only for his own department, and was perfectly free to vote, speak, or intrigue against his colleagues, it is obvious that the chief efficient power must have resided with the sovereign.

But this state of things continued substantially unaltered till far into the reign of George III. On close inquiry it will be found that the first cabinet on the present basis, homogeneous and subject to the prime minister, was the cabinet of Pitt, after the expulsion of Thurlow, in 1792. A very different notion must have prevailed in 1754, when Henry Fox (already a privy-councillor) was made a member of the cabinet by the king, as a mark of private favor, on condition that he was "not to interfere with or derogate from the priority of the secretary of state in the House of Commons." The career of the great commoner abounds with illustrations of the anomalous and uncertain character of the institution in his time. He was the master spirit of an administration of which another (the Duke of Newcastle) was the chief. He took a subordinate place in one formed (1766) by himself with unlimited powers, and gradually sank into a nonentity in it without leaving it. He is censured by Horace Walpole for undue presumption in assuming to guide the councils of a third, for the policy of which he was responsible. As we recently observed, it was a surprise to Charles Fox when he was dismissed for an act of ministerial subordination by Lord North; and Thurlow evidently thought that he was following no uncommon course when he competed for royal favor, and consequent supremacy in the cabinet, with his chief. "Stick to Pitt," was his advice to Scott (Lord Eldon). "He has tripped up my heels, and I would have tripped up his if I could. I confess I did not think the king would have parted with me so easily."

Dating from the Revolution, party government took rather more than a century to arrive at maturity, and, from not bearing this in mind, Mr. Lecky has, almost as completely as Lord Beaconsfield, mistaken the position of the first kings of the Hanoverian line: —

On the death of the queen, they (the Tories) had all, at least passively, accepted the change of dynasty, and there is no reason to question the substantial truth of the assertion of Bolingbroke, that the proscription of the Tories by George I. for the first time made the party entirely Jacobite. But whatever may have been its effect on the stability of the dynasty, there can be no doubt of the effect of the Whig monopoly of office on the authority of the sovereign. He was no longer the moderating power, holding the balance in a heterogeneous and divided cabinet, able to dismiss a statesman of one policy and to employ a statesman of another, and thus in a great measure to determine the tendency of the government. He could govern only through a political body which, in its complete union and in its command of the majority in Parliament, was usually able, by the threat of joint resignation, which would make government impossible, to dictate its own terms. . . .

In this manner, by the force of events, much more than by any express restrictive legislation, a profound change had passed over the position of the monarchy in England. The chief power fell into the hands of the Whig statesmen.

On turning to a subsequent portion of the volume, we find ample evidence that the king was still the moderating power, holding the balance not indeed between Whigs and Tories, but between adverse sections of Whigs, who, far from presenting anything like complete union, were more divided than at any period of their annals. Thus we are told of "the great schism which broke out in 1717, when Lord Townshend was dismissed from office; when Walpole, with several less noted Whigs, resigned, and went into violent opposition, and when the chief powers passed into the hands of Sunderland and Stanhope:" the explanation being that Sunderland had conciliated the king by humoring his Hanoverian tendencies, whilst Walpole and Townshend had made themselves peculiarly obnoxious and distasteful by opposing them. When Walpole, after many alternations of fortune, obtained the supremacy, he did not gain it or hold it, we are distinctly told, haughtily and independently, by dint of a firmly-knit league or commanding majority, which enabled him to dictate his terms or impose himself as a necessity, but by means which imply the entire absence of the higher elements of strength.

Other ministers may have bribed on a larger scale to gain some special object, or in moments of transition, crisis, or difficulty. It was left to Walpole to organize corruption as a system, and to make it the normal process of Parliamentary government. It was his

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd settled policy to maintain his Parliamentary majority, not by attracting to his ministry great orators, great writers, great financiers, or great statesmen, not by effecting any combination or coalition of parties, by identifying himself with any great object of popular desire, or by winning to his side young men in whose character and ability he could trace the promise of future eminence, but simply by engrossing borough influence and extending the patronage of the crown.

Again and again does Mr. Lecky supply ample evidence against the theory which he professedly adopts:—

The general level of political life was, however, deplorably low. Politics under Queen Anne centred chiefly round the favorites of the sovereign, and in the first Hanoverian reigns the most important influences were court intrigues or Parliamentary corruption. Bolingbroke secured his return from exile by the assistance of the Duchess of Kendal, one of the mistresses of George I., whom he is said to have bribed with 10,000*l*. Carteret at first based his hopes upon the same support, but, imagining that he had met with coldness or infidelity on the part of the duchess, he transferred his allegiance to her rival, the Countess of Platen.

Chesterfield, towards the end of his career, intrigued against Newcastle with the Duchess of Yarmouth; and Pitt himself is stated, on very good authority, to have secured his position in the cabinet in a great degree by his attentions to the same lady.

Surely this sustained and paramount influence of mistresses is wholly irreconcilable with the supposed dictation of the Whig oligarchy or the subjection of the monarch to party combination.

In a recent article* on Lord E. Fitzmaurice's life of his ancestor, the first Marquis of Lansdowne, we had occasion to comment on the extremely low state of political morality in England during the greater part of the eighteenth century. There was a period of thirty or forty years during which public spirit had completely died out and disappeared amongst our public men; although occasional sparks of it may have flashed from the nation at large, as when popular indignation was roused by the tale of Jenkins's ears or the arbitrary proceedings against Wilkes. Mr. Lecky does more than confirm this estimate. In his opinion the corruption extended far beyond the political arena: its effects might be traced in almost every class of life: the very heart of the nation was tainted to the core.

In very few periods was there so little religious zeal, or active loyalty, or public spirit. A kindred tone pervaded the higher branches of intellect. The philosophy of Locke, deriving our ideas mainly if not exclusively from external sources, was supreme among the stronger minds. In literature, in art, in speculation, the imagination was repressed; strong passions, elevated motives, and sublime aspirations were replaced by critical accuracy of thought and observation, by a measured and fastidious beauty of form, by clearness, symmetry, sobriety, and good sense. We find this alike in the prose of Addison, in the poetry of Pope, and in the philosophy of Hume. The greatest wit and the most original genius of the age was also the most intensely and the most coarsely realistic. The greatest English painter of the time devoted himself mainly to caricature. The architects could see nothing but barbarous deformity in the Gothic cathedral, and their own works had touched the very nadir of taste.

This is an exaggeration. There is nothing in the prose of Addison, the poetry of Pope, or the philosophy of Hume akin to the coarse cynicism of Walpole, the polished selfishness of Chesterfield, or the profligate sycophancy of Doddington; and it is hardly with caricature that we habitually associate the name of Hogarth, who was one of the finest moralists as well as (what Mr. Lecky afterwards terms him) the greatest English painter of his time. But the utter want of public spirit exhibited during the Rebellion of 1745, certainly indicates something more than what lies upon the surface for those who run to read. What must have been the condition of a people who, after more than half a century's experience of a free constitution, had not made up their minds whether it was worth keeping, or whether they might not just as well revert to the dynasty which they had expelled for systematic encroachments on their most cherished liberties and rights? "When the late rebellion broke out," says Lord Hardwicke in 1749, "I believe most men were convinced that, if the rebels had succeeded, Popery as well as slavery would have been the certain consequence, and yet what a faint resistance did the people make in any part of the kingdom!" What Mr. Lecky believes to be the true causes of this indifference are stated in a letter from Alderman Heathcote to the Earl of Marchmont in September 1745:—

Your lordship may observe the little influence an actual insurrection has had on the public funds; and unless some speedy stop be put to this universal coldness by satisfying the demands of the nation and suppressing by proper laws that Parliamentary prostitution

* Quarterly Review for April, 1876.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

which has destroyed our armies, our fleets, and our constitution, I greatly fear the event.

It is an undoubted fact, to which comparatively little attention has been paid, that the House of Commons had gradually brought upon itself much of the hatred and distrust which in arbitrary times had been concentrated on the crown. We are reminded of Speaker Onslow's recorded opinion, that the Septennial Act formed the era of the emancipation of the Commons from its former dependence on the crown and on the House of Lords. He might have added, from much of its wholesome and constitutional dependence upon the people. The consequences were seen and felt in the assumption of legislative and judicial functions, under the guise of privilege or the pretence of wounded dignity. "Almost every injury in word or act done to a member of Parliament was, during the reign of George II., voted a breach of privilege, and thus brought under the immediate and often vindictive jurisdiction of the House. Among the offences thus characterized were shooting the rabbits of one member, poaching on the fishponds of another, injuring the trees of a third, and stealing the coal of a fourth." Every general election gave rise to an explosion of popular disgust at the manner in which the contested seats were appropriated by the majority. "I believe," says Lord Hervey, "the manifest injustice in glaring violation of all truth in the decisions of this Parliament surpass even the most flagrant and infamous instances of any of their predecessors."

It is not easy to understand, remarks Mr. Lecky (speculating in his manner on the highly colored picture he has drawn), how a Parliament so thoroughly vicious in its constitution should have proved itself, in any degree, a faithful guardian of English liberty, or "should have produced so large an amount of wise, temperate, and tolerant legislation as it unquestionably did." Yet no one, he thinks, who candidly considers the general tenor of English administration during the long period of Whig ascendancy in the eighteenth century, can question that Voltaire and Montesquieu were correct in describing it as greatly superior to the chief governments of the Continent.

Considering what the chief governments of the Continent — of France, Spain, Germany, and Italy — were, when Voltaire and Montesquieu referred to them, this is saying very little for that of England; and it is to be regretted that Mr. Lecky has not cited specimens of the wise, temperate, and tolerant legislation of which he speaks. The most striking chapters of his book bear evidence to the intemperate and intolerant character of the legislation extended to that very portion of the empire (Ireland) where temper and toleration were most imperatively required. In England, too, the penal laws were rigidly maintained: the criminal law in all its branches, procedure included, was little better than the patched-up relic of a barbarous age. The bankruptcy laws, the law of debtor and creditor, the poor-laws, the game-laws, the laws of marriage, indeed all the laws regulating the social and commercial relations of the community, were in a most unsatisfactory state. The prisons, the press-gang, the want of sanitary regulations, the metropolitan magistracy and police, the insecurity of life and property in the most populous districts, were a disgrace to a people pretending to civilization. The slave-trade was rapidly rising into that monstrous blot upon humanity upon which we now look back with a mixture of surprise and shame that it was permitted to assume such appalling dimensions without a check. None of these things have been passed unnoticed by Mr. Lecky, but what he has failed to mark is, that the most crying evils remained for succeeding generations to grapple with, and that the eighteenth century left the worst of them untouched. The remedial measures he specifies fell lamentably short of their professed aim: with one marked exception, the Marriage Act (commonly called Lord Hardwicke's Act) of 1754.

Prior to this act a marriage valid for all purposes could be celebrated by a priest in orders at any time or place, without notice, consent of parents, or record of any kind. The celebration of such marriages naturally fell into the hands of needy and disreputable clergymen, who were always to be found in or about the Fleet Prison, where they were or had been confined for debt. Hence the term Fleet marriages: although the Fleet parsons by no means enjoyed a monopoly. Indeed, the most thriving business in this walk was carried on by the Reverend Alexander Keith, at a chapel in Curzon Street, who was computed to have married on an average six thousand couples per annum. The Fleet parsons, however, had no reason to complain: it was proved before Parliament that there had been 2,954 Fleet marriages in four months; and it appeared from the

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

memorandum-book of one of them, that he had made 57*l.* by marriage-fees in a month: of another, that he had married one hundred and seventy-three couples in a single day.

The scandal reached its acme in the seaports when a fleet arrived, and the sailors were married — as Lord Beaconsfield said converts to free-trade were made by Sir Robert Peel — in platoons. There was a story that once when from fifty to a hundred couples were arranged for the ceremony at a chapel at Portsmouth, some confusion took place, and several of them got hold of the wrong hands. When the resulting difficulty was mentioned to the parson, he exclaimed: "Never mind, you are all of you married to some one, and you must sort yourselves afterwards." Sham marriages by sham priests, devices such as that by which Squire Thornhill fancied he had got possession of the person of Olivia Primrose without making her his wife, were of constant occurrence. Examples are hardly required to show the amount of misery that must inevitably result when a solemn engagement may be contracted without a pause for reflection, on the spur of a passing inclination or caprice. But palpable as was the abuse, the mending act met with the most strenuous opposition, in which Henry Fox took the lead; and Horace Walpole deliberately denounced the bill, declaring that "from beginning to end one only view had predominated, that of pride and aristocracy." It must have been some satisfaction to him that a loophole or mode of evasion was left by which the object of the act could be partially defeated. Until the virtual abolition of Gretna Green marriages in 1856, it was still possible to elope with an heiress or peer's daughter, and most exciting races were occasionally run between the truant couple and the father or guardian. One of the most remarkable occurred in 1782, when a far-descended earl eloped with the daughter of the wealthiest of the London bankers, and was hotly pursued by the father, whose chaise-and-four, after they had actually crossed the Border, was in the act of heading them, when the bridegroom's best-man (the eldest son of an earl), seated in the rumble, drew a pistol and shot one of the leaders dead.

A series of legislative measures to which Mr. Lecky attaches great importance, were those directed against gin-drinking, the passion for which, dating from 1724, he describes as spreading with the rapidity and violence of an epidemic.

Small as is the place which this fact occupies in English history, it was probably, if we consider all the consequences that have flowed from it, the most momentous in that of the eighteenth century — incomparably more so than any event in the purely political or military annals of the country.

The consumption of British spirits in 1735 was ten times what it had been in 1689, and more than double what it had been in 1714. Physicians saw in gin a new and terrible source of disease and mortality. The grand jury of Middlesex formally presented it as the cause of much the greater part of the poverty and crime of the metropolis. On the signboards of noted gin-shops it was announced that a customer might get drunk for a penny, and dead-drunk for twopence, and have straw for nothing. Faith was kept by providing cellars strewn with straw, on which the customer who had got his twopennyworth was deposited till he was ready to re-commence. The ill success of the first repeated attempts to grapple with the evil may be judged from the fact that in 1749 the number of private gin-shops, within the bills of mortality, was estimated at more than seventeen thousand. Disease, vice, crime, disorder, lawlessness, profanity, immoralities of all sorts, had proportionally increased. In a pamphlet published in 1751, Fielding describes the increase of robbers as in a great degree owing to a new kind of drunkenness unknown to our ancestors; he states that gin was the principal sustenance of more than one hundred thousand people in the metropolis, and predicts that, should the drinking of this poison be continued at the same rate during the next twenty years, there will be very few of the common people left to drink it.

The same complaints were made of the prevalence of crimes of violence, and the resulting sense of insecurity, at a much later period, when it could be no longer ascribed to gin-drinking, which gradually abated, like other epidemics, moral and physical, from causes lying, we suspect, beyond the reach of the legislature; although Mr. Lecky mentions the remedial measures of the Pelham ministry, in 1751, as forming a striking instance of the manner in which legislation, if not overstrained or ill-timed, can improve the morals of a people. He specifies amongst the consequences of these measures that dropsy immediately diminished, and that the diminution was ascribed by physicians to the marked decrease of drunkenness in the community.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Still these measures formed a palliation and not a cure, and from the early years of the eighteenth century gin-drinking has never ceased to be the main counteracting influence to the moral, intellectual, and physical benefits that might be expected from increased commercial prosperity. Of all the pictures of Hogarth none are more impressive than those in which he represents the different conditions of a people whose national beverage is beer and of a people who are addicted to gin, and the contrast exhibits in its most unfavorable aspect the difference between the Hanoverian period and that which preceded it.

It is to be feared that the habit of dram or gin drinking, when it has once taken root in a northern climate and an over-populated community, can never be eradicated. It is too tempting a resource in poverty and cold. There is a moral, deeper than the humor, in a once popular caricature representing a workman pulling his wife out of a ditch with the remark, "Why, Nanny, you are drunk." — "And what do that argify, if I am happy?"

The streets of London were rife with violence and crime prior to the increased consumption of gin. Readers of "The Spectator" will hardly require to be reminded of the Mohocks, including the "sweaters," who formed a circle round their victim and pricked him with their swords; the "dancing-masters," who made him dance by a similar application of cold steel; and the "tumblers," whose amusement it was to set women on their heads or roll them down-hill in barrels.

Now is the time that rakes their revels keep,
Kindlers of riot, enemies of sleep.
His scatter'd pence the flying nicker* flings,
And with the copper shower the casement rings.
Who has not heard the scowerer's midnight fame?
Who has not trembled at the Mohock's name?
Was there a watchman took his nightly rounds
Safe from their blows or new-invented wounds?
I pass their desperate deeds and mischief done,
Where from Snow Hill black steepy torrents run.
How matrons, hoop'd within the hogshead's womb,
Were tumbled furious thence; the rolling tomb
O'er the stones thunders, bounds from side to side;
So Regulus to save his country died.†

Any defenceless person, male or female, who happened to be out after nightfall, was exposed to ill-treatment. Sir Roger de Coverley having expressed a wish to see the new tragedy, asked if there would not be some danger in coming home late, in case the Mohocks were abroad. "However," he said, "if Captain Sentry will make one with us to-morrow night, and if you will both of you call on me about four o'clock, that we may be at the house before it is full, I will have my own coach in readiness to attend you." "The Captain" (continues "The Spectator"), "who did not fail to meet me there at the appointed hour, bid Sir Roger fear nothing, for that he had put on the same sword which he made use of at the battle of Steenkirk. Sir Roger's servants, and among the rest my old friend the butler, had, I found, provided themselves with good oaken plants, to attend their master upon this occasion. When we had placed him in his coach, with myself at his left hand, the Captain before him, and his butler at the head of his footmen in the rear, we conveyed him in safety to the playhouse, where, after having marched up the entry in good order, the Captain and I went with him, and seated him between us in the pit."

In Johnson's "London," published in 1738, we read: —

Prepare for death if here at night you roam,
And sign your will before you sup from home.
Some fiery fop, with new commission vain,
Who sleeps on brambles till he kills his man,
Some foolish drunkard reeling from a feast,
Provokes a broil and stabs you for a jest.

The opening chapter of Fielding's "Amelia," published in 1751, exemplifies the still unprotected state of the streets, the inefficiency of the police, the worse than inefficiency of the magistrates, and the frightful scenes of disorder, suffering, and vice presented by the prisons. We are first requested to figure to ourselves a family, the master of which should put his butler on the coach-box, his steward behind his coach, his coachman in the buttery, his footman in the stewardship, and in the same manner should misemploy the talents of every other servant.

As ridiculous as this may seem, I have often considered some of the lower officers in our civil government to be disposed in this very manner. To begin, I think, as low as I well can with the watchmen in our metropolis, who being to guard our streets by night from thieves and robbers, an office which at least requires strength of body, are chosen out of those poor old decrepit people who are, from their want of bodily strength, rendered incapable of getting a livelihood by work. These men, armed only with a pole, which some of them are scarce able to lift, are to secure the persons

* Persons who broke windows with halfpence.
† Gay's "Trivia," published in 1728.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

and houses of his Majesty's subjects from the attacks of gangs of young, bold, stout, desperate, and well-armed villains. If the poor old fellows should run away from such enemies, no one I think can wonder, unless it be that they were able to make their escape.

Admitting that matters improve a little as we ascend amongst our public officers, the author suggests that Mr. Thrasher, the justice before whom Booth and others are brought, had some few imperfections in his magisterial capacity, one being that he was equally ignorant of statute and common law.

This perhaps was a defect; but this was not all; for where mere ignorance is to decide a point between two litigants, it will always be an even chance whether it decides right or wrong; but sorry am I to say, right was often in a much worse situation than this, and wrong hath often had five hundred to one on his side before that magistrate, who, if he was ignorant of the laws of England, was yet well versed in the laws of nature. He perfectly well understood that fundamental principle so strongly laid down in the institutes of the learned Rochefoucault, by which the duty of self-love is so strongly enforced, and every man is taught to consider himself as the centre of gravity, and to attract all things thither. To speak the truth plainly, the justice was never indifferent in a cause but when he could get nothing on either side.

Fielding never misses an opportunity of exposing and satirizing the venality and subserviency of the justices. In the course of the altercation between Squire Western and his sister, on his refusal to commit Honour for impertinence, Mrs. Western said "she knew the law much better: that she had known servants very severely punished for affronting their masters," and then named a certain justice of the peace in London, "who," she said, "would commit a servant to Bridewell at any time when a master or mistress desired it." "Like enough," cries the squire, "it may be so in London, but the law is different in the country." The practice, according to the same authority, was much the same in the country, for Joseph Andrews and Fanny were on the point of being committed to Bridewell for a month by a complaisant justice to please Lady Booby, when they were saved by the arrival of Squire Booby, the husband of Pamela. Fiction is confirmed by fact. "What the devil," writes Gilly Williams to George Selwyn, "could tempt you to act as justice of the peace? This is Trapolin with a vengeance. What! evidence, party, and judge too? If you do not make it up with the man soon, some rogue of an attorney will plague your heart out in the King's Bench." The gardener had been guilty of some peculation, for which Selwyn committed him at once.

In an "Idler" for 1759, Dr. Johnson computed that the prisoners for debt averaged twenty thousand, of whom twenty-five per cent. perished annually from the corruption of confined air, the want of exercise, and sometimes of food, the contagion of diseases, and the "severity of tyrants." We can well believe it when we bear in mind that in most prisons no separate accommodation was provided for them. Dr. Primrose, taken in execution at the suit of Squire Thornhill, relates that he attended the sheriff's officers to the prison which had formerly been built for the purposes of war, and consisted of one large apartment, strongly grated, and paved with stone, common to both felons and debtors at certain hours in the four and twenty. He says that he expected upon his entrance to find nothing but lamentations and various sounds of misery, but it was very different. The prisoners seemed all employed in one common design, that of forgetting thought in merriment and liquor. He readily complied with the demand for garnish, which was immediately sent for liquor, and the whole prison was soon filled with riot, laughter, and profaneness. Curiously enough it was by the sale of the book, "The Vicar of Wakefield," in which this scene is described, that the author escaped being placed in the same situation as Dr. Primrose.*

What makes it more extraordinary that efficacious measures were not taken for the improvement of the gaols, especially as regards their sanitary state, is the prevalence of the gaol fever, which Bacon described as the most pernicious infection next to plague. He was referring to its ravages in the sixteenth century,—to the Black Assize at Oxford in 1577, for example, when the chief baron, the sheriff, and some three hundred others died of it within forty hours. Yet it was little less fatal in the eighteenth; as in 1730, when a chief baron, a serjeant, a high sheriff, and others of lesser note, fell victims to it on the Western Circuit; and in 1750, when at the Old Bailey sittings, it destroyed two judges, the lord mayor, and an alderman. But that the root of the evil, the sanitary state of the prisons and the crowding together of prisoners of

* Boswell's "Life of Johnson," royal 8vo. edition, p. 114.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

all classes, was left untouched, may be inferred from the fact that Howard's labors for their amelioration commenced five years later, in 1755, and did not bear fruit till long afterwards.

What strikes us more than it seems to have struck Mr. Lecky, in reverting to these and other abuses affecting the moral and material well-being of the community, is the insensibility of the eighteenth century to their true character or its hopeless incapacity of grappling with them. A fitful feeble effort, or succession of efforts, is made, and the evil or abuse is found cropping up again with unabated vigor and vitality. Take, for example, the open defiance or easy evasion of justice by robbers. "How long," exclaims Fielding in 1751, "have we known highwaymen reign in this kingdom after they have been publicly known as such? Officers of justice have owned to me, that they have passed by such with warrants in their pockets against them without daring to apprehend them; and, indeed, they could not be blamed for not exposing themselves to sure destruction; for it is a melancholy truth, that, at this very day, a rogue no sooner gives the alarm, within certain purlieus, than twenty or thirty armed villains are found ready to come to his assistance."

In the introduction to the "Journal of a Voyage to Lisbon," he states that, in August 1753, when he was preparing for a journey to Bath, and was almost fatigued to death with several long examinations, relating to five different murders, all committed within the space of a week by different gangs of street-robbers, he received a summons to attend the Duke of Newcastle, who, not being able to see him when he attended, "sent a gentleman to discourse with him on the best plan that could be invented for putting an immediate end to those murders and robberies which were every day committed in the streets." He promised to transmit his answer in writing, which he did within four days, and soon received a message from the duke acquainting him that his plan was highly approved of, and that all his terms would be complied with."

The principal and most material of those terms, was the immediately depositing six hundred pounds in my hands; at which small charge I undertook to demolish the then reigning gangs, and to put the civil policy into such order, that no such gangs should ever be able, for the future, to form themselves into bodies, or at least to remain any time formidable to the public.

I had delayed my Bath journey for some time, contrary to the repeated advice of my physical acquaintance, and to the ardent desire of my warmest friends, though my distemper was now turned to a deep jaundice; in which case the Bath waters are generally reputed to be almost infallible. But I had the most eager desire of demolishing this gang of villains and cut-throats, which I was sure of accomplishing the moment I was enabled to pay a fellow who had undertaken, for a small sum, to betray them into the hands of a set of thief-takers whom I had enlisted into the service, all men of known and approved fidelity and intrepidity.

After some weeks, the money was paid at the treasury, and within a few days after two hundred pounds of it had come to my hands, the whole gang of cut-throats was entirely dispersed, seven of them were in actual custody, and the rest driven, some out of town, and others out of the kingdom.

This is confirmed by contemporary authority, as by Browne, who, writing in 1757, states that the reigning evil of street robberies in London has been almost wholly suppressed. But the suppression was local and temporary: the surviving members of the gang were simply driven to vary the scene of their operations, and no attempt was made to protect the suburbs and environs of the metropolis or the high roads. Walpole — who was twice robbed by highwaymen, once in Hyde Park and once near his own house at Twickenham — complains, in 1782, that no one can stir out after sunset without a body-guard of servants armed with blunderbusses.

The English highwaymen of former days were remarkably well-bred personages. Thomas Grenville, whilst travelling with Lord Derby, and Lord Tankerville, whilst travelling with his father, were attacked by highwaymen: on both occasions six or seven shots were exchanged between them and the highwaymen; and when the parties assailed had expended all their ammunition the highwaymen came up to them and took their purses in the politest manner possible!*

The two adventures are confused, as it can hardly be supposed that the circumstances of each were identical. As Mr. Thomas Grenville used to tell his the highwaymen were anything but polite, for they told the travellers, after taking their purses: "What scoundrels you must be to interfere with gentlemen about their business on the road!" Yet highwaymen of the higher order studied politeness sometimes, and found their account in it. "McLean," writes Walpole, "is still the

* Recollections of the Table Talk of Samuel Rogers (1856), p. 198.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

fashion: have I no reason to call him my friend? He says that if the pistol had shot me, he had another for himself. Can I do less than say I will be hanged if he is?"

As Mr. Thomas Grenville was born in 1755, his adventure must have occurred in the last quarter of the century. He used to relate in connection with it, that one night when he was walking down Hay Hill, he heard cries of "stop thief," and saw a man on horseback, a highwayman, dash down the steps of Lansdowne Passage and escape; adding that the iron bar was put up to prevent the recurrence of such an incident.

"In a letter written by Mrs. Harris, the mother of the first Lord Malmesbury, to her son, dated Feb. 16, 1773, she says: 'A most audacious fellow robbed Sir Francis Holburne and his sisters in their coach in St. James's Square, coming from the opera. He was on horseback, and held a pistol close to the breast of one of the Miss Holburnes for a considerable time. She had left her purse at home, which he would not believe. He has since robbed a coach in Park Lane.'"*

Amongst the causes of the increase of robbers, Fielding enumerates and lays much stress on the frequency of executions, their publicity, and their habitual association in the popular mind with notions of pride and vanity, instead of guilt, degradation, or shame. "The day appointed by law for the thief's shame is the day of glory in his own opinion. His procession to Tyburn, and his last moments there, are all triumphant; attended with the compassion of the meek and tender-hearted, and with the applause, admiration, and envy of all the bold and hardened." We have seen how Walpole speaks of McLean, whose father, he adds, "was an Irish dean; his brother is a Calvinist minister in great esteem at the Hague." This man was made a lion by the aristocracy, who flocked in crowds to visit him in prison. The turnkeys of Newgate were said to have made 200*l.* by showing Sheppard; and Dr. Dodd was exhibited for two hours in the press-room at a shilling a head before he was led to the gallows. The criminal sentenced to death was encouraged and aided to put a brave face on the matter, and act on the maxim, carpe diem — "Live and be merry, for the morrow we die." He was allowed to order what he liked for his last dinner or supper, which the ordinary was expected to share with him, with the view of keeping up his spirits, and giving him the benefit of jovial companionship to the last. "I will tell you a Newgate anecdote," writes Gilly Williams to Selwyn, "which I had from a gentleman who called on P. Lewis the night before the execution, and heard one runner call to another and order a chicken boiled for Rice's supper, 'but,' says he, 'you need not be curious about the sauce, for he's to be hanged to-morrow!' 'That is true,' says the other; 'but the ordinary sups with him, and you know he is a devil of a fellow for butter!'"

The inimitable scene in "Jonathan Wild," in which the ordinary justifies his preference of punch to wine, and Jonathan complains of being disagreeably reminded of a world to come, is doubtless a caricature; but a caricature by a humorist of Fielding's quality is pretty sure to embody a popular impression if not a truth. There is also an exquisite touch of satire in the "circumstance, showing the most admirable conservation of character in our hero to his last moments, which was, that whilst the ordinary was busy in his ejaculations, Wild, in the midst of the shower of stones, etc., which played upon him, applied his hands to the parson's pocket, and emptied it of his corkscrew, which he carried out of the world in his hand."

The brutalizing effects of public executions were studiously enhanced in cases of high treason, by the law enacting that, prior to the decapitation, the criminal should be half hung, and that his entrails should be taken out and burnt before his eyes. No attempt, certainly no sustained and successful one, was made to get rid of this butchery during the eighteenth century. The punishment was inflicted on Kennington Common in 1746, in all its revolting atrocity, on eight gentlemen who had held commissions in the rebel army; and a minute description of the course pursued with one of them, a member of the ancient family of Townley, is given in the "State Trials." Mr. Lecky states that gallows were erected in every important quarter of the city, and on many of them corpses were left rotting in chains. The practice of hanging in chains, although discontinued before its formal abolition, lasted far into the present century. Within living memory a batch of pirates was hung in chains in the marshes below Wool-

* "The Letters of the First Earl of Malmesbury," vol. i., p. 258. For this reference, and several others materially lessening the labor of research, we are indebted to "The Novels and Novelists of the Eighteenth Century, in Illustration of the Manners and Morals of the Age." By William Forsyth, M.A., Q.C., etc., etc. 1871. A book of real value and interest, displaying a wide range of curious reading judiciously applied.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

wich. A farmer and his son who rented the ground happening to take a close inspection of the victims, saw symptoms of life in one, took him down, carried him home with them, and employed him as a farm servant; till one night, finding him at his old trade of thieving, they laid hold of him, twisted his neck, and replaced him on the gallows; not at all imagining that they had been guilty of any description of irregularity.

Till 1790 women guilty of high or petit treason might be, and occasionally were, publicly burnt alive. Boys under twelve were sentenced to death and (we believe) hanged for participation in the Gordon riots of 1780. Mentioning the circumstance to Rogers, Mr. Grenville rather naively added: "I never in my life saw boys cry so."

When Blackstone wrote, says Mr. Lecky, "there were no less than one hundred and sixty offences in England punishable with death, and it was a very ordinary occurrence for ten or twelve culprits to be hung on a single occasion, for forty or fifty to be condemned at a single assize." Did the reformers of the eighteenth century diminish the list of capital offences or show any symptoms of being shocked by the demoralizing exhibitions so constantly set before their eyes? We are not aware that they did anything of the sort, although Mr. Lecky, referring to the period subsequent to the ministry of Walpole, lays down that "on the whole the institutions and manners of the country were steadily assuming their modern aspect." We shall presently see how far this is true of manners. It was certainly not true of laws and institutions. With the exception of the body of commercial law evolved and moulded by Lord Mansfield, the whole fabric of our juridical system, the entire administration of justice, civil and criminal, including the forms of procedure and the courts, were in as bad a condition at the end of the eighteenth century as at the commencement.

The state of opinion touching executions in 1783 may be inferred from Dr. Johnson's protest against the discontinuance of the procession to Tyburn. It having been argued, says Boswell, that this was an improvement, "No, sir," said he eagerly, "it is not an improvement; they object that the old method drew together a number of spectators. Sir, executions are intended to draw spectators. If they do not draw spectators, they don't answer their purpose. The old method was most satisfactory to all parties: the public was gratified by a procession; the criminal was supported by it. Why is all this to be swept away?" Boswell expresses his perfect agreement with the sage, adding: "Magistrates, both in London and elsewhere, have, I am afraid, in this land too much regard to their own ease." The true sound objection is not so much as hinted at. In 1783, when this conversation took place, the number of malefactors executed in London alone was fifty-one: in 1785 it has risen to ninety-seven. The increase was attributed in part to Madan's "Thoughts on Executive Justice," in which it was argued that every penal code, to be efficacious, should be rigidly enforced; and this without first taking care to adjust the scale of punishment to the degree of guilt or the feelings of society. This tract, although answered by Romilly, exercised a mischievous influence for many years, while Beccaria's famous treatise,* which had made numerous converts amongst Continental jurists, was little known in this country. It was just beginning to make way when a startling reaction took place.

> If any person [says Romilly in his "Diary"] be desirous of having an adequate idea of the mischievous effects which have been produced in this country by the French Revolution and all its attendant horrors, he should attempt some legislative reform on humane and liberal principles. He will then find, not only what a stupid dread of innovation, but what a savage spirit it has infused into the minds of many of his countrymen. I have had several opportunities of observing this. It is but a few nights ago, that, while I was standing at the bar of the House of Commons, a young man, the brother of a peer, whose name is not worth setting down, came up to me, and breathing in my face the nauseous fumes of his undigested debauch, stammered out, "I am against your bill, I am for hanging all." I was confounded; and endeavoring to find out some excuse for him, I observed that I supposed he meant that the certainty of punishment affording the only prospect of suppressing crimes, the laws, whatever they were, ought to be executed. "No, no," he said, "it is not that. There is no good done by mercy. They only get worse; I would hang them all up at once."

In 1813, a bill brought in by Romilly,

* "Dei Delitti e delle Pene." Monaco, 1764. There was a story current from which it would appear that Beccaria's practice did not accord with his theory. It is thus told by Lord Byron, in a letter from Milan in 1816: "I have just heard an anecdote of Beccaria, who published such admirable things on the punishment of death. As soon as his book was out, his servant (having read it, I presume) stole his watch; and his master, while correcting the press of a second edition, did all he could to have him hanged by way of advertisement."

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

for omitting the embowelling and quartering in the punishment for high treason, was thrown out on its first introduction, "so that the ministers," he remarks, "have the glory of having preserved the British law, by which it is ordained that the heart and the bowels of a man convicted of treason shall be torn out of his body whilst yet alive." He carried his main point in the following year, although only as a compromise, for he was obliged to give up the quartering, which a majority of both houses insisted on retaining as one of the bulwarks of monarchy.

Romilly, and after him Mackintosh, did good service by keeping public attention alive to the subject, but the effective amelioration of the penal code dates from 1823, when the late Sir Robert Peel became secretary of state for the home department, as the effective reform of the law of real property, the law of procedure in civil cases, and the general administration of justice, dates from Lord Brougham's great speech in 1828. The lawyers of the eighteenth century had no more sense of the genuine worthlessness and trumpery character of the arbitrary rules and tangled technicalities by which they habitually eluded reason and obscured right, than the contemporaries of Coke. Turn where we will, we are met by signs of indifference to crying abuses; owing, no doubt, in a great measure to the want of a bold and vigilant press. But what to people living in our time seems almost unaccountable, is how easily our predecessors of the last century dropped back into the old grooves after a more or less successful effort to get out of them.

Speaking of the condition of the army, Mr. Lecky states on the authority of a memorial drawn up in 1707, that the garrison of Portsmouth was reduced by death or desertion to half its former number in less than a year and a half, through sickness, want of firing, and bad barracks, and that the few new barracks that were erected were notwithstanding built with the most scandalous parsimony and crowded to the most frightful excess. The popular objection to barracks, based on the old jealousy of a standing army, was urged by Blackstone, who maintained that the soldiers should live intermixed with the people, and that no separate camp or inland fortress should be allowed. This objection retained sufficient strength in 1786, to cause the rejection of the scheme of fortification proposed by Pitt. Commissions in the army were indiscriminately employed for political or private ends, to buy support or to reward subserviency. After trying in vain to muzzle that "terrible cornet of horse" (the first Pitt), Walpole summarily deprived him of his cornetcy. Mr. Lecky states that an officer, named Anstruther, got a regiment for voting in favor of the Porteous Act. Promotion without interest was so entirely out of the question, that it was hardly deemed matter of complaint. Lieutenant Lismahago, in "Humphrey Clinker," had been thirty years in the service, "wounded, maimed, and mutilated," without ever attaining a higher rank than that of lieutenant. "But in such a length of time," resumed the squire, "you must have seen a great many young officers put over your head." "Nevertheless," said he, "I have no cause to murmur. They bought their preferment with their money. I had no money to carry to market: that was my misfortune, but nobody was to blame."

It was by no means uncommon to find ensigns in the cradle, who grew to be colonels in their teens. "Carry the major his pap," was a byword. It was not even deemed necessary to proceed by gradation. Edward Waverley joined his regiment in command of a troop, "the intermediate steps being overleapt with great facility." Charles Phillips states that one of Provost Hutchinson's daughters was gazetted to a majority of horse;* and a recent authority adds, that she drew the pay, and appeared at a fancy ball in the uniform, a short jacket and tight pantaloons, which set off her figure to advantage. There is a scene in Lady Morgan's novel, "The O'Briens and O'Flahertys," where the Irish cabinet, having nothing else vacant, agree to give the fair friend of a colleague a cornetcy en attendant.

It was left to one royal commander-in-chief in the present century to put the first effective check on these abuses, and to another H. R. H. to bring the system of promotion to a state as satisfactory as it can well be brought when the conflicting claims of merit and seniority are to be weighed. It was during the Duke of York's administration of the Horse Guards that a reasonable limit was placed on the age at which a commission could be held. But, dating from the abolition of the purchase system, a far more difficult and delicate duty has devolved on the royal commander-in-chief than that of framing a

* "Curran and his Contemporaries," 3rd ed., p. 45. This was the gentleman of whom Lord Townshend, when lord lieutenant, said: "If I gave Hutchinson England and Ireland for an estate, he would beg to have the Isle of Wight for a potato garden."

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

limit or prescribing a rule. The soundest discretion, the severest impartiality, have been called into action; and it is a memorable fact that, under the new order of things (now of nearly seven years' standing), not a single case of favor or affection, not one approximating to a wrong, has been established to the satisfaction of unprejudiced observers and competent critics, whether in or out of the profession.

It was similarly left to a long-subsequent generation to reform the abuses of the navy, which were at their height during the greater part of the eighteenth century. Smollett served as surgeon's mate on board a ship of the line in the expedition to Carthagena in 1741, and in the character of Roderic Random described what fell under his own observation in that capacity. "When I followed him (the surgeon) with the medicines into the sick-berth or hospital, I was much less surprised that people should die on board than that any sick person should recover. Here I saw about fifty miserable distempered wretches, suspended in rows, so huddled one upon another that not more than fourteen inches space was allotted for each with his bed and bedding; and destitute of every convenience necessary for persons in that helpless condition." That no improvement had taken place in 1757 is shown by a trustworthy authority quoted by Mr. Lecky: "I have known one thousand men confined together in a guardship, some hundreds of whom had neither a bed nor so much as a change of linen. I have seen many of them brought into hospital in the same clothes and shirts they had on when pressed several months before."

The hardships to which the sailors were still exposed in 1797, led to the formidable mutinies at Portsmouth and the Nore, and virtually constituted the sole apology for the press-gang as an appeal to force when milder means had failed or (more correctly speaking) had never been tried. Legally, only seafaring men were liable to seizure, but the gangs were not particular when lawful game failed. In Gilray's "Liberty of the Subject" (October 1779), a gang, armed with swords and cudgels, are leading off a half-starved tailor, despite of the resistance of his wife, who clutches the leader by the hair. Lord Fellamar, at Lord Bellaston's instigation, engages a gang to carry off Tom Jones, and are only prevented by an accident. In 1805, the member of a highly-respectable mercantile firm at Liverpool, who happened to be shabbily dressed, was seized by a press-gang, hurried on board the tender, hastily transferred to a line-of-battle ship on the point of setting sail to join Nelson, made to do duty despite his protestations, and killed at Trafalgar. The late Lord Sefton, after relating the incident, was wont to add that the family, a very well-known one, caused to be inscribed upon his grave: "To the memory of —— ——, Esq., Landsman, killed fighting for his country, much against his will, in the glorious naval action off Trafalgar, A.D., Oct. 21, 1805."

That silent revolution in opinions and manners brought about by time, of which Mr. Lecky speaks in his "History of Rationalism," was doubtless in progress during the whole of the eighteenth century, but the outward and visible signs of improvement are non-existent or rare. To take drinking, gambling, and swearing — there is an unbroken continuity in two if not three, from Harley and St. John, through Walpole, Carteret and Pulteney, to Charles James Fox and Sheridan. Indeed, granting equality as regards drinking, it may be questioned whether statesmen and men of quality did not play higher and swear harder as the century advanced. It was past the middle when women of quality took to gambling in its most disreputable shape, and near the end (1796) when Lord Kenyon went out of his way to give them a memorable warning: "If any prosecutions of this nature are fairly brought before me, and the parties are justly convicted — whatever be their rank or station, though they should be the first ladies in the land — they shall certainly exhibit themselves in the pillory." The very ladies to whom he alluded — Lady Buckinghamshire, Lady Elizabeth Luttrell, Lady Archer, and Mrs. Concannon — were actually prosecuted for keeping a gaming-table (a faro bank) and convicted; but he shrank from executing his threat, and they escaped with fines.

Mr. Massey was the first to call attention to the fact that a club composed of both sexes in equal numbers, selected from the highest class of the aristocracy, was instituted in 1772, but was speedily discredited and broken up through the introduction of deep play. In Miss Edgeworth's novel of "Belinda" (1801) a Mr. and Mrs. Luttridge, a fashionable couple who are in the habit of receiving the best society at their house, are detected by one of their guests in keeping an E. O. table

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

constructed for the purposes of fraud, and compelled to surrender a part of their plunder, amounting to many thousands of pounds. This novel illustrates other traits of manners. Lady Delacour is suffering from the effects of the recoil of a pistol which she fired in the air by way of honorable finale to a duel with another woman of rank. Again: "The first time Belinda ever saw Lord Delacour, he was dead drunk in the arms of two footmen, who were carrying him up-stairs to his bed-chamber; his lady, who was just returned from Ranelagh, passed by him on the landing-place with a look of sovereign contempt. 'What is the matter? who is there?' said Belinda. 'Only the body of my Lord Delacour,' said her ladyship; 'his bearers have brought it up the wrong staircase. Take it down again, my good friends; let his lordship go his own way. Don't look so shocked and amazed — don't look so new, my child: this funeral of my lord's intellects is to me a nightly, or,' added her ladyship, looking at her watch and yawning "I believe I should say a daily ceremony — six o'clock, I protest.'" Sir Philip Baddeley, one of Belinda's suitors, hardly utters a sentence without a "damme" or "curse it." The correct pages of Miss Austen are occasionally dotted with oaths. She, like Miss Edgeworth, drew from the life, and neither would have risked a coarse word or profane expletive that was not in keeping with and essential to the characters.

In the dedication of "Tom Jones" to Mr. (afterwards Lord) Lyttleton, Fielding expresses a hope that the reader will find in the whole course of the work "nothing inconsistent with the strictest rules of decency nor which can offend even the chastest in the perusal." We can only account for the boldness (we might almost say audacity) of this assurance, by supposing that expressions which have since been regarded as grossly indecent had then become inoffensive from familiarity. Few ladies would now be recommended to read "Tom Jones," or readily admit that they had read it. Indeed, women of refinement would be more repelled by the coarseness than attracted by the humor. But during half a century after its appearance it was read by the ingenuous youth of both sexes without reproach. Canning, then a boy at Eton, asks in a paper in "The Microcosm" in 1787 — "Is not the novel of 'Tom Jones,' however excellent a work of itself, generally put too early into our hands, and proposed too soon to the imitation of children?" Its early popularity with the fair sex is attested by Lady Bradshaigh, writing to Richardson in 1749: "The girls are certainly fond of 'Tom Jones,' as I told you before; and they do not scruple declaring it in the presence of your incognita."

The tone of Richardson's own novels, unimpeachable as they may be in intention, says little for the refinement of the age. The entire plot of "Pamela" is suggestive of indelicacy; and the fair correspondents who beg Richardson to save Clarissa from her impending fate, must have suffered their imaginations to wander into dangerous ground. "Do, dear sir," writes Lady Bradshaigh; "it is too shocking and barbarous a story for publication. I wish I could not think of it. Blot out but one night and the villainous laudanum, and all may be well again." Cibber writes: "What piteous d—d disgraceful pickle have you placed her [Clarissa] in! For God's sake, send me the sequel, or — I don't know what to say! My girls are all on fire and fright to know what can possibly have become of her. Take care."

In a paper contributed to "The Connoisseur" in 1754 by the Earl of Cork, the noble writer states "that he was present at an entertainment where a celebrated lady of pleasure was one of the party, and her shoe was pulled off by a young man, who filled it with champagne and drank it off to her health. In this delicious draught he was immediately pledged by the rest, and then, to carry the compliment still further, he ordered the shoe itself to be dressed and served up for supper. The cook set himself seriously to work upon it; he pulled the upper part of it (which was of damask) into fine shreds, and tossed it up in a ragout; minced the sole, cut the wooden heel into very thin slices, fried them in butter, and placed them round the dish for garnish. The company, you may be sure, testified their affection for the lady by eating very heartily of this exquisite impromptu."

At a still later period extravagance of conduct and open contempt for the decencies of life were pushed to extremity by the establishment of the Hell-fire Club, and the orgies of Medmenham Abbey. The coarseness of manners and laxity of morals that prevailed during the reigns of George I. and George II. are proved by the uniform tenor of Lord Hervey's "Memoirs" and Walpole's "Letters." It is a bad sign of national morals when public masquerades are a popular amusement with the pleasure-loving public, including the court and the aristocracy: —

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

The midnight orgy, and the mazy dance,
The smile of beauty, and the flush of wine,
For fops, fools, gamesters, knaves, and lords combine;
Each to his humor — Comus all allows:
Champaign, dice, music, or your neighbor's spouse.

The masquerade in 1749 at which Miss Chudleigh, a maid of honor, afterwards Duchess of Kingston, made her memorable appearance as "Andromeda," was attended by the Princess of Wales and other members of the royal family.

The example of conjugal and domestic virtue set by George III. and Queen Charlotte appears to have had little effect even in the very precincts of the court. "It is not (writes Junius) that he (the Duke of Grafton) kept a mistress at home, but that he constantly attended her abroad. It is not the private indulgence, but the public insult of which I complain. The name of Miss Parsons would hardly have been known if the first lord of the treasury had not led her in triumph through the Opera House, even in the presence of the queen."

If the acting plays reflected the popular taste, it was far from unimpeachable till past the middle of the century. "I never heard of any plays," says Parson Adams, "fit for a Christian to read but "Cato" and "The Conscious Lovers;" and I must own in the latter are some things which are almost solemn enough for a sermon." According to Hallam "The Conscious Lovers" (by Steele) was the first comedy since the Restoration that could be called moral. Miss Burney's heroine, Evelina, was present at the representation of "Love for Love," and no one who has read it will accuse her of prudery when she expresses a hope that, fraught with wit and entertainment as it is, she shall never see it represented again; "for it is so extremely indelicate — to use the softest word I can — that Miss Mervin and I were perpetually out of countenance, and could neither make any observations ourselves nor venture to listen to those of others." But a perceptible improvement as regards propriety had taken place in dramatic composition prior to the appearance of "The School for Scandal;" and the eighteenth century may certainly boast of having placed Shakespeare's rank as a poet and dramatist beyond dispute.

Supposed cause and effect are placed in puzzling opposition by dramatic annals. National, at all events metropolitan, demoralization is supposed to have been at its worst in the reign of Charles II.; and yet this was the reign in which there were only two theatres open in London, and even these were found too much; the rival companies being obliged to unite in 1684. There were ten or eleven in the reign of Elizabeth, and a still greater number in the reign of James I. Sir John Bernard, who brought the condition of the stage before the House of Commons in 1735, complained that there were then six theatres in London; and one of his supporters (quoted by Mr. Lecky) vehemently urged "that it was no less surprising than shameful to see so great a change for the worse in the temper and inclination of the British nation, who were now so extravagantly addicted to lewd and idle diversions that the number of playhouses in London was double that of Paris, . . . that it was astonishing to all Europe that Italian eunuchs and signoras should have set salaries equal to those of the lords of the treasury and judges of England."

The opera was an exotic unknown in England prior to 1705. At its first introduction, it was wholly English; in its second stage, the principal parts were Italian and the subordinate English; and it was not till after four or five years of tentative progress that it became wholly and thoroughly Italian.

The great impulse given by Handel to sacred music, and the naturalization of the opera in England, are the two capital events in English musical history during the first half of the eighteenth century.

Speaking of painting prior to Reynolds, Gainsborough, and Wilson, Mr. Lecky remarks that England "possessed indeed an admirable school, but one represented almost exclusively by foreigners, by Holbein, Rubens, Vandyck, Lely, and Kneller." These, however, received no encouragement, except as portrait-painters. "Painters of history," said Kneller, "make the dead live, but do not begin to live themselves till they are dead. I paint the living and they make me live." Hogarth described portrait-painting as "the only flourishing branch of the high tree of British art;" yet it was his surpassing excellence in another line which established his claim to be "the first native painter of undoubted genius and originality that England could boast."

Gray, writing in 1763, says that "our skill in gardening, or laying out grounds, is the only taste we can call our own, the only proof of original taste in matters of pleasure." The artificial French taste in gardens and grounds, as in most other

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd things, prevailed during the reign of Charles II., when (to borrow Lady Morgan's mot) nothing was natural except the children. The Dutch taste, equally distorted and more stiff, was introduced by William III.:—

> No pleasing intricacies intervene,
> No artful wildness to perplex the scene;
> The suffering eye inverted nature sees,
> Trees cut to statues, statues thick as trees.

The taste to which Gray lays claim for his countrymen was mainly owing to Bridgeman and Kent, who insisted on freedom and variety, on following nature instead of discarding or defacing her.

The condition of architecture at the period under inquiry is glossed over by Mr. Lecky, who merely says that architectural taste during the ascendancy of Vanbrugh was extremely low, and that the badness of the bricks employed in building was already a matter of complaint. The badness of the bricks in the old buildings of London, prior to the fire, is mentioned in the "Travels of the Grand Duke Cosmo," quoted by Lord Macaulay. "The history of architecture in England during the eighteenth century (says Mr. Fergusson) if not characterized by anything so brilliant as the career of either Jones or Wren, is marked in the beginning by the daring originality of Vanbrugh, and closes with the correct classicality of Chambers." *

A comparison of Lord Macaulay's description of London at the Revolution with Mr. Lecky's England half a century later, shows that the progress was less than might have been anticipated; although Mr. Lecky is surely mistaken when he says that the population of London in 1700 was little more than a seventh of what it is now. Lord Macaulay puts it as rather more than half a million in 1685.

In his preface to "The Fool of Quality,"† the Rev. Charles Kingsley asks: "Who, in looking round a family portrait-gallery, has not remarked the difference between the heads of the seventeenth and those of the eighteenth century? The former are of the same type as our own, and with the same strong and varied personality; the latter painfully like both to each other, and to an oil flask; the jaw round, weak, and sensual, the forehead narrow and retreating. Had the race really degenerated for a while, or was the lower type adopted intentionally out of compliment to some great personage?"

We do not agree with Mr. Kingsley that the heads of the seventeenth century are the same type as our own; but they certainly contrast favorably with those of the first half of the eighteenth, and it would be strange if they did not, unless it be altogether vain and idle to look for character in countenance. It was not merely that the heroic type was wanting: that the age of Hampden and Cromwell, Milton and Andrew Marvel, was no more. Corruption had usurped the place of patriotism, public men had degenerated during the reigns of George I. and George II.; and a corresponding decline may be observed in the intellectual class, especially in the men of letters. Their social position was lowered, and their tone had sunk with it. They were no longer the favored companions of statesmen and nobles. They no longer looked forward to becoming members of Parliament, or secretaries of state, or secretaries of embassy, or well-paid commissioners, or high dignitaries of the Church, as the reward of services rendered or distinctions earned by the pen. Compare the relative position in these respects of Pope, Addison, Prior, Steel, Gay, and Swift, with that of Fielding, Smollett, Johnson, and Goldsmith, prior to the accession of George III. There is a startling contrast between Johnson signing himself "Impransus," and Swift sending the lord treasurer (Harley) into the House of Commons to call out the secretary of state (St. John), only to let him know that he (Swift) would not dine with him if he dined late.

> Yet think what ills the scholar's life assail,
> Toil, envy, want, the garret, and the jail.

The first edition of "The Vanity of Human Wishes" was published in 1749. The disappointment and mortification Johnson underwent from the fallacious patronage of Lord Chesterfield led to the change in the subsequent editions of garret for patron. "Such treatment I did not expect, for I never had a patron before." . . . "Is not a patron, my lord, one who looks with unconcern on a man struggling

* History of the Modern Styles of Architecture. By James Fergusson, D.C.L., F.R.S., etc. Vol. iii., p. 314.

† By Henry Brooke, published in 1766, and republished by the Rev. Charles Kingsley, with a Preface and Life of the Author, in 1859. It was not worth republishing, being defaced throughout by glaring absurdities and bad taste. A lady's dress is thus described: "A scarf of cerulean tint flew between her right shoulder and her left hip, being buttoned at each end by a row of rubies. . . . A coronet of diamonds, through which there passed a white branch of the feathers of the ostrich, was inserted on the left decline of her lovely head, and a stomacher of inestimable brilliance rose beneath her dazzling bosom, and by a fluctuating blaze of unremitted light, checked and turned the eye away from too presumptuous a gaze!"

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

for life in the water, and when he has reached ground, encumbers him with help?"* When this was written, private patronage had ceased to be munificent or encouraging, and public patronage, that of the general readers and buyers, had not begun to be remunerative. For "The Vanity of Human Wishes" — which Byron called "a grand poem, and so true," which Scott pronounced the finest poem of the century after Pope — the author received fifteen guineas.

Mr. Lecky attributes this (obviously transition) state of things to the misemployment of the resources of the State by Walpole and Newcastle, for political ends, to the entire neglect of the intellectual interests of the country; and he digresses at some length to maintain that ample provision should be made for men of intellectual pursuits, so as to render them independent of popular support.

> The inevitable result of the law of supply and demand, if left without restriction, is either to degrade or destroy both literature and science, or else to throw them exclusively into the hands of those who possess private means of subsistence. This is not a matter of speculation or of controversy, but of fact, and any one who is even moderately acquainted with literary or scientific biography may abundantly verify it. It is certain that the higher forms of literature and science are as a rule unsupporting, that men of extraordinary abilities have spent the most useful and laborious lives in these pursuits without earning the barest competence, that many of the most splendid works of genius and many of the most fruitful and conscientious researches are due to men whose lives were passed between the garret and the spunging-house, and who were reduced to a penury sometimes verging upon starvation. Neither Bacon, nor Newton, nor Locke, nor Descartes, nor Gibbon, nor Hume, nor Adam Smith, nor Montesquieu, nor Berkeley, nor Butler, nor Coleridge, nor Bentham, nor Milton, nor Wordsworth, could have made a livelihood by their works, and the same may be said of all, or nearly all, writers on mathematics, metaphysics, political economy, archæology, and physical science in all its branches, as well as of the great majority of the greatest writers in other fields. Very few of those men whose genius has irradiated nations, and whose writings have become the eternal heritage of mankind, obtained from their works the income of a successful village doctor or provincial attorney.

The question being whether the existing state of things demands a given remedy, we have nothing to do with what may have occurred in a pre-existing state of things. Is it true that the higher forms of literature and science are as a rule unsupporting now? Was or is this the experience of Sir Walter Scott, Moore, Southey, Jeffrey, Lockhart, Macaulay, Froude, Lord Lytton, Tennyson, Thackeray, Dickens, George Eliot, Trollope, Owen, Tyndall, Huxley? Or, more correctly speaking, have they not received a fair return for their labors? for, be it observed, if a man only devotes a portion of his time to literature or science, he cannot expect it to be all-sufficing for his support. And this remark is especially applicable to the list of eminent persons which Mr. Lecky cites as quite decisive upon the point. Very few of them sought or expected to make a livelihood by their works. They were more or less independent of authorship. But surely Mr. Lecky will not contend that this was the mainspring of their productive energy, and that, unless they had been independent, their works would never have been produced at all; still less that we ought to select an indefinite number of men of promise and gave them an independence at starting, in the hope that some of them may turn out Bacons, Newtons, Miltons, or Lockes. Yet his argument is not that embryo authors should be stimulated into extraordinary efforts by specific honors and rewards, in addition to the hopes of fame and fortune common to all, but that "latent genius should be evoked, and directed to the spheres in which it is most fitted to excel," by liberal endowments in the nature of fellowships and ecclesiastical preferments. These, he says, "have as a matter of fact, produced many works of great and sterling value which would never have been written without them." The sole matter of fact is that Church dignitaries have produced theological works of value; a meagre set-off to the probable amount of power and energy that has vegetated or lain dormant in cathedral stalls and colleges.

Examples tell both ways or every way; for great works have been produced under every variety of circumstance and condition. We must look below the surface, to the ordinary motives that actuate mankind. Even assuming the entire absence of favor and affection, with an exceptional power of discrimination, in the selection of the nominees to the proposed endowments, it is running counter to all we know of human nature to assume that ease, comfort, competence, prosperity, are favorable to intellectual development, exertion, and

* Johnson's Letter to Lord Chesterfield, Feb. 7, 1755.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

activity. Would the privilege of undisturbed study from youth upwards suffice to produce a philosopher, an historian, or a poet? Would it have produced a Homer, a Milton, a Dante, or a Shakespeare? How, immured in a college, could they have collected their materials, or whence have derived their inspiration? Excitement, agitation, the storms and trials of life, varied experience, changes of fortune, alternating hopes and fears, were their congenial atmosphere, their school. If anything can be confidently predicated of the Homeric poems, it is that they were not the product of learned leisure. If Milton wrote in poverty for fame, and Dante poured forth his "thoughts that breathe and words that burn" under the irresistible impulse of patriotic indignation or personal sense of wrong, Shakespeare certainly dashed off his plays, like a modern playwright, with a distinct and well-understood view to the pecuniary results. So did Molière. Dryden notoriously wrote for money. So did Pope. So did Scott. So did Byron, after a short struggle with his pride. So did Wordsworth, although his earnings fell short of his expectations and his own estimate of his deserts. He did not write better by becoming a collector of excise. Johnson invariably avowed that he did not understand any one submitting to intellectual labor except from necessity; and it is quite as certain, as much of what Mr. Lecky calls "matter of fact," that if the lexicographer had been appointed to a fellowship or tutorship, instead of leaving the university without a degree from poverty, he would never have undertaken the "Dictionary."

"It is difficult," says Mr. Lecky, "to overestimate the amount of evil in the world which has sprung from vices in literature which may be distinctly traced to the circumstances of the author. Had Rousseau been a happy and a prosperous man, the whole history of modern Europe might have been changed." If Rousseau had been a happy and a prosperous man, he would not have been Rousseau. If Byron had been a moral and domestic man, he would not have written "Childe Harold" or "Don Juan," and it is open to Mr. Lecky to say, "So much the better for the world." But this is tantamount to saying that the proposed stimulant would act as a moral sedative, and that it would be well to bring all future poems within Piron's category: —

Il faut que la vertu plus que l'esprit y brille,
La mère en prescrira la lecture à sa fille.

We have paused upon this subject because Mr. Lecky's treatment of it is characteristic. It is one amongst many which he has discussed with candor, with knowledge, with copious illustration in excellent language; but without the requisite comprehensiveness and depth, and without landing us on any satisfactory conclusion at the end. He is more suggestive than convincing, and, in his eagerness to give prominence to particular views, he is apt to lose sight of their relative importance and the space to which they are entitled as bearing on the professed object of his work. What are meant and ought to be tributary streams, are sometimes greater than the main current and run parallel instead of flowing into it. He has undertaken not the history of the British empire, but the history of England during a given period; that is, its internal civil history, with especial reference to the degree and causes of its growth — social, moral, and intellectual — in laws, manners, customs, opinions, and institutions. His plan, although limited, is still vast. For example, it may be held to include most of the subjects treated by Mr. Leslie Stephen in his "History of English Thought during the Eighteenth Century;" for all revolutions in thought, all openings of new channels for mind, necessarily affect national growth. The influence of France, again, even prior to the volcanic eruption of 1789, was quite as perceptible in English modes of thinking and ways of life as that of Scotland, Ireland, or the colonies. We should say that the influence of Ireland was the weakest of the external influences: that it was hardly felt at all prior to the Union. Yet Mr. Lecky has devoted more than half a volume, three hundred and forty-five pages, to Irish history, taking it up in right earnest from the Irish wars of Elizabeth, and bringing it down to 1759. Considered apart, this is perhaps the most striking and valuable portion of his two volumes; but it sets all laws of proportion at defiance.

A similar objection lies against the chapter (one hundred and twenty pages) headed "The Religious Revival," in which, in our opinion, the abiding (if not the primary) influence of Methodism is greatly overestimated; as when it is stated that "the Evangelical movement anticipated, in many of its aspects, that great reaction which passed over Europe after the French Revolution, and it contributed powerfully to perpetuate and intensify it." Here, again, we follow Mr. Lecky with interest, even when he is widely deviating from the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

preappointed track. It is the same throughout. His neglect of unity detracts less from his genuine merits and attractiveness as an historian, than could have been anticipated. He always writes well — as only an earnest, high-minded man, of cultivation and accomplishment, can write; he is in all respects trustworthy; although not devoid of imagination and frequently rising into eloquence, he never sacrifices truth to effect; if we do not learn much absolutely new from him, he manages to throw an air of freshness around the most familiar topics; his book is pre-eminently calculated to excite inquiry and reflection; and (above all) we rise from it with the consciousness that the time spent in reading it has been both pleasantly and instructively spent.

[Published by arrangement with HARPER & BROTHERS.]

MACLEOD OF DARE.

BY WILLIAM BLACK.

CHAPTER XVIII.

CONFIDENCES.

FOR a second or two he held the letter in his hand, regarding the outside of it; and it was with more deliberation than haste that he opened it. Perhaps it was with some little tremor of fear — lest the first words that should meet his eye might be cruelly cold and distant. What right had he to expect anything else? Many a time, in thinking carefully over the past, he had recalled the words — the very tone — in which he had addressed her, and had been dismayed to think of their reserve, which had on one or two occasions almost amounted to austerity. He could expect little beyond a formal acknowledgment of the receiving of his letter, and the present that had accompanied it.

Imagine, then, his surprise when he took out from the envelope a number of sheets closely written over in her beautiful, small, neat hand. Hastily his eye ran over the first few lines; and then surprise gave way to a singular feeling of gratitude and joy. Was it indeed she who was writing to him thus? When he had been thinking of her as some one far away and unapproachable — who could have no thought of him or of the too brief time in which he had been near to her — had she indeed been treasuring up some recollection that she now seemed disposed to value?

"You will guess that I am woman enough," she wrote, "to be greatly pleased and flattered by your sending me such a beautiful present; but you must believe me when I say that its chief value to me was its showing me that I had another friend in the world who was not disposed to forget me the next day after bidding me good-bye. Perhaps you will say that I am cynical; but actresses are accustomed to find the friendships they make — outside the sphere of their own profession — of a singularly temporary character. We are praised and flattered to-day, and forgotten to-morrow. I don't complain. It is only natural. People go away to their own families and home occupations: why should they remember a person who has amused them for an hour?"

Miss Gertrude White could, when she chose, write a clever and interesting letter — interesting from its very simplicity and frankness; and as Macleod read on and on, he ceased to feel any wonder that this young lady should be placing before him such ample revelations of her experiences and opinions. Indeed, it was more than suggested in this confidential chat that Sir Keith Macleod himself had been the first cause of her having carefully studied her own position and the influence likely to be exerted on her by her present mode of life.

"One meets with the harsher realities of an actress's life," she said, "in the provinces. It is all very fine in London, when all the friends you happen to have are in town, and where there is constant amusement, and pleasant parties, and nice people to meet; and then you have the comforts of your own home around you, and quiet and happy Sundays. But a provincial tour! — the constant travelling, and rehearsals with strange people, and damp lodgings, and miserable hotels, and wet Sundays in smoky towns! Papa is very good and kind, you know; but he is interested in his books, and he goes about all day hunting after curiosities, and one has not a soul to speak to. Then the audiences: I have witnessed one or two scenes lately that would unnerve any one; and of course I have to stand helpless and silent on the stage until the tumult is stilled and the original offenders expelled. Some sailors the other evening amused themselves by clambering down from the top gallery to the pit, hanging on to the gas-brackets and the pillars; and one of them managed to reach the orchestra, jump from the drum

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

on to the stage, and then offered me a glass of whiskey from a big black bottle he had in his hand. When I told papa he laughed, and said I should be proud of my triumph over the man's imagination. But when the people roared with laughter at my discomfiture I felt as though I would rather be earning my bread by selling watercresses in the street or by stitching in a garret."

Of course the cry of the poor injured soul found a ready echo in his heart. It was monstrous that she should be subjected to such indignities. And then that cruel old pagan of a father — was he not ashamed of himself to see the results of his own cold-blooded theories? Was this the glory of art? Was this the reward of the sacrifice of a life? That a sensitive girl should be publicly insulted by a tipsy maniac, and jeered at by a brutal crowd? Macleod laid down the letter for a minute or two, and the look on his face was not lovely to see.

"You may think it strange that I should write thus to you," she said; "but if I say that it was yourself who first set me thinking about such things? And since I have been thinking about them I have had no human being near me to whom I could speak. You know papa's opinions. Even if my dearest friend, Mrs. Ross, were here, what would she say? She has known me only in London. She thinks it a fine thing to be a popular actress. She sees people ready to pet me in a way — so long as society is pleased to have a little curiosity about me. But she does not see the other side of the picture. She does not even ask how long all this will last. She never thinks of the cares and troubles and downright hard work. If ever you heard me sing, you will know that I have very little of a voice, and that not worth much; but trifling as it is, you would scarcely believe the care and cultivation I have to spend on it, merely for business purposes. Mrs. Ross no doubt sees that it is pleasant enough for a young actress, who is fortunate enough to have won some public favor, to go sailing in a yacht on the Thames, on a summer day, with nice companions around her. She does not see her on a wet day in Newcastle, practising scales for an hour at a stretch, though her throat is half choked with the fog, in a dismal parlor with a piano out of tune, and with the prospect of having to go out through the wet to a rehearsal in a damp and draughty theatre with escaped gas added to the fog. That is very nice, isn't it?"

It almost seemed to him — so intense and eager was his involuntary sympathy — as though he himself were breathing fog and gas and the foul odors of an empty theatre. He went to the window and threw it open, and sat down there. The stars were no longer quivering white on the black surface of the water, for the moon had risen now in the south, and there was a soft glow all shining over the smooth Atlantic. Sharp and white was the light on the stone walls of Castle Dare, and on the gravelled path, and the rocks and the trees around; but far away it was a milder radiance that lay over the sea, and touched here and there the shores of Inch Kenneth and Ulva and Colonsay. It was a fair and peaceful night, with no sound of human unrest to break the sleep of the world. Sleep, solemn and profound, dwelt over the lonely islands — over Staffa, with her resounding caves, and Fladda, with her desolate rocks, and Iona, with her fairy-white sands, and the distant Dutchman, and Coll, and Tiree, all haunted by the wild sea-birds' cry; and a sleep as deep dwelt over the silent hills, far up under the cold light of the skies. Surely if any poor suffering heart was vexed by the contentions of crowded cities, here, if anywhere in the world, might rest and peace and loving solace be found. He sat dreaming there; he had half forgotten the letter.

He roused himself from his reverie, and returned to the light.

"And yet I would not complain of mere discomfort," she continued, "if that were all. People who have to work for their living must not be too particular. What pains me most of all is the effect that this sort of work is having on myself. You would not believe — and I am almost ashamed to confess — how I am worried by small and mean jealousies and anxieties, and how I am tortured by the expression of opinions which, all the same, I hold in contempt. I reason with myself to no purpose. It ought to be no concern of mine if some girl in a burlesque makes the house roar by the manner in which she walks up and down the stage, smoking a cigar; and yet I feel angry at the audience for applauding such stuff, and I wince when I see her praised in the papers. Oh, these papers! I have been making minute inquiries of late; and I find that the usual way in these towns is to let the young literary aspirant who has just joined the office, or the clever compositor who has been promoted to the subeditor's room, try his hand first of all at

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd reviewing books, and then turn him on to dramatic and musical criticism! Occasionally a reporter, who has been round the police courts to get notes of the night charges, will drop into the theatre on his way to the office, and 'do a par.,' as they call it. Will you believe it possible that the things written of me by these persons — with their pretentious airs of criticism, and their gross ignorance cropping up at every point — have the power to vex and annoy me most terribly? I laugh at the time, but the phrase rankles in my memory all the same. One learned young man said of me the other day: 'It is really distressing to mark the want of unity in her artistic characterizations, when one regards the natural advantages that nature has heaped upon her with no sparing hand.' The natural advantages that nature has heaped upon me! 'And perhaps, also,' he went on to say, 'Miss White would do well to pay some little more attention before venturing on pronouncing the classic names of Greece. Iphigenia herself would not have answered to her name if she had heard it pronounced with the accent on the fourth syllable.'"

Macleod brought his fist down on the table with a bang.

"If I had that fellow," said he, aloud — "if I had that fellow, I should like to spin for a shark off Dubh Artach lighthouse." And here a most unholy vision rose before him of a new sort of sport — a sailing launch going about six knots an hour, a goodly rope at the stern with a huge hook through the gill of the luckless critic, a swivel to make him spin, and then a few smart trips up and down by the side of the lonely Dubh Artach rocks, where Mr. Ewing and his companions occasionally find a few sharks coming up to the surface to stare at them.

"Is it not too ridiculous that such things should vex me — that I should be so absolutely at the mercy of the opinion of people whose judgment I know to be absolutely valueless? I find the same thing all around me. I find a middle-aged man, who knows his work thoroughly, and has seen all the best actors of the past quarter of a century, will go about quite proudly with a scrap of approval from some newspaper, written by a young man who has never travelled beyond the suburbs of his native town, and has seen no acting beyond that of the local company. But there is another sort of critic — the veteran, the man who has worked hard on the paper and worn himself out, and who is turned off from politics, and pensioned by being allowed to display his imbecility in less important matters. Oh dear! what lessons he reads you! The solemnity of them! Don't you know that at the end of the second act the business of Mrs. So-and-So (some actress who died when George IV. was king) was this, that, or the other? — and how dare you, you impertinent minx, fly in the face of well-known stage traditions? I have been introduced lately to a specimen of both classes. I think the young man — he had beautiful long fair hair and a Byronic collar, and was a little nervous — fell in love with me, for he wrote a furious panegyric of me, and sent it next morning with a bouquet, and begged for my photograph. The elderly gentleman, on the other hand, gave me a great deal of good advice; but I subdued even him, for before he went away he spoke in a broken voice, and there were tears in his eyes, which papa said were owing to a variety of causes. It is ludicrous enough, no doubt, but it is also a little bit humiliating. I try to laugh the thing away, whether the opinion expressed about me is solemnly stupid or merely impertinent, but the vexation of it remains, and the chief vexation to me is that I should have so little command of myself, so little respect for myself, as to suffer myself to be vexed. But how can one help it? Public opinion is the very breath and life of a theatre and of every one connected with it; and you come to attach importance to the most foolish expression of opinion in the most obscure print.

"And so, my dear friend, I have had my grumble out — and made my confession too, for I should not like to let every one know how foolish I am about those petty vexations — and you will see that I have not forgotten what you said to me, and that further reflection and experience have only confirmed it. But I must warn you. Now that I have victimized you to this fearful extent, and liberated my mind, I feel much more comfortable. As I write there is a blue color coming into the windows that tells me the new day is coming. Would it surprise you if the new day brought a complete new set of feelings? I have begun to doubt whether I have got any opinions — whether, having to be so many different people in the course of a week, I have any clear notion as to what I myself am. One thing is certain, that I have been greatly vexed and worried of late by a succession of the merest trifles; and when I got your kind letter and present this evening, I suddenly thought, 'Now for a complete confession and protest.' I

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

know you will forgive me for having victimized you, and that as soon as you have thrown this rambling epistle into the fire you will try to forget all the nonsense it contains, and will believe that I hope always to remain your friend,

"GERTRUDE WHITE."

His quick and warm sympathy refused to believe the half of this letter. It was only because she knew what was owing to the honor and self-respect of a true woman that she spoke in this tone of bitter and scornful depreciation of herself. It was clear that she was longing for the dignity and independence of a more natural way of life. And this revelation — that she was not, after all, banished forever into that cold region of art in which her father would fain keep her — somewhat bewildered him at first. The victim might be reclaimed from the altar and restored to the sphere of simple human affections, natural duties, and joy? And if he ——

Suddenly, and with a shock of delight that made his heart throb, he tried to picture this beautiful fair creature sitting over there in that very chair by the side of the fire, her head bent down over her sewing, the warm light of the lamp touching the tender curve of her cheek. And when she lifted her head to speak to him — and when her large and lambent eyes met his — surely Fionaghal, the fair poetess from strange lands, never spoke in softer tones than this other beautiful stranger, who was now his wife and his heart's companion. And now he would bid her lay aside her work, and he would get a white shawl for her, and like a ghost she would steal out with him into the moonlight air. And is there enough wind on this summer night to take them out from the sombre shore to the open plain of the sea? Look now, as the land recedes, at the high walls of Castle Dare, over the black cliffs, and against the stars. Far away they see the graveyard of Inch Kenneth, the stones pale in the moonlight. And what song will she sing now, that Ulva and Colonsay may awake and fancy that some mermaiden is singing to bewail her lost lover? The night is sad — and the song is sad — and then, somehow, he finds himself alone in this waste of water — and all the shores of the islands are silent and devoid of life — and there is only the echo of the sad singing in his ears ——

He jumps to his feet, for there is a knocking at the door. The gentle Cousin Janet enters, and hastily he thrusts that letter into his pocket, while his face blushes hotly.

"Where have you been, Keith?" she says, in her quiet, kindly way. "Auntie would like to say good-night to you now."

"I will come directly," said he.

"And now that Norman Ogilvie is away, Keith," said she, "you will take more rest about the shooting; for you have not been looking like yourself at all lately; and you know, Keith, when you are not well and happy, it is no one at all about Dare that is happy either. And that is why you will take care of yourself."

He glanced at her rather uneasily; but he said, in a light and careless way, —

"Oh, I have been well enough, Janet, except that I was not sleeping well one or two nights. And if you look after me like that, you will make me think I am a baby, and you will send me some warm flannels when I go up on the hills."

"It is too proud of your hardihood you are, Keith," said his cousin, with a smile. "But there never was a man of your family who would take any advice."

"I would take any advice from you, Janet," said he; and therewith he followed her to bid good-night to the silver-haired mother.

CHAPTER XIX.

A RESOLVE.

He slept but little that night, and early the next morning he was up and out and away by himself — paying but little heed to the rushing blue seas, and the white gulls, and the sunshine touching the far sands on the shores of Iona. He was in a fever of unrest. He knew not what to make of that letter; it might mean anything or nothing. Alternations of wild hopes and cold despair succeeded each other. Surely it was unusual for a girl so to reveal her innermost confidences to any one whom she considered a stranger? To him alone had she told this story of her private troubles. Was it not in effect asking for a sympathy which she could not hope for from any other? Was it not establishing a certain secret between them? Her own father did not know. Her sister was too young to be told. Friends like Mrs. Ross could not understand why this young and beautiful actress, the favorite of the public, could be dissatisfied with her lot. It was to him alone she had appealed.

And then again he read the letter. The very frankness of it made him fear. There was none of the shyness of a girl writing to one who might be her lover. She might have written thus to one of her

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

school companions. He eagerly searched it for some phrase of tenderer meaning; but no — there was a careless abandonment about it, as if she had been talking without thinking of the person she addressed. She had even joked about a young man falling in love with her. It was a matter of perfect indifference to her. It was ludicrous, as the shape of the lad's collar was ludicrous, but of no more importance. And thus she receded from his imagination again, and became a thing apart — the white slave bound in those cruel chains that seemed to all but herself and him the badges of triumph.

Herself and him — the conjunction set his heart throbbing quickly. He eagerly bethought himself how this secret understanding could be strengthened if only he might see her and speak to her. He could tell by her eyes what she meant, whatever her words might be. If only he could see her again: all his wild hopes, and fears, and doubts — all his vague fancies and imaginings — began to narrow themselves down to this one point; and this immediate desire became all-consuming. He grew sick at heart when he looked round and considered how vain was the wish.

The gladness had gone from the face of Keith Macleod. Not many months before, any one would have imagined that the life of this handsome young fellow, whose strength and courage and high spirits seemed to render him insensible to any obstacle, had every thing in it that the mind of man could desire. He had a hundred interests and activities; he had youth and health and a comely presence; he was on good terms with everybody around him — for he had a smile and a cheerful word for each one he met, gentle or simple. All this gay, glad life seemed to have fled. The watchful Hamish was the first to notice that his master began to take less and less interest in the shooting and boating and fishing; and at times the old man was surprised and disturbed by an exhibition of querulous impatience that had certainly never before been one of Macleod's failings. Then his cousin Janet saw that he was silent and absorbed; and his mother inquired once or twice why he did not ask one or other of his neighbors to come over to Dare to have a day's shooting with him.

"I think you are finding the place lonely, Keith, now that Norman Ogilvie is gone," said she.

"Ah, mother," he said, with a laugh, "it is not Norman Ogilvie, it is London, that has poisoned my mind. I should never have gone to the south. I am hungering for the flesh-pots of Egypt already; and I am afraid some day I will have to come and ask you to let me go away again."

He spoke jestingly, and yet he was regarding his mother.

"I know it is not pleasant for a young man to be kept fretting at home," said she. "But it is not long now I will ask you to do that, Keith."

Of course this brief speech only drove him into more vigorous demonstration that he was not fretting at all; and for a time he seemed more engrossed than ever in all the occupations he had but recently abandoned. But whether he was on the hillside, or down in the glen, or out among the islands, or whether he was trying to satisfy the hunger of his heart with books long after every one in Castle Dare had gone to bed, he could not escape from this gnawing and torturing anxiety. It was no beautiful and gentle sentiment that possessed him — a pretty thing to dream about during a summer's morning — but, on the contrary, a burning fever of unrest, that left him peace nor day nor night. "Sudden love is followed by sudden hate," says the Gaelic proverb; but there had been no suddenness at all about this passion that had stealthily got hold of him; and he had ceased even to hope that it might abate or depart altogether. He had to "dree his weird." And when he read in books about the joy and delight that accompany the awakening of love — how the world suddenly becomes fair, and the very skies are bluer than their wont — he wondered whether he was different from other human beings. The joy and delight of love? He knew only a sick hunger of the heart and a continual and brooding despair.

One morning he was going along the cliffs, his only companion being the old black retriever, when suddenly he saw, far away below him, the figure of a lady. For a second his heart stood still at the sight of this stranger; for he knew it was neither the mother nor Janet; and she was coming along a bit of greensward from which, by dint of much climbing, she might have reached Castle Dare. But as he watched her he caught sight of some other figures, further below on the rocks. And then he perceived — as he saw her return with a handful of bell-heather — that this party had come from Iona, or Bunessan, or some such place, to explore one of the great caves on this coast, while this lady had wandered away from them in search of some wild flowers. By-and-by he saw the small boat, with its sprit-sail white in the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

sun, go away toward the south, and the lonely coast was left as lonely as before.

But ever after that he grew to wonder what Gertrude White, if ever she could be persuaded to visit his home, would think of this thing and of that thing — what flowers she would gather — whether she would listen to Hamish's stories of the fairies — whether she would be interested in her small countryman, Johnny Wickes, who was now in kilts, with his face and legs as brown as a berry — whether the favorable heavens would send her sunlight and blue skies, and the moonlight nights reveal to her the solemn glory of the sea and the lonely islands. Would she take his hand to steady herself in passing over the slippery rocks? What would she say if suddenly she saw above her — by the opening of a cloud — a stag standing high on a crag near the summit of Ben-an-Sloich? And what would the mother and Janet say to that singing of hers, if they were to hear her put all the tenderness of the low, sweet voice into "Wae's me for Prince Charlie?"

There was one secret nook that more than any other he associated with her presence; and thither he would go when this heart-sickness seemed too grievous to be borne. It was down in a glen beyond the fir wood; and here the ordinary desolation of this bleak coast ceased, for there were plenty of young larches on the sides of the glen, with a tall silver birch or two; while down in the hollow there were clumps of alders by the side of the brawling stream. And this dell that he sought was hidden away from sight, with the sun but partially breaking through the alders and rowans, and bespeckling the great gray bowlders by the side of the burn, many of which were covered by the softest of olive-green moss. Here, too, the brook, that had been broken just above by intercepting stones, swept clearly and limpidly over a bed of smooth rock; and in the golden-brown water the trout lay, and scarcely moved until some motion of his hand made them shoot up stream with a lightning speed. And then the wild flowers around — the purple ling and red bell-heather growing on the silver-gray rocks; a foxglove or two towering high above the golden-green breckans; the red star of a crane's-bill among the velvet moss. Even if she were overawed by the solitariness of the Atlantic and the gloom of the tall cliffs and their yawning caves, surely here would be a haven of peace and rest, with sunshine, and flowers, and the pleasant murmur of the stream. What did it say, then, as one sat and listened in the silence? When the fair poetess from strange lands came among the Macleods, did she seek out this still retreat, and listen, and listen, and listen, until she caught the music of this monotonous murmur, and sang it to her harp? And was it not all a song about the passing away of life, and how that summer days were for the young, and how the world was beautiful for lovers? "Oh, children!" it seemed to say, "why should you waste your lives in vain endeavor, while the winter is coming quick, and the black snowstorms, and a roaring of wind from the sea? Here I have flowers for you, and beautiful sunlight, and the peace of summer days. Time passes — time passes — time passes — and you are growing old. While as yet the heart is warm and the eye is bright, here are summer flowers for you, and a silence fit for the mingling of lovers' speech. If you listen not, I laugh at you and go my way. But the winter is coming fast."

Far away in these grimy towns, fighting with mean cares and petty jealousies, dissatisfied, despondent, careless as to the future, how could this message reach her to fill her heart with the singing of a bird? He dared not send it, at all events. But he wrote to her. And the bitter travail of the writing of that letter he long remembered. He was bound to give her his sympathy, and to make light as well as he could of those very evils which he had been the first to reveal to her. He tried to write in as frank and friendly a spirit as she had done; the letter was quite cheerful.

"Did you know," said he, "that once upon a time the chief of the Macleods married a fairy? And whether Macleod did not treat her well, or whether the fairy folk reclaimed her, or whether she grew tired of the place, I do not know quite; but, at all events, they were separated, and she went away to her own people. But before she went away she gave to Macleod a fairy banner — the bratach sith it is known as — and she told him that if ever he was in great peril, or had any great desire, he was to wave that flag, and whatever he desired would come to pass. But the virtue of the bratach sith would depart after it had been waved three times. Now the small green banner has been waved only twice; and now I believe it is still preserved in the Castle of Dunvegan, with power to work one more miracle on behalf of the Macleods. And if I had the fairy flag, do you know what I

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

would do with it? I would take it in my hand, and say: 'I desire the fairy people to remove my friend Gertrude White from all the evil influences that disturb and distress her. I desire them to heal her wounded spirit, and secure for her everything that may tend to her lifelong happiness. And I desire that all the theatres in the kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland — with all their musical instruments, lime-light, and painted scenes — may be taken and dropped into the ocean, midway between the islands of Ulva and Coll, so that the fairy folk may amuse themselves in them if they will so please.' Would not that be a very nice form of incantation? We are very strong believers here in the power of one person to damage another in absence; and when you can kill a man by sticking pins into a waxen image of him — which everybody knows to be true — surely you ought to be able to help a friend, especially with the aid of the bratach sith. Imagine Covent Garden Theatre a hundred fathoms down in the deep sea, with mermaidens playing the brass instruments in the orchestra, and the fairy folk on the stage, and seals disporting themselves in the stalls, and guillemots shooting about the upper galleries in pursuit of fish. But we should get no peace from Iona. The fairies there are very pious people. They used to carry St. Columba about when he got tired. They would be sure to demand the shutting up of all the theatres, and the destruction of the brass instruments. And I don't see how we could reasonably object."

It was a cruel sort of jesting; but how otherwise than as a jest could he convey to her, an actress, his wish that all theatres were at the bottom of the sea? For a brief time that letter seemed to establish some link of communication between him and her. He followed it on its travels by sea and land. He thought of its reaching the house in which she dwelt — perhaps some plain and grimy building in a great manufacturing city, or perhaps a small quiet cottage up by Regent's Park, half hidden among the golden leaves of October. Might she not, moreover, after she had opened it and read it, be moved by some passing whim to answer it, though it demanded no answer? He waited for a week, and there was no word or message from the south. She was far away, and silent. And the hills grew lonelier than before, and the sickness of his heart increased.

This state of mind could not last. His longing and impatience and unrest became more than he could bear. It was in vain that he tried to satisfy his imaginative craving with these idle visions of her: it was she herself he must see; and he set about devising all manner of wild excuses for one last visit to the south. But the more he considered these various projects, the more ashamed he grew in thinking of his taking any one of them and placing it before the beautiful old dame who reigned in Castle Dare. He had barely been three months at home: how could he explain to her this sudden desire to go away again?

One morning his cousin Janet came to him.

"Oh, Keith!" said she, "the whole house is in commotion; and Hamish is for murdering some of the lads; and there is no one would dare to bring the news to you. The two young buzzards have escaped."

"I know it," he said. "I let them out myself."

"You!" she exclaimed, in surprise; for she knew the great interest he had shown in watching the habits of the young hawks, that had been captured by a shepherd lad.

"Yes. I let them out last night. It was a pity to have them caged up."

"So long as it was yourself, it is all right," she said; and then she was going away. But she paused, and turned, and said to him, with a smile, "And I think you should let yourself escape too, Keith, for it is you too that are caged up; and perhaps you feel it now more since you have been to London. And if you are thinking of your friends in London, why should you not go for another visit to the south before you settle down to the long winter?"

For an instant he regarded her with some fear. Had she guessed his secret? Had she been watching the outward signs of this constant torture he had been suffering? Had she surmised that the otter-skins about which he had asked her advice were not consigned to any one of the married ladies whose acquaintance he had made in the south, and of whom he had chatted freely enough in Castle Dare? Or was this merely a passing suggestion thrown out by one who was always on the lookout to do a kindness?

"Well, I would like to go, Janet," he said, but with no gladness in his voice; "and it is not more than a week or two I should like to be away; but I do not think the mother would like it; and it is enough money I have spent this year already —"

"There is no concern about the money, Keith," said she simply, "since you have

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd not touched what I gave you. And if you are set upon it, you know auntie will agree to whatever you wish."

"But how can I explain to her? It is unreasonable to be going away."

How, indeed, could he explain? He was almost assuming that those gentle eyes now fixed on him could read his heart, and that she would come to aid him in his suffering without any further speech from him. And that was precisely what Janet Macleod did — whether or not she had guessed the cause of his desire to get away.

"If you were a schoolboy, Keith, you would be cleverer at making an excuse for playing truant," she said, laughing. "And I could make one for you now."

"You?"

"I will not call it an excuse, Keith," she said, "because I think you would be doing a good work; and I will bear the expense of it, if you please."

He looked more puzzled than ever.

"When we were at Salem yesterday I saw Major Stuart, and he has just come back from Dunrobin. And he was saying very great things about the machine for the drying of crops in wet weather, and he said he would like to go to England to see the newer ones and all the later improvements, if there was a chance of any one about here going shares with him. And it would not be very much, Keith, if you were to share with him; and the machine it can be moved about very well; and in the bad weather you could give the cotters some help, to say nothing about our own hay and corn. And that is what Major Stuart was saying yesterday, that if there was any place that you wanted a drying-machine for the crops it was in Mull."

"I have been thinking of it myself," he said absently, "but our farm is too small to make it pay —— "

"But if Major Stuart will take half the expense? And even if you lost a little, Keith, you would save a great deal to the poorer people, who are continually losing their little patches of crops. And will you go and be my agent, Keith, to go and see whether it is practicable?"

"They will not thank you, Janet, for letting them have this help for nothing."

"They shall not have it for nothing," said she — for she had plenty of experience in dealing with the poorer folk around — "they must pay for the fuel that is used. And now, Keith, if it is a holiday you want, will not that be a very good holiday, and one to be used for a very good purpose, too?"

She left him. Where was the eager joy with which he ought to have accepted this offer? Here was the very means placed within his reach of satisfying the craving desire of his heart; and yet, all the same, he seemed to shrink back with a vague and undefined dread. A thousand impalpable fears and doubts beset his mind. He had grown timid as a woman. The old happy audacity had been destroyed by sleepless nights and a torturing anxiety. It was a new thing for Keith Macleod to have become a prey to strange unintelligible forebodings.

But he went and saw Major Stuart — a round, red, jolly little man, with white hair and a cheerful smile, who had a sombre and melancholy wife. Major Stuart received Macleod's offer with great gravity. It was a matter of business that demanded serious consideration. He had worked out the whole system of drying crops with hot air as it was shown him in pamphlets, reports, and agricultural journals, and he had come to the conclusion that — on paper at least — it could be made to pay. What was wanted was to give the thing a practical trial. If the system was sound, surely any one who helped to introduce it into the western Highlands was doing a very good work indeed. And there was nothing but personal inspection could decide on the various merits of the latest improvements.

This was what he said before his wife one night at dinner. But when the ladies had left the room, the little stout major suddenly put up both his hands, snapped his thumb and middle finger, and very cleverly executed one or two reel steps.

"By George! my boy," said he, with a ferocious grin on his face, "I think we will have a little frolic — a little frolic — a little frolic! You were never shut up in a house for six months with a woman like my wife, were you, Macleod? You were never reminded of your coffin every morning, were you? Macleod, my boy, I am just mad to get after those drying-machines!"

And indeed Macleod could not have had a merrier companion to go South with him than this rubicund major just escaped from the thraldom of his wife. But it was with no such high spirits that Macleod set out. Perhaps it was only the want of sleep that had rendered him nerveless and morbid; but he felt as he left Castle Dare that there was a lie in his actions, if not in his words. And as for the future that lay before him, it was a region only of doubt, and vague regrets, and unknown fears; and he was entering upon it without any glimpse of light, and without the guidance of any friendly hand.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 / Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From Macmillan's Magazine.

FROM THE QUIRINAL TO THE VATICAN.

FROM the Quirinal to the Vatican, from the death-bed of the Rè Galantuomo, the first king of United Italy, to the death-bed of Pius IX., the last Papa Rè of Rome, the transition has been most startling and most sudden. In all the circumstances associated with these close coincidences of royal and papal deaths, Italy may well feel justified if she once more gratefully recognizes the influence of the benignant star which was believed to have so often shed its light on the fortunes of the nation. The Rè Galantuomo, so singularly fortunate in all the events of his life, was not less fortunate in the place and time of his unlooked-for death. An interest of a very different character would have attended the close of his life had it occurred at his Piedmontese villa of La Mandria. There would not, there could not, have been found there, the assemblage of domestic, political, and religious associations which imparted so varied and, in some respects, so important an interest to the last sad farewell taken, to the last solemn blessings given, in the little chamber on the ground-floor of the Quirinal; nor was the Rè Galantuomo less fortunate in the time of his departure. Had he died only two months earlier, the prospect of a possible embarrassment in Italian affairs arising from his decease might have lent fresh vigor to the Ultramontane conspirators who were then holding Marshal Macmahon in their toils. But his death, so closely preceding that of Pius IX., furnished the occasion for rekindling in the mind of the aged pontiff all the more generous feelings towards the house of Savoy and the Italian people, by which the commencement of his pontificate had been marked, and paved the way for a better understanding, if not for a complete reconciliation, between the new pope and the new king.

A German commentator on Machiavelli, when expanding and illustrating that passage of "The Prince" in which the Florentine secretary has set forth how completely all the calculations of Cæsar Borgia were overturned by the sudden death of his father, Pope Alexander VI., has observed that, strange as it may seem, the one element in all human combinations which is most certain and unavoidable — the element of mortality — is the one most generally overlooked. The remark, however, did not hold good in the case of Pius IX., for it would be difficult to discover amongst the illustrious and august personages of the nineteenth century another individual whose decease, whether proximate or remote, has been made the theme of so much speculation, and who, before closing his eyes, has been in an equal degree a party to the discounting of all the political and religious contingencies which his end might bring about. Given up again and agaih by his physicians, it was his lot to belie all their predictions, until they at last ceased to foretell his approaching death; and then, when they had all agreed that he might live yet two or three years, he put their science and their art once more to scorn, and died when every man in the Vatican believed in the further prolongation of his life. The strange medley of inconsistencies and contradictions by which his character and career were marked revealed itself even in this last phase of his existence; and just as the most fitful and capricious, the most spasmodic and impulsive of human beings had favored the world with the proclamation of his personal infallibility, the frail mortal whose uncertain health was in youth the chief cause of his exchanging the profession of arms for that of the Church, lived on with all his physical infirmities to the age of eighty-five, in his constant illnesses and constant recoveries almost suggesting the idea of the milk-white and immortal hind, "still doomed to death, yet fated not to die." Shortly after the Italian occupation of Rome at the close of 1870, when the animosity between the representatives of the Italian government and the occupants of the Vatican was at its height, there appeared in the windows of all the Roman print-sellers a photograph representing Pope Pius IX. and King Victor Emanuel arm-in-arm, both smiling most pleasantly, and apparently on the very best possible terms. During the seven years that elapsed from its first appearance until the death of both pope and king, the photograph steadily maintained its place as one of the most popular and profitable articles of the photographic trade, nor did its sale appear to be in the least degree affected by the violent language of the papal briefs and speeches denouncing the Savoyard usurper, or the equally violent declamations in the Italian Parliament and press against the clerical foes of liberty. It seemed as if a certain shrewd and sound instinct had taught the people that in the midst of all this war of words much latent good feeling existed towards each other in the hearts of the sovereign and the pontiff, or at any rate that if no such good feeling existed it ought to exist,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

and that its existence would promote the best interests of the Italian State and the Catholic Church. The much-talked-of but never-realized conciliation held its place in the minds of the people far more surely than it entered into the calculations of the statesmen or the churchmen; and the popular instinct in this case, as it is in so many others, was a better political guide than the hesitating and distrustful counsels of the cabinet or the curia. The conciliation came at last, and came in a manner so unexpected and amidst circumstances so touching that men could not but regard it as brought about by the interposition of a higher power, and designed to illustrate far higher truths than those bound up with the alternate successes of liberal and clerical opponents, or even with the triumphs of a national and Ultramontane warfare. Pius IX. had never ceased during the whole course of his life to be an Italian patriot; during the earlier period of his life he had been a sincere reformer, and at one epoch it is no exaggeration to say an Italian revolutionist. If his revolutionary period was not of long duration it was at any rate so strongly marked that the early friends who then shared his hopes and aspirations would never consent to look upon him in after life in any other character, and some of them even set up a theory as to his relation to the Church much akin to that once in favor as to Sunderland's relations with our James II. That was simply absurd, and it would be throwing away time to exhibit the evident proofs of its absurdity, and to show that however mistaken in his means Pius IX. had ever during his pontificate the same end in view — the welfare of the Roman Catholic Church.

As a reformer his tendencies were not disclosed for the first time on his elevation to the papal throne. There exists, and in all probability will soon be published, an extensive correspondence which Cardinal Mastai-Ferretti, when Bishop of Imola, held with the chief political authorities in Rome, and in which the future pope seeks to impress on the leading persons of the government the necessity of adopting a number of most important reforms, of which some are as much wanted at the present day as when Cardinal Mastai-Ferretti penned the letters alluded to. To give an example, he implores the papal government to make such arrangements with some foreign state as may place at its command a remote island for the sole objects of a penal colony, declaring that all the attempts to deal with brigandage and with the like crimes in the papal state will prove fruitless, unless the criminals shall for a term of years, or if required, during the whole of their lives, be completely separated by a distant ocean from the rest of the population. There is every reason to believe,— it is but justice to the present Italian government to make the statement — that the actual rulers of the Italian kingdom have an equal conviction of the same truth, and that if full effect has not been given to it the fault lies much more in the jealousy of foreign powers than in the diplomatic action of Italy itself. Pius IX. was a reformer, both from the principles which made him desire a better state of things, and from the kindly feeling which made him desire an increased amount of happiness amongst all around him. But it happened with him as with the emperor Napoleon III., that he often felt most keenly, and in consequence of this feeling promoted most readily, the happiness of the individuals with whom he was brought into immediate contact; and their personal gratification was but too often in direct antagonism with the happiness of the great masses of subjects intrusted to their rule. The more honest advisers of Napoleon III. were so well acquainted with this dangerous weakness in the character of their sovereign, that when they proposed to him any great administrative reform, they not unfrequently made it a regular stipulation that he should not consent to grant personal interviews to the parties whose interests would be wounded. That official adviser of Pius IX. whom it would be unsafe to rank amongst the more honest of his class, his cardinal secretary of state, Antonelli, was so well acquainted with the same peculiarities in the character of the pontiff, that his constant and, as it proved, perfectly successful aim was to shut out Pius IX. as much as possible from all intercourse with all persons excepting those who were subservient to the cardinal's own aims, whose interests were identified with his own, and whose happiness was not likely to be much affected by any sympathy felt or efforts made by them for objects of general and public welfare. Much has been said during the last seven years of the imprisonment in the Vatican of Pius IX. The matchless effrontery with which, in Belgium, France, and the Rhine provinces, circulation was given, with the full knowledge and sanction of the Catholic hierarchy, to the legend respecting Pius IX.'s alleged captivity, and the constant and public sale in those countries of straws taken from the august prisoner's

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

pallet, and of photographs representing him behind prison bars, throw a striking light on the reckless character of Ultramontane ethics. The Ultramontane prelates, who during their annual visits to the Vatican had the constant opportunity of seeing Pius IX. surrounded by all the old Byzantine splendor of his court, who knew that all his movements were as free as those of their own sovereigns, must have performed a very curious mental process when they succeeded in reasoning themselves into the belief that the constant and daily representation in their presence of that enormous lie was a matter calling for no protest or no rebuke. It must be presumed that they had accepted and acted on the principle set forth with such clearness by Loyola in his "Rules," that if any object seem to the devout believer white, and the Church tells him it is black, his unhesitating duty is to regard and pronounce it black, in accordance with the decision of his spiritual guides. When the story of his reign shall be faithfully and fully written, more prominence will be given to the involuntary imprisonment which, during twenty-eight years, he endured at the hands of his cardinal secretary of state; or, what amounts nearly to the same thing, to the strong, though subtle, network of precautions by which the Richelieu of the papacy made his Louis XIII. his helpless and unresisting tool. And when the same story shall be narrated in all its details, prominence will likewise be given to the fact that at one period of his reign — in the summer months of 1860, immediately preceding the severance of Umbria and the Marches from the papal dominions — a constant watch was kept over all the movements of Pope Pius IX. by the agents of the French police then employed in Rome, for the purpose of impeding any attempt which it was then believed he wished to make to escape to Austria or Spain, — an event which, had it occurred, would have robbed France of the right to exhibit herself to the whole Catholic world as the guardian of papal independence. When that history shall be faithfully and fitly told, justice will be done to Cardinal Antonelli, and if it should prove difficult highly to extol his merits, the amount of his demerits will certainly be lessened. He did many mischievous things. But he held with Fielding's predatory hero that mischief was a thing much too precious to be wasted, and that it should only be employed in exact proportion to the special end which it is intended to secure. Cardinal Antonelli's especial end was to heap up wealth in the coffers, to concentrate power in the hands, and to place fair women at the disposal, of Cardinal Antonelli, and he scrupulously and conscientiously abstained from the commission of any evil-doing which was not directly and immediately subservient to the main purposes of his life.

The real difficulties of Cardinal Antonelli's task can only be understood when they are viewed in connection with the personal character of the pope-king whom he served. Some idea may be formed of the trouble involved, and the care required in the management of Pius IX. from the details, not generally known, of his demeanor on the night when, after the assassination of Rossi, he quitted the Quirinal in disguise for Gaeta. The chroniclers of that event have mentioned that his immediate determination was prompted by the sudden advice of a French ecclesiastic which he regarded in the light of a providential warning. But these chroniclers have passed over in silence the following facts. When all was ready for the departure, the trusted persons who had made the necessary arrangements brought, as the chief part in these arrangements, the disguise — the layman's dress, the wig, the beard, and the green spectacles which the pope was to put on. He at once declared that he could not with a due regard to his present dignity be a party to such mumming. Point by point was then contested, and at a time when every moment was precious he was brought only by degrees to accept first the dress, then the wig, next the green spectacles, and last, after a hard struggle, the beard. Then he was conducted through the several rooms of the Quirinal, which were opened by a master key. At one of the last doors the key refused to do its work, and Pius IX. at once declared that this was an intimation from Heaven which decreed that he ought to remain in the Quirinal and be a martyr. The vacillation or oscillation of his character was however even less embarrassing than his personal piques. A good deal has been said of late on the attitude of the Jesuit father Curci towards the Vatican, and of the harsh treatment which he experienced at the hands of Pius IX. The true relation between the late pope and the Jesuit fathers will be better understood when it is known that Father Curci had been strongly urged by Pius IX. to write the history of his life and reign, that the Jesuit refused, and allowed it but too clearly to be understood that the reason of his refusal was the dislike to undertake a

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

biographical whitewashing of Giovanni Mastai-Ferretti. The pope never forgave him. Such were some of the most prominent and familiar features in the character of the pope-king whom Cardinal Antonelli so long served — it would be more correct to say over whom he so long ruled — as secretary of state.

The best tribute to the memory of Cardinal Antonelli is the frightful state of anarchy into which the Vatican was thrown immediately after his death, and which it continued to present until the moment of Pius IX's decease. The mind of the poor old pope was eternally tossed to and fro in a perfect tempest of accusations, recriminations, calumnies, inuendoes, raised up around him by the fury of rival factions, so that it is scarcely too much to say that whatever may be the degree of papal command over the purgatory of another world, it did not during the last fifteen months of Pius IX.'s sojourn in this world exempt him from the experience of something greatly resembling a purgatory here. The meeting of the Swiss Guards, so soon after the present pope's succession, deserves to be regarded, not so much in the light of a regular Ultramontane conspiracy organized against Leo XIII., as in that of the natural crown and climax of the general confusion in which the new pope found the whole Vatican plunged when he formally took possession of its halls. It is probable that this state of matters had not a little to do with hastening the decision of the conclave, for the Sacred College had to take into account not merely the importance of exhibiting to the Catholic world the spectacle of early and united counsel, it had also to face the present and pressing necessity of bringing something like order into the precincts of the Vatican.

The election of Cardinal Joachim Pecci to the highest dignity in the Roman Catholic Church was chiefly, if not wholly, due to the reaction provoked amongst the Italian cardinals against the violent Ultramontane agitation by which the Catholic world has been long convulsed. That reaction assumed two widely distinct forms — one on the part of nearly a half of the Sacred College to let the relations between the Vatican and the Italian government remain for the moment on pretty much the same footing as they have exhibited since 1870, in other words, to continue protesting against the Italian aggression, but not to push the antagonism much further than a mere protest; whilst with another section of the cardinals this modified hostility would have been exchanged for an open and direct conciliation. Cardinal Pecci himself belonged to the former group, and may indeed be regarded as the most faithful representative of its views. During his civil and ecclesiastical career as governor of the papal provinces of Benevento and Perugia, as nuncio at the court of Brussels from 1843 to 1846, and finally as Archbishop of Perugia, and from the last-named date until his elevation to the tiara, he furnished ample opportunities to the infinite variety of persons with whom he came in contact for correctly estimating his character, and the general estimate thus formed is beyond all question highly favorable. The anecdotes which have been lately published respecting his singular vigor in the administration of Benevento are declared by persons then living in that province to possess a somewhat apocryphal character. But it is certain that he brought from the court of Leopold I. — or perhaps it would be more correct to say that he developed and strengthened at that court — a more than common degree of diplomatic finesse, the habit of tolerating political and religious differences, the talent and tact by which statesmen or churchmen placed by their office amongst hostile and contending parties contrive to keep on good terms with foes as well as friends, and even inspire the antagonists whom they must combat or curb with the belief that as regards the enemy with whom they have to deal they might go further and fare much worse. The position in 1846 either of a civil governor or an archbishop in the third city of the papal dominions gave to its holder the means, if he possessed the tastes, of not only exhibiting aptness in the discharge of his official duties, but also of indulging in many social courtesies and hospitalities; and Perugia abounds in pleasant and grateful memories of the social gatherings and genial hospitality during the early part of Cardinal Pecci's official and episcopal rule. Of his alleged vein for poetry it might perhaps be safe to believe that his verses were probably much admired by his vicar-general, chaplains, and secretary; but there is no evidence of his ever having, like old Pope Urban VIII., inflicted his own sonnets without mercy on the persons who sought an audience on matters of public business. His interest in the fine arts is much more positively attested by his care for the preservation of the glorious artistic monuments in which Perugia abounds, and even by the expense, considerable for his means, which he personally incurred in the work of restoring the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

cathedral, whatever the taste may be with which those restorations were carried out. But the opening years of the archbishop's sway were marked by events of a far more exciting character than these.

The creative genius of Italy was all concentrated in a task far nobler than any efforts of plastic or pictorial art — it labored to build up a structure more imposing than the cathedral of Milan, and towering aloft more proudly than St. Peter's dome itself. One of the chief masters in this national undertaking, Vincenzo Gioberti, was the personal friend of Monsignor Pecci, and the patriots of Perugia felt pleasure and pride at the arrival in their city of the author of the "Primato;" and the fact that during his stay amongst them he was the honored guest of their bishop, naturally served to increase the esteem in which they held their ecclesiastical ruler. At length the war of 1848 broke out, and the band of patriotic Perugians which left the city of the Apennines for the plains of Lombardy included in its ranks some even of the clerical teachers in the episcopal seminary. Then all Italian patriots learned with dismay that the same pontiff who had blessed the first movements of the Italian revolution had just as openly denounced that revolution when it assumed the natural and quite inevitable character of a national war. Straightway archbishops and bishops, taking their cue from the Vatican, discovered that Italian nationality had its heterodox aspect, and that Gioberti's "Primato" contained certain propositions fit only to be put in the Index. The Archbishop of Perugia was not less susceptible of enlightenment from on high than his episcopal colleagues; but it is only common justice to add that he did not, like so many of their number, treat with contempt and rigor the Liberals of his diocese, on whose patriotic efforts he had so lately smiled. The learned professors of his episcopal seminary, Adamo Rossi and Marchesi, were exposed, on their return from the Lombard campaign, to no annoyance for the part which they had taken in the same, and the archbishop, who not long afterwards was raised to the rank of cardinal, often did acts of kindness — very cautiously and almost secretly, it is true, but still he did them — to the more enthusiastic and uncompromising members of the Liberal party, who from the known character of their political opinions were the especial objects of suspicion and vigilance to the papal police. The social life of the Umbrian capital soon reflected but too faithfully the elements of political discord; and from the force of circumstances, much more than from any change in his personal tastes, the archbishop no longer did the honors of the city as in the days when he first assumed its civil and episcopal government, until his mode of life became at length one, if not altogether of seclusion, certainly of extreme retirement and comparative privacy. Of his occasional visits to Rome, and his personal relations with the Vatican, people only heard from time to time that whenever his official duties summoned him to the papal capital, the cardinal secretary of state, Antonelli, exhibited a degree of uneasiness, which did not leave the mind of his Eminence until the moment that Archbishop Pecci again left Rome for Perugia.

In 1859 the character, firmness, and tact of Cardinal Pecci were subjected to a fresh ordeal. As one of the first consequences of the war waged by France and Italy against Austria, the subjects of the pope at Perugia rose in arms against the Vatican, as they had done in so many other cities of the papal territory, drove its representatives out of their walls, and established a provisional government. The inhabitants had fondly hoped that their rising would receive at the hands of the French emperor the same connivance if not open countenance, which he had given to the insurrectionary movement in the Legations; but they were cruelly undeceived when, unopposed by either French or Italian troops, the papal soldiers retook the city and signalized the recapture by acts of wanton cruelty and bloodshed. From that moment the position of the cardinal-archbishop became about as difficult and delicate as it is possible to conceive, placed as he was between a government reimposed, amidst most sanguinary scenes, on a hostile population, and a population thirsting for a fresh opportunity to throw off the yoke.

That opportunity was furnished in the autumn of the following year, when, by the rout of Lamoricière's motley host at Castel-Fidardo, the papal army was destroyed, and Umbria and the Marches, liberated by the presence of Fanti's and Cialdini's troops, became, after an almost unanimous vote of the people, incorporated with the other dominions of King Victor Emanuel. Cardinal-archbishop Pecci now reaped the fruits of the personal good-feeling which he had exhibited towards the oppressed members of the Liberal party during the period from 1849 to 1860. Men felt grateful for all the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

good he had done without too closely calculating its amount, for they could not refrain from bearing in mind all the evil which it was in his power to have performed. His pastoral letters spoke indeed like other pastoral letters of the heavy afflictions which had fallen on the Church through the assaults and impiety of the wicked; but "the wicked," as directly and personally represented by the prefects Commendatore Gadda and Marquis Tanari, or the mayors Evelyn Waddington and Count Reginald Asidei, always found that the views of the cardinal as to the expediency of removing a troublesome parish priest, or making some change in cathedral or other ecclesiastical buildings, did not, after all, differ widely from their own. And in the cabinet of the minister of the interior at Turin or Florence, when Signor Peruzzi or Count Cantelli had occasion to speak of the Italian bishops in their friendly or hostile relations to the State, the minister would frequently express the opinion that if all prelates acted after the fashion of Cardinal Pecci of Perugia, the collisions between government and clergy would neither be very frequent nor very alarming. It would be a great mistake, however, to infer from these or similar facts that the training of the young ecclesiastics in the diocese was marked by a much more liberal character than in other places; the priests who received their training in the seminary of Perugia came forth from the establishment not much more friendly to civil government, to lay independence, and to Italian unity than the great body of their colleagues, whilst it was equally a matter of observation that the young men who, after pursuing their studies there, renounced the idea of taking orders, and entered the ordinary walks of civil life, distinguished themselves by an unusual amount of red-hot radicalism, as if the natural reaction from the tone of their clerical teaching had driven them into the opposite extreme. But there was no lack of ecclesiastical law, lore, and controversial acuteness amongst the clergy more directly dependent on and associated with the bishop. The vicar-general Laurenzi is a Church lawyer of the highest order; and the conductors of the local organ specially devoted to the advocacy of Church interests, Il Paese, may be honorably contrasted with many other periodicals of the same color for the temper, talent, and tact of its controversial writing.

Such were the chief administrative and political antecedents of the churchman whose name had, for some years past, been often in men's mouths as that of a probable successor of Pius IX. He was believed to be an object of much dislike to the Jesuits. It was rumored that the knowledge possessed at Berlin of his conciliatory character and habits had made his possible election to the papacy a matter of deep interest in the chancellery of the German empire. It was well known that he had been constantly kept at a distance from Rome by the jealousy of Cardinal Antonelli; and when Pius IX., just six months before his death, conferred on him the rank of cardinal camerlengo, the appointment was regarded not so much in the light of a high dignity, spontaneously bestowed by the pontiff, as of an obstacle artfully placed by Ultramontane influence in the way of Cardinal Pecci's elevation to the tiara. But the duties devolving on the cardinal camerlengo, as interim pope, though imparting plausibility to a common belief that he was not likely to be elected, never led to the enactment of any possible legal disqualification, whilst the opportunities which they furnished to Cardinal Pecci of bringing out into greater relief the personal characteristics which would fit him for the office may have, it is surely not unreasonable to assume, contributed in a considerable degree to his success. It would be the height of rashness, at so early a stage of his pontifical career, to venture on any positive and sweeping prediction of what the course of that pontificate is likely to be. Leo XIII. has been chosen as the representative of that large majority of the members of the Sacred College which is desirous of maintaining an attitude, if not of direct amity and conciliation, at least of an extremely mild and modified antagonism, towards the kingdom of Italy and other civil governments. But he has to deal with a minority in the Sacred College, and that minority is of a restless, turbulent, daring, and not unfrequently unscrupulous character. The pope has a persuadable, pliable — one might even say, if the word could be fittingly applied to so august a personage, that he has a squeezable — side in his character. It is not more certain that the Tiber flows into the Mediterranean and that the Apennine forests will shed their leaves in the autumn, than that every form of Ultramontane and Jesuit pressure will be brought to bear on the will of Joachim Pecci to render him, if possible, the mere instrument of an Ultramontane policy.

The chances of success may in part be estimated by the foregoing account of the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

pontiff's past career. If I have succeeded in faithfully conveying to the reader my own impressions and convictions, he will be prepared to expect in the acts of Pope Leo XIII. an attitude not greatly dissimilar from that maintained during thirty-two years by the cardinal-bishop of Perugia. The attempt to stand well with rival and contending parties, the not unnatural ambition to make a great figure in the world, if the course of events shall permit him to do so; the habit of maintaining a dignified reserve, when such reserve clearly suggests itself as the most expedient line; in a word, a marked unwillingness to compromise the great interests of which he is the guardian by any inconsiderate step in one direction or another, — are characteristics which he has often showed, and which are likely to be still displayed. The resolution and energy revealed in his first acts, chiefly in the clearing away of abuses in the internal arrangements of the Vatican, must not be overrated, nor accepted as sure indications that an equal amount of firmness will be always displayed in the general government of the Catholic Church. The position of the new pope is not altogether enviable. He is surrounded on all sides by snares and pitfalls; and it required all his instinctive caution to avoid the Ultramontane trap set for him in the proposal to have the coronation ceremony performed publicly in St. Peter's, where, if the plans of the intriguers had proved successful, the accession of the new pope-king would have called forth a clamorous demonstration in favor of pope-kingship, certain, and intended to provoke, a counter-demonstration in favor of Italian unity, and thus to furnish an opportunity of representing to all foreign powers the untenable position of the new pope in Rome. The action of the pontiff in his relations with foreign powers must of course be much affected and modified by the personal qualities and political antecedents of his cardinal secretary of state; and not the least of the embarrassments encountering Leo XIII. has been the difficulty of finding in the Sacred College an individual who combines the political and religious attributes wanting for such a post. One Eminence is too much disliked, another much too popular in Rome; one is well-versed in the traditions of the curia, but has no experience of foreign policy; a very able and generally esteemed cardinal appears to unite in his person all requisites for the office, but alas! he is found to be deficient in one, — the power of communicating by speech his ideas with common clearness, not to say ease and fluency; whilst another member of the supreme council of the Church is shrewd, witty, almost as well versed in the combinations of European politics as Prince Gortchakoff, but suggests the doubt whether the dignity and decorum of the Holy See will be promoted by a statesmanship which, if it should recall the finesse of Mazarin, may not improbably suggest the morals of Dubois.

It would appear that the appointment of Cardinal Franchi to the post of cardinal-secretary presented itself to the mind of the pontiff as the best means of bringing to a close the many embarrassing questions connected with the choice. The persons who are believed to have the best opportunities of estimating Cardinal Franchi's character from his past career, and of anticipating from the same his probable action as secretary of state, feel no little difficulty in forming any definite conclusion. It was not expected that he would, under any circumstances, accept the post. That he should have been a candidate for the papacy was natural enough, and equally natural that he should look forward to the chances of better success in another conclave, for Pope Leo XIII. is on the verge of threescore and ten, and Cardinal Franchi a much younger man. The post of cardinal secretary of state has always been regarded as disqualifying its holder for the office of future pontiff in a degree far beyond that of cardinal camerlengo, so that Cardinal Franchi, in accepting the office, may be held to have virtually abandoned all hope of ever wearing the tiara. Then the post of prefect of the propaganda is held for life, whilst that of cardinal-secretary is dependent on the pope's pleasure. A large income, with immense patronage and influence, is attached to the first, whilst the second no longer possesses, as it did when the papacy was a temporal power, corresponding advantages; it seemed therefore most unlikely that Cardinal Franchi would exchange his high dignity of prefect of the propaganda for one in which he would be removable at pleasure. But Cardinal Franchi, defeated in the attempt to secure the tiara, has thrown himself heart and soul into the contest for the secretaryship of state, and has at last succeeded in ousting from the post Cardinal Simeoni, by whom it had been held since Cardinal Antonelli's death, and whom Leo XIII. appeared for some time not unwilling to retain. What objects may Cardinal Franchi be presumed to have in view in this eager desire to wield, if not all the influence belonging to a pope,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

at least all that of a cardinal-secretary? The objects are, beyond all question, much more of a political than of a religious character. They may indeed be assumed to possess a directly personal character, in this sense, that Cardinal Franchi has ever been desirous of playing a conspicuous part on the great stage of Roman Catholic politics. Cardinal Franchi, even though holding the office of prefect of the propaganda, is not commonly believed to trouble his head much about the conversion of the heathen. It may fairly be questioned whether the elevation of morality and religion in any of the states of the Old or the New World much engrosses his thoughts. But in all the annals of the Church it would perhaps be difficult to find a man who, by inclination, character, and habit, has been more completely at home in the region of political intrigue than Cardinal Franchi has constantly shown himself to be since his first entrance into public life. I have spoken of his "character," but the real character of Cardinal Franchi would be more difficult to define and to describe than that of Cardinal Antonelli. Jonathan Edwards has observed of a certain class of men that their character reminds you of nothing so much as of the successive skins of an onion. You may fancy, if you have never examined it, that there is some tough kernel in the centre, but you peel off one coat, and then a second, and then a third, and so on, until with the last coat the entire onion has been peeled away. In Cardinal Franchi you remove the upper skins of the abbé galant and petit maître, who, had he figured at the Versailles of the seventeenth century, would have exchanged witty scandal in the recess of the œil-de-bœuf, and might even have furnished matter for witty scandal at other courts; then you come to the skin of the keen-witted and astute diplomatist, ever ready to turn the weaknesses or wants of the court to which he is accredited to the advantage of his own sovereign or himself; the next coating reveals a politician apparently of enlarged and liberal views, professing to understand and act in harmony with the intellectual and social requirements of his time; but you must not trust too much to appearances, for you may find in the last skin that liberal appearances are but appearances after all, and serve only to mark the aims of an ambitious churchman, and the ends of an all-absorbing and despotic Church. With Cardinal Franchi as secretary of state, we may feel pretty confident that the influence of the papacy as a political power, and of Italy in so far as reflecting or strengthening the influence of the papacy, will be brought to bear not only on the Eastern question, but on all other questions of international interest, with a subtlety and an energy which Cardinal Antonelli's statesmanship, even in its most vigorous days, was unable to exhibit. A man so eminently a politician must beyond all doubt have had some political aim greatly at heart in his intense eagerness to secure the secretaryship of state. That eagerness reminds one of nothing so much as of Cardinal Antonelli's resolve that nothing — not even death itself — should be able to suggest to the diplomatists accredited to the Vatican the imminent danger of his power passing away. Almost the last act of Cardinal Antonelli's life was grimly characteristic. The very day before his death he was informed that Baron Baude, then newly accredited, desired an interview, after presenting his credentials to the pope. Cardinal Antonelli was almost at his last gasp; but he got himself dressed with the greatest care, and, propped up on cushions, called for, and drank off, about half a bottle of brandy before receiving the French diplomatist. By the help of this alcoholic auxiliary, he appeared as brilliant, witty, shrewd, and pleasantly sarcastic as he had ever been when in perfect good health. In short, he produced on Baron Baude the precise impression which he intended to convey; for the French minister, just after the interview, assured a friend that the stories about the dangerous state of Antonelli's health were all mere nonsense.

The problems with which the new pope has at once to deal are greatly different from those which engaged the attention of Pius IX. on his elevation to the papal throne thirty-two years ago. The actual change in the relations of the Vatican to all civil governments, and more especially to that of the kingdom of Italy, is much less important than the change in its relations to public opinion and to free inquiry. The facts that Italy now possesses a constitutional government, and that its various provinces have been united into a single state, have by no means so momentous a bearing on the present condition and future prospects of the entire papal hierarchy, as the fact that in every Italian town and village every imaginable question as to the respective duties and powers of Church and State is the theme of full and free discussion. The pope and the Sacred College must now, in a degree never

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

before experienced by popes and cardinals, take into account the daily shifting shades of political and religious opinion, as visible not merely in Rome itself, but in the other great political and social centres of the Italian state. The same remark holds good, though not to the same extent, respecting the position in which the Catholic Church now finds itself throughout the Austro-Hungarian empire, and in those districts of Catholic Germany where, thirty-two years ago, the press was not yet unfettered. During the last six months, but more especially during the last two months, the Italian press has been teeming with articles on the question whether, as the first condition of real Italian progress, it is not desirable to promote a general awakening of religious opinion. What the writers of these articles mean by a general awakening of religious opinion in Italy is not always easy to understand, though one fact is clear — that the writers in question have very imperfectly realized in their own minds the vast magnitude of all the issues involved in such a movement. They have not attempted to weigh its difficulties in opposition to the Church, its still greater difficulties if originating within the Church itself, the almost total want of the human instruments fitly qualified for its direction, and the utter unpreparedness, through previous mental and moral training, of the millions whom it is proposed religiously to instruct and elevate. These considerations, however, do not render less suggestive the fact that the want of a higher tone of religious thought is becoming every day more frequently and more loudly expressed by the chief organs of Italian public opinion, and this more general expression undoubtedly reveals more general feelings and convictions. This, however, is a condition of the public mind extremely different from the political and patriotic aspirations universal in 1846. In that year, and in the two years immediately following, one heard on all sides the assurance that, if Italy could only succeed in attaining civil freedom and national unity, religious questions would at once be lost sight of; that Italians, in short, felt no interest in religious inquiry, and would be content with according, as their forefathers had done, an outward and conventional respect to the ceremonies of the Church, without troubling themselves as to the deeper phases of religious life. Without seeking to overrate the amount or importance of the change which on these questions has been effected in public opinion, it is not the less necessary to keep in mind that a change has taken place which has altered, and is every day altering still more, the relations between the Italian clergy and the Italian people. The question so recently mooted as to the expediency of a legislative change in the measure of the papal guarantees is even less important in itself than as a symptom of the degree in which such matters are assuming a more prominent place in the national thoughts.

Many amongst the public writers who now discuss the benefits likely to accrue from an awakening of religious opinion mean in reality nothing more than the return, under the altered conditions of united Italy, of that connection between the State and the Church which, in the system of the old despotic governments, made the clergy instruments of state police. The views of such persons when closely sifted amount simply to the belief that it is very convenient for governments to have in their pay and at their disposal a large body of men whose avocations bring them into contact with all ranks of society, who possess special influence over the female mind, and who can give or withhold certain articles — in this case religious ceremonies — of which the presence at critical moments is highly prized, and the absence keenly felt and bitterly lamented. No doubt the ministers of religion in every Catholic country, considered quite apart from the greater or less amount of truth in the doctrines which they are assumed to teach, possess such attributes, and are so far well fitted to be the instruments of State police. The remark would hold equally good of barbers or bakers, taken as a class. For every peasant or workman who goes to mass on a Sunday or saint's day five go to the barber's shop to get themselves shaved; for one woman who reveals the twinges of conscience to a confessor twenty women confer with the hairdresser on their coiffure, and if this is true of the first and second, it is even more the case with the third class; for saddening as must be the admission, there is no man indifferent to the bread that is baked in ovens, whilst comparatively few prize at its real worth the bread that cometh down from heaven. To what extent the priests under the old papal régime were employed as government detectives became known when, after the overthrow of the regular government at the close of 1848 and the withdrawal of Pius IX. to Gaeta, the police archives were examined by the provisional government then established, and were found to contain many thousand secret reports fur-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

nished to the police by the parish priests and confessors of the various churches. Such a revival of religious influence as should be in effect the mere commission of the oldest sins, and that not even in the newest ways, will assuredly bring no good to Church or State in Italy. But there is, I repeat, the unmistakable aspiration in many quarters for a religious awakening of another and much higher kind, and with the forms which this aspiration has already taken, and may be expected to take, the Roman curia will soon be called upon to deal. The character and habits of the pope may render him not unfit to assume and maintain a becoming position amidst these new phases of national life; for his secretary of state, Cardinal Franchi, religious opinions will probably be regarded as so many political counters, to be employed in the games of official, diplomatic, and international intrigue. The religious forces of Europe may be expected before long to figure once more on the stage of politics side by side with our old friends, "the Latin races," and with all the purity and piety which they have invariably exhibited in the diplomatic chancelleries of Madrid and Constantinople.

From The Argosy.

THE COMET.

THERE was a great commotion in the village. Some of the men had been in the neighboring town, and in the inn there had read the county paper, and had come home full of the astounding news that a comet was rushing headlong into space, precipitating itself straight upon our planet; so that, as the astronomers calculated, it must swallow us up on the twelfth of August, 1872.

The village of A—— lies in a remote corner of Austria, and our good people do not come into contact with the ever-progressing world beyond its limits. Consequently they are rather backward in the knowledge of natural science, though far from being dull or uninterested in things lying nearer to them than the stars in the heavens.

But now, this was a thing to stir up their interest in astronomy: a comet coming straight down upon the earth. A comet: a thing imagined so far away that until now no one had dreamt of troubling about it, except only to consider its appearance in the sky as a sign of war and various other kinds of woe.

The villagers quite understood there was no fun in the matter. The learned astronomer himself, from whose work an extract had been published in the paper, had his apprehensions as to what effect this violent meeting of comet and earth would have on the latter; and although the men of A—— did not understand the burden of his learned suppositions, still it set them thinking, and brought them to the conclusion that one might well tremble before the consequences of such an unheard-of collision.

Would it be the end of the world? — of the stars beginning to fall from heaven? But the comet was not falling, after all — it was madly rushing straight upon us. How dreadful! What was the purport of its singular behavior — was it coming to destroy the earth with fire?

There was a great deal of talk about the new and strange matter, but no one was the wiser for it. At last the bearers of the news, only half credulous themselves, accompanied by those who refused to believe one iota of the tale, repaired to the schoolmaster's house, a neat whitewashed building, standing in the middle of a well-cultivated orchard.

But if the orchard testified to good culture, the schoolmaster's books told a very different tale; they had been thrown into a corner of a lumber-closet, many years before, and had never seen daylight since. The alphabet, a small volume of Bible stories, and one or two others, were all that was requisite for his daily use. From these few books he had taught one generation of boys and girls after another to read, write, cipher, and sing; and for thirty-seven years he had never felt the need of increasing his literary store.

He had another book though — a manuscript one, in his own handwriting, out of which he sometimes read to young and old. It was a bulky volume, composed of a great number of copy-books, fastened together and neatly bound in cloth by the author himself. In it he had written his experience of practical gardening, of brewing, cultivating bees, nursing domestic animals, and the like; and the villagers were in the habit of consulting him in preference to any one else. There was no husbandman equal to him in the place, and he was held in greater respect by the people for this than if he had possessed the wisdom of a professor of the university. For thirty-seven years he had worked in the village without quitting it, except for an excursion into the mountains or a trip to the next town.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Now the schoolmaster had read about the comet before any one else in the place; but as a wise man he kept silence on a matter he could not explain. Rack his brain as he would he could not revive any slumbering recollection of astronomy, nor find anything to aid his better understanding or enable him to expound the subject to others.

He was, however, not quite unprepared for the visit, and when the men came to him he thought it best to take a cheerful view of the case, and dilated to them on his experience that many things, looking strange in the distance, are quite natural and harmless when viewed close at hand.

"So let's expect the fellow with a calm mind," he said. "We will see what he is like when he comes; no use troubling about him before the time."

"But won't he set the world on fire?" they asked.

"We'll put it out if he does," he returned confidently.

"There would be more flames, I warrant, than all the water in our wells could quench," said one.

"It may not touch us after all," said the schoolmaster, always inclined to hope for the best. "Why shouldn't it fall far away on yonder hills, into the wood, or beyond it into the lake?"

There was a general laugh. If it would but tumble into the lake and drown itself, they would drag it out when cool and have a good look at it, and then exhibit it in the market-place. Yes, stick it up on a pole, with its tail turned upwards, and have a dance around it.

After this the good old man thought the occasion a fitting one to produce a few bottles of his own growth, and the cheering influence of a glass of wine dispelled in a great measure the rather gloomy impression the gravity of the matter had made upon their minds. They left the house but little comforted though, and very much inclined to believe that there really was a comet coming, this fact having been tacitly admitted by the schoolmaster.

The Pfarrer's (Monsieur le curé) house is not far distant from the school. A green slope, cut by an allée of poplar-trees, leads up from the latter to the church, and immediately opposite stands the Pfarrei, or Pfarrhaus.

Amongst those who were most eager to call upon the priest was — to every one's surprise — old Blasius.

Old Blasl never entered the church, and the minister of grace was to him only the person to whom he had to pay his tithe in grain, vegetables, etc. He would look away when he chanced to meet the old Pfarrer, that he might save himself the trouble of taking off his hat to him. Not to say that Blasl never prayed! — oh, he prayed. Most fervently did he pray every night that no fire, water, or thief might come near the treasure he had hidden deep in the earth under his bed, and in which his whole heart was bound up.

And now, would all these worshipped coins go to destruction, with the rest of the world? Perhaps something more might be learned about the matter at the Pfarrer's; therefore he entered the house whose threshold his foot had not crossed since the time of his marriage, thirty years before.

There was the scrupulous neatness and stillness reigning in the Pfarrei peculiar to a priest's habitation, showing that there was no wife or children to break the monastic order.

The Herr Pfarrer of A—— was a very aged man, past eighty at the time of our tale; and his sister, about eight or nine years younger than himself, kept house for him. A young priest, his "co-operator," who lived in a back room, was the third inmate of the spacious mansion, and an old servant the fourth. That was all.

The Pfarrer received the men with his usual kindliness; was very glad to see them, and happy to be able to give them his advice and consolation. For that purpose he administered to them a good dose of commonplace truths, all very good in themselves, and suitable for any tribulation whatever. After having warmly assured them that God would not forsake them if they did not turn from him, he dismissed them; and they departed, more, less, or not at all comforted, according to each man's nature.

Before they had all left the hall, Frau Barbara, the curé's sister, noiselessly emerged from a corridor, and, catching hold of Blasl's sleeve, she whispered to him: "Blasl, I am glad I have an opportunity of speaking to you. What is all this about your daughter? Surely you will think better of it before you make your poor child miserable for life?"

"Has she been and complained of me?" he enquired angrily.

"She has been here; you know she always comes to help me on busy days. The poor child cried bitterly — and no wonder, after being engaged to that nice young man, Lorenz, and now seeing her engagement broken off by her father,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

without any just cause or reason. Surely you will not do this?"

"That is my own affair," he gruffly interrupted. "I suffer no one to meddle with my concerns; you might have known that before now, Frau Barbara." And impatiently he turned to leave the hall.

"Nay, you must not leave me without listening to another word. You may have had your own reasons for breaking off with Lenz, but surely, Blasl, you cannot think of giving Maria to Steffl — Steffl, the scandal of the neighborhood? You must know that Steffl is an unprincipled man, a good-for-nothing, a spendthrift ——"

"Steffl is no spendthrift! he is — he has — no matter what! — you wouldn't understand my motives; and I really don't see that I need account for my actions to any one in this world, Frau Barbara."

"Not in this world, Blasl; no, not in this! but, mind you, this world is coming to grief, they say. Blasl, Blasl! think of this! If it be true, if really in a few days this world, with all our trumpery goods and treasures, is going to destruction, how shall we appear there, before the judgment-seat, divested of all our earthly riches?"

For a moment the old man stared at her with frightened, glazed eyes; he staggered, and turning away, tottered down the slope. Her words had startled him to the heart.

Old Blasl had not always been the hard, inflexible miser he was now. He used in his younger years to be of a jolly, easy disposition, and rather extravagant habits. When quite unexpectedly inheriting a considerable sum of money, he was suddenly seized with love for those shining, sparkling coins — the passionate, jealous love of a miser. He loved the coins for themselves, not for the comfort they might have brought into his house; therefore he would not put them out to interest. He could not make up his mind to loose his grasp upon them for one minute; would not trust any one with the sight of them. He dug a deep hole under the boards upon which his bed rested, and therein he hid his treasure, and there from henceforward lay his heart, buried with it. He saved and stinted and scraped together in order to hoard up one piece of gold or silver after another with the rest. But his life was a troubled one, and grew more and more so as his treasure increased. Night and day he could not rest from anxiety lest any one should discover its hiding-place, or lest any kind of danger should befall his cottage, which enclosed the cherished idol.

Besides his money, Blasl cherished a daughter, the last remaining one of a numerous family. He loved her in his way; as the future possessor of his wealth, who would, in her turn — so he hoped — worship it with her whole heart. He held her in high respect, but not without keen pangs of jealousy, raised by the thought that he must some day, whether he liked it or not, leave everything to her. These fits of jealousy grew more frequent as he advanced in age, and poor Maria felt surprised and shocked at the dislike to her he evinced at moments without any visible cause. She never guessed the truth; she did not know the secret of her father's room. He had not been a hard father to her — far from it, for he had not been a father at all; he never noticed her or cared for her, neither missed her when she was away, nor seemed glad to see her return to him.

Still, in spite of all that, in spite of the utter want of parental affection — poor Maria had lost her mother when she was an infant — she had not been an unhappy child. She had grown up amongst her kind neighbors. They loved the lonely litttle girl, who would come to them in search of all the comforts and joys she missed at home.

A lovely, bright-eyed child was Maria, with an active, helpful spirit; always eager to learn, and immediately turning to account what she had learned, either in her own home or for others. She was sure to be on the spot wherever there was anything going on; and helping her neighbors about the house and garden, in the field and woods, she learned to understand all kinds of work. At fifteen, when the old servant of the house — a stern, taciturn, uncongenial woman — died, she was able and willing to turn to, and managed to keep her father's house in the accustomed order, so that the old man scarcely noticed any change.

Amongst all those who loved Maria, she had two particular friends. Of one we will speak later; the other was Herr Schmitt, the schoolmaster, who certainly was her very best friend, because the most disinterested.

The child's brightness, her eagerness to learn, soon struck her master; he found in this little girl a mind far superior to that of the usual run of children. He gave her private lessons, walked with her about the woods and fields, and in talking to her found ways and means to impart a great deal of knowledge no one else in the village aspired to. He seldom failed to bring her something to read when coming from

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

town, and every Christmas-eve there was sure to be a story-book for Maria under the Christmas-tree at the schoolmaster's. Thus the very loneliness of her life was brightened by joys that few other children knew, and which helped her to bear the dulness of her father's house.

A few weeks before our story begins we might have beheld Maria grown up into a handsome blue-eyed lass of eighteen, with a wealth of golden hair, a bright smile, and a merry song on her lips, gladdening one's sight with her appearance of youthful grace, strength, health, and freshness. But now smile and song have died away, and sighs and tears have taken their place.

Blasl, Blasl! how could you have the heart? — oh! but his heart lies in an old iron pot many feet under the ground.

When Maria was five years old she and a neighbor's son, a few years older than herself, pledged their troth to each other — just as children will do. But in this case the attachment, instead of being lessened or forgotten in the course of years, grew with them, and every year added to its strength. This contributed greatly to Maria's happiness, and accounts for the brightness of her disposition.

Lorenz was a boy of high and buoyant spirits, and the course of their true love seemed to run quite smoothly; for when he talked to Maria's father, the latter found no objection to the match, and the two were solemnly betrothed. They were both rather young to be married at once, and Blasl had a reason of his own for putting the marriage off. He was loth to give to his daughter her portion, the two thousand florins she had from her mother — which naturally had remained in his keeping — not to speak of any dowry on his part, which he never dreamt of being asked for in his lifetime.

So far all went well. But Blasl had given his consent on the ground of an inheritance Lenz expected from his great-uncle, who had promised to make him his heir. When the latter died, however, no will could be found. People said it had been done away with, which was very likely. So the money was divided between a number of relations, and Lenz's share became a small one. Blasl broke off the engagement at once: no tears, no supplications could prevail against his decision. Nay, not satisfied with this, he wanted to force another husband upon his daughter, which, to the dismay of the whole village, was no other than Steffl — the very last man people would have thought he would fix upon. It was shocking! They talked of witchcraft, and were not far from the point. Steffl had bewitched the old man by a magic power old Blasl could not withstand.

Stefan had been a soldier, and had only returned to the village about a year ago. He was soon considered the plague of the neighborhood — ruining the boys by inducing them to spend their nights in public-houses, running after every girl, working when he pleased, and scattering his small earnings — Steffl was a regular rake, there was no mistake about it.

Amongst the girls he made love to there was one, a quiet, rather weak-minded lassie, who lived with an old aunt of hers in a little hut in the woods. Consequently she did not hear much of the talk in the village. And even if she had heard about Steffl's loose life, would she have believed it? No, for love is equally deaf and blind, and Lisbeth loved the handsome, dashing visitor who condescended to seek her in her poor home.

Poor Lisbeth! she believed every word Stefan said, and thought herself solemnly engaged to him for life. It pleased Stefan to go on as if he intended to marry her in a very short time, and make her the mistress of the splendid house and all the riches he possessed in some very far-off country.

Now, when Steffl heard of Lenz's changed circumstances, he thought the moment had come to win rich Blasl's fair daughter for himself. It is not astonishing that he should have tried for such a prize, but that he should have succeeded was most extraordinary. The poorest man in the neighborhood would have refused his child to a man like Steffl. However, he did succeed — at least with the father: he had chosen a sure way to lead him straight to his aim.

After having for some time given the old man hints that he was keeping a secret from the villagers, he one day made him a startling confidence. He was concealing a treasure; yes, a sackful of gold. Neither more nor less than twenty thousand florins, all in gold! and he behaved like a beggar before the village from fear of being robbed. But how did he get possession of so much gold? Ah! he had been a soldier. Everybody knows what strange fortunes may befall a man in times of war. When his eight years of service were over he left his regiment instead of taking a re-engagement, as he had always intended to do, and straightway travelled home with his treasure.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Old Blasius listened with every fibre of his gold-thirsty heart. His soul was so full of Steffl's strange luck that there was no room left for doubt. His considera-tion for Steffl was great from this moment. The two grew fast friends, to the wonder of the whole village and of poor Maria. They were constantly seen walking together, and Steffl sat for hours and hours at Blasl's, worrying Maria with his most unwelcome courtship.

Blasl, who had never treated his daughter harshly, now behaved with cruelty towards her: he forgot himself so far at times as to strike her, using every means to force Steffl upon her notice. Oh, the miserable life poor Maria now led! Her father had threatened to kill her if she attempted to see Lenz, who was at present working at some distant farm, and could only come to A—— on Sundays. Moreover, he locked her up in the house, and he and Steffl kept watch over her always on that day, so that she could not even go to church.

And poor Lisbeth, when she found herself forsaken for rich Blasl's daughter? In her despair she ran away, and was seen no more. Her aunt came down to the village to look for her in every house, to ask everybody after her: no one had seen her.

One day a little boy, who was crab-fishing on the shallow border of the river, found a silk kerchief entangled in the reeds; and people by this knew poor Lisbeth's fate. They openly reproached Steffl with her death; but he did not care what they said, and inwardly rejoiced that his good luck had removed the only stone in his way.

"It was very wise of her," thus his thoughts ran, "to do herself what I should have been obliged to do for her, had she meant to come forward and stand in my way."

II.

WHEN Blasl came home from the Pfarrer's he first scolded his daughter well for having complained of him to Frau Barbara; then, as a punishment, he locked her up in her room. He had a double reason for doing the latter, for when he had assured himself that all the doors and shutters of the house were well fastened, he lit a little lamp, removed his huge bedstead with a vigor one would not have expected in that shrivelled form, lifted the boards, and shovelled and scraped both with spade and hands until he brought his precious iron pot to light. He then tenderly lifted it out, uncovered it with one trembling hand, and approached the lamp with the other to let the contents sparkle in its rays, his tears streaming down upon the gold as he did so. When he had wept over it to his heart's content he covered it up, buried it again, and put everything over it in its accustomed place. Then he blew out the light, opened the shutters, and went about his day's work with a heavy heart.

The days ran on; people's most fervent wishes could not keep one of them back; and as the dreaded time approached their apprehensions grew boundless. Everybody now believed in the comet, and that it would bring the end of the world with it!

The peasants were not so much afraid for their own lives — they knew that death might take them by surprise at any time — they grieved for the impending destruction of all their earthly possessions, the fruit of not their own labor only, but of that of their fathers and grandfathers for many generations back, and which they had always hoped to leave behind them to their children and children's children. Whatever they now looked on seemed to preach to them of the vanity of all earthly pride; whatever each used to take the greatest delight in became now the source of the bitterest grief.

Thus one would look with tearful eyes on the ranges of well-cured hams and sausages in his larder, agonized by the thought that no one would enjoy those stored-up dainties in the future. Another would walk about his fields, shaking his head mournfully at the plentiful corn, doomed before it was ripe for the scythe. A third lamented over the fine old trees in his wood; there was not even time left for cutting them down and marketing the timber; and if it could be done, where would be the use? Men grew lax in their work, maidens gave up spinning for their marriage outfits, women neglected their households, children had dreams about the comet's arrival.

The good Pfarrer had prayers said to calm their minds; the schoolmaster visited from house to house with comforting words; all was of no avail; the panic grew with the flying hours, and reached its climax when the awful day arrived.

The 12th of August dawned upon them rather sultry and heavy; there was something oppressive in the air that added to their alarm. Every passing hour increased their anguish. A thick fog, which covered parts of the country at nightfall — a quite

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

unheard-of phenomenon at this season — terrified them. Anxiously they watched the gradual dying out of daylight. Would it ever dawn upon them again?

As if by common accord, they all expected the comet in the night; it never struck them that it might in its career meet the earth in the daytime; and it seemed most natural in a comet to fix upon midnight for its extraordinary performance — as all unearthly appearances have ever come at that critical moment, when one day meets another to part in the same instant forever.

No one would go to bed on that night; that was the tacit agreement.

The inn was crowded that evening. Most of those who had no particular home to take care of assembled there, to work themselves up by drink and talk to that pitch of courage necessary to meet such an event as this. Some of the younger men tried with fun and jokes to raise the dismal tone of the conversation at first indulged in. They laughed, sang, drank, and played, and were the merrier as they believed it was for the last time they had met together in their favorite place of resort.

But fathers and sons kept at home with their own people. Now and then a friend or relation would look in, trying both to bring and carry away better cheer. Neighbors agreed to watch together; all the doors stood open, the windows were bright, the whole village presented a most unusual aspect.

After nightfall the fog cleared away, and the stars twinkled with uncommon brightness, as people thought, and many an anxiously inquiring glance was sent up towards them.

Blasl's house was one of the dullest on that night; the old miser could not, even on the brink of death, go to the expense of an extra candle. The lamp flickered dismally on the hearth. He kept his shutters closed, and only opened the door now and then, putting his head out to see whether Steffl was coming.

Steffl! his solace, his help, his comfort. He had kept up the old man's spirits by repeatedly assuring him that there was no comet coming. He had promised to keep watch with them through that anxious night. But he had only been with them for one minute in the morning, and had not returned.

At dusk Lenz had suddenly stood at Blasl's door. Maria gave a little shriek, and would have run to meet him, but Blasl stepped between the two lovers. "What dost thou want here?" he cried.

"I want to shake hands with you and Maria; it may be for the last time in this world, you know."

"Nonsense," cried Blasl angrily; "thou art not on any pretence to come in or to speak to my daughter. Let me shut the door."

"Nay, Blasl," said the young man, "I have done nothing to forego your esteem. Why refuse me the little favor I ask for?"

"Get thee hence, I say!"

"You ought not to behave like that: it is a solemn night. Think of what may come!"

"I do not need thee to teach me what to think. I am master here, and I forbid thee to look at my daughter any longer. Away!"

"Nay, father," said Maria, gently pushing past him, "there is no harm in shaking hands with an old friend. Here is my hand, Lenz. Oh! if the world would but come to an end this night!"

Lenz's eyes filled with burning tears as he grasped her hand and looked close into her haggard, tearworn face. But old Blasl, exasperated, tore them asunder and banged the door in Lenz's face.

As the young man hastened away, not minding whither his steps led him, he met the schoolmaster.

"Do not go far away," said he, after having listened to Lenz's account of his visit to Blasl. "Keep in the neighborhood. This is a strange night, and things may happen we are not looking for. Maria may have need of thee."

Blasl did not attempt to hide his disappointment on seeing the schoolmaster enter instead of the expected Steffl. But Herr Schmitt took no notice: he talked to the daughter, who sat weeping in the darkest corner of the room. Poor Maria began to rally by-and-by. After all everything was not lost; she was not Steffl's wife yet, and the comet might step between them for aught any one could say. Steffl could not trouble her in the other world; she felt as sure of that as of being united to Lenz there. How she hoped and wished for the end of the world — surely the only one who did so!

Meanwhile her father kept running up and down, mumbling to himself in a wild, incoherent way, opening and shutting the door a dozen times in succession. No Steffl came.

Other friends dropped in — not because they cared for Blasl, who had scorned their fear all the past anxious weeks, but on account of his daughter, whom they would not forsake in such an extremity.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Everybody agreed there was something wonderful in the appearance of the sky, although they could not explain what it was, and their definitions were contradictory. Fear magnified what they saw, and their imagination worked upon the least incident.

"Did you see that?"

"See what — what?"

"The shooting stars — quite a shower of stars. That must be the beginning of ——"

They pressed to the door. The schoolmaster took Maria near the window, and opened the shutter to see whether there would be any more falling stars. Blasl alone would not look out; he stood in the middle of the room, tearing his hair and crying for Steffl.

"Steffl?" said the last comer, "has he not been here? He left us at the inn hours ago, saying he was going to you. Where in the world can he be?"

"He had had several glasses of wine," said another; "but that couldn't have hurt him. He is used to more."

"Do you mean to say Steffl has not been seen since dusk?" inquired one, looking in through the window. "I think then he has left the village."

"Left the village!" shrieked Blasl. "You are mad, man; what can you mean?"

"I mean that at dusk I saw Steffl running on the highroad to W——. I wanted to stop him, but he would not hear. He yelled out something about the end of the world, and rushed on frantically. He scared me out of my wits: I was never so frightened in my life. The comet's advent couldn't startle me more."

"Steffl gone!" moaned Blasl, wringing his hands. "Steffl gone; and his treasure! Has he taken his treasure?"

They thought he was raving; and he, fearing he had said too much, stopped abruptly. He threw himself upon his bed, crying and groaning. Then wildly starting up, he wailed out, "Is it coming then, friends? is the end of the world coming?"

But they could not attend to him: they were much too busy in observing "something fiery" sweeping all across the sky.

"There — there!" They all left the room in a hurry, and even the school master followed, after having whispered a word in Maria's ear that made her heart beat high.

"Steffl, Steffl, thou hast forsaken me! What! have they all gone? Oh, my poor child, we shall die alone, forsaken by all the world!"

For the first time something like parental affection broke through the hard crust that had so long closed over the heart of the father.

"No, you are not alone," said the schoolmaster, re-entering with Lenz; "your friends are staying with you. If we must die, we will die together."

Blasl caught hold of their hands: it is hard to say whether in his agony he recognized Lenz or not. "Stop with me," he entreated; "midnight is coming on. Oh, do not forsake us!"

Just then the old clock in the corner struck a quarter to twelve, and the schoolmaster said solemnly, "Yes, Blasl, the hour is at hand; let us prepare for it. Blasl, there is little time left for you to make up for all the grief you caused your poor child!"

Blasl stared at him in bewilderment. "What can I do?"

"You will — won't you — give your daughter to this young man: she was and still is his promised wife, you know. Nothing could break their betrothal. Now, Blasl, say you will," added he, shaking him by the arm to wake him out of his state of torpor.

"No, I won't," said Blasl, sitting down upon his bed and folding his arms in a determined manner.

For some time the schoolmaster spoke to no purpose. At last he pointed to the clock: "One minute wanting; now, let us prepare for the awful moment. Blasl, will you?" But Blasl shook his head.

"You won't? — it's going to strike!"

The clock began, and up started Blasl, groping as if in darkness for the lovers' hands eagerly stretched out towards him. Joining them, he kept them in his grasp, calling out, "I've done it — done it, schoolmaster; you see I have done it. God will be merciful to me for their sakes."

"Declare," urged Herr Schmitt, "that you give your daughter Maria to Lorenz Steiner to wife."

"I do, I do!" cried Blasl, shaking with the fever of anguish, and tightening his iron grip over their united hands.

"And these our friends and neighbors are witnesses," said Herr Schmitt solemnly, turning to those who had re-entered the room.

"We are witnesses," echoed they.

"It is done," exclaimed the schoolmaster, with a sigh of relief, whilst Blasl sank back on his bed, covering his face with his hands to shut out the coming crash.

There was a solemn pause ——

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Nothing was to be heard — not a sound outside or inside the house for a long while. At last the peasants began to wonder amongst each other whether the clock could be right — whether midnight was past; but when the quarter struck they breathed more freely, and they gave expression to their opinion that the danger might be over. The comet might have passed the earth without touching it — they had all felt its presence; it must have passed very close to them; the earth had had a narrow escape!

Blasl raised his head and listened attentively to their words, which became more and more cheerful as the hand of the clock neared the half-hour.

"Why are you two there together?" cried he suddenly, as his eye fell on the young people, who stood at the window hand in hand.

"Ho, ho!" said the schoolmaster, stepping between him and the pair; "these two belong to each other: you cannot part them any more; you have given your daughter to be the wife of Lenz Steiner."

"I have, have I?"

"You have," they all answered; "and we are witnesses thereto."

"Ah!" cried he, clapping his hands with a childish triumph, "I have not said a word about the money; she sha'n't have a penny!"

"Never mind," said Lenz, in happy tones, "Maria and I will work to live — won't we, Maria? — and never trouble you for money!"

"We will," replied Maria. "Be kind to us, father; give us your blessing instead of money!"

In the little hut in the wood two poor lonely women had also watched for the comet: Lisbeth and her aunt. For Lisbeth was not drowned. The wind had carried off her kerchief as she crossed the bridge, and must have blown it into the river. She had merely left the village, which had become hateful to her, and found service at some distant farm. But when the rumors of the comet and the end of the world reached her, she felt pangs of remorse for having left her kind old relative without any warning: she must go home to comfort her. And so it came to pass that Lisbeth walked towards A—— on the evening of the 12th of August, purposely choosing the time of dusk for her return.

She was shocked and frightened at the fog which stretched over the low-lying ground near the river, but rather glad of it still, for it would help her to escape notice. Having come half-way across the bridge, she heard another step coming towards her from the other end, and soon she saw a tall figure advancing which she at once recognized to be — the very last person she would have wished to meet — Steffl! Tremblingly she leant against the railing, giving him room to pass on the narrow planks, but he, suddenly perceiving her close before him, white and motionless, veiled by the fog, was seized with the terror of guilt. He fell back, and with the shrill cry, "The dead are rising! the end of the world is surely coming!" he ran away as if chased by fiends; and was never seen again.

Neither Steffl nor the comet was heard of any more. Who knows whether the comet, on meeting the earth, was not equally shocked, and jumping out of his route went straying into space? At any rate, comet and Steffl had gone together, and no one wished for the return of either the one or the other.

After Steffl had been away for some time his room was opened. Blasl, who had hovered about it, would be present, but to his great astonishment no treasure could be found.

Three weeks after the terrible night the good old Pfarrer cried for joy when he married Lenz and Maria, who were both his special favorites. Maria did not carry a penny out of her father's house. She followed her husband to the farm, his present home, where she found employment amongst the women; it was not the life of a servant she led there, though; they all respected her as rich Blasl's daughter, and considered her volunteering in service a great condescension.

Two years passed. Old Blasl's life had become more and more secluded, until no one ever saw him leave his house during the day, but in the night he had taken to carrying his treasure from place to place all over his garden, unburying and reburying it constantly. There was but one thing dawning on his clouded mind: the wish to hide the money so well that even after his death it should not be found by any one.

When one day he suddenly died, the schoolmaster, who for Maria's sake had watched him, was able to show her, her husband, and the magistrates he had sent for, the place where he had seen him digging last. They found a vast amount of money — much more than they could have ever expected.

They bought land, and Lorenz works on

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

it after the schoolmaster's precept, and is getting on to have a model farm. Children's voices now ring through the new house which Lenz and Maria built on the height opposite the church and the old Pfarrhaus.

MARIE ORM.

From The New Quarterly Review.

THE APOLLO BELVEDERE.

OF the few ancient statues which can be called really popular, the most popular is certainly the Apollo Belvedere. Every one knows that famous figure, and every one can feel its power. Not long ago the Apollo Belvedere was regarded as the very perfection of sculpture. Three persons out of four, even now, if they were asked to describe it, would probably reply without hesitation that it represents Apollo shooting with his bow and is the finest statue in the world. The answer would be wrong in both particulars; the statue is far from being the finest in the world, and does not represent the god as shooting with his bow at all. Mistaken, however, as such a description is, it does but repeat the unanimous and enthusiastic tradition of the past. The error as to the pre-eminent merit of this particular antique was universal until about fifty years ago; the error as to its subject and significance was universal until less than twenty. So that it must of necessity be long before the truth of the matter, as it is now known and accepted by students, can pass into general currency.

With reference, indeed, to one part of the matter, to the beauty and impressiveness of the Apollo Belvedere as a work of art, it may be doubted whether the views of the majority will be ever quite surrendered. Among works of art of all kinds and ages, there is a class concerning which the popular estimate is apt to differ, and to persist in differing, from the critical or instructed estimate; I mean those works of which the point lies particularly in expression or dramatic effect. Let a statue or a picture but strike by its expression, and for the majority its point is gained. They are not sensitive enough to feel when it strikes, so to speak, too hard; their judgment is not trained enough to discriminate between such expressions as are noble and sufficient, and such as are false, theatrical, and beyond the mark; nay, those exaggerations which the student, having his perceptions quickened by instinct or training, knows to be most detestable, the ordinary spectator is most prone to regard as admirable. Especially this happens in the appreciation of that form of art which interests perhaps the largest number, of religious art. Take a painter of the Italian decadence like Carlo Dolci; with thousands he passes for one of the first of religious artists; at the aspect of his Christs and Virgins they feel themselves impressed and elevated; year after year the easels of the copyists are to be found crowding about the blue-veiled Mater Dolorosa of Turin, and year after year the copies are scattered abroad to move admiration, sympathy, devotion, in all parts of the world. And yet, if you ask the opinion of the critical, you will be told with one consent that of all skilful painters Carlo Dolci is among the least to be praised; that his devotion is mechanical and his pathos unreal; that all the qualities of his painting, with its artful machinery of pallid cheeks, bloodshot eyes, and expansive eyelids, are cold, shallow, and unwholesome.

That is an extreme case; and the phase of ancient art which is illustrated by a statue like the Apollo Belvedere is relatively much higher than the phase of modern art which is illustrated by painting like that of Carlo Dolci. That phase is, nevertheless, a falling off from the highest; the Apollo Belvedere is, among the works of ancient art, theatrical; it represents the Greek genius not in its prime but in its decadence. The difference, for those intimate with the Greek genius, is unspeakably great; but for persons at large that difference, so far as they feel it at all, is rather against the highest, and in favor of the not-highest. The Elgin marbles they find cold and strange; but the Apollo makes them glow; they see nothing exaggerated, nothing theatrical, they see only what is impressive, in that haughty and radiant presence, that uplifted arm, that victorious glance of scornful indignation and assured supremacy.

Since this is so, and the Apollo exercises so powerful a spell by its faults as well as its virtues, there seems the more reason for insisting on the second part of our argument, and endeavoring to propagate among its admirers a true account of what it represents. But here again the force of tradition threatens to be too strong for us. Every schoolboy is taught to recognize Apollo by his bow and arrows; and ever since this statue was discovered, all generations have assumed and repeated that it represents the god as handling those accustomed weapons. The assump-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

tion was quite natural, and before it had been proved to be mistaken, had passed into universal literature and poetry. We are all used to the "unerring bow" in the stanzas that celebrate the Apollo Belvedere in "Childe Harold;" and when Mr. Browning contrasts us with the gods, and says, —

> You're wroth, can you slay your snake like Apollo, we all know of what particu'ar Apollo he is thinking. An association so inveterate is evidently hard to uproot. Nevertheless we shall see that the new associations suggested for this Apollo by modern research are in themselves so beautiful and striking, that we may be well content to cultivate them in exchange for others more familiar.

I.

THE Apollo Belvedere was discovered before the close of the fifteenth century, at Porto d'Anzio, the site of one of the pleasure-places of the Cæsars, the Roman Antium. The statue as it was taken from the soil was complete as you see it to-day, with the exception of the left, the raised, hand and wrist, the fingers of the idle right hand, and some portions of the tree-stem which serves for a support beside the right leg. Whether its extraordinary smoothness and brilliancy of surface are due in any measure to early operations of acid and scraping, is uncertain. So is it uncertain, according to experts, whether the marble of which it is wrought is Greek or Italian; but the balance of opinion is in favor of Carrara, which would of itself argue the work to have been wrought in imperial times, and probably for the adornment of a summer palace in Italy. The statue was bought immediately after its discovery by the cardinal Giuliano della Rovere, that magnificent amateur and fiery statesman who presently became pope under the title of Julius II. As Julius II. he had his Apollo set up under the care of Michelangelo in the Belvedere of the Vatican; and, as the fashion was in those days and down almost to our own, he also caused the missing portions to be supplied by new. The restorer called in was the most practised in his trade of all that time, Giovanni Montorsoli, a pupil of Michelangelo; he filled in the broken pieces of the olive or laurel stem, added fingers to the right hand, but added them, as we can now tell, too wide outspread in a gesture of display; and made a new left hand in what seemed the obvious action of holding out a bow, or rather such six-inch-long suggestion of a bow as was suitable to the marble substance.

So "restored," the Vatican or Belvedere Apollo reigned until but the other day as the master sculpture of antiquity. Let us pass over earlier testimonies, and listen to that of the great constructive critic of these things in the last century, Winckelmann. The work of Winckelmann, as the founder of the science of classical archæology, is imperishable; he had the threefold gift of learning, by which he perfectly possessed all that was then knowable on his subject; of spiritual fire, which made all the masses of his learning live and glow; and of natural instinct, which guided his learning and his fervor in sound directions, and gave, considering the materials at his command, the character almost of divination to many portions of his critical and historical construction. But all his qualities of divination failed him in presence of the Apollo Belvedere. The dramatic charm and traditional renown of the figure together held him fascinated and blind, and made him forget or misapply the wisest of his own canons. The most elaborate as well as the most impassioned passage of all his writings is in its praise; and when we, from whose eyes the scales have fallen, read his words, it is hard to resist their persuasion even now.

> The statue of Apollo [he avers] is the highest ideal of art among all the works of antiquity which have escaped destruction. The artist of this work has constructed it wholly in the ideal, and has only taken for his purpose just so much of matter as was necessary to embody and make visible his conception. This Apollo surpasses all other statues as much as the Apollo of Homer that of all poets after him. He has a figure loftier than human, and a station which bespeaks the majesty that informs him. An immortal spring, as of the happiest Elysium, invests with gracious youth the winning manhood of his full-blown years, and plays with blandest tenderness about the haughty fabric of his limbs. Go out in the spirit into the kingdom of beauties incorporeal, and strive to become the creator of a celestial being, in order to fill the spirit with beauties that rise above nature; for here is nothing mortal, nothing that bespeaks the frail conditions of humanity. No veins nor nerves give warmth and movement to this body, but rather some principle of heavenly life, which has been poured forth in a gentle stream and fills equably the whole circumscription of his frame. He has pursued the Python, the first victim of his bow; with his mighty stride he has overtaken and slain him. From the height of his content his look goes out, as into the infinite, far beyond his vic-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

tory; scorn sits upon his lips, and the indignation which he will not deign to vent inflates his nostril, and mounts as high as to his disdainful brow; nevertheless the peace which broods thereon in glad tranquillity remains unruffled, and his eye is full of sweetness, even as in the midst of the Muses when they are fain to lay their arms about him. The father of the gods himself does not, in any other of art's most honored images, approach so near to that majesty in which the divine poet conceived him, as in this his image in the countenance of his son; and the several beauties of the other gods meet together here as in the person of Pandora. A front of Jove, pregnant with his child the goddess of wisdom; eyebrows that by their movement affirm the will; eyes of mighty arch, the eyes of the queen goddess, and a mouth the image of that which inspired the beloved Branchus to delight. About the godlike head the soft hair plays like the tender and twining strings of some goodly vine moved equably by gentle airs; it seems anointed with balsams of the gods, and bound up in benignant richness by the hands of the Graces. In presence of this miracle of art I forget all else, and my spirit takes a lofty stand to gaze on it from befitting heights; I feel my breast dilated and uplifted with veneration, like those whom I behold inspired with the breath of prophecy; I am transported in spirit to Delos and the Lycian grove . . .

But we will not follow further the lyric prose of Winckelmann, since from this height of transport it wavers, and shortly finds its way somewhat flounderingly to earth.

Winckelmann's words of ecstasy were also words of authority, and served to confirm and deepen the impression already prevalent. The study which he had founded, others carried on and extended; but it was not until the year 1816 that there happened the event, perhaps the greatest of all events in the annals of classical archæology, which after a while had for its consequence the reversal of all established canons. That event was the purchase by the English nation, completed after long hesitation, of the Attic sculptures removed from the Parthenon by Lord Elgin. Among the evidence taken by experts as to their merits, one voice only was raised to declare them better than all other antiques together; Flaxman, one of the warmest advocates of the purchase, declaring that in his judgment the Theseus, excellent as it was, was still inferior to "the Apollo." Slowly, however, the concentration of study upon these new standards, and upon other works of art genuinely Greek and of the best time, revealed the enormous difference which divided them from the works that had hitherto been most admired, and thrust the dethroned Apollo, with many another of the treasures of Roman palaces, into their true place among the productions, comparatively shallow, showy, and pretentious, of late Greek or imperial art. All those points upon which Winckelmann had dwelt were found, in comparison with the really great work, to call for an interpretation the reverse of his. That absence of discernible vein and muscle, of the diversities of real flesh-surface, that polished evenness of the rounded marble, was found to be merely the sign of empty mechanical workmanship, and to have nothing to do with an incorporeal conception of the ideal; the Elgin marbles, being really Greek from the school of Pheidias, showed us ideals immeasurably more majestic, and a method of working them out which consisted in the very opposite handling — in an infinitely careful and tender imitation of realities, a translation into marble of every beautiful quality and accident of the corporeal fabric and its draperies. The very anatomy of the Apolline limbs, the design of the legs and setting of the thighs, was shown to be more pretentious than really right. The consciousness, the purpose to impress, the pose, in the attitude and expression, clever and striking beyond a doubt, were felt to be quite foreign to the great Greek style of invention in its simplicity. Matters like the sandals with their elegant patterns, and the hair with that luxuriant knotting and cunning adjustment which delighted Winckelmann, were perceived to be, tested by the same high standard, coxcombical.

In a word, the Apollo Belvedere stood confessed a monument of the decadence. But students did not therefore cease to study it; our materials from the early and the crowning times of ancient art are not so ample that we can afford to neglect so conspicuous and interesting a work of later times as this. Its relative place in general terms ascertained, attention was next directed towards its special subject. Winckelmann had suggested the first and most renowned exploit of the divine archer, his slaying of the Python at the Delphian shrine; and elsewhere, as an alternative, his slaying of the insulter of his mother Leto, the giant Tityos. These two alternatives have been much debated, a whole company of learned writers taking either side in the discussion. Next, other conjectures were added, and all the mythic victories and vengeances of the god were tried one after another. One said, he is

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

neither the Pythian Kallinikos, light victorious over defilement, nor yet the slayer of the ravisher Tityos; he is the chastiser of pride, sending forth his shafts against the seven sons and seven daughters of presumptuous Niobe. And another, he is the Hekatêbolos of Homer, the far-darting god of pestilence, who at the prayer of his priest comes down from Olympus, and scatters death among the Grecian host. But in trying to work out one or another of these suppositions, there arose difficulties hard to solve. Try it how you will, the attitude of the statue is not the natural attitude of shooting with a bow. The advanced right leg, upon which the weight is wholly thrown, the left leg being left behind — the head thrown over the left shoulder, and the upper part of the body turned partly with it in a direction almost at right angles to the advance — the left arm raised high in the same direction in which the head is turned, and raised, it seems, with an action of suddenness, so that it has caught up a part of the loose chlamys or short cloak slung over the shoulders — the right hand suspended and a little extended from the side, with a movement also of sudden and brief expectancy — the scornful lifting and arching of the under lip, which throws the chin forward — the angry dilation of the nostril, with that wide and haughty outlook of the eyes, not intent like a marksman's — test and study them how you will, neither this combination of actions nor this expression can really be made appropriate to the act of archery. "The god has delivered his victorious shafts, and is striding away content," said the majority of critics; but there is none of the relaxation of content in this movement, and you have only to rehearse the action to feel it, under such circumstances, quite unnatural. Again, it was suggested by those who held for the Tityos motive, the god is pausing between two discharges of his bow, and turning in the pause to look towards the mother whom he champions. In vain; the result remained, for all candid and exact students, that either this Apollo was not here represented as plying his bow at all, or else that he was represented as so doing very falsely and affectedly.

A fortunate discovery came to prove the former case, and to save the credit of the artist. One of the most learned and ingenious of scholars, Dr. Stephani of St. Petersburg, published in 1860 an account and illustrations of a bronze statuette which he had found in the possession of a Count Stroganoff of that city. Hitherto one of the several open questions concerning the Apollo Belvedere was this, whether it was an original conception — and nothing is rarer than an original conception in the art of those late Greek or imperial times to which it was now admitted to belong — or whether, a much likelier supposition, it was a copy, made in those times, of some work previously existing. The Stroganoff bronze disposed of this doubt first of all. It showed just those correspondences with the famous marble, and just those divergences from it, which lead an archæologist, when he observes them, to conclude back with certainty from the several works where they occur to the existence of a common original. The bronze, eighteen inches high and not very highly finished, repeats in attitude, type, and gesture all the essentials which we find in the marble. In some particulars it is better and simpler, particularly in the pose and setting of the lingering left leg; the limbs generally are less slender; the action of the idle right hand, with its fingers half-closed and slack, is much better than the ostentatious spreading of the same fingers to which the restorer has accustomed us in the marble. The chlamys, instead of being caught so that its end hangs over the raised left arm, falls straight and simply behind the shoulder; but it is not clear that this particular is anything but a consequence of the breaking off of the thin bronze in this place. The elaborate sandals are almost the same, but the hair of the unshorn one, Akersekomês, is much simpler in flow and twist. Above all, the left arm, held not so high as in the marble, has its wrist and hand complete, and the hand carries, not a bow, but — something else, of which the nature was at first sight dubious. It looks like an imitation in bronze of a piece of fringed and crumpled leather. But on examination it is apparent that the fringed and crumpled substance is not complete; there was once more of it, and the rest has been broken away. What could it have been? The only thing made of such substance with which we are familiar in ancient art is the ægis, the symbol of the rushing storm, the weapon or amulet with which the gods of the sky, Zeus the cloud-compeller, and his child Athênê, the queen of the air, are wont to dismay and scatter their enemies. The ægis was indeed represented as a scarf or short cloak of fringed and crumpled goat-skin, embossed with the head of the Gorgon for a symbol of terror. But there is little enough left to make sure by, in the object

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

which the extended arm of our bronze Apollo holds out, even though we cannot imagine anything else which that object could possibly be. Wait, however; there is further evidence in the matter. The bronze statuette can be traced back to the possession of a Dr. Frank, who lived as physician with Veli Pasha, first at Janina in Epirus, and afterwards, between 1807 and 1810, in the Peloponnese. He had received it as a present from his employer; it had formed part, as it appears, of a find of eighteen bronzes which had been made in the neighborhood of Janina. Sixteen out of these eighteen pieces had been followed, and what became of them ascertained with certainty; this Apollo made an almost equally certain seventeenth; what was the eighteenth? When we find the French consul and antiquarian Pouqueville mentioning, as in the possession of the same Dr. Frank, a bronze head of Medusa, are we not safe in concluding that this was at once the missing eighteenth piece of the Janina find, and the missing portion broken from the ægis, the Gorgoneion, of the Apollo?

At first, this idea of the ægis as the weapon of Apollo may seem strange in place of the familiar bow. We ask, did Apollo wear the ægis? We know it was the peculiar badge of his sire Zeus and his sister Athênê, and how should it pass from their possession into his? To answer this, we have only to remember our Homer. Once in Homer, and memorably though only once, Apollo does wield the ægis, not as his proper attribute, but as entrusted to him by his sire for a special purpose. It is in the fifteenth book of the Iliad, where Zeus takes, for the time being, the side of the Trojans, and bids the gods who help the Greeks hold off, and drives the Greeks themselves back to their ships. Or rather, he charges Apollo to drive them for him; and, as his purpose is not to slay but to scare, so Apollo has not to send among them those shafts which, whether for vengeance or release, are shafts of death; he has for this once to receive from his sire the thing of dread, the symbol of the concentrated terrors of the sky, and at its aspect to scatter them unhurt. "Take thou in thy hands the fringëd ægis," says to him Zeus his sire; "take it thou, and shake it mightily, and strike terror among the heroes of the Achaians." And by-and-by, heaping upon the symbolic weapon all the epithets of its power, Apollo, says the poet, marched in advance of the Trojan champion, his shoulders clad in cloud, and bearing "the swift and terrible ægis, conspicuous, shagged within and without, which the artificer Hephaistos gave to Zeus to wear for a terror to men: even this held he in his hands, and marched before the people. And the Argives held their ground as one man; shrill rose the battle-cry from this hand and from that; leaped many an arrow from its string, and from brave hands many a spear went forth, some to strike fast in the flesh of mighty warriors, and many, before they reached the white flesh, to strike in the ground midway, hungering for their fill of flesh. As long, at least, as Phœbus Apollo held the ægis quiet in his hands, so long the shafts flew striking either rank, and so long the hosts fought and fell; but when once he looked the fleet-horsed Danaans in the face, and shook the ægis, and cried, even he himself, with a mighty voice, then as by a spell he broke the courage within their hearts, and they forgot their fierce defence"— and huddled and fled, continues the poet, as a flock or herd may huddle and flee when the herdsman is absent, and a pair of beasts assail it in the night-time.

Here, then, we have epical authority for Apollo as the ægis-wielder. And the special points of the description answer precisely to special points in the statue, which the archer hypotheses fail to account for. If we imagine the god, not indeed marching to confront a hostile rank directly face to face, but hurrying up from one side to interpose between some threatened object and the enemy threatening it — if we imagine him so hurrying up, reaching the right point for interposition, then pausing in his advance, and turning upon the enemy on his left with a sudden action of indignant disdain, a sudden and haughty looking of them in the face, and shaking of the upheld ægis to dismay them (κατενῶπα ἰδὼν . . . Σεῖσ') — then, and then only, shall we have an explanation of our statue that will really both explain and justify it, and hold good at all points.

It is, then, as such an Apollo, an Apollo Aigiochos, or invested with the ægis of his sire, and Boëdromios, or hastening to the succor of some who need it, that our statue is henceforth to be regarded. We have henceforth to think away Montorsoli's restoration of the bow altogether. The Stroganoff bronze of itself proves as much; the passage in Homer supports and authorizes the proof. Add that after the discovery of the bronze, another valuable discovery was made, in 1866, of a marble head slightly mutilated, belonging evidently to a third ancient ver-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

sion of the same original. This head, bought in Rome by the sculptor Steinhaüser, is now in the museum of Basle. In the brilliancy and mechanical finish of the marble, it is not to be compared to the head of the Vatican statue; but it, again, is less overdone than the other in the expression of mouth and chin; it is much simpler in the treatment of the hair, and therefore purer in contour; thus seeming to take us nearer to a Greek original, and to show that no small part of those theatrical elegancies and exaggerations to which we object in the Vatican figures is due to the taste of the imperial copyist. That such a Greek original was of bronze and not of marble, can also be inferred with certainty. That gleaming evenness of surface which imposes so much on unpractised eyes is due in part to the mechanical attempt at imitating in stone the qualities of bronze; there are technical points, as in the definition of the lips and eyelids, which are again the sure marks of such imitation; but the surest mark of all is the management of the cloak; this, as caught up over the left arm and hanging free from the same arm to the shoulder, forms a thin sheet or plate which no marble sculptor would ever have invented as suitable, either in substance or in fold, to his material, but which would be perfectly suitable to the material of bronze.

The question now remains, can we get nearer in any way to that Greek original statue of bronze, which, from the evidence, we judge to have existed? can we tell more precisely what and of what date was that Apollo which our several later copyists had before them?

II.

So far we have been on safe ground, and have arrived at results as certain as, in this imperfect and still progressing science of classical archæology, results ever are. What follows is not so well established, and should pass current not yet as positive knowledge, but only as attractive and probable conjecture. The question before us is, in what days and under what circumstances was this type of Apollo as ægis-bearer and succorer, such as we find him in the Vatican statue, the Basle head, and the St. Petersburg bronze, first wrought? It is a question which narrows itself on a little examination. From the outset we are quite sure that the invention does not belong to the majestic days of Greek art in the fifth century, the age of Pericles. It so happens that an Apollo Boëdromios or Alexikakos, an Apollo the succorer, has lately been discovered which does belong to that age; I mean the colossal figure which filled the central place in the western pediment of the great temple of Olympia, and represented the god as interposing to defend his Greeks, men and maidens assembled at the marriage feast of Peirithoos, from the assault of the Centaurs. The figures of that pediment were the work of Alkamenes, the scholar and almost the rival of Pheidias; and from the cast of the Apollo's head, which, as well as a sketch of his body, have reached home, we can see how completely the conception is governed by the old religious stateliness and high reserve. The type is, indeed, in some sense ancestor, a lofty ancestor, to the type of the Belvedere; the underlip is raised, but only just raised, in scorn; the head, with its close, trim locks treated in the archaic manner, and bound with a close bronze band, was inclined, but only slightly inclined, over the shoulder; one arm, to which a drapery hangs, was raised, but only moderately raised, in action. Enough, however, of the new-found Apollo of Alkamenes, until there shall have been time to study it more fully; we did not need its discovery to be sure that our other Apollo had nothing to do with the Greek art of those days. Making all allowance for the spirit of parade and false refinement in the copyist, we can still pronounce that this type is originally due neither to the first nor to the second great Attic school, neither to that of Pheidias in the fifth century, nor to that of Scopas and Praxiteles in the fourth; but that it is due, at earliest, to the third century, to days post-Alexandrian, when in the breaking up of the ancient politics of Greece, Greek art and intellect had ceased to be centralized at Athens, and there arose in all parts of the new as well as the old Greek world schools infinitely accomplished and inventive still, but of which the characteristics are to be elegant, to be dramatic, to be realistic, to be modern, to have all qualities except the old majesty and simplicity.

Granting, then, that the period of Greek art between, say, 300 and 100 B.C. must be the period to which our type belongs, by what occasion that we can tell is it likely to have been suggested? For nothing is less likely than that it should have been merely suggested by that passage in the fifteenth book of the Iliad. To supply mere illustrations of passages in the poets was at no time the task of monumental sculpture in Greece; its task was to supply images of religion and to commemorate great persons and events. And the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

religious and the commemorative parts of its task were almost inextricably connected; inasmuch as every human event was regarded as happening under superhuman influence, and with every political glory or disaster, every historical victory or defeat, were mixed up ideas of the action both of ancestral heroes and of Olympian gods. Nothing is so likely as that a figure like our Apollo should have been set up by way of celebration and thanksgiving for the supposed interposition of his deity in some actual event.

Now do we know of any event in the history of Greece after the fourth century for which thanks were likely to have been offered in this shape? Do we know of any peril of the Greeks in which the succor of Apollo was conspicuously interposed? We do know of such an event and such a peril; and with the circumstances which attended them the peculiar features of our statue very singularly agree. The case was this. In the year 279 B.C. Greece suffered a disastrous invasion of those tribes of Gaulish barbarians which had for many years been uneasily shifting about the head and eastern shores of the Adriatic. They descended into Illyria; they swarmed over Macedonia, defeated and put to death the Macedonian king Ptolemæus; and next, to the number of sixty-five thousand under their leader Brennus, penetrated into Greece itself. The prize upon which the Gaul had set his heart was the plunder of the famous shrine of Delphi. That story of the barbarian assault and of its overthrow is the most rousing in the later annals of Greece. It is only in the pages of indifferent writers of Roman or imperial days that we read it — a fragment of Diodorus Siculus, a chapter of the guide-book of Pausanias, another of the abridged compilation of Justin — but as we read, even those tame narratives seem to take fire, and we can enter into all the emotions of that supernatural victory, which stirred once more within the hearts of all Greeks the expiring sense of the glories of their race, and seemed for a moment to renew the days of Marathon and Salamis and Platææ. At the approach of the invading host, the guardians of Delphi sought counsel of the oracle. "Fear not," replied the god, "I shall take care for mine own, I and the white maidens." The Gauls, tempted, as one account has it, by the wines and produce of the Phokian plain, delayed their attack long enough for a body of some four thousand defenders to be collected. And when at last they did gather to the fight, and began the assault of the holy steep, suddenly the earth quaked, and a tempest gathered, and thunder and lightning raged with earthquake the whole day long, and confounded the barbarians, and put to naught their multitudes. And the shapes of the Delphian heroies of old were seen athwart the fight — Phylakos and Laodokos and Hyperochos and Pyrrhos; and at a certain moment the priests from all the temples rushed forth, their hair and fillets flying, the instruments of their ministry in their hands, and came among the front rank of the fighters, and cried that the gods were fighting for the Greeks, that they had seen the very god as he flitted in lineaments of radiant youth athwart the opening of his temple, and to his side there had come up from the neighbor temples of Artemis and Athênê two presences of virgins armed; nor had they seen these things with their eyes only, but had heard the weapons of the immortals clash and their bowstrings hiss. So the assailants were overthrown upon that day, and their commander wounded in the fight; and in the night there came signs and wonders greater yet, to wit, great snow and frost, and a falling of rocks from the precipices, which fell and crushed the barbarians; and the next day the Greeks assailed them in their turn, hurling arrows and javelins with the advantage of the ground; until, on the night of the second day, a panic terror descended on the Gauls, and they turned wildly upon one another, and slew one another all night long, after which the Greeks had small pains in scattering the remainder till they were pursued and put to the sword.

Such was the form which, in the imagination of the Greeks, was given to the story of their deliverance from the Gauls at Delphi. It is evident that their defence had, in fact, been greatly helped by alarm of earthquake and blinding weather. If ever, in the history of the Greek world, Apollo fought visibly in defence of his worshippers, it was here; and he fought, which is the especial point, with unusual weapons; not with his own Apolline shafts, which are of three kinds, the shafts of light, of heat, or of pestilence; but with weapons which belong to his father Zeus, with thunder and lightning and storm, with the concentrated terrors of the sky; and of these, as I have said, the ægis with its Gorgon face is in art and mythology the symbol.

We do not know, as a matter of fact, that this last supernatural triumph of the Greek race over outnumbering barbarians

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

was commemorated with a statue, or statues, of Apollo wearing the ægis. But the appropriateness of that attribute to the event is obvious. Apollo as he dismayed the Gauls on the Delphian steep, is in every point the same Apollo who dismays the Greeks in the fifteenth book of the Iliad. And that the Delphian victory was, with statues of one kind and another, abundantly commemorated by the art of those days, is a fact which we do know. It was also commemorated by the establishment of a new festival, the festival of the Sôteria, or rejoicings for deliverance, in which Apollo the son was especially coupled with Zeus the sire. Of works of sculpture set up in honor of the victory, Pausanias mentions a statue of the Phokian warrior Aleximachos, killed in the fight, which was dedicated by his countrymen at Delphi; two statues of Apollo and one of Athênê also dedicated at Delphi by the Ætolians, besides, from the same source, a group of Ætolian captains in association with Artemis; and lastly, a figure of Apollo dedicated in their own market-place by the people of Patræ, the modern Patras, in Achaia. But before Pausanias was at Delphi, Nero had carried off from that sanctuary as many as six hundred of its dedicatory statues; and if the original of our Apollo had been set up at Delphi, we might well suppose it to have been among those six hundred, and that Roman sculptors copied it by the imperial order for the adornment of the imperial pleasure-house at Antium.

The hypothesis thus set forth is a hypothesis and no more; but it is supported by many circumstances of probability. The style and conception of the work correspond completely with the proposed date. And to all other considerations there are the following to be added. It is probable that a monument of sculpture set up to record the overthrow of the Gauls at Delphi would consist, not of the figure of Apollo alone, but would represent Apollo associated with Athênê and Artemis, the "white maidens" of the oracle, the sister goddesses who also had temples adjacent to his own on the heights of Delphi, and who came up each from her temple to help him in the fight. Our argument, say therefore some critics, would be not a little helped if we could point to a statue of either or both of these goddesses which seemed to fit naturally into one and the same group with the Apollo Belvedere. And to such a statue, they add, we can very distinctly point. The well-known Artemis with the stag, one of the most admired sculptures of the Louvre, and popularly known as the Diana of Versailles, furnishes the very thing of which we are in search. The extremely close correspondence between the Apollo Belvedere and the Artemis with the stag, their almost complete natural balance, had long ago been pointed out. Exactly as the Apollo advances hastily from the right, and pauses in his advance to throw his face and in a less degree his body to the left, and hold up the ægis with the left arm, so does the Artemis advance hastily from the left, and pause in her advance to throw her head and in some degree her body to the right, while she raises her right arm to draw an arrow from her quiver. Just as the olive-stem and serpent beside Apollo are the symbols of his deity, so is the attendant stag in the other statue the symbol of the pursuits of Artemis. The figures have the same slender proportions, still more exaggerated in the Artemis, the same highly finished sandals and mode of treatment in the hair, only that of Artemis is braided with less luxuriance. The eyes of both are raised in the same wide, distant, and haughty regard. The very features, with the design and expression of the mouth and chin, have a likeness which is more than that of divine brother and sister, which is identity on different scales. On the whole, the Artemis has a nobler and simpler aspect, with more of life and less of display, and so far speaks better for the copyist who has in this case translated the Greek original into marble. But when once you have taken casts of the two figures, and placed them side by side, with their faces fronting the same way and the direction of their bodies almost meeting, when you have done this and observed their balance and correspondence, it is difficult again to think of them apart. It need hardly be pointed out how accurately the very words of Justin about the virgin goddesses, how they ran up, each from her neighboring temple, to join Apollo, correspond to that action which I have described as the only one possible for the Belvedere figure, as it is also for the figure in the Louvre — the action, that is, of advancing from one side to interpose between some threatened object and its enemy, then, at the right point for interposition, turning against the enemy and confronting him.

With these figures of the Apollo Belvedere and the Diana of Versailles it has been attempted, I do not think success-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

fully, to unite, as part of the same group, the third champion of the Greeks on that day, in the shape of a statue of Athênê, preserved in the Museum of the Capitol at Rome. But of conjecture we have by this time had enough. Let the conjecture about the association of this Apollo and this Artemis, and the conjecture about the relation of both to the defeat of the Gauls at Delphi, be taken for what they are worth, which is certainly not a little. And let only the other part of our account, which identifies the Apollo Belvedere as a god, for the nonce, not of the sounding bow, but of the scathing and dismaying ægis, let that only be taken as a thing known and out of doubt.

SIDNEY COLVIN.

From The Cornhill Magazine.

CANOSSA.

ITALY is less the land of what is venerable in antiquity, than of beauty, by divine right young eternally in spite of age. This is due partly to her history and art and literature, partly to the temper of the races who have made her what she is, and partly to her natural advantages. Her oldest architectural remains, the temples of Pæstum and Girgenti, or the gates of Perugia and Volterra, are so adapted to Italian landscape and so graceful in their massive strength, that we forget the centuries which have passed over them. We leap as by a single bound from the times of Roman greatness to the new birth of humanity in the fourteenth century, forgetting the many years during which Italy, like the rest of Europe, was buried in what our ancestors called Gothic barbarism. The illumination cast upon the classic period by the literature of Rome and by the memory of her great men is so vivid, that we feel the days of the republic and the empire to be near us; while the Italian Renaissance is so truly a revival of that former splendor, a resumption of the music interrupted for a season, that it is extremely difficult to form any conception of the five long centuries which elapsed between the Lombard invasion in 568 and the accession of Hildebrand to the pontificate in 1073. So true is it that nothing lives and has reality for us but what is spiritual, intellectual, self-possessed in personality and consciousness. When the Egyptian priest said to Solon, "You Greeks are always children," he intended a gentle sarcasm, but he implied a compliment; for the quality of imperishable youth belonged to the Hellenic spirit, and has become the heritage of every race which partook of it. And this spirit in no common degree has been shared by the Italians of the earlier and the later classic epoch. The land is full of monuments pertaining to those two brilliant periods; and whenever the voice of poet has spoken, or the hand of artist has been at work, that spirit, as distinguished from the spirit of mediævalism, has found expression.

Yet it must be remembered that during the five centuries above mentioned Italy was given over to Lombards, Franks, and Germans. Feudal institutions, alien to the social and political ideals of the classic world, took a firm hold on the country. The Latin element remained silent, passive, in abeyance, undergoing an important transformation. It was in the course of those five hundred years that the Italians as a modern people, separable from their Roman ancestors, were formed. At the close of this obscure passage in Italian history, their communes, the foundation of Italy's future independence, and the source of her peculiar national development, appeared in all the vigor and audacity of youth. At its close the Italian genius presented Europe with its greatest triumph of constructive ability, the papacy. At its close again the series of supreme artistic achievements, starting with the architecture of churches and public palaces, passing on to sculpture and painting, and culminating in music, which only ended with the temporary extinction of national vitality in the seventeenth century, was simultaneously begun in all the provinces of the peninsula.

So important were these five centuries of incubation for Italy, and so little is there left of them to arrest the attention of the student, dazzled as he is by the ever-living splendors of Greece, Rome, and the Renaissance, that a visit to the ruins of Canossa is almost a duty. There, in spite of himself, by the very isolation and forlorn abandonment of what was once so formidable a seat of feudal despotism and ecclesiastical tyranny, he is forced to confront the obscure but mighty spirit of the Middle Ages. There, if anywhere, the men of those iron-hearted times anterior to the Crusades will acquire distinctness for his imagination, when he recalls the three main actors in the drama enacted on the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

summit of Canossa's rock in the bitter winter of 1077.

Canossa lies almost due south of Reggio d'Emilia, upon the slopes of the Apennines. Starting from Reggio, the carriage-road keeps to the plain for some while in a westerly direction, and then bends away towards the mountains. As we approach their spurs, the ground begins to rise. The rich Lombard tilth of maize and vine gives place to English-looking hedgerows, lined with oaks, and studded with handsome dark tufts of green hellebore. The hills descend in melancholy earth-heaps on the plain, crowned here and there with ruined castles. Four of these mediæval strongholds, called Bianello, Montevetro, Monteluzzo, and Montezano, give the name of Quattro Castelli to the commune. The most important of them, Bianello, which, next to Canossa, was the strongest fortress possessed by the Countess Matilda and her ancestors, still presents a considerable mass of masonry, roofed, and habitable. The group formed a kind of advance-guard for Canossa against attack from Lombardy. After passing Quattro Castelli we enter the hills, climbing gently upwards between barren slopes of ashy grey earth — the débris of most ancient Apennines — crested at favorable points with lonely towers. In truth the whole country bristles with ruined forts, making it clear that during the Middle Ages Canossa was but the centre of a great military system, the core and kernel of a fortified position which covered an area to be measured by scores of square miles, reaching far into the mountains and buttressed on the plain. As yet, however, after nearly two hours' driving Canossa has not come in sight. At last a turn in the road discloses an opening in the valley of the Enza to the left: up this lateral gorge we see first the Castle of Rossena on its knoll of solid red rock, flaming in the sunlight; and then, further withdrawn, detached from all surrounding objects, and reared aloft as though to sweep the sea of waved and broken hills around it, a sharp horn of hard white stone. That is Canossa — the alba Canossa, the candida petra of its rhyming chronicler. There is no mistaking the commanding value of its situation. At the same time the brilliant whiteness of Canossa's rocky hill, contrasted with the red gleam of Rossena, and outlined against the prevailing dulness of these earthy Apennines, secures a picturesque individuality concordant with its unique history and unrivalled strength.

There is still a journey of two hours before the castle can be reached; and this may be performed on foot or horseback. The path winds upward over broken ground; following the arête of curiously jumbled and thwarted hill-slopes; passing beneath the battlements of Rossena, whence the unfortunate Everelina threw herself in order to escape the savage love of her lord and jailer; and then skirting those horrid earthen balze which are so common and so unattractive a feature of Apennine scenery. The most hideous balze to be found in the length and breadth of Italy are probably those of Volterra, from which the citizens themselves recoil with a kind of terror, and which lure melancholy men by intolerable fascination on to suicide. Forever crumbling, altering with frost and rain, discharging gloomy glaciers of slow-crawling mud, and scarring the hillside with tracts of barrenness, these earth-precipices are among the most ruinous and discomfortable failures of nature. They have not even so much of wildness or grandeur as forms the saving merit of nearly all wrathful things in the world, and can only be classed with the desolate ghiare of Italian river-beds.

Such as they are, these balze form an appropriate preface to the gloomy and repellant isolation of Canossa. The rock towers from a narrow platform to the height of rather more than one hundred and sixty feet from its base. The top is fairly level, forming an irregular triangle, of which the greatest length is about two hundred and sixty feet, and the width about one hundred feet. Scarcely a vestige of any building can be traced either upon the platform or the summit, with the exception of a broken wall and windows supposed to belong to the end of the sixteenth century. The ancient castle, with its triple circuit of walls, enclosing barracks for the garrison, lodgings for the lord and his retainers, a stately church, a sumptuous monastery, storehouses, stables, workshops, and all the various buildings of a fortified stronghold, have utterly disappeared. The very passage of approach cannot be ascertained; for it is doubtful whether the present irregular path that scales the western face of the rock, be really the remains of some old staircase corresponding to that by which Mont St. Michel in Normandy is ascended. One thing is tolerably certain — that the three walls of which we hear so much from the chroniclers, and which played so picturesque a part in the drama of Henry

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

IV.'s penance, surrounded the cliff at its base, and embraced a large acreage of ground. The citadel itself must have been but the acropolis or keep of an extensive fortress.

There has been plenty of time since the year 1255, when the people of Reggio sacked and destroyed Canossa, for nature to resume her undisputed sway by obliterating the handiwork of men; and at present nature forms the chief charm of Canossa. Lying one afternoon of May on the crisp short grass at the edge of a precipice purple with iris in full blossom, I surveyed, from what were once the battlements of Matilda's castle, a prospect than which there is none more spirit-stirring by reason of its beauty and its manifold associations in Europe. The lower castle-crowded hills have sunk. Reggio lies at our feet, shut in between the crests of Monte Carboniano and Monte delle Celle. Beyond Reggio stretches Lombardy — the fairest and most memorable battle-field of nations, the richest and most highly cultivated garden of civilized industry. Nearly all the Lombard cities may be seen, some of them faint like bluish films of vapor, some clear with dome and spire. There is Modena and her Ghirlandina. Carpi, Parma, Mirandola, Verona, Mantua, lie well-defined and russet on the flat green map; and there flashes a bend of lordly Po; and there the Euganeans rise like islands, telling us where Padua and Ferrara nestle in the amethystine haze. Beyond and above all to the northward sweep the Alps, tossing their silvery crests up into a cloudless sky from the violet mist that girds their flanks and drowns their basements. Monte Adamello and the Ortler, the cleft of the Brenner and the sharp peaks of the Venetian Alps are all distinctly visible. An eagle flying straight from our eyrie might traverse Lombardy and light among the snow-fields of the Valteline between sunrise and sundown. Nor is the prospect tame to southward. Here the Apennines roll, billow above billow, in majestic desolation, soaring to snow summits in the Pellegrino region. As our eye attempts to thread that labyrinth of hill and vale, we tell ourselves that those roads wind to Tuscany, and yonder stretches Garfagnana, where Ariosto lived and mused in honorable exile from the world he loved.

It was by one of the mountain passes that lead from Lucca northward that the first founder of Canossa is said to have travelled early in the tenth century. Sigifredo, if the tradition may be trusted, was very wealthy; and with his money he bought lands and signorial rights at Reggio, bequeathing to his children, when he died about 945, a patrimony which they developed into a petty kingdom. Azzo, his second son, fortified Canossa, and made it his principal place of residence. When Lothair, king of Italy, died in 950, leaving his beautiful widow to the ill-treatment of his successor, Berenger, Adelaide found a protector in this Azzo. She had been imprisoned on the Lake of Garda; but managing to escape in man's clothes to Mantua, she thence sent news of her misfortunes to Canossa. Azzo lost no time in riding with his knights to her relief, and brought her back in safety to his mountain fastness. It is related that Azzo was afterwards instrumental in calling Otho into Italy and procuring his marriage with Adelaide, in consequence of which events Italy became a fief of the empire. Owing to the part he played at this time, the lord of Canossa was recognized as one of the most powerful vassals of the German emperor in Lombardy. Honors were heaped upon him; and he grew so rich and formidable, that Berenger, the titular king of Italy, laid siege to his fortress of Canossa. The memory of this siege, which lasted for three years and a half, is said still to linger in the popular traditions of the place. When Azzo died at the end of the tenth century, he left to his son Tedaldo the title of count of Reggio and Modena; and this title was soon after raised to that of marquis. The marches governed as vicar of the empire by Tedaldo included Reggio, Modena, Ferrara, Brescia, and probably Mantua. They stretched, in fact, across the north of Italy, forming a quadrilateral between the Alps and Apennines. Like his father, Tedaldo adhered consistently to the Imperial party; and when he died and was buried at Canossa, he in his turn bequeathed to his son Bonifazio a power and jurisdiction increased by his own abilities. Bonifazio held the state of a sovereign at Canossa, adding the duchy of Tuscany to his father's fiefs, and meeting the allied forces of the Lombard barons in the field of Coviolo like an independent potentate. His power and splendor were great enough to rouse the jealousy of the emperor; but Henry III. seems to have thought it more prudent to propitiate this proud vassal, and to secure his kindness, than to attempt his humiliation. Bonifazio married Beatrice, daughter of

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Frederick, duke of Lorraine — her whose marble sarcophagus in the Campo Santo at Pisa is said to have inspired Niccola Pisano with his new style of sculpture. Their only child, Matilda, was born probably at Lucca, in 1046; and six years after her birth Bonifazio, who had swayed his subjects like an iron-handed tyrant, was murdered. To the great house of Canossa, the rulers of one-third of Italy, there now remained only two women, Bonifazio's widow Beatrice, and his daughter Matilda. Beatrice married Godfrey, duke of Lorraine, who was recognized by Henry IV. as her husband and as feudatory of the empire in the full place of Boniface. He died about 1070; and in this year Matilda was married by proxy to his son, Godfrey the Hunchback, whom, however, she did not see till the year 1072. The marriage was not a happy one; and the question has even been disputed among Matilda's biographers whether it was ever consummated. At any rate it did not last long; for Godfrey was killed at Antwerp in 1076. In this year Matilda also lost her mother, Beatrice, who died at Pisa, and was buried in the cathedral.

By this rapid enumeration of events it will be seen how the power and honors of the house of Canossa, including Tuscany, Spoleto, and the fairest portions of Lombardy, had devolved upon a single woman of the age of thirty at the moment when the fierce quarrel between pope and emperor began in the year 1076. Matilda was destined to play a great, a striking, and a tragic part in the opening drama of Italian history. Her decided character and uncompromising course of action have won for her the name of la gran donna d'Italia, and have caused her memory to be blessed or execrated according as the temporal pretensions and spiritual tyranny of the papacy may have found supporters or opponents in posterity. She was reared from childhood in habits of austerity and unquestioning piety. Submission to the Church became for her not merely a rule of conduct, but a passionate enthusiasm. She identified herself with the cause of four successive popes; protected her idol, the terrible and iron-hearted Hildebrand, in the time of his adversity; remained faithful to his principles after his death; and having served the holy see with all her force and all that she possessed through all her lifetime, she bequeathed her vast dominions to it on her death-bed. Like some of the greatest mediæval characters — like Hildebrand himself — Matilda was so thoroughly of one piece, that she towers above the mists of ages with the massive grandeur of an incarnated idea. She is for us the living statue of a single thought, an undivided impulse, the more than woman born to represent her age. Nor was it without reason that Dante symbolized in her the love of holy Church; though students of the "Purgatory" will hardly recognize the lovely maiden, singing and plucking flowers beside the stream of Lethe, in the stern and warlike chatelaine of Canossa. Unfortunately we know but little of Matilda's personal appearance. Her health was not strong; and it is said to have been weakened, especially in her last illness, by ascetic observances. Yet she headed her own troops, armed with sword and cuirass, avoiding neither peril nor fatigue in the quarrels of her master Gregory. Up to the year 1622 two strong suits of mail were preserved at Quattro Castelli, which were said to have been worn by her in battle, and which were afterwards sold on the market-place at Reggio. This habit of donning armor does not, however, prove that Matilda was exceptionally vigorous; for in those savage times she could hardly have played the part of heroine without participating personally in the dangers of warfare.

No less monumental in the plastic unity of his character was the monk Hildebrand, who for twenty years before his elevation to the papacy had been the maker of popes and the creator of the policy of Rome. When he was himself elected in the year 1073, and had assumed the name of Gregory VII., he immediately began to put in practice the plans for Church aggrandizement he had slowly matured during the previous quarter of a century. To free the Church from its subservience to the empire, to assert the pope's right to ratify the election of the emperor and to exercise the right of jurisdiction over him, to place ecclesiastical appointments in the sole power of the Roman see, and to render the celibacy of the clergy obligatory, were the points he had resolved to carry. Taken singly and together, these chief aims of Hildebrand's policy had but one object — the magnification of the Church at the expense both of the people and of secular authorities, and the further separation of the Church from the ties and sympathies of common life that bound it to humanity. To accuse Hildebrand of personal ambition would be but shallow criticism, though it is clear that his inflexible

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

and puissant nature found a savage selfish pleasure in trampling upon power and humbling pride at warfare with his own. Yet his was in no sense an egotistic purpose, like that which moved the popes of the Renaissance to dismember Italy for their bastards. Hildebrand, like Matilda, was himself the creature of a great idea. These two potent personalities completely understood each other, and worked towards a single end. The mythopœic fancy might conceive of them as the male and female manifestations of one dominant faculty, the spirit of ecclesiastical dominion incarnate in a man and woman of almost superhuman mould.

Opposed to them, as the third actor in the drama of Canossa, was a man of feebler mould. Henry IV., king of Italy, but not yet crowned emperor, had none of his opponents' unity of purpose or monumental dignity of character. At war with his German feudatories, browbeaten by rebellious sons, unfaithful and cruel to his wife, vacillating in the measures he adopted to meet his divers difficulties, at one time tormented by his conscience into cowardly submission, and at another treasonably neglectful of the most solemn obligations, Henry was no match for the stern wills against which he was destined to break in unavailing passion. Early disagreements with Gregory had culminated in his excommunication. The German nobles abandoned his cause; and Henry found it expedient to summon a council in Augsburg for the settlement of matters in dispute between the empire and the papacy. Gregory expressed his willingness to attend this council, and set forth from Rome accompanied by the countess Matilda in December, 1076. He did not, however, travel further than Vercelli, for news here reached him that Henry was about to enter Italy at the head of a powerful army. Matilda hereupon persuaded the holy father to place himself in safety among her strongholds of Canossa. Thither accordingly Gregory retired before the ending of that year; and bitter were the sarcasms uttered by the Imperial partisans in Italy upon this protection offered by a fair countess to the monk who had been made a pope. The foul calumnies of that bygone age would be unworthy of even so much as this notice, if we did not trace in them the ineradicable Italian tendency to cynical insinuation — a tendency which has involved the history of the Renaissance popes in an almost impenetrable mist of lies and exaggerations.

Henry was in truth upon his road to Italy, but with a very different attendance from that which Gregory expected. Accompanied by Bertha, his wife, and his boy son Conrad, the emperor elect left Spires in the condition of a fugitive, crossed Burgundy, spent Christmas at Besançon, and journeyed to the foot of Mont Cenis. It is said that he was followed by a single male servant of mean birth; and if the tale of his adventures during the passage of the Alps can be credited, history presents fewer spectacles more picturesque than the straits to which this representative of the Cæsars, this supreme chief of feudal civility, this ruler destined still to be the leader of mighty armies and the father of a line of monarchs, was exposed. Concealing his real name and state, he induced some shepherds to lead him and his escort through the thick snows to the summit of Mont Cenis; and by the help of these men the imperial party were afterwards let down the snow-slopes on the further side by means of ropes. Bertha and her women were sewn up in hides and dragged across the frozen surface of the winter drifts. It was a year memorable for its severity. Heavy snow had fallen in October, which continued icebound and unyielding till the following April.

No sooner had Henry reached Turin, than he set forward again in the direction of Canossa. The fame of his arrival had preceded him, and he found that his party was far stronger in Italy than he had ventured to expect. Proximity to the Church of Rome divests its fulminations of half their terrors. The Italian bishops and barons, less superstitious than the Germans, and with greater reason to resent the domineering graspingness of Gregory, were ready to espouse the emperor's cause. Henry gathered a formidable force as he marched onward across Lombardy; and some of the most illustrious prelates and nobles of the south were in his suite.

A more determined leader than Henry proved himself to be, might possibly have forced Gregory to some accommodation, in spite of the strength of Canossa and the pope's invincible obstinacy, by proper use of these supporters. Meanwhile the adherents of the Church were mustered in Matilda's fortress; among whom may be mentioned Azzo, the progenitor of Este and Brunswick; Hugh, abbot of Clugny; and the princely family of Piedmont. "I am become a second Rome," exclaims Canossa, in the language of Matilda's rhyming chronicler; "all honors are

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

mine; I hold at once both pope and king, the princes of Italy and those of Gaul, those of Rome, and those from far beyond the Alps." The stage was ready; the audience had assembled; and now the three great actors were about to meet. Immediately upon his arrival at Canossa, Henry sent for his cousin, the countess Matilda, and besought her to intercede for him with Gregory. He was prepared to make any concessions or to undergo any humiliations, if only the ban of excommunication might be removed; nor, cowed as he was by his own superstitious conscience, and by the memory of the opposition he had met with from his German vassals, does he seem to have once thought of meeting force with force, and of returning to his northern kingdom triumphant in the overthrow of Gregory's pride. Matilda undertook to plead his cause before the pontiff. But Gregory was not to be moved so soon to mercy. "If Henry has in truth repented," he replied, "let him lay down crown and sceptre, and declare himself unworthy of the name of king." The only point conceded to the suppliant was that he should be admitted in the garb of a penitent within the precincts of the castle. Leaving his retinue outside the walls, Henry entered the first series of outworks, and was thence conducted to the second, so that between him and the citadel itself there still remained the third of the surrounding bastions. Here he was bidden to wait the pope's pleasure; and here, in the midst of that bitter winter weather, while the fierce winds of the Apennines were sweeping sleet upon him in their passage from Monte Pellegrino to the plain, he knelt barefoot, clothed in sackcloth, fasting from dawn till eve, for three whole days. On the morning of the fourth day, judging that Gregory was inexorable, and that his suit would not be granted, Henry retired to the Chapel of St. Nicholas, which stood within this second precinct. There he called to his aid the abbot of Clugny and the countess, both of whom were his relations, and who, much as they might sympathize with Gregory, could hardly be supposed to look with satisfaction on their royal kinsman's outrage. The abbot told Henry that nothing in the world could move the pope; but Matilda, when in turn he fell before her knees and wept, engaged to do for him the utmost. She probably knew that the moment for unbending had arrived, and that her imperious guest could not with either decency or prudence prolong the outrage offered to the civil chief of Christendom. It was January 25 when the emperor elect was brought, half dead with cold and misery, into the pope's presence. There he prostrated himself in the dust, crying aloud for pardon. It is said that Gregory first placed his foot upon Henry's neck, uttering these words of Scripture, "Super aspidem et basiliscum ambulabis et conculcabis leonem et draconem," and that then he raised him from the earth and formally pronounced his pardon. The prelates and nobles who took part in this scene were compelled to guarantee with their own oaths the vows of obedience pronounced by Henry; so that in the very act of reconciliation a new insult was offered to him. After this Gregory said mass, and permitted Henry to communicate; and at the close of the day a banquet was served, at which the king sat down to meat with the pope and the countess.

It is probable that, while Henry's penance was performed in the castle courts beneath the rock, his reception by the pope, and all that subsequently happened, took place in the citadel itself. But of this we have no positive information. Indeed the silence of the chronicles as to the topography of Canossa is peculiarly unfortunate for lovers of the picturesque in historic detail, now that there is no possibility of tracing the outlines of the ancient building. Had the author of the "Vita Mathildis" (Muratori, vol. v.) foreseen that his beloved Canossa would one day be nothing but a mass of native rock, he would undoubtedly have been more explicit on these points; and much that is vague about an event only paralleled by our Henry II.'s penance before Becket's shrine at Canterbury, might now be clear.

Very little remains to be told about Canossa. During the same year, 1077, Matilda made the celebrated donation of her fiefs to Holy Church. This was accepted by Gregory in the name of St. Peter, and it was confirmed by a second deed during the pontificate of Urban IV. in 1102. Though Matilda subsequently married Guelfo d'Este, son of the duke of Bavaria, she was speedily divorced from him; nor was there any heir to a marriage ridiculous by reason of disparity of age, the bridegroom being but eighteen, while the bride was forty-three in the year of her second nuptials. During one of Henry's descents into Italy he made an unsuccessful attack upon Canossa, assailing it at the head of a considerable force one October morning in 1092. Matilda's biographer

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

informs us that the mists of autumn veiled his beloved fortress from the eyes of the beleaguerers. They had not even the satisfaction of beholding the unvanquished citadel; and, what was more, the banner of the emperor was seized and dedicated as a trophy in the church of S. Apollonio. In the following year the countess opened her gates of Canossa to an illustrious fugitive, Adelaide, the wife of her old foeman, Henry, who had escaped with difficulty from the insults and the cruelty of her husband. After Henry's death, his son, the emperor Henry V., paid Matilda a visit in her castle of Bianello, addressed her by the name of mother, and conferred upon her the vice-regency of Liguria. At the age of sixty-nine she died in 1115 at Bondeno de' Roncori, and was buried, not among her kinsmen at Canossa, but in an abbey of St. Benedict near Mantua. With her expired the main line of the noble house she represented; though Canossa, now made a fief of the empire in spite of Matilda's donation, was given to a family which claimed descent from Bonifazio's brother Conrad — a young man killed in the battle of Coviolo. This family, in its turn, was extinguished in the year 1570; but a junior branch still exists at Verona. It will be remembered that Michelangelo Buonarroti claimed kinship with the count of Canossa; and a letter from the count is extant acknowledging the validity of his pretension.

As far back as 1255 the people of Reggio destroyed the castle; nor did the nobles of Canossa distinguish themselves in subsequent history among those families who based their despotisms on the débris of the Imperial power in Lombardy. It seemed destined that Canossa and all belonging to it should remain as a mere name and memory of the outgrown Middle Ages. Estensi, Carraresi, Visconti, Bentivogli, and Gazaghi belong to a later period of Lombard history, and mark the dawn of the Renaissance.

As I lay and mused that afternoon of May upon the short grass, cropped by two grey goats, whom a little boy was tending, it occurred to me to ask the woman who had served me as guide, whether any legend remained in the country concerning the countess Matilda. She had often, probably, been asked this question by other travellers. Therefore she was more than usually ready with an answer, which, as far as I could understand her dialect, was this. Matilda was a great and potent witch, whose summons the devil was bound to obey. One day she aspired, alone of all her sex, to say mass; but when the moment came for sacring the elements, a thunderbolt fell from the clear sky, and reduced her to ashes.* That the most single-hearted handmaid of the holy Church, whose life was one long devotion to its ordinances, should survive in this grotesque myth, might serve to point a satire upon the vanity of earthly fame. The legend in its very extravagance is a fanciful distortion of the truth.

J. A. S.

* I find that this story is common in the country round Canossa. It is mentioned by Professor A. Ferretti in his monograph entitled "Canossa, Studi e Ricerche," Reggio, 1876, a work to which I am indebted, and which will repay careful study.

From The Saturday Review.

RETROSPECTIVE SYMPATHY.

Of all the delicate fruits which can be tasted in perfection only in the "ripe quarter of an hour," none has a more evanescent exquisiteness than sympathy. A touch of responsive feeling which at one moment will seem to lift a mountain's weight from the heart, coming an hour later may pass unperceived, or excite but a languid pleasure. Indeed a very slight degree of untimeliness may turn the pleasure to sheer annoyance. But, apart from such a change of circumstances as would turn the whole thing into a mockery, our moods are so fleeting, and they melt into each other by such slight and gradual changes, that sympathy, in order to exercise its full and most mysterious potency, must rise and fall with the airy modulations of an Eolian harp. The mind of a perfect sympathizer has a surface as liquid and transparent as that of a summer lake. No currents of intention or preoccupation must disturb the flow of its mobile passiveness. And yet how much that is precious falls short of perfection, and how great is our loss if we cannot enjoy what is imperfect!

To learn to enjoy, or at least gratefully to accept, imperfect sympathy is one of the most important parts of the art of friendship. And it may help us towards doing so to remember how often what seems misplaced now would but a little while ago have hit the mark — how fully our past may justify the feelings which we no longer care to excite. For instance, a long course of disappointment may have

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

gradually lowered our expectations, till in middle life something is accepted as a boon which in earlier days we should have rejected as a mere hindrance. Our gladness on such an occasion will naturally be shared by those who have been near and intimate enough to have shared in our gradual resignation; but to others it may be the first indication, and a sad one enough, of the change wrought by years in our estimate of ourselves and of life. And to such friendly but comparatively distant spectators the occasion may seem to be one rather for condolence than congratulation. Is not this a kind of sympathy which it is hard to accept cordially, but which it would be unjust as well as ungrateful to reject?

Or, to take another instance, suppose that after long struggles against impending illness or calamity, a crisis comes which, by putting an end to the struggle, reveals to others, while it almost removes from our own consciousness, the weight of the burden which has so long been borne. Is not the sympathy then first excited apt to seem to us ill-timed and unwelcome in the fresh sense of relief — a relief in which we would perhaps gladly forget the weary load of the past? Or, on the other hand, a great happiness may come to us pierced by some secret pang of regret, too late perhaps to be shared by one for whose sake it was chiefly desired, or involving some new anxiety which in anticipation had been scarcely perceptible, but now may overshadow all the brightness. At such moments of complex feeling a warm and untempered congratulation may grate upon us as the most ignorant of blunders, and yet it may proceed from a real and deep sympathy in what is even now the principal, though not the most vivid, part of our experience. Indeed it very often happens that our own consciousness of joy or sorrow is not keenest at the most eventful moments. "Not in the crises of events . . . are life's delight and depth revealed —

> The day of days was not the day,
> That went before or was postponed;
> The night Death took our lamp away
> Was not the night on which we groaned.
> I drew my bride beneath the moon
> Across my threshold — happy hour;
> But ah, the walk that afternoon
> We saw the water-flags in flower!"

And if this is so in our own experience (and who but recognizes the truth of it?), how much more must it be the case with other people's perception of our feelings! If our own emotions arise, not when they are called for, but in gusts as fitful as the wind, it is but natural that sympathy should come not so much when we look for it as when by some inscrutable combination of conditions a way is prepared for the electric spark to flash into our friends' minds a sudden revelation of what has been taking place. So complicated are human beings, and so strangely mingled the events of our lives, that the reflection of them in the minds of others is of necessity broken and partial. We know but little about any event from its mere name. Till it actually befalls us, it may be dreaded or longed for, but we can but guess what will be its general result on our happiness. Probably very few people would say at the end of life that either their hopes or their fears had been always fully justified. Still less can our pity or our congratulation be expected to correspond with realities.

But it is the history or the prophecy, not the present feeling, revealed or suggested by words and looks, which appeals most powerfully to our imaginations. Seen from a slightly different point of view, how different would be the meaning of many of our real feelings, even to ourselves! We may easily prove this, if we have courage to do so, by reading over a few of our own old letters. And of course the difference is still greater in looking on at the lives of others. How much more touching are the pleasures of children and of old people than any of the struggles of the middle-aged wayfarers! — though it is from a dim sense of such struggles, as lying before or behind the present calm, that all its deep pathos is derived. Any present which touches us deeply is sure to be full of reflected lights from the past and the future. Seen under such lights, how sad are some gratifications, how much more pathetic some smiles than any tears!

Such a perfect reflection of every passing phase of feeling as would never jar upon any sensibility is scarcely possible except in the closest of all relations, and rare enough even in that. Nor is it perhaps on the whole to be desired. For one, perhaps the, great benefit of sympathy is not the mere pleasure it affords, nor even its strange power to relieve the pressure of intense feeling, but the equalization which it brings about in our feelings through this very retrospective quality which so often makes it a little hard to accept. A friend standing outside of our own life and of its minor changes and

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

chances, but truly recognizing and sharing its deeper currents, becomes to us by that mere fact a sort of unconscious regulator. The most helpful sympathy is not necessarily the readiest, or even the most delicate; but that which is most truly proportioned, taking part with what is deep and permanent against transient surface agitations, and so helping to steady and elevate the general course of feeling. People do not generally see their own lives as a whole. The looker-on may know less, but he has the advantage of distance, which gives him a wider view. And to bring the feelings belonging to this more comprehensive view to bear upon the present vivid and perhaps exaggerated emotion is one of the best offices of friendship. It is, however, one of those offices which cannot be discharged by any mere immediate effort of will. It is rather the unconscious result and reward of a past course of faithful and patient attention to our friend's interests that, when some sudden gust of feeling threatens to drive him from his moorings, he may find in us a steady anchorage, binding him to his more lasting aims. Some sympathy lies so deep and is so unchanging that it looks at times like indifference; but we go back and back to it as to nature herself, and we scarcely know till after the experience of long years how much we owe to it, how we have been calmed and strengthened and unconsciously cheered by the never-failing hopefulness and trust which ignored our little weaknesses, and seemed deaf to many a passing complaint. Other friends may give a readier response to each movement of our minds; may seem, and may really be, quicker to comprehend the bearing on our feeling of each passing occurrence; but the very quickness of their sympathy may come to be a burden and a disturbance if it be applied indiscriminately to the temper we are trying to attain and the impulses we are struggling to resist. We know that the smiles and the tears which are so ready for us are just as much at the service of the next comer, and we ungratefully conclude that they cannot mean much, or even suspect them of being partly mechanical. Great readiness of response seems to imply a mobility of temper which is perhaps hardly compatible with the depth of feeling and of principle which go to make up what may be called organic sympathy. Where this is wanting the slighter reflection of our moods soon palls, and even becomes irritating at times. Sympathy, indeed, is one of the qualities which depend for their value upon something deeper than themselves. It is, at its best, the result of participation, not only in emotion, but in that deeper part of feeling which has become character.

What we want, or ought to want, in a perfect friend is, above all, an ally for our best self — an ally against our own faults and weaknesses as well as against the world. If to this alliance can be added a sympathy so minute and flexible as to reflect our lightest emotion and to quiver with every passing ripple of apprehension, of fun, or of regret, which crosses our minds, we are indeed singularly blessed. But life is not so rich that we can afford to reject or despise lower degrees of helpfulness. As we grow older we learn to welcome and to enjoy many a clumsy expression of good will, at which inexperienced youth would chafe or wince; and amongst other things we discover the value of yesterday's sympathy. If it has been a little slow in reaching us, still we know now that even light does not travel so fast as might have been expected, and the distance from star to star may not be greater than that which is placed by the mysterious encumbrances of life between soul and soul. We learn to accept the inevitable imperfections of human sympathy; but we may also learn to avoid some unnecessary aggravations of them. One great lesson in this direction is that whenever our sympathy is excited, not so much by a simple expression of present feeling as by what that feeling implies of past joy or sorrow, we shall do well to be cautious in giving utterance to it. A certain vagueness is not unbecoming to the most genuine feelings when they are perhaps a little out of date, and sympathy in arrear should not be too articulate.

Why, indeed, should we ever without necessity try to pack our sympathy into anything so narrow and imperfect as language? A silent responsiveness, a diffused and respectful tenderness of manner, is more gratifying, as well as safer, in nine cases out of ten, than any attempt to express sympathy in words. But words will come, and must be spoken. Only in cases of any delicacy the fewer, the simpler, and the less personal they are, the safer — we will not say the better.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXII. | No. 1772.—June 1, 1878. | From Beginning, Vol. CXXXVII.

CONTENTS.

I. THE CROWN AND THE CONSTITUTION, . Quarterly Review, ... 515
II. WITHIN THE PRECINCTS. By Mrs. Oliphant. Part VII., ... Advance Sheets, ... 543
III. THE COMING TOTAL SOLAR ECLIPSE. By J. Norman Lockyer, ... Nature, ... 557
IV. ON KEEPING SILENCE FROM GOOD WORDS, Fraser's Magazine, ... 563
V. LOWER LIFE IN THE TROPICS, ... Spectator, ... 568
VI. AMATEUR LIBRARIANS, ... Spectator, ... 571
VII. ADVICE TO THE LATE LORD MACAULAY, ON ENTERING LIFE, ... Lord Brougham, ... 574
VIII. BUDDHISM, ... Public Opinion, ... 575
IX. THE GOORKHAS, ... Globe, ... 576

POETRY.

THE CURE'S PROGRESS, ... 514
BUTTERFLIES, ... 514
THE GOOD GREAT MAN, ... 514
SOME ANSWER, ... 514

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY
LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

For EIGHT DOLLARS, remitted directly to the Publishers, the LIVING AGE will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of THE LIVING AGE is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of LITTELL & GAY.

Single Numbers of THE LIVING AGE, 18 cents.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

THE CURE'S PROGRESS.

MONSIEUR the Curé down the street
Comes with his kind old face, —
With his coat worn bare, and his straggling hair,
And his green umbrella-case.

You may see him pass by the little "Grande-Place,"
And the tiny "Hôtel-de-Ville;"
He smiles as he goes, to the fleuriste Rose,
And the pompier Théophile.

He turns, as a rule, through the "Marché" cool,
Where the noisy fish-wives call;
And his compliment pays to the "belle Thérèse,"
As she knits in her dusky stall.

There's a letter to drop at the locksmith's shop,
And Toto. the locksmith's niece,
Has jubilant hopes, for the Curé gropes
In his tails for a pain d'épice.

There's a little dispute with a merchant of fruit,
Who is said to be heterodox,
That will ended be with a "Ma foi, oui!"
And a pinch from the Curé's box.

There is also a word that no one heard
To the furrier's daughter too;
And a pale cheek fed with a flickering red,
And a "Bon Dieu garde M'sieu!"

But a grander way for the Sous-Préfet,
And a bow for Ma'am'selle Anne;
And a mock "off-hat" to the Notary's cat,
And a nod to the Sacristan: —

For ever through life the Curé goes
With a smile on his kind old face, —
With his coat worn bare, and his straggling hair,
And his green umbrella-case.

Cornhill Magazine. AUSTIN DOBSON.

BUTTERFLIES.

ONCE more I pass along the flowering meadow,
Hear cushats call, and mark the fairy rings;
Till where the lych-gate casts its cool dark shadow,
I pause awhile, musing on many things;
Then raise the latch, and passing through the gate,
Stand in the quiet, where men rest and wait.

Bees in the lime-trees do not break their sleeping;
Swallows beneath church eaves disturb them not;
They heed not bitter sobs or silent weeping;
Cares, turmoil, griefs, regrets, they have forgot.
I murmur sadly: "Here, then, all life ends.
We lay you here to rest, and lose you, friends."

By no rebuke is the sweet silence broken.
No voice reproves me; yet a sign is sent;
For from the grassy mounds there comes a token
Of life immortal — and I am content.
See! the soul's emblem meets my downcast eyes:
Over the graves are hovering butterflies!

Chambers' Journal. G. S.

THE GOOD GREAT MAN.

How seldom, friend, a good great man inherits
Honor or wealth, with all his worth and pains!
It sounds like stories from the world of spirits,
If any man obtain that which he merits,
Or any merit that which he obtains.
For shame, dear friend! renounce this canting strain,
What wouldst thou have a good great man obtain?
Place — titles — salary — a gilded chain —
Or throne of corses which his sword hath slain? —
Greatness and goodness are not means, but ends;
Hath he not always treasures, always friends,
The good great man? — three treasures, love and light,
And calm thoughts, regular as infant's breath;
And three firm friends, more sure than day and night —
Himself, his Maker, and the Angel Death.

1809. S. T. COLERIDGE.

SOME ANSWER.

NOT for himself — he lives to God alone —
Do we lament that he, the good great man,
Should live unguerdoned and should die unknown:
Not for his sake we mourn, but for our own.
"A little while 'tis with you; while ye can,
Walk in the light!" So spake the living Way:
But we have chosen darkness; day by day
The light was with us, yet we dared to scorn
The beams of his pure glory; now his ray
Faints in the westward, therefore do we mourn.
Oh worse than famine, worse than sword, or pest,
When prophets cry in vain to the dull ear
Of dying lands, that murmur "Peace," and jest,
And lightly mock the visions of the seer.

1858. H. M. B.

Macmillan's Magazine.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

From The Quarterly Review.

THE CROWN AND THE CONSTITUTION.*

ONE of the most curious legacies we have inherited from our ancestors is an extreme susceptibility to the influence of political forms and phrases. We are proud of our weakness, and not without reason, for it is a sign of far-descended freedom and of traditional greatness. It is accredited by famous examples in poetry and history. When the worthy Dicæopolis wished for his own purposes to prorogue the Athenian Ecclesia, he used his privilege as a citizen, and announced that he felt a drop of rain. The Prytanes, as they were bound to do, at once declared the day's proceedings to be at an end.† If any member of the Polish Diet wished to stop a debate, he had only to make use of the Liberum Veto, and the assembly had no alternative but to dissolve itself or to murder the obstructing individual. In the same way the English politician, who seeks to acquire popularity by turning the whole community upside down, may be tolerably sure of success, if he can but represent some public act to be "unconstitutional."

The word is a good word, and may be used to signify a variety of positive things. On the other hand, it has vast magic as a mere phrase, and, as such, it is used always in one sense and for one purpose, namely, to bring discredit on the crown. When it is so employed it is, of course, convenient to ignore the fact that the constitution consists of several parts, and that the encroachment of any one part on the liberties of the others is, in the eye of the law, an unconstitutional act. We never hear, for instance, from modern historians that it was an unconstitutional act of the subjects of King Charles I. to cut off his head; or that there was anything unprecedented in the conduct of William IV.'s ministers who carried off their sovereign at a moment's notice to pronounce, without deliberation, the dissolution of Parliament; or that Sir Robert Peel pushed hardly on the royal prerogative in limiting the queen's choice of her personal attendants. For each and all of these acts, springing as they did from the will of the majority or its representative ministers, grave and weighty reasons are found; but no epithets are too forcible to describe the wickedness of the Charleses, the Jameses, the Georges, and even the Williams, who have sought, by the exercise of their prerogative, to check the liberties or the opinions of the Commons. We are by no means concerned to defend the conduct of the monarchs we have mentioned; we believe that both their thoughts and actions were often of a thoroughly unconstitutional character; but, as applied to the crown in the reign of Queen Victoria, most people will be inclined to consider the phrase "unconstitutional," to speak mildly, — inappropriate. We have been long under the impression that the reign of the present sovereign has been distinguished by the smooth working of our constitutional machinery, by the superiority of the crown to anything like party favoritism, and by the hearty sympathy which the monarch has shown for the varied interests of all classes of her subjects. But for the last eighteen months we seem to have been living in a quite different world. There has been solemn whispering and head-shaking in certain circles whenever the name of the queen is mentioned. Respectable Liberal journals, daily and weekly, have been in a flutter at the aggressive attitude of the crown. At a meeting of Radicals in Willis's rooms to advocate the opening of the Dardanelles, one of the speakers complained of the undue influence that was being exercised by the court, and was doubtless somewhat surprised to find himself called to order by the chairman, and his audience giving three cheers for the queen. In spite, however, of such momentary weaknesses as this manifestation of loyalty, there has been a tolerable agreement among politicians of a particular complexion that certain recent acts of the sovereign have been alarmingly "unconstitutional."

What, then, has the queen been doing? Has she been collecting in the House of Commons a party of "queen's friends"?

* 1. Life of the Prince Consort. By Theodore Martin. 3 vols. London, 1875–76–77.
2. The Crown and the Cabinet. By "Verax." London, 1878.

† Aristophanes, "Acharn." 171.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Has she been endeavoring to thwart the policy of her ministers, who are responsible to the country, by "an influence behind the throne"? Has she been dismissing lords-lieutenant, or striking off the names of privy councillors who have made themselves obnoxious to her by the expression of their opinions? She has done none of these things. Much less has she tried to revive the Star Chamber or the dispensing power. The "head and front of her offending" is that she has intrusted to an accomplished man of letters the materials necessary for the preparation and publication of the memoirs of her husband, the late prince consort.

Astonishing as such a statement sounds, it is the simple truth. We would remind our readers that the first volume of the "Life" was published in 1875, the second in 1876; and that when they first appeared both volumes were read with eager interest, not only as containing the history of one whose worth the people had learned to appreciate too late, but as throwing a vivid light on the interior working of our constitutional machinery. Not a syllable was breathed by the critics against the character of the prince consort, or the attitude of the crown, as depicted in this portion of the work. But when the third volume, composed evidently on the same principles as the first two, appeared, there arose a loud outcry. This volume dealt with the most interesting and critical period of her Majesty's reign — the Crimean War — and, as the relation of the crown to foreign affairs was more fully illustrated than in the earlier years which the biography covered, it was natural that the number of State papers in it should be proportionally large. But it was not of the predominance of politics that the critics complained. In their eyes the viciousness of the book lay in this, that, whereas a considerable section of the public were vehement advocates of Russia in her recent war with Turkey, the third volume of the "Life" placed in the clearest light and the most vivid colors the character of Russian diplomacy, the nature of Russian warfare, as well as the anti-Russian sympathies of English statesmen and the English people, throughout the events that led to the invasion of the Crimea by the allied armies in 1854. Hence, say these critics, it was evident that the queen had strong personal inclinations with which she wished her subjects to become acquainted, in order that by the exercise of her royal influence she might convert the misguided portion of the English people to better opinions. Which exercise of prerogative, without doubt, was highly "unconstitutional."

The frame of mind of persons haunted by these apprehensions is very characteristically illustrated by a pamphlet which has come into our hands, entitled "The Crown and the Cabinet," consisting of five letters, reprinted from the Manchester Weekly Times, with the signature of "Verax." The argument in this composition does not call for serious notice. The author, indeed, appears to pose as a kind of tame Junius; he writes of the queen and the prince consort as an "exacting master and mistress," and of their communications to their ministers as "pettish and insolent," together with many other epithets equally respectful and appropriate; but the matter of his discourse might be readily compressed into the phrase of the French doctrinaires, "Le roi règne, mais ne gouverne pas;" and it only deserves attention in so far as it is a representative expression of a certain middle-class opinion on the nature of the English constitution. "Verax" solemnly tells us that "this instalment of the 'Prince Consort's Life' is a message from the crown . . . a message sent straight to the nation over the heads of ministers, and only too well adapted to fire the resentments which those who are responsible for the policy of the country might wish to allay." Speaking of the queen's letter to Lord Aberdeen, to which we shall refer hereafter, he says, "I make no comment on these remarks; my loyalty forbids." As for the notion that the queen is to exercise any direct personal influence on the counsels of the cabinet, it fills him with despair. He is afraid that, if such principles prevail, "a day may come when the most momentous questions affecting the honor and destinies of the nation may be settled at a morning call between some future

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

emperor and his grand vizier." The true constitutional position of the sovereign, according to "Verax," is this: —

It is commonly supposed that while the queen reigns and all the acts of the government are done in her name, the responsible business of government, as regards both foreign and domestic affairs, is done by the dozen or fifteen statesmen whom the queen selects as her ministers from out of the ranks of the party which commands a majority in the House of Commons. We are under the impression that these statesmen meet together in perfect freedom, with minds unmolested and undisturbed by any outside influence, and determine to the best of their ability what course shall be adopted in the management of national affairs. We call them the advisers of the queen. We take it for granted that the queen does not advise herself, that she has no advisers except those supplied to her by Parliament, and that she never hesitates to adopt the conclusions presented to her on their authority as if they were her own. We exult in this arrangement as embodying the perfection of popular government, and we boast of the advantage it gives us of having our national policy decided, not by hereditary brains (sic), which may be wise or foolish, as accident determines, but by the select men of the nation, while it raises the crown far above the strife of contending parties, exempts it from criticism, and enables us to render to it the homage of an ungrudging, unstinted, and unwavering loyalty. . . . The crown we only know as the ceremonial device on the Great Seal by which the nation's resolves are attested, and the moment we are forced to know it in any other capacity danger commences for one party, though hardly for both.

"It is commonly supposed!" There is truth in the last words of the above passage, but not the truth which "Verax" intended them to express. The danger to which we are exposed arises not from any unconstitutional encroachment on the part of the crown, but from the ignorance and cowardice manifested in these "common suppositions" of which "Verax" makes himself the mouthpiece. For ignorance of the grossest kind it is, to suppose that the occupant of the oldest throne in Europe, surrounded by a boundless prestige, possessed of a vast if undefined prerogative, and commanding countless sources of influence, could ever sink into the capacity of a mere mechanical register of the will of Parliament; or that, if she did, the people would be likely to "pay the homage of an ungrudging, unstinted, and unwavering loyalty" to what they would recognize to be nothing but a clockwork figure. And cowardice, unworthy of Englishmen, it is to deny to the chief personage of these realms that privilege of free speech, which she herself so liberally allows to the meanest of her subjects. It is not from men who seek to discredit as "a message from the throne" a book, published no doubt under the auspices of royalty, and written with all the delicacy and skilfulness to be expected from its author, but seeking its fortune in the open market, and exposing itself to public criticism,— that the crown of England has any "danger" to apprehend. Rather it is English freedom that is imperilled by that slavish temper which, seeking to stifle the expression of all opinion contrary to its own, has ever been the instrument of force and tyranny. The dangerous fallacies involved in the constitutional theories of "Verax," as well as the extent to which his unfounded opinions appear to be shared by certain of his countrymen, suggest to us that it may be useful to inquire first of reason, what is the nature of constitutional government in general, and then of history and our own experience, what is the character of the English constitution in particular.

All government is founded partly on force, partly on opinion; good government consists in the combination of the two elements in their proper proportions. As Aristotle shows, the beginning of government is co-existent with the beginning of society. The rule of the father over the family is justified by his superiority in power. But his government is cemented and established by ties growing out of moral opinion, nor could the family be held together if the father failed to discharge his natural obligations towards his wife and children. Extended to the State, the same principle manifests itself in every form of government. Force encroaching unduly on freedom is certain after a while to reach a point at which freedom recoils and finds the means to subvert force.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

This truth was constantly illustrated in the Greek despotisms by the frequency of tyrannicide, and by the ingenious arguments with which such acts were defended by the philosophers. It was exemplified again on a larger scale by the influence of philosophy in producing the French Revolution. On the other hand, unchecked opinion is apt by its impotence and distractions to play the game of force. There never was a government in which opinion had such absolute latitude as that of Athens. The people in assembly heard their affairs discussed by their orators; they voted on the spur of the moment; the vote of the majority became a decree, and, if need were, was carried into instant execution. Many of our readers will remember the story of a tremendous tragedy which came within a point of being acted in consequence of this system of government. The city of Mitylene had revolted from Athens. On the suppression of the revolt, the people assembled in the Pnyx to deliberate on the fate of the rebels. Under the influence of an harangue by Cleon, they voted by a large majority that the whole male population, to the number of six thousand, should be put to the sword, and that all the women and children should be sold into slavery. A galley was at once despatched to Mitylene to order the decree to be executed. The night passed, and in the morning the people were filled with horror and remorse at the orders they had given. A fresh assembly was called, and the decree of the previous day was rescinded. Twenty-four hours after the first galley had started, a second followed it; and the unflagging chase that ensued, the superhuman efforts of the rowers, and the arrival of the reprieve at the moment when the sentence was about to be carried into effect, form one of the most dramatic episodes in the history of Thucydides. Vast as was the popular energy of Athens, solid as was its power when wielded by a statesman like Pericles, such a glimpse of passion, vacillation, and distraction, in a people given over to the winds of opinion, makes it easy for us to understand the impotence of its democracy to withstand the solid concentration of the Macedonian phalanx.

The most sagacious tyrants, as well as the wisest champions of democracy, have understood the necessity of tempering the extreme principles on which their respective forms of governments rest. Thus, Macchiavelli shows how Ferdinand of Aragon achieved his dark and selfish aims by acquiring "reputation" as the defender of the Church, and, like another power in later days, contrived that all his acts should be so connected with apparently generous motives, that men should be unable to gainsay him. On the other hand, the framers of the American Constitution conceived it was politic to render the executive secure from the storms of opinion by preventing the legislature from touching the power of the president during his term of office by any method except direct impeachment.

In spite, however, of all the wisdom of human contrivance, human nature is perpetually driving monarchy towards despotism, and democracy towards anarchy. The philosophers, who saw every variety of government illustrated in the small states of Greece, found in the perpetual revolutions of which they were witnesses plenty of materials for political speculation, but few for political construction. Yet the foresight of Aristotle anticipated the possibility of a government at once free and powerful in the form of "constitutional monarchy." No such constitution had been as yet actually witnessed. "A king," says the philosopher, "governing under the direction of law does not of himself constitute any particular species of government." Yet the idea was both rational and practicable. "A king ought to have a proper power, such a one, that is, as will be sufficient to make him superior to any one person, or even to a large part of the community, but inferior to the whole." And enumerating the arguments against absolute monarchy, Aristotle says: * "He who bids the law to be supreme, makes God supreme; but he who intrusts man with supreme power gives it to a wild beast, for such his appetites sometimes make him; passion, too, influences those who are in power, even the very best of men; whereas law is intellect free from appetite."

After the fall of the Roman Empire the principle of limited monarchy appears to have been generally recognized in the Gothic nations of Europe. But from one cause or another, in almost all these nations, the power of the crown prevailed over the liberties of the people, and, in the eighteenth century after Christ, England stood forth alone as an example to Europe of the privileges that might be enjoyed by subjects under a constitutional monarchy. How these privileges were acquired is matter of history; and though history may be read in different senses, we venture to

* Aristotle, "Politics," book iii., cap. x., xi.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

assert that no reading of it whatever can verify the theory of the cast-iron constitution which "Verax" seems to imagine was, at some time or another, imposed upon the nation. "To provide," says he, "against the chance that hereditary descent may occasionally give us a fool for a sovereign, our forefathers have devised the mechanism of responsible government." We can hardly give "Verax" credit for being so simple as he wishes to appear, and we believe that he knows very well that the principle of ministerial responsibility, so far from being invented to remedy any weakness inherent in the hereditary principle, was in effect a doctrine founded on the rational consideration — to use Aristotle's words — that "the power of the king must be inferior to the power of the whole community;" and that, like every other constitutional principle since the Restoration, it flowed from particular circumstances, and is sustained by special precedents. The constitution is older than ministerial responsibility; and the encroachments of the royal power before the Revolution of 1688, as well as the growth in the power of the Commons since, originated not in any prescribed source of law or custom, but in the ever-shifting conditions regulating the equilibrium which the constitution managed to maintain between force and opinion.

As all Englishmen are supposed to know, the constitutional checks on the power of the crown from the earliest days were five in number: 1, the sole right of Parliament to grant supplies; 2, the assent of Parliament for every new law; 3, security of the subject from arrest except by legal warrant, and the right of speedy trial; 4, trial by jury; 5, the liability of the servants of the crown to action for the violation of the liberty of the subject. These were the essential liberties for which our ancestors contended in Magna Charta, which were confirmed again and again by charters in subsequent reigns, and which were finally asserted and established in the Bill of Rights. It seems a miracle, as we look back, that rights so essentially civil should have been maintained against the overbearing force of the crown in the military ages of our history. But it is plain that several counteracting causes obliged the kings of England against their will to lean for support on their subjects, and enabled the latter on their side to insist on the royal recognition of their traditional liberties. Of these causes it will be sufficient to specify two; first, that uncertainty of title which weakened the power of so many of our kings, compelling, for instance, an usurper like Richard III. to seek popularity by the abolition of benevolences; and secondly, the foreign possessions of the crown, which required for their defence a loyal support from the king's subjects, that could be readily granted only in consideration of reciprocal concessions on the side of the sovereign. This principle of mutual bargaining, however, would scarcely have produced union and affection between the English monarchs and their people, if it had not been for a third cause, which united both parties by the common bond of self-defence, namely the attitude which the crown assumed in its foreign relations in consequence of the insular position of the kingdom.

The English people have always instinctively understood that the maintenance of their domestic liberties depends on the independence of their country, and they have naturally looked for the preservation of this independence to their sovereign, as the depositary of the concentrated force of the nation, the disposer of peace and war, and the natural representative of England's freedom in the eyes of foreign powers. In like manner the English kings have caught the flame of insular patriotism; and have seen, in the passion they have experienced to assert their own independence and dignity against foreign pretensions, the reflection of their subjects' love for their individual liberties. Hence every advance in the greatness of England as a nation has been effected by the joint action of the king and the people. The Constitutions of Clarendon, aimed though they were by the crown against a foreign ecclesiastical rival, secured the recognition of the ancient laws and customs of the realm. The framers of Magna Charta, while they forced from their monarch an acknowledgment of their liberties, were yet careful, in opposition to the wish of many of their own order, to keep the crown on an English head. They felt that national passion which Shakespeare centuries afterwards expressed in the person of the bastard Falconbridge, who, with all his contempt for John as a man, is loyal to him as the representative of England's majesty. The feeling we have been describing finds vivid utterance in the words with which Falconbridge concludes the play: —

This England never did, nor never shall Lie at the proud foot of a conqueror
But when it first did help to wound itself.
Now these her princes are come home again,
Come the three corners of the world in arms,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

And we will shock them; nought shall make us rue,
If England to itself do prove but true.

The great constitutional right of the English people to grant supplies through representatives in Parliament was really established by the most warlike of their monarchs. Hard pressed by his frequent wars, Edward I. issued writs to his sheriffs for summoning deputies from the boroughs, as well as knights from the shires, to grant such supplies as he and his council might judge necessary. The preamble to the writ affirms it to be "a most equitable rule that what concerns all should be approved by all, and common dangers should be repelled by united efforts." The immediate result of this happy arrangement between the crown and the Commons was the victory over the Scots at Dunbar. On the other hand, when the king sought to recover Guienne by means of arbitrary exactions, the nation withstood him, and he was obliged to relinquish his project of invasion, and to renew the national charters. So much do the wealth and security of the English people depend on the power of the crown; so essential to the honor of the crown is the love and confidence of the people!

There have been times when the intense passion for national independence has proved injurious to the cause of individual liberty. It can scarcely be doubted that the moral support which the tyrannical Henry VIII. derived from his subjects, in spite of his glaring contempt for justice, was due to the aversion of the latter to the jurisdiction of a foreign power. And in the same way, the raising of forced loans, the rejection of bills passed by both Houses of Parliament, and the institution of the Star Chamber, were all forgiven to the sovereign who appeared in arms at Tilbury to animate her troops against the invader, professing her readiness to die at their head in defence of the freedom of her people.

But no grace was granted to kings who were at once cowardly and despotic; who sought to make use of the undue force which their predecessors had left at their disposal, without possessing in themselves that greatness of patriotic character which alone had sustained those predecessors in public opinion. If the English people had, under the Tudors, surrendered some of their most cherished liberties, it was not because they had lost their spirit, but because they were willing to sacrifice some portion of individual freedom to the still more cherished object of national independence. And when James I. shrank from responding to the warlike ardor of his Parliament, he laid the axe to the root of that divinely-granted prerogative, the form of which he was so pedantically bent on preserving. We ask the Whigs of to-day, who refuse to grant supplies to their sovereign in the moment of their country's danger, to consider the example of their ancestors, swearing to spend and be spent in defence of their religion and of the Palatinate, "lifting up their hats in their hands so high as they could hold them, as a visible testimony of their unanimous consent, in such sort that the like had scarce ever been seen in Parliament."

Modern historians are apt to dwell solely on the benefits we have derived from the resistance of our ancestors to the encroachments of the crown, but it is also salutary to reflect how the discord between the crown and the people brought trouble and dishonor on the nation. Force, wielded by feeble hands, strove in vain against the irresistible rush of opinion; opinion breaking beyond all bounds, found itself promptly overmastered by armed force; this again was swept away by a tide of opinion running in favor of legitimacy, on which despotism was once more borne triumphantly along, till the sudden ebb of the royal force in 1688, manifested to the world how vast a revolution had been effected in the relative position of the Commons and the crown. During this period the country under one monarch had become obsequious to Spain, two other of its kings were the pensioners of France; one of them had agreed, in consideration of a price, to make a public profession of the Roman Catholic religion, while, as a crowning disgrace, the Dutch fleet rode up the Thames and insulted us on the Medway.

We think it will hardly be denied that during the one hundred and thirty years that elapsed between the accession of Anne and the first Reform Bill, the various elements of the English constitution were more evenly balanced than at any period before or after. No political system was ever more anomalous in principle, none ever worked better in practice, than that of popular representation by means of close boroughs. What constitution could apparently be more unpopular than one composed of an hereditary crown, an hereditary peerage, and a House of Commons, in which a large number of the members were direct representatives either of the House of Lords or of the sovereign, in which the great centres of popu-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

lation were entirely unrepresented, and in which perfect independence of opinion was only possible to those who were public-spirited enough to purchase the right of representing themselves! Nevertheless, this strangely compounded system was by no means unfavorable to individual liberty, and was certainly conducive to national independence. The reason is simple. All the essential parts of the nation were represented in it; each within its own proper sphere had full freedom of action; yet not one of them, however desirous of predominating, was sufficiently powerful to absorb the others, or to overthrow the well-distributed balance of the whole system.

To begin with, the excess of force inherent in royalty had been effectually restrained by the Revolution of 1688. The crown had emerged from its unavailing struggle against popular liberty shorn of much of its ancient influence and prestige. After the death of William III. the throne was filled by a monarch who was ruled by female favorites, themselves the mere instruments of rival parties. The first two monarchs of the house of Brunswick, ignorant, one even of the language, and both of the character of their people, aliens from English sympathies, and regarding England itself only as an instrument for advancing Hanoverian interests, were altogether unfitted to inspire their subjects with feelings of devotion. They were but too thankful to be relieved of responsibility, by leaving the management of home affairs in the hands of their ministers. Hence, as was inevitable, for the first sixty years of the eighteenth century there was a vast diminution in the personal influence of the crown. It may in fact be said that during the whole of this period the crown was in commission.

Out of this unnatural conduct of the sovereign arose the system of government by party. The royal sources of power and patronage remained unimpaired, and under the circumstances it was only natural that they should be administered by the aristocracy, as the political body immediately connected with royalty and deriving from that original its rank and possessions. A long struggle for power ensued between the two parties into which the nobility were divided; and, during the temporary eclipse of the crown, the Whigs and Tories took their stand severally on the monarchical or popular side of the constitution, and transferred the sentiment of loyalty, properly due to the monarch, to the party leaders who were able to command the distribution of places and honors. The Whigs being the principal authors of the Revolution, it was they who reaped the chief advantage from the system of party government which was now established; and, as it was with their elaborate scheme of Parliamentary connection that the resuscitated power of the crown was brought into collision after the accession of George III., it will be useful to recall the famous apology made for the principle of party by the greatest and most philosophical of Whig statesmen. The cabal, as Burke calls George III.'s illegal advisers, had endeavored to discredit party by calling it "faction," an accusation to which Burke replies: * —

> It is indeed in no way wonderful that such persons should make such declarations. That "connection" and "faction" are equivalent terms is an opinion which has been carefully inculcated at all times by unconstitutional statesmen. The reason is evident. Whilst men are linked together they easily and speedily communicate the alarm of an evil design. They are enabled to fathom it with common counsel, and oppose it with united strength. Whereas, when they lie dispersed, without concert, order, or discipline, communication is uncertain, counsel difficult, and resistance impracticable. Where men are not acquainted with each other's principles, nor experienced in each other's talents, nor at all practised in their mutual habitudes and disposition by joint efforts in business, no personal confidence, no friendship, no common interest subsisting among them, it is evidently impossible that they can act a public part with uniformity, perseverance, or efficacy. In a connection the most inconsiderable man, by adding to the weight and the whole, has his value and his use; out of it, the greatest talents are wholly unserviceable to the public. No man, who is not inflamed by vain glory into enthusiasm, can flatter himself that his single unsupported, desultory, unsystematic endeavors are of power to defeat the subtle designs and united cabals of ambitious citizens. When bad men combine, the good must associate, else they will fall, one by one, an unpitied sacrifice in a contemptible struggle.

This defence of party appears to us, within its own limits, perfectly reasonable. As a vindication of free Parliamentary government from the insidious attacks to which it was exposed, the argument is unanswerable. But its validity depends on the willingness of Parliament to confine itself to what Burke assumed to be its true limit, control. So long as the House of Commons was content to fill the place marked

* Thoughts on the Cause of the Present Discontents.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

out for it in the constitution, as the guardian of the public liberties, the bonds of party connection were necessary to oppose a firm front to the power of the crown. But when the House of Commons itself began to usurp the functions of the executive, when it came to look on office as the great end of party organization, when it used its "connection" for the purpose of reducing the monarch (to quote Baron Stockmar's phrase) "to a mandarin figure, which has to nod its head in assent or shake it in denial as ministers please," — then it became evident that Burke's position was no longer tenable, and that party was in a fair way to degenerate into faction. Tories as we are, we are by no means insensible to the great benefits which the administration of Walpole, the first master of Parliamentary "connection," secured for the country. But it is plain that towards the close of his term of power, and still more in the times of his successors, the government of the aristocracy was rapidly declining into oligarchy. The Tories, as a party, were too weak, in the absence of their visible head, to make a good fight against their rivals in defence of the monarchical rights which their principles bound them to maintain. Hence throughout the reigns of George I. and II. the power of the Whigs was continually on the increase. Now, in spite of their advocacy of the popular liberties, the Whigs have never been a popular party. The true Whig is a born lawyer and a natural aristocrat. He has a passion for constitutional precedents, and is ready to sacrifice his life and fortune for his doctrines of civil and religious liberty. But, like Milton, he has little sympathy with, and a good deal of contempt for, the people itself. Therefore, when constitutional freedom was once assured by the Bill of Rights, and when the Whigs, as the reward of their exertions, assumed the government, and relinquished the defence, of the people, they soon betrayed the selfish instincts by which aristocracy, like every other form of government, is liable to be corrupted. The poet tells us that the sweets of office are as soothing to the fiery spirits of the Whigs as flowers are to bees; and once settled there, the administration of Newcastle shows that they may be indifferent to what the instinct of the people and the honor of the country demand of its rulers.

How far the Whig oligarchy might have prevailed against the influence of the crown, if it had been allowed to develop unchecked its principle of "connection," it is impossible to say. But meantime a strong force was growing up outside Parliament, which served to counteract the exclusive influences to which the representatives of the people were exposed. This was public opinion. Unable to bring the Commons under its immediate control, it yet exercised a very decided influence on their proceedings. This influence was chiefly brought to bear on the conduct of foreign affairs. The passion of the people for independence, and their desire that England should uphold her position as the natural champion of freedom, was as ardent in the eighteenth century as at any period of their history. So strongly were the national traditions rooted in their mind, that, in the reign of George II., they twice forced Whig ministers into war, against their judgment. And the apparent want of sympathy in these ministers for the national honor was no doubt one of the causes which led to the revival of crown influence under George III. The nation had found a minister after its own heart in Pitt, whose greatness rendered him independent of either party; and the credit which had been obtained by the firm rule of a single man, when contrasted with the feebleness and vacillations of the "connection," had reflected a lustre on the crown. When George III. came to the throne, he won the hearts of his people by inserting with his own hand in the royal speech the phrase that "he gloried in the name of Briton." Had he been as wise as he was spirited, he might have used his popularity in a legitimate way to break through the network with which the Whigs sought to surround him. Unfortunately, he discarded the one minister who could have served the monarchical cause, and by his obstinacy and arbitrary conduct brought the crown into difficulties, from which he was unable to extricate it before the rise of the younger Pitt. But when Pitt had once established himself in the good graces of the king, the loyalty of the people rallied unanimously round the sovereign, and the excesses of the French Revolution, which showed how inseparable was the security of the nation from that of the throne, helped to maintain the Tory party in power for nearly fifty years.

In all my observation of the English state-machine [writes Baron Stockmar to the prince consort] I have never been able to discover that balance of the elements of their constitution of which Englishmen boast so much. Previous to the Reform Bill the theory of this balance was perhaps much more defective than it has been since; but the system worked better in practice than it does now. It admitted of a vigorous government.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

This remark appears to us perfectly well-founded; and indeed the principle of the constitutional equilibrium before the Reform Bill was, we think, more logical than the baron seems to allow. Each of the elements of the constitution sought to exercise its will unchecked; none of them for long together was strong enough to do so, though all, at one time or another, were strong enough to do a certain amount of mischief. The king sought to recover all the personal power of which the crown had been deprived by the Revolution, and the consequence was the loss of our American colonies. Parliament, under the Whig oligarchy, endeavored to usurp executive power, and to dispossess the monarch of his constitutional right of dissolution. The people, only indirectly represented in Parliament, made their voice heard outside in riots and tumults. All these irregularities produced violent shocks and oscillations in the balance of the State, but were impotent to overthrow it, because, whenever any single power showed itself dangerously predominant, there was strength and inclination in the other two powers to resist its encroachments, though not to annihilate its existence. Under such conditions, there was manifestly scope for "vigorous government." And vigorous government we had. Our commerce and enterprise laid the foundations of our empire in all parts of the globe. If we lost America, we gained Canada and India. We occupied the all-important military positions of Gibraltar and Malta. We put down rebellion in Ireland, and upheld freedom in Spain. And we endured, without flinching, a war of twenty years, in which we had more than once to stand alone against the associated power of Europe and, worse still, to confront at home the tyrannous anarchy with which we were contending abroad. There is no more glorious episode in our history than the suppression of the Mutiny of the Nore. It is well to recall to our statesmen, in these days of government by public opinion, the great examples of their predecessors, and the emotions which they excited in the minds of their illustrious contemporaries. "Let us figure to ourselves," says Prince Hardenberg, "Richard Parker, a common sailor, the leader of the revolt, taking at Sheerness the title of admiral of the fleet, and the fleet itself, consisting of eleven sail of the line and four frigates, assuming the title of the Floating Republic; and nevertheless recollect that the English, but recently recovered from a financial crisis, remained undaunted in the presence of such a revolt, and did not withdraw one vessel from the blockade of Brest, Cadiz, or the Texel! It was the firmness of ancient Rome."*

How it came to pass that this mighty system was abolished we need not stop to inquire. But we think it will be admitted that the Reform Bill of 1832 was passed, not because representation by close boroughs was opposed to the theory of the constitution, but because it had been used for selfish ends, and had proved itself inadequate to cope with those questions for which the force of opinion, now become overwhelming, imperatively demanded a solution. In any case, the passing of the bill produced a revolution in the political balance of power, the extent of which was not only unsuspected by those who framed the measure, but is even now imperfectly appreciated by the nation at large. The great intermediary power, which for nearly a century and a half had stood between the crown and the people, was, politically speaking, neutralized; and, after the long separation caused by the vain attempt to restrict popular rights by force, the sovereign was once more brought into direct personal contact with his subjects in a government resting almost entirely on opinion.

The first effect of this great revolution was to destroy the old basis of party government. It is impossible to disguise the fact that the Whig died and was buried in 1832. True, a claimant to his name and estates has appeared; but those who knew the old owner see that his personator is no more like him, than the martyr of Portsmouth is like Sir Roger Tichborne. The opposite view has been lately maintained by our distinguished contemporary the Edinbnrgh Review, who has endeavored to prove the identity of the Liberals with the old Whigs.† To begin with the "alias," this is the account the new claimant has to give of himself:—

> When the party to which we belong adopted the name of "Liberal," it did so not because it was ashamed of the old title, or meant to disown it, but because the new appellation stretched wider than the old, because it proclaimed the identity of our principles not only with a time-honored band of patriots in our own country, but with those who have toiled and bled for freedom in every age and all over the world.

* Alison's "History of Europe," chap. xxii.

† Edinburgh Review, January, 1877, "Principles and Prospects of the Liberal Party."

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

After this heroic reason for dropping a good old English name, our would-be Whig thinks to prove his identity by some round abuse of the Tories, and if his vituperations were really a proof that our dear old friend, with whom we have before now had many a sharp tussle, were really in the flesh, all the bad names in the world should not provoke us to a retort. But when we ask our Liberal-Whig for a little direct evidence by which he may be recognized, he refers to the following credentials: "The removal of religious disabilities; the abolition of trade restrictions; the removal of burdensome and unjust taxes; the establishment of a system of primary education; the reform of the representative system." We can only say with Dominie Sampson, "Prodigious!" "The removal of civil disabilities"! Why, would it surprise the Edinburgh Review to learn that the Parliamentary Test Act was supported with eagerness by the Whigs or their immediate predecessors; that it remained in undisturbed operation till the time of George IV.; and that it was finally repealed by the Tories? "The abolition of trade restrictions"! But who framed the Navigation Laws, if not that excellent progenitor of the Whigs, Oliver Cromwell? "The establishment of a system of primary education"! Well, we do not know that either Whigs or Tories had much to say to education before the foundations of the present system were laid by a body of men for whom the Whigs have never displayed much affection, the clergy of the Established Church. "The reform of the representative system"! But was not the Tory Pitt the first to propose Parliamentary Reform, and were not the genuine Whigs as much opposed in their hearts as the bitterest Tories to the measure of 1832, which they understood very well to be an act of political suicide?

By principles such as those enumerated in the foregoing extract, the Edinburgh Review thinks to prove at once the essential difference between the Liberal and Conservative party — the latter of which, it says, cares nothing for principle, but only for institutions — and the identity of the Liberals with the old Whigs. "Principles," we are told, "never change; if true once they are true forever." How has it come to pass, then, that the Liberals have been false to the principle of the Test Act, adhered to by Lord Somers? Of the Navigation Laws, passed by Oliver Cromwell? Of protection to trade, advocated by Fox in opposition to Pitt? And what has the Edinburgh Review to say about the "principle" of Church establishment? Of the policy respecting disestablishment a great deal, but of the "principle" on which that policy is founded very little. "When the nation by its representatives demands a settlement of the question; when some definite and intelligible plan for dealing with the immense and varied interests involved shall have been produced, and shall have met with general acceptance, it will be time for a party or a government to take it up." Quite so. The Edinburgh Review has let its cat out of the bag. The "principle" on which the Liberal party acts is expediency, or obedience to the will of the majority. But the assertion, that the will of a majority of the moment represents a principle which is "true forever," is enough to make all the old Whigs turn in their graves. We tell the Liberals plainly, there is no use in beating about the bush. For one hundred and fifty years the Whigs were the guardians of popular liberty against the encroachments of the crown, and during that period their principles were very clear and well-defined. But at the close of that period the people declared that its minority was ended, and that it was capable of governing itself, and when this stage had been reached there was plainly no longer any reason why the Whigs should stand between the people and the crown.

The Tories, on the other hand, had still a reason of existence. It is quite true, as the Edinburgh Review says, that Toryism does not effect to stand on "principle" so much as on institutions; in other words, it eschews the shibboleths and legal abstractions in which the Whig mind once delighted, and contents itself with loyally upholding the constitutional prerogative of the crown against the invasion of democracy. So long as the right and honor of the crown remain intact, the Tories have not the least desire to restrict the liberties of the people. They have indeed always been, in the widest sense of the word, a more popular party than the Whigs, as, though they know less about the people in the abstract, they know more about them in the flesh. Nor have they the Whig proneness to oligarchy. In his recent discourse on "Equality," Mr. Matthew Arnold, lamenting the profound chasm which divides the different ranks in English society, confesses that the conversation of those in a station inferior to his own is utterly unpalatable to him. This is the true Whig spirit. If Mr. Arnold had known more of the country parts where the sur-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

vivals of feudalism are many and vigorous, he would have understood that there, at any rate, difference in class is no bar to the existence of the strongest sympathy and affection between individuals. Hence there is nothing to wonder at in the introduction of popular measures by the Tory party. Nevertheless, we allow that measures like Catholic Emancipation or the Reform Bill of 1867 are, in a sense, injurious to our cause; because, whether or not these were actually fraught with danger to the crown, to a large section of the Tories they appeared so, and therefore weakened the union of the party and its faith in its leaders.

Such being the change effected in the relations of parties by the first Reform Bill, what was the effect of this measure on the position of the crown? In the first place, the capacity of the people to govern itself being virtually acknowledged, it became impossible for the monarch to adopt anything like a party line in the conduct of affairs. Had the queen after her accession been inclined, like George III. when first he made Pitt minister, to use her influence against the majority elected by the nation, she would clearly have been guilty of unconstitutional conduct. But she has never done, she has never by her intimate counsellors been advised to do, anything of the sort: —

If things come to a change of ministry [writes Baron Stockmar, whom writers like "Verax" strive to represent as a kind of Lord Bute] then the great axiom, irrefragably one and the same for all ministers is this, viz.: The crown supports frankly, honorably, and with all its might, the ministry of the time, whatever it be, so long as it commands a majority, and governs with integrity for the welfare and advancement of the country. A king who, as a constitutional king, either cannot or will not carry this maxim into practice, deliberately descends from the lofty pedestal on which the constitution has placed him to the lower one of a mere party chief.

Government being now completely based on opinion, the only course open to the sovereign was to encourage all sound instinct and sentiment, and at the same time to stand completely above party prejudice, and this was what the queen did.

You always said [writes the prince consort to Baron Stockmar] that if monarchy was to rise in popularity it could only be by the sovereign leading an exemplary life and keeping quite aloof from and above party. Melbourne called this "nonsense." Now Victoria is praised by Lord Spencer, the Liberal, for giving her support to the Tories.

The perfect unity of feeling between the crown and the people was shown at the time of the abolition of the Corn Laws. Never during the present century had party feeling run to such a height. In consequence of the plainly-marked drift of public opinion, Sir Robert Peel tendered his resignation to the queen. Lord John Russell was summoned to form a Liberal ministry, but found the difficulties in his path innumerable. Between the perplexities of party and the jealousies of statesmen, it seemed as if the State machine would be brought to a dead-lock. In this emergency the queen again sent for Sir Robert Peel, and he loyally undertook to sacrifice himself for the good of his country. What the sacrifice cost we know, and it may be imagined that even a man so patriotic as Peel might have shrunk from a struggle which was certain to deprive him of friendship, connection, and power, if he had not been sustained in his resolve by the sympathy and approval of his sovereign. As to the conduct of the crown on this occasion we quote the evidence of an unimpeachable witness, the Radical Examiner: —

In the pranks and bunglings of the last three weeks there is one part which, according to all report, has been played most faultlessly, that of a constitutional sovereign. In the pages of history the directness, the sincerity, the scrupulous observance of constitutional rules which have marked her Majesty's conduct in circumstances the most trying will have their place of honor. Unused as we are to deal in homage to royalty, we must add that never, we believe, was the heart of a monarch so warmly devoted to the interests of a people and with so enlightened a sense of their interests.

Yet while thus withdrawing herself from the blinding influences of party, the sovereign has never ceased to influence by opinion and suggestion the conduct of affairs. And whatever "Verax" and his following may say, we believe most Englishmen will thoroughly approve of the views of the prince consort on the duties of an English monarch.

Nowhere [he states in a private memorandum written in 1852] would such indifference be more condemned and justly despised than in England. Why are princes alone to be denied the credit of having political opinions based upon an anxiety for the national interests, their country's honor, and the welfare of mankind? Are they not more independently placed than any other politician in the State?

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Are their interests not most intimately bound up with those of their country? Is the sovereign not the natural guardian of the honor of his country? Is he not necessarily a politician?

Necessarily he is. In home affairs the sovereign is a politician in the noblest sense, because he is the father of his people. Mr. Martin's narrative shows the eager personal interest which both the queen and the prince consort took in every undertaking designed to promote the happiness or to improve the taste of the nation. Nor were they content merely to preside over their people from an eminence: many a widow of a lost miner or a drowned sailor has been cheered by the expression of her Majesty's sympathy with her suffering; many a hero of humble station has exulted at the thought that his conduct has merited the notice and approval of his sovereign.

There is thus a perpetual gravitation of the crown and the people towards each other, tending to close up the breach that was made in the royal authority by the Revolution. Strong monarchs have always been popular in England. The reigns to which the imagination most fondly reverts are those of the first and third Edward, Henry V., and Elizabeth. Under all these the principle of authority predominated over that of freedom, but enough of freedom existed to make the nation proud of its sovereigns, and to rejoice that in them its own majesty was worthily represented. It was only when the royal power was turned against its subjects that opinion rose against monarchy, and usurped the functions that properly belong to the crown. And now that the people has become self-governing it turns instinctively to its monarch, because it perceives the confidence she reposes in it, and sees in the heartiness with which she enters into all its interests the best guarantee of its prosperity and freedom. The personal feeling which the queen inspires in all classes of her subjects has been proved wherever her Majesty has chosen to show herself in town or country, and was not more genuinely exhibited by the "numbers of farmers," who, as the queen records, rode with the royal party through Dunstable in 1841, "nearly smothering them with dust," than by the two hundred and eighty thousand artisans of Birmingham, who, in 1843, thronged the streets of the stronghold of Chartism to welcome the visit of the prince consort.

But the influence which the crown exercises over the course of domestic legislation is a far less important consideration than its relation to foreign affairs. In a nation that is self-governed opinion will be the ruling power, but in international dealings it must be evident to all reasonable beings that force is still supreme. If a nation, therefore, values its independence, it must be prepared to use its force, and for this purpose it must be ready to give generous and ungrudging support to its sovereign power. The monarch is at once the head and the arm of the constitution, in whose judgment rests the decision of peace and war, and on whose will depend the movements of the military and naval forces of the country. Moreover, the sovereign, and not his ministers, is the visible representative of the national majesty in the eyes of all foreign powers. Constitutional arrangements are nothing to absolute monarchs; it is the monarch of each nation who is in their view responsible for all the actions to which the nation collectively commits itself. Hence the English sovereign has a double interest in the conduct of foreign affairs; first, the security of his country, and next, the maintenance of his personal honor. Therefore, though, on the principle of self-government, the opinion of the queen may not in the decision of home affairs be of more value than that of her poorest subject who possesses a vote, yet in foreign questions it is obvious that her interest is beyond all comparison greater than that of any other single Englishman, and may even be compared to that of the nation itself. Hence it follows that, not only by virtue of her prerogative, but by the nature of things, she must be allowed a large personal share in the control of our foreign policy.

This is a conclusion which "Verax" cannot bear. So far from thinking that the monarch, as head of the executive power, should bear any part in the maintenance of his own honor, he holds that "the special functions claimed for the crown in relation to foreign politics are a survival from a former age when the monarch had a far larger share of direct power in most things than he has now." And again: "The supreme importance of foreign affairs is only another reason why the crown should stand aloof from them, and leave them in the hands of men who, whatever risks they may choose to adventure with the sovereign, are delegated by the nation to do the work, and are held responsible, even to the length of impeachment, for the manner in which they do it." It is therefore plain that, in the view of "Verax," the nation is not only competent

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

to decide on the direction of its internal interests, but to originate and control the course of foreign policy.

Now for our part we think it can be very conclusively proved, both from reason and experience, that a House of Commons, elected on the principle of numerical representation, is utterly unqualified for the functions which its flatterers would thrust upon it. Admitting, for argument's sake, that the course of history since the Reform Bill has proved that the common sense of the nation has been sufficient to settle prudently questions of domestic interest, this does not at all prove that it will judge with equal wisdom of its interests abroad. Self-government is merely an application of the principle, that average common sense is capable of forming sound opinions on matters lying within its own experience. The principle which undoubtedly works well in the parish has been extended to the nation; and it may be plausibly argued that the average wisdom of the nation is fairly represented in such measures as the abolition of the Corn Laws and the Education Act of 1870. On such subjects almost everybody is capable of forming an opinion; but on what grounds is it to be believed that the ordinary Englishman, ignorant of elementary geography, still more ignorant of history, unacquainted with foreign languages, manners, and modes of thought, and peculiarly susceptible of insular prejudice, can judge with sagacity of imperial questions, requiring the deepest knowledge of human nature, and the most accurate acquaintance with principle and detail? The disqualifications of such a person to direct the foreign policy of his country will appear still more glaring if we consider the extremely complex system on which that policy has been based ever since the outbreak of the Revolutionary War.

Previous to the Reformation the wars of Europe were almost entirely dynastic. After the Reformation and before the Revolution they rose partly out of dynastic questions, partly out of questions of opinion. But since the French Revolution every European war (though some of them were occasioned by dynastic jealousies) has been one of opinion. Whether they have been waged between absolutism and anarchy, between foreign conquerors and national insurgents, or between race and race, opinion has been the source of them all. Now the main question which since 1789 has distracted Europe, between authority on the one side, and liberty and equality on the other, is one which England settled in her own fashion for herself in 1688. Her settlement was a compromise. Hence in almost every struggle that has occurred since the French Revolution, the interests of England collectively, and the sympathies of English parties and individuals, have been more or less divided between the rival causes. At the outset of the French Revolution the feelings of most Englishmen, and of Pitt among the rest, were on the side of the reformers. It was only after the murder of the king, the institution of the Jacobin propaganda, and the invasion of Belgium and Holland, that English opinion pronounced against the Revolution, and asserted the cause of constitutional liberty in the great war that terminated with the overthrow of Napoleon.

The objects for which England undertook that war, and which have continued to guide her foreign policy ever since, are lucidly stated in a despatch of Lord Grenville in 1799. After recommending the restoration of the Bourbons as the best means of securing peace and prosperity for France, Lord Grenville says: —

> But desirable as such an event must be both to France and the world, it is not to this mode exclusively that his Majesty limits the possibility of secure and solid pacification. His Majesty makes no claim to prescribe what shall be the form of her government, or in whose hands she shall vest the authority necessary for conducting the affairs of a great and powerful nation. He looks only to the security of his own dominions, and to those of his allies and to the general safety of Europe. Whenever he shall judge that such security can in any manner be attained, as resulting from the internal situation of the country or from such other circumstances of whatever nature as may produce the same end, his Majesty will eagerly embrace the opportunity to concert with his allies the general means of pacification.

The principles here laid down are those which must necessarily govern the foreign policy of England as long as she remains a constitutional monarchy. Admitting, as she did, the fundamental justice of the principles of the Revolution of 1688, it would have been inconsistent if England had made war on France for the purpose of restoring the Bourbon dynasty. In spite, therefore, of her own opinion that the acknowledgment of her legitimate monarchs would be for the best interests of France, England refrains from interfering with the liberty of the French to determine their own form of government.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

On the other hand, as the representative of a free and independent nation, the king asserts his right to resist the pretensions of France to impose her opinions on the rest of Europe, and declares that, if she does so, he will protect his own interests and those of his allies. It is impossible that the true limits of the doctrine of non-intervention could be more compendiously defined. Lord Grenville's policy maintains the balance between that state of absolute isolation, to which the Liberal interpreters of the doctrine are so anxious to reduce their country, and that perpetual interference in the affairs of other nations to which the absolutist and revolutionary parties on the Continent respectively resort, whenever either of them gains the upper hand.

We are aware that modern Liberals profess the doctrine that, after the treaty of Vienna, England entirely departed from the position which Lord Grenville had made her assume.

We are converts [said Sir W. Harcourt in the debate on the vote of supply] to a new political faith since 1815. The treaties of 1815 were negotiated by great statesmen, but they were gigantic blunders. There is nothing left of that treaty now. . . . The reason why that treaty has gone is that the negotiation was founded upon principles that were radically false. It was founded on dynastic arrangements; it was founded upon geographical puzzles; it was made to satisfy the ambition of rulers, and it neglected the interests and sympathies of the nationalities and populations. What was it that broke down the edifice that had been reared? What was the yeast which leavened the lump? It was the principle of nationalities. What makes Prince Bismarck so strong in Europe? It is because he has had the courage and wisdom to grasp the principle of nationality by which he has ground his foes to powder. What has made Austria so weak? It is because she has not recognized that principle. What has made Russia weak as the oppressor of Poland? What has made her so strong as the vindicator of oppressed races, etc.?

Astonishing words to be heard from the lips of one who is ambitious of being thought an English statesman! For they are neither more nor less than a repetition of the revolutionary principles which the speaker's ancestors combated with their blood and fortune for a whole generation, which the statesman whom he affects to admire resisted to the day of his death, and which even the leaders of his own party have strenuously repudiated. What was it but the principle of nationality, or the divine right of subjects to rise against their rulers, which originated the invasion of Belgium and Holland in 1793, which resulted in the flagitious treaty of Campo Formio in 1797, which led to the oppression of Spain in 1808? All this was done by France under the Jacobins or Napoleon, precisely on the same pretences as those by which the oppressor of Poland constitutes herself the protector of the Eastern Christians. And even Fox and his followers, ready as they showed themselves to sacrifice the honor and independence of England to the idol of liberty, never bowed down before Napoleon as "the vindicator of oppressed races." But if it be true that after 1815 England became the convert to a new faith, why did she not prove the sincerity of her conversion in 1823, by aiding the revolutionists in Spain against the armies of France? What said Canning, Sir W. Harcourt's own favorite, on that occasion? Replying to Sir James Mackintosh, who had instituted a parallel between England under Elizabeth and under George IV., he said: —

Elizabeth was herself amongst the revolters against the authority of the Church of Rome, but we are not amongst those who are engaged in a struggle against the spirit of unlimited monarchy. We have fought that fight. We have taken our station. We have long ago assumed a character different from those around us. It may have been the duty and interest of Queen Elizabeth to make common cause with, to put herself at the head of, those who supported the Reformation, but can it be either our interest or our duty to ally ourselves with revolution? . . . Our complex Constitution is established with so happy a mixture of its elements — its tempered monarchy and regulated freedom — that we have nothing to fear from foreign despotism, nothing at home but from capricious change. We have nothing to fear unless, distasteful of the blessings which we have earned and of the calm which we enjoy, we let loose again with rash hand the elements of our constitution, and set them once more to fight each other.

He concludes thus: —

Our station, then, is essentially neutral, neutral not only between contending nations but between contending principles. The object of the government has been to preserve that station, and for the purpose of preserving it to maintain peace.

When Donna Maria, the constitutional queen of Portugal, was forced from her throne by the usurper Dom Miguel, it was argued by the Liberals in England that we were bound by treaty to render her armed assistance. But Lord Aberdeen conclu-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

sively showed that our engagements only held us to protect Portugal from foreign aggression, not to interfere in her internal arrangements. And the government of that day stopped the expedition which had started from our shores to help Donna Maria on the ground that it involved a breach of England's neutrality.

Lastly, in the debate on Mr. Roebuck's motion of June 25th, 1850, on the principles of foreign policy applied by Lord Palmerston, Sir Robert Peel made his last speech, the peroration of which was as follows: —

> It is my firm belief that you will not advance the cause of constitutional government by attempting to dictate to other nations. If you do, your intentions will be mistaken, you will rouse feelings upon which you do not calculate, you will invite opposition to government; and beware that the time does not arrive when you withdraw your countenance from those whom you have excited, and leave upon their mind the bitter recollection that you have betrayed them. . . . You are departing from the established policy of England; you are involving yourselves in difficulties, the extent of which you can hardly conceive; you are bestowing no aid on the cause of constitutional freedom, but are encouraging its advocates to look to you for aid instead of those efforts which can alone establish it, and upon the successful exertion of which alone it can be useful.

Thus at three different dates, by three ministers of the most various temper and character, the policy of intervention on behalf of the cause of "nationality" was disavowed and deprecated. On the other hand, Sir W. Harcourt has no grounds at all for implying that England took up an anti-national position at the Congress of Vienna. By a separate declaration Lord Castlereagh modified the eighth article of the Treaty of Alliance between Great Britain, Austria, Russia, and Prussia. This article, he says, — > is to be understood as binding the contracting parties, upon principles of mutual security, to a common effort against the power of Napoleon Bonaparte, in pursuance of the third article of the said treaty; but is not to be understood as binding his Britannic Majesty to prosecute the war, with a view of imposing upon France any particular government. However solicitous the prince regent must be to see his Most Christian Majesty restored to the throne, and however anxious he is to contribute, in conjunction with his allies, to so auspicious an event, he nevertheless deems himself called upon to make this declaration on the exchange of the ratifications, as well in consideration of what is due to his Most Christian Majesty's interests in France, as in conformity to the principles upon which the British government has invariably regulated its conduct.

These principles, the same that we have before seen advanced by Lord Grenville, are those by which England must still continue to shape her policy if she wishes to preserve her security and independence. But clear and consistent as the principles themselves are, the difficulties in applying them justly are innumerable, and we think that we shall be able to demonstrate from experience that the only way in which the nation can hope to steer safely between the Scylla of absolutism and the Charybdis of anarchy is by leaving the executive — we will go farther, and add the sovereign herself — just liberty in the conduct of foreign affairs.

The first difficulty that presents itself to the proper application of the principle of non-intervention is the unstable character of our alliances. Allies we must have if the equilibrium of Europe, so necessary to the peace and safety of England, is to be preserved; and yet from the mixed nature of our own constitution and the uncompromising nature of foreign politics, our friendships have seldom been of complete cordiality or long duration. During the present century the only governments which have remained unshaken by revolution are those of England and Russia; the others have oscillated between revolution and military force; and as our policy forbids us to cast in our lot with one or other of these causes, we are loved by the partisans of neither, and suspected by both. Nevertheless since 1815 we have contrived to maintain our position without loss of influence on the Continent. Through the reigns of Louis Philippe and the late emperor the relations of the English and French governments, in spite of antipathies and jealousies in each people, were intimate, and the western powers, from 1830 to 1870, were consequently a sufficient balance to the great military monarchies of northern and central Europe. Our policy has been to recognize, as far as possible, the de facto government in France, without regard to dynastic considerations; and the attitude we have had to assume in consequence is one requiring the greatest delicacy and reserve. How much of the desirable concord between France and England was due to the personal appreciation by Louis Philippe and his successor of the value of the English alliance, and to the tact and judgment with which their advances were met by the queen and the prince consort, may be seen in Mr. Mar-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

tin's interesting narrative of the various visits exchanged between the monarchs of the two nations.

At the present moment, however, it seems as if the question of foreign alliances were not one with which England has any immediate concern, and we turn to consider a danger more likely to prove fatal to us than any want of co-operation abroad, namely the perils arising out of popular opinion at home. The policy of non-intervention, to be successful, requires the exercise of strict impartiality between the two extreme principles of action that divide nations and governments abroad; but the opinion of the majority of Englishmen has almost always been on one side. Their opinion is controlled by two main sentiments, the love of freedom and national pride. Careless and generous, the average Englishman wishes all the world to enjoy the same well-being as himself, and as he is conscious that he derives much of this well-being from his constitutional government, and is vaguely aware that his ancestors obtained their freedom by fighting for it, he is always on the side of subjects who rise against their rulers. French revolutionists, Spanish juntas, Italian republicans, Hungarian rebels, Polish patriots, have at various times in the century roused the English people to break away from their policy of non-intervention, in the hope of transplanting their own sacred constitution on to foreign soil. Now it is plain that, though much of this desire is due to democratic sympathy, still more is due to national pride. It pleased the popular imagination to think of England as the leader of European freedom, and to hear of foreign nations adopting constitutional government, because the notion was English. And as the whole drift of the policy the people desired was guided by sentiment, as they were entirely ignorant of the circumstances to which the policy would have to be applied, they were frequently awakened to a sense of reality by the disastrous failure of their expectations, which, however, they were seldom just enough to ascribe to their own ignorance. The fallibility of that public opinion, which "Verax" desires to be our pilot in foreign affairs, might be illustrated by a hundred examples since 1832, but it will be quite sufficient for our purpose to recall some of its exhibitions during the Crimean War.

Remembering, then, that at that period we were about to take the field against the greatest aggressive power in Europe, which, ever since the days of Peter the Great, had pursued its object with rare steadiness and persistency, what, let us ask, was the temper in which the English constituencies, the masters of the English House of Commons, to which the English ministry was responsible, prepared for the conflict. The prince consort, with admirable humor, sketches the state of public opinion at the moment: —

Another mistake that people abroad make is to ascribe to England a policy based upon material interests and cold calculation. Her policy is one of pure feeling, and therefore often illogical. The government is a popular government, and the masses upon whom it rests only feel and do not think. In the present instance their feeling is something of this sort: "The emperor of Russia is a tyrant, the enemy of all liberty on the Continent, the oppressor of Poland. He wanted to coerce the poor Turk. The Turk is a fine fellow; he has braved the rascal; let us rush to his assistance. The emperor is no gentleman, as he has spoken a lie to our queen. Down with the emperor of Russia! Napoleon forever! He is the nephew of his uncle whom we defeated at Waterloo. We were afraid of his invading us? Quite the contrary! He has forgotten all that is past, and is ready to fight with us for the glorious cause against the oppressor of liberty. He may have played the French some tricks, but they are an unruly set, and don't deserve any better. D— all the German princes who won't go with us against the Russian, because they think they want him to keep down their own people. The worst of them is the king of Prussia, who ought to know better."

Such being the "policy" of the masses, how much wisdom was shown by their more educated representatives, who claim to give an intelligent reflection of public opinion? For instance, "The defeat of the Turks at Sinope on our own element had made the people furious;" and what was the opinion of the press? The sinking of the fleet was ascribed to the treachery of — the prince consort. In one journal he was pointed at as "the chief agent of the Austro-Belgian-Coburg-Orleans clique, the avowed enemies of England, and the subservient tools of Russian ambition." It was suggested that there was an influence "behind the throne." It was imputed to the prince as a crime that "he was occasionally present at interviews between the queen and her ministers, that the queen discussed political questions with him, and that these had weight in guiding and strengthening the opinions of her Majesty." Worked up by these tremendous revelations, the public reached such an exalted pitch of feel

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ing, that they positively believed the prince had been arrested for high treason, and assembled in thousands to see him committed to the Tower. It of course required nothing but the meeting of Parliament to expose all these absurdities, and to establish, on the authority of all the leading statesmen of the day, the perfectly constitutional character of the prince's relations with the queen. Opinion as usual veered completely round, and the very journals which had been most bitter in their attacks on Prince Albert were now most servile in their flattery of him.

If, again, we turn to the House of Commons of this period as the truest image of a self-governed nation, we shall be unable to conclude that the opinion of the majority is a safe basis of national security and independence. In its readiness to grant supplies, and its determination to uphold the honor of the country, Parliament showed indeed all its traditional energy and patriotism. But as a deliberative assembly, claiming control over the actions of the executive, it can scarcely be said to have added to its reputation. It would be no doubt unjust to reproach it with not having foreseen, what no man in England could foresee, the utter collapse of our military system in the Crimea, but it might have been expected that the announcement of our first disasters should have been borne with patience and dignity, and that Parliament would have had the sagacity to perceive the cause of failure, and to suggest a remedy. As a matter of fact, the House of Commons belied both these moderate expectations. It had voted supplies for the war with an intense and patriotic belief that the arms of England could accomplish whatever they were called upon to achieve, and in the reaction of disappointment it reflected the popular belief that treachery must have been at work to prevent its hopes from being realized. Les malheureux ont toujours tort, and instead of laying the blame where it was really due, on the system which had so long approved itself to our constitutional notions of government, Parliament was determined to visit its resentment on some human head connected with the executive. The victim it had selected was once again the prince consort. When Mr. Roebuck had obtained his committee of inquiry, he told the Duke of Newcastle that he expected to discover but little, since "in a high quarter there had been a determination that the expedition should not succeed, which had been suggested to headquarters." The duke said that he supposed Mr. Roebuck was alluding to himself. "Oh, no!" said the other, "I mean a much higher person than you; I mean Prince Albert." When the chief mover of an inquiry, which was clearly of an unconstitutional nature, was on such a hopelessly false scent, there is little cause for surprise that the committee should have labored without result.

But the most curious effects of popular opinion on the foreign policy of England are to be traced in its influence on those who wield the force of the nation, the responsible ministers of the crown. So long as affairs were directed by a ministry supported by the whole power of the crown, and answerable only to a House of Commons elected from the close boroughs, it was possible for men like Grenville and Castlereagh to hold a firm and consistent course. But, even before the reform of Parliament, opinion had become so overwhelmingly strong that it threatened to carry with it the rulers who sought to control it, and its power was the more felt in proportion as the foreign minister was a man of spirit and imagination. In such men the desire to utilize and direct the force which they were unable to resist became almost a passion. Canning was the first great English statesman who was exposed to the full strength of popular impulse. "Let us not deceive ourselves," writes M. Marcellus to Chateaubriand, "in regard to Mr. Canning. Still undecided, he is yet in suspense between the monarchical opinions, which have made his former renown, and the popular favor, which has recently borne him forwards to power; but as he attends above all to the echo of public opinion, and spreads his sails before the wind which blows it, it is easy to see to which side he will incline." This criticism, it is true, does not strike us as quite just. Canning was far too great a man ever to bow meekly before the popular will, but his imagination and his patriotism were equally strong, and he felt how vast a force was public opinion if directed towards a national end. We have seen him before holding to the principle of non-intervention when pressed to resist the French invasion of Spain in 1823; there can be no doubt that it was the fervor of his English feeling which prompted his misapplication of the principle in the case of the Spanish colonies, and inspired his famous declaration that "he had called a new world into existence to redress the balance of the old."

His mantle fell upon Lord Palmerston, a statesman in most respects un ike him

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

in character, but resembling him in the energy and intensity of his English feeling. Lord Palmerston first became foreign secretary during the agitation preceding the Reform Bill, and served in almost every ministry from that date to the time of his death. Floated into power on the great wave of popular opinion, which was then overspreading Europe, he had to apply the policy of non-intervention at a time when almost every nation was seized with a passion for adopting constitutional government. Europe was in the midst of the long peace, and peace was not the condition of things best suited to Lord Palmerston's genius.

A daring pilot in extremity,
Pleas'd with the danger, when the waves went high
He sought the storms; but, for a calm unfit,
Would steer too nigh the sands to boast his wit.

Over and over again he brought the nation into danger, and the crown into difficulties by the ardor with which he pushed his constitutional propaganda. In 1848 his lectures to the Spanish government were rejected by those to whom they were addressed, as "offensive to the dignity of a free and independent nation." In the same year he sanctioned the withdrawal of guns from the government stores for the purpose of sending them to the Sicilian insurgents. The insurrection failed, and "the English government" (we quote Mr. Martin) "was charged, not without some show of justice, with having encouraged the Sicilians to resistance, and then deserting them in their extremity. Yet neither the prime minister, nor the cabinet, nor of course the crown, were aware of the proceedings by which the popular foreign secretary had jeopardized the honor of his country." In 1850 the queen addressed a memorandum to Lord John Russell, in which she explained what she required of the foreign secretary. Her conditions were two: —

1. That the secretary shall distinctly state what he proposes in a given case, in order that the queen may know as distinctly to what she has given her royal sanction.

2. Having once given her sanction to a measure, that it be not arbitrarily altered or modified by the minister.

The spirit of these rules was distinctly violated by Lord Palmerston in 1851, when in conversation with the French ambassador in London he expressed his approbation of the coup d'état in Paris, after Lord Normanby, our ambassador in that city, had been instructed to do and say "nothing which could wear the appearance of an interference of any kind in the internal affairs of France." As is well known, this matter led to Lord Palmerston's dismissal from office. There can be no doubt that his system of constant interference in the affairs of foreign countries was not only a departure from our traditional policy, but a source of weakness to the country. Its effects are summed up in a remark of the late emperor of the French on hearing of Lord Palmerston's removal: "Autant qu'il était ministre l'Angleterre n'avait point d'alliés."

Unsuited as Lord Palmerston was to conduct the foreign affairs of England in time of peace, his energy, capacity, and popularity made him just the man to take the helm in the presence of danger and excitement. His predecessor, Lord Aberdeen, forms a singular contrast to him in this respect, and offers another striking example of the effects of public opinion on the position of the ministers of the crown in regard to foreign affairs. Without any of Lord Palmerston's vigor, Lord Aberdeen had more caution; he thoroughly understood the difficulties of our situation on the eve of the Crimean War, but he wanted clearness of understanding for making those warlike preparations beforehand which would have enabled him to preserve peace. The consequence was, that by his weakness he deceived the emperor Nicholas, and thus drifted into that war. He was altogether out of sympathy with the public; his feebleness and spirit of concession only aroused their indignation; they were utterly unable to appreciate the grounds of his caution, and he was equally incapable of understanding the source of their enthusiasm. On principle he allowed the necessity of the war, but he could never bring himself to share his countrymen's hostility to the nation which he regarded as an old friend and ally.

Lord Palmerston was able to bring the Crimean War to a triumphant conclusion because he had the confidence of the country, which was therefore disposed to leave him liberty of action. But before he assumed the lead, the winds and cross-currents of opinion had reduced the counsels of the nation to something like distraction. After the outburst of public indignation which followed the disclosure of the state of the army, just at the time when it was most necessary for the cabinet to hold loyally together, for the sake of the public interest and the honor of the sovereign,

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Lord John Russell chose to make himself the mouthpiece of popular discontent in the ministry, and to demand the resignation of the Duke of Newcastle. When his demand was refused, he acquiesced in the decision, but on Mr. Roebuck's motion for a select committee of inquiry he resigned, because, as he said, "he did not see how the motion was to be resisted." The motion was consequently carried by an enormous majority, and the spectacle was then presented to the world of the queen of England vainly endeavoring to find a body of gentlemen who would uphold the honor of their sovereign and the cause of their country in the hour of difficulty. Lord Derby failed to form a ministry because he could not obtain the promise of sufficient support; Lord John Russell, because after his recent conduct his old colleagues refused to serve with him; Lord Lansdowne declined office on account of his age and infirmities; and even Lord Palmerston had the greatest difficulty in securing the co-operation of the Peelites. Nor were his troubles at an end after his government had been formed, for the Peelites soon resigned, and he had presently to resist the attacks of one who, in his capacity of chancellor of the exchequer, had proposed a war budget, but who had now, in the moment of need and pressure, deserted into the ranks of the party for peace at any price. We quote Lord Palmerston's remarks on this occasion, not only because we consider them entirely just as directed against Mr. Gladstone, but also because they aptly illustrate the dangers to which constitutional governments are exposed from statesmen who leave the anchorage of principle to drift on the tides of opinion and circumstance.

Sir, there must indeed be grave reasons which could induce a man who had been a party with her Majesty's government to that line of policy, who had assisted in conducting the war; who had, after full and perhaps unexampled deliberation, agreed to enter upon the war; who, having concurred after that full and mature deliberation in the commencement of the war, had also joined in calling upon the country for great sacrifices in order to continue it, and who had, up to a very recent period, assented to all the measures proposed for its continuance; I say there must indeed be grave reasons which could induce a man who had been so far a party in the measures of the government utterly to change his opinions; to declare this war utterly unnecessary, unjust, and impolitic; to set before the country all the imaginary disasters with which his fancy could supply him, and to magnify and exaggerate the forces of the enemy and the difficulties of our position.

If with such dissensions in cabinets, jealousies between individual ministers, confusion in Parliament, and ignorance among the masses, the direction of England's affairs abroad had been left, as "Verax" wishes, altogether in the hands of men "delegated by the people to do the work," it is more than probable that we should have come out of the Crimean War defeated and dishonored. Fortunately there was one part of the constitution, raised alike above the passions of party and the fluctuations of opinion, which was able to impress on our foreign policy the image of its own firmness and unity of purpose. History will record that many of the advantages secured to Europe, and much of the glory accruing to England from the Treaty of Paris, are due to the exertions of the English crown. Though neither the queen nor her husband appeared prominently before the public, there was scarcely an idea connected with the design and general scope of the campaign which did not originate in some royal suggestion. How clearly the prince consort understood the traditional principle of English policy which was involved in the war, may be seen from his "Memorandum," dated October 21st, 1853:—

It will be said that England and Europe have a strong interest, setting aside all Turkish considerations, that Constantinople and the Turkish territory should not fall into the hands of Russia, and that they should in the last extremity even go to war to prevent such an overthrow of the balance of power. This must be admitted, and such a war may be right and wise. But this would be a war not for the maintenance of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, but merely for the interests of the European powers of civilization. It ought to be carried on unshackled by obligations to the Porte, and will probably lead in the peace, which must be the object of that war, to the obtaining of arrangements more consonant with the well-understood interests of Europe, of Christianity, liberty, and civilization, than the re-imposition of the ignorant barbarian and despotic yoke of the Mussulman over the most fertile and favored portion of Europe.

The double purpose implied in this memorandum, of restraining the ambition of Russia and securing the better government of the subject races of Turkey, did not commend itself to Lord Palmerston, whose nature always prompted him to a strong and one-sided policy. Nor was it effectually achieved by the Treaty of Paris, the course of events having made it almost necessary in pursuance of English policy to leave the sultan independence of action within his own dominions. But the wisdom and foresight of the views thus expressed have been sufficiently proved by the too plausible pretexts which Russian craft has been able to weave out of the persistency of Turkish misgovernment.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

From war in the last resort it would have been impolitic and dishonorable of England to have shrunk. But before committing her country to so bloody an arbitrament, the queen used all her personal influence to prevail over the purpose of the czar, and to bring the pressure of a European concert to compel him to relinquish his designs. He had appealed to her by letter against the policy of her ministers, and she answered him firmly and courteously, upholding that policy. Austria and Prussia admitted the iniquity of the Russian aggression, but they were restrained by their mutual jealousies from opposing it. The king of Prussia wrote to the queen a letter excusing his inaction, and advancing much the same plea for his "industrious Rhinelanders" as has lately been employed on behalf of "the Pomeranian ploughman." The queen's reply was worthy of the country that had stood the chief brunt of war against Napoleon: —

When your Majesty tells me that "you are now determined to assume an attitude of complete neutrality," . . . I do not understand you. Had such language fallen from the king of Hanover or of Saxony I could have understood it. But up to the present time I have regarded Prussia as one of the five great powers which since the peace of 1815 have been the guarantors of treaties, the guardians of civilization, the champions of right and ultimate arbitrators of the nations; and I have for my part felt the holy duty to which they were thus divinely called, being at the same time perfectly alive to the obligations, various as these are and fraught with danger, which it imposes. Renounce these obligations, my dear brother, and in doing so you renounce for Prussia the status she has hitherto held. And if the example thus set should find imitators, European civilization is abandoned as a plaything for the winds; right will no longer find a champion, nor the oppressed an umpire to appeal to.

On the other hand, her Majesty displayed the most skilful tact in cementing our alliance with the parvenu emperor of the French, who was himself rejoiced at being able to strengthen his position by his intimacy with the occupant of so old and venerable a throne as that of England. And when once war became inevitable, she endeavored to compensate for the coldness of her first minister by the heartiness with which she identified herself with the national sentiment. Lord Aberdeen, in a reply to Lord Lyndhurst's memorable speech of June 19, 1854, had been betrayed into what appeared like a defence of Russia, and the queen, well understanding the unseasonableness of such an utterance, wrote to him in consequence as follows: —

The qualities in Lord Aberdeen's character which the queen values most highly, his candor and his courage in expressing opinions, even if opposed to general feelings at the moment, are in this instance dangerous to him, and the queen hopes that in the vindication of his own conduct to-day — which ought to be triumphant, as it wants in fact no vindication — he will not undertake the ungrateful and injurious task of vindicating the emperor of Russia from any of the exaggerated charges brought against him and his policy, at a time when there is enough in that policy to make us fight with all our might against it.

Yet in the midst of the difficulties to which Lord Aberdeen was afterwards exposed from the indignation of the people and the defections of his colleagues, the queen stood by him, and to testify her respect for his loyalty and sincerity, offered him the Order of the Garter, expressed to him at the same time "how deeply she was impressed by the admirable temper, forbearance, and firmness with which Lord Aberdeen had conducted the whole of a very difficult and annoying transaction."

To the prince consort's sagacity was due the plan of weekly reports from the Crimea by means of tabular returns, which did so much towards remedying the disasters caused by the first collapse of our military administration. The prince also furnished a memorandum on army organization, as to the merits of which it will be sufficient to quote the opinion of General Hamley, that "it has been the aim of military reformers since to embody all its suggestions, and that all have been put in practice with the exception of certain points of detail with which the memorandum either does not deal at all, or only imperfectly." Indeed, in every department connected with the army, the prince's anxiety for the success of the expedition was visible. "If," said the Duke of Newcastle, in reply to Mr. Roebuck's insinuations, "during the time of my official duties I have received any suggestions which were more valuable to me than others, they did not come from your friends the Napiers, but from Prince Albert."

Thus both in its capacity as sovereign

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

of the nation, as chief of the great council of the kingdom, and as the commander of the army, the personal influence of the crown made itself beneficially felt. It was more touchingly manifested in the exercise of its functions as the fountain of honor. Let those who think that all feudal feeling is extinct in England read the following extract from a letter of the queen to the king of the Belgians: —

> Ernest will have told you what a beautiful and touching sight and ceremory (the first of the kind ever witnessed in England) the distribution of the medals was. From the highest prince of the blood to the lowest private, all received the same distinction for the bravest conduct in the severest actions, and the rough hand of the brave and honest private soldier came for the first time in contact with that of their sovereign and their queen. Noble fellows! I own I feel as if they were my own children — my heart beats for them as for my nearest and dearest! They were so touched, so pleased — many, I hear, cried; and they won't hear of giving up their medals to have their names engraved upon them for fear that they should not receive the identical ones put into their hands by me!

Mr. Martin's third volume brings his biography of the prince consort down to within a few years of his death. Looking back over the exciting period of European history which has passed since that event, and reflecting on their own present circumstances, the people of England, when they close his book, will be conscious of two prevailing sentiments. They will, in the first place, feel a deep and respectful sympathy with their sovereign who, for the last seventeen years, has had to meet the increasing perils and difficulties by which her empire is surrounded, unassisted by the calm judgment which encouraged and advised her in the earlier portion of her reign. And in the second place, when they recall the suspicions and imputations to which the prince was exposed from popular passion and prejudice, at the very moments when he was laboring most indefatigably for the good of his adopted country, they will be sensible of the irreparable loss they have incurred themselves.

> Virtutem incolumen odimus,
> Sublatam ex oculis quærimus invidi.

Since the death of the prince consort, the whole aspect of affairs on the Continent has altered, and strange modifications have consequently been introduced into our foreign policy. Repressed for a moment in 1815, the great wave of democracy gathered fresh force during the long peace between that date and 1848, when it returned and dashed with irresistible force against every throne in Europe. That epoch may be said to have been the carnival of opinion. Doctrinaire statesmen, philosophical poets, scientific historians, and political economists, united their efforts against the powers of Catholicism and feudalism. The principles of liberty and equality were assumed as axiomatic by all who desired a reputation for wisdom and virtue. Opinion was everywhere hailed as the great nostrum which was to liberate and purify mankind; and each saw in his own particular opinion the image of the perfection towards which he asserted humanity to be travelling. All over Europe there was a passion for the establishment of equal rights and free institutions. But how was this ideal of liberty and equality, so passionately longed for, pursued? Not by means of opinion, but of force; not by legality, but by revolution and war. To destroy the strongholds of absolutism and to achieve national independence, all the local, traditional, and hereditary ties that gave variety and color to the smaller societies of Europe were remorselessly swept away. The end may have been worth the price, but the price was great, nor was the state of things actually realized in the least like what had been dreamed by the philosophers. The individual equality secured by the demolition of ranks and traditions formed a basis, not for constitutional liberty, but for European war.

Scarcely had the mutual congratulations between the nations, occasioned by the Great Exhibition of 1851, ceased, when war broke out between Russia and England and France. The Treaty of Paris had only been signed three years when the battles of Solferino and Magenta deprived Austria of a large portion of her Italian dominions. Within almost an equally short period, Austria and Prussia made their joint attack on Denmark; and the very next year Austria was excluded from the German Confederation and was forced to surrender Venice in consequence of her disastrous defeat at Sadowa. In 1870 occurred the still more terrible conflict between France and Germany, since which time every great nation in Europe, with the exception of England, has been a vast armed camp. And this state of things, so far from being temporary, appears to us to be the natural consequence of the application of the principle of equality. Individual aspirations liberated by the destruction of local rights gravitated to a single centre, and the unity of each

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

nation was represented solely by its military force. Instead of wars between rival monarchs, whose ambition was checked by personal fear or prudence, wars now arose between nation and nation, and race and race, and were liable to be as general in their extension as they were capricious in their cause.

But while force was thus reaping the fruits of opinion on the Continent, the power of opinion in England continued to expand and increase. After the Crimean War, the repeal of the duty on paper enormously increased the number and circulation of the daily journals; the influence of the moneyed classes, always the most powerful in forming opinion, was continually growing; and though during the lifetime of Lord Palmerston reform was practically shelved, his death was a signal to both parties to bid for power by a wide extension of the franchise. The influences of this vast collective mass of moving opinion were seen in the domestic legislation of the Gladstone ministry in their term of power after 1868.

A passion for reform had seized upon the public mind. There was not an interest in the country that was not attacked, not an institution that was not put upon its trial, not an endowment that was not threatened by popular opinion. The love of analysis manifested itself in our art and letters. Poets and men of literary taste turned philosophers, and amused the imagination of the people with speculative and religious paradox. Meantime the wealth of the country was advancing, as Mr. Gladstone said, with "leaps and bounds," and this, being coincident with the great development of opinion and self-government, confirmed the nation in the belief that it was on the high road to the millennium. The genius of England had, in short, become completely introspective.

Such a state of things had of course a powerful influence on the course of our foreign policy. After the revolutionary era closed in 1848, the just application of the principle of non intervention became more difficult than ever. There was now no longer any temptation to interfere, as Lord Palmerston had so frequently done, on behalf of nations struggling for free institutions. The peoples had won the day against their rulers, in fact, if not in appearance: all government on the Continent had henceforth a basis more or less democratic, and all wars a more or less popular origin. The democratic motives of these wars took from them the appearance of aggression, and consequently prevented England, even where, as in the war of Denmark with the German powers, her sympathies were strongly enlisted, from interfering in behalf of European right. Her policy of non-intervention grew, therefore, into a confirmed habit of abstention from Continental quarrels. Absorbed in domestic legislation, the people of England began to regard all affairs outside their own island with a merely scenic interest. They read the foreign correspondence with which their daily press so ably supplied them, with the same kind of zest as they devoured the last new novel or rushed to look at the last new rope-dancer. Their attitude to the world was like that of the gods of Epicurus, so finely described by the poet: —

For they lie beside their nectar, and the bolts are hurled
Far below them in the valleys, and the clouds are lightly curled
Round their golden houses, girdled with the gleaming world;
Where they smile in secret, looking over wasted lands,
Blight and famine, plague and earthquake, roaring deeps and fiery sands,
Clanging fights, and flaming towns, and sinking ships, and praying hands.

Wide as these lotus-bred notions had spread, there was something startling, even to those who indulged in them, in the uncompromising terms in which they were expressed, during the heat of the war between France and Germany, by the Edinburgh Review of October 1870: —

Happy England! [exclaimed the reviewer in a patriotic transport]. Happy, not because any Immaculate Conception exempted her from that original sin of nations, the desire to erect will into right, and the lust of territorial aggrandizement. Happy, not only because she is felix proles virûm, because this united kingdom is peopled by a race unsurpassed as a whole in its energies and endowments; but happy, with a special reference to the present subject, in this, that the wise dispensation of Providence has cut her off by that streak of silver sea which passengers so often and so justly execrate, though in no way from the duties and honors, yet partly from the dangers, absolutely from the temptations, which attend upon the local neighborhood of the Continental nations.

And the conclusion of the whole matter was: —

One accomplishment yet remains needful to enable us to hold without envy our free and eminent position. It is that we should do as we should be done by; that we should seek to found a moral empire upon the confidence of

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the nations, not upon their fears, their passions, or their antipathies. Certain it is that a new law of nations is gradually taking hold of the mind, and coming to sway the practice of the world; a law which recognizes independence, which frowns upon aggression, which favors the pacific, not the bloody settlement of disputes, which aims at permanent, not temporary adjustments; above all, which recognizes as a tribunal of paramount authority the general judgment of civilized mankind.

Such, with the recollection of four bloody wars within his experience, with the spectacle of two of the greatest nations in Europe engaged in a struggle for life and death almost before his eyes, such was, in 1870, the view of England's foreign policy as expressed — so it is universally believed — by her prime minister! The force of opinion "could no further go." Nor was it long before Mr. Gladstone had an opportunity for reducing these opinions to practice. Scarcely had the siege of Paris ended, when a stern voice was heard from the north demanding the excision from the Treaty of 1856 of all the clauses relating to the neutralization of the Black Sea. What followed is remembered by Englishmen too plainly to need repetition. But we had still another cheek to turn to the smiter. Our shrewd transatlantic kinsfolk saw their opportunity of driving a good bargain with the nation which had propounded the new political morality. The Geneva arbitration on the "Alabama" claims was arranged, and by "a tribunal of paramount authority representing the general judgment of the civilized world," we were fined to the amount of 3,000,000*l.* for observing the conditions of our own municipal law.

These experiences of real life acted like the healthy shock of a shower-bath on the over-excited condition of public opinion, and the elections of 1874 showed very clearly that "Philip had become sober." But another and still more severe experience was required before the nation could be completely cured of the ideology which had so inveterately infected it. Of all questions of foreign policy the one with which public opinion was least qualified to deal was the Eastern question, for this was essentially two-sided, and public opinion can never fix itself on more than one thing at a time. The prince consort had shown his sagacity by divining — as we have shown in our extract from his memorandum — that the object of the Crimean War was not primarily the indedendence and integrity of the Turkish empire, but the restriction of Russian ambition and the amelioration of the condition of the Christian subjects of Turkey. Neither of these objects was completely attained by the Treaty of Paris. The former was indeed apparently secured by the prince consort's ingenious device of the diplomatic guarantee, and the latter by the firman which the Porte granted to all its subjects, without distinction. And it may well be doubted, looking to the disposition of the German powers, and to England's essential principle of non-intervention in the internal affairs of other States, if greater results were possible. But the diplomatic guarantee only bound the powers to collective action in defence of Turkey; and the disclaimer of the right to interfere within the sultan's dominions made it impossible to urge the execution of the promised reforms by anything more effectual than diplomatic pressure.

In the summer of 1875 an insurrection, very obscure in its origin, broke out in the Herzegovina. It was followed at first with but languid interest by the English public; but the interest deepened when Servia joined the quarrel. Opinion became at once divided; the majority favoring the Turk for the sake of old associations, the Liberal minority siding, as usual, with the insurgent nationalities. But there was nothing like a stir of national sentiment till, in consequence of the request of Sir H. Elliott, the British fleet moved to Besika Bay. The object of the movement was suspected by both parties to be different from what it was asserted to be and what it really was. Even then, however, there was no passionate outburst of opinion from the Liberal party. This was reserved for the moment when the Bulgarian atrocities were first announced in the columns of a morning paper. Then was seen the enormous power which the telegraph and the press exert over all governments. Maddened by the horrors emulously portrayed to their imagination by the vivid word-painting of the newspaper correspondents, the feelings of the people broke beyond all bounds. Henceforth men could think, dream, and speak of nothing but atrocities; the Bulgarian massacre absorbed their minds and appeared to them the only basis on which to found a foreign policy. The electric current passed over the kingdom. Mayor after mayor called public meetings, which in their proceedings bore a strong resemblance to that famous assembly of which "the more part knew not wherefore they were come together," and which "cried out for the space of two hours, 'Great is

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Diana of the Ephesians!'" And, as if it was the business of statesmen to add fuel to the popular flame, the ex-premier, when the agitation had reached its height, wrote a pamphlet on "Bulgarian Horrors," in which the quondam apostle of complete "abstention" proposed to turn the Mussulman power "bag and baggage" out of Europe. Throughout the country, poets, historians, professors, High Churchmen and Dissenters, appeared on public platforms, denouncing with equal vigor the "unspeakable" Turk and the bloodthirsty premier.

Meantime the great autocratic power, representing force in Europe, showed that it understood perfectly well how to take advantage of this paroxysm of opinion. Russia had avoided the error she had committed in 1853 of showing her hand too soon, and during the early stages of the insurrection had kept herself well in the background. More than suspected of having fomented the rising in the Slav provinces, and of having suggested to the Porte the military arrangements which occasioned the Bulgarian massacre, she had observed a studious moderation till she perceived that she might safely appear in the character she had designed. Then, with the applause of a great section of the English public, and urged on, as she said, by the feeling of her own subjects, she stood forth, like another Ferdinand of Aragon, as the protector of the Christians against their Mussulman oppressors. Like a threatening cloud the vast armies she had mobilized hung over the conference at which the plenipotentiaries of the powers met to discuss the affairs of Turkey. When the conference broke up without result, in consequence of the refusal of the Turks to submit to what they considered a violation of their independence, Russia assumed the rôle of armed delegate of Europe, and declared war against Turkey. Beaten back at first in Armenia, and checked by the gallant defence of Plevna, the Russians held to their object with all their national tenacity; Kars was taken; Plevna capitulated; and, while English Liberals were still speaking of the "divine figure from the north," the English people were suddenly awakened to a real sense of their situation by the rapid march of the Muscovite army across the Balkans, and by the appearance of the vanguard before the walls of Constantinople.

Beati possidentes! The success of Russia has been due to the rare mixture of astuteness, dissimulation, and daring with which, as the possessor of autocratic force, she has been able to direct her policy. We altogether dissent from those omniscient guides of opinion, who have recently taken advantage of the strength they derive from having consistently opposed Russia, to pour the most rancorous abuse on their own government as the author of the difficulties in which we find ourselves. Let us at any rate be just even if we are angry. Our difficulties are due not to the ministry, but to ourselves. As a people taking pride in governing itself, the English nation has not thought fit to leave its rulers full liberty of choice in the direction of its foreign affairs. From the commencement of the insurrection down to the period of the Bulgarian massacres, the ministry had guided their policy by a strict observance of the Treaty of Paris and the traditional principle of non-intervention. They had acceded reluctantly, and only at the request of the Porte, to the Andrassy Note, and they refused to be parties to the Berlin Memorandum, because these measures appeared to them infringements of the ninth article of the treaty, which prohibits any interference on the part of the guaranteeing powers with the internal administration of Turkey. Up to this point their hands had been free, and had the Bulgarian episode not occurred, we do not doubt that any appearance of aggression on the part of Russia would have provoked the same kind of spirit in the country as has been lately manifested. In that case we should certainly not have gone to the conference at Constantinople till Russia had demobilized her army. But after the outburst of popular passion following the massacres, after the refusal of the Turks to accept the proposals of the conference, formed on the basis we had proposed ourselves, the only policy open to a ministry acting on the principle of non-intervention was conditional neutrality. Such a policy was obviously attended with the gravest dangers; some of the incidents in its execution have borne an appearance of weakness and indecision; but, on the whole, we ought to admit that under conditions of unexampled difficulty the ministry have done their duty steadily and manfully, and have deserved well of the country. The weaknesses of our policy are inseparable from our constitutional system, and if we are manly enough to understand the value of that system, instead of crying out against a ministry whose action we have hampered, we shall try to learn the lesson that our present circumstances teach us.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

This lesson will be by no means the one which "Verax" is anxious to inculcate. We have dwelt at length on the principles underlying constitutional government in general, and on the historical development of our own constitution in particular, because we think that the evidence shows very conclusively that the English constitution has nothing of the fixed character of, for instance, that of the United States. "Verax," it appears to us, is a political Rip van Winkle. His arguments are applicable to the state of things existing in the reign of George III., but not to the circumstances of the reign of Queen Victoria. When the nation in 1832 asserted its capacity to govern itself, it obviously occupied a very different position, relatively to the crown, from the state of pupilage in which it existed when the Whig aristocracy was defending its rights against the encroachments of the royal prerogative. What then does "Verax" mean by saying that, if the nation finds that the sovereign plays any part more active than that of a royal dummy, "danger commences for one party, though hardly for both"? If the danger is to the crown, does he find that his countrymen generally are murmuring at the revelations of "personal rule" made by the "Life of the Prince Consort"? But if he thinks it is the people whose security is imperilled, then "Verax" must choose between one of two alternatives; either the nation, by asserting its qualifications to govern itself, has proclaimed its ability to protect itself against the royal prerogative, or else it is so open to the influence at the disposal of the crown that it is not qualified for self-government. Now, we do not think that the latter of these conclusions is warranted. The course of our argument has gone to show that the centre of gravity in our constitution has at different periods oscillated perilously between the opposing poles of force and opinion. We have seen it under the Stuarts travelling too far in the direction of force; we have seen it of late recoiling equally overmuch to the side of opinion. Is it not possible that now, when the crown has been restored to its old unity with the people, we may be entering on a period when force and opinion will be able to resettle themselves in a just equilibrium?

To decide on this point, let us try to see distinctly how we stand; and first, with regard to the state of parties. "Party," says Burke, "is a body of men united for promoting by their joint endeavor the national interest upon some particular principle on which they are all agreed." How far is this condition fulfilled at the present moment by the party that calls itself Liberal? Let us assume, for the sake of argument, that the principle of numerical representation is developed to its logical extreme by the passing of a bill for the assimilation of the borough and county franchise. What would the party we are speaking of agree to do next. Mr. Chamberlain leads off glibly enough with a fine cry of "Free Church! Free Schools! Free Land!" But he is met by a soft murmur of deprecation from Mr. Bright, "Pray let us have no programme! The true Liberal frame of mind, manifested in speeches for peace at any price, and recollections of the Anti-Corn-Law League, is what we want." Mr. Goldwin Smith, however, dashes to the front, and, after administering some hearty cuffs to the "Whig oligarchy," suggests to them that they had better fall in with the earnest Radicals and pass the word for "Liberty and Nonconformity!" But he is immediately reminded by Mr. Matthew Arnold, with his usual urbanity, that he is a "political Puritan," and that "one of the great obstacles to our civilization is British Nonconformity and the other British aristocracy." Turning then to Lord Hartington, Mr. Arnold proposes to him to address his Scotch audience as follows: "The cause of your being ill at ease is not what you suppose. The cause of your being ill at ease is the profound imperfectness of your social civilization. Your social civilization is indeed such as I forbear to characterize. But the remedy is not disestablishment. The remedy is social equality. Let me turn your attention to a reform in the law of bequest and entail."* Such an address, he says, would doubtless be received with laughter; but he advises us to think over it. And for our part we should be exceedingly glad to know the character of Lord Hartington's reflections on the interesting suggestion which Mr. Arnold has put into his mouth.

We are disposed to make every allowance for the difficult position in which our Liberal friends are placed. They have to contrive some course of action which may preserve union among themselves, and please the imagination of the majority of their countrymen. And it is by no means easy to fascinate the fancy of Englishmen with any ideal which does not promise a practical increase in the amount of well-being of which they know themselves to

* LIVING AGE, No. 1765.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

be possessed; nor, even if promises attract them, are they inclined to take them on trust. They know and value the benefits which they have derived from their ancient liberty, but they doubt if they will increase these by entering on a course of destruction with Mr. Smith and Mr. Chamberlain. No doubt the prospect of an increase of religious life in the nation is a desirable end to be achieved, but will it be achieved by disestablishment? We suspect that the more serious-minded of the non-political Dissenters, who turn their eyes to the present condition of the Irish Church, will have some hesitation in affirming that all the spiritual results which were prophesied have followed the disestablishment and disendowment of that institution. We doubt, too, whether High Churchmen, when they look to the same quarter, however much they may complain of the oppression of courts of law, will be inclined to support Mr. Chamberlain in his demand for a free Church. Nor will there be many to agree with our English Quesnay in his refined distaste for inequality. We are all of us "ill at ease;" but most of us are shrewd enough to know that the cause of our being so is not "the profound imperfectness of our social civilization," but the radical imperfection of our own nature. While we agree with Mr. Arnold in thinking that this will not be cured by disestablishment, we are equally sure that the remedy is not to be found in "social equality;" and we believe that most Englishmen who desire relief will seek it not in the maxims of Menander, but in the consolations administered for more than eighteen hundred years by the religion which Mr. Arnold has lately taken under his special patronage and protection.

Now if new party lines cannot be constituted, it is certain that the old will be abused. Already we see attempts being made to disguise the absence of genuine party differences in the constituencies by the mechanical operations of the American "caucus." Inside the House of Commons the measures of government are exposed to the criticisms of half-a-dozen separate and irresponsible oppositions. By one of these, consisting of some five or six members, the venerable forms of the House, the heritage of times when the Commons had good reasons for protecting the liberties of the minority, are used for the complete stoppage of public business. On the other side the irresponsible supporters of the ministry, conscious of the strength which their leaders derive from their serried phalanx, seek to share in the enjoyment of power by bringing the executive more and more under their influence. The whole House groans under the weight of the duties with which it has charged itself since it abandoned its old functions of control to take the initiative in legislation. At one time transformed into a debating-society, at another into a vestry, it becomes every year more incapable of accomplishing the tasks which its ambition has undertaken. Meantime the imperial business which calls for despatch is vast and various. At home the nation has to encounter great and increasing difficulties, connected with the population crowded in its ever-growing cities; it has to purify and ennoble the public taste, by making the architecture of the State worthy of the State's imperial character; to purge the rivers of the acids by which they are poisoned; and as far as possible to preserve the features of its once beautiful country from the plague of smoke by which they are disfigured. Greater still are its responsibilities abroad. For the first time in the history of the world a free nation finds itself the master of a mighty empire. It extends its sway over a hundred self-governed colonies. It has assumed directly the government of two hundred millions of men originally subdued by the private enterprise of its own sons. How can these great matters, in which the whole unity of the nation is involved, be settled by the distractions of party government? What hope is there of Parliament dealing with them successfully, unless it falls into its proper place as part of the grand council of the realm?

When the Romans had acquired empire, and found that their old constitutional machinery was inadequate to the administration of their affairs, they deliberately chose to retain empire at the cost of liberty. Such would not be the choice of the English, even if the choice were forced upon them. But if they are the true children of their fathers, Englishmen will show that they know how to maintain both liberty and empire by placing full confidence in their sovereign. Our empire rests upon opinion, and the crown is the centre to which all sound opinion, independently of party, should gravitate. Her Majesty and all the members of the royal family have shown how clearly they understand that the interests of the crown and the nation are identical; and, in the opportunities of collecting, centralizing, and directing opinion, it is plain that no influence can compare with that of the monarch. We ought not to refuse to con-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

template possibilities because they seem to be remote. Let us suppose that parties disappeared, and Parliament, once more deliberately confining itself to its old office of control, left all initiative in the hands of the executive. What obstacle would be thereby opposed to rising energy and ambition? Honor and place would still be open to all who distinguished themselves in council. Ministers no doubt would be selected more at the discretion of the sovereign, and, though they would still be responsible to the people, they would cease to be what they now tend to become, its creatures. If it be said that such a constitutional balance would be dangerous to freedom, we answer that, even if it were, it is the natural consequence of self-government under the English constitution, and therefore a contingency that freedom must be prepared to face. But the supposed danger is a phantom, arising out of recollections of days when the crown wielded almost absolute power, whereas the crown has now no solid support but opinion; and if a monarch should ever be blind enough to mistake his interest, and bold enough to encroach on his subjects' liberties by force, it is incredible that in a people accustomed to centuries of freedom, there should not be sufficient means of self-defence. Our true defence against over-centralization lies in our habits of municipal independence. The policy of conservatism is plain. It is to localize whatever of our interests is domestic, and to centralize whatever is imperial.

And this policy of conservatism will be forced more and more on all who value the independence of their country, in consequence of the nature of our foreign relations. If England were the only country in the world, we might try experiments on our constitution, without fear of any consequences but such as would arise from internal revolution. Or again, if the nations of Europe were all living like ourselves under free constitutions, we might trust to the amiability and good nature of our neighbors rather to pity our distractions than to take advantage of our weakness. But it is very evident that if "that tribunal of paramount authority, the general judgment of civilized mankind," ever had any jurisdiction, it is not disposed to exercise it at the present moment. We are living among nations who have resorted to "the good old plan" of exacting territory from the conquered; among statesmen who have ratified the Bismarck-Benedetti compact; among autocrats who have scattered to the winds the fragments of the Treaty of Paris. If England is the "sick woman" that Prince Bismarck is said to consider her, she will scarcely be able to maintain, by moral opinion alone, her own vast empire, much less the liberties of her allies against her exceedingly unsentimental neighbors. All the clearness of head and all the force of arm that she can command will have to be employed in self-defence. "Gentlemen," as the prince consort said at a dinner at the Trinity House in 1856, "constitutional government is under a heavy trial, and can only pass triumphantly through it if the country will grant its confidence to her Majesty's government. Without this all their labors must be in vain."

But if her Majesty's government is to be trusted, it must show itself courageous and independent; it must show that it understands the English people too well to be afraid of them. About eighteen months ago Lord Derby, addressing one of the numerous deputations which beset him at the time of the great anti-Mussulman agitation, asked its leaders what policy they wished him to adopt, adding that he was most anxious to meet "the wishes of his employers." We thought at the time, and we still think, that his lordship considered that a body of Englishmen, coming to him in a state of mental exaltation, could be most appropriately received with a vein of pleasantry. But as we see that a great many people have taken his words seriously, we desire to record our hearty protest against the unconstitutional principle implied in the speech as reported. Lord Derby must be perfectly well aware that he is the servant, not of the people, but of the crown. He is responsible to the people for his conduct of affairs; whereas, if his words were to be taken seriously, his responsibility would obviously cease. If he were what "Verax" wishes him to be, the mere delegate of popular opinion, appointed to carry out the policy which the public desires, whatever ruin or disgrace might result from that policy, no single person could be made answerable for it. For our part we believe that had Lord Derby — knowing, as he did, the situation of affairs far more intimately than any one of his irresponsible advisers, and possessing, as he did, the alternative of resignation — consented to become the instrument of Mr. Gladstone's "bag and baggage" policy, he would have been guilty of a gross dereliction of duty.

If the Englishman, as reflected in his constitution, has a special weakness, it is,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

to speak metaphorically, this, that he has a little too much blood. From this fulness arise his vast animal spirits, and the vigor and vitality he shows in the pursuit of his objects; but to this also are due the suffusions of blood to his head, the vertigo and faintness which occasionally overpower him, and expose him to the attacks of his watchful enemies. At moments when it is of the most vital importance for him to keep his brain cool and his arm steady, he is apt to be carried away by a rush of opinion, which deprives him of all sense of justice and wisdom. The impatience of the people, the suspicions of Parliament, and the dissensions of ministries, bewildered our policy during the time of the Crimean War. A madness, that can only be paralleled by that of the Athenians after the revolt of Mitylene, paralyzed our action at the outset of our present difficulties; and now that our eyes are again open, the wild projects that were started on the eve of the Crimean War for the reconstruction of Poland or the conquest of Finland, find a counterpart in schemes ranging through all degrees of protection or partition of Turkey; while the government is as frantically abused for its caution by its supporters, as a short time ago it was assailed for its aggressiveness by its opponents. Words of true wisdom were addressed to the House of Commons during the debate on the vote of supply by the Radical member for Newcastle. Repudiating Mr. Gladstone's charge that he desired to let government have "exclusive and uncontrolled authority over foreign affairs," Mr. Cowen said:—

> My declaration was that we might discuss domestic affairs; yet, when national interests are at stake and national existence might be in peril, we ought to bridge our differences, forget that we were Whigs, Tories, and Radicals, and remember only that we were Englishmen. We may settle the general principles of our action, whether, for instance, this country is to have a monarchy in one State, whether we should overpower a republic in another, whether we were to be active partisans in the strife or be neutral—these were questions which must be settled by the people and the nation; but, the principle being conceded and the policy being agreed on, its execution must be left to the executive.

We have endeavored to indicate the main principles of the policy of "non-intervention," from the time of its enunciation by Lord Grenville down to the present day; we have shown the difficulty our statesmen have always found in applying those principles to our foreign relations generally, and we have illustrated the twofold difficulty they have experienced in applying them to the Eastern question in particular. These principles are as binding on us now as ever, but what private person is in a position to say how they ought to be applied, to understand the exact point at which the interests of England are touched, either by aggression on English rights, or on the rights of others no less essential than our own to the maintenance of European law? There is only one quarter in which the knowledge exists, in which the unity and continuity of England's policy is kept ever clearly in view apart from the illusions of party warfare. That quarter is the crown, represented by the ministry. There is only one member of the nation on whom the foreign relations of the country in respect of its honor and majesty bear with an immediate and personal effect. That member is the queen.

Those who read this article attentively will not accuse us of undervaluing constitutional government. We love the constitution because we believe that no form of government that has ever existed has given such scope to freedom, honor, and good manners. And we believe too in the people, so long as it fulfils its proper function of supplying the spirit and energy that support the head which thinks and the arm which strikes; we know the courage, the tenacity, and the patriotism rising out of that fulness of blood which we have spoken of before, and which are alluded to in the following observations of the prince consort:—

> In regard to the reproaches cast upon England from so many quarters for her narrowness of heart and short-sightedness—that it ought to have been foreseen that the Greeks would rise, that the Turkish supremacy cannot be upheld, and that the fanatic Osmanlis would rather come to terms with Russia than be forced to admit Christians to an equal footing with the Turks—that she should therefore have rather looked calmly on at the overthrow of the Turkish Empire by Russia with the view of thereupon taking so energetic a part in the European solution of the hereditary question that this overthrow could not have resulted to the advantage of Russia—I have merely to reply that we did foresee all this very distinctly, but that a popular government cannot carry on a policy which has apparent contradictions within itself, and one portion of which is to receive its complement from another at a distant stage. The overthrow of Turkey by Russia no English statesman could contemplate with equanimity; public opinion would have flung him to the winds like chaff, and no reliance could be placed on

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

such far-seeing, long-calculated, two-sided policy, with changes of ministry and Parliamentary majorities at home, and more especially with combinations on the Continent in which no confidence could be placed. We must live from day to day, but while we cleave as best we can to the self-consistent and impregnable principle of justice, I feel confident that, whatever phases may present themselves, we shall not on the whole fail to deal with them wisely.

There is a royal spirit in these last words. They show the complete understanding that the queen and her husband possessed of the temper of the English people. The whole of the passage we have quoted might be applied to our present circumstances. It is true that by an outbreak of popular feeling, exactly opposite in character to that which prevailed during the Crimean War, we have been anomalously driven into the "far-seeing, long-calculated, two-sided policy," which cool observers said we ought to have adopted at that period. But now that the time has come for us to take "an energetic part in the solution of the hereditary question," the nation has shown that its spirit is precisely the same as it was in the Crimean War; unity of feeling prevails not only through the British Isles but through the British dominions; and the queen may be assured that, should she be unfortunately called upon to exercise her prerogative of declaring war, her subjects will spare no sacrifices to maintain the safety of her empire and the honor of her crown.

WITHIN THE PRECINCTS.

BY MRS. OLIPHANT.

CHAPTER XIII.

CAPTAIN DESPARD.

MORNING service at the Abbey was more business-like than the severe ritual in the afternoon. The evening prayers were more pleasurable. Strangers came to them, new faces, all the visitors about, and there could be no doubt that the signor chose his anthems with a view to the new people who were always coming and going. Sometimes representatives from every quarter of England, from the Continent — members of "the other church" even which Anglicanism venerates and yearns after: and people from America, pilgrims to the shrine of the past, would gather within the Abbey, and carry away the fame of the music and the beautiful church to all the winds. The staff of the Abbey was pleasantly excited, the service was short, and the whole ritual was pleasurable. It was the dull hour in the afternoon when it is good for people to be occupied in such an elevating way, and when, coming in with the fresh air hanging about you in the summer, out of the sunshine, to feel the house so shady and cool — or in winter from the chill and cold out of doors to a blazing fire, and lamps, and candles, and tea — you had just time for a little lounge before dressing for dinner, and so cheated away the heaviest hour of the day. But in the morning it was business. The minor canons felt it, getting up from their breakfast to sing their way steadily through litany and versicles. And nobody felt it more than the old chevaliers as they gathered in their stalls, many of them white-headed, tottering, one foot in the grave. It was the chief occupation of their lives — all that they were now obliged to do. Their whole days were shaped for this. When the bells began the doors would open, the veterans come out, one by one, some of them battered enough, with medals on their coats. Captain Despard was the most jaunty of the brotherhood. Indeed he was about the youngest of all, and it had been thought a bad thing for the institution when a man not much over fifty was elected. He was generally the last to take his place, hurrying in fresh and débonnaire, with his flower in his coat, singing with the choir whenever the music pleased him, and even now and then accompanying the minor canon, with a cheerful sense that his adhesion to what was being said must always be appreciated. His responses were given with a grand air, as if he felt himself to be paying a compliment to the Divine Hearer. And indeed, though it was the great drawback of his existence to be compelled to be present there every morning of his life, still when he was there he enjoyed it. He was part of the show. The beautiful church, the fine music, and Captain Despard, had all, he thought, a share in the silent enthusiasm of the general congregation. And Captain Despard was so far right that many of the congregation, especially those who came on Sundays and holidays, the townsfolk, the tobacconists, and tradespeople, and the girls from the workroom, looked upon him with the greatest admiration, and pointed out to each other, sometimes awed and respectful, sometimes tittering behind their prayer-books, where "the captain" sat in state. The captain was "a fine man"

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

everybody allowed — well-proportioned, well-preserved — a young man of his age; and his agè was mere boyhood in comparison with many of his peers and brethren. It was ridiculous to see him there among all those old fellows, the girls said; and as for Polly, as she slipped humbly into a free seat, the sight of him sitting there in his stall quite overpowered her. If all went well, she herself would have a place there by-and-by — not in the stalls indeed, but in the humble yet dignified places provided for the families of the chevaliers. It must not be supposed that even the chevaliers' stalls were equal to those provided for the hierarchy of the Abbey. They were a lower range, and on a different level altogether, but still they were places of dignity. Captain Despard put his arms upon the carved supports of his official seat, and looked around him like a benevolent monarch. When any one asked him a question as he went or came he was quite affable, and called to the verger with a condescending readiness to oblige.

"You must find a place for this gentleman, Wykeham," he would say; "this gentleman is a friend of mine." Wykeham only growled at these recommendations, but Captain Despard passed on to his stall with the air of having secured half-a-dozen places at least; and his protégés felt a vague belief in him, even when they did not find themselves much advanced by it. And there he sat, feeling that every change in his position was noted, and that he himself was an essential part of the show, that show which was so good for keeping up all the traditions of English society, making the Church respected, and enforcing attention to religion — indeed, a very handsome compliment to the Almighty himself.

Captain Despard, however, though he admired himself so much, was not proportionally admired by his brother chevaliers, and it was something like a surprise to him when he found himself sought by two of them at once, as they came out of the Abbey. One of these was Captain Temple, who had encountered Lottie on the evening before, going alone to the Deanery. None of all the chevaliers of St. Michael's was so much respected as this old gentleman. He was a little man, with white hair, not remarkable in personal appearance, poor and old; but he was all that a chevalier ought to be, sans reproche. The story of his early days was the ordinary one of a poor officer without friends or interest; but in his later life there had happened to him something which everybody knew. His only daughter had married a man greatly above her in station, a member of a noble family, to the great admiration and envy of all beholders. She was a beautiful girl, very delicate and sensitive; but no one thought of her qualities in comparison with the wonderful good fortune that had fallen her. A girl that had been changed at a stroke from poor little Louie Temple, the poor chevalier's daughter, into the honorable Mrs. Dropmore, with a chance of a viscountess's coronet! was ever such good luck heard of? Her father and mother were congratulated on all sides with malign exuberance. Mrs. Temple got credit for being the cleverest of mothers, that applause, which in England means insult, being largely showered upon her. Whether she deserved it, poor soul! is nothing to this history; but if so, she soon had her reward. The girl who had been so lucky was carried off summarily from the father and mother who had nothing else to care for in the world. They were not allowed to see her, or even to communicate with her but in the most limited way. They bore everything, these poor people, for their child's sake, encouraging each other not to complain, to wait until her sweetness had gained the victory, as sweetness and submission are always said to do, and encouraging her to think only of her husband, to wait and be patient until the prejudices of his family were dispelled. But this happy moment never came for poor Louie. She died after a year's marriage, wailing for her mother who was not allowed to come near her, and did not even know of her illness. This had almost killed the old people too, and it had pointed many a moral all the country round; and now this incident, which had nothing to do with her, came in to influence the career of Lottie Despard. It was Captain Temple who first came up to his brother chevalier as he strolled through the nave of St. Michael's, on his way out from the service. A great many people always lingered in the nave to get every note of the signor's voluntary, and it was Captain Despard's practice to take a turn up and down to exhibit himself in this last act of the show before it was over. The sun shone in from the high line of south windows, throwing a thousand varieties of color on the lofty clustered pillars, and the pavement all storied with engraved stones and brasses. The captain sauntered up and down, throwing out his chest, and conscious of admiration round him, while the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

music rolled forth through the splendid space, with a voice proportioned to it, and groups of the early worshippers stood about listening, specks in the vastness of the Abbey. Just as it ended, with an echoing thunder of sweet sound, the old captain, putting on his hat at the door, encountered the younger warrior for whom he had been lying in wait.

"May I speak a word to you, Captain Despard?" he said.

"Certainly, my dear sir; if I can be of use to you in any way, command me," said Captain Despard, with the most amiable flourish of his hat. But he was surprised; for Captain Temple was a man who "kept his distance," and had never shown any symptom of admiration for the other chevalier.

"You will forgive my speaking," said the old man. "But I know that your evenings are often engaged. You have many occupations; you are seldom at home in the evening?"

"My friends are very kind," said Captain Despard, with another flourish. "As a matter of fact, I — dine out a great deal. I am very often engaged."

"I thought so. And your son — very often dines out too. May I ask as a favor that you will allow me to constitute myself the escort of Miss Despard when she is going anywhere in the evening? I had that pleasure last night," said the old man. "I am a very safe person, I need not say — and fond of — young people. It would be a great pleasure to me."

Captain Despard listened with some surprise. Perhaps he saw the reproach intended, but was too gaily superior to take any notice of it. When the other had ended, he took off his hat again, and made him a still more beautiful bow. "How glad I am," he said, "to be able to give you a great pleasure so easily! Certainly, Captain Temple, if my little girl's society is agreeable to you."

"She is at an age when she wants — some one to watch over her," said the old captain. "She is very sweet — and very handsome, Captain Despard."

"Is she?" said the other indifferently. "A child, my dear sir; nothing more than a child — but good looks belong to her family — without thinking of my own side of the house."

"She is very handsome. A mother is a great loss to a girl at that age."

"You think it is a want that ought to be supplied," said Captain Despard, with a laugh, stroking his moustache. "Perhaps you are right — perhaps you are right. Such an idea, I allow, has several times crossed my own mind."

"Despard," said another voice, behind him, "I've got something to say to ye. When ye're at leisure, me dear fellow, step into my place."

"Don't let me detain you," said the other old man, hurrying away. His kind stratagem had not succeeded. He was half sorry — and yet, as he had already prophesied its failure to his wife, he was not so much displeased after all. Major O'Shaughnessy, who was slightly lame, hobbled round to the other side.

"Despard," he said, "me dear friend! I've got something to say to you. It's about Lottie, me boy."

"About Lottie? — more communications about Lottie. I've had about enough of her, O'Shaughnessy. There's that solemn old idiot asking if he may escort her when she goes anywhere. Is he going to give his wife poison, and offer himself to me as a son-in-law?" said the captain, with a laugh.

"I'll go bail he didn't tell you what I'm going to tell you. Listen, Despard. My pretty Lottie — she's but a child, and she's as pretty a one as you'd wish to see. Well, it's a lover she's gone and got for herself. What do you think of that? Bless my soul, a lover! What do you make of that, me fine fellow?" cried the major, rubbing his fat hands. He was large of bulk, like his wife, and round and shining, with a bald head, and large hands that looked bald too.

"Is this a joke?" said the captain, drawing himself up; "by George, I'll have no jokes about my child."

"Joke? it is my wife told me, that is as fond of the girl as if she were her own. 'Mark my words,' says Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, 'she'll be the Honorable Mrs. Ridsdale before we know where we are.' And Temple's been at ye, Despard; I know it. The man is off his head with his own bad luck, and can't abide the name of an Honorable. But, from all I hear, there's little to be said against this one except that he's poor."

"The Honorable ——" said Captain Despard, with a bewildered look. Then, as the good major talked, he recovered himself. "Well!" he said, when that speech came to an end, "you may think that it's very fine, O'Shaughnessy, and I'm sure I am much obliged to you for telling me, but you don't suppose an Honorable is anything out of the way to me? With her family and her beauty, I would grudge the child to a man without a title anyhow, even if he weren't poor."

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

The major had his mouth open to speak, but he was so bewildered by this grandeur that he stopped and closed it again, and uttered only a murmur in his throat. "Well!" he said, when he came to himself, "you know your own affairs best; but now that your girl is taken out, and into society, and with her prospects, you'll be standing by her and giving her more of your company, Despard? Lottie's the best of girls, but it might make all the difference to her having her father at home, and always ready to stand up for her — not meaning any offence."

"Nor is any taken, O'Shaughnessy; make your mind quite easy," said the captain, looking extremely stately though his coat was shabby. Then he added, "I've got some business down town, and an appointment at twelve o'clock. I'm sorry to hurry off, but business goes before all. Good-morning to you, major!" he said, kissing the ends of his fingers; then turning back after he had gone a few steps, "My respects to your wife, and thanks for finding it all out; but I've known it these three weeks at least, though I'm obliged to her all the same." And so saying, Captain Despard resumed the humming of his favorite tune, and went swinging his arm down the Dean's Walk, the rosebud in his coat showing like a decoration, and the whole man jaunty and gay as nobody else was at St. Michael's. It was a sight to see him as he marched along, keeping time to the air he was humming; a fine figure of a man! The good major stood and looked after him dumbfoundered; he was almost too much taken by surprise to be offended. "Manage your own affairs as you please, my fine fellow!" he said to himself, and went home in a state of suppressed fury. But he relented when he saw Lottie, in her print frock at the window; and he did not give his wife that insolent message. "What is the use of making mischief?" the major said.

Captain Despard was not, however, so entirely unmoved as he looked. The news bewildered him first, and then elated him. Where had the girl picked up the Honorable Mr. ——, what was his name? He knew so little of Lottie and was so little aware of her proceedings, that he had only heard accidentally of her visits at the Deanery at all, and knew nothing whatever of Rollo. He must inquire, he said to himself; but in the mean time did not this free him from all the hesitations with which, to do him justice, he had been struggling? For if, instead of "presiding over his establishment" — which was how Captain Despard put it — Lottie was to be the mistress of a house of her own, and ascend into heaven, as it were, as the Honorable Mrs. Something-or-other, there would be no doubt that Captain Despard would be left free as the day to do what pleased himself. This wonderful piece of news seemed to get into his veins and send the blood coursing more quickly there, and into his head, and make that whirl with an elation which was perfectly vague and indefinite. With Lottie as the Honorable Mrs. So-and-so, all obstacles were removed out of his own way. Law did not count; the captain was afraid more or less of his daughter, but he was not at all afraid of his son. The Honorable Something-or-other! Captain Despard did not even know his name or anything about him, but already various privileges seemed to gleam upon him through this noble relation. No doubt such a son-in-law would be likely to lend a gentleman, who was not over rich, and connected with him by close family ties, a small sum now and then; or probably he might think it necessary for his new dignity to make an allowance to his wife's father to enable him to appear as a gentleman ought; and in the shooting season he would naturally, certainly, give so near a relation a standing invitation to the shooting-box which, by right of his rank, he must inevitably possess somewhere or other, either his own or belonging to his noble father. Probably he would have it in his power to point out to her Majesty or the commander-in-chief that to keep a man who was an honor to his profession, like Captain Lawrence Despard, in the position of a chevalier of St. Michael's, was equally a disgrace and a danger to the country. Captain Despard seemed to hear the very tone in which this best of friends would certify to his merits. "Speak of failures in arms! What can you expect when General So-and-so is gazetted to the command of an expedition, and Lawrence Despard is left in a chevalier's lodge?" he seemed to hear the unknown say indignantly. Nothing could be more generous than his behavior; he did nothing but go about the world sounding the captain's praises: "I have the honor to be his son-in-law," this right-thinking young man would say. Captain Despard went down the hill with his head buzzing full of this new personage who had suddenly stepped into his life. His engagement was no more important than to play a game at billiards with one of his town acquaintances, and even there he could not keep from throwing out mysterious hints about some great good fortune which was about to come to him. "What! are you going away, captain? Are you to have promotion? or is it you they have chosen for the new warden of the chevaliers?" his associates asked him, half in curiosity, half in sarcasm. "I am not in circumstances," said the captain solemnly, "to say what are the improved prospects that are dawning upon my house; but of this you may rest assured — that my friends in adversity will remain my friends in prosperity." "Bravo, captain!" cried all his friends. Some of them laughed, but some of them put their faith in Captain Despard. They said to themselves, "He's fond of talking a bit big, but he's got a good heart, has the captain!" and they, too, dreamed of little loans and treats. And, indeed, the captain got an immediate advantage out of it; for one of the billiard-players, who was a well-to-do tradesman with habits not altogether satisfactory to his friends, gave him a luncheon at the "Black Boar," not because he expected to profit by the supposed promotion, but to see how many lies the old humbug would tell in half an hour, as he himself said; for there are practical democrats to whom it is very sweet to see the pretended aristocrat cover himself with films of lying. The shopkeeper roared with laughter as the captain gave forth his oracular sayings. "Go it, old boy!" he said. They all believed, however, more or less, in some good luck that was coming, whatever it might be; and the sensation of faith around him strengthened Captain Despard in his conviction. He resolved to go home and question Lottie after this luncheon; but that was of itself a prolonged feast, and the immediate consequence of it was a disinclination to move, and a sense that it would be just as well for him not to show himself for some little time, "till it had gone off" — for the captain in some things was a wise man, and prudent as he was wise.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

CHAPTER XIV.

THE WORKROOM.

THERE were two factions in the workroom by the side of the river where Mrs. Wilting's daughters worked with Polly Featherstone for their forewoman. One of these, though very small, and consisting, indeed, only of Ellen Wilting, the eldest girl — who was "serious" — and a little apprentice who was in her class at the Sunday school — was greatly against the intrusion of "the gentlemen" into the workroom, and thought it highly improper and a thing likely to bring all the young ladies who worked there into trouble. Ellen was, contrary to the usual opinion which would have selected the plainest sister for this rôle, the prettiest of the girls. She was fair-haired, but not frizzy like the rest; and her face was pale, with a serious expression which made her very ladylike, many persons thought, and gave her, the others felt not without envy, a distinction which did not belong to their own pinkness and whiteness. There were four sisters, of whom Emma — who was the object of Law's admiration — was the youngest. Kate and 'Liza came between these two, and they were both of Polly's faction, though without any reason for being so. They thought Ellen was a great deal too particular. What was the harm if a gentleman came and sat a bit when they were not too busy, and talked and made them laugh? The object of life to these young women was to get as much laughing and talking as possible made consistent with the greatest amount of work done, of gowns and bonnets made; and any one who made the long evening appear a little shorter, and "passed the time" with a little merriment, was a real benefactor to them. Ellen, for her part, took more serious views of life. She would have liked to go to morning service every day had that been practicable, and called it matins as the ladies themselves did, which was very uncommon in the River Lane; and she was a member of the Choral Society, and had a pretty voice, and had sung in a chorus along with Miss Despard, and even with Miss Huntington before she married. All this made her feel that it was not "nice" to encourage the gentlemen who were of a different condition in life, and whose visits could not be for any good. And she would much rather have heard stories read out of the Monthly Packet, or something in which instruction was joined with amusement, than from the Family Herald; except, indeed, when she got interested in the trials, continued from number to number, of some virtuous young heroine like the Lady Araminta. Ellen wore a black gown like the young ladies in the shops, with her pretty fair hair quite simply dressed, without any of the padding and frizzing which were popular at the time; and fondly hoped some time or other to wear a little black bonnet like those of the sisters who had an establishment near. Her

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

mother sternly forbade this indulgence now, but it was one of the things to which the young woman looked forward. And it must be allowed that Ellen rather prided herself on her total unlikeness in every way to Polly Featherstone, who considered herself the head of the workroom, and who was certainly the ringleader in all its follies. Kate and 'Liza and Emma and the other apprentice, though they by no means gave their entire adhesion to Polly, and had many remarks to make upon her in private, yet were generally led by her as a person who knew the world and was "much admired," and always had somebody after her. That this somebody should be for the moment "a gentleman," gave Polly an additional advantage. It must not be supposed that her reputation was anyhow in danger, though she was known to "keep company" with the captain; for Polly, though not "particular," and ready to talk and laugh with any one, was known to be very well able to take care of herself, and much too experienced to be taken in by any of the admirers whom she was supposed to be able to wind round her little finger. For this, and for her powers of attracting admiration, and for her fluent and ready speech, and the dauntless disposition which made her afraid of nobody and ready to "speak up," if need were, even to the very dean himself, the girls admired her; and they would not be persuaded by Ellen that Polly ought to be subdued out of her loud and cheerful talk, and the doors of the workroom closed on the gentlemen. Little Emma, indeed, the youngest of the girls, was vehement against this idea, as was easily understood by all the rest.

"What is the harm?" she cried, with tears in her eyes, tears of vexation and irritation and alarmed perception of the change it would make if Law should be shut out; a terrible change, reducing herself, who now enjoyed some visionary superiority as "keeping company" in her own small person with a gentleman, into something even lower than 'Liza and Kate, who had their butchers and bakers, at least, to walk out with on Sunday—a privilege which Emma seldom dared enjoy with Law. "What is the use," Emma said, "of making a fuss? What harm do they do? They make the time pass. It's long enough anyhow from eight o'clock in the morning till nine at night, or sometimes later, and so little time as mother allows for meals. I am sure I am that tired," Emma declared, and with reason, "I often can't see how to thread my needle; and to have somebody to talk to passes the time."

"We have always plenty of talk even when we are by ourselves," said Ellen; "and I am sure we might make better use of our time and have much more improving conversation if these men would not be always coming here."

"Oh! if you are so fond of improvement," cried Polly, "I daresay you would like to have Mr. Sterndale the Scripture-reader come and read to us; or we might ask down Mr. Langton up-stairs, who is better, who is a clergyman. I shouldn't mind having him, he is so shy and frightened, and he wouldn't know what to say."

"Lord!" cried Kate; "fancy being frightened for us!"

"Oh!" said the better-informed Polly, "there's heaps as are frightened for us, and the gooder they are the more frightened they would be; a curate is always frightened for us girls. He knows he daren't talk free in a friendly way, and that makes him as stiff as two sticks. As sure as fate, if he was pleasant, somebody would say he had a wrong meaning, and that's how it's always in their mind."

"A clergyman," said Ellen authoritatively, "would come to do us good. But it wouldn't be his place to come here visiting. It's our duty to go to him to relieve our consciences. As for Mr. Sterndale, the Scripture-reader, I don't call him a Churchman at all; he might just as well be a Dissenter. What good can he do anybody? The thing that really does you good is to go to church. In some places there are always prayers going on, and then there is half an hour for meditation, and then you go to work again till the bell rings. And in the afternoon there is even-song and self-examination, and that passes the time," cried Ellen, clasping her hands. "What with matins, and meditation, and something new for every hour, the days go. They're gone before you know where you are."

The young women were silenced by this enthusiastic statement. For after all, what could be more desirable than a system which made the days fly? Polly was the only one who could hold up her head against such an argument. She did her best to be scornful. "I daresay!" she cried, "but I should just like to know if the work went as fast! Praying and meditating are very fine, but if the work wasn't done, what would your mother say?"

"Mother would find it answer! Bless

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

you," said Ellen, her pale face lighted with enthusiasm, "you do double the work when you can feel you're doing your duty, and could die cheerful any moment."

"Oh! and to think how few sees their duty, and how most folks turn their backs upon it!" replied the little apprentice who was on Ellen's side.

Polly saw that something must be done to turn the tide. The girls were awed. They could not hold up their commonplace little heads against this grand ideal. There were little flings of half-alarmed impatience indeed among them, as when Kate whispered to 'Liza that "one serious one was enough in a house," and little Emma ventured a faltering assertion "that going to church made a day feel like Sunday, and it didn't seem right to do any more work." Polly boldly burst in, and threw forth her standard to the wind.

"Week-days is week-days," she said oracularly. "We've got them to work in, and to have a bit of fun as long as we're young. Sundays I say nothing against church — as much as any one pleases; and it's a great thing to have the Abbey to go to, where you see everybody, if Wykeham the verger wasn't such a brute. But, if I'm not to have my bit of fun, I'd rather be out of the world altogether. Now I just wish Mr. Law were passing this way, for there's the end of Lady Araminta in the Family 'Erald, and it is very exciting, and she won't hear of marrying the earl, let alone the duke, but gives all her money and everything she has to the man of her heart."

"The baronet!" cried Kate and 'Liza in one breath. "I always knew that was how it was going to be." Even Ellen, wise as she was, changed color, and looked up eagerly.

It was Polly who took in that representative of all that the world calls letters and cultivation, to these girls. Ellen looked wistfully at the drawer in which the treasure was hidden. "I will read it out if you like," she said somewhat timidly. "I can't get on with this till the trimming is ready." Thus even the Church party was vanquished by the charms of art.

That evening the captain again paid them a visit. It was not often that he came two days in succession, and Emma, who was the least important of all, was very impatient of his appearance, notwithstanding the saucy speech she had made to Law. In her heart she thought there was no comparison between the father and son. The captain was an old man. He had no business to come at all, chatting and making his jokes; it was a shame to see him turning up night after night. She wondered how Miss Despard liked to have him always out. Emma regarded Miss Despard with great interest and awe. She wondered when she met her in the street, as happened sometimes, what she would say if she knew. And Emma wondered, with a less warm thrill of personal feeling, but yet with much heat and sympathetic indignation, what Miss Despard would think if she knew of Polly. She would hate her, and that would be quite natural. Fancy having Polly brought in over your head in the shape of a stepmother! and if Emma herself felt indignant at such an idea, what must Miss Despard do who was a lady, and used to be the mistress? It made the girl's heart ache to think that she would have to close the door upon Law again, for it would never do to have the father and son together. Polly, on the contrary, bore a look of triumph on her countenance. She pushed her chair aside a little as Emma had done for Law, thus making room for him beside her, and she said, with a delighted yet nervous toss of her mountain of hair, "Ah, captain, back again! Haven't you got anything better to do than to come after a lot of girls that don't want you? Do we want him, Kate?" to which playful question Kate replied in all good faith, no, she did not want him; but, with a friendly sense of what was expected of her, giggled, and added that the captain didn't mind much what she thought. The captain, nothing daunted, drew in a stool close to Polly, and whispered that, by George, the girl was right; it didn't matter much to him what she thought; that it was some one else he would consult on that subject; upon which Polly tossed her head higher than ever, and laughed and desired him to get along! The captain's coming was not nearly so good for the work as Law's, who was not half so funny, and whom they all received in a brotherly sort of indifferent, good-humored way. The captain, on the contrary, fixed their attention as at a play. It was as good as a play to watch him whispering to Polly, and she arching her neck, and tossing her head, and bidding him get along! Sometimes, indeed, he kept them all laughing with his jokes and his mimicries, himself enjoying the enthusiasm of his audience. But though on these occasions he was very entertaining, the girls perhaps were still more entertained when he sat and whispered to Polly, giving them the gratification of an actual romance, such as it was, enacted before their eyes. A

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

gentleman, an officer, with such a command of fine language, and such an air! They gave each other significant glances and little nudges to call each other's attention, and wondered what Miss Despard would think, and what would happen if really, really, some fine day, Polly Featherstone were made into a lady, a chevalier's wife, and Mr. Law's stepmother — what would everybody say? and Miss Despard, would she put up with it? Even the idea of so exciting an event made the blood move more quickly in their veins.

The captain was not in his jocular mood to-night. He was magnificent, a thing which occurred now and then. In this state of mind he was in the habit of telling them splendid incidents of his early days — the things he said to the Duke of Blank, and what the Duke of Blank replied to him, and the money he gave for his horses, and how he thought nothing of presenting any young lady he might be paying attention to (for he was a sad flirt in those days, the captain allowed) with a diamond spray worth a thousand pounds, or a sapphire ring equally valuable, or some pretty trifle of that description. But he was altogether serious to-night. "I intended to have come earlier," he said, "for I have family business that calls me home soon; but I was detained. It is very tiresome to be continually called upon for advice and help as I am, especially when in one's own affairs something important has occurred."

"La, captain, what has happened?" said Polly. "You ought to tell us. We just want something to wake us up. You've had some money left you; or I shouldn't wonder a bit if the commander-in-chief — "

Here she stopped short with sudden excitement, and looked at him. Captain Despard was fond of intimating to his humbler friends that he knew the commander-in-chief would send for him some day, indignant with those whose machinations had made him shelve so valuable an officer for so long. It seemed possible to Polly that this moment had arrived, and the idea made her black eyes blaze. She seemed to see him at the head of an expedition, leading an army, and herself the general's lady. It did not occur to Polly that there was no war going on at the moment; that was a matter of detail; and how should she know anything about war or peace, a young woman whose knowledge of public matters was limited to murders and police cases? She let her work fall upon her knee, and there even ran through her mind a rapid calculation, if he was starting off directly, how long it would take to get the wedding things ready, or if she could trust the Wiltings to have them packed and sent after her in case there should not be time enough to wait.

"No," the captain said, with that curl of his lip which expressed his contempt of the authorities who had so foolishly passed him over. "It is nothing about the commander-in-chief — at least not yet. There will soon be a means of explaining matters to his Royal Highness which may lead to —— But we will say nothing on that point for the moment," he added grandly, with a wave of his hand. Then he leaned over Polly, and whispered something which the others tried vainly to hear.

"Oh!" cried Polly, listening intently. At first her interest failed a little; then she evidently rose to the occasion, put on a fictitious excitement, clasped her hands, and cried, "Oh, captain, that at last!"

"Yes — that is what has happened. You may not see all its importance at the first glance. But it is very important," said the captain with solemnity. "In a domestic point of view — and otherwise. People tell you interest does not matter nowadays. Ha! ha!" (Captain Despard laughed the kind of stage laugh which may be represented by these monosyllables.) "Trust one who has been behind the scenes. Interest is everything — always has been, and always will be. This will probably have the effect of setting me right at the Horse Guards, which is all that is necessary. And in the mean time," he added, with a thoughtful air, "it will make a great difference in a domestic point of view; it will change my position in many ways, indeed in every way."

Polly had been gazing at him during this speech, watching every movement of his face, and as she watched her own countenance altered. She did not even pretend to take up her work again, but leaned forward nervously fingering the thread and the scissors on the table, and beginning to realize the importance of the crisis. To Captain Despard it was a delightful opportunity of displaying his importance, and there was just enough of misty possibility in the castle of cards he was building up to endow him with a majestic consciousness of something about to happen. But to Polly it was a great deal more than this. It was the crisis of something that was at least melodrama, if not tragedy, in her life. All her hopes were suddenly quickened into almost reality, and the change in her fortunes, which had been a distant and doubtful, if exciting chance, seemed sud-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

denly in a moment to become real and near.

The spectacle that this afforded to the other young women in the workroom it is almost beyond the power of words to describe. Their bosoms throbbed. A play! plays were nothing to it. They pulled each other's gowns under the table. They gave each other little nods, and looks under their eyebrows. Their elbows met in emphatic commentary. He, absorbed in his own all-important thoughts, she looking up at him with that rapt and pale suspense — never was anything more exciting to the imagination of the beholders. "He won't look at her," one whispered; "She's all of a tremble," said another; and "Lord, what are they making such a fuss about?" breathed Kate.

"Yes, it will alter our position in every way," the captain said, stroking his moustache, and fixing his eyes on vacancy. Then Polly touched his arm softly, her cheek, which had been pale, glowing crimson. Our position! the word gave her inspiration. She touched him shyly at first to call his attention; then, with some vehemence, "Captain! that will make —— a deal easier," she said; but what words were between these broken bits of the sentence, or if any words came between, the excited listeners could not make out.

"Yes," he said with dignity. But he did not look at her. He maintained his abstracted look, which was so very impressive. They all hung upon, not only his lips, but every movement. As for Polly, the suspense was more than she could bear. She was not a patient young woman, nor had she been trained to deny herself like Ellen, or control her feelings as women in a different sphere are obliged to do. She resumed her work for a moment with hurried hands, trying to control her anxiety; then suddenly threw it in a heap on the table, without even taking the trouble to fold it tidily. She did not seem to know what she was doing, they all thought.

"I am going home," she said, with a hoarseness in her voice. "There is nothing very pressing, so it won't matter. I've got such a headache I don't know what to do with myself."

"Oh, Polly, a headache! that's not like you — yes, there's Mrs. Arrowsmith's dress that was promised."

"I don't care — and she's not a regular customer. And it's only a bit of an alpaca with no trimmings — you can finish it yourselves. Captain, if you're coming my way, you can come — if you like; unless," said Polly, with feverish bravado, "you've got something to say to the girls more than you seem to have to me — I'm going home."

The captain woke up from his abstraction, and looked round him, elevating his eyebrows. "Bless my heart, what is the matter?" he said. And then he made a grimace, which tempted the girls to laugh notwithstanding Polly's tragic seriousness. "I had hoped to have contributed a little to the entertainment of the evening, my dear young ladies. I had hoped to have helped you to 'pass the time,' as you say. But when a lady bids me go ——"

"Oh, you needn't unless you like," cried Polly; "don't mind me! I don't want nobody to go home with me. I can take care of myself — only leave me alone if you please. I won't be made fun of, or taken off. Let me out into the fresh air, or I think I shall faint." The captain took an unfair advantage of the excited creature. He turned round upon them all when Polly rushed out to get her jacket and hat, which hung in the hall, and "took her off" on the spot, making himself so like her, that it was all they could do to keep from betraying him by their laughter. When she had put on her "things," Polly put her head into the room she had just left. "Good-night, I'm going," she said, with a look of impassioned anxiety and trouble. She was too much absorbed in her own feelings to see through the mist in which their faces shone to her, the laughter that was in them. She only saw the captain standing up in the midst of them. Was he coming after her? or was he going to fall off from her at this crisis of his affairs? Perhaps it was foolish of her to rush off like this, and leave him with all these girls about him. But Polly had never been used to restrain her feelings, and she could not help it, she vowed to herself. Everything in the future seemed to depend upon whether he came after her or not. Oh, why could not she have had a little more patience! oh, why should not he come with her, say something to her after all that had passed! As great a conflict was in her mind as if she had been a heroine of romance. The captain and she had been "keeping company" for a long time. He had "kept off" others that would not have shilly-shallyed as he had done. A man's "intentions" are rarely inquired into in Polly's sphere. But if he cared for her the least bit, if he had any honor in him, she felt that he would follow her now. Polly knew that she might have been Mrs.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Despard long ago if she had consented to be married privately as the captain wished. But she was for none of these clandestine proceedings. She would be married in her parish church, with white favors and a couple of flys, and something that might be supposed to be a wedding breakfast. She had held by her notions of decorum stoutly, and would hear of no hole-and-corner proceedings. And now when fortune was smiling upon them, when his daughter had got hold of some one (this was Polly's elegant way of putting it), and when the way would be clear, what if he failed her? The workroom with its blaze of light and its curious spectators had been intolerable to her, but a cold shudder crossed her when she got out of doors into the darkness of the lane. Perhaps she ought to have stayed at any cost, not to have left him in the midst of so many temptations. Her heart seemed to sink into her shoes. Oh, why had she been so silly! Her hopes seemed all dropping, disappearing from her. To sink into simple Polly Featherstone, with no dazzling prospect of future elevation, would be death to her, she felt, now.

Polly was half-way up the lane before the captain, coming along at his leisure, made up to her; and, what with passion and fright, she had scarcely any voice left. "Oh, you have come after all!" was all she could manage to say. And she hurried on, so rapidly that he protested. "If you want to talk, how can we talk if we race like this?" he said. "Who wants to talk?" cried Polly breathless, but nevertheless she paused in her headlong career. They went up the hill together, on the steep side next the Abbey, where there never was anybody, and there the captain discoursed to Polly about his new hopes. She would have liked it better had he decided how the old ones were to be realized. But still, as he was confidential and opened everything to her as to his natural confidant, her excitement gradually subsided, and her trust in him returned. She listened patiently while he recounted to her all the results that would be sure to follow, when an influential son-in-law, a member of a noble family, brought him to the recollection of the commander-in-chief.

"They think I'm shelved and superannuated," he said; "but let me but have an opening — all I want is an opening — and then you can go and select the handsomest phaeton and the prettiest pair of ponies, my lady."

Polly laughed and reddened with pleasure at this address, but she said prudently, "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush. I wouldn't give up being a chevalier. It's a nice little house and a nice little income too."

"Pooh! a nothing," cried the captain. This was very fine and gave a sense of superiority and exaltation. Polly could not but allow a vision to float before her eyes of the phaeton and the ponies, nay more of the march of a regiment with the flags and the music. She even seemed to see the sentry at her own door, and all the men presenting arms as she passed (what less could they do to the wife of their commander?). But, on the other hand, to live here at St. Michael's where she was born, and be seen in her high estate by all the people who had known her as a poor dressmaker, that was a happiness which she did not like to give up, even for the glories of a high command far away.

CHAPTER XV.

ROMANCE AND REALITY.

LOTTIE was entirely unconscious of the intimation that had been made to her father, and of the excitement which had risen among her neighbors about Mr. Ridsdale. It did not occur to her that any one but herself knew anything about him. The delighted curiosity of the O'Shaughnessys and the anxious concern of Captain Temple were equally unknown to her. Her mind was still moved by an echo of the sentiment of their last meeting — a thrill of emotion half from the music, half from the awakening feelings, the curiosity, the commotion of her developing nature. Of all Law's communications which had excited himself so powerfully, and which had also to some extent excited her, she remembered little in comparison. The large dim room at the Deanery, the faint night air breathing about, blowing the flames of the candles, the moths that circled about the lights and did themselves to death against every flame, seemed to glimmer before her eyes continually — everything else, even the dream of her father's marriage, the danger of Law's imprudence, fell into the background and became distant; everything receded before the perpetual attraction of this shadowy scene.

Mr. Ridsdale made a second call upon her in the morning after service, just at the moment when Captain Temple and Major O'Shaughnessy were talking to her father. This time he brought no note, and had no pretence to explain his visit.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

"I came to say good-bye," he said, holding out his hand and looking rather wistfully into her face. Lottie offered him her hand demurely. She scarcely met his eyes. Her heart began to beat as soon as she heard his voice asking for her at the door. It brought back all the terrors of the previous night. She did not however ask him to sit down, but stood faltering opposite to him, embarrassed, not knowing what to do.

"You would not accept my escort last night," he said; "I was dreadfully disappointed when I came out and found you gone. I had been waiting, not wishing to hurry you. I hope you did not think I was a laggard."

"Oh no, it was my fault," said Lottie, not raising her eyes. "There was no need for any one to come with me. It is but two steps, and at that hour there is no one about. There was no need — for any escort."

"May I sit down for a few minutes, Miss Despard? My train is not till one o'clock."

Lottie blushed crimson at this implied reproach. It might be right to be shy of him, but not to be rude to him. "Oh, I beg your pardon," she said, pointing to a chair.

"You took us all by surprise last night," he said, carefully placing hers for her. "I think it was a revelation to everybody. We hear that music in the Abbey, and we suppose we understand it; till some one like you suddenly interprets it to us, and we wake up and feel that we never heard it before."

"I never knew what it was — to sing anything like that before," said Lottie. It disturbed her even to think about it; "And it had all been so different — so ——"

"Commonplace? from the ridiculous to the sublime; from poor dear Aunt Caroline on her sofa to Handel fluting among the angels. It was a step indeed."

"I did not mean that. It was myself I was thinking of — I had been so full of silly fancies of my own."

"But all at once the inspiration came? I should like to be capable of anything like that; but I am not. I can only listen, and worship," said Rollo. There was fervor in his voice — a real something which was not mere fanaticism about music. And the two young people sat for a few moments in silence, a most dangerous thing to do, looking at each other — nay, not looking at each other, for Lottie did not feel either able or disposed to raise her eyes. She was the first to speak, in order to break the silence, which alarmed her, though she did not know why.

"It is wonderful how the signor plays. I never understood it in the Abbey. He seems to place you up somewhere above yourself — and make your voice come independent of you."

"Never in his life, I am sure, did he have such a beautiful compliment paid to him," said Rollo; "but, Miss Despard, you do him too much credit. You permitted even me to accompany you, and sang just as divinely ——"

"Oh no," said Lottie. Then she blushed and recollected herself. "You play very well, Mr. Ridsdale, but we could not compare those trumpery songs with ——"

"Trumpery songs! only Mozart and Bellini, and a few more," he cried, with a gasp. "Ah, I know what you mean; you meant the "Marta" song, which made your good friend, that good woman, cry ——"

"I like 'The Last Rose of Summer' very much. I have always liked it. I used to hear an old fiddler play it in the street when I was a child, when I was lying in the dark, trying to go to sleep. It was like a friend keeping me company; but a friend that had a breaking heart, that cried and took all my thoughts off myself — I shall never forget it," said Lottie, the tears coming to her eyes at the recollection. "I like it better than all the rest."

"Miss Despard, do not drive me to despair. Not better than 'Casta Diva,' or Margaret's 'Jewel-Song,' or ——"

"You forget I don't know where they come, nor the meaning of them," said Lottie calmly. "I never heard an opera. I think those things are beautiful, but they only sing to my ear, they don't come in to me."

Rollo shook his head. He was half touched, half shocked. It was her ignorance; but then a woman destined for a prima donna, a woman with musical genius, ought to know the best by intuition, he thought. All the same, he was more interested than if she had raved as the commonplace, half-educated amateur raves. "But Handel does," he said.

"Ah!" Lottie cried, her face lighting up. But she added, after a moment, "I am too ignorant to be worth talking to; you will be disgusted. I never thought much about Handel. It was not Handel, it was that." A flush of color came over her face with the recollection. She was too uninstructed (notwithstanding the neighborhood of the Abbey) to have fully woke up to Handel or any one. "I sup-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

pose I have heard it and did not pay much attention to it," she said; "it was singing it. One does not understand at first — till suddenly one hears one's self, and you say, 'What is this that is speaking; what is this? it cannot be me!'"

"I think I understand — a little," said Rollo doubtfully; "though it is simply you that makes a something quite familiar, a piece of music we have all heard a hundred times, become a new revelation to us all in a moment. I am going away, Miss Despard, and it may be some time before I return. Would you do me such a great favor — which I have no right to ask — as to sing me something now before I go?"

But Lottie would not sing. She said, "Oh no, no," with a half terror which he did not understand, and which she did not understand herself. The tone was one which forbade the repetition of the request. He begged her pardon anxiously, and there was a little languid conversation about other subjects, and then he rose. He put out his hand again, looking into her eyes, which she raised shyly, almost for the first time. Rollo had a way of looking into the eyes of women to whom he wished to make himself agreeable. It is sometimes very impertinent, and always daring, but, especially when the woman's imagination is on the side of the gazer, it is very efficacious. Lottie was entirely inexperienced, and she trembled under this look, but felt it penetrate to her very heart.

"Till we meet again," he said, with a smile, holding her hand for that necessary moment while he said his good-bye. "It will not be very long; and I hope you will be kind to me, Miss Despard, and let me hear you ——"

"Good-bye," said Lottie. She could not bear it any longer. She blamed herself afterwards for being rude, as she sat down and went over the incident again and again. She seemed to herself to have dismissed him quite rudely, pulling her hand away, cutting short what he was saying. But Rollo, for his part, did not feel that it was rude. He went down the narrow stairs with his heart beating a little quicker than usual, and a sense that here was something quite fresh and novel, something not like the little flirtations with which he was so familiar, and which amused him a great deal in general. This he had just touched, effleuri, with his usual easy sentiment, was something quite out of the common. It startled him with the throb in it. He went away quite thoughtful, his heart in a most unusual commotion, and forgot until he was miles away from St. Michael's that Lottie Despard was to be the English prima donna, who was to make his fortune, if properly managed. "Ah, to be sure, that was it," he said to himself suddenly in the railway carriage, as he was going to town. He really had forgotten what it was that took him to town at this unsuitable moment of the year.

The rest of the morning glided dreamily away after an incident like this; and it was not till late in the afternoon that Lottie suddenly awoke to the necessity of making an effort, and shaking off the empire of dreams: this was how she became convinced of the necessity of it. She had been sitting, as on the former occasion, with a basket of mending by her when Rollo came in. She had all the clothes of the household to keep in order, and naturally they were not done in one day. After Mr. Ridsdale was gone, she took up her work languidly, keeping it on her knee while she went over all that had happened again and again, as has been recorded. When, at last, startled by a sound outside, she began to work in earnest, then and there a revelation of a character totally distinct from that made by Handel burst upon her. It was not a revelation of the same kind, but it was very startling. Lottie found — that she had not yet finished the hole in the sock which she had begun to mend before Mr. Ridsdale's first visit! She was still in the middle of that one hole. She remembered exactly where she stuck her needle in the middle of a woolly hillock, as she heard him coming up-stairs; and there it was still, in precisely the same place. This discovery made her heart jump almost as much as Mr. Ridsdale's visit had done. What an evidence of wicked idling, of the most foolish dreaming and unprofitable thoughts was in it! Lottie blushed, though she was alone, to the roots of her hair, and seizing the sock with an impassioned glow of energy, never took breath till the stern evidence of that hole was done away with. And then she could not give herself any rest. She felt her dreams floating about her with folded pinions, ready to descend upon her and envelop her in their shadow if she gave them the chance; but she was determined that she would not give them the chance. As soon as she had finished the pair of socks, and folded them carefully up, she went to look for Law to suggest that they should go immediately to Mr. Ashford. Law had only just come in from a furtive expedition out of doors, and had scarcely

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

time to spread his books open before him when she entered his room. But he would not go to Mr. Ashford. It was time enough for that, and he meant in the mean time to "work up" by himself, he declared. Lottie became more energetic than ever in the revulsion of feeling, and determination not to yield further to any vanity. She pleaded with him, stormed at him, but in vain. "At the worst I can always 'list," he said, half in dogged resistance to her, half in boyish mischief to vex her. But he would not yield to her desire to consult Mr. Ashford, though he had assented at first. He did not refuse to go "some time," but nothing that she could say would induce him to go now. This brought in again all the contradictions and cares of her life to make her heart sore when she turned back out of the enchanted land in which for a little while she had been delivered from these cares. They all came back upon her open-mouthed, like wild beasts, she thought. Law resisting everything that was good for him, and her father —— But Lottie could not realize the change that threatened to come upon her through her father. It seemed like the suggestion of a dream. Law must be deceived, it must be all a delusion, it was not possible, it was not credible. The captain came in early that night, and he came up-stairs into the little drawing-room, to which he had no habit of coming. He told his daughter in a stately way that he heard her singing had given great satisfaction at the Deanery. "More than one person has mentioned it to me," he said; "that is of course a satisfaction. And — who is the gentleman you have been having here so much?"

"There has been no one here very much," said Lottie; then she blushed in spite of herself, though she did not suppose that was what he alluded to. "You do not mean Mr. Ridsdale?" she said.

"How many visitors have you got?" he said, in high good-humor. "Perhaps it is Mr. Ridsdale — Lady Caroline's nephew? Ah, I like the family. It was he you sang to? Well, no harm; you've got a very pretty voice — and so had your mother before you," the captain added, with a carefully prepared sigh.

"It was only once," said Lottie, confused. "Mrs O'Shaughnessy was here; it was after we had been singing at the Deanery; it was —— "

"My child," said the captain, "I am not finding fault. No harm in putting your best foot foremost. I wish you'd do it a little more. At your age you ought to be thinking about getting married. And, to tell the truth, it would be a great convenience to me, and suit my plans beautifully, if you would get married. You mustn't stand shilly-shallying; let him come to the point — or, if he won't, my dear, refer him to me."

"I don't know what you mean," cried Lottie. Fortunately for her, he had thought her a child up to the time of their migration to St. Michael's, and she had been subjected to very little advice of this description. But, though she gazed at him with wondering eyes, she knew very well by the instinct of horror and repulsion in her mind what he meant. It gave her a shock of pain and shame which ran like electricity to her very finger points. "I think you must be making a mistake," she said. "I scarcely know Mr. Ridsdale at all. He has called here twice — on business — for Lady Caroline —— and now he has gone away."

"Gone away!" the captain said, his face lengthening with disappointment and dismay; "gone away! then you're a fool — a greater fool than I thought you. What's to become of you, do you ever ask yourself? Good lord, what a chance to throw away! One of the Courtland family — a fellow with a turn for music — that you could have turned round your little finger! And to let him go away! By George," said the captain, making a stride towards her, and clenching his fist in the energy of his disapproval, "I don't believe you're any child of mine. Clever — you think you're clever? and so did your mother, poor woman! but you're an idiot, that is what you are — an idiot! to let such a chance slip through your fingers. Good lord! to think such a fool should be a child of mine!"

Lottie stood her ground firmly. She was not afraid of the clenched fist, nor even of the angry voice and eyes which were more genuine. If there was a slight tremor in her, it was of her own excited nerves. She made no reply; if she had spoken, what could she have done but express her own passionate loathing for his advice, and for his disapproval, and perhaps even for himself? for she had not been brought up to reverence the faulty father, whose evil qualities her mother had discussed in Lottie's presence as long as she could remember. There had not been any illusion in his children's eyes after their babyhood, in respect to Captain Despard, and perhaps in the present emergency this was well. She stood and met his fury, pale, but more disdainful than des-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

perate. It was no more than she would have expected of him had she ever thought of the emergency at all.

Law had heard the sound of the battle from afar; he heard his father's voice raised, and the sound of the stroke upon the table with which he had emphasized one of his sentences. It was a godsend to the unenthusiastic student to be disturbed by anything, and he came in sauntering with his hands in his pockets, partly with the intention of taking Lottie's part, partly for the sake of "the fun," whatever it might be. "What's the row?" he asked. He had slippers on, and shuffled along heavily, and his coat was very old and smelt of tobacco, though that was a luxury in which Law could indulge but sparingly. He had his hands in his pockets, and his hair was well rubbed in all directions by the efforts he had made over his unbeloved books. Thus it was but a slovenly angel that came to Lottie's aid. He stopped the yawn which his "reading" had brought on, and looked at the belligerents with some hope of amusement. "I say, don't bully Lottie," he exclaimed, but not with any fervor. He would not have allowed any one to lay a finger upon her, but a little bullying, such as she administered to him daily, that perhaps would do Lottie no harm. However, he was there in her defence if things should come to any extremity. She was of his faction, and he of hers; but yet he thought a little bullying of the kind she gave so liberally might do Lottie no harm.

"Go away, Law; it is no matter; it is nothing. Papa was only communicating some of his ideas — forcibly," said Lottie, with a smile of defiance; but, as there was always a fear in her mind lest these two should get into collision, she added hastily, "Law, I don't want you — go away."

"He can stay," said the captain. "I have something to say to you both. Look here. I thought in the first place that she had hit off something for herself," he said, turning half round to his son. "I thought she had caught that fellow, that Ridsdale; from what I had heard, I thought that was certain — that there would be no difficulty on that side."

The captain had left his original ground. Instead of reproaching Lottie, in which he was strong, he was in the act of disclosing his own intentions, and this was much less certain ground. He looked at Law, and he wavered. Big lout! he knew a great deal too much already. Captain Despard looked at Law as at a possible rival, a being who had been thrust into his way. The workroom had no secrets from Law.

"I think the governor's right there," said Law confidentially; "he's a big fish, but he's all right if you give him time."

New fury blazed on Lottie's face. She, too, clenched her hands passionately. She stamped her foot upon the floor. "How dare you?" she said, "how dare you insult me in my own home, you two men? Oh, yes, I know who you are — my father and my brother, my father and my brother! the two who ought to protect a girl and take care of her! Oh, is it not enough to make one hate, and loathe and despise!" said Lottie, dashing her white clenched hands into the air. Tears that seemed to burn her came rushing from her eyes. She looked at them with wild indignation and rage, in which there was still a certain appeal. How could they, how could they shame a girl so? They looked at her for a moment in this rage, which was so impotent and so pitiful, and then they gave a simultaneous laugh. When an exhibition of passionate feeling does not overawe, it amuses. It is so ludicrous to see a creature crying, weeping, suffering for some trifle which would not in the least affect ourselves. Lottie was struck dumb by this laugh. She gave a startled look up at them through those hot seas of salt, scalding tears that were in her eyes.

"What a fool you are making of yourself!" said the captain. "Women are the greatest fools there are on this earth, always with some high-flown rubbish or other in their stupid heads. Your own home! and who made it your home, I should like to know? That's simple enough. And I don't say you hadn't a right to shelter when you were a little thing; but that's long out of the question. A girl of twenty ought to be thinking about getting herself a real home of her own. How are you going to do it? that's the question. You are not going to stay here to be a burden upon me all your life, and what do you mean to do?"

"I will go to-morrow!" cried Lottie wildly; "I would go to-night if it were not dark. I will go — and free you of the burden!" Here she stopped; all the angry color went out of her face. She looked at them with great, wide eyes, appalled; and clasped her hands together with a lamentable cry. "Oh! but I never thought of it before, I never thought of it!" she cried; "where am I to go?"

Law's heart smote him; he drew a step nearer to her. To agree with his father (however much in his heart he agreed with

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

his father) was abandoning his sister — and his own side. "He doesn't mean it," he said soothingly in an undertone; "he only wants to bully you, Lottie. Never mind him, we'll talk it over after," and he put his big hand upon her shoulder to console her. Lottie turned upon him, half furious, half appealing. She could not see him till two big tears fell out of her eyes, and cleared her sight a little. She clutched at the hand upon her shoulder in her distraction and despair.

"Come with me, Law! Two of us together, we can go anywhere; two can go anywhere. Oh! how can you tell me never to mind? Do you hear me?" she cried, seizing his arm with both her hands, half shaking him, half clinging to him; "say you will come with me, Law!"

"Stop this stuff!" said the captain. "I am not telling you to go; I am telling you what is your plain duty, the only thing a woman is fit for. Besides, this young fellow would be of great use to me; it's your duty to get hold of him for the good of the family. He might say a good word for me at the Horse Guards; he might get Law something. I never expected you would have such a chance! Do you think I want you to go away just when there's a chance that you might be of some use? Am I a fool, do you think? You'll stay where you are, Lottie Despard! you'll not go disgracing your family, governessing, or anything of that sort."

"Ah!" said Law suddenly, "she'll wish she had listened to the signor now."

"To the signor? what of the signor? is he after her too?" cried the captain eagerly. A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush; and though the signor had no interest with the Horse Guards, he had money, and might be of use in many ways. Captain Despard's eyes lightened up. "Whew!" he whistled. "Lottie! so, my child, you've got two strings to your bow?"

Lottie turned upon her brother, whose arm she had been holding with both her hands. She pushed him, flung him from her with an energy of which she had not appeared capable, and throwing her head high, looked her father in the face and walked out of the room. Law, confounded by the force with which she threw him from her, caught at her angrily as she passed; but she pulled her dress from his hand, and walked past him with a contempt that stung him — callous as he was. As for the captain, he made no effort to detain her, partly because of his surprise, partly that he was anxious to have more information about (as he supposed) this second suitor. She went straight to her own room, while they stood listening till she had shut the door upon herself and her passion. Then the captain ventured to laugh again, but low, not to be heard; for the look of any creature driven to bay is alarming, and Lottie's sudden withdrawal was a relief.

"Whoever gets her will catch a tartar! eh, Law?" he said. "But now that she's gone, let's hear all about the signor."

There was no light in Lottie's room; nothing but the faint starlight outside, and as much of the familiar glimmer of the few feeble lamps in the Dean's Walk as could get in through her small window. How is it that so small a bit of space, such four strait walls, should hold in such a throbbing, palpitating, agitated being, with projects wide enough and fury hot enough to burst them like a child's toy? It was in her to have torn her hair or anything that came in the way of her fevered hands; to have filled the air with cries; to have filled the whole world with her protest against this intolerable shame and wretchedness which had come upon her. But she only threw herself on her bed in the dark and silence, letting no sound or movement betray her. She was not prostrated as by unkindness, or stung by reproach; but wounded, shamed, desecrated — the very sanctity of her dreams turned into a horror to her. And Law gone against her — Law gone over to the other side!

From Nature.

THE COMING TOTAL SOLAR ECLIPSE.

THERE is no doubt whatever that the eclipse which will sweep over the United States next July will be observed as no eclipse has ever been observed before. The wealth of men, the wealth of instruments, and the wealth of skill in all matters astronomical already accumulated there, makes us old-country people almost gasp when we try to picture to ourselves what the golden age will be like there, when already they are so far ahead of us in so many particulars.

Draper, Hall, Harkness, Holden, Langley, Newcomb, Peters, Peirce, Pickering, Rutherford, Trouvelot, and last, but not least, Young, are the names that at once run easily off the pen to form a skeleton list, capable of considerable expansion

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

with a little thought, when one thinks of the men who will be there. One knows too that all the enthusiasm of devoted students and all the appliances of modern science — appliances in the creation of which many of those named have borne so noble a part — will not be lacking. So that we may be sure that not only all old methods but all possible new ones will be tried to make this year one destined to be memorable in the annals of science side by side with 1706, 1851, 1860, and other later years.

Thank Heaven, too, there is no necessity that the thankless task of organizing an "Eclipse Expedition" from this country should fall on any unfortunate individual, among other reasons because — and this is a very hopeful sign of increasing general interest taken in scientific work — Messrs. Ismay, Imray and Co., the owners of the White Star Line, have expressed in the warmest manner their desire to aid English observers by a considerable reduction of fares, and the directors of the Pennsylvanian Railway Company, as the readers of Nature have already been made aware, have done the like in the case of observers coming from Europe in their individual capacity.*

The progress in that branch of knowledge which requires the aid of eclipse observations has been so rapid during the last few years that the eclipse of 1868, though it happened only ten years ago, seems to be as far removed from the present as the Middle Ages are in regard to many other branches of culture. The work done by the spectroscope since that year, when, in the hands of Janssen, Pogson, Herschel, and others, it added so enormously to our knowledge, has gradually covered larger and larger ground, and each successive eclipse in 1869, 1870, 1871 and 1875, has seen some variations in its use, so that its employment has proved the most novel, if not the most powerful, side of the attack.

Young's work of 1869 will no doubt form the key-note of much that will be done this year so far as the coronal atmosphere is concerned. It will be remembered that Young in 1869 observed a continuous spectrum, while Janssen in 1871 observed a non-continuous one, for he recorded the presence of the more prominent Fraunhofer lines, notably D. This positive observation from so distinguished an observer demands attention, not only on its own account, but because of the question which hangs upon it, which is this: does the corona reflect solar light to us or does it not, and if it does, where are those particles which thus act as reflectors? On this point the photographs taken in Siam in 1875 are silent, as the method employed was not intended to discriminate between a continuous and a discontinuous spectrum.

But although this point remains, how greatly has the ground been cleared since 1869! That wonderful line, "1474," is more familiar to us now; and yet there has been almost a chapter of accidents about it. In the first place, with regard to this line above all others, there appears to be a mistake in Angström's map; the solar line at 1474 is not due to iron at all; with the most powerful arc there is no iron line to be seen there. Then Secchi attributed it to hydrogen, though I am not aware on what evidence. But whatever be its origin, the fact remains that we now know by its means that the solar hydrogen is traversed and enwrapped by the substance which gives rise to the line to an enormous height, so that it forms the highest portion of the atmosphere which is hot enough to render its presence manifest to us by spectral lines. Here, so far as I know, only one point of difference remains. In 1871 I most distinctly saw the line trumpet-shaped, that is, with the base broadening as the spectrum of the photosphere was reached, while Janssen saw it stopping short of the spectrum of the photosphere. The importance of this point is that supposing one of us to be mistaken and one or other observation to represent a constant condition, then, if the line broadens downwards till the sun is reached we are dealing with a gas lighter than hydrogen, capable of existing at a high temperature, which thins out as the other gases and vapors do in consequence of its vapor-density being below that of hydrogen; or, on the other hand, if the line stops short as a constant condition, it represents a substance which is probably dissociated at the lower levels, and is therefore probably a compound gas; and then the question arises whether it has not hydrogen as one of its constituents.

Perhaps I may conveniently refer to a paper of mine which was read at the Royal Society last Thursday in this connection, because it may be that the solar regions most worthy of the closest study at

* In fact Messrs. Ismay, Imray and Co. have just announced that they will take properly certified observers and bring them home again for the sum of 20*l*., which is rather less than first-class single fare; so that English observers will be carried to Denver or the Rocky Mountains and back again for the sum of 34*l*.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

the present time are precisely these higher reaches of the sun's atmosphere. There is little doubt, I think, that around the sun's visible atmosphere matter exists at a temperature low enough not to give us its autobiography in the bright-line manner, and there is evidence that matter existing under such conditions, absorbing as it must do some of the sun's light, will, if it remains elemental, give us an absorption of the fluted kind, or again will absorb only in the blue or ultra-violet region.

Now the more the chemistry of the reversing lower layer of the sun's atmosphere — that in which the upper level of the photosphere is bathed — is examined the more metallic it is found to be. For instance, my own work has enabled me to trace with more or less certainty eighteen metallic elements,* in addition to those recorded by previous observers; but of metalloids in this region I have traced none. The persistency with which metal after metal revealed itself to the exclusion of the metalloids led me to throw out the idea some time ago, that perhaps the metalloids lay as a whole above the metals, and shortly afterwards I obtained evidence which seemed to me of a very satisfactory nature as to the existence of carbon, its presence in the sun's atmosphere being rendered probable by fluted bands, and not by lines. There were two points, however, which remained to be settled before the matter could be considered to be placed beyond all doubt.

The first was to establish that the fluted bands generally present in the spectrum of the electric arc, as photographed, which bands vary very considerably in strength according to the volatility of the metal under experiment, were really bands of carbon — a point denied by Angström and Thalèn.

This point I have settled by two photographs, in which the carbon bands remain the same, though one spectrum is that of carbon in air, the other of carbon in dry chlorine.

The next point was to insure accuracy by the most positive evidence that there was absolutely no shift in the carbon bands. Such a shift is produced when the part of the arc photographed is not perfectly in the prolongation of the axis of the collimator of the spectroscope. Its effect is to throw the lines of iron, for instance, a little to the right or a little to the left of the Fraunhofer lines with which they really correspond.

I have now obtained a photograph which supplies such evidence. There are metallic lines close to the carbon bands which are prolongations of Fraunhofer's lines, while the lines which I have already mapped at W. L., 39·27 and 39·295, in the spectrum of iron, are also absolute prolongations. Therefore there is no shift in the carbon flutings, and the individual members of the fluted spectra in the brightest portion are absolute prolongations of a fine series of Fraunhofer lines in the ultra-violet.

Now how does this connect itself with observations of the upper parts of the solar atmosphere?

Angström has already shown that the true carbon lines which we get when a coil and jar are employed are not reversed in the spectrum of the sun, and I have already shown that the calcium spectrum in the sun is similar to the spectrum obtained when the spark, and not the arc, is employed. Accompanying the change from a high to a higher temperature, there is a change in the intensity of the lines — some thicken, others become thinner. We can only match the relative thickness of the solar calcium lines by employing a very powerful coil and jar — so powerful, indeed, that the lines, and not the flutings, of carbon would be visible in the spark given by it. It is fair then to say that if carbon were present with the calcium in the sun's reversing layer, we should get the lines of carbon when we get the calcium lines appearing as they do.

As we do not get this evidence, we are driven to the conclusion that the carbon vapor exists not only in a more complicated molecular condition (as is evinced by the flutings) than the metallic vapors in the sun's atmosphere, but at a lower temperature. It must, therefore, exist above the chromosphere, that is, in a region of lower temperature. Lower pressure, again is indicated by the feeble reversal, so that everything points to a high level.

The question is, will this region be recognized during the coming eclipse?

Coming down lower we reach a level better known, and of which, perhaps, the interest during the eclipse will now be less, if we except the possibilities opened out to us by photography. One good photograph of the lines visible in the lower chromosphere will be of incalculable value. Attempts may be made on the cusps just before and after totality, and if only one

* These are strontium, lead, cadmium, potassium, cerium, uranium, vanadium, palladium, molybdenum, indium, lithium, rubidium, cœsium, bismuth, tin, lanthanum, glucinum, and yttrium or erbium.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

of these succeeds we shall have the ordinary solar spectrum as a scale. If good pictures near H can be secured, enough information now exists for that region to enable us to determine the chemical origin of the bright lines photographed. These remarks apply to attempts made with spectroscopes furnished with slits in the ordinary way; there is little doubt, however, that the method utilized for the Siam eclipse in 1875, the method suggested by Prof. Young and myself for the Indian eclipse of 1871, will also be taken advantage of; here the chromosphere itself becomes the slit. A dispersed series of spectral images of the thing itself, instead of the spectrum of a part of the image of it focussed on a slit is obtained, the position of each image in the spectrum enabling its chemical origin to be ascertained if only a comparison spectrum can be secured at the same time.

In 1875, in the expedition to Siam, the photographs of this nature were obtained by means of a prism, and the results obtained by that expedition led me to think that, possibly, this method of using the coronal atmosphere as a circular slit might be applied under very favorable conditions if the prism, or train of prisms, hitherto employed, were replaced by a reflection grating, with which the generosity of Mr. Rutherford has made many of us familiar, for the simple reason that while a prism only gives us one spectrum, a brilliant grating placed at right angles to an incident beam gives us spectra of different orders, so-called, on each side of the line, perpendicular to its surface. Of these two or three are bright enough to be utilized on each side, so that we can get six in all.

To test this notion I made the following experiment with a grating given to me by Mr. Rutherford. This magnificent instrument contains seventeen thousand two hundred and eighty lines to the inch, ruled on glass and silvered; its brilliancy is remarkable.

In front of the condenser of an electric lamp adjusted to throw a parallel beam, I placed a circular aperture, cut in cardboard, forming a ring some two inches in interior diameter, the breadth of the ring being about one-eighth of an inch. This was intended to represent the chromosphere, and formed my artificial eclipse.

At some distance from the lamp I mounted a three and three-fourths inch Cooke telescope. Some distance short of the focus I placed the grating; the spectrum of the circular slit illuminated by sodium vapor and carbon vapor was photographed for the first, second, and third orders on one side. The third-order spectrum, showing the exquisite rings due to the carbon-vapor flutings, was produced in forty-two seconds. The first-order spectrum, obtained in the same period of time, was very much over-exposed. It is, therefore, I think, not expecting too much that we should be able to take a photograph of the eclipse, in the third order, in two minutes. Similarly, we may hope for a photograph of the second order in two minutes, and it is, I think, highly probable also that a photograph of the first order may be obtained in one minute. To make assurance doubly sure, the whole of the totality may be used during the coming eclipse, but if there be several such attempts made it will certainly be worth while to try what a shorter exposure will do.

Now, by mounting photographic plates on both sides of the axis, one solidly mounted equatorial of short focal length may enable us to obtain several such photographs, with varying lengths of exposure. I insist upon the solidity of the mounting because, if any one plate is to be exposed during the whole of totality, the instrument must not be violently disturbed or shaken while the eclipse is going on. I think, however, it is quite possible to obtain more than one photograph of the lower-order spectra without any such disturbance in this way. The same plate may be made to record three, or even four, exposures in the case of the first order in an eclipse of four minutes' duration, by merely raising or lowering it after a given time, by mea , of a rapid screw or other equivalent contrivance, so that a fresh portion of the same plate may be exposed. Similarly, the plates on which the spectra of the second order are to be recorded may be made to perform double duty.

If one equatorial thus mounted were to be devoted to each quadrant of the coronal atmosphere, it is certain, I think, that most important results would be obtained.

It will be convenient here to give the results arrived at by the Siam expedition with an instrument of this description, which, for shortness, was called a prismatic camera.

The plates secured present at first sight a very puzzling appearance; they are unlike anything ever obtained before, and a good deal of thought had to be spent upon them before all the knowledge they were afterwards found capable of furnishing to us was properly appreciated. One of the plates was exposed for one minute at the commencement of totality, the other for two minutes at the end. The differences between them are those due to the phases of the eclipse. In the first, two strong protuberances close together are photographed; these are partially covered up in the second, while another series is revealed on the following limb in consequence of the motion of the moon over the sun.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Now in both the photographs — that exposed for one minute and that exposed for two — the strongest of the prominences are repeated three times, that is to say, three spectral images of them are visible, each of these images being produced by light of different wave-lengths which the prominences emitted.

The question is what are these particular wave-lengths thus rendered visible? Unfortunately no photograph was taken of the cusps either before or after totality; a scale therefore was out of the question; and when the task of assigning wave-lengths to these spectral images fell upon Dr. Schuster and myself, while we were preparing the report which was sent in to the Royal Society last year, the difficulties we encountered were very considerable.

Everybody I think will consider that we were justified in expecting the lines of hydrogen to be represented in such a photograph. Now the photographic hydrogen lines are those at F, near G, and at h, and the silver salts usually employed are such that the action is most intense near G, less intense near h, and least at F; the running down from G to F being rapid, and that from G to h much more gradual, so that while at one end F may be said to be the limit of photographic activity, at the other it is continued long past h. We were therefore justified in assuming as the preliminary hypothesis, that the image of least refrangibility was produced by the F light of hydrogen, the more so as the continuous spectrum also photographed — which continuous spectrum, as we had independent means of determining, came from the base of the corona — gave us also an idea of the part of the spectrum in which each image was located.

Taking then F as a starting-point and assuming the next line to be the one near G, we had a quite satisfactory method of checking the assumption, by comparing the real distance between the images with the calculated one.

A goniometer was therefore brought into requisition, and the angular distance between F and the line near G carefully measured in order to determine the dispersion of the prism actually employed. This dispersion was one which should bring the images about as far apart as they were actually found to be; this therefore was so far in favor of our assumption, that is to say, it did look as if we had got hold, on the photographs, of images of the prominences built up by the F and G light of hydrogen.

It was next the turn of the third line, the one at h. On the assumption already made, it was easy to determine the distance from the G image, at which the one representing h should lie. In this place, however, we found no image whatever of any of the prominences.

Now this was a very extraordinary result, and there was only one way, so far as we could then see, of accounting for it. Dr. Frankland and myself, nearly ten years ago now, produced evidence which seemed to indicate that this line of hydrogen was only produced by a very high temperature. This being so, then, we should have to conclude that the prominences were of a relatively low temperature; this, however, I am far from saying, and here there is undoubted work of the greatest value to be done at the next eclipse, and I for one feel certain that our American cousins will do it.

I have not, however, yet referred to the strongest image of all shown in the photographs. This lies a little further from the central one than does the first on the other side of it. On the assumption before stated its wave-length lies somewhere near 3957. This number, of course, is only an approximate one, but the region occupied by the line was obviously so near the boundary of the visible spectrum, that a long series of experiments, in which we called in the aid of photography and fluorescence, was made in order to determine whether an unrecorded hydrogen line existed in that region. All I can say is that the point may be said to be yet undetermined. It is quite true that in several vacuum tubes which Dr. Schuster and myself employed, a strong line more refrangible than H was seen, but then these same tubes unfortunately showed us lines in the visible spectrum, which beyond all doubt did not belong to hydrogen. The elimination of impurities is such a delicate matter, and one requiring such a large expenditure of time, that our report was sent in leaving this point sub judice. We tried hydrogen at atmospheric pres-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

sure in order to get such a predominance of the hydrogen vibrations as to mask the impurities, but this did not serve us, for the continuous spectrum was so bright in the violet and ultra-violet as to render observations of lines next to impossible. Owing to many reasons, Dr. Schuster's absence from London being one of them, we have not been able to renew the search.

The near coincidence of this spectral image with the H line leads us to ask the question whether Young's beautiful work in his mountain observatory might not help us on this point. Young found the calcium lines always reversed in the penumbra, and near every large spot. This important statement shows us that calcium is one of the metallic vapors which is most frequently ejected from below into the prominences; it is possible, therefore, that the prominences, the spectral images of which were photographed, may have been due to an eruption of calcium. This, of course, is only a suggestion, but the fact that it is a suggestion merely shows how important it is that this point should engage attention next July. If the prominences are then constituted as they were in '75, this violet line will doubtless turn up again, and that is why I have been most anxious to point out not only the conclusions to which we have been led, but the extreme difficulty of arriving at any conclusion whatever, unless by one method or another we have an absolute comparison of the spectrum of the prominences with that of the sun itself.

I have before referred to the fact of the registration on the plates of a continuous spectrum. If we were to suppose the whole light of the corona to be due to 1474 light, for instance, we should expect to get just as definite an image of the corona in the prismatic camera as in an ordinary one. And if everything outside the moon gave us nothing but a line spectrum, the moon's limb would have a perfectly defined edge. Now as a matter of fact, only one such edge is seen in the photographs. We have only one complete ring with a thoroughly defined hard outline, such as that to which reference has been made. This hard ring corresponds to the second spectral image of the prominences, and is a continuation of it. Supposing we were right about the prominences, the ring would be due to the high-temperature h line of hydrogen (supposing us wrong it might be a companion line to 1474); as the observations of Respighi, Janssen, and others, in the Indian eclipse of '71 endorsed the American observations of '69 that the hydrogen lines are the strongest in the photographic parts of the corona, we may very possibly be really dealing with hydrogen.

Now the edge of the corona, or the upper part of it considering it as the sun's atmosphere, as seen on our photographs, is precisely such as would be given by homogeneous light; that is, there is a distinct image, and there is one image and not three or any other number. Have we any means of determining the wave-length of the light by which this image has been produced? Let me give an idea of one method which we employed. A circle of the same size as the image of the moon on a photographic enlargement of the original negative was cut in paper and placed over the enlargement until the corona was symmetrical round it, as we know it to have been symmetrical round the moon's body, or nearly so, at that phase of the eclipse.

We found as a considerable endorsement of the assumption which we made regarding the hydrogenic origin of the chromospheric images, that the paper circle in this position had its circumference coincident with the hard ring to which I have referred as being a continuation of the middle spectral image of the prominences. Next, one of the ordinary photographs of the corona was enlarged to the same size as that of the one produced in the prismatic camera. When these were superposed so that the outlines of both coincided as much as possible, it was again found that the edge of the moon lay along the ring.

Now then for the continuous spectrum. The general woolliness of the photographs which at first sight gives rise to the idea that they were out of focus, and that there is nothing to be got out of them, is of course only in one direction, that at right angles to the edge of the prism employed. There is a well-defined structure running parallel to this direction, which of course is the line of dispersion; this structure is doubtless due to irregularities in the corona, drawn out by the prism into bands; it is easy to determine the limits of this continuous spectrum.

Examining the centre of the photographs we find that on one side the structure stops short at F, on the other it extends to a considerable distance beyond the prominence image in the ultra-violet, spaces of light being visible beyond 3530.

From these data we concluded that the continuous-spectrum-giving region extends at least to a distance of 3′ of arc from the sun's limb. This continuous spectrum is

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

well shown on photographs taken at the beginning and end of the eclipse. One of the plates of the prismatic camera was exposed, until the signal for the end of totality was given. Dr. Schuster states that all the observers agreed that the signal was given rather too late, and the fog on the plate indicates an intense illumination; nevertheless, the edge of the sun is not drawn out into a continuous band but rather into three distinct bands. It is probable, therefore, that when the plate was exposed, only the lower part of the chromosphere had appeared, and that it gave out light of such intensity that everybody imagined that the sun itself had come out of eclipse. I observed this myself in 1871, and a very striking fact it is.

So much then for the results obtained by the prismatic camera in '75. When the report is issued — and its issue cannot be much longer delayed — it will be seen that the hasty sketch I have now given can be followed in greater detail.

One of the most remarkable points about the expedition to Siam was the failure to obtain even spectra of the sun with the ordinary telespectroscopic cameras employed. No doubt the unforeseen delays which left very little time for the adjustment of instruments, have a great deal to answer for. I have little doubt that if the attempt is made next July, when any quantity of skilled help will be at hand, and any amount of rehearsal will be possible, that a full measure of success will be obtained, at all events for the most photographic part of the spectrum. An ordinary photograph of the corona was obtained by Dr. Schuster in two seconds; and my experience with photographic spectra enables me to say that this photograph was taken by means of an almost monochromatic light — that near G. Now as the coming eclipse will enable an exposure of almost one hundred times longer than this to be employed, I do not think that the undoubted feebleness of the object need be feared. Besides, this method would enable us to pick up the light of those lower reaches of the chromosphere which, as has been already stated, are of such extreme brilliancy as to have been mistaken, on many occasions, for the sun itself.

Up to the present time no attempt has been made to obtain a photographic record of the polarization of the corona. The difference of colors indicating radial polarization observed by me when I used the biquartz in 1871, certainly have left the impression on my mind that it would be quite easy to obtain a permanent record of them. This would be a very valuable result, and one which would set at rest a question which, though I consider it settled in my own mind, is yet, I believe, held to be still doubtful by many interested in these matters.

In what I have written I have touched only upon obvious work suggested by the previous observations. I have little doubt that the preparations of the skilled astronomers of the United States include many surprises and daring attempts among the solid work which we are quite certain of.

All here wish them the extremest measure of success, which I am sure their efforts will do more than command.

J. NORMAN LOCKYER.

From Fraser's Magazine.

ON KEEPING SILENCE FROM GOOD WORDS.

WHY should the simple and reverent mention of the name of God in conversation at an ordinary dinner party cause a sudden chill, an awkward break in the conversation, as though some solecism, some offence against good manners, had been committed? Why should any approach to a discussion on religious subjects be impossible in general society? People talk freely enough on politics, on art, on science, on literature; more freely still on the mere personal gossip of the day; the one subject which is by general consent proscribed is that which by general consent is allowed to be the most important, and which one might therefore suppose to be the most interesting. It is worth while to inquire into the cause of so singular a phenomenon.

The first and most obvious answer to the question which we have proposed would be, that this reticence arises from reverence. No one, it will be said, talks much in ordinary company of that which he most reveres; in calling such subjects sacred, we imply that they are not to be profaned by rude handling, but are to be kept as it were in a shrine apart from the traffic of the everyday world. It may be so; and yet if it be so, it is a phenomenon peculiar to us English Protestants. For the Hebrew of old, whose reverence as uttered by psalmists and prophets has been the type of all the deepest thoughts of men ever since, habitually spoke with his neighbor of God and of divine things. "As the Lord liveth," seemed to him

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the simplest and most natural way of affirming his belief in what he said. The Mahomedan has no lack of reverence; yet it is as natural to him to speak of Allah as it is to us to speak of nature; nor would it be easy to find words more deeply reverent, more touchingly natural, or more simply pathetic than those of the aged Nanyk Pasha, who in lamenting the fall of his nation said to the correspondent of the Daily News, "Allah is great. If he wills that we are to come through this trouble, he will find means to do so. We have done our best. We have now no help, no hope, but in him. If he wills that we are to perish, we are content." The English Puritan of the seventeenth century, though he did not express it in the same conventional forms with ourselves, was full of reverence for the unseen world; yet he, like the Hebrew of the Old Testament whom in so many other respects he resembled, habitually and naturally spoke of the unseen as though it were the world in which he lived and moved. Or, to come nearer to our own day, the Tyrolese peasant who raises his hat to each roadside crucifix that he passes, speaks of the liebe Herr Gott as familiarly as he does of the officials of his native village. It is true that a cultivated mind will shrink from a familiarity of speech which to a ruder taste will seem natural; yet there is, one should think, some medium between over-familiarity and the total ignoring of the subject.

A very different answer to our question will be given by many in the present day. Of course, they will say, people nowadays do not speak of religion, because they do not really believe in it. The Hebrew, who believed that God was about his path and about his bed; the Mahomedan, who believes that Allah compasses him round by an iron chain of destiny; the Puritan, who believed that he and the ruler of the universe were bound to each other by a special covenant — these believed, and therefore spoke: but the modern Englishman, who believes in evolution and natural laws, and to whom therefore the old idea of a deity regulating and arranging from hour to hour all the affairs of men and the course of nature is altogether foreign, will talk of a science which he believes, and not of a religion which he does not believe. Here probably we have got somewhat nearer to the root of the matter. No doubt, a very considerable number of our most highly educated and thoughtful men have ceased to hold any definite form of religious belief; yet for the most part these are the very men who do not shrink from speaking, and speaking out, on religious subjects; you will be more likely to hear a religious discussion introduced by a scientific agnostic than by an orthodox man of business who goes as regularly to church on Sundays as he does to his office on week-days, and perhaps with the same business like view of providing comfortably for the future. Exactly so, will be the reply: your man of science at least knows what he believes and what he does not, and so he handles religious subjects as freely as he does others; whereas your man of business thinks he believes a good deal about religion, but in the inner recesses of his soul there lurks a dim consciousness that after all his believing is rather make-believe, and so he prudently eschews religious topics and confines himself to what he does thoroughly believe in, the price of stocks or the tendency of dry goods. Still, this does not after all completely satisfy the question: for there are numbers of intelligent and open-minded men who are in the position neither of our man of science nor of our man of business, but who, whether or not they may accept all the details of orthodox theology, do yet heartily believe in Christianity, and find in it the comfort and stay of their lives; and yet these men, though they sincerely regard religion as of all subjects the most important, would feel uncomfortable and distressed if it were introduced into discussion or conversation. We must therefore look somewhat farther for our answer.

Another reason which may very plausibly be alleged is this. On almost all other subjects men can agree to differ; on science, on art, on literature, persons may hold very different views, and yet be able to discuss them quietly and freely; even on politics, men no longer quarrel and renounce each other's acquaintance as they did fifty years ago: but religious questions are almost sure to generate heat. Nor is it difficult to account for this. The belief universal in the Middle Ages, that the divine judgment of a man depends not on his works, but on his opinions, that a mistake in religious dogma is not a mistake merely but a sin, and that a miscreant is a wicked man, has laid a strong hold not on language only, but also on those floating impressions which, rarely sifted or inquired into, are the motive springs of most men's actions. And hence, many a man who thinks his neighbor only a fool for agreeing with Lord Beaconsfield or with Mr. Gladstone, thinks him a bad

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

man for agreeing with Dr. Pusey or with Bishop Colenso; and so thinking, while in a political discussion — unless perhaps on the eve of a general election — he will usually keep his temper, on a religious question he will take fire and blaze forth into divine wrath. Indeed, it is a curious confirmation of this view, that political questions seem to excite strong feeling in proportion as the religious element enters into them. Of all home questions in our day, that of the Irish Church disestablishment has probably stirred more bitter feeling than any other; and — discreditable as such an avowal must be to the common sense of Englishmen — it can hardly be doubted that some additional acrimony has — very unnecessarily — been imported into the Eastern question by the fact that the High Church clergy have unanimously and enthusiastically taken the Russian, or at least the anti-Turkish side. If intolerance is to exist, it is no doubt better that it should kindle hot words than blazing faggots; but one cannot help hoping that with the progress of intelligence men may come to perceive that in theology, as in all other branches of knowledge, the air which by stagnating is apt to become unwholesome, is stirred and freshened by discussion, and that if they will discuss temperately and without heat, they may probably find that their differences are less than they imagined.

But we must look deeper yet for the ground-cause of the universal reticence on religious topics; and we shall find it in a change which has silently taken place in the conception of what religion is. We hear it commonly said, that religion is a matter entirely between a man and his God — the possessive pronoun in itself seeming to indicate a kind of separate interest as it were — and that the salvation of his own soul is the one supremely important matter for each man. And from this view of religion it naturally follows that to speak of religion means with most people to speak of their own inward condition, of their spiritual symptoms, of their growth in the spiritual life. Such religious speech, unless it be between those who are so one in heart and soul that it becomes rather thought than speech, is of all things the most unwholesome. For there is a spiritual as there is a bodily reserve and modesty, the violation of which leads to the loss of self-reverence, and to the profanation of that which is most sacred. But this view of religion is a wholly modern one. To the Hebrew, whose State was his Church and whose Church was his State, whose public proclamation began not with "N. by the grace of God of the kingdom of Israel king," but with "Thus saith Jehovah" — to the Hebrew, whose politicians were inspired prophets and whose view of foreign nations was that all the gods of the heathen were but idols, but that Jehovah had chosen Jacob for himself and Israel for his own possession, to him not to speak of religion would have been simply to keep silence, for his daily life, his politics, his commerce with foreign nations, his wars, his treaties, his most private domestic relations, were all part of his religion. The Hebrew worship was the social life of the nation: the Hebrew scriptures were its literature. When Judaism passed into Christianity, the idea of the holy nation was superseded by that of the Church, and thus political and national relations unhappily lost their religious character, and for a time, partly under the influence of the expectation of the approaching end of all things, men's interests and thoughts were centred upon the unseen world. At such a time, the danger would be not of reticence on religious subjects, but of neglect and contempt of secular life. Still, the spirit of Christianity proclaims unmistakably the sacredness of common life; the monastic or ascetic principle, which cuts human life into two parts, one religious, the other secular, is not a true reading of the Christian law; where that law has been understood in its true import, there men have learnt that the domestic, the social, the political, and not the monastic, is the truly religious life. And hence, wherever religion has been understood not as a mere scheme for saving individual souls from future punishment, but as a kingdom of heaven on earth, wherever the religious life has been not the mere refined selfishness by which each several man tries to make the best terms he can for himself against a future life, but the struggle of mankind after clearer light and purer life, there men have not been ashamed to speak openly of it, because it is in fact nothing else than politics, art, science, and every other human interest looked at in their nobler and divine aspect.

If, then, this view of the matter is a true one, it would appear that the excessive reticence on religious subjects of which we have spoken arises not so much from reverence or from scepticism as from the individualism which is so marked a characteristic of modern religion, and which is the direct outcome of the Evangelical

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

movement. For this movement ignored the idea of the Church as a spiritual society, and — perhaps from the necessity of its position — addressed itself simply and solely to the work of quickening into life individual souls. How admirably it did this work, how it stirred with new life a whole generation of men, how Bristol colliers and Welsh quarrymen and Suffolk laborers and London merchants were alike melted by the eloquence, often rude enough, of men who spoke strongly because they spoke from the heart, is known to all who have read anything of the religious history of the last and the present century. But probably great part of the success of the movement depended on its strongly individual element, on its addressing men not as members one of another, but as separate souls who must answer each one for himself as he stands alone before his Judge. By such a course, it forced upon men a sense of personal responsibility, but it also impressed upon the popular religion a character of isolation, of independence, which has for a time at least destroyed much that was lovely in earlier types of Christianity. From this has arisen that "dissidence of dissent," that "spirit of disruption," which regards continually multiplying religious divisions not as a perhaps inevitable source of weakness, not as an evil to be endured so long as it cannot be cured, but as the ideal of religious liberty, a grand achievement reserved for the nineteenth century. And from this it has resulted that religion, instead of being regarded simply as the heavenward aspect of all things human, has come to be looked upon as the relation between the individual soul and its divine master. Such a relation cannot but be most sacred, most delicate; to reveal it to the general eye, to make it a subject of discussion whether with a friend or with a spiritual director, unless under the urgent need of spiritual sympathy or counsel, must blunt the sensitiveness of the soul, and injure that spiritual modesty and reserve without which religion loses all its loveliness. To talk of religion, if by religion we mean the inner secrets of the soul, must have upon most persons a somewhat hardening effect, and may very easily end in substituting words and professions for the deeper realities of the spiritual life.

But it may be objected that the Evangelical school of theology, far from discouraging religious conversation, has been the one school which has most markedly encouraged it; and that it is among professors of this form of religion almost exclusively that such conversation prevails. Most true. But while this fact testifies to the reality of conviction with which such persons hold their view of religion, it cannot be denied that to those who have not been brought up in the peculiarities of this school the way in which things sacro digna silentio are or used to be spoken of familiarly, not in the exceptional confidence of intimate friendship, but in ordinary intercourse, gives a painful sense if not of unreality, at least of unfitness and indecorum. And on those who have been brought up from childhood in Evangelical ways, the encouragement to talk of their spiritual condition and to lay bare the secrets of their souls is a perilous temptation to the fatal habit of letting words outrun the truth, of saying more instead of less than they feel. If religion is indeed a matter entirely between each man and his God, then religious conversation must be, except in very rare cases, the profanation of the holy of holies.

But there is, as we have tried to show, a higher and a nobler conception of religion, a conception which alone fits it for universal acceptance, which makes it the bond of human society, the consecrating influence of all human life. To regard it as the kingdom of heaven upon earth, as that which regulates the relation not of the individual soul only, but of the family, the nation, the race, with God; as the principle which is to raise men to a higher and purer life, not hereafter only, but here and now, and which therefore has to do not only with theology but also with political economy, with social science, with education, with the thousand problems of the day; this surely would be to make it no longer a monopoly of priests and churches, but a matter also for statesmen, for social reformers, for men of science, for all who are doing any kind of work for others. If God were regarded as standing in the same relation to humanity that Queen Victoria holds theoretically towards the British Empire, to speak of him in discussing human affairs would be as natural as it is to refer to the crown in talking of government or legislation. It is because we regard him not as the common Father of all men, but as the Benefactor of a select few, that we shrink from the mention of his name in any but this intercourse of closest friends.

That the habitual and, as it were, instinctive reference of all subjects of human interest to the highest standard, is not incompatible with a hearty and genial

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

enjoyment of all simple and natural pleasures, and with a manly and unaffected life and a keen interest in all political and social questions, ought not to need proof; but it might be proved by a reference to two biographies. The lives of Thomas Arnold and of Charles Kingsley, in whatever else they may differ, agree in this, that each sets before us the portrait of a man who from his heart believed in a present God, and who was not ashamed or afraid to speak of his belief. To Arnold indeed, with his strong view of the identity of Church and State, religion and politics were but the concave and the convex side of one and the same shield; to him, in school management or teaching, in social intercourse, in correspondence with his friends, and in political pamphlets, without Christianity everything was unmeaning. He looked forward to a time when "the region of political and national questions, war and peace, oaths and punishments, economy and education, so long considered by good and bad alike as worldly and profane, should be looked upon as the very sphere to which Christian principles are most applicable." And his biographer tells us how in his ordinary school lessons, "no general teaching of the providential government of the world could have left a deeper impression, than the casual allusions to it which occurred as they came to any of the critical moments in the history of Greece and Rome." And so again in the case of Kingsley, we see at once from his letters and from his recorded words that to eliminate from his conversation all mention of the kingdom of heaven and its king would have been simply to impose upon him silence as to all that he would have considered worth speaking of: to him the drainage of Bermondsey, the relations of capital and labor, the suffrage, secular education, were not less distinctly religious questions — might he not perhaps have said that they were more religious questions? — than the constitution of Church synods, or the jarrings of discordant sects, or the minute introspection of a morbid conscience. Not that either Arnold or Kingsley had the faintest tincture of secularism: in both we recognize the same deep reverence for and delight in Scripture; in both, though under somewhat different forms, we find the same value for public worship as the expression of the social character of Christianity; in both, the apparent mixing of things religious and secular is not the lowering of the religious, but the lifting the secular into a higher sphere. And in both, too, not in spite of but in consequence of their deep sense of religion and of a present kingdom of heaven among men, we find the keenest delight in outward nature, the freshest enjoyment of out-door sports, and an almost boyish exuberance of spirits alternating with the depression to which at times both the one and the other, in common with well-nigh all great souls, were liable in presence of the contrast between what is and what might be. Certainly neither in Arnold nor in Kingsley was religion "a thing between a man's self and his Maker," any more than a man's relation to his father is independent and exclusive of his relation to his brothers and sisters and his interest in family affairs.

If the theory which we have endeavored to work out is true, it would appear that the present universal reticence on religious subjects is a not altogether healthy symptom, as indicating that the belief in a kingdom of heaven amongst men has died out, and given place to a religion of selfishness and isolation, a system of sauve qui peut, in which each one is to do the best he can for himself, naturally without saying much about it. It is an ignoble phase of religious life, and as long as it lasts the best fruits of Christianity will be blighted and lost. Religion, like all other wholesome growths, loves the sunlight and the air; if we keep it in our cellars it will wither and die, or else send up a sickly and colorless shoot, that will bear no healthy fruit. The popular religion lacks just what it would gain by light and air and discussion: it would be more tolerant, better-proportioned, less self-sufficient and less given to party spirit. At present, if religion is spoken of at all, it is assumed that this can only be between persons holding similar views; whereas if it were recognized that the essence of religion lies not in views, which are each man's specialty, but in mutual affections and common objects, which are the uniting bond of society, it would be possible for men holding quite opposite views to discuss amicably and profitably subjects lying outside their differences, and even those differences themselves as being of quite subordinate importance.

There are special cases in which a more free speech on religious subjects such as we have advocated would be of the greatest advantage. It is often said to be one of the characteristics of the present day, that fathers and sons are not on the same confidential footing that they were a generation or two back: that they no longer talk freely and unrestrainedly; that the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

father is no longer his son's confidential friend. Many causes may have conspired to produce this effect: the growing love of independence; the busy lives led by so many fathers, which cuts them off from their families; the free thought of the present day, which makes many a young man silent lest he should shock his father. But if fathers would but bring themselves to make an effort to break through this mischievous reserve — and the first move must come from them — and without giving themselves airs of superior knowledge which in many cases they do not possess, would take pains to understand their sons' point of view and to enter into their difficulties and then talk matters over with them plainly and sensibly as elder friends anxious to help them if possible by the benefit of their experience, they would in most cases find that they had won their sons' confidence once for all, and that even if their sons still took a line which they regretted, they might at any rate be one if not in opinions yet in heart.

To another class of persons the bringing religion out of the mysterious gloom of the sanctuary into the light of day would be a great and unmixed gain. To the clergy, as the authorized religious teachers of the people, it is an absolute necessity to be en rapport with the thoughts of the laity on religious subjects if they would speak from the pulpit to any effect. And yet to a considerable number — probably a large majority — of the clergy, the minds of the lay people are a closed book. Nor is the fault with either class exclusively. The clergy are too apt to adopt a professional tone on religious matters, and to regard a layman who discusses them freely as a presumptuous person requiring to be repressed. And the laity are far too shy of expressing their opinions in the presence of their spiritual pastors, lest perchance they tread on a clerical corn. It would be better for all parties if there were more freedom of speech on all sides; if a religious layman might speak out his mind, even to the extent of calling in question the reality of miracles or of suggesting a mythical element in Scripture, without arousing the wrath to which "celestial minds" are prone; and if clergymen were more ready to recognize the unsettlement of men's minds, and to discuss the questions which press upon them without heat and with an earnest desire to help them in their search after truth. As it is, the loss is greater to the clergy than to the people: often sermons which might go straight to the hearts and minds of the hearers are lost in the air because the preacher looks at things from a clerical-meeting point of view, and so he and his hearers are moving in different planes; often a clergyman, personally respected and liked, fails utterly to exercise any influence on his people's thoughts, because he has never learnt to know their minds and to enter into their ways of looking at things.

It would of course be over-sanguine to suppose that we are likely to witness any rapid or even perceptible change in this matter at present. Many may think that in presence of the wide and widening differences of religious and non-religious opinion, reticence on such matters is likely rather to increase than to diminish. Yet two encouraging facts may be noted. The interest in religious questions is certainly greater now than it was twenty years ago; the pages of almost every periodical which proposes to address the thoughtful and educated class bear witness to the fact that religion is not so nearly dead as many would persuade us. And further, such a book as "The New Republic," in which as in the later Greek comedy well-known characters are brought together on the stage under the most transparent of masks to discuss religious and social and moral questions, whatever may be thought of the taste of such a proceeding, is at least a proof that such questions are held to be susceptible of discussion among persons who differ even as to fundamental principles. And if once religion can be lifted above the level both of pietism and of ecclesiasticism to a position analogous to that which the schoolmen assigned to theology as the mater scientiarum, to the position of the all-embracing and all-pervading kingdom of heaven on earth, then we shall learn that religious conversation is not only possible but inevitable, and God and his government will no longer be the one subject on which men are agreed to keep silence.

R. E. B.

From The Spectator.

LOWER LIFE IN THE TROPICS.

In the old times, before Mr. Darwin and Mr. Wallace, when we used to know nothing about evolution or selection, or the meaning of their colors to animals and plants themselves, apart from their privilege of pleasing the human eye, we read stories of the equatorial lands with rather

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

a provoked sense of the beauty that was wasted there. We called it "wasted" in our thoughts, because to so very few it should ever be given to look up into the golden and scarlet network roofing of the primeval tropical forest, and around on an endless expanse of flower-bearing stems, with Charles Kingsley's "At last!" in the long-drawn breath of their intense satisfaction. Now the fairy-tales of science are popular reading. Mr. Wallace tells us how the plants recommend themselves by their tempting colors to the birds which are to scatter their seeds in distant places, instructs us in the domestic habits of butterflies, and the humors of orchids; describes the humming-birds, in phrases that have the swiftness of flight in them; and shows us the life that is in the equatorial forests, — so various, so vivid, and so purposeful, that we see it in our fancy without any vague discontent, and with a grander notion of its beauty, gained from the fuller revelation of its wonder.

With Mr. Wallace for our guide, for instance, we may go ashore in fancy, from an imaginary "Sunbeam," during an unfettered voyage in which

> We know the merry world is round,
> And we might sail forevermore, and find ourselves in the hill forests of Borneo, all draped with the most beautiful of orchids, the unique Vanda Lowii, whose flower-stems, sent out from small clusters of leaves, hang down eight feet in length, covered with large, symmetrical, crimson stars. Throughout the mountains of the equatorial zone we should find everywhere the wonderful flowers of which the crimson-starred streamer — festival decorations of the forest — is king, growing on the stems, the forks, or the branches of trees, abounding on fallen trunks, spreading over rocks, hanging down the face of precipices, or modestly mixing with humble grasses. And we should see the profuse, low-growing, orange star flowers on the stem of the Polyalthea, which cannot fail to attract the attention of the wandering butterflies and bees, out of whose sight they would be, if they grew in the usual way, on the tops of these small trees, overshadowed by the dense canopy above them. We should not, indeed, find the belief that in abundance and variety of floral color the tropics are preeminent, which in old times we held, justified by the facts. "Twelve years of observation among the vegetation of the eastern and western tropics has convinced me," says Mr. Wallace, "that in proportion to the whole number of species of plants, those having gaily-colored flowers are actually more abundant in the temperate zones. The Alpine meadows and rock-slopes, the open plains of the Cape of Good Hope or of Australia, and the flower-prairies of North America, offer an amount and variety of floral color which can certainly not be surpassed, even if it can be equalled, between the tropics." But not only the vastness of the primeval forest, within the equatorial zone, would overwhelm us, but the force of development and vigor of growth, and amazing variety of forms and species which everywhere meet and grow side by side. If the traveller, having overcome his first sense of lost bewilderment amid profusion, notices a particular species, and wishes to find more like it, he may often turn his eyes in vain in every direction; trees of varied forms, dimensions, and colors are around him, but rarely is any one of them repeated in that equable zone, where there is no struggle against climate, and no one type of vegetation monopolizes territory to the exclusion of the rest. We should probably look in vain, amid the vast luxuriance of palm and bamboo, with all their incalculable aid to human needs in the lands they grow in, for the larger forms of animal life, for the mammals and the reptiles are widely scattered, and shy of man; and in the Brazilian forests, and those of the Malay Archipelago especially, birds do not sing, but make pensive and mysterious sounds. Monkeys, indeed, are pre-eminently tropical and constantly on view, except in Australia, Madagascar, and New Guinea; and whether they are chattering in Asia, or roaring like lions or bulls in America, they are the liveliest and the noisiest creatures within the equatorial zone. Bats, too, are specialities of the tropics, and South America boasts a group, the "vampyre," which Mr. Wallace considers "sure to attract attention." It seems likely, especially if an individual of the group gets a chance of exercising his mysterious manœuvres on the observant traveller. The exact manner of the vampyre's attack is not known; the sufferer never feels the wound, being fanned into a deeper slumber by the motion of the wings, and "rendered insensible to the gentle abrasion of the skin, either by teeth or tongue." The tropical bats are of immense variety. One of the strangest of the living pictures presented there must be a migration of the great fruit-bats, or flying foxes. We know the shrinking, blinking creatures, something like small umbrellas

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

with broken wires, and inextricably mixed up with foxhead handles, of which we get peeps under a flap in a cage at the Zoological Gardens; but they are small specimens, and convey to us no notion of the huge, swooping things, often five feet in width across the expanded wings, which pass by in immense flocks, taking hours to do it in, and devastate the fruit plantations of the natives, who will not even eat them in revenge. They seem indeed to enjoy complete impunity, like the beautiful glow-worm, who is supposed to shine because he is not edible, and hangs out his luminous speck of warning to the insectivorous birds. We might, perchance, see such monster snakes as that one, twenty-six feet long, which Mr. St. John measured in Borneo, and we should probably be told, while sleeping in a native house, that there is a large snake in the roof, on a rat-hunting expedition, and that one need not be disturbed in case one should hear it. The slender whip-snake will glide among the bushes, and may be touched before he is seen; and the green viper, deadly and watchful, will lie coiled motionless upon foliage of his own hue, unsuspected, within a few inches of one's face, if one is a collector, which it is much safer not to be. Then there are the lizards, — no less than thirteen hundred different kinds, and almost all to be found in the tropics, thriving on the rich vegetation and the duly proportioned sunshine and moisture, and colored to harmonize with their habits and surroundings. "When I see the first lizard holding on by his feet to the side of a white wall, I feel that I am getting into the sunshine," once said a lover of the sun to the present writer; and Mr. Wallace dwells on the charm of these creatures to comers from the cold. They run along walls and palings, sun themselves on logs of wood, creep up to the eaves of cottages, scamper out of one's way in every garden, road, or sandy path, walk up smooth walls with the greatest ease, or crawl up trees, "keeping at the further side of the trunk, and watching the passer-by with the caution of a squirrel." The house lizards are grey, the rock lizards are stone-color; the forest lizards are mottled with green, like lichen-grown bark; the ground lizards are of beautiful green colors, like the tree-frogs. Not the least interesting of the forest pictures must be the latter curious reptiles, sitting quietly during the day, so as to be almost invisible, owing to their color, and their moist, shining skins, so closely resembling vegetable surfaces; and the other varieties, beautifully spotted, like large beetles, or striped with bright, staring colors. In their case, nature's wonderful law comes in to protect them; they may flaunt their red bodies and blue legs, — they are uneatable.

Among the living pictures that the tropics have to show, surely none can be more beautiful than the butterflies. Who has ever looked even at dead specimens from Malacca and from Rio de Janeiro, all stiff and dull, pinned on cardboard with their prim companions, without wondering at their beauty, without a visionary glimpse of the sun-pierced forest paths, and the fruit-bearing lands in which the splendid creatures disport themselves in life? America is richer in butterflies than the Eastern hemisphere, but everywhere those of the tropics surpass those of the temperate zone in numbers and quality. "The first sight of the great blue Morphos," says Mr. Wallace, "flapping slowly along in the forest roads near Para, of the large, white-and-black, semi-transparent Ideas, floating airily about in the woods near Malacca, and of the golden-green Ornithopteras, sailing on birdlike wing over the flowering shrubs which adorn the beach of the Ke and Aru islands, can never be forgotten by any one with a feeling of admiration for the new and beautiful in nature." The habits of the tropical butterflies are as various as their colors and forms are exquisite, and a true lover of them need never be deprived of objects of contemplation, for though the majority are "diurnal" — that is, of the early-to-bed-and-early-to-rise persuasion — some Eastern Morphidæ and an entire American family (Brassolidæ) are "crepuscular," like the "Buffalo gals" of our youth. The description of some of them, as early in the morning they expand their wings to the sun, and dart so swiftly that the eye cannot follow them, reminds one of Shelley's "embodied joy, whose race has just begun." A considerable number frequent river-sides and the margins of pools, assembling together in flocks of hundreds of individuals; but these are all males, — the females remain in the forest, where in the afternoons (presumably after their no-business hours) their partners join them. Among these exquisite creatures there are also uneatable species, who, when the crowd of floating and fluttering beauties disappear, to conceal themselves amid foliage or on sticks which harmonize with their hues, hang in their unconcealed gaudiness at the end of slender twigs or on exposed leaves.

We should be disappointed at first with the tropical birds, but after many days in

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the forest we should find out the beautiful creatures that live in its dense foliage and gloomy thickets, the parrots, the pigeons, the perching birds, in all the wonderful variety of those orders, especially in that portion of the Malay Archipelago that is east of Borneo, and in the Pacific islands, where monkeys — arboreal animals given to the eating of eggs — are not. Only in America should we find the humming-bird, that living marvel of color, exclusively tropical, though it has migrant species which visit Lake Winnipeg and the Columbia River, making journeys of full three thousand miles each spring and autumn; darting into fuchsia-flowers in the midst of a snowstorm at Terra del Fuego, and whirring about Pichincha at fourteen thousand feet above the sea. It was of a minute humming-bird, found only in the extinct crater of Chiriqua, in Veragua, that Mr. Gould said, "It seems to have caught the last spark from the volcano before it was extinguished," so flaming is the crimson of its tiny gorget. These flitting gems, these beautiful bauble-birds are extraordinarily brave and combative; we have complete tournament pictures of them from Mr. Wallace and Mr. Gosse, and of their numbers Mr. Belt says that in the part of Nicaragua where he was living they equalled in number all the rest of the birds together, if they did not greatly exceed them. How much one would like to see the nest, "no larger inside than the half of a walnut-shell, of a cup-shape, beautifully decorated with pieces of lichen, and lined with the finest and most silky fibres;" how gently, lest one should tarnish the two little white eggs by breathing on them, one would steal away from it! What pictures are conjured up by the Mexican and Peruvian names of these wonderful creatures, which mean "rays of the sun" and "tresses of the day-star"!

The scientific aspect of these living pictures has an extraordinary charm, as Mr. Wallace sets it forth. "The functional and biological classification of the colors of living organisms" sounds very imposing, but one finds the protective, warning, sexual, typical, and attractive colors all severally explained, so simply and convincingly that one rather thinks the lucidity must be somehow imputable to one's self,— and then the theory adds a tenfold interest to the scenes which have been summoned up before one's fancy. One feels deeply grateful to the profoundly scientific naturalist who teaches one so much, but does not forbid one to feel,— who classifies wonders indeed, but acknowledges them thus: "When, for the first time, the traveller wanders in these primeval forests, he can scarcely fail to experience sensations of awe, akin to those excited by the trackless ocean or the Alpine snowfields. There are a vastness, a solemnity, a gloom, a sense of solitude and of human insignificance, which for a time overwhelm him, and it is only when the novelty of these feelings has passed away that he is able to turn his attention to the separate constituents that combine to produce those emotions, and examine the varied and beautiful forms of life which, in inexhaustible profusion, are spread around him."

From The Spectator.

AMATEUR LIBRARIANS.

We would suggest to the professional librarians of the world, who have now formed themselves into an association, and hold "conferences," and possess a journal of their own, that at their next meeting they might do a little to encourage the formation and maintenance of private libraries, those small but good collections of books of which there are comparatively so few in England. Private libraries, and especially private libraries of modest dimensions, containing from two to eight thousand volumes, cannot, of course, be compared in utility with public libraries of any kind, and especially with public libraries access to which is easy; but they confer benefits of their own, nevertheless. Each family which possesses one tends to grow up cultivated, to take and to diffuse an interest in literature, and to add to the number of that useful class which publishers know to be so extremely limited, that of the buyers of serious books. These people are very meritorious in the eyes of authors, publishers, and booksellers; they are the mainstay of serious literature, and they ought to have an interest even for librarians, though the latter may look upon their efforts with contempt. Amateurs are useful, if only because they diffuse the ideas of professionals; and there are amateur librarians, as well as amateur painters, musicians, and drivers of four-in-hand. The professional librarians should encourage them a little, and help them a little, and popularize their own knowledge a little, for their benefit, and this they have as yet scarcely begun to do. There is much information about libraries in the splendidly printed quarto of "Transactions" in which the proceedings of the

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

London Conference of Librarians are reported, many valuable papers on the formation of libraries, at least one brillant burst of rhetoric — a sort of hymn, sung by Mr. Harrison over the glorious first editions which would have been in the British Museum, if the copy-tax had been enforced in England from the invention of printing — and some interesting statistics; but there are very few hints by which amateur librarians can hope to profit. One grand temptation is indeed held out to them. They are informed that the professional librarians of the world confide to them one sacred trust, — that of conveying the torch of high art in the matter of bookbinding from hand to hand through the ages. Otherwise it will go out. What with the prevalent views of utility, and the poverty of many libraries, and the stinginess of all governments, and the public preference for the insides of books, as compared with their outsides, the librarians despair of themselves doing very much for bookbinding as an art, and devolve the duty avowedly upon wealthy amateurs. That, no doubt, is a real encouragement to the amateur. He has always had a sneaking kindness for pretty bindings. He has always wanted to waste more of his disposable money on the outsides of his books, and to limit his purchases to the number he could afford to rebind, and now he has a magnificent excuse for his graceful "fad." He is a preserver of an art which otherwise might perish. He may feel, if he likes, like a prior of Monte Cassino, that he is protecting civilization, for the professional librarians have not only given up the work, but have gone in for asceticism, and preach all through this beautiful quarto the virtues of buckram, that sackcloth of the binders' art. Buckram, they say, and almost sing, is the true binding for books in a great library. Buckram, a sort of canvas of linen, costs hardly anything, will take any color, and does take six, never heats, never spoils under the fumes of gas, and will outlast any kind of leather, except, perhaps, good, sound morocco. Buckram is the binding for the sovereign people, and its sway in popular libraries ought to be universal. When the professional turns ascetic the amateur must be luxurious, and as he is inclined so to be, that is so far encouragement for him. He gets praise instead of blame for his pet vice, and moreover, may plead that he has eternal principle on his side. Squalid ugliness will never be a good, even if it is durable as well as nasty, and the amateur who will bind one shelf of books in buckram will at once perceive that in resisting the innovation he is performing a high duty to art. There are one or two hints in the quarto for the amateurs' benefit besides. It is nice for them to know that the binding they like best — good, dear, whole-colored morocco — lasts longer than any other, except vellum, which, from its ghastly monotony of dirty ugliness, may be considered out of court. Gold is thrown away on vellum, or rather, only makes its ghoul-like pallor more conspicuous; while stamps of elaborate design and labels of glorious color would each only add to it a new horror, were that physically possible. Morocco, however, will last, and as all wives understand that a lasting article is cheap, morocco may be used without fear of a scolding for the bills. Then amateurs are told something, not specially for their benefit, but incidentally, which is really important for them to know. Lofty shelves of books perish. It is not gas, as many people suppose, which is the librarians' foe, but heat, and as heat rises, the books on the top of tall shelves perish at a frightful rate. No book-shelves meant to keep books forever should be above six feet high, but if that limitation is impossible, as it is in all private houses, then keep the books you care least about on the top shelves, and ventilate your libraries from above. Let the hot air out, if you want your "letterings" to last.

These three bits of counsel, — to bind well, because nobody but amateurs will do it; to use morocco, whenever you can; and to recollect that the heated air which destroys books hangs in a stratum, many feet thick, from the top of the room, — are the main facts we have collected, for the benefit of amateurs, from the "Transactions" forwarded to us. Perhaps we may add one more, because it is so useful, and is so often forgotten, — when you bind, put as much information about your book as you can into the lettering on the back. The practice saves you and your friends endless trouble, and when your books are sold, as they always are, will increase their selling value, by making them more acceptable to other amateurs. That, however, is a minute detail, and we want the professional librarians of the world to give to amateurs, and especially to intending amateurs, much more definite help. In the first place, could they not publish three, or four, or more catalogues of modest English libraries as they ought to be, — catalogues which may enable half-ignorant men to lay the foundations of their libraries on something like system? They will smile,

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

and ask if it is their business to find Mr. Branghton in culture; but they do not know how hopelessly ignorant most men are of books, how little they know what they want, how absolutely their memories fail them when they try to fill up lacunæ. Why should men who wish to fill a large room with books — furniture to them, perhaps, but cultivation to their sons — be reduced to rely on publishers, who, of course, recommend the books they publish; or booksellers, who are guided by the catalogues of their own stock; or the questionable taste of the auctioneer, who recommends some country collection as "very choice"? Why not begin with some decent collection chosen by experienced librarians, and varied afterwards according to their own tastes? Why should there not be the "Historian's Library," the "Littérateur's Library," the "Library of Science," and so on, catalogues of really good small libraries, drawn out carefully by librarians, for the assistance of amateurs? The Associated Librarians very naturally wish their "Transactions" to be beautifully printed, and as the process is very expensive, and they cannot always rely on "the liberal enterprise of the Chiswick Press," they want them to sell. Why not add such lists as we have suggested, which would, we can assure them, sell for years? And then why not try a still more spirited experiment, and confer on every amateur librarian, and indeed every student in England, a direct and appreciable boon by publishing in the form of these "Transactions" with the same perfect paper, and greedy but legible type, an anticipatory subject index of English, or English, German, and French books? We do not mean that they should attempt to realize Mr. John Ashton Cross's magnificent idea, expounded at page 104, in a paper which might have taken away the breath even of the Mr. Watts who was said by his enemies to have known of the existence of every book in the world. That mighty project, the preparation of a Universal Index of Subjects, the record of all that human beings have ever written upon anything, must be left for the German government when it has conquered the world, or for that scion of the Rothschilds, or the Astors, or the Vanderbilts who is one day to appear, and who to a fortune of twenty millions is to add burning philanthropy and acute bibliomania. He has not come yet, and till he comes, we fear Mr. Cross's magnificent speculation must remain a dream, even though he does tell us how much of the work has been done: "There are indexes to all works by Italian travellers and by Italian mathematicians, to German mathematics, German poetry, and German philosophy; to English and to American poetry; to Spanish philosophy and to Spanish agriculture; to Swiss history, to Alpine literature, to English topography, to Irish periodical literature, and to French, Belgian, and English law books. All the works on Russia, on Africa and Arabia, on Palestine, on the American Indians, on the American Pacific coast, have been indexed. And great men like Dante, Shakespeare, Molière, Goethe, Schiller, Columbus, Montesquieu, and Spinoza have their own special bibliographies. Even one so recent as Abraham Lincoln has been thus honored." But pending this cosmic book, which, when finished, will require a library, a librarian, half-a-dozen interpreters, and an endowment all to itself, could not the librarians give us something very small, a quarto volume, say, of a thousand closely printed pages, a dictionary of subjects, with lists of the best books easily accessible upon them? It would sell, we believe, better than any cyclopædia. They, with their resources all round them, have no conception of the difficulty ordinary men, whether amateur librarians or students, have in finding out what good books have been written, even on ordinary subjects, or in making a collection, not complete, but tolerably full, on any given topic. The present writer, for example, has tried, and tried in vain, to draw up a list of the inspired books, the books believed at various times to have come down from heaven ready bound, a list which six or eight considerable librarians could in concert furnish in an hour. The work of such a catalogue, carefully distributed, say, over two hundred and fifty libraries for three years, could not be unendurably heavy, would be of the highest service to investigation, and would, we believe, if attempted, be helped with small grants of money by many of the governments of the world. Of course the very principle of the undertaking would be to exclude the idea of completeness, to give no book not readily accessible, and to omit as far as possible unimportant or technical subjects, such as the law of conveyancing, the books on which are sure to be well known by many experts. It should be to Mr. Ashton Cross's grand project what Bellows is to Littré, a mere introduction to the mightier index, something of which the British Museum would speak with contempt, the Biblio-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

thèque National with levity, and all German savans with a sacred horror, but still a useful little work, say, of one thousand quarto pages or so, and called by the humble name of "The Guide to the Amateur Librarian." It would sell, O Associated Librarians and Messrs. Cassell, it would sell!

ADVICE TO THE LATE LORD MACAULAY, ON ENTERING LIFE.

IN 1823, when Lord Brougham was at the mature age of forty-four, he addressed the following letter to Lord (then Mr.) Macaulay's father, Z. Macaulay, Esq.: —

MY DEAR FRIEND, — My principal object in writing to you to-day is to offer you some suggestions, in consequence of some conversation I have just had with Lord Grey, who has spoken of your son (at Cambridge) in terms of the greatest praise. He takes his account from his son; but from all I know, and have learned in other quarters, I doubt not that his judgment is well formed. Now, you of course destine him for the bar; and assuming that this, and the public objects incidental to it, are in his views, I would fain impress upon you (and through you, upon him) a truth or two which experience has made me aware of, and which I would have given a great deal to have been acquainted with earlier in life from the experience of others.

First. That the foundation of all excellence is to be laid in early application to general knowledge is clear; that he is already aware of; and equally so it is (of which he may not be so well aware) that professional eminence can only be attained by entering betimes into the lowest drudgery, the most repulsive labors of the profession; even a year in an attorney's office, as the law is now practised, I should not hold too severe a task, or too high a price to pay, for the benefit it must surely lead to; but, at all events, the life of a special pleader, I am quite convinced, is the thing before being called to the bar. A young man whose mind has once been well imbued with general learning, and has acquired classical propensities, will never sink into a mere drudge. He will always save himself harmless from the dull atmosphere he must live and work in; and the sooner he will emerge from it, and arrive at eminence. But what I wish to inculcate especially, with a view to the great talent for public speaking which your son happily possesses, is that he should cultivate that talent in the only way in which it can reach the height of the art; and I wish to turn his attention to two points. I speak upon this subject with the authority both of experience and observation; I have made it very much my study in theory; have written a great deal upon it which may never see the light; and something which has been published; have meditated much, and conversed much on it with famous men; have had some little practical experience in it, but have prepared for much more than I ever tried, by a variety of laborious methods; reading, writing, much translation, composing in foreign languages, etc.; and I have lived in times when there were great orators among us; therefore I reckon my opinion worth listening to, and the rather, because I have the utmost confidence in it myself, and I should have saved a world of trouble and much time had I started with a conviction of its truth.

1. The first point is this: the beginning of the art is to acquire a habit of easy speaking; and in whatever way this can be had (which individual inclination or accident will generally direct, and may safely be allowed to do so) it must be had. Now, I differ from all other doctors of rhetoric in this; I say, let him first of all learn to speak easily and fluently; as well and as sensibly as he can, no doubt, but at any rate let him learn to speak. This is to eloquence, or good public speaking, what the being able to talk in a child is to correct grammatical speech. It is the requisite foundation; and on it you must build. Moreover, it can only be acquired young; therefore, let it by all means, and at any sacrifice, be gotten hold of forthwith. But in acquiring it every sort of slovenly error will also be acquired. It must be got by a habit of easy writing (which, as Wyndham said, proved hard reading); by a custom of talking much in company; by debating in speaking societies, with little attention to rule, and more love of saying something at any rate, than of saying anything well. I can even suppose that more attention is paid to the matter in such discussions than to the manner of saying it; yet still to say it easily, ad libitum, to be able to say what you choose, and what you have to say. This is the first requisite; to acquire which everything else must for the present be sacrificed.

2. The next step is the grand one: to convert this style of easy speaking into chaste eloquence. And here there is but

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

one rule. I do earnestly entreat your son to set daily and nightly before him the Greek models. First of all he may look to the best modern speeches (as he probably has already); Burke's best compositions, as the "Thoughts on the Cause of the Present Discontents;" "Speech on the American Conciliation;" and "On the Nabob of Arcot's Debt;" Fox's "Speech on the Westminster Scrutiny" (the first part of which he should pore over till he has it by heart); "On the Russian Armament;" and "On the War, 1803;" with one or two of Wyndham's best, and very few, or rather none, of Sheridan's; but he must by no means stop here; if he would be a great orator, he must go at once to the fountain-head, and be familiar with every one of the great orations of Demosthenes. I take for granted that he knows those of Cicero by heart; they are very beautiful, but not very useful, except perhaps the "Milo pro Ligario," and one or two more; but the Greek must positively be the model; and merely reading it, as boys do, to know the language, won't do at all; he must enter into the spirit of each speech, thoroughly know the positions of the parties, follow each turn of the argument, and make the absolutely perfect and most chaste and severe composition familiar to his mind. His taste will improve every time he reads and repeats to himself (for he should have the fine passages by heart), and he will learn how much may be done by a skilful use of a few words, and a rigorous rejection of all superfluities. In this view I hold a familiar knowledge of Dante to be next to Demosthenes. It is in vain to say that imitations of these models won't do for our times. First, I do not counsel any imitation, but only an imbibing of the same spirit. Secondly, I know from experience that nothing is half so successful in these times (bad though they be) as what has been formed on the Greek models. I use a very poor instance in giving my own experience; but I do assure you that both in courts of law and Parliament, and even to mobs, I have never made so much play (to use a very modern phrase) as when I was almost translating from the Greek. I composed the peroration of my speech for the queen, in the Lords, after reading and repeating Demosthenes for three or four weeks, and I composed it twenty times over at least, and it certainly succeeded in a very extraordinary degree, and far above any merits of its own. This leads me to remark, that though speaking with writing beforehand is very well until the habit of easy speech is acquired, yet after that he can never write too much; this is quite clear. It is laborious, no doubt; and it is more difficult beyond comparison than speaking off-hand; but it is necessary to perfect oratory, and at any rate it is necessary to acquire the habit of correct diction. But I go further, and say, even to the end of a man's life he must prepare word for word most of his finer passages. Now would he be a great orator or no? In other words, would he have almost absolute power of doing good to mankind in a free country, or no? So he wills this, he must follow these rules. — Believe me, yours,

H. BROUGHAM.

From Public Opinion.

BUDDHISM.

SIR PATRICK COLQUHOUN, Q.C., one of the senior vice-presidents of the Royal Society of Literature, recently delivered his second lecture on the "Historical Outlines of the Leading Religions of the World," prefacing it by naming those which he considered entitled to this designation — viz., Brahminism, Buddhism, classical heathenism, Judaism, Christianity, and Mahomedanism. Sir Patrick said that although Buddhism was, in fact, an outcome of Brahminism, occupying the same relative position to that creed as the reformed Christian Church does to the older Oriental and Western Churches, and was, therefore, in the nature of a sect, its widespread acceptance in the north-eastern portion of the world entitled it to the rank of an independent creed, professed as it is, in some sectarian form or other, by about one-third of the human race. The lecturer commenced by giving a précis of the life of its founder, Siddhârtha Gutami, son of Kuddhodama, maharajah of Kapilavasta, of the Kshattriya, or warrior caste of the Kaïkas. His future tutor, the learned Brahmin Asita, declared his birth remarkable by a development of the thirty-two great and twenty-four inferior signs of future eminence, and soon announced that he had nothing more to teach him. At a proper age he was married to his cousin Maya, a woman nearly as distinguished as himself in her acquirements. His mother died seven days after his birth. Being challenged by his intended father-in-law to show his proficiency in the usual athletic exercises of his race caste, to the astonishment of all he exceeded his competitors not alone in these, but in intellectual knowledge. In his twenty-ninth year he secretly left the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

palace, divested himself of his princely ornaments, shaved his head, obtained garments of skin from a trapper, and commenced his mission of reformation as an ascetic. When the garments were worn out he supplied their place with a yellow shroud obtained from a buried slave. This became the distinctive badge of the order; it is vulgarly called "Chinese mourning." After his twenty-four hours' meditation under the Ficus religiosa he perceives he has become "the Buddha" — that is, has attained "perfect intelligence" and has entered nirwâua. He dies at the age of thirty, having, in spite of the Brahminical opposition, obtained a large number of followers. The result of Buddhism was the abolition of caste. Its founder taught virtue for virtue's sake. He preserved the doctrine of metempsychosis, he acknowledged no deity, abhorred idols, and consequently recognized no priesthood, his monks being simply teachers. The lecturer than dealt with the doctrine of nirwâna, and came to the conclusion that it implies total annihilation of the vital principle, the soul and the matter, differing in this respect from the Brahminical doctrine which holds that the soul, after a series of transmigrations, is ultimately absorbed into the essence of the deity, thence to be converted and redistributed as matter is. The Buddhist's hell is terrestrial, and the ultimate end of the last, or perfect birth, annihilation. It was surprising that so unattractive a doctrine should have found so many votaries. The area of Buddhism in all its forms (for it has also separated into numerous sects) extends in the north from the Nepaul Mountains over the whole of Thibet, China proper, Mongolia, Manchooria, Cashmere, Bhlutant Sikhim, Korea, the Lien Khen Islands, and the British, Dutch, and Russian possessions in China and Japan, and the worshippers number four hundred and seventy millions. In the south Buddhism extends over Ceylon, British Burmah, Burmah, Siam, Assam, and Janis, and the worshippers number thirty millions, making a total of five hundred millions. The lecturer then proceeded to show how widely the institution had changed from the views of its original founder. In Thibet it has its hierarchy, its pope, its cardinals, its abbots, its eighteen degrees of inferior clergy, its idols, incense, choirs, monks, and nuns — to outward appearance identical with the Roman Catholic clergy; and the Dalai Lama is not only pope, but sovereign of the country. In short, it appears to have violated all the essential principles of the Buddhistic creed and theory.

From The Globe.

THE GOORKHAS.

THE worthy inhabitants of Malta will scarcely derive much æsthetic delight from the personal appearance of the Goorkha regiment that will be shortly among them. Ugly beyond comparison, with flat features and mere slits for eyes, these soldiers are of stunted stature, frequently very bow-legged, and much too broad for their height. But they are splendid little fellows for fighting purposes, being very hardy, capable of enduring almost any amount of fatigue, devoted to their officers, and completely devoid of even the instinct of fear. Armed only with their "kookeries" — broad-bladed, heavy knives, of fine temper, and sharp as razors — they often go on foot into the jungle, in quest of some man-eating tiger, and if the brute is brought to bay, it rarely escapes with life. Buddhists by faith, they hold in scorn the caste prescriptions of Hindooism, and when in our service, they adopt many of the customs of the English soldiery. It is an amusing sight to see a Goorkha setting forth from a station, for a day's sport in the neighborhood. Dressed in some cast-off European mufti which he has purchased in the bazaar, he carries either an ancient fowling-piece or a razed Brown Bess, while at his heels follow two or three curs of very low degree, whose ears and tails have been artistically docked. Yet, bizarre as looks his get-up, the little fellow generally manages to bring home a decent bag, unless, indeed, his weapon bursts at the first discharge. His method is either to stalk the game, be it a dove or a deer, or to lie in wait for it for hours at some likely spot. Between whiles, he puffs his short clay pipe and murmurs the songs of his native land, which sound rather harshly to sophisticated ears. Altogether a right merry lad is the Goorkha in quarters, and held in high esteem by the European soldiers. But his greatest talent lies in fighting to the death for the side whose salt he eats. Some years ago, during one of our expeditions into the Peshawur hills, a Goorkha detachment was skirmishing with the Afredees. On the recall being sounded, three or four men who had taken up favorable positions declined to come back. There they remained leisurely firing at the enemy until the Afredees swarmed down in overwhelming force, and then out flashed the wicked-looking kookeries, and there was some very pretty fighting. Of course the plucky little fellows were all killed, but not before the ground was considerably littered with defunct Afredees.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXII. | No. 1773.—June 8, 1878. | From Beginning, Vol. CXXXVII.

CONTENTS.

I. CONSTANTINOPLE, ... British Quarterly Review, . . . 579

II. COUNT WALDEMAR, ... Cornhill Magazine, ... 595

III. THUROT. A Biographical Sketch, . . . Fraser's Magazine, ... 613

IV. RUSSIAN COURT LIFE IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. Catherine Alexiewna I. and Anne Ivanowna, ... Temple Bar, ... 626

V. CONCEIT, ... Examiner, ... 636

VI. HOLIDAYS, . . . , ... Vanity Fair, ... 638

VII. THE YEOMAN'S STORY, ... Temple Bar, ... 639

POETRY.

TRANSLATION FROM HEINE, ... 578

AN APRIL WOOD, ... 578

A MAY-SONG, ... 578

THE YEOMAN'S STORY, ... 639

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY

LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

For EIGHT DOLLARS, remitted directly to the Publishers, the LIVING AGE will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of THE LIVING AGE is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of LITTELL & GAY.

Single Numbers of THE LIVING AGE, 18 cents.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

TRANSLATION FROM HEINE.

BY THEODORE MARTIN.

A FIRESIDE PIECE.

OUTSIDE the blast is making riot,
And through the darkness the snowflakes fall;
Here in my little room all is quiet,
Warm and dry, and so snug withal.

Musing I sit on my cushioned settle,
Facing the firelight's fitful shine;
Sings on the hob the simmering kettle,
Songs that seem echoes of "auld lang syne."

And close beside me the cat sits purring,
Warming her paws at the cheery gleam;
The flames keep flitting, and flickering, and whirring, —
My mind is lapped in a realm of dream.

Many long, long forgotten summers
Rise up, wraith-like, before my view,
Some in the brightness of masking mummers,
Some with their splendors bedimmed in hue.

Lovely, serene-faced women sweetly
Meanings divine in a glance convey;
Revellers, mingling among them fleetly,
Caper and laugh, and are madly gay.

Marble gods in the distance tower;
Near them, dream-like in beauty rare,
Is a fairy grove that has burst in flower,
And sheds perfume on the moonlit air.

Castles full many of wizard story
Totter along with their crests awry;
Knights behind them, in full-plumed glory,
With troops of their squires come riding by.

'Tis gone! The beautiful dream is over!
Away like a phantom the pageant draws!
Oh dear! The kettle is boiling over,
And pussy is yelling with scalded paws.

Blackwood's Magazine.

AN APRIL WOOD.

SWEET April sat in a regal wood,
And I sat down by her side;
Glad with the promise of leaf and of bud,
Flushed with the glory of Sol's bright flood, —
There she sat in her queenly pride.

Out and away from the regal wood
Cloud-isles hung in the motionless sky;
And the heavenly league, and the earthly rood,
Seem'd fresh from the voice that pronounced them "good," —
And happy were April and I.

In and about in the regal wood
The birds were full of April glee;
On a leafing elm a bold thrush stood,
Singing a song that was understood
By a mate on a neighboring tree.

But a cloud came over the regal wood,
In the scream of a frighted hare;
A hound pursued it eager for blood;
A squirrel nigh me shook where it stood;
And I fancied the world less fair.

Then I rose to depart from the regal wood,
And saw in the grass that there lay
A glittering snake with a raven hood;
The sight of it cooled and curdled my blood:
I trembled, — and went on my way.

Spectator. WILLIAM WILSON.

A MAY-SONG.

I.

WHEN the winds go Maying,
All in the woods so green,
The village chimes,
In the good old times,
Rung out for the young May-queen.
'Twas a goodly sight
When the maidens bright,
And the lads of generous mould,
Went out with the winds a-Maying
In the merry days of old.
A-Maying! A-Maying!
Went out with the winds a-Maying
In the merry days of old!

II.

When the winds go Maying
The emerald meadows through,
'Twas a maiden freak,
Each rosy cheek
To bathe in the young May dew;
And the dainty girls,
With the dewy pearls,
Decked their hair of the silken gold,
When they went with the winds a-Maying
In the merry days of old.
A-Maying! A-Maying!
When they went with the winds a-Maying
In the merry days of old!

III.

When the winds go Maying
By streamlet, grove, and hill,
Young Summer, drest
In her May-day vest,
Will gladly hail them still.
And the maidens gay
Will dance and play
With the lads of generous mould,
As they did when the winds went Maying
In the merry days of old.
A-Maying! A-Maying!
As when the winds went Maying
In the merry days of old.

Temple Bar. JOHN SHEEHAN.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The British Quarterly Review.

CONSTANTINOPLE.*

PERHAPS no city in the world has been more described, more praised, or more abused, than the city of the sultan, the capital of the Turkish empire. It has furnished a fruitful theme for the descriptive tourist, from Pocock and Tavernier to Albert Smith and Thackeray, while it has been a rich field for the patient researches of learned archæologists. In our review of the comparatively modern books at the head of this article we shall endeavor to give our readers an idea of Constantinople, social and political, as it exists, rather than plunge into the antiquarian questions, rich as they are, in which so interesting a city abounds. A residence of some five years entitles us to undertake this task, not unmindful, however, that a much longer residence could not have rendered us safe from the liability to error. Constantinople collectively is a name used by Europeans as a term for a group of cities once distinct, but for many years forming one grand metropolis, richly deserving a visit from all tourists, not from its merits merely as a beautiful city, for man has done but little, nature much, in adorning the Golden Horn and the banks of the Bosphorus; but perhaps no city in the world can afford such magnificent views, such marvellous variety of race and costume, or such interesting relics of a bygone age. This city has two names, Constantinople or the city of Constantine, and Stamboul or Istamboul, a name adopted by the Turks, but which is said nevertheless to be a name of Greek origin.

The city now consists mainly of Stamboul proper, inhabited by Turks, with, however, large numbers of Greeks and Armenians peopling extensive quarters. This main division of the city consists of a triangular tongue of land, bounded at the base by the ancient walls of the Byzantine city so bravely and vainly defended by the last of the Constantines against Mahomed II.; on the south, by the Sea of Marmora; on the east, by the Bosphorus; and on the north by that beautiful stretch of water called the Golden Horn. The apex of the triangle is occupied by an ancient palace of the sultans, and is called Seraglio Point. The water of the Golden Horn is crossed by a bridge of boats of comparatively modern construction, and this leads northwards to another quarter of the great city called Galata, once an independent settlement of the Genoese (when the city was in the feeble hands of the Byzantine Greeks), and still owning, like Pera, the next suburb, a sort of independence, inasmuch as these places are crowded with Europeans owning no allegiance to the Porte, and living under the laws of their respective countries.

It is but a trite remark of all tourists that they are delighted with the magnificent aspect of the city from the deck of their vessel, but are bitterly disappointed on landing. In truth, the site and surroundings of this capital are indescribably beautiful, while the streets and houses are wretched. In the month of May the visitor, as he glides into the harbor of the Golden Horn, seems to be approaching a fairy city. The sky is clear, the atmosphere is bright and sunny, the air is redolent with the fragrance of flowers wafted from the green hills, covered with marble palaces and green vineyards alternated with copses and gardens. The songs of nightingales are faintly heard in the distance, the waters of the Bosphorus, of emerald green, sparkle in the sunshine, and are covered with picturesque caiques rowed by brawny boatmen in the whitest of shirts and the reddest of fezes, while snowy seagulls and kittiwakes disport themselves with marvellous tameness amongst the boatmen. The visitor is enchanted with the scene around him; he gazes with impatience at the city of palaces rising on the hills of Stamboul, Pera, and Scutari; he longs to disembark. At length the tedious formalities are at an end, he jumps into a caique, is rowed to the Tophané landing-place, and there his illusions vanish. He is dragged from his boat and placed on a dangerously rotten wooden structure, built upon a loathsome

* 1. Three Years in Constantinople. By CHARLES WHITE. Colburn. 1844.
2. A Residence in Constantinople. By the Rev. R. WALSH, LL.D. Richard Bentley. 1838.
3. Two Years of the Eastern Question. By A. GALLENGA. Samuel Tinsley. 1877.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

dunghill or refuse heap: here are squatted a score of the famous wild or rather ownerless dogs of the city, growling over the miscellaneous garbage which is thrown on this spot. In addition to the dogs are a number of hammals, or porters, ready to seize and carry his luggage. Then he is assailed by beguirjees, or hack horsemen, each leading an animal which he is requested to mount: these are in place of the hackney-coachmen, einspanners, droskymen, or birdjos of other capitals. As the traveller proceeds to his hotel, whether on foot or horseback, he must indeed be of elastic temperament if he does not suffer from a sense of depression. None of the exhilarating sights of Western cities meet his eye; the streets are narrow and gloomy; the main street of Pera — and it is here the European must land, for there are no hotels in Constantinople proper or Istamboul — is narrower than Fetter Lane, and the pavement is horrible.

As the traveller proceeds to his hotel he encounters, as a rule, no carriage traffic, for the narrowness of the streets and the abominable pavement do not admit of it, but he may now and then meet with three or four carriages proceeding at foot pace, and preceded by a black eunuch, which contain some women of a great man's harem, and it will not be easy to pass these on horseback. After a laborious and painful progress the traveller at length arrives at his hotel, some two or three of which are in every respect good, all of which are dear. Here he may rest and study the varied characteristics of the city of the sultan.

It is a curious sensation for the citizen of a free country to find himself suddenly living under an absolute despotism. One of the glorious titles of the sultan is Hoonkyar, shedder of blood or manslayer. The true Turk looks upon him as a sort of god, and by no means one of a beneficent nature, but the real Eastern potentate, cruel, capricious, and all-powerful, whom to hear is to obey, and whose slightest whims are of more importance than the well-being of whole populations. Millions are living under this gloomy despotism, administered by pashas whose moral character is probably more depraved in every sense than that of any governing class in the world. But the European, although dwelling under the shadow of the sultan, may be at ease on this point: he is still under the laws of his own country, though, as in all ill-organized and barbarous states, he may be liable to outrage of an accidental kind, for which he can never receive adequate compensation.

Under the reign of Sultan Soleiman, all foreign subjects engaged in trade in the Ottoman dominions were allowed to organize themselves into a sort of municipality, and settle their disputes without reference to the true believers, who had more serious matters to attend to, without troubling themselves with the contemptible squabbles of inferior beings; therefore certain "capitulations" were arranged with the governments of Europe, and a most valuable right was thus contemptuously accorded, which has been jealously guarded ever since. The privilege of living and trading in Turkey, without the constant danger of being fleeced by pashas or robbed by zaptiés, was so valuable, that, as might have been expected, a sort of trade grew up, and the chiefs of missions not only demanded and obtained a number of these téskéres or passports, but began to give them to native Christians for a consideration. In this way a commerce was established of a very profitable kind, all foreign envoys being engaged in it, so that when Sir R. Liston, twenty-fifth British ambassador, arrived in Pera in 1793, and found that his salary mainly depended upon this undignified source, he demanded his recall, or the establishment of a fixed income, and he thus established his embassy in a proper and dignified position. Nothing, however, can more clearly mark the barbarous Asiatic nature of the government of the sultan, than the possibility of such a source of income. Imagine, if we can, the French, the Russian, or German embassy in London being besieged by any class of British subjects, offering money to the ambassadors in return for their protection against the petitioners' government. From the result of an observation of some years in the Levant, we do not hesitate to say that amongst the English and French protected subjects in Tur-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

key, more than two-thirds have no English blood in their veins. Their teskéré is, however, jealously guarded as their most precious treasure, and you could not offend one of these people more than by throwing any doubt on his nationality. When a rayah, tributary, or non-Mussulman Turkish subject has by any amount of scheming obtained an English, French, or Russian passport, he at once does his utmost to obliterate every trace of his former nationality, and he becomes fanatically devoted to his adopted country, whose language, unless it be French or Italian, in nine cases out of ten he cannot speak. He however adopts the European costume, and instead of the flowing, tasteful robes of the East, and the graceful turban or fez, he encases his limbs in tight pantaloons, and covers his head with the hideous black hat. His name, too, often undergoes a change. We remember a so-called English family, named Alepson, the head of which wore the old-fashioned orthodox mutton-chop whiskers, and conformed himself rigidly in everything but speech to the English standard. On inquiry, we found that he was a Syrian originally, whose name was Alepli oglou (the son of the Aleppo man). He had simply shaved off, with his beard, the termination li, signifying "of such a place," and translated oglou correctly into English, "son," and thus with the change of costume had become a bonâ fide Englishman in everything but language, which is the usual difficulty. We once stumbled upon a veritable Levantine colony of English. A more fanatically patriotic colony could not have been found in the world, but scarcely a man, and no woman, could be found who spoke English, and not one without a strong foreign accent. Their language was French or Greek. The politics of these British subjects undergo usually a remarkable change with their adopted nationality. Their rayah cousins, still wearing the yoke, are of course intensely hostile to the Turks, but the British subjects begin to talk of the British interests, and of the "integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire." The cause of this is obvious: they are in an exceptionally favored position, and profit by it enormously. While the unfortunate rayah is plundered, directly or indirectly, by some greedy Turkish pasha, the protected Englishman cannot be touched by the Turkish authorities, need not bribe Turkish cadis, and has no fear of being arbitrarily thrown into a Turkish prison. How often has the English tourist member of Parliament sought for information as to the state of the country from English subjects living under English laws in the Levant, and how often has he been told that the Turkish government is after all one of the most tolerant and beneficent the world has seen, and that all the mischief reported of it comes from "Russian intrigues."

We have spoken of the sultan as the Hoonkyar — the shedder of blood — the Eastern potentate who has the power of life and death over his subjects. The exercise of this power has fallen into abeyance, and although dark deeds are still from time to time perpetrated in the palace, these are no longer a matter of course, but are spoken of in whispers as something to be ashamed of, which of course is a great gain. This change is the result of European public opinion, which daily presses more and more on the life of Constantinople, and was chiefly remarked during the reign of the gentle, amiable, and feeble debauchee, Sultan Abdul Mejid, who had a constitutional aversion to the shedding of blood, and who was peculiarly under the influence of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. In the days of the Great Elchie it used to be said that the sultan invariably fortified himself with a stiff glass of brandy before undergoing an interview with the British ambassador. The sultan Abdul Aziz, who is said to have killed himself with a pair of scissors, occasionally was guilty of outbreaks of temper which were formidable to those around him. Mr. Gallenga says: —

> One of his besetting weaknesses was an almost superstitious fear of fire, and it is said that he would allow neither lamp nor candle to be carried about the palace after dark. One night, as he was groping along the corridors, one of his favorite slaves came suddenly out of her apartment, taper in hand, to light his way. He turned upon her in a towering fury, felled her to the ground, trampled

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

upon her, and, as she was in Poppæa's interesting condition, the poor girl succumbed to the same fate that the Roman empress met at Nero's hands.

The man to whom is entrusted the irresponsible power over the great Ottoman empire might be supposed to have to undergo no ordinary training for so great a position. To all appearances the sultan in his youth has less education, or a worse education, than the meanest of his subjects. According to Mussulman laws the eldest male is the heir to the throne, consequently he is usually the brother of the reigning sultan. While the latter reigns the former is kept in perpetual confinement. True, he is not thrown into a dungeon, or subject to any privations except loss of liberty; but he is kept, as it were, in a gilded cage. He is provided with a large number of beautiful female slaves, and if any one of these is discovered to be in an interesting condition, the offspring is murdered. He has his yachts, his horses, carriages, dogs, and other luxuries; but he is surrounded by spies, and jealously guarded from intercourse with the outer world, and should any irregularities affecting this strict seclusion be discovered, the imperial prisoner runs great risk of being secretly made away with. The daily life of the sultan himself is well described by Gallenga: —

The impression the Sultan Abdul Aziz made upon me was that of a man consummately bored. All the slaves of the best-stocked harem cannot save empire from its sense of unmitigated loneliness. Nothing, it seems, could equal the inanity, triviality, and utter blank of the sultan's mind. He could gossip on any subject with glibness, but everything in his look and speech betrayed the gloomy ignorance in which his harem education had buried his mental faculties. He appeared altogether destitute of all the powers of reasoning, incapable of any intellectual exertion, and especially of any such effort of imagination as might enable him to break through the magic circle of his concentrated selfishness, and to feel or even show sympathy with any human being. There was nothing so deeply rooted in his brain as the consciousness that the whole world was made for himself alone. The sultan's scheme of government consisted of bidding another to govern in his name. His deputy drew up a firman or iradé addressed to himself — à toi mon vizir — signed by himself, and laid before a sovereign, the first and foremost title to whose favor was "never to plague about business." The decree which was to go forth in the sultan's name was presented but not read, and seldom explained at any length to his Majesty, whose mere nod was accepted as his approval and sanction, without any further need of seal or signature.

Within the lifetime of middle-aged men great outward changes have taken place in the life and ceremonial of the court of the sultan. Mr. Walsh, whose book entitled "Residence at Constantinople" was published in 1838, thus describes a visit of the ambassador and suite to the sultan, about 1826: —

Lord Strangford, attended by his suite, proceeded to the palace at the day appointed, about two o'clock. The procession was led by the secretary of legation. He bore before him, in an embroidered case, like the chancellor's purse, the letter of the king to the grand seignior. We entered the edifice by a wide and lofty gateway, from whence, some say, is derived the name of the Sublime Porte. We were introduced into a very spacious apartment, which was the audience-room. Here we were stopped a moment at the door, till the grand vizier and his attendants appeared at the other. This was the signal to advance, when the two crowds hastened to the upper end of the room apparently trying who should arrive there first. Here we found a triangular stool without a back placed at an angle in the divan. Into this angle the grand vizier thrust himself, and waiting till the ambassador had arrived at the stool, they both sat down at the same moment face to face, and then the letter of the king was delivered to the grand vizier.

The following Tuesday, May 22nd, was the great day appointed for the audience with the sultan, and the description of it reads marvellously like a page from the travels of Livingstone, or some African traveller. The ambassador and his suite set out at a very early hour, mounted on richly-caparisoned horses.

The courtesies of life among these people are very extraordinary. It was certainly intended to pay the British ambassador particular respect through the whole of this ceremony, as we afterwards found, yet the vizier saw him, the representative of a great sovereign, with all his suite in full dress, kept waiting under a tree in a dirty street for near an hour; and though he courteously bowed to the Bostanji Bashi, and other Turkish officers, he did not condescend to take the slightest notice of us, no more than if we had been part of the crowd of hammals or porters with packs on their backs, who were gathered with us to see the great man pass by. When he went on we had leave to proceed. We followed him at a humble distance up a steep street. At the top of the street was the Babi Hummayoon, or Sublime Porte, the first entrance to the Seraglio. Here was a characteristic sight. The piles of human faces which I had seen a short time before were all trampled to the level of the ground. A few of the largest,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

however, seemed reserved for this occasion. On each side of the gate were niches in the wall, and in one of these some boys were amusing themselves. I had the curiosity to look as usual for some trait of national manners, which is seen even in the sports of children, and I found it. They had got half a dozen of these mutilated heads, which they were balancing on their toes, and knocking one off with another.

The embassy was first led through the Imperial Mint, and then, after pipes and coffee, to the second court of the Seraglio; and here, according to the ostentatious childish policy of the court, the strangers were shown the Janissaries receiving their pay. The ambassador and suite were next taken to an audience-room called the Divan, and after payment of the troops, the Europeans were taken to a barbarous feast, where they had to feed themselves with their fingers. "At the ambassador's table spoons were laid, which were supposed to be of horn. They were, however, of jasper, and said to be part of the costly table service of the Greek emperors, preserved since the taking of Constantinople. The tray also was silver of the same era, but so tarnished that it was not easy to distinguish the metal." Before any one was admitted to the sultan a fur pelisse was given him, in which he was enveloped. After an interminable number of tedious ceremonies the embassy was taken to the gate of the harem. "This gate was decorated with the most gorgeous display of Turkish sculpture. It was covered by a large semicircular projecting canopy, supported on pillars richly carved, gilt and embossed, in a style of architecture perfectly Oriental. Round the entry were several officers in their richest dresses, some in stuffs shot with gold, which, as they moved, were quite dazzling; but those which struck us most were the unfortunate eunuchs. Some of these were boys or young men from sixteen to twenty. They were tall, bloated, and disproportioned; their countenances were of a sickly sallow hue, with a delicate hectic flush and an expression of extreme anguish and anxiety, as if they suffered pain, and labored under a deep sense of degradation." While Mr. Walsh was gazing on these things in a kind of absorption of mind, he was roused by being suddenly seized by the collar by two men, one at each side. He observed that each of the party was caught in the same manner, and in this way they were dragged down a broad descending passage between rows of guards to the interior of the harem. Here they were taken into a small, gloomy little chamber, one half of which was occupied by the visitors, the other by a large throne, exactly resembling in size and shape an old-fashioned four-post bed without curtains. This was covered with what at first seemed to be a gay-colored cotton quilt, but it was a rich stuff embroidered with dull gold and pearls. "On the side of this, with his feet hanging down, sat the sultan, exactly in the attitude of a man getting out of bed in the morning. Next to him, standing stiff, with his back to the wall, was the vizier, and next to him the capitan pasha: they both were motionless as statues, with their eyes riveted on the ground. The sultan never turned his head, which he kept straight forward, as immovable as if it were fixed in a vice; but his eye was continually rolling, and the white of it, something like the color of white glass, gleaming now and then under his mahogany forehead, as he glanced sideway at us, gave him a most demon-like expression. The speech of the ambassador, expressing a desire on the part of his Britannic Majesty to continue the ties of amity and good-will between the two powers, was translated to the sultan by his trembling dragoman, and after a short pause he replied in a low, but firm and haughty tone, addressing himself apparently to the vizier, who repeated the speech very badly and hesitatingly to the dragoman, who stammered it out in French to the ambassador." The dragoman's terror was deplorable; the perspiration dropped from his countenance, and no wonder: his predecessor had just been executed, and he had no hope of escaping the same fate, nor did he.

The interview did not last ten minutes, when the ambassador and suite were seized by their collars and arms and hurried out of the presence. This curious custom is said to have arisen from the murder of Murad I., commonly called Amurath. During or just before the battle of Kossovo a Servian nobleman, Milosh Kabilovich, rode to the Turkish camp, pretending that he was a deserter, and professing to have something of great importance to communicate. He was admitted to the presence of the sultan, and, while prostrating himself, he caught the sultan with the left hand and stabbed him with the right. From that time until comparatively lately every stranger approaching his Majesty was held by both arms, so as to preclude the possibility of any attempt on the sultan's life. It scarcely seems possible that

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ambassadors still living amongst us were condemned to go through these humiliations within a comparatively recent period. We believe it was Sir Stratford Canning who first, by desire of his court, made a stand against these barbarous ceremonies, which were dropped, not we may suppose through any remonstrances of the British ambassador, but through the action of the Russians, who about the time of the change had reduced the pride of the barbarians to the dust, and dictated a peace at Adrianople.

Some years after the ceremonies above described we accompanied Sir Stratford Canning (now the venerable Lord Stratford de Redcliffe) to an audience of the sultan Abdul Mejid. The ceremony was remarkable only from its simplicity. The party filled the large state caique of the ambassador, as we were about a dozen persons, the officials being in uniform. After half an hour's delay in an antechamber, where we smoked Latakia tobacco from diamond-mounted chibouques and sipped coffee from costly little cups, we were marshalled up the grand staircase of the palace of Dolma Baghtché, through a lane of guards dressed in a mongrel half-European costume. Entering the large salaamlik, or audience chamber, we found ourselves at once in the presence of the sultan. He was dressed in a very plain European costume, with sundry pashas in heavily embroidered gold coats standing near him. The sultan looked inexpressibly bored and ill at ease; his countenance was as vacuous as any that could be found in Earlswood; he fumbled uneasily with the hilt of his sword, shifted his postures, and gazed vacantly at the ceiling, while the ambassador made one of those pompous little speeches which are the commonplaces of diplomacy. The British dragoman translated the speech, and then translated, or tried to translate somewhat liberally, the few disjointed sentences that tumbled out of the mouth of the half-witted, worn-out debauchee that stood before us. We were then dismissed, but departed as we had entered, free men, without our arms being held. One remarkable circumstance struck us, and that was the mode in which the dragoman did his duty. He spoke in a low voice, according to etiquette, but his words were distinct enough, and we were close behind him.

For many reigns the sultans always affected to be sovereign lords of the world, owning no equals: they would never deign to receive or answer any communication directly from Christian sovereigns, who, according to Turkish etiquette, ranked with the grand vizier, not with the sultan. The usual term applied to the sovereigns of Frangistan or Europe was Kral, the title of the tributary kings of Servia, Bosnia, and such like States; and whenever the European powers joined in an alliance with the sultan against another power, all good Moslems affected to believe that the sultan had summoned other tributary states against the rebellious Russians or French, as the case might be, just as the ancient kings of Servia were summoned to fight in the sultan's battles. The chief title of the sultan was Padishah, and it became a matter of grave negotiation to enforce the usage of this title by the Sublime Porte towards other great powers, a usage always resisted by the Porte, but enforced at last at the point of the sword. Thus the thirteenth article of the Treaty of Kainardji runs as follows: "The Sublime Porte promises to employ the sacred title of the Empress of all the Russias in all public acts and letters, as well as in all other cases, in the Turkish language, that is to say, 'Temamen Roussilerin Padishah.'" What was our surprise and disgust to hear on this occasion the official dragoman term the queen of Great Britain (herself a far greater Moslem sovereign than the sultan himself) the Kralishé, the female Kral of England. Strange to say, the ambassador, himself a veteran diplomatist, who at that time had been, we believe, more than forty years in Turkey, could not speak or even understand a single sentence of Turkish, so that he meekly endured the indignity; and for anything we know to the contrary, the Levantine dragomans of the embassy still go on using the term, unless Mr. Layard, who has, we believe, a slight knowledge of Turkish, has detected the term and objected to it. Many objections have been made to the employment of dragomans bred and born in the country, and not without reason. They are as a rule imbued with a craven fear of Turkish authorities, a fear which becomes hereditary in these oppressed countries; moreover, they are not remarkable for the high-toned feelings which we ascribe to English gentlemen. An effort was made about thirty years ago by Lord Palmerston to change the system, and to substitute young Englishmen from the universities, but for some reason or other the plan was not approved of by Sir Stratford Canning, and so it failed before his steady opposition.

At the commencement of the reign of each sultan there is usually a loud fanfar-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

onade of trumpets in the Western press proclaming the new sultan to be an enlightened man of Western ideas and the husband of one wife. All this was said on the enthronement of Abdul Aziz in 1861, when the writer ventured in a letter to the Times to point out that this sultan had fifteen hundred women in his harem, and that his extravagance was likely to resemble that of his predecessor. Events proved the accuracy of the statement.

Strictly speaking, the sultan has no wife. When Bayazid I. was conquered and taken captive by Timour the Tartar at Angora, in 1402, his harem passed to his conquerer, the most indelible humiliation that an Eastern can suffer. The Osmanlis felt acutely the indignity thus offered to their sultan, and so to diminish the shame of any future occurrence of the kind, it was determined that no sultan should hereafter be married, or have a legitimate wife that could be so dishonored; but although the monarch has no wife, the children born of his concubines are legitimate; indeed, throughout Islam it is but necessary for a man to own a child to legitimatize it, the Moslem law in this respect being more rational and merciful than the Christian or Roman. The harem of each sultan is immense, for the most valued gift from a great pasha is a beautiful slave girl, so that the imperial harem fills from year to year, for each woman honored by the notice of the sultan has an establishment of her own, consisting of slave girls, eunuchs, etc. When Sultan Abdul Aziz had been disposed of by an alleged suicide, and it was necessary to remove his family, fifty-three boats were employed to carry his women, children, nurses, slaves, etc. The women in the establishment are pretty nearly on an equality in cultivation and refinement, if indeed they have any. They are usually the children of peasants, not of the peasants of the West, broken and coarse with hard labor, but of the wilder, freer, and more graceful tribes of the Caucasus. Formerly these female slaves were from every northern nation. Turkish corsairs so late as the last century carried off slaves even from the coast of Ireland, and it may be that the sultans have Irish blood in their veins. The mother of Abdul Mejid was a Georgian Christian slave; but the Russians have protected the people of the Transcaucasian provinces from the periodical raids of Turkish slave-dealers, and have even limited the slave-trade with the Circassian tribes, so that the inmates of the imperial harem are usually women from the lower tribes of the pagan or Mussulman Caucasus. So invariably beautiful are these chosen ones, that the wonder is the sultans have not usually been finer men.

It is a mistake to suppose that the sultan's harem is a collection of women placed indiscriminately at his Majesty's service. On the contrary there is, we are informed, a severe etiquette observed in all the intercourse between the monarch and his female slaves. The mother of the first-born prince takes precedence of all others, but does not assume the title of sultan until her son comes to the throne. There is no such title as sultana, sultan being, like effendi, common to both sexes. When a new sultan comes to the throne his mother assumes the title of sultan valide, and is second in the empire, with a residence and court of her own, and with an income of about £110,000 a year. Her household is said to consist of one hundred and fifty persons. When a slave girl bears a child to the monarch she becomes a kadin, and has a place of precedence accorded her, being second, third, or fourth, as the case may be. There is a sort of divinity which doth hedge every member of the imperial family. The female members are given in marriage by the sultan to his favorite pashas, or rather these latter are given to his sisters and daughters as they grow up. The unfortunate victim of the sultan's favor finds his exaltation not one of unmitigated bliss. The wife, if one may believe general report, is too often a cruel tyrant, rendering her husband's life a burden to him. He always approaches her in the most abject manner, and waits on her as a slave. These women possess enormous political influence of an occult and irresponsible kind, and exercised entirely in favor of men, not measures. It is said that a good-looking man on this account (and on another, of which more anon) has tenfold the chance of rising in the world that a plain man possesses. None of these sisters or daughters of the sultan are allowed to rear children, lest they should in any way dispute the succession to the throne. The barbarous practice, worthy only of Coomassie, is still in full vigor. Mihr Sultan, the daughter of Mahmoud II., lost her life through this custom. She was married to Said Pasha, and finding herself pregnant, she resolved to anticipate the murderer's work, and so consulted one of the wise women, usually Jewesses, who are adepts at procuring abortion. In this case the deleterious potions killed the unfortunate mother, who died in con-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

vulsions. It is said that when the occurrence was reported to the sultan he shed tears, and vowed to change the custom, but it remains. In 1842 Ateya Sultan, sister of Abdul Mejid and wife of Halil Pasha, became pregnant. She had already had one infant murdered, and the prospect of another being sacrificed so preyed upon her spirits, that she resolved, with her husband, to procure the sultan's permission for the baby to live. Great exertions were made in consequence, and the poor mother was permitted to share those pure and holy joys in common with the meanest of the sultan's subjects. In due course the baby was born, a fine, healthy boy, and the royal mother herself gave it nourishment. At once a deep conspiracy was formed amongst the conservatives of the seraglio and the women who were the mothers of the imperial princes. On the morning of the third day, when the mother awoke and called to her attendants to bring her the baby from the magnificent inlaid cradle in which it reposed, the sorrowing nurse informed the horrified mother that the baby had died in the night of convulsions, and that etiquette had forbidden them to awaken the mother. On hearing this, and seeing the body of the child, the unhappy princess was seized with violent paroxysms, followed by delirium, which was succeeded by a mortal languor. On the seventy-fifth day her remains were deposited in the mausoleum of her father.

These instances of this barbarous and cruel custom are cited in White's "Three Years in Constantinople," but the writer can safely assert that it is still in force; and while he lived in Constantinople, the Hekim Bashi, or chief medical officer of the sultan, since dead, divulged to him a case in which he was called to procure abortion, one of the slaves of Abdul Aziz, while a prisoner and before he was called to the throne, being found to be pregnant. The Hekim Bashi told the sultan that upon being admitted to take his degree of M.D. he had sworn a solemn oath that he would never use his knowledge to procure abortion, and therefore humbly begged his Majesty to excuse him. The weak but gentle Abdul Mejid respected the doctor's oath, and called in a wise woman to perform the operation. During the long imprisonment of Abdul Aziz, abortion, or child-murder, always ensued on the occasion of any of his concubines threatening to found a nursery; but in spite of the vigilance of the sultan's emissaries the imperial prisoner contrived, on one occasion, to secrete one of his children, a fine boy, whom he saved from destruction, and on his coming to the throne produced him to his court. This remarkable instance of an infraction of Turkish rules was not encouraging to the friends of civilization, for the new sultan endeavored to set aside the order of Moslem succession in favor of the son thus rescued from destruction. He appointed him commander-in-chief of the army, and chose his military commanders and his ministers mainly as they favored his revolutionary idea with regard to his son. For some years the country was threatened with civil war, which was only averted by the deposition and death of Abdul Aziz, when the real heir, his nephew, and son of the late Abdul Mejid, came to the throne, only to be deposed as mad. In the great events of the past few months this young prince has been lost sight of: he is probably now a close prisoner, if he has not been murdered, which is still more likely.

In mentioning eunuchs, which to this day are as much a part of a great man's establishment in Turkey as powdered-haired lackeys are in England, we may say a few words on the subject of slavery. This detestable institution is now mainly supported by Turkey, including Egypt and Persia. When Sultan Abdul Mejid required the help of France and England, when threatened with a Russian attack in 1854, he published a firman in which he declared, while surrounded by mutilated eunuchs, that "man is the most noble of all the creatures emanating from the hands of God; that he destined him to be happy, in graciously according him to be born free." The sultan was shocked to hear that certain persons in Circassia and Georgia were selling their children and other relatives into slavery, and even kidnapping other people's children, selling them like cattle and common merchandise. He determined to put an end to this blamable and abominable practice, and directed his minister to inflict severe punishment both upon the buyer and seller of human beings. At that time officers of the army were to our certain knowledge kidnapping boys and girls from the Georgian villages and trafficking in them, even while the English were in alliance with the Turks. Again, in January, 1857, in a firman addressed to the pasha of Egypt, and to the authorities throughout the Ottoman dominions, the sultan discovered that the measures respecting the prohibition of the negro slave-trade had been of no effect, and that "a great number of these slaves, during

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the journey from their country to the coast, perish from the fatigues and hardships they are exposed to in the deserts; while the remainder, owing to their passage from warm to cold climates, become subject to pulmonary and other diseases, by which means most of them are cut off from the enjoyment of life at an early age." The most rigorous measures of suppression towards this unholy traffic were enjoined. Edhem Pasha, in a despatch addressed to Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, dated January 29, 1857, solemnly pledged the Porte to the severest measures; and several years later Sir Henry Bulwer assured her Majesty's government that slavery was at an end throughout the sultan's dominions, though slaves, both black and white, negro and Circassian, were bought and sold in various parts of the city, notably at Suleymanyeh, on the north side of the Golden Horn, at Tophané, and at Koomkapoosi. True it is that by the pressure of the Western powers slaves are not now sold so openly as formerly: indeed, the Turks are compelled to adopt a little trickery in the commerce. The dealer, usually a Circassian, travels to his native country, where women are bought and sold as a matter of course. He chooses four young girls suitable for the market, and marries them; that is to say, he goes through the legal Moslem formula of marriage, keeping them virgins. He then takes them to Constantinople, and if he meets any Russian cruisers on the way, of course the officers cannot interfere between the man and his legitimate wives. Arrived at Constantinople, the dealer forthwith divorces his brides, and sells them for what they will fetch, which is usually a handsome price. After the conclusion of this commercial affair the divorced man takes another trip in search of more wives, and if he can manage three or four voyages during the year, he makes a very good living, all the while keeping well within the law. Many of the Circassians, now settled in the Christian provinces of Turkey, where they are nothing if not brigands, add to their illicit gains that of breeding children for sale. A traveller, provided he be Moslem, would have no more difficulty in picking up good bargains in human, any more than in horse flesh, among the Circassian villages, fathers and mothers being the sellers, for hard cash. Mr. Gallenga informs us that "young Shamyl, the son of the renowned Circassian hero, who lived as a guest at the Russian embassy, told me, as the most natural thing in the world, that at one of these beauty shops (in Constantinople) he was offered a first-rate article, for which he was asked three hundred and fifty Turkish lire, and he offered one hundred and fifty lire, when the bargain broke down simply because the slave merchant did not allow the would-be purchaser to take the merchandise home with him for a week on trial."

As this author well remarks, "As a Turk cannot, owing to the peculiar institutions of Islam, hope to win an alien wife for love, he is content to get one or more for money." As a matter of fact, the Turks, who marry their children very young, usually prefer a slave wife for their sons. The writer was once spending the evening with a Turkish friend, a fair specimen of a good Turkish dignitary (and there are not a few naturally good ones). His friend, Mehemed Effendi, informed us that he was going to marry his younger brother, Reshid, to a young slave girl whom he was to acquire without purchase, through a piece of good luck. A friend and neighbor had an only son, and for this son the mother had purchased a child of ten, whom she had carefully educated to be his wife. Just as the boy reached the marriageable age of sixteen, and was about to be married, he died, and so the mother had taken a sort of antipathy to the girl, and offered her to Mehemed Effendi, for his young brother, who was sixteen. Our friend told us that it was considered an immense advantage to have no wife's relations to trouble one: he himself had only two wives, one a Moslem, the other a Greek, the latter keeping her religion. How he came by the Greek wife he never informed us: we suspect she was purchased from some miserably poor family, for there are Greek families in the quarters of Tatavola and elsewhere who are as ready to sell their daughters as the Circassians; but religious prejudice has so strong a hold on them, that they would usually prefer to sell their daughters to a Christian debauchee than to a good Turk for his wife. Our Turkish friend informed us that he was heartily tired of both his wives, and would rejoice if they died, as they were a great expense and trouble. He was, like all Turks that we have known, exceedingly fond of his children, and these were quite charming. A Turkish child is carefully educated in etiquette, and this is contrived to be instilled into their little minds without in any way affecting the buoyancy and gaiety of their young hearts. When you are shown into the salaamlik, or reception-room, the chil-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

dren of the house, who have the free run of the male and female apartments under the age of eleven, come forward to receive the visitors, and kiss their hands in the most graceful fashion. They then take their seats on the divan, and behave like little men and women until dismissed by the father, when they will be heard romping in the next room, as boisterous as English schoolboys, but certainly gentler and better-behaved. The education of these children is exceedingly imperfect; they are taught to read and write, but few ever attain the art of reading with fluency, and still fewer of writing. Their moral conduct as to externals is carefully looked after, but gross and obscene language does not seem to be forbidden; and on festival days, or rather nights, in the Ramazan, an entertainment called karagooz is exhibited in the harems, which is of the most obscene character, and would not be tolerated by the police of any European city.

It is a vulgar error to suppose that Turkish women are shut up and imprisoned like birds in a cage. On the contrary, in some respects they have more liberty than European women. Few Europeans would quite like to hear that their wives and daughters were roaming over the city in a mask, and disguised in a costume which renders recognition impossible, yet such is the habit of Turkish women. From time immemorial their masters, by no means undervaluing female chastity, but, on the contrary, somewhat morbidly jealous on the point, have never trusted their wives, who too often are uncultured, purchased savages; and so, instead of educating their females, and cultivating their feelings of honor and chastity, have adopted a system of jealous etiquette and seclusion from the male sex. No woman can speak to any man but her husband, except veiled, and out of doors in the public streets, and on matters of business. Hence the women go out shopping carefully veiled and wearing the feredjee, a large cloak completely concealing the figure. The bazaars are of course full of Turkish women, and so are the Frank shops of Pera. From time to time a ferocious edict is issued by the sultan, ordering that no Turkish woman shall enter any shop in Pera, proving beyond doubt that there were reasons for the edict. A rigorous order in this respect is kept in Stamboul proper amongst the native Christians, for it is simply death for a rayah to intrigue with a Moslem woman. If, on such an event happening, any diplomatic pressure is brought to bear on the government to mitigate the penalty of death, the male offender is nevertheless thrown into prison, and in all human probability he is never seen or heard of again: as for the poor woman, of course she disappears into the depths of the Bosphorus. Only the wealthy Turks can afford the luxury of eunuchs: the mass of the people have to do without these unfortunate guardians of female chastity, but it is rare to find any Turkish family, however humble, that has not a black woman slave. These are the maids-of-all-work, and considered necessaries of life, for no Turkish family would allow a daughter to go to live out of her mother's house: the family would be disgraced by such a step. It is considered to the last degree disgraceful for the master of the house to be intimate with the black female slave, and although there is in the large cities quite a population of these, it is rare to see a mulatto. The external life of the Turks is remarkably decent and orderly. The purely Moslem quarters of Stamboul are comparatively clean, and free from disorder or license. Drunkenness, which is by no means a Moslem vice, is kept out of sight when it exists, and the sounds of riotous revelry are not heard either night or day. If any bachelor takes a house in a quarter, he is bound to have a wife or concubine, or be subject to remonstrance; and if any irregularity is detected in his conduct, the elders of the quarter force him to leave. Whenever a European has taken a house in a Moslem quarter, no matter how perfect his conduct may be, he at once becomes the object of disagreeable attentions on the part of his neighbors: his windows are surreptitiously broken, his garden is filled with the bodies of dead dogs and cats, and rubbish that can be handily thrown over his wall finds there a receptacle. He never appears at his door or window but he runs the risk of contact with pebbles or dirty water, and it is rare to find any one hardy enough to outlive the constant persecution to which he or his family are subject. No feelings of chivalry actuate the Turkish mind; his wife and daughters are even more liable to insult and injury than himself. In commercial dealings the Turk is decidedly more to be trusted than the Greek, and as the morality of these Levantine traders is indescribably low, we may go further and say that the truthfulness and honesty of many of the Turkish burghers are quite remarkable, independent of any comparison, but there is a great gulf between the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

burgher tradesman and the pasha. No words can exaggerate the deep moral depravity of the governing class, the gentlemen of Turkey, the men of such charming manners who hospitably receive our travelling dukes and members of Parliament, who come away with the conviction that these viziers and pashas only want fair play to make of Turkey a paradise. To the initiated it is quite amusing to see how some gentlemen are gulled and bamboozled by these smooth-faced rogues, who talk so glibly, and with such an air of conviction, of progress and liberal measures, and how even in their ordinary social intercourse strangers are made fools of for the amusement of the neighbors and lackeys who are present. The etiquette of the most ordinary social meeting is elaborate, and a pasha delights in offering all sorts of petty slights to his European visitor, while he, all unconscious of the treatment he is undergoing, is charmed with the dignified and graceful manner of the false rogue who is entertaining him. More than once have we known a Turk detected and roughly exposed, when his abject penitence has been edifying. There is no hereditary aristocracy at Constantinople, though there are the remains of such in several parts of the empire, notably in Bosnia, Lazistan, and Kurdistan. The governing class in the metropolis is recruited in various ways; partly, no doubt, from the sons of pashas, but mainly from the horde of adventurers that crowd the capital. It would be a curious task to get a list of pashas, with their origin. As many, not to say most, of the matrons of Constantinople, including women of high social position, have been slave girls, so many of their husbands have been in early life slave boys, and there is moreover a curious resemblance between the histories of both that is far too revolting for further allusion. An episode in the dismal history of Scio will throw some light on the subject. Mr. Walsh says: —

But such was not the fate of other boys, who were reserved for a very dismal fate. Some were brought into harems, some were kept at infamous public places in Galata to which Turks resort, and some are even exposed in coffee-houses on the public road. A friend of mine at this time coming by land from Smyrna met one of them in a khan, who earnestly entreated him to kill him. He had been exposed to every surrogee and low Turk passing the road, and felt the misery and degradation so acutely that he could not survive it. Those whose fate was least severe were compelled to turn Mahomedans. Circumcision was performed on forty or fifty at once.

This quotation will illustrate much of what passes in Turkey. Many a pasha, known to fame throughout Europe, has been a good-looking slave boy, Circassian, Georgian, or Greek, condemned to a horrible moral depravity in his early youth, but having gained the favor of an influential pasha, has been put into an important position, and gradually or rapidly risen by his talents and cleverness. The Turks never hesitate to put a friend in a position of trust and confidence, whatever may have been his origin, nor do we for a moment mean to intimate that all careers or anything like all have so base a source; but too many have, and of that there can be no doubt.

Most pashas can read and write; some are learned, but these we imagine could be counted on the fingers of one hand; some can neither read nor write. The caimacam of a district south of the Balkans was found to have been the domestic servant of Midhat Pasha quite lately, and this, too, is one of the commonest origins of pashas. A Turkish pasha from such a source is not likely to know any but the rudiments of literature, but having ingratiated himself with his master, he is put in the way of making a career for himself, and by dint of presents and constant adoration of his powerful patron, he is always protected, and eventually may rise to the highest positions. The career of renegades is not usually a happy one, though some have been brilliantly successful. The most striking one of recent times that occurs to us is that of Omar Pasha. He was originally a subaltern officer in the Grenzer Guard of Croatia, but fled across the frontier and became a Moslem. For many years he had to suffer all sorts of bitter contumely and privations, but at last secured some powerful friends, and then began to rise. He undertook the punishment of Beder Khan Bey, the Koordish chief who massacred ten thousand Christians in the Tyari Mountains about 1845. Sir Stratford Canning compelled the Turks to punish the perpetrators of this crime, and as the Porte had not been encouraged by the Crimean War to believe themselves necessary to Europe, the Kurds were punished, and numerous captives restored to their homes. Omar Pasha next won laurels in the suppression of the revolt of the Bosnian beys in 1851–52, and lastly became Serdar-i-Ekrem, or commander-in-chief of the Turkish armies during the Crimean War, during which he cannot be

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

said to have much distinguished himself, nor yet to have suffered any great reverses. He showed no tactical talents whatever, but the allies came in to save him from the fate which has befallen his successors in the late Russo-Turkish war. In Bagdad and other places where he was sent as governor, Omar Pasha proved himself as cruel and corrupt as any Turkish pasha, which qualities were probably the secret of his social success. The most honest and upright of renegades that we ever encountered were those who were driven from their country on the suppression of the Hungarian revolution by the despotic conservative the czar Nicholas. Amongst these we may mention Feizi Pasha, who was chief of the staff during the blockade of Kars in 1855, and who was precisely in the same position in the siege of Kars in 1877. He is a brave and upright soldier, but evidently has not the qualities that push a man on in the service of the Porte. Another quality besides that of subserviency and corrupt pliancy has often proved successful in Turkey, and that is rigid Moslem piety, but this succeeds better in the country districts than in Constantinople. Mr. Consul Taylor, of Erzeroom, mentions a certain Sheikh Obeyd Ullah, near Van, who himself had murdered so many Christians, and destroyed so many churches, that even the government of the Porte was scandalized, and ordered his punishment. He nevertheless was not molested, and moreover entered Erzeroom in triumph, for the governor-general and his functionaries gave him a public reception, according him the honors due to a saint or demigod.

After all, the fons et origo mali in Turkey is the Established Church. The evils of a Church supported and favored by the government are sufficiently known in countries with less marked religious divisions: what must they be where but one religion is recognized as worthy of man, and where all dissenters, Ghiaours, or unbelievers, are only allowed to ransom their heads on payment of haratch, a special tax for that purpose; where the oath of a Christian cannot be taken in a Turkish court of justice; where such a burial certificate as the following was delivered by the cadi of Mardin to the relatives of a deceased Christian: "We certify to the priest of the Church of Mary that the impure, putrefied, stinking carcass of Saideh, damned this day, may be concealed under ground. El Said Mehemed Faizi. A. H. Rajil 2."

Instances of intolerance, even after death, occur, we admit, in our own country: the same spirit, though much chastened and kept in order by public opinion, breaks out from time to time in English rural parishes; but in this country we have at least a strong sense of decency, and above all a free expression of public opinion, with the protection of the law in extreme cases. In Turkey the dominant race have it all their own way, and apparently only an insignificant minority of this dominant race seem to disapprove of such outbreaks of fanaticism. A strong force ever ready to support the government in all contests with the hated Ghiaours exists in the softas, a body of young men brought up to be simultaneously lawyers and clergymen, for the two professions may be said to be united in Turkey, since all law is based upon the Koran. Education in Turkey, as in England, is divided into the primary or elementary classes, and the higher courses, similar to our university education. Attached to every mosque throughout the empire is a mekteb, or village school, and here reading and writing are taught, together with portions of the Koran which are learned by heart. Those of the pupils who are intended for liberal professions are removed to the medresses, where they pursue a laborious system of antiquated study, comprising rhetoric, logic, philosophy, dogma, jurisprudence, astronomy, etc. These students are softas, most of whom are enrolled in the corps of ulemas, and eventually become cadis and mollahs. They are educated and lodged and have one meal daily at the expense of the wakoof, or religious foundation. These medresses resemble much our own ancient universities in their religious exclusiveness, and the conservative character of the studies. The students, however, unlike those of most Continental cities, are intensely conservative and fanatical, looking on Church and State as the divinely ordained state of things, and ready to fight all enemies, domestic or foreign, in defence of this shibboleth. The idea that outsiders, Ghiaours, Kaffirs, or dissenters, have any human rights, is revolting to the softa mind. Unlike the members of our universities, the softas or students are usually very poor. It is incredible what amount of self-denial these poor fellows undergo in pursuit of knowledge: they have been found at times not far from death through physical exhaustion from want of food. The softas are usually heard of in times of political excitement, and seem to have, in a measure, taken the place of the Janissaries. Mr. Gallenga,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

who was in Constantinople as the Times correspondent during the exciting days of 1876, thus speaks of the softas: —

The 11th of May raised the softas to the height of popularity. Their movement, it is said, was a peaceful one, though they had bought so many revolvers. It had a political and not a religious character, though the softas are "divinity and law students of a superior class" in a community where divinity and law are one and the same thing, and though they obey the influence of the ulemas — divinity doctors — whose exclusive rule is the Koran. Led by priests, these priestlings, we are told, had held meetings in the mosques. Their deputations delivered into the sultan's hands petitions, which, backed by their imposing processions at the head of a wondering multitude, had acted on the abject fears of a craven monarch with sufficient power to work out the desired effect. The men who had been planning and were now accomplishing the revolution, the men who had aspired to power and were now grasping it — the pashas, the Midhats, Hussein Avnis, and their friends — well knew what instruments the softas could become in their hands. They looked upon the support of the army as insufficient, and they could not reckon on that of the utterly demoralized and helpless people. After the fall of the Janissaries, the pashas reasoned, there was no power in the country to equal that of the softas. Arbitrary political rule was based here on blind religious submission. The vices of the State had their roots in the corruption of the Church. The despot was inviolable because he was invested with the character of an infallible pontiff. The disorder admitted only of one treatment. The antidote must be sought where the poison lay. The enslavement of the people was the result of the perversion of Koran truth. But they, the softas, were the interpreters of the Koran.

At the commencement of the Crimean War, before the Western allies had come forward, the softas were very troublesome to the authorities by their fanatic impatience to fight the Ghiaours. Numbers of them, it was said, were put under arrest by the authorities and sent off to the army, and some were cast into prison. These latter were undoubtedly most to be pitied. The condition of the Turkish prison is indescribably bad. A Turkish prison usually consists of one or more large rooms, hot in summer and cold in winter. A long wooden construction almost two feet high runs along the wall, and on this the prisoners lie. They are of all sorts, young and old, and have perfect liberty to talk, smoke, sing, or even play on the little musical instruments which some bring with them. The younger and weaker ones are bullied by the stronger ruffians. The food depends much upon the honesty or humanity of the jailers, or the pasha at the head of the department, and the ventilation and cleanliness leave much to be desired. We have described the ordinary lock-up, but for some offenders, such as Bulgarian peasants, there are worse places, of which the following is a description: —

I went down below the level of the paved court, and was confronted by a massive door fastened by a ponderous iron bar. The door was opened. I went in, and found myself in a large crypt entirely destitute of any skylight, loophole, or any cleft or fissure through which, the door being closed, either outer air or daylight could be admitted. The thick walls all round were damp and mouldy, and the floor was bare earth, muddy and foul beyond imagination. There was no stretcher or board or pallet for a bed, no stool, no table, no article of furniture or utensil of any kind. The wretched man lay on a thin piece of matting, all wet, all torn to shreds, and had nothing besides to relieve his absolute, intense misery.

Cassape, a journalist and man of letters, was thrown into one of these dungeons, but at the end of three days he was removed to one of the upper prisons, as he was on the point of dying. The worst feature in the prison question is the fact that people are arrested and thrown into these places at the arbitrary will of a great man, and too often from personal vindictiveness, and there may lie untried and apparently forgotten. We remember on one occasion when a new minister came into power, and with the proverbial zeal of new functionaries he inspected the prisons, he found an unfortunate man who had been in prison for years. On examining him, he found he had been arrested one night in the streets for being found without a lantern — the streets being unlighted, every person is bound to provide himself with a lantern — and so he was put into prison and there left, his case never being inquired into.

One of the first of curiosities that strikes the eyes of strangers arriving at Constantinople, or indeed at any Eastern city, is the number of ownerless dogs in the streets. The stranger usually lands at Tophané, and here is a huge mound or dunghill, the accumulation of refuse which is thrown here, and part of which rolls into the tide of the Bosphorus. The organic matter on this heap naturally attracts the dogs. They are a listless, sleepy race of animals during the day, but in the night they are more lively, and it is

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

said that at times they are dangerous. They are of various forms and appearance, owing to the crossing at times of domesticated animals, but the genuine type is that of a foxy-looking animal, of a reddish hue, with a sharp nose and prick ears, almost the size of a small colley dog. They are sometimes called wild dogs, which is scarcely an accurate description, as they are thoroughly domesticated amongst men, though they have no owners. They are of a certain use as scavengers, though this office is performed by them in a perfunctory manner; for the writer has observed that as long as they can obtain the offal from houses, broken bread, meat, and the like, they will not touch dead animals that the Turks allow to lie in the streets. These carcasses are usually dragged to the Bosphorus and thrown into the water. There is a distinct and remarkable organization in the dog community. They have their separate quarters, and it is death to stray into another quarter.

The writer once made acquaintance with a mild-faced animal that lived in the same street, which was easily done, as these animals are always eager to attach themselves to any individual whom they recognize as having seen more than once, and a bit of bread or even a caress will at once win the heart of one of them. This poor dog used to greet our appearance with the liveliest expressions of canine attachment, and he would follow us to the end of the street. There he stopped, wagging his tail, and looking wistfully and lovingly, but no persuasion could induce him to break the canine municipal law: slowly and sadly he returned to his haunt, a sort of hollow beneath a doorstep.

The Turks are compassionate to these dogs, the Christians cruel: the latter consider them a nuisance, and persecute them with blows, scalding water, and poison, and some Christian quarters, notably Pera and Galata, have pretty well rid themselves of these creatures. The Turks gather together the leavings of their houses and throw them into the street, where they are quickly disposed of; but a good Moslem will never touch a dog, as it is an unclean animal. It is quite touching to see the affectionate invitations of a Turkish shepherd dog to be caressed by his master: he will throw himself at his feet, whine, and roll in the dust, but his master merely answers usht — begone — which he accompanies with a kick of the foot. To Europeans these street dogs are decidedly a nuisance. All night long they trouble the repose of the wakeful, not by continued barking, but what is much worse, by sudden outbreaks of barking and howling every quarter or half hour. If a stranger passes through the street after dark he is liable to be severely bitten. This liability is not extended to the main thoroughfares, where the animals are accustomed to much night traffic, but it is quite dangerous to venture into unfrequented streets and quarters. Mr. White says of these dogs:

> Friendless, houseless, and maltreated, exposed to all the vicissitudes of temperature, feeding upon the foulest and most putrescent matter, sometimes starving, sometimes gorged, constantly fighting and wrangling, bruised and maimed, the natural result, one might imagine, would be a tendency to hydrophobia. Yet, although cases of this kind have been known, they are extremely rare. It is difficult to account for this phenomenon. It would appear, then, as if constant exposure to cold, heat, rain, and snow, were in itself a preventive; and that meagre diet, combined with unrestrained liberty and communication of the sexes, are more efficient antidotes than regular food and shelter. It is possible also that the breed of dogs is more primitive, and less tender or susceptible to organic derangement than more pure and artificial bred races.

We ourselves are not disposed to admit any of these as the real cause of this remarkable exemption, but we adopt fully an old Turkish reason which assigns to the dogs themselves, i.e., to their municipal government, the stamping out of the malady. When a dog becomes snappish and odd in his behavior he is simply torn to pieces by the executioners of the quarter, and thus the disease is stamped out. The beginnings of this dire disease are more likely to be observed by the dog neighbors than by the master men, and energetic measures more likely to be adopted.

Turkey is the paradise of wild animals, as the Turks usually are not sportsmen. The waters of the Golden Horn are alive with beautiful seagulls, whose snowy plumage contrasts with the azure blue of the waters: these birds scarcely deign to get out of the way of the boatman's oars, so tame are they. In the midst of the water traffic, too, are often seen shoals of porpoises, which rise to breathe in the midst of the boats and boatmen, no one molesting them. On the southern shore of the Golden Horn, near Oon Kapoo Gate, the flocks of pigeons are enormous, which crowd upon the heaps of corn lying in the barges and elsewhere, and are unmolested. The gardens, full of cypress and almond trees, of the great houses

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

in the midst of Stamboul proper, abound with turtle-doves and other birds, which fill the air with their gentle murmurs. When in course of time a Turkish quarter is changed to a Christian one, these birds at once fall a victim to small shot. On the Bosphorus itself are flocks of a peculiar black and white bird, which flit incessantly up and down the straits. These have the popular name of "damned souls," the common superstition being that they are the souls of sinners condemned to perpetual unrest. They seem never to alight, and it is a popular mystery how they feed and where they rest. The result of some special observation on our part proved that these birds, a large species of petrel, feed on a minute kind of crustacean mollusk, which they find in certain parts of the Bosphorus. They are provided with gizzards, to grind the shells, and the birds doubtless roost on the rocks at the entrance of the Bosphorus, like the gulls. We have seen them floating on the surface of the Bosphorus at times, but rarely; they are almost always seen on the wing, hence the superstition.

The Turks are usually considered barbarous, and surely they are so in many respects: in their brutal cruelty to their fellow-creatures; in their utter absence of chivalry during war, when their conduct is not a whit above that of the redskins of America; in their treatment of women; in their barter of slaves; in the dirt and tumble-down appearance of their towns and cities; and, above all, in their corrupt and inefficient method of administration. But, on the other hand, they have certain civilized habits in which they are decidedly above all Europeans. The houses of the ordinary citizens are decidedly cleaner, and in some respects enjoy a better organization. No Turk will enter a sitting-room with dirty shoes. The upper classes wear tight-fitting fine shoes termed mests, and over these, galoshes. On entering a house the latter are laid aside at the door, and so the visitor treads on the carpet without bringing into the dwelling-house a mass of impurity. The Turk never washes in dirty water, like a European: water is poured over his hands, so that when polluted it is cast away, and not poured again over the hands and face. Certain conveniences in a Turkish house are always decent and cleanly, forming in this respect a marvellous contrast to those of most European countries: moreover, near every mosque are to be found these aids to health and decency, giving in this respect a lesson to England especially.

The code of etiquette is too elaborate and embarrassing, which is not exactly a mark of civilization. When Araucanians meet, the inquiries, felicitations, and condolences which custom demands are so elaborate, that the formality occupies ten or fifteen minutes. "We were particularly struck with the punctiliousness of manners shown by the Balonda," says Livingstone; and in our own intercourse with the nomad tribes of Mesopotamia and of Kurdistan we found the etiquette quite embarrassing. The entire absence of duelling might be scored to the credit of the Turks, did they not too often substitute the poisoned coffee-cup.

In literature (with the exception perhaps of divinity) the Turks are far below all European and most Asiatic races, while their knowledge of natural science may be said to be nil, excepting in the case of certain individuals destined for medicine and military engineering, whose education is European.

Some one has observed that the mode of feeding is a great mark of a nation's culture. When it is understood that the Turks use neither knives nor forks, many would at once rank them with outer barbarians, but this would scarcely be just. Although food of all kinds, excepting soup, is carried to the mouth without any instruments but those which nature has supplied, still in other respects Turkish meals are conducted in a mode both cleanly and decent. A Turk on rising from his bed (which consists of mattresses laid on the floor and afterwards rolled up in a cupboard) indulges in a pipe and a tiny cup of black coffee. He does not eat until about eleven o'clock, when a somewhat substantial breakfast is brought him, consisting of soup, bread, cheese, and a plate of hashed meat mixed with vegetables. This meal serves him till dinner, which is eaten about seven in the evening, and is substantial and well cooked. When dinner is announced, a servant brings in a metal ewer and basin, and pours water over the hands of the guests, presenting a towel, often prettily embroidered. A low sofra, or table, is then brought in, and upon this is placed a metal tray, on which are put spoons and pieces of bread. The first dish is a basin of soup, and each person dips his spoon into it, eating from what may be termed the soup-tureen. After this comes perhaps fish, then hashed meat and vegetables, then fowl, cooked so as to render its division easy. According to the wealth of the master of the house is the length of the feast, but in very moderate

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Turkish houses the dinners are somewhat elaborate, and they always end with pilaff, the national dish, much more national than either the roast beef or plum-pudding of the English, and as common as the macaroni of Naples. No wine is drunk during or after the repast; but on state occasions, as for example during the feast of Ramazan, some very delicious sherbets are handed round. The gala dinners of the Turks often afford examples of sweets and pastry that would not disgrace a French or Italian confectioner, so that in matters of cooking, if not in eating, the Turks may be acquitted of barbarism. We must not forget to add that at the close of the dinner the servant comes round again with soap, water, and towels, the water being often warm and scented. Coffee and pipes follow the dinner, with conversation, and the guests seem not unhappy but marvellously dull during the joyless evenings passed without the gentle and refining influence of the best part of creation. After all we come to the question — "What is civilization?" which will be variously answered by our readers. If luxury, cleanliness, and gentle manners combined, form civilization, then the Turks are highly civilized. If diabolical cruelty, the indulgence of obscene and unnatural passions, ignorance of science and the actual state of the world, constitute barbarism, then are these people barbarous. They have at least proved to the world that they are deficient in statesmanship, since their system of government is little else than an organization of brigandage, under which life, honor, and the property of millions are at the mercy of ruffians in the service of the government; while at not unfrequent periods some horrible massacre startles the world, and proves that the proverbial character of the Turk is still unchanged after centuries of contact with Europe.

There are abundance of both mosques and churches at Constantinople. A stranger would have no difficulty in finding the former, which are conspicuous all over the city, but it requires some ingenuity to find the latter. They are hidden in holes and corners, and are made as unobtrusive as possible, just like the old Quaker meeting-houses and Nonconformist chapels built two hundred years ago, when religious intolerance in England almost equalled that of Turkey. All mosques have revenues amply sufficient for keeping them in repair. No demands in the shape of tithes, collections, or entrance money are ever made from the faithful; but if Europeans wish to visit these places they pay very highly, and are obliged to take with them a guard to protect them from the fanaticism of the population, and even then, as in an instance recorded by Mr. Gallenga, they run some risk. The clergy of a first-class mosque such as that at Sofia consist of, 1st, a sheikh, or dean, whose duty it is to preach a sermon after midday prayer on Fridays, and whose rank may be described as episcopal; 2nd, of two or more khatibs, who recite the khoutba, or prayer for the Prophet and sultan; 3rd, of four imaums, who alternately recite the five namaz; 4th, of from twelve to twenty muezzin, who call to prayers from the minarets, and also chant during namaz from the gallery in the chancel, — the voices of many of these men are quite musical, and when heard from the minarets at sunset, there are few greater treats to the lovers of vocal music; 5th, of some fifteen to twenty kayims, who are the working servants of the mosques, engaged in sweeping, lighting, guarding, etc. The mosques in Constantinople are divided into three classes, called jamy-y-salatinn (imperial places of worship), which are mosques built by sultans and the mothers of sultans; secondly, jamy (places of assembly), built by mothers of sultans during their husbands' lives, by sultans' daughters or sisters, or by other great personages; of these there are two hundred and twenty-seven; thirdly, the common mejid, of which there are about three hundred. White, who gives us this information, adds: —

> The annual revenues arising from the different imperial wakoofs (mosque endowments) being more than triple the expenses required for each mosque, the increase of property by accumulation is great, and would be still greater were it not for malversation and peculation on one side, and the necessities of successive governments, or rather of successive sovereigns, on the other. There being no power higher than that of the imperial nazir, and the books and treasure being kept within ths seraglio, both are at the disposal of the sultan.

There has of late been expressed much astonishment at the money produced for the purchase of material of war by a bankrupt nation — vast cargoes of arms from America have been paid for in solid cash. The Russians have ignorantly supposed that our ministry could dispose of funds unknown to the nation, and that English gold was poured into the coffers of the sultan, but we have often pointed out the wakoof as the origin of the money. In a battle for life and death the ulemas would

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

bring forth the treasures of the mosques, with which to combat the infidels; for all war is a holy war, provided the enemy is not a Moslem power, and the Moslem priesthood would joyfully bear considerable sacrifices for such a cause.

For nearly a hundred years after the conquest of Constantinople the Christians retained several fine churches, though the magnificent cathedral of St. Sophia had from the first been devoted to Moslem uses; but during the bloody reign of Selim I. (about 1520) the sultan formed a grand scheme for the conversion of his heretical subjects. After a huge massacre of the Moslem sect of Shiis, he resolved forcibly to convert his Christian subjects and turn their churches into mosques. In order to fortify his conscience he put before the grand mufti, the head of the law, the question, "Which is the more meritorious, to conquer the whole world, or to convert the nations to Islam?" The mufti unhesitatingly answered that the conversion of the world was the more meritorious. The sultan having obtained this official opinion in the form of a fetva, ordered the grand vizier to change all the churches into mosques, to forbid the practice of the Christian religion, and to offer the alternative of the sword or the Koran to all Christians. The grand vizier, aghast at the decree, procured for the Greek patriarch an audience before the Divan at Adrianople. He strongly appealed to the pledges given by Mahomet the conqueror when Constantinople was taken by assault, invoking certain passages in the Koran which forbid compulsory conversion. The sultan yielded so far as to spare the lives of the Christians, but all the best churches were converted into mosques.

By far the most magnificent mosque in the world is that of St. Sophia, once the most glorious of Christian temples. The vast dome is one of the wonders of the world. Concealed beneath the whitewash, with which the Turks have covered the interior, are various beautiful vestiges of its Christian origin, which in all human probability will some day be uncovered to delight a Greek congregation.

Did space permit we might endeavor to describe the exquisite scenery of the narrow channel called the Bosphorus, whose banks are lined with the summer houses of the citizens, and which opens into the Black Sea. This channel is fifteen miles long. We might describe the interminable labyrinths of arched passages called the tcharshié, or bazaars, where every conceivable kind of goods are sold, for as a rule Stamboul contains no shops, all the goods being sold in these centres of traffic. Then we might dilate upon the various races of Europeans and Asiatics which crowd the streets, and offer to the curious eye a greater diversity of costume than is to be found in any other city in the world. But we must be content with the imperfect sketch we have given to the reader, only venturing to add the hope that a new era is dawning on this interesting city, and that it will soon become the abode of civilization and enlightenment, having ceased to be the lair of Asiatic tyrants.

From The Cornhill Magazine.

COUNT WALDEMAR.

I.

It was in Homburg that I first met him. I had finished the noonday breakfast which I always take at the Cursaal, and was sitting on the terrace in front of that establishment, smoking the one morning cigar allowed me by my doctor, and contemplating with indolent satisfaction the sunny gardens before me and all the soft lights and shades that lay upon the distant woods, when he came clattering down the steps of the restaurant in his tight blue hussar uniform, his Hessian boots, and flat forage-cap, and pulling up suddenly within a few paces of my chair, began to slap his breast and rummage in his scanty coat-tail pockets in search of something which was evidently not to be found there. He was a tall, handsome young fellow, with clear blue eyes and a fair moustache, a young fellow of a type by no means uncommon in the German army; but something — I don't know whether it was his size, or his good looks, or a prophetic instinct — attracted my attention to him at once. A slight cloud overspread his features as he realized the futility of his search, and for a moment or two he seemed uncertain what to do next; but presently, becoming aware of the scrutiny of an elderly Englishman of benevolent aspect, he cheered up, as with a sudden inspiration, and approaching me in a couple of strides, raised his right hand to the side of his cap, bowed very low from the waist, and gratified me with one of the brightest smiles I had ever seen upon a human countenance.

"I have done a most stupid thing," said he, speaking with a strong German accent, but without hesitation or a shadow of

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

embarrassment; "I have left my Cigarren-étui at the hotel. Dare I give myself the liberty to ask if you have a cigar to spare in your pocket?"

Of course I handed him my case without further ado. I suppose that no man living could be churl enough to refuse such a request; but I was amused by it nevertheless; for it was one that an Englishman would have died rather than address to a total stranger; and indeed the article required was to be purchased close at hand in the Cursaal restaurant, where my esteemed friend M. Chevet keeps some of the choicest brands.

The young officer, however, had his reasons for not choosing to avail himself of this convenient proximity, and disclosed them with engaging candor, after taking a light from me.

"Now this is a very goot cigar," he was kind enough to remark, seating himself astride upon an iron chair. "If I would buy such a one by Chevet, I would have to pay a mark for him. One mark — yes, that is what they have asked me last night — it is unheard of! For you Englishmen, who pay without bargaining, that is very well; but we Germans" (Chairmans he pronounced it) "are not such fool — I mean, we know better what is the fair price."

His ease of manner was simply inimitable; I have never seen anything like it before or since. It arose, I imagine, from that unsuspecting good-will towards the world at large which makes children who are not afflicted with shyness such charming companions. I was delighted with him. He chatted away so pleasantly and amusingly for a quarter of an hour that I was quite sorry when a formidable posse of comrades in arms — dragoons, uhlans, hussars, and I know not what other specimens of the imperial German cavalry — came clanking along the terrace, and carried him off with them. Before this he had given me his card, which bore the name of Count Waldemar von Ravensburg; had informed me that he held a lieutenant's commission in a Würtemberg hussar regiment, and was in Homburg for the purpose of riding in some proposed military steeplechases; and had strongly advised me to dine that evening at the Hessischer Hof, where he said I should get good German fare, greatly superior to the spurious French cooking of the more fashionable hotels.

"I shall be dining there myself, mit all my friends," he added, by way of final inducement.

Under ordinary circumstances such a consideration as this would have sufficed of itself to drive me elsewhere in search of my evening sustenance; for sincerely as I appreciate the many amiable social qualities of German officers, I know what these gentlemen are when a number of them get together, and I am fond neither of being deafened nor of having to bellow like a skipper in a gale of wind, in order to make my own remarks audible. But I had taken such a fancy to Count Waldemar, he struck me as so genial and original a type of fellow-creature, that I was loth to lose any opportunity of prosecuting my acquaintance with him; and accordingly the dinner-hour (half past five) found me at the door of the little Hessischer Hof.

A most cacophonous din burst upon my ears, as I entered, from an assemblage of spurred and uniformed warriors, who, as the manner of their nation is, were exchanging civilities in accents suggestive of furious indignation. My young hussar detached himself from the group, greeted me with the warmth of an old friend, and presented me to each of his comrades in turn.

"Meestr Cleefford — Herr von Blechow, Herr von Rochow, Herr von Katsow, Herr von Wallwitz, Herr von Zedlitz, Herr von Zezschwitz," etc., etc. Perhaps these were not their names: indeed, now I come to think of it, I believe they ran into considerably more syllables; but it does not much matter. They were all very polite, and indeed were as pleasant and jovial a set of youths as one could wish to meet. During dinner the conversation turned chiefly upon races and steeplechases, giving opportunity for many thrilling anecdotes, and with our dessert we had some sweet champagne, over which we grew very merry and noisy.

When it was all over, Count Waldemar hooked his arm within mine, and in this familiar fashion we strolled out into the street, where (for it was early in August) broad daylight still reigned, and slant sunrays from the west streamed upon the long row of yellow droschkes with their patient, net-covered horses, upon the shiny hats of the drivers, upon the trim orange-trees in their green tubs, and upon the distinguished visitors — English almost exclusively — who, by twos and threes, were slowly wending their way towards the terrace, where the band would soon strike up. Gusts of cool, fresh air were sweeping down from the blue Taunus range, setting the little flags upon the Cursaal fluttering, and banging a shutter

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

here and there. Imagine to yourself a stalwart young hussar, moving with that modicum of swagger from which no cavalry man that ever lived is quite free, and which very tight clothes render to some extent compulsory upon their wearer; imagine, arm-in-arm with him, an Englishman of something under middle height and something over middle age, clad in a grey frock-coat and trousers and tall white hat, and you will have before your mind's eye a picture which, I grieve to think, is not wholly wanting in elements of the ridiculous.

I have reason to believe that the droschke-drivers saw it in this light; I fear that my compatriots did; I know that I did myself. But I am perfectly sure that the excellent Count Waldemar was not only free from the faintest suspicion that our appearance could provoke a smile, but that he never could have been brought to understand in the least why it should do so. No one could laugh louder or longer than he, upon occasion; but then he must have something to laugh at; and it would have been impossible to convince him that there could be any joke in the simple fact of two gentlemen walking together arm-in-arm. He was in all things the most completely unselfconscious mortal I have ever known.

For my own part, I am not ashamed to confess — or rather I am ashamed, but do confess — that the notion of being promenaded up and down the terrace, under the eyes of all my friends and acquaintances, by this long-legged and rather loud-voiced young officer alarmed me so much that I was fain to insist upon leading him down one of the more secluded alleys. He did not want to walk that way; he said we should neither hear the music nor see the people there; but I pointed out to him that it would be impossible for me to give my whole attention to his conversation in a crowd; and so, being a most good-natured soul, he yielded, and went on chatting about Stuttgardt, and his regiment, and his brother officers, and his horses, in all of which subjects he seemed to think that I must be greatly interested. And so indeed I was — or, at least, in his treatment of them.

Just as we reached the point where the Untere Promenade crosses the Cursaal gardens we were met by a party of English people — an old lady, three young ones, and a couple of men carrying shawls — who came up the steps talking and laughing, and passed on towards the band. I should not have noticed them particularly had not a sudden convulsive jerk of my captive arm made me aware that my companion had some reason for feeling moved by their vicinity. The manner in which he paused, and, gazing after them, profoundly sighed, would have sufficiently revealed the nature of that reason, even if he had intended to conceal it — which of course he did not.

"Now I shall tell you something," said he, with an air of confidential candor all his own. "The lady you see there — the tall one who is walking alone — it is she whom I mean to make my wife."

"Indeed?" I answered. "I am sorry, then, that I did not look at her more closely. May I venture to ask her name?"

"Ah, diess I cannot just tell you. But it begins mit an S — that I know; for I have seen the monogram upon her fan."

"Your love affair is not very far advanced then?"

"Advanced? no; it is not yet commenced; but that is no matter. I have three whole days more to spend here, and in three days one may do much. Oh, and we do not see one another now for the first time. Last summer we have met in a bath."

"In a bath?" I echoed, rather startled.

"You do not say bath — no? Well, in a watering-place. It is true that I have not been able to make myself acquaint mit her; but my eyes have spoken. I think she has perhaps understood. And now I was thinking at dinner that you might present me."

"To the lady? My dear sir, I should like nothing better; but unfortunately I never saw her before in my life."

"Versteht sich! That is no difficulty. You are English — she is English; you have friends here who will certainly know her."

I interrupted my impetuous companion by observing that he was evidently under some misapprehension as to the social relations of the English abroad. Even upon the doubtful supposition that the unknown lady and I had some common acquaintance in Homburg, it by no means followed that I could venture to request an introduction to her for myself — still less for a friend.

"Besides," I added, "all sorts of people travel nowadays: this lady may be a duchess, or she may be a tailor's daughter. In the first case, you see, she would probably decline to have anything to say to me; and in the second I should not particularly care about knowing her."

He appeared to be rather surprised than

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

shaken by these objections. For a few seconds he contemplated me wonderingly, stroking his moustache, and murmuring, "What a pitee!" but his self-confidence was not long in returning to him.

"Never mind!" he resumed cheerfully; "we must make the attempt — that can do no harm. You will try to make yourself presented to her to-night, and if you succeed, you will present me to-morrow morning."

I don't think it struck him for a moment that there was anything cool in this proposal. He uttered it in the most matter-of-fact tone in the world, patted me encouragingly on the shoulder, and then, remarking that Herr von Wallwitz would be waiting for him, said he would leave me to accomplish my mission. I afterwards found that he was in the habit of issuing his behests in this calm manner, and that, somehow or other, they were generally obeyed.

Whether it was owing to the power of Count Waldemar's reliance upon human friendliness, or to the pliancy of my own nature, which has led me into many a scrape first and last, I can't say; but certain it is that in this instance he gained his point. For, as chance would have it, the very first person whom I met on returning to the terrace, where the lamps were now lighted, and where the fashionable world of Homburg was gossiping, flirting, and promenading to the accompaniment of an excellent band, was little Tommy Tufnell, who knows, or says he knows, everybody from the Prince of Wales downwards; and as, immediately after this encounter, I happened to espy the fair unknown sitting in the midst of a circle of friends, I took the opportunity to ask my companion whether he could give me any information about her, at the same time expressing a careless wish to make her acquaintance. Tommy, of course, knew her perfectly well — most intimately, in fact — had known her people all his life. "She was a Miss Grey — Warwickshire Greys, you know," he observed explanatorily. He further informed me that she was a widow, and that her present name was Seymour. "Married poor Jack Seymour of the 25th Hussars," he continued. "You remember Jack, of course. No? Ah, well, he was a baddish lot, poor fellow. Broke his neck out hunting — just as well perhaps. Had D.T. twice, and was not over and above kind to his wife, I'm afraid. She is here with her aunt, Mrs. Grey, and her cousins — charming people. Come along, and I'll introduce you. Upon my word, Clifford, you old fellows, when you get away from your wives, and come abroad on the loose, there's no end to the games you're up to! All safe with me, you know — sha'n't say anything about it to Mrs. Clifford," adds the facetious Tommy, wagging his head and nudging me after a favorite fashion of his, which I am quite sure he would abandon if he only knew how very much I dislike it.

Presently I was making my best bow before the little group of ladies above mentioned. The two young men whom I had seen entering the gardens with them stopped talking and stared, evidently wondering what the deuce this tiresome old fogey wanted; but as I showed no disposition to interrupt their respective flirtations with the pretty Miss Greys, they soon began to whisper again, and ceased to notice me. Tufnell obligingly engaged Mrs. Grey, a stout, good-humored looking old person, in an animated discussion as to the effect of the Homburg waters upon suppressed gout; and Mrs. Seymour withdrew a corner of her dress from a chair which stood conveniently at her side. I availed myself of the tacit permission thus conveyed, and dropped into it, profiting by the light of an adjacent gas-lamp to survey at my leisure the lady who had made so facile a conquest of Count Waldemar.

I saw a slim, but well-proportioned figure, clad in a handsome silk dress, the cut of which, even to my masculine eyes, betrayed the hand of an artist — a face neither beautiful nor plain, surmounted by a profusion of little fair curls, arranged, according to the fashion of the day, so as to conceal the forehead, a picturesque hat, a pair of diamond solitaire earrings — upon the whole a person completely unremarkable, but at the same time (to use an adjective which I abhor, but cannot replace), decidedly stylish. Why any one should have fallen in love with Mrs. Seymour at first sight it was not very easy to understand, though taking her altogether, she made a favorable impression upon me. She had a frank, pleasant smile and clear grey eyes, and talked away agreeably enough, in an easy, conventional way, about Homburg, about the recent Goodwood meeting, the latest scandal, and what not. In short she was so exactly like everybody else that I had no hesitation in crediting her with just so much of good nature, common sense, selfishness, and solid principle as are required to make up a well-balanced character, nor any doubt but that she would be quite the last woman in the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

world to marry a scatterbrained German hussar, after a courtship of three days' duration.

She bowed or nodded to so many of the passers-by, during the time that I was sitting beside her, that I formed a shrewd guess that, among the many obstacles which seemed to lie in the path of my audacious young friend, that most formidable one of wealth was not likely to be wanting. Later in the evening I again came across Tommy Tufnell in the Cursaal, whither I had repaired to have a look at the young people dancing before I went to bed, and I took occasion to question him upon this point.

"Oh, yes, she is very well off," answered Tommy carelessly; "that is, comfortably off, you know — three or four thousand a year, or something like that, I should think, and no children. It would have been more if poor Seymour had gone over to the majority a little sooner. He always lived beyond his income, and latterly he lost rather heavily on the turf."

Mentally summing up, as I walked home, all that I had heard and seen of Mrs. Seymour, I came to the conclusion that to introduce Count Waldemar to her would be merely to cause disappointment to him, annoyance to her, and inconvenience to myself; and I therefore determined that I would do nothing of the sort. Had I been a little better acquainted with the young Würtemberger, I should not have made this resolution; for I subsequently discovered him to be one of those people who invariably get their own way, whereas I, for some occult reason, seldom or never get mine.

When I went down to the springs at half past seven the next morning, in obedience to the rule laid down for me by my doctor, whom should I see approaching the Elisabethen-Brunnen but Mrs. Seymour. She looked very nice and fresh in her cotton dress, and saluted me with a friendly nod and smile. Side by side we drained our bitter draught, and then, as neither of us was provided with a companion, we could not well help turning away to go through the prescribed twenty minutes of moderate exercise together. We took our way down the shady avenue so familiar to Englishmen, while the morning sun streamed through the leaves over our heads, throwing long blue shadows from the trees across the dewy grass of the park, while the throng of water-drinkers tramped steadily up and down, and the bandsmen in their kiosk scraped and tootled away as merrily as if they really enjoyed making melody at that unnatural hour. Half London met or passed us as we walked. Peers and tradesmen, judges and generals, members of Parliament and members of the stock exchange, they plodded on — they, their wives and their daughters — a queer miscellany of Anglo-Saxon samples, without a single German, barring H. S. H. the Grand Duke of Halbacker, among them. I had just pointed out this remarkable circumstance to my fair companion when a sudden grip of my left arm above the elbow warned me that I had spoken too hastily. Here, sure enough, was a German, and one who had no notion of being ignored either.

"Goot morning!" he cried cheerily. "Now this is a very fortunate thing, that I just happen to meet you."

I was not quite so sure of that; but I answered him civilly, and he hooked himself on to me without any ceremony. I resumed my conversation with Mrs. Seymour, and after we had progressed a few yards, Count Waldemar began poking me with his elbow in a way which I understood, but did not choose to notice. Finding these gentle hints of no avail, he followed them up presently by such a tremendous blow in my ribs that I positively staggered under it. I looked up at him reproachfully, shook my head, and tried to form with my lips the words, "Can't be done. Will explain afterwards." But it was no good.

"I hear not one wort von wass you say," was his response, delivered in stentorian tones; after which he continued, without lowering his voice in the least, "Will you not do me the honor to present me to madame?"

What could I do?

"Mrs. Seymour, will you allow me to introduce Count Waldemar von Ravensburg," says I, perhaps a little sulkily; and I noticed that a mischievous gleam of amusement swept across the lady's face as she returned Count Waldemar's profound bow. No doubt he had been making eyes at her with that thoroughness of purpose which distinguished his every deed.

Now that I had acted contrary to my better judgment, and done what was required of me, it obviously remained only that I should take myself off; and indeed it was time for my second glass of water. So, when we had reached the Elisabethen-Brunnen, whither we all three returned together, I judiciously caught sight of a friend, and slipped away.

While listening to the plaints of old Mr.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Porteous upon the subject of his gouty toes, I kept an eye upon the count and the widow, who were sustaining an animated dialogue on the further side of the spring. I saw her finish her potion; I saw him seize the empty glass, hand it to the attendant maiden to be refilled, and drain it with a gusto for which the inherent properties of the water were hardly sufficient to account; I saw him repeat this foolhardy action twice — thrice, and then walk away at Mrs. Seymour's side as coolly as you please. I believe he would have pocketed the tumbler, like Sir Walter Scott, had not his uniform been far too tight to permit of such a proceeding.

Merciful powers! three glasses of Elisabethen straight off the reel! And I who am allowed but two; and must walk about for twenty minutes after the first, and for an hour after the second, under peril of I know not what awful consequences! I took a couple of turns along the avenue beside Porteous's bath-chair, and then concluded my walk in the company of some other fellow-sufferers; but I heard little of what they said, for I could not take my eyes off that young man. I watched him as the islanders watched Saint Paul of old, waiting for tardy Nemesis to overtake him, and I was almost disappointed to see that he came out of the ordeal as scathless as the apostle. My faith in my favorite spring received a blow that morning from which it has never fully recovered. Meanwhile the unconscious disturber of my peace was to all appearance getting on at a great pace with Mrs. Seymour. Their conversation did not appear to flag for a moment; and every now and then the sound of his laughter reached my ears above the din of the band, the shuffling of footsteps, and the buzz of many voices. Such a jolly, joyous laugh as it was! No snigger, nor cackle, nor half-smothered outburst, but a fine, rich ho-ho-ho! as natural and irrepressible as the song of a bird, and, to my ears, nearly as musical. I declare that, if I had been a woman, I should have felt three-parts inclined to marry Count Waldemar for the mere sake of his laugh, knowing that it could only proceed from the most manly and honest of hearts.

He caught me up after I had set my face homewards, and clapped me on the shoulder with much warmth. "You are my very goot friend," he was good enough to say. "I shall never forget wass you have done for me."

"You have nothing to thank me for. I should not have introduced you if you had not forced me into doing so," I replied candidly. "The truth is, there is no chance for you. I know my countrywomen better than you can do, and I assure you that, though Mrs. Seymour may find it amusing enough to hear you talk, she will no more think of accepting your offer (if you are foolish enough to make her one) than she would of drinking three glasses of mineral water, highly charged with carbonic acid gas, because your lips had happened to touch the rim of the tumbler."

"Now, that we shall see," he rejoined, in no way disconcerted.

"Setting aside the question of your nationality and of her very slight acquaintance with you," I continued, "I must tell you that she is a woman of considerable fortune."

"Ja — so?" quoth he, quite imperturbably. "That is all the better; for I am myself a poor man. Money brings not happiness, but is no bad addition to happiness.".

The perfect good faith with which this copybook maxim was enunciated was in its way inimitable. It was clearly absurd to waste more words upon one so ignorant of the first guiding principles of civilized society, so I went home to breakfast.

II.

I AM one of those who look back with regret to the palmy old days of MM. Blanc and Bénazet. I never could see that the interests of public morality required the suppression of the gaming-tables, nor, for that matter, that it is the legitimate province of governments to look after the morals of law-abiding people at all. It has always seemed to me that, if I had gambling propensities, it would be far better for me to indulge them in public than in private. Those who stake against the bank play with an adversary who at least has no cards up his sleeve, who expects no "revenge" from a winner, who neither takes nor offers IOU's, who gains without unseemly exultation, and may be "broken" without being ruined. Of course I know all about the clerks who used to rob their masters' tills, and the peasants whose hardly-earned wages used to disappear on Saturday nights over the green cloth; but an obligatory deposit of twenty pounds or so, to be returned on the departure of the visitor, would have effectually excluded these simple folks; and really, if our rulers are to begin protecting us against ourselves, where are they to stop? Why should we not be forbidden

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

to back a horse, or to invest our money in South American securities, or to go out in wet weather without an umbrella and cork soles?

I feel the more free to say all this inasmuch as neither M. Blanc nor M. Bénazet ever made a single thaler out of me, except in indirect ways. It is not from any love of trente et quarante or roulette in themselves that I would fain see a restoration of those merry monarchs, but because their little kingdoms, which were once so joyous, are now left desolate, or nearly so. Their flower-gardens are growing less flowery every year; their well-mown lawns are well-mown no longer; their paths are grass-grown, or strewed with falling leaves; their prime donne and Parisian actors find more lucrative summer engagements elsewhere; the very gilding on their palace walls is beginning to tarnish, and will, perhaps, not be renewed; for where is the money to come from?

Homburg, it is true, is more highly favored than its neighbors, fashion having chosen to decree of late years that it should be the proper thing for the English great world to repair thither for a time at the close of the London season; and I must confess that now, when I do my annual three weeks of water-drinking, I mix in a more aristocratic as well as more respectable society than of yore. But then it is a considerably duller one. With the exception of lawn-tennis and dancing, neither of which relaxations are altogether suitable to the age of a majority of the Curgäste, Homburg is somewhat wanting in amusements in these latter days; and I suppose that is why everybody was so determined to be present at the steeplechases mentioned to me by Count Waldemar, that, on the appointed day, there was not a carriage to be had in the town for love or money. I myself was glad enough to accept the offer of a box-seat from some friends; for, anxious though I was to see how my new friend would acquit himself in the saddle, I had no idea of trudging two or three miles under a blazing sun for that or any other purpose.

The improvised course was pleasantly situated upon a slope of the Taunus Mountains, commanding a wide view of the rolling plain on which Homburg stands, of yellow cornfields and waving woods, and the spires of Frankfort glittering in the distance. Mounted policemen in spiked helmets were galloping hither and thither without any ostensible object; flags were fluttering, a military band was in full blast; a large concourse of country people in holiday garb lined the hillside, and a triple row of carriages, displaying much quaint variety in build, was drawn up in the neighborhood of the winning-post.

In one of the latter I soon made out Mrs. Seymour, of whom, after the exchange of a few commonplaces, I could not forbear from inquiring her opinion of Herr von Ravensburg. She laughed heartily, as at some diverting reminiscence.

"Charming!" she replied. "Thank you so very much for introducing him to me. I don't know when I have met anyone who has made me laugh so much."

I doubted whether this were exactly the impression the young gentlemen had intended to produce, and I said so.

"He does not intend to produce any impression at all," answered Mrs. Seymour. "That is just what makes him so delightful. Instead of thinking about himself, as most Englishmen do, he thinks about the person he is talking to — and tells you what he thinks, too, in the most innocent manner."

"Did he tell you what he thought of you?" I asked.

"He did indeed. He said I wore false hair, and that that was very bad taste. Also he informed me that I ought not to go down to the springs in the morning alone."

"How very rude of him! Did he say nothing more than that?"

"Oh, yes, he paid me some compliments. He could hardly do less after being so plain-spoken. Ah, here he is. Now we shall have some fun."

The dialogue that ensued was funny enough in all conscience, but I doubt whether Mrs. Seymour fully appreciated the humor of it. To an onlooker nothing could have been more comical than the freak of fate which had brought together these two widely differing types of humanity, and had inspired each of them with a desire to penetrate beneath the outer crust of the other's individuality. By education, by habit, in thought and in mode of expression, they were as remote from one another as a Chinaman from a Choctaw; and I question whether they had a single quality in common, unless it were that of good-nature. Mrs. Seymour understood, no doubt, that this young German was greatly smitten with her — she must have been blind indeed to have ignored that — but I think that her comprehension of him began and ended there. As for him, he palpably could make nothng of the

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

English lady whose charms had conquered his heart. It was easy to see that he was a little shocked, as well as fascinated, by her freedom of manner. The idioms of her fashionable slang puzzled him, and he could not quite follow her quick repartees. More than once I caught him gazing at her with a look of troubled bewilderment in his blue eyes, which gradually melted into a smile as reflection brought him a clue to her meaning.

"Ah, you wass laughing at me," he would exclaim, breaking into one of his own hearty peals at this remarkable discovery. And then fat Mrs. Grey would laugh too, without knowing why; and so by degrees we all became very friendly and merry.

In the mean time the afternoon was wearing on. The three first events on the card — steeplechases they called them, but the obstacles to be surmounted were not of a very formidable kind — were disposed of, and the time was approaching for the great race of the day, in which Count Waldemar was to take part. We all wished him success when he left us, and, as he hurried away, I noticed that he was twirling between his finger and thumb a white rose very much resembling a cluster of those flowers which Mrs. Seymour wore in the front of her dress.

After a short delay the riders came out, and thundered past us, one by one — a yellow cap and jacket steering a big-boned, fiddle-headed roan; a blue jacket and black sleeves struggling with a chestnut who seemed a little too much for him; then some half-dozen others, whose colors, to tell the truth, I have forgotten, and likewise their horses. Last of all Count Waldemar cantered by, mounted on a little brown horse whose looks did not take the fancy of the ladies. Nor, for that matter, were they much better satisfied with the appearance of the count himself. He wore his uniform — a queer costume, certainly, in which to ride a race — and what had he done with that white rose but stuck it in the side of his flat cap, where, I must confess, it looked excessively absurd and conspicuous. Mrs. Seymour was not a little annoyed, I think, by this bold advertisement of her favor, but she was too much a woman of the world to make mountains out of molehills. However, she unfastened her own roses from her dress, and tossed them into the hood of the carriage, saying plainly that she did not wish to be laughed at by all Homburg.

I am not a sporting man myself, and should never think of trusting to my own judgment in a matter of horseflesh. Therefore, although I was by no means so displeased as my companions with Count Waldemar's mount, I did not venture to say anything to excite their hopes until I had consulted a racing man of my acquaintance, whom I found near the judge's box, surveying the scene with hat cocked and arms akimbo, patronage, not unmingled with disdain, expressed in his gaze.

"Good wear-and-tear little nag. Might win, I should say, over a long course like this, if his owner knows how to ride him," was the verdict of this oracle. "The roan's the favorite, they tell me, but, Lord bless you! looking at a horse'll never show you what he can do, especially with these fellows up. Lay you six sovereigns to four against the little brown, if you like, just to give the thing an interest, you know."

Modestly accepting this offer, I returned to tell Mrs. Seymour that I thought our man had as good a chance as anybody; and had just time to clamber up on to the box of her carriage, and get out my field-glasses, before a start was effected.

As I have already intimated, I have no pretension to say in what manner a race should or should not be ridden; but, dear me, the pace at which those young men dashed off, and the way they rushed at their fences! The yellow jacket took the lead, and kept it; the others were all together, a couple of lengths or so behind him — whipping and spurring, some of them, before they had accomplished a fourth of the distance. I was glad to see Count Waldemar lying well in the rear of this charge of cavalry, sitting still in his saddle, and evidently biding his time, like a sensible man. His little horse, with whom he seemed to be upon terms of perfect mutual understanding, popped over the fences cleverly enough, and looked full of running.

The race was twice round the course, and when the first circuit had been completed, it was clear to the most inexperienced eye that there were only three horses in it — the roan, the chestnut, and the brown.

Of the remaining competitors, one had gone the wrong side of a flag, and had pulled up, two had come to grief, and the others were hopelessly beaten. The roan was still ahead; the chestnut, all in a lather, was separated from him by a few lengths; and the brown was a little further behind than I quite liked to see him. Now, however, he began to creep slowly up; at

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

every jump he perceptibly gained ground, and before very long secured the second place. This order of going was maintained up to the last fence, over which yellow-jacket lifted the roan as if it had been a five-barred gate instead of a modest little hurdle. Count Waldemar slipped past him while he was still in the air, and cantered in without once lifting his whip.

"I am so glad!" cried Mrs. Seymour, as soon as she could make her voice heard above the acclamations that greeted this finish. "He did ride well, did not he, Mr. Clifford?"

"Couldn't have ridden better," I responded heartily, thinking of my six pounds and of the knowingness I had displayed in picking out the winner. "You see I was not very far wrong. I must say for myself that, though I don't profess to know much about racing, I have a pretty good eye for a horse, and——"

"Oh, but it wasn't the horse at all," interrupted Mrs. Seymour rather unkindly. "Anybody could see that that ugly little thing would have had no chance whatever if your friend had not ridden so perfectly. I wonder whether he is very much pleased."

"He looks so, at all events," remarked Mrs. Grey.

In truth the countenance of the victor, who was just now being led away in triumph by a crowd of his comrades, wore an expression of delight which he made no attempt to conceal. He had dropped his reins, and was throwing his arms about and talking eagerly, evidently explaining what the nature of his tactics had been, while all his features literally beamed with glee. Those who have happened to observe the face of a very small boy who has astonished everybody by a clever catch at cricket, will have some idea of Count Waldemar as he appeared in this moment of success. Only to look at him did one's heart good, and, as I watched him, I rejoiced more than ever in his victory, for I saw then how dreadfully disappointed he would have been if he had lost.

It is hardly necessary to relate how he eventually reappeared beside Mrs. Seymour's carriage, how he was received by the ladies with warm congratulations, and how every incident in the race had to be recorded in detail. I, for my part, having said what was proper, benevolently took away Mrs. Grey to look at the water-jump, perceiving that, if Count Waldemar was ever to make an impression upon the heart of the widow, now would be his opportunity.

No doubt he made good use of his time. I left the racecourse without seeing him again; but happening to dine that evening at the Cursaal, I had the satisfaction of witnessing from afar a well-attended and somewhat uproarious banquet, at which he was the chief guest, and which was given, the waiter told me, by the Herren Offiziere who had taken part in the steeplechases. A silver cup of surpassing hideousness, displayed in the middle of the table, was, my informant added, the trophy won by the hero of the day; the Herr Graf's health was about to be proposed, and doubtless he would make a speech in reply. Distance debarred me from enjoying the Herr Graf's eloquence; but judging from the applause it elicited, I conclude that it was worthy of him and of the occasion, and I observed with pleasure that his high spirits had not deserted him.

While I was drinking my cup of black coffee in the open air afterwards, he came out and joined me, as I had half expected that he would do. I asked him whether closer inspection had lessened his admiration of my countrywoman's charms, and he said not at all. On the contrary, he was more than ever convinced that he was now in love for the first and only time in his life, and more than ever determined that Mrs. Seymour should, ere long, change her name for that of Gräfin von Ravensburg. At the same time he gave me to understand that love had not blinded him to certain imperfections in the lady of his choice. He took exception to sundry tricks of voice and gesture, which, with a German's instinct for spying out the infinitely little, he had remarked in her; he pronounced her to be too emancipirt, by which, I take it, he meant "fast," and feared that the poetical side of her nature had not been sufficiently developed. But these, after all, he concluded, stretching out his long legs, and blowing a cloud of smoke into the still evening air, were but trifles, which marriage, and a residence in the cultured society of Stuttgardt, would soon correct.

"Do you know," said I, "I think you are about the most conceited young man I ever came across?"

He opened his eyes in genuine amazement.

"Conceited!" he cried; "now that has never been said of me before. What for do you call me conceited?"

I pointed out to him that modest men do not, as a rule, expect ladies to fall in love with them at first sight.

"Ah, that is your English notion. You

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

consider yourselves the first nation in the world, and yet it is rare that you will find an Englishman who does not affect to speak against his country. That you call modesty, but I think it is a great foolishness, for you do not mean wass you say. And so mit other things. I do not expect as every lady shall fall in love with me — no! But one — that is another thing. If it has happened to me to love her, why should she not love me? I am very sure that your wife has loved you before she has married you."

"An impartial study of Mrs. Clifford's character during some twenty years of married life would have led me to form a somewhat different conclusion," I answered; "but doubtless you know best. I can assure you, however, that I have never had the audacity to offer marriage to anybody within a week of my first meeting with her."

"Berhaps," said he gravely, "you have never met the lady whom Gott has meant to be your wife. If you had, you would know that it is of no importance whether a man shall speak in two days or in two years. For me, I have no choice. I must join my regiment to-morrow, and so it is necessary that I declare myself to-night."

"And pray how are you going to find your opportunity?"

"Ah, for that I have had to employ a little diplomacy," he answered, pronouncing the word "diploma*cee*," with a strong emphasis upon the last syllable, and accompanying it with a look of profound cunning which I would not have missed for worlds. "I have arranched to meet these ladies at the band, and to show them the race-cup, which, as you know, is in the restaurant. Now, diess is my plan. I join them when they are already seated, and I say: 'One lady will be so kind and keep the chairs while I take the other indoors.' I take Mrs. Seymour first, and then — you understandt."

He went off presently to carry out this wily stratagem, having first promised to call at my hotel early the next morning, and let me hear the result of his attempt.

Somehow or other I could not help fancying that there might be a chance for him. Women like youth and good looks and proficiency in manly sports and a pretty uniform, and Mrs. Seymour was rich enough to indulge in a caprice. I had taken so strong a liking to the young fellow myself during the three days of our intimacy, that it did not seem to me an absolute impossibility that a lady should have fallen in love with him within as brief a period. I ought of course to have known better. I ought to have remembered that we do not live in an age of romantic marriages and love at first sight, and to have foreseen that Mrs. Seymour would receive the young German's declaration exactly as ninety-nine women out of any hundred would do; but I suppose Count Waldemar's self-confidence must have slightly disturbed the balance of my judgment; and besides, I am always more prone to look at the sentimental side of things after dark than during the daytime.

With the return of morning my common sense recovered its sway, and I was not surprised when my breakfast was interrupted by the entrance of Count Waldemar, with a rather long face and a confession of failure upon his lips. He was disappointed, but far from despairing, and assured me that he had no intention of accepting this check as a final defeat.

"I have been reflecting all night in my inside," he said; "and I perceive that I have been too hasty. No matter — aufgeschoben ist nicht aufgehoben, as we say — to delay is not to break off. I shall meet her again, and then I shall know better how to act."

And so, with a hearty shake of the hand at parting, and a cordial invitation to beat up his quarters at Stuttgardt if ever my wanderings should lead me that way, he set off for the railway-station.

III.

SHORTLY afterwards I myself left Homburg, having completed the period of my "cure;" and if at the end of a week I had not quite forgotten Count Waldemar and Mrs. Seymour, I had at all events ceased to think about them and their destinies. On one's way through the world one is forever catching glimpses of disconnected dramas — the opening of a farce, the second act of a comedy, the tail of a tragedy. Accident interests us for a time in the doings and sufferings of the actors, and accident hurries them out of sight and out of mind again, with their stories half told.

Accident it was — or destiny, I can't say which; certainly it was not inclination — that took me, in the autumn of that same year, to Hyères, in company with my wife, and Mrs. Seymour could give no more satisfactory explanation of her presence in that dull little winter station. I ran up against her, on the Place des Palmiers, a few days after my arrival; and if I had been Friday and she Robinson Crusoe, she could not have hailed me with a greater show of delight.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

"I am so very glad to see you!" she exclaimed. "In an evil hour I made up my mind to winter in the south, and three weeks ago I came here with my cousin, Miss Grey, whom you may remember at Homburg; and now, after I have taken a villa for six months, we have discovered how cordially we hate the place. We know hardly anybody, we have nothing to do, and, in short, we are bored to death. I do hope you are going to spend the winter here."

I said I did not think that I should be in Hyères very long, but that Mrs. Clifford, I believed, intended remaining for several months; after which I could hardly avoid adding that I hoped soon to have the pleasure of introducing my wife to Mrs. Seymour.

The truth is, that my satisfaction at meeting with that lady was tempered by some misgivings as to the probable nature of her reception by Mrs. Clifford, who is not a little particular in the matter of chance acquaintances, and who has never had any confidence at all in her husband's powers of discernment. In the present instance, however, my fears proved to be groundless; for when Mrs. Seymour came to call, it transpired, in the course of conversation, that before her marriage she had been one of the Warwickshire Greys (whoever they may be), and that, of course, made it all right. My wife pronounced her to be a really delightful person, and declared emphatically that she already felt a sincere interest in her future welfare.

The full significance of the latter phrase, which at the time I thought rather uncalled for, did not strike me until a few days later. It had happened that, upon our arrival at the Hôtel d'Orient, we had found already installed there a certain young man named Everard, a budding diplomatist with whom I am upon tolerably intimate terms, and whom I had been much astonished to discover spending his leave in a spot so remote from the charms of society. It was not until I had found out that he was in the habit of passing the greater part of his days and the whole of his evenings at Mrs. Seymour's pretty villa on the wooded hillside, that my sagacity led me to suspect what Mrs. Clifford, with her finer feminine wit, had divined from the outset. Now, as this young man was a prime favorite with my wife — for indeed he was connected with I know not how many noble houses — and as, owing to an unfortunate tardiness of birth for which he was in no way responsible, he had but a poor share of this world's gear, it was not difficult to understand that lady's benevolent anxiety with regard to Mrs. Seymour's prospective happiness.

I solemnly declare that I had no objection in the world to the scheme hinted at above. I simply took no interest in it at all, one way or the other. It had nothing to do with me, and I make it a rule never to interfere in my neighbors' affairs. And yet Mrs. Clifford avers to this day that I consistently opposed it; that I did so merely with the object of annoying her, and that certain vexatious events which subsequently occurred would never have taken place at all but for me. Of the injustice, not to say the absurdity, of these accusations, I will leave those to judge who shall have the patience to peruse this narrative to its close. One thing, at all events, I can conscientiously affirm: that it never so much as entered my head to think of Count Waldemar in connection with the subject; for how could I possibly foresee that a lieutenant of German hussars, quartered in remote Stuttgardt, would appear in the extreme south of France without a moment's notice, and create all manner of discord and unpleasantness in our midst? This, however, is precisely what happened.

It was a bitter cold evening in December. All day long a furious and icy mistral had been sweeping over the bare hills, driving clouds of dust before it, ripping branches from the olives and evergreen-oaks, chilling the poor exotic palms, bursting open windows, slamming doors, and irritating beyond all bearing the nerves of luckless strangers. I was sitting in the smoking-room of the hotel with young Everard, cowering over a wood fire, and bewailing the inclemency of this quasi-southern climate.

"Is it for this," I moaned, "that we have left our comfortable London home at the mercy of a crew of unprincipled servants? Is it for this that I have sacrificed my club, and my rubber of whist, and the improving society of my friends? Is it for this that we have crossed the Channel in a gale of wind, and faced the miseries of the most comfortless railway journey in the whole world? Is it for this ——"

"There's the omnibus come in from the station," interrupted Everard. "More deluded unfortunates in search of warmth, I suppose. How they must be cursing their doctors!"

The front door was flung open, letting in a gust of cold air from without. A

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

heavy trunk was let down with a bang upon the stone floor. Some noisy, cheerful person came stumping in, laughing and talking with the landlord,—

And fragments of his mighty voice
Came rolling on the wind.

"Not much wrong with his lungs, anyhow," remarked Everard.

Could I doubt for a moment the origin of that tremendous ho-ho-ho? It needed not the landlord's smiling announcement that "un ami à monsieur" had arrived; it needed not the sight of a stalwart, fur-enveloped figure following closely upon his heels, to prepare me for the agonizing grip of both hands, whereby Count Waldemar evinced his joy and surprise at this unexpected renewal of our friendly relations.

He sat down before the fire, stretched out his interminable legs, and explained that he had got a month's leave of absence from his regiment. He entered at once into conversation with Everard, and would have divulged the cause of his journey to Hyères in the course of the first five minutes if I had not contrived to catch his eye, and check him by a succession of hideous grimaces. He acknowledged these signals by a wink of surpassing craftiness, and a laughing ejaculation of "Schön! schön! Werde nicht mehr plaudern," which, seeing that Everard speaks German as well as he does English, was not exactly calculated to allay any suspicions that might have begun to trouble that young gentleman's mind. Still, the evening passed off without any untoward incident, and that was really more than I had ventured to hope for at first.

The next morning I had to introduce the count to Mrs. Clifford, and to this hour I cannot imagine how I could have been so insane as to tell her privately beforehand that he was related to the Grand Duke of Halbacker.

Sometimes I am almost tempted to think that even white lies — and this one, I do maintain, was of the most harmless order — never prosper. My sole aim was to give my young friend a chance of securing Mrs. Clifford's good-will; but, alas! the result achieved was the exact contrary of this. For Everard, who, as I ought to have remembered, had served as attaché at more than one German court, assured her that the grand duke had no such connections, and my lame explanation that I was always making mistakes about people, and that I must have been thinking of somebody else, did not avail to prevent her from setting down poor Count Waldemar as an impostor, and openly speaking of him as such to the other inmates of the hotel. Altogether it was a most unfortunate occurrence, and did me much harm in the estimation of those about me.

I have neither space nor desire to speak of the botheration which ensued; of the solemn warning which my wife thought fit to address to Mrs. Seymour; of the latter's appeal to the person principally concerned, and of my own clumsy attempts to get out of an awkward predicament. The upshot of it all was that I believe I was looked upon, for some time, as more or less of a detected swindler by everybody, except, indeed, by my dear and excellent count, who would never have understood the mean feeling which had led me to make him out a greater man than he was. Now the Von Ravensburgs were of just so good descent as the Grand Dukes of Halbacker, he said; and if I had made a little mistake, who was the worse for it? "Tell me, my dear Mrs. Seymour, why does Mrs. Cleefford go out of the room whenever I enter? Does she take me berhaps for a peeck-pocket?" He roared with laughter at this funny notion.

The matter-of-course way in which Mrs. Seymour had taken Count Waldemar's sudden appearance upon the scene puzzled me so much that at last I felt impelled to ask her whether she had not been rather astonished to see him again.

"Oh, no," she answered quietly. "He has written to me several times since we parted at Homburg, and he always spoke in his letters of paying us a flying visit in the course of the winter."

"Oh, really?" said I, "I didn't know;" and then I changed the subject.

A man does not reach my time of life, nor spend the best part of half a century principally in cultivating the society of his fellow-creatures, to be scandalized by the flirtations of a pretty woman. Consciousness of my own many infirmities has ever imposed upon me a large measure of toleration for those of others; and when all is said and done, flirting, taken in the abstract, is no very heinous offence. Nevertheless, Mrs. Seymour's conduct in the present instance disappointed me. I had given her credit for less vanity and more consideration for the feelings of her neighbors. Was it worth while to inflict an expensive and fruitless journey upon this innocent young German; to set a hitherto harmonious party by the ears, and to get me into trouble with Mrs. Clifford, merely for the amusement of playing off one admirer

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

against another? I was really vexed with Mrs. Seymour, and all the more so because I had seen a good deal of her during my sojourn at Hyères, and had discovered the existence of many excellent qualities beneath her somewhat conventional exterior.

At the same time, I could not but admire the skill with which she contrived to receive both the young men every day, and yet so to arrange matters as that their visits should not clash. I myself, having so few sources of amusement at command in the place, strolled up to her villa pretty frequently, and invariably found one or other of the rivals there, but never the two of them together. There was always some pretext, directly traceable to Mrs. Seymour's influence, for the dismissal of the absentee. Now it was Everard who had taken Miss Grey out for a ride; now it was Count Waldemar who had kindly undertaken to execute a few commissions at Toulon, and who was to be driven back from the station by Mrs. Seymour in her pony-carriage. Sometimes the German, sometimes the Englishman, was sent down to the seashore, three miles away, to pick up the many-colored shells which abound on that coast. I happen to have an elementary knowledge of conchology, and I had the curiosity to put a few questions to Mrs. Seymour on the subject, thereby convincing myself that if she knew a crustacean from a mollusk it was about as much as she did. She laughed when I taxed her with deliberate deceit, and frankly admitted that she had found it advisable to keep her friends as much as possible apart.

"They did not get on well together from the first," said she; "and I think it is always so much better not to try and make people like each other unless they are inclined that way. Count Waldemar is much too good-natured to quarrel with anybody, but he has a way of criticising you to your face, and of contradicting you flatly if you do not happen to agree with him, which people who do not know him are sometimes apt to take amiss. And then, you know, he does rather monopolize the conversation. When he is in the room nobody else gets much chance of making himself heard, and Mr. Everard, who is very well-informed and clever, and all that, is accustomed to be listened to."

"Precisely so; and that, of course, is quite enough to account for two good fellows hating one another like poison," says I, with delicate irony.

"Well, you know, Englishmen and foreigners hardly ever do manage to hit it off," she answered, in the most innocent manner in the world; "but I should not say that they exactly hated one another."

They did, though, or something very like it. Although, owing to the able tactics above alluded to, they seldom or never met at Mrs. Seymour's, every day brought them together half-a-dozen times at the Hôtel d'Orient; and, to use Mrs. Clifford's epigrammatical expression, they never fell in with one another without falling out. She, of course, laid all the blame of this unpleasantness upon Count Waldemar, whereas I was inclined to think that Everard had been the original aggressor: but I must confess that at the end of a week there was not a pin to choose between them. Each did his best to be objectionable to the other, and in so doing, succeeded in being a most decided nuisance to everybody else.

In my capacity of neutral, I had more opportunities than I cared about of hearing both sides of the question.

"Of all the offensive bores I ever met," Everard would exclaim, "that long-legged German friend of yours is the most irrepressible. I can't understand how a fellow can be so intrusive. It is easy to see that poor Mrs. Seymour is tired to death of him; but I suppose she doesn't like to be rude, and nothing short of kicking the man out of the house would ever keep him away from it. I assure you he is there morning, noon, and night."

"So is somebody else, as far as that goes," I make bold to observe.

"You mean me? Ah, but I'm different," answers Everard, and saunters away without deigning to explain wherein the difference lies.

Count Waldemar, on his side, showed no less bitterness and a good deal more jealousy. He had a very poor opinion of the Englishman, whom he spoke of as "a most effeminate person — wass we call ein junger Geck," but admitted, for all that, that he regarded him as a formidable rival.

"I know not what to think," he said, shaking his head despondently one evening when I was smoking my after-dinner cigar with him, Everard having, as we both knew, betaken himself to the villa on the hill. "When I am alone mit her, then is she so kind, so pleasant as I could wish for nothing more; but if this abominable fellow is expected, at once I am sent away, and that is a thing wass I cannot endure. Very likely he is sitting beside her at this moment, in the very chair I was sitting in myself this morning."

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

"Why, of course he is," I answered stupidly. "You don't suppose that he sits at one end of the room and Mrs. Seymour at the other, do you?"

Up jumps the count, and begins putting on his military great-coat with the air of one who has a definite purpose in view.

"What are you going to do?" I inquired apprehensively.

"I go to Mrs. Seymour's," he replied. "Do you come mit me? Yes, my friend, you shall come, and we will see for ourselves whether or no she is making me a fool."

He took down my hat from the hook on which it was hanging, clapped it on my head, pushed my passive arms into the sleeves of my overcoat, and marched me out into the moonlight without another word. I had got accustomed to his ways by this time, and made no resistance, though I felt that we were about to do a foolish thing.

On reaching the villa, we were kept some time waiting before the servant answered our ring, and when we entered the drawing-room, there was nothing in the relative attitudes of its three inmates to excite any jealous suspicions. Miss Grey was at the piano; Everard, standing behind her, was apparently intent upon turning over the pages of her music-book, and Mrs. Seymour was demurely occupied with a piece of embroidery by the fireside. The latter welcomed us with her wonted cordiality, and looked, I thought, more amused than annoyed; but Everard sighed impatiently, and whispered something to Miss Grey.

Count Waldemar dropped into a chair at Mrs. Seymour's side, and I am bound to say that he contrived to perform this simple action in a markedly aggressive manner. Everard, however, did not take up the challenge, if such it were intended to be, but went on conversing in a low tone with Miss Grey.

Finding myself thus constrained to play the ungrateful part of a fifth person, I rose presently, and stepped out on to the verandah which surrounded the house.

I have nothing to say against the climate of Hyères at such times as the mistral is not blowing. On this December night the air was as mild as that of an English June. There were roses in bloom in the garden; a faint breeze was stirring among the olive-trees on the slopes; the moon made a silvery pathway across the sea beneath, softening all the landscape, and casting such a fairy-like glamor over the arid rocks of the Hyères Islands that their ancient title of the Iles d'Or no longer seemed inappropriate. Somebody had left a cane armchair out on the verandah. I took possession of it, lighted a cigar, and was soon lost in those pathetic memories which are the peculiar property of moonlight and middle age.

How long I had been thus pleasantly occupied I cannot say, when an increased volume of sound proceeding from within attracted my attention, and made me aware that Count Waldemar was delivering one of his harangues. This was followed by some barely audible sentences enunciated in Everard's slow and somewhat drawling accents, and then I heard the count's voice saying distinctly and rather sulkily, —

"Sir, you make a mistake; the Germans are a most order-loving people. That we love Prussia I do not say — no; but we shall remain loyal to the emperor because he is the natural head of the Reich; and it is only very ignorant and foolish persons who maintain the contrary."

"Thanks. I fully appreciate the flattering inference. All the same, I expect to see the German republic before I die."

"Pfui!"

"Herr von Ravensburg, do you know that you are rather rude?"

"Rude? Aber! — when a man speaks to me of the German republic!"

At this juncture I judged it appropriate to appear upon the scene, after the fashion of the heathen deities of old, and to avert the impending strife.

"Are you young men aware that it is past eleven o'clock?" I asked. "If you stay here much longer, you will not only wear out Mrs. Seymour's patience, but also that of the hotel-porter, who is not fond of late hours. Come, let us all say good-night, and be off."

As I marched out of the house between the two rivals, I felt that I had displayed a tact for which everybody owed me some thanks; but my self-approval was not destined to last long. Just as we reached the limits of the small domain, Count Waldemar, who all this time had been only too evidently struggling with inward wrath, stopped short, drew himself up to his full height, and looking over my head at Everard, ejaculated, —

"Sir!"

"Do be quiet," I whispered entreatingly; but he never heeded me.

"Sir," he repeated. "Just now you have said that I was rude. Before the ladies I could not notice your worts, but now I must ask you what you have meant."

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

"Exactly what I said," answered Everard curtly.

"In Germany we consider such speeches an insult."

"Do you? Well, really I can't help it. If a man dislikes being called a boor, he ought not to behave boorishly."

Count Waldemar told me afterwards that Everard had been sneering at him, and trying to provoke him all the evening through: otherwise he would not have lost his temper even after so direct an affront as this. As it was, his self-control deserted him entirely. He took two strides towards the offender, caught him up in his arms like a baby, held him for an instant poised aloft, and then, with one mighty heave, tossed him clear over the low bank by which we were standing, into a conveniently adjacent clump of cactus-bushes.

I am sorry to say that, shocked and indignant though I was at this deed of violence upon the person of a friend and a fellow-countryman, the first emotion that took possession of me was one of most unseasonable mirth; and this, gaining strength by reason of my efforts to conquer it, soon mastered me so completely that I was fain to sit me down upon the grass and hold my sides, while Count Waldemar, all his ill-humor dispersed in that one explosion of wrath, woke the echoes with peal after peal of uproarious laughter, and from the cactus-bushes below arose the maledictions of the outraged Everard.

To a man smarting both mentally and physically as Everard must have been doing, such conduct as this may well have appeared as inexcusable as it was exasperating. I suppose that under any circumstances he would have been very angry; he was simply furious now, and satisfaction he vowed he would have.

How we got back to the hotel I can hardly say. I daresay we were a sufficiently comical trio — Count Waldemar still shaking with laughter, Everard bristling with thorns like a hedgehog, and I insisting with vain volubility upon the necessity for mutual apologies. All I know is that, when I went to bed that night, I closed my eyes upon the prospect of having to play the absurd, not to say hazardous, part of second in a duel.

IV.

It was Count Waldemar who, despite my entreaties and protestations, would have it that I must act as his friend in the carrying out of this piece of murderous folly. He was very sorry to put me to any inconvenience, he said; but since he was not upon speaking terms with any other man in Hyères, he could not help himself; and when I declared that no duel should take place at all with my consent, he simply answered that that did not concern him, he being the receiver, not the giver of the challenge. He added, as a matter of detail, that he had no intention of apologizing for the hasty act into which his temper had betrayed him on the previous evening, and that he did not in the least regret it.

"I have seen very well, last night, that Mrs. Seymour is more fond of him as of me," he sighed; "but when she shall hear how I have sitted him in the meedst of those thorns, then must she certainly laugh. Yes, I shall have my revenche!"

And with this unworthy sentiment he lounged out into the sunshine, while I went up-stairs to see what I could do with the other fire-eater.

I found Everard deep in conversation with a certain M. de Beaulieu, a young Parisian, who was reluctantly spending a few weeks in the south in order to soothe the last moments of a wealthy and asthmatic aunt. I was sorry to see him there, for I had guessed the cause of his presence even before Everard, rising from his chair, said, —

"If you come from Herr von Ravensburg, perhaps I had better leave you with M. de Beaulieu, who has kindly consented to act for me in this matter."

"Nonsense, my dear fellow! pray don't stir," I answered, determined to make light of the whole business if I could. "I certainly do come from Count Waldemar — that is, in a sort of way you know. I mean, I did not tell him I was coming; and my only object in doing so is to suggest that you and he should make up your difference in a friendly way."

"I don't quite see how that is to be managed," observed Everard quietly.

"Now, Everard, be reasonable. For goodness' sake don't let us have a row. You see, the fact is you were both in the wrong; you provoked him, and he forgot himself; each of you will surely admit that much. Very well; you have only to acknowledge frankly —— "

"Mr. Clifford, what would you do if a fellow twice your size chucked you into a small plantation of prickly pears?"

"Well, I can't exactly say upon the spur of the moment; but one thing is certain — no Englishman is expected to fight duels in these days."

"No man who prefers to take a licking

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

is ever expected to fight. For my own part, I have lived so much abroad that I have become a little foreign in my habits; and as I am a particularly good shot, and a very fair swordsman, and have already been out three times, I see no reason why I should not prevent your German friend from insulting strangers for the future."

"Why, you bloodthirsty young ruffian, do you mean to say you would kill the man?"

"Not if I can help it; but I mean hitting him, I can tell you. And if I were you, Mr. Clifford, I would keep out of the quarrel. You can do as you like, of course, and it is no business of mine; but I think it is only fair to warn you that all this will probably end by getting you into a mess with the police."

That was all I obtained from Mr. Everard, who now left the room. For one brief moment I did think of following his advice — of declaring that I washed my hands of these two young idiots and their broils, or, better still, of packing up my portmanteau and taking the afternoon train to Nice. But it was only for a moment. Upon further reflection, I felt that I could not leave poor Waldemar thus basely in the lurch; and so I sat down sadly, and began to use my poor powers of eloquence upon M. de Beaulieu. That gentleman heard me out very patiently, and then convinced me, by a few brief but pithy sentences, that nothing short of an abject written apology would satisfy the wounded honor of his principal. At the end of a quarter of an hour I had actually consented, on Count Waldemar's behalf, to a hostile meeting with pistols at daybreak; and to this hour I cannot see what alternative course was open to me. Some vague hints I did venture to throw out with reference to blank cartridges, and the possibility of satisfying wounded honor without risk to life or limb; but upon this M. de Beaulieu became so angry, and asked me with such an air of outraged dignity what I took him for, that I was compelled to retreat rather hastily from that position.

Thus it came to pass that, after a disturbed night, I found myself stealing out of the Hôtel d'Orient about the hour of sunrise, accompanied by three other malefactors, whom, at that dismal moment, I most warmly commended in my heart to the devil. I don't know what I have done that I should be forever getting into these discreditable scrapes; I don't know why such troubles should come upon me more than upon other inoffensive members of society; but, as a fact, they do.

Silently we plodded up the stony hillside, and through the woods of olive and cork trees that clothed it. The branches overhead and the scanty herbage at our feet were glistening with dew; the air was still and crisp; the sunlight fell upon a pale blue sea and upon a white sail or two in the offing.

It seemed monstrous that two young fellows in the prime of life should be setting out to kill one another on such a lovely, peaceful morning; and we all of us, I fancy, felt the influence of the scene in a greater or less degree. I can answer for it that one of the party, who is neither a rich nor a specially generous man, would gladly have signed a cheque for a thousand pounds there and then, at the imminent risk of having it subsequently dishonored, if by that means he could have obliterated the events of the two preceding days.

But as that could not be, and as Providence did not think fit to intervene in the person of a gendarme or any other deus ex machinâ, we pursued our way without let or hindrance, and presently reached the entrance of a little dell, shut in on every side by rocks and trees, where we all instinctively came to a standstill. The light might have been better, M. de Beaulieu said, surveying the spot with a critical eye; but one could not have everything, and it was a pretty place for the purpose — a very pretty place. This Frenchman's spirits appeared to rise with the approach of the combat, and he set about measuring the distance — only twenty paces, alas! — as briskly and cheerfully as if he had been making the requisite preparations for a cotillon. Everard and Count Waldemar stood a short space apart, each with his eyes fixed upon the ground, while I, with the pistol-case under my arm, seated myself upon the stump of a tree, shivering a little, and feeling as utterly miserable as I ever felt in my life.

At this supreme moment a distinct sound of approaching footsteps fell upon my ear. I wheeled round, and found myself face to face with — heavens and earth! — Mrs. Seymour and Miss Grey.

"Good morning, Mr. Clifford," said the former, without any demonstration of surprise. "Is it not a delicious morning for a walk? Is that Mr. Everard? And Herr von Ravensburg too! Dear me, what can you all be doing? And what have you got under your arm?"

"A — a botanical case — or rather, I should say, a paint-box. I mean, I really don't know; it doesn't belong to me, but to M. de Beaulieu. Here, catch hold of

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

it," says I, thrusting the horrid thing into the hands of its owner, who had now joined the group, looking very blank. "Are you — er — out for a walk too?" I continued with an inane simper; for in truth I hardly knew what I was saying.

"As you see," answered Mrs. Seymour demurely. "A walk in the early morning gives one such a capital appetite, does it not? And, à propos, I want you all to come back and breakfast with me."

A prompt and general murmur, like a response in church, testified to the unanimity with which we declined this kind invitation.

"Oh, but I will take no refusal," insisted Mrs. Seymour. "You cannot possibly have any engagement at this hour of the day, and I do not intend to let you escape. Miss Grey shall take charge of Mr. Everard, I will look after Mr. Clifford, and the two other gentlemen shall walk between us, so that we may not lose sight of them."

There was nothing to be done but to surrender to this determined lady — I don't deny that one of us was no very reluctant prisoner — and so our tragedy was converted into a farce, and we marched down the narrow pathway, two and two, in somewhat ludicrous procession — first Everard and Miss Grey; then Count Waldemar and M. de Beaulieu, the latter ineffectually striving to conceal his murderous implements under an overcoat; finally Mrs. Seymour and myself.

"Well, Mr. Clifford," began my companion, as soon as we were fairly under way.

"Well, Mrs. Seymour?"

Of course I saw that she knew what we had been about.

"I should have believed this of a great many people — of Count Waldemar, for instance, who is a foreigner, or of Mr. Everard, who has lived so much abroad — but not of you."

"Go on. Blame me, and you will be quite in the fashion. That is what everybody invariably does under all circumstances; and I have long since given up self defence as a mere waste of time. I am quite prepared to admit that everything has been my fault from beginning to end, and to apologize to you all round. It was I, of course, who brought an unfortunate German all the way from Würtemberg to Hyères upon a fool's errand; it was I who flirted with two young men to that extent that one of them had to ease his feelings by plunging the other head over heels into a cactus-bush: it was I who ——"

"Mr. Clifford, you are excessively rude, and, begging your pardon, excessively silly too. I never was accused of flirting before in my life. I can make allowances for Herr von Ravensburg, because he is — well, because, for many reasons, it is not unnatural that he should misunderstand things; but that you, who particularly pride yourself upon your insight into human nature and the causes of people's actions should not have seen long ago that Mr. Everard is engaged to my cousin, Miss Grey, is more than I can comprehend. The engagement would have been announced before this, only I did not want it talked about just at first, because Mr. Everard is not very well off, and my people rather objected to the match. Now, however, everything is settled; and when Count Waldemar has apologized, as I intend him to do before breakfast, I hope we may all shake hands, and forget how foolish some of us have been. But I must say I shall have some little difficulty in pardoning you for doing your best to kill the two firmest friends I have in the world."

"Will you tell me how on earth I was to prevent a man who refused to apologize from fighting another who insisted upon an apology?"

"How? Oh, in a hundred ways. You had only to inform the police or to send a line to me. Nothing could be more simple."

"Quite out of the question — altogether contrary to etiquette," returned I, trying to look as if I had had a large experience of duels. "Ladies know nothing about these affairs. By-the-bye, may I ask how you managed to arrive upon the scene so opportunely?"

"I shall not answer any questions which might get innocent people into trouble. But I may mention that if you had not yelled with laughter in that unseemly way, the night that Count Waldemar behaved so disgracefully, my maid would not have run out into the garden to see what was the matter."

"Oho! Is your maid that very well-dressed lady whom I sometimes see walking with Everard's man on Sunday afternoons?"

"Never mind. Will you go on now, and entertain M. de Beaulieu, please. And may I ask you to send Herr von Ravensburg to me. I have a few words to say to him."

The nature of those few words I was enabled to surmise by the guttural ejaculations which reached me, every now and

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

again, as I descended the hill beside the Frenchman. Just as we approached the house Count Waldemar brushed past me, looking a trifle crestfallen, and hurried up to the couple who were waiting for us at the door. I was too far off to hear what passed; but the count's utterances were always embellished with so much pantomime that it was easy to form a pretty accurate guess at what he was saying, so long as he was anywhere within range of eyesight. I saw him standing, hat in hand, before Miss Grey, rigid as to his legs, but violently agitated from the waist upwards. I saw him fling his arms about wildly, and feign to tear out his hair by handfuls. Then he turned to his late antagonist, bowed three several times most profoundly, indulged in a little more gesticulation, and finally seized him by both hands, and almost shook him off his feet. Everard did not look more than half pleased; but Count Waldemar was not the man to be abashed by a little coldness. Having accomplished his task, he faced about, and came striding back towards us with his wonted cheerful equanimity very nearly restored.

"Now I have made all goot," said he, in the tone of a man who expects to be thanked. "Mrs. Seymour, I hope you are gontent mit me?"

Mrs. Seymour laughed. "Let us go in to breakfast," she said, without replying to the count's question.

I cannot say that that breakfast was in any sense a success. Our hostess was charming, and did all in her power to set us at our ease, and Count Waldemar, as usual, talked a great deal; but, upon the whole, I think everybody was very glad when the repast came to an end. I, for my part, was conscious that, however excusably, I had made a fool of myself; M. de Beaulieu barely disguised his dissatisfaction at the tame conclusion of the affair in which his services had been enlisted; Miss Grey never opened her lips, and Everard was evidently rather sulky. I suppose those thorns still rankled a little.

He and his fiancée seized the earliest opportunity that offered to escape into the garden, and immediately afterwards M. de Beaulieu took his leave. Upon this I said I thought I would go out on to the verandah, and smoke a cigar, and as neither of the two remaining members of the company offered any objection to my departure, I suited the action to the word.

It was very pleasant out on the verandah. The air was warm, yet clear; the stony, hilly landscape was beautiful with numberless delicate gradations of color; a silvery ribbon of surf fringed the blue sea, which stretched away towards the far horizon to meet as blue a sky. In the garden at my feet, the standard roses, yellow, pink, creamy, and white, were drinking in the sunshine; and every now and then I caught a glimpse of Everard and Miss Grey pacing slowly side by side among the myrtles and tamarisks. Surveying this idyllic prospect with quiet contentment, I fell into a pleasant daydream, which, by an easy transition, resolved itself ere long into a refreshing slumber. When I awoke it was to find Count Waldemar and Mrs. Seymour standing before me hand in hand.

"My dear Mr. Clifford," said the former oratorically, "you have once done me the great kindness to present me to Mrs. Seymour; permit me, in return, to present to you the future Gräfin von Ravensburg."

It is always a little difficult to know what to say upon these occasions, and the difficulty is perhaps rather specially great to a man who has been caught asleep, and has not had time to reassemble his ideas. However, it can matter very little what his remarks may be so that he makes them short, and relieves the lovers of his presence with all convenient despatch; and in this branch of my duty I did not fail.

Mrs. Clifford, to whom I communicated the news later in the day, received it with some strong expressions of disapproval.

"I do not remember ever to have heard of a more ill-omened and unsuitable marriage," said she. "An Englishwoman of good birth and fortune to ally herself with a German adventurer! What possible chance of happiness can she have?"

To a certain extent, I confess that I shared my wife's apprehensions. Looking at the utter dissimilarity of their ways of life and thought, I could not but foresee that Count Waldemar and his wife would have need of much mutual forbearance; and no one knows better than I how limited is the stock of that useful quality accorded to most mortals. The match did not sound a promising one; but then, as everybody knows, the most promising matches often turn out badly in the long run, and vice versâ. Marriage, which has more than one attribute in common with death, resembles it especially in this, that no human being can venture to predict what manner of life is likely to succeed to it.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

I am glad, at all events, to be able to state that, when I saw the Count and Countess von Ravensburg in London, a few days since, they both looked remarkably cheerful and contented.

From Fraser's Magazine.

THUROT.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE question of fortifying the several commercial harbors and seaports round our coasts has been often proposed and argued on; it has, quite lately, been again urged by the corporations of Edinburgh and Leith; it is, in reality, one which too closely affects our material interests to be treated as lightly or carelessly as it often is treated, and which deserves more consideration than it commonly gets.

Britannia needs no bulwarks is a favorite reply; a poetical vaunt, a bit of bounce, that sounds well, and that, when written, sounded almost better; with the tidings of the first of June, of St. Vincent, Camperdown, and the Nile still ringing in the public ears, we can quite understand the proud boast which a few years' further experience showed thinking men might be a very unsafe one. Had Villeneuve been a man of moderate ability and moderate nerve, Britannia might have wished very heartily for bulwarks; and the martello towers, which were built shortly after, showed that it was considered just as well to have some fortifications even along the steep.

It is not, however, of that stirring period of eighteen hundred and war time, that I am now about to write. I am going to endeavor to recall the memory of an older war, and a still earlier scare; when a French invasion seemed imminent; when flat-bottomed boats were got ready all along the north coast of France; when a camp was formed on Brighton Downs: when a large force of soldiers, militia and volunteers, was mustered to oppose the expected landing; when Garrick wrote, and Boyce composed, and Champness sang that spirit-stirring song, "Hearts of Oak," which is still the recognized call of our seamen to quarters, though such lines as

We'll still make them fear, and still make them flee,
And drub 'em on shore as we've drubbed 'em at sea, hint at a possibility of invasion after all; and when another favorite song was first heard, a song whose air has been a loth-to-depart in both services for the last hundred years, and which is genuine English, nor the less so because a great many have fancied it an Irish melody: the words are too long to quote; the first two verses will be sufficient to remind the reader that the original name of the song was "Brighton Camp:"—

I'm lonesome since I crossed the hill,
And o'er the moor and valley,
Such heavy thoughts my heart do fill
Since parting with my Sally.
I seek no more the fine or gay,
For each does but remind me
How swift the hours did pass away
With the girl I've left behind me.

Oh, ne'er shall I forget the night,
The stars were bright above me,
And gently lent their silvery light,
When first she vowed to love me.
But now I'm bound to Brighton Camp;
Kind Heaven then pray guide me,
And send me safely back again
To the girl I've left behind me.

And then, as half a century later, the boldness and decision of English admirals, acting on the timidity and vacillation of the French, nullified the well-planned strategy of the French government: then, on August 18, 1759, Boscawen,—"Old Dreadnought," as our sailors loved to call him—broke up, dispersed, captured, burned, or drove on shore the Toulon fleet, under M. de la Clue, as it tried to pass out of the Mediterranean to join the fleet at Brest, and obtain the command of the Channel: then Hawke—"as a hawk on his quarry"—pounced down on that Brest fleet as, on November 20, 1759, it was entering Quiberon Bay, to embark the troops mustered in Morbihan; and made that brilliant and glorious smash of the French navy which was historically, nautically, and politically the precursor and rival of Trafalgar; the memory of which in France is perpetuated as "la journée de M. de Conflans," though in England it is but feebly remembered as Hawke's action, and the name of Quiberon Bay has fallen into oblivion, so that it will now probably sound strange, or in itself convey no definite meaning.

That Quiberon Bay was a decisive battle of the Seven Years' War, is a fact which has escaped most historians; that, had the result of it been reversed, had it been the English fleet that was annihilated, the relative positions of France and England

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

during the next four years, and in the negotiations which then ensued, would have been very different. Historians have not recognized this; and even at the time, it seems to have been taken very much as a matter of course. The possibility of the result of a meeting between the two fleets being not exactly what it was, seems never to have occurred to our enthusiastic countrymen, who had, less than three years before, shot one of their admirals for strategic defeat and tactical imbecility; not perhaps for positive cowardice, but, at any rate, for very negative courage. Hawke was thanked by Parliament for his great victory; and a pension followed shortly after, but he did not get his peerage for seventeen years; and even at the time, the fleet was so neglected by the government, now that the strain — unacknowledged though it was — was taken off, that the necessary stores and provisions were not sent to it; and our seamen were exposed to great and uncalled-for hardships and privations, while keeping up the strict blockade on the shattered remnants of the enemy's navy. The feeling of the fleet was expressed in some wretched doggrel, which none the less conveys a very painful idea of injustice and neglect: —

> Ere Hawke did bang
> Monsieur Conflans,
> You sent us beef and beer;
> Now monsieur's beat,
> We've nought to eat,
> Since you have nought to fear.

But all this is matter of history more or less familiar. The political state of the two countries at the time may be read in Lord Mahon's (Stanhope's) "History of England;" and the details of Boscawen's action in the Straits, or Hawke's action in Quiberon Bay — both joining with the capture of Quebec and the conquest of Canada to render the year "wonderful" — can be found in Entick's "History of the Late War," in Beatson, in Charnock, or in the continuation of Campbell.* But coincident with these great events, smaller events were taking place; coincident with the French idea of a great invasion in the south of England, which was extinguished by Boscawen and Hawke, was entertained by the French another idea, that of a landing in the north of England or Ireland, not indeed in any force, but still in such force and under such circumstances as might, and as it was hoped would, direct to the north a considerable part of the army mustered in the south, would thus weaken the defence, and render the undertaking of the invaders comparatively easy. The charge of this expedition was given to a man whose name indeed, Thurot, is in all our histories, but of whose career no one English book, or French book either, gives any complete or correct account. In the local records, the corporation books of many towns, the mention of Thurot's name shows that he was a much more real personage in the minds of the worthy burghers than De la Clue or Conflans; and yet, even then, he was to some extent mythical; and his earliest biographer, the Rev. John Francis Durand,* writing immediately after his death in 1760, says: "In the course of a few weeks I have known him to be a Scotchman, an Englishman, and an Hibernian; he was successively the Young Pretender, a reformed pirate, and a bastard of the blood royal of France, and I make no doubt that if he had kept the sea a little longer, he would, in his turn, have been the brother of the Grand Turk, or the nephew of the pope of Rome; unless the newspapers had thought fit to give us broad hints that he was those very great personages themselves in disguise." Durand's little book is the only "Life of Thurot" which has been written in English; but though the author makes great claim to authenticity, as having been an intimate friend of Thurot for many years, he has left us a farrago of nonsense which we may believe Thurot himself crammed him with. Durand was a clergyman, and is said by Entick, also a clergyman, to be worthy of credit; it is more than can be said of his book, which can only be trusted for the few years when Thurot was living in London, or a frequent visitor to it; or when, in the latter part, it quotes or refers to official papers; but the account which

* Is it not strange that in a country like ours, having a navy such as ours, there is nothing at all approaching to a standard naval history? Beatson's "Memoirs" is a mere chronicle, crowded with unimportant details, very often incorrect; and though — with proper care — most valuable to the professional student, is caviare to the general reader. A writer of our own time attempted, a few years ago, to supply the want; but his work, though pleasantly enough written, is a mere compilation of the material readiest to hand, without research, knowledge, or critical judgment; and as a "History of the British Navy" is of no value whatever.

* "Genuine and Curious Memoirs of the famous Captain Thurot, written by the Rev. John Francis Durand, with some of Mons. Thurot's Original Letters to that Gentleman, now in England. To which is added a much more faithful and particular Account than has been hitherto published of his Proceedings since his Sailing from the Coast of France, October 18, 1759." Dublin, 12mo. 1760. I have said in the text that these memoirs are more than curious. Even such a trifling matter as this last-mentioned date is incorrect.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

it gives of Thurot's early life and active career is simply and entirely false; it has not even the semblance of truth.

François Thurot,* the son of an innkeeper and postmaster in a small way of business, was born at Nuits, a petty town of Burgundy (Côte d'Or) on July 22, 1726. As a boy he is said to have been of a violent and quarrelsome disposition; and when, after having had a fair education at the Jesuits' college at Dijon, he was, at the age of sixteen, bound apprentice in the shop of a druggest in that town, he launched out into all sorts of juvenile dissipation and debauchery. This, as is often the case, led to the worst kind of rowdyism; and he ended his career in Dijon by robbing his aunt of her silver dishes and flying from the town. Naturally enough, he ignored Dijon and Nuits for the rest of his life; he seems to have passed himself off as a native of Boulogne, when, some short time after, he turned up at Dunkirk, and, being almost, or quite destitute, obtained employment as surgeon on board a privateer fitted out to take advantage of the war with England. He was then barely eighteen, and his knowledge of surgery was such as he had picked up during his few months in the druggist's shop; so that it was, perhaps, in some respects, fortunate for the crew of the privateer that she was captured by the English almost at once; and that they and their surgeon were put out of harm's way in a prison at Dover.

Thurot remained a prisoner for about a year, during which time he learned English; and having won the good opinion of his gaolers, and probably being out on parole, he one night seized on a small boat, and put to sea with no further equipment than a pair of sculls; with these, and with his shirt for a sail, he reached Calais in the course of the next day. The success of this bold escape made some noise, and was the means of introducing him to the Maréchal de Belle-Isle, who advised him to study navigation and take to a seafaring life. He did both; he entered as boy on board a privateer, and rose rapidly to higher ratings; after two cruises he was entrusted with an independent command, and by his activity, energy, and good fortune, won some reputation and a large share of prize-money; so that, when peace was concluded in 1748, although but twenty-two, and having been only three years at sea, he was in a position to fit out a merchant ship at his own risk and expense. For the next few years he lived a good deal in London, lodging — according to Mr. Durand — at the house of an apothecary in Paddington, where he passed as a gentleman. He spoke English remarkably well for a foreigner, sung, played the flute and the French horn, was free with his cash, and was, altogether, good company. "But," says Durand, "the chief bent of his inclination leaned towards navigation and fortification; he had always some little plans, purely the efforts of his own unformed genius, relative to those arts about him, which he was constantly showing to his companions; and never seemed so thoroughly happy as when he got with people that had a smattering of the above-mentioned sciences. The last time he was in England he lived in a court in Carey Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, and was there instructed in the mathematicks by one Mr. Donnelly, an Irish gentleman, famous for his knowledge and abilities in mathematical studies."

He seems, then, to have passed his time in London in an easy, social, sometimes studious, occasionally dissipated manner; vanishing for months together, no one knew where, when his money ran short. Durant clearly knew nothing about him during these absences, beyond what Thurot himself chose to tell; and in that there was evidently a good deal of romance. It is, however, quite certain that he was actively engaged in smuggling; possibly in piracy also; and that his misdeeds brought him within the grasp of the law; but whether in England or France may perhaps be thought doubtful. His daughter, in her address to the French government in 1790, urging her claims for a pension, says that he was ruined by legal process in England, on suspicion of being engaged in contraband trade. But his daughter had no personal knowledge of Thurot; nor, at the time referred to, does Thurot seem to have been married, so that she could not learn anything of this, at first hand, from her mother; and Thurot himself was too much given to what is nautically known as "spinning benders," to permit us to attach much credit to any unsupported statement of his concerning

* The French notices of Thurot referred to are: —
(1) Adresse à Messieurs les Représentans de la Nation Française. Par Mlle. Thurot. 1790.
(2) Vie du Capitaine Thurot. Par M. ——. Paris, 1791.
(3) Journal Historique du Capitaine Thurot dans sa Croisière sur les Côtes d'Ecosse et d'Irlande. Dunkerque, 1760.
(4) Journal de la Navigation d'une Escadre Françoise, partie du port de Dunkerque aux ordres du Capitaine Thurot, le 15 Octobre 1759.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

his antecedents. Neither is it to be overlooked that Mlle. Thurot had a case to make out; that it was an object to show that her father had lost money through the English; and that, in 1790, implied abuse of England was not likely to do her cause any harm. Durand, on the other hand, says that he was imprisoned in France, first in Dunkirk and afterwards in Paris, for smuggling; the French laws, in respect to that offence, being extremely severe: and though it is quite possible that Thurot's peculiar views of commerce and navigation were objected to on both sides of the Channel, Durand's account is consistent, and apparently based on actual knowledge.

Nevertheless, smuggler or pirate, he had in France a reputation as a bold seaman; and when war was on the point of breaking out, his name was mentioned at court as that of a man likely to prove serviceable. The king sent him a commission in the royal navy, and his old patron, the Maréchal de Belle-Isle, procured for him the command of the "Friponne," a small sloop, in which he cruised, as before, in the Channel, waging a profitable war against English commerce.

Whilst thus employed, he is said to have conceived the possibility of setting fire to Portsmouth, and utterly destroying the dockyard. His plan was simplicity itself. He was to glide (glisser) into the harbor in the dead of night, in a large boat carrying fifty men. His biographer, M. ——, thinks that nothing prevented his doing this but the jealousy of the aristocratic courtiers, and the carelessness of the minister who discussed the project in presence of some traitor, who sold the secret to the English government. Had it not been for that, it was only "necessary to elude the most active vigilance, and to face the guard of a harbor the entrance of which bristled with cannon." These, to Thurot, would have been trifles; but the English, being forewarned, took such additional precautions as rendered the brilliant scheme quite hopeless.

It is difficult to say how much, or how little, truth there is in this, but I see no reason to doubt that a wild and daring adventurer, like Thurot, may have proposed some such scheme; partly, perhaps, with a real intention of attempting it; partly also, with a view of being prevented by the government, and of adding to his reputation at a cheap rate. But certainly, if the project was seriously proposed, the French government refused to entertain it: instead of doing so, it appointed Thurot to the command of a squadron to cruise in the Channel.

This squadron, consisting of two thirty-six-gun frigates, the "Maréchal de Belle-Isle" and the "Chauvelin," each mounting twelve-pounders on her maindeck, and two small sloops, sailed from St. Malo on July 16, 1757. Very shortly after starting, one of the sloops, looking out ahead, was picked up by some English cruisers; but the others escaped. On July 25, off Portland, they fell in with the English frigate "Southampton" (thirty-two guns, Captain Gilchrist), on her way from Portsmouth to Plymouth, with stores and specie. As the action that ensued is one which the French biographer considers especially glorious, it is well to point out that the French frigates were each of them more than a nominal match for the "Southampton;" that the two together had a very great superiority of force; that they attacked and were beaten off; and that whether they drew back, as Beatson says, or were unable to follow and prevent the "Southampton" making off, as M. —— says, is a matter of little consequence. The main point is the same; that Thurot, with two frigates against one, each larger, heavier, and with a more numerous crew, did not capture the one;* and with the best will in the world, it is difficult to see the great glory which, from this non-capture, redounds to the French navy.

It looks to me, indeed, as if M. Thurot had conceived his special work to be plundering comparatively helpless merchant ships, rather than fighting sturdily defended men-of-war; and that, when he found the "Southampton" no easy capture, he stomached his loss — amounting, on board the "Belle-Isle" alone, to fourteen killed, twenty-six wounded — and hauled to the wind. Clearly it was no part of Captain Gilchrist's duty, when he was specially employed in carrying specie, to go out of his way to engage an enemy of more than double his strength. That this is the correct view to take of Thurot's conduct seems confirmed by the facts of another action which he fought off Flushing, on August 1, with the "Seahorse," a twenty-four-gun frigate, Captain Taylor. The "Belle-Isle," which, in her engagement with the "Southampton,"

* A statement of the comparative force of the combatants will put this in a clearer light:

Southampton	26 12-pounders	6 6-pounders	220 men.
Belle Isle	28 12-pounders	8 6-pounders	400 men.
Chauvelin	28 "	8 "	400 "
Total	56 12-pounders	16 6-pounders	800 men.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

had suffered much in her rigging, had been partially dismantled in a squall off Ostend, and was in tow of the "Chauvelin," their sloop, the "Gros Thomas," in company, when the "Seahorse," with two small craft, the "Raven" and "Bonetta," bore down against them. After an engagement lasting three hours and a half, at first with the "Chauvelin" alone, and afterwards with the two together, the "Seahorse" was almost dismantled and had eight killed, seventeen badly wounded. She was of much smaller force* than either the "Belle-Isle" or the "Chauvelin," and ought to have been captured. That she was not, was due not so much to her material strength, as to the moral weakness of her opponents, who have boasted — as of a victory — of having forced her to sheer off. In point of fact, she was too much disabled either to sheer off or to continue the attack, and the French frigates were content to leave her and retire into Flushing.

It was September 18 before they were refitted, and they were scarcely well out of the port before they were chased in again by an English squadron, consisting, it is said, of three ships of the line and two frigates. The "Chauvelin" got back without difficulty; but the "Belle-Isle," carrying away her foretopsail yard, was overtaken, and sustained a heavy fire before she could escape. The French accounts of this affair are certainly exaggerated; and as the English have taken no notice of it, it is impossible to identify the squadron; the more so, as the "Journal de la Croisière" — written by an eye-witness, an officer of the "Belle-Isle" — has previously called the "Seahorse" and her little companions, "three frigates." The "Somerset" (seventy), and the "Rochester" (fifty), were on that coast at the time, and may possibly have chased the French frigates into Flushing; but it is difficult to believe that both or either of them were within pistol-shot of the "Belle-Isle," fired several broadsides into her, and did not sink her: it is not a question of human endurance, or French courage, but of the fundamental principles of hydrostatics.

When Thurot had again refitted, the two ships, "Belle-Isle" and "Chauvelin," stood out to the northward, and cruised with some success on the east coast of England and Scotland. On October 5 they were driven by stress of weather into the Moray Frith, and anchored off Banff, to the no small dismay of the provost and burgesses, who expected nothing less than the enforcement of a heavy contribution. The accident of opportunity might have suggested this to Thurot, and there was no force to prevent him; but during the night the gale freshened; the "Chauvelin" parted her cables and drifted out to sea, leaving her anchors behind; and in the morning the "Belle-Isle" weighed, and went to look for her, very much to the relief of the towns-people of Banff, who, for once, realized the danger to which they were exposed so far as to raise a sum of 400*l.* to construct a battery for their future defence.*

The two ships did not meet outside, and we may conclude that the "Chauvelin" made the best of her way back to France: the "Belle Isle," on the other hand, kept northwards; and having, under the Dutch flag, obtained some provisions at the Shetland Islands, crossed over to Bergen, picking up on her way (October 19) a prize, described as a royal frigate of twenty-six guns: this it certainly was not; but it may have been an armed merchant ship, or possibly a privateer. During this year the French cruisers were very active, and took — according to Beatson — five hundred and seventy-one British ships, most of which, however, were of trifling value. The number of prizes taken by us amounted to no more that three hundred and sixty-four; but of these, "one hundred and fifteen were either privateers of force or armed merchant ships, carrying a great number of guns, and manned with upwards of ten thousand seamen;" so that, on the whole, the balance was believed to be in our favor.

Thurot anchored at Bergen on October 30, and remained there a couple of months, refitting his ship, which, though only a month at sea, was much in want of it. Here a curious incident occurred, which marks the character of the man: he was short of naval stores — such as blocks, ropes, and spars; and offered to buy them from the captain of a French ship, in the port, consigned to a Norwegian merchant. The captain refused to sell; and Thurot, not to be baulked, or, as his biographer puts it, "guided by his zeal for the interests of his country," sent a party on board, and with the strong hand seized on what he wanted; "an act of violence," adds M. ——, "which would, under other circum-

* Seahorse. 22 9-pounders 2 3-pounders 160 men.

* The "Statistical Account of Scotland" (vol. xiii., p. 20) gives a ludicrous description of the meeting of the corporation of Banff; the date there given (1759) is, however, a mistake: Thurot was not near Banff in 1759.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

stances, have been most blamable," and which, as it was, nearly got him into trouble with the Norwegian authorities.

He left Bergen on December 25, and was no sooner outside than he got into a furious storm, which again dismasted the "Belle-Isle," whose ill-luck in that respect suggests that Thurot was not quite such a good practical seaman as he is represented. Under jury-masts, and with continual bad weather, the "Belle-Isle" was driven north beyond the sixty-fifth parallel; it was slowly and with much difficulty that she worked her way south again, and did not reach Gothenburg till February 1, 1758.

At Gothenburg Thurot remained till May 11; and then, going south, capturing several coasters and colliers, he was, on the 26th, off the entrance to the Frith of Forth, met and engaged by the "Dolphin" (twenty-four) and "Solebay" (twenty-eight). The two English frigates were beaten to a standstill, and Thurot, still satisfied with having secured his own safety, made no attempt to push his advantage to the point of victory: the match between the two sides was tolerably equal, though the "Belle-Isle" had a certain superiority both in weight of metal and in number of men; and, in boarding, might perhaps have carried one before the other could assist her: but she had lost nineteen killed, thirty-four wounded; and simple hard fighting was not the vocation of her crew.

Thurot, however, remained in Scotch waters, and made many prizes between St. Abb's Head and the Naze of Norway: his continued presence deeply impressed the coast population; his repelling the attack of the "Dolphin" and "Solebay" was magnified by vulgar report; and he became the bugbear of a people who were unaccustomed to the neighborhood of enemies' ships. Twelve vessels, mostly small snows, brigs, or brigantines, are named as prizes taken between May 26 and July 12; and on the 13th, off the Skaw, he encountered a fleet of merchant ships — seventeen armed pinks — presumably the Baltic trade. With these he had a brisk engagement; they mounted an aggregate of one hundred and thirty guns, and, clustering round the "Belle-Isle," seemed for a time as if they might take her; in the end, Thurot broke through them, put them to flight, and cut off one of their number, the "George and Joseph:" heavy rain and a dark night permitted the rest to escape.

The English government, wearied with the continual complaints about one frigate being left to threaten the coasts of England and Scotland, and almost to stop the North Sea trade, sent several ships to look after the "Belle-Isle;" but though constantly chased, Thurot succeeded in eluding his pursuers, in maintaining his ground, and in making several captures, till towards the middle of August; when, finding the station too hot for him, he stretched across to the Faroe Islands. Having obtained some fresh provisions, he came back; and as the ship was making a good deal of water, put into Lough Swilly.

It gives a curious idea of the conditions of naval war in the year 1758, to read of an enemy's frigate quietly taking up her position in Lough Swilly to refit; but even then it was not safe to stay long. Thurot resumed his cruise, and off the west coast of Scotland and northern entrance to St. George's Channel, took several prizes; amongst which are named the "Henry," mounting eighteen guns; the "Charleston," of twelve guns, laden with cloth stuffs, from Liverpool to Carolina; the "Britannia," of fourteen guns, with porcelain, to New York; and the "Admiral Ruyter" of eighteen guns, laden with sugar, coffee, and indigo; but, formidable as the armament of these sounds, it must be borne in mind that the guns of a merchant ship were small, meant merely to repel any desultory attack of petty pirates, and were useless against a regularly armed ship; not one of these prizes seems to have even attempted any resistance.

By September 13 Thurot was back at Bergen, and cruising from there took again several prizes; but towards the end of the year he ran down to Ostend, and early in January discharged his crew and officers, or, as we should say, paid off, at Dunkirk.

M. Thurot seems now to have spent some time at Paris, and to have been consulted freely by the government as to the projected invasion of England. The public feeling of France — so far as France had a public feeling — was no doubt just then very bitter against England. Not only was England at war, and a natural enemy, but four times within the last two years had she defiled the soil of France; and though on the first occasion, the attempt on Rochefort, in September 1757, was altogether abortive, as is indeed related in "The Virginians," and on the last, the troops which landed near St. Malo, on September 3, 1758, were, to the number of eight hundred, killed, made prisoners, or driven into the sea at St. Cas, on the 11th, the success on the two other occasions had been sufficient to kindle not only material fires at the time, as at St.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Malo in June '58, but also very much and noisy indignation. The attack on Cherbourg, in August '58, was worst of all; and even St. Cas following directly afterwards could not wipe away the memory of it.

Cherbourg, though very different from what it now is, had been a pet fancy of Louis XV. and of Cardinal Fleury: there is no doubt that it was meant, from the beginning, as a standing menace to England: as such its docks had been dug out and fortified against wind and waves and English arms; and as such it was broken up and destroyed by the expedition under Commodore Howe, — "Black Dick" as he was more familiarly called: the mole and fortifications were turned over into the harbor and basins: the work of years was undone in a few days: it seemed almost in mockery that the gate of the grand sluice bore the inscription: —

Hanc jussit Lodovix, suasit Floræus, et undis
Curavit mediis Asfeldus surgere molem:
Non aliis votis almæ præsentior urbis.
Ars frænavit aquas, fluctus domuitque minaces;
Hinc tutela viget, stat copia, gloria crescit;
Hinc rex, hinc sapiens, herosque manebit in ævum — which was, not unaptly under the circumstances, paraphrased by one of Howe's officers: —

Louis and Fleury must, with Asfeld, now
Resign to George, to Pitt, to Bligh and Howe.
One blast destroyed the labor of an age,
Let loose the tides and bid the billows rage:
Their wealth and safety gone, their glory lost,
The king's, the statesman's, and the hero's boast.

The wrath of France and of the French government was extreme, and it was not lessened by Rear-Admiral Rodney bombarding Havre de Grace, on the 3rd and following days of July, 1759, as he wrote in his official letter, "for fifty-two hours without intermission, with such success that the town was several times in flames, and their magazines of stores for the flat-bottomed boats burnt with great fury, for upwards of six hours." Albion was to be crushed; Carthage was to be destroyed; and whilst the Marquis de Conflans and the Duke d'Aiguillon arranged this in the south, Thurot undertook, with a small force, to make a diversion in the north, according as circumstances rendered expedient.

The force put at his disposal for this purpose consisted of his old ship, the "Maréchal de Belle-Isle," now mounting forty-four guns, of which four were eighteen-pounders; three smaller frigates, and two corvettes; and all of these, in addition to their complements, which were smaller than was usual in French ships, carried a number of soldiers, amounting in the aggregate to about twelve hundred:* these were borne for service on shore, under the command of a brigadier general, M. de Flobert. With this squadron, Thurot weighed from Dunkirk on October 15, 1759. On the 26th he arrived at Gothenburg, having not only passed through the English cruisers which, under Commodore Boys and Sir Piercy Brett, blockaded the coast of Dunkirk and Ostend, but taken several prizes on the way.

A quaint letter, which Durand has preserved, gives the impressions of a Liverpool skipper, a Captain Rimmer, who had seen the squadron at Gothenburg. The "Belle-Isle," he says, "has a black lion-head, and appears very ill-hogged in the mid-ships, and is painted black and red;" one of the other frigates "has a yellow lion-head standing remarkably high, is painted yellow and black;" and so on through the rest of them. The fashion which prevailed to the last, of painting ships of the line and frigates black with white stripes, and which was, I believe, definitely introduced by Sir John Jervis when in command of the Mediterranean fleet, no doubt had some advantages; but the artistic eye, comparing it with the fashions of the past, as exemplified in some of the models in the museum of the Royal Naval College, may almost regret the uniform simplicity which superseded them.

But a more remarkable passage in the letter just referred to, is that which speaks of the condition of the squadron: "The frigates when they came into Gothenburg were very foul, as if come off from a long voyage, and were destitute of many necessaries — had very few seamen on board, but full of land forces, commanded by a major-general; most of the soldiers were in blue, faced with white, and others all white. Whilst they remained at Gothenburg, nineteen days, they were fully employed cleaning their ships, getting new topmasts, new rigging for their vessels, victualling and watering; and the Swedes

* The squadron was: —

Maréchal de Belle-Isle	44 guns	600 men.
Bégon	36 "	600 "
Blonde	36 "	400 "
Terpsichore	24 "	300 "
Amarante	18 "	? 150 "
Faucon	18 "	? 150 "

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

assisted them all in their power, sending them their East Indian ships' boats to water with, and procuring them cables in lieu of those they had ordered to be made, which would have detained them before finished." And this after eleven days at sea from their first leaving France!

The squadron left Gothenburg on November 15, and meeting with a succession of southerly gales, was driven northward, and put into Bergen; the "Bégon" (thirty-six), presumably the "yellow and black" frigate mentioned by Captain Rimmer, and one of the corvettes had parted company; and as Bergen had been given out as a rendezvous, Thurot waited there for several days; they did not, however, appear, and he left without them on December 5.

The weather, that winter, seems to have been as persistently bad as it has been during the winter which is just passing away; and the squadron, now reduced to four ships, was driven away to the westward, and on December 28 came to an anchor in Westmanna-haven in Stromsoe, one of the Faroe Islands. Whilst there he wished to procure fresh provisions for his ships' companies; and as the governor made difficulties, he landed a party of men, at once to intimidate the authorities, and to lay hands on whatever they could get. The display of force was sufficient, and a small supply of bullocks, flour, brandy, and tobacco was sent on board. It may be noticed that at that time the Faroe Islands were a favorite haunt of smugglers, and a place of call for Danish and Dutch East Indiamen; now that smuggling, as well as these branches of the East India trade, has been done away, the resources of the islands have probably much diminished, and any supplies they could furnish would scarcely be worth the notice of a body of more than twelve hundred men.

During the stay of the squadron at Stromsoe a quarrel broke out between M. de Flobert and Thurot, which was the cause of serious embarrassment both then and afterwards. Flobert had displayed all along a feeling of jealousy at being subordinated to Thurot, as well as of pique at Thurot's refusal to communicate the tenor of his private instructions and the full purport of the expedition. A circumstance, trivial in itself, was sufficient to set the match to the ready fuel. Thurot had learned that one of the soldier officers had been grumbling about the hardships of the cruise, and the provisions, in what he rightly considered an unofficer-like way; and had felt it his duty to reprimand him sharply. Flobert took up the matter in support of his junior; worked himself into a rage; and mad with passion, ordered up a corporal and two file of the guard to put Thurot under arrest. This obliged Thurot to produce an order from the king, in proof that he was absolutely commander-in-chief of the expedition; and Flobert — I quote here from the "Life," by M. ——— "fearing to compromise his authority by persisting in his imprudent step, drew back, and the quarrel was for the time appeased; leaving, however, a leaven of animosity which continued to ferment, occasioned many difficulties, and threw into the minds of the soldiers a germ of insubordination which produced very bad effects."

In point of fact, this quarrel between Flobert and Thurot was an extreme instance of a cause which, in the last century, and in England more than in France, rendered futile so very many expeditions in which sea and land forces were required to act in conjunction. Of these, Vernon's failure at Cartagena in 1741 was perhaps the most marked and the most disastrous; but there were scores of others; and the constant recurrence of difficulties seems to point to a radically false system and an honest misunderstanding, rather than to mere captiousness and personal dislike. At the same time, it is too true that there was, between soldiers and sailors, a very mutual feeling of jealousy and contempt, which the officers in no small degree shared with their men. This was strong enough, no doubt, on the part of the soldiers; but was perhaps even stronger amongst the sailors, who saw their favored and courtly rivals, seasick and helpless on board ship, but had no opportunity of seeing them in their own sphere of duty and distinction. The pipe-clay, the powdered head, the stiff clothing and etiquette of the soldier, were all repulsive to the "tar" of the olden time. Had he been versed in Shakespeare, he would probably have described the object of his scorn in the words of Hotspur, as "neat and finely dressed — fresh as a bridegroom — perfumed like a milliner;" as it was, he drew up a table of precedence, which continued in vogue till not very many years ago: I have myself heard it said, and meant too: "A messmate before a shipmate; a shipmate before a stranger; a stranger before a dog; but — a dog before a soldier."

When we consider that, in our own annals, the only brilliant instance of perfect concord between two commanding

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

officers of the different services, not otherwise connected, was that offered by two exceptional men, — Rear-Admiral Saunders and Acting Major-General Wolfe — a concord which effected the fall of Quebec and the conquest of Canada, it is not to be wondered at if a French soldier of good family, M. de Flobert, was indignant at the circumstances that compelled him to act subordinately — or rather insubordinately — to a sailor, not even a genuine naval officer, an ex-smuggler, a privateer, a man of no family, a roturier, a François Thurot. Possibly, nay probably, Thurot was at fault in some of the conventionalities of French society, for he had never had any opportunity of seeing or practising them: but after all, Thurot's name lives in history; Flobert's probably comes before many readers now for the first time.

The constant succession of gales which obliged Thurot to remain at the Faroe Islands, compelled him to put the men on short allowance of bread, ten ounces per day, and to stop the double rations issued to officers and servants, promising, however, that they should be paid savings, that is, the equivalent in money. Flobert insisted that a council of war should be called, and stated that, in his opinion, as their force had been lessened by the loss of the two ships, "Bégon" and "Faucon," and was now weakened by the want of provisions, it was imperative on him to return to France at once. Thurot replied: the speech, as reported, is most likely apocryphal: but it has been accepted by the French, and serves at any rate to illustrate the sense in which they have considered his character. He said, then, — that as they could not get provisions at the Faroe Islands, they must go and look for them in England, where they would find abundance. That the winds, which had long been contrary, would change, and three days would bring them to their destination: the only honorable way to be useful to their country was to make a diversion, — which might lead to great results, — by attacking the enemy in their homes, and by braving all risks in this glorious attempt; certainly not by returning shamefully to France after so much toil and fatigue, without having ventured to undertake anything. For the rest, the direct route lay past England; and on the English coast he would land: it was absolutely necessary to make a descent; he was determined to do so; the reasons offered for a retreat so dishonorable as had been proposed could have no influence with a force on which the safety of the country depended: and in fine, that to grumble at the difficulties, or even the calamities incidental to war, was not showing the courage and firmness necessary to the career of arms.

Thurot carried his point. On January 26, 1760, the squadron left Stromsoe, with a fresh wind from north-west, and by the 30th was on the north coast of Ireland. It was his intention to enter Lough Foyle, and attack Londonderry; there does not seem to have been anything to prevent him, except the weather, which, with a southerly gale, drove him off the coast. And meanwhile, a mutiny broke out amongst the officers of the troops, which was the more dangerous as the soldiers formed the largest part of the ships' companies. The "Amarante" deserted the squadron; the "Terpsichore" had arranged to do the same; Thurot hailed to say that if the wind did not shift he would run back to Bergen and get provisions; the "Blonde" replied that it was none too soon. M. de Rusilly, commanding the troops on board the "Terpsichore," complained bitterly of the short allowance of provisions, and said that all the officers were decided to return to France. Thurot pointed out that their doing so might lead to results disagreeable to themselves; but finding his authority set at naught, he consented, as a compromise, to go to Bergen.

The wind, however, now changed to the north-west, and he proposed to enter St. George's Channel; but Rusilly impudently notified to him, in the name of the officers of the "Terpsichore," that they were going to pass to the west of Ireland, and return to France. Thurot ordered Dernaudais, the captain of the "Terpsichore," to follow the "Belle-Isle," saying that if he refused he should be responsible before the king for his conduct. Rusilly answered that he would take all the responsibility on himself; that it was his intention, as soon as he arrived in France, to lay a complaint of Thurot's conduct before the court, and have him punished. Dernaudais, who had every wish to obey his commodore, was forced by Rusilly and the other soldier officers to yield, and to make off towards the west: Thurot fired a shot across the "Terpsichore's" bows; he had to fire a second before she would bring to; and Dernaudais, having gone on board the "Belle-Isle," had to prove that he had been constrained by his officers. He was sent back to his ship, bearing to the mutineers the assurance that they should be severely pun-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

ished. The "Blonde" seems to have been just at that time more favorably disposed; she passed under the "Belle-Isle's" stern, and her captain, M. Larréguy, hailed that Thurot might count on him.

The next day, Thurot judged it necessary to reduce the ration of bread to eight ounces. Flobert ordered that only five ounces should be issued to the soldiers. These naturally complained that they got less than the sailors, and Thurot at once gave directions that they should get the same. Flobert, whose order seems to have been quite unwarranted — to have been given only to provoke disturbance amongst his men — was furious. He insisted on a council, and demanded that the captain should explain his navigation; for the day before it had been agreed that he was to enter St. George's Channel, and now he was standing towards Londonderry. Thurot replied that, in fact, he meant to go to Londonderry. Flobert asked what he would do if the wind still prevented his entering. In that case Thurot would continue his route. "Well then!" cried Flobert, "if to-morrow morning, at six o'clock, we are not in the port of Londonderry, and you do not then give up this project, I will have you arrested, and will myself take charge of the ship." Thurot is described as being more surprised than angry, and as contenting himself with saying, "If you take it in that way, there's nothing more to be said: your threats do not intimidate me; I do not fear you, and I defy you to arrest me."

Flobert, screaming with rage, rushed out of the cabin; ordered the sentry to prevent Thurot's leaving it, and called the guard to arms. Thurot took his pistols, pushed past the sentry, and went out on the quarter-deck. The guard had fallen in, but the men were unwilling to execute off-hand the orders of their commandant, whose fellows had, meantime, pointed out to him that he was exceeding his power. Flobert gave way; and Thurot, to put an end to the scandalous scene, and to prevent anything of the sort happening again, wished to read out his instructions from the king, and the commission appointing him commander-in-chief of the squadron. Flobert forbade the soldiers to listen to him. Thurot then said that he would have it posted up for all to read. Flobert gave orders that whoever attempted to post it up should be arrested. It was now Thurot's turn to give way; "he had the complaisance not to make his instructions public" — not to post them up — and so calm was restored.

That same night the "Belle-Isle" hove-to off the entrance to Lough Foyle, and in the darkness her two consorts left her, having agreed between themselves to pass round to the west of Ireland. By a mistake in their reckoning, however, they rejoined her next day, but too late to carry out the commodore's purpose. The wind had shifted to the south-west, and it was no longer possible to enter the lough.

Meanwhile, in gales, disturbances, and quarrels, time slipped away. It was February 15; the daily allowance of bread was reduced to five ounces, and Thurot, firmly resolved not to go back to France, anchored in Claigeann Bay in the island of Islay. Here he learned from a man, McDonald, who came off as pilot, of the decisive defeat which Conflans had sustained. It was an event three months passed, but was news to him, and disturbed his plans, as he saw that, of course, the great project of invasion could not be carried out. He was, however, still unwilling to return without attempting something which might be for the honor, if not very much for the material advantage of France. But it was absolutely necessary, in the first place, to get some fresh provisions and bread, for his crews were sickly; and, as the population of the island, with the suppressive measures of the English government after "the Forty-five" still in their memories, refused to furnish any supplies, the natural course would have been to take them by force. This Thurot was unwilling to do; for his instructions were positive not to attempt any hostile landing in Scotland, where it was hoped the Jacobite feeling might itself make a diversion in favor of French arms.

In this dilemma he came to an arrangement with McDonald — who seems to have acted throughout as his agent — to land his men as a demonstration. It was the merest of demonstrations. The poor, half-starved, scurvy-smitten wretches, were no sooner landed than they "began to dig up every green thing they saw upon the ground, even the grass, which they devoured with the utmost eagerness." The bullocks, nevertheless, were produced; forty-eight were driven in, and after a difficulty with Flobert, who wished to "requisition" them, were very honestly paid for by Thurot. In a similar way, he got a small but grateful supply of oatmeal and flour; and putting to sea on the 19th, a Lisbon trader, laden with oranges, was, under the circumstances, a most valuable prize.

About midnight on the 20th he entered

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Belfast Lough. On the previous evening he had detailed his plans to Flobert. "There are two objects before us," he had said, "Belfast and Carrickfergus. I will land you at Whitehouse. You will, in the first instance, attack Belfast; it is a rich commercial town, and has neither fortifications nor troops. Threaten to set fire to it, and the inhabitants will hasten to furnish the stores and provisions of which we are so much in need. You will be able, besides, to levy a large contribution. After that you will go to Carrickfergus, a town of but small size, and poor. It will be quite easy to seize on the castle, which is old, ruinous, and without defence. You will set at liberty the French prisoners who are there, and extract from the people such a contribution of provisions and money as their small means will permit; and will re-embark before the English ships are apprised of our landing. The whole thing is to be done off-hand; the enemy must not have time to organize any opposition."

The plan seems to have been excellent, but Flobert, purely out of contradiction, insisted on attacking Carrickfergus first. He would land at Kilroot, two or three miles to the north-east of Carrickfergus, or nowhere; and, unable to overcome his mutinous obstinacy, Thurot, sooner than do nothing, consented. The landing of about six hundred men was effected by noon on February 21, 1760.

As soon as Lieut.-Col. Jennings, who commanded at Carrickfergus, learned that three strange and suspicious ships had anchored at Kilroot, whilst waiting for further information he sent all the prisoners to Belfast, and made what preparations he could for defence. These were but few. Although Carrickfergus was, in a way, the military depot of the north of Ireland, the castle was ruinous, the town was unfortified, and there were in garrison only two hundred men, almost all young recruits, and, as yet, quite undisciplined. Accordingly, when Flobert attacked, little opposition could be made; the men retired into the castle, and after a short stand, in which some fifty French were killed and wounded, they capitulated on terms sufficiently favorable. The troops were not to be sent prisoners to France, but exchanged against an equal number of French; the castle (such as it was) was not to be demolished; the town was not to be burned or pillaged, but was, as a ransom, to supply the squadron with provisions. The course of events rendered these conditions practically vain; and though the town was not set on fire, it was pretty well ransacked, as was, indeed, to be expected from men whose officers had set them no good example of obedience, and who had been confined on board ship for four months.

Thurot had meanwhile weighed, stood further into the bay, and anchored off Whitehouse. From there, on the next day, he landed, and in an interview with Flobert, pressed him to advance at once on Belfast, which, he understood, was defended by only two hundred men, and some militia. Flobert, notwithstanding this, and the wish of his own officers, refused to move.

The next day, the 23rd, Thurot wrote to Flobert, still urging him to attack Belfast; again pointing out that they could get plenty of provisions there, could levy a rich contribution, and that it would be easier to re-embark. That he could not stay long, as the enemy would gather in on him; that, in fact, he must sail the next day; and that, unless he got provisions, he would not re-embark the troops: it would be better that they should remain prisoners in Ireland than die of hunger on board. Flobert's reply to his commanding officer is a valuable commentary on the discipline of the period.

"If," he wrote, "you had done with your ships the hundredth part of what I have done with the quarter of my detachment, we should not be in the wretched plight in which, by your fault alone, we now are: for this you shall answer to the king, who, when he entrusted you with the conduct of a detachment, did not give you permission to sacrifice it, in a barefaced manner, in trying to carry out impossible and chimerical plans. If you had had the common sense to see that famine is the only evil without remedy, and beyond the courage of the king's troops, you would not now be reduced to the cruel threat of abandoning us to the discretion of the king's enemies. It is your duty to abide whatever may happen, rather than not re-embark the detachment. I summon you, in the king's name, to run all hazards rather than abandon us."

M. de Cavenac, who, on Flobert being wounded, had taken the command, wrote in much the same sense; and again, shortly afterwards, that the enemy were mustering in force, and that it was necessary to re-embark at once. Thurot, in threatening to abandon the troops, had undoubtedly threatened what he could not and durst not perform; and finding that their officers would not lead them against Belfast, he embarked them on the evening of the 25th. Of provisions he seems to have

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd obtained none, except a few potatoes. The mayor and three townsmen were taken on board as security for what had been demanded and promised; but as these were not forthcoming on the 24th, it was arranged that the town should pay 1,000*l.* instead; and two of the hostages were sent on shore to see about it; the two others, Mr. Chaplin the mayor, and Mr. Spaight, a merchant of Carrickfergus, being kept on board. Thurot was anxious to get out of the bay, but a stormy wind from the northward prevented him, and he could not weigh till midnight of the 27th. It was half past four on the morning of the 28th when he rounded the light on the island of Copeland.

The delay which had been enforced on him had permitted the government to bring up a small squadron from the south of Ireland. It cannot but appear strange that there should have been at that time no ships of war in the northern waters; for it had been known for weeks past that Thurot was on the coast, and great alarm had been felt at all places which were, or thought they were, worth attacking. At Whitehaven, where some two hundred merchant ships, coasting vessels and others, were lying, there was great excitement, and six hundred volunteers took up arms to defend the place; but how these were expected to defend the shipping does not appear. Liverpool in the same way, then rising fast into importance, and especially obnoxious for the number of its privateers, assembled a considerable number of troops, mostly of the local militia. An old townsman, who, under the name of a "nonagenarian," published his recollections a few years ago, has described the scene, which would be still fresh in the memory of his mother when he was a little boy.

"Everton Hill," he says, "was alive with people from the town waiting the freebooters' approach. A party of soldiers was then encamped on the hill, and I have been told the men had orders, on Thurot's appearance, to make signals if by day, and to light up the beacon if at night, to communicate the intelligence of the French fleet being off the coast to the other beacons at Ashurst and Billinge, Rivington Pike, and elsewhere, and so spread the news into the north; while signals would also be taken up at Halton, Beeston, the Wrekin, and thence to the southward." *

But there seems to have been no attempt to defend the river, and Thurot might, practically without opposition, have done a good deal of mischief amongst the shipping, and have destroyed the rising fortunes of the Bolds, the Colquitts and others, whose names are perpetuated in the modern streets.

Notwithstanding all this preparation and excitement, no ships had been sent north; and when the Duke of Bedford, then lord-lieutenant of Ireland, had news of the landing at Carrickfergus, he had to send, quite promiscuously, to the different seaports, to inform the captains of any of his Majesty's ships that might happen to be there of the enemy being on the coast. Luckily, and only luckily — that is to say, without any special orders — there did happen to be three frigates at Kinsale: the "Æolus" (thirty-two) Captain Elliot, "Brilliant" and "Pallas," each of thirty-six guns. These having weighed immediately, had come off the entrance of Belfast Lough on the evening of the 26th, but during the gale had not ventured inside: it was thus, that on the morning of the 28th, when the French squadron came round Copeland Island, it saw, and was immediately seen by, the "Æolus" and her consorts.

It was no part of Thurot's plan to fight a squadron of English frigates, and he did not wait for their attack. They gave chase, and closed with him about nine o'clock; the "Æolus," leading, engaged the "Belle-Isle;" the "Pallas" and "Brilliant," as they came up, assisted her; and after a smart action, lasting for about an hour and a half, Thurot was killed, and his ship hauled down her colors. The "Blonde" and "Terpsichore" had not shown any wish to fight, and being chased by the "Pallas" and "Brilliant," struck almost at once; they thus sustained little or no damage or loss; but the "Belle-Isle" had suffered considerably in men, in spars, and in hull. Captain Elliot, in his official letter, estimates the enemy's loss, in killed and wounded, at three hundred; the French accounts — probably not including the less severe cases — speak of ninety hors de combat; and whichever account we accept, the loss was very great, and had fallen almost entirely on the "Belle-Isle," which was also with difficulty kept from sinking, as she was taken, with the other prizes, into Ramsay Bay, in the Isle of Man.

The presence of the French frigates on the coast had caused such vivid alarm, that the rejoicing over their capture was something excessive, and was accompanied by much boasting. The action was no doubt highly creditable to Elliot and

* "Recollections of Old Liverpool," by a Nonagenarian, p. 146. Liverpool, 1863.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

his companions, and a very important service was performed just when it was most needed; but there was not in reality, much to boast about. Nominally the French squadron was superior to the English; independent of the result, it was not so effective; the French guns were heavier, but several had been struck below during the bad weather in the Northern seas, and had not been remounted; the ships too were of slighter scantling, the "Belle-Isle" more especially, which was badly hogged even at Gothenburg, and after her capture was not thought worth buying into the service. The number of men, again, was nearly double that of the English, but of these many were sickly, if not sick; and the bulk were soldiers, who — under such officers as they had — were not only useless in action, but worse than useless, as getting in the way, and swelling the list of killed and wounded. Even had the "Blonde" and "Terpsichore" stuck gallantly by their consort, the result must have been the same; for the three English frigates were in good order, well manned and ably commanded; but the manner in which these two kept aloof, by throwing the whole weight of the contest on the "Belle-Isle," rendered it beyond question easier, and the sooner come at.

About Thurot himself there seems little room for doubt; his contemporaries, alike friends and enemies, speak of him as a bold, daring man, active, energetic, and full of resource; and the fact that during the greater part of three years he kept the English coast in a state of continued apprehension, escaping from, eluding, and, when need was, fighting the English cruisers with which the narrow seas were swarming, is sufficient evidence of his high qualities as a corsair and a leader of a flying squadron. I have already shown how, on different occasions, he declined to push his success against English ships of war to a decisive issue; notably against the "Southampton" and against the "Seahorse" — against this last more especially. In doing so I have not wished to impute any base motive to Thurot, whose courage must have been of proof; but I do think that both these actions, and in a less degree that which he fought against the "Dolphin" and "Solebay," illustrate the principle which was then, and continued to be during the century, the ruling principle of the French navy — that of avoiding decisive action; * a principle which might occasionally lead to strategic advantage, but which on the other hand exposed them to great tactical danger and absolute loss — as was clearly exemplified on November 20, 1759, "la journée de M. de Conflans" — and which effectually prevented their winning any brilliant success. Thurot fought well when he was forced to fight, but he consistently avoided action whenever he could avoid it: and when he could not, he quitted it at the earliest possible opportunity. He thus, throughout his career, obtained only the reputation of an active and untiring corsair. Had it been otherwise, he might have gained a higher reputation as a warrior, by capturing the "Southampton" or the "Seahorse," against each of which he had an overwhelmingly superior force; and at the last, might have made a much sturdier resistance against the "Æolus" and her consorts. Had he stood boldly towards the English squadron, his companions would scarcely have had the unblushing cowardice to stand away; but as he crowded sail from the enemy, they did the same; and by rate of sailing and accident of position, had an excuse — sufficient for them, though it would not have been sufficient for single-hearted, honest, and honorable men — to keep out of the fight.

As to the conduct of M. de Flobert, and the whole body of soldier officers, the story of which throws a curious light on the capabilities or incapabilities of French discipline, there can be but one opinion. Whatever grievances he had, or thought he had, it was his duty to his country and his king to have backed up the commodore. His complaints might and should have waited, after due remonstrance, till their return to France. There can be little doubt that had Flobert entered into Thurot's views and schemes, Belfast would have been sacked. Against a sudden onset such as Thurot proposed, there were no possible means of effective resistance; though after three days' delay, things would certainly have been very different.

And the history of Thurot's whole career, and more especially of this last campaign, seems to me to show that a naval force, however numerous and active, is not in itself sufficient to protect our commerce from loss, our coasts from insult, and our towns from pillage, at the hands of a small squadron, or even of a single ship, commanded by a man of talent and enterprise. That Thurot failed in inflicting very serious loss on our towns and our shipping, seems to have been due not to

* Compare "Victoires et Conquêtes," tom. vii., p. 251.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

any wise precautions of the government, though the elder Pitt was secretary of state, not to the superior might of our navy, though that crushed him at last; but to the exceptional severity of the season, to the inherent weakness of French sailors, the inefficiency of French equipment, and the bad discipline of French soldiers. But it is not wise always to trust our safety, our prestige, or our honor either to the caprice of the weather, or to the presumed incapacity of a possible enemy.

In person, Thurot is described as of middle height, stout built and well made, "rather robust than genteel, rather comely than handsome; very brown and extremely florid, with a small scar under his left eye." Of his private life we know little or nothing; he died poor, leaving an Irishwoman (née Smith) who passed as his wife, and a daughter six months old, dependent on the State, which, at that time, meant Madame de Pompadour. We find the daughter coming forward in 1790, with a petition for further support, and being awarded, at the instance of Barrère, a pension of one thousand francs. His biographer, M. ——, says that he married about the year 1750; but according to Durand, who appears to write in good faith and of personal knowledge, he was about that time and after, living in Shadwell with an Irish lady whom he had picked up in that not very reputable neighborhood. Whether this was Miss Smith, the future Mme. Thurot, or not, must remain a matter of opinion.

J. K. LAUGHTON.

From Temple Bar.

RUSSIAN COURT LIFE IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

CATHERINE ALEXIEWNA I. AND ANNE IVANOWNA.

THE eighteenth century is remarkable for the number of female sovereigns who in the course of it controlled the affairs of Europe and exercised an influence, as often baneful as beneficial, on the destinies of their own and other countries. In England the reign of Queen Anne, with its valiant generals and military successes, its distinguished men of letters, science, genius, and wit, ushered in the century brilliantly. In the latter part of the preceding one, in semi-barbarous Russia, the haughty and ambitious Princess Sophia Alexiewna, who, as regent, had governed absolutely and sternly, and commanded that the coin of the realm should bear her image, disliking to lay down her power for a gloomy life in a monastery — a retreat to which the princesses of her nation were in that day generally consigned — intrigued to supplant her half-brother, Peter the First, in order to reign alone as czarina. The young czar, before setting out on his travels to learn shipbuilding and other useful arts, had put down Sophia's partisans, dispelled her hopes of deposing him, and condemned her to the life she had so dreaded. During his absence the Strelitz revolted and invited Sophia to leave her monastery for the throne. On learning this, Peter, full of fury, hastened back to Moscow, and after quelling the revolt, ordered atrocious cruelties to be inflicted on the rebels, and with his own hands helped to execute them. The corps of Strelitz, or fusileers, originally formed by Ivan the Terrible, Peter disbanded, and finally, in the first year of the eighteenth century, shut up Sophia for life, and compelled his weak-minded half-brother Ivan to reside on his estates at some distance from the capital.

From 1725 the czarinas Catherine the First, Anne Ivanowna, the regent Anne of Brunswick, and Elizabeth Petrowna reigned with a very high hand over "all the Russias" for upwards of thirty-three years. With the accession of Elizabeth (misnamed "la clémente") to the throne of the czars, in 1741, began almost simultaneously the long and troubled reign of near forty years of Maria Theresa, the empress-queen of Austria and Hungary; of whom Frederick the Second, after her death in 1780, truly said, "She was an honor to her sex and to the throne," adding, "I made war upon her, but personally was never her enemy." After Elizabeth, Catharine the Second, "la grande Catherine," as she has been called, and who, undoubtedly, was the most remarkable woman of her time, swayed the Russian sceptre despotically for thirty-four years. Generally, too, with the selfish, unflinching hardness more characteristic of a stepmother, than with the anxious solicitude to promote the prosperity and happiness of her subjects which the title — in adulation bestowed on her by servile flatterers — of "mother of her people" would seem to imply. This century of reigning European empresses and queens closed with the reign of Donna Maria the First, of Portugal, under whom the great Marquez de Pombal, the Richelieu of his nation,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

was persecuted and disgraced; his efforts for the regeneration of his country thwarted, and his work everywhere undone at the instigation of a crafty, unprincipled priesthood, who ruled the weak mind of their timid and superstitious sovereign, who eventually became insane.

The naïve remark of the young Duchess of Burgundy to Louis the Fourteenth and Madame de Maintenon, that "when queens reign men govern, and women govern when kings reign" — so often repeated that it has passed into a proverb — tested by the experience of the eighteenth century, would seem to apply even more forcibly to kings than to queens. Though the well-governed Louis himself did not admit that it was fairly applicable to kings, or to France at all, where the Salic law, so wisely as he said, excluded women from sovereign power. But no queens have governed more arbitrarily than those eighteenth-century queens of the main gauche (if that term be allowable) the devout but wily De Maintenon; the ably diplomatic De Pompadour; the triumphantly audacious Du Barry. And none ever caused more misery by the secret exercise of undue influence than the volatile and unfortunate queen-consort of Louis the Sixteenth.

But the sceptre so despotically swayed by the female sovereigns of Russia was not guided by men. The numerous unworthy favorites raised by these women to places of power and trust merely availed themselves of their weaknesses and vices, and the opportunity of tyrannizing over and plundering the unhappy people, in order rapidly to amass wealth while their uncertain tenure of favor lasted. And by a long course of the depravity that led to this species of misrule and constant change of rulers, tyranny, corruption, and licentiousness became under the czarinas the very essence of the Russian system of government. Catherine the Second, without abandoning the system, greatly modified it. For with the vices of her predecessors she also possessed the great ambition of playing before the world the part of an able ruler and powerful sovereign. Her influence has extended even to the present day in the aggressive policy handed down to and adopted by her successors; who have invariably acted in accordance with it whenever a pretext could be found, or opportunity offered, for "rectifying the frontiers," or giving "a more uniform line to the limits" of their vast and ever-expanding empire. The rapacious Catherine's most cherished objects have been always kept steadily in view, and especially that which became a passion with her — the realization of her Oriental system in the fulfilment of the "Heaven-assigned mission of Russia" (supposedly propounded by Peter the First) to expel the fanatic Turk from his European territory, and, in the interests of his Christian brethren, of course, to annex it to that of "all the Russias," in order to found there an eastern empire, with Constantinople for its capital.

It is singular that a semi-barbarous country, whose women until so recently had for ages been the mere abject slaves of enslaved men, should afford the almost single example of having been despotically governed during the greater part of a century by five or six female sovereigns in succession; the short reign of the child Peter the Second and the six months of that of the unfortunate Peter the Third alone intervening — Anne of Brunswick having ruled as regent during the few months that her baby, Ivan, was acknowledged as czar. The Russian women owed their emancipation to that grand, intellectual barbarian Peter the First. A man of iron will, large views, and great tenacity of purpose; of powerful physique; coarse, brutal, and criminal. Yet a man in every respect as well fitted to trample on long-cherished customs and national prejudices as to cope with the difficulties of consolidating the scattered and thinly populated provinces of the wild wastes of Russia into one vast empire, and of overcoming the resistance nature seemed to oppose to his project of laying in a swamp the foundations of a great city, in order to give to that empire — with an eye to future conquests — a second capital directly communicating with the Baltic. In the carrying out of this project human life was as largely and remorselessly sacrificed as at Versailles and Marly to the whims of another equally callous but more refined and effeminate despot — le grand monarque — for "the now stately granite-built St. Petersburg rests upon a bed of human skeletons."

Such court life as there was under the rule of Peter the First was in every way the reverse of courtly. The manners and domestic habits of the czar and his associates were rather those of savages than of a people on whom even the first gleams of civilization had dawned. At the court dinners Peter entertained a mixed assemblage of shipwrights and other artisans, generals, priests, ministers of state, merchants, ambassadors, and people of all

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

grades and trades employed on his works. The workmen, in the dress of their calling, filled the places of honor next the czar, who appeared in the same kind of coarse woollen clothing. Other guests who could find seats at the festive board took possession of them sans cérémonie. Those who could not stood around, getting stray morsels "by hook or by crook," and in the intervals refreshing themselves with "potations pottle deep" of brandy and common Tokay; for in them the czar allowed of no stint to his guests and in no wise stinted himself. Before the repast was half finished the company was uproarious, and in the end, inflamed by strong drink, more ferocious than wild beasts — never separating until, in their drunken frenzy, while fighting and blaspheming, they had inflicted some bodily injury on each other. And the more the blood flowed, the merrier the meeting, and the more to the taste of the czar. From these royal banquets the class called the old aristocracy was rigidly excluded. It consisted of families who plumed themselves on their descent from the bold Scandinavian private Rurik, who founded the Russian empire during the ninth century. They were generally wealthy, and pompous in manner, from pride in their ancient lineage; ostentatious, and of indolent habits — an unprofitable part of the community, Peter considered, and therefore particularly obnoxious to him. Gradually he humbled and crushed them; leaving them only the privilege of appearing on great State occasions at court. Even then he marked his contempt for them by assigning them places far below those of his own nobility — the men who by service had obtained military rank, held offices of trust in the State, or were skilful superintendents of his dockyards or works.

The festive board of the czar, as may well be imagined, had not hitherto been graced by the presence of the fair sex. From all the rude hospitalities, social enjoyments, and court revels of the time — such as they were — woman was banished. She lived in Oriental seclusion, but not in luxury. She was the slave of her lord and master; must not sit in his presence, or eat at the same table. Sometimes her spirit rebelled, her courage rose, and with a dagger or poisoned cup she freed the earth and herself from a tyrant. But what, then, was her fate? He might have struck her down with impunity, but she, unless she had arranged to fly to the protection of one more powerful, and perchance more humane, than he, was seized immediately, loaded with fetters, and her tongue cut out. Had she not profanely dared to speak reproachfully of her lord, and lifted her sacrilegious hand against him? Cut it off then; brick her up in a wall, or bury her in the earth up to her chin, and there let her slowly die, a warning to disobedient and rebellious wives. Alas! for poor Russian women in those days.

But a better time was at hand. Peter was not always engaged in chopping off a dozen refractory heads in a morning, and drinking off a goblet of brandy between each operation. He knew, barbarian though he was, that Russia was far, very far behind the kingdoms of the West in civilization. He desired to raise her to their level; it would conduce to her material greatness, and was therefore a subject much in his thoughts. His far-seeing views suggested to him the amelioration of woman's social position, and her introduction into society as a means towards its modern reorganization. This keen observer had not failed to notice when visiting foreign courts the beneficial and civilizing effect of woman's presence there, and the deference and respect with which she was treated. The ladies of the court under the Orléans regency were certainly not models of virtue, but the grace and refinement with which they veiled their vices are said to have captivated Peter. Curiosity, too, to see the woman who had had so much influence in the councils of Louis, induced the czar to request permission to visit Madame de Maintenon, then near her end, and residing at St. Cyr.

After his second return to his country, he himself set the first example of the reform he wished to introduce. He determined to publicly marry his Livonian mistress, the Lutheran priest's servant-maid, Martha, taken captive at the siege of Marienburg by General Bauer, who ceded her to the powerful Prince Menschikoff, from whom she was transferred to the czar at his urgent request. For years she had followed the camp with him and borne uncomplainingly his frequent outbursts of drunken frenzy and the application of the cane to her back. But she managed her ferocious hero with excellent tact, and by energy united to persuasion was of real service to him at Pruth. When surrounded there by the Turkish army she urged him to attempt negotiations with the grand vizier, and herself collected all the money and valuables in the camp and sent them to that high functionary to induce him to forbear pressing his advantage, and she prevailed. The Turks had the czar

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

in their clutches, but allowed him to escape on his undertaking to restore Azof and withdraw from the Black Sea. These conditions he fulfilled with sullen rage, but he acknowledged his obligations to Martha, and privately married her, when after making the Greek confession of faith (repeating the Athanasian creed) she took the name of Catherine Alexiewna. He then married her publicly, and in 1724, the year before his death, she was crowned at Moscow, with great pomp and splendor. The czar himself robed her in the imperial mantle, which was of cloth of gold lined with ermine, and placed the crown on her head. At the conclusion of the ceremony the crown and sceptre were carried before her, preceded by Peter at the head of a newly-formed regiment, named, in honor of the occasion, "les Chevaliers de l'Impératrice." The princes of the empire followed, bearing the train of the "great and orthodox empress," Catherine Alexiewna. Thus, to the accompaniment of a furious clang-clanging of all the bells of Moscow, was the first empress of Russia proclaimed. The czars before Peter's time had not assumed the imperial title.

No time was lost in issuing a ukase, which was expected at once to transform the hitherto semi-barbarous court of Russia into a brilliant rival of that of Versailles. The nobles, the officers of state, the merchants, even the old aristocracy, all indeed who frequented the court, were commanded henceforth to bring with them their wives and daughters, mothers and sisters. Also to open their houses once or twice in the week, from four till ten P.M., for the entertainment of each other's families; and should there be any marriages on the tapis, Peter ordered that no betrothal should take place until, by this new system of mutual visiting and family intercourse, the young people had had for some weeks an opportunity of becoming acquainted.* But national prejudices, based on the custom of ages, could not immediately give way, even before the strong will and ukase of an imperial despot. Many men neither approved of nor saw any wisdom in innovations, according so large a share of liberty to women. They even murmured — sotto voce, be it understood, for they had a wholesome dread of the knout and Siberia. Some of the poor crushed women, or women without spirit, from long seclusion, poor things, also shrank from the ordeal of a first appearance in public. But Peter resolved that his Katinka's court should be fully attended, and all defaulters, or transgressors of the rules of the new code of fashion, were condemned to swallow, at one draught, an enormous tankardful of brandy — the tankard from its form and size was called the "great eagle of Russia." This decree was certainly a gross mistake on the part of a reformer who desired to bring the decencies of society into vogue.

More select dinners, however, were now given than formerly; for though the shipwrights were still the czar's most welcome and honored guests, some little attention to toilette was exacted. They had to wash and brush up a bit after work and to don their Sunday coats; for did not the czarina and the ladies who attended her now put in an appearance, and arrayed in the last Paris fashions? Peter had provided himself for great court receptions with a coat of rich blue silk, fringed and betasselled, and embroidered with gold. It was therefore but reasonable that he should ask both men and women to conform in their dress to a pattern he had brought from the West. They were required to adopt a new style of headdress, and the men were to shave off their beards or pay a fine. The czar had turned his attention also to music, and had organized a fine band. The halls of the palace were swept and garnished, and weekly the imperial pair issued invitations to a court ball. For arriving late a whole party of his ministers on one occasion was thrashed, and even Menschikoff was caned for wearing his sword while dancing. If the head of any family, smothering his rage, expressed his deep regret that his womenkind were unable to attend, and humbly prayed their Majesties to excuse them, forthwith Peter despatched his servants, or officers of the household, and compelled these recusants of the new order of things to come to the entertainment to which they had been bidden. The coiffeurs, the modistes, and other artistes in the needs of fashion were invited to settle in the Russian capital, with promise of especial privileges. Katinka patronized them lavishly, and the ladies of her court followed suit. She had cast off forever her coarse woollen coats, and was now always draped with richest silks, wrapped in choice furs, and decked with gold and jewels rare. Emancipated woman, reconciled to the strangeness of liberty, soon made the fullest use of it. And many a benediction was fervently invoked by rosy lips on the domestic-reforming czar, while many a

* It had hitherto been customary for them to see each other for the first time at the ceremony of betrothal.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

curse on him, deeply growled, issued from between the clenched teeth of discomfited lords and masters. Peter is said to have established and edited at this time a Russian newspaper, but we are not told whether it contained any fashionable court news. Its circulation must indeed have been limited, whatever its contents, as few, very few, were then able to read.

During Peter's Persian campaign, in 1722, he suffered greatly from an internal complaint; but he refused medical aid, and his extreme intemperance considerably increased his disorder. Its attacks became henceforth more frequent and more intensely painful. The agony he endured made him even more than usually violent, and almost constant delirium ensued; until at last his strong frame gave way, and the struggle ended in death, on the 28th of January 1725. He was fifty-two years of age, and had reigned twenty-three — for some years conjointly with Ivan and under the regency of the Princess Sophia. It is considered doubtful whether Peter intended that Catherine should succeed him as reigning empress. His son Alexis, by his first marriage, had been condemned by him to be beheaded, but died (by poison it is believed) in his prison on the day preceding that named for his execution. He had been disinherited some years before, after the birth of Catherine's son, who died in his childhood. But the wretched Alexis (the counterpart of his father in his grossness and vices, but wanting his energy and ability) had left a son, who at Peter's death was nine years of age. Some expressions of remorse uttered by the dying czar in his few lucid moments seemed to indicate a desire to atone for his barbarity, as a father, by a last act of justice to his grandson. However, the final attack of his painful complaint came upon him more suddenly and severely than before, and was of shorter duration. It was, indeed, slanderously whispered that Catherine (to revenge the inhuman infliction of capital punishment on her favorite chamberlain, Möens de la Croix, of whom the czar was furiously jealous) had had a hand in shortening Peter's sufferings. By his deathbed stood his most trusted minister and Catherine's firm friend, the wealthy and powerful Prince Menschikoff, and with him Archbishop Théophane of Pliskoff, the former raised by Peter from the position of a workman to that of a prince of the empire, general of the armies, and first minister of state. These witnesses of the great autocrat's death interpreted the broken sentences he gasped forth — "remettez à — rendez tout" — and his ineffectual attempt to write what he could not speak, as the expression of his wish that Catherine should succeed him, and the Archbishop of Novgorod, who crowned her, sanctioned it. For several hours his death was kept secret, to enable Menschikoff to take measures for insuring the widow's succession to the throne. The people had sworn to accept the sovereign elected by Peter to reign over them. The regiment of "Chevaliers de la Czarina" immediately declared for her, and the army generally followed their example. She was popular with the troops. They had received many proofs of her kindness and good-will when she accompanied the czar on his military expeditions. She had then rendered them the services of a vivandière, and bandaged their wounds, after Peter, who was his own army surgeon (he had acquired in Holland some knowledge of surgery), had handled his lancet, or reduced a dislocation. Thus supported, Menschikoff informed the nation of the death of the czar, and proclaimed the accession of the czarina — "the daring and promptitude of a journeyman pastry-cook," as was said at the time, "quietly, and without a word of opposition, seating a Livonian peasant servant-maid on the throne of all the Russias." Into Catherine's hands he put the sceptre, but took into his own the government of the country.

Menschikoff was a man wholly destitute of culture, and naturally rough-mannered and boorish; but he was active-minded, energetic, and full of resource — a genius somewhat after the pattern of Peter, yet less ferocious, and possessing a power, wanting in the czar, of assuming a certain air of dignity and adapting his demeanor in some measure to the importance of the high office he filled. Honors had been heaped upon him for his great military and other services, and he had been permitted to amass enormous wealth. His serfs might be counted by tens of thousands, his roubles by millions, the value of his diamonds, jewels, and plate at the same rate, and his landed estates were so extensive that he could have crossed Russia from Riga on the shores of the Baltic to the Caspian Sea without leaving his own domains. While Catherine lived, Menschikoff held absolute sway in her realm, and generally he aimed at carrying out the views of the late czar. Many banished families were recalled from Siberia by the czarina's desire; the long arrears due to the troops were paid, and many of

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Peter's atrociously inhuman punishments were, by her order, altogether abolished. Reading and writing were accomplishments that neither she nor her minister possessed. Her daughter Elizabeth read and signed for her all the State papers that Menschikoff's confidential secretary had, under his orders, prepared.

Catherine the First was not an ambitious woman. Her handsome face and fine figure had first attracted Peter's attention; her vivacity, her invariable good-humor, her ready comprehension of his plans, and, when able, her desire to aid in developing them, gained her his lasting affection and favor. Accompanying him in his various military expeditions, she had led a very hard life in her early days, and while the vigilant eyes of her master were upon her she was active in her habits, diligent in the performance of the new duties of her station, and cheerful in temper; but when they were closed in death and she was invested with sovereign power, Catherine did not rise to the occasion, but degenerated sadly. She had been accustomed to sip brandy and Tokay with Peter, who would hand her his goblet to partake of his liquor, but did not allow a separate one to be filled for her — he liked abstemiousness in women though he did not approve of it for himself. Smoking, to some extent, is a national habit, but Catherine, now unrestrained, took to brandy-drinking and smoking to excess, and sloth and intemperance soon made inroads on her already much-tried constitution. At her balls there was more drinking than dancing. Dissipation reigned unchecked at her court, and soon all decency was banished. The nobles and ministers began to murmur, and to ask why for this low-born, profligate woman their lawful sovereign, the son of Alexis, should be deprived of his rights? The absolute authority wielded by Menschikoff also displeased them; it even gave offence to the officers of the army, of which he was commander-in-chief. Plots and intrigues were rife. Catherine would probably have been deposed, but disease, brought on by her shameful excesses, ended her career, after a reign of little more than two years, on the 18th of May, 1727. She availed herself of her power to elect her successor, and would gladly have left the imperial diadem to her minister Menschikoff, but he forbade it. He knew that a storm was already brewing over his head, and, anxious to escape from it, recommended the czarina to make a will naming the grand duke Peter Alexowitch to succeed her — in accordance with the wishes of the court and army — and with her own implied if not actually expressed promise, intended to conciliate opponents, when she first addressed the nobles and ministers as their sovereign. Catherine followed his advice, concluding her testament with motherly counsels and cautions to the youthful czar, then eleven years of age, and enjoining him to marry Menschikoff's daughter, Maria. Thus she hoped to secure the continuance in power of her own and Peter the First's favorite minister; though the czar, according to the document called his will, had recommended that future sovereigns of Russia should choose wives from among the princesses of the German courts, in order to avoid the many inconveniences to the State that arose from marrying their own subjects.

No sooner was the boy Peter the Second seated on the throne than he fell into the hands of the Dolgorouki family, of the old aristocracy. Dolgorouki and Osterman, who had been Menschikoff's colleagues under Peter and Catherine, envied the chief minister his influence and power. The time was now come to cabal against him, and to achieve his downfall, and for this purpose they employed the means which were to have helped him to retain his sway of the empire. They contrived to introduce to the young czar a rival playmate to Maria, in the person of Catherine Dolgorouki, a pretty little lively girl two years his junior, and a desperate little coquette. Peter and Maria had shown no inclination for each other's society. The enemies of Menschikoff had secretly told the boy that Maria was destined to be his wife, and he, in consequence, had begun to look upon her with much suspicion and awe; while she, poor child, to whom her parents had given similar hints, was rather afraid of Peter, and made him a very dull playmate. But when little laughing Katinka skipped on the scene, she soon seduced the czar of all the Russias from his allegiance. He was greatly taken with her, and, sad to say, she scornfully turned up her little nose at Maria, who was two years older than herself, and of the same discreet age as the czar. He too flouted the supposed bride-elect, who was fain to dissolve into tears as the thoughtless and heartless young couple, with the sauciest air in the world, flirted and danced together at the juvenile balls and entertainments, then first given at the palace for the amusement of this shameless young autocrat.

This little comedy, so amusing to the

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

children, and no less so to many of the elders who looked on, had the effect on Menschikoff that was intended by those who had helped to get it up — it greatly annoyed the arbitrary minister. Some hasty expressions were construed into threats, and complained of to the Senate — a council composed of the ministers and a certain number of the nobles, and established by Catherine at the suggestion of Menschikoff, to advise her on difficult questions of State. His enemies also accused him of appropriating the finances of the country, and the accusation was most probably well founded. But it was customary in Russia during the last century, and maybe well into the present one, for a set of men out of office who saw a chance of displacing those who were in, to bring charges against them of peculation; not that they cared to prevent the plundering of the State, their object was to succeed to the vacant places and take their turn at plundering too. Menschikoff, therefore, paid the ordinary penalty of being too wealthy and powerful. If his enormous riches were ill-gotten, he had now to give them up. His sumptuous palaces and vast estates were confiscated. His gold and silver plate, his diamonds and rare gems, his pictures and valuable objets d'art (his tastes were far more artistic than those of the shipwright czar, his style of living far more sumptuous) were seized, ostensibly for transfer to the imperial treasury; but the spoil passed through many hands, and was much diminished in bulk before reaching the coffers of the State. Finally, Menschikoff was degraded, and with his wife and family banished to Beresov, on an allowance of a few roubles per day. His spirit was deeply wounded, bowed to the earth, by this stroke of ill-fortune. Amidst the snows of Siberia he seems to have felt deeply the vanity of earthly hopes and human wishes, for he turned his thoughts to religion, and strove to find resignation to his fate in acts of piety, and in endeavoring to reconcile his family, by his own example, to their lot of poverty and toil. He labored with others in felling trees in the forest for the erection of a wooden chapel, and when it was finished performed some of the lay offices in it. Still, the crushed hopes of his vast ambition lay heavy on his mind, and the severity of the climate so much affected the shattered health of the old general that in 1729, less than two years from his arrival in that ice-bound land, he died, having supported disgrace with a dignified humility strongly contrasting with the haughty pride with which he had borne his honors. At about the same time Peter the Second was carried off by an attack of malignant small-pox. He was the last of the male line of the Romanoff family, and his short reign ended before he had completed his fourteenth year. The two brothers Dolgorouki were then all-powerful in the government, and had the young czar lived to attain his majority, little Katinka, it has been said, would have had a fair chance of becoming his czarina. But fate willed it otherwise, and the next turn of fortune's wheel doomed her father to set out for that snowy grave of so many of the Russian nobility in the "half-dark land" to which he had so greatly contributed to send his former colleague, Menschikoff.

In Februrary 1730 the younger Dolgorouki and two other nobles arrived at Mittau to inform the duchess of Courland, Anne Ivanowna, daughter of Ivan, half-brother of Peter the First, that, as the female representative of the elder branch of the Romanoffs, she had been elected by the Senate to the vacant throne of Russia, and the army was said to have approved the choice of the Senate. Unwilling, however, again to allow the uncontrolled power exercised by the czars to be placed in a woman's hands, a council, independent of the Senate, had been formed of seven nobles, by whom all decrees of the sovereign were to be approved before they could take effect. Dolgorouki was at the head of it, and laid before the duchess, together with the offer of the crown, the conditions she was required to subscribe to. "She could impose no taxes, make no gift of crown lands; could neither declare war nor conclude peace; must not appoint her successor, or take a second husband, but by the permission of this despotic and irresponsible council." The duchess Anne hesitated to accept the sovereignty with so mere a shadow of power as was left to her, and the more so as her secretary and favored lover, the notorious John Ernest Biren, whose ruffianly character and dangerous influence over her were too well known, was strictly prohibited from entering Russia.

The selection of the seven nobles to form the new council had given satisfaction only to those who were nominated its members. The disappointed candidates immediately protested that no such council was needed, and, according to Russian custom, secretly set about thwarting its objects. Their communications to the duchess resulted in an arrangement that

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd induced her to accede without further hesitation to the terms proposed by the council. Great preparations were made at St. Petersburg for receiving her there with due honor, and her coronation at Moscow was more splendid than any that had preceded it. As duchess of Courland, the empress Anne had long been accustomed to comparative refinement, and to a tone of good breeding very different from what had hitherto characterized Russian court life; the coarse, boorish habits of which underwent a marked change for the better from the period of her accession.* She was an extremely handsome woman, of the Russian type of beauty; tall and of fine commanding figure; very courteous and polished in manner, but a thorough Russian in duplicity of character. The first act of the autocratrix was to abolish the newly-established council of seven, and, seated on the throne, she announced in her manifesto that she reigned over "all the Russias" by hereditary right alone, and recognized no power in the Senate to elect her. She then appointed her own ministers, and summoned her lover, Biren, from Courland, to place him at the head of them, and that post the brutal tyrant retained throughout the ten years of Anne's reign.

Biren was a native of Courland, and of obscure origin; a fact very displeasing to him, and a stigma — as he regarded it when he rose in the world — which he strove to efface by writing himself "De Biron," claiming descent from the distinguished French family of that name, and assuming their arms. He was not deficient in talent, and had acquired some elementary education, which, aided by much shrewdness and a strikingly handsome person, won for him the post of secretary to the duchess Anne, whose affections, by his apparent devotion to her, he succeeded in gaining. The influence of his imperial mistress with the nobles of the duchy, together with her newly-acquired power as czarina, of employing Russian troops to enforce her wishes, procured her favorite's election to the ducal sovereignty; while, through the lamentable infatuation that led her to give the supreme power into Biren's hands, she also placed over Russia a barbarous despot, whose numerous atrocities were scarcely surpassed by those of the inhuman monster Ivan the Terrible. It was partly to appease him that the empress so speedily abolished the council of seven, for Dolgorouki had deeply wounded his pride. When the prince arrived at Mittau and was about to announce the elevation of the duchess Anne to the throne, he observed standing at the farther end of her apartment a man of slovenly attire, and supposing him to be a servant, requested that he might be ordered to withdraw. The haughty Biren immediately turned towards the prince with defiant gestures, and crossing the room seated himself by the side of the duchess. The astonished and indignant Dolgorouki, accustomed to the slavish obedience of serfs, angrily seized the presumptuous stranger by the arm, and would have ejected him by force had not Anne, in great trepidation, gasped out, "Monsieur de Biron, my secretary." Dolgorouki released him, and silently returned to his seat. Biren, without uttering a word — probably aware that opportunity would soon offer of better showing his resentment by deeds — in sullen rage left the room. Very soon after the coronation of the empress, Dolgorouki was on his way to Siberia; three others, princes of the empire, were beheaded; two other members of the council were shut up for life in the dungeons of a fortress, and the seventh was broken on the wheel. Thus was the council of seven effectually disposed of; and thus was the vengeance of an empress's favorite sated.

The empress Anne was naturally of a humane disposition, but her passionate and degrading love for the inhuman Biren made her the mere slave of his will — a slave more abject than the most oppressed of Russian women had ever been to a tyrant master. By the stroke of her pen she could have instantly consigned him to the dungeon and scaffold he so richly merited; but with more than weakest woman's weakness she dared not risk incurring his displeasure by using, even when she most earnestly wished it, her prerogative of showing mercy when he had pitilessly and unjustly condemned, and her heart was bleeding for his victims. It seems incredible, yet writers of the time assert that to obtain the reversal of some cruel decree, "l'impératrice se mettait souvent à genoux devant lui pour l'adoucir; mais les prières et les larmes de cette princesse ne pouvaient le toucher."

* When Peter the First married his niece Anne to the duke of Courland, the wedding guests were compelled to do honor to the auspicious event by excessive feasting and drinking. The bridegroom, while endeavoring to vie with Peter in the number of his draughts of brandy from the "great eagle of Russia," fell senseless on the floor and died. Peter then claimed Courland for Anne, and the Courlanders, having no army, submitted, and became eventually one of "the Russias."

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

But while Biren inaugurated her reign with the wholesale banishment and butchery of her subjects, the empress, who was fond of pleasure and magnificence, gave balls and entertainments whose gaiety and splendor delighted and astonished the boorish Russian court, and in some measure reconciled them to the arbitrary rule of her favorite. With true Russian servility they crouched to the execrable minion then in power, and, while he was shedding the best blood of their country, bent the knee to him, and to curry favor with him kissed the iron rod he wielded and the blood-stained hand that held it. No wonder that coarseness and brutality should so long have been the chief characteristics of the Russian people, when the atrocities and horrors of each succeeding reign opposed so effectual a barrier to the entry of civilization even into the life of the court. It has been affirmed that the character of the empress Anne herself became deteriorated and her bearing lost something of its dignity after she had filled for a few years the imperial throne. Ambassadors and travellers of note of that day have described the dazzling splendor of her court as unequalled by any in Europe. Yet inebriety and consequent brawls, even in the presence of the empress, often marred the most sumptuous of her fêtes; and from beneath all the glitter and pomp then so ostentatiously displayed Muscovite grossness and barbarity constantly peeped forth. Of a ball given in January 1734 the account states that

Along the sides of the spacious saloons, and filling the atmosphere with their mingled sweet odors, were ranged rows of orange-trees in blossom and myrtles in bloom. Arbors, over which were twined the jessamine and honeysuckle, were placed in shaded nooks, and beneath them were mossy banks and seats of fresh turf — an enchanter's wand seemingly having brought from a southern clime the flowers, fruits, and scenery of summer, to place them in freshest bloom and beauty amidst the frozen snows of the north. The empress was magnificently dressed, her robes glittering with diamonds. She looked remarkably handsome, and her mien was most gracious. Many of the ladies also displayed magnificent jewels, splendid dresses, and much beauty, and the nobles and great officers made no mean contribution to the show, in the blaze of jewelled orders with which they were decorated. Amongst the guests were ambassadors from China — the only instance of a Chinese embassy having appeared at a European court. And they proved themselves not bad courtiers, as, in reply to the empress's question, which of the ladies present he thought the most beautiful, the chief ambassador said that "on nights when the firmament was full of brilliant stars it was very difficult to decide which star shone most brilliantly."

Under the reign of Anne, Russia made considerable advance in material greatness. The empress aimed at carrying out in her domestic policy the plans of Peter the First. She encouraged skilled artificers from foreign countries to settle in Russia and promoted the establishment of manufactories of woollen and silk goods. The Ladoga canal, begun by Peter for the purpose of facilitating the furnishing of supplies to St. Petersburg, was completed in her reign, and the army was brought to a state of much greater efficiency, under Bouchard, a severe disciplinarian, known as "le feld-maréchal de Munich." He was a Dane, and at the age of seventeen began his military career in the service of the prince of Hesse-Darmstadt, and afterwards served under Prince Eugène and Marlborough. His hasty temper and impatience of Biren's interference in military matters, of which he was entirely ignorant, often dangerously provoked the ire of that great personage, and would speedily have brought condign punishment on Munich, but for the difficulty experienced in finding an equally able commander-in-chief to succeed him. It was Munich who first introduced a corps of engineers into the Russian army, and by his successes in Poland enabled Anne to set up a king there subservient to Russia, and in defiance of the French. Aided by his second in command, General Lacy, he took Azof and invaded the Crimea — for Anne eagerly desired to recover the places that Peter the First had been forced to give up at the peace of Pruth, and to give Russia a southern seaboard. Austria was allied with Russia in this expedition, but her troops were so thoroughly beaten by the Turks that she sued for a separate peace. Single-handed, Russia was unable to continue the war — so heavy had been her losses in men and treasure, and in the utter devastation of various parts of the country. She therefore thought it prudent to propose negotiation to the Turks, and in 1739 peace was concluded — all the Russian conquests being again restored to Turkey. These four years of unsuccessful warfare cost Russia not less than one hundred thousand men and many millions of roubles.

Meanwhile, Biren had been despatching his thousands also — some to the scaffold, others to Siberia. The greater part of these perished in the inclement land of

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

exile from misery and starvation, or died on the road, unable to support the hardships and fatigues of the journey. It has been computed that during the ten years' reign of the empress Anne, at least fifteen thousand persons felt the effects of her miscreant favorite's tyranny, either in some terribly barbarous death, torturing punishment, or Siberian exile. The confiscated lands and other property of these unhappy persons, together with the plunder of the State, had made him the wealthiest man in Russia, and probably in Europe. So great was the ascendency he had acquired that men of all ranks trembled before him. When "his Highness the Duc de Biron of Courland" passed with his retinue through the streets, the people on foot fled, lest his evil eye should fall on them. Carriages drew up and their occupants alighted to salute him, with bared and bowed heads, as he passed. Foreign ministers did not disdain to kiss his hand, or at the state banquets to pledge him, with effusive sentiment, in overflowing goblets of wine.

In 1739 the princess Anne, daughter of the Duchess of Mecklenburg, the elder sister of the empress, was married to Prince Antony, brother of the reigning duke of Brunswick. The young couple, at the invitation of the empress, who then proposed to nominate her niece her successor, came to reside at the Russian capital. But in the following year a son was born to them. He was named Ivan, and christened according to the rites of the Greek Church. This great-grandson of the grand duke Ivan the empress now proclaimed her heir-apparent, with the hope of prolonging the reign of her favorite, or probably at his command. She named Biren regent in the event of Ivan succeeding to the imperial throne in his minority. This decree was made October 18, 1740, the child being then two months old. Ten days afterwards, quite unexpectedly, the empress died.

Biren immediately assumed the title of "his Highness the regent," and began his reign by summarily putting out of the way a batch of persons whose presence about the court was offensive to him. He also separated the baby-czar, Ivan the Sixth, from his parents, and thus raised up for himself two mortal enemies. He had, besides, a host of others, who long before would have taken vengeance upon him, had not the ineradicable veneration of Russians for a high-handed sovereign restrained them. No time was lost by the prince and princess in concerting measures with Osterman, the dissatisfied chief minister, and with Marshal de Munich, the equally dissatisfied head of the army, for the downfall of the tyrant. In the month of November, and on the twenty-first day of his reign, a party of fifty guards, under an officer Munich could rely upon, silently entered the palace. At midnight they seized his Highness in his bed, and conveyed him to the fortress of Schlusselburg. After some months of strict confinement and the confiscation of the whole of his enormous wealth to the State, he was condemned, not, as he had condemned so many, to be maimed, mutilated, beheaded, and burned, but to banishment for life to Pelim — a wretched Siberian village, indebted to him for its miserable population, who received him when he arrived among them with the scorn and derision he deserved.

The princess Anne succeeded to the regency. Prince Antony desired to share in the government, but Anne, who thought her husband less competent to rule than herself, would not allow of his interference in affairs of State. Disputes arose between them in consequence, though otherwise they are said to have been an affectionate couple. The Russian nobles looked jealously upon them as foreigners, and were little disposed to favor the claims of young Ivan, with the prospect of a troubled minority of seventeen years before him. As usual, too, there were many scheming hangers-on of the court eagerly looking forward to the next turn of the imperial kaleidoscope to bring them, as they hoped, the chance of more prominent places in the new arrangement of its parts. But the regency of the princess Anne dragged on, amidst general murmuring and discontent, yet a few months longer, when a court intrigue, the chief promoter of which was L'Estorq, a man of French extraction, and the physician of the princess Elizabeth, younger daughter of Peter and Catherine the First, brought it suddenly to an end. Though residing at St. Petersburg since the death of her mother, Elizabeth had held but little intercourse with either the empress Anne or the princess-regent, and rarely appeared at court. The daughter and granddaughter of the elder branch of the Romanoffs looked coolly and haughtily upon the illegitimate daughter of the peasant Catherine. It was considered that she had no claim to the throne, and she had evinced no desire to reign. She had inherited the vicious propensities indulged in by her mother in the latter part of her

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

life, but none of the force of character she had shown in her earlier days, and apparently was content to live in retirement in luxury and indolence. When, however, L'Estorq and others whispered to her of her right to reign, and confided their plans to her, she very readily acquiesced in them.

A part of the army being gained over, on December 5, 1741, a regiment surrounded the palace, and a strong guard was placed over the prince and princess of Brunswick. The party of soldiers who had orders to seize the person of the young czar found him sleeping in his cradle, and, strangely enough, considering the nature of their errand, waited respectfully until the poor babe had had his nap out. They then conveyed him to Elizabeth, who took him in her arms and kissed and caressed him. She had already been brought by L'Estorq to the palace, and the soldiers and people assembled outside were then expressing their joy at the success of the revolution in loud acclamations and vivas for the empress. The child's attention was caught by the noise, and he laughed gleefully. "Poor child!" exclaimed Elizabeth, with well-feigned emotion. "Alas! you know not that those cries which so delight you express the joy of those who have deprived you of your throne." She then gave him into the charge of the officer who was to convey him and his parents to the fortress of Schlusselburg, there to remain till the further pleasure of the new empress should be made known respecting them.

C. C. J.

From The Examiner.

CONCEIT.

It would be difficult to name a vice so innocent towards others as conceit. Your impatience, your apathy, your fretfulness, your carelessness, your garrulity, your extravagance, all these, almost all faults and foibles in the catalogue of human imperfection, have it inevitable to them to inflict harms and vexations on people you have to do with; your conceit leaves them never a whit the worse. And yet there is nothing man resents so much as conceit in his fellow-man. The display of it arouses an aggressive desire for the reformation of the offender which can only be satiated by his miserable abashment, and to that end many will take over a mere casual acquaintance an amount of trouble which few would think worth while for the cure of downright depravity in any person in whom they had not the immediate interest of near kinship or responsible connection. While there is a watchful delicacy about even alluding to any other mental or moral defect in the presence of a person known to be one of those possessing it, or rather possessed by it, not only politeness but reasonable kindness is constantly set aside without compunction for the sake of giving the conceited the giftie of seeing themselves as ithers see them — with their least softening spectacles on. One would think it need not matter much to any one of us if our friend has more admiration for himself than we have for him; yet his error is one which it is scarcely in human nature to tolerate, and for him charity bears the pedagogue's whip. It is every man's mission to inflict wholesome discipline for his good on the conceited man.

It might be supposed that the peculiar annoyance, as if from some impertinence to ourselves personally, caused by other people's conceit, is from its bringing with it a sense of offence against our own. The sinner is, we might take it, by overrating his gifts, disavowing our superiority or claiming a vexatious equality; or, if what he thinks much of in himself is something which we do not at all possess, his merit must, in his own mind at all events, go to prove our deficiency. And probably some of the resentment against conceit does have its source in this feeling; and, where the conceit has in it, beyond its own mere unalloyed self-gratulation, the ill flavors of arrogance and assumption, the resentment against it will consciously derive much from such a source. But a homœopathic conflict of conceit against conceit does not account for all. Else why are teachers, and even parents, so apt to use against this particular fault an asperity and bitterness which might seem more fitly measured to larger faults which go overlooked? — why do they so commonly infuse a sort of spitefulness into their rebukes and their hints? — why do they feel in the culprit's mortification a pleasure akin to cruelty which would be far enough from them if the mortification had been never so well deserved by naughtiness? It is amusing to see the care with which parents who never think of keeping watch for the young upshooting of other ill weeds guard against the tiniest growth of what might come to be conceit. Generally the plan taken is to snub the clever children and to tell the pretty ones they are plain. Not much comes of it in

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

any way; and good cannot come. When there is any result, it is usually a morbid self-depreciation — conceit gangrened and driven inward — which, though a less irritating phase of the malady to other people, is infinitely more harmful in lessening the usefulness as well as the happiness of the sufferer. But oftenest the clever and the pretty find themselves out betimes, and, seeing through the improvingly meant dispraises practised upon them, take them as compliments and are the more able to appreciate their gifts and graces. If their minds are actively and wholesomely employed they will be none the worse for the knowledge. To be honestly aware of advantages, to feel a pleasure in their possession even, need no more be conceit than is the swallow's confidence and pleasure in its power of flight.

Real conceit seems to be partly the over-estimation of what one is, and therefore of what one does, and partly the living, as it were, before a looking-glass taking notice of one's self. Sometimes the over-estimation may be only apparent; the capacity one supposes in one's self may have really existed, may still exist, but the time which should have gone to cultivating and developing it has gone in admiring it; it has been frittered away in little exhibitions, and has dwindled for want of pains to make it more. Bystanders, seeing no signs of it, believe it never was but as an hallucination of demented vanity; but it did once have its place as a rational prompting to the exercise of a faculty, and it is possible that the faculty may have been worth exercising. The chattering sciolist, the half-skilled, superfluous dilettante, may have had in them so much instinctive ability as, with the plodding zeal of humility, goes to make sound philosophers and competent artists. They were right, perhaps, in thinking they could get over the racecourse, but they kept stopping on the way to pat their heads and give themselves sugarplums, and so they never got near the goal. Unhappily, such runners are apt to believe in their capabilities for the extremest prowess, just because they have never at any time tested their strength to the full. What they have done they have done with such ease that surely a little effort would make them a match for the best. Something in them, they know not what — a genius which cannot bear harness, a nobility of nature which forbids descent into the arena of competition, a divine indolence, an ethereal carelessness — something, in fact, whatever it be, which is unpractical but exceedingly superior, has hindered them of craftsman's excellence. These superlunary beings descend not to the menial steadiness of a Whewell, a Tennyson, a Huxley, a Millais: they are comets, air-plants, all sorts of erratic wild flowers, uncatalogued stars, anything that cannot be calculated upon and goes its own way uselessly. Nobody is so possessed of a lyre, a soul, a genius, a star, as the occasional poet incapably ferocious against grammar and petulant at metre. A plain-sailing Shakespeare, or Milton, or so, has little enough of such extra-human inspiration to boast; but the amount of respectable gentlemen and ladies who are guided and gifted by such consummate influences is past the multiplication table. Something gets in their way to even penny-a-liner publicity; and they are scarcely likely to perceive that the something is conceit.

Yet, do we know what is conceit? Can we tell who, of the youthful, is under its blight? No little boy could be more liable to be accused of it by rational creatures than the little boy who saw a picture which, of course, he could no more have painted than he could have jumped over the moon, and cheerfully remarked, "Anch' io son pittore." By-and-by it turned out that he was right. But if circumstances had been adverse — if he had never got a chance of learning to mix the colors and the vehicles the right way — would he have been conceited because he never became a successful painter? Would the prompting have been less genuine because opportunity failed?

The doggrel that is written! the daubs that are painted! and all under the youthful inspiration that feels a power none looking at the execution can discern. Are we to see in such immature confidence only conceit? Or, if it be conceit that nerves young boneless creatures to enterprises of a Hercules, in which they fail, and leaves them after failure ready to begin again, and try, try, try, till they fail past their strength to rise again, as the million do, or with final gasps rise again and triumph, as the dozen do — then, if this be conceit, as doubtless it is, let us thank God for conceit, and be a little lenient even to the simpletons in whom conceit is but an enervating mistake. Conceit in the young means the possibility of immortal success, of ludicrous failure. If there were no conceit among the young, what would there be for the world but decent, self-seeking, so much per cent. respectability? For the gain of the future, for kindly pity's sake to-day, let us be a little more lenient to conceit than we are, remembering that, if without it there need be no bathos of presumption in the dust, there could be no ascension of low-born greatness to the heights.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

From Vanity Fair.

HOLIDAYS.

THE praise of holidays has been so favorite a theme of late in this busy land of ours, and they have been so increased in number not only by practice but even by act of Parliament, that we seem to be in some danger of coming to the state of Spain as described by the Irishman who said, "It is a country where to-day is always to-morrow, and that is a holiday." The multiplication of blank days may be a mark of "civilization," or it may be merely a trades-union device, by which the stockbrokers and bankers of an enlightened legislature prevent other stockbrokers and bankers from doing the business they do not wish to do themselves; but it is assuredly not an unmixed good, and when, as at Easter-time, the severer attacks of holiday set in, many who regard it as an unmixed evil may be easily excused. There are men who when they see the newspapers putting forth advertisements of excursion trains, and behold vans full of rowdy men and women, blasting the morning air with cornets horribly out of tune, feel impelled straightway to take to their bed and not to get up again until the holidays are past and over and work once more begins. It is not that they grudge the people their "outing" in Epping Forest, Hampton Court Park, or further afield, nor that they entertain any scruples as to the drunkenness in which these excursions always end for the men, or the accidents of another kind which commonly result for the women — on the contrary, they are well disposed towards holiday-making; what they object to is that everybody should make holiday altogether; they are all for cakes and ale and junketing, but they would have cakes and ale consumed turn and turn about. In short, what they feel as a misfortune is not the holiday itself, but the generality of it, the holiday by act of Parliament which forces all men to join in it at one and the same time, instead of each man taking it at a different time. And they point to the effect of the general holiday as amply justifying their objections.

The first result is that the whole workday life of the country is forcibly stopped. As matters now stand there are four days together at Easter during which no man can get a cheque cashed or a coat sent home, or any of those things done which tradesmen exist to do. If he would buy anything the shop is closed; if he would write a letter the post-office would break down in its delivery; and if, in despair, he decides to leave town, there is not a cab to be had, and the railway, if ever he reaches it, is choked with excursionists, each one of whom seems to have two babies and a dozen paper bags, and to be so muddled that they throw the paper bags about the carriages and the stations instead of the babies. When he gets to the country, instead of peace and quiet he finds more excursionists, and more paper bags and babies; but there is no help for it anywhere, and he passes his miserable four days cursing Sir John Lubbock and the collective wisdom of Parliament, which in the attempt to make all men happy by holidays has only made the greater number idle and drunken, and the rest miserable and helpless. Then perhaps he thinks of that same collective wisdom refusing, as it always has, to open the museums on the Sunday, which is the proper and, if rightly dealt with, would be the sufficient holiday of the masses — and, thus thinking, he is led by his wrongs to wish that the collective wisdom had but one head that he might punch it at a blow.

Nobody can pretend that this is a proper or desirable frame of mind for an inoffensive and amiable person to be brought to; nevertheless it is to that frame of mind that many hundreds of those who have the misfortune to be stigmatized as "the upper classes" have been brought during this very past week in consequence of these holidays which have made Easter a season of as great tribulation as Christmas itself. It is probably inevitable that holidays should come. They come badly enough every Saturday afternoon; they come also every Sunday, and they come at Easter, at Whitsuntide, and at Christmas, besides other times. Now each set of these holidays involves not only the holiday itself, but also a preceding and succeeding stage of idleness, riot, and drunkenness, of days when shops are closed, when trains don't arrive, when letters are delayed, and cheques can't be cashed. If these things must be, and if it is absolutely necessary that everybody should idle, riot, and get drunk simultaneously, it would be far better to lump up all the holidays together — to join in one, Easter, Christmas, Whitsuntide, the half-Satur-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

days, the bank holidays, and all the rest, and so build up one big annual saturnalia and there an end. By this means we should know what to expect and when to expect it, and should make our preparations to go abroad accordingly, instead of being always unexpectedly and suddenly brought up as we now are by constantly recurring holidays which scarcely leave a man time to get sober before he is bound by act of Parliament to get drunk again.

From Temple Bar.

THE YEOMAN'S STORY.

Is it you, old neighbor and friend? I'm here in the dark alone;
I wasn't noticing much how sombre the room had grown.
I know by the grasp of your hand the things that you want to say,
But I'd rather you shouldn't say them — at least till another day.

Yes, Will, he has gone at last. My darling is really dead;
All I had left in the world, and I haven't a tear to shed!
Give me your arm — there's the moon there, full over the apple-trees,
Let us walk and talk for a little — maybe it'll give me ease.

Will, you remember his mother? You must often have heard it said
There was never a prettier woman, nor one that held higher her head;
Yet only a village beauty, with cheeks like the month of May,
And a mother to slave for her dress, and a father to give her her way . . .

Philip was comely and tall, but I was richer than he;
Sometimes she liked Philip the best, and sometimes she seemed to like me.
She played fast and loose with us both, as only these young things can
Who fancy no sport so well as to toy with the heart of a man.

Well, Will, without bonnet or shawl she came to my house one night,
Said she had broken with Philip, and if I would have her I might.
Shall I ever forget that moment, when, shaking in every limb,
I seemed to hear music about me more solemn and sweet than a hymn?

We were married within the month, and Philip had gone away —
A happier man than I never looked on the light of day!
I whistled from morning to night, and was blithe as a bird on the wing,
Ah, lad! that a strong man's soul should hang on so weak a thing!

I don't remember exactly when first I noticed the change,
But I know that soon something struck me as not like herself, and strange;
Her dimples were not so deep, nor so round her little chin,
And her eyes grew brighter and brighter as her cheeks seemed hollowing in.

She watched my every turn with her large blue wistful eyes,
As though she had something to say — she was full of trouble and sighs;
I thought she was sick for a sight of the old folks down at the mill,
But she wouldn't go near her mother, and that made me uneasy, Will.

She fretted a deal at last, and the child when 'twas born wasn't strong;
But like the fool that I was, I didn't think what was wrong,
Till I came unawares upon her in the beech-copse yonder . . . she lay
In a heap . . . with a letter . . . from Philip . . . and sobbing her heart away.

It was well she died as she did; she was spared from a heavier fate,
For when he came home from sea, he came just a week too late:
The osiers were binding her bed, and the May rose had burst into bloom,
When I heard he was back in the village. 'Twas close on the evening gloom,

I had opened the churchyard gate, with an armful of lilac flowers
To deck out her grave a little (not green yet in spite of the showers),
When I paused without dropping the latch, for Philip was standing there
With his arms hanging down at his sides, and his lips on the work as in prayer.

I was sorry for him, right sorry — he was so stricken and wan;
His face when he lifted it up was the face of an agèd man;
The look that he gave when he saw me will never pass out of my sight,
But I couldn't give him my hand, Will, I couldn't, try as I might!

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

So you see I was left with the baby. Could you think such a little boy
Could grow all the world to me, my all of sorrow or joy?
No hands touched him but mine — don't smile, lad — I washed him, and fed,
And watched till he fell asleep every night by his cradle-bed.

I carried him in my arms, and played with his curly hair,
His eyes, the picture of hers, were sometimes hard to bear,
But I grew a better man, Will, than ever before I had been,
With her baby boy to live for, and her grave to keep neat and green.

'Tis wonderful, Will, these children, how soon they come to know!
It didn't seem any time before he could laugh and crow,
And stretch out his little arms when he saw me coming nigh —
The best child ever born, and never the one to cry!

Sometimes I used to lift the hem of his baby-clothes
And nurse his tiny feet, pinkish-white, like a wild hedge-rose,
And wonder through what rough paths they would tread in the years to come —
I didn't think then they'd be taking the safest and surest home. . . .

Three years old when he died! and just beginning to talk,
To prattle to Rover and me, and toddle about in the walk!
It makes you sometimes doubt if things are so right after all,
When the weeds are left to flourish, and the blossoms are made to fall.

You've some of your own at home — you'd like to see him maybe?
It can only do you good, Will, to think upon him and me!
You'll feel the goodness of God as you never felt it before
When the young ones hear your footsteps, and rush to the cottage-door!

Do you hear that moaning noise? It's Rover down in the yard;
I'd a mind to shoot him the morn, and yet 'twould be rather hard;
The boy was fond o' the dog, and the poor brute seems to know —
Being old, and scarce able to crawl, he misses my darling so!

That's his hat on the peg, and yonder his poor little toys —
It grieves me above a bit that I've ever been vexed at the noise;
Now I'd give worlds to hear it, even though it were ten times more —
O Will! how my heart sinks down as we come near the bedroom door! . . .

There he lies in his cot, so quiet and happy and still,
He looks more like his mother than ever I saw him, Will. . . .
What a selfish fool am I, to regret that he's gone from here,
For hasn't his face a smile, lad? and that's better sure than a tear!

Death is sweeter than life, and slumber is sweeter than pain.
'Tis such a hard fight, old man, and we have so little to gain!
Who knows what he might have come to had he lived to be old as we?
If life is a good thing, Will, 'tis a better thing not to be!

Those snowdrops he picked himself that he holds in his tiny hands,
Now he gathers the flowers of Paradise as clothed in white wings he stands
In the garden of God, looking upward to the throne of eternal grace,
With the light of ineffable love streaming down on the hush of his face.

Will, do you think he remembers? or has he forgotten it all?
The old dog crippled and blind, who always limped up at his call,
The pipe of the early thrushes, the bloom on the orchard-trees,
My face, that his eyes were fixed on when I took him to die on my knees?

O God! let him not forget me! Let him still remember, and wait,
And watch with a wistful longing when they open the golden gate;
Watch with a wistful longing till he sees me enter in,
Pure as a little child, and free forever from sin!

But the house, Will, the lonely acres, the poor little empty chair,
The picture-books unopened, the silence upon the stair?
How shall I listen o' nights to the moan of the winds on the hill?
And the rush of the rain from the skies? God! how I shall miss him, Will!

FLORENCE K. BERGER.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXII. | No. 1774.—June 15, 1878. | From Beginning, Vol. CXXXVII.

CONTENTS.

I.	The Greatness of the Romans. By Goldwin Smith,	Contemporary Review,	643
II.	The Death of the Duke de M——. From "The Nabob," by E. Daudet. Translated from the French,	Temple Bar,	653
III.	The Political Adventures of Lord Beaconsfield. Part II. From 1826 to 1837,	Fortnightly Review,	657
IV.	The Azores,	Fraser's Magazine,	668
V.	Macleod of Dare. By William Black. Part X.,	Advance Sheets,	677
VI.	Illustrations of the Acts from Recent Discoveries. By Canon Lightfoot,	Contemporary Review,	685
VII.	The House across the Street,	All The Year Round,	691
VIII.	How to Live on a Reduced Income,	Good Words,	699
IX.	The Letter "H": A Historical Conjecture,	Examiner,	703

POETRY.

Our Future Home: an Easter Hymn. By Dean Stanley, ... 642

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY

LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

For Eight Dollars, remitted directly to the Publishers, the Living Age will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of The Living Age is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of Littell & Gay.

Single Numbers of The Living Age, 18 cents.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

OUR FUTURE HOME:

AN EASTER HYMN.

BY DEAN STANLEY.

It has been thought that there may be a place for some expression, such as the following hymn or hymns endeavor to embody, of the prospect of another world, more hopeful than the touching address of the emperor Hadrian to his soul, less vague and material than Pope's graceful version of it in his well-known lines, "Vital spark of heavenly flame."

PART I.

I.

O FRAIL spirit — vital spark,
Trembling, toiling, rising, sinking,
Flickering bright mid shadows dark,
Spring of feeling, acting, thinking,
Central flame of smiles and tears,
Boundless hopes and wasting fears,
Whither wilt thou wend thy way,
When we close this mortal day?

II.

Shall the course of earthly joys
Still repeat their round forever,
Feasts and songs, and forms and toys,
Endless throbs of this life's fever?
Or, beyond these weary woes,
Shall we find a deep repose,
And, like dove that seeks her nest,
Flee away and be at rest?

III.

Dimly, through those shades unknown,
Gleams the fate that shall befall us;
Faintly, entering there alone,
Can we hear what voices call us;
Yet our spirit's inmost breath,
As we near the gates of death,
In that purer, larger air,
Thus may shape a worthier prayer: —

IV.

"Maker of the human heart,
Scorn not thou thine own creation,
Onward guide its nobler part,
Train it for its high vocation:
From the long-infected grain
Cleanse and purge each sinful stain;
Kindle with a kindred fire
Every good and great desire.

V.

"When in ruin and in gloom
Falls to dust our earthly mansion,
Give us ample verge and room
For the measureless expansion:
Clear our clouded mental sight
To endure thy piercing light,
Open wide our narrow thought
To embrace thee as we ought.

VI.

"When the shadows melt away,
And the eternal day is breaking,
Judge most just, be thou our stay
In that strange and solemn waking;
Thou to whom the heart sincere
Is thy best of temples here,
May thy faithfulness and love
Be our long last home above."

PART II.

VII.

"Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wings,
All thy better portion trace,
Rise from transitory things,
Heavenward to thy native place."*
Higher still and ever higher,
Let thy soaring flight aspire,
Toward the Perfectness Supreme,
Goal of saints' and sages' dream.

VIII.

There may we rejoicing meet
Loved and lost, our hearts' best treasures,
Not without surprises sweet
Mount with them to loftier pleasures;
Though the earthly bond be gone,
Yet the spirits still are one —
One in love, and hope, and faith;
One in all that conquers death.

IX.

And, in those celestial spheres,
Shall not then our keener vision
See, athwart the mist of years,
Through the barriers of division,
Holy soul and noble mind,
From their baser dross refined,
Heroes of the better land
Whom below we scorn'd and bann'd?

X.

May we wisely, humbly scan,
Face to face at last beholding,
Glimpses of the Son of Man,
All his grace and truth unfolding;
Through the ages still the same,
As of old on earth he came;
May our hope in him be sure,
To be pure as he is pure.

XI.

As we climb that steep ascent,
May the goodness and the glory,
Which to cheer our path were lent,
Seem but fragments of the story,
There to be unroll'd at length,
In its fulness and its strength,
Not with words that fade and die,
In the book of God Most High.

XII.

Through our upward pilgrimage,
Larger, deeper, lessons learning,
May we boldly page on page
Of diviner lore be turning;
May we still in labors blest
Never tire and never rest,
And with forces ever new Serve the Holy and the True.

Macmillan's Magazine. A. P. S.

* These four lines are taken, with two slight alterations, from the fine hymn of Robert Seagrave, 1748.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The Contemporary Review.

THE GREATNESS OF THE ROMANS.

ROME was great in arms, in government, in law. This combination was the talisman of her august fortunes. But the three things, though blended in her, are distinct from each other, and the political analyst is called upon to give a separate account of each. By what agency was this State, out of all the States of Italy, out of all the States of the world, elected to a triple pre-eminence, and to the imperial supremacy of which it was the foundation? By what agency was Rome chosen as the foundress of an empire which we regard almost as a necessary step in human development, and which formed the material, and to no small extent the political matrix of modern Europe, though the spiritual life of our civilization is derived from another source? We are not aware that this question has ever been distinctly answered, or even distinctly propounded. The writer once put it to a very eminent Roman antiquarian, and the answer was a quotation from Virgil —

Hoc nemus, hunc, inquit, frondoso vertice clivum
Quis deus incertum est, habitat Deus; Arcades ipsum
Credunt se vidisse Jovem cum sæpe nigrantem
Ægida concuteret dextra nimbosque cieret.

This perhaps was the best answer that Roman patriotism, ancient or modern, could give; and it certainly was given in the best form. The political passages of Virgil, like some in Lucan and Juvenal, have a grandeur entirely Roman with which neither Homer nor any other Greek has anything to do. But historical criticism, without doing injustice to the poetical aspect of the mystery, is bound to seek a rational solution. Perhaps in seeking the solution we may in some measure supply, or at least suggest the mode of supplying, a deficiency which we venture to think is generally found in the first chapters of histories. A national history, as it seems to us, ought to commence with a survey of the country or locality, its geographical position, climate, productions, and other physical circumstances as they bear on the character of the people. We ought to be presented, in short, with a complete description of the scene of the historic drama, as well as with an account of the race who are to be the actors. In the early stages of his development, at all events, man is mainly the creature of physical circumstance; and by a systematic examination of physical circumstance we may to some extent cast the horoscope of the infant nation as it lies in the arms of nature.

That the central position of Rome, in the long and narrow peninsula of Italy, was highly favorable to her Italian dominion, and that the situation of Italy was favorable to her dominion over the countries surrounding the Mediterranean, has been often pointed out. But we have yet to ask what launched Rome in her career of conquest, and, still more, what rendered that career so different from those of ordinary conquerors? What caused the empire of Rome to be so durable; what gave it so high an organization? what made it so tolerable, and even in some cases beneficent to her subjects? what enabled it to perform services so important in preparing the way for a higher civilization?

About the only answer that we get to these questions is race. The Romans, we are told, were by nature a peculiarly warlike race. "They were the wolves of Italy," says Mr. Merivale, who may be taken to represent fairly the state of opinion on this subject. We are presented in short with the old fable of the twins suckled by the she-wolf in a slightly rationalized form. It was more likely to be true, if anything, in its original form, for in mythology nothing is so irrational as rationalization. That unfortunate she-wolf with her twins has now been long discarded by criticism as a historical figure; but she still obtrudes herself as a symbolical legend into the first chapter of Roman history, and continues to affect the historian's imagination and to give him a wrong bias at the outset. Who knows whether the statue which we possess is a real counterpart of the original? Who knows what the meaning of the original statue was? If the group was of great antiquity, we may be pretty sure that it was not political or historic, but religious;

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

for primeval art is the handmaid of religion; historic representation and political portraiture belong generally to a later age. We cannot tell with certainty even that the original statue was Roman: it may have been brought to Rome among the spoils of some conquered city, in which case it would have no reference to Roman history at all. We must banish it entirely from our minds, with all the associations and impressions which cling to it, and we must do the same with regard to the whole of that cycle of legends woven out of misinterpreted monuments or customs, with the embellishments of pure fancy, which grouped itself round the apocryphal statues of the seven kings in the Capitol, aptly compared by Arnold to the apocryphal portraits of the early kings of Scotland in Holyrood, and those of the mediæval founders of Oxford in the Bodleian. We must clear our minds altogether of these fictions; they are not even ancient: they came into existence at a time when the early history of Rome was viewed in the deceptive light of her later achievements; when, under the influence of altered circumstances, Roman sentiment had probably undergone a considerable change; and when, consequently, the national imagination no longer pointed true to anything primeval.

Race, when tribal peculiarities are once formed, is a most important feature in history; those who deny this and who seek to resolve everything, even in advanced humanity, into the influence of external circumstances or of some particular external circumstance, such as food, are not less one-sided or less wide of the truth than those who employ race as the universal solution. Who can doubt that between the English and the French, between the Scotch and the Irish, there are differences of character which have profoundly affected and still affect the course of history? The case is still stronger if we take races more remote from each other, such as the English and the Hindoo. But the further we inquire, the more reason there appears to be for believing that peculiarities of race are themselves originally formed by the influence of external circumstances on the primitive tribe; that, however marked and ingrained they may be, they are not congenital and perhaps not indelible. Englishmen and Frenchmen are closely assimilated by education; and the weaknesses of character supposed to be inherent in the Irish gradually disappear under the more benign influences of the New World. Thus, by ascribing the achievements of the Romans to the special qualities of their race, we should not be solving the problem, but only stating it again in other terms.

But beside this, the wolf theory halts in a still more evident manner. The foster-children of the she-wolf, let them have never so much of their foster-mother's milk in them, do not do what the Romans did, and they do precisely what the Romans did not. They kill, ravage, plunder — perhaps they conquer and even for a time retain their conquests — but they do not found highly organized empires, they do not civilize, much less do they give birth to law. The brutal and desolating domination of the Turk which, after being long artificially upheld by diplomacy, is at last falling into final ruin, is the type of an empire founded by the foster-children of the she-wolf. Plunder, in the animal lust of which alone it originated, remains its law, and its only notion of imperial administration is a coarse division, imposed by the extent of its territory, into satrapies, which, as the central dynasty, enervated by sensuality, loses its force, revolt, and break up the empire. Even the Macedonian, pupil of Aristotle though he was, did not create an empire at all comparable to that created by the Romans. He overran an immense extent of territory, and scattered over a portion of it the seed of an inferior species of Hellenic civilization; but he did not organize it into an empire, much less did he give it, and through it the world, a code of law. It at once fell apart into a number of separate kingdoms, the despotic rulers of which were sultans with a tinge of Hellenism, and which went for nothing in the political development of mankind.

What if the very opposite theory to that of the she-wolf and her foster-children should be true? What if the Romans

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

should have owed their peculiar and unparalleled success to their having been at first not more warlike, but less warlike than their neighbors? It may seem a paradox, but we suspect that in their imperial ascendency is seen one of the earliest and not least important steps in that gradual triumph of intellect over force, even in war, which has been an essential part of the progress of civilization. The happy day may come when science in the form of a benign old gentleman with a bald head and spectacles on nose, holding some beneficent compound in his hand, will confront a standing army, and the standing army will cease to exist. That will be the final victory of intellect. But in the mean time, our acknowledgments are due to the primitive inventors of military organization and military discipline. They shivered Goliath's spear. A mass of comparatively unwarlike burghers, unorganized and undisciplined, though they may be the hope of civilization from their mental and industrial qualities, have as little of collective as they have of individual strength in war; they only get in each other's way, and fall singly victims to the prowess of a gigantic barbarian. He who first thought of combining their force by organization, so as to make their numbers tell, and who taught them to obey officers, to form regularly for action, and to execute united movements at the word of command, was, perhaps, as great a benefactor of the species as he who grew the first corn, or built the first canoe.

What is the special character of the Roman legends, so far as they relate to war? Their special character is, that they are legends not of personal prowess but of discipline. Rome has no Achilles. The great national heroes, Camillus, Cincinnatus, Papirius Cursor, Fabius Maximus, Manlius, are not prodigies of personal strength and valor, but commanders and disciplinarians. The most striking incidents are incidents of discipline. The most striking incident of all is the execution by a commander of his own son for having gained a victory against orders. "Disciplinam militarem," Manlius is made to say, "qua stetit ad hanc diem Romana res." Discipline was the great secret of Roman ascendency in war. It is the great secret of all ascendency in war. Victories of the undisciplined over the disciplined, such as Killiecrankie and Preston Pans, are rare exceptions which only prove the rule. The rule is that in anything like a parity of personal prowess and of generalship discipline is victory. Thrice Rome encountered discipline equal or superior to her own. Pyrrhus at first beat her, but there was no nation behind him; Hannibal beat her, but his nation did not support him; she beat the army of Alexander, but the army of Alexander when it encountered her, like that of Frederic at Jena, was an old machine, and it was commanded by a man who was more like Tippoo Sahib than the conqueror of Darius.

But how came military discipline to be so specially cultivated by the Romans? We can see how it came to be specially cultivated by the Greeks: it was the necessity of civic armies, fighting perhaps against warlike aristocracies; it was the necessity of Greeks in general fighting against the invading hordes of the Persian. We can see how it came to be cultivated among the mercenaries and professional soldiers of Pyrrhus and Hannibal. But what was the motive power in the case of Rome? Dismissing the notion of occult qualities of race, we look for a rational explanation in the circumstances of the plain which was the cradle of the Roman empire.

It is evident that in the period designated as that of the kings, when Rome commenced her career of conquest, she was, for that time and country, a great and wealthy city. This is proved by the works of the kings, the Capitoline Temple, the excavation for the Circus Maximus, the Servian Wall, and above all the Cloaca Maxima. Historians have indeed undertaken to give us a very disparaging picture of the ancient Rome, which they confidently describe as nothing more than a great village of shingle-roofed cottages thinly scattered over a large area. We ask in vain what are the materials for this description. It is most probable that the private buildings of Rome under the kings were roofed with nothing better than shingle, and it is very likely that they were mean and dirty, as the private buildings of Athens appear to have been, and as those of most of the great cities of the Middle Ages unquestionably were. But the Cloaca Maxima is in itself conclusive evidence of a large population, of wealth, and of a not inconsiderable degree of civilization. Taking our stand upon this monument, and clearing our vision entirely of Romulus and his asylum, we seem dimly to perceive the existence of a deep prehistoric background, richer than is commonly supposed in the germs of civilization, — a remark which may in all likelihood be extended to the background of history in general. Nothing surely can be more grotesque than the idea of a set of wolves, like the Norse pirates before their conversion to Christianity, constructing in their den the Cloaca Maxima.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

That Rome was comparatively great and wealthy is certain. We can hardly doubt that she was a seat of industry and commerce, and that the theory which represents her industry and commerce as having been developed subsequently to her conquests is the reverse of the fact. Whence, but from industry and commerce, could the population and the wealth have come? Peasant farmers do not live in cities, and plunderers do not accumulate. Rome had around her what was then a rich and peopled plain; she stood at a meeting-place of nationalities; she was on a navigable river, yet out of the reach of pirates; the sea near her was full of commerce, Etruscan, Greek, and Carthaginian. Her first colony was Ostia, evidently commercial and connected with salt-works, which may well have supplied the staple of her trade. Her patricians were financiers and money-lenders. We are aware that a different turn has been given to this part of the story, and that the indebtedness has been represented as incurred not by loans of money, but by advances of farm stock. This, however, completely contradicts the whole tenor of the narrative, and especially what is said about the measures for relieving the debtor by reducing the rate of interest and by deducting from the principal debt the interest already paid. The narrative as it stands, moreover, is supported by analogy. It has a parallel in the economical history of ancient Athens, and in the "scaling of debts," to use the American equivalent for seisachtheia, by the legislation of Solon. What prevents our supposing that usury, when it first made its appearance on the scene, before people had learned to draw the distinction between crimes and defaults, presented itself in a very coarse and cruel form? True, the currency was clumsy, and retained philological traces of a system of barter; but without commerce there could have been no currency at all.

Even more decisive is the proof afforded by the early political history of Rome. In that wonderful first decade of Livy there is no doubt enough of Livy himself to give him a high place among the masters of fiction. It is the epic of a nation of politicians, and admirably adapted for the purposes of education as the grand presentation of Roman character and the rich treasury of Roman sentiment. But we can hardly doubt that in the political portion there is a foundation of fact; it is too circumstantial, too consistent in itself, and at the same time too much borne out by analogy, to be altogether fiction. The institutions which we find existing in historic times must have been evolved by some such struggle between the orders of patricians and plebeians as that which Livy presents to us. And these politics, with their parties and sections of parties, their shades of political character, the sustained interest which they imply in political objects, their various devices and compromises, are not the politics of a community of peasant farmers, living apart each on his own farm and thinking of his own crops: they are the politics of the quick-witted and gregarious population of an industrial and commercial city. They are politics of the same sort as those upon which the Palazzo Vecchio looked down in Florence. That ancient Rome was a republic there can be no doubt. Even the so-called monarchy appears clearly to have been elective; and republicanism may be described broadly with reference to its origin, as the government of the city and of the artisan, while monarchy and aristocracy are the governments of the country and of farmers.

The legend which ascribes the assembly of centuries to the legislation of Servius probably belongs to the same class as the legend which ascribes trial by jury and the division of England into shires to the legislation of Alfred. Still the assembly of centuries existed; it was evidently ancient, belonging apparently to a stratum of institutions anterior to the assembly of tribes; and it was a constitution distributing political power and duties according to a property qualification which, in the upper grades, must, for the period, have been high though measured by a primitive currency. The existence of

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

such qualifications, and the social ascendency of wealth which the constitution implies, are inconsistent with the theory of a merely agricultural and military Rome. Who would think of framing such a constitution, say, for one of the rural districts of France?

Other indications of the real character of the prehistoric Rome might be mentioned. The preponderance of the infantry and the comparative weakness of the cavalry is an almost certain sign of democracy, and of the social state in which democracy takes its birth — at least in the case of a country which did not, like Arcadia or Switzerland, preclude by its nature the growth of a cavalry force; but on the contrary was rather favorable to it. Nor would it be easy to account for the strong feeling of attachment to the city which led to its restoration when it had been destroyed by the Gauls, and defeated the project of a migration to Veii, if Rome was nothing but a collection of miserable huts, the abodes of a tribe of marauders. We have, moreover, the actual traces of an industrial organization in the existence of certain guilds of artisans, which may have been more important at first than they were when the military spirit had become thoroughly ascendant.

Of course when Rome had once been drawn into the career of conquest, the ascendency of the military spirit would be complete; war, and the organization of territories acquired in war, would then become the great occupation of her leading citizens; industry and commerce would fall into disesteem, and be deemed unworthy of the members of the imperial race. Carthage would no doubt have undergone a similar change of character, had the policy which was carried to its greatest height by the aspiring house of Barcas succeeded in converting her from a trading city into the great capital of a great military empire. So would Venice, had she been able to carry on her system of conquest in the Levant and of territorial aggrandizement on the Italian mainland. The career of Venice was arrested by the League of Cambray. On Carthage the policy of military aggrandizement, which was apparently resisted by the sage instinct of the great merchants while it was supported by the professional soldiers and the populace, brought utter ruin; while Rome paid the inevitable penalty of military despotism. Even when the Roman nobles had become a caste of conquerors and proconsuls, they retained certain mercantile habits; unlike the French aristocracy, and aristocracies generally, they were careful keepers of their accounts, and they showed a mercantile talent for business, as well as a more than mercantile hardness, in their financial exploitation of the conquered world. Brutus and his contemporaries were usurers like the patricians of the early times. No one, we venture to think, who has been accustomed to study national character, will believe that the Roman character was formed by war alone: it was manifestly formed by war combined with business.

To what an extent the later character of Rome affected national tradition, or rather fiction, as to her original character, we see from the fable which tells us that she had no navy before the first Punic war, and that when compelled to build a fleet by the exigencies of lost war, she had to copy a Carthaginian war galley which had been cast ashore, and to train her rowers by exercising them on dry land. She had a fleet before the war with Pyrrhus, probably from the time at which she took possession of Antium, if not before; and even if her first treaty with Carthage is to be assigned to the date to which Mommsen and not to that to which Polybius assigns it, that treaty shows that before 348 B.C. she had an interest in a wide seaboard, which must have carried with it some amount of maritime power.

Now this wealthy, and as we suppose industrial and commercial city was the chief place, and in course of time became the mistress and protectress, of a plain large for that part of Italy, and then in such a condition as to be tempting to the spoiler. Over this plain on two sides hung ranges of mountains inhabited by hill tribes, Sabines, Æquians, Volscians, Hernicans, with the fierce and restless Samnite in the rear. No doubt these hill tribes raided on the plain as hill tribes always do; probably they were continually being pressed down upon it by the migratory movements of other tribes behind them. Some of them seem to have been in the habit of regularly swarming, like bees, under the form of the Ver Sacrum. On the north, again, were the Etruscan hill towns, with their lords, pirates by sea, and probably marauders by land; for the period of their degenerate luxury and frivolity may be regarded as subsequent to their subjugation by the Romans; at any rate, when they first appear upon the scene they are a conquering race. The wars with the Æqui and Volsci have been ludicrously multiplied and exaggerated by Livy; but even without the testimony of

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

any historian, we might assume that there would be wars with them and with the other mountaineers, and also with the marauding Etruscan chiefs. At the same time, we may be sure that in personal strength and prowess, the men of the plain and of the city would be inferior both to the mountaineers and to those Etruscan chiefs whose trade was war. How did the men of the plain and of the city manage to make up for this inferiority, to turn the scale of force in their favor, and ultimately to subdue both the mountaineers and the Etruscans? In the conflict with the mountaineers, something might be done by superiority of weapons which superior wealth would afford. But more would be done by military organization and discipline. To military organization and discipline the Romans accordingly learned to submit themselves, as did the English Parliamentarians after the experience of Edgehill, as did the democracy of the northern states of America after the experience of their first campaign. At the same time the Romans learned the lesson so momentous, and at the same time so difficult for citizen soldiers, of drawing the line between civil and military life. The turbulent democracy of the former, led into the field, doffed the citizen, donned the soldier, and obeyed the orders of a commander whom as citizens they detested, and whom when they were led back to the forum at the end of the summer campaign they were ready again to oppose and to impeach. No doubt all this part of the history has been immensely embellished by the patriotic imagination, the heroic features have been exaggerated, the harsher features softened though not suppressed. Still it is impossible to question the general fact. The result attests the process. The Roman legions were formed in the first instance of citizen soldiers, who yet had been made to submit to a rigid discipline, and to feel that in that submission lay their strength. When, to keep up the seige of Veii, military pay was introduced, a step was taken in the transition from a citizen soldiery to a regular army, such as the legions ultimately became, with its standing discipline of the camp; and that the measure should have been possible is another proof that Rome was a great city with a well-supplied treasury, not a collection of mud huts. No doubt the habit of military discipline reacted on the political character of the people, and gave it the strength and self-control which were so fatally wanting in the case of Florence.

The line was drawn, under the pressure of a stern necessity, between civil and military life, and between the rights and duties of each. The power of the magistrate, jealously limited in the city, was enlarged to absolutism for the preservation of discipline in the field. But the distinction between the king or magistrate and the general, and between the special capacities required for the duties of each, is everywhere of late growth. We may say the same of departmental distinctions altogether. The executive, the legislative, the judicial power, civil authority and military command, all lie enfolded in the same primitive germ. The king, or the magistrate who takes his place, is expected to lead the people in war as well as to govern them in peace. In European monarchies this idea still lingers, fortified no doubt by the personal unwillingness of the kings to let the military power go out of their hands. Nor in early times is the difference between the qualifications of a ruler and those of a commander so great as it afterwards became; the business of the State is simple, and force of character the main requisite in both cases. Annual consulships must have been fatal to strategical experience, while, on the other hand, they would save the republic from being tied to an unsuccessful general. But the storms of war which broke on Rome from all quarters soon brought about the recognition of special aptitude for military command in the appointment of dictators. As to the distinction between military and naval ability, it is of very recent birth: Blake, Prince Rupert, and Monk were made admirals because they had been successful as generals, just as Hannibal was appointed by Antiochus to the command of a fleet.

At Preston Pans, as before at Killiecrankie, the line of the Hanoverian regulars was broken by the headlong charge of the wild clans, for which the regulars were unprepared. Taught by the experience of Preston Pans, the Duke of Cumberland at Culloden formed in three lines, so as to repair a broken front. The Romans in like manner formed in three lines — hastati, principes, and triarii — evidently with the same object. Our knowledge of the history of Roman tactics does not enable us to say exactly at what period this formation began to supersede the phalanx, which appears to have preceded it, and which is the natural order of half-disciplined or imperfectly armed masses, as we see in the case of the army formed by Philip out of the Macedonian peasantry,

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd and again in the case of the French Revolutionary columns. We cannot say, therefore, whether this formation in three lines is any way traceable to experience dearly bought in wars with Italian highlanders, or to a lesson taught by the terrible onset of the Gaul. Again, the punctilious care in the entrenchment of the camp, even for a night's halt, which moved the admiration of Pyrrhus and was a material part of Roman tactics, was likely to be inculcated by the perils to which a burgher army would be exposed in carrying on war under or among hills and always liable to the sudden attack of a swift, surefooted, and wily foe. The habit of carrying a heavy load of palisades on the march would be a part of the same necessity.

Even from the purely military point of view, then, the she-wolf and the twins seem to us not appropriate emblems of Roman greatness. A better frontispiece for historians of Rome, if we mistake not, would be some symbol of the patroness of the lowlands and their protectress against the wild tribes of the highlands. There should also be something to symbolize the protectress of Italy against the Gauls, whose irruptions Rome, though defeated at Allia, succeeded ultimately in arresting and hurling back, to the general benefit of Italian civilization, which, we may be sure, felt very grateful to her for that service, and remembered it when her existence was threatened by Hannibal, with Gauls in his army. Capua, though not so well situated for the leadership of Italy, might have played the part of Rome; but the plain which she commanded, though very rich, was too small, and too closely overhung by the fatal hills of the Sammiti, under whose dominion she fell. Rome had space to organize a strong lowland resistance to the marauding highland powers. It seems probable that her hills were not only the citadel but the general refuge of the lowlanders of those parts, when forced to fly before the onslaught of the highlanders, who were impelled by successive wars of migration to the plains. The Campagna affords no stronghold or rallying point but those hills, which may have received a population of fugitives like the islands of Venice. The city may have drawn part of its population and some of its political elements from this source. In this sense the story of the asylum may possibly represent a part, though it has itself nothing to do with history.

Then, as to imperial organization and government. Superiority in these would naturally flow from superiority in civilization, and in previous political training. The former Rome derived from her comparative wealth and from the mental characteristics of a city population; the latter she derived from the long struggle through which the rights of the plebeians were equalized with those of the patricians, and which again must have had its ultimate origin in geographical circumstance bringing together different elements of population. Cromwell was a politician and a religious leader before he was a soldier; Napoleon was a soldier before he was a politician: to this difference between the moulds in which their characters were cast may be traced, in great measure, the difference of their conduct when in power, Cromwell devoting himself to political and ecclesiastical reform, while Napoleon used his supremacy chiefly as the means of gratifying his lust for war. There is something analogous in the case of imperial nations. Had the Roman, when he conquered the world been like the Ottoman, like the Ottoman he would probably have remained. His lust of blood and pillage slaked, he would simply have proceeded to slake his other animal lusts; he would have destroyed or consumed everything, produced nothing, delivered over the world to a plundering anarchy of rapacious satraps, and when his sensuality had overpowered his ferocity, he would have fallen, in his turn, before some horde whose ferocity was fresh, and the round of war and havoc would have commenced again. The Roman destroyed and consumed a good deal; but he also produced not a little; he produced, among other things, first in Italy, then in the world at large, the peace of Rome, indispensable to civilization, and destined to be the germ and precursor of the peace of humanity.

In two respects, however, the geographical circumstances of Rome appear specially to have prepared her for the exercise of universal empire. In the first place, her position was such as to bring her into contact from the outset with a great variety of races. The cradle of her dominion was a sort of ethnological microcosm. Latins, Etruscans, Greeks, Campanians, with all the mountain races and the Gauls, make up a school of the most diversified experience, which could not fail to open the minds of the future masters of the world. How different was this education from that of a people which is either isolated, like the Egyptians, or comes into contact perhaps in the way of continual border hostility with a single race! What

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the exact relations of Rome were with Etruria in the earliest times we do not know, but evidently they were close; while between the Roman and the Etruscan character the difference appears to have been as wide as possible. The Roman was pre-eminently practical and business-like, sober-minded, moral, unmystical, unsacerdotal, much concerned with present duties and interests, very little concerned about a future state of existence, peculiarly averse from human sacrifices and from all wild and dark superstitions. The Etruscan, as he has portrayed himself to us in his tombs, seems to have been, in his later development at least, a mixture of sybaritism with a gloomy and almost Mexican religion, which brooded over the terrors of the next world, and sought in the constant practice of human sacrifice a relief from its superstitious fear. If the Roman could tolerate the Etruscans, be merciful to them, and manage them well, he was qualified to deal in a statesmanlike way with the peculiarities of almost any race, except those whose fierce nationality repelled all management whatever. In borrowing from the Etruscans some of their theological lore and their system of divination, small as the value of the things borrowed was, the Roman, perhaps, gave an earnest of the receptiveness which led him afterwards, in his hour of conquest, to bow to the intellectual ascendency of the conquered Greek, and to become a propagator of Greek culture, though partly in a Latinized form, more effectual than Alexander and his Orientalized successors.

In the second place, the geographical circumstances of Rome, combined with her character, would naturally lead to the foundation of colonies and of that colonial system which formed a most important and beneficent part of her empire. We have derived the name colony from Rome; but her colonies were just what ours are not, military outposts of the empire, propugnacula imperii. Political depletion and provisions for needy citizens were collateral, but it would seem, in early times at least, secondary objects. Such outposts were the means suggested by nature, first of securing those parts of the plain which were beyond the sheltering range of the city itself, secondly of guarding the outlets of the hills against the hill tribes, and eventually of holding down the tribes in the hills themselves. The custody of the passes is especially marked as an object by the position of many of the early colonies. When the Roman dominion extended to the north of Italy, the same system was pursued, in order to guard against incursions from the Alps. A conquering despot would have planted mere garrisons under military governors, which would not have been centres of civilization, but probably of the reverse. The Roman colonies, bearing onwards with them the civil as well as the military life of the republic, were, with the general system of provincial municipalities of which they constituted the core, to no small extent centres of civilization, though doubtless they were also to some extent instruments of oppression. "Where the Roman conquered he dwelt," and the dwelling of the Roman was, on the whole, the abode of a civilizing influence. Representation of dependencies in the sovereign assembly of the imperial country was unknown, and would have been impracticable. Conquest had not so far put off its iron nature. In giving her dependencies municipal institutions and municipal life, Rome did the next best thing to giving them representation. A Roman province with its municipal life was far above a satrapy, though far below a nation.

Then how came Rome to be the foundress and the great source of law? This, as we said before, calls for a separate explanation. An explanation I do not pretend to give, but merely a hint which may deserve notice in looking for the explanation. In primitive society, in place of law, in the proper sense of the term, we find only tribal custom, formed mainly by the special exigencies of tribal self-preservation, and confined to the particular tribe. When Saxon and Dane settle down in England side by side under the treaty made between Alfred and Guthurm, each race retains the tribal custom which serves it as a criminal law. A special effort seems to be required in order to rise above this custom to that conception of general right or expediency which is the germ of law as a science. The Greek, sceptical and speculative as he was, appears never to have quite got rid of the notion that there was something sacred in ancestral custom, and that to alter it by legislation was a sort of impiety. We in England still fancy that there is something in the breast of the judge, and that something is a lingering shadow of the tribal custom, the source of the common law. Now what conditions would be most favorable to this critical effort, so fraught with momentous consequences to humanity? Apparently a union of elements belonging to different tribes such as would compel

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

them, for the preservation of peace and the regulation of daily intercourse, to adopt some common measure of right. It must be a union, not a conquest of one tribe by another, otherwise the conquering tribe would of course keep its own customs, as the Spartans did among the conquered people of Laconia. Now it appears likely that these conditions were exactly fulfilled by the primeval settlements on the hills of Rome. The hills are either escarped by nature or capable of easy escarpment, and seem originally to have been little separate fortresses, by the union of which the city was ultimately formed. That there were tribal differences among the inhabitants of the different hills is a belief to which all traditions and all the evidence of institutions point, whether we suppose the difference to have been great or not, and whatever special theory we may form as to the origin of the Roman people. If the germ of law, as distinguished from custom, was brought into existence in this manner, it would be fostered and expanded by the legislative exigencies of the political and social concordat between the two orders, and also by those arising out of the adjustment of relations with other races in the course of conquest and colonization.

Roman law had also, in common with Roman morality, the advantage of being comparatively free from the perverting influence of tribal superstition.* Roman morality was in the main a rational rule of duty, the shortcomings and aberrations of which arose not from superstition, but from narrowness of perception, peculiarity of sphere, and the bias of national circumstance. The auguries, which were so often used for the purposes of political obstruction or intrigue, fall under the head rather of trickery than of superstition.

Roman law in the same manner was a rule of expediency, rightly or wrongly conceived, with comparatively little tincture of religion. In this again we probably see the effect of a fusion of tribes upon the tribal superstitions. "Rome," it has been said, "had no mythology." This is scarcely an overstatement; and we do not account for the fact by saying that the Romans were unimaginative, because it is not the creative imagination that produces a mythology, but the impression made by the objects and forces of nature on the minds of the forefathers of the tribe.

* From religious perversion Roman law was eminently free: but it could not be free from perverting influences of a social kind; so that we ought to be cautious, for instance, in borrowing law on any subject concerning the relations between the sexes from the corrupt society of the Roman Empire.

A more tenable explanation, at all events, is that just suggested, the disintegration of mythologies by the mixture of tribes. A part of the Roman religion — the worship of such abstractions as Fides, Fortuna, Salus, Concordia, Bellona, Terminus — even looks like a product of the intellect posterior to the decay of the mythologies, which we may be pretty sure were physical. It is no doubt true that the formalities which were left — hollow ceremonial, auguries, and priesthoods which were given without scruple, like secular offices, to the most profligate men of the world — were worse than worthless in a religious point of view. But historians who dwell on this fail to see that the real essence of religion, a belief in the power of duty and of righteousness, that belief which afterwards took the more definite form of Roman stoicism, had been detached by the dissolution of the mythologies, and exerted its force, such as that force was, independently of the ceremonial, the sacred chickens, and the dissipated high priests. In this sense the tribute paid by Polybius to the religious character of the Romans is deserved; they had a higher sense of religious obligation than the Greeks; they were more likely than the Greeks, the Phœnicians, or any of their other rivals, to swear and disappoint not, though it were to their own hindrance; and this they owed, as we conceive, not to an effort of speculative intellect, which in an early stage of society would be out of the question, but to some happy conjunction of circumstances such as would be presented by a break-up of tribal mythologies, combined with influences favorable to the formation of strong habits of political and social duty. Religious art was sacrificed; that was the exclusive heritage of the Greek; but superior morality was on the whole the heritage of the Roman, and if he produced no good tragedy himself, he furnished characters for Shakespeare and Corneille.

Whatever set the Romans free, or comparatively free, from the tyranny of tribal religion, may be considered as having in the same measure been the source of the tolerance which was so indispensable a qualification for the exercise of dominion over a polytheistic world. They waged no war on "the gods of the nations," or on the worshippers of those gods as such. They did not set up golden images after the fashion of Nebuchadnezzar. In early times they seem to have adopted the gods of the conquered, and to have transported

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

them to their own city. In later times they respected all the religions except Judaism and Druidism, which assumed the form of national resistance to the empire, and worships which they deemed immoral or anti social, and which had intruded themselves into Rome.

Another grand step in the development of law is the severance of the judicial power from the legislative and the executive, which permits the rise of jurists, and of a regular legal profession. This is a slow process. In the stationary East, as a rule, the king has remained the supreme judge. At Athens, the sovereign people delegated its judicial powers to a large committee, but it got no further; and the judicial committee was hardly more free from political passion, or more competent to decide points of law, than the assembly itself. In England the House of Lords still, formally at least, retains judicial functions. Acts of attainder were a yet more primitive as well as more objectionable relic of the times in which the sovereign power, whether king, assembly, or the two combined, was ruler, legislator, and judge all in one. We shall not attempt here to trace the process by which this momentous separation of powers and functions was to a remarkable extent accomplished in ancient Rome. But we are pretty safe in saying that the prætor peregrinus was an important figure in it, and that it received a considerable impulse from the exigencies of a jurisdiction between those who as citizens came under the sovereign assembly and the aliens or semi-aliens who did not.

Whether the partial explanations of the mystery of Roman greatness which we have here suggested approve themselves to the reader's judgment or not, it may at least be said for them that they are veræ causæ, which is not the case with the story of the foster-wolf, or anything derived from it, any more than with the story of the fateful apparitions of Jupiter on the Capitoline Hill.

With regard to the public morality of the Romans, and to their conduct and influence as masters of the world, the language of historians seems to us to leave something to be desired. Mommsen's tone, whenever controverted questions connected with international morality and the law of conquest arise, is affected by his Prussianism; it betokens the transition of the German mind from the speculative and visionary to the practical and even more than practical state: it is premonitory not only of the wars with Austria and France, but of a coming age in which the forces of natural selection are again to operate without the restraints imposed by religion, and the heaviest fist is once more to make the law. In the work of Ihne we see a certain recoil from Mommsen, and at the same time an occasional inconsistency and a want of stability in the principle of judgment. Our standard ought not to be positive but relative. It was the age of force and conquest, not only with the Romans but with all nations; hospes was hostis. A perfectly independent development of Greeks, Romans, Etruscans, Phœnicians, and all the other nationalities, might perhaps have been the best thing for humanity. But this was out of the question; in that stage of the world's existence contact was war, and the end of war was conquest or destruction, the first of which was at all events preferable to the second. What empire then can we imagine which would have done less harm or more good than the Roman? Greek intellect showed its superiority in speculative politics as in all other departments of speculation, but as a practical politician the Greek was not self-controlled or strong, and he would never have bestowed on the provinces of his empire local self-government and municipal life; besides, the race, though it included wonderful varieties in itself, was, as a race, intensely tribal, and treated persistently all other races as barbarians. It would have deprived mankind of Roman law and politics, as well as of that vast extension of the Roman ædileship which covered the world with public works beneficent in themselves and equally so as examples; whereas the Roman had the greatness of soul to do homage to Greek intellect, and, notwithstanding an occasional Mummius, preserved all that was of the highest value in Greek civilization, better perhaps than it would have been preserved by the tyrants and condottieri of the Greek decadence. As to a Semitic empire, whether in the hands of Syrians or Carthaginians, with their low Semitic craft, their Moloch-worships and their crucifixions,— the very thought fills us with horror. It would have been a world-wide tyranny of the strong box into which all the products of civilization would have gone. Parcere subjectis was the rule of Rome as well as debellare superbos; and while all conquest is an evil, the Roman was the most clement and the least destructive of conquerors. This is true of him on the whole, though he sometimes was guilty of thoroughly primeval

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

cruelty. He was the great author of the laws of war as well as of the laws of peace. That he not seldom, when his own interest was concerned, put the mere letter of the social law in place of justice, and that we are justly revolted on these occasions by his hypocritical observance of forms, is very true; nevertheless their general action and the language of their national critics in these cases prove the existence of at least a rudimentary conscience. No compunction for breach of international law or justice we may be sure ever visited the heart of Tiglath-Pileser. Cicero's letter of advice to his brother on the government of a province may seem a tissue of truisms now, though Warren Hastings and Sir Elijah Impey would hardly have found it so, but it is a landmark in the history of civilization. That the Roman republic should die, and that a colossal and heterogeneous empire should fall under the rule of a military despot, was perhaps a fatal necessity; but the despotism long continued to be tempered, elevated, and rendered more beneficent by the lingering spirit of the republic: the liberalism of Trajan and the Antonines was distinctly republican; nor did sultanism finally establish itself before Diocletian. Perhaps we may number among the proofs of the Roman's superiority the capacity, shown so far as we know first by him, of being touched by the ruin of a rival. We may be sure that no Assyrian conqueror even affected to weep over the fall of a hostile city, however magnificent and historic. On the whole it must be allowed that physical influences have seldom done better for humanity than they did in shaping the imperial character and destinies of Rome. GOLDWIN SMITH.

From Temple Bar.

THE DEATH OF THE DUKE DE M——.

FROM "THE NABOB," BY E. DAUDET.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

THE duke lay dying. He had been taken ill quite suddenly on Sunday as he was coming from the Bois. He was seized with the most insupportable burning inward pain, which seemed to follow as with a red-hot iron every bone in his body, and at intervals came a numbing chill, and long lethargic sleeps. Jenkins, who had been instantly summoned, said little and ordered gentle opiates.

The next day the pain was worse, and the icy congestion which alternated with it was also more defined, as if life was yielding to the force of these violent attacks. Those about him were not yet alarmed. "Legacy of St. James" was whispered in the anteroom, and Jenkins' handsome face was quite calm. On his morning round he had casually mentioned the duke's indisposition to one or two persons, but so lightly as to excite no attention.

M—— himself, notwithstanding his excessive weakness and a feeling of emptiness in the head, so that he said he had not an idea in his brain, was yet far from suspecting how seriously ill he was. It was only on the third day of the attack, when on awaking he saw a little stream of blood which had run from his mouth on to his beard and the stained pillow, that this refined and delicate worldling, who shrank from the miseries of human nature, and most of all from illness, saw that noiselessly it had now made its way to him with its soiled traces, bringing feebleness and neglect of personal care — death's first tribute.

In the evening there was a consultation, kept secret at the duke's desire; he felt shy of acknowledging his illness, his sufferings, which dethroned him from the eminence on which he lived, and brought him down to the common level. Like those African kings who hide themselves to die within the recesses of their strongholds, he would have wished to pass away translated, transfigured, and deified. He dreaded beyond measure the pity, the consolations, the tenderness with which he would be surrounded, the tears that would be shed, probably feigned, or even if sincere still more revolting to him because disfiguring.

He had always hated scenes and exaggeration; whatever appealed to his feelings disturbed the harmonious, well-balanced tenor of his existence. This was well understood by those around him, and he was kept ignorant of all the distress, all the deep despair which from all parts of France sought relief from M—— — one of those lighthouses of refuge in the dark woods where wandering wayfarers knock.

He was not hard to the unfortunate, it was perhaps more because he felt that he was too easily moved to pity, which he looked upon as a sentiment unworthy of him and of the strong; and therefore what he refused to others he dreaded for himself, lest it should shake his invincible courage.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

No one in the palace, except Monpavou and Louis his valet, knew the errand of the three personages who were mysteriously ushered into the room of the minister of state. Even the duchess was kept in ignorance. Separated from her husband by all the many barriers which the social and political world interposes between husband and wife in these exceptional marriages, she believed him to be only slightly unwell, fanciful perhaps, and so little idea had she of a catastrophe, that as the doctors went up the dimly lighted grand staircase, her apartment on the other side of the palace was being lit up for a young girls' ball, one of those bals blancs which the invention of idle Paris was putting in fashion.

The consultation was what consultations always are — solemn and awful. Doctors no longer wear the big wigs of Molière's time, but they still put on the same lugubrious air like priests of Isis, or astrologers brimming over with cabalistic conventionalities, and shakes of the head which a peaked cap would render absolutely comic. The surroundings of the scene on this occasion lent to it an imposing aspect. In the vast room, which seemed changed and larger by the helpless attitude of its master, all these grave figures advanced towards the bed, on which the light fell concentrated, showing amid the snowy linen and the rosy drapings a furrowed face ghastly from the lips to the eyes, but veiled or rather shrouded in calm serenity. The faculty spoke low, exchanged hasty glances, dropped outlandish words, and remained imperturbable without moving an eyelid. But this mute reticence of the doctor and the judge, this solemn gravity which science and justice borrow to hide their weakness or their ignorance, struck no terror into the duke's mind. Seated in his bed, he continued to talk quietly, with an expression of elevation which the last flashes of intellect leave in their flight, and Monpavou answered coolly, mastering his feelings and learning from his friend a last lesson in deportment, whilst Louis in the background leant against the door which led to the duchess's apartment, the representative of that trained domesticity which inculcates as a duty marked indifference.

The moment was a solemn one, the prisoner awaiting the sentence of his judges, life or death, reprieve or pardon.

M——, with a gesture familiar to him, kept stroking his moustache with his long white hand; whilst talking to Monpavou about the club, the crush-room of the Variétés, and asking the last news of the Chambers, and the election of the Nabob, all quite naturally, without the least affectation. Then, probably from fatigue, or perhaps fearing that the expression of his face, involuntarily turned to the hangings from behind which his verdict was presently to come forth, might reveal the emotion which he could not but feel in the depths of his heart, he leaned his head back, shut his eyes, and only opened them when the doctors came back. They brought in the same cold, passionless faces, the faces of judges on whose lips hang the fate of the human race, the final word which the tribunals pronounce fearlessly, but which physicians, on whose science it is a sarcasm, elude and give out in paraphrases.

"Well, gentlemen, what says the faculty?" asked the sick man. Then followed a few false, halting words of encouragement, and some unmeaning advice, and the three learned men hastened to depart, anxious to get away and escape from the responsibility of this calamity. Monpavou hurriedly followed them.

The duke at once felt that neither Jenkins nor Louis would tell him the truth about the consultation. He therefore affected to share their belief in his being better, and without questioning them endured their pretence of jubilant confidence. But when Monpavou came back, he immediately called him to his bedside, and seeing falsehood in the lines of the painted old face, he said quickly, "Oh! come now, no nonsense — between you and me, the truth. What do they say? I am very far gone, am I not?"

Monpavou preceded his answer by a suggestive pause, and then brutally, cynically, fearing to break down, "Damned, my poor Auguste."

The duke's face did not move a muscle. "Ah," he simply said. He mechanically stroked his moustache, but made no sign, and at once accepted his fate. That the poor wretch who dies in the hospital, homeless and friendless, nameless save for the number of his bed, should accept death as a relief, or bear it as a last trial; that the old peasant, who, doubled up with aches and pains in his dark, smoky hole, should leave it without regret for the ground he has so often turned and returned, can easily be imagined. And yet how many there are even among those who hold to life because of their wretchedness, and who cling to their sordid rags and belongings, crying, "I will not die," till death

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

loosens the last gripe of their bleeding nails and stiffened fingers.

Here there was nothing of the sort. To have everything and to lose everything — such an overthrow! In the silence of the first awful moment, only broken by the faint sounds of the music of the duchess's ball at the other end of the palace, all that belonged to the dying man's life, power, distinction, fortune, with their dazzling brilliancy, must have faded into the dim distance of the past forever gone. To bear such a blow without any appearance of a revolt of pride called for courage of a most unusual kind. There were only present the chosen friend, the servant, and the doctor, the only three for whom there were no secrets; the bed was shaded from the light, and the dying man could have turned his face to the wall and sorrowed over his fate without being seen. But no, not one moment of weakness or of useless regret.

Without displacing a leaf of the horse-chestnuts in the garden, or fading one flower on the state staircase of the palace, Death with muffled tread had sped up the thickly carpeted steps and opened the door of this great man's bedroom to sign to him "Come," and he quietly answered, "I am ready." The departure of a real man of the world, sudden, swift, and silent.

Man of the world! M—— was nothing else. Going through life in mask and gloves, with a white satin buckler such as fencing-masters wear on parade days, and keeping his defence free from spot or stain in guise of armor, he had become a statesman in passing from the drawing-room to a vaster area, and indeed he was a statesman of the highest order through his training in the world, the art of listening and smiling, the thorough knowledge of men, utter scepticism and imperturbable calm. This calmness stood his friend in the hour of need. Scanning the short time left him, for his grim visitor was hurried, and through the door he had left open came a chill air upon his face, he thought only of making the most of it and fulfilling all the duties incurred by such a death as his, which should leave no affection unrecognized and no devotion betrayed. He gave a list of the few persons he wished to see, who were immediately sent for, and summoned his secretary; when Jenkins remonstrated as to the fatigue, "Will you promise that I shall wake up to-morrow morning? I feel strong now, let me profit by it."

Louis asked if he should inform the duchess. The duke listened before answering; the music of the orchestra came through the open windows of the bedroom in harmonious strains borne by the night wind; then he said, "Wait a while . . . I have something that must be done . . ."

He drew towards him the little table by his bedside to select from the mass the letters to be destroyed, but, feeling his strength give way, he called Monpavou, and in a feeble voice said, "Burn all."

As he saw him going to the hearth, where there was a fire, although it was summer, he added, "No, not here . . . there are too many . . . some one might come."

Monpavou took up the light desk and signed to the valet to light him, but Jenkins came up quickly, "Stay here, Louis — the duke may want you."

He took the lamp and they went cautiously down the length of the long corridor, looking into all the rooms and the passages, where all the fireplaces were filled with artificial flowers without a sign of ashes; so they wandered on in the darkness of the immense building shrouded in silence except on the right, where pleasure kept its revel like a bird singing on a roof about to fall in.

"There is no fire anywhere . . . what are we to do with all this?" they asked each other anxiously. They were like two thieves making off with a casket which they could not force open.

At last Monpavou, with a gesture of impatience, went up to the only door they had not opened. "By Jove! there is no help for it, as we can't burn them we must drown them. Hold the light, Jenkins." And they went in.

Where were they? Only St. Simon would know how to say it in relating the confusion of one of those royal catastrophes, the upsetting of all ceremony, all dignity, and all distinction of rank caused by death, and above all by sudden death. St. Simon alone could do justice to it.

The Marquis de Monpavou with his white delicate hands pumped. The other passed to him torn letters, bundles of letters on satin paper, tinted, scented, marked with initials, with arms, with mottoes, all covered with close, fine writing, persuasive, alluring, seductive; and all these light sheets of paper were swept around by the streams of water which soiled them, effacing and defacing before they were swallowed up by the flood carrying them to the bottom of the dark descent.

There were love-letters of every sort, from the note of the adventuress, "Duke,

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

I saw you as you passed in the Bois yesterday," etc., to the aristocratic reproaches of the mistress before the last, and the complaints of those abandoned, and the pages of recent date with the latest avowals.

Monpavou was initiated in all these mysteries, and named each one: "That is Madame Moor . . . ah! Madame d'Athis . . ." a medley of coronets and initials, caprices and habits, all mingling promiscuously together, and all being swallowed up in the yawning abyss by the light of a lamp, with a sound of many waters, and all going down into oblivion by the path of shame . . .

It was strange to see the faces around with no expression of pity or pain, but a sort of rage. All these people resented on the duke his death as a species of treachery; sentences like this were uttered, "It is no wonder, leading such a life!" and through the large windows they watched the coming and going of equipages in the courtyard, and the stopping of little chariots outside, at the windows of which appeared a little hand neatly gloved, which out of the falls of lace handed a card turned down at the corner to the valet who brought the bulletin of the day.

From time to time one of the intimate circle, those who had been sent for by the dying man, appeared among the crowd, gave an order, and disappeared; the expression of alarm on his face was at once reflected in twenty others. Jenkins came in for an instant, his cravat untied, his waistcoat open, his cuffs tumbled, in all the disorder of the battle he was waging against an inexorable foe. He was immediately surrounded, and overwhelmed with questions. The monkeys in cages pressing their scrub noses against the wires, startled by the unusual confusion and attentively remarking all that passed, as if studying the grimaces of mankind, had certainly a magnificent model in the Irish physician. His grief was noble, a deep, manly grief which showed itself only in the lips firmly set and heaving of his breast. "The death-agony is begun," he said gravely, "it is now only a question of hours."

In the antechamber it was very still, brilliant with the light of two immense lamps. A footman slept in a corner, the porter read at the fireplace. He looked at a new-comer over his spectacles, but did not speak, and Jansoulet did not dare to ask. Piles of newspapers lay on the table in their covers with the duke's name, thrown there as if useless. The Nabob opened one and tried to read, but a quick, sliding step and a whispered, cadenced sound made him raise his eyes to the figure of an old man pale and bent, adorned with costly lace like a shrine, and who prayed as he disappeared with the long strides of the priest, his ample scarlet vestments trailing behind him on the carpet. It was the Archbishop of Paris with his two acolytes. The vision, with its murmuring noise as of an icy blast, passed before Jansoulet, swept into the great coach, and disappeared, carrying with it his last hope.

"A matter of conventionality, my dear sir," said Monpavou, suddenly appearing. "M—— is a sensualist with the ideas of — what's its name — what do you call it, the eighteenth century — but for the masses it would be very bad if a man of his standing — pst — pst — pst. Ah! he was our teacher in all things — pst — pst — so unexceptionally correct."

"It is over, then," said Jansoulet, horror-stricken, utterly hopeless.

Monpavou made a sign to him to listen. A carriage rolled smoothly over the avenue of the quay. The signal bell struck rapidly several strokes. The marquis counted aloud, one, two, three, four — at the fifth he rose. "No hope now," he said, "here comes the other," alluding to the Paris superstition that the visit of the sovereign is always fatal to the dying. The lackeys hurried about, opened the folding door, fell into line, whilst the Swiss with his three-cornered hat marked the passage of the two august visitors by striking his bayonet at intervals on the paved way.

Jansoulet could only catch glimpses of them behind the servants, but they appeared through a long perspective of open door, ascending the grand staircase preceded by a valet bearing a candelabra. She walked proudly erect, draped in her Spanish mantilla. He leant upon the railings, going slowly and wearily, the collar of his light-colored overcoat rising up on his back, slightly bent and agitated by convulsive sobs.

Is he dead? Jansoulet said to himself as he left the club, and he determined to go and see before he went home. It was no longer hope which impelled him, but that sort of morbid, nervous curiosity which after a great fire brings the unfortunate victims, ruined and homeless, to the ashes of their burnt houses.

Although it was still very early, the rosy vapors of the dawn not yet dispersed, the hotel stood wide open as if for a solemn departure. The lamps still burned on the

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd mantelpiece, the air was filled with floating dust. The Nabob made his way in this incomprehensible solitude up to the first story, where at last he heard a familiar voice, Car——'s, dictating names, and the scratching of pens on paper.

The same clever director of the festivities in honor of the Bey was now undertaking with the same zeal the funeral obsequies of the Duke of M——. His Excellency died in the course of the evening, and already by morning ten thousand letters had been printed, and every one of the household who could write was busy with the addresses.

Without passing through these improvised business apartments, Jansoulet reached the reception-room, usually so full, now quite empty. On a table in the middle the duke's hat, stick, and gloves, always ready for a sudden necessity of going out, so as to avoid the trouble of giving an order. What we wear takes more or less an impress of our individuality. The line of the hat recalled that of the moustache, the light gloves seemed about to clasp the cane of Chinese bamboo, strong and supple; it all looked lifelike and ready for the duke to appear, talking and stretching out his hand to take up these familiar objects and go out. Oh no — the duke was not going out. Jansoulet had only to approach the bedroom door ajar to see on the bed, raised by three steps, a stiff, haughty form, a motionless profile aged by the grey beard which had grown in the night; kneeling against the head of the bed, which sloped backward, buried among the white curtains, was a woman with a wealth of fair hair falling carelessly around her, ready to fall under the shears of perpetual widowhood. There was a priest and a nun absorbed in the funereal watch of a sleepless night, marked only by murmured prayers and solemn stillness.

This room, where so many ambitious projects had taken wing, so many hopes been born, and so many disappointments endured, was now hushed in the tranquillity of death — not a sound, not a sigh, only, notwithstanding the early hour, down by the bridge of La Concorde the shrill fifing of a clarionet made itself heard above the roll of the first vehicles; but its poignant sarcasm was now unmarked by him who lay there in the eyes of the terrified Nabob, the precursor of his own fate, colorless, lifeless, apt for the grave.

After Jansoulet, others came into the death-room, made yet more ghastly. The windows wide open, darkness and the night air circulating freely in a great gush of wind. On tressels a human form. The body just embalmed, the head emptied and filled with sponge, the brain in a basin. The weight of the statesman's brain was something marvellous. It weighed — it weighed — all the papers gave the weight — who remembers it to-day?

From The Fortnightly Review.

THE POLITICAL ADVENTURES OF LORD BEACONSFIELD.

II.

FROM 1826 TO 1837.

In the preceding pages we have spoken of the race and parentage of Lord Beaconsfield. To some minds it seems impossible that you can say that a man is a Jew without intending to reproach him for being a Jew. Unfortunately, the strength of still-surviving prejudices makes this confusion only too natural; and the imputation of an ungenerous appeal to hatreds of creed and race cannot be avoided by any writer who discusses the character of the present prime minister. If Lord Beaconsfield's political adventures could be truly narrated without any reference to his Jewish blood and to the inherited qualities which are deeply stamped upon his nature, physical and moral, we should be very glad to keep the things apart. But the blood is the life, in another sense than that which the Hebrew law-giver attached to the phrase; and the secret of Lord Beaconsfield's life lies in his Jewish blood. It is not a matter for self-glorification, though it seems to be so to him; it is not a matter for disparagement and contempt, though both his assailants and eulogists often appear to regard it as such. It is a simple question of fact and of natural history. So with the characteristics which two thousand years of persecution and suffering have impressed upon the Jewish captivity in Europe. If Israel was not the worse for what it had undergone, cruelty and wrong-doing would be merely physical calamities. If a man loses half his worth on the day on which he becomes a slave, the nation which has been in servitude for two thousand years is not likely to be morally the better for the experience. That the Jews have imbibed servile vices in nineteen centuries of bondage is as obvious in fact as it was certain in theory. That freedom will bring to them the virtues of freemen we do not doubt; at present it has stopped at a period of transition,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

and has brought them the equivocal qualities of freedmen. Their persons have been enfranchised, but not their minds. They display too often the habits of a manumitted slave. It is not matter for wonder that Epictetus should be a rarer product of slavery than Narcissus. The Venetian is almost as conspicuous in Lord Beaconsfield as the Jew. The organization is due to his race. The environment of several centuries, acting upon the organization, has been supplied by the republic of St. Mark. Lord Beaconsfield has always discussed English politics in terms of the Venetian State system. To him the British aristocracy are Venetian magnificoes; the sovereign is a doge whom an oligarchy has enslaved. George III. was a sort of Marino Faliero who struggled against the bondage by which an usurping oligarchy fettered him; and in the struggle, which has Lord Beaconsfield's intense sympathy, forfeited not his life but his reason.

Lord Beaconsfield's manhood began in the days of George IV.; and the preparatory part of his career, his apprenticeship in literature and politics, extends over the last four years of the life of that sovereign and over the whole of the reign of William IV. His Parliamentary life, which in England is the only form of political life, opens with the Parliament which was assembled on the accession of the queen. The circumstances of the time, the men who occupied conspicuous positions in the State, and the evident transition which was impending from an old to a new era, were such as would have roused the ardor of a generous and humane mind. The long Tory domination, which had been marked by the selfish foreign policy of Castlereagh and the domestic oppression of Sidmouth, by political persecutions and Peterloo massacres, was obviously drawing to a close. Huskisson had begun that policy of free trade which twenty years later was to receive its full development at the hands of Peel; the political emancipation of Nonconformists and of Roman Catholics was obviously at hand, and formed the subjects of ardent strife; Parliamentary reform threatened a revolution in the near future. It was an era of great causes and struggling principles, which powerfully appealed to all minds in which the love of freedom and the sense of justice were strong, and in which there was any consciousness of power to aid the right cause and to combat the wrong. The young Disraeli, a politician in his schoolboy days, felt no summons to the field. The history of his own race did not bid him sympathize with those who suffered from kindred oppression. The dreadful distress among the poor did not win from him any cry of indignation nor stir him to any efforts for its mitigation or removal. The successive Liberal administrations of Lord Grey and Lord Melbourne, with many weaknesses and follies, and much slothful inaction, yet unloosed one heavy burden after another from the necks of the English people, and opened one closed pathway after another to the energies and talents hitherto denied their free scope. Lord Beaconsfield, in the days which ought to have been those of youthful enthusiasm, gave no help to the work. He watched it closely; he stood by and railed at those who were doing it, striving by scoff and jeer to discredit them. If he did not hinder it, it was for lack of power and not for lack of will. The presence of Canning and Huskisson in the cabinet of Lord Liverpool was a sign that the era in which it had been possible for Burke to be the political dependent of a Marquis of Rockingham and a Duke of Portland, was passing away; and the premiership of Canning confirmed the augury. Yet when Canning was persecuted to his death and Huskisson was driven from office, no word of rebuke or indignation rose to the lips of the young candidate for fame. To him, at a period when every ingenuous and sincere mind was stirred to noble thoughts and strenuous action, politics and politicians were simply the theme of literary satire or a field for personal intrigue and adventure. At a time when in literature the meditations of Wordsworth and the speculations of Coleridge, the hardy realism of Crabbe, the mystic dreams of Shelley, the generous enthusiasm of Byron in his better moods, and the manly historic sense of Scott, had breathed a new and healthier soul into English imagination, the young Disraeli felt no contagious inspiration of nobleness, and took his place among the novelists of high life and of political society, with Theodore Hook and the author of "Tremaine," with Mrs. Gore and Lady Blessington. A free and generous spirit would have raised itself above the degrading influences of a servile condition and ancestry. Lord Beaconsfield, in his boyhood, as in his manhood and old age, was content now to flatter, now to mock and gibe, to be now the parasite and now the bravo of the great, to write now a begging and now a threatening letter. The ten years which preceded his entrance into

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Parliament contained the promise which has been fulfilled in the forty years of his Parliamentary life.

Lord Beaconsfield's first adventure was literary rather than political; but it was literature with a large element of politics in it. "Vivian Grey," or rather the first part of it, which is alone much remembered now, appeared in 1826, when the author was just of age. It was written probably in his latest boyhood. Lord Beaconsfield affects now to be ashamed of the work, which he says that he has vainly endeavored to suppress. He speaks of it as a puerile production; but it really does not differ morally or intellectually from most of his other novels. The survival of boyishness in "Lothair" and the premature mannishness of "Vivian Grey" bring both stories to about the same level. Apart from the contemporary allusions with which each work is filled, "Vivian Grey" might have been the child of Lord Beaconsfield's old age and "Lothair" the indiscretion of his youth. The work of the sexagenarian lacks ripeness and maturity; the work of the boy has no tinge of ingenuousness. It lacks the hue of virtue. Rather the advantage is in this respect with the more recent work, which has not the unabashed hardihood of the earlier. In "Vivian Grey," however, the key-note of Lord Beaconsfield's career is struck. We need not tell the story which is familiar to every one. The type of character is that of the adventurer bent upon climbing by whatever means to the highest point of ambition. He fails, and there is a good deal of virtuous moralizing about his crimes and faults. In Vivian Grey, as in Contarini Fleming — the person, we mean, and not the novel — there is a curious blending of Beaumarchais and of Byron. The slippery adventurer, who is not much above the moral or intellectual level of the intriguing slave and valet of the classical and French comedy, is mixed up with the grand passions, the crime, and the remorse of Lara and the Corsair; and the combination is not a little ridiculous. But the basis of the character is the impudent schemer.

The story, as we have said, or rather its first part, was published in 1826, and it bears some traces of the time of its production. Lord Liverpool was prime minister, and when the second part of "Vivian Grey" appeared, he had been succeeded by Mr. Canning, of whom, and of Brougham, and Lord Eldon, there are perhaps traces in Mr. Charlatan Gas, Mr. Foaming Fudge, and Lord Past Century, though we have the names only and not the men. Who Mr. Stapyltan Toad and Mr. Liberal Snake may have been, it is not worth while to inquire. Sir Christopher Mowbray, who, on Liberal Snake's "presuming to inform him what rent was, damned himself several times from sheer astonishment at the impudence of the fellow," and whose "most peculiar characteristic was an inexplicable habit of styling political economists French smugglers," is perhaps the liveliest sketch in the book. Sir Christopher, we are told, "is perfectly aware of the present perilous state of the country, and watches with the greatest interest all the plots and plans of this enlightened age. The only thing which he does not exactly comprehend is the London University. This affair really puzzles the worthy gentleman, who could as easily fancy a county member not being a freeholder, as a university not being at Oxford or Cambridge. Indeed, to this hour, the old gentleman believes that the whole business is a hoax, and if you tell him that . . . there are actually four acres of very valuable land purchased near White Conduit Street for the erection . . . the old gentleman looks up to heaven, as if determined not to be taken in, and leaning back in his chair, sends forth a sceptical and smiling, 'No! no! no! that won't do.'" In Sir Christopher Mowbray damning French wines, Bible societies, and Mr. Huskisson, surrounded by lecturing political economists, and incredulous of the London University; in the inarticulate man of science, Mr. Macaw, who is contrasted with "the mealy-mouthed professors of the Royal Institution, who get patronized by the blues — the Lavoisiers of May Fair," a sneer we take it at Sir Humphry Davy or Faraday; in Mr. Stapyltan Toad's pamphlet on the Corn Laws, "which excited the dire indignation of the Political Economy Club," — the commencement of what we may call the Brougham period of politics may be noted. The schoolmaster began to get abroad, and men talked about the popularization of science and the diffusion of useful knowledge. The movement which may be supposed to have its personification in the contest between Lord Past Century and Mr. Liberal Principles had its weak and even its ludicrous side. "Vivian Grey" cannot be said to give a full picture of it in its earliest stage; still there are in the book glimpses of it, drawn in a sketchy and scratchy manner, but showing a conception of its real character.

To Lord Beaconsfield, as a boy, the situation on its literary side seems simply

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

to have offered him opportunities as a satirist, and if he had made a literary career his own, this mode of treating the society of his time would not have been fairly open to severe censure. There are men to whom the cynical view of human life is natural, as there are others to whom life presents itself simply in its artistic aspects. The indifference of Goethe to the great struggles of his age showed a constitutional defect of character; and the mocking temper which is always conspicuous in "Vivian Grey," and is unabated in "Lothair," is not an amiable feature of youth or of old age. If Lord Beaconsfield had been content to play the part of a gibing chorus to the drama passing under his eyes, it would have been matter for regret that he should have seen only one aspect of the human and English life of his time; but that too ought to be seen, and it can be seen through his eyes. For other phases of it we must trust to the perceptions of other intellects and characters. The real ignobleness which is impressed on Lord Beaconsfield's writings and political life lies in this, that while men with any greatness of character withdraw from the pursuits and associations for which they feel a contempt, Lord Beaconsfield has been impelled into them in spite of, or even by, this very scorn. The meannesses and weaknesses which he ridiculed he felt could turn to the account of his own ambition. The satirist was also an adventurer.

His early manhood was the beginning of a period which seemed to promise a new epoch. The cabinet of Lord Liverpool in 1826, when in "Vivian Grey" Lord Beaconsfield took his first survey of English society and politics, contained two men of genius on whom the hatred of aristocratic dulness and monopoly had conferred the name of adventurers. Mr. Canning and Mr. Huskisson had fought their way from difficult and inconsiderable beginnings to high places in the service of the State. Surrounded by heavy peers and squires, in a ministry presided over by the very genius of decorous respectability, their political fortunes may have helped to fire the ambition of the younger Disraeli, who perhaps saw a Marquis of Carabas in Lord Liverpool and a Vivian Grey in Mr. Canning. But though Canning and Huskisson, and before them Burke, were stigmatized as adventurers, and although in a certain sense the name belongs to them, they cannot be brought into the same class with Lord Beaconsfield. With a truer self-respect, Burke perhaps would not have been content to serve great nobles, and to be rewarded in his earlier years with a private secretaryship under Lord Rockingham and in his maturer manhood with an office outside the cabinet into which Charles Fox, while yet a youth, was admitted. Something of the servility which the prevalence of an aristocratic system produces even in genius and worth, is apparent in his submission. But Burke's too humble attitude was redeemed by passionate political convictions and by devoted personal attachments. He served these in serving his great Whig patrons. Canning never failed in his enthusiasm for Pitt and in his steady friendship with Jenkinson; and Huskisson's consistency as an economic statesman was born of unwavering conviction. These men were adventurers in politics only in the sense in which the man, who, not being born in the purple, wins his way to fortune is an adventurer; or as the founder, by genius and enterprise, of a great commercial house, which he has raised from low beginnings or from nothing, is an adventurer, when he is compared with the inheritor of a business that has dealings with all the world. In the sense in which the word carries moral odium with it, as implying indifference to persons and principles, it is not applicable to them. This is the sense in which it is used when it is injuriously applied to Lord Beaconsfield; and this use of the term, we fear, his career too conclusively justifies. In his interpretation of the motives of the great man whose unworn title he has audaciously borrowed, Lord Beaconsfield throws a strong light upon his own aims. He thinks that Burke's passionate denunciation of the French Revolution was simply a vehicle for his exploding hatred of the Whigs whom he had served for hire, and who had kept his wages from him. When Fox was admitted to the cabinet, from which he was excluded, "hard necessity," says Lord Beaconsfield, "made Mr. Burke submit to the yoke, but the humiliation could never be forgotten. Pouring forth the vials of his hoarded vengeance . . . he dashed to the ground the rival who had robbed him of his hard-earned greatness," and "rent in twain the oligarchy that had dared to use and to insult him." We quote from "Sybil," one of the novels of Lord Beaconsfield's maturer manhood. Lord Beaconsfield reads his own political spite and malice into the majestic though disordered movements of Burke's genius. He attributes to him the anger of a discarded and slighted ser-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

vant. He fancies that the author of the "Appeal from the New to the Old Whigs" was animated by the neo-Judaic hatred of a Venetian oligarchy.

The second part of "Vivian Grey," which only survives in a dead-alive union with the first, is a sort of prose "Childe Harold." The penitent wanderings of the discomfited adventurer have picturesque and amusing passages; but the political allusions are few. Lord Beaconsfield has himself imitated in later years the policy of the plebeian minister of the Grand Duke of Reisenburg, who took care to distribute offices among great nobles, so that, having no family influence of his own, he might organize the family influence of others. In this, says the author of "Vivian Grey," "he resembles the prime minister of a neighboring State, whose private secretary is unable to write a sentence, almost to direct a letter, but he is a noble." Mr. Canning was then prime minister of England, and Lord George Bentinck was, we believe, his private secretary.

In 1828 Lord Beaconsfield published the "Adventures of Captain Popanilla." One of the most remarkable things about this work is the fact that the author has forgotten that he ever wrote it. In the general preface prefixed to one of the later editions of "Lothair," Lord Beaconsfield speaks of "Contarini Fleming" as his second work. It was really, at the very least, his fourth, — "Popanilla" and "The Young Duke," a three-volume novel, coming between it and "Vivian Grey." Lord Beaconsfield appears to labor under the curious notion that by suppressing a passage or a book he makes it never to have been, and becomes justified in asserting that no such thing was ever written. When in 1864 a question was raised as to the tyrannicidal doctrines attributed to Mazzini, and the complicity of a subordinate member of Lord Palmerston's government in the enterprises of the great Italian revolutionist, Lord Beaconsfield was virtuously indignant, and did not rest until the offending member had been cut off. In the mean time some curious busybody — perhaps the person who afterwards traced a celebrated eulogy on the Duke of Wellington to M. Thiers — got hold of a copy of "The Revolutionary Epick," and quoted thence some lines which justified tyrannicide as explicitly as Mazzini was supposed to have done. To clear himself from this accusation, and to enable the public to judge between him and his calumniators, Lord Beaconsfield promptly republished the poem, leaving out the lines impugned. More recently he has adapted a still more thorough procedure. In the preface of which we have spoken, he intimates that between 1832 and 1837 he wrote nothing at all. "There was yet a barren interval of five years of my life, so far as literature is concerned." "The Revolutionary Epick," which was published in 1834, is thus got rid of in the most effectual manner. This is hurling his lyre to limbo with a vengeance. "I'll disown you, I'll disinherit you, I'll unget you," says Sir Anthony Absolute to his son. Lord Beaconsfield apparently thinks that by disowning he can unwrite such of his works as he no longer finds it agreeable to acknowledge. He can not only make them cease to be, but cause them never to have been. But this is a feat which it is proverbially beyond the power of omnipotence to accomplish — factum infectum facere nequit. Since he achieved respectability, Lord Beaconsfield has thought it necessary to affect a certain degree of penitence for having written "Vivian Grey." He emulates the contrition of Chaucer and Dryden. Such, he represents, was his sense of the demerits of the work, that when his second novel was published, he did not describe himself as the author of that story. The fact is that "Popanilla," which was published in 1828; "The Young Duke," which was published in 1831; "Alroy," which was published in 1833; and "Venetia," which was published in 1837, were all described on the title-pages as by "the author of 'Vivian Grey.'" They were recommended to the public by that fact. "Contarini Fleming," which, as we have said, was neither the second nor the third, but the fourth of Lord Beaconsfield's works, is the only one on the title-page of which "Vivian Grey" is not mentioned. This work, afterwards called a "psychological romance," was originally announced as a "psychological autobiography." There was therefore an obvious propriety in veiling its real authorship. Lord Beaconsfield, however, having persuaded himself that "Vivian Grey" was repented of as soon as written, proceeds to make a series of circumstantial statements in corroboration of that fact. The origin and growth of myths is thus pleasingly illustrated in an example to which historic inquirers ought to attach some value. A fixed idea generates a detailed narrative to support and confirm it. The idea gives credit to the narrative, and the narrative supports the idea, and yet both are fiction.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

It is interesting to observe the processes which have created religions in operation before our very eyes. A myth, it should be observed, does not involve conscious falsehood, but only a creative imagination embodying its conceptions in narratives, and straightway believing the narrative because it embodies its conceptions.

There are, of course, reasons why Lord Beaconsfield should be desirous of ignoring "Popanilla" and "The Revolutionary Epick," and should regret that "Vivian Grey's" tenacity of life has resisted all attempts to smother it. "Popanilla" does not respect the foundations of society, and there are passages in it which the future leader of the protectionist party might be excused for wishing to deal with as the assailant of Mazzini and Mr. Stansfeld dealt with the tyrannicidal preachments of "The Revolutionary Epick." It is impossible to avoid some association of "Popanilla" with its author. The shipwrecked adventurer, brought from the island of Fantaisie to the coast of Vraibleusia, and mingling with the crowds in the streets of Hubbabub, was not more foreign to the scenes and people among whom he found himself, than the younger Disraeli in the politics and society of London. The description of the statue, of the aboriginal inhabitants, and of the twelve managers, in which the sovereign, the landed aristocracy, and the cabinet were ridiculed, is perhaps the cleverest portion of "Popanilla." In the arrangements which the aboriginal inhabitant makes for forcing his own agricultural produce on the inhabitants of Vraibleusia, the doctrine and practice of protection to native industry is openly ridiculed. It is clear that at this turn of his life he was fully possessed of the arguments in favor of free trade, and understood them more clearly than might have been expected. His eulogies in other works on the economic doctrines which Shelburne and the younger Pitt derived from Adam Smith, show that until political exigencies made the advocacy of protection expedient, Lord Beaconsfield was a free-trader. His phrases vary as occasion suggests, but his general doctrine is unmistakable. The story is a clever, boyish parody and imitation, which shows enough acquaintance with the terms of the political, philosophical, and religious fashions of the time to enable the author to make fun of them. Lord Beaconsfield has never thought it necessary to go much deeper into matters than phrases and catchwords will lead him. Mankind, in his view, is governed by phrases and catchwords, and to study thoroughly what you do not intend to treat thoroughly would be a waste of time. Lord Beaconsfield has never treated either his subjects or the public seriously, and the public has been content to laugh at and with him until the present moment, when it may begin to think itself of the crackling of thorns under the pot.

In such exercises as these, and in the travels in Europe and the East to which we have referred, Lord Beaconsfield prepared himself for that public life in which he was anxious to play a conspicuous part. In the preface to "Lothair," of which we have before spoken, he lays claim to a sort of political consistency. He represents himself as having through life avowed certain principles, which were the result of early study and meditation. "Born in a library and trained from early childhood by learned men who did not share the passions and prejudices of our political and social life, I had imbibed on some subjects conclusions different from those which generally prevail, and especially with reference to the history of our own country." Lord Beaconsfield then proceeds to set forth, in language suitable to a man who had been, and hoped to be again prime minister of England, and who was still leader of the Conservative party, some ghostly shadow of the old doctrines about the doge and the Venetian oligarchy, though those familiar names are never mentioned. He was not, however, so exclusively the recluse student working out his own solitary conclusions in his natal library and among the learned men who trained his early childhood, as might be fancied from the description. The discipline of a Dissenting boarding-school and the bustle of an attorney's office had their share with the learned men who were free from the passions and prejudices of our political and social life, in the formation of the young Disraeli's mind and character. Familiarity with these passions and prejudices, wheresoever derived, is more conspicuous in "Vivian Grey," "Popanilla," and "The Young Duke" than new readings of English history and theories of the English constitution. These appear later in Lord Beaconsfield's life and writings. The library and the learned men have probably had very little to do with them, except in furnishing an imposing and half-barbarous jargon of magnificoes and doges, in which the new doctrines were expressed for the greater bewilderment of the public, prepared to take omne ignotum pro magnifico. Lord Beaconsfield's view of the British constitution at the commencement

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

of his political adventures may be briefly expressed. It was a view from the outside. Its high walls and closed doors and barred windows were the objects presented to his gaze, and he resolved to surmount them. In a man who has a high conception of politics, and who is eager to level unjust barriers that stand in the way of others as well as himself, attack upon oligarchic monopoly and privilege may be commended as a noble and generous enterprise. To Lord Beaconsfield, however, by his repeated confession, and still more emphatically by the clear tenor of his life and writings, politics have been simply an exciting game in which he desired to take part, and politicians have formed an exclusive society into which he was resolved to force himself. The exclusion which he resented was the exclusion of himself.

There has been much discussion as to whether Lord Beaconsfield made his first appearance in politics as a Tory, or as a Radical, or as a Tory-Radical. The fact is that he was an anti-Whig, and his Toryism, or Radicalism, or Tory-Radicalism, were only so many phases of his opposition to the Whigs and their oligarchical beati possidentes. We need not go into the details of Lord Beaconsfield's candidature for High Wycombe, and his unsuccessful overtures to other constituencies, until his election for Maidstone in 1837. The story has been sufficiently told in Mr. Macknight's able biography, and is repeated with more detail in the carefully compiled volume entitled, "Benjamin Disraeli, Earl of Beaconsfield." He stood twice in 1832 for the first-named borough; issued, in hope of a vacancy which did not occur, an address to the electors of Marylebone in 1833; and stood unsuccessfully against the late Mr. Labouchere for Taunton in 1835. In the latter year he first appeared distinctly as a Conservative. Up till then he had hovered between Toryism and Radicalism, advocating the measures proposed by Mr. Hume and Mr. O'Connell on grounds drawn from the writings and the conduct of Bolingbroke and Sir William Wyndham, who were in favor of triennial Parliaments, and who, for good reasons, had certainly never said anything against vote by ballot or the repeal of the taxes on knowledge. In 1834 Lord Beaconsfield appears to have been still hesitating between the two elements of his Tory-Radicalism. According to a passage in the late Mr. Greville's diary, he was undecided whether to seek his Marquis of Carabas in Lord Chandos or in Lord Durham. One thing only is clear. Lord Beaconsfield was bent on a political career, and found that the exclusiveness of the Whig oligarchy was the main obstacle in his way. His hatred of the Whigs was, we believe, genuine, and it dressed itself up in the guise of a principle. Political adventurers who are not content to be the mere servants and lackeys of a great lord, have usually played either one or other of two games. They may be courtiers or they may be demagogues; they may flatter the mob, or they may be the sycophants of the crown. They sometimes play these parts in succession, as Wilkes did. They have not often combined them at one and the same time. This, however, is what Lord Beaconsfield has done. The crown and the multitude are set forth as natural allies against a rapacious, recreant, and haughty Parliament. The Reform Act is described as issuing out of "the popular frenzy of a mean and selfish revolution, which emancipated neither the crown nor the people." The cause for which Hampden died in the field and Sydney on the scaffold was the cause of the Venetian republic. From the very beginning of his career, Lord Beaconsfield has doubled the apparently inconsistent parts of king's friend and mobsman. Under different conditions, and with a different ultimate object, he has played the same game in England as Louis Napoleon played in France. It is singular, however, that his political detestation of the aristocracy has been accompanied by an enormous social veneration of them. As a novelist, he is never easy when he is in any other society. His veneration, it is true, is mainly for their houses, their furniture, their grounds, and their liveries. His novels abound in descriptions of the mansions and parks of great people, all done in the style of a great auctioneer's advertisements. The tone and phrases of the house-furnisher, the appraiser, and the salesman run through all the still life of his novels. A tailor matching patterns, unrolling his sample-book, and combining a sweet thing in waistcoats with an article he can recommend for trousers, is the image which Lord Beaconsfield's inventory of the dresses of his heroes recalls. To him the emperor Hadrian is almost at the head of mankind as being "the most sumptuous character of antiquity." A love of power, wealth, and finery, and a mixed hatred and reverence of the persons who possess them, is the common inspiration of Lord Beaconsfield's politics and of his literature. In the curious mixture of servility and of mockery which runs

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

through his description of the lives and conversation of the high nobility, where reverence ends and contempt begins it is impossible to say. They are both obviously there, and, inconsistent as they seem, they are inextricably mixed.

This habit of mind, this inability to see much except the results of a large income and a patronage bestowed, wholly regardless of expense, on the tailor, the jeweller, the house-furnisher, and the ornamental gardener, are as the tares which choke the wheat in Lord Beaconsfield's writings. There are every now and then glimpses of better feelings and of a more disinterested enjoyment of what is beautiful in nature and in human life; but these things are evanescent. The angry sense of exclusion and the greed of coveted possession deform and discolor all but here and there a few pages. Apart from the purely satirical passages, the most natural and skilful touches are those in which the talk and games of boys, their brag and self-confidence, their absolute theories of life and purposes of action unqualified by a dream of failure, are set forth; with a certain humor that is not without its veiled pathos. There is some delicacy, too, mixed with much fine writing and superfine sentiment of the Minerva Press school in Lord Beaconsfield's heroines. Women do not enter into competition with men, and there is no sense therefore of struggle with rivals fortunately placed, to embitter his views of them. On the whole, the sort of mixture of a fitful generosity and nobleness, with the recklessness of the brigand and pirate of the circulating library, marks Lord Beaconsfield's earlier stories.

In these social feelings, the hatred of a plebeian and of a man of foreign origin and despised race, for an aristocracy whose power he would have liked to share, whose houses, grounds, clothes, and jewellery he admired, and in whose society he pined to live, we get the inspiration of Lord Beaconsfield's policy, clothed in phrases borrowed from Bolingbroke. In 1834 he was elected a member of the Westminster Reform Club, and in the following year he appeared at Taunton as the candidate of the Conservative Club and the supporter of Sir Robert Peel. These are facts not involving greater inconsistencies than those which mark every period of his life. He has been everything except a Whig, not only in succession, but simultaneously. His conflict with O'Connell, arising out of a speech made during his unsuccessful candidature at Taunton, has a certain interest as illustrating the qualities which were displayed by Lord Beaconsfield later in life in his assaults on Sir Robert Peel. He had courted O'Connell's political support when he was candidate three years before at High Wycombe. He had indulged in private expressions of esteem and regard, which amounted to a solicitation of O'Connell's friendship. But O'Connell, after denouncing the base, bloody, and brutal Whigs, was supposed to have entered into the agreement with them known as the Tichfield House Compact. Next to his love of the Jews, Lord Beaconsfield's strongest passion, as we have seen, has been hatred of the Whigs; and O'Connell and Lord Melbourne's administration were both denounced in terms which our readers would not thank us for repeating. O'Connell repaid his assailant in kind. The license of political and personal controversy was more excessive than it is now; but it may be safely said that English gentlemen, of the attainments and intellectual power of either of the two combatants, could not have indulged in the reciprocal ribaldry and insult with which they bespattered each other. O'Connell and Mr. Disraeli, however, came each from a servile race and a proscribed and insulted religion. Through no fault of their own, the vices of slaves were in their hearts and found expression in their tongues. Self-respect was difficult to men whose ancestors through a long course of centuries had been taught to cringe under a yoke, and who, when they did not speak low and in a bondsman's key, exploded in violent and indecent insults. We have spoken of the vices of slaves as illustrated in this reciprocal vituperation. We ought rather to have said that they displayed the vices of freedmen, from whom the restraints of servitude have been removed, but who have not yet learned the moral restraints of personal self-respect.

The parallel does, however, some injustice to O'Connell. With some of the vices of the slave, the railing and licentious tongue, and the slippery and tricky nature, he combined the large and generous impulses of the patriot. Whether he had the self-denial which would have accepted poverty, or exile, or unpopularity for a just but losing cause, is fairly open to question. There are few traces in him of the temperament of the hero or of the martyr. But, though he had not the sensitive and exacting honor which would shrink from a paid and retained patriotism; though he did not feel that

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the suspicion of selling himself to the advocacy of aims which he knew to be illusions was at any cost to be shunned; there is no reason whatsoever for thinking that the paid patriot would ever have been the purchased apostate. Justice and freedom, his country and his Church, were not simply articles of merchandise in which he carried on a trade: they were to him, in spite of many meaner and debasing elements, a sacred inspiration. This large and generous nature could feel the fascination of a great and noble cause. The mixture of the buffoon and the mountebank with the patriot and the national liberator, belongs to the transition period in Irish history and character. The old servitude and the newer freedom blend in this ambiguous result.

The disgrace of this gladiatorial combat of manumitted slaves rests largely with the nation which, by proscribing them, their race, and their faith, helped to make them what they were. The penalty rests with it too. Sinister interests, and powerful influences which are not English, sway English politics. Finance and religion are cosmopolitan, and men whose country is their counting-house indirectly govern us. The rulers of the synagogue are more largely than is suspected the rulers of England. Lord Beaconsfield's language to O'Connell, as his language afterwards to Peel, passing at once from fulsome eulogy to unmeasured vituperation, simply exhibits the transition from the obsequiousness of the mercenary seeking a place to the insolence of the mercenary refused or dismissed from one. In the "Letters of Runnymede," which appeared in the following year, these qualities are very conspicuous. The author directly addresses the leading Whig statesmen of the day by name in terms of personal insult, which do not differ from the abuse with which a street-beggar who has been denied alms will sometimes pursue a passer-by.

In 1834, as we have seen from Mr. Greville's diary, Mr. Disraëli was hesitating between two patrons. There was a chance of his entering Parliament as a Radical by Lord Durham's aid, and some hope of doing so as a Tory by the help of Lord Lyndhurst. From whatever motive, the latter course was decided upon; and Mr. Disraeli went down to Taunton in 1835. Possibly his friendship for Lord Lyndhurst decided him. In the preface to "Lothair," which contains Lord Beaconsfield's latest confessions, he speaks of Lord Lyndhurst as one of the two best friends he ever had. Lord Beaconsfield is just the man to appreciate the brilliant intellectual gifts of Lyndhurst, and he passes what may be a just eulogy upon the qualities he displayed in private life, "the tenderness of his disposition, the sweetness of his temper, his ripe scholarship, and the playfulness of his bright and airy spirit." Lord Lyndhurst's ostentatious indifference to political principles, and the readiness with which he took the large retaining fee of professional employment and promotion, by which he was bought off from the Liberal side in politics, and became the advocate of Tory principles, are not likely to have impressed Lord Beaconsfield unfavorably. Scruples, he has said, are usually the creatures of perplexity, not of conscience; and he would have thought Lord Lyndhurst a fool to have thrown away his chances. The friendship of the two men had one political result in the "Letter to a Noble and Learned Lord in Vindication of the English Constitution," which was published in 1835, the year following that in which "The Revolutionary Epick" appeared. The "Vindication" does not rank as a permanent contribution to English political philosophy. It is a queer medley of Burke and Bolingbroke, whose streams of thought do not readily mix, with that sort of Tory-democratic doctrine in which renegade Radicals often endeavor to hide their apostasy.

The second of the two best friends Lord Beaconsfield ever had was "the inimitable D'Orsay, the most accomplished and the most engaging character that has figured in this century, who with the form and universal genius of an Alcibiades, combined a brilliant wit and a heart of quick affection, and who, placed in a public position, would have displayed a courage, a judgment, and a commanding intelligence which would have ranked him with the leaders of mankind." "Henrietta Temple," which was dedicated to Count D'Orsay, contains a portrait of him under the name of Count Alcibiades de Mirabel, from which one may judge of the qualities which in Lord Beaconsfield's view went to form the most accomplished and engaging character of this century. It might be unfair to judge the hero by the hero-worshipper; but it is not unfair to judge the hero-worshipper by the hero, or at any rate by his idealized conception of the hero. Count Alcibiades de Mirabel is a glorified Beau Brummel; and although the fault may be in Lord Beaconsfield's portraiture, the type of character is not

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

doubtful. A dashing and showy social adventurer, who would have been a first-rate drawing-master, music-master, writing-master, French master, elocution master, riding-master, courier, tailor, or cook — a master of all those arts by which "our life is only drest for show: mean handi-work of craftsman, cook or groom" — is to Lord Beaconsfield, in his advanced age, the most accomplished and engaging character and universal genius of the century. The impulses which inspire the reason, and direct the conscience, and shape the life to nobler ends than political advancement or social enjoyment, are left out of his reckoning. His gaze is fixed on the D'Orsays, and the Tom Duncombes, and the Louis Napoleons, with whom he associated at Gore House, the spendthrifts and adventurers and conspirators who found themselves in salons to which "gentlemen" only (gentlemen as distinguished from ladies) went. Prince Louis Napoleon conquered a precarious respectability by his reception at Windsor. Lord Beaconsfield achieved a similar position when he was acknowledged by the late Lord Derby. His properly political life begins with his entrance into Parliament in 1837 on the accession of the queen. His literary career was at the same time brought to a pause of seven years, which was broken in 1844 by the publication of "Coningsby." The two stories, "Venetia" and "Henrietta Temple," published in 1837, and dedicated to Lord Lyndhurst and Count D'Orsay, have no political motive or character. They are attempts in pure art, and cannot be deemed successful save in a few strokes of social satire. Byron is out-Byronized, and the Werther period of Goethe out-Werthered. In "Venetia" Caduras and Herbert are recognizable as Byron and Shelley, not by any truth of portraiture, but by plagiarism from their real lives. Lord Beaconsfield's dealings with the grand passions always suggest the Porte St. Martin and the Surrey Theatre. His heroic vein lies perilously near to the mock heroic. There is a genuine breath of social and political satire animating his works which might have earned him a more honorable place in English literature than the Parliamentary career, on the threshold of which we leave him for the present, has won for him in English history.

In writing this sketch, we lay our account with some censure, which we have no choice but to confront. The public career of Lord Beaconsfield is in our view the opprobrium of English politics during the past forty years, and his political character is, in the situation which he holds, a danger and defiance to England, and a threat to the peace of the world. There can be no reason why, without exaggeration, but without reserve, we should not say what we believe to be the truth about it. In discussing the actions of a politician from day to day it is neither desirable nor possible to be always examining character. Life is too short for business of that sort. The man must be taken for granted, in the position to which he has raised himself, and in which the public sees him with acquiescence, and even maintains him with deliberate purpose. But this abeyance, for convenience' sake, of the moral judgment — this refusal to raise the previous question of general character and motives at every step in social intercourse or every stage of the public business — certainly does not involve the permanent renunciation of moral judgment. It is impossible to leave men to the appreciation of history only. To treat Lord Beaconsfield as if he were a Chatham, would simply be ludicrous twenty-five years hence. No one will grudge any paradox-monger of the twentieth century an amusement of that sort, if he can find nothing better or more plausible. But what will be historic folly then is a very present danger now, a danger against which it is impossible to guard without what is called attacking an individual. We speak only of Lord Beaconsfield's public character. His admirers have not even the least right to protest against personality in politics. The life of their hero has been little more than a series of personal assaults.

This example, however, is the last by which we should desire to justify ourselves, and we have no intention of imitating it. The motive which has urged us to the task of studying his political career is of a different order. At present the doctrine of the personal power is loudly proclaimed. An attempt is being made to revive the pretensions which George III. strove unsuccessfully to assert. This effort has always been tried under foreign inspiration. An able German, Baron Stockmar, undertook to instruct the prince consort in the theory and practice of the British constitution, and the ideas of the prince consort were, of course, transmitted to the queen, and shaped her practice. English statesmen, by a careless compliance, due in part to the deference which they found it difficult to withhold from one whom, to use a phrase of Lord Palmers-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ton's, both as a sovereign and a lady it was unbecoming to thwart, too hastily yielded assent to doubtful pretensions. They even framed a theory of the constitution to suit these ideas. Lord John Russell consented, on a celebrated occasion, to become the mouthpiece of Stockmarism in the House of Commons. The speech which he delivered when the action of the prince consort was called in question, has become historic. It is habitually cited by apologists who desire to aggrandize the power and functions of the crown. Like almost all attempts to frame a theory of the constitution, it sought the living among the dead. By the time that a scheme of the English constitution is concocted, it has almost of necessity ceased to be true. Depending, as the constitution does, upon a balance of powers and forces which are in a constant state of relative growth and decline, the theory, even if it be brought up to the very latest date at the time when it is framed, is pretty sure to be out of date at the time when it is published. The position of things has changed. Baron Stockmar and the prince consort, drawing their doctrine out of old English books and historic precedents, illustrated by foreign, and chiefly German, analogies, adopted a procedure more certain perhaps than any other that could be devised, to lead them astray. Even if they possessed, as they certainly did not, the flexibility of mind and quickness of intuitive perception needful to discern the genius of a people and the character of institutions foreign to their personal experience, the method which they employed, and the conditions which surrounded them as observers, were almost of a necessity fatal to success. A court, even a court so pure as that of England, is the very last place in which Parliamentary government can be fairly studied. A prince consort, even a prince consort so admirable in intention, so respectable in character, so conscientious and painstaking in every relation of life as Prince Albert was, is the very last person to comprehend the working of Parliamentary institutions so developed as those of England. It is too rough to be congenial to a situation so delicate, difficult, and even equivocal as that of the husband of a reigning queen, and the father of an heir-apparent to the throne. The assistance of a kind of private physician-minister, such as Baron Stockmar was, would make matters rather worse than better. The disposition to minimize Parliamentary authority, and to assert an influence of the court and of the crown above and beyond them, is in such circumstances inevitable. The premature death of the prince consort, the withdrawal of the queen for a long term of years from active interest in political affairs, and the long premierships of Lord Palmerston and Mr. Gladstone, men very dissimilar in most respects, but neither of them courtiers, nor possessing the qualities likely to make them the favorites of court favorites — men of great natural vigor of character, of strong purpose, and of resolute political convictions — all these things have contributed to keep in check for a time the assumptions which Baron Stockmar encouraged. Under Lord Beaconsfield's administration they have revived, and revived in a more mischievous form and under worse guidance than ever before. They are ostentatiously set forth in courtier-like memoirs appearing under the royal sanction, and in political manifestoes of important Conservative organs. They fit in with the doctrines which Lord Beaconsfield has professed with more steadiness than any other of his fluctuating opinions, and which he probably seriously entertains. They are likely enough to receive very mischievous development at his hands — a development in which there may be the seeds of future troubles, unless a more modest view of the functions of the crown in the constitution than that which he encourages, be adopted and acted upon in future. The personal power of the monarch is in danger of becoming either a means of thwarting a minister who has the confidence of the country without the good-will of the sovereign; or, what might be yet more calamitous, the personal power of an adroit flatterer and a daring adventurer is likely, under forms of obsequious submission, to take the place of the personal power of the monarch. Cardinal Wolsey wrote, Ego et rex meus. Lord Beaconsfield makes a very near approach sometimes to a similar egotism. It is no longer possible to treat him with the half-contemptuous indulgence that was thought to be due to a political comedian. Up till 1874 Mr. Disraeli was treated by the whole political press of England as a joke, although he was often treated — and especially in the Quarterly Review — as a very misplaced and untimely joke. In 1878, without being a serious personage, he holds very serious issues in his hands. It is essential that men should be reminded what manner of man he is, to whom the English people, the English Parliament, and the queen of England, have committed a sort of political dictatorship.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

From Fraser's Magazine.

THE AZORES.

THE satisfaction felt by most Englishmen with the English climate is undoubtedly a salutary sentiment. If a man has to spend six months out of every twelve amidst wet and cold and darkness, it is surely well that he should be content to regard these phenomena as seasonable and healthful. To belong to the dissenting minority who are unable to accept this article of the national creed is a distinct misfortune. "The weather, indeed, is not benign," wrote Johnson, giving an account of his health to Dr. Brocklesby a few months before his death; "but how low is he sunk whose strength depends upon the weather!"

It was on a January day of gloom and drizzle, now some few years ago, that we, being of the number of these lowly sunken men, made our way on board the vessel that was to carry us from the port of Bristol to a more congenial clime. She was a little fruit schooner of ninety-eight tons, temporarily fitted up to accommodate a few passengers. The steamers which now make the voyage between the Azores and England in seven or eight days, had not yet begun to supplant their pretty predecessors in the fruit trade. As seems always to happen when an English merchantman is starting on a voyage, it turned out at the last moment that some of the crew who had signed articles were drunk and others were missing, but these difficulties being in the end surmounted we proceeded on our way. Two days afterwards we took our departure, as navigators express it, from Hartland Point, a lonely promontory stretching far out into the wintry sea. Then came a week of wretchedness, not without some admixture of the ludicrous for those who could laugh while they were miserable — of contrary gales, of seas shipped, of disheartening projects of putting back into Milford Haven or Queenstown — of sea-sickness, of bedding drenched by rush of water down the cabin stairs, of overturned coffee-pots and soup-tureens, of the swallowing by stewards of restoratives intended for prostrate sufferers. Next came a day when all things seemed to be suddenly changed, and it was found that the decks were dry, the motion of the vessel moderate, and the sun for the first time shining. We were at length fast slipping out of winter's detested grasp, and thenceforward, day by day, the air grew pleasanter, the skies more brilliant, the wind more favorable and less boisterous. Sparkling blue waves replaced the mud-colored seas that had boarded us in the chops of the Channel, shoals of porpoises joyously gambolled in the waters, and some of the seabirds of southern latitudes began to gather around us.

On the fourteenth morning of our voyage we found ourselves under the eastern end of the island of St. Michael, a mass of rugged mountain. The Pico da Vara, 3,570 feet in height, lay a little way inland, and from its sides huge spurs, separated by dark ravines, protruded into the sea. A glimpse here and there of a pathway winding upwards out of the ravines filled us with a longing, which was afterwards gratified, to explore this wild region. As we sailed along the southern coast the mountains, broken now and then by rents and chasms, continued to tower over us for half the length of the island. But soon between them and the sea a widening belt of cultivated land began to extend itself, and every few miles a little white town, surrounded by orange groves, glistened in the sunshine. As we rounded a rocky point some miles distant from Ponta Delgada, the chief city of St. Michael's, the mountains subsided altogether, and the richest orange district of the island lay extended before us. It is a tract everywhere undulating, and rising here and there into conical hills of some height. Hill and dale were clothed with the dense foliage of the orange, and of the loftier evergreen trees with which every orange plantation is surrounded for the sake of shelter from high winds. The fragrance of the orange blossom reached us at a distance of a mile or two from the shore. So luxurious was the vegetation that it would have seemed monotonous, but that it was relieved by the village churches and country houses scattered amongst the trees; the majority of the latter, as we afterwards found, rough little places enough within, but all of them, as is the Portuguese fashion, gaily whitened or colored externally. Similarly bright were the little watch turrets perched high up, according to Portuguese usage, at many of the prettiest points of view. To the north the prospect was bounded by an irregular range of hills, some bare, some wooded. On the southern horizon lay the smaller island of St. Mary. On the west was the city, and behind it rose the mountain range occupying the western extremity of the island, less lofty, somewhat, than the eastern mountains, but inclosing lakes which, as will hereafter appear, form one of the gems of Azorean scenery.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Ponta Delgada itself, though a large and thriving place, contains little to interest the traveller acquainted with the cities of southern Europe. There is, indeed, a peculiar dulness observable, due chiefly to the prevailing usages respecting the appearance in public of the female sex, which have come down from the time when the population of Portugal was largely Moorish. Instead of the gaily-dressed female peasantry of a Mediterranean town are seen a crowd of figures muffled in dark cloth cloaks, surmounted by helmet-shaped hoods of cloth and whalebone, quite concealing the face, except so much of it as the wearer thinks fit to make visible through a slit or opening in front. While the women of the lower orders are thus enveloped, the ladies of the place seldom appear in the streets on foot at all. From the delights of shopping, as practised in western Europe, most of them live entirely debarred. That any lady should ever be seen in public, except in a carriage, is an innovation most distasteful to Azorean conservatism.

Sight-seeing, in the usual sense of the word, is with all its pleasures and pains unknown. The churches contain nothing æsthetically valuable, except, perhaps, some specimens of wood carving. The rich Azoreans (and some of them are very rich) seek to display their taste and luxury, not in galleries or works of art, but in the laying out and embellishment of ornamental gardens. Most of these gardens are freely thrown open to strangers. The climate, of which the especial characteristic is warmth without aridity, permits a combination of English grass lawns with semi-tropical and tropical trees and flowers unattainable in southern Europe, or even in Madeira. Wandering over well-kept sward, the visitor is surrounded by many of the greenhouse and hothouse plants of Kew and the Crystal Palace, flourishing in unrestricted space, and amplified often a hundredfold in size and vigor. And, after all, there is something of the same difference between a plant thus enjoying its natural freedom, and the same plant imprisoned in a greenhouse, as there must be between the lion of the Sahara and the lion of a wild-beast show.

Scarcely less interesting than these professedly ornamental gardens are many of the gardens in which the sweet and juicy oranges of St. Michael's are cultivated for exportation to England. The beauty of the orange gardens is at its height in winter and early spring, when the golden fruit clusters as thickly as the apples in a Devonshire orchard, and the blossom fills the air with perfume. The delicate little Tangerine orange contrasts here and there with his larger brethren, and various other plants are also allowed to flourish even at some sacrifice of profitable space. Foremost of these is the camellia, for which the Azorean soil and climate are said, with much appearance of truth, to be unequalled. The magnolia and the oleander also thrive exceedingly. Scattered here and there are clumps of the banana, the guava, and the Japanese nespera, or loquat, as it is called in Australia. Pineapples are common, but those which grow in the open air are of indifferent quality. The delicate pines which are exported to England are raised under glass. The vine lingers in many places, through the vine disease is still active enough to make grapes scarce and dear in an island which formerly produced twelve or fifteen thousand pipes of wine a year. In the autumn the beautiful belladonna lily, and a little later the Guernsey lily, and in spring the arum, covers every heap of stones and neglected spot; and throughout the winter roses, heliotropes, geraniums, and fuchsias flower abundantly. Despite the bird-destroying devices of man below, and the açor, or hawk, from which these islands take their name ever hovering overhead, the trees are filled with singing birds. Commonest among these is the canary, much less bright in plumage in all his native Atlantic islands than when domesticated. Blackbirds, robins, and finches, of several species likewise abound, but the ubiquitous sparrow is unknown. So are all venomous reptiles — even toads and lizards. Insects are by no means so numerous or troublesome as in Spain and Italy.

The climate of the Azores, although the vegetation is so luxuriant, is by no means one of uniform tranquillity und sunshine. A gale off these islands is, indeed, a phenomenon which, in winter at least, is exceedingly familiar to seafaring men. The winter of St. Michael's makes itself felt in weeks or fortnights of violent westerly winds and driving rains. These stormy periods occur irregularly between November and April alternating with intervals of genial weather and sunshine, which call to mind by the combination of summer skies with short days a fine September in England. Of real cold there may be said to be none. The average temperature of the coldest month, as given in the tables published by Sir James Clark, is upwards of 55° of Fahrenheit, which is the tempera-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ture of the month of May in London. But as hardly any of the houses have fireplaces or stoves, it is sometimes chilly enough within doors in the winter evenings. The Azorean summers are for the latitude cool, very much cooler certainly than those of Lisbon, Madeira, or the Mediterranean. While according to the tables already referred to the winter of St. Michael's is 18° warmer than that of London, the summer is but 6° warmer, and even this moderate excess of temperature seems mainly due to the uniformity of the warmth. Certainly nothing like the exhausting effect of a very hot day in London is ever felt in the Azores. Equability of temperature, indeed, is from well-understood physical causes the special characteristic of purely oceanic climates. The waters absorb much of the solar heat when it is in excess, and give it out again when the air becomes cooler; in other words, they subtract largely from the temperature of the day to add to that of the night, and from the temperature of the summer to add to that of the winter. Moreover, between the Azores and the cold quarters of the north and north-west the Gulf Stream with its exceptionally high temperature interposes. So happy, indeed, is St. Michael's in the matter of temperature that grumbling at the climate is almost always directed against its dampness. Dampness, however, is of two kinds. The atmosphere may derive an excess of moisture either from contact with the ocean, or from the evaporation which takes place from the surface of impervious soils and in low situations. The damp sea breezes of Devon and Cornwall are not to be confounded with the no less humid airs that may be breathed in the Bedford Level. Now in one of these senses St. Michael's is very damp, but in the other the reverse of damp. The soil is everywhere highly pervious to water, and moreover such part of the rainfall as is not absorbed by the soil is rapidly carried off by streams. On the other hand, however, every breeze that blows comes charged with the salt moisture derived from long contact with the sea. And the humidity of a purely sea atmosphere has its inconveniences. It may be doubted, however, whether it is on the whole at all unfavorable to health.

The lover of mountain scenery who finds himself at St. Michael's soon turns his thoughts from the cultivated district round Ponta Delgada to the fields of exploration that lie beyond. The mountains of the island everywhere display their volcanic origin. Craters of extinct volcanoes, great and small, are clustered around and within one another by scores. Many of these craters are extremely perfect in shape, in the walls of others are wide breeches, or deep fissures eaten out by streams. The mountains are in general composed less of volcanic rocks than of pumice and other loose materials easily acted on by water. There is much less of beetling crag and jagged outline, and more of rounded summit, than in Madeira. Of deep ravines and gullies there seems to be no end. Large evergreen shrubs, amongst them the tree heath, the dwarf cedar, a kind of myrtle, and several varieties of the bay family, form the indigenous clothing of all Azorean uplands. Woods of pine, acacia, chestnut, and of trees without an English name fill many of the mountain valleys. Masses of gigantic ferns abound everywhere. Noisy streams and waterfalls are common. More peculiar to the place are the lakes which occupy the lower portion of some of the more perfect craters. Most of these are small, but there are three in different parts of the island which are several miles in circumference.

As was pointed out with reference to Madeira by the late Mr. William Longman in an article in Fraser's Magazine for August 1875, the climate of the Atlantic islands is not well adapted to mountaineering on foot. There are tolerably good carriage roads over most of the cultivated districts of St. Michael's, but when the mountains are reached the ordinary mode of travelling is on donkeys. Few Azoreans would entrust the safety of their persons on a mountain road to any other beast, but to anybody who has ridden Madeira horses, or Swiss mules, the want of power in even the finest of these sagacious animals is painfully apparent. However, the mountain roads of St. Michael's are in general safer and less precipitous than those of Madeira, so that there is a certain congruity between the roads travelled and the beasts employed.

Our first mountain excursion was to the lakes, inexplicably called the Lakes of the Seven Cities, which lie amongst the western mountains already referred to. From Ponta Delgada we drove for ten or twelve miles along an uninteresting coast, and then mounting our donkeys turned inland up a steep mountain ascent. After an hour's puffing and struggling of the donkeys we reached the edge of what seemed for an instant to be an elevated plateau, and then turning the corner of a rock

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

found all at once at our feet a scene of great beauty. We stood on the brink of a vast crater, an almost perfect circle of fully ten miles in circumference. The mountain walls inclosing it, in spite of some depressions and elevations here and there, seemed surprisingly regular. A thousand feet below us, filling half the bottom of the crater, lay a charming lake, or perhaps more correctly two lakes separated by a narrow causeway. So closely do these lakes approach the walls of the crater that it almost seemed as if we could jump down into the smaller of them from where we stood. On the banks of the larger sheet of water lay a village with white church and houses glistening in the sunshine. The smaller lake was much overhung with woods. Elsewhere from the floor of the great crater rose four or five conical hills, some of them of considerable height, and each enclosing a small but perfectly-shaped crater of its own. Two of these lesser craters have themselves become little lakes, lying several hundred feet above the level of the larger lakes. As we descended into the great crater by a winding path fresh points of view disclosed fresh beauties at every turn. The principal landowner of the place has added something to its attractions by judicious planting. In an inclosed park lying at the foot of the descent, azaleas and rhododendrons displayed such masses of bloom as none of us had ever seen equalled. Between the park and the larger lake we reached our resting-place, and here, comfortably housed, we tarried for many pleasant days. There was boating on the lakes, and wandering through the woods and into the smaller craters for the less energetic of our party, while the more active scaled the heights, and made the laborious circuit of the walls of the great crater. Sometimes a picnic on some wooded promontory or secluded little bay of the lake was our afternoon point of reassembly. It is not always, however, that the climate of this elevated region admits of picnics. Mists and rain are common, and often, the walls of the great crater being wrapped in clouds, the place appears as completely cut off from the rest of the world as the valley in "Rasselas." The coming of rain is announced by the frogs of the lake, who on a night when the weather is to their liking fill the whole valley with croaking.

Our return to Ponta Delgada was by a longer and rougher route. Having entered the great crater from the south, we emerged from it at its north-west point. When we reached the summit of the ridge the island of Terceira, upwards of seventy miles away to the north-west, lay plainly visible in the morning sunshine. Turning to the eastward we followed the edge of the great crater for some miles, sometimes absorbed by the magnificence of the views, sometimes disquieted by our closeness to the precipices overhanging the larger lake. Then we traversed a mountain track abounding in small lakes, or tarns, lying at a great elevation. From these lakes Ponta Delgada is supplied with water, and the aqueduct by which it is conveyed across some of the mountain glens relieves the wildness of the scene, much as, comparing small things to great, do the bridges and galleries of the roads over the Alps.

On the eastern border of this mountain region stands the Pico de Carvão, as it is called in the English Admiralty map of St. Michael's, or the Pico do Ledo, as it is called on the spot. The road passes close under it, and it is easily ascended on foot. From its summit the traveller sees spread out before him the whole of the central and cultivated section of the island, which, though forty miles long, is here not more than five or six miles wide. In the foreground are extensive tracts of Indian corn. Beyond, on the south coast, lies the city and the great orange district already mentioned. On the northern coast are three or four gay-looking little towns, surrounded by orange gardens and corn lands pleasantly intermixed. Both north and south the swell of the Atlantic fringes with sheets of snowy foam the dark lava rocks of the coast. To the east the prospect is bounded by the mountain ranges which fill that half of the island.

To visit these eastern ranges and the Furnas baths, the great summer retreat of St. Michael's, was our next undertaking. A pretty drive of fifteen or sixteen miles along the southern coast took us to the town of Villa Franca, lying between the mountains and the sea. The little island of Villa Franca, half a mile from the shore, is worth a visit. It encloses one of the characteristic Azorean craters, into which the sea has entered through a narrow breach on the land side, forming a circular natural dock. From Villa Franca we had a hot ride on donkeys of two hours along the coast, to the foot of a pass called the Gaiteira, leading to the Furnas. The lower part of this pass ascends through ravines, shaded by woods of chestnut. Above these woods came a wilder region, and at the top we had a fine view of

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the eastern mountains. Then a steep descent brought us into a narrow valley, out of which we presently emerged upon a lake surrounded by sombre mountains, but enlivened that day by a regatta which was going on for the amusement of the Furnas visitors. A mile beyond the lake, in the middle of another wide mountain valley, lies the Furnas village, where we remained for some weeks.

If this remote valley, with its varieties of mineral waters, its boiling pools, and heated mud, had happened to be placed in any accessible part of Europe, it would no doubt be filled with doctors and patients, hotels and boarding-houses, pump-rooms and casinos. From what is called the Great Caldeira jets of steam and scalding water spirt upwards after the manner of the Geysers of Iceland, but on a smaller scale. Not far off is a deep open pit, twelve or fifteen feet in diameter, in which the waters are incessantly and furiously boiling. Unpleasant stories are told of the fate of animals, and even children, who have carelessly approached this dangerous spot, which is unprotected by fence or inclosure of any kind. Close by, from beneath a mass of rock, heated mud is obliquely forced out in regularly recurring jets, with a noise like the beats of a huge pumping engine. The atmosphere round about is filled with sulphurous fumes, and the soil consists of bare heaps of a whitish deposit, containing many crystals of alum and sulphur. The smaller boiling springs cannot be counted, but there must be hundreds of them. Round the larger springs they cluster thickly, and they are also found in many other parts of the valley, on the borders of the lake already mentioned, and in and near the bed of a stream called the Ribeira Quente, or hot river, which carries the waters of the Furnas valley through a deep mountain gorge to the sea. Of cold mineral springs there is also a considerable variety.

There is an abundance of bathing-houses and drinking-fountains, and the waters are resorted to not only by many Azoreans, but occasionally by invalids from Lisbon, the Brazils, and the United States. Chemically the waters are mainly of two kinds, sulphurous and chalybeate. Perhaps the most popular baths are those containing a mixture of the two. Whatever may be the remedial merits or demerits of the Furnas waters, it does not appear that they can, with any justice, be regarded as merely inert. They exercise a manifest influence over the bodily state and sensations of those who use them. How far this influence can be advantageously called into play in the treatment of disease is, of course, a question which cannot be discussed here. An interesting account of these baths, as well as much other information respecting the Azores, useful and trustworthy in substance, though conveyed in a somewhat diffuse and rambling form, is to be found in Bullar's "Winter in the Azores and Summer at the Baths of the Furnas," a book published in the year 1841. One of the two authors was a physician, and has, in an appendix, discussed professionally the medicinal and chemical properties of the Furnas waters.

The Furnas valley is pretty when looked at as a whole, but much prettier when examined in detail. There seems no end to the charming walks and rides amongst tributary glens and gorges, rich in overhanging woods and fern banks, in streams and waterfalls. A month's stay did not enable us to exhaust them. Nor is there any lack of more distant mountain excursions. From the Furnas to the summit of the Pico da Vara is a four hours' ride or walk. After an hour and a half of steep ascent out of the valley we reached the central ridge or backbone of the island. As we journeyed eastward along this ridge we looked down on either hand into a series of valleys and abysses, and now and then had a clear view over the ocean beyond to a vast distance. At other times clouds resting against the sides of the mountains below us shut out this prospect, except when through an opening in the mist we caught a distant strip of sea, enlivened once or twice by the sails of a passing vessel. Reaching the Pico da Vara itself, we came once more upon the wild district we had watched from the sea when we approached the island from England. Near the mouth of a vast ravine we saw the little town of Nordeste, placed, as its name imports, at the north-east end of the island. Towards the south-east a sharp ridge projected from some distance below us to the sea. Crossing this ridge, which is called the Tronqueira, runs the mountain road by which Nordeste is reached from the south.

In the course of another and later excursion from the Furnas, we followed this wild road over the Tronqueira to Nordeste, where we slept, and on the next day, turning southward, we made our way along the coast, through the villages of Agoa Retorta and Fayal, back to the Furnas. The ride from Nordeste to Agoa Retorta is one of the finest in the island, both from the rugged grandeur of one or two of the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ravines crossed, and because the remoteness of the place having saved it from the woodcutter and the charcoal-burner, here the great despoilers of the mountain, the tree heaths and other native mountain growths of the island are of an age and size seldom to be seen elsewhere.

We returned from the Furnas to Ponta Delgada by the north coast of the island. By this route the whole journey may be performed in a carriage, but in point of scenery the southern coast is superior. The large town of Ribeira Grande stands on the north coast, nine or ten miles from Ponta Delgada. Amongst the mountains above it, lie the Caldeiras of Ribeira Grande, another group of hot and cold mineral springs on a smaller scale than those of the Furnas. The sulphurous waters here were found by Dr. Bullar to be acid, while those of the Furnas were alkaline, so that probably the medicinal effect of the two may be appreciably different. A cluster of houses, occupied only during the summer, surrounds these springs. The place being easily reached from Ponta Delgada, and lying amidst wooded glens and mountain streams, is a delightful resort, much frequented during the summer months.

Rather more than an hour's ascent by a difficult if not dangerous road, took us from the Caldeiras of Ribeira Grande to the edge of the deep irregular crater in which, at a great height above the sea and far from human habitation, lies the Lagoa do Fogo, or Lake of Fire, the third of the larger lakes of St. Michael's. The scene was silent and solitary, for the spot is seldom visited except by wood-cutters and the herdsmen in charge of animals driven to the surrounding hills for pasture. On the west the lake was darkened by gloomy precipices, on the south a flood of sunshine poured through a wide breach in the crater walls opening above the town of Villa Franca. Through this breach a small stream carries away the overflow of the lake. From the top of the mountain which overhangs this lake on its western side there is a noble view over the cultivated portion of the island extending westward to the mountains of the Seven Cities.

Before going on to the other Azore Islands, it may not be out of place to say something of every-day life at St. Michael's, and of what seems noteworthy in its inhabitants. To an active, stirring Englishman, life at Ponta Delgada appears dull and monotonous; to the lover of basking and contemplation, it is better suited. The amusements attainable are of a tranquil character. There are walks and drives, a croquet ground, an occasional picnic in an orange garden, a pretty little theatre, sometimes tenanted for the winter by a dramatic, and sometimes by an operatic, company. Some of the shops are used as a cheap substitute for clubs, and here loungers congregate, the news and scandal of the day is circulated, and as often as a vessel arrives with letters the hearts of men are made glad, or (much more frequently) sorrowful, by the announcement of the latest prices fetched by oranges in the English markets. During several weeks of the Carnival there is a great deal of masquerading, at which the Portuguese are extremely clever. A less refined amusement of the last three days of that season is the squirting of water at all who appear in the streets, without exception of the old or the rheumatic. There is excellent quail-shooting in the cultivated districts of St. Michael's, and rabbits, woodcocks, snipes, rock pigeons and wild fowl are to be found in localities suited to their respective habits. There are no game laws, and with scarcely a restriction the sportsman wanders whither he lists.

Domestic administration is troublesome, and complaints by mistresses of the malpractices of servants are almost as rife as in England. Most of the servants are in truth wild, untaught, and impatient of the usages of civilized life. Now and then, however, an intelligent, useful servant, who will take kindly to English habits, is met with. Cookery is effected chiefly by means of three-legged iron pots, under which a fire of sticks is kept up. A kitchen contains instead of range and dresser a stone slab on which the iron pots are heated, and a very large oven of masonry. Under the manipulation of a good cook, however, these seemingly rude appliances are made to yield excellent results. Good beef and poultry are always to be had, mutton is sometimes satisfactory and sometimes the reverse. The price of meat being very low, and candles being at a much higher figure, the butchers, unlike their English brethren, pare off all the fat they can, to sell to the tallow-chandlers. The Portuguese supply the deficiency thus caused by eating fat bacon with beef, but the English find it necessary to induce the butcher to relax the rigidity of this practice in their favor.

The Portuguese of the Azores are singularly courteous and obliging to strangers. With much genuine kindness they com-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

bine conventionalities of a somewhat tedious kind. The action of time as a solvent of ancient punctilio has been here much slower than on the mainland of Portugal. Sociability is impeded by the oft recurring bowings and professions of esteem which custom requires whenever a morning visit is paid. A Portuguese subscribes himself at the foot of a letter as "your watchful venerator," an expression no doubt quite as worthy of credit as "your obedient servant." He dates all letters written from his own house with the capitals S. C., which stand for "sua casa," or "your house," and he addresses them to S. I. C., standing for "your most illustrious house." Politeness requires him to assume that the house he lives in is one of the inferior mansions of the person he happens to be writing to, who, possessing a more illustrious habitation for his own use, allows the writer to occupy it by indulgence or sufferance. The lower orders of people are in their way quite as ceremonious as the upper. He who jogs a mile or two on a donkey along any country road in St. Michael's receives as many and much more profound obeisances than greet the Prince of Wales when he rides down Piccadilly. Even bare-legged servant boys and girls address each other unfailingly as sir and madam.

For the young men of the upper classes, there is an almost total want of occupations or careers. Small government appointments are eagerly made interest for — always a very bad symptom in the body politic. Here still flourishes, little modified by any irruption of new ideas, the patriarchal system of disposing of daughters in marriage without heed of inclination, of parity of age or character, or of aught save money. That marriages should be purely mercenary seems, indeed, to be almost enjoined by the Portuguese law. If a rich Englishman marries a penniless girl he at all events keeps what he has got, though he does not add to it. But if a rich Portuguese should do the like, and his wife should happen to die without leaving children, the property of the married couple would by the ordinary law be thereupon divided into equal halves, of which the surviving husband would retain one, and the relations of the portionless wife would take the other. The rich husband would, in fact, in expiation of his romantic folly be mulcted of half his property. Under the influence of this law it has become an inveterate custom amongst the rich Azoreans to marry near relations, so as to keep their money in their own families. An heiress as often as not marries her uncle or her nephew, a young man of fortune chooses between his aunt and his niece. The physical and moral results of this system are of course bad. Of energy mental or bodily amongst the upper classes there is but little. Few of them know anything of books or literature. Walking, shooting, boating, swimming, they are little given to. Their horsemanship seldom extends beyond curvetting, with an incredible clatter, over the paved streets of the town. They entertain, indeed, too keen a fear of exposure to the sun, to undertake much bodily exertion of any sort out of doors, which is the more singular as they see the peasantry work in the sun without detriment from morning to night throughout the hottest season.

The laboring class are quiet and simple, industrious and saving. In the Azores as elsewhere, boatmen, donkeymen, servants and small hucksters will sometimes be found by strangers to be capable of overcharge and embezzlement. A more repulsive characteristic is their excessive cruelty to animals. Their treatment of mules and donkeys is painful to witness. Their chief recreation and delight are the dias de festa and processions, to which they look forward with eager interest. The other great solace of their lives is the killing of their pigs. Scarcely the poorest cottager is without a pig, and when it is killed, the meat both fat and lean being reserved for future consumption, the less solid portions of the animal, prepared in some recondite way, and seasoned with garlic without stint, furnish them with their great feast and revelry for the year. A sober feast it is, for drunkenness is rare. So are all serious crimes against person or property, partly from the character of the population, and partly, no doubt, because in a small island it is almost impossible for a criminal to escape the pursuit of justice.

Agriculture is the only productive industry of the Azores. The poorer and more stony soils being the fittest for orange gardens, the richer are devoted to tillage. Indian corn is the principal crop, but beans, wheat, sweet potatoes, and yams, as well as pumpkins and melons, are largely grown. The tillage districts are not picturesque. The tall and graceful Indian corn might enhance even the summer beauty of our English fields, but it cannot take away the monotony of tracts extending for miles almost unrelieved by hedge or tree or human dwelling-place. The agricultural processes in use are of a primor-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

dial character. Labor is extremely cheap, and like most things over-plentiful is wastefully applied. Corn is still trodden out by oxen, and carried to the tops of hills to be winnowed by tossing it aloft with wooden shovels on a breezy day. Spades are rejected as incompatible with bare feet, and a large hoe, much less efficacious, is used instead. Earth and stones, instead of being moved from place to place, when necessary, by means of wheelbarrows, are carried in baskets on men's backs. In the country carts the wooden wheels and axles revolve together with a hideous screeching and a prodigious loss of tractive power. But soil and climate are propitious, and as in Ireland a generation ago, and in other countries where the supply of labor is excessive, men will pay any rent to get possession of a piece of land, which they can cultivate by their own labor and that of their families. So the tillage lands of St. Michael's let in small holdings at rents equivalent to from 3*l.* to 7*l.* sterling per English acre. The selling value of land is proportionately high.

But it is time to turn to the smaller islands still remaining to be noticed. Portuguese mail steamers start from Lisbon for the Azores on the 1st and 15th of every month. They are fairly satisfactory vessels in point of size and comfort, and perform their voyages with punctuality. Leaving St. Michael's at nightfall by one of these steamers on her outward voyage, we found ourselves early the next morning entering the harbor of Angra, in the island of Terceira. Angra lies at the head of a deep bay, and looks imposing from the sea. It is, indeed, by far the best-built and finest city in these islands, and in the olden time was the seat of government, and the residence of the captain-general of the Azores. The adoption of a decentralizing policy at Lisbon has deprived the place of these advantages, and at present its grass-grown streets have a deserted aspect. The western side of the Bay of Angra is formed by a promontory called the Mount Brazil, a steep, rounded height surmounted by the only regular fortress in the Azores. A district of rich fruit gardens studded with country houses stretches round the town and along the base of the mountains which occupy the interior of this oval-shaped island. These mountains, which rise to a height of somewhat over three thousand four hundred feet, are bare, and rounded in outline, and do not appear to be by any means so rich in scenery as those of St. Michael's. On the other hand, as Terceira is one of the central cluster of the Azore Islands, the views to seaward are interesting, especially towards the south-west, where on a clear day the lofty cone of Pico is seen towering behind the precipices of the nearer island of St. George.

A few hours' steaming to the north-west took us from Terceira to the little island of Graçiosa, the beautiful or graceful, as the name imports. The only beauty, however, much appreciated by the nation which conferred this name is the beauty of corn-fields and fruit gardens. The Portuguese hold exceedingly cheap the unprofitable grandeur of cloud-capped summits and fathomless abysses. Graçiosa looks attractive enough from the sea, and the cliffs towards the southern end of the island are very fine; but there is so much surf on the coast of this island that landing is at all times difficult, and neither on our first nor on a subsequent visit were we able to get on shore. It is said that there is a subterranean lake amongst the Graçiosa mountains, but we never succeeded in meeting with any trustworthy person who had actually seen it.

Turning southward from Graçiosa we steered next for St. George's. This singular island, straight as a ruler, nowhere more than three miles wide, lofty from end to end, and reaching at some points a height of close upon three thousand five hundred feet, stretches for thirty miles across the Atlantic like the ruined fragment of a gigantic wall, barring the approach to the islands of Pico and Fayal, which lie beyond. Grassgrown uplands show themselves above the stupendous precipices, and these mountain pastures must be nutritious, for there is a large export of cheeses to the other islands and to Lisbon. The place pours forth likewise a teeming population, to become the hewers of wood and drawers of water of the richer islands. A servant seeking employment at St. Michael's generally answers, if questioned, that he or she is, as they express it, a son or daughter of St. George. Rounding the western point of this island we came to its metropolis, Villa das Vellas, which lies on the southern coast. Here we landed for an hour or two, and with a troop of beggars at our heels wandered over the untidy and dilapidated little town, and contemplated the noble view from a ruined convent on a height above. To the south, on the other side of a channel ten or twelve miles in width, we had before us the island of Pico, that is of the Peak, and towards the south-west, separated from Pico by a

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

channel four or five miles wide, lay the small but well-known island of Fayal, the farthest point of our voyage.

Two or three hours' steaming under the shadow of the Peak took us from St. George's into the Bay of Horta, in Fayal, an anchorage with which most officers of the English navy are well acquainted. There is an American hotel at Horta, and the place being much visited by ships of war of many nations, is less out of the world than any other in the Azores. Horta is a much smaller town than Angra or Ponta Delgada, but from the sea looks prettier than either. The ground ascends rapidly behind it, and rising one above another are seen churches, convents, and country houses in the midst of groves of orange and lemon trees, and skilfully tended gardens. At the back of the cultivated district appears the central mountain of the island. This mountain incloses one of the largest and most regularly-shaped craters in the Azores. It is extremely deep, and at the bottom lies a gloomy lake. Twice during our short stay at Fayal our donkeys stood equipped for a visit to this crater, but as often did the weather frustrate the project.

But the most striking feature in the view from the Bay of Horta is, undoubtedly, the lofty mountain that rises on the opposite island of Pico. Not, indeed, that its height above the sea level, which is something over seven thousand six hundred feet, is anything extraordinary. Of other well-known mountains which, like itself, abut upon the sea, Hecla is some two thousand five hundred feet lower, and Pico Ruivo, in Madeira, some fifteen hundred feet lower, but Etna is some three thousand feet higher, and Teneriffe some four thousand five hundred feet higher. What gives the Azorean mountain its marked individuality is that, as seen from Fayal (though not from St. George's), it seems to stand entirely alone, springing in conical or bell-shaped form almost directly from the sea level to its apex. It is very regular in outline, except that there is a slight bifurcation at the actual summit. A mountain standing thus alone conveys a greater impression of height than if it be only the highest point of a range. So far as comparison was possible between a scene in actual view and scenes remembered after some considerable lapse of years, the present writer found the view of the Azorean Peak from Fayal fully as striking as those of Etna from the coast of Sicily, and Teneriffe from Oratava.

We were unfortunately unable to attempt the ascent of the Peak. It is an undertaking free from danger or difficulty for anybody who is equal to the fatigue. A considerable part of the journey can indeed be performed on donkeys, but the traveller must take the requisite animals with him in a boat from Fayal, there being none to be hired in Pico. For the last hour or two, as at Vesuvius and Teneriffe, the way lies over loose cinders, and this part of the ascent is of course fatiguing. In winter there is sometimes a good deal of snow on the higher part of the mountain. There is still some slight volcanic activity in one of the two small craters at the top. The views over the surrounding islands, and the intervening arms of the Atlantic, must of course be magnificent. There is a good account of an ascent of Pico in Bullar's work already referred to.

A hundred and twenty miles to the north-west of Fayal are the outlying islands of Flores and Corvo, but these we did not visit. The mail steamers now go on to Flores once a month, but they did not begin to do so until after we had left the Azores. We also failed to accomplish an often projected excursion to the little island of St. Mary, which lies only some forty miles south of St. Michael's, and on every clear day was plainly visible from our windows in Ponta Delgada. We returned to England by way of Portugal. The mail steamer carried us in four days from St. Michael's to Lisbon, a city offering comparatively little to the art-student or to the mere sight-seer, but much to him who can take delight in its fine position, its gay and busy streets, its noble river, and picturesque environs. After a few days at Lisbon and Cintra, we took the railway, which, crossing the Tagus halfway between Santarem and Abrantes, traverses the great cork-wood forests of southern Portugal to the frontier at Elvas. Passing the frontier we spent a day at Badajos, a gloomy and ruinous old town on the sluggish Guadiana, some of its time-worn buildings yet bearing scars and fissures inflicted presumably by Wellington's artillery. Wandering round the fortifications we traced the scene of the terrible assault, and were shown where lies southward, ten or twelve miles across a sultry and treeless plain, the battle-field of Albuera. Returning into Portugal we next made our way by the northern railway to Coimbra, once the capital of the kingdom, and now the seat of its ancient and possibly somewhat effete university.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Coimbra is finely placed on a hill overlooking the broad Mondego, but the town itself is poor and the university buildings not remarkable. From Coimbra we went by railway to Oporto, where, after waiting many days for an expected steamer, we embarked for Southampton.

The island of St. Michael may now be reached by steamer from England direct during the fruit season, which lasts from October to March or April, as well as by way of Lisbon at all seasons. Two or three of the fruit steamers have good accommodation for a few passengers. An artificial harbor has taken the place of the dangerous open roadstead which made landing and embarking difficult in former days. There are hotels kept by Englishmen at Ponta Delgada and at the lake of the Furnas, a Portuguese hotel in the Furnas valley, and a comfortable little cottage inn at the Seven Cities. There is an English consul, an English church and burying-ground (though not a chaplain), and an English colony of perhaps a dozen resident families. What the place seems to require is that some enterprising young doctor should settle there and publish a book about it. The island certainly offers to invalids the unusual combination of a mild and soothing climate for the winter and a variety of mineral waters for trial during the summer. The accommodation for visitors for short periods is scanty, but would, no doubt, increase with the demand for it. Persons intending a prolonged residence easily find unfurnished houses in or near Ponta Delgada, and the furniture in use is for the most part cheap and simple. Hotel charges, servants' wages, meat, poultry, eggs, fish, and nearly all other provisions which do not pass through the custom house are here at less than half the English rates. Bread, thanks to a Portuguese corn law, is in this corn-exporting island as dear as in England. Groceries are appreciably dearer, and most materials of clothing very decidedly dearer. The cost of living does not, however, entirely turn upon comparisons of this kind. In countries like England there are a thousand amusements, knick-knacks, and miscellaneous luxuries, filching more or less money from every man's pocket, which in such a place as St. Michael's are simply non-existent. On the whole it seems safe to say that any given income will go twice as far at St. Michael's as in England. This statement, however, presupposes with reference to new-comers that they should acquire some knowledge of the language and take kindly to the ways of the place, that they should be willing to do for themselves many things which in England are done for them by tradesmen, to higgle with voluble hucksters, and extract useful help from untaught and often perverse domestic servants. It is requisite, too, to forego, more or less completely, books and newspapers, daily letters, and acquaintance with current events — in fact, to put on a little of the wildness which becomes a settler in Australia or New Zealand. Those who can do all this, and are yet wanting in the rough vigor which enables a man in a new colony to make a fortune, could find few places where it is so easy as at St. Michael's to do without one.

R. M. D.

[Published by arrangement with HARPER & BROTHERS.]

MACLEOD OF DARE.

BY WILLIAM BLACK.

CHAPTER XX.

OTTER-SKINS.

"Ah, pappy," said Miss Gertrude White to her father — and she pretended to sigh as she spoke — "this is a change indeed!"

They were driving up to the gate of the small cottage in South Bank. It was the end of October. In the gardens they passed the trees were almost bare, though such leaves as hung sparsely on the branches of the chestnuts and maples were ablaze with russet and gold in the misty sunshine.

"In another week," she continued, "there will not be a leaf left. I dare say there is not a single geranium in the garden. All hands on deck to pipe a farewell.

> Ihr Matten, lebt wohl,
> Ihr sonnigen Weiden
> Der Senne muss scheiden,
> Der Sommer ist hin.

Farewell to the blue mountains of Newcastle, and the sun-lit valleys of Liverpool, and the silver waterfalls of Leeds; the summer is indeed over; and a very nice and pleasant summer we have had of it."

The flavor of sarcasm running through this affected sadness vexed Mr. White, and he answered sharply, —

"I think you have little reason to grumble over a tour which has so distinctly added to your reputation."

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

"I was not aware," said she, with a certain careless sauciness of manner, "that an actress was allowed to have a reputation — at least, there are always plenty of people anxious enough to take it away."

"Gertrude," said he sternly, "what do you mean by this constant carping? Do you wish to cease to be an actress? or what in all the world do you want?"

"To cease to be an actress?" she said, with a mild wonder, and with the sweetest of smiles, as she prepared to get out of the open door of the cab. "Why, don't you know, pappy, that a leopard cannot change his spots, or an Ethiopian his skin? Take care of the step, pappy. That's right. Come here, Marie, and give the cabman a hand with this portmanteau."

Miss White was not grumbling at all — but on the contrary was quite pleasant and cheerful — when she entered the small house and found herself once more at home.

"Oh, Carry," she said, when her sister followed her into her room, "you don't know what it is to get back home after having been bandied from one hotel to another hotel, and from one lodging-house to another lodging-house, for goodness knows how long!"

"Oh, indeed!" said Miss Carry, with such marked coldness that her sister turned to her.

"What is the matter with you?"

"What is the matter with you?" the younger sister retorted, with sudden fire. "Do you know that your letters to me have been quite disgraceful?"

"You are crazed, child — you wrote something about it the other day; I could not make out what you meant," said Miss White; and she went to the glass to see that the beautiful brown hair had not been too much disarranged by the removal of her bonnet.

"It is you are crazed, Gertrude White," said Carry, who had apparently picked up from some melodrama the notion that it was rather effective to address a person by her full name: "I am really ashamed of you — that you should have let yourself be bewitched by a parcel of beasts' skins. I declare that your ravings about the Highlands, and fairies, and trash of that sort have been only fit for a penny journal — "

Miss White turned and stared — as well she might. This indignant person of fourteen had flashing eyes and a visage of wrath. The pale, calm, elder sister only remarked, in that deep-toned and gentle voice of hers, —

"Your language is pretty considerably strong, Carry. I don't know what has aroused such a passion in you. Because I wrote to you about the Highlands? Because I sent you that collection of legends? Because it seemed to me, when I was in a wretched hotel in some dirty town, I would rather be away yachting or driving with some one of the various parties of people whom I know, and who had mostly gone to Scotland this year? If you are jealous of the Highlands, Carry, I will undertake to root out the name of every mountain and lake that has got hold of my affections."

She was turning away again, with a quiet smile on her face, when her younger sister arrested her.

"What's that?" said she, so sharply, and extending her forefinger so suddenly, that Gertrude almost shrank back.

"What's what?" she said, in dismay — fearing perhaps to hear of an adder being on her shoulder.

"You know, perfectly well," said Miss Carry vehemently, "it is the Macleod tartan."

Now the truth was that Miss White's travelling-dress was of an unrelieved gray, the only scrap of color about her costume being a tiny thread of tartan ribbon that just showed in front of her collar.

"The Macleod tartan?" said the elder sister demurely. "And what if it were the Macleod tartan?"

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself, Gerty! There was quite enough occasion for people to talk in the way he kept coming here; and now you make a parade of it; you ask people to look at you wearing a badge of servitude; you say, 'Oh, here I am, and I am quite ready to be your wife when you ask me, Sir Keith Macleod.'"

There was no flush of anger in the fair and placid face; but rather a look of demure amusement in the downcast eyes.

"Dear me, Carry," said she, with great innocence, "the profession of an actress must be looking up in public estimation when such a rumor as that could even get into existence. And so people have been so kind as to suggest that Sir Keith Macleod, the representative of one of the oldest and proudest families in the kingdom, would not be above marrying a poor actress who has her living to earn, and who is supported by the half-crowns and half-sovereigns of the public? And indeed I think it would look very well to have him loitering about the stage doors of provincial theatres until his wife should be ready to come out; and would he bring his gil-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

lies, and keepers, and head foresters, and put them into the pit to applaud her? Really, the rôle you have cut out for a Highland gentleman ——"

"A Highland gentleman!" exclaimed Carry. "A Highland pauper! But you are quite right, Gerty, to laugh at the rumor. Of course it is quite ridiculous. It is quite ridiculous to think that an actress whose fame is all over England — who is sought after by everybody, and the popularest favorite ever seen — would give up everything and go away and marry an ignorant Highland savage, and look after his calves and his cows and hens for him. That is indeed ridiculous, Gerty."

"Very well, then, put it out of your mind, and never let me hear another word about it," said the popularest favorite, as she undid the bit of tartan ribbon; "and if it is any great comfort to you to know, this is not the Macleod tartan, but the MacDougal tartan, and you may put it in the fire if you like."

Saying which she threw the bit of costume which had given so great offence on the table. The discomfited Carry looked at it, but would not touch it. At last she said, —

"Where are the skins, Gerty?"

"Near Castle Dare," answered Miss White, turning to get something else for her neck, "there is a steep hill, and the road comes over it. When you climb to the top of the hill and sit down, the fairies will carry you right to the bottom, if you are in a proper frame of mind. But they won't appear at all unless you are at peace with all men. I will show you the skins when you are in a proper frame of mind, Carry."

"Who told you that story?" she asked quickly.

"Sir Keith Macleod," the elder sister said, without thinking.

"Then he has been writing to you?"

"Certainly."

She marched out of the room. Gertrude White, unconscious of the fierce rage she had aroused, carelessly proceeded with her toilet, trying now one flower and now another in the ripples of her sun-brown hair, but finally discarding these half-withered things for a narrow band of blue velvet.

"Threescore of nobles rode up the king's ha'," she was humming thoughtlessly to herself as she stood with her hands uplifted to her head, revealing the beautiful lines of her figure,

"But bonnie Glenogie's the flower o' them a';
Wi' his milk-white steed and his coal-black e'e:
Glenogie, dear mither, Glenogie for me!"

At length she had finished, and was ready to proceed to her immediate work of overhauling domestic affairs. When Keith Macleod was struck by the exceeding neatness and perfection of arrangement in this small house, he was in no wise the victim of any stage effect. Gertrude White was at all times and in all seasons a precise and accurate house-mistress. Harassed, as an actress must often be, by other cares; sometimes exhausted with hard work; perhaps tempted now and again by the self-satisfaction of a splendid triumph to let meaner concerns go unheeded; all the same she allowed nothing to interfere with her domestic duties.

"Gerty," her father said impatiently to her, a day or two before they left London for the provinces, "what is the use of your going down to these stores yourself? Surely you can send Jane or Marie. You really waste far too much time over the veriest trifles: how can it matter what sort of mustard we have?"

"And indeed I am glad to have something to convince me that I am a human being and a woman," she had said instantly; "something to be myself in. I believe Providence intended me to be the manager of a Swiss hotel."

This was one of the first occasions on which she had revealed to her father that she had been thinking a good deal about her lot in life, and was perhaps beginning to doubt whether the struggle to become a great and famous actress was the only thing worth living for. But he paid little attention to it at the time. He had a vague impression that it was scarcely worth discussing about. He was pretty well convinced that his daughter was clever enough to argue herself into any sort of belief about herself, if she should take some fantastic notion into her head. It was not until that night in Manchester that he began to fear there might be something serious in these expressions of discontent.

On this bright October morning Miss Gertrude White was about to begin her domestic inquiries, and was leaving her room humming cheerfully to herself something about the bonnie Glenogie of the song, when she was again stopped by her sister, who was carrying a bundle.

"I have got the skins," she said gloomily. "Jane took them out."

"Will you look at them?" the sister

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

said kindly. "They are very pretty. If they were not a present, I would give them to you to make a jacket of them."

"I wear them?" said she. "Not likely!"

Nevertheless she had sufficient womanly curiosity to let her elder sister open the parcel; and then she took up the otter-skins one by one, and looked at them.

"I don't think much of them," she said.

The other bore this taunt patiently.

"They are only big moles, aren't they? And I thought moleskin was only worn by working people."

"I am a working person too," Miss Gertrude White said; "but in any case I think a jacket of these skins will look lovely."

"Oh, do you think so? Well, you can't say much for the smell of them."

"It is no more disagreeable than the smell of a sealskin jacket."

She laid down the last of the skins, with some air of disdain.

"It will be a nice series of trophies, anyway — showing you know some one who goes about spending his life in killing inoffensive animals."

"Poor Sir Keith Macleod! What has he done to offend you, Carry?"

Miss Carry turned her head away for a minute; but presently she boldly faced her sister.

"Gerty, you don't mean to marry a beauty man!"

Gerty looked considerably puzzled; but her companion continued vehemently, —

"How often have I heard you say you would never marry a beauty man — a man who has been brought up in front of the looking-glass — who is far too well satisfied with his own good looks to think of anything or anybody else! Again and again you have said that, Gertrude White. You told me, rather than marry a self-satisfied coxcomb, you would marry a misshapen, ugly little man, so that he would worship you all the days of your life for your condescension and kindness."

"Very well, then!"

"And what is Sir Keith Macleod but a beauty man?"

"He is not!" and for once the elder sister betrayed some feeling in the proud tone of her voice. "He is the manliest-looking man that I have ever seen, and I have seen a good many more men than you. There is not a man you know whom he could not throw across the canal down there. Sir Keith Macleod a beauty man! I think he could take on a good deal more polishing, and curling, and smoothing without any great harm. If I was in any danger, I know which of all the men I have seen I would rather have in front of me — with his arms free; and I don't suppose he would be thinking of any looking-glass! If you want to know about the race he represents, read English history, and the story of England's wars. If you go to India, or China, or Africa, or the Crimea, you will hear something about the Macleods, I think!"

Carry began to cry.

"You silly thing, what is the matter with you?" Gertrude White exclaimed; but of course her arm was round her sister's neck.

"It is true, then."

"What is true?"

"What people say.

"What do people say?"

"That you will marry Sir Keith Macleod."

"Carry!" she said angrily. "I can't imagine who has been repeating such idiotic stories to you. I wish people would mind their own business. Sir Keith Macleod marry me!"

"Do you mean to say he has never asked you?" Carry said, disengaging herself, and fixing her eyes on her sister's face.

"Certainly not," was the decided answer; but all the same Miss Gertrude White's forehead and cheeks flushed slightly.

"Then you know that he means to — and that is why you have been writing to me, day after day, about the romance of the Highlands, and fairy stories, and the pleasure of people who could live without caring for the public. Oh, Gerty, why won't you be frank with me, and let me know the worst at once?"

"If I gave you a box on the ears," she said, laughing, "that would be the worst at once; and I think it would serve you right for listening to such tittle-tattle, and letting your head be filled with nonsense. Haven't you sufficient sense to know that you ought not to compel me to speak of such a thing — absurd as it is? I cannot go on denying that I am about to become the wife of Tom, Dick, or Harry; and you know the stories that have been going about for years past. Who was I last? The wife of a Russian nobleman who gambled away all my earnings at Homburg. You are fourteen now, Carry; you should have more sense."

Miss Carry dried her eyes, but she mournfully shook her head. There were

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

the otter-skins lying on the table. She had seen plenty of the absurd paragraphs about her sister which good-natured friends had cut out of provincial and foreign papers, and forwarded to the small family at South Bank. But the mythical Russian nobleman had never sent a parcel of otter-skins. These were palpable, and not to be explained away. She sorrowfully left the room, unconvinced.

And now Miss Gertrude White set to work with a will; and no one who was only familiar with her outside her own house would have recognized in this shifty, practical, industrious person, who went so thoroughly into all the details of the small establishment, the lady who, when she went abroad among the gayeties of the London season, was so eagerly sought after, and flattered, and petted, and made the object of all manner of delicate attentions. Her father, who suspected that her increased devotion to these domestic duties was but part of that rebellious spirit she had recently betrayed, had nevertheless to confess that there was no one but herself whom he could trust to arrange his china and dust his curiosities. And how could he resent her giving instructions to the cook, when it was his own dinner that profited thereby?

"Well, Gerty," he said, that evening after dinner, "what do you think about Mr.——'s offer? It is very good-natured of him to let you have the ordering of the drawing-room scene; for you can have the furniture and the color to suit your own costume."

"Indeed, I shall have nothing whatever to do with it," said she promptly. "The furniture at home is enough for me. I don't wish to become the upholsterer of a theatre."

"You are very ungrateful, then. Half the effect of a modern comedy is lost because the people appear in rooms which resemble nothing at all that people ever lived in. Here is a man who gives you carte blanche to put a modern drawing-room on the stage; and your part would gain infinitely from having real surroundings. I consider it a very flattering offer."

"And perhaps it is, pappy," said she; "but I think I do enough if I get through my own share of the work. And it is very silly of him to want me to introduce a song into this part too. He knows I can't sing——"

"Gerty!" her sister said.

"Oh, you know as well as I. I can get through a song well enough in a room; but I have not enough voice for a theatre; and although he says it is only to make the drawing-room scene more realistic, and that I need not sing to the front, that is all nonsense. I know what it is meant for — to catch the gallery. Now I refuse to sing for the gallery."

This was decided enough.

"What was the song you put into your last part, Gerty?" her sister asked. "I saw something in the papers about it."

"It was a Scotch one, Carry; I don't think you know it."

"I wonder it was not a Highland one," her sister said, rather spitefully.

"Oh, I have a whole collection of Highland ones now. Would you like to hear one? Would you, pappy?"

She went and fetched the book, and opened the piano.

"It is an old air that belonged to Scarba," she said; and then she sang, simply and pathetically enough, the somewhat stiff and cumbrous English translation of the Gaelic words. It was the song of the exiled Mary Macleod, who, sitting on the shores of "sea-worn Mull," looks abroad on the lonely islands of Scarba, and Islay, and Jura, and laments that she is far away from her own home.

"How do you like it, pappy?" she said, when she had finished. "It is a pity I do not know the Gaelic. They say that when the chief heard these verses repeated, he let the old woman go back to her own home."

One of the two listeners, at all events, did not seem to be particularly struck by the pathos of Mary Macleod's lament. She walked up to the piano.

"Where did you get that book, Gerty?" she said, in a firm voice.

"Where?" said the other innocently. "In Manchester, I think it was, I bought it."

But before she had made the explanation, Miss Carry, convinced that this too had come from her enemy, had seized the book and turned to the title-page. Neither on title-page nor on flyleaf, however, was there any inscription.

"Did you think it had come with the otter-skins, Carry?" the elder sister said, laughing; and the younger one retired, baffled and chagrined, but none the less resolved that before Gertrude White completely gave herself up to this blind infatuation for a savage country and for one of its worthless inhabitants, she would have to run the gauntlet of many a sharp word of warning and reproach.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

CHAPTER XXI.

IN LONDON AGAIN.

On through the sleeping counties rushed the train — passing woods, streams, fertile valleys, and clustering villages all palely shrouded in the faint morning mist that had a sort of suffused and hidden sunlight in it: the world had not yet awoke. But Macleod knew that ere he reached London people would be abroad, and he almost shrank from meeting the look of thousands of eager faces. Would not some of them guess his errand? Would he not be sure to run against a friend of hers — an acquaintance of his own? It was with a strange sense of fear that he stepped out and on to the platform at Euston Station; he glanced up and down; if she were suddenly to confront his eyes! A day or two ago it seemed as if innumerable leagues of ocean lay between him and her, so that the heart grew sick with thinking of the distance; now that he was in the same town with her, he felt so close to her that he could almost hear her breathe.

Major Stuart had enjoyed a sound night's rest, and was now possessed of quite enough good spirits and loquacity for two. He scarcely observed the silence of his companion. Together they rattled away through this busy, eager, immense throng, until they got down to the comparative quiet of Bury Street; and here they were fortunate enough to find not only that Macleod's old rooms were unoccupied, but that his companion could have the corresponding chambers on the floor above. They changed their attire; had breakfast; and then proceeded to discuss their plans for the day. Major Stuart observed that he was in no hurry to investigate the last modifications of the drying-machines. It would be necessary to write and appoint an interview before going down into Essex. He had several calls to make in London: if Macleod did not see him before, they should meet at seven for dinner. Macleod saw him depart without any great regret.

When he himself went outside it was already noon, but the sun had not yet broken through the mist, and London seemed cold, and lifeless, and deserted. He did not know of any one of his former friends being left in the great and lonely city. He walked along Piccadilly, and saw how many of the houses were shut up. The beautiful foliage of the Green Park had vanished, and here and there a red leaf hung on a withered branch. And yet, lonely as he felt in walking through this crowd of strangers, he was nevertheless possessed with a nervous and excited fear that at any moment he might have to quail before the inquiring glance of a certain pair of calm, large eyes. Was this, then, really Keith Macleod who was haunted by these fantastic troubles? Had he so little courage that he dared not go boldly up to her house and hold out his hand to her? As he walked along this thoroughfare, he was looking far ahead; and when any tall and slender figure appeared that might by any possibility be taken for hers, he watched it with a nervous interest that had something of dread in it. So much for the high courage born of love!

It was with some sense of relief that he entered Hyde Park, for here there were fewer people. And as he walked on, the day brightened. A warmer light began to suffuse the pale mist lying over the black-green masses of rhododendrons, the leafless trees, the damp grass-plots, the empty chairs; and as he was regarding a group of people on horseback who, almost at the summit of the red hill, seemed about to disappear into the mist, behold! a sudden break in the sky; a silvery gleam shot athwart from the south, so that these distant figures grew almost black; and presently the frail sunshine of November was streaming all over the red ride and the raw green of the grass. His spirits rose somewhat. When he reached the Serpentine the sunlight was shining on the rippling blue water; and there were pert young ladies of ten or twelve feeding the ducks; and away on the other side there was actually an island amid the blue ripples; and the island, if it was not as grand as Staffa nor as green as Ulva, was nevertheless an island, and it was pleasant enough to look at, with its bushes, and boats, and white swans. And then he bethought him of his first walks by the side of this little lake — when Oscar was the only creature in London he had to concern himself with — when each new day was only a brighter holiday than its predecessor — when he was of opinion that London was the happiest and most beautiful place in the world. And of that bright morning, too, when he walked through the empty streets at dawn, and came to the peacefully flowing river.

These idle meditations were suddenly interrupted. Away along the bank of the lake his keen eye could make out a figure, which, even at that distance, seemed so much to resemble one he knew that his heart began to beat quick. Then the dress — all of black, with a white hat and white

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

gloves — was not that of the simplicity that had always so great an attraction for her? And he knew that she was singularly fond of Kensington Gardens; and might she not be going thither for a stroll before going back to the Piccadilly Theatre? He hastened his steps. He soon began to gain on the stranger; and the nearer he got, the more it seemed to him that he recognized the graceful walk and carriage of this slender woman. She passed under the archway of the bridge. When she had emerged from the shadow she paused for a moment or two to look at the ducks on the lake; and this arch of shadow seemed to frame a beautiful sun-lit picture — the single figure against a background of green bushes. And if this were indeed she, how splendid the world would all become in a moment! In his eagerness of anticipation he forgot his fear. What would she say? Was he to hear her laugh once more? And take her hand? Alas! when he got close enough to make sure, he found that this beautiful figure belonged to a somewhat pretty, middle-aged lady, who had brought a bag of scraps with her to feed the ducks. The world grew empty again. He passed on in a sort of dream. He only knew he was in Kensington Gardens, and that once or twice he had walked with her down those broad alleys in the happy summer-time of flowers and sunshine and the scent of limes. Now there was a pale blue mist in the open glades, and a gloomy purple instead of the brilliant green of the trees; and the cold wind that came across rustled the masses of brown and orange leaves that were lying scattered on the ground. He got a little more interested when he neared the Round Pond; for the wind had freshened, and there were several handsome craft out there on the raging deep braving well the sudden squalls that laid them right on their beam ends, and then let them come staggering and dripping up to windward. But there were two small boys there who had brought with them a tiny vessel of home-made build, with a couple of lug-sails, a jib, and no rudder; and it was a great disappointment to them that this nondescript craft would move, if it moved at all, in an uncertain circle. Macleod came to their assistance — got a bit of floating stick and carved out of it a rude rudder, altered the sails, and altogether put the ship into such sea-going trim that, when she was fairly launched, she kept a pretty good course for the other side, where, doubtless, she arrived in safety and discharged her passengers and cargo. He was almost sorry to part with the two small ship-owners. They almost seemed to him the only people he knew in London.

But surely he had not come all the way from Castle Dare to walk about Kensington Gardens? What had become of that intense longing to see her — to hear her speak — that had made his life at home a constant torment and misery? Well, it still held possession of him; but all the same there was this indefinable dread that held him back. Perhaps he was afraid that he would have to confess to her the true reason for his having come to London. Perhaps he feared he might find her something entirely different from the creature of his dreams. At all events, as he returned to his rooms and sat down by himself to think over all the things that might accrue from this step of his, he only got further and further into a haze of nervous indecision. One thing only was clear to him. With all his hatred and jealousy of the theatre, to the theatre that night he would have to go. He could not know that she was so near to him — that at a certain time and place he could certainly see her and listen to her — without going. He bethought him, moreover, of what he had once heard her say, that while she could fairly well make out the people in the galleries and boxes, those who were sitting in the stalls close to the orchestra were, by reason of the glare of the footlights, quite invisible to her. Might he not, then, get into some corner where, himself unseen, he might be so near her that he could almost stretch out his hand to her, and take her hand, and tell by its warmth and throbbing that it was a real woman, and not a dream, that filled his heart?

Major Stuart was put off by some excuse, and at eight o'clock Macleod walked up to the theatre. He drew near with some apprehension; it almost seemed to him as though the man in the box-office recognized him, and knew the reason for his demanding one of those stalls. He got it easily enough; there was no great run on the new piece, even though Miss Gertrude White was the heroine. He made his way along the narrow corridors; he passed into the glare of the house; he took his seat with his ears dinned by the loud music, and waited. He paid no heed to his neighbors; he had already twisted up the programme so that he could not have read it if he had wished; he was aware mostly of a sort of slightly choking sensation about the throat.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

When Gertrude White did appear — she came in unexpectedly — he almost uttered a cry; and it would have been a cry of delight. For there was the flesh-and-blood woman, a thousand times more interesting, and beautiful, and lovable than all his fancied pictures of her. Look how she walks — how simply and gracefully she takes off her hat and places it on the table! Look at the play of light and life and gladness on her face — at the eloquence of her eyes! He had been thinking of her eyes as too calmly observant and serious: he saw them now, and was amazed at the difference — they seemed to have so much clear light in them, and pleasant laughter. He did not fear at all that she should see him. She was so near — he wished he could take her hand, and lead her away. What concern had these people around with her? This was Gertrude White — whom he knew. She was a friend of Mrs. Ross's; she lived in a quiet little home, with an affectionate and provoking sister; she had a great admiration for Oscar the collie; she had the whitest hand in the world as she offered you some salad at the small, neat table. What was she doing here — amid all this glaring sham — before all these people? "Come away quickly!" his heart cried to her. "Quick — quick — let us get away together; there is some mistake — some illusion; outside you will breathe the fresh air, and get into the reality of the world again; and you will ask about Oscar and young Ogilvie; and one might hold your hand — your real, warm hand — and perhaps hold it tight, and not give it up to any one whatsoever!" His own hand was trembling with excitement. The eagerness of delight with which he listened to every word uttered by the low-toned and gentle voice was almost painful; and yet he knew it not. He was as one demented. This was Gertrude White — speaking, walking, smiling, a fire of beauty in her clear eyes, her parted lips when she laughed letting the brilliant light just touch for an instant the milk-white teeth. This was no pale rose-leaf at all — no dream or vision — but the actual laughing, talking, beautiful woman, who had more than ever of that strange grace and witchery about her that had fascinated him when first he saw her. She was so near that he could have thrown a rose to her — a red rose full blown and full scented. He forgave the theatre — or rather he forgot it — in the unimaginable delight of being so near to her. And when at length she left the stage, he had no jealousy at all of the poor people who remained there to go through their marionette business. He hoped they might all become great actors and actresses. He even thought he would try to get to understand the story — seeing he should have nothing else to do until Gertrude White came back again.

Now Keith Macleod was no more ignorant or innocent than anybody else; but there was one social misdemeanor — a mere peccadillo, let us say — that was quite unintelligible to him. He could not understand how a man could go flirting after a married woman; and still less could he understand how a married woman should, instead of attending to her children and her house and such matters, make herself ridiculous by aping girlhood and pretending to have a lover. He had read a great deal about this, and he was told it was common; but he did not believe it. The same authorities assured him that the women of England were drunkards in secret; he did not believe it. The same authorities insisted that the sole notion of marriage that occupied the head of an English girl of our own day was as to how she should sell her charms to the highest bidder; he did not believe that either. And indeed he argued with himself, in considering to what extent books and plays could be trusted in such matters, that in one obvious case the absurdity of these allegations was proved. If France were the France of French playwrights and novelists, the whole business of the country would come to a standstill. If it was the sole and constant occupation of every adult Frenchman to run after his neighbor's wife, how could bridges be built, taxes collected, fortifications planned? Surely a Frenchman must sometimes think — if only by accident — of something other than his neighbor's wife? Macleod laughed to himself, in the solitude of Castle Dare, and contemptuously flung the unfinished paper-covered novel aside.

But what was his surprise and indignation — his shame, even — on finding that this very piece in which Gertrude White was acting was all about a jealous husband, and a gay and thoughtless wife, and a villain who did not at all silently plot her ruin, but frankly confided his aspirations to a mutual friend and rather sought for sympathy; while she, Gertrude White herself, had, before all these people, to listen to advances which, in her innocence, she was not supposed to understand. As the play proceeded, his brows grew darker and darker. And the husband who ought to

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

have been the guardian of his wife's honor? Well, the husband in this rather poor play was a creation that is common in modern English drama. He represented one idea at least that the English playwright has certainly not borrowed from the French stage. Moral worth is best indicated by a sullen demeanor. The man who has a pleasant manner is dangerous and a profligate; the virtuous man — the true-hearted Englishman — conducts himself as a boor, and proves the goodness of his nature by his silence and his sulks. The hero of this trumpery piece was of this familiar type. He saw the gay fascinator coming about his house; but he was too proud and dignified to interfere. He knew of his young wife becoming the by-word of his friends; but he only clasped his hands on his forehead, and sought solitude, and scowled as a man of virtue should. Macleod had paid but little attention to stories of this kind when he had merely read them; but when the situation was visible — when actual people were before him — the whole thing looked more real, and his sympathies became active enough. How was it possible, he thought, for this poor dolt to fume and mutter, and let his innocent wife go her own way alone and unprotected, when there was a door in the room, and a window by way of alternative? There was one scene in which the faithless friend and the young wife were together in her drawing-room. He drew nearer to her; he spoke softly to her; he ventured to take her hand. And while he was looking up appealingly to her, Macleod was regarding his face. He was calculating to himself the precise spot between the eyes where a man's knuckles would most effectually tell; and his hand was clinched, and his teeth set hard. There was a look on his face which would have warned any gay young man that when Macleod should marry, his wife would need no second champion.

But was this the atmosphere by which she was surrounded? It is needless to say that the piece was proper enough. Virtue was triumphant; vice compelled to sneak off discomfited. The indignant outburst of shame and horror and contempt on the part of the young wife, when she came to know what the villain's suave intentions really meant, gave Miss White an excellent opportunity of displaying her histrionic gifts; and the public applauded vehemently; but Macleod had no pride in her triumph. He was glad when the piece ended — when the honest-hearted Englishman so far recovered speech as to declare that his confidence in his wife was restored, and so far forgot his stolidity of face and demeanor as to point out to the villain the way to the door instead of kicking him thither. Macleod breathed more freely when he knew that Gertrude White was now about to go away to the shelter and quiet of her own home. He went back to his rooms, and tried to forget the precise circumstances in which he had just seen her.

But not to forget herself. A new gladness filled his heart when he thought of her — thought of her not now as a dream or a vision, but as the living and breathing woman whose musical laugh seemed still to be ringing in his ears. He could see her plainly — the face all charged with life and loveliness; the clear bright eyes that he had no longer any fear of meeting; the sweet mouth with its changing smiles. When Major Stuart came home that night he noticed a most marked change in the manner of his companion. Macleod was excited, eager, talkative; full of high spirits and friendliness; he joked his friend about his playing truant from his wife. He was anxious to know all about the major's adventures, and pressed him to have but one other cigar, and vowed that he would take him on the following evening to the only place in London where a good dinner could be had. There was gladness in his eyes, a careless satisfaction in his manner; he was ready to do anything, go anywhere. This was more like the Macleod of old. Major Stuart came to the conclusion that the atmosphere of London had had a very good effect on his friend's spirits.

When Macleod went to bed that night there were wild and glad desires and resolves in his brain that might otherwise have kept him awake but for the fatigue he had lately endured. He slept, and he dreamed; and the figure that he saw in his dreams — though she was distant, somehow — had a look of tenderness in her eyes, and she held a red rose in her hand.

From The Contemporary Review.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE ACTS FROM RECENT DISCOVERIES.

BY CANON LIGHTFOOT.

In a former volume M. Renan declared his opinion that "the author of the Third Gospel and the Acts was verily and indeed (bien réellement) Luke, a disciple of Saint

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Paul." * In the last instalment of his work he condemns as untenable the view that the first person plural of the later chapters is derived from some earlier document inserted by the author, on the ground that these portions are identical in style with the rest of the work.† Such an expression of opinion, proceeding from a not too conservative critic, is significant; and this view of the authorship, I cannot doubt, will be the final verdict of the future, as it has been the unbroken tradition of the past. But at a time when attacks on the genuineness of the work have been renewed, it may not be out of place to call attention to some illustrations of the narrative which recent discoveries have brought to light. No ancient work affords so many tests of veracity; for no other has such numerous points of contact in all directions with contemporary history, politics, and topography, whether Jewish or Greek or Roman. In the publications of the year 1877, Cyprus and Ephesus have made important contributions to the large mass of evidence already existing.

1. The government of the Roman provinces at this time was peculiarly dangerous ground for a romance-writer to venture upon. When Augustus assumed the supreme power, he divided the provinces under the Roman dominion with the Senate. From that time forward there were two sets of provincial governors. The ruler of a senatorial province was styled a proconsul (ἀνθύπατος), while the officer to whom an imperatorial province was intrusted bore the name of proprætor (ἀντιστράτηγος) or legate (πρεσβευτής). Thus the use of the terms "proconsul" and "proprætor" was changed; for, whereas in republican times they signified that the provincial governors bearing them had previously held the offices of consul and prætor respectively at home, they were now employed to distinguish the superior power under which the provinces were administered without regard to the previous rank of the governors administering them. Moreover, the original subdivision of the provinces between the emperor and Senate underwent constant modifications. If disturbances broke out in a senatorial province and military rule was necessary to restore order, it would be transferred to the emperor as the head of the army, and the Senate would receive an imperatorial province in exchange. Hence at any given time it would be impossible to say without contemporary, or at least very exact historical knowledge, whether a particular province was governed by a proconsul or a proprætor. The province of Achaia is a familiar illustration of this point. A very few years before St. Paul's visit to Corinth, and some years later, Achaia was governed by a proprætor. Just at this time, however, it was in the hands of the Senate, and its ruler therefore was a proconsul, as represented by St. Luke.

Cyprus is a less familiar, but not less instructive, example of the same accuracy. Older critics, even when writing on the apologetic side, had charged St. Luke with an incorrect use of terms; and the origin of their mistake is a significant comment on the perplexities in which a later forger would find himself entangled in dealing with these official designations. They fell upon a passage in Strabo * where this writer, after mentioning the division of the provinces between the emperor and the Senate, states that the Senate sent consuls to the two provinces of Asia and Africa, but prætors to the rest on their list, — among which he mentions Cyprus; and they jumped at the conclusion — very natural in itself — that the governor of Cyprus would be called a proprætor. Accordingly Baronio † suggested that Cyprus, though a prætorian province, was often handed over honoris causa to be administered by the proconsul of Cilicia, and he assumed therefore that Sergius Paulus held this latter office; while Grotius found a solution in the hypothesis that proconsul was a title bestowed by flatterers on an official whose proper designation was proprætor. The error illustrates the danger of a little learning, not the less dangerous when it is in the hands of really learned men. Asia and Africa, the two great prizes of the profession, exhausted the normal two consuls of the preceding year; and the Senate therefore were obliged to send ex-prætors and other magistrates to govern the remaining provinces under their jurisdiction. But it is now an unquestioned and unquestionable fact that all the provincial governors who represented the Senate in imperial times, whatever magistracy they might have held previously, were styled officially proconsuls.‡

* Les Apôtres, p. xviii.
† Les Evangiles, p. 436.

* xvii., p. 840.
† Sub ann. 46.
‡ See Becker u. Marquardt, Röm. Alterth. III. i., p. 294, seq. Even De Wette has not escaped the pitfall, for he states that "according to Strabo Cyprus was governed by proprætors," and he therefore supposes that Strabo and Dion Cassius are at variance. De Wette's error stands uncorrected by his editor, Overbeck.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

The circumstances indeed, so far as regards Cyprus, are distinctly stated by Dion Cassius. At the original distribution of the provinces (B.C. 27) this island had fallen to the emperor's share; but the historian, while describing the assignment of the several countries in the first instance, adds that the emperor subsequently gave back Cyprus and Gallia Narbonensis to the Senate, himself taking Dalmatia in exchange; * and at a later point, when he arrives at the time in question (B.C. 22), he repeats the information respecting the transfer. "And so," he adds, "proconsuls began to be sent to those nations also." † Of the continuance of Cyprus under the jurisdiction of the Senate, about the time to which St. Luke's narrative refers, we have ample evidence. Contemporary records bear testimony to the existence of proconsuls in Cyprus not only before and after, but during the reign of Claudius. The inscriptions mention by name two proconsuls who governed the province in this emperor's time (A.D. 51, 52); ‡ while a third, and perhaps a fourth, are recorded on the coins.§ At a later date, under Hadrian, we come across a proprætor of Cyprus.‖ The change would probably be owing to the disturbed state of the province consequent on the insurrection of the Jews. But at the close of the same century (A.D. 198) — under Severus — it is again governed by a proconsul; ¶ and this was its normal condition.

Thus the accuracy of St. Luke's designation is abundantly established; but hitherto no record had been found of the particular proconsul mentioned by him. This defect is supplied by one of General Cesnola's inscriptions. It is somewhat mutilated indeed, so that the meaning of parts is doubtful; but for our purpose it is adequate. A date is given as ΕΠΙ · ΠΑΥΛΟΥ · [ΑΝΘ]ΥΠΑΤΟΥ "in the proconsulship of Paulus." On this Cesnola remarks: "The proconsul Paulus may be the Sergius Paulus of the Acts of the Apostles (chap. xiii.), as instances of the suppression of one of two names are not rare."  An example of the suppression in this very name Sergius Paulus will be given presently, thus justifying the identification of the proconsul of the Acts with the proconsul of this inscription.

Of this Sergius Paulus, the proconsul of Cyprus, Dean Alford says that "nothing more is known." But is it certain that he is not mentioned elsewhere? In the index of contents and authorities which forms the first book of Pliny's "Natural History," this writer twice names one Sergius Paulus among the Latin authors to whom he was indebted. May not this have been the same person? The name is not common. So far as I have observed, only one other person bearing it * — probably a descendant of this Cyprian proconsul — is mentioned, of whom I shall have something to say hereafter; and he flourished more than a century later. Only one test of identity suggests itself. The Sergius Paulus of Pliny is named as an authority for the second and eighteenth books of that writer. Now on the hypothesis that the proconsul of Cyprus is meant, it would be a natural supposition that like Sir J. Emerson Tennent or Sir Rutherford Alcock, this Sergius Paulus would avail himself of the opportunities afforded by his official residence in the East to tell his Roman fellow-countrymen something about the region in which he had resided. We therefore look with interest to see whether these two books of Pliny contain any notices respecting Cyprus, which might reasonably be explained in this way; and our curiosity is not disappointed. In the second book, besides two other brief notices (cc. 90, 112) relating to the situation of Cyprus, Pliny mentions (c. 97) an area in the temple of Venus at Paphos on which the rain never falls. In the eighteenth book again, besides an incidental mention of this island (c. 57), he gives some curious information (c. 12) with respect to the Cyprian corn, and the bread made therefrom. It should be added that for the second book, in which the references to Cyprus come late, Sergius Paulus is the last-mentioned Latin authority; whereas for the eighteenth, where they are early, he occupies an earlier, though not very

* liii. 12.

† liv. 4.

‡ Q. Julius Cordus and L. Annius Bassus in Boeckh, Corp. Inscr. Græc., 2631, 2632.

§ Cominius Proclus, and perhaps Quadratus: see Akerman's "Numismatic Illustrations of the New Testament," p. 39.

‖ Corp. Inscr. Lat., iii. 6072, an Ephesian inscription discovered by Mr. Wood.

¶ Corp. Inscr. Lat., iii. 218.

 Cesnola's "Cyprus," p. 425.

* Dean Alford indeed (on Acts xiii. 7), following some previous writers, mentions a Sergius Paulus, intermediate in date between the two others — the authority of Pliny and the friend of Galen — whom he describes as "one of the consules suffecti in A.D. 94." This however is a mistake. A certain inscription, mentioning L. Sergius Paullus as consul, is placed by Muratori (p. cccxiv. 3) and others under the year 94; but there is good reason to believe that it refers to the friend of Galen, and must be assigned to the year when he was consul for the first time, as suffectus, i.e. about A.D. 150. See Marini, Atti e Monumenti de' Fratelli Arvali, p. 198; Waddington, Fastes des Provinces Asiatiques, p. 731.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

early, place in the list. These facts may be taken for what they are worth. In a work, which contains such a multiplicity of details as Pliny's "Natural History," we should not be justified in laying too much stress on coincidences of this kind.

From the Sergius Paulus of Luke the physician we turn to the Sergius Paulus of Galen the physician. Soon after the accession of M. Aurelius (A.D. 161) Galen paid his first visit to Rome, where he stayed for three or four years. Among other persons whom he met there was L. Sergius Paulus, who had been already consul suffectus about A.D. 150, and was hereafter to be consul for the second time in A.D. 168 (on this latter occasion as the regular consul of the year), after which time he held the prefecture of the city.* He is probably also the same person who is mentioned elsewhere as proconsul of Asia in connection with a Christian martyrdom.† This later Sergius Paulus reproduces many features of his earlier namesake. Both alike are public men; both alike are proconsuls; both alike show an inquisitive and acquisitive disposition. The Sergius Paulus of the Acts, dissatisfied (as we may suppose) alike with the coarse mythology of popular religion and with the lifeless precepts of abstract philosophies, has recourse first to the magic of the sorcerer Elymas, and then to the theology of the apostles Barnabas and Saul, for satisfaction. The Sergius Paulus of Galen is described as "holding the foremost place in practical life as well as in philosophical studies;" he is especially mentioned as a student of the Aristotelian philosophy; and he takes a very keen interest in medical and anatomical learning. Moreover, if we may trust the reading, there is another striking coincidence between the two accounts. The same expression, "who is also Paul" (ὁ καὶ Παῦλος), is used to describe Saul of Tarsus in the context of the Acts, and L. Sergius in the account of Galen. Not the wildest venture of criticism could so trample on chronology as to maintain that the author of the Acts borrowed from these treatises of Galen; and conversely I have no desire to suggest that Galen borrowed from St. Luke. But if so, the facts are a warning against certain methods of criticism which find favor in this age. To sober critics, the coincidence will merely furnish an additional illustration of the permanence of type which forms so striking a feature in the great Roman families. One other remark is suggested by Galen's notices of his friend. Having introduced him to us as "Sergius who is also Paulus," he drops the former name altogether in the subsequent narrative, and speaks of him again and again as Paulus simply. This illustrates the newly-published Cyprian inscription, in which the proconsul of that province is designated by the one name Paulus only.

2. The transition from General Cesnola's "Cyprus" to Mr. Wood's "Ephesus" carries us forward from the first to the third missionary journey of St. Paul. Here again, we have illustrative matter of some importance. The main feature in the narrative of the Acts is the manner in which the cultus of the Ephesian Artemis dominates the incidents of the apostle's sojourn in that city. As an illustration of this feature, it would hardly be possible to surpass one of the inscriptions in the existing collection.* We seem to be reading a running commentary on the excited appeal of Demetrius the silversmith, when we are informed that "not only in this city but everywhere temples are dedicated to the goddess, and statues erected and altars consecrated to her, on account of the manifest epiphanies which she vouchsafes" (τὰς ὑπ' αὐτῆς γεινομένας ἐναργεῖς ἐπιφανείας); that "the greatest proof of the reverence paid to her is the fact that a month bears her name, being called Artemision among ourselves, and Artemisius among the Macedonians and the other nations of Greece

* This person is twice mentioned by Galen, De Anat. Admin., i. 1 (Op. ii., p. 218, Kühn): τοῦδε τοῦ νῦν ἐπάρχου τῆς Ῥωμαίων πόλεως, ἀνδρὸς τὰ πάντα πρωτεύοντος ἔργοις τε καὶ λόγοις τοῖς ἐν φιλοσοφία, Σεργίου Παύλου ὑπάτου: De Prænot. 2 (Op. ii., p. 612), ἀφίκοντο Σέργιός τε ὁ καὶ Παῦλος, ὃς οὐ μετὰ πολὺν χρόνον ὕπαρχος (l. ἔπαρχος) ἐγένετο τῆς πόλεως, καὶ Φλάβιος, ὑπατικὸς μὲν ὢν ἤδη καὶ αὐτὸς, ἐσπευκὼς δὲ περὶ τὴν Ἀριστοτέλους φιλοσοφίαν, ὥσπερ καὶ ὁ Παῦλος, ὡῖς διηγησάμενος, κ. τ. λ. In this latter passage the words stand Σέργιός τε καὶ ὁ Παῦλος in Kühn and other earlier printed editions which I have consulted, but they are quoted Σέργιός τε ὁ καὶ Παῦλος by Wetstein and others. I do not know on what authority this latter reading rests, but the change in order is absolutely necessary for the sense; for (1) in this passage nothing more is said about Sergius as distinct from Paulus, whereas Paulus is again and again mentioned, so that plainly one person alone is intended (2) in the parallel passage Sergius Paulus is mentioned, and the same description is given of him as of Paulus here. The alternative would be to omit καὶ ὁ altogether, as the passage is tacitly quoted in Borghesi, Œuvres, viii., p. 504.

† Melito in Euseb., H. E., iv. 26: see Waddington, Fastes des Provinces Asiatiques, p. 731.

* Boeckh, Corp. Inscr. Græc., 2954. The first sentence which I have quoted is slightly mutilated; but the sense is clear. The document bears only too close a resemblance to the utterances of Lourdes in our own day.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

and their respective cities;" that during this month "solemn assemblies and religious festivals are held, and more especially in this our city, which is the nurse of its own Ephesian goddess" (τῇ τροφῷ τῆς ἰδίας θεοῦ τῆς 'Εφεσίας); and that therefore "the people of the Ephesians, considering it meet that the whole of this month which bears the divine name (τὸν ἐπώνυμον τοῦ θείου ὀνόματος) should be kept holy, and dedicated to the goddess," had decreed accordingly. "For so," concludes this remarkable document, "the cultus being set on a better footing, our city will continue to grow in glory and to be prosperous to all time." The sense of special proprietorship in this goddess of world-wide fame, which pervades the narrative in the Acts, could not be better illustrated than by this decree. But still the newly-published inscriptions greatly enhance the effect. The patron deity not only appears in these as "the great goddess Artemis," as in the Acts, but sometimes she is styled "the supremely great goddess (ἡ μεγίστη θεός) Artemis." To her favor all men are indebted for all their choicest possessions. She has not only her priestesses, but her temple-curators, her essenes, her divines (θεολόγοι), her choristers (ὑμνωδοί) her vergers (σκηπτοῦχοι), her tirewomen or dressers (κοσμητεῖραι), and even her "acrobats," whatever may be meant by some of these terms. Fines are allocated to provide adornments for her; endowments are given for the cleaning and custody of her images; decrees are issued for the public exhibition of her treasures. Her birthday is again and again mentioned. She is seen and heard everywhere. She is hardly more at home in her own sanctuary than in the great theatre. This last-mentioned place — the scene of the tumult in the Acts — is brought vividly before our eyes in Mr. Wood's inscriptions. The theatre appears as the recognized place of public assembly. Here edicts are proclaimed, and decrees recorded, and benefactors crowned. When the mob, under the leadership of Demetrius, gathered here for their demonstration against St. Paul and his companions, they would find themselves surrounded by memorials which might stimulate their zeal for the goddess. If the "town-clerk" had desired to make good his assertion, "What man is there that knoweth not that the city of the Ephesians is sacristan of the great goddess Artemis?" he had only to point to the inscriptions which lined the theatre for confirmation. The very stones would have cried out from the walls in response to his appeal.

Nor is the illustration of the magistracies which are named by St. Luke less complete. Three distinct officers are mentioned in the narrative — the Roman proconsul (ἀνθύπατος), the governor of the province and supreme administrator of the law, translated "deputy" in our version; the recorder (γραμματεύς) or chief magistrate of the city itself, translated "town-clerk;" and the Asiarchs ('Ασιαρχαί), or presidents of the games and of other religious ceremonials, translated "the chief of Asia." All these appear again and again in the newly-discovered inscriptions. Sometimes two of the three magistracies will be mentioned on the same stone. Sometimes the same person will unite in himself the two offices of recorder and Asiarch, either simultaneously or not. The mention of the recorder is especially frequent. His name is employed to authenticate every decree and to fix every date.

But besides these more general illustrations of the account in the Acts, the newly-discovered inscriptions throw light on some special points in the narrative. Thus, where the chief magistrate pronounces St. Paul and his companions to be "neither sacrilegious (ἱεροσύλους) nor blasphemers of our goddess,"* we discover a special emphasis in the term on finding from these inscriptions that certain offences (owing to the mutilation of the stone, we are unable to determine the special offences) were treated as constructive sacrilege against the goddess. "Let it be regarded as sacrilege and impiety" (ἔστο ἱεροσυλία καὶ ἀσέβεια), says an inscription found in this very theatre,† though not yet set up at the time when the "town-clerk" spoke. So again, where the same speaker describes the city of Ephesus as the neocoros, the "temple-sweeper" or "sacristan of the great goddess Artemis," we find in these inscriptions for the first time a direct example of this term so applied. Though the term neocoros in itself is capable of general application, yet as a matter of fact, when used of Ephesus on coins and inscriptions (as commonly in the case of other Asiatic cities), it has reference to the cultus not of the patron deity, but of the Roman emperors. In this sense Ephesus is described as "twice" or "thrice sacristan," as the case may be,

* Acts xix. 37, where ἱεροσύλους is oddly translated "robbers of churches."

† Inscr. vi. 1, p. 14.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

the term being used absolutely. There was indeed every probability that the same term would be employed also to describe the relation of the city to Artemis. By a plausible but highly precarious conjecture it had been introduced into the lacuna of a mutilated inscription.* By a highly probable but not certain interpretation it had been elicited from the legend on a coin.† There were analogies too which supported it. Thus the Magnesians are styled on the coins "sacristans of Artemis;" ‡ and at Ephesus itself an individual priest is designated by the same term "sacristan of Artemis." § Nor did it seem unlikely that a city which styled itself "the nurse of Artemis" should also claim the less audacious title of "sacristan" to this same goddess. Still probability is not certainty; and (so far as I am aware) no direct example was forthcoming. Mr. Wood's inscriptions supply this defect. On one of these "the city of the Ephesians" is described as "twice sacristan of the Augusti according to the decrees of the Senate and sacristan of Artemis." ‖

One other special coincidence deserves notice. The recorder, desirous of pacifying the tumult, appeals to the recognized forms of law. "If Demetrius and his fellow-craftsmen," he says, "have a matter against any one, assizes are held, and there are proconsuls.¶ Let them indict one another. But if you have any further question (i.e., one which does not fall within the province of the courts of justice), it shall be settled in the lawful (regular) assembly." By a "lawful (regular) assembly" (ἔννομος ἐκκλησία) he means one of those which were held on stated days already predetermined by the law, as opposed to those which were called together on special emergencies out of the ordinary course, though in another sense these latter might be equally "lawful." An inscription, found in this very theatre in which the words were uttered, illustrates this technical sense of "lawful." It provides that a certain silver image of Athene shall be brought and "set at every lawful (regular) assembly (κατὰ πᾶσαν νόμιμον ἐκκλησίαν) above the bench where the boys sit." *

With these facts in view, we are justified in saying that ancient literature has preserved no picture of the Ephesus of imperial times — the Ephesus which has been unearthed by the sagacity and perseverance of Mr. Wood — comparable for its lifelike truthfulness to the narrative of St. Paul's sojourn there in the Acts.

I am tempted to add one other illustration of an ancient Christian writer, which these inscriptions furnish. Ignatius, writing to the Ephesians from Smyrna in the early years of the second century, borrows an image from the sacred pageant of some heathen deity, where the statues, sacred vessels, and other treasures of the temple are borne in solemn procession. He tells his Christian readers that they all are marching in festive pomp along the via sacra — the way of love — which leads to God; they all are bearers of treasures committed to them,— for they carry their God, their Christ, their shrine, their sacred things in their heart.† The image was not new. It is found in Stoic writers. It underlies the surname Theophorus, the "God-bearer," which Ignatius himself adopted. But he had in his company several Ephesian delegates when he wrote; and the newly-discovered inscriptions inform us that the practice which supplies the metaphor had received a fresh impulse at Ephesus shortly before this letter was written. The most important inscriptions in Mr. Wood's collection relate to a gift of numerous valuable statues, images, and other treasures to the temple of Artemis, by one C. Vibius Salutaris, with an endowment for their custody. In one of these (dated A.D. 104) it is ordained that the treasures so given shall be carried in solemn procession from the temple to the theatre and back "at every meeting of the assembly, and at the gymnastic contests, and on the other days that may be directed by the council and the people." Orders are given respecting the persons forming the procession, as well as respecting its route. It must pass through the length of the city, entering by the Magnesian Gate and leaving by the Coressian.‡

* Boeckh, Corp. Inscr., 2972, τ[οῖς νεωκόρων τῶν Σεβαστῶν μόνω]ν ἁπα[σῶν] δέ τῆς Αρτέμιδος.

† Eckhel, Doctr. Num. ii., p. 520. The legend is— ΕΦΕΣΙΩΝ · ΤΡΙΣ · ΝΕΩΚΟΡΩΝ · ΚΑΙ · ΤΗΣ · ΑΡΤΕΜΙΔΟΣ.

‡ Mionnet, iii., p. 153, Suppl. vi., pp. 245, 247, 250, 253.

§ Xen., Anab. v. 3, 6.

‖ Inscr. vi. 6, p. 50.

¶ Acts xix. 38, ἀγόραιοι [sc. ἡμέραι] ἄγονται καὶ ἀνθύπατοί εἰσιν, translated "the law is open, and there are deputies," in the Authorized Version, but the margin, "the court days are kept," gives the right sense of the first clause. In the second clause "proconsuls" is a rhetorical plural, just as, e.g, in Euripides (Iph. Taur. 1359) Orestes and Pylades are upbraided for "stealing from the land its images and priestesses" (κλέπτοντες ἐκ γῆς ξόανα καὶ θυηπολούς), though there was only one image and one priestess.

* Inscr. vi. 1, p. 38.

† Ignat. Ephes. 9.

‡ Inscr. vi. 1., p. 42.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From All The Year Round.

THE HOUSE ACROSS THE STREET.

CHAPTER I.

It was the narrowest street imaginable, a mere flagged passage indeed, protected by little posts and chains from suspicion even of being anything so vulgar as a thoroughfare; and opening into one of those quaint old Bloomsbury squares at one end, and a quainter old crescent at the other. There was a church at the corner, old too, with a square Gothic tower, built in grey stone, green with damp, and black with age and soot, and abutting directly on the pavement, without any intervening space of grass or gravel to give it dignity and seclusion. The house stood close beside it, a little back in the shadow of the big tower, and divided from the sidewalk by a flight of stone steps and an iron railing; a tall, narrow, dark-red building of the time of Queen Anne, with a ponderous brazen knocker, and a couple of antiquated iron extinguishers, set at either side of the gateway: extinguishers which the link-boys were wont to use to quench their flaring torches, in the old days, after their mistress had emerged, powdered and hooped, and with dainty patches set cunningly on cheek and chin, from the sedan-chair which had borne her to a night's festivity at Ranelagh or Vauxhall; and had been handed by her brocaded and bagwigged lord up the tall flight of steps aforementioned.

I wonder was ever a damsel among those high-heeled and delicate-featured belles of the eighteenth century, one-tenth part as lovely as she who reigned in the old red house when I lived over the way? Ah me! how often I have sat and watched her, doing nothing, thinking nothing, only taking in the mere sight of her grace and beauty, as if they were rest and refreshment to the wearied mind and worn-out body!

I was only a London surgeon, a plain, middle-aged bachelor, with a large practice, and a big, dingy house, facing the old, red-brick tenement over the way; a house in which I snatched my hasty hours of rest, and devoured hurried meals, and saw servant girls and other impecunious patients for a couple of hours in the morning; but which had never been sanctified by a woman's loving smile, or gladdened by the patter of baby feet; or made beautiful by the flowers, and needlework, and thousand and one trifles which make even the homeliest "home" so different from the mere house in which a man lives. The house across the street was of far more interest to me than my own.

I suppose Miss Robarts must have been about one-and-twenty when she and her father first came to live there. She attracted my attention at once, a tall, slim, delicate-looking girl, chiefly noticeable for the languor of bearing and movement, in contrast to the noble lines of her face and form, as she sallied out of a morning to early service at the grey old church; the bloomy whiteness of her cheek showing whiter near her plain black dress and the red edges of her big prayer-book. The book seemed too heavy for the slender fingers which carried it. Doctors notice these things, you see; but I am glad to think I began to take an interest in her, even then.

The interest grew, however, even when the cause for it was gone; for, before many months, I saw that the sweet face, with its crown of nut-brown hair, looking out over a fence of mignonette for her father's return of an evening, had gained a delicate rose-tint, which showed brighter for the olive-green background of the heavy window-curtains, against which her small head took a golden tinge.

I think her father was very fond of her. He was a thin, stiff-looking, white-haired man, and used to scold her sometimes for coming out into the evening air with nothing on her head, when she met him at the door in the summer twilight; and sometimes I could hear his voice sounding sharp and peevish, as he sallied forth to business of a morning. But you could not see his face when he came out with her on his arm on Sunday, or the way in which he glared at any man bold enough to lift his eyes to her, without telling in a moment that she was the very pride and joy of his heart.

I don't know when I first began to watch for my fair neighbor, and note her doings. You see I had not much to amuse me in my own home, and gradually I grew to know her habits so well, that it would have made any one laugh to see how I watched for bright spring or summer mornings; for then I knew she would come out on a little piece of leads between their house and the body of the church, which she had cleverly converted into a garden for herself. I believe that in reality it was the roof of the vestry, but she gained access to it by a staircase window and a couple of steps; and there of an early morning I used to see her, her tall figure outlined against an oblong patch of pale blue sky, great coarse red pots of yellow daffodils and big purple flags about her feet, sometimes her head thrown back and her arms lifted, the wind blowing little soft locks about her brow, and ruffling the drapery of her simple morning gown, as she nailed some truant bough of Virginia creeper back against the dingy red-brick wall where she had trained it; sometimes standing with bent head, and beautiful white hands clasped round a pot of tall white narcissus, drinking in the sweetness and fragrance with a delight which never guessed at possible onlookers. Now and then, too, a long, slanting ray of sunlight would steal out across the house-tops, and fall athwart her pretty head and the yellow daffodils about her feet; or a great clang of bells would burst from the clustered grey pinnacles of the old church-tower overhead, startling a whole cloud of sparrows from their nests in grimly leering gargoyles, or floriated niches, into the blue expanse above; and all the while the roar of the great thoroughfares beyond could be heard, like the muffled beatings of a mighty heart, pulsing over grey house-roofs and church-towers and the vivid green glimmer of trees in the old square at the corner — a ceaseless echo of all the toil, and pain, and sin, and turmoil seething ever higher and higher in the great city beyond.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

That brief morning vision was like a little poem to me; but it was not only then that I saw her.

The Robartses had a custom, unlike most Londoners, of not drawing down their parlor blinds or shutting the shutters till bedtime. Perhaps they had lived in the country, where people are not so anxious to shut out the sweet blue night and stars. Any way, it was a habit of theirs; and I, sitting in the old armchair in my dusky parlor over the way, and often too tired after a long day's toil even to read, used to find quite a home-like reflection in the warm glow of the parlor-window opposite — the old man's white hair and her white dress gleaming out against the dull green walls, the glimmer of gold from the picture-frames, and her head bent over the keys of the tall ebony harmonium, with the orange light from the fire making a warm aureole about it, till the grand notes of the instrument, subdued by distance, and mingling with her voice, poured out in Schubert's matchless "Addio," or the grander cadence of a "Credo" by Mozart. At those times I was glad to shut my eyes and listen only — listen till the music and the glow and the gold-green brightness about the two heads grew into one harmonious whole, and became in my fancy a part of me; as though it were my room that held them, and she were in it singing to me. I wonder if it would have angered her if she had known; but she never did. I never even saw her glance across the way.

At last I came to know her.

They had been living nearly five years in the old red house, when one day Mr. Robarts was taken suddenly ill. It was a kind of fit; and in their anxiety to get the nearest assistance they sent across to me. Of course I went, and it was Magdalen who met me in the hall, put her hand in mine, and saying: "Thank you for coming; my father is very ill, and our doctor is away on the Continent," led me straight up-stairs to the room where the old gentleman was lying insensible.

By the time I came down again he was not only conscious, but declaring himself so much better that, if I had not absolutely forbidden it, he would have dressed and gone out as usual. There were grateful tears in Magdalen's eyes when she thanked me this time; and, sweet as her voice had sounded when it floated across the street in Schubert and Mozart, I never thought the low, rich tones half so full of melody as now when I heard them speaking — as in my dreams I had sometimes fancied them speaking — to me. It went to my heart to chill her gratitude by bad news, but truth must out where health is in question, and I had to tell her that I was afraid her father would not be quite well for some time yet; and to ask if his medical man would be long away.

"I don't know — months perhaps. He was very ill himself when he went. Doctor, do you mean that there is anything the matter with papa — anything more than weakness and this hot weather?"

There was such a look of appeal in her eyes that involuntarily I laid my hand on hers, as if I were soothing a child.

"You know there must always be some cause for weakness when a man is not naturally feeble, my dear young lady; and even a little cause ought to be taken in time to prevent its getting greater. I don't think there is any reason for you to be frightened about him, but he ought to have advice, and the sooner the better."

That evening I got a note from Mr. Robarts asking me to call on him on the following morning, and adding, —

"My own doctor is away, as you know. I detest his partner, and put no faith in bigwigs. If you think you can put me to rights, I shall be very glad."

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

I sent word that I would do as he wished; and from that day no other person attended him till his death. He had an internal malady, which had grown by neglect into even graver proportions than I had at first supposed. It was that which made him irritable and captious, and inclined at times to tyrannize even over the one being he loved, his only child; but he was quite aware of it, and in his better moments would tell me: "I am afraid pain makes me testy, doctor. I was harsh with Magdalen when you were here yesterday; but she's a good girl, a very good girl. She loves her old father, and never gives him back a sharp word or sour look."

And I don't believe she ever did. We were good friends now, and I saw her often and in many moods — sad, and gay, and playful, and dreamy — but never with a frown on the smooth, fair brow or bitter words on the lips.

Yet she had known trouble in her life, and had been crossed in her dearest wishes by the old man to whom she devoted her life. He told me all about it one evening, when, Magdalen having gone to the opera with a friend, I was playing piquet with him in her stead.

The talk had turned upon her. I don't think the tea was strong enough, and he began to grumble at her absence. I thought of the various sorts of tea — cold, smoky, and flavorless — with which my cook was in the habit of favoring me, and asked him what he would do when she was married, adding, with an absurd anxiety for the answer which even struck myself, that I supposed he did not expect to keep her long with him. He looked up from his cards, frowning.

"What do you mean, doctor? You don't think —— But pshaw! She sees no one here who would take her fancy; and the old affair was over long ago. I don't believe she even remembers it now. Come, you doctors have a way of looking into people's feelings through their faces. Don't you think she looks as well and happy as any girl you know?"

"Quite happy and very well," I answered decidedly, and he smiled. My words evidently pleased him.

"Ha! so I say. I am glad you agree with me, for it's all owing to me. She wouldn't have looked well or happy if she had married some ne'er-do-well who would have brought her to beggary, and run away from her in a twelvemonth. Eh, what do you think?"

"I think such a fate would have killed her. Was there ever — any chance of it?"

It was not a fair question, and I hesitated before putting it. The old man only laughed, however.

"Chance! It was touch and go. She wasn't twenty-one, when a fellow, a younger son with a heap of debts at his back, and not a farthing to bless himself with, fell in love with her, and succeeded in entrapping her into a promise. I was away at the time; and, unfortunately, her letter enclosing one from him missed me; and she interpreted something in the next I wrote her into consent; and positively considered herself engaged to the scamp. Egad! I promise you the engagement didn't last long after I returned! She was under age, so that I could have claimed her obedience, anyhow; but my Magdalen's a good girl, and I had been father and mother both to her since my poor wife's death. She didn't need to be forced into her duty; and, as to the young adventurer, I warrant you I didn't waste soft words on him, when I showed him to the door. He begged hard for a last interview; but I said: 'No, you've made my child unhappy enough as it is. I won't have you make her more so;' and I didn't."

"Then that was the end of it? They never met again?"

"Never. I took her away next day; and, though he wrote to her on the following one, I thought it was one of those cases where a father has a right to exercise his discretion. The letter is there now," nodding his head to a tall escritoire in the corner of the room. "I'm an honorable man, and I never even opened it. I daresay it's full of ranting and love-sick vows; but they'll do no harm there, and as for Magdalen — look at her!"

Yes, she was very calm and fair to look at. Yet, with the glad feeling that it was so, and that the girlish love of six years back was, as the old man said, a dream scarcely remembered, I could not repress a shudder at the pitiless way in which it had been stamped out, and an emotion of pity for the poor boy, who for a few days had thought to possess a treasure, which, in that moment, I knew it would have been death to me to lose. And she? Up in my mind rose a vision of her as I had first seen her, frail and white, with drooping head and languid step. Surely she too must have suffered; but, at least, it was over now — and, doubtless, it was for her happiness. From my heart — a heart still aching from the discovery of how precious

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

she was to me — I hoped that it might be so. Mr. Robarts took up his cards again with a serene air.

"I hardly think Magdalen will marry," he said cheerfully. "She is difficult, very difficult to please; and, as you see, she loves me, and is quite happy in her home. Perhaps, when I am gone indeed . . . but it is your lead, I think?" and he returned to the game with renewed interest.

"A man habituated to selfishness," I said to myself; but I had no right to pursue the subject, and there it might have rested forever if an incident had not recalled it. I had promised to lend Magdalen a book she wanted, and on the evening following this I went across the street to give it her, and, hearing she was in the dining-room, passed in there unannounced. The next moment, however, I was sorry that I had done so, for, to my great surprise and distress, I found her crying.

Of course she started up at my entrance, brushing the tears from her eyes, and I don't know which of us felt most embarrassment. I fear I showed mine and the concern I felt very visibly; for she recovered herself almost at once, and there was something so sweet and gracious in the way in which she received my bungling apology, seeming to put her own annoyance completely out of sight in the effort to set me at ease, that I was surprised when, just as I was leaving, she stopped me by saying with more girlish agitation than I had ever seen in her, and yet with a frank dignity which always seemed a part of her nature, —

"Dr. Elliot, you were surprised to find me crying just now; but I am not in any trouble. You look so sorry that I must tell you so."

I suppose I did not look satisfied; for she tried to smile and came nearer, leaning her clasped hands on the table.

"You were speaking last night to papa about my marrying. He was not so well this morning, and — and the idea fretted him. Pray do not do so again, ever. I do not mean to marry. He wants me. He could not do without me; and he is right in what he told you. I am quite happy, perfectly happy, and contented here with him — happier than I could be with any one or anywhere else."

"You are young to say that, my dear," I said gently.

You see I was past forty, an old man compared to her; and the tears in her eyes made me feel more tenderly to her.

"I am not too young to know what is right and good for me," she answered. "My father has only me in the world, and I ——" Her eyes wandered out to the green-blue of the twilight sky, and fixed themselves there with a strange, wistful look, as if she were appealing to some one far, far away. There was a little cheap ring on the third finger of her left hand. She covered it gently with the other, stroking it backwards and forwards softly. "How could I have had any happiness apart from his? And he has been so tender to me always. Other girls have mothers; but I — the study of his life has been that I should not miss mine. Think what it would be to him now to miss me! And pray, pray, never say anything to him to make him fear that he will."

"My dear," I said again, "you may trust me. Your father has a good daughter. I hope Heaven will bless her."

I hardly thought she heard me, for her eyes were still fixed on the sky in that far-away gaze; only, after a moment, a grave sweet smile came into them, and she held out her hand to me, saying, —

"Thank you, doctor; I do trust you already. Indeed, I think you are one of the best friends I have." And then she added, with a little laugh, as if trying to shake off the least remains of her sadness: "It seems strange that we should have grown to know each other so well after only six months' acquaintance, when for five years we have been living with only this narrow street between us, and never even dreaming of each other's existence. Why, the one thing I knew of your house was that it had a brass plate on the door, and I don't once recollect taking the trouble to look across, or to ask whether it belonged to a doctor or a dancing-mistress, until the day papa had that fit."

Not once! And all those five years her house had been the one home-spot in my toilsome life! Yet, after all, it was only natural. What was there on my side of the way? An ugly, middle-aged man and a dingy house. It was she who made her side what it was to me. For the rest, I was content enough at learning from her own lips that she was as happy as she looked, and would not change her lot for that which had once been offered her, if she had had the opportunity.

"Poor lad! But I daresay he, too, has consoled himself," I said to myself as I went away.

CHAPTER II.

It was early spring. There was a soft, balmy feeling in the air. The bare branch-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

es of the almond-trees were dotted over with tiny, rose-colored buds, a few brave primroses were thrusting up their pale yellow blossoms out of the dark-brown mould. Women were crying "Hyacinths!" in the street, and tempting passers-by with baskets heaped with their tall odorous clumps of white and pink and creamy bells. There were birds twittering in the square, and a stir of new life and freshness all through the world; but Mr. Robarts was not so well. He had been confined to the house for several days; and I went over to sit with him one afternoon, so that Magdalen might get out for a little fresh air.

"You won't leave him till I do come back," she said, lingering even after her bonnet was on. "Promise me, doctor. He is so disobedient to orders that he is not to be trusted by himself; but if you ——"

"Yes," I said, "I will stay, don't be afraid. I can promise you that or — anything else that you ask." The exceeding loveliness of her face had struck me even more that day than usual. I could not take my eyes off it till she was gone; and then, as I turned back to her father, I met his fixed on me. They were keen grey eyes; and in their hard scrutiny I read that which told me without any words that something in my face or tone had betrayed me, and that my secret was no longer my own. Well, I had naught to be ashamed of, and after the moment's shock I was man enough to meet his gaze fully and calmly. He was silent for a little; and then said, —

"I have just found out something. Do you know what it is, Dr. Elliot?"

"I think so. Isn't it that there are more fools in the world than you were aware of a few moments back? You have discovered that I care for your daughter. I have known it myself for some time back; but what does it matter? I hoped no one would ever guess it; and, after all, it is not my fault."

To my unutterable surprise he put out his hand to me, smiling.

"What is not your fault? To tell you the truth, I have once or twice before suspected your feelings for Magdalen; and I am glad you have owned it. You call it a folly, though. In what way?"

"Only that it is a folly for any man to stake his whole heart on something he has no hopes of winning."

"Hem! You are modest; or — may I ask if Magdalen has already convinced you of the hopelessness of your affection?"

"I have never so much as hinted at its existence to her. I should have thought you knew me well enough for that, Mr. Robarts. Indeed, I fancied that you ——"

"Wouldn't have heard of it? Well, to be frank with you, when the idea first flashed across my mind, it did startle me; but I have thought over it since then; and I don't mind telling you that, if I were to give my child to any man, I would rather it were you than another."

I was struck dumb with astonishment. He smiled again and went on.

"It is simply this — I know you. You are an honorable and kind-hearted man. I believe you are in a position to keep her in the style she has been accustomed to; and also that, if she were your wife, you would be good and faithful to her. Am I right, or not?"

I rose and answered —— Well, well, what do the words matter now? But I must have made my meaning plain at any rate; for he pressed my hand kindly.

"There! you are a good fellow, doctor, and I believe you. There is one stipulation, however, which I must make. Will you agree to it?"

"You have been so wonderfully generous to me, Mr. Robarts, it would be hard if I did not agree to anything you asked."

"Don't take my child from me, then. I have a fancy I am not here for very long; but I could not live without her. You will promise me."

I knew she would not have left him; but I promised notwithstanding.

"Thank you; and — don't say anything to her yet awhile. I do not believe that she cares for you at present, or guesses at your caring for her, or I would not ask it; but overhastiness might only upset her peace and damage your own cause. Leave her alone for a while."

I assented; and meanwhile I will tell you what I did. I set to work to beautify and refurnish my ugly old house from garret to cellar; and I got together pictures, and old china, and quaint brasses, and I cunningly persuaded Magdalen — old Robarts laughing in his sleeve at us all the while — that I had little taste and less time of my own for such things; and so won her to lend me hers in the choice of nearly all I purchased; being wishful that they should be all according to her own taste, so that the home, to which one day I hoped to bring my darling, should not repel her by its unlikeness to that she left. I remember her saying to me one day that she should quite look on it as her house when it was finished; and I hardly know whether the words gave me most pain or pleasure. Would she have said it if there had been any feeling in her heart akin to that in mine for her? And yet she took such a frank and eager interest in it all; and was so warmly cordial and trustful with me! I knew at least that she liked me, and how often is not liking only love's prelude? I had much secret doubt and fear and anxiety about that time; but I look back on it now, and know that I was very happy in it all the same.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

The end came sooner than any of us expected. Mr. Robarts was taken suddenly worse one evening in early May. A succession of fainting fits followed; and though he rallied from them, it was only to pain too keen for his exhausted frame to bear. Before midday on the morrow he was dead; and Magdalen knelt weeping by the bed where a few moments back he had tried to clasp our two hands in his dying fingers, and had whispered in hoarse, gasping tones, —

"Take care of her, Elliot. I trust her to you. Magdalen, remember, I — leave — you — to his care."

Ah me! it was more than "care" that I longed to give her then, my poor darling, in the first hour of her desolation; but no one save an utterly self-engrossed coward would have spoken to her of love and marriage at such a time; and it was enough that she did not repel the affectionate authority which, for her own good, I felt bound to use to her; and submitted to be ruled and tended by me with a meek, childlike passivity which made her more than ever dear and precious to me.

"I will wait a week," I said to myself. "One week more, and then, after the funeral, I will speak to her. I do not think she will send me away," and I did not. There was something in the look of her eyes when she thanked me, in the clinging touch of her fingers when they rested in mine, which, through all sense of my unworthiness, made me hope at last.

Mr. Robarts had few relations, and no near or trusted ones. He had left a written request that I would take charge of his papers, burn all that were not of importance, and arrange the funeral and legal matters. It would spare Magdalen somewhat; and she was to write to an elderly cousin in Scotland, who had long ago agreed to come to her in the event of such a contingency; but her letter found the elderly cousin ill and unfit to travel for several days, and Magdalen would not go to her or leave the house till after the funeral; neither had I the heart to urge it.

"You are here, and you do all that I want, or that any one could do for me. I am much happier alone," she had said, with a pitiful quiver about her beautiful mouth; and I took her hands in mine and answered,—

"My dear, you shall do just as you like. If being alone is a comfort to you, no one shall disturb you," and certainly I did not. I had to be there every day on business; but very often I did not see her at all. I was busy with the papers I have mentioned; and she rarely left her own room. The little garden on the leads was gay with spring flowers, and the ivy was putting forth all its fresh green shoots; but she never went into it now, and it had lost all its beauty for me.

I was over at the house one evening turning out the old oak cabinet, where her father had once told me he kept most of his private letters. It was a wearisome task enough, for they had all to be looked through before being destroyed; but I was glad to do it, for I knew that many would have pained Magdalen sadly; and in course of time came to one, set aside in an old pocket-book by itself, and without an envelope. I had glanced through it and had seen the signature before I realized that it was not written to Mr. Robarts at all, but to his daughter, from one Guy Latham — the letter written by Magdalen's lover, which had never been suffered to reach her. I don't know much about love-letters, and I suppose this was not different to the generality; yet I felt that I would rather die than that she should see this, the passionate appeal of a young man desperately in love, and furious at the cruelty which had separated him from its object. "I know you love me," he wrote. "Be true to me; and neither time nor absence shall shake my fidelity. Your father has behaved like a brute and a tyrant to us; but only wait for me, my angel, till I can make a home for you, and we shall be happy in spite of him," and I, reading it, wondered whether, if she had seen it, she would have granted the prayer, and gone on waiting for him till then. It was a question which was very terrible to me, and I shut the cabinet, and sat down to ponder over the letter. The doubt was what I should do about it even now.

Her father had kept it from her, and had never intended it to reach her eyes. It had been written six years ago, when she was only a young girl. The young man had never been seen or heard of since. The probability was that he had long since forgotten her, and she — well, she had wept for him, and had dried her tears and grown happy again as she had been before he crossed her path. What earthly end could showing her this letter serve now, save to upset her peace of mind, add a cruel tinge of bitterness to her grief for her father, and perhaps stir up some morbid scruple as to her right to accept the new love which was waiting to be offered to her? I thought of it all night and all the next day, and in all ways and lights, but this was the result to which I invariably came; and in the end I resolved to abide by it. I did not destroy the letter, however; something within me made me averse to doing so; and I locked it up again with other papers which were to remain in my keeping.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

The funeral was on the following day. Magdalen would go, though I tried to persuade her to the contrary, for it was a cold, raw day, and I was afraid for her health; but, though pale as death, she was very calm, and even at the graveside made no moan or crying; but stood there with locked hands and head a little bent, a tall, slender figure, all black from head to foot, cut out against the faint red color of an afternoon sky — a figure so solitary and pathetic in its voiceless bereavement, that it comes back to me even now with the longing I had then to take her in my arms, and so show her that love had not left her alone in the world after all.

"But to-morrow," I said to myself, as I put her and Cousin Jane, who had arrived in time for the ceremony, into the carriage. "Only till to-morrow! We shall both know then." Was it some mocking fiend which whispered to me that if she cared for me she would never have kept her face so steadily averted from mine, and answered me as briefly and coldly as I fancied she had done all that day — the day which saw the completion of the last services I could do for her? But what did it matter? I would have served her all my life long, even if I had known I could never have so much reward as a smile from her. Young men, when they make love, do it as they run and leap, for the prize they hope to win. With men of my age it is different. When we love a woman, it is not what we can get from her, but what we can do for her that we think about.

I went to see her on the following day. She was in the dining-room, the servant said, and alone; and there I found her. I had gone in unannounced, and I must have startled her, for a deep crimson spot came into her cheek as she rose to greet me, and I felt her hand tremble in mine. It had never done so before.

"I did not expect you," she said, a little formally. "It is kind of you to come, when I have been taking up so much of your time of late. Cousin Jane has only just gone up-stairs. I will ring for her," and she was reaching out her hand to the bell when I stopped her.

"Do not ring just yet," I said. "I have something I want to say to you first. Do you mind? It is not a good time, perhaps, but I will not keep you long, and I have waited ——" My voice was husky, and I broke off. I did not tell her how long I had waited. Her sweet, soft eyes met mine with a questioning glance. Somehow she must have guessed that it was no trifle I had come about, for her face had grown very white again; yet even then the trouble and yearning which I could not keep out of mine touched her. She answered very gently, —

"You may keep me as long as you like. Do you think I have forgotten what you were to papa, and that he left me to your care? What is it you want to say to me?"

She was still looking up at me. The late coldness which had so distressed me had quite gone from her manner. It was grave and full of trust. I had got my opportunity at last, and how did I use it? Why, I let go her hand, turned away from her sweet eyes, and, crossing the room, unlocked the oak cabinet in the corner, and took out Guy Latham's letter. I had decided that it ought never to be shown her. My mind was quite clear on the subject. My reason and my conscience were alike convinced, and —— Well, well, I daresay I am a blundering, inconsistent fellow; but I couldn't help it. I could not take advantage of an absent man when it came to the point, no, not even if I were to win Magdalen by so doing; and so I just put the letter in her hand and said, —

"I have something to show you first. I found this among your father's papers. It was written over six years ago; but he thought it better not to give it you then. You will not blame him even if he was wrong; for he meant it for your good. Do you know the handwriting?"

For the moment — one glad moment — I hardly thought she did; for she looked up at me, and then at the paper with a puzzled, wondering glance. Then I, looking on with what a sore-wrung heart no man can know, saw the blood suddenly rush up into her face, dyeing throat and cheeks and brow with one vivid crimson glow. Her lips parted with a quick, shiv-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ering gasp, her great eyes dilated with a look half fierce, half tender and yearning; and then a cloud came over them, "there came a mist and a driving rain," and down came the tears in a blinding torrent, bowing the fair head, and shaking the slender figure, and blotting all the faded words with their passionate drops, as she hid her face above them, murmuring the name which I had read at the bottom of the letter; but which none had heard cross her lips for many a weary year.

"Guy! My Guy! Oh! why did I never see it!"

I said nothing. What could I say — ay, or do either, in such a case? When wife and home, and all that this world holds for a man has just been swept away by a mountain avalanche, it is not words that you expect from him. He may know that in that one moment his heart has broken; but what of that? Hearts break every day; and mine — even then the worst ache in it was to see her grief and be so impotent to heal it. Yes, that was the worst of it; that passion of sorrow told me that my hope was vain; I should never now have the right to comfort and protect her as I had prayed I might; and I turned my face away, and crushed my hands together with a stifled groan for the vanishing of my foolish dream.

It was she who recalled me. Far more quickly than I had thought for she checked her grief, brushing the tears from her eyes with the air of one long used to repression, and touched me half timidly on the arm, as though she feared I was displeased with her.

"I am so sorry," she said gently. "Dr. Elliot, I do not know what you are thinking of me; but it was the sudden shock; and it is so long since ——" Her voice broke, and her eyes wandered to the letter which her other hand held pressed gently against her bosom. "I loved him," she said, looking up at me again with a sweet simplicity that was above all disguise, "and we were parted. I do not blame my dear father; and it is all over now. I ought not to have given way so, and before you. What was it that you wanted to say to me?"

Wanted! Ah, but the want was past now. I too could have said, "It is all over," but looking at the gentle courage in her fair, pale face, I could not but be brave myself.

"Nothing of any importance," I answered, taking her hands in mine. It was to be for the last time; though she did not know it. "I had meant to ask you something; but it does not matter, and you have answered it, not knowing, already. Let me speak of this letter instead. You will know I did not mean to grieve you when I showed it you. What I want is to see you happy, my child. Only be frank with me; and do not forget that you are in my care. I will not fail you. You love this — this young man. Do you know if he is true to you; or where we can find him?"

The red firelight was on her face, but I saw it whiten through all the ruddy glow; and felt her hands tremble. Yet her pathetic eyes never wavered in their straightforward glance.

"Do you not know?" she said. "Dr. Elliot, you are very good. I never knew how good till to-day; but you cannot help me in the way you think. There is nothing now of Guy to find but his grave. He died five years ago, just before we came to this house."

"Died!" I must have said it; but it did not sound like my voice, and the room seemed reeling with me. "Yes," she said softly, the tears brimming up into her eyes again, "it was barely twelve months after — after papa sent him away. He went to Australia. The friends where we first met gave me news of him two or three times; but it was not good news — there was no good news to hear." Her lip quivered even now at the remembrance; but she went on. "I suppose papa was right; he was not steady, my poor Guy, and he grew less so after we parted. At first I hoped that my love might help him; for he knew I would be true and wait until he had got on, and won papa's consent. And papa was not unjust, doctor; he would have given it if —— Please do not mind my crying; but I can't talk about that time. I don't think my poor Guy could work or keep to anything for long, and I daresay he had many temptations; but oh! even when I heard it, I knew God had never been so merciful as when he took him away. Poor Guy is safe now. It is better so, far."

There was a dead silence in the room. Only the ashes fell with a soft rustling sound into the hearth, and the flames leaped up and threw a warm glare over the dim green walls, the slender figure in its black robes, and tender, wistful face. A little small rain was pattering against the window-pane; and in the corner of the room a great basket of hyacinths gave out a sweet, faint fragrance. Magdalen remembered herself with a start, and our eyes met.

"I have pained you," she said sorrowfully. "Dr. Elliot, I am so sorry. For-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

give me. Indeed, I never meant to do so. I who owe you so much, and would give so much to be able to repay you, even in the least, for all you have done for me."

"My dear," I answered, lifting her pretty, clinging fingers to my lips, "love does not want repaying. I love you, Magdalen. Did not your father tell you? There is only one thing you can do for me; but I would not have it, though it has been the one hope of my life all these years I have known you, except you can give it me freely — of your own will — my love."

And then I stopped for an answer. What it was I will not tell you. Only, if you think it wrong that she, so fair and beautiful, should have given herself to a dull, middle-aged man like me, I cannot say anything. She will tell you if she has ever repented it — she, my wife, and the mother of my children, sitting with her hand in mine while I say this.

And the house across the street has had other tenants for more than ten years now.

From Good Words.

HOW TO LIVE ON A REDUCED INCOME.

[This paper contains the experiences of an English lady reduced in circumstances, who with two daughters is residing in a town in the neighborhood of Paris. Although the circumstances in detail are applicable to English persons who have settled on the Continent, it is believed that mutatis mutandis they might be usefully considered by Englishmen or Englishwomen in like circumstances at home. — A. P. S.]

THE conditions of modern life are changing so rapidly that the old-fashioned notion of living respectably "all round" is being rudely shattered among us folk of small, or even moderate incomes, the increase of which does not correspond to the requirements of the day. In the struggle to keep even with the times one family drops one thing, one another, according to their several or individual gains, but we all leave some of our feathers on the road, and they bear testimony to the pace being too much for us. Here we see home comfort erected as the household god. The traditional three women-servants — cook, housemaid, and parlor-maid, with a background of invisible "boy," and "charwoman" on occasions, make the machinery of housekeeping work easily, and a friend or two may drop in at meal-time without giving the mistress of the house a care. But there would seem to be a veiled sort of narrow self-sufficiency in this all-inside life; there is no margin for anything else — no travelling, no outside interests — and life is materialized into "living by bread alone." In another house the family evaporate continually; the money is spent in dress and locomotion; and considered as a social investment, if the people are pleasant and amusing it may pay, and start all the sons and daughters in the world; but then the home is a myth, representing only a shifting scene of discomfort, out of which all the members are continually escaping as fast as they can. Others — the most sensible, perhaps — are all for intellectual, or artistic, or literary pursuits; but the mistake is, that you must on a limited income take from Peter to pay Paul. One stints on fire, one on attendance, one on table; but the contrivances are still behind the ever-increasing necessities, till we come to the families at the opposite pole, who have not even a hobby, and live in a scramble all round without compensation.

The fact is that, whatever way the money goes, ninety-nine families out of a hundred are living up to the extreme edge of their income — and often beyond it — trusting in that case to some happy chance to be able to square accounts. And wives look harassed and husbands are cross, and the children come to feel that they are considered specially, if not exclusively, as so many items of expenditure; and family love, and kindly feeling, and all home affections are battered about from post to pillar till they are pretty well knocked to pieces in the daily struggle to appear what we are not. How much more of all this is to be endured? The relief must soon come somehow or other — by fair means or by foul. The truth is, that the drones are being squeezed away out of modern life, and that we, the middle-class people with fixed incomes, which are diminishing yearly and becoming "small by degrees and beautifully less," are being cleared off from the body social as surely as the Maories out of New Zealand. There is no room at all for us in the new distribution of parts, and, as money is daily losing its value, those who will not work must starve, and the sooner we realize this fact the better for our children, whose inheritance is always tending to melt away like snowballs in a thaw. I being a woman write specially for women, and would earnestly implore all parents of what is conventionally called good position and moderate means to bring up their daughters, as they do their sons, to some honorable employment. Means of occupation for ladies are opening out on all sides, and corresponding channels of instruction and

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

education are ready to their hands to prepare them for a career of honest work and usefulness. To me it appears to be positive cruelty in the face of increasing difficulties to leave girls helpless and incapable. But this is provision for the future, and meanwhile we require immediate relief in the present. It is to be found, I believe, in a more simple mode of life — in the not trying to keep up to the mark in one particular to the neglect of all the rest. Let us renounce at once the senseless struggle to appear richer than we are — this money pride — this Moloch on whose altar the well-being of so many families is offered up. It is the peculiar English weakness — the modern equivalent of the tax of blood on our scanty incomes. Let us shake it off bravely, fearlessly, and an untold relief will be the first and immediate consequence.

It is not a pleasant feeling to combine a sad consciousness of the incapacity to fight one's own battle in the world with the conviction that you are being "improved" off the surface of the earth on account of it, or, at least, as a consequence of it, and yet such is the fate of the greater number of us women who were educated under the old negative dispensation of the "Thou shalt not." That is, thou shalt not help thyself.

I have already said that we may ease ourselves in two ways — by making money, and by saving money. The former should be placed within the reach of the younger generation; the latter, which all, however, may practise, remains, I fear, the sole refuge of many of us in ripe middle age. It is at best but a transitory expedient; still it may do our day and see us through our time. It is, therefore, on "economy" that I would speak more especially to-day.

We often hear it said "You can live so much cheaper abroad;" but I doubt whether English families, even those who are accustomed to travel on the Continent, really know much about it. Circumstances have accelerated my descent personally, not merely by the sliding scale which is carrying us all along together more or less consciously, but with a sudden plunge, a small avalanche in private life, which has landed me from the moderate altitude of a cosy £500 a year down on an insecure ledge of £250, and I have thought it might not be without interest to show how "we do these things" abroad.

To begin with, there is the blessedness of "flats" instead of houses. Mine was rather small for my income, but being south (saving in fuel), pretty, healthy, and well situated, I had not cared to change, and so now can remain in it. We had two women-servants — equal to three in a house. These have been dispensed with, and I have in their place a woman who comes for three parts of the day. We now dine at one, and as soon as the washing-up is over, my femme de journée goes away, leaving the bright, cheery little kitchen free to us, if wanted. It is a notable economy not having a servant to sleep — in rent of sleeping-room, in washing, in house-linen, in lighting, and in warming. We consist of self and two daughters just growing up and still educating with a view to independence. I should mention that masters are paid for out of a small fund laid by for the purpose. Now to items: —

	£	s.	d.
Table (a month)	6	0	0
House expenses	6	0	0
Rent (unfurnished)	3	0	0
Clothes and private expenses	5	0	0
	£20	0	0

And we really do not live uncomfortably or discreditably, by which I mean that we do not in the slightest degree make our house a "pigsty" — an idea generally connected with tight quarters by those who enjoy plenty of room and attendance, and whom I am quite ready to challenge to a domiciliary visit — reciprocally! If travelling friends pass our way, we are ready to offer them lunch any day; and go the lengths of asking in a dozen or so friends of an evening sometimes for a cup of tea and music, and very good music too! Everything comes so handy in an apartment that "self-help" is scarcely apparent, and but a small infliction. Perhaps you would like to know how it all works and fits in. During these short winter days the servant does not come till seven, and as the breakfast is at eight, at that time it leaves a scanty margin. We help in the easy morning work, and as we still allow ourselves good light in an evening, I trim three small lamps, which we either unite on one table to work and read together or disperse at will. Breakfast consists of tea or milk, or some sort of porridge, as our tastes differ, bread and butter, and always a dish of raw fruit — just at present apples. Immediately afterwards I go down to the cellar, keys in hand, and give out so many logs of wood for the rooms and coals for the kitchen stove. The porter is enlisted for this service at the rate of five francs a month. It may be worth while to mention that a coal-scuttle full, weighing from fifteen to twenty pounds, is the allow-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ance for two days, with two scuttles a week of "slack" to bank up the fire after dinner, which keeps up a gentle warmth and hot water in the boiler till quite into the night. Coals being here £2 5*s.* a ton, and wood almost dearer in proportion, fuel is a serious consideration. Gas is laid on in the kitchen, and we cook entirely by it in summer. In winter I keep one small furnace burning to boil water or cook one dish at the hours when the stove is not available. All our early work is done by nine; indeed, three times a week there is a master who comes at ten. At dinner we have, — vegetable soup, one of the many sorts so well made in France; one dish of meat (prime joint from best butcher); potatoes; one dish of dry and one dish of green vegetables dressed in the foreign way. Tea or supper at half past six or seven — for this meal we are left to our own devices — a dish of stewed fruit being always ready, to which we add rice-milk or stewed maccaroni or a blancmange turn-out. We often come home late, and so have nothing which takes much time, if hot. Cold things are done in the morning by the servant. Sometimes we have hot roast chestnuts from round the corner, and altogether the reform of no late dinner has been welcomed not unkindly. At this hour I cook, and the girls lay the cloth and take away. The dirty crockery is put into the pantry for poor "Smudgy," as we call her, to wash up next morning, and before half past seven we are settled in the drawing-room without a household care on our minds, feeling that the little apartment is spick and span in every nook and cranny.

Every other Monday — it used to be once a week — comes the frotteur, by "peep o' day;" the man who rubs and polishes the floors, or gives the rooms, carpeted in winter, a thorough good routing and sweeping, to the tune of half a franc a room. He puts up all my winter curtains for one franc, and cleans all my windows for another — which in this unsmoked atmosphere is only necessary twice a year. Needlework is kept in check by a workwoman who comes two days in the week, at the cost of two francs or less a day, not fed. One of her days is my "at home," and I thus have a tidy girl to answer the door. When we give a "tomasha," i.e. an evening party, she comes for the occasion, which costs me another franc. By eight o'clock tea and cakes are set out in the dining-room. We have thus our three rooms lighted up, the piano being at the opposite end, and my "parties" do not cost me more than five francs.

What I want to impress on my readers by all these particulars is that we do not, we need not, sacrifice all the graces and amenities of civilized and social life any more than intellectual pursuits. We must dress very plainly, but we have good patterns and are handy with our needle. We cannot afford any extra expenses, and must practise a good deal of self-denial in that respect, for sheer want of margin; but we are not compelled to adopt any habits repugnant to gentlefolk, or that we should wish to unlearn under better circumstances. How much of this plan of life would be possible in England I cannot judge, not having tried: but surely much might be done. To small parties we go on foot in summer, in winter in a cab; the cost, there and back, is 2*s.* 6*d.* For large parties we order, on rare occasions, a remise carriage — a large landau with two horses, very roomy inside and perfectly clean; five francs, both ways. Our porter goes a message all over the town for five sous.

Under the rather comprehensive item of "house," £6 a month, I include fuel, fifty francs; wages of servant, forty francs; frotteur, or the "trotter," as my English cook would insist on calling him all the five years she was with me, five francs; workwoman, eight or nine francs; porter, five francs; soap, oil, candles, gas, washing, general wear and tear, breakages, and that ever-encroaching list of unclassable nothings that go under no particular heading, that are the enfants terribles of housekeeping, and require a very firm hand.

As for postages and locomotion, they go on the private expense-book. The fact is I have never had such a wonderful array of little account-books, or dealt so much in figures, or divided and subdivided to such an extent, as since there has been so little to operate upon! And I do not mean to say that all is couleur de rose, and that things are always quite easy, or even pleasant. Human beings, drill as you will, are not machines; and yet we must submit to the most orderly and tidy habits, and to the most extreme exactitude, as every one's occupations dovetail one into the other, and any irregularity translates itself into mutual obstruction, and often into expense, the ultimate consideration of all. Indeed, if things were not made easy to her we should soon have "Smudgy" in a highly excited state of mind, throwing up her arms wildly, and exclaiming in no dulcet tones — more, however, in despair than in anger — that she cannot overtake the work. Now Catherine, commonly called "Smudgy," is a sort of character in her

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

way — a legacy left me by the cook when we parted last year. She used to come in for odd jobs, and so learnt the ways of the house, and was altogether pleasanter to deal with than a stranger. "I assure you, ma'am," quoth cook, "you might go farther and fare worse than with Smudgy. I certainly do wish she would take more pride in herself, but that's just the worst that can be said about her. She is a good soul if you don't rough her, and speak kindly; and capital at cleaning, which many of them French are not; and she is daintily clean in her cooking, and really truly honest."

So Catherine was duly inducted into the cook's vacant place, but on her own express stipulation that she must have her evenings free to — go to school; and this she does with the utmost perseverance, notwithstanding that she is "fat, dark, and forty." She has a pleasant face, very soft pretty eyes, and a bright smile. There was a sort of winning naïveté in the way in which this stout rolly-poly woman said to me one day, "I was so pleased last night, I did not make a single fault in my dictation." Poor Catherine, why does she go about so unkempt? The coarse frieze peasant skirt, and woollen jacket hanging loosely from the shoulders, a capital working-dress, and which manages to look so thoroughly to the purpose, and yet tidy and appropriate on so many, seems to tell of neglect and want of honest pride in her, while her head is wild and bushy like that of a Shetland pony. The little I know of her past is but a shadowy outline. She was once in Algeria, as I learnt from the exclamation, "Oh, madame, always wash those little cheap figs! I have seen them prepared en Afrique; they powder them over with flour for it to look like the sugar come out in the drying, and altogether — it's better to wash them." She also made with me the bargain of one day free in the month to go to Paris "on business." She prepares the dinner for two days, and on the Paris morning only comes to do out the rooms, leaving us to warm up and serve, which makes it rather a black-letter day as far as we are concerned. I have found out that she goes to receive a monthly allowance, and that she has a boy educating somewhere, who is now twelve years old. And this information has given quite a new coloring to her desire to pick up a little instruction, her anxiety to have a little knowledge of things. It has appeared to me that she is possibly trying in her humble way to bridge over a chasm between herself and her child, that she may not be utterly abased before him. I respect her reticence, asking no questions; but to me it lends a touching pathos to the evening schooling. She is quiet and well-conducted enough now, poor thing! and I can fancy her steadied by that one pure and true love for a son who will perhaps be always far removed from her sphere. I have evolved a story out of these slight hints that he is being educated above her station, and that his father may be a sort of a gentleman intending his son to be on his own plane in life, which I have made up my mind probably is that of a small government employé, of which there are a good many thousands.

Left-handed connections are, alas! more than common in that world, because they are forbidden to marry under a certain dot or portion; the higher the grade the larger the sum. This is a wide and sore subject on which much might be said; for the present it is enough to state that, in consequence of these stringent requisitions, this whole class of men look upon such connections as perfectly justifiable. They may or may not end in marriage when the man takes his retirement and recovers his liberty. As a rule, the children are educated, and the father owns his responsibilities. I would fain have touched a tender corner in your heart for poor, willing, faithful "Smudgy," with her shock-head, soft, kindly eyes, and pleasant countenance, going after a hard day's work to her evening school to learn even as a little child. Poor she is not in the money sense of the word; like all the working-people in this country, she hoards penny upon penny, and then invests. She had an obligation de la Ville de Paris that was drawn with a premium the other day, on which occasion she, of course, took an extra jaunt into Paris to receive her money, which she re-invested forthwith; but she goes on toiling and moiling as if she possessed never a farthing. Surely the working-people, by which is understood the manual-labor class, have an enviable start of us, and are in more normal conditions of existence. That woman holds her livelihood in her own hand, and can earn her bread in a manner congenial to her habits and capacity. We ought to be able to do as much; failing which we stand at a clear disadvantage; and that is why some of our money goes to her direct, and none of anybody else comes to us through any exertion of our own. It is for this that our daughters must train to be workers in their sphere; it is the keystone to the arch of the nineteenth century. Let the young generation go forth on its way re-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

joicing in the new commandment, "Thou shalt" — in the glory of the affirmative principle which teaches that life is action, and that when we cease to do we begin to die. Let it abandon the leaky and sinking craft of idle poor gentility to join the goodly company of those who have realized that "work" in its noblest sense is our highest privilege — the most elevated point of contact of mortal humanity with the Divine: "My father worketh, and I work." All honor to the leaders of men, the great thinkers of the age, who elaborate the form in which it shall be cast, who mould or reflect the times. All honor to the workers above, and also to the workers below us, though they should join hands over our heads. Let those who can, make good their claim to enter the ranks on either side, and spring into renovated life and action. Let those who cannot, humbly bow their heads, and submit to their fate with, at least, the final and supreme grace of quiet dignity and patient resignation.

From The Examiner.

THE LETTER "H": A HISTORICAL CONJECTURE.

THE inquiring like the contented mind is a continual feast. It carries its banquet with it wherever it goes. But, though some problem or other, go where it will, is always offered to it, there is one set of problems which is always and everywhere suggested, except in solitude, namely, those afforded by the speech of others. Peculiarities of accent, curious grammatical constructions, the choice of words in different people, the cast of their sentences, the extension and intension, so to speak, of their style, from the vituperative volubility of an Irishwoman at Seven Dials to the laconic conciseness of the English laborer to whom the whole world is wrapped up in one highly-colored epithet, all furnish food for meditation.

Our Teuton ancestors, when they crossed the sea from Germany and settled in England, brought with them the same habit of aspiration which is common to the whole Teutonic stock; and, had they been suffered to live on unmolested in the lands which they had conquered from the Celts who went before them, the letter "H" would be this day as much respected on the banks of the Thames as it is at Washington and Leipzig. But fate willed otherwise. And if ever the truth of the maxim that evil communications corrupt good manners has received a solemn, indeed one may say a world-historical confirmation, it is in the process by which the slighting of the letter in question was introduced into this country. The Scandinavian Normans, allied to us in no small degree by blood and speech, had established themselves in northern France, and it cannot be doubted that Rolf and all the early comers from Norway were as blameless in the matter of the aspirate as are all the readers of this paper. But their numbers were comparatively few; the material civilization which they found in France was ahead of what they had left at home; and gradually, as was only natural, they put off the old Norman man, and adopted the customs and the language of France. And in this language the letter "H" is wanting. When the Saxon and the Norman armies stood face to face on the battlefield of Senlac, the Norman knight found it easier to spear his Saxon antagonist than to pronounce correctly the name of the Saxon king. And thus by the victory of William the Conqueror a ruling class was established in England which, whatever virtues and graces it may have possessed, was innocent of the aspirate. So long as Norman-French continued to be the language of the court and the upper classes this was of little consequence. But when the fusion of the two peoples began, and, as its basis and guarantee, the new English language was developed, the incapacity of the feudal lords to sound a letter which the popular ear felt to be indispensable must have been keenly recognized. It cannot be doubted that Brian de Bois-Guilbert said "'orse" and "'ouse" when he spoke to Rebecca of York, and it is likely that the repugnance which she showed to his love was as much due to this failing of his as to the faithlessness and barbarity which disfigured his character. Thus, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, it was the Norman nobility who were unable to utter the aspirate, and the mass of the people whose ears they offended thereby.

As time went on, and as the fusion of classes became more and more complete, it was natural that, by the working of laws which hold good everywhere, many of the upper classes sank to the general level of the people, and many of the people made themselves a name and founded a family; and in the fifteenth century two memorable changes were accomplished. In the first place, England lost her possessions in France, the close connection between the two countries was severed, and the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

steady stream of "H"-less foreigners into our island was thus cut off. In the second place, the Wars of the Roses were fatal to a great part of the nobility, and were directly or indirectly the cause why the vacant places were taken by new men who rose from the people. This accelerated that shifting process which is always going on in every country that is not under the spell of a social or religious caste-doctrine. There has been for centuries a twofold current, upwards and downwards, between the people and the aristocracy, like that between the oxygen and carbonic acid in a dwelling-house. But the remarkable fact, which it is now our task to explain, is that the people converted the upper classes to the use of the "H," while the upper classes infected the people with that grieving of the spirit which is involved in a contempt for this symbol.

And here the laws of philology and psychology come in to help us. In the first place, we all know what the contagious influence of a bad example is, even upon those who make an effort to resist it. The imitative instinct in man is largely unconscious, and is only partly under the control of the will. Some of us may have been shut up by bad weather in a country inn with people who despise, as is paradoxically said, "their H's." And those who all their life long have never sinned in this way will find, after a day or two of such association, that in certain words, such as "adhere" or "Alhambra," they do not indeed miss the "H," but the letter somehow becomes muffled; a kind of creeping paralysis seems to lay hold upon it; it ceases to be brought out with the full force and distinctness which are its due; and one flees as if the avenger of blood were behind. And the law of imitation is here backed up by a well-known philological law, which lies at the root of the growth and decay of language, the law, of which we are mostly unconscious while we illustrate it, according to which we spare ourselves effort in our speech up to the point where the saving of effort is more than counterbalanced by a loss of clearness. Now, it is undoubtedly an effort to sound the "H;" and there are whole nations which find the exertion more than it is worth, and therefore decline to undergo it. Thus the Norman example, helped on by the disinclination natural in all men to take trouble, prevailed in many cases over the long-established Germanic practice, and in some instances, as in the word "honor" and the like, prevails to this day in the speech of all instructed persons. The case quoted is, however, rather a survival of French usage than an invasion upon the Saxon.

It remains to be considered why this process, having gone so far, did not become general; why only part of the Saxons caught the trick, and why the remaining Normans in the upper classes were led to adopt the Germanic "H." A variety of causes seem to have worked together for this result. The force of example, to begin, tells both ways, and must have told very powerfully when the Norman population, small in number compared with the Saxon mass they ruled over, became freely mixed and distributed among it. In the next place, among those Normans who were of genuine Scandinavian descent, there would probably be a physical predisposition to recur to old usage, a predisposition which the stay of a century or two in France cannot have obliterated. Their return to the use of the letter, when they found the majority of those around them using it, would be at least as natural as the reappearance of ancestral habits in descendants who have never seen the ancestors whose ways and tricks they reproduce. Further, the learned class — that is to say, the clergy, whose influence on national speech has always been considerable — were drawn in England, as in all Catholic countries, largely from the people; and that respect for language and conservatism in language which are among the first results of scholarship cannot but have told upon them. And, finally, the impoverishment of language which comes from dropping a letter, the confusion and ambiguity which the habit is apt to produce, the ludicrous effects which it sometimes has, and its contradiction to the genius of our own and to the analogy of allied languages, would be felt by all who had an instinct for pure and correct speech, and especially felt by those whose position required pure and correct speech as a matter essential to personal dignity.

But these hints, to which it would be premature to assign the place of a scientifically proved theory, are not intended to weaken that respect for long descent and for all its outward symbols which is one of the most pleasing features in the English character. A physiological radicalism may assert that the farther we go back on the ancestral line the nearer we approach to our common forefather, the short-tailed monkey. Social enthusiasts may descant on the disastrous results of feudalism, with its exaggerated sense of claims and lax feeling for duties. But these few remarks are made only to serve the cause of pure reason.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXII. | No. 1775.—June 22, 1878. | From Beginning, Vol. CXXXVII.

CONTENTS.

I. Scepticism in Geology, ... Edinburgh Review, ... 707
II. Macleod of Dare. By William Black. Part XI., ... Advance Sheets, ... 724
III. Diderot at Saint Petersburg, . . . Fortnightly Review, ... 732
IV. Within the Precincts. By Mrs. Oliphant. Part VIII., ... Advance Sheets, ... 744
V. Basque Customs, ... Fraser's Magazine, ... 749
VI. Pictures and Dress, ... Spectator, ... 760
VII. Turkish Wives, ... Pall Mall Gazette, ... 762
VIII. The Microphone, ... Spectator, ... 764
IX. The Feast of Lanterns at Canton, . Japan Times, ... 765
X. Tibet, ... Spectator, ... 766

POETRY.

Adieu, Mon Cœur! Eighteenth Century, ... 706

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY
LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

For Eight Dollars, remitted directly to the Publishers, the Living Age will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of The Living Age is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of Littell & Gay.

Single Numbers of The Living Age, 18 cents.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ADIEU, MON CŒUR!

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

SPRING.

How gracefully the young Bertine
  With Jaques, her lover, dances!
See how like sunbeams 'neath the trees
  She flies, and then advances;
And yet she sings in a minor key
The old Provençal melody,
"Tais-toi, mon cœur! Adieu, mon cœur!"
As if some sadness came to her
  With love's dear smiles and glances.

The Sieur de Courcy comes that way
  And 'neath the walnut lingers,
He marks her instep clean and high,
  Her white and dainty fingers;
He hears her sing in a minor key
The old Provençal melody,
"Tais-toi, mon cœur! Adieu, mon cœur!"
And thinks, as he fondly looks at her,
  Of the lays of the Minnesingers.

But hark the call! the conscript drum!
  And Jaques, the number chosen;
No wonder that Bertine is dumb,
  The blood in her bosom frozen.
Brave Jaques strikes up in a stronger key
The old Provençal melody,
"Tais-toi, mon cœur! Adieu, mon cœur!"
And looking fondly back at her
  He said, "Dear love, be true to me!"

SUMMER.

The king said gayly, "Je m'ennuie,"
  Nor heard if the people grumbled;
What cared that gallant Majesty
  If some plain lives were humbled?
The next age sang in a different key,
"Tais-toi, mon cœur! Adieu, mon cœur!"
Of Pompadour and the Parc aux Cerfs,
And greeted the great with a bitter laugh
  When heads in the basket tumbled.

For when the sun lay on the vines
  Bertine the grapes was tying,
The tendril round her brow entwines,
  The summer days were flying!
Well may she sing in a minor key
The old Provençal melody,
"Tais-toi, mon cœur! Adieu, mon cœur!"
For the news was coming back to her
  Of the field where Jaques lay dying.

What, then, was history but a page
  Of romance, love, and glory?
Chimeras of the golden age
  When life was worth the story!
Woman still sings in a minor key
The old Provençal melody,
"Tais-toi, mon cœur! Adieu, mon cœur!"
That is the tale Time tells to her,
  And will till he is hoary.

AUTUMN.

The Sieur de Courcy came to woo,
  His voice was low and tender;
He drove the wolf and the king away—
  "Let me be thy defender!"
And when she sang in a minor key
The old Provençal melody,
"Tais-toi, mon cœur! Adieu, mon cœur!"
The gentleman knelt down to her
  And kissed her fingers slender.

"Who is my rival?" laughed the king,
  His gallant, gay eyes lighting;
"Now I will do a graceful thing
  To show I bear her slighting!
We'll change that mournful monody,
The old Provençal melody,
'Tais-toi, mon cœur! Adieu, mon cœur!'
And life shall not be spoiled for her
  Because my love is blighting!"

So went he forth to take the air,
  His perfumed locks were streaming,
His brow was gay, as if no care
  Could blight that face so beaming.
He sang as he rode, in a minor key,
The old Provençal melody,
"Tais-toi, mon cœur! Adieu, mon cœur!"
But took the road which led to her—
  The courtiers guessed his seeming.

"I came," said he, as they bent the knee,
  "All doubts and cares to banish;
Leave chains of rank and cares of state—
  For one day—let them vanish!
And, dear Bertine, sing now for me
The old Provençal melody,
'Tais-toi, mon cœur! Adieu, mon cœur!'"
And then he lightly told to her
  A drama from the Spanish.

"Rise! my proud subject," said the king,
  "Rise! Marquise St. Aulaire!
I give the title and the ring
  To this thy consort fair.
Now all my courtiers sound the key
Of the old Provençal melody,
'Tais-toi, mon cœur! Adieu, mon cœur!'"
And one and all bow down to her,
  The new court lady there.

All gratefully the sad Bertine
  'Neath her long lashes glances.
How much the tear that steals between
  The eyes' dark gleam enhances!
And yet she sings in a minor key
The old Provençal melody,
"Tais-toi, mon cœur! Adieu, mon cœur!"
The king gave Courcy's hand to her,
  Who, lover-like, advances.

WINTER.

O'er castle walls, with banners hung,
  The crescent moon is peeping,
And on the ground, in sadness flung,
  A mournful man is weeping.
On a white cross—what words to see!—
He reads the sad, old monody,
"Tais-toi, mon cœur! Adieu, mon cœur!"
He breathes his last farewell to her,
  For there Bertine lies, sleeping.

Sunday World. M. E. W. S.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The Edinburgh Review.

SCEPTICISM IN GEOLOGY.*

THE advance of positive science up to the present time is mainly due to the collection, analysis, and decipherment of facts. The attention of students was formerly directed to what, it was assumed, must be. Certain postulates were laid down; and on them the blank skeleton of science was supposed to rest. Anything that fell without this arbitrary scheme was summarily rejected. It is almost a matter of wonder how, under such a system, the human mind could have advanced to the point of questioning the verity of the system itself. That once done, the whole artificial structure collapsed. Ceasing to study what must be, men began to observe what is. By the rise of one of those great waves of thought which have so often surged over the intellectual world, facts long unknown, obscure, or misunderstood came almost simultaneously into view in nearly every portion of the field of human survey. Chemistry yielded a knowledge of its elements to those who sought it by the test-tube and the scales. Physical law became unveiled in its majestic simplicity. The acquisition of power over nature followed or accompanied the acquisition of knowledge of her laws. Watt and Stephenson had yoked the steam-spirit to the pump, the ship, and the car, before Grove had illustrated the correlation of physical forces, or Joule had determined the mechanical equivalent of heat. Advance and victory, all along the line, crowned every persevering effort. The accurate osteological knowledge which Cuvier first obtained from comparative study, enabled that great student of nature to lay the bases of palæontology. To the mighty sounding-line thus let down into the darkness of the past was added the second means of discovery afforded by lithological analysis. A pebble, intelligently interrogated, was found to bear a long record inscribed on its face. It yielded to the enquirer information as to whence it came; of what primary or later rock it had once formed a portion; whence and to what distance it had been transported by the motion of ice or of water; and by what currents, eddies, and waves, it had been ground into shape. While entirely unexpected light was thus streaming in upon the student, human history recovered much of her lost speech. The hieroglyphics of Egypt, and the yet quainter characters in which Assyrian, and, before them, Accadian, scribes had indented history, chronology, grammar, political apophthegms, memoranda of purchase and sale, and records illustrating the whole course of daily life, on the humble but durable material, clay, became vocal. Much that had been vague in past history started at once into exact and definite order. It may perhaps be said that in the same way in which written records are more reliable than oral tradition, sculptured and graven inscriptions are at once more durable and more authentic than those committed to the perishable keeping of papyrus or of parchment. But still more exempt from error than the most elaborate tablets of the hieroglyphic sculptor, or the terra-cotta scribe, are the notes graven by the hand of nature herself on cliff, and boulder, and pebble — the records of past events which bear the very autoglyphs of terrestrial change.

In the pursuit of a study so new, so fascinating, and so positive in its basis, it it was to be expected that error and extravagances should at first occur. It is in physical research alone that the elements of knowledge are absolutely true. Any error or falsification must be in the reader. We may authenticate an inscription as that of a great monarch. Past doubt we may have it as he uttered or authorized it. But who shall say how far he colored the facts — how far, consciously or unconsciously, he ordered the graving of something more like a bulletin of Napoleon than a true military or political chronicle? But the striæ on the face of a cliff, or the teeth in

* 1. Scepticism in Geology and the Reasons for it. By VERIFIER. London: 1877.

2. The Freedom of Science in the modern State. By RUDOLF VIRCHOW, M.D. London: 1878.

3. Geology for Students and General Readers. By A. H. GREEN, F.R.S., etc. 2nd Edition. London: 1877.

4. Manual of Geology. By the Rev. S. HAUGHTON, M.D., D.C.L., etc. 4th Edition. London: 1876.

5. Manuals of Elementary Science. Geology. By T. G. BONNEY, M.A., F.G.S. Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge: 1874.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

some archaic form of jaw-bone, are free from any possible error as records. The only misguidance of which they can be accused is due to the ignorance, the haste, or the prejudice of the student. Hence we can afford to look with patience on such errors, assured that, in due course of study, the true testimony of the primeval archives will be disentangled, and the message of nature, telling of her past revolutions, will fall plainly and intelligibly on our ears.

In the contest and struggle attendant on the introduction of the new order of study, it is natural that much should occur to shock venerable prejudices. We use the word in its proper meaning — not as a term of contempt or abuse, but as expressing an unquestionable fact. Fore-judgments are necessarily made, by those who attempt to decide at all, upon imperfect data. When these fore-judgments are the simple outcome of the facts, as far as they are known, they perform the important function of scientific hypothesis.

It will be at once admitted by all those who are familiar with the subject that nothing, since the time of the re-promulgation of the physical, or Pythagorean, view of the solar system by Galileo, has raised a fiercer contest between what were asserted to be old truths, and what were brought forward as new discoveries, than the facts brought to light by the progress of geology. The first shock of that contest is now over. It was never comparable in its intensity to the effect produced on men's minds by the announcement of the motion of the earth, although it has proved more disturbing than the results of any subsequent advance in human knowledge. But as we are now perfectly content to use the terms "sunrise" and "sunset," while we know that they are only apparently, not physically true, so we find many of those who once frantically denounced the opposition of the views of Cuvier and his followers to what they held to be the revealed statements of Moses, or at least many of those on whom the hoods and gowns of the old assailants of the geologist have descended, ready to admit that they may too hastily have adopted a servile and puerile interpretation of Semitic language; and that history written on papyrus may perhaps best be understood by the aid of history written on the very surface of the earth herself.

It is as a volunteer in this contest that the author of "Scepticism in Geology" has made a spirited and well-executed attack on what he terms "certain excrescences on the great and incontrovertible truths of geology, which aim at proving the earth to have been fashioned by mechanical processes still going on." Interesting in its argument, the book is illustrated by cuts, one or two of which are so apt in their elucidation of the author's views as to approach ocular demonstration. Although to some extent the actual energy of recent geological phenomena is undervalued, and although the most authoritative utterances of modern geology must be taken to be rather more in harmony with some of the views supported, than with those most successfully attacked, by "Verifier," we have no hesitation in characterizing the book as one calculated to advance the aim of the writer, namely, "to sift the truth." But the questions which underlie the subject are of far deeper moment than the enquiry how far any geological writer may have caricatured a tentative theory. We fear that the unrivalled popularity that has hailed the appearance of certain works, which have propounded new theories or carried old theories to new results, with reference to the organized species of the natural kingdoms, has not been due, in the main, to a genuine interest in natural science. It is idle to disguise the fact that the contest in its present phase, although it may be unfair to say that it is carried on under false colors, is one which concerns the safety of positions of a very different importance from the outposts around which the skirmish as yet rages. The "uniformitarian" doctrine of geology, or the perfect explanation afforded to all the half-read mysteries of the bygone course of organic life on the globe by the doctrine of natural selection, are subjects as to which comparatively few persons are sufficiently educated to form an opinion which is worth consulting. Yet it is to such persons alone that the purely scientific inter-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

est of the questions is limited. Popular attention is commanded, not by the direct, but by the indirect, results of the debate. There can be no doubt that, on the one hand, there is an uneasy, and but half-confessed fear, and on the other hand an eager and hostile expectancy, that the progress of science, or the definitive statement of the positive knowledge at which the most cultivated students of the day are gradually arriving, will prove absolutely inconsistent with the maintenance of certain religious tenets very dear to the former, and very obnoxious to the latter, disputants. It is not as affecting the authority of Cuvier, but as impairing or maintaining traditions which were supposed to have the positive sanction of religious authority, that such a doctrine as that of development rivets the attention of the great mass of readers.

It is idle to bewail the existence of a tendency which, however strong it may be at the present time, had tenfold power in the time of Galileo. But when the student is beset by the din of conflict from without — when eager hands are outstretched to snatch the result of each new experience, in order to use it, not for scientific, but for polemical, purposes — the most honest searcher for truth is liable to become heated and hurried. The clear light of intelligence is troubled by the hot breath of debate. Thus, for example, the enquiry as to whether certain Egyptian dynasties were contemporary or successive is a purely historical question, for the solution of which certain data exist, more are in course of collection, and as to which the attainment of ultimate certitude may be confidently expected. But there is an incompatibility between the attribution of such a date as most Egyptologists assign to the fifth Egyptian dynasty, and — not the book of Genesis, but the ordinary interpretation of the book of Genesis. The builder of the great pyramid lived, there is little room to doubt, six hundred years before the date usually assigned as that of an universal deluge. There are three parties, or three propositions, to be reconciled. The position which should be most readily given up is that of the comparatively unsettled enquirer, who is shocked by a discrepancy which after all may only appear to exist owing to his own ignorance. But this is usually the last explanation thought available. That the discoveries of Mariette and of Brugsch and the statements of the book of Genesis are irreconcilable is at once taken as a fact; and thereupon one disputant proceeds to revile Brugsch as an infidel, and the other to vilify the Pentateuch as a fable. That the two records are, in point of fact, both veritable, and that the apparent discrepancy is due to an over-hasty interpretation, is a simple issue from the difficulty which is ever the last to find favor with the ordinary disputant.

The effect of this oblique disturbing force becomes evident in the unduly positive terms in which writers of admitted eminence maintain statements as to which the utmost that can be said is, that, in our present imperfect knowledge, they are not facts or truths, but conceivable hypotheses. Thus we find one writer, distinguished for an erudition in natural history of a high order, bringing forward all his learning, and taxing all his reasoning powers, to support the assertion that "the most distinct genera and orders within the same great class — for instance, whales, mice, birds, and fishes — are all the descendants of one common progenitor, and we must admit that the whole vast amount of difference between these forms of life has primarily arisen from simple variability." The truth which underlies this ridiculous over-statement is, that a certain general type, platform, or design may be recognized as underlying the vertebrated form of life, and as developed with wonderful diversity, so as to suit different conditions of abode, of food, and even of medium of life. The idea of the "common progenitor" is not only purely gratuitous, but is one so opposed to all the phenomena of the distribution of animal life, and indeed so far transcending the limits which physical science imposes on the conceivable duration of life on our planet, that it is difficult to imagine why a writer should have weighted his argument with so unnecessary an approach to a mathematical absurdity. In such a sentence as we have quoted the term "varia-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

bility" ceases to have any scientific meaning. As to the object with which it was introduced, however, we are not left in doubt. "No shadow of reason," Mr. Darwin continues, "can be assigned for the belief that variations, alike in nature, and the result of the same general laws which have been the groundwork, through natural selection, of the formation of the most perfectly adapted animals in the world, man included, were intentionally and specially guided." We think that it is tolerably evident that the interest excited by the desire to justify or to condemn such an utterance as the above, has little claim to the title of scientific interest.

It is plain that two entirely distinct issues are raised in the words which we have quoted from one of the later works of Mr. Darwin,* in language which has, at all events, the rare merit of being both intelligible and precise. The first (and, as we have said, gratuitously conditioned) demand on our assent is the thesis that all forms of animal life, as far at least as the vertebrata are concerned, have been derived, by the ordinary process of descent, from a common ancestor. The second, and no less gratuitous, proposition is, that during the long descent, through a series of transformations which could only have been possible in consequence of the primary provision of adaptability, no direct, creative, providential, or divine design has been kept in view; that no controlling wisdom has directed, or rendered possible, the course of development; but that man has been evolved out of a fish, a sponge, or a speck of jelly, by the preservation, during the battle for life, of varieties which possess any advantage in structure, constitution, or instinct. It is important, as giving the fullest exposition of this view, to cite the words of Mr. Huxley: "A nucleated mass of protoplasm turns out to be what may be termed the structural unit of the human body. As a matter of fact, the body, in its earliest state, is a mere multiple of such units; and in its perfect condition it is a multiple of such units variously modified." "All vital action may, with equal propriety, be said to be the result of the molecular forces of the protoplasm which displays it. What justification is there, then, for the assumption of the existence in the living matter of a something which has no representative or correlative in the not-living matter which gives rise to it?"

* Animals and Plants under Domestication, vol. ii., pp. 430, 432.

When we find writers thus laboriously go out of their way, content to part company with the sobriety of reason, so that they may administer a slap in the face to what they may regard as an inconvenient superstition, are we not fully justified in the statement that the popularity their works have attained is mainly due to something very different from the desire of the mass of their readers to be enlightened in the truths of physical science? Nothing is more contrary to true scientific method than the confusion of theory and of facts, or the transplanting, to one order of investigation, of details appertaining to a totally different field of research. Thus it may be possible to state in terms, or perhaps even in some queer sense to hold, the low and semi-brutal theory that no proofs of wise purpose and design are to be drawn from that perfect adaptation of type to conditions of existence which forms the general law of organic nature. But we might expect that a student afflicted with so unfortunate a form of intellectual color-blindness would be careful, by a judicious silence, not to draw attention to his damaging deficiency. When, on the contrary, we find him volunteer a statement so wide of the mark as to say that not "a shadow of reason can be assigned" for a more symmetric and more complete view of nature, we feel at once that we can accept no statement at his hands without control or verification. Again, we might expect that a man sufficiently familiar with the rudiments of chemistry to be able to describe, in terms of scientific notation, the chemical elements of protoplasm, would be one of the first to be aware that there was a something in living matter which is not to be found in the carbon, and oxygen, and hydrogen, and nitrogen, of which he tells us that such matter consists. It is a something which he cannot by any means detect in non-living matter. He is unable to put it into any similar mixture, with whatever accuracy he may compound it. It is precisely the presence of "a something which has no representative or correlative in the not-living matter" which composes the contents of an egg, that makes the difference between an addled and a good egg — a difference which, on the argument of Mr. Huxley, would be altogether imaginary, or at all events entirely unaccountable.

It is impossible to appreciate the true bearing and import of such questions as those raised by "Verifier," if we regard them as casual or isolated subjects of enquiry. While we deprecate, with the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

utmost earnestness, any attempt to decide a question appertaining to one department of enquiry on grounds drawn from a different province of thought, we hail any symptom that those who believe the asserted discoveries of scientific enquiry in any branch or portion to be false, are addressing themselves to grapple with such errors on scientific grounds. If "Verifier" opposed to the demands of the geologist for an immeasurable period of past time such arguments as those with which the early geologists were encountered, we should take but little interest in his work, whatever the ability which it might display. But when a writer who, whether rightly or wrongly, opposes the teaching of any school, abandons the ground of its questionable tendency, and directly attacks the accuracy of the asserted scientific basis, he does good service to the cause of truth. The weapons of scepticism are used in our times with great effect to assail and shake some of the fundamental principles of morality and religion. We must say that we feel at least an equal amount of scepticism in relation to many of the dogmas of modern science. They are, many of them, as we have said, mere hypotheses; there is an admitted failure of evidence to raise them to the rank of demonstrated truths; but they are promulgated and proclaimed with an arrogance and intolerance worthy of the infallible priesthood of an absolute creed. There is in truth more reason in these days to complain of the intolerance of science than of the intolerance of religion. Few names in science are more illustrious than that of Dr. Virchow, but the services he has rendered to his art are in our judgment surpassed by the service he has rendered to truth in the vigorous protest delivered by him at Munich last autumn against "the tyranny of dogmatism which undertakes to master the whole view of nature by the premature generalizing of theoretical combinations." A very large proportion of these daring hypotheses are literally unsupported by facts, and even opposed to facts; and we cannot sufficiently applaud the manly and independent spirit in which Dr. Virchow rejects the attempt to inculcate these unsettled opinions as fundamental truths. His discourse well deserves the honor of translation, and we hope it will be generally read.

The great battle of which the question of the truth or falsehood of what are called uniformitarian views in geology is one of the incidents, began with the discovery of the telescope and the true laws of planetary motion. It is not easy to conceive that any discovery remaining to be made can produce so violent a moral and intellectual earthquake as did that of Galileo. Those who are familiar with the literature of his day are aware how thoroughly men's minds were stirred. The Church did not fear to nail her colors to the mast, and to declare that the central position and immobility of the earth were articles of the Christian faith. How that faith has maintained its hold on the world unimpaired, while men have gradually become aware that it is not the sun but the earth that moves, we have ceased to wonder or to enquire. We are content to remember that the advisers of the papacy took much for granted which turns out to be incorrect. A similar though a very much less violent shock attended on the first promulgation of geological discovery in our own time. The point which here was in question was more narrow than that which physical astronomy had raised and decided. It was taken for granted, before the time of Cuvier, that the earth was only about some six thousand years old, and that the Bible taught us that such was the case. No person of any claim to be considered as educated is now unaware that the antiquity of the earth is not to be measured by a few thousands of years; nor does it now appear that the Bible, read by itself, was ever intended to throw any light on the question of the earth's age. We enquire into the evidences of telluric and organic changes and periods of existence with as much calm as we evince in listening to the demonstration of Newton as to orbitual motion. We simply note that a connection was imagined to exist between the sacred records and the history of physical events, which never really existed or was intended to exist. It is true that the same kind of discomfort which was first awakened by the discoveries of Galileo, and then reawakened by the march of geology, now attends the discussion of the questions of descent, of evolution, and of specific change. But a calm appreciation of the nature of the enquiry leads to the same conclusion as in the former cases. Geologic action, specific history, evolution, are all subjects to be studied apart, on their own foundations, and by their several proper methods. The moralist or the theologian may await with perfect calm the outcome of scientific enquiry.

In the vast field of intellectual contest, which ranges from the facts of physical astronomy to the profoundest investigations

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

of physiology, and to the decipherment of the long-hidden records of a history earlier than that of Rome, of Athens, or of Jerusalem, is to be observed as confused an association of heterogeneous allies as can be found on any battle-field of the day, whether military or political. Viewed abstractedly, the contest is between ignorance and knowledge — between the spirit of authority resting upon assumption, and the spirit of doubt, which proposes to test the solidity of the ground for every fresh step with the sagacity of the elephant. But on the side — fated as it is to lose — of the defence are ranked some of the most venerable and most conservative of influences, and even of institutions. On the part of the attack we too often witness that insolence which is irreconcilable with real reverence for truth. There is a dissociation and counterchange between the parties. Moral beauty is opposed to intellectual light. Real advance, profound culture, the religious spirit, and the scientific method, instead of being united, are forced into mutually damaging opposition. The man who has the opportunity to look most closely into the work of God is heard to declare, with the loudest vulgarity, that such workmanship made itself. The man whose graceful fancy might have fitted him sooner than any other to accomplish the task left to his successors by Linnæus, and to limn out, with intelligent sense, the true order of organic life, is the first to declare the inversion of all that can be shown to be historic, to be the true and necessary course of nature. For this reason, among others, we welcome any effort to unite religious sentiment with scientific boldness, and to apply the methods by which truth may be discovered to the service of that party which is chiefly anxious that truth should be respected and maintained.

The geological enquiry, apart from palæontology, occupies so small a portion of this great field of contest, that the positions contested by the author of "Scepticism in Geology" may be described in comparatively few words. The writer — we wish that he had allowed us to designate him by his real name — commences his first chapter with the remark that "of all the sciences the most rapid in its rise and general popularity has been geology. Since the beginning of the present century a band of illustrious men, contemporaries in this and other countries, all striving with one aim, and reminding us of the group of authors in the time of Queen Anne, and of artists in that of Leo X., have developed this branch of learning, and rendered it perhaps the most attractive of the natural sciences. . . . To have recovered so many records of the past existence of our globe, and of its inhabitants, was a precious addition to the book of knowledge." The objections which are urged by the writer are thus confined to the region of speculative geology. This, confessedly the least advanced and most uncertain portion of the study, can hardly yet be said to have crystallized into any accepted form. Theories are almost as numerous as writers. As the works of such a student as Sir C. Lyell pass through edition after edition, while the purely descriptive portions of the book are enlarged by continued observation, the floating sequel of the speculative doctrine undergoes constant modification. The difficulties which are regarded as especially obnoxious by the author of "Scepticism in Geology" are those "which environ the doctrine of uniformity, or the operation of modern causes; the elevating power of earthquakes, erosion of rocks by rivers, and the antiquity of man upon earth."

It is the opinion of "Verifier" that the elevating influence of earthquakes has been much overrated. If any geologist should now attempt to account for the elevation of great mountain chains by any such action of earthquake as has been known to occur in historic times, he would find it difficult to hold his own against our author. And the expression, so constantly used that we shall hardly be able to avoid adopting it, of the "upheaval" of mountain chains, may certainly be regarded as objectionable, if it be taken to imply the protrusion of these chains above the ordinary sea or land level by such forces as are now known to be active. But that permanent elevation of large areas of land does occur in our own time has been distinctly witnessed in 1858. The earthquake of that year was most intense in its energy in Calabria and Basilicata, where many lives were lost, and many buildings overthrown. In Naples the principal shock was so severe, and caused so much alarm, that almost the whole population of that city passed the night in the open air, in fear of being buried in their own houses by a return of the shock. In point of fact, however, not a house was thrown down in Naples, and very few were appreciably injured. But the entire circumference of the Bay of Naples, from Sorrento to Baiæ and Misenum, rose during that night from six to eight inches above its former level, as was apparent by the marks of animal

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

and vegetable life on the rocks that lined the bay. Nor did the ground thus elevated return to its former level, certainly for six years, or, we apprehend, up to the present time. The doubts thrown by "Verifier" on the famous phenomena of the elevation and depression of the Temple of Serapis at Puzzuoli would have been removed by familiarity with the spot. Granting the improbable theory, which would not have commended itself to a visitor of the locality, that "the site of the temple was originally gained from the sea by artificial means," the question of level would by no means be thus simplified. The admirable chapter in the "Principles of Geology," which describes the evidence existing for the alternate depression and elevation of the site of this famous temple, has neither needed nor received any correction in the tenth edition of that work. Its great accuracy will only be confirmed by local research; and there are facts connected with the advance of the shore line at Ostia which have not hitherto been collated with the phenomena of the Bay of Naples, which show that what we may term a pulsatory motion on the seaboard of this part of Italy has not been limited to the immediate vicinity of Vesuvius.

It must be said that the statement of "Verifier" (p. 17) — "From all these circumstances, recited by Lyell himself, and from others which it would be tedious to quote, the permanent effects of earthquakes are discredited" — is altogether erroneous. But we can only blame the author of "Scepticism in Geology" for having done, on one side of the case, what he shows that Professor Geikie has done on the other — that is, so overstated views, in themselves correct, as to present them under the form of caricature. The true argument — as to which the difference between "Verifier" on the one hand, and the most careful and authoritative geological writers on the other, is one only of detail and degree — is this. Earthquakes within the historic time, and even in the memory of living witnesses, have effected changes in elevation of considerable districts of country which, regarded in themselves, are very notable. But if compared with such phenomena as the elevation (supposing it to have occurred) of such districts as the Alpine range or any other mountain nucleus, the evidences of any recent action are almost inappreciably small. What may follow from this argument is another question; but that its outcome is thus correctly stated, we think few impartial students of fact will deny.

The second point urged by the author of "Scepticism in Geology" is thus stated by him: "Among assertions which have been accepted as facts, and assumed to be verities by geologists, is the theory of the erosive power of running water, and the conclusion that the valleys, gorges, and beds of rivers, many of them composed of the hardest and most indestructible of rocks, in all parts of the world, have been cut by the streams now running through them, however inconsiderable." The only evidence brought forward to show that the above is a correct representation of accepted geological theory is taken from the works of Mr. Geikie, with one additional quotation from M. Lartet. To that part of the question, therefore, we must return. But taking the argument of "Verifier" as presented both in his text and in four very aptly selected woodcuts, there can be no doubt of its truth and weight. Mechanically regarded, we question the propriety of the phrase "erosive power" as applied to water at all, if the substance cut through be of the nature of solid rock. There is no doubt that water occasionally contains chemical elements which attack and eat away certain rocks; as, on the other hand, other streams contain elements which deposit in crystalline form beneath our very eyes. Such is the case in the dropping well at Knaresborough, and in several travertine-forming streams of southern Italy. The action of drip on paving stones under the eaves of houses is, perhaps, mainly of a chemical nature. Again, water has an enormous battering power, especially if it be exerted in the way of lifting masses of stone under which a wave strikes. Yet again, the action of water removes friable materials, particle by particle, and thus eats away a channel or undermines a cliff. When whirling along in its course pebbles or sharp sand, water communicates a grinding movement to these bodies, and also directly assists their action by the removal of the particles ground off, which otherwise would deaden the abrading force. Apart from these modes of action, we must be permitted to disbelieve that water has any cutting power. We see rocks exposed to the fury of the waves, or to the force of rapid currents, covered with the humbler forms of vegetable and of animal life. It is idle to pretend that the force of water, which cannot wash a limpet or an alga from a rock, can cut through the solid material of which that rock is composed. Thus in the view of the gorge of the Danube below Belgrade ("Scepticism in Geology," p. 62),

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

where the vertical cliffs, two thousand feet high, are represented as an example of geological erosion by running water, "Verifier" clearly exposes the ridiculous absurdity of such an assumption. The same remark applies to the cut on page 63, the Via Mala, with its sarcastic little note — "according to geologists, scooped out by rain, frost, and running water." The bird's-eye view of the falls of the Zambesi is, if possible, yet more conclusive as an argument against any such unmechanical theory of erosion.

The fall [says the author] is twice as high and twice as wide as Niagara; but differs from it in that, immediately opposite to the fall, rise three successsive natural walls of rock of the same height as that over which the river leaps, separated from one another by narrow rifts. These triple barriers consist of wedge-shaped promontories of rock, with vertical sides, projecting alternately from the right bank and from the left, like side scenes in a theatre, but entirely overlapping one another. Out of the first deep trough the river, after its descent, is compelled to find its way through a gap only eighty yards wide in the first opposing rock wall. A second wall here confronts it, by which the stream is turned at an acute angle to the right. It is next forced round the second promontory; then, reversing its course, round a third, and before it is allowed to escape to the sea it is compelled to double round a fourth wider headland.*

We freely give up to the deserved sarcasm of "Verifier" the unlucky remark of the writer who observes as to this doubling and redoubling of a stream through rifts and fractures of basaltic rocks, such as may be seen to be produced by cooling in the lava of Vesuvius or of Ætna at almost any eruption: "The stream seems to have cut its way backwards through this winding ravine." "The discovery of the Zambesi Falls," our author, with more justice, says, "would seem to have been reserved until the present time in order to refute a leading tenet of modern geology, and to prove the utter impotence of water to cut through hard rock." Mechanical science is so thoroughly at one with those who denounce the absurdity of a belief in such kind of aqueous action, that the only weak point in the attack is the question how far the writer is justified in calling the expressions which he so justly ridicules the authoritative utterances of geologists.

The third bête noire of the author of "Scepticism in Geology" is the part which he states that geologists assign to subaerial denudation in modifying the surface of our planet. "It surpasses all other modern causes in the power that it is said to be still exerting, and in the effects it produces. The wonders which it has performed, and is performing, are best set forth in the very words of its advocates. 'Mountains and valleys are due to it; it has carved them out of the solid rock. The great river systems are excavated by it.'" It is true that "Verifier" is, to some extent, justified in relying on this quotation, for even in the last edition of "Principles of Geology" the illustrious author uses the expression, "the uniform nature and energy of the causes which have worked successive changes in the crust of the earth and in the condition of its living inhabitants." But it should be borne in mind that even in this phrase, which may be taken as a dogmatic statement of uniformitarian hypothesis, the period during which existing causes are said to have operated with unchanged energy is limited to that of the presence of animal life upon earth. The sixth chapter of the "Principles of Geology" is, in point of fact, a protest against the introduction, into geological theory, of the action of imaginary causes. As such there is no doubt that the object, if not the basis, of the hypotheses of Lyell is philosophically true. We must regard the argument as critical and controversial rather than as constructive; and thus as liable to be driven, by the impetus of controversy, not only beyond the true mean, but even beyond the position which the author, if undisturbed by contest, would himself have chosen. M. Elie de Beaumont postulated the recurrence of long periods of repose, interspersed with brief periods of paroxysmal violence, from the earliest geological periods. This assumption was peculiarly repugnant to a mind that had a philosophical abhorrence of the jumbling up of observations and imaginations. Impartially regarded, the question of uniformity of action must necessarily become subordinate to those of time and of degree. Any speculative geologist who regards an earlier condition of planetary existence than that which now prevails, whether he assumes the nebular hypothesis or any other theory, admits by that very assumption the occurrence of change in energy of action. Good service is done to science by bringing this fact distinctly forward. But we do not admit that the leading geologists of the day are so far removed from the views of "Verifier" as he considers to be the case.

"The doctrine," writes one of the authors whose works we have enumerated at

* Scepticism in Geology, p. 67.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the head of the present article, "that the forces which have produced geological changes have been practically the same, both in kind and degree, during the whole of that portion of the earth's past lifetime of which a record has come down to us, is one not much touched on in most of the text-books. Judging by the rate at which changes are going on now, the time required to bring about past geological changes, if the rate were unaltered, would have been very great indeed. Physicists, guided by the doctrine of the dissipation of energy, are not disposed to allow as much time as geologists were at one time disposed to demand. It is very possible, however, that the limitation of the physicist may be as much too stringent as the demands of the geologist are excessive." In these candid and moderate words the actual state of the question, in so far as the demand for past time is concerned, is fairly represented. The energy required to effect certain changes would, of course, be a function of the time occupied in their production. This simple mechanical relation, however, is obscured by the language of too eager theorists. It is impossible to put the erroneous views, which have been thus allowed to distort speculative geology, more strongly than in the language quoted from Mr. Geikie's "Scenery of Scotland" by our author: "We make the fatal error of forgetting that, in the geological history of our globe, time is power." It would be as correct to say time is space. But we can only regard such an expression as a too hasty metaphor, used by a laborious student and powerful writer, which he would be one of the first to wish to qualify or to withdraw. If we turn to the account given by Mr. Geikie in "The Great Ice Age" of the action of the weather on rocks, erosion by running water, and denudation, during the last inter-glacial period, we shall find that, while his language is graphic, his reasoning is close.

Let us recall [says Mr. Geikie] the appearance presented by the Scottish mountains — bold hummocky masses of rock, for the most part, but often bristling with splintered crags and shattered precipices. See how frequently the hilltops are buried in their own ruins, and how the flanks are in many places curtained with long sweeps of loose angular blocks and rubbish, that shoot down from the base of cliff and scaur to the dark glens below. All this is the work of rain and frost. . . . Under the influence of rain, soil is continually trickling down from higher to lower levels; rills and brooklets are gouging out deep trenches in the subsoils and solid rocks, — streams and rivers are constantly wearing away their banks, and transporting sediment to the sea. The gravel and sand and silt that pave the numerous watercourses are but the wreck and ruin of the land; and it is easy to see that, since the close of the glacial epoch, immense quantities of material have been thus abstracted from the country. The streams and rivers have been working deeper and deeper into the bottoms of the valleys, and leaving behind them terrace after terrace of alluvial detritus to mark the different levels at which they formerly flowed. And if we tried to estimate the amount of material which has been thus cut out of the valleys and carried seawards, we should no longer feel inclined to undervalue the erosive power of running water.*

With the exception of the adjective "solid," the use of which requires some qualification, there is nothing in the above quotation with which we are able to find fault. The existence of gravel and detritus, the lithological origin of which can be traced, in the delta of a river which descends from the abraded hills, is a piece of material evidence which it is hard to misapprehend. We have to remember that the question of slope is one which is of primary importance in the case. It is only when descending with a certain velocity that water exercises a great transporting power. The bed of a river running through a plain or down a very gentle slope has rather a liability to silt up than to cut a deeper channel. We are unable, indeed, to resolve the compound expression, and to say how much of the deposit is due to time, and how much to greater intensity of energy in the transporting element. A certain velocity of stream can be shown to have been requisite for the transport of gravels or boulders of a given size — a velocity for the most part greater than that of to-day. We are driven to suppose either that rainfall was formerly much more abundant, or that the slopes were formerly steeper, than at present. Mechanical laws, we cannot doubt, are unchanging, but we can only point to the gross results. We cannot exactly measure either the time during which they were produced or the intensity of the transporting forces. They are functions of one another. But that the periods of formation have been very long, and that the transporting forces have gradually diminished in intensity, are facts which it is very difficult to deny.

It is, however, undoubtedly the case that the knife of the critic should be boldly and freely applied to remove many of

* The Great Ice Age, 3rd edition, p. 321.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

those expressions which are yet left to disfigure our text-books, and which, however rhetorical they may be in form, lack the essence of rhetoric, the power of persuasion. Thus, in the careful and practical "Geology for Students and General Readers," by Mr. A. H. Green, we find a quotation from Playfair, which, when read by the light of the recent quotation as to the course of the Zambesi, can only be called absurd.

On observing the Potomac, where it penetrates the ridge of the Alleghany Mountains, or the Irtish, as it issues from the defiles of Altai, there is no man, however little addicted to geological speculations, who does not immediately acknowledge that the mountain was once continued quite across the space in which the river now flows; and, if he ventures to reason concerning the cause of so wonderful a change, he ascribes it to some great convulsion of nature, which has torn the mountain asunder, and opened a passage for the waters. It is only the philosopher, who has deeply meditated on the effects which action long continued is able to produce, and on the simplicity of means which nature employs in all her operations, who sees in this nothing but the gradual working of a stream which once flowed over the top of the ridge which it now so deeply intersects, and has cut its course through the rock in the same way, and almost with the same instrument, by which a lapidary divides a block of marble or granite.

The philosopher, in this case, has drawn, in our opinion, far more unwarrantably upon his own imagination than the man "little addicted to geological speculations," whom he despises.

But while we agree with the author of "Scepticism in Geology" in disbelief of the statement that the zigzag course of the Zambesi, or the profound and branching cañons of the Colorado River, have been cut by the action of running water, we have no sympathy with his alarm at the tendency of that action of degradation and transport which the rivers of the world are constantly exerting. What may have occurred in past time is matter of speculation; what is now occurring is question of measurement. The degrading or denuding effects of rivers are measured by the annual growth of their deltas. We know enough of the operations of the Nile, the Danube, the Rhone, the Brenta, the Ganges, the Godaveri, and many other rivers to trace the constant annual action of degradation, transport, and deposit, and even to obtain some approximate figures as to the relations of rainfall, slope of descent, and amount of detritus. In a recent number of the Edinburgh Review we gave some particulars as to the growth of the delta of the Nile. The result of actual measurements gives an annual deposit of two hundred and forty million cubic yards, a rate of increment which solved the difficulty formerly existing as to the statement of Herodotus. Even the comparatively small stream of the Brenta, since, in 1839, it made its way into the lagoon of Chioggia, has reduced by its deposits the water-surface of that basin by one hundred and thirty-eight acres annually from 1839 to 1871, and by one hundred and fifty-three acres per annum from 1871 to 1874. It is the opinion of the Italian engineers that, unless the course of the Brenta be diverted, the lagoon will be irretrievably ruined within thirty-eight years.

The result then [says "Verifier"] of the most approved geological philosophy is to reduce the great globe, and all that it inherit, to a DEAD LEVEL!!* The theory of natural development applied to geology ends in deterioration, monotony, and stagnation. According to it the earth is to be planed smooth and bare, deprived of all that makes it beautiful, useful, and habitable; converted into one monotonous plain, barely capable of keeping its head above water, save by the aid of occasional earthquakes.

The author mistakes. This cannot properly be said to be a matter of geological theory. That all the loftier and more exposed portions of the earth are in the course of slow disintegration and degradation, and that the spoils of the winter frosts are borne seaward by torrents and floods year after year, is not theory, but fact. The rate of such degradation can in many cases be measured. In some districts it has been actually measured. Whatever be the rate of denudation, whether that which our author thinks so incredible — a foot over the entire surface of a continent in six thousand years, or more or less — as to the fact of the continued action there is no doubt. The theorist is the man who says: "That the work of the creation of the earth was one of perfection defies all disproof." The word "perfection" is vague. But that rain and frost, dew and vapors, storms and floods, rivers and torrents, summer and winter, have been, and still are, changing the surface of the earth year by year, from the first epoch which has left any monument, is not a question of opinion. It is a matter as to which ignorance is possible, or knowledge; but which admits of intelligent doubt only as question of dogma.

* The capitals and notes of admiration are in the text.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

In this little burst of genuine but misdirected indignation, the author of "Scepticism in Geology" forgets the implied promise of his opening chapter to expose the errors of geologists as to the antiquity of man upon the earth. Under the influence of the sympathy which we feel for the aim of the writer, and of our respect for the ability with which he has handled certain portions of his theme, we can hardly regret that this is the case. Unconsciously, but very decidedly, as he has approached this portion of the subject, "Verifier" has edged off from the safe ground of enquiry into fact into the perilous bog of assumption of what must have been. "The hunger of the mind to see every natural occurrence resting on a cause, and the vanity of believing that modern science can account for and explain everything, appear to create in the scientific mind a stubborn resistance to the belief in a first cause." Entertaining this view, the author opposes to it his own hypothesis in the words: "Is there any inconsistency in supposing that when a potter moulds a vase out of a lump of clay, he should put forth his greatest energy, and exert his utmost skill, to finish and turn it out perfect? That achieved, would there be any reason for his continuing to revolve his wheel slowly for an indefinite time?" The author is, as is but natural, misled by an inappropriate metaphor, as well as by inexact use of terms. If perfection be the adaptation of structure to condition, it would be impossible to deny that the mail-clad ganoids of the old red sandstone, or the gigantic reptiles of the neocomian series, were as perfect as any fish, lizard, or beast of the present age. We may here contrast the undisputed range of the earlier tyrants of the seas or the shores with the failing resistance of the red races of mankind to the firewater and the rifles of the American settler, or with the depopulation of central Africa before the slave-trader. Our duty is not to predicate what we imagine that a great First Cause ought to have done, but to trace, as far as we are able, the course of the historic revolutions of our planet, as indicated by the changing forms of palæontological life and the evidence of lithological degradation or deposit. It is possible to do this with as reverent a spirit and as profound a recognition of the action of Almighty Wisdom as it is to assume as inadmissible "a solution of the problem of cosmogony involving the absurdity that the work was left unfinished, and needs constant alteration by means of certain mechanical self-acting operations." As far as the inorganic world is concerned there is no doubt that a constant change is in actual progress, of which the details are minute and often unobserved, but of which the aggregate is enormous. "Verifier" allows himself to prophesy: "It will eventually be acknowledged that, at the time and in the process of fashioning the globe, a power was "exerted totally different from the present course of nature." Perhaps it will; but we prefer taking no such leap into the dark. That mighty changes have occurred, for example, in the adaptation of the state of great districts of the earth to the support of different forms of life, or to the support of life at all, is one of the earliest discoveries of geology. No more lofty or truthful idea of a divine cause is formed by supposing changes in the method of its operation. If such changes have occurred, we shall no doubt in course of time become aware of the fact; and it will then be our duty to endeavor to understand the mode, and to ascertain the reason, of such change. For a longer or a shorter duration, with equal or with varying intensity, as the old order has changed, giving place to new, it has still been true that > God fulfils himself in many ways.

A word must be said as to the sudden and unexpected outburst of unnecessary indignation poured out by a nobleman, of whose motives all must speak with respect, on Mr. Bonney's most modest and inoffensive "Manual of Geology." In simple language Mr. Bonney has stated the main facts which have been ascertained as to the past history of the earth, and the inferences on which the students of those facts are in the main agreed. "It was long believed," he says, "that the human race did not appear upon the globe till a comparatively short period before written history began. . . . Numerous facts, however, oppose themselves to this belief, of which the following are too brief a sketch." The faith which is staggered by such a plain statement of truth as this is certainly not of the kind that removes mountains, unless they be mountains of evidence. It is painful to have to refer to such intolerant impatience of the light.

The assertion of Professor Huxley, made on the authority of the survey of the Dead Sea by M. Lartet, that "rain and running water, working along the old line of fracture, ultimately hollowed out the valley of the Jordan," is contrasted by "Verifier" with the evidence of a section

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

across the valley in question, copied from M. Lartet's work. "Just as plausibly and with as much probability," is the comment, Mr. Huxley "might attribute the image on a rusty bronze medal to the rust which corrodes it, and not to the die which stamped it." We are in possession, however, of more information on this subject than was collected by M. Lartet. A paper drawn up by Lieutenant Conder, R.E., the officer in command of the ordnance survey of Palestine, was read before the British Association in 1874, which throws an entirely new light on the geology of Syria. Bearing testimony to the minute accuracy of the study given by M. Lartet to those parts of Palestine which he visited personally, Lieutenant Conder remarks that the map of that explorer, which in many parts is an absolute blank, in others is disfigured by false conclusions, drawn apparently from hearsay evidence. After mentioning the extent of country covered by black basalt, south of the Sea of Galilee, before undescribed, the trappean outbreak on Carmel, and the evidence of the former existence of a tertiary volcanic lake south-west of that mountain, Lieutenant Conder says:—

The western shore of the Dead Sea is bounded by steep, precipitous cliffs, at the foot of which are marls and conglomerates belonging to an ancient sea-level. At the top of these cliffs are marls of a similar character, giving a second level; and from these the marl hills rise rapidly to a third level, that of the Bukeya, or raised plain, situate at the foot of the main chain of hills, and below the Convent of Mar Saba. This gives a series of three successive steps, each of which seems at some period to have formed the bed of a lake, under conditions similar to those of the present sea. There is, however, a very curious feature observable, the narrow valley running north and south, and separating a line of chalk cliffs immediately adjoining the Bukeya from the hard dolomite beds of the main chain. It is, in fact, evidence of a fault or sudden fold in the strata, the existence of which seems to have been hitherto unsuspected. Advancing north, we find a broad basin north of the Dead Sea, in which Jericho stands; which has an exact counterpart on the east side of the valley. The same contortion of strata is remarkable, and the higher level is occupied by beds of a reddish marl, and of the famous stink-stone or bituminous limestone; evidence that at this early geological period a lake existed under conditions similar to those of the present Dead Sea. From this point we succeeded in tracing an ancient shore line at a level equal to the second step on the west shore for a distance of over twenty miles up the valley. Thence a narrow gorge, with strata less violently contorted, extends for some ten miles. The valley then broadens again; and the shore deposits and red marl reappear and extend along the side of the upper basin south of the Sea of Galilee. I have submitted these observations to professional geologists; and their opinion confirms that which I formed upon the spot — that the Jordan valley was caused by a sudden and probably violent depression in times subsequent to the late cretaceous period; that it presented at first a chain of great lakes; and that no less than three levels for these lakes are to be found, the area of the most ancient being the greatest.

It is highly probable that the depression of the Jordan valley, which is such that the level of the surface of the Dead Sea is thirteen hundred feet below that of the Mediterranean, and which, there is much reason to believe, is still slowly increasing, may be due to volcanic action in Galilee and the Lejja. The date of activity in this district is not accurately known. It is, at all events, as late as the tertiary age. It is interesting to see how one of the latest contributions to our knowledge of physical geology bears witness to the comparatively recent operation of forces on a scale now unusual, although probably by no means rare in earlier geologic time.

In Mr. Haughton's little book, which bears the same relation to some other text-books that wax bears to honey, or the work of the bee to that of the ant, all the collected store having passed through the alembic of a reflective mind, the question of geological time is thus stated:—

Any person who has paid even the slightest attention to the science of geology must be aware of the fact, that the whole of our knowledge with regard to age in this science is confined to relative age, and that with respect to absolute age we have little or no real information; and in this absence of positive knowledge as to the absolute age of rocks, geologists have sometimes indulged in the wildest and most extraordinary statements and speculations (p. 79).

That the advent of man [says Mr. Woodward] took place very much earlier than our forefathers imagined, is a point about which there can be no question whatever; and although this conclusion is repugnant to many minds of a conservative nature who are unable to receive the facts upon which it is founded, it is nevertheless a conclusion which is fully established as true. . . . This we do know, that man lived in this country and throughout western Europe with the lion and hairy elephant, the hyæna and woolly rhinoceros. . . . In his weapons of warfare and of the chase he resembled the dwellers on the shores of Arctic seas; and, judging from the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

associated animals, he probably lived in an age when continental conditions and higher mountains produced much greater extremes of climate than are found in the same countries now. . . . Although we cannot assign a date to his first appearance, we must refer him to a period sc remote that wide valleys have been scooped out, and whole races of animals exterminated, since his time; but how long it took to bring this about we cannot yet tell.*

In fact, as part of a view at once modest and profound, of the great series of authentic monumental records which are inscribed on the stony leaves of the successive strata of the earth's surface, the question of longer or shorter time becomes comparatively unimportant. We have not, at present, at least, the means of translating geological into astronomical time. We ought not to undervalue the importance of such a relation, a key to which we may perhaps hereafter discover; but at all events such value is but small, in comparison with that of the main features of the teaching of the rocks. While one school of naturalists is very anxious to convince the world that everything is as it must have unavoidably been, and that organic nature has organized itself, we must confess that a loftier conception of the order and sequence of the palæontologic record seems to us both more rational and more noble. That the mighty maze is not without a plan, can only be denied by those who lose their way in the labyrinth. That the plan made itself is not, to our view, a very rational theory. The greater the delicacy of self-adaptation, as evinced in the history of any specific form, to changing conditions, the higher, it seems to us, must be the idea formed of the power and wisdom under the exercise of which the parent form first had being, and the steady progress was effected. In our limited capacity for knowledge it may seem less wonderful that a man should be the descendant of a fish or of a sponge than that his first parent should have stood upright and conversed with his Maker. But the incapacity for self-origination is not more obvious in the one case than in the other; and if we look at the formative power as exterior to the living form, the humbler the first nucleus of life, the more prescient and potent must the exercise of that formative power appear to the imagination.

It is true that the efficacy of the principle of natural selection, as the law accounting for the development of all existing forms of life, has been implicitly abandoned by the author of the theory. The admission of the power of sexual selection, as some of Mr. Darwin's disciples have more or less dimly perceived, is fatal to the unity of the former theory. If an organ or a quality be of use to the animal, as the trunk to the elephant, it is due, we are told, to the gradual growth of the snouts of successive elephants, because such growth was a convenience, and the longer-snouted creature obtained food with more ease than the shorter-snouted one. Were this the case we should expect that, instead of finding at this period of time the varied lips of the elephant, the peccary, the horse, and even the hog, we should find the most useful general type to have been attained by a common pachyderm snout. The result of natural selection, if it were so potent an influence as its believers urge, would be, in our opinion, to produce unity rather than diversity of type. The whole order of palæontological development evinces an increase in diversity of form and in specialization of function. Natural selection, we apprehend, would be a more tenable hypothesis if the order of succession were absolutely inverted. However that may be, when the action of a second independent principle is introduced, the value of the first, as a sole or even as a controlling element, is destroyed. The tail of the humming-bird or of the peacock has been of no advantage to the creature in procuring food. It must rather have been an obstacle than otherwise to its pursuit of sustenance, or to its care of its young. When asked how this, and other useless beauties of the organic world, have come into being, we are therefore referred to the principle of "sexual selection." Hen humming-birds and hen pea-fowl have so long and so steadfastly admired tufted and ocellated tails in their mates, that the birds better provided in this way than their fellows have always had the choice of the strongest hens; and thus, in the succession of ages, have grown their tails to their actual development.

With regard to this, however, the same doubt occurs about the major proposition that arose in the former case. Is it likely that there should have been such a steady sexual taste? All our experience, whether of the human race or of the animal tribes, points in the opposite direction. What care the breeders of pigeons have to take to provide against an aberrant sexual selection in the hen-birds of valuable varieties! How often a pure-bred tumbler, or pouter or fantail will select some absolute

* Geology of England and Wales, p. 432.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

mongrel for a mate, rather than delight in the nobility of her own blood, if the chance be possible! Do we find that black beards, or brown beards, or red beards, are developed amongst ourselves by the steady effect of feminine admiration? Do we find, as a rule, that like does select like? Are not the majority of instances just the reverse? Does not the small man admire the stately woman, the dark man admire the golden or flaxen blonde, the negro worship the white woman? Sexual taste, so far as we know, if not absolutely capricious, is rather awakened by unlikeness than by likeness. Its tendency, so far as we can see, is therefore not to form permanent varieties, but to obliterate them.

Let us suppose, however, that this view is erroneous. Let us admit, as matter of hypothesis, that the secular development of the most useful structure, from the very fact of its utility, tends to produce, and not to diminish variety. Let us admit, also, under the same reserve, that the tendency of the mutual admiration of the sexes is in the direction of the production and maintenance of distinct varieties of form, and not in that of rendering permanent an average or common type. How do these opposite laws accord in their operation? Two primary influences are said to be at work; the one is utility, the other caprice. To ascertain the working of the first, we have only to discover what is actually useful for the maintenance of animal life, but to the second we have no key. The origin of the sexual admiration, leading to sexual selection, is absolutely obscure. Utility it is not, for in that case the hypothesis of natural selection would be brought into play. Whence does this useless emotion, which plays so powerful and so perplexing a part in the formation of varieties, spring? To say that it is pure caprice does not mend the matter much. A personal, automatic, incalculable element is admitted to exist alongside of the rational, calculable, iron force of utility. What is this but to destroy the whole logical value of the theory of natural selection?

One thing is certain, namely, that if these two forces, the certain and the uncertain, the calculable and the incalculable, do coexist and interfere, the problem of the resolution of such forces is utterly insoluble. The eye is struck by a graceful form or by a brilliant color. The old-fashioned philosopher recognizes in this one of the countless embodiments of those ideas of grace and of beauty which he believes to be part of a certain ideal excellence, after which the order of nature has been framed. The philosopher of the new school quietly tells him that such a notion is nonsense. "No shadow of reason can be assigned for the belief that variations were intentionally and specially guided." Necessity, or survival of the fittest, caused all variations, except those which were due to the fancy of the variants. If you ask how that fancy arose, there is no reply. Thus, if an organ or a development be of utility, it is due to natural selection; otherwise it is due to sexual selection. If it be doubtful how far it is useful, and how far only beautiful or quaint, it is doubtful to which cause it is due. It is also altogether unknown what is the origin of the second asserted cause of modification. And this is called a philosophic view of the automatic development of the organic world!

The author of "Scepticism in Geology" has not referred to the most powerful arguments yet adduced against what is called the uniformitarian theory. Geology, whatever be its actual advance, is but one branch of natural science. Not only must any sound geological theory, therefore, be in accordance with the ascertained truths of natural philosophy, but it must be controlled by those more general and more certain data which are to be obtained by the physicist and by the physical astronomer. The address delivered to the Geological Society of Glasgow (Feb. 27, 1868), by Sir W. Thomson, "On Geological Time," has laid down certain lines and limits which no reasonable speculator can attempt to overstep. By reasoning as lucid as that of the "Principia" itself, Sir William has demonstrated the fact that a secular retardation of the rotation of the earth is caused by the tides. A second and independent proof that geological time is limited, deduced from the laws of heat, is to be found in the paper "On Geological Dynamics," by the same author, read to the same audience on February 19, 1869. In this, Professor Huxley's address to the Geological Society of London (Feb. 19, 1869) is submitted to a damaging, or rather totally destructive, criticism. From these masterly papers it is clearly evident that the enormous demands on time made by the uniformitarian geologists, so far from being based on any observed phenomena, are irreconcilable with an intelligent consideration of physical law. Almost everything, in fact, points to the conclusion that the erosive, transporting, and upheaving actions of nature were formerly far more active than is now the case. One thing alone

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

stands on the opposite side of the question. The contrast is thus stated by Sir W. Thomson: "The limitation of geological periods imposed by physical science, cannot, of course, disprove the hypothesis of transmutation of species. But it does seem sufficient to disprove the doctrine that transmutation has taken place through 'descent with modification by natural selection.'" The only necessity for the assumption that "a far longer period than three hundred million years has elapsed since the latter part of the secondary period"* is to give time for the operation of that law, which has been invented by Mr. Darwin, and which is thus proved to be inconsistent with well-known and established principles of natural science.

We take leave of the theory of self-creation. It is not by the insertion, three or four times in every page, of the words, "by the process of natural selection," that the existence of any such process can be proved. But it is difficult to see what better proof has been adduced. Confessedly, not a single pertinent observation can be cited in behalf of the fantasy. Variations, where their history is known, have been due to the action of controlling will. The deduction made from the fact is, that variability proves the absence of controlling will. There is good reason to hold that the action of such a law as that of selection, if it existed, would be the reverse of that which is known to have occurred — that is to say, that it would have tended to diminish, instead of to produce, differences. The only assumed advantage of the imaginary law, its aptness to account for facts, is rendered nugatory by the enforced supplement of the equally imaginary law of sexual selection, which is also supposed to have worked in a direction contrary to observation. Finally, the attempt to obtain elbow-room for the operation of natural selection has driven its supporters to assume an invariability in cosmical action, and a secular permanence of existing conditions, which are inconsistent with known data of natural science, and are pronounced impossible alike by the astronomer and the physicist.

Space now fails for the pursuit of an investigation to which the utterances of the geologist and of the naturalist equally invite. A sketch of the order of nature, not in the organic world alone, but exhibiting how, so far back as the stony records of the past have been deciphered, certain great laws of fitness and of progress have operated with unvarying force, demands more room than remains now available even for the most elementary outline. The general thesis, that as far back as organic relics can be identified there has been a perfect adaptation of type or form of being to habitat and to condition, will not be disputed by the palæontologist. Neither will he deny that, during a succession of changes which cannot be as yet in any way measured by astronomic time, there has prevailed the same law of increase in specialization of function. The earlier animals were at once more complex and more simple than the later tribes. They were more complex, inasmuch as they contained the germs or indications of organs, of which the developments have been wrought out, in fuller detail, in particular tribes of later origin. They were more simple, inasmuch as they possessed no organ so specially fitted for one sole function as is the case in many of the later births of time. Thus the fish of the old red sandstone foreshadowed, and may perhaps have been the ancestors of, not only the bony fish of modern seas, but of the reptiles of the permian and lias rocks, and perhaps of the two great subclasses of air-breathing quadrupeds that now inhabit the old and the new worlds. Mr. Darwin will not be the last to admit that anatomical research has traced forecasts of the structure of the whale, of the crocodile, of the salmon, of the platypus, and even of the kangaroo, in the cartilaginous masters of the ancient deep. From our point of view it would have been to be expected that the principle of natural selection would have tended rather to maintain, and perhaps to intensify, the general faculties of the cartilaginous fish, than to split up its descendants into the various tribes we have named; to say nothing of sub-divisions ranging to an almost infinite degree of variation. It will be replied that the latter has been the course that has actually occurred. That is so, no doubt. But it does not follow that it has occurred in consequence of the action of the principle of natural selection. To many persons it will appear more correct to say that the actual history of organic forms is the negation of the action of any such principle, at all events as a controlling law.

It is not, however, foreign to the considerations which led us to direct the attention of our readers to the arguments of the author of "Scepticism in Geology," to point out the remarkable coincidence — hitherto, we apprehend, by no means

* Origin of Species, ed. 1859, p. 287.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

duly described — between the succession of conditions through which our planet has passed since it was tenanted by living beings, and those ancient and venerable Hebrew records which, at a time when geology was undreamed of, mapped out the sequence of the days of creation. The geological record, as usually studied, ascends like a pedigree. We commence with the organic forms of to-day, and go back to those of yesterday, and then to those of the remoter past. For our present object we must reverse this order, and, giving only the heading of the successive chapters, begin at the beginning.

The first chapter of the self-recorded history of the planet earth comprises a long period to which the name, now known to be by no means accurate, of the azoic period has been given. The solid surface of the earth then presented a crystalline nucleus. From the primary and unstratified materials of the granite, syenite, porphyry, greenstone, and trappean rocks — substances closely akin to the lava of to-day — the successive layers of gneiss, mica schist, slates, sands, and conglomerates were formed by the conflicting forces of nature. If we use the language of D'Orbigny and the French geologists, it must be remembered that the term "upheaval" may be relative, and may denote such action as is now going on, or at all events has comparatively recently taken place, in the valley of the Jordan, as well as that of which Monte Nuovo gives us an example, within late historic times, on the shores of the Bay of Naples. At the time of which we speak, then, the mountain range of La Vendée was upheaved. Ten thousand feet of thickness attained by the Cambrian beds attest the immense duration of this first, comparatively lifeless, period. The astronomical elements of form and movement seem to have been almost the only features that were common to the earth of this first day and that of our own time. Volcanic and thermic, rather than organic, agency, came into energetic play when the light was first divided from the darkness.

A vast oceanic period succeeds. An aerial atmosphere and an aqueous robe surrounded the no longer lifeless earth. The great groups of the placoid and ganoid fishes ranged the seas which deposited the Silurian and Devonian rocks. Together with animal forms of aquatic respiration and primary simplicity, existed large and heavily armed fishes, creatures of which the reptile affinities were so apparent to Linnæus that he classed the few remaining species as Amphibia nantia, animals which afforded in their structure the promise of future forms of a higher and more varied life. Such as they were, they were the fit lords of the earth, or rather of the ocean, of their day. Plinlimmon and Snowdon rocks; sands, limes, and conglomerates; siliceous, quartzose, and slaty strata; sands, marls, and tilestones, forming the old red sandstone of the Devonian series, mark the dividing of the waters from the waters of the terrestrial and the aerial oceans.

The third period, divided from the preceding by the upheaval of the Ballons, witnessed the deposit of the mountain limestone, of the millstone grit, and of the coal measures. The latter were the scene of a rich and fertile vegetation. The labor of the miner has brought to light ample evidence that the dry land had appeared and brought forth grass, and herb, and tree. Animal life, of air-breathing structure, was not wanting amid the giant forests. Insects flitted beneath their shade. A terrestrial fauna, as well as a terrestrial flora — if the term may include cryptogamic vegetation — testifies to the activity of terrestrial life during the great carboniferous period of the earth's history.

A new series of organic forms is introduced in the fourth great geological day, separated from the preceding period by the upheaval of the north of England range of mountains. Climates, and seasons, and tides, and winds, to some extent resembling those of our own time, have left marks of their course during this long herpetiferous period. The permian and triassic rocks, the lias, and the oolite, are all characterized by the predominance of reptile forms. Gigantic saurians swam, and waded, and crawled, and walked, and even flew. Forms which now defy the anatomist to rank in existing classes — feathered reptiles, birds with tails like squirrels — marked this stage of protochthonic existence. Insect life was busy. Probably at no geologic epoch were the ideas of change, of progress, of development, and of an immense, and not very dimly indicated, future, so distinctly wrought out in the fauna of our planet. Reptile life, the animal life which of all kinds is most directly dependent on the sun, active in his rays, and torpid in his absence, reigned over earth on the fourth day.

The upheaval of the Côte d'Or ushers in the fifth great day. The most striking characteristic of the epoch has not hitherto been pointed out. It was a second oceanic

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

period. It comprised the time of the deposit of the chalk, of the Purbeck and Hastings beds, of the Weald clay, the gault, and the green sand. During this epoch the waters brought forth abundantly. The characteristic inhabitants of the modern seas and rivers, the cycloid and ctenoid fish — the bony fishes, quite distinct in their anatomy from the cartilaginous fishes, such as the sharks and rays, which were the children of an older ocean — now first appeared. Remains of birds occur in the chalk, although they are, as is natural in marine deposits, rare. Great fish moved in the waters, and fowl flew above the earth in the open firmament of heaven.

The Pyrenees form the mountain barrier, the upheaval of which marks the limit between the fifth and the sixth day. We have now reached the kainozoic strata. Mammalia appear on the scene. Cattle, and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind, herald the advent of man. We can now trace step by step the progress of that well-ordered development of which we have only collected few and distant relics in the earlier portions of the scene. The action of the same law, however, is perceptible. Permanence of type, coexisting with modification of detail, appears to be the central rule of organic development. That modification of detail is continually in the direction of increased specialization of function. Forms and organs of general, are replaced by those of special, utility. That this should be the case during any great inorganic revolution in the condition of the earth is not matter of wonder. As the amphibious and lacertine forms of life delight in the muddy confines of land and water, so we can imagine that a period of vast paludic life, when the dry land was only commencing its consolidation, and marsh and swamp, covered with cryptogamic vegetation, spread over vast areas of the surface of our planet, were especially suitable for that vigorous activity of lacertine forms which we know to have then existed. But it should be needless to point out the old fallacy of post hoc ergo propter hoc. With the drying of the earth, and the gradual attainment of its actual physical condition, the increase in detail and speciality of function of its animal inhabitants has, in point of fact, coexisted. It does not follow that it was thus produced; and many of the later phenomena of the varieties of species are not altogether consistent with such an hypothesis.

If the strata of which we have spoken as naturally divided into six great systems, or days, be graphically arranged and drawn to scale, an approach to the exhibition of a remarkable law of sequence will at once catch the eye. It is one of the same kind as that which is well known as Bode's law of planetary distances. We desire to speak with all due reserve. We are hardly in a position to catch more than a glimpse of the truth; for our measurements of the different strata are as yet so few, and so strictly local, that no geologist can give a reliable section of the crust of the earth as a whole, showing the average thickness of the successive strata of deposit. But with this caution it may be remarked that there is an approach to the diminution of deposit, and thus, probably, to that of lapse of time, somewhat approaching to the rate at which the spaces between the planets diminish as they approach the sun. The strata of the first system before described afford a known depth of fifty-two thousand eight hundred feet. Those of the second have been estimated at a little over twenty-seven thousand feet. The carboniferous systems, as before limited, have a total depth of thirteen thousand six hundred and fifty feet. The herpetiferous group of rocks is more than eight thousand feet in thickness. The cretaceous system has been measured at three thousand three hundred and fifty feet. As to this it should be remarked that a deposit of the nature of the chalk, which modern research has shown to be at this moment going on at the bottom of the sea in some regions, will be far slower in its accretion than mechanical deposits, such as those of sands, limes, and clays. The tertiary strata have been measured at one thousand three hundred and fifty feet in depth. We must repeat the caution that these measurements are not offered as a true average of the depths of the successive systems mentioned. But they are figures taken without alteration from the best estimates and measurements as yet published. It is possible that more extended information may show that no such regular decrease as is intimated actually prevails. But the subject is not unworthy of attention, and, whether such a relation hereafter prove to hold good or not, it will have been no waste of time to enquire into the actual sequence, and into the approach to an estimate of time which may be based on the measurement of depths.

As to the general theory of the advance in development of animal life, from creatures not only inhabiting but breathing water, through those of mixed abode and double respiration, to land-walking, air-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

breathing quadrupeds and bipeds, and to the tribes that sport in the air itself, there is no room for doubt or question. The one point to which it is most important to call attention is, that the progress of development has not been what may be called purely mechanical. It has been in waves or bounds. In the very earliest times, when, as far as we can tell, no air-breathing creature existed on our planet, and when most of the water-breathing tribes were of very low and simple organization, the cartilaginous fish showed a complexity and perfection of structure which is quite incompatible with the idea that a general self-development was the law of nature. So again in the herpetiferous period. The swimming, wading, and flying dragons of the fourth geologic day — the ichthyosaurs, plesiosaurs, and pterodactyls of the trias, lias, and oolite seas and marshes, contain developments of the reptile type far higher than any now existing in life. In families as well as in classes, the geological record shows, even from its present imperfectly collected data, that growth, progress, culmination, and decay have been the general law which each group of animal forms has successively obeyed. Perhaps, as we have heard it suggested by an ingenious friend, we are ourselves living in the seventh day or period of the creation, the evening of which has not yet closed on the destinies of the globe.

The more patient, exhaustive, and profound the study given to these records of nature, the more fully may we expect to understand the great secular and structural laws under which the development of organic life has taken place. So sensible are we of the enormous disproportion between the positive geological knowledge already attained, and that which we may hope hereafter to grasp, that we had some hesitation in calling attention to a parallel, which is certainly very striking, between the book of nature and another record of primitive tradition. We can only submit it for further illustration and verification. But even in this hypothetical form it is not without a certain value. It may serve to quiet the apprehensions of those who fear the progress of scientific research. Truth is one, although truths and facts are innumerable. He is not only a bold but a foolish man who thinks that he has grasped so central a truth that all other knowledge must group itself around, and in subservience to, his theory. If anything be known, really and fully appreciated, no freshly acquired portion of knowledge can disturb or invalidate that treasured verity. When contradiction seems to arise, the cause is not that the facts observed are delusive, but that our observation of those facts is imperfect. Even if a truth be held, after long research, with a grasp which seems indisputable, a new discovery, without discrediting the former study, may show how far it was from being exhaustive. The colors of the rainbow, and the different refractive powers of various transparent bodies, were patiently investigated by Newton. His was a theory of light founded on true observations, before the dark lines of Fraunhofer were detected in the spectrum. Who could have dreamed of the probability of the latter discovery? Still more, who could have dreamed of its results? To the investigation of these lines of no light we owe our possession of a knowledge which Auguste Comte declared to be unattainable by man, and which it was therefore a waste of time to pursue — a knowledge of definite facts of sidereal astronomy. We now know something, thanks to the spectroscope, even of the chemical constitution of some of the fixed stars, as well as of the speed and the direction of their secular motion in space. Would Newton have dreaded this discovery lest it should have interfered with his views as to light, or with his fame as the analyst of the spectrum? If the religious man fails to sympathize with those who labor to promote the advance of positive science, it is not because he is religious, but because he is unscientific. His fear, in inner truth, must arise, not from the force, but from the half-unconscious weakness, of his religious convictions.

[Published by arrangement with HARPER & BROTHERS.]

MACLEOD OF DARE.

BY WILLIAM BLACK.

CHAPTER XXII.

DECLARATION.

NOVEMBER though it was, next morning broke brilliantly over London. There was a fresh west wind blowing; there was a clear sunshine filling the thoroughfares; if one were on the lookout for picturesqueness even in Bury Street, was there not a fine touch of color where the softly red chimney-pots rose far away into the blue?

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

It was not possible to have always around one the splendor of the northern sea.

And Macleod would not listen to a word his friend had to say concerning the important business that had brought them both to London.

"To-night, man — to-night; we will arrange it all to-night," he would say; and there was a nervous excitement about his manner for which the major could not at all account.

"Sha'n't I see you till the evening, then?" he asked.

"No," Macleod said, looking anxiously out of the window, as if he feared some thunderstorm would suddenly shut out the clear light of this beautiful morning. "I don't know — perhaps I may be back before — but at any rate we meet at seven. You will remember seven?"

"Indeed I am not likely to forget it," his companion said; for he had been told about five-and-thirty times.

It was about eleven o'clock when Macleod left the house. There was a grateful freshness about the morning even here in the middle of London. People looked cheerful; Piccadilly was thronged with idlers come out to enjoy the sunshine; there was still a leaf or two fluttering on the trees in the squares. Why should this man go eagerly tearing away northward in a hansom, with an anxious and absorbed look on his face, when everybody seemed inclined to saunter leisurely along, breathing the sweet wind, and feeling the sunlight on their cheek?

It was scarcely half past eleven when Macleod got out of the hansom, and opened a small gate, and walked up to the door of a certain house. He was afraid she had already gone. He was afraid she might resent his calling at so unusual an hour. He was afraid — of a thousand things. And when, at last, the trim maidservant told him that Miss White was within, and asked him to step into the drawing-room, it was almost as one in a dream that he followed her. As one in a dream, truly; but nevertheless he saw every object around him with a marvellous vividness. Next day he could recollect every feature of the room — the empty fireplace, the black-framed mirror, the Chinese fans, the small cabinets with their shelves of blue and white, and the large open book on the table, with a bit of tartan lying on it. These things seemed to impress themselves on his eyesight involuntarily; for he was in reality intently listening for a soft footfall outside the door. He went forward to this open book. It was a volume of a work on the Highland clans — a large and expensive work that was not likely to belong to Mr. White. And this colored figure? It was the representative of the Clan Macleod; and this bit of cloth that lay on the open book was of the Macleod tartan. He withdrew quickly, as though he had stumbled on some dire secret. He went to the window. He saw only leafless trees now, and withered flowers, with the clear sunshine touching the sides of houses and walls that had in the summer months been quite invisible.

There was a slight noise behind him; he turned, and all the room seemed filled with a splendor of light and of life as she advanced to him — the clear, beautiful eyes full of gladness, the lips smiling, the hand frankly extended. And of a sudden his heart sank. Was it indeed of her,

> The glory of life, the beauty of the world, that he had dared to dream wild and impossible dreams? He had set out that morning with a certain masterful sense that he would face his fate. He had "taken the world for his pillow," as the Gaelic stories say. But at this sudden revelation of the incomparable grace, and self-possession, and high loveliness of this beautiful creature, all his courage and hopes fled instantly, and he could only stammer out excuses for his calling so early. He was eagerly trying to make himself out an ordinary visitor. He explained that he did not know but that she might be going to the theatre during the day. He was in London for a short time on business. It was an unconscionable hour.

"But I am so glad to see you," she said, with a perfect sweetness, and her eyes said more than her words. "I should have been really vexed if I had heard you had passed through London without calling on us. Won't you sit down?"

As he sat down, she turned for a second, and, without any embarrassment, shut the big book that had been lying open on the table.

"It is very beautiful weather," she remarked — there was no tremor about her fingers, at all events, as she made secure the brooch that fastened the simple morning dress at the neck — "only it seems a pity to throw away such beautiful sunshine on withered gardens and bare trees. We have some fine chrysanthemums, though; but I confess I don't like chrysanthemums myself. They come at a wrong time. They look unnatural. They only remind one of what is gone. If we are to have

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

winter, we ought to have it out and out; the chrysanthemums always seem to me as if they were making a pretence — trying to make you believe that there was still some life in the dead garden."

It was very pretty talk all this about chrysanthemums, uttered in the low-toned and gentle and musical voice; but somehow there was a burning impatience in his heart, and a bitter sense of hopelessness; and he felt as though he would cry out in his despair. How could he sit there and listen to talk about chrysanthemums? His hands were tightly clasped together; his heart was throbbing quickly; there was a humming in his ears as though something there refused to hear about chrysanthemums.

"I — I saw you at the theatre last night," said he.

Perhaps it was the abruptness of the remark that caused the quick blush. She lowered her eyes. But all the same she said, with perfect self-possession, —

"Did you like the piece?"

And he, too: was he not determined to play the part of an ordinary visitor?

"I am not much of a judge," said he lightly. "The drawing-room scene is very pretty. It is very like a drawing-room. I suppose those are real curtains, and real pictures?"

"Oh yes, it is all real furniture," said she.

Thereafter, for a second, blank silence. Neither dared to touch that deeper stage question that lay next their hearts. But when Keith Macleod, in many a word of timid suggestion, and in the jesting letter he sent her from Castle Dare, had ventured upon that dangerous ground, it was not to talk about the real furniture of a stage drawing-room. However, was not this an ordinary morning call? His manner — his speech — everything said so but the tightly clasped hands, and perhaps, too, a certain intensity of look in the eyes, which seemed anxious and constrained.

"Papa, at least, is proud of our chrysanthemums," said Miss White, quickly getting away from the stage question. "He is in the garden now. Will you go out and see him? I am sorry Carry has gone to school."

She rose. He rose also, and he was about to lift his hat from the table, when he suddenly turned to her.

"A drowning man will cry out — how can you prevent his crying out?"

She was startled by the change in the sound of his voice, and still more by the almost haggard look of pain and entreaty in his eyes. He seized her hand; she would have withdrawn it, but she could not.

"You will listen. It is no harm to you. I must speak now, or I will die," said he, quite wildly, "and if you think I am mad, perhaps you are right, but people have pity for a madman. Do you know why I have come to London? It is to see you. I could bear it no longer — the fire that was burning and killing me. Oh, it is no use my saying that it is love for you — I do not know what it is, but only that I must tell you, and you cannot be angry with me — you can only pity me and go away. That is it — it is nothing to you — you can go away."

She burst into tears, and snatched her hand from him, and with both hands covered her face.

"Ah!" said he, "is it pain to you that I should tell you of this madness? But you will forgive me — and you will forget it — and it will not pain you to-morrow or any other day. Surely you are not to blame! Do you remember the days when we became friends — it seems a long time ago; but they were beautiful days, and you were very kind to me, and I was glad I had come to London to make so kind a friend. And it was no fault of yours that I went away with that sickness of the heart; and how could you know about the burning fire, and the feeling that if I did not see you I might as well be dead? And I am come — and I see you — and now I know no more what is to happen when I go away. And I will call you Gertrude for once only. Gertrude, sit down now — for a moment or two — and do not grieve any more over what is only a misfortune. I want to tell you. After I have spoken, I will go away, and there will be an end of the trouble."

She did sit down; her hands were clasped in piteous despair; he saw the teardrops on the long beautiful lashes.

"And if the drowning man cries?" said he. "It is only a breath. The waves go over him, and the world is at peace. And oh! do you know that I have taken a strange fancy of late —— But I will not trouble you with that; you may hear of it afterward; you will understand, and know you have no blame, and there is an end of trouble. It is quite strange what fancies get into one's head when one is — sick — heart-sick. Do you know what I thought this morning? Will you believe it? Will you let the drowning man cry out in his madness? Why, I said to myself, 'Up, now, and have courage!

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Up, now, and be brave, and win a bride as they used to do in the old stories.' And it was you — it was you my madness thought of. 'You will tell her,' I said to myself, 'of all the love and the worship you have for her, and your thinking of her by day and by night; and she is a woman, and she will have pity. And then in her surprise, why ——' But then you came into the room: it is only a little while ago, but it seems for ever and ever away now — and I have only pained you ——"

She sprang to her feet, her face white, her lips proud and determined. And for a second she put her hands on his shoulders, and the wet, full, piteous eyes met his. But as rapidly she withdrew them — almost shuddering — and turned away; and her hands were apart, each clasped, and she bowed her head. Gertrude White had never acted like that on any stage.

And as for him, he stood absolutely dazed for a moment, not daring to think what that involuntary action might mean. He stepped forward, with a pale face and a bewildered air, and caught her hand. Her face she sheltered with the other, and she was sobbing bitterly.

"Gertrude," he said, "what is it? What do you mean?"

The broken voice answered, though her face was turned aside.

"It is I who am miserable."

"You who are miserable?"

She turned and looked fair into his face, with her eyes all wet, and beautiful, and piteous.

"Can't you see? Don't you understand?" she said. "Oh, my good friend! of all the men in the world, you are the very last I would bring trouble to. And I cannot be a hypocrite with you. I feared something of this; and now the misery is that I cannot say to you, 'Here, take my hand; it is yours; you have won your bride.' I cannot do it. If we were both differently situated, it might be otherwise."

"It might be otherwise!" he exclaimed, with a sudden wonder. "Gertrude, what do you mean? Situated? Is it only that? Look me in the face, now, and as you are a true woman tell me — if we were both free from all situation — if there were no difficulties — nothing to be thought of — could you give yourself to me? Would you really become my wife — you who have all the world flattering you?"

She dared not look him in the face. There was something about the vehemence of his manner that almost terrified her. But she answered bravely, in the sweet, low, trembling voice, and with downcast eyes.

"If I were to become the wife of any one, it is your wife I would like to be; and I have thought of it. Oh, I cannot be a hypocrite with you when I see the misery I have brought you! And I have thought of giving up all my present life, and all the wishes and dreams I have cherished, and going away and living the simple life of a woman. And under whose guidance would I try that rather than yours? You made me think. But it is all a dream — a fancy. It is impossible. It would only bring misery to you and to me."

"But why — but why?" he eagerly exclaimed; and there was a new light in his face. "Gertrude, if you can say so much, why not say all? What are obstacles? There can be none if you have the fiftieth part of the love for me that I have for you. Obstacles!" — and he laughed with a strange laugh.

She looked up in his face.

"And would it be so great a happiness for you? that would make up for all the trouble I have brought you?" she said wistfully; and his answer was to take both her hands in his, and there was such a joy in his heart that he could not speak at all. But she only shook her head, somewhat sadly, and withdrew her hands, and sat down again by the table.

"It is wrong of me even to think of it," she said. "To-day I might say 'yes,' and to-morrow? You might inspire me with courage now, and afterward — I should only bring you further pain. I do not know myself. I could not be sure of myself. How could I dare drag you into such a terrible risk? It is better as it is. The pain you are suffering will go. You will come to call me your friend; and you will thank me that I refused. Perhaps I shall suffer a little too," she added, and once more she rather timidly looked up into his face. "You do not know the fascination of seeing your scheme of life, that you have been dreaming about, just suddenly put before you for acceptance; and you want all your common sense to hold back. But I know it will be better — better for both of us. You must believe me."

"I do not believe you, and I will not believe you," said he, with a proud light in his eyes; "and now you have said so much, I am not going to take any refusal at all. Not now. Gertrude, I have courage for both of us; when you are timid you will take my hand. Say it, then!

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

A word only! You have already said all but that!"

He seemed scarcely the same man who had appealed to her with the wild eyes and the haggard face. His look was radiant and proud. He spoke with a firm voice; and yet there was a great tenderness in his tone.

"I am sure you love me," she said, in a low voice.

"You will see," he rejoined, with a firm confidence.

"And I am not going to requite your love ill. You are too vehement. You think of nothing but the one end to it all. But I am a woman, and women are taught to be patient. Now you must let me think about all you have said."

"And you do not quite refuse?" said he.

She hesitated for a moment or two.

"I must think for you as well as for myself," she said, in a scarcely audible voice. "Give me time. Give me till the end of the week."

"At this hour I will come."

"And you will believe I have decided for the best — that I have tried hard to be fair to you as well as myself?"

"I know you are too true a woman for anything else," he said; and then he added: "Ah, well, now, you have had enough misery for one morning; you must dry your eyes now and we will go out into the garden; and if I am not to say any thing of all my gratitude to you — why? Because I hope there will be many a year to do that in, my angel of goodness."

She went to fetch a light shawl and a hat; he kept turning over the things on the table, his fingers trembling, his eyes seeing nothing. If they did see anything, it was a vision of the brown moors near Castle Dare, and a beautiful creature, clad all in cream-color and scarlet drawing near the great gray stone house.

She came into the room again; joy leaped to his eyes.

"Will you follow me?"

There was a strangely subdued air about her manner as she led him to where her father was; perhaps she was rather tired after the varied emotions she had experienced; perhaps she was still anxious. He was not anxious. It was in a glad way that he addressed the old gentleman who stood there with a spade in his hand.

"It is indeed a beautiful garden," Macleod said, looking round on the withered leaves and damp soil: "no wonder you look after it yourself."

"I am not gardening," the old man said peevishly. "I have been putting a knife in the ground — burying the hatchet, you might call it. Fancy! A man sees an old hunting-knife in a shop in Gloucester — a hunting-knife of the time of Charles I., with a beautifully carved ivory handle — and he thinks he will make a present of it to me. What does he do but go and have it ground and sharpened and polished until it looks like something sent from Sheffield the day before yesterday!"

"You ought to be very pleased, pappy, you got it at all," said Gertrude White; but she was looking elsewhere — and rather absently, too.

"And so you have buried it to restore the tone?"

"I have," said the old gentleman, marching off with the shovel to a sort of outhouse.

Macleod speedily took his leave.

"Saturday next at noon," said he to her, with no timidity in his voice.

"Yes," said she, more gently, and with downcast eyes.

He walked away from the house — he knew not whither. He saw nothing around him. He walked hard, sometimes talking to himself. In the afternoon he found himself in a village in Berkshire, close by which, fortunately, there was a railway station; and he had just time to get back to keep his appointment with Major Stuart.

They sat down to dinner.

"Come now, Macleod, tell me where you have been all day," said the rosy-faced soldier, carefully tucking his napkin under his chin.

Macleod burst out laughing.

"Another day — another day, Stuart, I will tell you all about it. It is the most ridiculous story you ever heard in your life!"

It was a strange sort of laughing, for there were tears in the younger man's eyes. But Major Stuart was too busy to notice; and presently they began to talk about the real and serious object of their expedition to London.

CHAPTER XXIII.

A RED ROSE.

From nervous and unreasoning dread to overweening and extravagant confidence there was but a single bound. After the timid confession she had made, how could he have any further fear? He knew now the answer she must certainly give

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

him. What but the one word "yes" — musical as the sound of summer seas — could fitly close and atone for all that long period of doubt and despair? And would she murmur it with the low, sweet voice, or only look it with the clear and lambent eyes? Once uttered, anyhow, surely the glad message would instantly wing its flight away to the far north, and Colonsay would hear, and the green shores of Ulva would laugh, and through all the wild dashing and roaring of the seas there would be a soft ringing as of wedding bells. The Gometra men will have a good glass that night; and who will take the news to distant Fladda, and rouse the lonely Dutchman from his winter sleep? There is a bride coming to Castle Dare!

When Norman Ogilvie had even mentioned marriage, Macleod had merely shaken his head and turned away. There was no issue that way from the wilderness of pain and trouble into which he had strayed. She was already wedded — to that cruel art that was crushing the woman within her. Her ways of life and his were separated as though by unknown oceans. And how was it possible that so beautiful a woman, surrounded by people who petted and flattered her, should not already have her heart engaged? Even if she were free, how could she have bestowed a thought on him — a passing stranger, a summer visitor, the acquaintance of an hour?

But no sooner had Gertrude White, to his sudden wonder and joy and gratitude, made that stammering confession, than the impetuosity of his passion leaped at once to the goal. He would not hear of any obstacles. He would not look at them. If she would but take his hand, he would lead her and guard her, and all would go well. And it was to this effect that he wrote to her day after day, pouring out all the confidences of his heart to her, appealing to her, striving to convey to her something of his own high courage and hope. Strictly speaking, perhaps, it was not quite fair that he should thus have disturbed the calm of her deliberation. Had he not given her till the end of the week to come to a decision? But when in his eagerness he thought of some further reason, some further appeal, how could he remain silent? With the prize so near, he could not let it slip from his grasp through the consideration of niceties of conduct. By rights he ought to have gone up to Mr. White and begged for permission to pay his addresses to the old gentleman's daughter. He forgot all about that. He forgot that Mr. White was in existence. All his thinking from morning till night — and through much of the night too — was directed on her answer, the one small word filled with a whole worldful of light and joy.

"If you will only say that one little word," he wrote to her, "then everything else becomes a mere trifle. If there are obstacles and troubles and what not, we will meet them one by one, and dispose of them. There can be no obstacles if we are of one mind; and we shall be of one mind, sure enough, if you will say you will become my wife; for there is nothing I will not consent to; and I shall only be too glad to have opportunities of showing my great gratitude to you for the sacrifice you must make. I speak of it as a sacrifice; but I do not believe it is one: whatever you may think now, and whatever natural regret you may feel, you will grow to feel there was no evil done you when you were drawn away from the life that now surrounds you. And if you were to say, 'I will become your wife only on one condition — that I am not asked to abandon my career as an actress' — still I would say, 'Become my wife.' Surely matters of arrangement are mere trifles — after you have given me your promise. And when you have placed your hand in mine (and the motto of the Macleods is Hold fast) we can study conditions and obstacles, and the other nonsense that our friends are sure to suggest, at our leisure. I think I already hear you say 'Yes;' I listen and listen until I almost hear your voice. And if it is to be 'Yes,' will you wear a red rose in your dress on Saturday? I shall see that before you speak. I will know what your message is, even if there are people about. One red rose only."

"Macleod," said Major Stuart to him, "did you come to London to write love-letters?"

"Love-letters!" he said angrily; but then he laughed. "And what did you come to London for?"

"On a highly philanthropic errand," said the other gravely, "which I hope to see fulfilled to-morrow. And if we have a day or two to spare, that is well enough, for one cannot be always at work; but I did not expect to take a holiday in the company of a man who spends three-fourths of the day at a writing-desk."

"Nonsense!" said Macleod, though there was some telltale color in his face. "All the writing I have done to-day would not fill up twenty minutes. And if I am a

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

dull companion, is not Norman Ogilvie coming to dinner to-night to amuse you ?"

While they were speaking a servant brought in a card.

"Ask the gentleman to come up," Macleod said, and then he turned to his companion. "What an odd thing! I was speaking to you a minute ago about that drag accident. And here is Beauregard himself."

The tall, rough-visaged man — stooping slightly as though he thought the doorway was a trifle low — came forward and shook hands with Macleod, and was understood to inquire about his health, though what he literally said was, "Hawya, Macleod, hawya?"

"I heard you were in town from Paulton — you remember Paulton who dined with you at Richmond? He saw you in a hansom yesterday; and I took my chance of finding you in your old quarters. What are you doing in London?"

Macleod briefly explained.

"And you?" he asked, "what has brought you to London? I thought you and Lady Beauregard were in Ireland."

"We have just come over, and go down to Weatherill to-morrow. Won't you come down and shoot a pheasant or two before you return to the Highlands?"

"Well, the fact is," Macleod said, hesitatingly, "my friend and I — by the way, let me introduce you — Lord Beauregard, Major Stuart — the fact is, we ought to go back directly after we have settled this business."

"But a day or two won't matter. Now let me see. Plymley comes to us on Monday next, I think. We could get up a party for you on the Tuesday; and if your friend will come with you, we shall be six guns, which I always think the best number."

The gallant major showed no hesitation whatever. The chance of blazing away at a whole atmosphereful of pheasants — for so he construed the invitation — did not often come in his way.

"I am quite sure a day or two won't make any difference," said he quickly. "In any case, we were not thinking of going till Monday, and that would only mean an extra day."

"Very well," Macleod said.

"Then you will come down to dinner on the Monday evening. I will see if there is no alteration in the trains, and drop you a note with full instructions. Is it a bargain?"

"It is."

"All right. I must be off now. Good-by."

Major Stuart jumped to his feet with great alacrity, and warmly shook hands with the departing stranger. Then, when the door was shut, he went through a pantomimic expression of bringing down innumerable pheasants from every corner of the ceiling, with an occasional aim at the floor, where an imaginary hare was scurrying by.

"Macleod, Macleod," said he, "you are a trump. You may go on writing love-letters from now till next Monday afternoon. I suppose we shall have a good dinner, too?"

"Beauregard is said to have the best chef in London; and I don't suppose they would leave so important a person in Ireland."

"You have my gratitude, Macleod — eternal, sincere, unbounded," the major said seriously.

"But it is not I who am asking you to go and massacre a lot of pheasants," said Macleod; and he spoke rather absently, for he was thinking of the probable mood in which he would go down to Weatherill. One of a generous gladness and joy, the outward expression of an eager and secret happiness to be known by none? Or what if there were no red rose at all on her bosom when she advanced to meet him with sad eyes?

They went down into Essex next day. Major Stuart was surprised to find that his companion talked not so much about the price of machines for drying saturated crops as about the conjectural cost of living in the various houses they saw from afar, set amid the leafless trees of November.

"You don't think of coming to live in England, do you?" said he.

"No — at least not at present," Macleod said. "Of course one never knows what may turn up. I don't propose to live at Dare all my life."

"Your wife might want to live in England," the major said coolly.

Macleod started and stared.

"You have been writing a good many letters of late," said his companion.

"And is that all?" said Macleod, answering him in the Gaelic. "You know the proverb — Tossing the head will not make the boat row. I am not married yet."

The result of this journey was that they agreed to purchase one of the machines for transference to the rainy regions of Mull; and then they returned to London. This was on a Wednesday. Major Stuart considered they had a few days to idle by be-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

fore the battue; Macleod was only excitedly aware that Thursday and Friday — two short November days — came between him and that decision which he regarded with an anxious joy.

The two days went by in a sort of dream. A pale fog hung over London; and as he wandered about he saw the tall houses rise faintly blue into the gray mist; and the great coffee-colored river, flushed with recent rains, rolled down between the pale embankments; and the golden-red globe of the sun, occasionally becoming visible through the mottled clouds, sent a ray of fire here and there on some window-pane or lamp.

In the course of his devious wanderings — for he mostly went about alone — he made his way, with great trouble and perplexity, to the court in which the mother of Johnny Wickes lived; and he betrayed no shame at all in confronting the poor woman — half starved and pale and emaciated as she was — whose child he had stolen. It was in a tone of quite gratuitous pleasantry that he described to her how the small lad was growing brown and fat; and he had the audacity to declare to her that as he proposed to pay the boy the sum of one shilling per week at present, he might as well hand over to her the three months' pay which he had already earned. And the woman was so amused at the notion of little Johnny Wickes being able to earn any thing at all, that, when she received the money, and looked at it, she burst out crying; and she had so little of the spirit of the British matron, and so little regard for the laws of her country, that she invoked Heaven knows what — Heaven does know what — blessings on the head of the very man who had carried her child into slavery.

"And the first time I am going over to Oban," said he, "I will take him with me, and I will get a photograph of him made, and I will send you the photograph. And did you get the rabbits?" said he.

"Yes, indeed, sir, I got the rabbits."

"And it is a very fine poacher your son promises to be, for he got every one of the rabbits with his own snare, though I am thinking it was old Hamish was showing him how to use it. And I will say good-by to you now."

The poor woman seemed to hesitate for a second.

"If there was any sewing, sir," said she, wiping her eyes with the corner of her apron, "that I could do for your good lady, sir ——"

"But I am not married," said he quickly.

"Ah, well, indeed, sir," she said, with a sigh.

"But if there is any lace, or sewing, or anything like that you can send to my mother, I have no doubt she will pay you for it as well as any one else ——"

"I was not thinking of paying, sir, but to show you I am not ungrateful," was the answer — and if she said hungrateful, what matter? She was a woman without spirit: she had sold away her son.

From this dingy court he made his way round to Covent Garden Market, and he went into a florist's shop there.

"I want a bouquet," said he to the neat-handed maiden who looked up at him.

"Yes, sir," said she; "will you look at those in the window?"

"But I want one," said he, "with a single rose — a red rose — in the centre."

This proposition did not find favor in the eyes of the mild-mannered artist, who explained to him that something more important and ornate was necessary in the middle of a bouquet. He could have a circle of rosebuds, if he liked, outside; and a great white lily or camellia in the centre. He could have — this thing and the next. She showed him how she could combine the features of this bouquet with those of the next. But the tall Highlander remained obdurate.

"Yes," said he, "I think you are quite right. You are quite right, I am sure. But it is this that I would rather have — only one red rose in the centre, and you can make the rest what you like, only I think if they were smaller flowers, and all white, that would be better."

"Very well," said the young lady, with a pleasing smile (she was rather good-looking herself), "I will try what I can do for you if you don't mind waiting. Will you take a chair?"

He was quite amazed by the dexterity with which those nimble fingers took from one cluster and another cluster the very flowers he would himself have chosen, and by the rapid fashion in which they were dressed, fitted, and arranged. The work of art grew apace.

"But you must have something to break the white," said she, smiling, "or it will look too like a bride's bouquet;" and with that — almost in the twinkling of an eye — she had put a circular line of dark purple-blue through the cream-white blossoms. It was a splendid rose that lay in the midst of all that beauty.

"What price would you like to give, sir?" the gentle Phillis had said at the very outset. "Half a guinea—fifteen shillings?"

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

"Give me a beautiful rose," said he, "and I do not mind what the price is."

And at last the lace paper was put round; and a little further trimming and setting took place; and finally the bouquet was swathed in soft white wool and put into a basket.

"Shall I take the address?" said the young lady, no doubt expecting that he would write it on the back of one of his cards. But no. He dictated the address; and then laid down the money. The astute young person was puzzled — perhaps disappointed.

"Is there no message, sir?" said she; "no card?"

"No; but you must be sure to have it delivered to-night."

"It shall be sent off at once," said she, probably thinking that this was a very foolish young man who did not know the ways of the world. The only persons of whom she had any experience who sent bouquets without a note or a letter were husbands, who were either making up a quarrel with their wives or going to the opera, and she had observed that on such occasions the difference between twelve and sixpence and fifteen shillings was regarded and considered.

He slept but little that night; and next morning he got up nervous and trembling — like a drunken man — with half the courage and confidence that had so long sustained him gone. Major Stuart went out early. He kept pacing about the room until the frightfully slow half-hours went by; he hated the clock on the mantelpiece. And then, by a strong effort of will, he delayed starting until he should barely have time to reach her house by twelve o'clock, so that he should have the mad delight of eagerly wishing the hansom had a still more furious speed. He had chosen his horse well. It wanted five minutes to the appointed hour when he arrived at the house.

Did this trim maidservant know? Was there anything of welcome in the demure smile? He followed her; his face was pale, though he knew it not; in the dusk of the room he was left alone.

But what was this, on the table? He almost uttered a cry as his bewildered eyes fixed themselves on it. The very bouquet he had sent the previous evening; and behold! — behold! — the red rose wanting! And then, at the same moment, he turned; and there was a vision of something all in white — that came to him timidly — all in white but for the red star of love shining there. And she did not speak at all; but she buried her head in his bosom; and he held her hands tight.

And now what will Ulva say; and the lonely shores of Fladda; and the distant Dutchman, roused from his wintry sleep amid the wild waves? Far away over the white sands of Iona — and the sunlight must be shining there now — there is many a sacred spot fit for the solemn plighting of lovers' vows; and if there is any organ wanted, what more noble than the vast Atlantic rollers booming into the Bourg and Gribun caves? Surely they must know already; for the sea-birds have caught the cry; and there is a sound all through the glad rushing of the morning seas like the sound of wedding bells. There is a bride coming to Castle Dare. The islands listen; and the wild sea calls again; and the green shores of Ulva grow greener still in the sunlight. There is a bride coming to Castle Dare; and the bride is dressed all in white — only she wears a red rose.

From The Fortnightly Review.

DIDEROT AT SAINT PETERSBURG.*

"What would you say of the owner of an immense palace, who should spend all his life in going up from the cellars to the attics, and going down from attics to cellar, instead of sitting quietly in the midst of his family? That is the image of the traveller." Yet Diderot, whose words these are, resolved at the age of sixty to undertake no less formidable a journey than to the remote capital on the shores of the Neva. It had come into his head, or perhaps others had put it into his head, that he owed a visit to his imperial benefactress, whose bounty had made life easier to him. He had recently made the acquaintance of two Russian personages of consideration. One of them was the Princess Dashkow, who was believed to have taken a prominent part in the confused conspiracy of 1762 which ended in the murder of Peter III. by Alexis Orloff, and the elevation of Catherine II. to the throne. Her services at that critical moment had not prevented her disgrace, if indeed they were not its cause, and in 1770 the princess set out on her travels. Horace Walpole has described the curiosity of the London world to see the Muscovite Alecto, the accomplice of the northern Athaliah, the amazon who had

* A chapter from a forthcoming work.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

taken part in a revolution when she was only nineteen. In England she made a pleasant impression, in spite of eyes of "a very Catiline fierceness." She was equally delighted with England, and when she went on from London to Paris, she took very little trouble to make friends in the capital of the rival nation. Diderot seems to have been her only intimate. The princess called nearly every afternoon at his door, carried him off to dinner and kept him talking and declaiming until the early hours of the next morning. The "hurricanes of his enthusiastic nature" delighted her, and she remembered for years afterwards how on one occasion she excited him to such a pitch that he sprang from his chair as if by machinery, strode rapidly up and down the room, and spat upon the floor with passion.

The Prince Galitzin was a Russian friend of greater importance. Prince Galitzin was one of those foreigners, like Holbach, Grimm, Galiani, who found themselves more at home in Paris than anywhere else in the world. Living mostly among artists and men of letters, he became an established favorite. With Diderot's assistance (1767) he acquired for the empress many of the pictures that adorn the great gallery at St. Petersburg, and Diderot praises his knowledge of the fine arts, the reason being that he has that great principle of true taste, the belle âme. "One must have soul," as Vauvenargues said, "in order to have taste." He wrote eclogues in French, and he attempted the more useful but more difficult task of writing in the half-formed tongue of his own country an account of the great painters of Italy and Holland. Diderot makes the pointed remark about him that he believed in equality of ranks by instinct, which is better than believing in it by reflection. It was through the medium of this friendly and intelligent man that the empress had acted in the purchase of Diderot's library. In 1769 he was appointed Russian minister at the Hague, and his chief ground for delight at the appointment was that it brought him within reach of his friends in Paris.

Diderot set out on his expedition some time in the summer of 1773 — the date also of Johnson's memorable tour to the Hebrides — and his first halt was at the Dutch capital, then at the distance of a four days' journey from Paris. Here he remained for many weeks, in some doubt whether or not to persist in the project of a more immense journey. He passed most of his time with the Prince and Princess Galitzin, as between a good brother and a good sister. Their house, he notices, had once been the residence of Barneveldt. Men like Diderot are the last persons to think of their own historic position, else we might have expected to find him musing on the saving shelter which this land of freedom and tolerance had given to more than one of his great precursors in the literature of emancipation. Descartes had found twenty years of priceless freedom (1629–1649) among the Dutch burghers. The ruling ideas of the encyclopædia came in direct line from Bayle (d. 1706) and Locke (d. 1704), and both Bayle and Locke, though in different measures, owed their security to the stout valor with which the Dutch defended their own land, and taught the English how to defend theirs against the destructive pretensions of Catholic absolutism. Of these memories Diderot probably thought no more than Descartes thought about the learning of Grotius or the art of Rembrandt. It was not the age, nor was his the mind, for historic sentimentalism. "The more I see of this country," he wrote to his good friends in Paris, "the more I feel at home in it. The soles, fresh herrings, turbot, perch, are all the best people in the world. The walks are charming; I do not know whether the women are all very sage, but with their great straw hats, their eyes fixed on the ground, and the enormous fichus spread over their bosoms, they have the air of coming back from prayers or going to confession." Diderot did not fail to notice more serious things than this. His remarks on the means of travelling with most profit are full of sense, and the account which he wrote of Holland shows him to have been as widely reflective and observant as we should have expected him to be. It will be more convenient to say something on this, in connection with the stay which he again made at the Hague on his return from his pilgrimage to Russia.

After many hesitations the die was cast. Nariskin, a court chamberlain, took charge of the philosopher, and escorted him in an excellent carriage along the dreary road that ended in the capital reared by Peter the Great among the northern floods. It is worth while to digress for a few moments, to mark shortly the difference in social and intellectual conditions between the philosopher's own city and the city for which he was bound, and to touch on the significance of his journey. We can only in this way understand the position of the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

encyclopædists in Europe, and see why it is interesting to the student of the history of Western civilization to know something about them. It is impossible to have a clear idea of the scope of the revolutionary philosophy, as well as of the singular pre-eminence of Paris over the Western world, until we have placed ourselves not only at Ferney and Grandval, and in the parlors of Madame Geoffrin and Mademoiselle Lespinasse, but also in palaces at Florence, Berlin, Vienna, and St. Petersburg.

From Holland with its free institutions, its peaceful industry, its husbanded wealth, its rich and original art, its great political and literary tradition, to go to Russia was to take a measure of a great arc of Western progress. It was to retrace the steps of the genius of civilization. The political capital of Russia represented a forced and artificial union between old and new conditions. In St. Petersburg were united the age of barbarism and the age of civilization, the tenth century and the eighteenth, the manners of Asia and the manners of Europe, the rudest Scythians and the most polished Europeans, a brilliant and proud aristocracy and a people sunk in servitude. On one side wére elegant fashions, magnificent dresses, sumptuous repasts, splendid feasts, theatres like those which gave grace and animation to the select circles of London or Paris: on the other side, shopkeepers in Asiatic dress, coachmen, servants, and peasants clad in sheepskins, wearing long beards, fur caps, and long fingerless gloves of skin, with short axes hanging from their leathern girdles. The thick woollen bands round their feet and legs resembled a rude cothurnus, and the sight of these uncouth figures reminded one who had seen the bas-reliefs on Trajan's column at Rome, of the Scythians, the Dacians, the Goths, the Roxolani, who had been the terror of the empire.* Literary cultivation was confined to almost the smallest possible area. Oriental as Russia was in many respects, it was the opposite of Oriental in one: women were then, as they are still sometimes said to be in Russia, more cultivated and advanced than men. Many of them could speak half-a-dozen languages, could play on several instruments, and were familiar with the works of the famous poets of France, Italy, and England. Among the men, on the contrary, outside of a few exceptional families about the court, the vast majority were strangers to all that was passing beyond the limits of their own country. The few who had travelled and were on an intellectual level with their century, were as far removed from the rest of their countrymen as Englishmen are removed from Iroquois.

* Ségur's Mém., ii. 230.

To paint the court of Catherine in its true colors, it has been said that one ought to have the pen of Procopius. It was a hotbed of corruption, intrigue, jealousy, violence, hatred. One day, surrounded by twenty-seven of her courtiers, Catherine said: "If I were to believe what you all say about one another, there is not one of you who does not richly deserve to have his head cut off." A certain princess was notorious for her inhuman barbarity. One day she discovered that one of her attendants was with child; in a frenzy she pursued the hapless Callisto from chamber to chamber, came up with her, dashed in her skull with a heavy weapon, and finally in a delirium of passion ripped up her body. When two nobles had a quarrel, they fell upon one another then and there like tipsy navvies, and Potemkin had an eye gouged out in a court brawl. Such horrors give us a measure of the superior humanity of Versailles, and enable us also in passing to see how duelling could be a sign of a higher civilization. The reigning passions were love of money and the gratification of a coarse vanity. Friendship, virtue, manners, delicacy, probity, said one witness, are here merely words, void of all meaning. The tone in public affairs was as low as in those of private conduct. I might as well, says Sir G. Macartney, quote Clarke and Tillotson at the Divan of Constantinople, as invoke the authority of Puffendorf and Grotius here.

The character of the empress herself has been more disputed than that of the society in which she was the one imposing personage. She stands in history with Elizabeth of England, with Catherine de' Medici, with Maria Theresa, among the women who have been like great men. Of her place in the record of the creation of that vast empire which begins with Prussia and ends with China, we have not here to speak. The materials for knowing her and judging her are only in our own time becoming accessible.* As usual, the

* The Imperial Historical Society are publishing a recueil général of documents, many of which shed an interesting light on Catherine's intercourse with the men of letters. In the archives of the house of Woronzow (especially vol. xii.), amid much of what for our purpose is chaff, are a few grains of what is inter-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

mythic elements that surrounded her like a white fog from her northern seas, from which she loomed like a portent, are rapidly disappearing, and are replaced by the outlines of ordinary humanity, but with more than the ordinary human measure of firmness, resolution, and energetic grasp of the facts of her position in the world.

We must go from the philosophers to the men of affairs for a true picture. These tell us that she offered an unprecedented mixture of courage and weakness, of knowledge and incompetence, of firmness and irresolution; passing in turn from the most opposite extremes, she presented a thousand diverse surfaces, until at last the observer had to content himself with putting her down as a consummate comedian. She had no ready apprehension. Too refined a pleasantry was thrown away upon her, and there was always a chance of her reversing its drift. No playful reference to the finances or the military force, or even to the climate of her empire, was ever taken in good part. The political part of her nature was the serious part. Catherine had the literary tastes, but not the literary skill of Frederick. She is believed on good evidence to have written for the use of her grandsons not only an "Abridgment of Russian History," but a volume of "Moral Tales." The composition of moral tales was entirely independent of morality. Just as Lewis XV. had a long series of Chateauroux, Pompadours, Dubarrys, so Catherine had her Orloffs and Potemkins, and a countless host of obscure and miscellaneous Wassiltchikows, Zavadowskys, Zoriczes, Korsaks. On the serious side, Lewis XIV. was her great pattern and idol. She resented criticism on the grand monarque as something personal to herself. To her business as sovereign — mon petit ménage, as she called the control of her huge formless empire — she devoted as much indefatigable industry as Lewis himself had done in his best days. Notwithstanding all her efforts to improve her country, she was not popular and never won the affection of her subjects, but she probably cared less for the opinion and sentiment of Russia than for the applause of Europe. Tragedy displeases her, writes the French minister, and comedy wearies her; she does not like music; her table is without any sort of exquisiteness; in a garden she cares only for roses; her only taste is to build and to drill her court, for the turn that she has for reigning and for making a great figure in the universe is really not so much taste as a downright absorbing passion.

Gunning, the English chargé d'affaires, insists that the motive of all her patriotic labors was not benevolence, but an insatiable and unbounded thirst for fame. "If it were not so, we must charge her with an inconsistency amounting to madness, for undertaking so many immense works of public utility, such as the foundation of colleges and academies on a most extensive plan and at an enormous outlay, and then leaving them incomplete, not even finishing the buildings for them." They had served the purpose of making foreigners laud the glory of the Semiramis of the north, and that was enough. The arts and sciences, said the French minister, have plenty of academies here, but the academies have few subjects and fewer pupils. How could there be pupils in a country where there was nobody who was not either a courtier, a soldier, or a slave? The princess Sophie of Anhalt, long before she dreamed of becoming the czarina Catherine II., had been brought up by a French governess, and the tastes that her governess had implanted grew into a passion for French literature, which can only be compared to the same passion in Frederick the Great. Catherine only continued a movement that had already in the reign of her predecessor gone to a considerable length. The social reaction against German predominance had been accompanied by a leaning towards France. French professors in art and literature had been tempted to Moscow; the nobles sent to Paris for their clothes and their furniture; and a French theatre was set up in St. Petersburg, where the nobles were forced to attend the performances under pain of a fine. Absentees and loiterers were brought to their boxes by horse-patrols.

Catherine was more serious and intelligent than this in her pursuit of French culture. She had begun with the books in which most of the salt of old France was to be found, with Rabelais, Scarron, Montaigne; she cherished Molière and esting. M. Rambaud, the author of the learned work on "The Greek Empire in the Tenth Century," gave interesting selections from these sources in two articles in the Revue des deux Mondes for February and April, 1877. Besides what is to be gathered from such well-known authorities as William Tooke, Ségur, Dashkow, there are many interesting pages in the memoirs of that attractive and interesting person, the Prince de Ligne. The passages from English and French despatches, I have taken from an anonymous but authentic work published at Berlin in 1858, "La Cour de la Russie il y a cent ans: 1725–1783: Extraits des Dépêches des Ambassadeurs anglais et français." Catherine's own memoirs, published in London in 1859 by Alexander Herzen, are perhaps of too doubtful authority.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Corneille; and of the writers of the eighteenth century, apart from Voltaire, the author of Gil Blas was her favorite. Such a list tells its own tale of a mind turned to what is masculine, racy, pungent, lively, and sapid. "I am a Gauloise of the north," she said, "I only understand the old French; I do not understand the new. I made up my mind to get something out of your gentry, the learned men in iste: I tried them; I made some of them come here; I occasionally wrote to them; they wearied me to death, and never understood me; there was only my good protector Voltaire. Do you know it was Voltaire who made me the fashion?"* This was a confidential revelation, made long after most of the philosophers were dead. We might have penetrated the secret of her friendship for such a man as Diderot, even with less direct evidence than this. It was the vogue of the philosophers, and not their philosophy, that made Catherine their friend. They were the great interest of Europe at this time, just as Greek scholars had been its interest in one century, painters in another, great masters of religious controversy in a third. "What makes the great merit of France," said Voltaire, "what makes its unique superiority, is a small number of sublime or delightful men of genius, who cause French to be spoken at Vienna, at Stockholm, and at Moscow. Your ministers, your intendants, your chief secretaries, have no part in all this glory." This vogue of the philosophers brought the whole literature of their country into universal repute. In the depths of the Crimea a khan of the Tartars took a delight in having "Tartufe" and the "Bourgeois Gentilhomme" read aloud to him.†

As soon as Catherine came into power (1762), she at once applied herself to make friends in this high region. It was a matter of course that she should begin with the omnipotent monarch at Ferney. Graceful verses from Voltaire were as indispensable an ornament to a crowned head as a diadem, and Catherine answered with compliments that were perhaps more sincere than his verses. She wonders how she can repay him for a bundle of books that he had sent to her, and at last bethinks herself that nothing will please the lover of mankind so much as the introduction of inoculation into the great empire; so she has sent for Dr. Dimsdale from England and submitted to the unfamiliar rite in her own sacred person. Presents of furs are sent to the hermit of the Alps, and he is told how fortunate the imperial messenger counts himself in being dispatched to Ferney. What flattered Voltaire more than furs, was Catherine's promptitude and exactness in keeping him informed of her military and political movements against Turkey. It made him a centre of European intelligence in more senses than one, and helped him in his lifelong battle to pose in his letters as at least the equal of his friend, the king of Prussia. For D'Alembert the empress professed an admiration only less than that she felt for Voltaire. She was eager that he should come to Russia to superintend the instruction of the young grand-duke. But D'Alembert was too prudent to go to St. Petersburg, as he was too prudent to go to Berlin. Montesquieu had died five years before her accession, but his influence remained. She habitually called "The Spirit of Laws" the breviary of kings, and when she drew up her instruction for a new code, she acknowledged how much she had pillaged from Montesquieu. "I hope," she said, "that if from the other world he sees me at work, he will forgive my plagiarism for the sake of the twenty millions of men who will benefit by it." In truth the twenty millions of men got very little benefit indeed by the code. Montesquieu's own method might have taught her that not even absolute power can force the civil system of free labor into a society resting on serfdom. But it is not surprising that Catherine was no wiser than more democratic reformers who had drunk from the French springs. Or possibly she had a lower estimate in her own heart of the value of her code for practical purposes, than it suited her to disclose to a Parisian philosopher.

Catherine did not forget that, though the French at this time were pre-eminent in the literature of new ideas, yet there were meritorious and useful men in other countries. One of her correspondents was Zimmermann, of Hanover, whose essay on "Solitude" no second-hand bookseller's library is ever without. She tried hard to bribe Beccaria to leave Florence for St. Petersburg. She succeeded in persuading Euler to return to a capital whither he had been invited many years before by the first Catherine, and where he now remained.

Both Catherine's position and her temperament made the society of her own sex of little use or interest to her. "I don't know whether it is custom or inclination,"

* To the Prince de Ligne.
† Rambaud, p. 573.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

she wrote, "but somehow I can never carry on conversation except with men. There are only two women in the world with whom I can talk for half an hour at once." Yet among her most intimate correspondents was one woman well known in the encyclopædic circle. She kept up an active exchange of letters with Madame Geoffrin — that interesting personage who though belonging to the bourgeoisie and possessing not a trace of literary genius, yet was respectfully courted not only by Catherine, but by Stanislas, Gustavus, and Joseph II.*

On the whole, then, we must regard Catherine's European correspondence as at least in some measure the result of political calculation. Its purposes, as has been said, were partly those to which in our own time some governments devote a reptile fund. There is a letter from the Duchesse de Choiseul to Madame du Deffand, her intimate friend and the friend of so many of the literary circle, in which the secret of the relations between Catherine and the men of letters is very plainly told. "All that," she writes, "— protection of arts and sciences — is mere luxury and a caprice of fashion in our age. All such pompous jargon is the product of vanity, not of principles or of reflection. . . . The empress of Russia has another object in protecting literature; she has had sense enough to feel that she had need of the protection of the men of letters. She has flattered herself that their base praise would cover with an impenetrable veil, in the eyes of her contemporaries and of posterity, the crimes with which she has astonished the universe and revolted humanity. . . . The men of letters, on the other hand, flattered, cajoled, caressed by her, are vain of the protection that they are able to throw over her, and dupes of the coquetries that she lavishes on them. These people, who say and believe that they are the instructors of the masters of the world, sink so low as actually to take a pride in the protection that this monster, in her turn, seems to accord to them, simply because she sits on a throne." †

In short the monarchs of the north understood and used the new forces of the men of letters, whom their own sovereign only recognized to oppress. The contrast between the liberalism of the northern sovereigns, and the obscurantism of the court of France, was never lost from sight. Marmontel's "Belisarius" was condemned by the Sorbonne, and burnt at the foot of the great staircase of the Palace of Justice, but in Russia a group of courtiers hastened to translate it, and the empress herself undertook one chapter of the work. Diderot, who was not allowed to enter the French Academy, was an honored guest at the Russian palace. For all this Catherine was handsomely repaid. When Diderot visited St. Petersburg, Voltaire congratulated the empress on seeing that unique man; but Diderot is not, he added, "the only Frenchman who is an enthusiast for your glory. We are all lay missionaries who preach the religion of Saint Catherine, and we can boast that our church is tolerably universal." * We have already seen Catherine's generosity in buying Diderot's books, and paying him for guarding them as her librarian. "I should never have expected," she says, "that the purchase of a library would bring me so many fine compliments; all the world is offering them to me about M. Diderot's library. But now confess, you to whom humanity is indebted for the strong support that you have given to innocence and virtue in the person of Calas, that it would have been cruel and unjust to separate a student from his books." † "Ah, madame," replies the most graceful of all courtiers, "let your imperial majesty forgive me; no, you are not the aurora borealis; you are assuredly the most brilliant star of the north, and never was there one so beneficent as you. Andromeda, Perseus, Callisto, are not your equals. All these stars would have left Diderot to die of starvation. He was persecuted in his own country, and your benefactions came thither to seek him! Lewis XIV. was less munificent than your Majesty: he rewarded merit in foreign countries, but other people pointed it out to him, whereas you, madame, go in search of it and find it for yourself. Your generous pains to establish freedom of conscience in Poland are a piece of beneficence that the human race must ever celebrate." ‡

When the first partition of Poland took place seven years later, Catherine found that she had not cultivated the friendship of the French philosophers to no purpose. The action of the dominant party in Poland enabled Catherine to take up a line which touched the French philosophers in their tenderest part. The Polish oligarchy was Catholic, and imposed crushing dis-

* See M. Mouy's introduction to her correspondence with Stanislas.

† Corresp. Complète de Mme. du Deffand (Ed. 1877), i. 115. June, 1767.

* November 1, 1773.

† November, 1766.

‡ December 22, 1766.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

abilities on the non-Catholic part of the population. "At the slightest attempt in favor of the non-Catholics," King Stanislas writes to Madame Geoffrin, of the Diet of 1764, "there arose such a cry of fanaticism! The difficulty as to the naturalization of foreigners, the contempt for roturiers and the oppression of them, and Catholic intolerance, are the three strongest national prejudices that I have to fight against in my countrymen, who are at bottom good folk, but whom their education and ignorance render excessively stubborn on these three heads."* Poland in short reproduced, in an aggravated and more barbaric form, those evils of Catholic feudalism in which the philosophers saw the arch curse of their own country. Catherine took the side of the dissidents, and figured as the champion of religious toleration. Toleration was chief among the philosophic watchwords, and seeing that great device on her banners, the encyclopædic party asked no further questions. So, with the significant exception of Rousseau, they all abstained from that cant about the partition which has so often been heard from European liberals in later days. And so with reference to more questionable transactions of an earlier date, no one could guess from the writings of the philosophers that Catherine had ever been suspected of uniting with her husband in a plot to poison the empress Elizabeth, and then uniting with her lover in a plot to strangle her husband. "I am quite aware," said Voltaire, "that she is reproached with some bagatelles in the matter of her husband, but these are little family affairs with which I cannot possibly think of meddling."

One curious instance of Catherine's sensibility to European opinion is connected with her relations to Diderot. Rulhière, afterwards well known in literature as a historian, began life as secretary to Breteuil, in the French embassy at St. Petersburg. An eye-witness of the tragedy which seated Catherine on the throne, he wrote an account of the events of the revolution of 1762. This piquant narrative, composed by a young man who had read Tacitus and Sallust, was circulated in manuscript among the salons of Paris (1768). Diderot had warned Rulhière that it was infinitely dangerous to speak about princes, that not everything that is true is fit to be told, that he could not be too careful of the feelings of a great sovereign who was the admiration and delight of her people. Catherine pretended that a mere secretary of an embassy could know very little about the real springs and motives of the conspiracy. Diderot had described the manuscript as painting her in a commanding and imperious attitude. "There was nothing of that sort," she said; "it was only a question of perishing with a madman, or saving one's self with the multitude who insisted on coming to the rescue." What she saw was that the manuscript must be bought, and she did her best first to buy the author, and then, when this failed, to have him locked up in the Bastille. She succeeded in neither. The French government were not sorry to have a scourge to their hands. All that Diderot could procure from Rulhière was a promise that the work should not be published during the empress's lifetime, and it was not actually given to the world until 1797. When Diderot was at St. Petersburg, the empress was importunate to know the contents of the manuscript, which he had seen, but of which she was unable to procure a copy. "As far as you are concerned," he said, "if you attach great importance, madame, to the decencies and virtues, the worn-out rags of your sex, this work is a satire against you; but if great views and masculine and patriotic designs concern you more, the author depicts you as a great princess." The empress answered that this only increased her desire to read the book. Diderot himself truly enough described it as a historic romance, containing a mixed tissue of lies and truths that posterity would compare to a chapter of Tacitus.* Perhaps the only piece of it that posterity will really value is the page in which the writer describes Catherine's personal appearance; her broad and open brow, her large and slightly double chin, her hair of resplendent chestnut, her eyes of a brilliant brown into which the reflections of the light brought shades of blue. "Pride," he says, "is the true characteristic of her physiognomy. The amiability and grace which are there too, only seem to penetrating eyes to be the effect of an extreme desire to please, and these seductive expressions somehow let the design of seducing be rather too clearly seen."

The first Frenchman whom Catherine welcomed in person to her court was Falconet. His introduction to her was due to Diderot. She had entreated him to find for her a sculptor who would undertake a colossal statue of Peter the Great. Fal-

* Corresp., pp. 135, 144, etc.

* Satire I. sur les Caractères, etc. Œuv. vi. 313.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

conet was at the height of his reputation in his own country; he seems to have been actuated by no other motive than the desire to seize the opportunity of erecting an immense monument of his art. Diderot's eloquence was not wanting. Falconet had the proverbial temperament of artistic genius. Diderot called him the Jean Jacques of sculpture. He had none of the rapacity for money which has distinguished so many artists in their dealings with foreign princes, but he was irritable, turbulent, restless, intractable. He was a chivalrous defender of poorer brethren in art, and he was never a respecter of persons. His feuds with Betzki, the empress's faithful factotum, were as acrid as the feuds between Voltaire and Maupertuis. Betzki had his own ideas about the statue that was to do honor to the founder of the empire, and he insisted that the famous equestrian figure of Marcus Aurelius should be the model. Falconet was a man of genius, and he insisted that what might be good for Marcus Aurelius would not be good for Peter the Great. The courtly battle does not concern us, though some of its episodes offer tempting illustrations of biting French malice. Falconet had his own way, and after the labor of many years, a colossus of bronze bestrode a charger rearing on a monstrous mass of unhewn granite. Catherine took the liveliest interest in her artist's work, frequently visiting his studio, and keeping up a busy correspondence. With him, as with the others, she insisted that he should stand on no ceremony, and should not spin out his lines with courtly epithets on which she set no value. She encouraged him to pester her with a host of his obscure countrymen in search of a living, and a little colony of Frenchmen whose names tell us nothing, hung about the Russian capital. Diderot's account of this group of his countrymen at St. Petersburg recalls the picture of a corresponding group at Berlin. "Most of the French who are there rend and hate one another, and bring contempt both on themselves and their nation: 'tis the most unworthy set of rascals that you can imagine." *

Diderot reached St. Petersburg towards the end of 1773, and he remained some five months, until the beginning of March, 1774. His reception was most cordial, as his arrival had been eagerly anticipated. The empress always professed to detest ceremony and state. In a letter to Madame Geoffrin she insists, as we have already seen her doing with Falconet, on being treated to no Oriental prostrations, as if she were at the court of Persia. "There is nothing in the world so ugly and detestable as greatness. When I go into a room, you would say that I am the head of Medusa: everybody turns to stone. I constantly scream like an eagle against such ways; yet the more I scream, the less are they at their ease. . . . If you came into my room, I should say to you, 'Madame, be seated; let us chatter at our ease. You would have a chair in front of me; there would be a table between us. Et puis des bâtons rompus, tant et plus, c'est mon fort.'"

This is an exact description of her real behavior to Diderot. On most days he was in her society from three in the afternoon until five or six. Etiquette was banished. Diderot's simplicity and vehemence were as conspicuous and as unrestrained at Tsarskoe-selo as at Grandval or the Rue Taranne. If for a moment the torrent of his improvisation was checked by the thought that he was talking to a great lady, Catherine encouraged him to go on. "Allons," she cried, "entre hommes tout est permis!" The philosopher in the heat of exposition brought his hands down upon the imperial knees with such force and iteration, that Catherine complained that he made them black and blue. She was sometimes glad to seek shelter from such zealous enforcement of truth behind a strong table. Watchful diplomatists could not doubt that such interviews must have reference to politics. Cathcart, the English ambassador, writes to his government that M. Diderot is still with the empress at Tsarskoe-selo, "pursuing his political intrigues." And, amazing as it may seem, the French minister and the French ambassador both of them believed that they had found in this dreaming rhapsodical genius a useful diplomatic instrument. "The interviews between Catherine and Diderot follow one another incessantly and go on from day to day. He told me," writes the ambassador, "and I have reasons for believing that he is speaking the truth, that he has painted the danger of the alliance of Russia with the king of Prussia, and the advantage of an alliance with us. The empress, far from blaming this freedom, encouraged him by word and gesture. 'You are not fond of that prince,' she said to Diderot. 'No,' he replied, 'he is a great man, but a bad king, and a dealer in counterfeit coin.' 'Oh,' said she, laughing, 'I have had my share of his coin.'"

* xx. 58.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

The first partition of Poland had been finally consummated in the Polish Diet in the autumn of 1773, a few weeks before Diderot's arrival at St. Petersburg. Lewis XV., now drawing very near to his end, and D'Aiguillon, his minister, had some uneasiness at this opening of the great era of territorial revolution, and looked about in a shiftless way for an ally against Russia and Prussia. England sensibly refused to stir. Then France, as we see, was only anxious to detach Catherine from Frederick. All was shiftless and feeble, and the French government can have known little of the empress, if they thought that Diderot was the man to affect her strong and positive mind. She told Ségur in later years what success Diderot had with her as a politician.

"I talked much and frequently with him," said Catherine, "but with more curiosity than profit. If I had believed him, everything would have been turned upside down in my kingdom; legislation, administration, finances, — all to be turned topsy-turvy to make room for impracticable theories. Yet as I listened more than I talked, any witness who happened to be present would have taken him for a severe pedagogue, and me for his humble scholar. Probably he thought so himself, for after some time, seeing that none of these great innovations were made which he had recommended, he showed surprise and a haughty kind of dissatisfaction. Then speaking openly, I said to him: M. Diderot, I have listened with the greatest pleasure to all that your brilliant intelligence has inspired; and with all your great principles, which I understand very well, one would make fine books but very bad business. You forget, in all your plans of reform, the difference in our positions: you only work on paper, which endures all things; it opposes no obstacle, either to your imagination or to your pen; but I, poor empress as I am, work on the human skin, which is irritable and ticklish to a very different degree. I am persuaded that from this moment he pitied me as a narrow and vulgar spirit. For the future he only talked about literature, and politics vanished from our conversation." *

Catherine was mistaken, as we shall see, in supposing that Diderot ever thought her less than the greatest of men. Cathcart, the English ambassador, writes in a sour strain: "All his letters are filled with panegyrics of the empress, whom he depicts as above humanity. His flatteries of the grand duke have been no less gross, but be it said to the young prince's honor, he has shown as much contempt for these flatteries as for the mischievous principles of this pretended philosopher."

* Ségur, iii. 34.

Frederick tells D'Alembert that though the empress overwhelms Diderot with favors, people at St. Petersburg find him tiresome and disputatious, and "talking the same rigmarole over and over again." In her letters to Voltaire, Catherine lets nothing of this be seen. She finds Diderot's imagination inexhaustible, and ranks him among the most extraordinary men that have ever lived; she delights in his conversation, and his visits have given her the most uncommon pleasure. All this was probably true enough. Catherine probably rated the philosopher at his true worth as a great talker and a singular and original genius, but this did not prevent her, any more than it need prevent us, from seeing the limits and measure. She was not one of the weaker heads, who can never be content without either wholesale enthusiasm or wholesale disparagement.

Diderot had a companion who pleased her better than Diderot himself. Grimm came to St. Petersburg at this time to pay his first visit, and had a great success. "The empress," wrote Madame Geoffrin to King Stanislas, "lavished all her graces on Grimm. And he has everything that is needed to make him worthy of them. Diderot has neither the fineness of perception nor the delicate tact that Grimm has, and so he has not had the success of Grimm. Diderot is always in himself, and sees nothing in other people that has not some reference to himself. He is a man of a great deal of understanding, but his nature and turn of mind make him good for nothing, and, more than that, would make him a very dangerous person in any employment. Grimm is quite the contrary." *

In truth, as we have said before, Grimm was one of the shrewdest heads in the encyclopædic party; he had much knowledge, a judgment both solid and acute, and a certain easy fashion of social commerce, free from raptures and full of good sense. Yet he was as devoted and ecstatic in his feeling about the empress, as his more impetuous friend. "There," he says, "was no conversation of leaps and bounds, in which idleness traverses a whole gallery of ideas that have no connection with one another, and weariness

* Mouy's Corresp. du roi Stanislas, p. 501.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

draws you away from one object to skim a dozen others. They were talks in which all was bound together, often by imperceptible threads, but all the more naturally as not a word of what was to be said had been led up to, or prepared beforehand." Grimm cannot find words to describe her verve, her stream of brilliant sallies, her dashing traits, her eagle's coup d'œil. No wonder that he used to quit her presence so electrified, as to pass half the night in marching up and down his room, beset and pursued by all the fine and marvellous things that had been said. How much of all this is true, and how much of it is the voice of the bewildered courtier, it might be hard to decide. But the rays of the imperial sun did not so far blind his prudence as to make him accept a pressing invitation to remain permanently in Catherine's service. When Diderot quitted St. Petersburg, Grimm went to Italy. After an interlude there, he returned to Russia and was again restored to high favor. When the time came for him to leave her, the empress gave him a yearly pension of two thousand roubles, or about ten thousand livres, and with a minute considerateness that is said not to be common among the great, she presently ordered that it should be paid in such a form that he should not lose on the exchange between France and Russia. Whether she had a special object in keeping Grimm in good humor we hardly know. What is certain is that, from 1776 until the fall of the French monarchy, she kept up a voluminous correspondence with him, and that he acted as an unofficial intermediary between her and the ministers at Versailles. Every day she wrote down what she wished to say to Grimm, and at the end of every three months these daily sheets were made into a bulky packet and despatched to Paris by a special courier, who returned with a similar packet from Grimm. This intercourse went on until the very height of the Revolution, when Grimm at last, in February, 1792, fled from Paris. The empress's helpful friendship continued to the end of her life (1796).*

Diderot arrived at the Hague on his return from Russia in the first week of April (1774), after making a rapid journey of seven hundred leagues in three weeks and a day. D'Alembert had been anxious that Frederick of Prussia should invite Diderot to visit him at Berlin. Frederick had told him that, intrepid reader as he was, he could not endure to read Diderot's books. "There reigns in them a tone of self-sufficiency and an arrogance which revolt the instinct of my freedom. It was not in such a style that Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, Locke, Gassendi, Bayle, and Newton wrote." D'Alembert replied that the king would judge more favorably of the philosopher's person than of his works; that he would find in Diderot, along with much fecundity, imagination, and knowledge, a gentle heat and a great deal of amenity.* Frederick, however, did not send the invitation, and Diderot willingly enough went homewards by the northern route by which he had come. He passed Königsberg, where Kant was then meditating the "Critique of Pure Reason." It is hardly probable that Diderot met the famous worthy who was destined to deal so heavy a blow to the encyclopædic way of thinking, and to leave a name not less illustrious than Frederick or Catherine.

A court official was sent in charge of the philosopher. The troubles of posting by the sea-road between Königsberg and Memel had moved him to the composition of some very bad verses on his first journey; and the horror of crossing the Dwina inspired others that were no better on his return. The weather was hard; four carriages were broken on the way. He expected to be drowned as the ice creaked under his horses' feet at Riga, and he thought that he had broken an arm and a shoulder as he crossed the ferry at Mittau. But all ended well, and he found himself once more under the roof of the Prince Galitzin at the Hague. Hence he wrote to his wife and his other friends in Paris, that it must be a great consolation to them to know that he was only separated from them by a journey of four days. That journey was not taken, however, for nearly four months. Diderot had promised the empress that he would publish a set of the regulations for the various institutions which she had founded for the improvement of her realm. This could only be done, or could best be done, in Holland. His life there was spent as usual in the slavery of proof-sheets, tempered by daily bursts of conversation, rhapsody, discussion, and dreamy contemplation. He made the acquaintance of a certain Björnstähl, a professor of oriental languages at the University of Lund in Sweden, and a few pages in this obscure writer's obscure

* Mémoire Historique, printed in vol. i. of the new edition (1877) of the "Correspondence of Grimm and Diderot," by M. Maurice Tourneux.

* D'Alembert au roi de Prusse. Feb. 14, 1774.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

book contain the only glimpse that we have of the philosopher on his travels.* Diderot was as ecstatic in conversation as we know him to have been in his correspondence, in praise of the august friend whom he had left. The least of his compliments was that she united the charms of Cleopatra to the soul of Cæsar, or sometimes it was, to the soul of Brutus.

"At the Hague," says Björnstähl, "we go about every day with M. Diderot. He has views extending over an incredibly wide field, possesses a vivacity that I cannot describe, is pleasant and friendly in intercourse, and has new and unusual observations to make on every subject. . . . Who could fail to prize him? He is so bright, so full of instruction, has so many new thoughts and suggestions, that nobody can help admiring him. But willingly as he talks when one goes to him, he shows to little advantage in large companies, and that is why he did not please everybody at Saint Petersburg. You will easily see the reason why this incomparable man in such companies, where people talk of fashion, of clothes, of frippery, and all other sorts of triviality, neither gives pleasure to others nor finds pleasure himself." And the friendly Swede rises to the height of generalization in the quaint maxim, "Where an empty head shines, there a thoroughly cultivated man comes too short."

Scheveningen, the little bathing-place a few miles from the Hague, was Diderot's favorite spot. "It was there," he writes, "that I used to see the horizon dark, the sea covered with pale haze, the waves rolling and tumbling, and far out the poor fishermen in their great clumsy boats; on the shore a multitude of women frozen with cold or apprehension, trying to warm themselves in the sun. When the work was at an end and the boats had landed, the beach was covered with fish of every kind. These good people have the simplicity, the openness, the filial and fraternal piety of old time. As the men come down from their boats, their wives throw themselves into their arms; they embrace their fathers and their little ones; each loads himself with fish; the son tosses his father a codfish or a salmon, which the old man carries off in triumph to his cottage, thanking heaven that it has given him so industrious and worthy a son. When he has gone indoors, the sight of the fish rejoices the old man's mate; it is quickly cut in pieces, the less lucky neighbors invited, it is soon eaten, and the room resounds with thanks to God, and cheerful songs." *

These scenes with their sea background, their animation, their broad strokes of the simple, kindly, and real in life, may well have been after Diderot's own heart. He often told me, says Björnstähl, that he never found the hours pass slowly in the company of a peasant, or a cobbler, or any handicraftsman, but that he had many a time found them pass slowly enough in the society of a courtier. "For of the one," he said, "one can always ask about useful and necessary things, but the other is mostly, so far as anything useful is concerned, empty and void."

The pleasantness and ease of the people of the Hague in society was supposed to betray the influence of foreigners and the court. Impartial travellers assigned to the talk of cultivated circles there a rank not below that of similar circles in France and England. Some went even further, and declared Holland to have a distinct advantage, because people were never embarrassed either by the levity and sparkling wit of France on the one hand, nor by the depressing reserve and taciturnity of England on the other.† Yet Holland was fully within the sphere of the great intellectual commonwealth of the west, and was as directly accessible to the literary influences of the time as it had ever been. If Diderot had inquired into the vernacular productions of the country, he would have found that here also the wave of reaction against French conventions, and the tide of English simplicity and domestic sentimentalism, had passed into literature. "The Spectator" and "Clarissa Harlowe" inspired the writers of Holland as they had inspired Diderot himself.‡ In erudition, it was still what, even after the death of Scaliger, it had remained through the seventeenth century, the most learned state of Europe, and the elder Hemsterhuys, with such pupils as Ruhnken and Valckenaer, kept up as well as he could the scholarly tradition of Gronovius and Grævius. But the eighteenth century was not the century of erudition. Scholarship had given way to speculation.

Among the interesting persons whom Diderot saw at the Hague, the most interesting is the amiable and learned son of

* Briefe aux seinen ausländischen Reisen (Leipzig, 1780—a German translation from the Swedish), iii. 217–233.

* xvii. 449.

† George Forster's Ansichten vom Niederrhein, etc., ii. 396 (1790).

‡ Jonckbloet's Gesch. d. Niederland. Lit. (German trans.), ii. 502, etc.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the elder Hemsterhuys, himself by the way not Dutch, but the son of a Frenchman. If Diderot was playfully styled the French Socrates, the younger Hemsterhuys won from his friends the name of the Dutch Plato. The Hollanders pointed to this meditative figure, to his great attainments in the knowledge of ancient literature and art, to his mellowed philosophizing, to his gracious and well-bred style, as a proof that their country was capable of developing both the strength and the sensibility of human nature to their highest point.* And he has a place in the history of modern speculation. As we think of him and Diderot discussing, we feel ourselves to be placed at a point that seems to command the diverging streams and eddying currents of the time. In this pair, two great tides of thought meet for a moment, and then flow on in their deep appointed courses. For Hemsterhuys, born a Platonist to the core, became a leader of the reaction against the French philosophy of illumination — of sensation, of experience, of the verifiable. He contributed a marked current to the mysticism and pietism which crept over Germany before the French Revolution, and to that religious philosophy which became a point of patriotic honor both in Germany and at the Russian court, after the revolutionary war had seemed to identify the rival philosophy of the encyclopædists with the victorious fury of the national enemy. Jacobi, a chief of the mystic tribe, had begun the attack on the French with weapons avowedly borrowed from the sentimentalism of Rousseau, but by-and-by he found in Hemsterhuys more genuinely intellectual arguments for his vindication of feeling and the heart, against the encyclopædist claim for the supremacy of the understanding.

Diderot's hostess at the Hague is a conspicuous figure in the history of the same movement. Prince Galitzin had married the daughter of Frederick's field-marshal, Schmettau. Goethe, who saw her (1797) many years after Diderot was dead, describes her as one of those whom one cannot understand without seeing; as a person not rightly judged unless considered not only in connection, but in conflict, with her time. If she was remarkable to Goethe when fifty years had set their mark upon her, she was even more so to the impetuous Diderot in all the flush and intellectual excitement of her youth. It was to the brilliance and versatility of the Princess Galitzin that her husband's house owed its consideration and its charm. "She is very lively," said Diderot, "very gay, very intelligent; more than young enough, instructed and full of talents; she has read; she knows several languages, as Germans usually do; she plays on the clavecin, and sings like an angel; she is full of expressions that are at once ingenuous and piquant; she is exceedingly kindhearted." But he could not persuade her to take his philosophy on trust. Diderot is said, by the princess's biographer, to have been a fervid proselytizer, eager to make people believe "his poems about eternally revolving atoms, through whose accidental encounter the present ordering of the world was developed." The princess met his brilliant eloquence with a demand for proof. Her ever-repeated Why? and How? are said to have shown "the hero of atheism his complete emptiness and weakness."* In the long run Diderot was entirely routed, in favor of the rival philosophy. Hemsterhuys became bound to the princess by the closest friendship, and his letters to her are as striking an illustration as any in literature of the peculiar devotion and admiration which a clever and sympathetic woman may arouse in philosophic minds of a certain calibre, in a Condillac, a Joubert, a D'Alembert, a Mill. Though Hemsterhuys himself never advanced from a philosophy of religion to the active region of dogmatic professions, his disciple could not find contentment on his austere heights. In the very year of Diderot's death (1784) the Princess Galitzin became a Catholic, and her son became not only a Catholic, but a zealous missionary of the faith in America.

But this was not yet. In September (1774) Diderot set his face homewards. "I shall gain my fireside," he wrote on the eve of his journey, "never to quit it again for the rest of my life. The time that we count by the year has gone, and the time that we must count by the day comes in its stead. The less one's income, the more important to use it well. I have perhaps half a score of years at the bottom of my wallet. In these ten years, fluxions, rheumatisms, and the other members of that troublesome family will take two or three of them; let us try to economize the seven that are left, for the repose and the small happiness that a man may promise himself on the wrong side of sixty." The guess was a good one. Diderot

* Forster, ii. 398.

* Dr. Katerkamp's Denkwürdigkeiten aus dem Leben der Fürstinn Amalie von Galitzin, p. 45.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

lived ten years more, and although his own work in the world was done, they were years of great moment both to France and the world. They witnessed the establishment of a republic in the American colonies, and they witnessed the final stage in the decay of the old monarchy in France. Turgot had been made controller-general in the months before Diderot's return, and Turgot's ministry was the last serious experiment in the direction of orderly reform. The crash that followed resounded almost as loudly at St. Petersburg and in Holland as in France itself, and Catherine in 1792 ordered all the busts of Voltaire that had adorned the saloons and corridors of her palace to be removed into the cellars. EDITOR.

WITHIN THE PRECINCTS.

BY MRS. OLIPHANT.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE SIGNOR'S HOUSEHOLD.

THE Despard family became a great centre of interest to many people both within and without the Abbey precincts at this period of their history. Without any doing, so to speak, of theirs, fate mixed them up both with the great and the small, so that their proceedings moved a great many circles of thought and feeling beyond that in which they themselves stood. We have said without any doing of theirs — but this, perhaps, is true only in respect to Lottie, who took no steps consciously to produce the rapprochement which had taken place so strangely between the heaven of the Deanery and the earth of the lodges. She had not done anything to recommend herself to Lady Caroline or Lady Caroline's nephew. And yet with both she had become an important "factor," to use a fashionable term, in the immediate concerns of life. The captain was not so innocent of purpose in the commotion he had begun to make. But still he had not calculated upon the interest that would be excited by his proceedings. The community at St. Michael's was quiet and had little to rouse its interest. Sometimes a canon would be translated to a higher and a better stall — sometimes an old chevalier would die and be replaced by another veteran not much less old than he — sometimes a son would "go wrong," and create a great deal of whispered communication and shaking of heads. At the present time there were no daughters to marry except Lottie, so that the pleasanter strain of possibility was little thought of. All this made it very inspiring, very agitating to the dwellers round the Abbey, when a family within the precincts gave them so much to think about. A girl likely to make a very good match in a romantic way; a man likely to make a very bad one, in a way which might have been quite as romantic had it not been on the wrong side, such as would debase, not exalt his class: these two probabilities coming together had a great effect upon the popular mind. In the chevaliers' lodges there was very little else talked about. Captain Temple, the most respected of all the chevaliers, could not keep still, so excited was he. He had spoken to "the father," he told his wife, to put him on his guard, and to show him how necessary it was to take proper care of his child. That was all he could do, but he would not content himself with doing what he could. He paced about his little sitting-room, disturbing Mrs. Temple at her wool-work. She was not like her husband. She was a still, composed, almost stern woman, with a passionate heart, to which she gave very little expression. She could not talk of her daughter as Captain Temple could. The remembrance of the years during which her child was separated from her was terrible to her. When her husband talked as he was accustomed to do of this great grief of theirs, she never stopped him, but she herself was dumb. She closed all her windows, as it were, and retired into a fortress of silent anguish, out of which no cry came; but she listened to him all the same. This was what she did now, though it pained her to hear of this other girl who stood between life and death, between good and evil, as once her child had stood. She would have helped Lottie with all her heart, but she could not bear to hear her talked of — though this was precisely what she had to bear.

"I told him it was his duty to look after his daughter," said Captain Temple, pacing — three steps one way, four the other — about the room. "But he won't — you see he won't. A beautiful girl, far too good for him, a girl who deserves a better fate. She puts me in mind of our own dear girl, Lucy. I have told you so before."

To this Mrs. Temple made no reply. He had told her so a great many times before. She selected a new shade of her

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Berlin wool, and set her elbow rigidly against the arm of her chair, that she might thread her needle without trembling, but she made no reply.

"She puts me constantly in mind of her. The way she holds her head, and her walk, and —— I beg your pardon, my dear. I know you don't like this kind of talk; but if you knew how I seem to see her wherever I go — wherever I go! I wonder if she is permitted to come and walk by her old father's side, God bless her. Ah! Well, it was Despard's daughter we were talking of. To think he should have this girl who takes no care of her, and we to whom ours was everything ——"

The poor woman made a spasmodic movement, and turned her eyes upon him dumbly. She could not bear it. The needle fell out of her hands, and she stooped to hunt for it on the carpet. She would not stop him to whom it was so great a relief to talk; but it was death to her.

"But I told him," said Captain Temple. "I showed him his duty, Lucy. I told him he ought to be thankful he had such a daughter to watch over. And what more could I do? I set the whole thing before him. There was nothing more that I could do."

"Then you must be satisfied, William, and perhaps it will have some effect; we must wait and see," said Mrs. Temple, coming to the surface again with her needle, which she had found, in her hand. She managed to get it threaded this time with great exertion, while her husband set off again upon his restricted promenade, shaking his white head. Captain Temple, it may be recollected, had not said so much to Captain Despard as he thought he had said; but if he had said everything that man could say it is not probable that it would have made much difference. The kind old chevalier shook his white head. His eyes were full of moisture and his heart of tenderness. He did not feel willing to wait and see as his wife suggested. He wanted to do something there and then for Lottie, to go to her and warn her, to keep watch at her door, and prevent the entrance of the wolf — anything, he did not mind what it was so long as he could secure her safety.

The other subject was discussed that same evening in another and very different scene, when Mrs. Purcell, the signor's housekeeper, asked her old fellow-servant, Pickering, what news there was in the precincts, and if anything was stirring. It was the most delicious moment for a gossip, when tea was over in the kitchen, and dinner up-stairs, and the twilight was beginning to drop over the country, bringing quiet and coolness after the blaze of the day. Mrs. Purcell sat by the open window, which was cut in the very boundary wall of the Abbey precincts, as in the side of a precipice. It was not safe for any one of uncertain nerves to look straight down upon the slope of St. Michael's Hill, on which the walls were founded, and on the steep street winding below. But Mrs. Purcell had her nerves in the most steady and well-regulated condition. She was not afraid to sit at the head of the precipice, and even to look out and look down when the shop-windows began to be lighted. She liked to see the lights coming out below. It was cheerful and felt like "company" when she sat alone. Old Pickering had just come in after an errand into the town. He was the manservant while she was the housekeeper, but the work of the establishment was chiefly done by a sturdy young woman who was under the orders of both.

"News — I don't know much about news," said old Pick. "It wants young folks to make news; and there ain't many of that sort about here."

"Dear!" said Mrs. Purcell (but it must not be supposed that this exclamation meant any special expression of affection to old Pickering). "There's heaps of young folks! There's the signor, and there's my John ——"

"Master? you may call him young, if it don't go again your conscience — my notion is as he never was no younger than he is now. So you may put what name to it you please. But you don't ask me for news of master, nor Mr. John neither. Him, oh, ah, there'll be news of him one of these days. He'll get a cathedral, or he'll be had up to London. We'll see him, with his baton in his hand, afore the biggest chorus as can be got together; and won't he lead 'em grand!" said old Pick. "When he was but a little thing in his white surplice I seen it in his eye."

"You were always one that did my John justice," said the housekeeper warmly. "Just to think of it, Pick — one day a bit of a mite in his surplice, and the next, as you may say, with his baton, leading the chief in the land! We bring children into the world, but we can't tell what's to come of them," she added, with pious melancholy. "Them as is fortunate shouldn't be proud. The young men as I've seen go to the bad since I've been here!"

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

"That should be a real comfort to you," said Pickering, and they paused, both, to take full advantage of this consolation. Then, drawing a long breath, Mrs. Purcell resumed,—

"And so it should, Pick — when I see my boy that respectable, and as good as any gentleman's son, and reflect on what I've seen! But pride's not for the like of us — seeing the Lord can bring us low as fast as he's set us up." The good woman dropped her voice, with that curious dread lest envious fate should take her satisfaction amiss, which seems inherent in humanity. As for old Pick, sentiment was not in his way. He took up a little old-fashioned silver salver which stood on the table with some notes upon it, waiting the sound of the signor's bell, and began to polish it with his handkerchief. "Them girls," he said, "there's no trust to be put in them. The times I've told her to be careful with my plate. She says she haven't the time, but you and me knows better than that. What is there to do in this house? We gives no trouble, and as for master, he's dining out half his time."

"She'll find the difference," said Mrs. Purcell, "when she's under a lady. There's many a thing I does myself. Instead of calling Mary Anne till I'm hoarse, I takes and does it myself; but a lady will never do that. Ah, Pick, it's experience as teaches. They don't put any faith in what we tell them; and her head full of soldiers, and I don't know what — as if a soldier ever brought anything but harm to a servant girl."

"They are all alike," said old Pick. "There's them Despards in the lodges — all the Abbey's talking of them. The captain — you know the captain? the one as sings out as if it all belonged to him — though he's neither tenor, nor alto, nor bass, but a kind of a jumble, and as often as not sings the air!" said the old chorister, with contempt which was beyond words. Mrs. Purcell looked upon the captain from another point of view.

"He's a fine handsome man," she said. "He looks like a lord when he comes marching up the aisle, not an old Methusaleh, like most of 'em."

"Ah!" cried Pickering, with a groan, "that's the way the women are led away. He's a fine fellow, he is! oh yes, he's like a lord, with bills in every shop in the town, and not a penny to pay 'em."

"Them shops!" said Mrs. Purcell. "I don't wonder if a gentleman's of a yielding disposition. They offer you this, and they offer you that, and won't take an answer. It's their own fault. They didn't ought to put their temptations in folk's way. It's like dodging a bait about a poor fish's nose; and then swearing it'll make up lovely, and be far more becoming than what you've got on. I think it's scandalous for my part. They deserve to lose their money now and again."

"They say he's going to be married," said old Pick stolidly.

"Married! You're dreaming, Pick! Lord bless us," said Mrs. Purcell, "that's news, that is! Married? I don't believe a word of it; at his age!"

"You said just now he wasn't a Methusaleh, and no more he is; he's a fine handsome man. He thinks a deal of himsel, and that's what makes other folks think a deal of him. The women's as bad as the shops," said old Pick, "they bring it on themselves. Here's a man as is never out of mischief. I've seen him regularly coming home — well — none the better for his liquor; and gamblin' day and night, playing billiards, betting, I don't know what. We all know what that comes to; and a grown-up family besides —— "

"Dear!" said Mrs. Purcell, in great concern. She knew a good deal about Miss Despard, and her feelings were very mingled in respect to her. In the first place, to know that her John was in love with a lady flattered and excited her, and had made her very curious about Lottie, every detail of whose looks, and appearance generally, she had studied. A chevalier's daughter might not be of very elevated rank; but it was a wonderful rise in the world for Mrs. Purcell's son to be able to permit himself to fall in love with such a person. On the other hand, Miss Despard was poor, and might interfere with John's chance of rising in the world. But anyhow, everything about her was deeply interesting to John's mother. She paused to think what effect such a change would have upon her son, before she asked any further questions. What would Miss Despard do? It was not likely she would care for a stepmother after being used to be mistress of the house — would she be ready to accept any one that asked her, in order to get "a home of her own"? And would John insist upon marrying her? and would he be able to keep a wife? These questions all rushed through Mrs. Purcell's mind on receipt of this startling news. "Dear! dear!" she said — and for a long time it was all she could say. The interests were so mixed that she did not know what to desire. Now or never, perhaps, was the time for John to secure the wife he want-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ed; but even with that justification, would it be right for him to marry? Mrs. Purcell did not know what to think. "Did you hear who the lady was?" she asked, in a faint voice.

"Lady! — no lady at all, a girl that works for her living. I know her well enough by sight. One of the dressmaker's girls in the River Lane. Ladies is silly enough, but not so silly as that; though I don't know neither," said old Pick. "What women-folks will do for a husband is wonderful. They'll face the world for a husband. It don't matter what sort he is, nor if he's worth having ——"

"They haven't took that trouble for you, anyhow," said Mrs. Purcell faintly, standing up amid her preoccupations for her own side.

"I've never given 'em the chance," said Pick, with a chuckle. "Lord bless you! they've tried a plenty, but I've never given 'em the chance. Many's the story I could tell you. They've done their best, poor things. Some has been that enterprising, I never was safe in the same room with 'em. But I've kep single, and I'll keep single till my dying day. So will master, if I can judge. There's some has the way of it, and some hasn't. It would be a clever one," said old Pickering, caressing his chin with an astute smile, "to get the better of me."

The housekeeper threw at him a glance of mingled indignation and derision. She gave her head a toss. It was not possible for feminine flesh and blood to hear this unmoved. "You're so tempting," she said, with angry energy. "'Andsome and well to do, and worth a woman's while."

"Bless you, they don't stick at that," said the old man, with a grin. "I could tell you of things as has happened — some to myself — some to other folks —— "

"Dear!" cried Mrs. Purcell, "and me to think you were an old stick of an old bachelor, because nobody would have you, Pick! There's some, as a body reads it in their face, as dry as an east wind, and cutting like an east wind does, that is never happy but when it's blighting up somebody. I daresay it's all a story about Captain Despard — just like the rest."

"None of you likes it," said old Pick, chuckling to himself. "Some pretends just to please a man; but women does hang together, whoever says different, and they none of them likes to hear the truth. About Captain Despard, it's a story if you please, but it's true. The girl she talks quite free, and tells everybody as she'll soon make a difference in the house. She'll pack off the son to do for himself, and the daughter ——"

"What of the daughter, Pick? Oh, the shameless hussy, to talk like that of a poor, motherless young girl —— "

"If she wasn't motherless, what would Polly have to do with her? It can't be expected as a second wife should cry her eyes out because the first's gone."

"Polly!" said Mrs. Purcell, with bated breath; "and she says she'll pack the son about his business; and the daughter — what is she going to do about the daughter, when she's got the poor misfortunate man under her thumb? And who's Polly, that you know so much about her? She's a pretty kind of acquaintance, so far as I can see, for a man as considers himself respectable, and comes out of a gentleman's house."

"That's the other side," said Pick, still chuckling to himself. "I said women hangs together. So they do, till you come to speak of one in particular, and then they fly at her. I don't know nothing against Polly. If the captain's in love with her, it ain't her fault; if she wants to better herself, it's no more than you or me would do in her place. She's as respectable as most of the folks I know. To work for your living ain't a disgrace."

"It's no disgrace: but a stepmother that is a dressmaker girl will be something new to Miss Despard. Oh, I can't smile. A dressmaker as —— And young, I suppose, like herself? Oh, trust a man for that! she's sure to be young. Poor thing, poor thing! I'm that sorry for her, I can't tell what to do. A lady, Pick; they may be poor, but I've always heard there was no better gentlefolks anywhere to be found. And a woman that the likes of you calls Polly. Oh, that's enough, that's enough for me! A nice, good, respectable girl, that knows what's her due, you don't call her Polly. Polly — there's a deal in a name."

"Aha!" said old Pick, rubbing his hands, "I knew as soon as I named one in particular what you would say. Fly at her, that's what all you women do. A name is neither here nor there. I've known as good women called Polly as was ever christened Mary; eh? ain't they the same name? I had a sister Polly; I had a ——"

"Dear, dear!" said Mrs. Purcell softly. She was paying no attention to him; her mind was much disturbed. She turned away instinctively from the gathering gloom of evening in which her old companion stood, and cast her anxious eyes upon the wide landscape outside — the sky between grey and blue, the lights beginning to twinkle far down in the steep street. There was something in the great space and opening which seemed to give counsel and support in her perturbation. For she did not know what to do for the best. At such a moment would not John have a better chance than he might ever have? And yet, if he got his heart's desire, was it quite certain that it would be good for John? The signor's housekeeper was just as anxious about her boy as if she had been a great lady. Twinges of maternal jealousy, no doubt, went through her mind. If John married, he would be separated from his mother, and his wife would look down upon her and teach him to despise her — a mother who was in service. What could she expect if her son married a lady? All these thoughts went through her mind as she looked out with anxiety, which drew deep lines upon her forehead. But, on the whole, she was not selfish, and deliberated anxiously, ready to make any sacrifice for that which in the long run would be most good for John.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

In the mean time old Pickering talked on. When he was set a-going it was difficult to bring him to a stop. He was quite aware that at the present moment he ought not to stay there talking; he knew he ought to be lighting the lamps, and kept listening with expectant ear for a sharp tingle of the signor's bell, which should warn him of his retarded duties. But for all that he talked on. Dinner was over for some time, and Pick knew very well that he ought to carry in the notes which he had piled again upon the salver after giving it that polish with his handkerchief. However, though he knew his duty, he took no step towards performing it, but moved leisurely about, and put various articles back into the old polished cupboard with glass doors, which showed all the best china, and was the pride of Mrs. Purcell's heart. When Mary Anne came in, he emptied the salver again and showed her how imperfectly she had cleaned it. "I can't think how folks can be so stupid," Pickering said. "How do you think you are ever to better yourself if you don't take a lesson when it's giv' you? and proud you should be that any one would take the trouble. If I see it like this again I'll — I don't know what I sha'n't do." He knew very well that it was what ought to have been his own work that he was thus criticising, and, as it happened, so did Mary Anne, whose spirit was working up to a determination not to be longer put upon. But for all that he found fault, (always waiting to hear the bell ring sharply, with a quaver of impatience in it), and she submitted, though she was aware that she was being put upon. Mrs. Purcell, in the window, paid no attention to them. She kept gazing out upon the wide world of grey-blue clouds, and asking herself what would be best for John.

They were disturbed in all these occupations by a step which came briskly down-stairs, perhaps betokening, Pickering thought, that the signor was going out again, and that his own delay about the lamps had been a wise instinct. But, after all, it was not the signor's step; it was young Purcell, who came along the little winding passage full of corners, and entered the housekeeper's room, scattering the little party assembled there. Mary Anne fled as a visitor from the outer world flies from the chamber of a servant of the court, at the advent of the queen. Though she would assure herself sometimes that Mr. Purcell's son was "no better nor me," yet in his presence Mary Anne recognized the difference. He was "the young master" even in Pick's eyes, who stopped talking, and put the notes back once more upon the salver with a great air of business, as if in the act of hastening with them to the signor. Mrs. Purcell was the only one who received her son with tranquillity. She turned her eyes upon him quietly, with a smile, with a serene pride which would not have misbecome an empress. No one in the house, not the signor himself, had ascended to such a height of being as the housekeeper; no one else had produced such a son.

"Go and light the candles in the study, Pick," said young Purcell. "The signor is in the dark, and he's composing. Quick and carry him the lights. Don't bother him with those letters now. He is doing something beautiful," he said, turning to his mother. "There's a phrase in it I never heard equalled. He has been sitting out on the terrace getting inspiration. I must run back and keep old Pick from disturbing him, making a noise —— "

"Stay a moment, Johnny, my own dear —— "

"What's the matter, mother? Oh, I know; you've heard of this last offer. But if I take any I'll take St. Ermengilde's, where I could go on living at home, the signor says. It's less money, but so long as I can help him, and see her now and again, and please you —— "

"Ah, John, your mother's last; but that's natural," said Mrs. Purcell, shaking

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

her head, "quite natural. I don't complain. Is it another organ you've got the offer of? Well, to be sure! and there are folks that say merit isn't done justice to! John, I've been hearing something," said the housekeeper, putting out her hand to draw him to her; "something as perhaps you ought to know."

The young man looked at her eagerly. In this place he bore a very different aspect from that under which he had appeared to Lottie. Here it was he who was master of the situation, the centre of a great many hopes and wishes. He looked at her closely in the dusk, which made it hard to see what was in her face. He was a good son, but he was his mother's social superior, and there was a touch of authority even in the kindness of his voice.

"Something I ought to know? I know it already: that Mr. Ridsdale has been visiting at the lodges. That is nothing so extraordinary. If you think a little attention from a fashionable fop will outweigh the devotion of years!" said the young man, with a flush of high-flown feeling. He had a great deal of sentiment and not very much education, and naturally he was high-flown. "People may say what they like," he went on in an agitated voice, "but merit does carry the day. They've offered me St. Ermengilde over the heads of half a dozen. Is it possible, can you suppose, that she should be so blind!"

"That wasn't it," said Mrs. Purcell quietly; "it's something quite different, my dear. Shut the door, that we mayn't have old Pick coming in again (it was he that told me), and you shall hear."

From Fraser's Magazine.

BASQUE CUSTOMS.

THE origin of the Basques has been made the subject of such wild speculations, philological and ethnological, that it is almost necessary to preface any reference to that most interesting people by the assurance that we are not going to prove them to be either Berbers or Phœnicians or Huns, nor even to hazard any opinion on the burning question whether Escuara be an Aryan tongue or no.

The fact which interests us is that in the latter half of the nineteenth century it should be possible to point to a race of pure-blooded villagers following an absolutely unique code of custom on certain points of family organization, while illustrating in other points the working of institutions common to most of the present inhabitants of Europe at a certain period in their development. And this interest is heightened when we find customs fairly on a level with mediæval civilization apparently stretching as far back into barbarism on the one hand as they reach forward into modern life on the other. The code of usage which was fully developed in the thirteenth century retained its vitality within the last decade, while its existence in a more or less rudimentary form is signalized by Strabo, so that the usages themselves have a triple title to consideration, from their singularity, their age, and the light which they may throw upon the vexed questions of origin and affinity already alluded to, for custom is as hard to change as language and as slow to mix as race, so that we may be tolerably sure that no radical diversity of race underlies the identity of customs transmitted through nearly two thousand years.

Of the origin or causes of race distinctions, we know practically nothing: a given family or clan adopts one dialect, one set of customs, and one standard of morality rather than another, much as a public school, a college, a university, or even a particular suburb of London comes to have a certain tone, opinions, and character of its own. The character once formed is perpetuated by tradition; and if we imagine such a spontaneous differentiation to take place between the inhabitants of separate tribes or hamlets, the tradition would be reinforced by all the physical influences of descent. If geographical conditions tend to keep the specialized population distinct even from its nearest kindred whose blood mingles freely with that of other races, the difference will go on increasing till at last the apparent gulf between related families may seem wider than that between independent classes. But every fresh case in which the gulf is spanned by history shows us fresh points of resemblance between the early days of races which are allowed to be ethnologically distinct, and so, without impeaching the reality of ethnological distinctions, deprives them of the semi-mysterious finality sometimes ascribed to them.

The accounts given by classical authors of the barbarian inhabitants of the Iberian peninsula bring before us tribes of about the same degree of promise and intelligence as the Red Indians of the American continent, whom they also resemble in a number of minor traits such as may fairly

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

be held to indicate spiritual affinity where physical connection is out of the question. The earliest written memorials relating to the modern Basques show them to us, say, at about the date of the compilation of the "Senchus Mor," with customs fully settled on a few leading points, and the right of private property by families within the village community fully developed, but with little disposition to legislate on other subjects such as are only brought forward by the growth of individualism and the decay of the communal spirit. And from that time until the present century both the form and spirit of the ancient social organization have continued singularly unchanged; so that for a parallel to the phenomena accessible to the modern tourist at Barège or Cauterêts we must go to the outskirts of the conservative East and study the organization of the "house-communions" of Servia and Dalmatia, or the communal prerogatives of the Russian village.

The Basque customs are generically like, specifically different from those of other European nations, and they have most in common with the usages of those offshoots of the main Aryan trunk which might be called either the oldest or the youngest — young in that they branched off before the parent stem was old enough to bequeath them much ready-made mental furniture of physical predisposition or intellectual aptitude; old in the sense of being nearest to the primitive state out of which the after families grew, as well as in the literal sense of a longer duration for their national existence.

There are hardly materials enough to furnish even those learned in all the materials which there are with a positive and convincing opinion as to the manner in which the successive strata in the population of civilized Europe were deposited. But it is agreed that the stream of immigration continued in the main steadily from east to west, and it is not denied that the later waves of the rising human torrent were of the same elements as the first thin lines that spread themselves irregularly here and there until overtaken by the main body of longer pent-up waters. Thus we think of the Pelasgi as established in Greece before the Hellenes of history, of the Etruscans as older Italians than the Latins, while in Spain the tribes — Keltic, Iberian, or Kelt-Iberian — with which we have to do preceded the Gothic ancestors of the modern political kingdom. In all these cases the earlier inhabitants who were either enslaved, or absorbed, or thrust on one side, appear to have been as far advanced in the arts of peace as their stronger kindred at the date of invasion, but to have been deficient in political genius, so that even their bravery and patriotism were ineffective for want of an organization to concentrate the one and direct the other. But such a people, if it escapes absorption by retreating into mountain fastnesses or uncoveted corners — as the native Irish, the ancient Britons of Wales, Brittany, and the Land's End — may display a wonderful vitality, and become a byword for conservative tenacity in their own old way.

The conservatism of the Basques is connected with a quite unique rule of inheritance, based on the right of primogeniture without distinction of sex, which has been made the subject of an interesting but little-known monograph by M. Eugène Cordier. The various coutumes which he has consulted might almost be described as a commentary, in fifteen centuries, on a single sentence of Strabo. That author says concerning the Cantabri: * "Men give dowries to their wives, and the daughters are left heirs, but they procure wives for their brothers." This meagre statement might easily be set on one side as a traveller's misunderstanding but for the light thrown upon it by the full-grown Basque usage.

To assure the full conservative working of the law of primogeniture, it is not left to itself, but reinforced and regulated by a mass of curious and interesting customs which would be tyrannous and oppressive if they were not the faithful transcript of the conduct spontaneously approved and followed by all sections of the community at once. To realize the social state within which the customs prevail, we have only to turn to the descriptions given by Sir Henry Maine and M. Laveleye of the constitution of village communities in other lands. The village in its collective capacity is the real original proprietor of the land taken into occupation, which is usually divided into arable ground, pasture, and waste or forest. Woods, wastes, and pastures are usually enjoyed in common by the villagers, while the cultivated land is either given up to private ownership or to private occupancy subject to periodical redistribution. Zamacola, the author of a Spanish history of the Basque nations, asserts that collective ownership lasted longer among them than among other peo-

* Basque writers assert this name to be Escuara, from khanta-ber, able singers.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ples, that the land was cultivated in common, and private property at one time unknown. But though this statement is intrinsically credible, it is unfortunately unsupported by any satisfactory reference to authorities; and coming as it does from an uncritical pen, it adds little to the antecedent probabilities. He also alludes to an ancient equal division of the land amongst families, and adds that if two lots were joined by a marriage, they were again to be separated and go to different children or grandchildren. Most village communities seem to have passed through a similar period of transition, in which the village cedes its rights in trust to its component families, on the understanding, however, that the family then becomes responsible for the support of all its own members, and does not attempt to relieve itself at the public expense of the charge of a superfluous residuum.

The peculiar Basque law of inheritance tends to modify the localization, as one may call it, of the usual domestic rights and powers. Paternal, or rather parental, authority is at a discount in these communities, a fact which we may connect, if we please, with the statement of Silius Italicus that among the Cantabri the old men were wont to commit suicide by throwing themselves from a rock. "Los senhors et dames juens," as the coutume of Navarre calls them, are the favorites of the law. There is an equal partnership in the enjoyment and control of the family property between the parents and the married heir (or heiress), younger children and parents being virtually sacrificed to the young couple of the moment,* though these again have to be prepared, when their own first-born comes of age and marries, to subdivide the inheritance again, so that it is by no means unheard of for the same ménage to have several masters and mistresses of different generations and equal rights living amicably within it at the same time.

Whether this has been the case or not, on the death of the nominal proprietor, the first-born child, son or daughter, inherits all the family property, subject to a small charge for the legal dowry of the younger children. The heir (or heiress) is master, and the younger children are called esclaus and esclabes, and are, in fact as well as name, the born servants of the household; they have a right to shelter, etc., in the family house, but they are liable to be called to account to their elders for their private earnings, if these exceed the amount of the légitime (which meanwhile remains in the elder's hands as an equivalent for the charge of their maintenance), unless they leave the family with the consent of its head, taking their portion once for all, or are emancipated by the parent's will from the strict application of the general principle. But the most characteristic feature of Basque society is the provision which it makes for the élite of those younger children who neither abide in the family mansion nor go to seek their fortune abroad. On marriage, the first-born, heiress or heir, becomes "co-seigneur," and is entitled at once to half the patrimony. Persons civilly or physically incapacitated for marriage are excluded from the family inheritance. Every head of a household marries, if not in the parent's lifetime, in any case shortly after succession, and — what is essential to the maintenance of the whole economy of the villages — every head of a household marries the younger child of some other family. This cadet, or cadette, who takes the name of the heir, is called gendre or bru, and comes to live in the family mansion, naturally in a somewhat subordinate position, all his or her earnings going to the benefit of the family, to which the children are also attached. Sometimes a cadet retains his own name, but the children always take that of the mother if she is an heiress. A French writer of the seventeenth century notices this peculiarity, but without understanding it, observing that the poorest villagers call themselves lords and ladies of such a cottage, or even pigstye, while they give up their proper name, "and even the wife that of her husband," to take the name of the house.

The customs of Barège and Lavedan were commented on at length by one Noguès, an advocate of Toulouse, in 1760, who apologizes for their singularity, which he thinks is likely to excite a "movement of indignation," by pointing out that they serve better than any other more orthodox arrangement the supreme end "of keeping the property in the family." And the working of the code certainly illustrates better than any argument the fundamental natural impossibility of giving a separate class interest to the sexes, as feudal legislators vainly dreamt of doing. All that can be achieved is to secure the usufruct of about half the whole number of feudal estates to one set of heirs male

* In the little republic of Andorre poor households have but two sleeping-rooms, one for the master and mistress, and one for the rest of the family; and we are told that when the heir marries, the old father vacates the separate apartment and takes his place in the common chamber with the rest.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

instead of to another, and that of the other half to heirs male instead of to heirs female, still to the detriment of another generation of males. Thus if A's second child, a son, B, succeed him to the prejudice of the eldest child, a daughter, C, C's son D is injured, and if B has only daughters, a distant connection profits to the detriment of their sons, B's grandsons, or the great-grandsons of A, who perhaps made the entail from a disinterested desire to "keep up the family." This ambition may not perhaps be very exalted, but it was strong among the Basques, who were allowed by their traditions to keep two strings to the family bow, in consequence of which we meet with such cases (said not to be by any means exceptional) as that of a family in Andorre, which has kept its name and its property without increase or diminution for between seven and eight hundred years. Twice in the time its maintenance has depended on the life of a sole heiress, so that it must have become extinct under the common mediæval rule.

An additional security against the extinction of families is offered by the rule compelling the householder to marry from (we cannot say "into") a family possessing at least two children. Of course the rule is only of customary obligation, but the case is quoted of a marriage between heir and heiress, neither of whom would consent to leave their own ancestral abode, and while such was the prevailing feeling, shared as all durable social sentiments must be, by both sexes, it was clearly needless to make marriages of the kind penal. In the case of a romantic attachment, the matter would probably be arranged by a family compact, the less wealthy of the two parties ceding their inheritance to the next of kin, and receiving a portion instead. Even where the Basque custom has long ceased to prevail, we find traces of its past force surviving; and at St. Jean Pied de Port a writer, who was not on the lookout for such indications, mentions the existence of a superstitious belief that marriages between heir and heiress are unlucky. In fact, what Professor Huxley has said of the Basque language may be applied without qualification to their customs, "the area of which has gradually diminished without any corresponding extirpation of the people which primitively spoke [or followed] it. So that the people of Spain and Aquitaine at the present day must be largely Euskarian by descent in just the same sense as the Cornish men are 'Celtic' by descent." The area of the peculiar dialect and of the peculiar custom has kept on narrowing; but however far afield we may find traces of either one or other, there we may safely conclude that men have once passed akin to the ancestors of the half-million who have been faithful to all the traditions of their race.

As each commune, town, or village, in the Basque confederacy was autonomous, their usages were by no means all alike, and from very early times we trace an antagonism between the cherished national custom of the peasantry and the feudal tastes of the warlike nobles settled within their boundaries. The antagonism was not exactly between noble and plebeian, because every Basque, like every Highlander, is well-born; all the pasteres are free citizens, and every free citizen (or rather countryman) is ipso facto noble; instead of quarters of nobility, it is only necessary to prove four generations of Basque ancestry, so that if La Soule and Lower Navarre enjoyed the same privileges, the settler from one district had only to give proof of nationality to be received as a native in the other. The date at which the different coutumes were reduced to writing gives no clue to the purity of the usage they sanction. Some of those of the Pays de Lavedan, which are as free as any from feudal corruption, were not written till 1704, while the for of the Valley of Azun, in the same district, from which we take the prime article of Basque faith, "Que prumer filh o filha deu heretar," was drawn up in 1306, and confirmed in 1497. The customs of Barège, conceived throughout in the same spirit, were proclaimed and written in 1670, after debate in the communes, as having been followed, authorized, and approved for four hundred years since the destruction or loss of the coutumier by fire or war. The custom of Bayonne was revised and written in 1514; the fuero de Viscaya (which has some kindred features) is dated 1526. In the barony of Saubusses (the land of the Sibutzates, mentioned by Cæsar as having sent hostages to Crassus after his second victory in Aquitaine) and other parishes it was decreed in 1514, with the consent of the inhabitants, that the old custom should be abolished, and the eldest son succeed in future, and the eldest daughter only in default of sons. In the republic of Andorre this was the rule, but the same usage as elsewhere prevailed with regard to the marriage of heiresses. Various local customs are quoted from Aquitaine: in the coutume of Acs, north of the Basque

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

country, the rule of succession is complicated by three principles, seniority without distinction of sex, equal division amongst all the children of acquêts or disposable goods, equal division among the children of different marriages in sets with distinction of age in each; some, supposing children by two marriages, failing sons by the first, gave the inheritance to the eldest daughter, excluding her own sisters and half-brothers; this applied only to nobles, as did a curious system of collateral succession in Navarre, of brothers to brothers and sisters to sisters in order of seniority, the eldest of the opposite sex coming after the youngest of the same. The coutume of Soule names a number of noble families in which the rural usage was followed, while in the town of Lourdes there was one street (only) in which the feudal rule prevailed. But in 1552 under Henry II. of Navarre, it was proclaimed that in Béarn "noblesse ne se divise entre frères et sœurs," and that rural properties were to follow the same rule, saving the right of eldest daughters already married in their parents' house, a proviso which shows the Barège custom to have prevailed before. Still earlier, in 1205, we find John, king of England, conceding to the Bordelais the "privilege" of excluding married and dowered daughters from succeeding with their brothers, and that of depriving their wives of the half share, previously secured to them, in the acquisitions or additions made to the family fortune after their marriage, a provision confirmed by Philip IV. in 1295. But the triumphs of feudalism were mostly confined to the outskirts of the pure Basque districts.

The success of the resistance offered by the peasants to what they call the "bad customs" of feudalism gives us some measure of the tenacity of the truly national usage, especially if we contrast it with the gradual substitution of the rule of primogeniture for the equal succession of the children among the Odallers of Orkney, by the intrusion of Scotch lawyers, whose persistent attempts to feudalize the islands in the sixteenth century were almost entirely successful in suppressing what seems to have been a very sane and suitable local custom. But we may also estimate the closeness of the struggle, even when it was successful, by the fact that the droit de seigneur existed almost within sight of the liberties of Lavedan and Barège. In fact, it was really to their affection for their customs that the Basques were indebted for their escape from the clutch of a miniature Visconti, Eccelino, or Della Scala. The ancient record of the customs of Béarn, for example, begins by relating for the instruction of kings how in ancient times there was no lord in Béarn, but the people heard great praises of a certain knight of Bigorre, so they sent to seek him, and made him lord for one year, but he would not keep the fors and customs, so the court of Béarn assembled at Pau and required him solemnly to do so, and he would not, and they slew him before the court. Then the fame of a worthy knight of Auvergne reached them, and they made him lord for two years, but he also waxed proud and would not observe the fors and customs, and he was slain by order of the court "at the edge of the bridge of Saranh, by a squire who struck him such a blow with a pike that the point passed out at his back, and this lord's name was Sentonge." It was in the name of their ancient liberties that the Basques on the French side of the frontier successfully resisted the imposition of the gabelle under Louis XIV.; and the smuggling which has been a favorite and honorable occupation in the mountains since the imposition of duties on tobacco, etc., at the end of last century, is regarded not as a breach of rightful law, but as a lawful assertion of the immemorial rights of the frontier tribes to do what trade they can.

Household suffrage is the rule in these communities, and, except in the politically independent state of Andorre, this right seems to have been exercised, with the corresponding proprietary privileges, without distinction of sex. Thus in the ancient town of Cauterêts in 1316, when the inhabitants met to consult whether they should accept certain lands from the monastery of Saint Savin, subject to some feudal rights, we read that all the inhabitants male and female (besis et besies *) "tous présents et consentants de leur bon gré, ont dit et déclaré, ensemble et individuellement, qu'ils reconnaissent leur dépendance du monastère de Saint Savin. Tous l'ont dit, à l'exception de Gualhardine de Fréchon, une femme qui protesta." We are told that the names of the women are different from those of the men, so that it is clear that they voted as householders; and in fact, considering the nature of the questions habitually brought before the communal government, the maintenance of roads, use of pastures, etc., it would have

* Voisins et voisines, the exact equivalent of the German Nachbar.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

been impossible to exclude heiresses from a voice in the decision of questions in which their material interests were so much involved. Nearly five centuries later we meet with a well-meant but rather clumsy recognition of the customary claim of women to the franchise, by a representative of the revolutionary government. In virtue of the law of June 10, 1793, a delegate of the National Government invited the inhabitants of the Valley of Azun to vote on a question relating to the division of the communal land. The meeting was stormy, and the men refused their consent to the division; and the agent observing that the women had not voted, summoned them to a separate discussion, after which fifty-six voted for and forty-five against the measure, a division list which may perhaps tend to reassure those politicians whose dread of the political "emancipation" of women is inspired by the belief that the sex will vote uniformly all together — and all wrong — upon questions on which all men, or all but a very few, are prepared to vote right.

When magistracies were attached to special families, the heiress might be represented by a son or husband; the husband became voisin through his wife, though it was disputed whether he should keep the title after her death, and agreed that he lost it by marrying elsewhere.* In Béarn but not Barège the widowed gendre was allowed to bring a new wife to the house of the first with the consent of the children. Some provisions † seem to show that widows were averse to marrying legally, since a bru in so doing lost the custody of her children; and it is probably in consequence of these various drawbacks and difficulties that public opinion in the provinces became opposed to second marriages of any kind, at least to the extent of visiting them with the penalty of a charivari. In family ceremonies, etc., the heiress takes the front place, but in practice the administration of family affairs out of doors is left to the man, and in general the apparent harshness of the law is modified by the encouragement which it gives to marriages of inclination, since the social superior is necessarily disinterested in his or her choice. Thus Béla, commenting in 1660 on the coutume of Soule, says: "Les dits maris adventices (their technical name) se rencontrent d'ordinaire des hommes recoints et habilités aux affaires . . . femmes vaillantes, provides et ménagères, qui ne font pas moins de leurs parts que les hommes de leur côté." The dowry brought by a cadet on his marriage with an heiress is in all respects on the same footing as the portion given to a younger daughter who marries an heir; the époux dotal was allowed to make whichever child he (or she) pleased, heir; failing a will, the property was equally divided amongst all, and formed the usual provision for juniors, or, if succession was in the male line, for daughters. Failing children or a will, the conjoint héritier succeeded to the conjoint dotal, but not conversely; and the Bayonne custom even included a curious reversal of the condition of tenancy "by the curtesy of England," since, if a living child was born of a marriage, and afterwards died, the mother, as heiress to the child, might succeed to the father's dowry, which, even if he were the survivor, still went ultimately to her heirs, while he, on the contrary, inherited neither way.

These arrangements only applied to the marriages between heirs or householders, and younger brothers or sisters. The marriage contract of two younger children commonly stipulates that all acquisitions after marriage shall be possessed in common, though the two dowries remain distinct in view of eventualities. The contracting parties are called meytadés. The surviving meytadé succeeds his partner as usufructier, with the charge of the children till their marriage or majority. One marriage contract is quoted in which a primée stipulates that if she succeeds to her elder brother, her husband shall be treated as nore (the phrase for a dowered husband in relation to the heiress wife), while otherwise they were to continue meytadés. The portion due from the heir to the younger children was generally determined by a family council, with reference to the available funds, debts, etc. The heir was only bound to dower brothers or sisters who stayed at home and added

* Cf. Mr. Patterson's description (Fortnightly Review, No. 64, N. S.) of the house-communions of the Croat Serbs: "As a woman on marrying became at once a member of the house-communion to which her husband belonged, membership in a house-communion descended only in the male line. There were several instances in which men entered the communion to which their wives belonged. This, however, they did, not in virtue of their marriage, but in consequence of their adoption by the community, which might — in fact often did — happen without any such affinity. Unmarried women belonged, of course, to the house-communion of their fathers, and widows to those of their late husbands. Should a widow, having children, marry again, the children of her former husband remained in the house-communion in which they were born, while she herself passed into that of her second husband. An adopted member took the surname of the house-communion into which he was received."

† Quoique menant une mauvaise vie, la veuve ne peut perdre la jouissance des biens qui doivent retourner à ses enfants.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

their labor to the family stock. If public opinion made any difference, it was in expecting the heir to make more efforts to marry younger sisters than younger brothers; but these had a right to marry if they pleased, and bringing their wife and her dowry into the common stock, might insist on a share in the dwelling. Nevertheless the name for a cadet is esterlo, or sterlo (? sterilis); and strange as a custom of disinterestedness, unenforced by any penal sanctions, may seem to some utilitarian economists, it is a well-authenticated fact that, in the districts following the Basque law, voluntary devotion of the younger children (both sons and daughters) to the interest of the household is the rule rather than the exception. The social order which shall demand no victims has yet to be invented, and the most painful feature recorded of the onc before us is the ingratitude with which such devotion is accepted as a matter of course, and rewarded with neglect and ill-treatment. The position of an aged cadet meeting a Lear-like fate at the hands of nephews and nieces, to whose prosperity his private hopes and independence have been continuously sacrificed, hardly requires the pen of a Balzac or a Tourguenef to heighten its repulsive pathos; but though such cases do occur, we are told, and are glad to believe, that they are exceptional, and that more often an innocent, sentimental communism allows them to feel contentedly identified with the one leading shoot of the family tree.

In spite of the enforced celibacy of unenterprising or self-sacrificing cadets of poor houses, early marriages and large families, which are the general rule, make the pressure of population a chronic danger, the rather that the little nation, wedged in between the powers of France and Spain, has had no possibility of extending its frontiers by war. Accordingly, for centuries the Basques, like the Swiss, have been in the habit of seeking their fortunes abroad. In the seventeenth century their success as whalers gave serious concern to the English and Dutch vessels engaged in the whale fisheries of Greenland and Iceland. At the same date no grand seigneur's household was thought complete without a Basque laquais, warranted to "run like the wind;" and up to the present time the stream of emigration from the Bay of Biscay to South America is nearly as constant as that from Ireland to the United States. Enriched cadets, who are allowed to marry in foreign parts, while their elder is bound to the soil, often return as small nabobs to their native villages; still, like all nations that emigrate without colonizing, the Basques look upon emigration as a necessary evil; and Zumala Carreguy gave to a French tourist as one of the advantages of the Carlist war that it would relieve the valleys for years to come from the need of arranging large schemes of emigration. Before so many openings were available for the surplus population, the claims of younger sons sometimes gave rise to embarrassing litigation. At one time the number of cattle, the peculium of younger sons, grazing on the common lands, alarmed the householders, who imposed an octroi duty on their introduction from the plains of Gascony, where they wintered. In German villages the servant and the children, without an independent hearth, were generally on the same footing, many privileges and offices being closed to the adult, "welcher nit in der gemein ist ess sei knecht oder nachpauer's sohn" (Bauer = Nachbauer = Nachbar); and it would be a knotty question whether primitive Basque law would not have reserved the right of common to heads of families only. A curious case, bearing on this subject, was decided in 1743, after a seventy years' lawsuit, with the recognition as a commune of the hamlet of Arbéost. The pastures of the district had been used, but no settled dwellings were erected till the fifteenth century; the settlers of that date, or rather their descendants, claimed exclusive right to the old common land, even when not actually residing there; while the older communes retorted that they were originally either strangers or esclaus (younger brothers), and in either case could have no right except as tenants.

An interesting and circumstantial account of the practical working of the Basque institutions, down to the last decade, may be found in M. le Play's "Organisation de la Famille." He traces the history, during three generations, of one of the ancient families of Cauterêts, which, after maintaining its dignity unimpaired for four hundred years (since the Wars of the Roses), was in danger of perishing in consequence of the encouragement afforded by the code civile to litigious cadets. The bare genealogy is not without interest, as it is fairly representative of the way in which families of the kind kept up the customary proportion between their numbers and the family property. In 1810, one Pierre Dulmo, an heir, or proprietor, gave his eldest daughter, Dominiquetta, in marriage to Joseph

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Py. Pierre had seven other children, of whom two sons and three daughters were portioned and married outside the household, while a son and a daughter remained single at home. On the death of Dominiquetta, the master and mistress of the household were the widower, Joseph, and his daughter, the heiress, Savina. At one time the household consisted of these two, of the unmarried son and daughter of Pierre, of two unmarried brothers of Savina (another brother and three sisters having been given in marriage outside), Savina's husband, their seven children, and one elderly unmarried male servant. Before this, however, namely in 1835, when Savina's marriage was arranged, her grandfather, Pierre Dulmo (who had just finished paying off the marriage portion of his brothers and sisters), drew up a statement of the family property, in view of the arrangements to be followed on his death. The total capital was estimated at nineteen thousand three hundred and sixty-eight francs; the quarter of which, according to the code, may be disposed of by will, was to go to the heiress, and the community undertook, without proceeding to a division, which would have detracted from the value of the inheritance, to economize yearly as it could, until those of the children who chose to marry had received their legal share. One esterlo, in claiming his portion, stipulated to leave it to his niece, the heiress. In the next year Pierre died, and for twenty-nine years the family continued to regard this deed as a kind of domestic charter of supreme authority. In the next generation dowries of twenty-three hundred and ninety-five francs were being gradually economized and paid off to the younger children as they became entitled to claim them, one dowry coming on an average about every four years, so as to entail an annual charge of between five and six hundred francs, for which the head of the household was responsible.

In 1864 Joseph Py died, and one of the heiress's uncles, a mauvais sujet who had spent his own portion, attacked the act of division of 1834, on the plea of its being an invasion of the code. Savina, the heiress, was condemned, but on her appeal the act of division was ruled to be, as it clearly was, both lawful and equitable, and on a counter-appeal Savina won her cause — at a cost of four thousand francs, which the opposite side had no means of paying. M. le Play draws a moving picture of the terror and bewilderment which the unwonted affliction of a lawsuit excited in the innocent little rustic household, and of the heroic efforts made by Savina in its defence. The case was tried at Lourdes, and for two years she was constantly being summoned to give evidence or information to her counsel, to meet all the allegations of the opposite side, and justify, one by one, every business transaction in which the official heads of the family had engaged for thirty years and upwards. The distance from the farm is about eighteen miles; visitors to Cauterêts know the mountain road, and the diligence spends three or four hours on the way. Savina, however, used to walk the whole distance and back in the same day, starting sometimes in a storm, with snow filling the gorge where the road skirts the torrent-bed, at two or three in the morning, reaching Lourdes at ten, leaving at two or three in the afternoon, and reaching Cauterêts at eleven or midnight. The lawsuit was not the only source of the family impoverishment; its members were reduced by death and other mischances, and in a moment of discouragement, after the court of cassation had pronounced in favor of the family, but before they knew of the decision, Savina's only son Joseph, aged twenty-two, engaged himself as a substitute for two thousand francs, part of which he made over to his mother. M. Cheysson, who adds these details to M. le Play's account of the domestic economy of the community in its palmy days, says that though the family is impoverished and has lost in consideration by these misfortunes, Savina still maintains authority over her household, but he fears what may be the fate of the four-hundred-year-old house on her death, since it is only by strenuous efforts on the part of the eldest child, supported by complete unity of purpose in the community, that the charge of providing for the younger children can be met without breaking up or encumbering the inheritance. The privilege of the heir is thus almost limited to the discharge of an arduous duty, and unless some official sanction or encouragement is extended to the national custom, it is to be feared that it will succumb to the short-sighted greed of half-enlightened cadets.

Before the introduction of the code which limits the share disposable by will to a quarter of the inheritance, it was usual for the heir to receive half of the whole, and the position of the sterlo is clearly improved by the change which gives him the right of calling for a partition, which he might exercise if treated with harshness or neglect. Accordingly

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

it seems that, at the present day, cadets living at home share the privileges of the householder as to pasturage and the like, and they generally have enough property of their own (commonly bequeathed to the head) to secure respect. These good results might be secured without endangering the national custom, thus cleared of its one reproach. Nevertheless an alarming decrease of the population in the Basque districts is recorded as having taken place within the last few years, and it is accounted for by the emigration of families unwilling to submit to the provisions of the code. Now that France is at length free to consider disinterestedly the good of each component part of the great republic, surely some independent politician might plead with success the cause of this venerable custom. Nothing is needed but for the central authority to recognize as a sufficient compliance with the code, in districts where the local custom prevails, that the légitime of the younger children be paid by degrees, say in triennial instalments, corresponding to the value of the estate. Otherwise the equal partition enforced by the code will soon become an equality in destitution. If, on the other hand, the solidarity of the family will and the family estate is so complete that the family can be induced to spend its whole life in discharging successive obligations to each generation of its members, the struggle for existence does not indeed lose its severity — for farmers with 800*l.* capital — but the struggle is carried on by a united family against soil and seasons, instead of by social stragglers against each other and the community, and if the worst comes to the worst there is always a roof, homespun, and chestnuts to share amongst the undivided group. At any rate we should like the quaint archaic custom to live until society has discovered how to secure for all the "younger sons" of fortune as good a provision out of the pêle-mêle of civilization as Pierre Dulmo was able to make for the sons and grandsons of his posterity out of the ancestral plot.

Their laws and their language are certainly the two most original and interesting posessions of the Escuara people; but the curiosity excited by either of these subjects naturally goes on to include any other traits or peculiarities which may prove to belong to them. And first it is natural to ask whether the rare respect for the proprietary rights of women, in which Strabo saw a token of gynæcocratic barbarism, produces any revolutionary effects on the constitution of families, or whether it is itself the effect of any curious belief or superstition concerning the qualities of the sex. The answer on both points is encouragingly meagre; Basque families are very like those of other villagers, and though the Basque rule of inheritance could only have been accepted by a population in which women were treated with consideration, none of the other recorded signs of such consideration being offered to them by the Iberian tribes, of whom the Basques are the modern representatives, are without a precedent or parallel among Kelts, Tartars, or Red Indians. As among the latter, matrons had a semi-official status when it was desired to open negotiations for peace; and it is at Illiberri (Basque, New Town) that we hear from Plutarch of Hannibal's having employed the Gaulish women to arbitrate between their husbands and his troops. Sallust mentions that it was the business of the Spanish matrons to rehearse the deeds of their ancestors to the young warriors proceeding into battle, and other customs which belong to a more advanced state of society than that of the Indians, yet are such as might have grown out of the like beginnings. The Segobriges, on the Ligurian coast east of the Rhone, had an institution resembling the swayamvara, or free marriage choice allowed to Hindoo maidens of the warrior caste, as appears from the legend, given in Justin, of the foundation of Marseilles, by the captain of a company of Phocians, who applied to the king for leave to build a city on his territory. The king was preparing to marry his daughter Gyptis, "after the custom of that people," to a son-in-law chosen at a solemn feast; the maiden was told to give water to him whom she chose for husband, and overlooking her countrymen, turned to the Greeks and held out water to Protis, who thus became the king's son-in-law, and was presented with ground for his city. Another fragment of Sallust makes the same custom appear general,* and even the extent to which the women and children of the Iberians shared in the patriotic fury of resistance to the Roman conquest, points to a closer identity of feeling throughout the community than is generally met with in patriarchal societies sufficiently advanced to have fixed usages in the matter of dowries.

It is a long step from these fragmentary

* Neque vergines nuptum a parentibus mittebantur, sed ipsæ belli promptissumos delegabant.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

notices to the not less fragmentary indications of mediæval feeling. The charter of Bigorre (A.D. 1097) gives to all women the right of asylum possessed by some monasteries — somewhat as in Ireland a fight was to stop equally for the passing of a woman or a bishop; and a similar turn of thought probably prevailed in dictating the clause in a royal charter of Jacca in Arragon (1128): "Et quod meri nus meus non accipiet coloniam de ullo homine Jacce, nisi per laudamentum de sex mulieribus vicinis Jaccensibus." Another quaint rule of the same (twelfth) century proves, however, that the mood of sentimental reverence was intermittent, both with husbands and legislators, for the right of the husband to beat his wife, as well as other members of the household, is asserted by one text, with the worldly-wise exception — "à moins qu'il ne fut plaignant!"

It may seem strange to find all these tokens of exceptional regard for women associated with two customs commonly regarded as a sign of the social inferiority or degradation of the sex: we mean the couvade, and the separation of the sexes at meals. Both customs are highly archaic, but their presence here, we venture to think, rather goes to prove that their spirit must have been misunderstood by those writers who denounce them as barbarous evidence of the subjection of women. Up to the present time, at any rate, the most conspicuous characteristic of women — as a class — is their sex, and the prominence of any social customs relating to women as such, is a sign that they are recognized as a prominent social fact. Just as when any Alceste makes a parade of misogyny we suspect some Célimène to be at the bottom of his tirades, so we find the rules of savage etiquette most abundant on matters relating to women, where women have most influence, among tribes that approach nearest to what is called gynæcocracy in their manners. At any rate, among the Basques both customs have proved practically compatible with the fullest civil equality, and their survival in the face of such equality is scarcely conceivable if their origin had been irreconcilable with its spirit.

Professor Max Müller has suggested that, in observances of the couvade order, the father of the new-born infant takes to his bed to escape the awful presence of a mother-in-law; and other writers treat the superstition as a serious protest against the imprudence of nature in leaving such an important matter to the care of the feebler sex — that, in fact, as Bartle Massey says, "It had better ha' been left to the men." But the explanation of a foolish bit of ritual is seldom more profound than the ritual, and a comparison of the analogous superstitions on different continents seems to show that, like most savage observances, it is dictated by the association heedlessly established in the savage mind between a desired end and means which look — to the savage — as if they might not unlikely help to produce it. These chains of causation are oftenest quite arbitrary imaginations. Mr. Wallace tells of an Indian who obliged his wife to feed only on cassava bread and fruit, because her eating animal food, pepper, or salt, would disagree with a bird he had given into her care; and by a similar process of reasoning the Abipone father was dieted with much severity in the interest of his unborn children. Some of the Dyaks oblige the new-made father to live for some days on rice and salt, to prevent the baby's stomach from swelling; so amongst the Guaque Indians the husband rests for three months, fasting from some kinds of food before the birth. And we hear of a nomad tribe, in which the father of a son has to stand for three days, without eating, on a stage raised above the trench in which his wife is delivered, in order to bring good luck to the child. The custom according to which the husband lies in bed with the child, while the mother gets up and waits on him, is substantially of the same kind.* Marco Polo, in describing the practice of the Tartars, gives as a motive the intention of the father to take a share in the labors of nursing, but the true explanation is probably to be found in a less articulate, less utilitarian feeling — a composite impression that the father is intimately connected with the life of his offspring, and that somehow or other he ought to contrive to act accordingly.

In the Pyrenees, of course, the custom is now falling into discredit. M. Cordier writes in 1868, as the result of personal inquiries: —

Dans la Navarre on me dit en rougissant, "Oui, cela se pratique, mais dans certaines familles, dans quelques lieux écartés seulement." Dans la Gaule on me renvoyait à l'Espagne, mais quelqu'un me dit: "Il est vrai la nouvelle accouchée se lève et sert son époux, qui se met au lit avec l'enfant; il y

* Besides the ancient notices of this custom in Spain, Diodorus mentions it as existing among the Corsicans, which gives a presumption in favor of an Iberian settlement in that island.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

reste quatre jours et quatre nuits; il en est qui se contentent d'y demeurer quelques heures. On pense que la chaleur du père est de nature à fortifier l'enfant, et si c'est un fils la coutume est encore plus suivie." . . . Quoi qu'il en soit [he concludes] je ne saurais admettre qu'une telle coutume implique nécessairement ou la paresse de l'homme, ou sa brutalité à l'égard de la femme.

And we may be equally sceptical about the other survival of barbarous ceremonial, according to which Basque women do not eat with their husbands. That such a custom is not necessarily regarded as a hardship by the women appears from the fact that the Pitcairn Islanders — descended from English sailors and Tahitian women — were noticed by their visitors to eat apart, a custom which must have been introduced by the women out of disinterested attachment to their native traditions.* In Iceland, also, where the proprietary independence of women was considerable, we find traces of a customary separation of the sexes in the fact that every house had a men's door and a women's door at opposite ends, while the apartments of the two sexes ranged down opposite sides of the principal chamber. In the Basque districts, the separation of the sexes is still observed in markets and public places of amusement; and at Fuentearabbia and other places where the language and laws have long ceased to prevail, men and women still occupy separate aisles in church. Of course, the custom has ceased for ages to have any significance at all; but if an explanation of its origin is insisted on, we must probably go back to the first dawn of ideas of social decorum and morality, when rules of formal etiquette and precepts of rational morality are mixed together in a confusion very perplexing to later ages. It is easier to enforce a sweeping mechanical rule, that can come to be obeyed mechanically, than to trust to the self-restraint and discernment of individuals to keep up the spirit of the conduct clumsily indicated by the rule; and it is exactly in societies where the influence of women is strongest that primitive reformers would first feel the need of some kind of regulations in social intercourse, to which the Basque restriction alone applies. The sexes work together out of doors, neither women nor girls being confined to the house. Travellers are sometimes surprised to see them acting as porters, and loading vessels at the seaport towns, those who do so being, doubtless, most frequently the cadettes of poor families engaged in earning their own marriage portion. A picturesque description is given by M. Chaho * of their working among the mountains at home. Upon narrow ledges of cultivated ground on the side of declivities too steep to allow the plough to reach them, the substitute for ploughing is the skilled use of a large iron fork, called laia; the villagers (of both sexes) stand in a row with one of these forks in each hand, drive it into the ground with force, then, moving in cadence, raise and turn the end with an immense expenditure of strength. M. Chaho convinced himself, with difficulty, that all the laie were of the same size and weight, and adds: "On s'émerveille que des jeunes filles, aux formes élégantes et souvent frêles, puissent soutenir à demi-nues, dans ce pénible exercice, la longueur et le poids du jour." The excellent health of the villagers in general, and the robustness of the women, may be partly owing to the fact that no severe labor is imposed on the children; the very young do no work; and the "school age" extends to twelve or fourteen. Fourteen is the age for the first communion, and a year later that for beginning field work. The customary division of labor between the sexes is singular in some respects; women have nothing to do with dairy work, but the care of the kitchen garden is their especial province, and also that of pigs and poultry. The dowries of sons and daughters are, of course, equal in amount; but, in the same generation, that of the son may be paid partly in sheep, while the daughter's equivalent consists of furniture, linen, and money.

In general there is little apparent difference between life in the Basque villages and among other well-conditioned peasant mountaineers. They are a sober, provident, pleasure loving people, passionate on provocation, but honorable, self-respecting, and faithful in their attachments. There is something almost Hellenic in their serious love of play and athletic sports. Their national game is a kind of tennis, generally played on an open space answering to the village green, while —

* So the legend of Miletus (Herod. i. 146) lays the responsibility of a similar practice upon the women. According to him, the Carian girls, married by force to the Athenian colonists who had slain their fathers and brothers, vowed that no woman should in future sit at meat with her husband, or call him by his name. And the other notices we have of Carian manners show traces of gynæcocracy or feminine independence.

* Voyage en Navarre, p. 282.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

"honi soit qui mal y pense" — the blank wall of the village church serves as a boundary for the balls. The heart of Plato would have rejoiced over the sight of their wrestling matches between boys and girls, in which the latter, we are told, do not always retire vanquished. But dancing, for which their love amounts to passion, is more particularly a masculine relaxation, and several proverbs show that women who dance much in public are held in slight esteem. Births, deaths, and marriages are celebrated with great festivities, and the attendant expenditure was such, in earlier times, as to provoke a good many sumptuary enactments for their discouragement. At funerals the women wail and keep up the same extravagant demonstrations of grief as among the Irish. But there are few really original superstitions or observances on these points; one, at weddings, may be mentioned, that during the ceremony a fold of the bride's dress should rest upon the bridegroom's knees, or else a malicious spell may come between them, and esteca, a fatal antipathy, divide them forever. Like the peasants of Tyrol, the Basques were fond of dramatic entertainments, but the most popular form of them was a kind of amateur dramatic satire, or rather libel — an imaginative reproduction by the ingenious youth of the village of any domestic tragedy or scandal that had occupied the public mind. These were, of course, not written; and, in fact, Basque literature must be described as a disappointment to the admirers of the sturdy, conservative little nation. Their love songs are simple and passionate enough, but as compared with the popular productions of other countries, Sicily, Scotland, Greece, or Arabia, they are wanting in imaginative delicacy and variety. The lover is too much in earnest to play with the accessories of passion, and there is something prosaic, matter-of-fact, in the haste with which the song comes to the point — of the next rendezvous.

Charming and original as the Basque organization was, we cannot claim for it the very highest place among the social experiments tried by the spontaneous ingenuity of mankind. Only, until the more elaborate attempts of a higher civilization have succeeded as well in proportion, we may admit the practical merits of the system which, while left to itself, kept vice and misery, as well as the arts and sciences, in a "stationary state."

E. S.

From The Spectator.

PICTURES AND DRESS.

"PRIVATE-VIEW week is the best time for seeing the fashions," said a lady, a little while ago, in the hearing of the present writer, who thought there was a good deal of truth in the remark, and that it could be no harm for the "horrid male creature," in the intervals of observing the novelties in art upon the walls of the picture-galleries which have been opened this week, to observe the novelties of fashion within them. It is not, indeed, given to men to remember the fashions of last spring, nor to any except men-milliners to forecast those of next, but there is an advantage in this disability; the present is all the more amusing, even delightfully bewildering. It is a mistake to accompany a lady on these occasions; accurate information is disturbing, and self-esteem is wounded by the gentle ridicule with which an outsider's guesses are met who has not courage honestly to confess to the all-comprehensive ignorance that would be a sure passport to the sweetest indulgence. The temptation to seem to know just a little bit about everything is too strong for most men, and in a lady's company one will be sure to talk of a "Gainsborough" hat or a "Watteau" sacque, when those lovely things have been "quite ages" gone by, and to be impressed by the taste and originality of the wrong costumes, — "wrong" meaning those which are not in unison with the artistic persuasion of one's fair companion. The mere instinct of self-preservation would make us ascertain whether our guide held by Morris or Burne Jones, made her arrangements in obedience to Mr. Whistler's dictates, tried on, or rather off, the oldest things in Greek costume, or was a devotee of those "sweet, sad" harmonies in sea and sage greens that recall equally Robespierre and roast goose. Even then, however, one would not be quite safe; there are fine distinctions in these things, nuances as subtle as the Bismarck en colère and Paris brûlé of nearly a decade ago, and a reckless condemnation of bleu fumé, or preference of clair de lune over arc-en-ciel in bead trimmings might be as dangerous as an imputation of any of the virtues to Count Schouvaloff at a Tory dinner-party.

Profound ignorance is, then, the happiest state of mind, and solitude is the most favorable condition for observing the clothes of the period, as displayed at private views, where one may see the best and the worst dressed women in the

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

world, and contemplate them with the serene satisfaction of a member of that sex whose costume has never been, since the woad and sheepskin period, so simple, so ugly, or characterized by such complete extinction of individuality as it is at present. With what a happy conviction that at least he is not ridiculous, may the male biped mingle with the crowd, his unpresuming clothing serving as a foil to the richness, the variety, and the eccentricities of the dresses which swish, and rustle, and trail all around him, in a frou-frou accompaniment to the old refrain of "That's the way the money goes!" Trying, after awhile, to systematize his impressions, he notices that the general snippettiness is less than he has formerly observed it to be; and he is glad, because he has previously bethought himself in a humble way that the best use to which rich silk, sheeny satin, soft woollen stuffs, and majestic velvet can be put is not the cutting of them up into small pieces, and the sewing of those small pieces together in huddled masses, to the total destruction of the idea of lines and drapery. This irritating peculiarity of recent costume is replaced, he perceives, by sweeping lines and curves, by simplicity allied with richness, and a sensible abatement — for which mankind cannot be too grateful, in the interest of feminine gracefulness and of common sense — of the detestable fashion of "tying back." The fair beings who inspect the pictures "on the line" (frequently with the audible comment of "How awful!") do not hop, or stumble, or struggle in the swathing-bands of their one garment, with knees threatening to protrude, and maimed feet hobbling in imitation of the "Tottering Lily of Fascination," as they hopped and stumbled last year; their skirts fall decently and softly around them, and unless the "horrid male creature" be more than commonly idiotic, there are surely in a few instances symptoms of crinoline,— real crinoline, not wire, not the bird-cage or balloon of John Leech's palmy days, but the finely modulating horsehair of the far past, which lifted the heavy folds of the gown, and left the movements of the wearer free. Some of the portraits on the walls of the galleries have their gowns (or "frocks," as it is the correct thing, our granddaughters tell us, to say this season) tied back to what in real life and any earthly vesture, must certainly be the crack of doom; and they seem quite old-fashioned, after one has been looking for a while at the living pictures.

The hard and brazen style has almost disappeared, and it is replaced, for the most part, by the soft, the timid, the appealing. One does see monstrosities in tight black satin, with arrangements in crimson and yellow upon them (upon inquiry of good-natured female friends, one learns that these horrors are called "pipings") which resemble costume advertisements of court plaster; and very terrible specimens of blue-and-green embroidery of unsurpassable sickliness, do overcome us, to our especial wonder; but these are passing afflictions. On the whole, dress at the private views last week was a thing of beauty, and in most instances, doubtless, a joy, for a week or two, to its possessors. Richness of material, combined with simplicity of form, invariably recommends itself to the inarticulate half of humanity (on the subject of dress); and there it was, "in perfect heaps," like the good sense of Mrs. Toots; in purple velvet pelisse-like gowns, fitting without a crease, and fastened with plain buttons, worn with white "baby" bonnets, quite bewitching in form and expression; in dead-leaf satin, in dull black silk, with folds which even Mr. Millais would have to study before he could paint them; in grey cashmere and camels'-hair and homespun, so trim and dainty, with the accoutrements of hanging pouch and precise three-cornered pelerine, that two-thirds of each assembly might have been costumed by Mr. Mulready to help the future Mrs. Primrose in the choosing of her wedding gown, or on their way to visit Miss Austen's county families in Northamptonshire. It is evidently no longer the fashion for young girls to look saucy, and in none of the typical assemblages of last week was the affectation of mannishness that has recently grieved the middle-aged masculine breast, perceptible. There were plenty of other affectations, but not that, — and any other kind is better. There was, for instance, the good, old-fashioned affectation which was in Dickens's mind when he described Miss Snevellicci "glancing up at Nicholas Nickleby from the depth of her coal-scuttle bonnet," but none of the new, which would have led the young lady to stare at an admirer from under the brim of her "Jerry" hat, with her hands in the pockets of her ulster. If this revulsion should continue and spread, we need not despair of our girls arriving at the singing of Balfe's ballads, the quoting of Haynes Bayley and Barry Cornwall, the playing of the Duc de Reichstadt's waltz, and the reading of Sir Walter

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Scott; and so that the swing of the pendulum stops short of the wearing of broad-sandalled shoes and screaming at spiders, we shall not desire to arrest it. Clothes are indications of taste in other things than dress only, and women are always more or less "in character" with their garments. There is something wholesome in the "distinctly English" style of the day — it is not also distinctly hideous, as it was some years ago when fashionable London rebelled temporarily against the legislation of Paris — although we are told it is "frightfully expensive;" that the modest little tippets cost as much as our grandmothers' gowns, a quite too lovely baby bonnet is about as dear as a grown-up coat by an eminent artist; and the soft and graceful fringes with just a touch of mother-of-pearl or the least dash of gold in them, mount up in a horrid way in the milliners' bills, which are the to-morrows to the yesterdays of clothes.

The various headdresses are almost all pretty, at least to the unskilled eyes that do not know the difference between the hat of last week, the bonnet of the moment, and the toque of to-morrow. Dead-leaf satin hats with soft plumes, hats of the Mother Bunch and the "beef-eater" style, set trimly on curly hair, hats of "drawn" white satin, with rolling brims, very like those which the court cavaliers doffed in the presence of Henrietta Maria, quaint, prim, buckled, sugarloaf hats, like Anne of Denmark's, as she stands among her dogs in her portrait, and, unless our eyes deceive us, bonnets with curtains, not little rims, but real curtains of the substantial silk of yore, stoutly sewn. The "old-fashioned" costumes are thorough this year; one is reminded of the pocket-books of seventy years ago, with texts and household recipes for their supplementary literature, by figures which might be the originals of their frontispieces, in short-waisted "jockeys" of sage-green, with miniature coachman's capes, large worked-muslin collars almost touching the shoulders, tight sleeves with puffs at the wrists; bags — not the elegant trifles of the last few years, but stout bags, with stout ribbon strings — hung on the arm, just above the substantial wash-leather glove (bags with "housewives" in them, doubtless, and franked letters on blue Bath post), and bolt-upright bonnets with piped edges and quilled caps, like Madame Tallien's in the picture at Versailles. A costume à la guillotine (not so called now, we may be sure, or conveying any such notion to the fair young wearer) reminds one suddenly of the old print-shop on the Quai D'Orsay, where ever so many years ago studious persons, with books under their arms, used to stand in contemplation before the pictures of those terrible times, which were not so old then. Just such trailing, flat-backed robes, with such open, rolling collars,— they call them the "save-Samson-trouble-collars," — and just such short, artistically creased waistcoats may be seen in the old prints of the promenades of Paris with the Terror pressure off, and the fêtes of the Directoire.

The mediæval affectations in costume are less pleasing; they are too completely out of harmony with their surroundings, living and pictorial. A lady in a gown of the Plantagenet period, with sleeves which were meant to imitate the stiffness of the mail armor of the time, and a cap like crook-backed Richard's, making out Mr. Frith's "Road to Ruin" by way of "College," "Ascot," and Boulogne, is a discord in the scene, but the singing girls in Mr. Leslie's picture, and the group which carries out the autumnal sentiment of Mr. Boughton's, have their counterparts in the repetitions of history in the matter of attire, which form an amusing exhibition of their own, as well worth seeing as any that is on view this May.

From The Pall Mall Gazette.

TURKISH WIVES.

First among Turkish social topics is that of the harem. The Koran allows a Mussulman to have four wives; and many persons have consequently imagined that polygamy is the rule in Turkey, whereas it is the exception. A Mussulman may only have as many wives as he can keep in comfort; and it is only the very rich who can afford to keep four. The middle-class Turks have only one wife apiece; the men of the lowest class are often obliged to remain single from not having the means to support a consort in the style which the Moslem law enjoins. Nothing can be more un-Turkish than the Mormon idea of accumulating a number of women to live under one roof, quarrelling in the kitchen and parlor, and acting as household drudges for their husband. The Turkish wife is not a slave; the chief fault to find with her is that she has too lofty a sense of her own dignity. An advocate of female rights would have some difficulty in persuading her that her lot was pitiable: she has never envied the emancipation of

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Christian women, whose free ways shock her; while she has noticed that they get much less respect from the men of their faith than that which is invariably vouchsafed to herself. She veils her face with no more regret than a Western lady unveils her shoulders. Turkish women are not shut up. They go out when they please, attended by their odaliks if rich, or holding their children by the hand; and their magpie voices fill the bazaars, for they are noisy talkers. Wherever they pass, men of all creeds stand aside deferentially. If a husband meets his wife in the street he makes no sign of recognition. If he perceives her halting before a draper's stall and gazing significantly at silks dearer than he can afford, he must possess his soul in resignation, muttering "Mashallah." This respect for women prevails also in the home circle, and it comes naturally to the Mussulman, who has been taught from his boyhood to behave courteously to the softer sex. The Western conjugal expression about "wearing the breeches" has its Turkish counterpart in the phrase to "live under the slipper;" and it is to be feared that not a few Turks know the taste of this implement of uxorial persuasion. A hamal (street porter) once came before a cadi to complain that his wife trounced him too frequently. "See what mine does," answered the magistrate, opening his gown and showing some weals on his neck and shoulders. "Go thy way, my son, and thank Allah thou art luckier than I."

A Turkish house is divided into two parts — the selamlik for the men, the haremlik for the women; and the latter has as many separate suites of apartments as there are ladies. A Turk who has but one wife may require a large haremlik if his mother and sisters live with him, for each of these ladies must have her private set of rooms and servants for her separate use. There must be no crowding and no mixing of domestics in a well-ordered establishment; so that if there be four wives they need never see one another unless they please. The first wife is called the hanun, and takes precedence over the others all her life. She has a right to the best rooms, and to a fixed share of her husband's income, which he must not reduce to minister to the caprice of his younger spouses. As these points have generally been settled through the ulemas or priests before the wedding, a hanun's jointure is as safe as that of a Frenchwoman who has had a contract drawn up by a notary. During the last twenty years monogamy has become more and more the rule among Turks of the highest class, and even among those who have two or three wives the hanun has gradually come to be regarded as having the same rank as the mistress of a Christian house. She visits and entertains the hanuns of other gentlemen, but keeps aloof from wives of the second and other degrees. These are not equals in her sight, being generally ladies of a lower social status, who have not brought any dower to their husband. Time was when a pasha would take four wives of equal degree, all being daughters of other pashas or of the sultan, and all richly portioned; but manners have altered in this respect — at all events, in the European part of Turkey. It must not be supposed, however, that a hanun cherishes any such jealous hatred of her fellow-wives as is felt by a Christian wife who sees her husband flirt with strange women. She is content with the largest share of her husband's respect, without demanding his exclusive devotion. Her philosophy often goes the length of choosing from among her own odoliks or companions (from oda, room), one whom she deems meet to be his morganatic spouse, and she will do this the more readily if she have taken a fancy to the girl and be unwilling to see her leave the house. In some houses, not of the highest class, the four wives are as friendly at home as it is possible for women to be; though each may have a different set of outdoor friends whom she will not introduce to the others. In any case the supremacy of the hanun is always acknowledged, and the others will not intrude themselves into her presence unless invited.

The Turk who has money marries young, and an excuse for polygamy might be found in the fact that his first marriage is always an affaire de convenance. His father bespeaks a bride for him from among the daughters of his best friend, and he does not see the young lady until she lifts her veil in the bridal chamber after the wedding. The preliminaries are conducted by the mothers on both sides; and doubtless a son will now and then plead hard to be allowed just one peep at his intended, but a prudent matron will turn a deaf ear to such entreaties. The damsel is more fortunate, for she can see her bridegroom elect through the grated windows of her residence, or, closer still, under cover of her veil in the bazaars. It might be supposed that, as feminine nature is the same in all latitudes, a girl who knew herself to be pretty might devise in-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

nocent stratagems for letting her betrothed get a sight of her — for instance, wear a very thin veil, or contrive that, at the hour when the young effendi called on her father, one or two of the wooden bars of her moucharabiés (window-grating) should be displaced. But this would be quite contrary to Mussulman notions of delicacy, which are not to be trifled with. Turkish girls are unaffectedly modest. Those of the lower class who are engaged as servants in the houses of Frank residents are much preferred to Greeks or Armenians for their excellent behavior, cleanliness, and regard for truth. Looking upon marriage as their natural destiny, they are careful of their reputations; and when married make first-rate housewives.

From The Spectator.

THE MICROPHONE.

THE instrument which Professor Hughes has discovered (and which he proposes to call the "microphone," as the one which enables you to send sound to a great distance is called the "telephone") will certainly prove an astonishing step in advance, not only for the science of sound, but for all the sciences in which sounds are the symptoms of changes hitherto undiscoverable by man. It is, however, hardly right to contrast this instrument with the telephone, as the microscope is contrasted with the telescope. For the microphone apparently will be just as applicable to the hearing of distant sounds as to the hearing of sounds that are near. The telephone brings the sound from a distance, and the microphone magnifies the sound when it is thus brought near. The microphone, in fact, will be just as applicable to the sounds transmitted from Dublin or New York, — if the latter can be transmitted so far,— as to the sounds in a vibrating-plate which is within a few inches of the listener's ear. The telephone brings from a distance without magnifying, — indeed, not without lessening greatly the sound it transmits, — and then the microphone magnifies it, so as to make it even far more audible than it was to the ear of a close listener. The invention depends on so breaking, by the interposition of charcoal permeated by fine atoms of mercury, the currents transmitted by the telephone-wire that the sound is vastly increased by the interruption, — just as heat is known to be vastly increased by a similar interruption of a current, even to the turning of metallic wire to a red or white heat. Thus the microphone will make a minute sound audible, whether it be close or far off. It is said that the march of a fly over the vibrating-plate is rendered as audible by this invention as the tramp of a horse, and that the mere breathing of the fly is heard almost like the trumpeting of an elephant. And this, as we understand, is just as true of a sound transmitted from a distance, as of a sound close at hand. Supposing the fly to walk over the vibrating-plate at one end of the telephone, the microphone will magnify whatever corresponding sound may reach the other end as much as it will magnify the sound at the end at which it occurs. We do not understand that it would be in any way impossible, for instance, to get a physician living in London — with the help of the microphone and the telephone — to report on the sounds in the lungs and heart of a patient in Birmingham. The stethoscope itself should be superseded by the microphone. But not only should the stethoscope be superseded but the range of the new instrument should be enormously extended by the telephone, the two playing into each other's hands, so that a whisper in Dublin might be heard as a shout in Holyhead. It is this extraordinary power of combining the telephone and microphone together, which opens out such strange prospects as the result of this discovery. Indeed, associated as both may be with the phonograph, — the instrument which records and bottles, as it were, speech, till some convenient future occasion for unbottling it, — it is quite conceivable that the whisper of a dying statesman like Cavour's, — "I will have no state of siege, any one can govern with a state of siege," — might be repeated after the expiration of a hundred years, in a hundred cities, each of them hundreds of miles away from the place where it was first uttered, in a voice audible to a great assembly, instead of only to the ear of an intently listening friend.

But the most curious results which we can at present anticipate from this marvellous microphone are results due not so much to the transmisssion of these sounds, either in space or time, as to the discovery through its means of new sounds now inaudible. It has often been observed that other creatures' ears must perceive notes which we do not at present perceive at all; must perceive the vibrations due to waves too short as well as to waves too long to affect the human ear. So far as

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

our inability to see and hear depends on the absolute incapacity of the retina or the ear to be affected by waves of a given length, of course no microphone, any more than any microscope, will render them perceptible. The microscope does not show us new colors, and the microphone will not show us new sounds. But just as the microscope renders not only visible, but large and conspicuous, what we could not previously discern simply from its minuteness, so the microphone will render distinct and even loud what we could not previously discern, simply from the want of volume in the sound. The first result should be to provide these who are only deaf — whose auditory nerve is not destroyed — with a nearly perfect ear-trumpet, — not, of course, one which will enable them to gather in the general and confused sounds of a room with all the distinctness of good hearing, for the very essence of this instrument is that it can only magnify the isolated vibrations received on the vibrating-plate at the other end of the conducting-wire, but still complete for the purposes of any isolated sound; that is, sufficient not only to make it audible, but to make it perfectly clear and distinct. But far more curious results should follow. With the help of the microphone, it should be possible to hear the sap rise in the tree; to hear it rushing against small obstacles to its rise, as a brook rushes against the stones in its path; to hear the bee suck its honey from the flower; to hear the rush of the blood through the smallest of the blood-vessels, and the increase of that rush due to the slightest inflammatory action. In fact, the new instrument should add a hundred times as much to the means of investigating the facts of both vegetable and animal physiology, as the stethoscope added to the knowledge of the structure of the heart and lungs; for while the stethoscope only collected the sound, the microphone will magnify it.

That, however, which strikes the imagination most in this wonderful discovery is not so much what it is sure to do, as the wonderful world of possibility it opens. It is almost certain that a ray of light strikes the surface on which it impinges with a definite force, and Mr. Crookes certainly supposed that he had found the means of approximating to a calculation of that force. But if this be so, there must be a definite sound caused by light touching a surface, and the new instrument may enable us not merely to see, but to hear light. It is quite conceivable that by the use of the microphone the chemist who is trying to analyze the spectrum of a star may be enabled to hear the first ray of the star strike upon his spectroscope, and to listen to the gentle rain of rays which follows while the spectroscope is exposed to that star, and then to exchange that gentle sound for that of the torrent which would follow when he exposed his instrument to the moon instead of the star. We may find that the rippling of the light from Sirius has a sound quite different in character from the rippling of the light from Arcturus or the Polar Star; and all of these onsets of starry light, if they can be heard at all, must make a sound as inferior to the cataract which rushes from the sun, as the dash of a brook is inferior to the roar of Niagara. It may be, too, that the sound made by the different prismatic rays, as they strike a surface, will produce a harmony as delightful and as susceptible of indefinite variation as the prismatic colors themselves, so that the most exquisite musical instruments might be produced by merely opening the ear to the sounds (at present too slight for any ear to perceive) corresponding to the colors of the rainbow, and varying the combinations at the discretion of the musician. Wagner, in one of his great works produced in this country, has, we believe, a "Rainbow Chorus," which was greatly admired, but which did not, without help from the words of the libretto, suggest to the audience that association with a rainbow which he had imaginatively ascribed to it. May it not be possible, with the help of the microphone, to give us a true rainbow music, — a music really caused by the sound of the same waves which, in their effect on the optic nerve, produce the vision of the rainbow? This is, of course, mere dreaming. But one of the most delightful results of great discoveries like this, is that it fosters so much a dreaming power not quite divorced from possibility, and therefore not quite of a kind to discontent us with the world in which our actual duties lie.

From The Japan Times.

THE FEAST OF LANTERNS AT CANTON.

THE feast was held on the three nights of the September full moon — our harvest moon — and celebrates the birth of that luminary, sister to the celestial lord of the five-clawed dragon. On the swell night, that of actual full moon — every Chinese householder is obliged (doubtless on pain of being chopped into mincemeat) to hang out from the highest point of his dwelling two lamps at least, and all day long the people may be seen occupied in fixing these lanterns on the points of long slender bamboos, till the city from afar looks like an enormous cane-brake or a mighty bed of bulrushes. The lanterns, gaily painted, are of all forms, sizes, and colors, and as night falls and the full moon slowly rises, the lights begin to glimmer, and in half an hour, the low, mean, sordid city is changed into an almost indescribable scene of brilliant, twinkling, glittering light and beauty. I was most fortunate in the weather. A slight, very slight mist hung above the water, which, while it dimmed the lamps in the extreme background, yet magnified them and deepened their color. In the foreground were the boats, scarcely moving on the river, which lay as smooth as a mill-pond — for there was now scarcely a breath of wind — all gaily lighted, and some, the flower-boats (floating theatres, and houses of entertainment or cafés) brilliantly illuminated with rows of colored lamps and bright devices of every conceivable pattern. Behind lay the great city, with its countless houses, closely packed, the lights on their roofs gently swaying to and fro on the vibrating canes and showing like a fiery cloud hanging in mid-air: all the ugly forms and dull grey masses vanished — shrouded in the luminous veil. And so away to the farthest limits of the walls, where the glitter changed to a dull red glow, like that of a dying fire. Then, from every flower-boat on the stream, rose incessant rockets, and each fiery meteor, as it rushed up into the deep, deep blue of the Oriental sky, seemed to drive down into the river a corresponding flash; each, as it burst into a rain of sparks above, reflected below, keeping the water always glittering with many-colored specks of flame. And from every boat, from every house, burst innumerable crackers, sounding like an incessant fusillade, and making the air heavy with the perfume from the shavings of scented wood with which they are filled. Then the tinkle of the Chinese gittern, and the sonorous clang and clash of gong and cymbal, softened by the distance, filled the air with a not unpleasing music — the music of holiday joy. And best of all, to my mind, far above and all in contrast to the glitter and the glare, the smoke and mist and fiery glow, the rattle and the laughter and the song, there rode the full, round moon — pale, pure, bright, as she only is in the glorious lustrous purple of a tropical sky, and beyond the city, on the far horizon, the eternal hills lying quiet and calm and beautiful, sleeping in her light. Puck and Oberon, Messieurs Cobweb, Mustardseed, and Peaseblossom, might be revelling and rioting here, but there one might well believe that Titania slept her happy sleep amongst immortal thyme and oxlips, and where the never-dying, nodding, nodding violets blow. Indeed it was a scene I shall not readily forget.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The Spectator.

TIBET.

If we may credit the vague rumors which have lately floated through the Himalayan passes, the person into whom the spirit of the late Dalai Lama had passed has been discovered, as usual, in a little child. The Dalai Lama, the pope of Buddhism, the worldly representative of the never-dying spirit of Tsong Khapa, has once more appeared among the people, who for some two years have been eagerly expecting him. During many months, a council of the lamas has been assembled at Lhasa, engaged in the solemn quest for the person into whom the Holy Spirit had entered, and their secret conclave has at last resulted in the unanimous selection of the new Dalai. Long and anxious must have been the consideration of the claims of each candidate, and bitter will be the disappointment in many a household when the unsuccessful claimant is restored to his parents. No European writer has yet raised the sacred veil which shrouds that mysterious selection, nor have even Chinese writers revealed its accompanying ceremonial. That the former is conducted with all due solemnity may be accepted as the fact, and that the latter is as gorgeous and imposing as Tibetan resources will admit, is not more doubtful. Of the nature of the ceremony something may be judged from the description of the minor proclamation of the Teshu Lama, which is to be found in Captain Turner's work, "Embassy to the Court of the Teshu Lama," published in 1800. The influence of the chief priest-ruler of Tibet extends wherever the doctrines of Buddha obtain. It is scarcely less potent in Pekin than it is in Lhasa itself, and it is one of the most visible tokens of religious animation in the Chinese empire. The Dalai Lama is the pope of some four hundred million peo-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

ple. At any time, a description of the state of this ruler — a state which is also connected in many ways with historical associations of great importance both to India and China — could scarcely fail to be interesting; but, as our readers will doubtless remember, a clause in our last treaty with the Chinese attaches a significance to the subject at the present time which it has not enjoyed since the days of Warren Hastings. This is, therefore, a doubly opportune moment, when a new ruler has been chosen, and when our own relations towards the State have undergone some modification, for the consideration of the past history of Tibet itself.

The remote history of Tibet, like that of all the countries bordering upon China, is intertwined so closely with that of the dominant power, that it is not easy, with the meagre authorities at our service, to separate them from each other. Nor would it be of much use to attempt to unravel the idle, although extremely poetical, legends that cluster round "Bod" land, in the years previous to the appearance of the great priest and reformer, Tsong Khapa. The Tibetan Luther was born in or about the year 1417, at Sining, and his parents, who were poor people, were only too glad when he displayed at an early age a preference for a religious career. There is another legend of his origin, which attributes it to a supernatural occurrence, and which asserts that his mother, who had long been barren, had conceived him by falling on a stone tablet on which were graven characters in honor of Sakya Muni. The foundation for this version may very possibly have been that he had been educated in the great monastery dedicated to Sakya Muni. Here he grew up in the very midst of the corruption and vice which were eating into the existence of the whole fabric of lamaism; but instead of becoming vitiated by his surroundings, his strong moral convictions enabled him to triumph over all the temptations of worldly pleasure and of secular power. Up to his age, the scarlet robe had been the peculiar dress of all lamas, but so thorough was Tsong Khapa's resolve to effect a complete reform, that he discarded as a pollution the sacred color. To demonstrate beyond all cavil the radical measures which he intended, he adopted a yellow costume. Then ensued the bitter contest that always has attended rivalry amongst priestly disputants, but at last the controversy between Reds and Yellows was closed by the triumph of the latter, and the gradual reformation of the former. The Red faction is still, or was in the days of the Abbé Huc, existent in Tibet, but the descendants of Tsong Khapa and his disciples are supreme. The reforms introduced by Tsong Khapa gave increased vitality not only to the Buddhist religion, but also to the priestly order of Tibet; and when he died, in 1478, he left Tibet in a state of general prosperity and of tranquillity both within and without. On his death-bed he summoned his two principal disciples, Lolum Ghiamdzo and Kojuni Machortse, to him, and told them that they were to carry on the good work which he had commenced. The former became the first Dalai Lama, the latter the first Teshu or Panshen Lama; and from that time to the present the spirits of those two personages have been never-dying on earth, and except the brief intervals required for the discovery of the person into whom the spirit had passed, those offices have never been vacant. Although the presence of the Chinese in the country, as more or less de facto rulers, since the time of the first Mantchoo emperor, Chuntche, has effaced the secular power of the lamas to a great extent, the Dalai has always been more concerned in the public administration than the Teshu. The latter, who resides at the lamasery of Teshu Lumbo, near the town of Shigatze, on the Sanpu, is the great theological authority in Tibet, and is styled the "Gem of Learning;" whereas, the former's designation is "the Gem of Majesty." But since the days when Chinese armies had to be summoned in to befend Lhasa from marauding Ghoorkas, the independence of the Dalai and his subordinates has grown more and more doubtful, until at last their authority has become almost "the shadow of a name." But while their worldly power has been waning before the encroachments of the Ambans, their influence and reputation, both among Tibetans and the Chinese people, have been as steadily increasing, until the Tibetan lamas are now almost as potent as they were in the ancient days of the Mongols, when Kublai Khan entreated their aid for the construction of an alphabet for his ignorant people. There are many who assert that there is a religious, as well as a national, revival going on amongst the Chinese, and in the former of these movements the most active agent would undoubtedly be the religious fervor which is to be found among the lamas of Tibet.

The relations between ourselves and the Tibetans have been very slight; in fact,

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

since the days of Warren Hastings there have been none at all. In 1772, that governor-general sent an envoy — Mr. George Bogle — to the Teshu Lama, and his mission gave rise to some very instructive interchanges of opinion, for an account of which we are indebted to Mr. Clements Markham; but the result of this diplomatic action was very transitory. Captain Turner, Warren Hastings's second ambassador, despatched a few years later on, for the purpose of complimenting a new Teshu on his accession to the dignity, was not more successful; and then for many years official business was transacted by our Tibetan agent, the widely travelled Purungir Gosain. In 1792 there occurred that war between Nepaul and China which resulted in the ignominious defeat of the former, and which the intercession of Lord Cornwallis alone prevented from closing with the sack of Khatmandoo, but which is chiefly of importance to us as marking the turning-point in our intercourse with Tibet. Up to this, our diplomatic overtures had not indeed been crowned by any very brilliant success, but they had not been complete failures. The passes through the Himalaya were at all events open, if any one cared to make use of them; and so long as the fair at Rangpur was maintained, so long did Tibetan goods find their way into Bengal, and our Indian fabrics into Tibet. But the Chinese government and generals resented our intervention in favor of the Ghoorkas, who, in the eyes both of Tibetans and Chinese, were merely a set of troublesome marauders; and after the year 1792, the Chinese, in consequence of Lord Cornwallis's well-intentioned mediation, closed the passes of the Himalaya, erected blockhouses at their northern entrances, and put a stop to all intercourse whatsoever. Since that time, more than eighty years ago, only one Englishman has succeeded in breaking through that unyielding barrier, and it must be long before the same astonishing energy and rare acquaintance with Chinese manners will be united again in the same person as they were in Thomas Manning. That gentleman, in the disguise of a Chinaman, did in the year 1811 penetrate from Bhutan into Tibet, and his triumph was rendered more perfect by a residence of many months in its capital. Whatever information we possess we owe to these three gentlemen, and to the French missionaries Huc and Gabet, who went to Lhasa from China in 1845. Since their time, we have indeed learnt much from the explorations of the pundit Nain Sing, but our historical knowledge has not kept pace with our geographical. The tidings that another child exercises the power of Dalai Lama will serve to remind us that whenever we seek to enforce our treaty rights, it will be solely with the Chinese Ambans that we shall have to deal. The same difficulties will have to be encountered and to be overcome as those which beset a visit to any other unknown and secluded province of the Chinese empire. Whatever virtues the Tibetans themselves possess — and if all is true that we are told of them, they possess more than a fair share of them — it is not they who will decide how our ambassador shall be received, but the Chinese governors, who will act in accordance with the instructions remitted from Pekin. From one aspect, seeing that it is the Chinese themselves who have conceded the point, this should argue favorably for the result of an English mission to Tibet; but from another, seeing that the Chinese, and not the Tibetans, have at all times been hostile to intercourse of any kind with ourselves in India, the prospect is scarcely so pleasing. In the mean while, the intrepid Russian traveller, Prjevalsky, nothing daunted by illness or by the obstacles placed in his path by the Chinese, is slowly wending his way along the outskirts of the great Desert of Gobi towards the country of the lamas. In the search for geographical information he is emulating the achievements of his most distinguished predecessors, and should he be successful in this case, which, to say the least, is extremely doubtful, he will most probably, now that so many more entrancing questions are agitating the bosoms of the Indian Council, have the double satisfaction of having been the first representative of his country to visit Lhasa, and of having anticipated the English embassy, which Sir Thomas Wade foreshadowed in his treaty of Chefoo.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXII. | No. 1776.—June 29, 1878. | From Beginning, Vol. CXXXVII.

CONTENTS.

I. THREE SCOTTISH TEACHERS, ... Edinburgh Review, ... 771
II. WITHIN THE PRECINCTS. By Mrs. Oliphant. Part IX., ... Advance Sheets, ... 783
III. LOUIS BORNE, ... Fraser's Magazine, ... 793
IV. A DOUBTING HEART. By Miss Keary, author of "Castle Daly," "Oldbury," etc., Advance Sheets, ... 804
V. IDYLLIC POETRY, ... Macmillan's Magazine, . . . 816
VI. TALKING AT THE PLAY, ... Theatre, ... 823
 Title and Index to Volume CXXXVII.

POETRY.

TRANSLATION FROM HEINE, ... 770
APPLE-BLOSSOMS, ... 770
A BALLAD OF MAY, ... 770

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY
LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

For EIGHT DOLLARS, remitted directly to the Publishers, the LIVING AGE will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of THE LIVING AGE is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of LITTELL & GAY.

Single Numbers of THE LIVING AGE, 18 cents.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

TRANSLATION FROM HEINE.

BY THEODORE MARTIN.

LOVE'S BURIAL.

THOU hast passed from life, and thou knowest it not;
The light is quenched in thine eyes, I wot;
Thy rose-red mouth, it is wan and sere,
And thou art dead, my poor dead dear!

One summer night, myself I saw
Thee laid in earth with a shuddering awe;
The nightingales fluted low, dirge-like lays,
And the stars came out on thy bier to gaze.

As the mourning train through the wood defiles,
Their litany peals up the branching aisles;
The pine-trees, in funeral mantles dressed,
Moan prayers for the soul that is gone to rest.

And as by the mountain tarn we wound,
The elves were dancing a fairy round;
They stopped, and they seemed, though startled thus,
With looks of pity to gaze at us.

And when we came to thy lone earth bed,
The moon came down from the heaven o'erhead.
She spoke of the lost one. A sob, a stound!
And the bells in the far-away distance sound.

Blackwood's Magazine.

APPLE-BLOSSOMS.

THE orchard grass is sunshine-barred,
And starry-white upon the sward
The pretty daisies lie;
I rest beneath a mossy tree,
And through its waving branches see
The sapphire of the sky.

I feel the balmy breeze of May
Soft-blowing down the grassy way,
And in the boughs above
The little birds break into song,
And praise, in thrilling strains and strong,
Spring's halcyon days of love.

The apple-blossoms fall around,
And fleck the daisy-chequered ground
As breezes softly blow;
I stretch a lazy hand aloft,
And grasp a cluster silken-soft,
Like rosy-tinted snow.

I look at every tender leaf,
And marvel why a life so brief,
To such sweet things is given;
Why not for them a longer space
To blossom gaily in their place,
Beneath the summer heaven?

Why not for them a longer time
To feel the sun at morning prime,
To see the moon at night?
To quiver by soft breezes stirred;
To listen when God's morning bird
Sings heavenward his delight?

Ah me, my heart! it must be so,
The blossom drops that fruit may grow,
The sweetness of the flower
Dies early on the vernal breeze,
That autumn-time may bless the trees
With gold and crimson dower.

Ah me, my heart! so must thou see
The flowery hopes that gladden thee,
In this thy morning prime,
Fade in the fair place where they grow,
Drop round thee swiftly like the snow
Of apple-blossom time.

But if they leave thee good and true,
And pure as when they blossomed new,
Then gladly let them go;
Where now these fairy blossoms be,
In God's good time thine eyes shall see
Thy life's fair harvest glow!

All The Year Round.

A BALLAD OF MAY.

SPARKLING like a diamond
Beams the daystar in the skies;
Nature, loosed from winter's bond,
Smiles as one in sweet surprise.
Light and life are firm allies;
Hawthorns wear their wedding white,
Pastures show their greenest guise, —
Earth is laughing with delight.

Branches leafy vests have donned,
Buds and blossoms glad the eyes,
Brakes and ferns unfurl the frond,
Daisy-bloom with clover vies;
Sings the runnel as it hies,
Swallows twitter in their flight,
Master rook his pinions tries, —
Earth is laughing with delight.

Tadpoles people pool and pond,
Cushat-calls and coos arise,
Chaffers of the dusk are fond,
All day long the cuckoo cries;
Gauzy insects, butterflies,
Flutter forth to see the sight;
Lo! the bee with saffron thighs, —
Earth is laughing with delight.

ENVOI.

Lady, 'tis no time for sighs,
While the world is buoyant, bright;
Love is not a vague surmise, —
Earth is laughing with delight.

Spectator. W. H. BRETT.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The Edinburgh Review.

THREE SCOTTISH TEACHERS.*

It has been sometimes made a reproach to Scotland that its theological creed is of the same uniform Calvinistic type. The implied reproach has been held by others as a compliment, and the wonder has been expressed that a people so united in religious faith should be so bitterly rent by ecclesiastical divisions. The southern mind, looking at the surface of theological opinion and the Presbyterian constitution of the three Churches to which the bulk of the population adhere, is naturally astonished that these Churches should remain separate. But both the reproach and the compliment fail in gauging the full character of the national thought and feeling. Social and ecclesiastical rather than theological principles have always been the chief causes of Scottish "disruptions;" † and the apparent uniformity of belief has always covered deep-lying veins of thought quite at variance with Calvinism or what passes for Calvinism. Contrast, rather than uniformity, might be said to be the characteristic of the thought and life of Scotland all through its history, from the days, to go no further back, when Queen Mary and John Knox confronted each other in Holyrood, to the days, to come no further down, when Sir Walter Scott and Thomas Chalmers represented, with a like rarity of genius, different sides of the national mind and character. There are few national histories, in fact, more marked by picturesque contrasts. If it be said that Queen Mary was half a French woman, and stands opposed to Knox in virtue of her French rather than her Scottish qualities, Maitland of Lethington was at least as much a Scotchman as the great reformer — he supposed himself the very type of a Scotchman, and did not hesitate to fling in the face of one of Knox's friends the scornful taunt, "Ne sit peregrinus curiosus in aliena republica." Yet what a living embodiment of antagonistic qualities the men are! The chivalrous Montrose and the crafty Argyle, the saintly Rutherfurd, the equally saintly Leighton, Robert Burns and James Beattie, John Wilson and Dr. Andrew Thomson, all are equally children of the soil, and yet how diversified is the background of thought, not to speak of mere personality, that they represent! Uniformity of creed, uniformity of intellectual temperament, is so little what these and many other names — all equally Scottish — suggest, that one of the most intelligent and close-observing of American authors once said to the writer that, never having visited Scotland and only knowing it by its literature, he was quite at a loss to understand the broad differences which it presented; how the same country which had accepted, if not produced, the Confession of Faith, should at the same time enjoy so thoroughly the poetry of Burns. The severity of Puritanic Calvinism and the riotous fun of "Tam o' Shanter" and "The Jolly Beggars" meeting in the same hearts, or at least in the hearts of the same people, had always appeared to him one of the most unintelligible of national problems.

We have no thought of trying to explain this problem, even should the subject appear in the same light to any of our readers. But those who really know Scotland and are able to look below the surface of opinion know how little it deserves either the reproach or the compliment of uniformity in theological opinion any more than in many other things. It is true that the Scottish Presbyterians of the Revolution were more powerful than any other party in the country, and that they accepted as a creed the confession prepared mainly by English divines at Westminster. This they did, because the Westminster Confession of Faith appeared to them to embrace the common creed of Protestantism, and because the Church had already accepted it (in 1647), when "uniformity" was the common ambition of the party alike

* 1. Letters of Thomas Erskine, of Linlathen. 2 vols. Edinburgh: 1877.

2. Memorials of John M'Leod Campbell, D.D. Edited by his Son. 2 vols. London: 1877.

3. Memoir of Bishop Alexander Ewing, D.C.L. By Alexander J. Ross, D.D. London: 1877.

† In one of the volumes at the head of this article this idea is very well expressed: "Peers and lairds choose Episcopacy; professional men and farmers choose an Established Presbytery, and the shopocracy a free Presbyterianism. Thus it now is in Scotland, and thus it will be in England (if disestablishment takes place). It is a matter of 'clothes' after all." (Ewing's Memoir,) p. 498.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

in England and in Scotland. This confession remains nominally the creed of all the Presbyterian Churches. It is the type and symbol of that Augustinian theology with which all the Protestant Churches identified themselves, and which the Church of England has no less substantially, if in milder and more catholic phraseology, retained in the Thirty-nine Articles. But not even at the first did the acceptance of such a creed shut out all individuality of opinion and speculation. The dominant party in the Church may have designed this. It is a popular commonplace, from which it seems impossible to rid certain minds, that this is the necessary intention and result of creeds. Zealots within all Churches find it their interest to foster this commonplace. It squares with their unworthy conceptions as well as with the popular notion of a confession of faith being a kind of bargain between the clergy of a Church and the authorities of that Church. But in point of fact, no document of any kind can remain unchangeable in its interpretation or obligation. A confession of faith may be highly useful for the time; it may or may not be essential that every Christian Church should have a definite creed for its basis — these question are meantime quite beyond our scope — but no creed can remain binding on the national consciousness from generation to generation. Even if theological ideas were themselves immutable, which no rational student of theological history would maintain, the relation of the national mind to them necessarily changes with its changes and growth. There is in short no permanence here any more than in any other aspect of human thought. It is a simple fact arising out of the law of rational development, that uniformity of belief, even if temporarily enforced, cannot last. Time brings its alterations in theology no less than in philosophy; and the idea of uniformity has no application to the region of history in which the courses of human opinion really run. Let a Church set out with whatever creed it may, and make what ties it can to bind its adherents — in the course of time a change sets in, and the interpretations both of the creed and of the ties binding to it are insensibly moulded in conformity with the changing current of ideas. So true is this that the student of theological opinion is well aware that it is often those who believe themselves the most orthodox, the most faithful to the letter of a creed and to their own interpretation of the relation in which they stand to it, who have most truly departed from its original spirit. Nothing is so heterodox as popular orthodoxy, or the complacent dogmatism in the nineteenth century which supposes itself echoing the creed of the seventeenth or the twelfth or the fourth centuries. The same words no longer convey the same meanings even to the instructed, and still less to the popular intelligence.

If we have run into this digression, it is not at present for any purpose of argument, but only to explain how absurd the commonplace view of Scotland is, which supposes it to be the home of a uniform Calvinism, because its Presbyterian Churches all profess a Calvinistic creed. It is the same, only a less pronounced, type of Augustinian theology which, as we have said, lies at the basis of the national Church of England. Differences may be made out between the creeds of the two Churches, but that the Westminster divines were the legitimate heirs of the Elizabethan reformers admits of no doubt whatever. And it might as reasonably be supposed, therefore, that the theology of the Thirty-nine Articles should condition all the development of theological opinion in England, as that the theology of the Westminster Confession should confine the Christian intellect of Scotland. In point of fact, both have exercised a powerful influence; but in point of fact also the Christian thought of both countries has followed natural lines of development, of which the original theologies of the Churches have only been one of the main causes. These lines have been far more rich and diversified in England, not because the original theology of the Church of England is really different from that of Scotland, but because the intellectual and Christian life of England has been so much larger, richer, and more fruitful than that of Scotland. The Presbyterian north is, after all, but a small country, and the result of this

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

has been at once to intensify its party divisions, and to give more significance to its prominent types of theological expression.

How much force there is in these general observations may be estimated by some attention to the remarkable movement in Scotland of which the volumes at the head of this article are more or less a memorial. The three men brought before us in these volumes were all representative of something very different from Calvinism in its ordinary acceptation, and yet they were Scotchmen of the Scotch. They were genuine "sons of the soil," bearing the impress of the best Scottish culture of their time, and directly representative of its religious thought. The men are only fully intelligible in the light of Scottish circumstances and opinions amidst which they lived, and, exceptional as they may be in some respects, each would have claimed a real interest in the religious traditions of their country, as that country has reason to be proud of all of them.

In bringing these men under the notice of our readers, it is not our intention to enter into any theological discussion. This is not the key-note we have wished to strike, and is certainly not our aim in the present paper. We have no intention even of describing fully the movement which they may be supposed to represent. This would require more space than we can afford, and carry us into questions which we have no wish to discuss. All we design now is to bring the men before us in their distinctive character, as illustrating the growth of a more diversified and richer type of Christian faith and thought than is generally associated with Scotland. In themselves the three men are deserving of commemoration, and it is impossible to tell their story and exhibit their character, as drawn in their letters or memoirs, without at the same time exhibiting the affinity of their religious ideas as so far the product of a common impulse, and indicating the manner in which the men were more or less associated for the diffusion of these ideas. Whether they can claim to be called a "school," or to what extent they may have founded one, or what is its worth, may appear in the course of our remarks.

The eldest of the three men described in the volumes before us was Thomas Erskine, of Linlathen, a notable and picturesque figure as portrayed in his letters, and as known in his later years to many still living. Thomas Erskine was a Scottish gentleman of ancient descent, whose great-grandfather, Colonel John Erskine of Carnock, the "Black Colonel," as he was called, was "the great-great grandson of the distinguished Earl of Mar, the wise regent of Scotland, and the faithful counsellor of King James VI." The "Black Colonel" was evidently a remarkable figure in his own day, not easily turned aside from what he considered the right road, and somewhat free and irascible in the use of his sword, as when he assailed the magistrates of Culross for burning kelp under his nose, notwithstanding his orders to the contrary. The famous author of "The Institutes of the Law of Scotland" was a son of Colonel Erskine; and again Dr. John Erskine, the colleague of Dr. Robertson, the historian, and one of the leaders of the evangelical party in the Church of Scotland in the eighteenth century, was a son of this well-known jurist, and therefore an uncle of the subject of our notice. His father, David Erskine, practised as a writer to the Signet in Edinburgh, and was "allowed by all competent judges to have been one of the ablest and most honorable men whom his profession has ever produced." But he died at a comparatively early age, and the care of the son's education devolved upon the mother, a daughter of the house of Airth — where, or at Kippenross, in the neighborhood, Thomas spent most of his early years. The first glimpse we get of him is at Airth Castle in 1793, when he was five years old. He told the dean of Westminster that he remembered as a boy at this time the sensation produced by the death of Louis XVI., and Bruce the traveller coming in a snowstorm to communicate the sad tidings. The housekeeper, on being asked who it was who had arrived in such circumstances, exclaimed, "Why, wha should it but Kinnaird" (the name of Bruce's house, and Scotice the familiar name by which its owner was called), "greetin as if there

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

werena a saunt on earth but himsel and the king of France."

There is little to mark the youth of Thomas Erskine beyond the fact that he appears to have been a happy boy, as he was upon the whole a happy and well-circumstanced man. His life throughout was of a peculiarly placid and unembarrassed character, a fact not to be forgotten in estimating the tenor of his theological views. He had to lament, indeed, the loss of dear friends, and especially of an elder brother, who by the depth and power of his character seems to have made a strong impression on all who knew him; but there were no storms of any kind either of calamity or of passion in his career. Endowed with good health and abundant means, and troops of enthusiastic relatives and friends, it was certainly the sunnier side of this mortal pilgrimage along which he travelled, and that this sunniness had ripened and sweetened his nature, and given it — shall we say? — a vein of complacency, if not stolen from it something of strength, was plain to most of those who knew him in his later years. It left him free, moreover, to follow the bent of his own meditations and desires, which how few are ever able to do! His time was his own, his studies were what he liked, and his theological opinions were moulded not only out of the deep and ever-enlarging experience of his own heart, but in some degree also out of the free and random turnings of his own will and thought, which owned few or none of those outward checks which after all bind the thoughts of most men in this world. This was an advantage. It gave a spontaneity and individuality to his religious development; but so exceptional an advantage is never without some drawback. The freedom of his life, the happiness of his circumstances, gave perhaps a tinge of arbitrariness no less than of independence to his judgment, and prevented him from seizing those broader historical connections the recognition of which is so essential to the appreciative and intelligent estimate of religious no less than of intellectual phenomena. We shall have occasion to give illustrations of this as we proceed.

The death of his brother made Thomas Erskine laird of Linlathen, and left him absolutely at liberty to follow his own mode of life. The result was that he practically gave up the profession of the Scotch bar, to which he had been trained, and resolved to travel some years on the Continent. This was not, however, before a change had passed upon him from a state of semi-scepticism (vaguely indicated) to a state of profound religious conviction. His residence in Edinburgh, after passing for the bar in 1810, was coeval with the heyday of the "Waverley Novels" and the early fame of the review in which we now write. Jeffrey, Cockburn, and Fullerton, "with all of whom our young advocate was on terms of closest friendship," were all in the full activity of their career. The influence of the society around him, and the course of his own reflections, he implies, led him to have misgivings as to the credibility of the gospel history. But his misgivings were soon dispersed. "The patient study of the narrative," he adds, "and of its place in the history of the world, and the perception of a light in it which entirely satisfied my reason and my conscience, finally overcame them, and forced on me the conviction of its truth." His religious impressions were deepened especially by the death of his brother, already mentioned, in 1816. In reference to this event he writes in a pathetic strain of Christian confidence which shows how deeply and intelligently his faith was already grounded. He even drew up a paper as the record of his views and convictions, "which he thought of putting into the hands of his companions at the bar when he parted from them," and which was afterwards printed in 1825 as an introductory essay to the letters of Samuel Rutherford, so well known in Scotland. The germ of much of his after thought is found in this paper, especially the idea he so often reiterates as to the moral or practical aims of all the divine dealings with man in the gospel.

> A restoration to spiritual health, or conformity to the divine character, is the ultimate object of God in his dealings with the children of men. Whatever else God hath done with regard to men has been subsidiary, and with a view to this; even the unspeakable work of Christ and pardon freely offered through the cross have been but means to a further end; and that end is that the adopted children of the family of God might be conformed to the likeness of their elder brother — that they might resemble him in character, and thus enter into his joy. . . . The sole object of Christian belief is to produce the Christian character, and unless this is done nothing is done.

These sentences are curiously interesting to the student of Scottish theology, marking as they do so clearly, on the one hand the impression which the customary religious phraseology had made upon Mr. Erskine, and on the other hand the diver-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

gence which had already begun in his mind from the commonplaces of evangelical theology, then and so long afterwards prevalent in Scotland. Even a professional theologian would hardly now write in such formal phrases. They are to be heard only in the pulpit, and even there not in the mouths of the best preachers. But they came as a common voice at that time to all who spoke or wrote about religion. Certain persons were "adopted children," and the blessing of Christ's sacrifice was "pardon freely offered." The language of the older type of thought clings to Erskine, layman as he was, but he has already penetrated to the artifices which such language is apt to hide. The gospel is nothing, he sees, if it is not a spiritual and moral good in all who profess to receive it. This was a decided advance, not, indeed, upon the theological belief — for it is impossible to conceive anything of the deliberate nature of belief sinking below such a self-evident proposition — but upon many of the religious commonplaces, of the time. Such ideas as "pardon" and "adoption" had been so traded upon and emphasized by themselves that they had passed into the popular, and even into the clerical mind, as abstractions summing up the meaning of the gospel. Religion was supposed to consist in things denoted by these and similar phrases, with little or no relation to the life and character of many who made use of them. It was an evidence of the reality of Erskine's faith that he saw beyond all this, and while using, in so marked a manner, the abstract and technical language of the religious world of his youth, he at the same time expressed so clearly the living connection between pardon and character — in other words, between religion and morality. This radical conception he never lost hold of, and it helped to steady him amidst the stress of fanaticisms which for a while seemed likely to carry him away.

Before Mr. Erskine went abroad in 1822 he published his first work on "The Internal Evidence of Revealed Religion," in which he pursued in a more extended manner something of the same line of thought as that already spoken of. His great aim was to show the divine origin of Christianity both from the fitting illustration which it furnished of the character of God and its bearing on the character of man; "to demonstrate," in his own words, "that its facts not only present an impressive exhibition of all the moral qualities which can be conceived to reside in the divine mind, but also contain all those objects which have a natural tendency to excite and suggest in the human mind that combination of moral feelings which has been termed moral perfection." It is the same great idea of "character" in relation to religion which is mainly before his view. There seemed to him "an intelligible and necessary connection between the doctrinal facts of revelation and the character of God (as deduced from natural religion), as there is an intelligible and necessary connection between the character of a man and his most characteristic actions;" and again, he says, the belief of the doctrinal facts of revelation has "an intelligible and necessary tendency to produce the Christian character in the same way that the belief of danger has an intelligible and necessary tendency to produce fear." Christianity, in short, was to him self-evidencing, both in the light which it shed upon the nature of God, from whom it professed to come, and in the effects which it exerted upon man, for whose benefit it was designed. The incarnation and atonement, rightly viewed, prove God to be all that our hearts desire, and contain a power of good fitted to all human necessities. It is a false and unscriptural view of the atonement which regards God as rigidly exacting punishment while "not much concerned whether the person who pays it be the real criminal or an innocent being, provided only that it is a full equivalent." Here, as more fully afterwards, he is working his way towards reality in the sphere of religious thought. All notions or abstractions about God or the ways of God are distasteful to him. It is God himself as a moral intelligence and will whom he seeks to know. And the only religion worth anything is that which changes a man's will from evil to good. This it is which stamps Christianity as divine, that it so necessarily elevates and transforms into moral beauty the character of those who really receive it.

We cannot linger over any of Mr. Erskine's foreign reminiscences. They have little value now, and they contain fewer indications of his personal feeling and individuality of thought than we had looked for. Altogether, it must be confessed that the letters in the first volume are somewhat disappointing. There is a lack of richness and diversity in them, and hardly any traces of the humor which was a marked, if not obtrusive, feature of his mind in later years. We have only met in the earlier letters with a single touch

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

of the quiet vein of humorous reflection which used often to run through his talk. When in correspondence with Dr. Chalmers in 1827, he contrasts his friend, "in the midst of the business of the General Assembly," with himself in Rome, "quietly looking upon the seat of the beast, and wondering at him, the manner of his existence, and at his duration." He had evidently at the time a solemn interest in the fate of the "beast" for he represents himself as busy with Irving's book upon the prophecies, which he speaks of as "a magnificent book full of honest zeal;" yet he is also delighted with the story of a "Romish priest" who, having fixed the year 1830 "as the termination of the wrath," and applied to the pope for permission to publish his speculations, received for answer that he should be allowed to publish in 1831!

Wherever he goes it is his own thoughts as to religion which chiefly occupy him and fill his letters. The true nature of Christianity as a power of spiritual education grows always clearer to his mind. He sees that if true at all there must be good in it for all. It must be a religion of universal love, and not a mere scheme of salvation for a few. There is little said as to the course of his thought in his letters, although they are full of general religious reflections; but he is found, on his return to Scotland from a second sojourn abroad, busy with the publication of a new volume entitled "The Unconditional Freeness of the Gospel," which appeared early in 1828. This appears to have been the first of his books which excited controversy, as it was the first which impressed some higher minds which were destined to exert a marked influence upon the religious thought of their time. Long afterwards Mr. Maurice spoke in warm terms of his obligations to this book. "Have we," he said, "a gospel for men, for all men? Is it a gospel that God's will is a will to all good, a will to deliver them from all evil? Is it a gospel that he has reconciled the world unto himself? Is it this absolutely, or this with a multitude of reservations, explanations, contradictions? It is more than twenty years since a book of yours brought home to my mind the conviction that no gospel but this can be of any use to the world, and that the gospel of Jesus Christ is such a one." It was about the time he published this volume, and when his mind was excited by the importance of the views it expounded, that he first became acquainted with Mr. M'Leod Campbell, with whom he immediately formed a warm friendship, and became closely united in works of Christian thoughtfulness and zeal. This union opens up the most significant period of Mr. Erskine's religious history, and at the same time serves to bring before us prominently the second of our list of Scottish teachers.

Mr. M'Leod Campbell had been settled at this time about three years in the beautiful parish of Row, on the banks of the Gareloch, in Dumbartonshire. He had begun his pastoral work there with great success and high aspirations. A deep-thoughted man, with an independent and highly practical turn of mind, he was more intent upon doing his duty than upon identifying himself with either of the parties which then divided the Church. In preparing his sermons he used little but his Bible and concordance, consulting commentaries only "to ascertain the precise translation of the original." He had no plans of working out a theology for himself, and still less of drawing attention to his mode of preaching. But the religious condition of his people greatly occupied him, and he considered much how he might awaken amongst them a higher spiritual life. An old man whom he visited soon after he commenced his ministry said to him on parting, "Give us plain doctrine, Mr Campbell, for we are a sleepy people;" and the simple and solemn words left an ineffaceable impression upon his mind. Mr. Story, minister of the parish of Roseneath, on the opposite side of the Gareloch, somewhat older in years, was a man of like mind with himself, full of thoughtful anxiety for his people, and with a beautiful saintliness and dignified simplicity of character that had already given him an honored position in the parish and neighborhood. They became fast friends, and Mr. Campbell enjoyed all the advantages of his friend's more matured experience. Both were happy in their work, and neither dreamed of exciting the Church or becoming the centre of a religious movement.

But gradually, as Mr. Campbell's religious views deepened, he began to preach in a vein which startled some of his more cautious and less-convinced brethren. He began especially to speak of the assurance of faith, and of the universal love of God for all men, in a way which, as he himself says, awoke "opposition, or rather speculation." In his letters to Mr. Story, who was away from home at this time in bad health, and also in his own "Reminiscences and Reflections," he recounts, with a quiet simplicity and an unhesitating con-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

fidence in his own judgment, the results of his new thoughts. "I was enabled to declare the truth twice. . . . The Lord put it into their hearts to treat me with much respectful attention, although not giving in. But the truth has been scattered and may yet take root. . . . I mean to speak as God will enable me from the delightful and appropriate words, 'God is love.' The present aspect of things is deeply interesting." This was in December 1827; and shortly after this time Mr. Erskine seems to have heard Mr. Campbell preach for the first time. Returning from the church with a friend, he said, with great emphasis, "I have heard to-day from that pulpit what I believe to be the true gospel." Soon Mr. Erskine found his way to the parish of Row, and the two friends, with others, especially Mr. Scott, afterwards principal of Owens College, Manchester, mutually strengthened one another in their higher views of the love of God and of the strength of faith.

But meanwhile a storm was gradually rising in the Church against Mr. Campbell's preaching. Many of his brethren began to preach in their turn against the "new doctrine." To add to the commotion, this was the heyday of Edward Irving's fame as a pulpit orator, when the grandeur of his earlier eloquence was just passing into the wilder tones and apocalyptic reveries of his later years. It was in the summer of 1828 that he gave his long-remembered course of lectures in Edinburgh on the Apocalypse to crowded congregations at six o'clock in the morning. Mr. Campbell sought an interview with him at the time, not, as he himself says, "to consult him as one having 'difficulties,'" but with the view of laying before him "the conclusions at which he had arrived on the subject of the assurance of faith." It was not unnatural in the circumstances that the older and more cautious heads in the Church of Scotland should have become alarmed at the invasion of novel doctrines, or what seemed to them novel doctrines; and none could have blamed them if they had dealt wisely and thoughtfully with the authors of these doctrines. What really alarmed one half of the Church, known as the "Moderate" party, was undoubtedly the self-confident pretensions that lay under the movement, and the fanaticism to which it seemed in some cases fast tending. It is impossible for any impartial historian of the events of 1830–35 not to feel that there was some ground for this alarm. The aberrations of Irving, the delusions of Mr. Erskine himself, and the dogmatic assumptions of an exclusive possession of "the truth" which pervade both Mr. Campbell's speeches and letters on the occasion, and which no doubt equally characterized his preaching, were all of a nature calculated to provoke opposition, and to call for interference from the Church courts. Our own pages, in an elaborate article which opens the number of June 1831, entitled "Pretended Miracles: Irving, Scott, Erskine," bears evidence to the wide-spread excitement which had sprung up in the wake of the Row movement, especially connected with the alleged return of what were called "spiritual gifts," similar to those which prevailed in the early Church. The chapter on this subject in the first of the books before us cannot be read without some feeling of shame, even at this time of day, that so really wise and good a man as Mr. Erskine should have countenanced and apparently for a time believed in the reality of such pretensions. Mr. Campbell, although in their immediate neighborhood, seems happily to have kept himself aloof from them, and to have discerned pretty clearly from the first the delusive foundations of the early Irvingite Church. Anything more melancholy than the account of the supposed gift of tongues — the evident ravings of religious hysteria — can hardly be imagined. Mr. Erskine was far too clear-sighted, and had seized on the moral side of Christianity, as we have seen, far too strongly, to remain long under any hallucination as to the real character of the wide-spread pretensions which rose in many quarters as the enthusiasm spread. His letters to Lady Elgin and Miss Rachel Erskine in 1833 show how he gradually and completely emancipated himself from such forms of enthusiasm, and came once more into the clear light of a moral gospel, whose function is not to promote excitement, even of the best kind, but to transform men's characters and change their evil into good. Any doctrine apart from this, he says, "is a vanity and deception." "If we are faithful and patient, we shall have the life of God taught to us and nourished in us. But we are in such a hurry; we think something must be done immediately." Again: "My mind has undergone a considerable change since I last interchanged thoughts with you. . . . These gifts are but signs and means of grace; they are not ground of confidence; they are not necessarily intercourse with God; they are not holiness, nor love, nor patience; they are not Jesus.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

The truth and substance of religion is the spirit of Christ manifested in the heart as the light and life of God. . . . You know that Mr. Scott is entirely separated from Mr. Irving and his church, believing it, as I understand, to be a delusion, partly, and partly a spiritual work not of God." Again, to another lady, Mrs. Macnabb, a sister of Mr. Campbell: "We have had a great trial about the spiritual gifts. The spirit which has been manifested has not been a spirit of union but of discord." Finally, to another correspondent, the Rev. W. Tait, in 1834: "My dear friend, I see that you are much fixed on these things [the pretensions of Irvingism]. I believe them to be delusions. I see in them a return to Judaism."

Before this time Mr. Campbell had been deposed from the ministry in the Church of Scotland for the teaching of heretical doctrine. That there was an element in Mr. Campbell's teaching calling for the interference and even the authoritative guidance of the Church courts, may be allowed. But no event could have been more unhappy than the actual conduct of the prosecution directed against him, and its violent issue. It is difficult to realize now the atmosphere of indignant alarm which rendered both not only possible, but apparently easy. His two alleged heresies of the assurance of faith and of a universal atonement, if not recognized by the Confession of Faith — which he did not himself contend they were, especially the first — are not yet in any direct manner negatived or condemned by it. It may to this day be fairly urged, as he himself urged at the bar of the synod of Glasgow and Ayr, that the doctrines he taught "were not inconsistent with the standards of the Church." It is believed, Dr. Hanna, as editor of Mr. Erskine's letters, says, "that the Church now would neither eject Mr. Campbell nor Mr. Scott" (whose views, on the subject of the atonement at least, were identical with those of Mr. Campbell). But it is not to be concealed that the mere attitude of being tolerated was not welcome to Mr. Campbell. Merely to urge that his doctrines were not "inconsistent with the Westminster Confession appeared to him taking up an inadequate ground of defence." "I feel," he says, "that to take this ground would be failing in duty to the truth of God; and more especially at present, when it is so general a feeling that it is charity to be indulgent to all manner of opinions, and that to speak dogmatically is necessarily an evil." Now and long afterwards there was that in Mr. Campbell, and indeed in Mr. Erskine, which made their profession of faith hard for others to bear. With all their personal humility and insight into the perplexities of the religious life, they were yet essentially dogmatic in their own assertion of the truth. They failed, as every one connected with the movement did, in any appreciation of the historical growth of Christian thought, and of the manner in which its higher and lower moments fit into one another in the great progress of the Church. They had no perception, consequently, of what both the "Moderate" and the "Evangelical" parties had to say for themselves — the real amount of truth that lay in their respective systems, equally extravagant as both were in their extreme manifestations. Mr. Erskine is almost uniformly unjust in his letters to the old Moderate clergy, such as Carlyle of Inveresk; and Scotland is "torpid" and dead when it does not respond at once to the higher light which he and his friends represented. Neither he nor Mr. Campbell, in short, had then learned anything of those principles of religious latitude, which their country has been so slow to recognize. Diversity of religious opinion then appeared to them no less than to their opponents an evil instead of a good. Even so late as 1846 Mr. Campbell talks with some alarm of the "latitudinarianism" which permitted Calvinists and Arminians subscribing a uniform formulary of confession at the Evangelical Alliance. There may have been difficulties in such a process; we know nothing of the alleged formulary; but the underlying conception of all this mode of speaking is that words are capable of doing what they never can do — define insoluble mysteries — and that forms of language of one school of Christian thought may have such an absolute value over those of another school of thought that "the truth" is in possession of the one to the exclusion of the other. Such a notion, of course, was universal in Scotland at the time, and must always prevail where theology remains so much of a dogmatic, and so little of an historical, study. Religion, in such a case, becomes confounded with theology, and the enthusiasms and excitements of the one sphere are transferred to the other. Mr. Erskine and Mr. Campbell both lived to understand this matter better, and to recognize thankfully how much Christian reason and even good there might be in opinions very different from those which they themselves professed and taught.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

In our rapid sketch we pass onwards to that later period of their life when the third teacher on our list also emerges upon our notice as the friend of both. The years that followed Mr. Campbell's deposition — those troubled years in Scotland known as the "ten years conflict," issuing in what is called the "disruption" of the Scotch National Church, make little mark on the lives of either Mr. Erskine or Mr. Campbell. They lived above the turmoil of the time, and part of it was spent by the former in a renewed visit to the Continent. All that he says about it is in a letter from Linlathen in 1844: "The present time is a very trying one. I did not feel myself called upon to take any part in this movement [the Disruption], but I always expressed my conviction that it was one more of a political than of a religious character." In the light of later events these words have something of that semi-prophetic character that distinguishes not a few of his sayings.

But in the last thirty years the atmosphere of local and provincial controversy, which has been such a bane to Scotland, has greatly cleared away; and during this time both the friends entered with a clear and noble intelligence, disciplined by their former experience, into the higher questions which arose for discussion. In passing to the second volume of Mr. Erskine's letters, and hardly less in passing to the second volume of Mr. Campbell's "Memorials," one feels himself breathing "a diviner air." The enthusiasms of Port Glasgow and the Gareloch have passed into forgetfulness. Linlathen is the centre no longer of a narrow religious circle, to which Mr. Erskine himself for some time ministered. It is the home as much as ever of a beautiful piety and constant ministry of love, but there is more of rational as well as spiritual light pervading it. Mr. Carlyle is a visitant and correspondent. Homer and Plato are familiar studies. Some of the letters to Mr. Carlyle in this volume are very interesting, and there is at least one very remarkable letter from Mr. Carlyle, for which, however, we cannot find room. We must content ourselves with the following brief extract from the correspondence addressed to the patriarch of Cheyne Row from Linlathen in 1847: —

I really hope that the next visit you pay to Scotland you will come to us, and before that time I trust that this weary Fritz may be off your conscience and thrown on the consciences of other men, as incentive or warning as the truth of the matter may make him. I suppose that he shows us what a strong will and a clear insight without a conscience can do for a man. To me it is a most unpleasing spectacle — a German king confining his kinghood to leading armies and extending frontiers, and setting up par goût as a French wit and a ribald freethinker. I would much rather be honest Mrs. Braid [an old nurse of Mr. Carlyle], selling flour and bacon, and lovingly bearing the burden of her bed-rid son.

During all this time Mr. Erskine continued to hold to the substance of the old faith which he had indicated in his earliest writings; but he had also risen into a clearer and broader atmosphere of thought. He had seen more of the world, much of it as he had seen before; he had got more beyond the influence of the narrow circles or coteries so apt to beset zealous religious people, and poison with applausive echoes the air they breathe; he had wisely abandoned his former attempts at pulpit instruction, and the delivery of religious addresses in public. It was not, as the editor of his letters says, "that his thoughts were less intently occupied with the great truths of Christianity," but that he was satisfied that "it was not in the direction either of controversy or outward activities of any kind that his strength could be best employed." No doubt, also, it was that he had himself risen into a purer region — not of belief, but of thought. He saw around him better. The world was not so hopeless as it seemed, nor Churches so dead, although they were still dead enough. There was Christian good working, and Christian truth taught in many forms, upon which he and some of his old friends, both at home and on the Continent (for there is no narrowness worse than that of the Continental Evangelical), had been apt to look askance. The spirit of liberality grew greatly in him, and was one of the chief charms of his later mood. Not that he ever parted with his old convictions; these remained as a sure anchor of his soul; but a higher light was shed upon them. His ideas of the gospel of life, of the future, of the love of God, of the sacrifice of Christ, became every year, if possible, more simple, less technical — more real, less dogmatic. He not only cast off the old clothes of an abstract Calvinism, but also the new clothes which some of his own school would have woven for him, and on all sides left his mind open to truth from whatever quarter it might come. And so all the religious literature and controversy of his later years had a lesson for him. Little as he liked the "Essays and

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Reviews," he felt that there was a sifting power in these and similar writings that was good for the trial of his own faith and the faith of the Church. To Dean Stanley he writes in 1864: "Your Church seems to be in a sad mess at present, many truly earnest men afraid that the foundation of all their spiritual hopes is to be swept away by criticism, and forgetting that any revelation, whether inspired or uninspired, must owe its whole value to its being the discovery of truth which remains true independently of that revelation." Again, in his conversations with Miss Wedgwood, preserved in her valuable journal printed in the second volume of the letters, and upon the whole, as it appears to us, the best expression of his later and riper thought: —

I think we shall learn to value the Bible more as we grow independent of it. I do value parts of the Bible exceedingly, but I do not feel that I depend upon it. When I find a small dispersed people from the first asserting a righteousness in the Divine Being which I do not find in the gods of more enlightened nations, I cannot feel that this is mere accident. This was the teaching of God. But then when I come upon discrepancies in the narratives which are very definite and striking, neither can I ignore them, and I feel that this is not inspiration. The records are the vehicle of principles which are true independently of the records, and which criticism cannot touch. . . . I have no difficulty in receiving the fact of miracle. But if anyone has, I do not conceive that he is thereby debarred from entering into the spirit of Christianity. The one is a fact, the other is a principle. The two things can never come into collision with one another.

His old idea of life being an "education" rather than a "probation" became expanded under the influence of this loftier and more rational faith. Divine education became to him in its very nature an endless process which did not terminate with this life, but reached infinitely forward till all evil should be destroyed. God's purpose in Christ is "to make men good" — repeating the key-note with which he started in his first book. For this purpose he has created us, and is constantly educating us; and the mere fact "that not one in a thousand had really received any education here" was enough to show without hesitation "that the education must necessarily proceed in the next world."

The words are taken from a letter addressed to Bishop Ewing in 1864. Alexander Ewing, who became bishop of what is known in the Scotch Episcopal Communion as the "Diocese of Argyle and the Isles," is the youngest of the men whom we have ventured to group together as Scottish teachers. Bishop as he was, he must be held inferior in theological power and insight to his older friends. He had less original force than either; and yet in some respects his spiritual life was exceptionally bracing and healthy. Had he not known both Erskine and Campbell, Alexander Ewing would never have been the teacher he was; and yet there was a sense in which he improved upon their teaching. He was upon the whole more a man among other men than either of them. He was more free from the impress of the select religious circle, and possessed a wider range of purely human feeling, with bursts of poetry in his heart, that spoke of a more varied, artless, and manlier vein of natural experience.

Ewing first met Erskine in the company of Mr. Carlyle in London in 1855, when "the hope of final good for all mankind was fast becoming," as Ewing's biographer says, "the calm and settled persuasion of the great lay theologian — for such undoubtedly Erskine was." An intimate friendship soon sprang up between them, which Campbell no less shared. Polloc, the residence of Sir John Maxwell, in the neighborhood of Glasgow, was the chief meeting-place of the three friends; and Bishop Ewing has left in one of his "Present-Day Papers" a pleasant sketch of the charms of the old residence, and its dignified, thoughtful, and genial host, "dear Sir John, the soul of honor, charity, and benevolence." In 1860 the bishop writes to his brother from Polloc: —

If I could always live as I do here without anxiety, in a large warm house [he suffered from an affection of the chest], I might live forever. Sir John is certainly the most genial, large-hearted, and best-tempered man in the world, and his conversations and views are so striking and edifying that no one but would be the better for his society. . . . Mr. Campbell, of the Row, is here now, and is of much benefit to all. He is great upon the subject of divine love — love being regarded by him as synonymous with righteousness, holiness, and justice, and law being the expression of it. Erskine has been here also; so you will understand, if one is not the better for being here and meeting with such men, one must be incurable.

Some time before this Mr. Campbell had published his book on "The Nature of the Atonement," which, with all its faults of style, remains a truly noble monument of his spiritual genius. No mod-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

ern theological work, upon the whole, has made a more remarkable impression upon many thoughtful minds. It has carried the deeper tone of the school, apart from its peculiarities, into a circle of readers having otherwise no affinity with either Mr. Campbell or Mr. Erskine. And this has been owing not to any obvious attractions in the book itself — for its arrangement and style are alike cumbrous and involved — but to the real weight of spiritual thought contained in it, a certain profundity of insight and grasp of meaning which are felt by all who are at pains to study it and have any interest in the great doctrine which it discusses. This work and Mr. Campbell's later volume, "Thoughts on Revelation," which was called forth by the agitation which followed the appearance of "Essays and Reviews," and which is marked by the same deep spiritual qualities, are the chief contributions to theological science made by the school. Temporary as the school itself may prove, both these works have a permanent value. Criticism may reveal the weakness of Mr. Campbell's theory of the atonement no less than of every other theory. There is no theory on such a subject ever likely to prove adequate. But the elaboration of adequate theories — were such a thing possible — is a small matter in comparison with the deepening and enrichment of the theological mind, with casting some measure of light into hitherto unexplored depths, and showing harmonies in what hitherto have seemed and been presented as contradictions. This is the sort of service which Mr. Campbell's work on the atonement has rendered, and this is the kind of influence that lives in theology or any other branch of the moral, or, as the French call them, the "philosophical" sciences. In these sciences the power of systematization — of abstract definition and co-ordination — has exhausted itself long ago. There is nothing to be gained in this way but empty formulæ, and propositions without life and meaning frequently in proportion to the rigor with which they are set forth in logical deduction. What is really required is the capacity of seeing the true character of spiritual and moral facts, and the intimate links that bind together all higher speculation, whether as to the nature of God or man. And it is this capacity which Mr. Campbell's works, both on the atonement and revelation, so fully exhibit, and which has given them, as it will continue to give them, a living influence over the course of theological opinion.

It is needless to say that the author of such works had greatly advanced from the stage on which he stood at the bar of the synod of Glasgow and Ayr, when the doctrine of the assurance of faith appeared to him an essential part of the truth, and he challenged a verdict on his own private opinions as absolutely the gospel and nothing else. Probably Mr. Campbell never receded from his old dogmatic position. To the last the assurance of faith may have been a vital element of his own experience. Certainly his earlier views of the universality of the divine love as revealed in Christ only grew into a clearer and more confident brightness, if some of the forms in which he had presented this great truth may have fallen away from him. But to whatever extent he may have retained or modified his old convictions — for which he gladly suffered the loss of his parish — he had, in the long interval between his deposition and his becoming known as the author of "The Nature of the Atonement," greatly grown not only in depth of religious insight, but in what is far more closely allied to it than he or any of his friends would have allowed in their earlier years — width and rationality of comprehension. He had opened his mind to a higher horizon of knowledge, both natural and spiritual, than that which formerly confined him, as well as his friend Mr. Erskine. There are many indications of this as we advance in the two volumes of his "Memorials," which we cannot pause to quote, but which no reader can miss who has an eye to notice the growth of his mind and thought. Formerly he is shocked at the mild and somewhat irrational latitudinarianism of the Evangelical Alliance. In 1856, in reference to "Essays and Reviews," he regards it "as a marvellous distinction of the Church of England that it permits the free utterance within its pale of such conflicting sentiments. I cannot," he adds, "but regard it as an advantage as compared with the state of things in the Church of Scotland. I am sure free discussion within the Church is better than the constant necessity to form a new sect if one has any new thought to utter."

Happily all three minds passed into this higher atmosphere of light before they passed away; but perhaps Bishop Ewing, as he had begun with less technical theology than either of his friends, a fact of which he was quite conscious, rose into this atmosphere more easily than others. There was in him by nature a great love of freedom for its own sake, as a spiritual

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

good, as the only channel through which the highest spiritual good can come to any soul. Systems of any kind — new systems as well as old — were hateful to him, and restraints upon the genuine growth of the religious life. "I do not think there is any vitality in the Athanasian formula," he says in a letter to Archbishop Tait. "It is holding up the skeleton of the dead amidst the living. To the great majority of those who attend our churches the technical phrases of the creed are quite as unintelligible as are the special legal expressions in a title-deed or the terms in a physician's prescription. . . I would keep it as an old and curious heirloom in the charter-chest." The dogmatism which had surrounded the great truths of the atonement and of revelation appeared to him mere "materialistic substitutions" for the truths themselves. "Balances and equivalents had made of none effect," he says, "the direct revelation of the forgiveness of sins."

Every year Ewing's mind seemed to rise more above the environments of his own Church, and the exclusive principles which have been so unhappily associated with it. "Let us rise," he said to his own clergy, "from systems, whether of Episcopacy or Presbytery — above all material apparatus. Let us rise to higher things; let us live in that region which makes the face to shine, and where the heart says, 'I have seen the Lord;' where we behold his glory, and the Word become flesh in the midst of us." Among his last desires was to testify in the College Chapel at Glasgow to the power of a common faith uniting his own Church and the National Church of Scotland, and it was only the interdict of his colleague, Bishop Wilson, that prevented his doing so.

I have had my time greatly taken up [he writes] with that business of Bishop Wilson's, and I cannot say how much it has impressed me with the feeling that these apparently innocent things, Apostolic succession and high views (as they are called) of the Christian sacraments, are really anti-Christian in their operation. When they take shape in actual life, they reveal their meaning to be a doctrine of election which is just so much worse than the common one that it is external and official, and which, moreover, renders the sacraments themselves uncertain in their efficacy by demanding the co-operation of the will of the minister if the reception of them is to be savingly beneficial. How destructive this doctrine must be of all simple and immediate fellowship between man and man, and between man and God, I need not say.

All his deeper feelings of the nature of Christianity and of the possibilities of Christian union seem to have been outraged by this action of his colleague in the Scottish Episcopal communion. To another colleague, Bishop Wordsworth, he says: —

I confess that if the spirit of which I complain represents the spirit of our Scotch Episcopal Church, it is a grave question with me, and I am sure it is also with you, whether we should take part in a ministry which has so manifestly departed from the object for which it was instituted. For is not fellowship the end of the Christian ministry, and is it not the work of a true ministry to achieve its end by producing union on the way? Episcopacy, as you well know, while claiming superiority of degree for the well-being of the Church, never did among us claim to be necessary for its being.

In these and other utterances there is the note of genuine liberality, of a spirit which could see common Christian truth under many divisions, and was prepared to recognize and honor it in whatever Church it was found. No one thought less of what is popularly known as Calvinism than Bishop Ewing. He expresses his horror at a reported utterance of the Free Church moderator, that all the ministers of the Free Church were strict Calvinists. But he was able to see, like Erskine, the divine truth which the Calvinistic formulas were intended to embody; and he was always ready for any measure of practical co-operation with the Presbyterian churches around him, and especially with the Established Church, with many of whose clergy he carried on a most friendly and frequent correspondence. His liberality was essentially a part of his intensely human and truth-loving nature. Resting in one or two great central truths, the light of his own life, his mind was open on all sides to further light and knowledge; and the last charge which he delivered on the "Character and Place of Holy Scripture in Christianity," in 1872, the year before his death, shows his mind still free as ever and longing for more light. There can hardly be a better statement of the relation of revelation to Scripture than this charge contains. There are those, we are aware, who see weakness rather than strength in this constant progressiveness of mind, especially in a bishop. The Church is supposed to have settled everything long ago, and there seems an element of unsettlement and restlessness in this constant sifting of fundamental questions and opening of the mind to new or higher views.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

But science can acknowledge no other attitude. It can never shut out light; and it is the very highest praise we can give to Bishop Ewing, that he was at the end, as throughout, among the "children of light" and "of the day," and not "of the night nor of darkness."

The three men whose lives and whose work as teachers we have thus briefly touched will live each only in so far as they loved the light, and sought to help others to a better vision of it. Their own lives became more beautiful, and their own character larger, as they rose above the narrowness of their early education. It has been our business to show in the case of two of them how much more catholic and scientific their spiritual and theological attitude was in their later than in their earlier years. All three, not so much in virtue of any special doctrines which they taught as in virtue of their catholicity and the growth of a rational and enlightened spirit in their teaching, have exercised, and are likely to continue to exercise, a healthy influence upon the progress of theological thought in Scotland. We do not underestimate the value of their special theology, but we claim to judge them in the spirit rather than the letter — to look at them from the outside, under no feeling of discipleship, but simply as forces in the movement of Christian opinion in their own country especially. Still more interesting than anything they taught was the rational method which more or less guided all their later leaching. Whether they knew it or not, they were Christian rationalists, ready to recognize the validity of many different sides of Christian doctrine, and the imperfect and progressive stages through which thought in religion, as in everything else, moves onward to its goal. This is the element in them which we feel confident was really good, and which will survive for good long after what is known as "Row heresies," or any other special opinions which they are supposed to have espoused, are forgotten.

And as this higher rationalism was the best element of their teaching, so it was that which Scotland most needed at their hands. If theology in Scotland is not only so far to obey the same law of diversified increase which characterizes it in other countries, but to grow into richer and more fruitful forms of development, it can only be by the recognition of the rational principles that underlie its study. Investigation must have free scope here as in every other branch of knowledge. New light must be welcome from whatever quarter it may come. The claims of science must be meted neither by the decisions of presbyteries nor of assemblies, past or present. Every product of former thought, every creed which the Church has elaborated and set in its history as the monuments of its progress, deserves and should receive respect, but never so as to stifle or resist the living voice of the Christian reason, always seeking a more enlarged and perfect expression in a science more complete because more faithful to all the facts of spiritual experience.

WITHIN THE PRECINCTS.

BY MRS. OLIPHANT.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE MUSICIAN AT HOME.

THE signor's house was one of those which, when general peacefulness had made the battlements round St. Michael's unnecessary, had grown within the outer wall. It was more like a growth than a building. Windows which looked, as we have said, as if cut in the side of a precipice, gave light to the small panelled chambers which were connected by bits of quaint passages, here and there by a little flight of stairs, with tiny vestibules and landing-places, wasting the little space there was. Room after room had no doubt been added as necessities arose, and each new room had to be connected somehow with the others. The house occupied more space than a comfortable ugly modern house with tolerably-sized rooms would have done, and when the signor came into possession it had been a miracle of picturesque awkwardness, not a room in it capable of holding more than three or four people at a time, yet as many rooms as would have lodged a dozen, the least possible use for the greatest possible expenditure of space. The signor, however, had built on the inner side a dining-room in red brick, which made existence possible, though it failed in the point of beauty. To tell the truth, the musician's dining-room was an eyesore to all the antiquaries and all the critics. It was of no style at all, neither Gothic, like the original building, nor Queen Anne, like the fashion. He had failed to his duty in every respect. It was a square box with a large window filling up one side. It was lighted with gas. It had red curtains in bold and uncompromising rep, and a large mahogany side-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

board of the worst period. How he had been allowed to build this monstrosity nobody knew. It had been made the subject of a painful discussion in the chapter itself, when Canon Skeffington (the Honble. and Revd.) complained so bitterly of the injury done to his best principles and highest feelings, that the dean was irritated, and took up the cudgels on his side on behalf of his favorite musician. "He has a right, I suppose, to make himself comfortable like the rest of us," the head of the community said. "No right to make my life a burden to me," said the honorable canon; and, he added, almost weeping, "I cannot look out of my window without seeing the thing. You talk at your ease, you others ——" But what was to be done? The chapter could not take so bold a step as to invade the rights of private property, tear down the signor's red curtains, burn his sideboard, destroy his walls. He had to be left to the enjoyment of his villanous erection. The signor laughed behind his sleeve, but in public was remorseful, bemoaning his own ignorance of art, and declaring that if he could afford it, rather than to give pain to Canon Skeffington — but then he could not afford it, and what was to be done? He kept his dining-room, which was big enough to accommodate his friends, but for himself the signor had better taste than he professed to have. His favorite sitting-room was in the same position and had the same view as that of his housekeeper, but its window was between two buttresses of the wall, which held in their gigantic support a little square shelf of green turf, a small projection of hill, which above and below was covered with masonry, bearing little ledges of grass, like one of the hanging gardens of Scripture, hung high in the air above the town and the landscape. The signor's window opened upon this little lawn. His room within was low and dark, but in summer at least this mattered little, for its dim light and shadowy walls were a relief, like a bower in a wood, to the lightness and brightness outside. There was a heavy beam across the roof, from which hung a little chandelier of old Venice glass, reflected in a tall old mirror among the oak panels over the mantelpiece, and not much more bright than they were. On one side was the carved doors of a cupboard in the wall, which was full of old music, the signor's chief treasures, and on the other was a range of low bookshelves, also filled with music books of every size and kind. The piano stood in the corner between the window and the wall, with the keyboard close to the light. There was a chair or two about the room, and a writing-table piled with papers. This was all the furniture of the dim little chamber, and it was impossible to imagine a greater contrast than existed between it and the new building which had so shocked Canon Skeffington. And the signor was not in this particular much unlike his house. A touch of sentiment, which some people were disposed to call high-flown, mingled in him with a curious undercurrent of cynicism, which few people suspected at all. He liked to jar upon the Canon Skeffingtons of existence and ruffle their tempers and their finest feelings. But in his heart he had feelings equally fine, and was as easily ruffled as they. He mocked at them on the very points in which he himself was weak, affecting an insensibility which he did not feel, building the vile modern room with profound enjoyment of their delicate distress, but retiring out of it himself to the shelter of this dim romantic chamber. The combination was very like the signor.

On this particular evening, when young Purcell went to call for candles, the signor was seated out on his little terrace enjoying the twilight and a cigarette together. There were two chairs on the scrap of grass, and a little table with an inkstand upon it, and the cup in which the signor had taken his black coffee after dinner. He was leaning back in his chair puffing out the fragrant smoke from his cigarette, lazily watching it as it floated upwards, and now and then noting down a bar or two of music upon a piece of paper in his hand. Sometimes he took the cigarette from his mouth and hummed a scrap of an air, keeping time with his head and hand. There was no one who was more popular in the country as a composer of graceful drawing-room songs than Signor Rossinetti. It was something refined, something elegant that was expected from him, delicate soprano melodies, fine combinations for tenors and altos. It was very seldom that he took any trouble about the bass, but his tenor songs were justly considered exquisite. He liked to have a pretty set of verses on hand, and "set" them in the intervals of more serious business. In the summer evenings, when he sat out after dinner upon his scrap of terrace, was the time when he had most inspiration. His pupil and protégé, young Purcell, thought there was no intellectual pleasure higher and more elevating than to sit out here in the shadow of the great grey but-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

tresses, with the cheerful distant noises of the High Street floating upward from the foot of the wall, and to watch the signor composing his song. The young fellow would run in to the piano and "try over" every line of the symphony as it came welling out from that fount of music. He said often that, except one thing, there was no such delight in the world. To see genius working under his very eyes, what a privilege it was! To Purcell it seemed that his master read his heart, and uttered his deepest sentiments for him in those compositions. To-night his mind had been lulled out of great commotion and disturbance by the rosy vision of love and happiness that had breathed through the notes. It was glad, it was sad, it was full of suggestion, it wrung the very heart of Purcell — "'Twas in the time of roses, they plucked them as they passed." Would that time ever come for him? He thought the signor had read the depths of his heart, the wistful longing which was sometimes hope and sometimes despair, the pictures he made to himself of one day wandering by her side, one day gathering roses for her. He murmured over and over the tune of the refrain in a kind of ecstasy as he went to his mother's room, his fancy excited, his head all on fire, half with the delicious sense of being friend to such a genius, and sharing as it were the very inspiration that produced such beautiful things, and half with the pride and delight of being so deeply in love and hanging on so exquisite an edge of anguish. The signor himself did not know how much those pretty compositions of his went to his pupil's heart; but he was flattered, as who would not be? by this never-failing appreciation of his work, and youthful enthusiasm. It pleased him vaguely, just as the floating sound from below, the voices and noises, all softened by the warm air of the summer evening, and even by the dimness of the twilight, pleased him. How harmonious they became as they soared upwards, all that was harsh taken out of them, filling the solitude with a genial sense of human fellowship! Perhaps the signor was, like many others, not too fond of his fellow-creatures close at hand; but as they went and came, far down at his feet, talking, calling to each other, shouting their wares, singing now and then, making a sound of their steps upon the pavement, and a movement of their breathing in the air, he was transported with the hum, and felt that he loved them. This always gave him inspiration, this and the glimmer of the river and of the distant villages scattered over the plain, throwing up here and there a dim point of a spire among the trees. When Purcell left him, he put aside the bit of music-paper on which he had been jotting down his chords. He raised his eyes to the profound, unfathomable blue above, and swung back upon his chair. He was half giddy with the sense of circling depths of infinity above him, though himself raised so high. The signor was not without a feeling that he was raised very high, not only in locality, but in soul; yet there was a heaven above which made his head giddy when he looked up — a heaven full of stars, from Palestrina to Mendelssohn, all shining over him, serene, unapproachable, not even holding out any encouragement to him, passive and splendid as the other stars which hid themselves in that still, luminous blue. Would any one ever look up at that sky and recall his name as also among the ranks of the unapproachable? The signor turned his eyes from it with a sigh as he heard some one enter the room, and came down to earth, letting his chair drop upon its four legs, and his mind return to the present. He watched through the open window the advent of old Pickering carrying the lamp. The old man put it down on the table, and lighted some candles on the mantelpiece in front of the dim mirror, which gave them back with a blurred, enlarged reflection. His master sat outside and watched him pottering about the room, setting the chairs against the wall, and vainly attempting to make everything "straight." It was a standing grievance to old Pick that he was not allowed to close the window and draw the curtains as it was right to do. The signor outside sat and watched him with a gentle amusement. He liked to feel the oddness and superiority of his own tastes, thrown into evidence by the mighty anxiety of old Pick to shut the window. A smile came over his face. To ordinary mortals, in ordinary houses, it was not necessary to seek inspiration from the skies and the wide world of evening air. As Pick approached the window, with his usual look of wistful anxiety to be allowed to do what was right, and tacit disapproval of lawless habits, the signor stepped through smiling. "I think you will shut me out some night, Pick," he said, "and then you will have my blood on your soul — for what could I do upon the terrace? I should fall asleep and tumble over, and be picked up in little pieces at the foot of the hill."

"Ah! I don't feel no fear of that, sir,"

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

said Pickering, shaking his head; "you've got too good a voice for that, sir. I don't make no doubt that you could hold an A sharp till you frighted the whole Abbey. And besides I always looks out; I've got the habit in this house. Even the girl, she'll go and stand at the window, as if the view was any matter to her. It's a thing as carries one away. But I don't hold with leaving all open when the lights are lighted. Bless you, the top windows in the street with a spyglass, or even with good eyes like what I had when I was young, they could see in."

"Much good it would do them," said the signor, sitting down before his piano. And indeed it is quite true that as he sat close to the window, relieved against the light of the lamp within, there were eyes at the top windows opposite which could catch with difficulty the outlines of the signor's pale profile and black moustache. Some of the young ladies in the shops would climb up occasionally and show that exciting prospect to a friend. But it was an amusement which palled after the first moment, and certainly did no harm to the signor.

"Maybe not much good, sir," said old Pick, who always would have the last word; "but it might do harm. You never can tell what folks will say. The less they know the more they'll talk; and that's true all the world over; though I will say for the Abbey as it's as bad or worse than most other places."

"Why should it be worse, Pick?"

"I don't know, sir — unless it's the clergy and the chevaliers. You see, when gentlemen has little or nothing to do, they're brought down to the level of the women, so far as that goes — and as gentlemen always does things more thorough than the women when they're started, the consequence nat'rally is — leastways that's my notion of it," said Pick; "the women haven't the strength to start a real talking as does harm. They tries hard — as hard as they knows how — but bless you, in that as in most things, they wants a man to show 'em the way."

"That is a new view, Pick. I thought if there was one thing in which the ladies had the advantage of us —— "

"There ain't one thing, sir, not one. For my part, I can tell in a minute a story as will hang together, a real crusher, one as will drive folks distracted and ruin a family. You'll never get that out of a woman's tongue. Nay, nay, they hasn't the force for it; they're poor creatures at the best; they can make a person uncomfortable, but they can't do no more. And when I say the Abbey's as bad or maybe worse, I mean that the gentlemen has little to do, and they has to amuse themselves the same as the women. That's what I mean to say."

The signor gave a half attention to Pick's long speech while he sat at his piano. All the time he was running over his new composition with one hand, correcting a note here and there, changing a harmony. "'Twas in the time of roses — the time of roses," he hummed softly under his breath. But the smile on his lip was for Pick, and he gave him a negligent half attention, amused by his chatter, and by the peculiar views he held forth. He looked up at him as Pick stopped, singing with a little flourish in the accompaniment, which meant satisfaction in having at last got the phrase to his mind — "'Twas in the time of roses — the time of roses —— " Old Pick was not surprised by the utterance of a sentiment so foreign to his subject. He knew his master's ways, and he took a certain interest in his master's productions, such as old servants often benevolently accord to the doings of their "family." He could not tell what folks saw in them — still, as the signor's productions, he looked upon them with kindly toleration all the same.

"You may say, sir," he cried, "'the time o' roses' — that's just the very thing; for, I daresay, but for that rose in his button-hole, and the jaunty looks of him, a young girl wouldn't have seen nothing in him. But I don't know neither — women is the queerest things on the face of this whole earth. Flatter them, or make them think they're bettering themselves, and there's nothing they won't do."

"Who is it that wears flowers in his button-hole?" said the signor. He wore them himself, and he was curious and slightly excited, wondering if any gossip could by any chance have got up about himself. The idea of such a thing kindled him into interest; his right hand dropped off from the piano, though with the other hand he kept softly sounding notes in the bass, and he turned towards his old servant with a look of animation altogether new. What interest is there like that with which one anticipates hearing something about one's self?

But at this moment Purcell's steps were heard coming quickly along the passage, and he came in with his head erect, and his eyes gleaming, and pushed old Pick out of his way. "That will do, Pick," he said, with a glimmer of impatience, "that

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY will do! I will set things right for the master, myself."

"What is the matter, boy?"

"Matter or no matter, if you think I'll leave it to the first that comes to look after my master," said old Pick, standing his ground. He would not yield; he was very friendly in general to Mr. John, and ready to do what he ordered, but there are limits to everything. He stood his ground steadily, arranging and rearranging the papers on the table, while young Purcell went forward to the signor. The young fellow put himself behind the musician, between him and the window, and stooped to whisper in his ear. His glowing eyes, his eager aspect, made a great impression on the signor, who was very impressionable. He was possessed by some new thought. "Master," he said breathless, "I have a hundred things to say to you. I have heard something new. I want your advice, I want your help." He was breathless, as if he had been running a race, though all he had really done had been to come along a few yards of passage. The signor was easily moved by the sight of emotion, and he was fond of his protégé. "Go, Pick," he said immediately, "and bring us some tea."

"Tea, sir!" said the old man in consternation. "You never takes it. If it's but to get rid of old Pick, I'll go. I'll go, never fear but I'll go."

"I want some tea," said the signor authoritatively; "foolish old man, would you spoil my new song for want of a cup of tea? Go to Mrs. Purcell, and tell her, with my compliments, I want some of her special brew — the very best, as she used to make it for me when I had headaches. Quick, my head threatens to ache now. Well! what is it, boy? Has the queen sent for you to be the head of her orchestra, or is the dean coming to pay us a visit. It must be something very important to judge by your face."

"Oh, sir," cried young Purcell, "what a heart you have! making up a headache and a whole story to save old Pick's feelings! and me that am really no better than he is, pushing him out of the way."

"Nobody is any better than any other," said the signor in his measured tones. "I have tried to teach you so all your life. But I will allow that some are worse than others," he added, with a smile. His disciple was too much occupied, however, with the urgency of his own case to notice what he said.

"Master," said the young man, "I have hurried back to tell you I have changed my mind; I will take the organ at Sturminster after all."

An almost imperceptible change came over the signor's face; that slight stiffening of the muscles of the mouth — continuance of the easy and genial smile of real satisfaction into the forced and uncomfortable one of pretended equanimity — which is the sign above all others of disappointment and displeasure, became visible in his face. "Well —" he said slowly, "why not — if you think it will be more to your advantage? After all, that is the grand test."

"It is not that," said young Purcell, shrinking a little; "you can't think that I would leave you only for my advantage. No, master, it is not that. You must hear it all before you judge."

"Certainly," said the signor. He kept that same smile rigid upon his face. "And in the mean time here is old Pick with the tea," he added, "and we must drink it for the sake of his feelings. What, Pick, is it made already? I don't think your mother can be so careful as usual, boy, about her brew."

"I don't put no faith in tea that stands long to draw, sir," said Pick. "I like it myself with all the scent in it. Water as boils hard, and not a minute lost. That's my maxim. It's fresh made with plenty of tea in, and I'll warrant it good. Smell that," he said, taking off the lid of the teapot. The signor listened to him quietly, taking no notice of Purcell's impatience. He smiled on the old man and let him talk. He was wounded and offended by his pupil's sudden change after the decision of an hour ago; and though he had a great desire to hear what reason could be given for this difference of feeling, his annoyance and disgust at the change found expression in this apparent carelessness of it. He kept Pick talking with secret malice, while Purcell fretted. The young fellow did not know how to contain himself. He collected the music-books that were on the piano, and put them back on the shelves. Then he took them down again; he shifted the candles; he roamed from corner to corner, moving the chairs about, throwing into disorder the things on the table. Now and then he cast a piteous look at his master; but the signor sat in serene malice sounding the bass notes in his accompaniment, putting artful questions to old Pickering, and leading him on to talk. It was the old man himself at length who brought the suspense to an end by recollecting something it was necessary for him to do. "They'd have

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

kep' me there all night," he said to Mrs. Purcell, with pretended impatience, as he got back to the housekeeper's room. "Dear!" said Mrs. Purcell, astonished; she could not understand how the signor could waste time talking to old Pick at a moment so momentous for her John.

When old Pickering was gone the signor still said nothing. He turned to the piano and began to play; he was like a woman offended, who will not approach the subject on which she is dying to be informed. At last Purcell, approaching humbly with wistful eyes, ventured to put one hand lightly upon his arm.

"Master," said the young man, "let me speak to you. I cannot do anything till I have spoken to you."

"To me, boy? Speak then as much as you please," said the signor, nodding at him with an air of ingenuous wonder while he rung out the end of the melody. "'Twas in the time of roses," he sang; then swinging himself round on his stool, "You want to speak to me? Why didn't you say so sooner? Speak then, I am all attention," he said.

Then Purcell began, once more breathless with agitation and excitement: "I think there seems a chance for me, sir," he said; "my mother has just been telling me. It is such a chance as never may happen again. You know I love St. Michael's better than anything in the world — except one thing. Master, she is in trouble; her home is about to be made impossible to her; now or never; if I had a home to offer her, she might accept it. This is why I said I would take Sturminster. St. Ermengilde is more to my mind, a thousand times more to my mind; and to be near you, to have the benefit of your advice, that would be everything to me. But, dear master," said the young man, "must I not think of her first? and here is a chance for me, perhaps the only chance I may have in my life."

"Has anything happened to Miss Despard?" said the signor in great surprise. He recognized the justice of the plea, and he listened with great interest and sympathy, and a curious feeling which was neither sympathy nor interest. Lottie was to the signor a mysterious creature, exciting an altogether different kind of feeling from that which he felt for his pupil. He was almost sentimentally attached to his pupil, and entered into the history and prospects of his love with an enthusiasm quite unlike that with which a mature Englishman generally interests himself in anybody's love-affairs. But along with this sentiment there existed another almost directly opposite to it, an interest in Lottie as a being of a totally different class from Purcell, of whom it would be profoundly curious to know the history, and the means by which she might perhaps be brought to look favorably on — nay, to marry — Purcell; which seemed to the signor quite "on the cards." How she might be brought to this, in what way she would reconcile herself to be Purcell's wife; how she would bow a spirit, evidently so proud, to the young musician's origin and to his ways of talking, which, though refined enough, were still at the bottom those of a man whose mother was "in service:" all this was deeply captivating as a matter of study to the signor; he got, or expected to get, a great deal of amusement out of it, expecting that Lottie's struggles in fitting herself for the position would be wonderful enough, so that his interest cannot be called entirely benevolent. But between this keen and half-malign interest and the sentimental interest he took in Purcell's "happiness," it may be imagined that the crisis was nearly as exciting to him as it was to Purcell himself. He listened to the story with the warmest interest, and agreed that there was nothing for it but to accept Sturminster. "But you must not lose a day," he said; "you must secure the lady at once, there is not a moment to lose."

"Secure?" Purcell said, growing red and growing white; "then you think there is a hope, a — likelihood ——"

"Think? I think there is an almost certainty!" cried the signor. He became quite excited himself for the sake of his pupil and for his own sake, for the keen intellectual interest he felt in this curious problem as to what Lottie would do. "You must go to-morrow," he cried, with all the eagerness of a personal interest; "you must not lose a single day."

CHAPTER XVIII.

YOUNG PURCELL.

NEXT morning found young Purcell in a state of excitement and nervous agitation still greater than that of the previous night. He had not slept during the natural time for sleep, and in consequence, according to the fashion of youth unaccustomed to watching, had fallen very fast and heavily asleep out of sheer fatigue in the morning, waking only with an indescribable sense of guilt to hear the bells ringing for the morning service in the Abbey. Such a thing had never happened

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

to him before, and his shame and sense of wrong-doing were more than reason. He jumped up in dismay, but even the most hurried toilette could not get him in time; and his mother appeared at his door when he prepared to rush out half-dressed, preventing his exit. "You wouldn't go out without your breakfast?" she cried with horror. The virtuous and carefully regulated life of the chorister and musical student trained under the signor's eye and his mother's constant care had made a late morning and an omitted breakfast seem like something criminal. Besides, the sense of the crisis had got into the air. The signor had left an anxious message, begging his protégé not to hurry himself, to take his time, and to keep up his courage. His mother kissed him wistfully, and served him with a noble breakfast as if he wanted strengthening in the most material way for the important piece of work before him. Even old Pick looked at him with respectful curiosity as at a man on the edge of a very serious step indeed, a curiosity mingled with awe and a little grim humor and admiration. The boy was going to do what Pick had never had the courage to do; and though the old man thought the young one a fool, and hugged himself on his superior wisdom, yet it cannot be denied that he looked with a certain respect on the bold youth who was about to make such a venture. He put his breakfast on the table, not grudging the trouble, though the signor's breakfast had long been over, and he shook his head behind Mr. John's chair. "Take a good breakfast, it will do you a deal of good," he said, as he left the hero of the occasion. Purcell, though his mother was only the housekeeper, was the son of the house; he took his meals with the master, though it was his mother who prepared their dishes in the kitchen. It was a false position, perhaps, but he had not yet found any trouble in it. He had been a little curly-headed boy in the choir when Mrs. Purcell came first to take charge of the signor's house; she had been the sole servant then, and had scrubbed and brushed and cooked, diligently keeping everything in order. Old Pickering had gone through the same sort of training which had made John Purcell a gentleman. He, too, had been a chorister, and had progressed into a lay-clerk, with possibilities of rising to something better. But Pick was one of the unsuccessful ones; his voice failed him, his science never had been great, and a little after Mrs. Purcell's advent he had come to the signor also to be provided for. The organist had a large heart and a somewhat indolent temper; the easiest way to provide for the old singing-man was to take him into his own household, and this was what had been done. As for Pick, he had settled very easily into his new place, having been the son of the master of a little tavern; and though it cost him an effort to acknowledge the little soprano, whose surplice he had put on so often, in the light of a young master, yet the effort was made. Pick was conscientious, he did not do anything by halves; and the first time that the signor's pupil was permitted to play the voluntary in the Abbey, the old man made his fellow-servants jump, and gave the youth a shock of mingled alarm and pleasure, by suddenly addressing him as Mr. John. Nobody had expected such a heroic act of submission, but Pick knew his place and all that was suitable in the circumstances. "Him as the signor puts in his own place has a right to be respected," he said; and he never wavered in that noble self-abnegation, nor let any one suppose that it was painful to him. All this had happened long before the period of which we are writing; but what sensation, what emotion, it had caused at the time! Pick stood now, pausing behind the young musician's chair, and lifted up his hands and shook his head. To think this boy, whom he had, so to speak, brought up, should show so much courage! Pick himself had never made such a venture, nor even the signor, who was the master of both, and yet this boy was going to do it. The old man shook his head, not knowing what might come of it; but in his heart he felt a respect reaching to admiration for the courage which was so much beyond anything he had ever known.

Courage, however, was the last quality in which, on this particular morning, young Purcell could be said to excel. To devote your life in secret to a beloved object, to dream of her night and day; to make impassioned resolutions, and determine to win glory and wealth for her, is not so hard for a fanciful youth; but to go into her presence, look into the face that dazzles you, confront the goddess of your distant worship, and without any preliminaries to lead up to this great step, and prepare her for it, quite off-hand and impromptu ask her to marry you! This is a very different matter. The young man sat alone and tried to eat his breakfast, trembling to think of what was before him. The circumstances were such as to add tenfold to the natural tremors of such a crisis. She was a lady, and far above him

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

— not rich indeed, nor occupying any very exalted position in reality, though her dignity was very imposing to the young man, who had always recognized this grace of what seemed to him rank, as one of her particular charms. Purcell was painfully aware that he himself had no right to the name of gentleman. Many a less worthy claimant has borne it, with no thought that it was inappropriate, and Purcell had anxiously and painfully endeavored to acquire all its outside appearances. He knew as well as any how to behave himself in society, and passed muster very well among other young men. He was a little over-anxious, perhaps, a little too fine in his language, too deferential and polite, not sufficiently at his ease, to get much enjoyment out of his social experiences; but this was a fault on the right side. Notwithstanding his modest sense of his own "merits" Purcell could not persuade himself that he was Lottie's equal. He knew he was not her equal. She had been as a star to him, far away and out of reach — and though in the fervor of imaginative passion the hope of winning her had seemed like heaven, yet the actual enterprise of wooing her, when brought thus close, seemed very appalling indeed — a quest more dangerous and alarming than ever knight-errant set forth upon. His knees knocked together, great beads of moisture came upon his forehead — how was he to do it? how was he to present himself, to explain the hopes which, looked at thus in cold blood, appeared even to himself impossible, not to say presumptuous in the highest degree? How was he ever, he asked himself, to make her aware what he meant? She would not understand him. She would think he meant something else, anything else rather than that he, a poor musician, the son of the signor's housekeeper, wanted to MARRY her, the daughter of a gentleman. It would be impossible to make her understand him. This seemed the first difficulty of all, and it was an appalling one. She would not even know what he meant. In this respect indeed Purcell was mistaken, for Lottie already knew well enough what were the hopes in his heart — resenting them highly as one of the wrongs of fate against her; but this he had no way of knowing. If he could but have got any one to smooth the way for him, to tell what it was he wanted to say, to set him a-going, he thought he could find eloquence enough to carry him on — but how could he make that premier pas? Thus, while the household was all expectant, excited by what was coming, Purcell sat over his breakfast and trembled, too frightened to move or think, though with a consciousness that this desperate step must be taken. The signor in the Abbey, rolling forth melodious thunders out of the organ, kept thinking of him with a smile, and a half sigh. Like Pick, he had a certain admiration for the valor of the boy thus pushing forward before himself into the mysteries of life; but the signor's thoughts were more tender and less cynical than those of his servant. He could not help wondering how it was that in his own person he had let all such chances slip. How was it? As he followed his pupil in imagination to the feet of his love, that young creature seemed very fair, very much to be desired. No doubt, to have such a one by your side, sharing your life with you, would make existence bear a very different appearance. Why was it he had never done what Purcell was going to do? This question seemed to flow into the music he was playing, and to go circling round and round the Abbey in the morning sunshine. Why? Life was endurable enough, a calm sort of routine, with now and then a pleasurable sensation in it, but nothing more; and no doubt it might have been made more of. The signor could not answer his own question. He did not want to make himself the rival of his own pupil, or to do anything similar to what young Purcell was doing. He had no wish to make any violent change in life, which was well enough as it was. But only it was odd that a simple fellow like John Purcell should thus boldly have pushed before him into a complete existence — very odd; the boy was bold. Whether he succeeded or not, his very agitation and ardor had in them a higher touch of emotion than any that had been in the life of his master. He laughed within himself at the boy's temerity — but the laugh was mingled with a sigh.

And Mrs. Purcell, for her part, was in high excitement, longing for her boy to be gone on his errand, longing for him to be back again. That her John should marry a lady was the climax of grandeur and happiness. To be sure, it ought to have been a rich lady or great lady. He deserved a princess, his mother felt. Still, as things were, it was a kind of intoxication to think even of the daughter of a chevalier. Why did he linger as if breakfast was worth thinking of? She listened for every sound, for the door shutting, for his step in the hall, and was very cross when Mary Anne made a noise, so that she could not hear what was going on up-stairs. As for

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

old Pick, he brushed Mr. John's hat with a grim smile on his face, and hung about the hall to watch him go out.

"The young un's off at last," he said, with a chuckle, marching into the kitchen, when just before the end of the service in the Abbey, when all the air about was ringing with the echo of the amens, Purcell at last screwed his courage to the sticking-point, and went out, to meet his fate.

Poor young fellow, he could not have been more alarmed had he gone to face a lion instead of a lady. The lion would have been nothing. He would have called out for succor, and used whatever weapons he could lay hold of; but nobody could help him with Lottie — no shield would cover him from the lightnings of her eyes. It was all embarrassing, all terrible; even if by any chance things should turn out in his favor, he did not know what he should do. What could he call her? Not Lottie, that was too familiar. Not Miss Despard. All these different and disjointed thoughts seemed to float about his head in the maze of excitement he was in — he was past thinking, but such questions kept floating in and out of his mind. It was the most extraordinary relief when, going to the door of Captain Despard's house, he found that Lottie was out. If she had been there, it seemed to Purcell that he would have run away — but she was not there. He asked when she was expected back and went on, recovering his breath. He could not go home again, where presently the signor would come from the Abbey and question him. The service was not so nearly over as he thought. It was a saint's day, and there was a sermon. The precincts were very still and deserted, for most people were at church. Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, sitting at her window, saw the young musician walk across the broad silent sunshine, but he did not see her. He went up the Dean's Walk, hearing his own step echo through the silence, and past the Deanery, and out upon the slopes beyond. It was shady and sweet under the trees, which rose up close against the old wall — and all was very quiet during the time of matins, though the town went on with its usual hum down below at the foot of the hill. Purcell began to recover himself a little and take breath as he came to this shelter and refuge. Many a time had he strayed under these trees, thinking of her, wondering if he ever might be able to approach her. It was strange to be here, however, in the morning, the hour of work and engagements, which he never had to himself, and to hear the far-off sound of the organ pealing out after the sermon was over. All the common occupations of life seemed to be suspended for Purcell. He felt as ordinary men feel on an occasional stolen Sunday, when work is suspended, and the duty of church-going put aside. All was so sweet, and serene, and still — no one to disturb his thoughts; the sound of the organ in the distance keeping him aware of the fact that he was singularly, unprecedentedly liberated from his usual occupations, and the tremor of agitation dying away into an excitement which was more bearable, which left room for all the sweeter musings, of which she was the centre. He sat down on the root of a tree, and let himself breathe. Then came the first notes of the voluntary, and a distant hum as of the congregation dispersing. The old chevaliers were apt to take their walk here in the morning after matins, and Purcell felt that he had but a moment in which to indulge himself, and that soon he must turn back.

As he sat thus trying to collect himself, a sudden sound close by, the rustle of a dress among the bushes, the soft sound of a footstep, caught his ear. He looked up — and his heart jumped into his throat. There she stood before him, a little basket in her hand. There was a by-way into the town by the slopes. Lottie had been about her marketing. She was in her usual simple morning frock, clean print and nothing more, and though her head was sufficiently full of dreams and her mind of anxieties, she was at present lingering upon neither, but going straight from one place to another, as became the active morning hour and the consciousness of various things to do. When she saw Purcell spring to his feet suddenly in the midst of the path, for the moment Lottie was startled. She made him a little gracious but indifferent sign of recognition, as courtesy required — for ridiculous as were the notions in his head, she could not be rude to him — and was passing on, not wanting any further parley, when she was struck by the agitation in his face. He was staring at her as if she had been a ghost — his mouth was open, his breath coming quick, his color changing. Excitement did not improve his appearance. She had almost laughed, then checked herself remorsefully, and became so much the more sympathetic for her temporary movement of mirth.

"Is there anything the matter?" she said kindly. "I am afraid you are ill.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Has anything — gone wrong?" She did not know what to say, he looked at her with such solemn eyes.

"Oh, nothing — nothing has gone wrong. I am not ill. Miss Despard — I did not expect to see you here."

"No — but I hope it is not I who have frightened you," said Lottie. "I sometimes go to the bridge road this way."

"You have not frightened me," said Purcell, who found it easier to repeat her words than to say anything original; "but I — did not know you went this way."

It was all that Lottie could do, once more to keep herself from laughing. She gave him a little nod, and was about to pass, saying, "What a lovely morning it is," the stereotyped English remark, when he made a hurried step after her, and, holding up his hands, entreated her, in a piteous voice, to stay a moment. "Miss Despard — what startled me was that I was looking for you. Oh, stay a moment, and let me speak to you," he said.

Lottie stood still, arrested in her progress, throwing a wondering look upon him. What could he want with her? Her first glance was simple surprise, her second — was it possible he could mean that? — could he be bold enough, rash enough? Next moment she blushed for her own folly. To be afraid of young Purcell! That was foolishness indeed. She stood still, one foot put out to go on, her basket in her hand.

"Please say what it is, Mr. Purcell. I have got something to do. I ought to be at home."

The morning is not the moment for a love tale. How much more congenial would have been the evening, the twilight, the subdued poetic hour, after the sun has disappeared, that great busybody who shows every imperfection, and is himself so perpetually moving on! Something to do was in every line of Lottie's energetic figure. She had no time for lingering, nor wish to linger. "Please say what it is." Only business should be treated in this summary way, not love.

"Miss Despard," said the young musician, whose limbs were trembling under him, "I wanted to say a great deal to you; it is very important — for me. Things are going well with me," he added, with desperation, after a momentary pause. "I have been appointed to a church — a fine church — with a good instrument. They are to give me a good salary, and they say I can have as much teaching as I like. I shall be very well off."

"I am glad to hear you are so fortunate," said Lottie. Her eyes were full of surprise, and for a moment there was a gleam of amusement in them. That he should waylay her to tell her this, seemed a curious piece of ostentation or folly. "I am very glad," she repeated; "but you must forgive me if I have to hasten home, for I have a great many things to do."

"One moment," he said, putting out his hand as if to stop her. "That was not all. The signor thinks — you know the signor, Miss Despard, there is not a better musician in the country — he thinks I will make progress. He thinks I may rise — as high as any one can rise in our profession. He tells me I may be a rich man yet before I die."

"Indeed, I hope all he says will come true," said Lottie; "but why you should take the trouble to tell me ——"

Then suddenly she caught his eye, and stopped short, and blushed an angry red. She saw what was coming in a moment, which did not, however, prevent her from drawing herself up with a great deal of dignity, and adding, "I don't know what you mean."

"Miss Despard," he said with a gasp, "there is no comparison between me and you. But you are not so well off — not happy. They say — you know how people will talk — that there is something going to happen that will make you very uncomfortable."

"Stop," she said, with an involuntary cry, half of anger, half of amazement. Then she laughed. "Do you want me to acknowledge that you are much better off than I am?" she said; "but there is no need to compare you with me."

"It could not be done, Miss Lottie. I know it could not be done. You are a lady, and far above me. I know I am not your equal — in some things."

Lottie began to be too angry to laugh, but yet she was provoked to ridicule, which is the keenest of weapons. She made him a little mocking curtsy. "It is very kind of you to say so, I am sure, for we are quite poor people, Mr. Purcell; not fortunate, and getting on in the world like you."

"No, Miss Despard," he said simply, "that was just what I wanted to say. If you had been as well off as I could wish, I should not have ventured to say anything. I have always loved you, and thought of you above all the world. Since you first came to St. Michael's, I have never thought of any one but you. It has been my hope that some time or other I might be able to — but it was only just

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

yesterday that I heard something that made me settle two things —— "

She did not speak, being indeed too angry and annoyed for speech; but she felt a kind of contemptuous, wrathful interest in what he was saying, and curiosity to know what it was that had induced him to make this venture; and, accordingly, gave him a glance, in which there was an impatient question. Purcell was not too discriminating. He felt encouraged by being listened to, from whatsoever motive.

"Two things," he said, with stolid steadiness. "One, to take Sturminster. I had settled before I would not take it, but St. Ermengilde. But when I heard that, I changed my mind, though it did not please the signor. Sturminster will make me independent; it will give me a home. And then I settled to tell you, Miss Lottie; if you are uncomfortable at home, if you don't like things that may be going to happen, to tell you that there's another home ready for you, if you will have it; a home that may be made very comfortable; a place of your own, to do what you like with, that will be waiting for you, whenever you please, at a moment's notice, the sooner the better. If you would say yes, I would go directly, I would go to-morrow and prepare — and nobody would be able to give you trouble or make you uncomfortable. Only say the word, and there is nothing, nothing I would not do —— "

Lottie stood and gazed at him, wondering, bitterly ashamed and humiliated, and yet not without a sense that so much simple devotion was worth more than to be crushed or scorned or flung from her, as she wished to fling it. She restrained herself with an effort. "What do you mean?" she said. "Is it possible that you are asking me to marry you, Mr. Purcell? That cannot be what you mean."

"What else could it be?" he said, turning on her a look of genuine surprise.

His cheeks grew crimson, and so did hers. A cry of anger and shame and confusion came from her breast. She stamped her foot impatiently on the ground. "You would never, never have ventured to ask me, never, if I had not been helpless and friendless and poor!"

"No," he said again, with a simplicity in which she could not help feeling a certain nobleness. "I would not have ventured, for I am not what you call a gentleman; but when I heard you were in trouble, I could not keep silent. I thought to myself, Miss Lottie shall not be unhappy because of having no home to go to."

"Oh!" said Lottie, putting out her hand to stop him. She could not bear any more. Her heart was sick with the mortification of such a suit. She could have crushed and trampled upon her humble lover, in rage and shame, and yet she could not but see the generosity and truth in his heart. If he had been less worthy, it would have been less hard upon her. "It is not a thing that can be," she cried hastily. "Oh, don't say another word. I know you are kind, but it is not a thing that can be —— "

"Not now?" he said, looking at her wistfully; "well, but perhaps another time? perhaps when you need it more — I am not in any hurry. Perhaps I am young to marry; the signor thinks so. But another time, Miss Lottie. Whenever you want me, you have but to say the word."

"Oh, don't think of it. I will never, never say the word. Forget it altogether, Mr. Purcell. I am very, very much obliged to you; but indeed it can never be."

The young man's countenance fell. Then he recovered himself. "I can't think you are taking everything into consideration. We could have a nice home, plenty of everything, and I should never spare trouble to see that you had all you were used to."

"Oh, go away, go away," she cried.

And as they stood there, some one else, his shadow slowly moving before him, came round the corner of the pathway, among the chestnut-trees; and Purcell felt that his opportunity was over. He was not sorry for it. He had done what was set before him; and if he had not succeeded, he was not discouraged. There was still hope for another time.

From Fraser's Magazine.

LOUIS BORNE.

THE claim which Louis Börne has upon our interest is that of a bold man who dared to tell unpalatable truths, political and social, to the German nation, and reaped his reward on the one hand in misconception and abuse, on the other in the honor of a patriot and the fame of a brilliant political writer.

Upon a tall narrow house in the Judengasse at Frankfort may still be read an inscription bearing the dates of his comparatively brief career — 1786 to 1837. At the former date the house was occupied by a wealthy Jewish family named Baruch; their second son was born on May 22, and on his subsequent adoption of Christianity

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

he became known as Louis Börne. Those of us who have seen the Judengasse of modern times must in imagination intensify every repellent feature of the place in order to have even an approximate idea of what it then was. Within the prescribed limits of their narrow quarter all Frankfort Jews were forced to live. Thus the houses were built closer and higher until in time light and air were excluded, and every corner from dingy cellar to gabled roof was crowded with human beings. Nothing that imagination might picture of the life behind those grimy walls and impervious windows could exceed the horrors of reality. The history of the men and women who swarmed in and out of the dark doorways was written in their crouching attitude, their stealthy tread, their fierce hopelessness or dull dejection of countenance; it was not only their own history, but that of generations of wronged and persecuted ancestors. In Frankfort hatred of the Jews had been from time immemorial a mark of orthodox Christianity, a municipal duty, a fashionable custom. Bettine, in her "Correspondence," tells us she was trained in Judenhass. The wealthier Jewish merchants, Baruch among the number, were able to vary their lives somewhat by the frequent journeys which their business necessitated. Either in Berlin or Vienna they found their kinsmen occupying a social position such as no wealth or learning could make possible under the tyranny of the Frankfort Senate. Even in Heine's "verdammtes Hamburg" the possibilities of emancipation were much greater.

Louis Börne and his two brothers were educated by a young tutor who resided in the house, and who was engaged upon the understanding that the instruction of the boys should be kept rigidly within the limits of orthodox Jewish regulations. The young man, Sachs by name, was well educated, and had breathed the freer intellectual air of Berlin. He found his conscience often sorely tried by the persistent questions of his pupil Louis; there was so much that he longed to explain and impart to the restless-minded boy, but for the embargo laid upon him. Sachs found Louis at twelve years old smaller and less vigorous than his brothers, reserved and quiet in manner, and the impression of extreme shyness was increased by a spot on one of his full bright eyes, which added uncertainty to their rapid glance. Beneath the outward indifference to all household and family interests Sachs perceived that the boy's brain was constantly at work, and he felt disposed to echo the grandfather's prophecy, "That lad will be a great man some day." As the least demonstrative among the boys Louis appears to have been made somewhat of a family scapegoat, particularly by the tyrant of the house, an old female servant. Louis found sarcasm the most effective method of dealing with her. Provoked by some ceremonial neglect on his part, she said one day to him, "If you were a rabbi you would have the whole congregation baptized." "In that case," replied the boy, "I should be the only Jew left, and should ruin the business of your two sons." Another time she told him plainly "he certainly must go to hell." To which he answered, "Indeed, I hope not, for then I should have no respite from you, even in eternity."

The patriarchal customs of the house and the frequent absences of Herr Baruch prevented any interchange of sympathy between father and son. The mother seems to have been only a cipher in the family, and to have influenced but little the childhood of Louis. It was the tutor who took the boys to the synagogue morning and evening, who explained to them the Jewish prayer-books (according to Friedländer), making them commit to memory the important passages; who taught them Hebrew, and endeavored to clear a pathway for them in the wilderness of Talmudic learning and ceremonial lore. It was only to the tutor that Louis dared to utter angry protests and indignant questions about the maze of contradictions by which he found himself every day surrounded. The gates of the Jewish quarter were locked on Sunday at four o'clock and no one permitted to go out, unless to a doctor, or for the purpose, then rarer than we can imagine, of posting a letter. As Louis passed the watch one day he said fiercely to Sachs, "I only don't go out at that gate because the man is stronger than I am." The Jews were forbidden to use the pavements, such as they were, in those days. Louis and his tutor were one day walking after heavy rain; the road was almost impassable in its depth of mud. "Let us cross to the pavement," said Louis. "You forget the prohibition," said the tutor. The boy's reply, "No one will see us," gave occasion for a lecture on the sanctity of law. "It is a stupid law," interrupted Louis,—"suppose it entered the burgomaster's head to forbid us to light a fire, we should all have to be frozen to death." With such restrictions on every hand it was no wonder that Louis under-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

stood all Christians to be his natural enemies. Upon this assumption he would give coins to Christian beggars instead of Jewish ones, until Sachs, with fine conscientiousness, explained that, despite appearances, the fact from which he reasoned was not true. And the lesson was not lost; it gave the boy a principle which helped him to combat his natural feeling of resentment, and enabled him, in later life, to judge the position of the Jews as a reasonable man, not wholly as an injured adversary. At thirteen two great problems suggested by the execution of Louis XVI. occupied his boyish brain. How could any man be so virtuous and so unfortunate? How could the grand idea of freedom be so abused by an entire nation? Louis Börne lived through a second revolution in Paris, and yet the problems were not solved!

Notwithstanding the circumscribed education which Herr Baruch's orthodoxy permitted, the fitness of Louis for a studious profession could not be overlooked. To a Jew that of medicine alone was open. At Giessen, in the house of Professor Hetzel, Louis remained for nearly three years, nominally studying preparatory subjects. He also read much of Jean Paul and of Lafontaine, and enjoyed the little society the place afforded.

In 1802 Louis Börne was removed from Giessen to Berlin. Although the university was not yet established there, medical schools existed, and the Prussian capital had already become the centre of scientific research. Chief among its men of note was the Jewish physician Dr. Marcus Herz, who had the best medical practice in Berlin, who pursued eagerly every new development of science, and who, by his lectures, attracted learned listeners from far and near, and established his fame throughout Germany. Baruch had heard of him in Frankfort, and greatly desired for his son the benefit of his experience and guidance; he therefore wrote, making to Marcus Herz a liberal proposal, and secured for Börne, in addition to the direction of his medical studies, the advantage of residence in the physician's house. The care of his patients and his private scientific work left Marcus Herz but little time for recreation, and the only kind for which he seemed to care was that provided for him in the social intercourse of his wife's well-frequented drawing-room. Now in the full prime of womanhood, Henriette Herz was equally celebrated for her beauty, her accomplishments, and her goodness of heart. A perfect mistress of all social art, gifted with tact, tenderness, and cheerful gaiety, she had for years past gathered round her the most interesting residents and visitors Berlin could boast. Upon certain evenings all such guests were welcomed as had already received a general invitation or been preceded by due introduction. Upon these occasions Börne would establish himself in a remote corner of the room with an air of perfect indifference toward the lively scene before him. Guests and friends would commiserate Henriette Herz upon the uninteresting character of her protégé; but they did not hear the sarcastic comments, the exhaustive questions which he would shoot out at long intervals during his daily association with his hostess, and which revealed to her that Börne's apathetic manner concealed in him much that was not commonplace. The new life, startling and stimulating as it was, furnished Börne with abundant food for thought. In the drawing-room of this Jewish household he saw the élite of the Christian world mingling with the despised Israelites, who in Frankfort would not have been allowed to tread the same pavement. He saw the families of Friedländer, Moses Mendelssohn, Itzig, Levy, Meyer, Levin, Jews who believed in their race if not in their religion, exchanging social amenities with Count Alexander Dohna, Count Bernstorff, Baron Brinckmann, Carl Laroche, W. and A. von Humboldt, Frau von Berg (a court lady), Elise von der Recke, with the publishers Reimar and Unger, their wives and many other ladies. Some intimate and distinguished members of this circle had lately left Berlin; among them Schleiermacher, who was just settled as professor in Halle; Tieck, who was in Jena or Dresden; Gentz also had lately transferred his services to Vienna, and F. Schlegel had joined the literary band at Jena. Börne would observe the same mixture of race and class in the audiences who attended, probably from very different reasons, the scientific lectures of Marcus Herz. Scholars of unmistakable citizen extraction sat beside fine ladies and gentlemen from the court. Henriette Herz frequently on these occasions acted as assistant to her husband in his experiments, and one day charmed memorably a little prince of five years old by a brilliant explosion.*

* Afterwards Frederick William IV. When Alexander von Humboldt appealed to the king in 1845 on behalf of Henriette Herz, he himself recalled the incident with genial good humor, and ordered for her a pension of five hundred thalers a year, and a present of fifty louis d'or.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Societies for dramatic reading or literary discussion were much the fashion in Berlin at this date, and Henriette Herz appears to have been a member of three at least. Börne would probably be admitted to one of these, which had a varied existence of many years under the name of the Wednesday Society. It was usually held at the house of Engel, the writer and critic, and included Schadow the sculptor, Reichard the musician, Delbrück, tutor to the royal princes; Ramler, Hirt, Philip Moritz, and other literary men; Fischer the naturalist, who read treatises and performed experiments; Fleck the great actor, who looked like a king even without a sword and mantle, who seemed always a hero whether annihilating a villain on the stage or accepting a cup of coffee in private life, but who read aloud worse than any other member of the party. The names of the ladies have not all been preserved, but among them would be Elise von der Recke, Dorothea Veit, and Marianne Meyer, afterwards Frau von Eybenberg, and her sister, who became Frau von Grotthuis. The critical discussion and the fugitive remarks which reached the ears of Börne would all bear more or less upon the vexed question of the day in Berlin: the comparative merits of the old poetry and of the new criticism. Börne had heard only rumors of the new lights Goethe and Schiller, and about the young upstarts of the romantic school he knew nothing. The paper warfare was raging fiercely in Berlin. Nicolai, the mouthpiece of the Philistinism of the day, uttered his opinion that it was quite easy to write as Goethe and as Schiller did. The time-honored critical canons by which he and others regulated their material and their style were despised by these new poets, who went on writing whatever happened to come into their heads. He could do the same if he chose! Engel also, on the appearance of "Wilhelm Meister," wondered what, after Scarron's novel, there remained to be said about "comedian life." Elise von der Recke discarded her name of Charlotte in wrath at its association with "Werther;" and Klopstock, after reading that work, declined to open any more by the same author. Marcus Herz also stood by the old school of literature, and would admire no writer later than Lessing. The same was true of the cultivated David Friedländer, who one day brought Herz for elucidation an obscure passage in Goethe. "Pray go to my wife," said the physician in reply; "she understands the art of explaining nonsense." Madame Herz took enthusiastically the side of the new school, and not only rivalled her friend, the already famous Rahel, in her admiration for Goethe, but also in her interest for the early writings of the romanticists, Ludwig Tieck and Novalis. Börne must have heard them all freely discussed, and would doubtless hear too how, in Jena, Novalis at twenty-eight had just breathed his last in the arms of F. Schlegel, and had left to Tieck the difficult task of arranging for publication his unfinished romance of "Heinrich von Ofterdingen." Amid these conflicting interests, social and literary, Börne saw Henriette Herz the presiding genius; bright and equable, sympathetic and intelligent, a companionable woman such as no dream, no reality had ever suggested to him. He abandoned even the pretence of medical study, gave himself passively up to all the sunshiny influences about him, and filled his brain, through books and people, with all the historic bearings of a time teeming with that future whose sorrows were to stir his soul, kindle his latent genius, and control his whole career.

In the year 1803 Marcus Herz died after a brief illness. Börne entreated to be allowed to continue in the house. Henriette saw no difficulty in the arrangement, she being thirty-eight and Börne seventeen years old. One day, however, she was alarmed while visiting her mother, by the appearance of one of her servants, who showed to her a note which Börne had entrusted to her to deliver to a certain chemist. It contained money, and an order for arsenic, with the explanation that he was going away for a few days and wished to clear his room of mice during his absence. Henriette Herz sent her sister Brenna to her house to see Börne; she drew from him a passionate confession of his hopeless attachment to Henriette Herz and his indifference to life, but the young girl, who knew him well, thought she had succeeded in bringing him back to a reasonable state of mind. After a short time, however, a second attempt of the same kind convinced Henriette Herz that another home must be found for him. This she arranged with Dr. Reil, a physician and professor at Halle. Before leaving Börne gave to her copies of letters he had written but not delivered to her, and also of a short diary he had kept while under her roof. These were published in 1860, but the greater part of their correspondence was destroyed by Henriette Herz shortly before her death in 1847. It

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

is interesting to discover from these fragments how, from the first day, Börne was impressed by the harmony, the dignified repose, the poetic charm which characterized the life and home of Henriette Herz. He puts down with delight simple everyday facts; that Madame Herz does not wear rings or hair-powder; that the cooking is excellent, and the breakfast-rolls of ambrosial consistency unknown before; that he had told Dr. Herz he had never seen any one he admired and liked so much as Madame Herz. Then the naïve utterances and witticisms change to more intense expressions of adoration and passionate exclamations of despair, after the old, old fashion. When the time came to leave Berlin the sharpness of the conflict between reason and imagination had subsided, and he could write, "If Madame Herz loved me as I love her, I believe that my love would not altogether cease, but gradually decline; there is, however, no fear of her making an experiment with that kind of cure." And again, "How I wish for Madame Herz that she would marry some man whom she could really love!" This sentence, also written on the day he left Berlin, is very characteristic in its combined pathos and mockery: "How I wished once more to come up to you, once more to look round your room! These flowers come from my heart. They will bloom when the blossoming time of my life is stifled in the reeking vapors of the Halle salt-magazines. Assuredly you will think of me then."

Throughout his four years' residence in Halle, Börne addressed to Madame Herz, as his "Dear mother," calm, thoughtful, egotistical letters, which are an interesting revelation of the youth and his intellectual growth. He learned heartily to esteem Dr. Reil, a man of commanding appearance, with eyes like Frederick the Great's, and who inspired his patients with such confidence that, it was said, "they sometimes lost life but never hope." The sensitiveness of Börne was constantly wounded by the contrast of the prosaic Reil household with that which he had left; the professor's wife seems to have been a connoisseur in the art of making herself disagreeable. In a letter containing a caustic description of his surroundings, Börne remarks: "Time only heals by distraction; what it cannot disturb it can never heal." Then almost in the same sentence: "I am very angry with Brenna that she does not write to me; tell her there is a ropemaker living opposite with whom I have an account." About Halle he writes: "The inexpressible prose of this place is enough to drive one mad; some sarcastic Satan must have created it as a parody upon the seventh day." In graver moods he became Jean Paulish: "The dream is the shadow of our life, as our present existence is the shadow of a life to come. One day, when the sun is right above our heads, all shadows will disappear." Again: "You once wrote to me that you wished a good spirit would overshadow me; it has come, and with a friendly greeting. Ah! if life had but a haven, how sweet the storms would be! But the desired land is always beyond the horizon, and the breakers around shatter our frail lives."

Among those lectures which Börne attended in Halle, were the medical courses of Reil, those on natural science by Steffens, and on ethics by Schleiermacher. His acquaintance with the latter never ripened into friendship. With all his study and culture of individual character, Schleiermacher failed to read Börne, and wrote despairing reports of him to Madame Herz. He saw only those faults which throughout Börne's life lay so plainly upon the surface; his apparent idleness and apathy, his wilfulness, his caprice, and that astounding egotism which was nevertheless compatible with renunciation and self-sacrifice.

When, on October 19, 1806, Napoleon entered Halle and dispersed the university, Börne was among the twelve hundred students whose patriotism had been roused by the indignation of Schleiermacher and the eloquence of Steffens. Even in his later letters, before leaving Halle to live in Frankfort, Börne showed signs of that awakening anger against tyranny and bad government which became the ruling passion of his life. "Those who are better than myself," he writes, "will I gladly serve, but the Philistines of the earth I long to see at my feet." He abandoned the study of medicine for that of jurisprudence, and occupied a small municipal post whilst Frankfort was under French dominion. After the fall of Napoleon and the subsequent removal of the French government, the Frankfort Senate hastened to restore with additional severity all former restrictions against the Jews, and the Jew was therefore deprived of his office. Börne compared these persecutions on the part of the government to an Indian snake-hunt; in which an ox is driven into the jaws of the snake, who swallows it, and again coils himself round in impotent slumber.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

The then popular subject of Freemasonry occupied Börne for a time, and he even delivered lectures in one of their lodges. He wished to enter one which was called the "Socrates Lodge," but was met at the threshold by the question, "Are you a Christian?" To his reply in the negative he added the sarcasm, "that if Socrates stood beside him, he too must answer no, and turn his back upon the lodge." Börne soon found the limitations and petty detail of the brotherhood only irksome, and his interest declined. It was the habit of his mind to judge all things broadly, men in masses, actions in results: to study individual men he held to be "like reading small print."

The guiding events of Börne's history were his renunciation of Judaism, his editorship of a monthly journal, called Die Wage (the Balance), and his friendship for Madame Wohl. His hereditary connection with Jewish observances and religion had gradually ceased. Under the restrictions against which he daily chafed, he was powerless for political good to Jew or German, and no doubt took this step in 1818 to gain a wider opening for his lifelong crusade against the misgovernment of Europe. It can hardly be said that he accepted a definite creed in place of the system he renounced. Christianity, as the religion of love, had been strangely exemplified to him in the dealings of the Frankfort Senate. Possibly through Schleiermacher and Henriette Herz he had received some truer, nobler ideas, which the experiences of a life of much suffering and disappointment served to develop. That he was in sympathy with those who sought religious light and truth appears in his short philosophical essay, "The Neophytes of Faith and the Apostates of Knowledge;" and in expressions like the following: "What is the use of all these investigations about the practical truths of Christianity? The faith in Christianity is the greatest miracle of all, and there is no possibility of reasoning that away."

It is difficult now to understand the effect produced by the first appearance of Börne's journal, unless we could make ourselves acquainted in detail with the pitiful condition of the periodical press in Germany at the period of reaction after the war of liberation. The first number of it went quickly through two editions. Börne's own writing took mostly the form of dramatic critiques, for which he made daily notes, on the theatrical performances; these notes he carefully studied, polished, and spiced, until his name became a terror to the theatrical world of Frankfort. In reply to the threatening letters which he received, he bought and carried a brace of pocket-pistols. Börne's object, however, lay altogether beyond the critiques themselves; through all ran the political red thread. When he commented upon the voice of a prima donna, the delivery of an actor, or protested against a battle being represented by six men with an accompaniment of tin cans in the distance, or against the inappropriately small supply of fireworks for the closing scene in "Don Giovanni," he had in view some municipal or state regulalations which were a part of the general system of oppressive mismanagement. On sending the first copy of the journal to a friend, an actor named Weidner, he wrote: "The theatrical critiques are not for such as you; they are only baits to entice readers who do not care to read anything else." The diplomatists at Vienna soon observed the cloven hoof: Metternich with anger, Gentz with admiration. The opinion of the latter is quoted by Rahel, in a letter to her friend Auguste Brede: "I have made a new acquaintance, whom I have not yet seen; Doctor Börne, of Frankfort-on-Maine. I commend him to you most strongly. He has a journal, Die Wage; you must persuade your friends to take it in, or, what would be better still, get it taken in at the reading-room. It was recommended to me by Gentz with enthusiastic praise as the cleverest, wittiest writing of the day. Speaking of one article only he says, 'No such dramatic criticism has appeared since the days of Lessing.' Naturally, I took Gentz at his word; but the reality far surpassed his praise in its wit and its admirable style. The man must be a very upright man; he is clear-sighted, profound, courageous, genuinely true, not new-fashioned yet quite new, stately withal, and like one of the ancient heroes. In short, my great favorite. If you read his criticism on a piece that you have never seen, he brings the whole before you. Pray get all your friends to take it in; you will laugh yourself well again. I have seen no other writings of his. Gentz is strongly opposed to his political views, but at the same time finds it natural for him to entertain them."

Rahel soon afterwards (in 1819) made the personal acquaintance of Börne. He dined with her and Varnhagen von Ense at the historical White Swan at Frankfort; an inn famous alike for the well-known persons who frequented it, and for the

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

unimpeachable character of its sauerkraut. Rahel saw in Börne a small, slightly-built man, with pale complexion, dark hair, and finely-cut, regular features. With her quick perception she noted the intensity of expression in his full brown eyes, and recognized in the delicate outline and play of his mouth, not only the sharp and ready irony, but that peculiar expression of pathos which characterized it and which in grave talk deepened into positive pain. They sympathized heartily as they discussed the humiliating political reaction in Germany, and laid a scheme for starting a Liberal paper in which Varnhagen, Börne, Lindner, and Oelsner were to take the lead. But the publication of the notorious Carlsbad decrees quenched the bright little project.

It was in the winter of 1816–17, when Borne was thirty years of age, that he first met with Madame Wohl. Still quite young, she had just been released from an unhappy marriage through a divorce, which in Germany may be obtained with equal facility by wife or husband. Although not handsome, Madame Wohl charmed by her dignified simplicity of manner, her freedom from all pretence, and by that sense of repose which she imparted, and which pleased Börne better than brilliant endowments; at the same time she was intellectually cultivated and refined. Börne was almost a daily visitor in the family with whom Madame Wohl resided. The acquaintance became a friendship which outward circumstances combined to make intimate and lasting. Ten years later, when Börne saw Henriette Herz in Berlin, she asked, "Why are you and Madame Wohl not married?" Börne repled, "Because she will not trust me." Knowing him so thoroughly as she did, Madame Wohl could have no doubts about his conscientious, upright character; but she would also know the strength of his convictions and the inconsiderate zeal with which he could carry them out, his one-sidedness, his caprices, his delicate health. It is true that his greatest failings lay upon the surface, but the surface of daily life is important. Possibly also Madame Wohl had heard Börne express the dislike he entertained to the idea of marriage, and foresaw that with his variable moods a speedy repentance might follow. In this decision she probably gave evidence of that mature judgment on which, both in literary and other matters, Börne gladly relied to the end of his days. To his correspondence with Madame Wohl the public owe his famous "Letters from Paris," the earlier volumes of which were selected by her for publication.

In 1819 Börne gave up his journal and removed to Paris. The former act is perhaps sufficiently explained in the fact that he appears to have been at once editor, contributor, clerk, and banker. He now entered into an arrangement with Cotta, the publisher at Stuttgart, for an income of six thousand francs to supply him with articles on French affairs. "France," said Börne, "is the dial-plate of Europe; there you see what the time is. In other countries you do not know the hour until you hear the clock strike. It is easier to miss the sound than the sight." Madame Wohl, accompanied by a friend, afterwards Madame Reinganum, also spent this winter in Paris. They occupied rooms near to those of Börne, and supplied to him the sense of domestic repose and the stimulus to intellectual effort of which he stood in need. Börne had no personal ambition; the mainspring of all his writing was benevolence. He saw humanity to be in a bad case, owing certainly in part to its inherent indolence and selfishness, but also to the fact of its being "too much governed" and "too ill-governed." The impulse to arouse the Germans to understand and to amend this condition of affairs by individual effort he followed in his own original way; to this vocation were consecrated his personal influence and his literary genius. When from discouragement at the persistent national apathy his zeal flagged, Madame Wohl would remind him of some unfinished manuscript, some half-developed scheme, and so stimulate him to overcome the temporary depression. To the lack of personal ambition, and to the uncertainty of health and mood, must be attributed the ephemeral and fragmentary form of the work which Börne has left behind. The same instinct of benevolence which dictated the work of his life, also made itself agreeably felt in daily intercourse, and somewhat affected the relations of his expenditure and income. With genial alacrity he would assist a German refugee, or carry to a friend some tasteful Parisian luxury; the birthdays of ladies and children whom he liked were always commemorated by flowers. His own personal tastes were what is called "aristocratic." He choose rooms in an open, airy quarter, and supplied with the then unusual luxury of carpets; birds and growing flowers added brightness to the comfort. He was particular about the fineness of his clothes, his linen, his gloves, and followed with

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

curious interest every new fashion in the tie of a cravat. He liked also to be well served, and in the "Letters from Paris" often alludes to the eccentricities of his man Konrad (also a literary character), whose strong personal attachment made his presence essential to Börne's comfort. In the matter of diet he was of necessity careful and abstemious; he took no wine, and only contracted the habit of smoking by medical advice; it gave him relief from pain, and became so inveterate that in every personal description of Börne we find the pipe an accessory. Cotta's six thousand francs were naturally inadequate to these demands. Börne could spend recklessly, though not selfishly, but could never make money. Herr Baruch had long been painfully aware of this fact, and sent remittances, accompanied often by a grudging protest. Twenty thousand guldens had been spent upon the education of a son whose only return was made in malicious writings aganst his father's old patron, Prince Metternich. In 1827, Börne, through the death of Herr Baruch, came into possession of a fixed income. The same winter he took his long desired journey to Berlin in a carriage of his own.

The fame of the first series of the "Letters from Paris" had already reached Berlin. Borne met with cordial welcome at the hospitable house of Rahel and Varnhagen von Ense, who sympathized entirely with his political views. Madame Herz he also met again, and went with her as in the old days to the gatherings of the Wednesday Society, where he was made much of by Ludwig Robert and Willibald Alexis. Both these writers, however, savagely attacked his later writings.

In consequence of a severe illness from which Börne had suffered in 1822, he was obliged every year to visit some German bath. In the eventful summer of 1830 he stayed in a small primitive place near Frankfort called Soden. Börne was trying to forget the outer world, to give himself up to the organization of picnics or the study of the domestic economy of a neighboring farmyard, when news reached him of the July Revolution in Paris. With burning impatience he awaited the slow-travelling intelligence of each day, until at length he started for the scene of action. Upon his way he writes thus to Madame Wohl of the state of Germany: —

When I reached Darmstadt I could not but laugh to remember that a few days before a frightful revolution had taken place there. The streets were as quiet as those of Frankfort are at midnight; the few persons visible walked about like snails. We had heard that the castle was on fire, and a friend of mine climbed a high tower to see the light. All was false. The citizens are discontented, not with the government, but with the Liberals, who decline to pay the grand duke's debts. That is true German grumbling, and is all very well — there is a Rossini melody about it. If you will not believe that I sat for three hours in a theatre yesterday hearing "Minna von Barnhelm" from beginning to end, I will not be angry. Many improbable things are true. I can bear much upon a journey. There were at least fifty soldiers present; about one to every two of the spectators. Far too few in these wild times. Early this morning a squadron rode under my window trumpeting me, and all the children, and grey heads, and invalids, and sweet dreaming maidens out of their slumbers. The same happens every day. These little German princes in their nutshell residences arm themselves all round with prickles like horse-chestnuts. How thankful I am to get out of the country! Adieu, adieu. Write to me on the spot when you hear of any sublime stupidity.

From Paris Börne sent pictures of daily life as he saw it — the surface and what lay beneath it. They are humorous, pathetic, grotesque, tragical, and to be adequately understood must be taken as a whole. In some are delightful suggestions of a genial playfulness: in some the passionate exhortation, the fierce political invective, recall an earlier agitator — Jonathan Swift. Here is one scene in September 1830: —

There has been a commemoration here today of four subalterns, who, in connection with the conspiracy of Berton, fell into the hands of the government, and were murdered as defenceless prisoners on the Place de la Grève eight years ago. They were butchered, but being done with a judicial flourish it was called an execution. In the evening a State concert took place. It makes one wild. Only eight years, and what was then a crime is changed into a virtue. If according to the laws of humanity and of war the vanquished had been kept in prison, the unhappy youths might still have been alive. With what jubilant triumph would their prison have been opened, with what rapture would they again have greeted the light and air of freedom! Kings are hasty because they know there is no eternity for them, and nations slow because they know they live forever. Here is the trouble. Now, as then, when I witnessed the accursed execution, my anger was less against the arrogance of power than against the contemptible cowardice of the people. A few hundred men were there to carry out the official murder. These were shut in by thousands of citizens whose hearts were bursting with wrath and hatred. There was no question of risk of life, scarcely indeed of a wound. Had they only exerted themselves as much as they

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

do any crowded opera night, worked with their elbows right and left, the tyranny would have been suppressed and its victims rescued, but for the superstitious fear of military power. Why did they not then do what they have had to do eight years later? One is driven to despair in seeing how a nation needs to become intoxicated with hatred before it has courage enough to gratify it; that a nation cannot find its heart until it has lost its head.

Oct. 1830. Yesterday evening I was at Lafayette's, who has a soirée every Tuesday. It is hard to give you any idea of the scene; you need to have been present. In three rooms were about three hundred people, so crowded together that they literally could not move. Lafayette is above seventy and looks fairly hearty, but how the old man lasts through the whole evening of heat and crush it baffles one to understand. But he is a Frenchman. I talked with several people whom I did not know; there were many Germans present, young folks who held much revolutionary talk. In fact the whole company would have been hanged in Austria. All was free and easy, like a coffee-house — only with gratuitous refreshments. . . . The finest character of the new time is and remains Lafayette. He is enthusiasm grown old, of such kind as has never been imagined or painted. He has experienced deceit, treachery, hypocrisy, violence of all kinds, and still believes in virtue, truth, freedom, right! Such men give better proof of the existence of a God than the Old and New Testaments and the Koran combined.

Dec. 26, 1830. I jest and yet am right sad at heart. In my despair I send for a cup of chocolate and try to persuade myself that it is to blame for my gloomy forebodings. My dreams about the freedom of France are all over. In politics it is neither summer nor winter — the most pitiable Revolution spring I ever knew. Not warm enough to be without a fire, not cold enough to light it up, one freezes without remedy. At home we have no doubt about its being winter, and we put on flannel — in that beautiful country of which I read yesterday in the papers that folks in the streets and casinos ask each other with tremulous smiles "whether the Duke of Coburg is likely to marry again," and both smile and are silent; where the state chancellor Niebuhr in Bonn, having been told in print that he had formerly associated with Potter, fights hand and foot against such an insinuation as a child does against cold water, and declares upon his honor never with a finger to have touched that disturber of the peace! But here, the meadows were already green, and now the snow falls thickly upon them! The Chamber, that old coquette, who paints and makes eyes and abuses the young ones, I should like to see it horsewhipped. When it was young was it not as bad as the rest? Lafayette has been removed from his command in the National Guard, and the minister of war has placed the entire Ecole Polytechnique under arrest. It was these young heroes who influenced the fight of July. But for them all these deputies and ministers would probably have been food for the ravens. It was Lafayette who kept the Revolution pure and saved it from anarchy. To him Orleans and the princes of Europe owe their crowns. He told the people it was possible for a king to love freedom, and they believed him. May Heaven keep me from ever having to take part in State affairs! I see that the very best men who come into power lose first their hearts and then their heads, retaining of the latter only just enough to keep the former in subjection. There is no question of uncertainty or misunderstanding. Faith with the people has been deliberately broken; they have had promises without fulfilment. The authorities talk here, as with us, about misleaders of the people, disturbers of the peace, republican agitation, and so forth. But no man asks for a republic; they only want those republican institutions which were promised them in the day of fear. With these men "agitation" is said to begin where their own advantage leaves off. I hear that Lafayette and Dupont will leave the ministry, and the prefect of Paris be displaced. I do not doubt but the government is strong enough to carry it out without popular disturbance. But what then? Peace, the only desirable and lasting peace, resting upon the general content of the citizen classes, cannot be established in this way. Dissatisfaction will increase, the malcontents will become stronger than the government, and the battle will begin over again. Whenever I come to be minister, hold up before me my democratic letters. I already know what the reply will be. I shall say nothing, only smile and invite you to my next ball, and then you will smile too. We ministers and you people are all alike. Now I shall change my dress and go and read the papers and gather fresh irritation. In rye there is more nutriment than in potatoes, more in wheat than in rye, but most of all in anger. Snow and woe are the newest things out here. Have you also snow? I need not ask about the other. . . . Now a happy New Year to you! May it be a better one for us than for emperors and kings. That is a modest wish, which Heaven might well grant us. I give Konrad instructions, if an emperor calls, to look well at his hands and not to leave him alone in the room. During next year a dozen eggs will cost more than a dozen princes.

Those letters which Börne wrote from Paris in 1831–2 were mainly directed against his critics in Germany. It was not his personal ambition or literary vanity which was wounded by these attacks, but the entire misapprehension in which they originated that gave him pain. Börne's emotional nature was strong, it often perhaps overpowered his judgment. His love for his country was correspondingly intense, but it never assumed a sentimental

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

character. Enthusiastic adulation, declamation in popular German fashion about the fatherland and all its virtues, was not possible to Börne. His great crime was, that he must tell the truth, that he must be forever upbraiding and correcting. German Liberals might read with satisfaction tirades against princes and privy councillors, against caprice and tyranny in high places, but to be told that they themselves were responsible in State affairs, and greatly to blame for existing evils, was quite another matter. Börne wished to make them see the mischief of the separation between the intellectual activity of Germany and its practical life; to convince them that individual self-government, mutual confidence, calm, persistent, practical effort in the direction of securing the best laws, would ultimately accomplish more than many revolutions. He would have had a German thinker expend upon the real questions of the day more of that intellectual power which he contentedly devotes to the process of "evolving camels from the depths of his own moral consciousness." What forbearance could be extended to a countryman who wrote in this style of the most cultivated people in Europe? "Every man has a right to be a blockhead, nothing can be said against it, but even a right should be exercised with modesty; the Germans abuse it." Börne's plain speaking was intolerable alike to the iconoclastic, self assertive democrat and to the comfortable official mind of the reactionist. By the latter he was held up as a warning of the fatal depths of ingratitude towards his country into which a man might be betrayed by democratic ideas, and they prophesied an indignant expulsion for him if he dared again to set foot in Germany. Börne's next visit to Frankfort, however, proved a political ovation, with serenade, procession, Lebehoch, and all fitting expressions of enthusiasm. The authorities would gladly have arrested the obnoxious Börne; failing to do this, they endeavored to deprive him of a small pension which he drew, but Dr. Reinganum, his legal friend, fought a victorious battle for him.

The few remaining years of Börne's life were spent for the most part in Paris. That was his place of inspiration and his workshop. To the German baths he went for health, and to Frankfort only to assuage the homesickness which tormented him; at the same time he admitted his birthplace to be interesting to him but on one day in the week, "Friday, sauerkraut day at the White Swan." The incessant pulsation of political and social life in Paris was to Börne a stimulus and a delight. From his winter quarters in the Rue Lafitte, or his summer retreat in Auteuil, he watched the throbbings of the heart of the world. He saw clearly and estimated keenly little incidents or apparently trivial occurrences, reading in them political indications of good or evil augury. His own theories and thoughts were always associated with men and with events, with active practical life, and on this account the whole character of his literary work is journalistic. To write for the sake of writing, for the pleasure of creating, rounding, perfecting an artistic production, was to him unnatural; he needed the incentive of life, action, and opposition. At the same time he never wrote in haste; an article which was to point out some hidden grievance, to batter some political assumption, would occupy his mind for weeks. His best thoughts would haunt his brain with uneasy persistency until they suddenly took perfect shape, and he could put them down in a poetic figure, in an epigram, or in his favorite form of antithesis. The reader of Jean Paul must at once recognize his influence upon Börne's style. But the latter is never prolix, he rarely says a word too much, and knows precisely when a metaphor has done its work. The humorous titles of many essays, as "A Monograph of a Post Snail," the mock German topography of which Börne makes use, are all reminiscences of the author whose poetry and satire had been the chief enjoyment of his own prosaic boyhood. Jean Paul ridiculed the infinitesimal German principalities, the punctiliousness, affectation, wickedness, and general tinsel of their courts, the barren, humdrum mediocrity of their town-life. Börne looked below the surface of these things, and worked out his political doctrine of equality. He was not content to ridicule; like a true knight-errant, he must attack even though he could not redress the wrong.

The last volume of the "Letters from Paris" is perhaps the most collected in thought and feeling, the most finished in style, of all Börne's writings. His intellect was keen, vigorous as ever, despite his deafness and his failing bodily strength, but he was daily losing heart for Germany, for humanity. He saw how France was deceived after the Revolution of 1830, and foresaw that Germany would also be cheated out of every inch of freedom it had gained. The democratic agitation was fast subsiding, to be followed, as he well knew, by that vis inertiæ in which

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

his countrymen excel. Upon these sad facts and prospects he pondered constantly, and lost by degrees his elasticity, and not a little of that hopefulness of which his store had been so large. Although, with good reason, he had learned to distrust men, he never could relinquish his belief in what he held to be the divine in man. It was this intense earnestness, this morbid, unresting anxiety without counterbalancing hope, which made Börne's society at this time so intolerable to Heine's lighter mood, and which in fact precipitated the final quarrel between them. Börne had been his host in Frankfort on more than one occasion; Heine spoke of him with something akin to reverence, and told him upon his first visit he passed and repassed the door before he "plucked up heart to enter." In Paris they associated but little together. Börne looked on Heine as on "a lad chasing butterflies across a battle-field;" while Heine was made absolutely miserable by the earnestness of Börne, by his connection with operative associations, his fraternity with those rougher democrats who with unwashed hands laid unclean petitions upon the restaurant table for him to sign. Börne wrote a French article in M. Raspail's Réformateur on Heine's salon, upbraiding him with coldness in the good cause of freedom. Heine retaliated with bitterness and ridicule; in the next volume of his "Letters from Paris" Börne wrote a severe but not hostile judgment upon Heine's account of "French Affairs." The result was an open breach, kindly facilitated in the usual manner by common friends. Heine threatened Börne with a challenge, and the latter with half-humorous bravado dogged him everywhere to show that he was not afraid. A crisis, however, was avoided, and the enemies occasionally met, without speaking, at soirées in the house of the composer Hiller. The frequent comparisons drawn between these two men are worse than idle. Little indeed had they in common: Heine, the greatest German poet after Goethe, with a defective moral nature, whose lawlessness combined with outward circumstances to place him in antagonism to all authority and to make him ever ready, at least to sing the praises of liberty; Börne, a prophet rather than a poet, who brought with him into the world an almost morbid moral sensibility, a fanatical politician, who saw in every man an equal — a wandering heir of the lost inheritance of freedom whom it behoved him to pioneer along the thorny homeward path.

Among the phases of French thought which developed rapidly after the July Revolution, was St. Simonianism. Börne's first notice of it is characteristic: —

> A religious society has been growing up here lately which seeks to diffuse the doctrines of St. Simon. I never before heard anything of this Simon. Sunday sermons are preached, and I am told community of goods is one of their fundamental doctrines. The society has already many followers, and among them the son of my banker. When I go to him for more money, and offer him a cheque, he will no doubt say, "That is not at all necessary, my money is also yours." I shall be very glad to hear it.

Börne studied carefully these new theories, but upon the whole rejected them as untenable. Of the three mottoes of La Globe newspaper he only held the first; to the effect that all social regulations must have for their object the moral and political interests of the poorest and most numerous class of the community. Much more attractive to Börne was the personal influence and character of Lamennais. When his "Paroles d'un Croyant" appeared in 1832, Börne read it with enthusiasm, translated it into German, and had the satisfaction of seeing the whole edition sold in Switzerland, with the exception of five hundred copies ordered by an adventurous Leipsic bookseller. In this little book Börne thought he had at last found combined politics and religion after his own heart; Lamennais became to him in his last days what Jean Paul had been in his early youth. It was not until after Börne's death that Lamennais broke away from the Christian faith, as he had long broken away from ecclesiastical authority.

Madame Wohl had been for some time residing in Frankfort, and had there married Herr Strauss, who was also a friend and ardent admirer of Börne. When the health of the latter began seriously to fail in 1836 they left Frankfort and took rooms near to him in Paris, thus providing for him the quiet, congenial society, and the watchful care which his heart and health alike required. Early in the year 1837 an attack of influenza, then raging in Paris, settled upon his already delicate lungs. Börne, certain that death was near, awaited it with quiet patience, grieving only for those whom he knew he should leave behind to grieve. On the evening of February 12 there was nothing left for Konrad to do but to kneel and pray for his dear friend and master. Turning to Madame Strauss with a long farewell look, Börne said, "Sie haben mir viele Freude ge-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

macht" ("You have given me much happiness"). The life which had been one long battle ended in peaceful calm, and after death each familiar trace of sadness vanished from the placid features.

Beside Börne's grave in Père la Chaise words of kindly sympathy and appreciation were spoken by M. Raspail.* They had worked much together at the short-lived Réformateur. M. Raspail, the indomitable republican, the clear-headed man of science, shared Börne's political views, and admired the terseness and vigor of his style. "This is a new French," he said to Börne, "a French without rhetoric." And in the funeral oration he placed Börne in the first rank of French writers. In 1842 a broken column of granite was placed above the grave, and a bronze bust of Börne executed by David. The friends of Börne felt that he had died of a broken heart, but his enemies spoke of him as a hypochondriac who had succumbed to influenza. Among the latter was Heine, who published a dastardly attack entitled "Heine UEBER Börne." In it he laid claim to a general superiority over his foe, and, drawing largely upon his imagination, proceeded to detail conversations, incidents, and facts relating to Börne's opinions and private life, in which he did not scruple also to reflect on Madame Strauss. Heine received a challenge from Herr Strauss, and a duel took place. Truly, a pure friendship which had been a stay and a delight for twenty years, and in the last hours of life was to Börne a supreme solace, might well surpass the comprehension of such a man as Heine! What Börne's feeling was in a similar case about critics who had passed beyond the possibility of reply, we see in his humorous reference to Ludwig Robert, who died in 1832 just as Börne's answer to his attack was published: —

> One of my anonymous critics whom I have pretty thoroughly mauled has played me the mean trick of dying, which makes me very uncomfortable, for I said things that I could not with any propriety have said of a man who was not there to answer for himself. I must put up a daily prayer for the life of my critics. If Häring (W. Alexis) were to die before my letters are printed, I should drown myself.

In this mere outline of Börne's character and work we have, of necessity, left many matters untouched. Among others, that gulf which to the last remained impassable between Börne the Frankfort Jew and Goethe the Frankfort aristocrat; the skirmishes with the renegade W. Menzel, and the whole detail of Börne's somewhat inconsistent political creed.* We have only said a little to show that he was no vulgar demagogue, no "red handed Jacobin," no mere hypochondriac, but a man — passionate and one-sided perhaps — of noble aspirations, of careful culture, of original genius, with an intensity of soul which ultimately wore out its ill-matched bodily frame. J.

* M. Raspail, though born in 1794, has to-day his place in the Assembly at Versailles. His scientific and political journal during its brief life of some eighteen months was twenty times condemned, and paid in fines one hundred thousand francs. M. Raspail devoted his energies to organic chemistry and political reform, and has written books upon the "History of the Poles," and the "Organism of Ammonites."

* These points are treated after his usual discursive fashion by Karl Gutzkow in his "Life of Börne." It appeared in 1840 shortly after the pamphlet of Heine to which we have referred, and is an enthusiastic defence and panegyric; unsatisfactory as it may be in many respects, it still remains the only memoir. We are further indebted for several traits and incidents to the "Recollections" of Henriette Herz, of Varnhagen von Ense, and of Fanny Lewald.

A DOUBTING HEART.

BY MISS KEARY,

AUTHOR OF "CASTLE DALY," "OLDBURY," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

IDLE TEARS.

"WELL, Alma, I really think that at last I have earned a few minutes' rest."

The speaker of this sentence was not, as might be supposed, a weary sempstress in an attic, hushing the click of her machine, as it completed the last stitch in her long, long day's tale of work, or a washerwoman in a cellar wringing the soap-suds from her wrinkled arms, or a governess, whose charges had just been borne off to bed. It was a handsome, matronly lady, in a black velvet dress, who, suiting her action to her words, sank down into a well-cushioned chair by a glowing fire in a London drawing-room. The last visitor had been shown out, the footman had disappeared with the afternoon tea-tray, the doors of the inner drawing-room were shut, and the curtains drawn across; but there was something beyond even these tokens of quiet, that combined to fill the room just then with a subtle atmosphere of repose. There was a suggestion, though one could not precisely say where it lurked, that this delightful stillness succeeded a commotion of some sort. It might be given by some unusually festive arrangements of the furniture of the room, or

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

by occasional sounds of hurrying feet and clacking tongues that came up from the lower regions. Alma read it most plainly in the radiant self-satisfaction that shone in her mother's face, and seemed to surround her whole person with an aura of congratulation and conscious well-doing. Only for an instant did her lace cap touch the back of her chair, the next her head was erect again, and her face turned to her daughter with an alert expression on it, which told Alma that the discussion of yesterday's events, that had been going on since morning, and of which she herself was sick at heart, was about to be opened again in some new phase.

"Do you know, my dear Alma," Lady Rivers began, "I really can't yet take in the thought that only yesterday at three o'clock Constance left us — Constance and her husband. Now the excitement is all over, we shall begin to miss the dear child dreadfully. I wonder I don't feel it more, but of course I shall now that all is over."

"I hope not, mamma"

"But I shall. A mother must feel the loss of her daughter, however satisfactory the cause of the separation may be. Do you know, Alma, I fancied Lady Forest was a little surprised that the leave-taking between myself and Constance passed so quietly. She cried when she said 'good-bye' to her son, I observed, but then she is a widow; I am sure I hope she won't argue from my self-control, that Constance is not a great loss to me. I hope it won't give a wrong impression about how that lovely creature is regarded in her own home. I really don't know how it happened. I am sure my feelings are keen enough; but yesterday morning was such a whirl, and just as the travellers were starting, Preston came to me with a teasing question about the arrangements for the evening. I was obliged to attend to him, or nothing would have been as it should be."

"Lady Forest is differently circumstanced, you see, mamma; she can afford to have feelings on public occasions, and let things take their course. She is not on promotion as we are."

"I should be very much grieved if I thought Constance was in any danger of being looked down upon by the people she is going among. I have been doing my very utmost, ever since I saw how things were likely to turn out, to give the Forests the right impression about all our connections. I have given your father all the hints I dare give, to prevent his making unfortunate allusions, as he does sometimes, and I have gone against my own feelings and run the risk of offending old friends, for the sake of keeping all our entertainments lately, as nearly as possible, to their set. My own feelings would have led me to ask Emmie West to be one of the bridesmaids, but I refrained, from fear of giving theirs the smallest shock."

"I wonder what sort of feelings those are that would be shocked at the sight of Emmie West."

"Lady Forest is very inquisitive, and might have asked questions. As it was, I think she must have been struck with the fact that the person of most consequence in the room was a friend on our side, quite unconnected with them. I wonder whether your father talked at all to Lord Anstice. I rather thought he would have proposed his health, but he did not. Do you suppose Lord Anstice was satisfied with the amount of attention he received, Alma?"

"I did not ask him, mamma; but I don't suppose he came here to talk to papa, or to have his health drunk either."

"Alma, have you an idea that he came for any other reason than because he was asked? You will tell me, I am sure, if you have."

"He did not come for the reason that has just shot into your head, dear mother, I assure you, so put it away as quickly as you can. It was all a joke to him. His cousin, whom we do know intimately, and whom we did not ask, saw the invitation we sent to him whom we knew very little, and ordered him to accept it. My clairvoyance does not go further than that. I can't make up my mind how much good-nature there was in Wynyard Anstice's bestirring himself to secure us the presence of a live earl at our first wedding, or how far it was done in pure scorn. Lord Anstice did as he was bid, and is only disappointed that we are all so like the people that he sees every day, that coming to our wedding has given him nothing new to talk about. If we had been vulgar on the surface, so that he could see it, he would have been quite satisfied with his morning's entertainment."

"Really, Alma, I wonder how you can talk in that cold-blooded way. If Wynyard Anstice has been representing us to his cousin as proper subjects for ridicule, I can only say he makes a most unworthy return for all the kindness I showed him in old times, when your brothers used to bring him from school to spend holidays

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd with us. I can't believe such a thing of him, however."

"And you need not, mamma. I am quite as sure as you can be, that Mr. Anstice has never spoken disparagingly of us to any one, and I sincerely believe he meant to do you a pleasure by sending his cousin here yesterday. Perhaps he thought it would please me too; I don't know."

"Then you should not say such misleading things, my dear, making one uncomfortable for nothing."

"You are right, mamma, I should not."

The conversation seemed to have come to a standstill, as it was apt to do when Wynyard Anstice's name got into any talk between the mother and daughter.

Alma, who was much given to tracing effects to their causes, was just beginning to wonder how this name came to be spoken so often as was the case — seeing that her own determination, and, as she believed, her mother's was to keep it from ever being spoken at all: was it really so much in her secret thoughts, that it forced itself to her tongue without her will's leave — when the thread of her self-questioning was broken by the entrance of the servant with the evening letters. A foreign one, addressed to Alma, fixed her mother's eyes, as well as her own.

"From Constance," exclaimed Lady Rivers, leaning forward in her chair, the self-satisfaction passing from her face as a flash of true mother-hunger came for a moment into her eyes.

"Be quick and open it, Alma; there will be something for me inside. What! not a line — well, read — what does the sweet child say? Is she comfortable and happy?"

"There is not much; you had better read it, mamma; it is chiefly directions about sending on her boxes," said Alma, as she handed a sheet, with a few lines scribbled on it, to her mother.

"And there is nothing more? Alma, are you sure?" said Lady Rivers, after a moment's silence, during which her heart, deadened and choked with world-dust as it was, had been rent with a sore pang. "You are sure there is no slip of paper inside the envelope with a more private word to me or you? This tells us nothing."

"It is all there is; and, mamma, I am very sorry to see that you are so disappointed, but I think Constance is right; it would not do for her to begin writing private words to me, or even to you, now that she is Constance Forest. She cannot have anything really interesting to tell us, so she had much better hold her tongue."

"My dear, I had a great deal to say to my mother the day after my wedding."

"You, mamma! Yes."

The tone in which this was said carried so much suggestion with it, that Lady Rivers sat upright in her chair, and folded her hands in her lap preparatory to answering it.

"My dear Alma, I wish you would get out of the habit of insinuating things. I don't think you can mean it, but really your manner of speaking of Constance's engagement ever since it took place, and now of her marriage, would lead any one who heard you to suppose that it was something forced upon her, instead of being her own deliberate choice, as you well know to have been the case."

"No, mamma, I don't mean to throw any blame of the kind on you; I beg your pardon if I have given that impression. I know that Constance chose her lot herself with her eyes open, and I really think she has taken what will suit her best; but, all the same, I doubt whether her thoughts about it just now will bear discussion with you or me, and I think she is wise to take the silent course, and work it into the best shape she can by herself.

"I can't see why she should not be radiantly happy, and thankful to me who have done so much for her, and by my exertions (for this is the case, Alma) enabled her to gain the position she is best suited for. Sir John Forest may not be as clever as your father or so agreeable as Wynyard Anstice ——"

"There is no need to bring his name into the discussion, mamma."

"Certainly not, except that you and your brothers have made so much more of him than he deserves; but, as I was saying, it is an enviable position Constance has gained, and I do think it is rather hard on me, who have toiled night and day for all your advancement, that when any one of you succeeds you should grudge me the satisfaction of knowing you are content."

"Dear mother, it is hard, but I think the fruit of the tree we are all of us busy gathering has that kind of taste. Constance has got her apple of Sodom, and it is a very handsome one to look at: we had better not insist on knowing exactly what she finds inside it, I think."

"My dear Alma, at least I hope you will keep such reflections for home use."

"You may depend on that, mamma, and after to-day, on this subject at least, I

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

don't think you will hear any more of them. You must please forgive me if I have made you uncomfortable, but you know now that I have lost Constance: there is no one else to whom I can safely grumble on home subjects. However, I have done now, mamma. Let us turn to the other letters."

A heap of invitations and notes of congratulation were examined, discussed, and put aside to be answered later, and then Alma held up two thick letters to her mother's notice. "One is from Agatha from her convent, and the other from Aunt West; shall I read them aloud to you?"

Lady Rivers sank back in her chair with a look of real uneasiness and oppression now. "I don't think I can bear either to-night," she said; "they must keep for a few hours. Whatever Agatha has found to say about her sister's marriage, I know it will be something to give me pain; and the last time she wrote she signed herself 'Sister Mary of Consolation,' as if to show how completely she had cut herself off from her own family. You may not readily believe it of me, Alma, but I could hardly get the thought of Agatha out of my head, all yesterday, the bitter thought of her estrangement from me, and you would have me suppose that I have lost Constance, too, in another way."

"I am sorry I said so much, mamma, for I am sure Constance will give you all the satisfaction out of her married life she can; but how about Aunt West's letter?"

"Read it to yourself, and tell me by-and-by if there is anything that needs an answer. It can hardly be a pleasant letter. Of course your poor aunt must feel aggrieved, for I really have been obliged to neglect the Wests of late, and it is unfortunate that it should have happened so soon after the death of the little boy that your aunt took so much to heart. I am sure I felt for her at the time, but when, soon after, this affair of Constance's came on, I could not help my time and thoughts being greatly taken up. Lately I have not dared even to mention the name of West before your father, for fear he should take it into his head to insist that Emmie and Harry, and perhaps half-a-dozen more of them, should be asked to the wedding. Luckily your father never thinks of things unless they are actually brought before him. Of course I can't exactly explain to your poor aunt how it has been, or tell her I am determined to make up for my seeming neglect by doing all we can for them now."

"If they will let us."

"Ah, yes, Mr. West's temper is a great hindrance to the whole family; and your poor aunt has always given way far too much to him. I think, even with all their misfortunes, she might with spirit have kept up the credit of the family better. I don't think I should ever have allowed children of mine to live in a house, the best rooms of which were let out to lodgers, — that degradation, that last fatal step, I think, I should have had resolution to spare my family."

"Even with Mr. West for a husband. Mamma, what was Aunt Emmeline like when she was young — I don't mean as to looks — I can imagine that well enough; but, in short, how did she ever come to marry Mr. West?"

"My dear, things looked very differently then from what they do now. When we two sisters were engaged about the same time, it was I who was thought to be doing the imprudent thing, and, so to speak, rather throwing myself away. Emmeline's match was considered a very good one, — the junior partner in an old London mercantile house. I can remember how my mother used to explain it to our visitors, and the touch of mortification I felt at the few words that came to my share. 'Mr. Rivers is considered a clever man,' my mother would say apologetically, 'and though promotion is slow at the bar, poor Agatha has made up her mind to take her chance with him.' No one could have foreseen then how affairs would turn out, or the altered position we two sisters should stand in towards each other by the time our children were grown up."

"So poor Aunt Emmeline has not even the satisfaction I always credited her with, of having a disinterested love-match to look back upon."

"You do so jump to conclusions, Alma. I never said your aunt did not love Mr. West when she married him. Of course she did, and was flattered by his choice of her, as well as very thankful to give such a triumph to her father and mother, who had not had much prosperity in their early lives, I can tell you. She made them happy in their old age, and I often tell her the reflection should be a greater support to her in her misfortunes than I fear it is. At all events she has a right to look for a like return from her own daughter."

"Poor little Emmie, I hope you won't impress that obligation too strongly upon her, mamma; she has burdens enough already, and had better let the matrimonial one wait a while. It is all very strange.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Now I think of it, I can remember stories of Agatha's and Frank's childhood which always struck me as investing the Wests with quite a different relationship to ourselves from anything that Constance and I ever saw. I have felt dimly, but never realized, that they were the great people in those days, and that some strange jugglery must have taken place to alter the perspective so."

"No one can say, my dear, that prosperity has changed my feelings; it has only laid fresh duties upon me, and of course your poor aunt Emmeline's duties are changed too."

"As far as we are concerned the life in Saville Street has faded into a dim background, which brings out all the sharp points of our prosperity, with different effects on the minds of the beholders — very different effects."

"You need not remind me of that, Alma; it is never far from my thoughts, and you cannot wonder if I feel very little disposed to throw you younger ones much under Aunt Emmeline's influence. I never can forget that it was after spending a month in Saville Street that Agatha first began to talk to me about her distaste of the world, and attraction toward sacred poverty, and to put forth the extraordinary views that have landed her where she is now."

"Aunt West is not responsible, however, for the direction Agatha's enthusiasm has taken; she is quite as much puzzled at it as you are; and to set against Agatha's convent, in the scale of obligation between us and the Wests, you must put yesterday's wedding. You may not be aware of it, but it was after an afternoon spent in Saville Street that Constance made up her mind to throw over young Lawrence for all the dances she had promised him at old Lady Forest's ball, and forced herself to give Sir John the smile that settled his destiny forever afterwards. I saw it all, and shall always maintain that if the atmosphere in the Wests' little breakfast-room that day had been a whit more tolerable, and the boys' manners just a shade more civilized, young Lawrence would have won the day, and been the bridegroom at Constance's wedding, yesterday."

"Alma, what reckless talk! how can you allow yourself to indulge in it now?"

"Just this once more, mamma. As I said before, I have no one but you to grumble with, and after to-night I shall have so accustomed myself to the new state of affairs as not to care to talk about it. But I have done already. I am going to read the letters."

The mere outside of these seemed to have effectually quelled Lady Rivers's activity, for she at last leaned back in her chair, and shaded her eyes with her hand, not to see Alma's face as she read the closely-written sheets slowly by the fire-light. The flicker rose and fell, bringing out all manner of beautiful lights and shades on her sheeny silk dress, on the coils of soft light hair that lay low on her neck, and on a face, turned towards the flames, that was never hard to read, and that some people thought worthy of a good deal of study. Some people — others were apt to raise the question whether Alma Rivers would have passed for a beauty if the loveliness of her two sisters had not somehow involved her in a halo of admiration and observation that blinded the public eyes to her actual claims. And then would follow a criticism of features which demolished all her pretensions to the regular beauty they inherited from their mother, by showing how much likeness to her father there was in her spirited face. It was almost ridiculous, people said, to catch under a wreath of flowers and braided hair, a resemblance to those strongly-marked, characteristic features which political caricatures and illustrated journals had familiarized everybody with, and had held up again and again to public admiration or contempt. It really did make the homage paid to Alma as a reigning beauty almost absurd. But the homage continued to be paid through a second season when Lady Rivers's energetic management had taken her daughters everywhere; and there was one at least of her admirers who had gone the length of so distinguishing Alma Rivers from her reputation as a beauty, as to be willing to allow that it was just those irregularities of form, and flashes of expression to which other people objected, that gave her face its conquering charm, and made it the one beautiful face in the world for him.

Alma let the letters fall into her lap when she had read them, and sat with her hands clasped round her knees looking into the fire for a long time. There was perfect stillness at last, and the room was full of the scents of hothouse flowers, and of a ruddy fire glow in which it was luxury to sit and dream, and there was, it must be confessed, a kind of luxury of sadness in the reverie to which Alma gave way. A sadness which was very far indeed from being pain, though as the thought rose, large round tears gathered in Alma's beau-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

tiful eyes, and made marks on the sheeny dress as they fell. She fancied herself very unhappy, for she had no experience which taught her the great gulf that lies between imaginative sorrows which can estimate the pathos of their own pain, and those vital ones which strike at the very root of thought; and she believed herself just now to have come to a point in her life when a great many cherished illusions must be parted with, and a reality she was not prepared for embraced. Henceforth, she was saying to herself, there would be much of solitude in her life, and if any important decision had to be made she must make it alone; and, what was worse, without any clear principles or even definite wishes to shape her determination upon. She had, she told herself, grown out of many splendid hopes of her youth, and the failure consisted rather in that she was disenchanted with herself than with her old ideals. The objects she had longed for might even be near, ready for her to take; but she doubted very much her own strength to choose them now, or rather to be satisfied when chosen. Was it strength or weakness, reasonableness or folly, she asked herself with a touch of self-contempt, which made her see the desirableness of opposite goods so strongly that she could not heartily wish for anything ? or was she really at twenty so dusty and dried up with the worldliness she had imbibed from her childhood as to have no power of feeling vividly, only this horrible power of thinking, of weighing everything in the balance and finding it wanting? Why had Agatha deserted her? Agatha, through whose imagination she had been used to look at the world, who had invested the amusements and pursuits they had shared together with something from herself that made them worth living for. Why had Agatha, suddenly at the end of one month of absence, come back translated as it were into a new world, the entrance gate to which was forever shut to Alma? Why had she deliberately stripped off the halo she had herself given from all their aims and pleasures, pronouncing them hollow and unsatisfying, and then stepped out into a sphere whose pure, cold, dazzling air Alma felt she could not breathe. Her hand strayed once during these thoughts to Agatha's letter lying on her lap, but she did not take it up. It was no use. It was too far off from her to be any help. The inward spiritual experiences it treated of were, for her, too unreal to have any comfort in them. Tears of real pain, but of the pathetic, bearable sort still, came to her eyes as she murmured to herself,—

> For this on death my wrath I wreak;
> He put our lives so far apart we cannot hear > each other speak.

Was the misfortune less when something else than death did this? when the body was left and the audible voice, and it was the soul that had gone too far off for thought to pass between it and those it had left? What silence was there so terrible as the silence that comes between souls that can no longer make each other understand however loud they speak, or however closely and lovingly they whisper in the ear? Forever, Alma said to herself, must this silence reign between herself and her best-loved sister; and now Constance, her nursery companion, who had clung to her trembling a few hours ago, had been borne off — rather by the course of events, it seemed, than her own free will — into this unknown world of matrimony, to which certainly love had not given her a golden key. How would she fare in it? Was hers the substantial, real world, and Agatha's only shadow; or was it just the other way? Was there a real world possible for those who, having tasted of the Sodom apples, had lost the power of distinguishing substance from shadow? Alma smiled with a little scorn of her self-scorn, as she asked the question, and then proceeded to justify it by a rapid survey of the lives she knew best — even Aunt West's, robbed of the spice of romance she had credited it with, beginning under false expectations, and ending in gloom; her mother's, which to outsiders looked such a brilliant example of rewarded love, but from which, as she knew, love had long since been crowded out by hosts of uneasy cares and paltry ambitions. After all, since this same dust of care choked all roads alike, did it matter much by which gate one entered on one's destiny, love or worldly prudence? Had not Constance after all done well in ignoring the gate, and choosing what appeared the least up-hill road, strewn with fewest stones to hurt her feet?

Alma thought she was really pondering this problem in the abstract, and trying to give it a dispassionate answer; and, all the time, it was not Constance's decision she was looking at. Her thoughts, like birds on the wing, were hovering, but never settling round an application of the question that concerned herself. There it was in the distance, a very up-hill road,

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

but the gate looked golden enough. She was not nearly ready for a decision yet. She might never be ready, she told herself, but meanwhile there was at least interest in glancing furtively that way sometimes. If she could but see how the road would look a little further on! If the hand that offered the key would remove some stones out of the way she was required to walk in; if he would even leave off putting down fresh stones; or if — if — looking down into her soul she could find strength to choose the stony path, and find the same strange satisfaction in it that he seemed to find! Well — well — Constance's marriage, and yesterday's display, and the invitation sent to Lord Anstice, that was due to his cousin, were threads of circumstance certainly not drawing her that way. She saw how they were being woven about her, and wondered whether she, like Constance, would wake up some day to find herself bound to a course she only half approved by a million slender invisible threads, that could only be broken by the strength of a Hercules.

Alma had ample time for all these speculations, for this was one of the evenings when her father was not likely to return home till very late; and under pretext of fatigue she and her mother had decided on keeping on their afternoon dresses, and indulging in a second tea in the inner drawing-room, instead of dinner.

Lady Rivers dearly loved this indulgence, but sternly refused it to herself, except on rare occasions, for fear her servants should guess that its enjoyment consisted in its being a renewal of old habits. When, an hour later, she and Alma were sitting together, with a comfortable meal spread on a small table by the fire, and a knock came at the front door, her face showed an extremity of dismay at which Alma could not help smiling.

"Will Preston be so absurd as to let any one in?" she cried. "What o'clock is it, Alma? Only a quarter past eight! We could not be supposed to be taking tea after dinner, and with patés and jelly on the table, at this hour."

"Only a very charitable person would give us the benefit of such a supposition, I am afraid, mamma. But don't be alarmed. I assure you I have seen Lady Forest sit down to tea on Sunday evening with a plate of radishes before her; and if our visitor at this untimely hour proves to be one of her set, I will take an opportunity of mentioning the circumstance."

"Pray don't be so absurd. Stay! It was not your father's knock; but surely that is his footstep on the stairs. What a comfort that it is only your father!"

But Lady Rivers rejoiced too soon. It was indeed the face of Lord Justice Rivers that appeared when the door opened; but other steps followed his to the inner room; and before she had finished her exclamations of surprise at her husband's unexpected return, Wynyard Anstice had shaken hands with Alma, and was making his way towards her, with a look on his face half deprecatory, half mischievously triumphant, such as he used to confront her with in long-past days, when he had been deputed by the schoolroom party to confess some desperate piece of mischief, in which all the juniors had been involved with him.

"I am perfectly aware I am doing what you don't like in coming here this evening," the look said; "but I don't mean you to be angry with me. I am throwing myself on the good-natured side of your character, in whose existence I always mean to believe, however much your actions towards me belie it."

She had never been able to resist feeling a sort of motherliness towards him, which his boyish confidence in her had called out in old times; and even now, vexed as she was, his winning face and manner conquered her again; and she shook hands and answered his inquiries after the newly-made Lady Forest with less coldness than had lately marked her attitude towards this least desirable of all Alma's lovers. She did not even attempt to telegraph her vexation on to her husband; there was no use in directing displeased glances towards Sir Francis Rivers, for he never saw them. If he had ever listened to her hints about the undesirableness of encouraging Wynyard Anstice's intimacy with the family, he had utterly forgotten by this time that such words had ever been spoken; and now he sat down with a provoking smile of complacency on his face, satisfied that he had done a sensible thing in bringing home an old family friend, on a vacant evening, and thus securing pleasant occupation for the ladies of the house, while he was set free to enjoy the rare luxury of lounging in his easy-chair with an uncut quarterly which he had already taken from a side-table in passing, and was nursing lovingly on his knee.

"Ah," he said, glancing towards the table by the fire, and then at his wife, "I need not have dined at the club if I had known I should be released so early; we

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

would have had high tea together, my dear, in memory of old days, and I might almost have fancied ourselves back in our chambers at Gate Street, when the children were babies, and dinners were luxuries reserved for high days."

Lady Rivers kept her face steadily turned towards the cup she was filling during this speech, and only Alma saw the beautiful look that shone from Wynyard Anstice's eyes towards her father. It stirred her with a vivid feeling that had pleasure, and a little pain in it too. She liked to see her father appreciated, above most things, but she was not sure that she wanted Wynyard Anstice to admire him exactly for the reason in his thoughts now. Encouragement in being unconventional and unworldly was precisely what Wynyard Anstice did not, in Alma's estimation, require. She might like these qualities in him ever so dearly far down in her inmost heart, but she saw, at the same time, that they would not aid him in paving the smooth path she sometimes dreamed they might walk in together. The next moments brought her unmixed pleasure, for, while her father sipped his tea, keeping his finger all the while on the page in the quarterly he was longing to plunge into, he carried on a desultory conversation with his guest, from which it by-and-by appeared that an essay of Mr. Anstice's that had lately come out in a quarterly journal had attracted her father's attention, and won his unqualified approbation as being a masterly piece of reasoning, for once unspoiled by reference to any of his own particular crotchets. Alma even thought she observed a new air of respect in her father's manner, very different from the amused indulgence with which he had hitherto been in the habit of listening to young Anstice's arguments, when by-and-by a lively discussion grew out of this qualified praise. As she listened, turning her head from one speaker to the other, and now and then venturing to put in a playful word, a change seemed to come over her whole person; the cynical, weary look left her face; her brow cleared of its weight of discontent; her eyes took a new intensity of color in their blue depths; the drooping mouth became full of spirit and tenderness. It was the look that was her father's, but with something higher added — a touch of enthusiasm that his face had lost. It was her highest self uppermost for the moment that looked out and showed to some eyes that noted it well what a stake it was for which the world and love were playing.

Meanwhile Lady Rivers was asking herself, "Could anything be more unfortunate?" Here was all her laborious twelve months' work in the way of being undone, by her husband, too! who professed — and to do him justice, honestly intended — to leave the management of family politics in her hands! How it was that, with the reputation for wisdom the world gave him, he should show himself so thoroughly incompetent whenever he presumed to meddle in home affairs, was a standing puzzle to her, and constantly made her feel thankful that public business required so much less delicate handling than private that her husband's blundering could there pass for discretion. If the government and the bar had had the same opinion of the justice's ability that long experience had brought to his wife, where would the prosperity of the family have been? It was indeed well that the coarser texture of men's business was suited to their coarser wits. This reflection soothed the extremity of Lady Rivers's irritation, and enabled her to see that her own consummate prudence would be best shown to-night by standing aside, and letting the unfavorable current that had set in run its course. So when the happy moment came for the justice, when, without rudeness, he could turn to his book, she established herself in a shady corner of the sofa, which always meant sleep, and saw Alma go to the piano, far away in the arctic regions of the great drawing-room, without a word of objection. Open love-making she knew she had not to fear, and other words, however deep an impression they might make on two hearts, might easily hereafter be explained away. It was, after all, only a desultory conversation that set in, in intervals between Alma's playing; a few sentences merged into the music, and then taken up again. Alma was not in the mood to begin upon one of the half-bantering, half-serious arguments which for the last year or two, since she was quite grown up, had been the style of discourse she had usually fallen into with her old playmate, and she was afraid of getting any nearer to what Mr. Carlyle would call "sincere speech." It was not till after quite half an hour's music that she ventured on a remark bearing in any way on what she was thinking about. She had just brought Schumann's "Schlummerlied" to an end, and with her fingers resting on the keys, ready to dash into a waltz, if necessary, she said, —

"I am glad you had the sense not to congratulate me when you came in to-day."

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

"I am a great deal too unhappy myself at another defection from our schoolroom party of long ago to think of such a thing. There will be no one of us left soon."

"Except myself. 'A scolding woman in a wide house.'"

"A queen who has driven all her subjects away, satisfied with the wide house," Anstice corrected, venturing a steady look into Alma's face, that was turned up to him with a half-mocking, half-defiant expression on it.

"You think I have hectored my sisters out of the house, and the poor boys too. What an opinion you must have of my temper, to be sure!"

"You know that was not what I was thinking."

"Well, but don't you want to know how we all looked and behaved yesterday?"

"Unexceptionally, I am sure; and, as for looks, I suppose none of you can have looked at the bride without thinking how strongly her likeness to your other sister came out under her white veil."

"How do you know? Your cousin could not have told you that."

"My own eyes did. You don't believe I should lose such an opportunity for a critical look at you all, do you? I was up in the gallery all the time watching and comparing."

"Comparing?"

"Yes, I may as well tell you at once what I called this evening principally to find an opportunity of saying to you. A fortnight ago I was in Paris staying with a friend whose wife has lately become an ardent Roman Catholic. She was full of a grand ceremony that was to take place at a convent near. I went with her, and through a phalanx of gratings, had a glimpse of your sister Agatha, in what I suppose was her last public appearance. I could not make out the ceremony. It seemed to me a sort of travesty of a wedding followed by a funeral, 'crowned and buried.' And your sister looked so like herself all the while that I had to rub my eyes every now and then to be convinced I was not dreaming one of our old charade-actings over again."

"Do you think she saw you?"

"Oh, no, I was cooped up in a crowd behind close gratings. I don't suppose I had any right to be there; but my friend's wife had my edification strongly at heart, and stretched a point. I am afraid she is founding very false hopes on the interest she saw that the ceremony excited in me."

"Tell me again how Agatha looked — was it really as Constance looked yesterday?"

"I never thought them as much alike as other people did, you know, but yesterday when I had a moment's good view of your sister Constance, as she turned to you just before kneeling down, I could almost have thought myself in that convent chapel again, and that the face was Agatha's, — almost for an instant; the second impression, of course, was of the difference."

"Tell me about that."

"It is difficult to put into words."

"You must try, or you should not have begun to speak about it."

"Well, if I must, let me see. I think I can only say it was a difference in degree, something added to the convent bride's look. The fear on Constance's face was awe on Agatha's, and the clinging dependence which made yesterday's bride cast so many reluctant looks back on you, gave Agatha's eyes an inward expression, as if she were gathering strength by thought from some felt but unseen presence. I don't know which was the most beautiful after all; but Agatha's face was the thing to remember."

"And we were none of us there! I wonder if we should any of us have so much as seen all that if we had been there."

So far apart we cannot hear each other speak.

The words rushed into Alma's mind again, and with them came quick tears, that having once been indulged refused to be sent back to their source unshed. She turned her head as far from the light as possible, but could not conceal that in an instant her face was wet.

Lady Rivers would have been ready to faint with dismay, if she had roused herself at that moment from pleasant dreams to such a sight — Alma weeping silently, and Wynyard Anstice looking on with an intensity of sympathy and emotion on his always expressive face, that might well make her thankful for the blinding effect of tears on Alma. The danger to her was only momentary however. Mr. Anstice got up hastily and walked to a distant table, where, with his back to Alma, he stood nervously fingering the ornaments, and clasping and unclasping photograph-books. It had been a great shock to him, and he had as much need of a struggle to get back into his ordinary drawing-room self as had Alma. He had never seen tears in her eyes in his life before, never. Not even in childhood, when at partings, or meetings, or pathetic readings,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

which had moved her sisters to tears, she had always remained bright and defiant.

The times when in confidential talk her eyes had softened in his sight were epochs to be chronicled for the effect they had had far down in his inmost soul. He heard a large tear fall on one of the music-sheets she was gathering up in her hands, as his thoughts reached this point, and it sent a thrill through him. A thrill that was not all sympathy with her pain, there was a pang for himself as well as for her. When he had entered the room to-night he believed that a contest which had long disturbed his life was decided forever, a victory won, and that he had only come to look once more on a lost love. What was there in this sudden rain of tears for Agatha to water the dead hopes, the buried unrest (which he had so congratulated himself on having securely buried), and cause them to spring up into life again stronger and greener than ever? Nothing absolutely. It was most unreasonable to feel that by revealing so much of her soul to him Alma had laid a new claim on his devotion; but he did somehow so feel, and he could not all in a moment decide whether it was in pain or triumph that he took up the old burden again, resolving to carry it at all events a little further on the road. He only knew that each tear as it fell had struck on his heart and left a trace there that would not be easily worn out; whether it was destined to fester into one of those sore spots that make memory a torment or deepen and widen into a fountain of lifelong joy. Alma was innocent of the smallest design or wish to excite so much emotion. She was deeply ashamed of her tears long before the power to restrain them came, and by the time she had strangled the last sob and brought her eyes into something like order the feeling that had called them forth had evaporated into an absorbing anxiety to look as usual when the now fast-approaching inevitable moment came, when Lady Rivers should awake from her nap and come into the room, to end this perilous interview with such words of polite dismissal as she so well knew how to administer to an unwelcome guest. Alma's first sentence when she came up to the table and addressed Mr. Anstice was spoken in a light, indifferent tone that jarred strangely on his mood.

"You won't find any record of yesterday there," she began. "We were not guilty of having ourselves photographed in our wedding dresses. You had better question me unless you have heard all the gossip from your cousin already. I know you are quite capable of cross-examining him on the minutest details, for you always were the newsmonger of our society."

He was silent, not being able at once to get back into a lightness of tone that would match hers; and Alma rattled on, throwing an accent of warning into her next sentence.

"Mamma, would you believe it? Mr. Anstice will not allow that he took enough interest in us to ask his cousin how our wedding went off yesterday. Is such total lack of curiosity credible in him?"

Lady Rivers, who had entered the outer room just as Alma left the piano, now came forward into the circle of lamplight with an expression of some anxiety on her face. Had maternal vigilance slept too long, and given time for the occurrence of a frightful calamity? A glimpse at Alma's tear-stained face made her heart absolutely stand still, but turning to Wynyard she saw a look of pain on his that sent up her spirits many degrees at once. Was it even better than she had dared to hope? Had he spoken again, poor fellow? and had Alma, like a sensible, good girl, given him his final dismissal? That would indeed be fortunate, and leave the way clear and open for delicate schemes which her genius, now that Alma was the only one left to scheme for, was longing to elaborate. This pleasing supposition lent quite a motherly tone of interest to her voice and smile, as she turned to the young man, who had once long ago, in the character of her favorite son's safest comrade, shared her matronly solicitude to a certain small extent.

"We know Mr. Anstice's friendly feeling towards the family too well," she said, "not to be sure that nothing but a really pressing engagement would have prevented his being with us, or, at all events, full of thought for us on such an important day."

"I had no engagement. I did not come to you yesterday because I was not asked," he said, looking full at her. Lady Rivers did not expect such a bold thrust even from Wynyard Anstice's unconventional sincerity, but she was equal to the occasion.

"We hardly thought a formal invitation necessary with you, as our note to your cousin warned you of the day; but, however, you did not lose anything by not coming. We were all too sad to be pleasant company, and even Sir Francis broke down in his speech. Your cousin will have told you."

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

"I have not seen him since yesterday morning."

"He was very undutiful then," cried Alma, whose cheek had burned under her mother's implied falsehood, and who was longing to put an end to the conversation. "He told me he meant to report himself to you on the first moment of his release, and seemed perfectly aware that his raison d'être was to see everything with your eyes and carry it to you."

Mr. Anstice smiled. "I know you have a theory of your own about my cousin's character; but now you know him better, don't you see more in him than the sort of devoted Smike you chose to fancy him in old days?"

"Smike! Oh no. I never thought of anything so racy. My types for you and your cousin were taken from a tale of Madame de Genlis's we used to read in the schoolroom — 'Alphonse and Thelismar' — the déréglé young French noble and his philosophical friend, who brought him back to reason by discourses on nature and the general course of things."

"I hope yesterday made you ashamed of the inexactness of your portrait-painting, then."

"Well, I will confess I was a little disappointed. Lord Anstice did not talk so much like Alphonse as I had expected, nor display so much devotion to Thelismar as (lowering her tone) I perhaps think past and present circumstances warrant."

"I have always told you you misunderstand those same circumstances."

Lady Rivers did not hear the lowered tones, but she had caught the word disappointed and could not resist putting in a word on a subject which was always more or less in her thoughts whenever she saw Alma and Wynyard Anstice together.

"You must not be surprised if we all feel a little disappointed on first acquaintance with your cousin. We naturally expect a great deal from a person in whose favor, as it seems to us, you voluntarily cut yourself off from all your prospects in life and from your older friends."

It was meant for a stinging reproach to Wynyard, but all the pain it gave came to Alma. To him it was almost incomprehensible, so distorted was the view of the facts to which it alluded. Some years ago, when the Riverses first knew him, he and his younger cousin had been equally dependent for education and advancement in life on the head of their family, a bachelor uncle, with an old title and large unentailed estates. The younger and the least-promising lad represented the elder branch and was heir to the title, but Wynyard had always been his uncle's favorite, and was looked upon as likely to inherit the larger portion of his wealth, till a few months before the old man's death, when he managed to quarrel with him on some abstract question of principle and conduct, and so offended him by maintaining his own contrary views, on a public occasion, that he was never received into favor again. When a little later the uncle died, and the will came to be read, it was found that the despotic old man had heaped the whole of his great wealth on the nephew who, though less satisfactory in conduct, had allowed his theories to be prescribed for him, and left the one best liked to fight out a position in the world he had elected to live in after fashions of his own.

This change in Mr. Anstice's circumstances had occurred about two years ago, just at the time when his attachment to Alma began to be talked about; and Lady Rivers never could forgive the part he had acted in ruining himself. If a totally unattached young man of her acquaintance chose to be quixotic, and recklessly throw away the good gifts fortune had designed for him, a quiet pity for his folly, and a resolute avoidance of him in future, was all the notice that it was necessary for her to take of his misconduct. But when the young man had already taken the liking of a girl of good position into his keeping, and when that girl was her own most attractive daughter, the indignation that swelled her motherly heart was too bitter to be quietly borne. It was always waking up and rousing her into expressions of hostility that her better judgment deprecated — the more so as Alma could never be made to express satisfactory condemnation of her lover's conduct. Yet the invectives were not altogether lost. Alma did not acquiesce when her mother told her again and again that Wynyard Anstice's real care to win her was to be estimated by the lightness with which he had thrown away the conditions that made such winning possible; but the words rankled and made a sore wound in her mind that winced whenever it was touched. The pain she felt just now stung her into something like defiance, and determined her to persevere in the low-toned talk it was meant to interrupt.

"I am really sorry you did not see your cousin yesterday afternoon," she said; "I had given him a message for you, and he promised me to look you up, in whichever of your haunts you might be."

"The haunt which actually held me was

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

one where I don't think his courage would have been sufficient to induce him to follow me. At the time when your party broke up, I was speaking in a lecture-room in an out-of-the-way place in the east end, at a meeting convened to discuss woman's suffrage, among other social questions."

Alma's face clouded again; every fresh instance of Mr. Anstice's disposition to take up unpopular subjects, struck her as a sort of slight to herself.

"How can you go to such places? making people talk of you, and hindering your getting on in your profession, and lowering papa's opinion of your good sense. Why can't you give up such freaks now?" she asked, putting a greater amount of pleading in her voice than she was quite aware of.

"I did not intend to take part in the discussion when I went in; I was moved to it by what I thought unfair hostility shown towards a lady, who got up in the body of the meeting and pleaded woman's rights, not so much to votes as to wider spheres of work, in a speech that was a good deal above the heads of most of the people there. I will confess, however, that I was struck with her remarks before the row began, and with herself too, for she was no common-looking person, I can tell you, in spite of the company she had got herself among. Perhaps some people — I don't say myself, but some people — might even have thought it worth while to miss a wedding breakfast for the sake of hearing and seeing her."

"Then I suppose she is young and handsome, in spite of Punch's last week's picture. But she must be a monster to go to a meeting of rough people, and get up and speak. I can't think how you can defend such conduct."

"I don't defend it; I only say that being present I was struck with what she said, and how she looked while saying it."

"So handsome?"

"No, not at all handsome, but a very unforgettable face all the same."

"Did you make out her name?"

"I heard it spoken by some people near, Miss Moore — Katharine Moore, I believe they called her; and as you seem curious about her looks, here is an outline sketch I took of her before I grew too much interested in what she was saying to do anything but listen."

"Katharine Moore ——"

Alma repeated the name musingly, as she examined a pocket-book page, on which was sketched hastily, but effectively, a strongly-featured, expressive face, with dark, level brows, wide forehead, full, well-shaped mouth, and indented chin.

"Katharine Moore — how strange — I believe she must be the elder of the two sisters to whom Aunt West ——"

Alma stopped short, arrested by an agonized look from her mother; and Lady Rivers finished her sentence. "One of the orphans whom my sister, Mrs. West, has received into her house as companions to her daughter."

"Poor little Emmie West," said Alma quickly, to stop further explanation, "how will she like companions who get themselves into rows at public meetings, I wonder? I must go and look her up, I think, now that all our gaieties are over."

"Miss West!" cried Anstice. "Ah, she was not at the wedding any more than myself then? Why should not I look her up, that we may condole with each other, and then perhaps" (with,a malicious smile towards Alma) I shall see my lady orator again."

Mr. Anstice took his departure soon after this, and Alma got a lecture from her mother for making her eyes red, for showing too much interest in Wynyard Anstice's doings, and for bringing in her aunt's name in conversation, with people who did not belong to the family. How strange it was that she who was reputed so clever should make more mistakes than Constance ever did, and never allow her mother the repose of feeling she might be trusted.

It certainly had not been a pleasant evening; and yet Alma, as she sat staring into her bedroom fire before going to bed, felt not happier, perhaps, but fuller of life than she had felt for many long days. The hurry of engagements and gaieties in which she lived had lately been growing so meaningless and vapid to her, it was a comfort to be raised out of its dust, even by sensations of pain — pain of such sort at least as this evening's reflections, and the sight of Wynyard Anstice had brought with it. It was not a new pain, nor even a new light upon it, only the old puzzle that she had pondered again and again. Could he really love her, so very much as his eyes sometimes said, when his own hand had put away the right to ask for her, and when even now he was putting all manner of crotchets before the purpose of climbing quickly up again to such a height as would enable her to look upon him with favor once more? If Alma had been asked if she could appreciate the sentiment of the poet-soldier, who sang, —

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

I could not love thee, dear, so much,
Loved I not honor more,

she would have answered, "Yes, certainly;" but then surely that meant honor such as the world could recognize — honor that could be reflected back in a halo round the beloved head; not subtle scruples like these, self-sacrifices that nobody asked — delicate weighings of more or less worth in work for the world, such as the world would never understand, and that were due to some overstrained, unrecognized sense of duty to powers out of sight.

Surely such mere floating thought-motes as these ought to be blown away by the strong gusts of passion? What was the worth of a love that barriers unseen by most eyes could hold back? Sadly, after long musing, Alma gave the old answer to this question, and then she knelt down and went through her prescribed round of evening devotions, not recognizing that the decision she had just come to was a distinct denial of there being any unseen presences to pray to.

From Macmillan's Magazine.

IDYLLIC POETRY.

THERE are flowers whose beauty needs no discoverer. A tangle of white roses, creeping up the arms of an ancient yew, a regiment of lilies in a cottage garden — these, and such as these, cannot escape notice. Whoever passes that way in his daily walks must see them, unless the seeing eye has been denied him. They command attention and admiration. There is no need of sending worshippers to their shrine. But if perchance some lover of flowers knows where to find the ivy-leaved campanula, or, better still, if he can tell of a spot under fragrant fir-trees where the tall gentian hides its delicate blue blossoms among thick masses of heath, we may thank him for the tidings, for we might live long in the neighborhood and never chance upon these hidden beauties.

So in the world of poetry. There are poems which cannot be compared to any single flower, but rather to the tops of a tropical forest, filled with light, motion, and color. These belong to the epic order. Others are small, and make a single impression, but are perfect in form, color, and fragrance, like the rose. Such are many lyrical poems, which live in the remembrance of every reader. These do not require to be discovered by a wanderer in bypaths. But there are flowers which not every one loves, and some who pass them by would pronounce their form insignificant, their tints faded, their scent unpleasing. The discovery of their charms is the reward of the careful and close observer. So there are poems which are special favorites with a few but which others count as slight and fanciful, best left in obscurity. The judgment of the majority sets this mark upon idyllic poetry. Even the greatest poems in this order have not been universally admired. But, as the observer of nature will bring a friend to the flower which, as he thought, gave a nymph-like grace to the copse, lent a special charm to the moor, or lit up the river bank, so the reader of poetry will try to impart to others the pleasure he has received.

Definitions are always difficult to frame, and in matters of poetry often impossible. Idyllic poetry cannot be defined in terms that would satisfy a logician. It were as easy to describe a mass of cloud and shower once seen passing along the mountainous coast across an arm of the sea, with a square block of hill in black shadow to the left, while the rounded mist and streaming rain were lit with wonderful yet delicate colors — no positive tints like those of a sunset — but a marvellous inweaving of subtlest harmonies. It was a sight to see, to remember, to dream of; not to describe, scarcely even for the genius of Turner himself to paint. Neither can idyllic poetry be defined, for the effects on which it depends are often equally subtle. Idyllic poems cannot be caught, and penned, like a flock of sheep in a pound, until they are all numbered. The idyll has a habit of breaking bounds, and may be found now and then in epic territory. The idyllic sentiment is not unfrequently to be seen in lyrical poetry, and sometimes an epigram looks decidedly idyllic.

There is no outward and visible sign separating idyllic from epic poetry, except the apparently trivial mark of length. The idyll cannot be long, neither can the true epic be short. The sweep and mighty current which are necessary characteristics of the latter are characteristically absent from the former. On this side, as, perhaps in a less degree, on the other, the distinction must be felt rather than seen. The idyll is less elevated in tone than the epic, less intense than lyrical poetry. This may best be shown where two of the kinds are brought into vivid contrast. Thus Milton, the greatest English master of the idyll as

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY of the epic, introduces some score of epic lines into his "Lycidas," beginning,—

> Last came, and last did go,
> The pilot of the Galilæan lake;

and ending with the stern allusion to false shepherds, the grim wolf, and "that two-handed engine at the door." This is a "strain of higher mood;" and the poet, who on another occasion, > intends to soar

> Above the Aonian mount, quickly brings back the strings to the former key. How clearly, with his poet's tact, he feels and notes the change!—

> Return, Alpheus; the dread voice is past
> That shrunk thy streams: return, Sicilian muse,
> And call the vales, and bid them hither cast
> Their bells and flowerets of a thousand hues.

If we find here the bucolic pipe sounding unwonted notes, we may observe also in epic poems that a restful change is produced by idyllic passages. A fine example is the description of the shield in the eighteenth Iliad.

The most obvious distinction between idyllic and lyrical poetry lies in the metre. This may seem a highly artificial method of distinguishing the two, but it is not so altogether. Idyllic poetry avoids intensity and rapid motion. Lyrics are usually both intense and rapid, and being cast into corresponding metres, may commonly be identified at a glance. It is possible for some portion of the idyllic sentiment to wander into lyric poetry, but it can hardly find proper expression in lyric measures.

The most perfect metre for idylls in ancient languages is the hexameter, as modified for the purpose by Theocritus. In modern languages, perhaps with the exception of German, the dactylic hexameter is intolerable. It is, therefore, replaced on the cy près principle, by modifications of the heroic measures.

The older masters of the idyll—Clement Marot, Spenser, Milton—vary their verse to a considerable extent, and do almost everything except transgress into the epic region on the one hand, or the lyric on the other. Mr. Tennyson keeps usually to the five iambic feet. Mr. Matthew Arnold adopts the stanza. But I know of no instance in which a good poet uses metres for idyllic purposes which are not idyllic, i.e., which are too stately on the one hand or too lively on the other, except, indeed, where he may vary his key for a moment, or may introduce a song, as Spenser does his fourth æclogue.

But another note of the idyll is that it always tells or hints at more or less of a story. Something of human interest, something more than the expression of a bare sentiment, is always introduced; and, bearing this in mind, we shall be able rationally to distinguish some poems from idylls, which otherwise we could only feel to belong to a different order.

The idyll is a little picture, a poem imparting a single impression, or describing a single scene. So far the definition would include many lyrical poems. Take, for example, the following from Shelley:—

> A widow bird sat mourning for her love
> Upon a wintry bough;
> The frozen wind kept on above,
> The freezing stream below.
>
> There was no leaf upon the forest bare,
> No flower upon the ground;
> And little motion in the air
> Except the mill-wheel's sound.

The passion, the rapidity, the intensity, which usually distinguish lyrical from idyllic poetry are here absent. This exquisite little poem is essentially picturesque. Or rather, perhaps, it resembles the effect produced by music. No clear intellectual idea is conveyed by the poet to the reader. Scarcely is a definite picture suggested to his mind. It is a sentiment which is conveyed. The poem is the wire along which the current passes, causing the reader to feel with the writer.

What definite idea does a sonata of Beethoven suggest? It is dangerous to say; but it affects you as he meant it should. So with this and many other poems of Shelley. But we must not suppose because they are undefined, suggestive, uninformed by strong passion, that they are therefore idyllic. The metre is lyrical rather than idyllic; yet in this case the metre is perhaps hardly decisive. Intensity there is, as always in Shelley, who is an essentially lyric poet. Yet the intensity is here subdued and kept well below the surface. It might, therefore, be contended, and it has often been argued, that this is a good example of an idyll. It may rather be compared with Greek epigrams of the lyric class, which pass into lyrical poems by shades too gradual for definition. Take for example this translation from Sappho, given by Mr. Dodd in his "Epigrammatists:"—

> The cool, low-babbling stream,
> 'Mid quince-groves deep,
> And gently rustling leaves,
> Bring on soft sleep.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

It is true that this is but a fragment of a longer poem, the remainder of which is lost to us. Still the fragment is perfect in itself, and for our purposes may be quoted as though the poetess had written only so much as Hermogenes has preserved. So taken, it forms an exact parallel to the poem of Shelley quoted above.

Each suggests a picture, and conveys a sentiment much after the fashion of music. Both are picturesque, subdued, and tranquil; and so far approach the idyllic type. But their metre, shortness, and, above all, the absence of direct human interest, forbid us to class them with the idyll proper. No poem, which is merely sentimental, or which gives a picture of still life, can be properly reckoned as idyllic.

This distinction will, perhaps, be better understood by reference to an example. Mr. Clough has a very beautiful poem, the undersong of which is the line, — in which he describes a French girl driving home her cows and thinking of an absent lover. In this very good, and even typical, specimen of the idyll, the characteristics marking it off from the last-quoted poems are plainly to be seen. The pastoral element is retained, a story of human interest is hinted, and the little picture is set in charming natural scenery. A description of French mountains capped with snow, and a thunderstorm rolling up in the valley, would in no case have been an idyll. Had the action of the poem been made more vivid, ending in some catastrophe, it might have become a ballad. As it is it remains an idyll, neither more nor less, and very charming in its kind.

Home, Rose, and home, Provence and La Palie;

From considering what the idyll is not, I have been led to give an example of what it is, or rather may be. For idyllic poetry is a wide and subdivided field; and, if Mr. Clough's poem be typical, as has been asserted, it is not meant that all idylls are to be referred to it as the standard. It belongs to one division, and is rather a good example to take, because, while perfect in its kind, it approaches in tone and treatment to another division. Idyllic poems fall into three classes. The first contains those idealized poems, which are usually called pastoral, in which country life is described, not as it is, but as it is poetically imagined to be; and imaginary characters are introduced, either for poetical purposes simply or with a veiled but easily understood allusion to real and living persons. The second is realistic, giving a picture of actual life. To this division Mr. Clough's poem clearly belongs, since it describes nothing that may not be conceived as having actually happened. The third, which may be treated as a subdivision of the first, is composed of memorial idylls.

I take the second of these divisions first, and for this reason: I wish if possible to induce my readers to do justice to the idyll, and would therefore approach them by the side where prejudice is least strong. It will be well, therefore, to abstain at first from saying much about imaginary shepherds, and the rest of pastoral symbolism, the bare mention of which will make some critics stand to their arms. Let me rather say that the idyll need not be pastoral at all, and very often is realistic enough to satisfy the most practical of the dwellers in Gath. Be it admitted, then, that the idealized idyll, or pastoral poem, had until lately fallen into discredit, from which, perhaps, it has not wholly recovered. The words "idyllic sentiment" are sometimes even now used — as by Mr. Mackenzie Wallace in his "Russia" — as the equivalent of something wholly fanciful and unreal. This fall was the effect of the reaction naturally consequent upon the abuse of idyllic symbolism. Clement Marot is a poet whom not many would care to read in the original. But since Mr. Henry Morley published a charming sketch of him and his work, every one ought to know that Marot set the fashion in his day of disguising real personages under the idyllic mask. He wrote of himself as a shepherd, of the king as Pan, of the persecuting dignitaries of the Church as wolves. Spenser copied Marot pretty closely in "The Shepherd's Calendar." But the conceit, which was charming in those older poets, was afterwards worn threadbare by over use. The reasons which made it desirable to disguise allusions to fact under the likeness of fable passed away; and the symbolism which had covered stern realities was decked with ribbons and set up for admiration in the court of love. Every small poet was constantly appealing to imaginary shepherds to tell him, tell him what had become of his shepherdess, until people became heartily tired of Strephon and Chloe, with their sheep, crooks, and fal-lals.

Pope, in his "Discourse on Pastoral Poetry," says: "There are not a greater number of any sort of verses than those called pastorals, nor a smaller of those which are truly so." His early efforts

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

must be classed with the majority, and only succeeded in showing that the age could not produce excellence of this kind. A great admirer of Pope, William Shenstone, thought himself entitled to use pastoral imagery, because he lived retired in the country, or, in his own phrase, "vacant in the rural cave," marked "the lab'ring hind invert the soil," and had leisure to prophesy that > elegance, with coy, judicious hand,

> Shall cull fresh flow'rets for Ophelia's tomb.

His verses gave evidence of a gentle, kindly nature, but of very little more, and he contributed to bring round the time when a reader, on seeing a pastoral ode, would immediately shut the book. Metaphor is not necessarily insincere, but in the hands of poets of that age it became so. The curtain was the picture. Art was not disguised, nor did it in turn disguise a reality of genuine feeling.

Pastoral poetry came to have Watteau for its painter, and took the style of the siècle Louis Quatorze, where > all is glistening show,

> Like the idle gleam that December's beam
> Can dart on ice and snow.

Idyllic sentiment, idyllic painting, and idyllic poetry were appropriated by the French court, and became hollow, rouged, and false, like it. We have long since escaped from the glamor of those enchantments, and are beginning to recover from the reaction which followed them.

But for the great benefit, and with a view to the gradual education of those who imagine that Sèvres china shepherds and shepherdesses haunt all idyllic poetry, the fact must be established that idylls are not necessarily pastoral, nor are pastoral poems necessarily unreal. In idyllic poetry an incident may be described having no relation whatever to oxen and sheep; or if shepherds are introduced, their talk may be perfectly, and even realistically, natural. If we want to see what the idyll originally was, we must turn to Theocritus; and in his genuine idylls we shall find both idealized and realistic poems. In him, at least, there is no "middle wall of partition" between the two kinds. A pastoral poem may be idealized by him, but quite as often it is not. In many instances his shepherds talk very naturally — sometimes rather coarsely; these poems being tolerably faithful transcripts of the actual converse of goat-herds and ox-herds, with just those changes in language, and addition of point and a poetic flavor in places, which are necessary to redeem the whole from vulgarity, and to keep weariness away from the mind of the reader. Very parallel with these, and strictly in the same class, are the charming "Poems in the Dorset Dialect," for which the present generation is so much indebted to Mr. Barnes. But Theocritus often writes in the same manner on quite other subjects, and presents us with a scene from other kinds of life. In the second idyll, for example, a girl tries to recover the affections of a lover by magical charms; and the undersong or recurring line throughout the first part of the poem is addressed to the wryneck, which is bound to the magic wheel, and whose cries are supposed to attract the lover to the house. In another poem two friends meet, and the one narrates how, on the preceding night, he opened a particularly good jar of wine, and there was "a sweet drinking;" and how a quarrel came about between him and his mistress. At another time a "spring journey" to a festival is described, with the songs sung on the way; and the party is left enjoying midday repose in a reed-bed by the roadside, shaded overhead by poplars and elms, a sacred spring trickling hard by from a nymph-haunted cave; the merry din of the grasshoppers was heard from the branches; the croaking of the tree-frog from the thicket; larks and siskins sang, and the stock-dove mourned; the yellow bees flew over the water, and all smelt of the rich heat — smelt of the coming summer. Or, again, Theocritus tells how one Syracusan lady comes to visit another; how they chat together, and go forth into the perils of the street, where the horseguards frighten them much, and where the people "push like pigs" to the festival of Adonis. There is nothing pastoral, or fanciful, or mythological about these poems. They are simply characteristic sketches; sometimes almost photographic in their fidelity to actual life. Those, therefore, who object altogether to allegory and symbolism, need not turn away at once from a poem which is called an idyll, because it may happen to suit them very well.

It is right, perhaps, to dwell upon this side of idyllic poetry, because there are those who will appreciate it, while they will wholly refuse to place, as I do, the ideal and pastoral poems at the head of the idyllic class. Some reasons for this preference will be given presently. Meantime we must subdivide those poems, which depart more or less completely from actual life, and introduce mythological persons and idealized shepherds, into two divisions. First and highest come those which are in no sense allegories; which convey no veiled or secondary meaning; which deal with fancy because it is more poetical than fact, with imaginary characters, because they have a charm of their own not found in the actual world. In such poems a favorite subject is Polyphemus, and his hopeless love for the sea-nymph, who jests at and avoids him. Most readers of poetry know how, in Theocritus, the grotesquely uncouth monster is made to sit, looking seaward, on a rock, and soothe his love for Galatea by song and the pipe; while she, as he describes her, "whiter than curd, softer than the lamb, more skittish than a calf, whose skin is smoother and firmer than the unripe grape," mocks him from amid the waves, until he wishes that he had been born with fins; and takes comfort at last in the philosophic reflection that "he can find a handsomer Galatea if this one scorns him." All lovers of music know how admirably Handel, in his "Acis and Galatea," has caught and expressed the idyllic sentiment in some of its aspects.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

But the most highly idealized poem of Theocritus is the first, which has also influenced later poetry far more than any of the others. From this idyll Virgil and Milton have sought inspiration, and indeed have translated portions of it almost exactly. Thyrsis and a shepherd meet and challenge each other to play or sing: but to pipe at noonday is not safe; they fear Pan, who then rests, wearied with his hunting; and his anger is easily roused. So they agree that Thyrsis should sing the ode which describes the fate of Daphnis, which twice over at least has been honored by imitation. This poem is wholly ideal: this is to say, its personages are the creation of poetic fancy; it contains no allusion, direct or indirect, to living men and their affairs. The Daphnis, over whom the lament is pronounced, never really either lived or died. More than this, the persons introduced in this kind of poetry do not speak altogether the language of real men and women; and some of the characters and incidents are purely fanciful. The idyll of this highest kind deals with a wholly ideal world, the very essence and charm of which is that it is other than the world of our practical acquaintance.

There is usually no great or lasting difference between this and the next subdivision, consisting of poems with mythological or fanciful machinery, but which are governed by a covert allusion to the actual world and contemporary personages. Virgil has, as many think, spoilt his eclogues by making them allusive instead of purely ideal. But who cares now whether or not Tityrus had an actual prototype, or if Gallus and Lycoris really lived in the poet's circle of acquaintance?

We read the poems as poems, not as illustrations of the history of the time; and so the characters have become for us purely ideal, whatever was meant by the poet, or understood by his contemporaries. It may be added, as a testimony to the value of those poems, which it seems just now to be the fashion to decry, that they contain a greater number of often-quoted lines than almost any others of equal length; a test of merit, not indeed conclusive, yet worthy of consideration. Marot and Spenser also, as has been already remarked, introduced thinly-veiled allusions into their idylls, and used them to some extent for argumentative or controversial purposes. We may admit at once that this practice is thoroughly contrary to the spirit of idyllic poetry, and poetically wrong. But who cares now that Algrind was Archbishop Grindal? The controversial meaning is gone; the poetry remains. So old builders satirized the regular clergy in the sculpture of their cathedrals. The satire was out of place, and artistically bad; but it hardly now affects our enjoyment of the whole structure. Time has worn away, or veiled for us the false, and left the true. In any new poem of the idyllic kind the intrusion of controversial matter, or of current allusions, should be sternly condemned. But in old poems we need take no account of them, for they will not interfere with our pleasure unless we force them to do so. Virgil and Spenser have a strong tendency to be idyllic, even when they undertake to be epic; and those portions of their works which are cast in the idyllic mould have high and peculiar merits, which need not be spoilt for us by temporary defects.

The third and last division of idyllic poetry is that which its poets have consecrated to the memory of departed friends, in which shine the names of Moschus, Milton, Shelley, and Arnold. The idyll has been considered peculiarly fit for the expression of grief. Those who have so used it have thought that private joy or sorrow may well be the motive power which brings poetry into existence, but that it should be shown to the public only under a veil of art and in an idealized form. That which a true poet pleases to give us we must accept as it is, and enjoy the beauties it

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

displays. If a man of genius chooses to proclaim his inmost feelings without disguise, we must be grateful for so much of the display as we can honestly admire. But he acts more wisely who limits his lament within a brief compass, and even then expresses it under forms and symbols. The absence of passion and intensity, which distinguishes idyllic poetry, makes it an excellent means for hinting at a sorrow which the public would not thank us for displaying more openly. True poetry belongs to the order of eternal things; sorrow for an individual is temporal, and does not interest others than his immediate circle of friends, unless it be expressed in a form which appeals to all men for all time. This form of idyllic poetry has, like the others, met with dispraise. Dr. Johnson, somewhat peevishly, says of "Lycidas:" "It is not to be considered as the effusion of real passion, for passion runs not after remote allusions and obscure opinions. Passion plucks no berries from the myrtle and ivy, nor calls upon Arethuse and Mincius, nor tells of rough satyrs with cloven heel. In this poem there is no nature, for there is no truth; there is no art, for there is nothing new. Its form is that of a pastoral; easy, vulgar, and therefore disgusting. Whatever images it can supply are long ago exhausted; and its inherent improbability always forces dissatisfaction on the mind." In this sentence Johnson would no doubt have included the other poems of this class. But the true answer to the only part of this criticism which is worth answering, is that passion which would be loud had best be silent. As Martial says,—

> Non luget quisquis laudari, Gellia, quaerit;
> Ille dolet vere, qui sine teste dolet.

But when passion has lost its first intensity, it may very properly become the motive for poetry, which, however, with becoming modesty, will shrink from publicity, unless cloaked in those "remote allusions," "obscure opinions," and "inherent improbabilities," which the prejudices of Johnson caused him to find "vulgar"— not indeed in our modern sense, but familiar and offensive.

Having thus glanced rapidly over the divisions of idyllic poetry as it has existed in the past, we have to consider what is likely to be its position in time to come. There are two schools of prophets who prophesy of the poetry of the future. According to one school, old models will be totally abandoned; poetry will be fused by other fires, and run into wholly different moulds; and each poet will be "ein Narr auf eigne Hand." The other holds that while, as times change, different subject-matter will be introduced into poetry, yet the old forms will be retained, and even for the highest work the old legends still give the truest inspiration. Probably, at any rate for a long time to come, the old methods will hold their ground. I can well imagine that the drama will undergo great changes, and that the drama of the future may differ as widely from that of Shakespeare as his did from that of Sophocles or Æschylus. But the drama is the most mobile form of poetry — the most subject to the influences of the age. Of course, it does not follow that because we cannot imagine a thing, it therefore will not come to pass; but those who cannot imagine cannot expect the time when the epic of the future will be essentially different from the epic of the past; and the same may be said, perhaps even more emphatically, of lyric poetry or song. So with idyllic poetry. It has changed from age to age; it will change with the coming ages. But under its external changes it will remain essentially the same. For that which is its essence is eternally pleasing, and will be continually reproduced in one form or another. The typical idyll is a poem in which a little picture is painted in somewhat subdued coloring; it represents a scene and a slight story, which are pleasing without being exciting. The poets widely modify the idyll, each according to his own nature. But they cannot pass certain bounds; or, if they do, their poems are no longer idyllic, but something else. On the one hand, the idyll borders on the drama. Multiply the characters of "The Syracusan Women" of Theocritus — well known to English readers in Mr. Matthew Arnold's excellent version — intensify the action, and you have a play. Others again, such as the "Alexis und Dora" of Goethe, with more fire, and a shorter, livelier metre, would pass into the lyric, or perhaps the ballad region. The idyllic domain lies between these empires. It is a land "where it is always afternoon" — where strong passion and violent action may never enter. Pastoral poetry is, I know, wholly condemned by some. It has been shown that the idyll has a wider range; but there are some — si quis captus amore leget — who will not despise verse-tasting > of summer and the country green,

> Dance and Provençal song and sun-burnt mirth.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Perfect pastoral poetry introduces us to scenes which our feet can never tread; and its shepherds have often little resemblance to the actual tenders of small cattle. Are we so abandoned to realism that we can no longer appreciate any fairy-tales save those of science? If we have lost the power of loving poetry which murmurs like a slow-flowing river between great reed-beds, and which raises the charm of country life to a height only to be reached by fancy, our hold of poetry, at least on one side, has altogether slackened.

But we have left the past, and are to see how the idyll is being adapted to meet the needs of the present and the future. One instance which will occur to most persons in these days when German is so commonly read is Goethe's "Hermann und Dorothea." This poem is a good instance of the extent to which the idyll may be varied from the normal type without losing the idyllic character. The story is more fully worked out than is usual in the idyll, and is even divided into sections, whereas the true idyll seldom shifts the scene or allows you more than one look through the camera. But the idyllic sentiment, which consists in picturesque effect and lightly-stirred emotion is maintained throughout, and the poem may be taken as a very fair example of the way in which the idyll may be modified to suit modern needs. Mr. Browning's art is, I think, always too intense to be purely idyllic. But his "Saul and David" is an idyll altered in character by heat, like metamorphic rocks, and several of the poems entitled "Men and Women" are very like idylls. "Love among the Ruins" is a true and very beautiful idyll.

Our other great living poet is essentially idyllic. Mr. Tennyson has indeed departed from the idyllic type when there was most reason for keeping to it, and has called a series of poems idylls which I certainly should not class under that head. His "Idylls of the King" seem more like studies for an epic poem than anything else. The first which appeared, the "Morte d' Arthur," and which is much the finest, unless an exception be made in favor of "Guinevere," is simply an epic fragment. It was not these, but the detached poems to be found in his works, that Mr. Kingsley thought must "make the shade of Theocritus hide his diminished head." This is high praise — I think exaggerated praise. Yet in such poems as "Dora" and "The Gardener's Daughter" Mr. Tennyson has attained to a high measure of success, and both have the true characters of the idyll, while "Œnone" must always hold its place in the very front rank of this class of poetry.

But for the best work in this kind which has been done since Milton — as the lyrical nature of Shelley's poetry strongly marks even the "Adonais" — we have to thank Mr. Matthew Arnold. In "The Scholar Gipsy" he has given us a legend of Oxford. With subtle and most skilful daring he has brought the ideal and the actual, legend and modern life, close together, without ever allowing the one to jar upon the other. When he wrote of the scholar who had left Oxford life for the haunts of the gipsies, Arnold had a friend with him, who shared in the fancy that they might some day meet this wanderer,

> Rapt, twirling in his hand a withered spray,
> And waiting for the spark from heaven to fall.

But the friend could not stay.

> He could not keep, —
> For that a shadow lowered on the fields, —
> Here with the shepherds and the silly sheep,
> Some life of men unblest
> He knew, which made him droop, and filled his head.
> He went; his piping took a troubled sound
> Of storms that rage outside our happy ground;
> He could not wait their passing, he is dead!

This friend was another poet, to whom I have referred above — Arthur Hugh Clough, and to his memory Arnold wrote a monody, which stands beside the very best memorial idylls. Space forbids quotation at greater length from this poem, "Thyrsis," and the other, "The Scholar Gipsy," with which it is so closely connected. But they form the best defence of idyllic poetry, because the best recent examples of effective use of the idyll.

With these examples before us I think we must admit that the idyll is likely to play a not unimportant part in the poetry of the future. It seldom has been, and seldom will be, as popular as other forms of poetry. With a few exceptions — and the merits even of these have been disputed — idyllic poetry does not command the attention and admiration of all. Yet it fills a niche which cannot be left empty without spoiling the general effect of the temple which each age rears to poetry. The particular form which idyllic, like other poetry, takes in each epoch varies with the taste and judgment of the men of that generation. The pastoral and ideal elements may at one time be exaggerated, and at another left out altogether. Per-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

haps in the idyll of the future the faults of the past will be avoided, and the merits of different schools united; the pastoral symbolism will be occasionally retained and used, as Mr. Arnold has shown us it may be used, to help the translation of the harsh facts of actual life and personal sorrow into the calm and eternal regions of art; myth, legend, and reality will be taught to touch without jarring upon each other, and the idyll will be recognized as not indeed among the highest, yet one of the most pleasing forms of poetry.

The idyll does not claim a place in the highest rank. The greatest poetry is truly, although perhaps always unconsciously, didactic, or else it keenly excites the emotions and creates lofty sentiments. None of these objects can be gained by the writer of idyllic poetry. There will, therefore, never be wanting the Johnsons and the Morrells, who, from a real or a fancied eminence, exclaim, —

> What, ho, thou jolly shepheard swaine,
> Come up the hill to me;
> Better is than the lowly plaine,
> Both for thy sheep and thee.

But Thomalin knows full well that

> In humble dales is footing fast.

It is not by all men, nor even by the greatest in all humors, that the highest kind of work can be done; nor by all men and in all humors that the highest kind of work can be enjoyed. In these days of unrest and feverish action there is special need of restful and unworldly poetry, and of such is the idyll.

> Alsoone may shepheard climb the skie
> That leades in lowly dales,
> As goteheard prowd, that, sitting hie,
> Upon the mountayne sayles.

M. W. Moggridge.

From The Theatre.

TALKING AT THE PLAY.

The talkers at the play, talkers by habit and from choice, represent a form of social nuisance against which legislation is practically powerless. We know that de minimis non curat lex, and those who spoil our evening's entertainment at the play must behave worse than they do before we can actually interfere to put a stop to their selfish way of enjoying themselves. If only they would interrupt the performers upon the stage they would doubtless become amenable to the law, and at the instigation of the acting manager they would not improbably be silenced or expelled. So, too, they would be stopped if they were caught picking pockets, or attempting to settle their little differences of opinion by a resort to blows. But so long as they confine themselves to irritating their neighbors by their audible whispers or by animated conversation carried on throughout the performance in a low tone of voice, they are safe from any check save that provided by an occasional remonstrance or by an angry frown. Ultimately they may succumb to the force of public opinion which must in the end decide the amount of deference to be paid to the feelings of others; but before petty selfishness of this kind is definitely recognized as a breach of good breeding and an intolerable sin against good manners, we shall, it is to be feared, have a long time to wait, and talking at the play will continue to flourish as a thoroughly objectionable fashion, but a fashion nevertheless.

The commonest type of talkers at the play is seen in the would-be man-about-town when he takes the conventional country cousin to a first night. This gentleman really regards his conversation as a sacred duty owed to his companion. He feels bound to prove how many acquaintances amongst theatrical people he has achieved by the aid of his membership of Bohemian clubs. From the actress in the box to the critic in the stalls he must be able to give a name and a condensed biography of every one in the house who catches his eye, and his opportunities in this direction are increased by the fact that his auditor has no means of testing the accuracy of the information so volubly poured into his ear. His reputation is, he thinks, at stake, and gossip, either correct or incorrect, must be supplied. So the lady's relation to her companion is incorrectly described, the journalist is allotted to a paper for which he never wrote in his life, and — a blunder much more important — malicious stories are told of an actress whose sister is seated well within earshot of the reckless speaker. Wonderful indeed would life behind the scenes be if it were anything like what it is described as being by the cicerone who knows everything; and if we were not too pained to have to hear his remarks at all, they would assuredly keep us well amused. Another confirmed chatterer is the old stager who always knows how to finish each sentence spoken on the stage before it is half over, and who for the benefit of the less-experienced playgoer by his side audibly unrav-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

els the plot as it proceeds, repeats and explains each joke, and possibly, if the piece is a standard one, gives reminiscences of the way in which each successive point used to be made by artists now dead and gone. He is perhaps a laudator temporis acti, and he persists in singing his praises of time past at the wrong moment; or he is a gushing admirer of the "modern school," whatever that may chance to be, and he cannot keep his admiration to himself until the performance is over. A talker who talks apparently in spite of himself is the funny man who cannot resist his humorous sallies, however inopportune they may be. Then there is the gentleman who chimes in with any portion of the dialogue that chances to hit his fancy, who has in stock a fund of ludicrous similes for the actors, and who is never quiet except when he is cudgelling his brains for some smart utterance to be given impromptu during the critical situation of the drama. This humorist might sometimes be justly set down as a rival playwright or as a professional concocter of burlesque determined to keep up his character even in private or semi-private life. He seems incapable of serious appreciation of stage-work, however good, or at any rate he is very loth to show it. His cynical comments will often quite destroy the enjoyment of those who catch them, for their laughing satire is sufficiently smart to leave a sting behind it, and there are those weak enough to allow the thread of their earnest interest to be broken irreparably after this fashion.

But there are also talkers whose talk is of nothing connected with the theatre or performance in it. Why they have come to the theatre at all it is impossible to guess, since they arrive there too late to understand what is going on upon the stage, and as likely as not they will stay out for a whole act smoking cigarettes and drinking brandy and soda. Arrived in their box — it is generally to a box that playgoers of this class go — they do not even pretend to take an interest in the play or the acting, but begin an animated discussion about the races they have recently left, or the game of billiards that they had after dinner, or the movements of Erie and Great Northern Deferred A. and South-Eastern A. Perhaps the discussion grows vehement, since it is possible to grow excited over the pursuits of betting man and stockbroker; and then one result of the excitement is the great annoyance of all who can see and hear the inhabitants of the box. It is mostly after a heavy dinner that these worthies make their appearance, and the fact that they have been dining is generally very apparent. Their presence in the front of the box is always a curse to the performers, for it distracts the attention of all upon whose notice it is forced; and it is a slight upon the interest of the entertainment which cannot well be overlooked.

It is scarcely necessary to insist upon the selfishness and the direct madness of such behavior as that indulged in by the various classes of talkers at the play. They may not mean to do much harm, any more than do the good people whose tongues are loosened at parties the moment the music begins. They are simply too stupid or too careless to know what a nuisance they are, and comparatively few begin their conversation in deliberate defiance of the wishes of their neighbors. The fact is, that folks who sit near these chatterboxes would do well if they would quietly remonstrate with the offenders on each occasion as it arises, when in nine cases out of ten the offence would cease. Assuming that the annoyance is not intended, it will be dropped the moment the sufferers protest; and much good would be done if those whose pleasure is thus spoilt for the idle gratification of others would at any rate give the culprits the opportunity of proving that their conduct was not intentionally subversive of the comfort of others.

END OF VOLUME CXXXVII.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY