The Living age ...
New York [etc.], The Living age co. inc. [etc.]

https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374

Public Domain
http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

We have determined this work to be in the public domain, meaning that it is not subject to copyright. Users are free to copy, use, and redistribute the work in part or in whole. It is possible that current copyright holders, heirs or the estate of the authors of individual portions of the work, such as illustrations or photographs, assert copyrights over these portions. Depending on the nature of subsequent use that is made, additional rights may need to be obtained independently of anything we can address.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Production Note

Cornell University Library produced this volume to preserve the informational content of the deteriorated original. The best available copy of the original has been used to create this digital copy. It was scanned bitonally at 600 dots per inch resolution and compressed prior to storage using ITU Group 4 compression. Conversion of this material to digital files was supported by the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation. Digital file copyright by Cornell University Library 1995.

This volume has been scanned as part of The Making of America Project, a cooperative endeavor undertaken to preserve and enhance access to historical material from the nineteenth century.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

AP
2
.L79+

024850

Cornell University Library

BOUGHT WITH THE INCOME FROM THE SAGE ENDOWMENT FUND
THE GIFT OF Henry W. Sage
1891

A.238688 4/11/09

6896-1

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by
CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

LITTELL'S

LIVING AGE.

E PLURIBUS UNUM.

"These publications of the day should from time to time be winnowed, the wheat carefully preserved, and the chaff thrown away."

"Made up of every creature's best."

"Various, that the mind
Of desultory man, studious of change,
And pleased with novelty, may be indulged."

FIFTH SERIES, VOLUME XXII.

FROM THE BEGINNING, VOL. CXXXVII.

APRIL, MAY, JUNE,

1878.

BOSTON:

LITTELL AND GAY.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

AP
2
.L79+

A.238688

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by
CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from
CORNELL UNIVERSITY

TABLE OF THE PRINCIPAL CONTENTS

OF

THE LIVING AGE, VOLUME CXXXVII.

THE TWENTY-SECOND QUARTERLY VOLUME OF THE FIFTH SERIES

APRIL, MAY, JUNE, 1878.

EDINBURGH REVIEW.

Scepticism in Geology, ... 707
Three Scottish Teachers, ... 771

QUARTERLY REVIEW.

Lecky's "History of England in the Eighteenth Century," 451
The Crown and the Constitution, . . 515

WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

Popular Buddhism according to the Chinese Canon, ... 387

BRITISH QUARTERLY REVIEW.

Constantinople, ... 579

CHURCH QUARTERLY REVIEW.

A Broad-Church Bishop, ... 131
The Poetry of Doubt.—Arnold and Clough, ... 410

CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

The English Language as Spoken and Written, ... 94
Madonna Dunya, ... 117
Froude's "Life and Times of Thomas Becket," 150, 323
Positivism on an Island: The New Paul and Virginia, ... 358
The Greatness of the Romans, . . 643
Illustrations of the Acts, from Recent Discoveries, ... 685

NEW QUARTERLY REVIEW.

The Apollo Belvedere, ... 496

FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

Florence and the Medici, ... 3
Equality, ... 67
Modern Japan, ... 222, 345
The Political Adventures of Lord Beaconsfield, ... 276, 657
Diderot at Saint Petersburg, ... 732

NINETEENTH CENTURY.

England as a Military Power in 1854 and in 1878, ... 195
Russia and India, ... 259
Can Jews be Patriots? 374

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

"Only Jean," 15
French Home Life. The Influence of Women, ... 236

FRASER'S MAGAZINE.

Spenser's Irish Rivers, ... 21
On Teaching English, ... 115
A Romance of the East Coast, . . . 380
On Keeping Silence from Good Words, 563
Thurot, ... 613
The Azores, ... 668
Basque Customs, ... 749
Louis Börne, ... 793

CORNHILL MAGAZINE.

The Three Cities, ... 51
On the Decay of Fine Manners, . . . 110
Æs Triplex, ... 307
Canossa, ... 504
Count Waldemar, ... 595

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

"Il Re Galantuomo," 46
The Gothic Fragments of Ulfilas, . . 300
Thomas Arnold, D.D., ... 428
From the Quirinal to the Vatican, . . 479
Idyllic Poetry, ... 816

TEMPLE BAR.

Russian Court Life in the Eighteenth Century, ... 626
The Yeoman's Story, ... 639
The Death of the Duke de M——, . 653

GOOD WORDS.

How to Live on a Reduced Income, . 699

ST. JAMES'S MAGAZINE.

Flowers of Anglo-Indian Literature, . 438

CASSELL'S MAGAZINE.

How Great Men Work, ... 59

ARGOSY.

The Comet, ... 488

SUNDAY AT HOME.

A Recollection of the Indian Mutiny, . 311

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

CONTENTS.

POPULAR SCIENCE REVIEW.

The China-Clay Industry of Cornwall and Devon, ... 434

EXAMINER.

Conceit, ... 636
The Letter "H": a Historical Conjecture, ... 703

SPECTATOR.

The Hatred of Individuals for Nations, 62
The Tobacco-Tax in Germany, . . . 187
The Gardener Bird, ... 189
The Legitimate Sphere of Agnosticism, 192
Our Irresponsible Ambassadors, . . 250
The Loss of the "Eurydice," 252
The Domestic Sphinx, ... 254
The Luxury of Reading Old Novels, . 442
The Chinese Re-Conquest of Eastern Turkestan, ... 446
Lower Life in the Tropics, ... 568
Amateur Librarians, ... 571
Pictures and Dress, ... 760
The Microphone, ... 764
Tibet, ... 766

SATURDAY REVIEW.

The Pleasures of Mediocrity, ... 315
Courtesy at Home, ... 444
Retrospective Sympathy, ... 510

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

The Centenary of Voltaire, ... 123
Turkish Wives, ... 762

CHAMBERS' JOURNAL.

The Green Flag of the Prophet, . . . 126
Story of George Cruikshank, ... 178
Change-Ringing, ... 247
A Fearful Swing, ... 317
Japanese Fans, ... 319

ALL THE YEAR ROUND.

The House Across the Street, . . . 691

NATURE.

The Last of the Gases, ... 121
The Analogies of Plant and Animal Life, ... 182
The Coming Total Solar Eclipse, . . . 557

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

INDEX TO VOLUME CXXXVII.

ANALOGIES of Plant and Animal Life, . 182
Agnosticism, The Legitimate Sphere of 192
Ambassadors, Our Irresponsible . . 250
Æs Triplex, ... 307
Arnold and Clough, The Poetry of Doubt, ... 410
Arnold, Thomas, D.D., ... 428
Anglo-Indian Literature, Flowers of . 438
Apollo Belvedere, The 496
Azores, The 668
Acts, the, Illustrations of, from Recent Discoveries, ... 685

BROAD-CHURCH Bishop, A 131
Becket, Thomas, Froude's Life and Times of 150, 323
Beaconsfield, Lord, The Political Adventures of. 276, 657
Buddhism, Popular, according to the Chinese Canon, ... 387
Buddhism, ... 575
Brougham's Advice to Macaulay on Entering Life, ... 574
Basque Customs, ... 749
Börne, Louis 793

CITIES, The Three 51
Cruikshank, George, Story of. . . . 178
Change-Ringing, ... 247
Correspondents, Foreign, Our Irresponsible Ambassadors, ... 250
Cat, The, The Domestic Sphinx, . . . 255
Clough and Arnold, The Poetry of Doubt, 410
China-Clay Industry, The, of Cornwall and Devon, ... 434
Courtesy at Home, ... 444
Chinese Re-Conquest of Eastern Turkestan, ... 447
Comet, The 488
Canossa, ... 504
Crown, The, and the Constitution, . 515
Constantinople, ... 579
Count Waldemar, ... 595
Conceit, ... 636

DOUBT, The Poetry of 410
Death of the Duke de M——, . . . 653

Discoveries Recent, The Acts Illustrated by 685
Diderot at Saint Petersburg, ... 732
Dress and Pictures, ... 760
Doubting Heart, A 804

ERICA, ... 35, 80, 164, 209, 286
Equality, ... 67
English Language, The, as Spoken and Written, ... 94
English, On Teaching 115
Ewing, Alexander, Bishop of Argyle, . 131
England as a Military Power in 1854 and in 1878, ... 195
"Eurydice," The Loss of the 252
England in the Eighteenth Century, Lecky's History of 451

FLORENCE and the Mèdici, ... 3
Froude's "Life and Times of Thomas Becket," 150, 323
French Home Life, ... 236
Fans, Japanese 319

GASES, The Last of the 121
Green Flag, The, of the Prophet, . . 126
Germany, The Tobacco-Tax in . . . 187
Gardener Bird, The 189
Greek Pronunciation, ... 320
Goorkhas, The 576
Geology, Scepticism in 707

HONG KONG, ... 51
How Great Men Work, ... 59
Hatred of Individuals for Nations, . 62
Holidays, ... 638
House Across the Street, The . . . 691
"H," The Letter: a Historical Conjecture, ... 703

IRISH Rivers, Spenser's 21
India and Russia, ... 259
Indian Mutiny, A Recollection of the . 311
Income, a Reduced, How to Live on . 699
Idyllic Poetry, ... 816

JAPAN, Modern 222, 345

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Japanese Fans, ... 319
Jews, Can they be Patriots? 374

LECKY'S "History of England in the Eighteenth Century," 451
Librarians, Amateur 571
Lanterns, The Feast of, at Canton, . 765

MEDICI, The, and Florence 3
Manners, Fine, On the Decay of . . 110
Madonna Dunya, ... 117
Macleod of Dare, 143, 229, 421, 471, 677, 724
Mutiny, Indian, A Recollection of the . 311
Macaulay, Brougham's Advice to, on Entering Life, ... 574 Microphone, The 764

NOTE-DEAFNESS, ... 353
Novels, Old, The Luxury of Reading . 442

"ONLY Jean," 15

PRINCES, The Use and Abuse of . . 125
Plant and Animal Life, Analogies of . 182
Paul and Virginia, The New . . . 358
Positivism on an Island, ... 358
Pictures and Dress, ... 760

QUIRINAL, From the, to the Vatican, . 479

RUSSIA and India, ... 259
Romance, A, of the East Coast, . . . 380
Russian Court Life in the Eighteenth Century, ... 626
Romans, The, The Greatness of . . 643
Reduced Income, a, How to Live on . 699

SPENSER'S Irish Rivers, ... 21
Swing, A Fearful 317
Second Sight, ... 337, 402
Sympathy, ... 510
Solar Eclipse, The Total 557
Silence from Good Words, On Keeping 563
Scepticism in Geology, ... 707
Scottish Teachers, Three 771

TOBACCO-TAX, The, in Germany, . . 187
Tropics, Lower Life in the 568
Thurot, ... 613
Turkish Wives, ... 762
Tibet, ... 766
Teachers, Three Scottish 771
Talking at the Play, ... 823

ULFILAS, The Gothic Fragments of . 300

VICTOR Emanuel, ... 46
Voltaire, The Centenary of . . . 123
Vatican, To the, from the Quirinal, . 479

WITHIN the Precincts, 104, 266, 543, 744, 783

POETRY.

APRIL Wood, An 578
Adieu, Mon Cœur! 706
Apple-Blossoms, ... 770

Beautiful Things, ... 194
Butterflies, ... 514

Child's Heart, A 386
Curé's Progress, The 514

Death's Changed Face, ... 130

Explorer, The 130
Ethel, To 322

Fireside Piece, A 578
Future Home, Our 642

Good, Great Man, The 514

Homeward, ... 66
Hacia Casa, ... 66
Her Laureate, ... 386
Hereafter, ... 386

I Love Thee, ... 2
Irish Song, ... 258

Long Ago, ... 2
Lost and Found, ... 194
Love's Calendar, ... 258
"Lead, Kindly Light," 258
Love's Burial, ... 770

Madonna Dunya, ... 117
Meadow, In a 386
May-Song, A 578
May, A Ballad of 770

Pall Mall, In 2

Room, A 386

Strange Singer, A 66
Spring Songs, ... 322
Sorrow on the Sea, ... 450
Sunset, ... 450
Some Answer, ... 514

Two Cities, The 66
Theatre, At the 194

Wife, My 2
When we were Children, ... 258
Wind and Weather, ... 322

Yeoman's Story, The 639

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

TALES.

COMET, The 489
Count Waldemar, ... 595
Death of the Duke de M——, . . 653
Doubting Heart, A 804
Erica, ... 35, 80, 164, 209, 286
House Across the Street, ... 691
Macleod of Dare, 143, 229, 421, 471, 677, 724
New Paul and Virginia, ... 358
Only Jean, ... 15
Second Sight, ... 337, 402
Within the Precincts, 104, 266, 543, 744, 783

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by
CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from
CORNELL UNIVERSITY

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXII. No. 1764.—April 6, 1878. From Beginning, Vol. CXXXVII.

CONTENTS.

I.	Florence and the Medici. Part II.,	Fortnightly Review,	3
II.	"Only Jean,"	Blackwood's Magazine,	15
III.	Spenser's Irish Rivers. By P. W. Joyce, LL.D.,	Fraser's Magazine,	21
IV.	Erica. Part XVII. Translated for The Living Age, from the German of	Frau von Ingersleben,	35
V.	"Il Re Galantuomo." By James Montgomery Stuart.	Macmillan's Magazine,	46
VI.	The Three Cities. By W. G. Palgrave,	Cornhill Magazine,	51
VII.	How Great Men Work,	Cassell's Magazine,	59
VIII.	The Hatred of Individuals for Nations,	Spectator,	62

POETRY.

My Wife. By Frederick Locker, . . 2
In Pall Mall, ... 2
Long Ago, ... 2
I Love Thee, ... 2

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY

LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

For Eight Dollars, remitted directly to the Publishers, the Living Age will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of The Living Age is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of Littell & Gay.

Single Numbers of The Living Age, 18 cents.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

MY WIFE.

My little wife is out beyond the burn,
I see her parasol behind the fir,
And here am I inditing verse to her
Ere she return.

That pretty bird is happy there conceal'd,
This fragrant chamber smiles a peaceful smile, —
What joy to sing the joys of home — the while My joy's afield!

My spouse is mild — she's meek as any nun,
And yet her spiritual calm is such . . .
Somehow one's always feeling she is much Too good for one.

She thinks I'm wise and handsome — 'tis her creed.
I wonder am I either! On my word
Sometimes I've wonder'd "an my bonnie bird"
Think so indeed:

Perhaps! for she my homage ne'er repels;
Perhaps I might have loved her half a life,
Perhaps — had she but been the little wife
Of some one else.

But why should I complain of cross or cares?
While entertaining her (who won't complain)
It may be I an angel entertain —— And unawares.

Cornhill Magazine. FREDERICK LOCKER.

IN PALL MALL.

What do I see? — that face so fair,
My friend of years too bright to last,
Living again in beauty rare,
As yonder omnibus went past.

Amid surroundings rude and low,
Stood out the gem-like profile clear;
The mouth carved like a perfect bow,
The auburn curls that were so dear.

Can there be two with such a face?
The other, which I thought unique,
Lies 'neath the ivy's sheltering grace,
Since many a year and month and week.

Say shall I follow? Shall I try
To leave my death-in-life and live?
The picture lost, alas! I cry —
Some joy may not the copy give?

Nay, while so much of good and great
Is round thy path and at thy side,
Force not the hands of wiser fate
To give the joy supreme denied.

Yet am I thankful for the glance
Vouchsafed me at thy face divine;
That for one moment sweet of trance,
I lived the life that once was mine.

Adieu — thou fadest as a dream;
The work-day world is back once more:
Gone is that sudden rosy gleam,
And — here's the Athenæum door.

Macmillan's Magazine.

LONG AGO.

He gave me his promise of changeless truth,
(Down in the wood where the ivy clings);
And the air breathed rapture, and love, and youth,
(And yon tree was in bud where the throstle sings).

He said he was going across the sea,
(Far from the wood where the ivy clings),
And would bring back riches and jewels for me;
(But brown leaves shake where the throstle sings).

Hope made life like a summer morn;
(Sweet was the wood where the ivy clings);
Now my heart is cold, and withered, and worn,
(And the bough is bare where the throstle sings).

Days are dreary, and life is long;
(Yet down in the wood the ivy clings),
And the winds they moan a desolate song,
(And there's snow on the bough where no throstle sings).

Spring will come with its buds and leaves (Back to the wood where the ivy clings);
But 'tis winter cold for the heart that grieves,
(And I hear not the song that the throstle sings).

Chambers' Journal. J. C. H.

I LOVE THEE.

I love thee; why, I cannot tell.
A thousand nameless winning ways
Around thee weave their magic spell,
And make words poor to speak thy praise.

I love thee; not because thine eyes
Are matched by heaven's celestial blue,
But in thy trustful look there lies
Th' unspoken promise to be true.

I love thee for some subtle charm
That seems to draw my heart to thine;
Thy voice and look my fears disarm,
And tell me thou art only mine.

I love thee; not for wealth or fame —
No worldly wish holds thought of thee;
And since thy heart reveals the same,
How bright with hope our lives may be!

Tinsley's Magazine. M. A. BAINES.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The Fortnightly Review.

FLORENCE AND THE MEDICI.*

II.

COSIMO had shown consummate skill by governing Florence through a party created and raised to influence by himself. The jealousy of these adherents formed the chief difficulty with which his son Piero had to contend. Unless the Medici could manage to kick down the ladder whereby they had risen, they ran the risk of losing all. As on a former occasion, so now they profited by the mistakes of their antagonists. Three chief men of their own party, Diotisalvi Neroni, Agnolo Acciaiuoli, and Luca Pitti, determined to shake off the yoke of their masters, and to repay the Medici for what they owed by leading them to ruin. Niccolo Soderini, a patriot, indignant at the slow enslavement of his country, joined them. At first they strove to undermine the credit of the Medici with the Florentines by inducing Piero to call in the moneys placed at interest by his father in the hands of private citizens. This act was unpopular; but it did not suffice to move a revolution. To proceed by constitutional measures against the Medici was judged impolitic. Therefore the conspirators decided to take, if possible, Piero's life. The plot failed, chiefly owing to the coolness and the cunning of the young Lorenzo, Piero's eldest son. Public sympathy was strongly excited against the aggressors. Neroni, Acciaiuoli, and Soderini were exiled. Pitti was allowed to stay, dishonored, powerless, and penniless, in Florence. Meanwhile, the failure of their foes had only served to strengthen the position of the Medici. The ladder had saved them the trouble of kicking it down.

The congratulations addressed on this occasion to Piero and Lorenzo by the ruling powers of Italy, show that the Medici were already regarded as princes outside Florence. Lorenzo and Giuliano, the two sons of Piero, travelled abroad to the courts of Milan and Ferrara with the style and state of more than simple citizens. At home they occupied the first place on all occasions of public ceremony, receiving royal visitors on terms of equality, and performing the hospitalities of the republic like men who had been born to represent its dignities. Lorenzo's marriage to Clarice Orsini, of the noble Roman house, was another sign that the Medici were advancing on the way toward despotism. Cosimo had avoided foreign alliances for his children. His descendants now judged themselves firmly planted enough to risk the odium of a princely match for the sake of the support outside the city they might win.

Piero de' Medici died in December, 1469. His son Lorenzo was then barely twenty-two years of age. The chiefs of the Medicean party, all-powerful in the State, held a council, in which they resolved to place him in the same position as his father and grandfather. This resolve seems to have been formed after mature deliberation, on the ground that the existing conditions of Italian politics rendered it impossible to conduct the government without a presidential head. Florence, though still a democracy, required a permanent chief to treat on an equality with the princes of the leading cities. Here we may note the prudence of Cosimo's foreign policy. When he helped to establish despots in Milan and Bologna, he was rendering the presidency of his own family in Florence necessary. Lorenzo, having received this invitation, called attention to his youth and inexperience. Yet he did not refuse it; and, after a graceful display of diffidence, he accepted the charge, entering thus upon that famous political career, in the course of which he not only established and maintained a balance of power in Italy, with Florence for the central city, but also contrived to remodel the government of the republic in the interest of his own family and to strengthen the Medici by relations with the papal see.

The extraordinary versatility of this man's intellectual and social gifts, his participation in all the literary and philosophical interests of his century, his large and liberal patronage of art, and the gaiety with which he joined the people of Flor-

* Concluded from THE LIVING AGE, No. 1752.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ence in their pastimes — Mayday games and Carnival festivities — strengthened his hold upon the city in an age devoted to culture and refined pleasure. Whatever was most brilliant in the spirit of the Italian Renaissance seemed to be incarnate in Lorenzo. Not merely as a patron and a dilettante, but as a poet and a critic, a philosopher and scholar, he proved himself adequate to the varied intellectual ambitions of his country. Penetrated with the passion for erudition which distinguished Florence in the fifteenth century, familiar with her painters and her sculptors, deeply read in the works of her great poets, he conceived the ideal of infusing the spirit of antique civility into modern life, and of effecting for society what the artists were performing in their own sphere. To preserve the native character of the Florentine genius, while he added the grace of classic form, was the aim to which his tastes and instincts led him. At the same time, while he made himself the master of Florentine revels, and the Augustus of Renaissance literature, he took care that beneath his carnival masks and ball-dresses should be concealed the chains which he was forging for the republic. What he lacked, with so much mental brilliancy, was moral greatness. The age he lived in was an age of selfish despots, treacherous generals, godless priests. It was an age of intellectual vigor and artistic creativeness; but it was also an age of mean ambition, sordid policy, and vitiated principles. Lorenzo remained true in all respects to the genius of this age: true to its enthusiasm for antique culture, true to its passion for art, true to its refined love of pleasure; but true also to its petty political intrigues, to its cynical selfishness, to its lack of heroism. For Florence he looked no higher and saw no further than Cosimo had done. If culture was his pastime, the enslavement of the city by bribery and corruption was the hard work of his manhood. As is the case with much Renaissance art, his life was worth more for its decorative detail than for its constructive design. In richness, versatility, variety, and exquisiteness of execution, it left little to be desired; yet, viewed at a distance, and as a whole, it does not inspire us with a sense of architectonic majesty.

Lorenzo's chief difficulties arose from the necessity under which, like Cosimo, he labored of governing the city through its old institutions by means of a party. To keep the members of this party in good temper, and to gain their approval for the alterations he effected in the State machinery of Florence, was the problem of his life. The successful solution of this problem was easier now, after two generations of the Medicean ascendency, than it had been at first. Meanwhile the people were maintained in good humor by public shows, ease, plenty, and a general laxity of discipline. The splendor of Lorenzo's foreign alliances and the consideration he received from all the courts of Italy, contributed in no small measure to his popularity and security at home. By using his authority over Florence to inspire respect abroad, and by using his foreign credit to impose upon the burghers, Lorenzo displayed the tact of a true Italian diplomatist. His genius for statecraft, as then understood, was indeed of a rare order, equally adapted to the conduct of a complicated foreign policy and to the control of a suspicious and variable commonwealth. In one point alone he was inferior to his grandfather. He neglected commerce, and allowed his banking business to fall into disorder so hopeless that in course of time he ceased to be solvent. Meanwhile his personal expenses, both as a prince in his own palace, and as the representative of majesty in Florence, continually increased. The bankruptcy of the Medici, it had long been foreseen, would involve the public finances in serious confusion. And now, in order to retrieve his fortunes, Lorenzo was not only obliged to repudiate his debts to the exchequer, but had also to gain complete disposal of the State purse. It was this necessity that drove him to effect the constitutional revolution of 1480, by which he substituted a privy council of seventy members for the old councils of the State, absorbing the chief functions of the commonwealth into this single body, whom he practically nominated at pleasure. The same want of money led to the great scandal of his reign

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

— the plundering of the Monte delle Doti, or State insurance-office fund for securing dowers to the children of its creditors.

While tracing the salient points of Lorenzo de' Medici's administration, I have omitted to mention the important events which followed shortly after his accession to power in 1469. What happened between that date and 1480 was not only decisive for the future fortunes of the Casa Medici, but it was also eminently characteristic of the perils and the difficulties which beset Italian despots. The year 1471 was signalized by a visit paid by the duke Galeazzo Maria Sforza of Milan, and his wife Bona of Savoy, to the Medici in Florence. They came attended by their whole court — body-guards on horse and foot, ushers, pages, falconers, grooms, kennel-varlets, and huntsmen. Omitting the mere baggage service, their train counted two thousand horses. To mention this incident would be superfluous, had not so acute an observer as Machiavelli marked it out as a turning-point in Florentine history. Now, for the first time, the democratic commonwealth saw its streets filled with a mob of courtiers. Masques, balls, and tournaments succeeded each other with magnificent variety; and all the arts of Florence were pressed into the service of these festivals. Machiavelli says that the burghers lost the last remnant of their old austerity of manners, and became, like the degenerate Romans, ready to obey the masters who provided them with brilliant spectacles. They gazed with admiration on the pomp of Italian princes, their dissolute and godless living, their luxury and prodigal expenditure; and when the Medici affected similar habits in the next generation, the people had no courage to resist the invasion of their pleasant vices.

In the same year, 1471, Volterra was reconquered for the Florentines by Frederick of Urbino. The honors of this victory, disgraced by a brutal sack of the conquered city, in violation of its articles of capitulation, were reserved for Lorenzo, who returned in triumph to Florence. More than ever he assumed the prince, and in his person undertook to represent the State.

In the same year, 1471, Francesco della Rovere was raised to the papacy with the memorable name of Sixtus IV. Sixtus was a man of violent temper and fierce passions, restless and impatiently ambitious, bent on the aggrandisement of the beautiful and wanton youths, his nephews. Of these the most aspiring was Girolamo Riario, for whom Sixtus bought the town of Imola from Taddeo Manfredi, in order that he might possess the title of count and the nucleus of a tyranny in the Romagna. This purchase thwarted the plans of Lorenzo, who wished to secure the same advantages for Florence. Smarting with the sense of disappointment, he forbade the Roman banker, Francesco Pazzi, to guarantee the purchase money. By this act Lorenzo made two mortal foes — the pope and Francesco Pazzi. Francesco was a thin, pale, atrabilious fanatic, all nerve and passion, with a monomaniac intensity of purpose, and a will inflamed and guided by imagination — a man formed by nature for conspiracy, such a man, in fact, as Shakespeare drew in Cassius. Maddened by Lorenzo's prohibition, he conceived the notion of overthrowing the Medici in Florence by a violent blow. Girolamo Riario entered into his views. So did Francesco Salvati, archbishop of Pisa, who had private reasons for hostility. These men found no difficulty in winning over Sixtus to their plot; nor is it possible to purge the pope of participation in what followed. I need not describe by what means Francesco drew the other members of his family into the scheme, and how he secured the assistance of armed cutthroats. Suffice it to say that the chief conspirators, with the exception of the count Girolamo, betook themselves to Florence, and there, after the failure of other attempts, decided to murder Lorenzo and his brother Giuliano in the cathedral on Sunday, the 26th of April, 1478. The moment when the priest at the high altar finished the mass was fixed for the assassination. Everything was ready. The conspirators, by Judas kisses and embracements, had discovered that the young men wore no protective armor under their silken doublets. Pacing the aisles behind the choir, they feared no treason. And now the lives of both might easily have been secured, if at

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

the last moment the courage of the hired assassins had not failed them. Murder, they said, was well enough; but they could not bring themselves to stab men before the newly consecrated body of Christ. In this extremity a priest was found, who, "being accustomed to churches," had no scruples. He and another reprobate were told off to Lorenzo. Francesco de' Pazzi himself undertook Giuliano. The moment for attack arrived. Francesco plunged his dagger into the heart of Giuliano. Then, not satisfied with this death-blow, he struck again, and in his heat of passion wounded his own thigh. Lorenzo escaped with a flesh-wound from the poniard of the priest, and rushed into the sacristy, where his friend Poliziano shut and held the brazen door. The plot had failed; for Giuliano, of the two brothers, was the one whom the conspirators would the more willingly have spared. The whole church was in an uproar. The city rose in tumult. Rage and horror took possession of the people. They flew to the Palazzo Pubblico and to the houses of the Pazzi, hunted the conspirators from place to place, hung the archbishop by the neck from the palace windows, and, as they found fresh victims for their fury, strung them one by one in a ghastly row at his side above the square. About one hundred in all were killed. None who had joined in the plot escaped; for Lorenzo had long arms, and one man, who fled to Constantinople, was delivered over to his agents by the sultan. Out of the whole Pazzi family only Guglielmo, the husband of Bianca de' Medici, was spared. When the tumult was over, Andrea del Castagno painted the portraits of the traitors head-downwards upon the walls of the Bargello Palace, in order that all men might know what fate awaited the foes of the Medici and of the State of Florence.* Meanwhile a bastard son of Giuliano's was received into the Medicean household, to perpetuate his lineage. This child, named Giulio, was destined to be famous in the annals of Italy and Florence under the title of Pope Clement VII.

As is usual when such plots miss their mark, the passions excited redounded to the profit of the injured party. The commonwealth felt that the blow struck at Lorenzo had been aimed at their majesty. Sixtus, on the other hand, could not contain his rage at the failure of so ably planned a coup de main. Ignoring that he had sanctioned the treason, that a priest had put his hand to the dagger, that the impious deed had been attempted in a church before the very sacrament of Christ, whose vicar on earth he was, the pope now excommunicated the republic. The reason he alleged was, that the Florentines had dared to hang an archbishop.

Thus began a war to the death between Sixtus and Florence. The pope inflamed the whole of Italy, and carried on a ruinous campaign in Tuscany. It seemed as though the republic might lose her subject cites, always ready to revolt when danger threatened the sovereign State. Lorenzo's position became critical. Sixtus made no secret of the hatred he bore him personally, declaring that he fought less with Florence than with the Medici. To bear the odium of this long war and this heavy interdict alone, was more than he could do. His allies forsook him. Naples was enlisted on the pope's side. Milan and the other states of Lombardy were occupied with their own affairs, and held aloof. In this extremity he saw that nothing but a bold step could save him. The league formed by Sixtus must be broken up at any risk, and, if possible, by his own ability. On the 6th of December, 1479, Lorenzo left Florence unarmed and unattended, took ship at Leghorn, and proceeded to the court of his enemy, King Ferdinand, at Naples. Ferdinand was a cruel and treacherous sovereign, who had murdered his guest, Jacopo Piccinino, at a banquet given in his honor. But Ferdinand was the son of Alfonso, who, by address and eloquence, had gained a kingdom from his foe and jailor, Filippo Maria Visconti. Lorenzo calculated that he too, following Alfonso's policy, might prove to Ferdinand how little there was to gain from an alliance with Rome, how much Naples and Florence, firmly united together for offence and defence, might effect in Italy.

Only a student of those perilous times can appreciate the courage and the genius, the audacity combined with diplomatic penetration, displayed by Lorenzo at this crisis. He calmly walked into the lion's den, trusting he could tame the lion and teach it, and all in a few days. Nor did his expectation fail. Though Lorenzo was rather ugly than handsome, with a dark skin, heavy brows, powerful jaws, and nose sharp in the bridge and broad at the nostrils, without grace of carriage or melody of voice, he possessed what makes up for personal defects — the winning charm of eloquence in conversation, a

* Giottino had painted the Duke of Athens, in like manner, on the same walls.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

subtle wit, profound knowledge of men, and tact allied to sympathy, which placed him always at the centre of the situation. Ferdinand received him kindly. The Neapolitan nobles admired his courage, and were fascinated by his social talents. On the 1st of March, 1480, he left Naples again, having won over the king by his arguments. When he reached Florence he was able to declare that he brought home a treaty of peace and alliance signed by the most powerful foe of the republic. The success of this bold enterprise endeared Lorenzo more than ever to his countrymen. In the same year they concluded a treaty with Sixtus, who was forced against his will to lay down arms by the capture of Otranto and the extreme peril of Turkish invasion. After the year 1480 Lorenzo remained sole master in Florence, the arbiter and peacemaker of the rest of Italy.

The conjuration of the Pazzi was only one in a long series of similar conspiracies. Italian despots gained their power by violence and wielded it with craft. Violence and craft were therefore used against them. When the study of the classics had penetrated the nation with antique ideas of heroism, tyrannicide became a virtue. Princes were murdered with frightful frequency. Thus Gian Maria Visconti was put to death at Milan in 1412; Galeazzo Maria Sforza in 1484; the Chiarelli of Fabriano were massacred in 1435; the Baglioni of Perugia in 1500; Girolamo Gentile planned the assassination of Galeazzo Sforza at Genoa in 1476; Niccolo d'Este conspired against his uncle Ercole in 1476; Stefano Porcari attempted the life of Nicolas V. at Rome in 1453; Lodovico Sforza narrowly escaped a violent death in 1453. I might multiply these instances beyond satiety. As it is, I have selected but a few examples, falling, all but one, within the second half of the fifteenth century. Nearly all these attempts upon the lives of princes were made in church during the celebration of sacred offices. These was no superfluity of naughtiness, no wilful sacrilege, in this choice of an occasion. It only testified to the continual suspicion and guarded watchfulness maintained by tyrants. To strike at them except in church was almost impossible. Meanwhile the fate of the tyrannicides was uniform. Successful or not, they perished. Yet so grievous was the pressure of Italian despotism, so glorious was the ideal of Greek and Roman heroism, so passionate the temper of the people, that to kill a prince at any cost to self appeared the crown of manliness. This bloodshed exercised a delirious fascination: pure and base, personal and patriotic motives combined to add intensity of fixed and fiery purpose to the murderous impulse. Those then who, like the Medici, aspired to tyranny and sought to found a dynasty of princes, entered the arena against a host of unknown and unseen gladiators.

On his death-bed in 1492, Lorenzo lay between two men — Angelo Poliziano and Girolamo Savonarola. Poliziano incarnated the genial, radiant, godless spirit of fifteenth-century humanism. Savonarola represented the conscience of Italy, self-convicted, amid all her greatness, of crimes that called for punishment. It is said that when Lorenzo asked the monk for absolution, Savonarola bade him first restore freedom to Florence. Lorenzo turned his face to the wall and was silent. How indeed could he make this city in a moment free, after sixty years of slow and systematic corruption? Savonarola left him, and he died unshriven. This legend is doubtful, though it rests on excellent if somewhat partial authority. It has, at any rate, the value of a mythus, since it epitomizes the attitude assumed by the great preacher to the prince. Florence enslaved, the soul of Lorenzo cannot lay its burden down, but must go with all its sins upon it to the throne of God.

The year 1492 was a memorable year for Italy. In this year Lorenzo's death removed the keystone of the arch that had sustained the fabric of Italian federation. In this year Roderigo Borgia was elected pope. In this year Columbus discovered America; Vasco di Gama soon after opened a new way to the Indies, and thus the commerce of the world passed from Italy to other nations. In this year the conquest of Granada gave unity to the Spanish nation. In this year France, through the lifelong craft of Louis XI., was for the first time united under a young, hot-headed sovereign. On every side of the political horizon storms threatened. It was clear that a new chapter of European history had been opened. Then Savonarola raised his voice, and cried that the crimes of Italy, the abominations of the Church, would speedily be punished. Events led rapidly to the fulfilment of this prophecy. Lorenzo's successor, Piero de' Medici, was a vain, irresolute, and hasty princeling, fond of display, proud of his skill in fencing and football-playing, with too much of the Orsini blood in his hot veins, with too little of the Medicean

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd craft in his weak head. The Italian despots felt they could not trust Piero, and this want of confidence was probably the first motive that impelled Lodovico Sforza to call Charles VIII. into Italy in 1494.

It will not be necessary to dwell upon this invasion of the French, except in so far as it affected Florence. Charles passed rapidly through Lombardy, engaged his army in the passes of the Apennines, and debouched upon the coast where the Magra divided Tuscany from Lunigiana. Here the fortresses of Sarzana and Pietra Santa, between the marble bulwark of Carrara and the Tuscan Sea, stopped his further progress. The keys were held by the Florentines. To force these strong positions and to pass beyond them seemed impossible. It might have been impossible if Piero de' Medici had possessed a firmer will. As it was, he rode off to the French camp, delivered up the forts to Charles, bound the king by no engagements, and returned not otherwise than proud of his folly to Florence. A terrible reception awaited him. The Florentines, in their fury, had risen and sacked the Medicean palace. It was as much as Piero, with his brothers, could do to escape beyond the hills to Venice. The despotism of the Medici, so carefully built up, so artfully sustained and strengthened, was overthrown in a single day.

Before considering what happened in Florence after the expulsion of the Medici, it will be well to pause a moment and review the state in which Lorenzo had left his family. Piero, his eldest son, recognized as chief of the republic after his father's death, was married to Alfonsina Orsini, and was in his twenty-second year. Giovanni, his second son, a youth of seventeen, had just been made cardinal. This honor, of vast importance for the Casa Medici in the future, he owed to his sister Maddalena's marriage to Franceschetto Cybo, son of Innocent VIII. The third of Lorenzo's sons, named Giuliano, was a boy of thirteen. Giulio, the bastard son of the elder Giuliano, was fourteen. These four princes formed the efficient strength of the Medici, the hope of the house; and for each of them, with the exception of Piero, who died in exile, and of whom no more notice need be taken, a brilliant destiny was still in store. In the year 1495, however, they now wandered, homeless and helpless, through the cities of Italy, each of which was shaken to its foundations by the French invasion.

Florence, left without the Medici, deprived of Pisa and other subject cities by the passage of the French army, with no leader but the monk Savonarola, now sought to reconstitute her liberties. During the domination of the Albizzi and the Medici the old order of the commonwealth had been completely broken up. The arti had lost their primitive importance. The distinctions between the grandi and the popolani had practically passed away. In a democracy that has submitted to a lengthened course of tyranny, such extinction of its old life is inevitable. Yet the passion for liberty was still powerful; and the busy brains of the Florentines were stored with experience gained from their previous vicissitudes, from the study of antique history, and from the observation of existing constitutions in the towns of Italy. They now determined to reorganize the State upon the model of the Venetian republic. The Signory was to remain, with its old institution of priors, gonfalonier, and college, elected for brief periods. These magistrates were to take the initiative in debate, to propose measures, and to consider plans of action. The real power of the State, for voting supplies and ratifying the measures of the Signory, was vested in a senate of one thousand members, called the Grand Council, from whom a smaller body of forty, acting as intermediates between the council and the Signory, were elected. It is said that the plan of this constitution originated with Savonarola; nor is there any doubt that he used all his influence in the pulpit of the Duomo to render it acceptable to the people. Whoever may have been responsible for its formation, the new government was carried in 1495, and a large hall for the assembly of the Grand Council was opened in the public palace.

Savonarola, meanwhile, had become the ruling spirit of Florence. He gained his great power as a preacher: he used it like a monk. The motive principle of his action was the passion for reform. To bring the Church back to its pristine state of purity, without altering its doctrine or suggesting any new form of creed; to purge Italy of ungodly customs; to overthrow the tyrants who encouraged evil living, and to place the power of the State in the hands of sober citizens: these were his objects. Though he set himself in bold opposition to the reigning pope, he had no desire to destroy the spiritual supremacy of St. Peter's see. Though he burned with an enthusiastic zeal for liberty,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

and displayed rare genius for administration, he had no ambition to rule Florence like a dictator. Savonarola was neither a reformer in the northern sense of the word, nor yet a political demagogue. His sole wish was to see purity of manners, and freedom of self-government re-established. With this end in view, he bade the Florentines elect Christ as their supreme chief; and they did so. For the same end, he abstained from appearing in the State councils, and left the constitution to work by its own laws. His personal influence he reserved for the pulpit; and here he was omnipotent. The people believed in him as a prophet. They turned to him as the man who knew what he wanted — as the voice of liberty, the soul of the new régime, the genius who could breathe into the commonwealth a breath of fresh vitality. When, therefore, Savonarola preached a reform of manners, he was at once obeyed. Strict laws were passed enforcing sobriety, condemning trades of pleasure, reducing the gay customs of Florence to puritanical austerity.

Great stress has been laid upon this reaction of the monk-led populace against the vices of the past. Yet the historian is bound to pronounce that the reform effected by Savonarola was rather picturesque than vital. Like all violent revivals of pietism, it produced a no less violent reaction. The parties within the city who resented the interference of a preaching friar, joined with the pope in Rome, who hated a contumacious schismatic in Savonarola. Assailed by these two forces at the same moment, and driven upon perilous ground by his own febrile enthusiasm, Savonarola succumbed. He was imprisoned, tortured, and burned upon the public square in 1498.

What Savonarola really achieved for Florence, was not a permanent reform of morality, but a resuscitation of the spirit of freedom. His followers, called in contempt i piagnoni, or the weepers, formed the pith of the commonwealth in future; and the memory of their martyr served as a common bond of sympathy to unite them in times of trial. It was a necessary consequence of the peculiar part he played, that the city was henceforth divided into factions representing mutually antagonistic principles. These factions were not created by Savonarola; but his extraordinary influence accentuated, as it were, the humors that lay dormant in the State. Families favorable to the Medici took the name of Palleschi. Men who chafed against puritanical reform, and who were eager for any government that should secure them their old license, were known as Compagnacci. Meanwhile the oligarchs, who disliked a democratic constitution, and thought it possible to found an aristocracy without the intervention of the Medici, came to be known as gli ottimati. Florence held within itself, from this epoch forward to the final extinction of liberty, four great parties: the Piagnoni, passionate for political freedom and austerity of life; the Palleschi, favorable to the Medicean cause, and regretful of Lorenzo's pleasant rule; the Compagnacci, intolerant of the reformed republic, neither hostile nor loyal to the Medici, but desirous of personal license; the Ottimati, astute and selfish, watching their own advantage, ever mindful to form a narrow government of privileged families, disinclined to the Medici, except when they thought the Medici might be employed as instruments in their intrigues.

During the short period of Savonarola's ascendency, Florence was in form at least a theocracy, without any titular head but Christ; and as long as the enthusiasm inspired by the monk lasted, as long as his personal influence endured, the constitution of the Grand Council worked well. After his death, it was found that the machinery was too cumbrous. While adopting the Venetian form of government, the Florentines had omitted one essential element — the doge. By referring measures of immediate necessity to the Grand Council, the republic lost precious time. Dangerous publicity, moreover, was incurred; and so large a body often came to no firm resolution. There was no permanent authority in the State; no security that what had been deliberated would be carried out with energy; no titular chief, who could transact affairs with foreign potentates and their ambassadors. Accordingly, in 1502, it was decreed that the gonfalonier should hold office for life — should be in fact a doge. To this important post of permanent president Piero Soderini was appointed; and in his hands were placed the chief affairs of the republic.

At this point Florence, after all her vicissitudes, had won her way to something really similar to the Venetian constitution. Yet the similarity existed more in form than in fact. The government of burghers in a Grand Council, with a senate of forty, and a gonfalonier for life, had not grown up gradually and absorbed into itself the vital forces of the commonwealth. It was a creation of inventive intelligence, not of national development, in Florence.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

It had against it the jealousy of the Ottimati, who felt themselves overshadowed by the gonfalonier; the hatred of the Palleschi, who yearned for the Medici; the discontent of the working classes, who thought the presence of a court in Florence would improve trade; last, but not least, the disaffection of the Compagnacci, who felt they could not flourish to their heart's content in a free commonwealth. Moreover, though the name of liberty was on every lip, though the Florentines talked, wrote, and speculated more about constitutional independence than they had ever done, the true energy of free institutions had passed from the city. The corrupt government of Cosimo and Lorenzo bore its natural fruit now. Egotistic ambition and avarice supplanted patriotism and industry. It is necessary to comprehend these circumstances, in order that the next revolution may be clearly understood.

During the ten years which elapsed between 1502 and 1512, Piero Soderini administered Florence with an outward show of great prosperity. He regained Pisa, and maintained an honorable foreign policy in the midst of the wars stirred up by the League of Cambray. Meanwhile the young princes of the house of Medici had grown to manhood in exile. The cardinal Giovanni was thirty-seven in 1512. His brother Giuliano was thirty-three. Both of these men were better fitted than their brother Piero to fight the battles of the family. Giovanni, in particular, had inherited no small portion of the Medicean craft. During the troubled reign of Julius II. he kept very quiet, cementing his connections with powerful men in Rome, but making no effort to regain his hold on Florence. Now the moment for striking a decisive blow had come. After the battle of Ravenna in 1512, the French were driven out of Italy, and the Sforzas returned to Milan; the Spanish troops, under the viceroy Cardona, remained masters of the country. Following the camp of these Spaniards, Giovanni de' Medici entered Tuscany in August, and caused the restoration of the Medici to be announced in Florence. The people, assembled by Soderini, resolved to resist to the uttermost. No foreign army should force them to receive the masters whom they had expelled. Yet their courage failed on the twenty-ninth day of August, when news reached them of the capture and the sack of Prato. Prato is a sunny little city, a few miles distant from the walls of Florence, famous for the beauty of its women, the richness of its gardens, and the grace of its buildings. Into this gem of cities the savage soldiery of Spain marched in the bright autumnal weather, and turned the paradise into a hell. It is even now impossible to read of what they did in Prato without shuddering.* Cruelty and lust, sordid greed for gold, and cold delight in bloodshed, could go no further. Giovanni de' Medici, by nature mild and voluptuous, averse to violence of all kinds, had to smile approval, while the Spanish viceroy knocked thus with mailed hand for him at the door of Florence. The Florentines were paralyzed with terror. They deposed Soderini and received the Medici. Giovanni and Giuliano entered their devastated palace in the Via Larga, abolished the Grand Council, and dealt with the republic as they listed.

There was no longer any medium in Florence possible between either tyranny or some such government as the Medici had now destroyed. The State was too rotten to recover even the modified despotism of Lorenzo's days. Each transformation had impaired some portion of its framework, broken down some of its traditions, and sowed new seeds of egotism in citizens who saw all things round them change but self-advantage. Therefore Giovanni and Giuliano felt themselves secure in flattering the popular vanity by an empty parade of their own institutions. They restored the Signory and the gonfalonier, elected for intervals of two months by officers appointed for this purpose by the Medici. Florence had the show of a free government. But the Medici managed all things; and soldiers, commanded by their creature, Paolo Vettori, held the palace and the public square. The tyranny thus established was less secure, inasmuch as it openly rested upon violence, than Lorenzo's power had been; nor were there signs wanting that the burghers could ill brook their servitude. The conspiracy of Pietro Paolo Boscoli and Agostino Capponi proved that the Medicean brothers ran daily risk of life. Indeed, it is not likely that they would have succeeded in maintaining their authority — for they were poor and ill-supported by friends outside the city — except for one most lucky circumstance: that was the election of Giovanni de' Medici to the papacy in 1513.

The creation of Leo X. spread satisfaction throughout Italy. Politicians trusted that he would display some portion of his

* See Archivio Storico.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

father's ability, and restore peace to the nation. Men of arts and letters expected everything from a Medicean pope, who had already acquired the reputation of polite culture and open-handed generosity. They at any rate were not deceived. Leo's first words on taking his place in the Vatican were addressed to his brother Giuliano: "Let us enjoy the papacy, now that God has given it to us;" and his notion of enjoyment was to surround himself with court-poets, jesters, and musicians, to adorn his Roman palaces with frescoes, to collect statues and inscriptions, to listen to Latin speeches, and to pass judgment upon scholarly compositions. Any one and every one who gave him sensual or intellectual pleasure, found his purse always open. He lived in the utmost magnificence, and made Rome the Paris of the Renaissance for brilliance, immorality, and self-indulgent ease. The politicians had less reason to be satisfied. Instead of uniting the Italians and keeping the great powers of Europe in check, Leo carried on a series of disastrous petty wars, chiefly with the purpose of establishing the Medici as princes. He squandered the revenues of the Church, and left enormous debts behind him — an exchequer ruined and a foreign policy so confused that peace for Italy could only be obtained by servitude.

Florence shared in the general rejoicing which greeted Leo's accession to the papacy. He was the first Florentine citizen who had received the tiara, and the popular vanity was flattered by this honor to the republic. Political theorists, meanwhile, began to speculate what greatness Florence, in combination with Rome, might rise to. The pope was young; he ruled a large territory, reduced to order by his warlike predecessors. It seemed as though the republic, swayed by him, might make herself the first city in Italy, and restore the glories of her Guelf ascendency upon the platform of Renaissance statecraft. There was now no overt opposition to the Medici in Florence. How to govern the city from Rome, and how to advance the fortunes of his brother Giuliano and his nephew Lorenzo (Piero's son, a young man of twenty-one), occupied the pope's most serious attention. For Lorenzo Leo obtained the duchy of Urbino and the hand of a French princess. Giuliano was named gonfalonier of the Church. He also received the French title of Duke of Nemours and the hand of Filiberta, princess of Savoy. Leo entertained a further project of acquiring the crown of southern Italy for his brother, and thus of uniting Rome, Florence, and Naples under the headship of his house. Nor were the Medicean interests neglected in the Church. Giulio, the pope's bastard cousin, was made cardinal. He remained in Rome, acting as vice-chancellor and doing the hard work of the papal government for the pleasure-loving pontiff.

To Lorenzo, duke of Urbino, the titular head of the family, was committed the government of Florence. During their exile, wandering from court to court in Italy, the Medici had forgotten what it was to be burghers, and had acquired the manners of princes. Leo alone retained enough of caution to warn his nephew that the Florentines must still be treated as free people. He confirmed the constitution of the Signory and the privy council of seventy established by his father, bidding Lorenzo, while he ruled this sham republic, to avoid the outer signs of tyranny. The young duke at first behaved with moderation, but he could not cast aside his habits of a great lord. Florence now for the first time saw a regular court established in her midst, with a prince, who, though he bore a foreign title, was in fact her master. The joyous days of Lorenzo the Magnificent returned. Masquerades and triumphs filled the public squares. Two clubs of pleasure, called the Diamond and the Branch — badges adopted by the Medici to signify their firmness in disaster and their power of self-recovery — were formed to lead the revels. The best sculptors and painters devoted their genius to the invention of costumes and cars. The city affected to believe that the age of gold had come again.

Fortune had been very favorable to the Medici. They had returned as princes to Florence. Giovanni was pope. Giuliano was gonfalonier of the Church. Giulio was cardinal and archbishop of Florence. Lorenzo ruled the city like a sovereign. But this prosperity was no less brief than it was brilliant. A few years sufficed to sweep off all the chiefs of the great house. Giuliano died in 1516, leaving only a bastard son Ippolito. Lorenzo died in 1519, leaving a bastard son Alessandro, and a daughter, six days old, who lived to be the queen of France. Leo died in 1521. There remained now no legitimate male descendants from the stock of Cosimo. The honors and pretensions of the Medici devolved upon three bastards — on the cardinal Giulio, and the two boys, Alessandro and Ippolito. Of these, Alessandro was a mulatto, his mother having

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

been a Moorish slave in the palace of Urbino; and whether his father was Giulio, or Giuliano, or a base groom, was not known for certain. To such extremities were the Medici reduced. In order to keep their house alive, they were obliged to adopt this foundling. It is true that the younger branch of the family, descended from Lorenzo, the brother of Cosimo, still flourished. At this epoch it was represented by Giovanni, the great general known as the invincible, whose bust so strikingly resembles that of Napoleon. But between this line of the Medici and the elder branch there had never been true cordiality. The cardinal mistrusted Giovanni. It may, moreover, be added, that Giovanni was himself doomed to death in the year 1526.

Giulio de' Medici was left in 1521 to administer the State of Florence single-handed. He was archbishop, and he resided in the city, holding it with the grasp of an absolute ruler. Yet he felt his position insecure. The republic had no longer any forms of self-government; nor was there a magistracy to whom the despot could delegate his power in his absence. Giulio's ambition was fixed upon the papal crown. The bastards he was rearing were but children. Florence had, therefore, to be furnished with some political machinery that should work of itself. The cardinal did not wish to give freedom to the city, but clockwork. He was in the perilous situation of having to rule a commonwealth without life, without elasticity, without capacity of self-movement, yet full of such material as, left alone, might ferment and breed a revolution. In this perplexity he had recourse to advisers. The most experienced politicians, philosophical theorists, practical diplomatists, and students of antique history were requested to furnish him with plans for a new constitution, just as you ask an architect to give you the plan of a new house. This was the field-day of the doctrinaires. Now was seen how much political sagacity the Florentines had gained while they were losing liberty. We possess these several drafts of constitutions. Some recommend tyranny; some incline to aristocracy, or what Italians called governo stretto; some to democracy, or governo largo; some to an eclectic compound of the other forms, or governo misto. More consummate masterpieces of constructive ingenuity can hardly be imagined. What is omitted in all, is just what no doctrinaire, no nostrum can communicate — the breath of life, the principle of organic growth. Things had come, indeed, to a melancholy pass for Florence when her tyrant, in order to confirm his hold upon her, had to devise these springs and irons to support her tottering limbs.

While the archbishop and the doctors were debating, a plot was hatching in the Rucellai Gardens. It was here that the Florentine Academy now held their meetings. For this society Machiavelli wrote his "Treatise on the Arts of War," and his "Discourses upon Livy." The former was an exposition of Machiavelli's scheme for creating a national militia, as the only safeguard for Italy, exposed at this period to the invasions of great foreign armies. The latter is one of the three or four masterpieces produced by the Florentine school of critical historians. Stimulated by the daring speculations of Machiavelli, and fired to enthusiasm by their study of antiquity, the younger academicians formed a conspiracy for murdering Giulio de' Medici, and restoring the republic on a Roman model. An intercepted letter betrayed their plans. Two of the conspirators were taken and beheaded. Others escaped. But the discovery of this conjuration put a stop to Giulio's scheme of reforming the State. Henceforth he ruled Florence like a despot, mild in manners, cautious in the exercise of arbitrary power, but firm in his autocracy. The condottiere, Alessandro Vitelli, with a company of soldiers, was taken into service for the protection of his person and the intimidation of the citizens.

In 1523, the pope, Adrian VI., expired after a short papacy, from which he gained no honor and Italy no profit. Giulio hurried to Rome, and, by the clever use of his large influence, caused himself to be elected with the title of Clement VII. In Florence he left Silvio Passerini, Cardinal of Cortona, as his vicegerent and the guardian of the two boys Alessandro and Ippolito. The discipline of many years had accustomed the Florentines to a government of priests. Still the burghers, mindful of their ancient liberties, were galled by the yoke of a Cortonese, sprung from one of their subject cities; nor could they bear the bastards who were being reared to rule them. Foreigners threw it in their teeth that Florence, the city glorious of art and freedom, was become a stable for mules — stalla da muli, in the expressive language of popular sarcasm. Bastardy, it may be said in passing, carried with it small dishonor among Italians. The Estensi were all illegitimate; the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Aragonese house in Naples sprang from Alfonso's natural son; and children of popes ranked among the princes. Yet the uncertainty of Alessandro's birth and the base condition of his mother made the prospect of this tyrant peculiarly odious; while the primacy of a foreign cardinal in the midst of citizens whose spirit was still unbroken, embittered the cup of humiliation. The Casa Medici held its authority by a slender thread, and depended more upon the disunion of the burghers than on any power of its own. It could always reckon on the favor of the lower populace, who gained profit and amusement from the presence of a court. The Ottimati again hoped more from a weak despotism than from a commonwealth, where their privileges would have been merged in the mass of the Grand Council. Thus the sympathies of the plebeians and the selfishness of the rich patricians prevented the republic from asserting itself. On this meagre basis of personal cupidity the Medici sustained themselves. What made the situation still more delicate, and at the same time protracted the feeble rule of Clement, was that neither the Florentines nor the Medici had any army. Face to face with a potentate so considerable as the pope, a free State could not be established without military force. On the other hand, the Medici, supported by a mere handful of mercenaries, had no power to resist a popular rising if any external event should inspire the middle classes with a hope of liberty.

Clement assumed the tiara at a moment of great difficulty. Leo had ruined the finance of Rome. France and Spain were still contending for the possession of Italy. While acting as vice-chancellor, Giulio de' Medici had seemed to hold the reins with a firm grasp, and men expected that he would prove a powerful pope; but in those days he had Leo to help him; and Leo, though indolent, was an abler man than his cousin. He planned, and Giulio executed. Obliged to act now for himself, Clement revealed the weakness of his nature. That weakness was irresolution, craft without wisdom, diplomacy without knowledge of men. He raised the storm, and showed himself incapable of guiding it. This is not the place to tell by what a series of crooked schemes and cross purposes he brought upon himself the ruin of the Church and Rome, to relate his disagreement with the emperor, or to describe again the sack of the Eternal City by the rabble of the Constable de Bourbon's army. That wreck of Rome in 1527 was the closing scene of the Italian Renaissance — the last of the Apocalyptic tragedies foretold by Savonarola — the death of the old age.

When the Florentines knew what was happening in Rome, they rose and forced the cardinal Passerini to depart with the Medicean bastards from the city. The youth demanded arms for the defence of the town, and they received them. The whole male population was enrolled in a militia. The Grand Council was reformed, and the republic was restored upon the basis of 1495. Niccolo Capponi was elected gonfalonier. The name of Christ was again registered as chief of the commonwealth — to such an extent did the memory of Savonarola still sway the popular imagination. The new State hastened to form an alliance with France, and Malatesta Baglioni was chosen as military commander-in-chief. Meanwhile the city armed itself for siege — Michael Angelo Buonarroti and Francesco da San Gallo undertaking the construction of new forts and ramparts. These measures were adopted with sudden decision, because it was soon known that Clement had made peace with the emperor, and that the army which had sacked Rome was going to be marched on Florence.

In the month of August, 1529, the Prince of Orange assembled his forces at Terni, and thence advanced by easy stages into Tuscany. As he approached, the Florentines laid waste their suburbs, and threw down their wreath of towers, in order that the enemy might have no harborage or points of vantage for attack. Their troops were concentrated within the city, where a new gonfalonier, Francesco Carducci, furiously opposed to the Medici, and attached to the Piagnoni party, now ruled. On the 4th of September the Prince of Orange appeared before the walls, and opened the memorable siege. It lasted eight months, at the end of which time, betrayed by their generals, divided among themselves, and worn out with delays, the Florentines capitulated. Florence was paid as compensation for the insult offered to the pontiff in the sack of Rome.

The long yoke of the Medici had undermined the character of the Florentines. This, their last glorious struggle for liberty, was but a flash in the pan — a final flare-up of the dying lamp. The city was not satisfied with slavery; but it had no capacity for united action. The Ottomati were egotistic and jealous of the people. The Palleschi desired to restore the Medici at

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

any price — some of them frankly wishing for a principality, others trusting that the old quasi-republican government might still be reinstated. The red republicans, styled Libertini and Arrabbiati, clung together in blind hatred of the Medicean party; but they had no further policy to guide them. The Piagnoni, or Frateschi, stuck to the memory of Savonarola, and believed that angels would descend to guard the battlements when human help had failed. These enthusiasts still formed the true nerve of the nation — the class that might have saved the State, if salvation had been possible. Even as it was, the energy of their fanaticism prolonged the siege until resistance seemed no longer physically possible. The hero developed by the crisis was Francesco Ferrucci, a plebeian who had passed his youth in manual labor, and who now displayed rare military genius. He fell fighting outside the walls of Florence. Had he commanded the troops from the beginning, and remained inside the city, it is just possible that the fate of the war might have been less disastrous. As it was, Malatesta Baglioni, the commander-in-chief, turned out an arrant scoundrel. He held secret correspondence with Clement and the Prince of Orange. It was he who finally sold Florence to her foes, "putting on his head," as the doge of Venice said before the Senate, "the cap of the biggest traitor upon record."

What remains of Florentine history may be briefly told. Clement, now the undisputed arbiter of power and honor in the city, chose Alessandro de' Medici to be prince. Alessandro was created Duke of Città di Penna, and married to a natural daughter of Charles V. Ippolito was made a cardinal. Ippolito would have preferred a secular to a priestly kingdom; nor did he conceal his jealousy for his cousin. Therefore Alessandro had him poisoned. Alessandro in his turn was murdered by his kinsman, Lorenzino de' Medici. Lorenzino paid the usual penalty of tyrannicide some years later. When Alessandro was killed in 1539, Clement had himself been dead five years. Thus the whole posterity of Cosimo de' Medici, with the exception of Catherine, queen of France, was utterly extinguished. But the Medici had struck root so firmly in the State, and had so remodelled it upon the type of tyranny, that the Florentines were no longer able to do without them. The chiefs of the Ottimati selected Cosimo, the representative of Giovanni the Invincible, for their prince, and thus the line of the elder Lorenzo came at last to power. This Cosimo was a boy of eighteen, fond of field sports, and used to party intrigues. When Francesco Guicciardini offered him a privy purse of one hundred and twenty thousand ducats annually, together with the presidency of Florence, this wily politician hoped that he would rule the State through Cosimo, and realize at least that dream of the Ottimati, a governo stretto or di pochi. He was notably mistaken in his calculations. The first days of Cosimo's administration showed that he possessed the craft of his family and the vigor of his immediate progenitors, and that he meant to be sole master in Florence. He it was who obtained the title of grand duke of Tuscany from the pope — a title confirmed by the emperor, fortified by Austrian alliances, and transmitted through his heirs to the present century.

In these two papers upon Florence and the Medici I have purposely omitted all details that did not bear upon the constitutional history of the republic, or on the growth of the Medici as despots; because I wanted to present a picture of the process whereby that family contrived to fasten itself upon the freest and most cultivated State in Italy. This success the Medici owed mainly to their own obstinacy, and to the weakness of republican institutions in Florence. Their power was founded upon wealth in the first instance, and upon the ingenuity with which they turned the favor of the proletariate to use. It was confirmed by the mistakes and failures of their enemies, by Rinaldo degli Albizzi's attack on Cosimo, by the conspiracy of Neroni and Pitti against Piero, and by Francesco de' Pazzi's attempt to assassinate Lorenzo. It was still further strengthened by the Medicean sympathy for arts and letters — a sympathy which placed both Cosimo and Lorenzo at the head of the Renaissance movement, and made them worthy to represent Florence, the city of genius, in the fifteenth century. While thus founding and cementing their dynastic influence upon the basis of a wide-spread popularity, the Medici employed persistent cunning in the enfeeblement of the republic. It was their policy not to plant themselves by force or acts of overt tyranny, but to corrupt ambitious citizens, to secure the patronage of public offices, and to render the spontaneous working of the State machinery impossible. By pursuing this policy over a long series of years they made the revival of liberty in 1494, and again in 1527, ineffec-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

tual. While exiled from Florence, they never lost the hope of returning as masters, so long as the passions they had excited, and they alone could gratify, remained in full activity. These passions were avarice and egotism, the greed of the grasping Ottimati, the jealousy of the nobles, the self-indulgence of the proletariate. Yet it is probable they might have failed to recover Florence, on one or other of these two occasions, but for the accident which placed Giovanni de' Medici on the papal chair, and enabled him to put Giulio in the way of the same dignity. From the accession of Leo in 1513 to the year 1527 the Medici ruled Florence from Rome, and brought the power of the Church into the service of their despotism. After that date they were still further aided by the imperial policy of Charles V., who chose to govern Italy through subject princes, bound to himself by domestic alliances and powerful interests. One of these was Cosimo, the first grand duke of Tuscany. J. A. SYMONDS.

From Blackwood's Magazine.

"ONLY JEAN."

CHAPTER I.

MINISTER of a parish in a densely-populated manufacturing town in the south of Scotland, and having suffered severely from fever, I gladly accepted an offer made me by a friend to go for a few months in summer to take charge of a parish in the west Highlands, a remote district on the seacoast.

In order to appreciate thoroughly the beauty of the scenery to which I went, and realize the sense of exquisite freshness given by the sea breezes, one must have suffered as I had suffered from the constant smoke and dirt which made open windows almost a forbidden pleasure. How I had longed and panted for fresh air! and here the very act of breathing was a pleasure. As health returned, I began to wander far and wide, and one day I found myself exploring a long stretch of moor, seemingly interminable. Heather, not yet in full bloom, and countless marsh-flowers were mingled together; piles of peat were drying in the wind; all this lay before me and around me, on the one hand, while, on the other, far below my feet, the sea lay sparkling as each wave caught the sunlight on its crest. On the opposite coast rose the beautiful hills of Skye; the breeze swept the clouds overhead fast, and their shifting lights and shadows made their forms seem ever new; myriads of sea-birds whirled high above me, screaming to each other in ceaseless uproar; larks sang joyously through it all; and all the time the grand monotony of the rolling waters breaking upon the rocks chanted an accompaniment.

After walking some distance, I came to one of those sudden breaks in the land forming a narrow glen. It was watered by a burn charged with the brown memory of the peaty soil through which it passed, and growing purer and clearer as it filtered through the stones, leaping over others as the descent grew deeper, till it fell in one lovely glittering shower into the sea.

The ground rose abruptly on either side of it, and on the banks all the way down primroses grew in utmost profusion — late primroses such as can hardly be found elsewhere, with such exquisite freshness, such long stems, and such luxuriant leaves; their very look brought a sudden sense of coolness and springtide. Beside them, in somewhat stately beauty, tall foxgloves reared their heads; just coming into bloom, and of every imaginable hue — pure white, delicate pink, with splashes of a darker color in their hearts, and beautiful crimson, with dainty brown pencillings. Ferns grew in their tenderest greens; club mosses showed every gradation of tint, from richest emerald to olive green; a few silver-stemmed birch-trees dipped and moved, swayed by the wind, and forming a lovely contrast to some sturdy stiff Scotch pines that stood at the head of the glen, as though they were its sentinels.

Near these pines, and sheltered by a rising ground behind it, stood a shieling or cottage, humbly built, but with evidences of unusual care in its surroundings. Nothing of the untidiness that speaks of a hurried life was there: a paling, almost concealed by honeysuckle and the common Ayrshire rose, fenced the little garden; more honeysuckle was trained against the wall; and the windows stood wide open. It was the only sign of man or his habitation I had seen in my walk, and as I sat down on the bank to rest and eat my luncheon, I wondered if the people living in this solitude were in any way influenced by the beauty which surrounded them, or whether they lived unappreciative lives, not knowing that their "lines" had fallen in such "pleasant places."

In a moment or two my thoughts were, in a measure, answered; the door of the cottage opened, and a girl came out with a dish under her arm piled with clothes

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

she had been washing. She paused for a moment, as though a little dazzled by the sun, and looked round as if she thoroughly enjoyed the beauty that lay about her; and then, with a swift, light step, she came down the bank till she stood on a flat stone close to where the burn was imprisoned in a sort of pool. Setting down the clothes, she began to rinse them in the clear water and wring them out, then holding them up she shook them out, one by one, and threw them on the bank. It was the homeliest possible occupation, and her dress differed in nothing from the dress of most Highland girls — a short linsey petticoat, a jacket of some washing material, with the sleeves rolled high up above the elbow; but her gestures were full of grace, an her hair was of a rich ruddy brown, that shed a sort of light round her head, and reminded me of old pictures I had seen.

I was unwilling to remain so near her without letting her know of my presence, so I rose and went down the bank to speak to her. She answered me with the utter absence of self-consciousness and with the simple directness possessed by all fine natures; her manner was reserved but kindly, and her voice was low-toned and musical. She was not beautiful, if beauty depends upon feature and outline, but she had a most interesting and pathetic expression in her dark eyes; and when she smiled, her face lighted up wonderfully. She offered me refreshment, which I declined, but I accepted her invitation to rest for a little while in the cottage.

There is no use in trying to account for the interest claimed by one stranger when many pass by unheeded; but from the first, before I knew her, I felt that this girl had a history, and that in some way she had suffered, and borne nobly.

The cottage at first seemed dark after the sunshine, but as my eyes became accustomed to the subdued light, I saw the figure of an old woman lying on a bed at the farthest end of the room. I had never seen any one living so absolutely devoid of color as she was, — hair and face were bleached — nothing but the keen and restless look of her eyes, and the incessant movement of her long, thin hands busily knitting, spoke of life.

The girl went up to her, and told her in a low voice who I was, and then placed a chair for me by the bedside; and as I sat down, I felt conscious of a peculiar feeling, as though in the presence of some weird being, and I sat silent for a little by the side of this motionless figure, under the gaze of those piercing and questioning eyes. When she spoke, the impression was increased, as it was in a clear, shrill whisper that seemed to reverberate through the room in a manner absolutely startling.

I asked if she had been long lying there, and she said, "Near eleven years," with a little sigh.

"Does your granddaughter always live with you?" I asked.

She looked at me quickly. "Do ye mean Jean? She's no my granddaughter; she's only Jean."

"Only Jean." I thought it sounded a strange way of naming the active-looking girl before me, moving to and fro so quietly about household matters, but it was not said unkindly. Was it my fancy, or did a brighter color come into her face as she heard the words?

I stayed some little time there; and though the old woman (whose name I found was Elspeth, commonly called Widow Grant) did not ask me to return, she looked pleased when I offered to do so; and I left the place, interested in my new acquaintances, Jean showing me a quicker but not so beautiful a way home, across the moor.

CHAPTER II.

THE parishioners of whom I was now in charge lived in widely scattered houses, and I could not help often contrasting their lives with the lives of my own people in the south. There, everything was contracted and small — space was our most needed thing — families were huddled together in houses, made more dirty and wretched by what is called a "common stair," and which it was therefore no one's business to keep clean; and though an inspection was made now and then by sanitary commissioners, and charitable people did their best, there are a thousand ways in which sanitary laws can be evaded; and charitable people, with a few notable exceptions, have the most unhappy knack of assisting the wrong people. Who can blame them? As a rule, the deserving poor are exactly those who shrink from help, and who, with a handful of meal and hardly a potato left, show a brave face to the world, and allow no necessity to appear.

The very poor are everywhere deserving of pity; but in the country, fresh air, a little firewood, and, above all, pure water, are to be had for nothing. In towns, the first is often not to be got; the poor cannot afford to buy the second; and when I think of the water-rate—— I am no political economist — I have a most unjust dislike to the man who collects the water-rate — and I never can see why God's free gift to man should be sold by spoonfuls at the cost of many lives! However, much is being done, and more will follow.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Here, in this beautiful place, space was quite unlimited: all down the hillside linen lay bleaching in the sun, and another contrast was not only in the way it was left out all night, but in the absence of bolts, bars, and shutters in the houses. Not even the shop had shutters, and theft was as unknown there as though a mounted guard watched incessantly over the place.

The shop (there was but one) sold every imaginable thing, from treacle and herrings to needles and cheese, and the widow who kept the shop was an autocrat in her way. She was licensed to sell spirits, and it would be good for humanity if all "licensed individuals" acted on the same firm principles. To some she positively refused to sell at all — to others she allowed only what she considered right for them to have. She knew the private affairs of each individual, and was guided by that. I have seen her refuse "a dram" to a lanky, shy-looking shepherd who asked for one, saying to him in the tone you might use to an unreasonable child, "Hoot awa', Sandy, ye ken weel your head is nae like ither heads, and a drap will set it spinning. Na, na, man, gang hame, and dinna compare your head with ithers!" and the man quietly withdrew with a look of sheepish resignation. To another man she said, "Surely I didna hear ye rightly; it's na a dram ye're seeking and your wife sae sober" (which did not refer to sobriety, as might be imagined, but to sickliness). When he showed temper she said, with a change of voice that would have suited an actress, "I'm sorry I've no spirit good enough for you, Mr. Cran, but you'll get it at the next shop," which was exactly eleven miles off. With this carefulness for the welfare of her neighbors she was not at all above making a close bargain; and I feel convinced (and indeed my housekeeper never lets me forget it) that I paid more than I ought to have done for some bandanas that I bought at her shop.

From this woman, who talked upon all subjects con amore, I heard a great deal about old Mrs. Grant and Jean, and everything I heard was to the credit of both. The old woman had been an excellent mother to a delicate daughter who died of a broken heart on the sudden death of her husband. The only grandchild, "Kenneth Malcolm," had been brought up by the grandmother, and, as was often the case in Scotland before school-boards came in the way, he had received a first-rate education, and had turned out by all accounts a fine young fellow, steady and clever.

Mrs. Grant had come to Burnside more than forty years before my first acquaintance with the place: no one knew why she had come there, or anything about her antecedents. It was supposed the old laird was acquainted with her story, but he had never told it to any one. He had requested his nephew and successor to allow her to live out her life rent-free, and, in addition to this, a small yearly sum was paid to her from some unknown source. She was incessantly busy, and her spinning and knitting were quite famous. Jean had gone to her when she was a well-grown child of ten, and the relations between them were more those of mother and child than of mistress and servant. When she had been there two or three years misfortunes began to come, and they never come singly. Widow Grant fell and hurt herself so much that she did not recover the injury; then she had a paralytic stroke, and by degrees sank into the complete state of helplessness in which she was when I first made her acquaintance. Jean's devotion was unceasing, and her spinning and knitting filled up the gap when the poor old woman was helpless. Very confused and various accounts were given of how and why Kenneth had gone away. All that people knew for certain was that Jean, for the first and only time since she had lived at Burnside, had gone to Skye, and returned only the very day Kenneth had left for New Zealand, and that they had not met.

Not long after his departure, the little sum of money which made the small household so comfortable suddenly ceased; and Widow Grant had refused, in an excited and determined manner, to allow any inquiries to be made about it. Jean acquiesced. Their wants were very few, but everybody said that since Kenneth's departure she had not looked the same; and it was evident that, as in all life's histories, a romance was woven through it all. Though why, as by all accounts Kenneth had been "sair set" on having her for his wife, she should have refused him, and have actually been the cause of his leaving the country, was beyond the comprehension of every one.

My visits to Burnside became of great interest to me. The old woman began to

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

look forward to my arrival with much evident pleasure, and the freshness and originality of Jean's remarks were very pleasant. She had read nothing save the pages of nature so lavishly distributed round her; but everything came with such acute observance, and her mind naturally was so refined, that I used to feel when with her as if I had more to learn from her than she could learn from me.

CHAPTER III.

I SHALL always remember a certain autumnal day, not long before I left this Highland spot, — a day when the golden haze of an "Indian summer" filled the air. In a valley stretching away through the hills, some oats were ready to cut, and a neighboring farmer who had imported the first reaping-machine to that part of the country, had lent it for the occasion.

Every one turned out as though it were a festival. In harvest many a respectable married woman earns enough to clothe herself and her children for the rest of the year. The work is pleasant to them, and they are as proud of their quickness and dexterity as any London belle of her prowess in dancing. It was certainly one of the prettiest sights I ever saw; the many colors of the various dresses, the activity and merriment as the machine worked round the field, leaving the straight lines of prostrate corn in its track in regular rows. At stated intervals one woman and a man were placed; a dexterous little band, woven from the cut corn, was laid on the ground, and an armful of corn laid upon it; then the man's stronger fingers knotted the ends round it, and set the sheaf upright. The driver and his fellows hurried on the horses and tried to keep the workers busy; and the workers, with many a laugh and jest, exerted themselves with their utmost quickness, in order to stand ostentatiously idle before the machine came round again. Seated on the hillside, where the lingering gorse flowers and wild thyme attracted countless bees, I watched the scene, trying to distinguish the faces I knew.

After a little while I recognized Jean, her active and upright figure one of the busiest there. As usual, she was bareheaded, and her hair gleamed like red gold in the sunlight. As usual, too, her manner had the quiet reserve that she never laid aside; and a noticeable thing was the silent respect with which the man with whom she worked treated her. He followed her footsteps as though one wishing to serve her, not as an equal.

I sat long, enjoying the peaceful and happy scene — familiarity had only made me more fond of that secluded spot — and I thought I had learned to appreciate it better; sweet scents and sounds were all around me. The breeze swept past me as it rose and died away, ruffling the surface of the corn as it ruffled the surface of the sea, and hurrying the flight of the countless insects that rustled their wings among the wild flowers.

I was roused from my day-dream by seeing a little barefooted lad I knew run off to Jean and pull her gown. In a moment she had snatched up her plaid, spoken to the manager, and was gone, followed by the boy. I conjectured that the old woman was perhaps ill; but I was always afraid of intruding, and I knew that if I was wanted, Jean would send for me. I left the hillside, and wound my way up a steep path leading homewards. I paused at the top to rest a moment, and take one other look of the brilliant and busy scene, when a clear voice began to sing a lovely Gaelic air, with a mournful refrain in a minor key. It was quaint and wild with the pathetic sound that invariably accompanies beautiful music. Another voice joined in, and yet another; and as the voices swelled up in harmony, I thought no melody appeals so forcibly to our highest feelings as the untrained voices of a people, expressing in their own natural manner the untutored feeling of their hearts.

CHAPTER IV.

I HAD gone to bed late, and as usual had left my window open, watching as long as I could a most unusual sunset, when I was awakened by a noise that in my half-dreamy state seemed as though the sea had burst its bonds, and was rushing over everything. I never remember seeing such heavy rain. It came down in torrents, bending down the heads of the sturdiest flowers in the little garden below my window, and washing all the gravel off the sloping walks. Thunder reverberated round the hills, and vivid flashes of lightning shot across the sky. A thunder-storm is never so magnificent as among mountains; and the echoes, repeated again and again till they died away in the distance, seemed almost continuous. It lasted long. Peal after peal succeeded each other; the birds, frightened and bewildered, flew from branch to branch to seek the smallest shelter, and sent forth melancholy chirps, as though to reassure themselves.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

By breakfast-time the rain had moderated, and the thunder-storm was over; and I went out to enjoy the well-known pleasantness of the air after it, and to notice the damage my poor flowers had sustained. As I stood there, I saw a figure hurrying towards me, with a plaid thrown over her head. It was Jean. She was looking white, and spoke in a quick and agitated way. Mrs. Grant was ill, and would like much to see me. She had had news; and I saw that the news, whatever it was, had affected Jean equally. In a few minutes I was ready, and we walked the shortest way to Burnside. As we came near the cottage, Jean said, in a low voice, "Kenneth is married — he is coming home;" and, leaving my side, I entered alone. Whiter than usual Mrs. Grant could hardly look; but there was great distress in her keen blue eyes, and in the helpless beseeching way in which she stretched out her hands.

"Tell Jean she must stay," were almost her first words; and it then at once occurred to me that this coming home might bring about painful complications; and that if Kenneth had forgotten, Jean still loved.

Kenneth's marriage had been a surprise; but when Mrs. Grant put his letter into my hands, and begged me to read it, I quite understood the pain it must have caused her. He wrote in a sad and desponding way, — was evidently sorry for his young wife — found it impossible to remain there, surrounded by her relations — began several times to send a message to Jean, carefully scratching out what he had begun; and finally leaving all unsaid, he ended by hoping his grandmother would be kind, and make allowances. It was a letter written in such evidently low spirits, and the want of happiness was so painfully manifest, that it was quite sad to read.

I sat long, and talked with the old woman. She told me Jean never would listen to Kenneth; but even she did not know why. She was sure she liked him. She thought some one had made mischief. Altogether, it was a comfort to her to talk it over with me; and though I felt utterly incapable of giving advice, once the reserve she usually showed was broken into, she opened up to me more of her own thoughts and feelings than I had ever yet seen — and the confidence comforted her.

I went down by the burn side, intending to speak to Jean, but stopped when I saw her sitting, her face buried in her hands. As she heard my footsteps, she raised herself up. She had so sad, so despairing a look, that I felt I could not speak to her just then. Her lips parted, and, raising her eyes, she murmured, so low that I could hardly catch the words, "A day will come when we will know the reason of all," and went slowly up the bank, her head drooping, and her hands clasped together, as though endeavoring to suppress her excitement.

When I arrived at home I found a telegram summoning me south. The dearest friend I possessed had been severely injured in a railway accident; and within a few hours I was going to him, my thoughts too fully occupied to think of Burnside.

. . . .

Winter had come early. Storms had already caused havoc amongst the shipping, and brought distress to many a home. I was plodding my way through the daily cares and troubles of my large parish, when I one day received a letter from Jean, reminding me of a promise I had made her of doing her a favor, and entreating me to get her a place, ever so humble, it did not matter.

Her letter distressed me. It was written in such evident sorrow — not a word of Kenneth or his wife, and of Mrs. Grant only that she was much the same.

Perplexed by her letter, I still had it before me when I heard a bustle in the little hall, and my friend Mr. Macrae, the minister of the beautiful parish where I had spent those well-remembered summer months, stood before me, his coat sprinkled with snow, his color raised by the frosty air, and a look of quiet happiness that told me at once his long engagement was drawing to an end. He had come to try and persuade me to take his duty for one fortnight, and was delighted to find small persuasion needed.

Two days more saw me on my way. Not long after I started, a most violent snow-storm set in. So long as we were in the railway our progress was pretty good; but with something like forty miles of coaching, through the wildest scenery, and over a road that divided tremendous hills, it became a work of the greatest difficulty. Gangs of men had to accompany us, and every now and then we were obliged to get out and allow the coach to be cut out of the drifts. When night came, we had to spend it in a miserable little inn, where the peat-smoke, having no proper outlet, made the air of the room nearly intolerable; and the only provisions were oatcake, very hard cheese, and

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

whisky. As this last was a thing I never touched, I was delighted to find that a spring of clear water rose near the house, and that, though surrounded by icicles, it was obtainable.

Next morning we pushed on, to find, as is often the case near the sea, that the snow had given place to rain, which was pouring down pitilessly; and never did I so rejoice over a welcome as on that weary day when I found myself greeted by a splendid fire, a cloth that rivalled the snow, and a most excellent tea, with bannocks, and all sorts of home comforts before me, from kippered salmon to home-made marmalade.

The next morning was one of unceasing rain. Early in the afternoon, the old servant, with evident reluctance, brought me a message a man wished to see me. It was Kenneth. As is usually the case, he was completely different from the idea I had in my own mind conceived of him, — tall and fair, with a sunburnt face, and the manner and appearance of a man who had seen a good deal of the world — one of nature's gentlemen, in outward semblance at any rate. He came to see me, and to tell me of old Mrs. Grant's evidently approaching end. Then, with a lowered voice, he spoke of Jean, and with frankness said that the position at home was intolerable to her. Without casting blame on his wife, he showed me that Jean could find no home with her if old Mrs. Grant died, and asked me what could be done.

I had often seen the sore need that existed in a children's hospital near me for just such a person as Jean, and spoke to him of it. He bent his head a little, and I saw that the idea of any service so far from him gave him an acute pang, and that he put force on himself, and was trying to think it was for the best.

Something I said brought out the fact that his wife's people in Australia were not very respectable, and a flash in his eyes showed that certain remembrances were not pleasing. All at once he flung back his hair, and standing up, said to me, "You are very kind, sir, and the truth is best. My wife's father is a ticket-of-leave man. She is very young, and does not know the shame."

I grasped his hand and, as he was leaving he said, "Do you know, sir, why Jean held out, — why Jean would not marry me? Her father is living; he is shut up for a crime, but they could not punish him, for he has not his wits. He is a criminal lunatic."

I could not speak for a moment; then I said, "Does Jean know? I mean, about your wife ——"

An angry look gleamed in his eyes, and he said, "She told Jean when she was angry the other day. She is very young," he said, in a tone of defence, and went out.

So this was the story — the higher nature felt the disgrace, and gave up her happiness and sacrificed herself, and then had to stand by and see that the sacrifice had been in vain; and I thought of her murmured words, "A day will come when we will know the reason of all." Poor Jean!

It was nearly dusk when the faithful old servant came into my little sitting-room. "Though yon man had the sense to leave you in peace," she began, "here's an urgent message for you. Mrs. Grant's dying, and would fain see you; and such a night!" she said, looking out at the never-ceasing rain.

Wrapping myself well up, I hurried off, contrasting the wet and dreary walk with my first walk there. Nothing could be more miserable than this one — in places almost ankle-deep in boggy mud, the heavy rain blotted out the hills, and the wind sent it in slaps against my face, and countermanded the use of an umbrella. Kenneth met me close to the burn, with the intelligence that the poor old woman had slept away peacefully; and we were talking together, looking at the torrent of water pouring down, when we saw the bank underneath the little plank bridge below the house suddenly give way. The plank remained treacherously in its place, supported by a sod of earth only a few inches thick. "This is terrible," said Kenneth, as he started off and ran up towards it. He was still on his way (it all passed in a very few minutes) when the door of the cottage opened, and his wife, a girlish-looking creature, with lint-white hair, ran down, and stepped on to the plank, just as her husband reached it. He was too late to save her; and, with a shrill scream I never shall forget, she fell, with the plank, into the foaming stream.

I can give no clear or connected account of that dreadful night. I remember seeing Jean, with a resolute face, wade in from below and reach her; and the memory still haunts me of the two figures struggling in the water, and Kenneth's face as he tried to breast the torrent and go to their assistance. I hurried for help, and help came. I saw Kenneth carrying one figure home, and others tended one

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd lying on the bank, and in the still, white, upturned face, I recognized Jean.

Though I was shivering from head to foot, partly with excitement and partly with cold, I did not leave till I saw that her eyes unclosed and knew that Jean lived.

I paid the penalty of having been so long exposed to the damp, and was in bed for several weeks with rheumatic fever. When I recovered, I heard that Jean was with a neighbor, and that she and Kenneth had been almost daily to ask for me.

. . . .

Two summers came and went, and once more I was in that lovely Highland place. The cottage at Burnside was deserted, and the primroses and foxgloves realized the poet's idea, —

Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
And waste its sweetness on the desert air.

But some miles away there is a comfortable farmhouse, where flowers also bloom and linen lies bleaching in the sun. It is essentially a home of peace; and kindness is spread round, and is made to reach many far beyond its boundaries. Here Kenneth and his dark-eyed wife live, their happiness tempered by remembrance; and her welcome is as kind, and her smile far sweeter and brighter, than it used to be in the days when I knew her as "only Jean."

From Fraser's Magazine.

SPENSER'S IRISH RIVERS.

BY P. W. JOYCE, LL.D.

In the year 1580, when Edmund Spenser was in the twenty-seventh year of his age, he came to Ireland as secretary to Baron Grey of Wilton, the newly-appointed lord deputy. On the recall of the lord deputy in 1582, Spenser returned with him to England, and soon after he received a grant of three thousand acres of land in the county of Cork, a portion of the confiscated estates of the Earl of Desmond. He proceeded again to Ireland in 1586, to live on his estate, and selected for his residence the castle of Kilcolman, one of Desmond's strongholds, whose ruins are still to be seen two miles from the village of Buttevant.

It was about the time of his first visit to Ireland that Spenser began his "Faerie Queene;" and several books of the poem were composed during his residence at Kilcolman. That he studied the topography and social history of his adopted country, and to some extent inquired into its language and literature, is sufficiently proved by his essay, "A View of the State of Ireland;" while his poetry equally shows that his imagination had become deeply impressed with the quiet beauty of its scenery, and with its quaint and graceful local legends. Its sparkling rivers seem to have been his special delight; he recurs to them again and again with a pleasure as fresh and bright as the streams themselves, and they form the basis of some of his most beautiful similes and allegories.

There are in his poems three passages of special interest, in which Irish rivers are prominently mentioned. The first is the "marriage of the Thames and Medway," in the eleventh canto of the fourth book of "The Faerie Queene;" the second occurs in the first of "Two Cantos of Mutabilitie;" and the third in "Colin Clouts come home againe."

The spousals of the Thames and Medway took place in the house of Proteus; and the poet relates that all the sea and river gods were invited to the bridal feast. First came the continental rivers of the whole world, famous either for size or for historical associations; next the English rivers; and lastly those of Ireland. The following is the passage in which the Irish rivers are recounted: —

Ne thence the Irishe Rivers absent were;
Sith no lesse famous then the rest they bee,
And ioyne in neighborhood of kingdome nere,
Why should they not likewise in love agree,
And ioy likewise this solemne day to see?
They saw it all, and present were in place;
Though I them all, according their degree,
Cannot recount, nor tell their hidden race,
Nor read the salvage countries thorough which they pace.

There was the Liffy rolling downe the lea;
The sandy Slane; the stony Aubrian;
The spacious Shenan spreading like a sea;
The pleasant Boyne; the fishy fruitfull Ban;
Swift Awniduff which of the English man
Is cal'de Blacke-water; and the Liffar deep;
Sad Trowis, that once his people overran;
Strong Allo tombling from Slewlogher steep;
And Mulla mine, whose waves I whilom taught to weep.

And there the three renowmed Brethren were,
Which that great gyant Blomius begot
Of that faire nimph Rheüsa wandering there:
One day, as she to shunne the season whot
Under Slewbloome in shady grove was got,

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

This gyant found her and by force deflowr'd,
Whereof conceiving, she in time forth brought
These three faire sons, which being thenceforth powrd,
In three great rivers ran, and many countries scowrd.

The first the gentle Shure that, making way
By sweet Clonmell, adornes rich Waterford;
The next, the stubborne Newre whose waters gray
By faire Kilkenny and Rosseponte boord;
The third, the goodly Barow which doth hoord
Great heaps of salmons in his deepe bosóme;
All which, long sundred, doe at last accord
To ioyne in one, ere to the sea they come;
So flowing all from one, all one at last become.

There also was the wide embayed Mayre;
The pleasant Bandon crowned with many a wood;
The spreading Lee that, like an island fayre,
Encloseth Corke with his divided flood;
And balefull Oure, late staind with English blood:
With many more whose names no tongue can tell.
All which that day in order seemly good
Did on the Thames attend, and waited well
To doe their dueful service, as to them befell.*

Of several of the rivers in this enumeration it is unnecessary to speak at any length, for there could be no mistake about their identification, and they are too well known to need description. Only it ought to be remarked how agreeably the poet relieves the dryness of a mere catalogue by his happy selection of short descriptive epithets, which exhibit such a variety that no two of them are alike, and describe the several streams with great force and truthfulness.

As regards several of these rivers, editors and others who have considered the subject have been in uncertainty or error from Spenser's day to our own; and there are a few which none of the editors of Spenser's works have attempted to identify.

The manner in which the Liffey is characterized — "rolling downe the lea" — is extremely just and natural; for this river, after bursting from the high lands of Wicklow through the haunted gorge of Pollaphuca, flows for more than half its course through the levellest lea land in all Ireland, the plains of Kildare, where its banks are a continued succession of verdant meadows and smiling pasture-lands. This was the old plain of Moy-Lifè, celebrated in ancient Irish writings, whose name is now remembered only in connection with the river — the Aven-Liffey, or Anna-Liffey, as it used to be called in times not very long past, that is, the river (aven) of the plain of Lifè.

In "the sandy Slane," the poet touches off the most obvious feature of the river Slaney. Geologists tell us that the bed of the river was once a fiord, when the sea was higher than it is now — long before the Milesian Celt contended with Anglo-Norman, Dane, or magic-skilled Dedannan; and during this primeval period the tide deposited at the bottom of the long valley great beds of sand and gravel, through which, when the sea retired to its present level, the stream cut its channel. The river is characteristically sandy in its whole length; from Stratford-on-Slaney to Wexford town there is scarce a rock sufficient to raise a ripple; its fords are all along formed of sand and gravel, and it flows into the sea below Wexford through a wide waste of sand.

Passing by for the present "the stony Aubrian" — farther on I shall have a word to say about it — we may just glance at the Shannon, the Boyne, and the Bann. Spenser's way of designating the first — pictures this great river very vividly to the mind of the reader; for during its passage from Quilca Mountain in Cavan to Limerick city it expands into three great lakes, or inland seas, as they may be called, besides several smaller ones; and below Limerick it opens out into a noble estuary fifty miles long, and so broad that the shores often become lost on the horizon.

The spacious Shenan spreading like a sea —

The banks of "the pleasant Boyne," from its source in Trinity Well, at the ruined Castle of Carbery in Kildare, to Maiden Tower below Drogheda, presents a succession of lovely, quiet, pastoral landscapes, not surpassed by any other river in Ireland.

He is equally correct in "the fishy fruitfull Ban," for this river has always been noted for the abundance and excellence of its trout and salmon. Toome, where it issues from Lough Neagh, and Portna, near the village of Kilrea, are to this day the delight of trout-anglers; and the great salmon fishery at the old waterfall of Eas-Creeva at Coleraine is one of the most productive anywhere to be found.

I shall defer for the present the consideration of two important rivers, the Awniduff and the Allo, and take up both together a little farther on.

"The Liffar deep" is the Foyle at

* Faerie Queene, b. iv., c. xi.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Lifford in Donegal. It is often called Liffar or Liffer by early Anglo-Irish writers, as by Gough and Camden, and by Spenser himself in his "View of the State of Ireland:" — "Another (garrison) would I put at Castle-Liffer or thereabouts, so as they should have all the passages upon the river to Logh Foyle" (p. 158, ed. 1809). The town of Lifford took its name from the river, a circumstance very usual in Ireland; for in this manner Dublin, Limerick, Galway, Sligo, and many other towns received their names. It may be remarked that this old Anglo-Irish name Liffer represents very correctly the pronunciation of the native name Leithbhearr; and that the insertion of the d at the end belongs to a class of verbal corruptions very common in anglicised Irish names.*

"Sad Trowis that once his people overran" is the short river Drowes flowing from Lough Melvin, between the counties of Donegal and Leitrim, into Donegal Bay, which was commonly called Trowis in Spenser's time. This stream is very often mentioned in old Irish records; for, from the earliest period of history and legend to the present day, it has continued to be the boundary line between the two provinces of Ulster and Connaught; and it is no doubt its historical and legendary notoriety that procured for it a place in Spenser's catalogue, for otherwise it is an unimportant stream.

In the words "that once his people overran," the poet alludes to an ancient legend accounting for the origin of Lough Melvin, that at a very remote period the river overflowed the land, and turned the valley into a lake. This legend is recorded by several of our old writers, and among others by the Four Masters, who relate that a certain king of Ireland named Melga, who reigned many centuries before the Christian era, was slain in battle; that when his soldiers were digging his grave the waters burst forth from it and overwhelmed both the land and the people; and that the lake formed by this fatal inundation was called by the name of Lough Melga, in memory of the king.†

Legends like this are told in connection with most of the large lakes of Ireland, and some of them have held their ground for a very long time indeed; they are mixed up with the earliest traditions of the country, and not a few of them are current among the peasantry to this day. Giraldus Cambrensis, writing in the twelfth century, records a legend of this kind regarding Lough Neagh; and this story is also found in some of the oldest of the native Irish writings, from which indeed Giraldus borrowed it, though he added a few characteristic touches of his own. He mentions, moreover, what the people will tell you to this day, that the fishermen sometimes see the lofty and slender ecclesiasticæ turres, or round towers, ruins of the ancient submerged city, beneath its waters, a belief which Moore has embalmed in the well-known lines: —

On Lough Neagh's banks as the fisherman strays,
When the clear cold eve's declining,
He sees the round towers of other days
In the wave beneath him shining.

Before parting with this little stream, I wish to make an observation on the word "sad," by which it is designated in the present passage. The reader cannot help observing that the poet's fancy is ever ready to seize on any correspondence — whether real or imaginary — between the names and the characteristic features of the several streams in his catalogue; and this conceit he often embodies in some happy descriptive epithet. I shall have occasion to notice this peculiarity farther on. But, with respect to the name Trowis, it is clear that the poet thought it was an anglicised form of an Irish word of similar sound, which signifies sorrow or sadness;* and once his fancy had caught up this interpretation he connected the name with the event; so that, supposing him right in his conjecture, his "sad Trowis" in the present passage would be quite as appropriate as "false Bregog" in "Colin Clouts come home againe."

* Viz., the addition of d after words ending in l, n, and r. See this fully explained and illustrated in the author's "Origin and History of Irish Names of Places," First Series, chap. iii.

† The old Irish form of the name is Loch-Meilghe, which has been corrupted to Lough Melvin by the English-speaking people. Lough Melvin lies four miles south of Ballyshannon in Donegal.

* Truaghas (pronounced troois), sadness, wretchedness, from truagh (troo), sad. The poet's fancy is not correct, for the ancient name of the river is not Truaghas, but Drobhaois (pronounced Drowish), a very different word. Spenser was accustomed to get Irish words and phrases translated for him by those of his Irish acquaintances who could speak English. There is abundant evidence of this in various parts of his "View of the State of Ireland," in which he gives the equivalent of many Irish terms; and in one place he expressly says: "I have caused divers of them (Irish compositions) to be translated unto me, that I might understand them, and surely they savored of sweet wit and good invention, but skilled not of the goodly ornaments of poetry; yet were they sprinkled with some pretty flowers of their naturall device, which gave good grace, and comlinesse unto them" (p. 124, ed. 1809). It must have been some of his Irish friends that attempted to explain Trowis for the poet, by identifying it with truaghas, sadness; for the peasantry, even to this day, as I know well, are very fond of this kind of speculative etymology.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

As for "Mulla mine whose waves I whilom taught to weep," it is enough for the present to point out that it is the little river, properly called the Awbeg, flowing near Spenser's own residence of Kilcolman, and falling into the Blackwater; but I shall have more to say of it in connection with others of Spenser's rivers.

I will now consider the two rivers, "swift Awniduff which of the English man is cal'de Blacke-water," and "strong Allo tombling from Slewlogher steep." The former has been set down as the Munster Blackwater, whereas it is really the northern Blackwater, flowing between the counties of Armagh and Derry, and falling into the south-west corner of Lough Neagh; and the latter has been taken to mean the little stream now called the Allo, or Allow, flowing into the Blackwater near Kanturk, in the county of Cork, though Spenser really intended it for the great Blackwater itself. Dr. Smith, a very careful writer, who published his "History of Cork" about the year 1750, was the first, so far as I know, to discuss these rivers mentioned by Spenser; and he identifies "strong Allo" with the present river Allo, and the Awniduff with the Munster Blackwater. He is followed by Crofton Croker in his "Researches in the South of Ireland." In Todd's edition of Spenser the error is repeated; but Todd received his information from Joseph Cooper Walker, author of the "History of Irish Bards," who merely copied Smith without adding anything of his own. And all other writers who have written on the subject, from Smith's time to the present, have followed him in his error, with the single exception of the Rev. C. B. Gibson, who at page 300, vol. i., of his "History of Cork," places the Blackwater correctly, though without giving any proof of the correctness of his identification.

The Munster Blackwater was never called by the name of Awniduff or Avonduff (black river). Its Irish name is Avonmore (great river), as we find it in all native authorities, ancient and modern; and this is the name in universal use in the spoken Irish language of the present day. The modern English name Blackwater, therefore, is not a translation, but a new name given by English-speaking people; and it is an appropriate one, for the river is very dark in the early part of its course, partly from the peat bogs of Slieve Lougher, and partly on account of the Duhallow coal district, through which it flows.

But it will be of consequence to remark that the English name in general use in Spenser's time was Broadwater, which is a sufficiently correct translation of Avonmore. For example, Gerard Boate, who wrote his "Natural History of Ireland" in the beginning of the last century, has: "The two chief rivers of Munster are Sure and Broadwater, the city of Waterford being situated on the first . . . the other passeth by Lismore, and falleth into the sea by Youghal."* It is also called Broadwater in Norden's map of Ireland, compiled about 1610; and in a charter of James I. the two English names are used — "the river Blackwater, called otherwise Broadwater."

The poet tells us that "strong Allo" flows from Slewlogher, or Slieve Lougher, a wild moorland district lying east of Castle Island in Kerry, which was very much celebrated in ancient Irish writings. This circumstance alone is sufficient to prove that he is speaking of the Blackwater under the name of Allo; for the Blackwater flows directly from Slieve Lougher, rising about five miles above King Williamstown, and running first southward and then eastward towards Mallow. On the other hand the little river now known by the name of Allo is not more than seventeen miles in its whole length; and, to say nothing of the inappropriateness of the term "strong" for such an insignificant stream, it does not flow from or near Slieve Lougher, but on the contrary it is in every part of its course more than twelve miles distant from the nearest part of that mountain.

Dr. Smith was so puzzled at Spenser's "strong Allo tombling from Slewlogher steep" that he was forced to conclude that the poet confounded the rivers Allo and Blackwater. It would be strange indeed if Spenser, who knew so well, and designated with such precision, the features of the other chief streams of Ireland, should confound two rivers in the immediate neighborhood of his own residence; one of them, moreover, being a mere rivulet, and the other a stream of the first magnitude.

Spenser did not, however, as he has done elsewhere, borrow or invent this name for the river; for it will appear that the Blackwater, or at least a part of it, was at one time known by the name of Allo; and Dr. John O'Donovan came to this conclusion on testimony altogether independent of Spenser; for he does not appear to have been aware of Spenser's designation, or indeed to have considered the subject of Spenser's rivers at all.

* Page 37, ed. 1726.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY   Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 / Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

What led O'Donovan to this opinion was his examination of the name of Mallow, now a well-known town on the Blackwater, which is called in Irish Moy-Allo — that is, the plain or field of the (river) Allo. Now this place could not possibly have got its name from the present river Allo, for it is situated at a point which is fully eleven miles below the junction of this river with the Blackwater. Accordingly O'Donovan writes: "From this name (Moy-Allo or Mallow) it is evident that the name Allo was anciently applied to that part of the Blackwater lying between Kanturk, where the modern Allo ends, and the town of Mallow." * Had this passage of Spenser come under his observation, he would no doubt have quoted it in further proof of his opinion. Whether the name Allo was anciently applied to that part only of the Blackwater lying between Kanturk and Mallow, or to a longer portion, or to the whole, I have met with no evidence to show.

But, to put the matter beyond all dispute, we shall bring up Spenser himself as a witness to tell us what he means. In "Colin Clouts come home againe," he relates how old Father Mole † did not wish his daughter (the river) Mulla to wed (the river) Bregog; but,

> Meaning her much better to preferre,
> Did think to match her with the neighbor flood > Which Allo hight, Broadwater called farre;

by which the poet means that the river which was locally known by the name Allo was that called Broadwater by people living at a distance; which decides without any manner of doubt that by "strong Allo" he meant the Broadwater or Blackwater.

If any one should inquire how it came to pass that the little river Allo, and the Blackwater into which it falls, were called by the same name, I will observe that a river sometimes gives its name to a tributary, the principal river losing the name, which then becomes perpetuated in the minor stream. For instance, the river Foyle, flowing by the city of Derry, was in old times called the Mourne, a name which is now applied to one of its branches, viz., that flowing by Lifford; while the present name Foyle was borrowed from Lough Foyle, the arm of the sea into which the river flows.

There is another example near Dublin, which has hitherto escaped notice. The Dodder is a small mountain river flowing through the valley of Glenasmole south of Dublin, and falling into the Liffey at Ringsend. Its usual Irish name was Dothar,* which is pronounced Dŏher; for the t is aspirated, as Irish grammarians say, the aspiration being indicated by the letter h; and an aspirated t (i.e. th) sounds in Irish like h alone, so that, if the name had been correctly anglicised according to pronunciation, the river would now be called Doher. But in the neighborhood of Dublin the people had a curious fashion, when anglicising Irish names, of restoring the primitive sounds of aspirated letters,† and in this manner the river came to be called Dodder instead of Doher. Yet, for all that, the old name is still preserved; but it is now applied to a small stream coming down from the adjacent hills, which, after turning a number of mills in a pretty valley, joins the Dodder at Rathfarnham, and is well known by the name of Doher or Owen-Doher. Other instances of this sort of transfer might be cited if it were necessary, and I might point to some examples among English rivers also.

After what has been said it will not be necessary to dwell farther on the Awniduff, for the reader will only have to attend to the order in which the rivers are named to be convinced that the Awniduff is intended for the Ulster Blackwater. Beginning at the Liffey, the poet proceeds south and west till he reaches the Shannon; starting next from the Boyne, he goes north and west, naming the rivers in the exact order of position, — Boyne, Ban, Awniduff (or Blackwater), Liffar (or Foyle), and Trowis, — curiously enough omitting the Erne: he then returns southwards, and finishes off the stanza with his own two rivers —

> Strong Allo tombling from Slewlogher steep,
> And Mulla mine whose waves I whilom taught > to weep.

"The three renowmed Brethren" are the Suir, the Nore, and the Barrow, which the poet describes with more detail in stanza xliii. It is curious that he personifies them as three brethren, and calls them farther on "three faire sons;"

* Annals of the Four Masters, vol. vi., p. 2080.
† See p. 33, farther on.

* The most ancient form of the name was Dothra; but in later Irish, and among the people, the river was always called Dothar.
† So bōthar (pronounced boher), a road, came to be called botter, booter, or batter, as in Stonybatter, in Dublin (stony road); and in Booterstown, near Kingstown, i.e. road-town. See the author's "Origin and History of Irish Names of Places," 4th edition, p. 42, et seq.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

whereas by other early English writers, as by Cambrensis, Camden, etc., they are called "the Three Sisters."

The poet makes them all rise in the Slieve Bloom Mountains, which is not correct. The Barrow flows from Slieve Bloom, but the Nore and the Suir take their rise among the Devil's Bit range, south-west of Roscrea, their sources being within two miles of each other, and about twenty-four miles south-west from the source of the Barrow. This error was committed by Giraldus Cambrensis long before him, and is very excusable, for the Devil's Bit Mountains may be considered as a continuation southward of the Slieve Bloom range, and were very probably so considered by both Giraldus and Spenser.

The three rivers, after being "long sundred, do at last accord to ioyne in one," in the long valley extending from New Ross to Waterford harbor, which was in old times called Cumar-na-dtri-nuisce (pronounced Cummer-na-dree-nis-ka), the valley of the three waters.

The Barrow is, as he truly states, one of the great salmon rivers of Ireland. The Nore boords or flows "by faire Kilkenny and Rosseponte," this last place being New Ross in Wexford, which is situated not exactly on the Nore, but at a point nearly two miles below the junction of the Nore with the Barrow. This town was of much more account in old times than it is now; and to distinguish it from Old Ross, four miles east of it, and from Ross Ibercan or Rosbercon, at the Kilkenny side of the river, it was called Rosseponte, or Ross of the Bridge, from a wooden bridge across the Barrow, which in those times was considered a very remarkable structure. All this will be made plain by the following words from Richard Stanyhurst:

> This towne was no more famoused for these wals, than for a notable woodden bridge that stretched from the towne unto the other side of the water. Diverse of the poales, logs, and stakes, with which the bridge was underpropt, sticke to this day in the water. . . . This Rosse is called Rosse Nova, or Rosse Ponti, by reason of their bridge.*

Spenser makes these three rivers the offspring of the great giant Blomius and the nymph Rheüsa; the former being the impersonation of Slieve Bloom, and the latter of the rain falling on the mountains; for Rheüsa means "flowing water," being nothing more than rheousa, the feminine participle of the Greek verb rheo, to flow.

* Description of Ireland, chap. iii.

In Ireland the historical or legendary personages connected with hills or other features are often magnified through the mists of centuries into giants or supernatural beings; and in this manner it has come to pass that a great many of the hills in every part of the country have special guardian fairies. Most of these were the chiefs of the half-mythical magic-skilled Dedannans; but several were the deified heroes or heroines of the Milesian and other early Irish races, and they lived in splendid palaces, in the interior of green mounds, great cairns, or isolated rocks, which often crown the tops of hills.

Legends of this kind are found in the most ancient Irish literary remains; they are mentioned or alluded to in manuscripts written more than a thousand years ago, and they are still current among the peasantry. Several of these presiding spirits are as celebrated now as they were when the oldest manuscripts were written, and popular stories about them are as prevalent as ever; among whom may be mentioned Finvarra of Knockma, near Tuam in Galway; Donn of Knockfierna, near Croom in Limerick; Macananty of Scrabo Hill, near Newtownards; and the two banshees of Munster, Cleena of Carrig-Cleena, near Mallow in Cork, and Eevil of Craglea, near Killaloe in Clare.

The old legend assigned Slieve Bloom to a Milesian chief named Bladh (pronounced Blaw), who reigned there as the guardian genius. Bladh, we are told, was slain during the Milesian invasion, in a skirmish with the Dedannans near these mountains, which ever after retained his name; for the Irish name of the range, as we find it written in the oldest manuscripts, is Slieve Bladhma, the mountain of Bladh (Bladh making Bladhma in the genitive). As Bladhma is pronounced Blawma or Bloma, the present name Slieve Bloom is not a great departure from the original pronunciation; and Spenser retained both the sound of the name and the spirit of the popular legend, when he designated the deified Milesian chief as "that great giant Blomius."

"The wide embayed Mayre" is the Kenmare river and bay in the south-west of Kerry, which were often called Maire by English writers of that period; as, for example, by Norden, who writes in his map "Flu. Maire," and by Boate, who describes it in his "Natural History of Ireland" as "a huge bay called Maire." The name was applied to the bay by English writers only; and they borrowed it

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

from Kenmare by a kind of reverse process, as if "Kenmare" meant the ken or head of the estuary of Maire, exactly as Spenser himself formed Mulla from Kilnamulla (see page 33). The river flowing by Kenmare into the bay is the Roughty; and the original name of the extreme head of the bay, on which the town stands, was Ceann-Mara, which was in the first instance applied to the highest point to which the tide ascended in the river, and which signifies "head of the sea." *

"The pleasant Bandon crowned with many a wood," flows altogether through the county of Cork, by the towns of Dunmanway and Bandon, into the sea at Kinsale. It has not quite lost the character given of it by the poet; for though the magnificent woods that clothed all that country in Spenser's time have disappeared, yet, along nearly the whole course of the river, there are numerous castles, mansions, and villas, all surrounded with pleasant plantations, which crown the banks on either side.

In "the spreading Lee," the poet alludes to the great expansion of the river Lee below Cork, which forms the noble harbor in which Queenstown is situated. At Cork the river divides into two branches a little above the city, near the Mardyke, which join again near the modern City Park at the east, forming an oval-shaped island, two miles long. In Spenser's time the city was confined chiefly to the island; but in later years it has extended across the river at both sides far beyond the original boundaries.

"Baleful Oure late staind with English blood" is the Avonbeg in the county Wicklow, which flows through Glenmalure, and joins the Avonmore at "the Meeting of the Waters." As this river has never before been identified, and as it is an excellent example of how the poet himself, even when he is using fictitious names, generally supplies, in his short descriptions, the means of discovering the exact places he is writing about, it will be worth while to unfold, one by one, the steps that have led to its identification.

The words "late staind with English blood" must refer to a battle of some consequence in which the English were defeated and suffered loss, and which was still fresh in recollection when this passage was written. Looking back from the year 1590, which, we may assume, was the year, or very near it, when the Fourth Booke of "The Faerie Queene" was written, we find two battles, and only two, in which the English were defeated, that might then be called "late." The first was fought in 1579 at a place called Gortnatubrid, in the south of the county Limerick, where three hundred English soldiers and three officers were killed. Another was fought at Glenmalure in 1580 — the very year of Lord Grey's arrival — which was far more serious in its consequences. It will not be necessary to examine the details of the first; for the second is the only action that answers Spenser's words, and it answers them in every particular. The lord deputy Grey, marching in that year against the Wicklow clans, pitched his camp on one of the hills over Glenmalure. On August 25 a strong force prepared for action, and advanced incautiously into the recesses of this glen, while the lord deputy remained in his camp. They were allowed to proceed without interruption till they reached a narrow part of the defile, when they were suddenly attacked by the Irish on the banks of the little stream — the Avonbeg — and after a short and sharp struggle they were routed in great disorder, leaving behind them dead eight hundred men, including four English officers, Sir Peter Carew, and Colonels Moor, Cosby, and Audley.

So far the river bears out the description, "late staind with English blood;" and it is important to remark that this defeat was all the more disastrous in Spenser's eyes, and he would be the more likely to retain a vivid memory of it, as it was his own master, Lord Grey, that was concerned in it.

Let us now consider the name "baleful Oure." I have elsewhere observed that the poet often bestows fictitious names, generally borrowed from some neighboring features, of which several examples are given in the course of this paper: Arlo Hill, from the Glen of Arlo; Mulla from Kilnamulla; and from this again Mole, Molanna, and Armulla. So here also: "Oure," is merely the last syllable of Glenmalure, or Glenmalour, as he himself calls it in his "View of the State of Ireland."

And as to the word "baleful," the origin of this is very clear. Spenser generally endeavored to find meanings in his names, being always ready to imagine one when the appearance of the word was in his favor; and he often bestows an epithet that reflects this real or fancied signification. Here are some examples — all names of rivers — taken from canto xi. of the Fourth Booke: —

* Ceann, a head; muir, genitive mara, the sea, corresponding with Latin mare.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Wylibourne with passage slye
That of his wylinesse his name doth take.

Mole that like a nousling mole doth make
His way still under ground till Thames he overtake.

Bounteous Trent, that in himself enseames
Both thirty (Fr. trente, thirty) sorts of fish and thirty sundry streames.

And there came Stoure with terrible aspéct.

(False) Bregog hight (see pp. 29, 33),
So hight because of this deceitful traine.

So also "sad Trowis" (supra), "Tygris fierce," and several others. He does the same in the case before us, using "baleful" as if it were an equivalent for mal; for the river "Mal-oure" was baleful, not only in the disastrous memory connected with it, but even in its very name.* The reader will observe that here the same sort of fancy passed through the poet's mind as in the case of Mulla (p. 33 infra); in other words, he thought, or assumed, that the name of the river was Oure or Maloure, and that it gave name to Glenmalure.

The Glenmalure River or Avonbeg comes also in its natural place in the catalogue; for starting from the Maire, and proceeding along the coast, east and north, the very next important river, not already named, after the Maire, the Bandon, and the Lee, is the one in question, the Avonbeg or Ovoca.

Although I have made a very diligent search in every available direction, I have failed to discover the river Spenser meant by "the stony Aubrian," the only one in his whole catalogue that remains unidentified. The first syllable is probably the common Irish word abh (pronounced aw or ow), signifying river, as we find it in Awbeg, Ownageeragh, Finnow, and many other river names. From the place it occupies in the catalogue, joined with three well-known large rivers — the order in the text being Liffey, Slaney, Aubrian, Shannon — it may be inferred that it is somewhere in south Munster, and that it is itself a considerable river. But, after eliminating from the inquiry all the Munster rivers named here by the poet, I cannot find that any one of those remaining will answer both name and description. The Feale in Kerry, flowing by Abbeyfeale into the Shannon, is a large river, and stony enough in its bed; but I have never heard that it has been called by any name like Aubrian. "The stony Aubrian" is a mystery, and, so far as I am concerned, will, I fear, remain so.

In the first of "Two Cantos of Mutabilitie" the poet relates, in a fine strain of poetry, how the goddess of Titanesse, Mutabilitie, laid claim to universal sovereignty; that when Jove gave judgment against her, she appealed to the highest authority of all — "Father of gods by equal right, to weet, the God of nature;" and that Jove, very much against his will, agreed to the appeal, bidding "Dan Phœbus, scribe, her appellation seale."

Eftsoones the time and place appointed were,
Where all, both heavenly powers and earthly wights,
Before great Natures presence should appeare
For triall of their titles and best rights:
That was, to weet, upon the highest hights
Of Arlo-hill (who knows not Arlo-hill?)
That is the highest head, in all mens sights,
Of my old father MOLE, whom shepheards quill
Renowmed hath with hymnes fit for a rurall skill.

If there be any reader "who knows not Arlo-hill," the scene of this solemn trial, the following examination will enable him to find it out.

In the neighborhood of Buttevant and Charleville, in the county of Cork, begins a range of mountains, which runs in a direction nearly eastwards till it terminates near the village of Caher in Tipperary, a distance of about thirty miles. The middle part is low, and interrupted by high plains, but the extremities rise boldly in two well-defined mountain groups; the western portion being called the Ballahoura Mountains, and the eastern the Galties. This eastern portion is also the highest, abounding in peaks, precipices, and gorges; and one particular summit, Galtymore, the most elevated of the whole range, attains a height of 5,015 feet. This last peak rises immediately over the vale of Aherlow, or Arlo, as it was commonly called by Anglo-Irish writers of Spenser's time, including Spenser himself; a fine valley, eight or ten miles long, walled in by the dark, steep slopes of the Galties on the south-east side, with Galtymore towering over all, and by the long ridge of Slievenamuck on the north-west. The whole range, from Buttevant to Cahir, is what Spenser calls "Mole," or "old

* The poet is, of course, not correct, and very likely he knew it. But the syllable "mal" was very tempting under the circumstances, for as an ordinary Latin-English prefix it was then, as it is now, well understood to mean something evil or baleful. The true original form of the name Glenmalure is Gleann-Maoilughra, which means the glen of the tribe called Mailura.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

father Mole," as will appear very plainly a little farther on.

The mountain mass that culminates in Galtymore is Arlo-hill, on which the meeting of the gods was held; but the name Arlo was applied to the hill only by Spenser himself, who borrowed it from the adjacent valley, and who, after his usual fashion, selected it on account of its musical sound. That Arlo-hill is Galtymore, and no other, is shown by several expressions scattered through this part of the poem. Arlo, we are told, overlooks the plain through which the river Suir flows:

> [Diana] quite forsooke
> All those faire forrests about Arlo hid;
> And all that mountaine, which doth overlooke
> The richest champain that may else be rid;
> And the faire Shure, in which are thousand salmons bred;

which indicates that it is among the Galties. For, standing on the summit of these mountains, you have the magnificent plain of Tipperary at your feet, a part of the "Golden Vale," truly designated by the poet as "the richest champain that may else be rid;" while, on the other hand, this plain cannot be seen at all from the western part of the range. The name Arlo connects it with the vale of Aherlow; and that it is the same as Galtymore is placed beyond all doubt by the statement that Arlo-hill > is the highest head, in all mens sights,

> Of my old father Mole.

Spenser tells us, at the beginning of "Colin Clouts come home againe," that he lived at the foot of Mole: —

> One day (quoth he) I sat (as was my trade)
> Under the foote of Mole, that mountain hore,
> Keeping my sheepe amongst the cooly shade
> Of the greene alders by the Mullaes shore.

This, we know, was where Kilcolman Castle ruins now stand, under the Ballahoura hills, at the western extremity of the range; and as Arlo-hill in the Galties "is the highest head, in all mens sights, of my old father Mole," it is quite plain that by "old father Mole" the poet meant the whole range, including the Galties and the Ballahouras.

Moreover, he tells us in the same poem, —

> Mole hight that mountain gray
> That walls the north side of Armulla dale;

from which it appears that he gave the name of Armulla to that wide valley through which the Blackwater flows, walled on the north by Father Mole, and on the south by the Boggera hills, and by the Nagles Mountains near Fermoy. But these names, Mole, Mulla, Armulla, are all fictitious; and I shall presently have a word to say about their origin.

Before describing the meeting of the gods and the trial of the claims of the Titanesse, the poet introduces a pretty episode about Arlo-hill. He relates that

> Whylome when Ireland florished in fame
> Of wealth and goodnesse, far above the rest
> Of all that beare the British Islands name,
> The gods then us'd, for pleasure and for rest,
> Oft to resort thereto, when seem'd them best:
> But none of all therein more pleasure found
> Then Cynthia, that is soveraine Queene profest
> Of woods and forrest, which therein abound,
> Sprinkled with wholsom waters more then most on ground.
>
> But mongst them all, as fittest for her game,
> . . . .
> She chose this Arlo; where shee did resort
> With all her nymphes enranged on a rowe,
> . . . .
> Amongst the which there was a nymph that hight
> Molanna; daughter of old Father Mole,
> And sister unto Mulla faire and bright;
> Unto whose bed false Bregog whylome stole,
> That Shepheard Colin dearely did condole,
> And made her lucklesse loves well knowne to be;*
> But this Molanna, were she not so shole [shallow],
> Were no lesse faire and beautifull then shee:
> Yet as she is, a fairer flood may no man see.
>
> For first she springs out of two marble rocks,
> On which a grove of oakes high mounted growes,
> That as a girlond seemes to deck the locks
> Of some faire bride, brought forth with pompous showes
> Out of her bowre, that many flowers strowes:
> So through the flowry dales she tumbling downe
> Through many woods and shady coverts flowes,
> That on each side her silver channell crowne,
> Till to the plaine she come, whose valleyes she doth drowne.
>
> In her sweet streames Diana used oft,
> After her sweatie chace and toilsome play,
> To bathe herselfe; and after, on the soft

* The story of the loves of the Bregog and Mulla, alluded to here, will be found at pp. 33, 34 farther on.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

And downy grasse her dainty limbes to lay
In covert shade, where none behold her may.*

The poet goes on to tell how the foolish wood-god Faunus had long wished to catch a sight of the goddess, but found no way to compass his design, till at last he persuaded the nymph Molanna, by tempting her with bribes, "to tell what time he might her lady see."

Thereto hee promist, if she would him pleasure
With this small boone to quit her with a better;
To weet, that whereas shee had out of measure
Long lov'd the Fanchin, who by nought did set her,
That he would undertake for this to get her
To be his love, and of him liked well.†

Faunus succeeded, by the help of the nymph, but was caught in the very act by the goddess and her attendants; and on being closely questioned as to who had led him there, he confessed in his fright that it was Molanna. Whereupon they punished him by dressing him in the skin of a deer and chasing him with their hounds; but he managed to escape them all.

So they him follow'd till they weary were;
When, back returning to Molann' againe,
They, by commaund'ment of Diana, there
Her whelm'd with stones: yet Faunus for her paine,
Of her beloved Fanchin did obtaine,
That her he would receive unto his bed.
So now her waves passe through a pleasant plaine,
Till with the Fanchin she herselfe do wed,
And, both combin'd, themselves in one faire river spred.

Nath'lesse Diana, full of indignation,
Thenceforth abandoned her delicious brooke;
In whose sweet streame, before that bad occasion,
So much delight to bathe her limbes she tooke:
Ne onely her, but also quite forsooke
All those faire forrests about Arlo hid;
And all that mountaine, which doth overlooke
The richest champain that may else be rid;
And the faire Shure, in which are thousand salmons bred.

The Fanchin, or, as it is now called, the Funsheon, is a small river, rising in the Galty Mountains, and flowing by Mitchelstown and Glanworth into the Blackwater, two miles below Fermoy, after a course of about thirty miles.

But no one has yet pointed out the stream that Spenser designated by the name Molanna. Smith, indeed, in his "History of Cork," attempts to do so; but this careful writer must have been misled in the present instance by some incorrect old map, or by some other erroneous evidence; for in his description of the source of the Funsheon, and in his identification of the Molanna, he is quite wrong, as I shall, I think, be able to show very plainly. After the time of Smith, the editors of Spenser, and other writers who interested themselves in this matter, followed his authority without question or examination.

Smith states that the Funsheon "rises in the county of Tipperary, in a bog, a mile south of the mountains called the Galties. Not far from its source it receives a brook called the Brackbawn, which divides the county of Limerick from Tipperary, and rises in the Galty Mountains."* And in a note at the foot of the same page he states that the Brackbawn is Spenser's Molanna.

To any one who has not examined the place all this appears satisfactory, and to fall in exactly with Spenser's description. But a walk of three or four miles along the river will at once dispel the illusion. The river that Smith describes as meeting the Brackbawn from a bog in Tipperary, and which he says is the Funsheon, has no existence at all. The Brackbawn, for the whole of its short course of four miles, forms the boundary line between the counties of Tipperary and Limerick; and it so happens that there is no stream joining it from the Tipperary side. On that side, the fall of ground lies the other way, and all the rivulets flow eastward towards the basin of the Suir. The Brackbawn is, in fact, the source or head-water of the Funsheon: it is the main stream — the Funsheon itself — though it is called the Brackbawn (and sometimes the Attycraan) for the first four miles of its course, and the Funsheon from that down. I have said that the Brackbawn is the main stream: I should have said, rather, that it is the only stream; for from the point high up in the mountains where the Brackbawn is formed by the junction of two streams, down to where it begins to be called the Funsheon, it receives no tributary at all, either from the Tipperary or from the Limerick side.

* C. vi.
† C. vi.

* Hist. of Cork, ii. 266.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

As the Brackbawn is the Funsheon, it cannot be the Molanna, as Smith and his followers assert; for the context of the poem shows clearly that the Molanna and the Funsheon are two different streams, and that the former is a tributary of the latter.

It is evident that Spenser was well acquainted with all this neighborhood. It forms part of "Armulla Dale," the valley he himself lived in; it is only about sixteen miles from Kilcolman — within view, in fact, of the castle windows; and he describes the rivers with such exactness and detail, and his descriptions are so correct, that it is impossible to avoid believing that he explored the place himself, and wrote from personal knowledge.

Although I knew this locality many years ago very intimately, I visited it from Dublin on a pleasant day of last June, to examine the rivers and to judge for myself. I walked along the streams up into the heart of the Galty Mountains; and any one who performs the same pleasant pilgrimage, with the poet's description in his mind, and who looks about him with ordinary attention, will identify the Molanna without the least difficulty. There is, in fact, no choice. The whole context of the poem indicates that the Molanna flows from the slopes of Arlo-hill. There are only two streams of any consequence flowing into the Funsheon valley from the Galties. One of these is the Funsheon itself, or the Brackbawn, which, as I have already observed, forms for some distance the boundary between Limerick and Tipperary. Its source is high up among the mountains, about a quarter of a mile east of the summit of Galtymore; and it flows from several springs along the glen, one on the boundary line of the counties, others on the Limerick side, but none, as far as I could see, on the east or Tipperary side.

The other stream is the Behanna,* which rises in "Arlo-hill," a little to the west of the summit of Galtymore, and, after a course of about four miles, joins the Funsheon at the hamlet of Kilbeheny. This is the Molanna. We have, as I have said, no choice in the matter; there is no stream but the Behanna flowing from the Galties into the Funsheon, except mere tiny brooklets that could not claim a moment's consideration; and in every respect it answers the poet's description of the Molanna. It is formed by the junction of two streams far up in the mountains, each flowing through a deep glen, with a high hill (Knocknadarriff, or the hill of the bulls) jutting out boldly between them. The eastern branch is named Carrigeen (little rock), from a rock extending along the side of the glen through which it flows, which is also often called Doocarrig, or black rock. The other or western branch is called Coolatinny (the recess of the fox), or more commonly the Pigeon Rock stream. Rising over the side of this western glen is a great precipice called Carrignagloor, or the rock of the pigeons, which gives the name of Pigeon Rock to the stream.

Each stream has its own rock towering up on the side of its glen; and this is obviously what the poet had in his mind when he described the Molanna as "springing from two marble rocks." The "grove of oakes high mounted" over the double source is gone indeed; but so are the dense woods that once clothed the Galties — "all those faire forrests about Arlo hid" — for which these mountains were noted in times not very remote. When you look from a point on the Behanna, a little below the junction of the two streams, upwards into the two rocky glens winding into the heart of the mountains, you can hardly help believing that in Spenser's time the grove of oaks that so struck his fancy crowned the summit of Knocknadarriff, which rises abrupt and bare between the two streams to a height of two thousand feet straight before you.

The "many woods and shady coverts," that crowned the silver channel of the Molanna three hundred years ago, are also gone; but down to a very recent period a wood extended along both sides of the river for about a mile below the junction of the two tributary streams. This was called Coolattin wood, and was a modern plantation; but it was doubtless the successor of a forest of ancient growth. Coolattin wood was cut down seven or eight years ago, but abundant vestiges of it still remain — roots and stumps of trees, and an occasional undergrowth of oak, ash, hazel, and birch.

After tumbling down from its mountain channel, the Behanna emerges sharply on the plain, through which it winds gently for the last mile of its course, among level meadows and cornfields, till it joins the Funsheon near the bridge of Kilbeheny; thus corresponding exactly with the words of the poet: —

* It is now called Beheena by the natives; but a generation ago it was called Behanna, and this is the name perpetuated on the Ordnance maps.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

So now her waves passe through a pleasant plaine
Till with the Fanchin she herselfe do wed,
And, both combin'd, themselves in one faire river spred.

The stream is very steep in the first part of its course; and the winter torrents have, in the course of ages, rolled down vast quantities of large stones and gravel, and deposited them in the level part of its bed. The people, indeed, often come specially to the river during heavy floods to listen to the great noise made by the stones as they are rolled down by the torrent, tearing, crashing, and grinding against each other. The poet has figured this feature of the river bed, under a thin veil, in the passage where he tells us that the nymphs, at the command of Diana, overwhelmed Molanna with stones. So that here, as elsewhere, his accurate delineation of local features helps us to identify the stream; and when we have succeeded in this, our knowledge of the place heightens our appreciation of his beautiful allegory. He is no less truthful when he writes: —

But this Molanna, were she not so shole [shallow],
Were no lesse faire and beautifull then shee [i.e., than the Mulla]:
Yet as she is, a fairer flood may no man see.

For the Behanna never becomes deep and slow in its movement like the Mulla, but flows brightly and quickly along, winding and dashing among the stones that everywhere strew its bed, and showing, all along, the clear gravel at the bottom. And as to beauty, I question whether the poet was not prejudiced in favor of his own beloved Mulla, when he pronounced it superior to Molanna; for even though "so shole," the Molanna is a very lovely stream.

In the early part of its course, the river forms many crystal pools, each under a little rocky cascade; and it was in these that

Diana used oft,
After her sweatie chace and toilsome play,
To bathe herselfe.

When I was walking along the stream, on a sultry evening in June, I could not help thinking how delicious it would be to imitate the goddess.

As "Molanna" is a fictitious name, it may naturally be asked what was the cir cumstance that suggested it to the poet's mind; for the reader will have observed that all Spenser's fictitious names were adopted from some local features; and the origin of this name appears quite clear. The poet tells us that Molanna was "sister unto Mulla faire and bright;" for both were daughters of "old father Mole," and, according to the poet's fancy, took their names from him. But the latter part of the name Molanna, I think it very obvious, was suggested to Spenser partly by the native name Beh*anna*, and partly also perhaps by the fact that on the eastern bank of the stream there is a small lake giving name to a townland, called to this day Lough-an-anna.

I am persuaded that the idea of making Arlo-hill the scene of these gatherings of the gods was suggested to Spenser by the native legends. For in times of old, in the shadowy days of Irish romance, this hill was very famous; it was the resort of fairies and enchanters, of gods and goddesses, though these last were not the same as those recorded by Spenser; and many stories of their strange doings are still preserved in our old manuscript books, especially in one called "The Book of Ballymote."

It was here, near the summit of the hill, that Cliach, the youthful harper of Connaught, sat for a whole year, pleading his love for the Princess Baina, the daughter of the Dedannan fairy king, Bove Derg. But although he played on two harps at the same time, he was not able by the spells of his fairy music to open the gates of the palace, for the magical power of the king was an overmatch for him; neither did he succeed in winning the love of the princess, whose heart remained hardened against him to the last. So that the earth, at length taking pity on his sorrows, opened up under his feet and received him into her bosom. And the hollow was immediately filled up by a lake, which remains to this day near the top of the hill. The legend* adds that "Crotta Cliach," the old name of the Galty Mountains, was derived from this love tragedy; for "Crotta Cliach" signifies, according to this account, the crotta or harps of Cliach, in allusion to the two cruits or harps on which he played.

It was here, too, that another fairy princess, the beautiful Keraber, and her train of sevenscore and ten damsels, who were bright-colored birds one year, and had their own shapes the next — here it was, on this very lake, that they spent their time, swimming about year

* Which, as well as the next, is found in "The Book of Ballymote."

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

after year while they were birds, linked togther in couples with chains of silver.

It is highly probable that Spenser was acquainted with these and other legends about Arlo-hill — why should he not know them as well as he knew the legend of Lough Melvin at the other side of Ireland? — they were then quite common among the peasantry, as indeed some of them are at the present day; and we may very well suppose that he took from them the hint of the meeting of the gods, and of his beautiful episode of Diana and her nymphs.

The story of the loves of the two rivers, Bregog and Mulla, is related in "Colin Clouts come home againe;" and the poet introduces this little pastoral narrative with a particular account of his own melodious Mulla: —

Old father Mole (Mole hight that mountain gray
That walls the north side of Armulla dale),
He had a daughter fresh as floure of May,
Which gave that name unto that pleasant vale;
Mulla, the daughter of old Mole, so hight
The nimph which of that water course has charge,
That, springing out of Mole, doth run downe right
To Buttevant, where, spreading forth at large,
It giveth name unto that auncient Cittie,
Which Kilnemullah cleped is of old.

The little river Mulla, which he elsewhere speaks of as "Mulla mine, whose waves I whilom taught to weep," flows by Buttevant and Doneraile, passing through the district once held by Spenser, within a short distance of Kilcolman Castle, and after a gentle winding course of about twenty-five miles it joins the Blackwater halfway between Mallow and Fermoy. The name Mulla, which Spenser took such delight in, is not, and never was, the name of the river; but the poet used it, as elsewhere he used Arlo, in preference to the true name, on account of its musical sound. Its proper name is Awbeg, little river; and it was so called to distinguish it from the Avonmore (great river) or Blackwater.

The poet got the name Mulla much in the same way as he got "baleful Oure;"* he borrowed it from Kilnemullah, which, as he truly states, was the old name of Buttevant. The river grows very wide, "spreading forth at large," at Buttevant, forming a kind of elongated lake; and he assumed that its own proper name was Mulla, and that it gave name to Kilnemullah — "It giveth name unto that auncient Cittie"* — it was enough for him that it looked plausible; and having got the name Mulla, he used it ever after for the river, and loved it, and multiplied it in every direction. Its first production is in "old father Mole," the fanciful name of the range of hills already noticed, father of the nymph Mulla, who, following up, or rather reversing, the fiction, took her name from her grey old sire, as did also her sister nymph Molanna; and, lastly, the name Armulla had a like origin, for Mulla "gave that name unto that pleasant vale."

[Mulla] lov'd and was beloved full faine
Of her owne brother river, Bregog hight,
So hight because of this deceitfull traine
Which he with Mulla wrought to win delight.
But her old sire more carefull of her good,
And meaning her much better to preferre,
Did thinke to match her with the neighbor flood,
Which Allo hight, Broadwater [the Blackwater] called farre.

And, in fact, the day was fixed for the marriage; but Bregog was determined to have Mulla for himself, and the nymph secretly favored his advances. The old father, "sitting still on hie," kept a close watch on the lovers; but Bregog was too clever for him, and circumvented him in the end. For the rest we must let Colin Clout tell the story in his own delightful way.

Her father, sitting still on hie,
Did warily still watch which way she went,
And eke from far observ'd with iealous eie,
Which way his course the wanton Bregog bent;
Him to deceive, for all his watchfull ward,
The wily lover did devise this slight;
First into many parts his stream he shar'd
That, whilest the one was watcht, the other might Passe unespide to meete her by the way;
And then, besides, those little streames so broken,
He under ground so closely did convay,
That of their passage doth appeare no token,
Till they into the Mullaes water slide.
So secretly did he his love enioy:
Yet not so secret, but it was descride,
And told her father by a shepheard's boy,
Who, wondrous wroth for that so foule despight,
In great revenge did roll down from his hill
Huge mighty stones, the which encomber might

* See p. 27.

* As if it were the kill or church of Mulla. But this is not correct, for the old name is Cill-na-mullach, ecclesia tumulorum, as O'Sullivan Bear translates it, "the church of the summits or hillocks." The present name Buttevant is believed to be derived from Boutez-en-avant, a French phrase, meaning "Push forward," the motto of the Barrymore family.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

His passage, and his water courses spill,
So of a River, which he was of old,
He none was made, but scattred all to nought;
And, lost emong those rocks into him rold,
Did lose his name: so deare his love he bought.

The little river Bregoge is still well known by the same name. It rises in two deep glens on Corrinmore Hill, one of the Ballahoura range, and, flowing near Kilcolman Castle, it joins the Awbeg or Mulla at the town of Doneraile, after a course of about five miles. This river is described by the poet, in his fanciful sketch, with great truthfulness. After leaving the hills it traverses the plain before its junction with the Awbeg; and for some distance after emerging from its mountain home its channel is often very wide, and filled with heaps of gravel and stones brought down by the floods, so that the stream, which is generally very small, and often nearly dry, is much scattered and interrupted; and we may assume that it was still more so in Spenser's time, before the bed was shut in by cultivation. These are the stones rolled down by old father Mole in his "great revenge."

In the lower part of its course, the river traverses a limestone plain, winding along a lovely little glen, among rich meadows interspersed with groves and shrubberies, and grey limestone rocks, sometimes rising high up on either bank, and sometimes just peeping out from amidst the foliage. Two or three times, from "Streamhill," where the two principal feeders meet, down to "Old Court"—a distance of about two miles—the river sinks out of sight, and flows underground for a considerable distance through the caverns of the limestone rock under its bed, leaving its channel completely dry. It presents this appearance always, except in wet weather or during a flood, when the underground caverns are not able to swallow all the water, and the stream then flows continuously. With this peculiarity Spenser was thoroughly well acquainted, as he describes it with great correctness:—

Those little streames so broken
He [Bregog] under ground so closely did convay,
That of their passage doth appeare no token,
Till they into the Mullaes water glide.

The poet called this little river by its true name, which is not very musical, instead of inventing or borrowing one, as he did in so many other cases; for it so happened that he was able to turn its signification to account—if, indeed, as is probable, the name did not suggest the treatment—in working out his pretty pastoral, "Bregog," meaning, as he rightly interprets it, a false one or a deceiver,—

So hight because of this deceitfull traine,
Which he with Mulla wrought to win delight.

It may not be amiss to say a word here regarding this name and its signification, though in doing so we shall have to descend from the airy world of fancy to the solid level ground of sober reality. Brég is an Irish word meaning a falsehood, and in various forms it is applied to rivers that are subject to sudden and dangerous floods, or which flow through deep quagmires; signifying, in this application, deceitful or treacherous. There is, for instance, a stream called Breagagh near the city of Kilkenny, and another near Thurles, in Tipperary. And Trawbreaga Bay, at Malin in the north of Donegal, is so called (Trawbreaga meaning the strand of falsehood or treachery) because the tide rises there so suddenly that it has often swept away people walking incautiously on the shore.

Spenser's Bregog is formed by the junction of four mountain rivulets all of about the same length, and meeting nearly at the same point, whence the united stream flows on to the Awbeg. These rivulets carry little water in dry weather, but whenever a heavy and continuous shower falls on the hills, four mountain floods rush down simultaneously, and meet together nearly at the same instant, swelling the little river in a few moments to a furious and dangerous torrent. All this is quite well understood in the neighborhood. An intelligent peasant living near the river told me that it was the most "roguish" river in the world; for when you least expected it, and when the stream looked perfectly quiet and gentle, the flood would rise in a quarter of an hour to a height of seven or eight feet, rushing down "all abreast," as he expressed it. I may add that the word "roguish" gives exactly the sense of the Irish name "Bregoge."

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

ERICA.*

TRANSLATED FOR THE LIVING AGE FROM THE GERMAN OF

FRAU VON INGERSLEBEN.

XXXIV.

THE BALL.

THE day of the princess's great ball had arrived. Even in the forenoon numerous carriages bringing guests from a distance rolled up to the door, and there was a very large company at dinner. Neither the baroness nor her young guests appeared at table, as the old lady rigidly maintained the separation between the two households, and Elmar was the only one who went to dine with his sister. Katharina, who wore a magnificent dress, glittering with jewels, instantly whispered to him that Count Meerburg had not yet arrived, and she feared some accident had made him aware of Sidonie's presence.

"Don't be anxious, Kathinka," replied Elmar, "as Meerburg accepted your invitation, he will come in spite of Sidonie. He has only two miles to drive, so there is not the slightest reason to expect him to dinner."

Katharina scarcely heard the end of the sentence, she was already occupied with other things, and the constant restlessness, which seemed to have increased since her residence in Waldbad, induced her to rise from the table before the dessert had been touched. The young ladies, supported by the anticipation of the ball, endured the loss with composure, but the older people exchanged glances of astonishment at the strange haste of the hostess.

When the company dispersed to their own rooms to rest and prepare for the ball, Elmar went to his grandmother's to offer the young ladies large, beautiful bouquets, which, by his orders, the gardener had arranged with special taste. Sidonie thanked him for the gift, but received it with the quiet indifference with which we accept an expected, matter-of-course attention, but Erica's brown eyes sparkled with delight at the sight of her bouquet. It was the first ball she had ever attended, the first bouquet she had ever received, and she thought it the most beautiful she had ever seen. Elmar perhaps thought the same of the recipient, for his eyes rested steadily on her eager, animated face, and involuntarily followed all her elastic movements.

"How fortunate it is that we sometimes danced at Dorneck!" cried Erica joyously, "or I should not venture to undertake a quadrille to-night; we never had figures of that kind in the dances I used to share with the fishermen's children in Waldbad."

"Then I can venture to dance a quadrille with you?" asked Elmar gaily.

"You may boldly undertake the hazard, sir, of course always supposing I am willing to accept you for a partner."

"The ball is going to the child's head," said the old lady laughing; "I should advise you to take proper measures before she gets still more saucy, Elmar."

"I will follow grandmamma's advice, and ask what dance you will give me, Erica?"

"How indiscreet in you, Elmar, to offer me carte blanche, when you must dance the first set with the illustrious Countess Sidonie!"

"The illustrious countess resigns her rights in your favor," said Sidonie with a faint smile.

"Oh! the noble lady cannot be permitted to do that, and I am very much astonished, Sidonie, to find myself obliged to remind you of Aunt Vally's lessons."

The maid, who entered the room to inform the young girls that it was time to dress, interrupted the conversation. Erica gave her bouquet to the old lady to keep, and hurried away, while Sidonie lingered a moment, and turning to the baroness, said sadly,—

"I envy Erica her unfeigned delight in the anticipation of an entertainment which seems to me a burden. I really believe, grandmamma, I am only fit to be abbess of Herdrungen."

Little inclination as the old lady felt, at her advanced age, to take part in gay society, she could not wholly avoid this ball. When, accompanied by the two young girls, she entered the brilliantly lighted rooms, there was a universal movement among all present, who pressed forward to offer their greetings. Her tall, stately figure, in its heavy grey silk dress, still looked so queenly, spite of her simple attire, that Erica cast an almost timid glance at her. She had not supposed that the pleasant, cordial old grandmamma was at the same time such a perfect woman of the world, and as she now, with easy dignity, received the salutations of the guests, addressing a few friendly words to one, bowing formally to another, and then pausing to carry on a longer conversation, she seemed to Erica almost like a stranger.

* Copyright 1877, by Littell & Gay.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Although Sidonie had entered the ballroom so reluctantly, she soon appeared to feel in her element, and became eager and animated, while Erica, who had been radiant with delight in the anticipation of the entertainment, gradually experienced a slight sense of discomfort. The numberless strange faces bewildered and embarrassed her, and she secretly confessed that, after all, a ball was not quite so enchanting as she had supposed.

The conversation of the old ladies to whom the baroness introduced her was not particularly entertaining, and even the young men whose acquaintance she made, seemed by no means attractive. She found most pleasure in gazing at the spacious, magnificent rooms, with their gilded furniture and brilliant chandeliers. Although the princess was hostess here, everything really belonged to Elmar, and thus was doubly interesting to her.

Elmar was constantly in demand to-night, and thus obliged to be more conspicuous than usually suited his taste, especially as there were many slights and instances of want of tact on Katharina's part to conceal and repair. The princess, who wore a gleaming ball-dress embroidered with silver, and sparkling diamond ornaments, whispered to him that Meerburg's arrival had been announced, and he would now be forced to appear, out of fear of the gossip his absence would cause.

Elmar glanced anxiously at Sidonie, irresolute whether to prepare her for the meeting. She was standing a short distance away, directly under the huge bronze chandelier, which cast its brilliant glow directly upon her. The flood of light was reflected in a thousand hues from the diamond dewdrops on the white roses she wore in her lustrous black hair, and shone full upon the noble, regular features, which, suffused by a faint pink flush, and animated by conversation, looked surpassingly beautiful at this moment, and gave a dazzling brilliancy to the light blue silk dress, which fell in artistic folds around the slender figure. Elmar's eyes were involuntarily spell-bound several moments by the beautiful vision, and when he wished to approach and warn her of the impending meeting, he saw that it was already too late. Count Meerburg unexpectedly emerged from the crowd beside the old baroness, and the latter, pausing before the young girl, said, —

"My dear Sidonie, here is Count Egon Meerburg, who is very anxious to make your acquaintance."

Sidonie's bright face instantly darkened, a cold, distant expression came into her sparkling eyes, her cheeks lost their delicate color, and her lips curled haughtily. She turned towards the speaker with almost uncourteous hesitation, as if to delay her reply, and when she at last looked at the person presented to her, it seemed as if the sight of him possessed the power to transform her into stone.

A well-known figure stood before her, and a voice whose tones were only too familiar said: "You forget my whole name, aunt; I am called Egon Werner Meerburg."

"You must forgive an old lady, my dear Werner; I was probably thinking of your father."

A mist came before Sidonie's eyes; the walls and people whirled around her in dizzy circles, and she involuntarily grasped the back of a chair for support. A deathlike pallor overspread her face, dark circles were visible under her eyes, and for a moment it seemed as if the support would not save her from falling. Soon, however, she regained her composure; the drooping figure drew itself up proudly, the marble-like face turned towards the count with a grave, stern expression, and a glance of actual hatred flashed from the dark eyes, as she said, —

"You might have saved yourself the trouble of this introduction, grandmamma. I have already made Count Meerburg's acquaintance, though under a mask."

The old lady noticed Sidonie's strange and almost incomprehensible manner with grave anxiety. With considerate kindness, she had herself taken the young man to Sidonie as soon as he entered, in order to anticipate Katharina, and she now showed the same delicate tact in diverting attention from the young girl, by saying with a smile: "So you are old acquaintances; well, so much the better, I need not take the trouble to find you any subjects for conversation."

She then turned to the bystanders and quietly began to talk with them, thus partially isolating Sidonie and Werner from the rest of the company. The latter instantly took advantage of the opportunity to approach Sidonie, and say in a hasty, agitated whisper, —

"Will you permit me to explain my conduct, countess?"

Sidonie had retreated a step at his approach, and replied in a calm, cold tone, which contrasted strangely with his trembling voice. "Any conversation upon this subject would only be a fresh insult to me. I must, for the sake of my own self

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

respect, suppose that Count Meerburg's singular disguise was adopted to arouse my anger, and cause an open breach, and in this respect, at least, our wishes harmonize."

"Sidonie!"

Once more as on a former occasion in the park at Dorneck, there was so much anguish, love, and entreaty in the mere utterance of the name, that the young girl trembled and involuntarily grasped the chair again. The stern, half scornful expression of her features softened, and her lips seemed about to utter words less harsh, when Katharina suddenly rustled up.

"So my eyes do not deceive me," she exclaimed, in her usual hasty manner. "The unknown relative and the secretary at Dorneck are one and the same person. Who would have believed it? Sidonie, you really might have saved yourself the numerous headaches caused by Count Meerburg's apparent neglect. But how did you happen to hit upon this somewhat singular incognito, Count Werner? It really was not particularly flattering to Sidonie, for you to suppose she could fall in love with a man so greatly below her in rank, a thing which, as you must acknowledge, would have been extremely indecorous."

Werner bit his lips fiercely in his wrath; his worst enemy could have wrought him no greater injury than the beautiful, smiling woman before him, who apparently uttered her words in mere mischievous merriment. Sidonie's features had already changed and assumed their former stony, Medusa-like expression, and the black eyes gazed at him with cold contempt.

"You too clearly reveal the utter want of tact such a plan would display, cousin," he replied, with as much composure as he could assume, "to suppose that I intended to attempt to win the countess's favor under that mask."

"Oh! I expect anything from the vanity of men, my dear count," laughed Katharina. "Besides, I unfortunately have positive proofs of my assertion, for Herr von Wehlen had noticed the affection existing between two persons so widely separated by rank, and begged me to interpose to save the family a scene. I, however, did not enter into his proposition, for I don't like to meddle with other people's affairs, and now have reason to congratulate myself upon my prudence, for the dreaded scandal is transformed into a match most ardently desired by all parties."

She rustled away again as quickly as she had come. She knew that she had dealt Sidonie's pride a mortal blow, and her restlessness, as well as some little fear of the manner in which Werner might receive her words, caused her hasty departure. The young man's heart was so full of hatred towards her that he could have murdered her in cold blood, the more so, as after her last words, there could be no doubt that it had been her intention to injure him in Sidonie's estimation. The latter stood perfectly motionless, her features were, if possible, a shade paler than before, and her eyes had a fixed, lustreless stare. When Werner approached, she again retreated a little; her eyes were no longer full of angry hate, but rested upon him with an expression of reproachful anguish, as she murmured in an undertone,—

"You see how deeply you have humiliated me." Then she turned away and hurried quickly through the crowd into one of the other rooms.

The music, which at this moment gave the signal for the beginning of a dance, caused a universal movement among the company. There was an instant separation between the younger and older portion of the guests, and while the former prepared for the dance, the latter tried to secure good seats. The mothers of the young ladies whirling over the floor preferred the ball-room, while the others talked together in groups in the adjoining apartments, or withdrew to the card-room. Dancing at this moment was a torture to both Werner and Sidonie, but lest they might attract attention, they patiently endured it.

When Sidonie took her place with Elmar, she exclaimed in an agitated tone: "Don't speak to me about that man's conduct; I will not endure it. Talk of indifferent matters, and help me to get through this torturing evening."

Elmar's only reply was a silent pressure of the hand, and he then made every exertion to entertain his partner, though he still continued to watch Erica, who, radiant with pleasure, stood a little distance from him.

She jested and laughed with her partner, and as she whirled swiftly through the dance, her light, graceful movements seemed to Elmar so precisely in accordance with the laws of beauty, that he secretly declared the children of the Waldbad fishermen to be the best dancing teachers in the world.

When the set was over he approached her, and was received with a half pout because he had not taken any notice of her before. She wore the chain and locket

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the princess had given her, and when she saw Elmar's eyes rest upon them, said eagerly, —

"Grandmamma particularly requested me to wear this unlucky chain to-night; I detest it, for I am sure it will bring me some misfortune."

"Still superstitious, Erica?" replied Elmar, smiling, but he could not help the slight shudder that ran through his frame at her words. "Look, there comes a friend from Dorneck," he continued, glancing at Werner; "do you recognize him?"

Erica frankly held out her hand, saying gaily, "I am very glad to see the unknown Count Meerburg transformed into Herr Werner, for, to tell the truth, new acquaintances make me feel a little shy."

Werner said a few polite words in reply, and then asked whether she had a dance for him.

"They are all engaged," said Erica, glancing over her card, "there is no way except to make a little mistake. Let us see whom we will choose for the victim;" and she again took the tablet, and carefully read the names.

"Really, Erica, you astonish me," exclaimed Elmar. "This young lady is at her first ball, and yet she talks about making a mistake with as much coolness as a trained belle. Who in Heaven's name can have told you of these wiles so soon? for mere instinct, even with women, does not go so far."

"Why, Olga told me. Olga makes mistakes at almost every ball; how else can one get rid of tiresome partners?"

"I bow reverently to the quickness with which young ladies receive a new idea," said Elmar, laughing. "I had been to at least ten balls, before I emancipated myself, even in a small degree, from the rule of the floor-managers, and ventured to ask the ladies I liked best. Did you fare any better, Werner?"

"I scarcely think so," replied the latter absently, while his eyes rested upon Sidonie, who was standing in the centre of a numerous group. The diamond circlet around her neck, and the jewels in her hair flashed in a thousand changeful hues, but the glittering rays seemed the only living thing about her, so cold and statuesque was her countenance.

Erica had just time to give Werner a dance, before she was claimed for the waltz that was now beginning. Elmar's eyes followed her retreating figure with the same interest that had just sparkled in his companion's, and turning to him whispered, —

"Don't she really look like a little fairy in her white, airy dress, that seems to float around her like a cloud, and the gay wreath of flowers in her hair?"

"She is certainly a charming girl," Werner acquiesced, although he did not bestow a single glance upon the lovely vision. "I have a favor to ask you, Elmar," he continued the next instant, in a very different tone. "Induce Sidonie, for the sake of silencing people's tongues, to dance at least once with me. She would rebuff me like an intrusive schoolboy, if I ventured to approach her with even this modest request, without your mediation."

"Unfortunately you over-value my influence this time, Werner; she has expressly forbidden me to speak of you. However, when this dance is over, we will try what out united diplomacy can accomplish."

The expression of Sidonie's features when she saw the two young men approach, indicated no great complaisance, and she at last turned so decidedly and almost rudely in the opposite direction, that an angry flush crimsoned Werner's face. But instead of relinquishing his intention, this uncourteous rebuff only induced him to persist in it, and he hastily went up to her and made his request.

She did not answer him, but turned to Elmar, saying reproachfully, "Your inattention to my request wounds me, Elmar."

"I have not transgressed your commands, my queen, for you did not forbid me to associate with Werner. True, I must now, for your own sake, support his petition, for consider that you will become the theme of universal gossip, if you show your aversion so openly before the world."

Her black eyes flashed for a moment, as if with surprise, but the next instant resumed their former expression, as she replied, "Unfortunately Count Meerburg has already given so much cause for gossip by his strange masquerade, that I am spared all necessity for any constraint on this occasion; a little more or less is of no consequence."

She had not vouchsafed Werner a word or glance, but addressed herself entirely to Elmar, and the flush which had already crimsoned the former's cheek, grew darker and more threatening. When she paused, he bowed formally, and said in the same manner: "Pardon me, countess, for having wished to impose upon you the constraint of a regard for others, which you are not accustomed to recognize. I have entreated, most earnestly entreated you to listen to my defence, that you might

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

be able to form an impartial judgment of my conduct. As, however, you refuse me this favor, as well as every other, it would be unworthy of me to continue longer the rôle I have just played." He made another distant, formal bow, and turned away.

Her eyes followed him with an expression of perplexity, in which perhaps a little remorse mingled, then she turned to Elmar, and asked abruptly, "How did it happen that Katharina did not know him?"

"She was in Russia when he lived on his estates in our neighborhood. We then travelled with Ottomar over nearly the whole of Europe, and parted when Werner went to Algiers and Egypt."

"Why did he never come to Dorneck before?"

"You had not grown up then, and, to tell the truth, Sidonie, I don't think you made a very favorable impression on him as a child."

"Nor he on me," replied Sidonie, in the same abrupt manner, and with these words closed the conversation. Immediately after Elmar became the witness of a scene, which affected him even more unpleasantly than the one he had just experienced. In spite of the late hour, Katharina had permitted little Carlos to remain in the rooms, to be admired by the company. Surrounded and petted by all, he at first behaved very well, but soon grew sleepy and cross, and Katharina wanted to get him away. She therefore asked Erica to take the child to his room and put him to bed.

"I am sorry," replied Erica in surprise, "but I am engaged for every dance, and cannot disappoint my partners."

The princess's restless eyes darted an angry glance at the speaker. "I have always heard that duty takes the lead of pleasure," she said hastily.

"How fortunate it is then that this duty is not incumbent upon me, as I am very much heated, and could not go through the corridors now!"

Katharina's hands pulled the lace on her handkerchief so violently that the delicate fabric tore, and she answered, with scarcely bridled passion: "Fraülein, I desire you to obey my wish."

Erica gazed in alarm at the speaker, whose beautiful face was distorted by anger, but instantly regained her composure and answered quietly: "I am sorry I cannot gratify your wish; but I will find Carlos's nurse, I saw her in the next room just now."

"You will not go, Erica?" cried Katharina, with the same unbridled violence. "Carlos refuses to go with his nurse, and I hope your presumption will not extend so far as to expect me to take the boy myself."

An expression of mingled defiance and contempt hovered around Erica's lips, as she replied, "The boy is naughty because no one understands how to manage him. Come, Carlos, we will go and look for Blanche together," she continued, turning to the child, and without taking any farther notice of Katharina, went with the boy into the next room.

"You see now for yourself, Erica, that I was perfectly right in warning you not to become Katharina's companion," said Elmar, when he at last secured a dance with Erica.

Her lip curled with the same expression of mingled defiance and contempt, as she replied: "The princess would never succeed in making a Fräulein Molly of me."

"Ah! my obstinate little girl, how soon that defiance would be crushed and transformed into angry bitterness, or perhaps despondency, if you were exposed to entire dependence upon Katharina. With grandmamma's protection for a support, and my — let us call it friendship — as a safeguard, such storms can easily be resisted."

"You may be right," replied Erica laughing, "for I was on the point of rushing to grandmamma for protection. By the way, she intended to leave the ball early, and I am surprised to see her still here."

"She has only been waiting for the end of this dance, that I might not be deprived of the pleasure of having one waltz with you, for she is in the habit of being escorted by me."

In fact, as soon as the dance was over, the old lady took her grandson's arm and left the room. When they entered the corridor, she turned eagerly to him, saying: "Can you explain this strange affair of Sidonie's, Elmar? How could Werner be so wanting in tact as to assume such a disguise?"

"That is rather difficult to explain, grandmamma, but, at all events, he at first had no idea of seeking Sidonie's love as a stranger. He probably wanted to see her without constraint, and possibly to arouse her anger, in order to make her refuse him, for he used to speak of this compulsory marriage with a sort of horror. If, however, the motive of his course of action was to obtain this refusal, the point of the sword has been turned against himself, for he passionately loves Sidonie."

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

"But, if I understood Katharina correctly, he really tried to win Sidonie's love while occupying the position of Count Rodenwald's secretary."

"No other course was left him, as his game was lost under any circumstances. By the very efforts to inspire her with a love deep enough to conquer her pride, he has suffered total shipwreck."

"What madcaps young people are!" said the old lady, shaking her head. "When the path is made smooth for them they invent obstacles themselves. Now here are two people destined for one another from their very cradles, who, as you say, love each other passionately, and yet do nothing but make themselves trouble and sorrow. Besides, Elmar, I am not at all pleased with you for keeping this matter a secret from me."

"My own affairs are all known to you, grandmamma, but I must not reveal those of others. But to return to myself, let me ask you how my little heather-blossom pleased you to-night. You must confess she is charming."

"She reminded me of a bird or a butterfly as she floated over the ball-room floor. There can be no greater contrast than that afforded by the beautiful, cold statue, Sidonie, and Erica's graceful, pliant figure, with its quick, elastic movements; there is so little comparison between them, that they serve as a foil to each other."

"I confess that I have been tortured by jealousy this evening, not of possible admirers, but this unconstrained delight in the ball, her unfeigned enjoyment of dancing. It has made me doubtful again, for would Erica feel this pleasure so keenly, if her affection for me were as strong as I hoped?"

"You can thank Katharina, my dear Elmar, for preventing you from yielding entirely to the impulse of your love. It is always dangerous to place so young a girl in the important position of a wife, before she has enjoyed the amusements and pleasures which are, in a certain sense, the right of youth. If there is no other result, she will feel a slight regret at the thought of these lost joys, and often, under any circumstances, strive to obtain them, and thus neglect her duties. I think this one thing is the source of many unhappy marriages.'

"You frighten me, grandmamma. So I must often undergo the torture of such a ball, that Erica may be partially satisfied with dancing, before she becomes my wife."

"Certainly, my dear Elmar," said the old lady, smiling, "but, nevertheless, I acknowledge that I heartily wish I could put your little fairy in your arms at once, for I dread the scenes we must first encounter."

"In spite of your warning, grandmamma, no one desires it more ardently than I. If that confounded document were only found, I should be very indifferent to all the scenes Katharina might choose to make."

"Do you know that Erica has asked her friend, the young pastor, to help look for the document?"

"How did she see the pastor? Has he been bold enough to visit her here? Besides, I don't want any intimacy with the young man; he is disagreeable to me."

"Are you a little jealous of him, as well as the pleasures of the ball? I think there is equal danger of both. But you must not refuse his help, for he is said to have a passion for old papers, and his interest may succeed where your indifference fails."

"Perhaps so, I will reflect upon the matter. But I must leave you now, I cannot remain absent any longer."

"You are eager to return to the torture of the ball, as I see, Elmar; so good-night, and thanks for your escort."

When Elmar went back to the ball-room, he was surprised to find Werner talking gaily to the young ladies. "Are you trying what jealousy will do, Werner?" he whispered.

"I am trying to forget, Elmar. I have given up all other efforts."

Very soon after Elmar approached Sidonie, and began to talk to her. She answered in a weary, absent manner, and her eyes constantly wandered towards the spot where Werner was standing. "The ancient lever, which tangles and unfastens the gordian knot of life, always retains its power," thought Elmar, "and yet we blame poets for always returning to the old theme, as if human hearts changed like the fashions of former times."

The ball lasted until nearly dawn. Katharina considered the length of an entertainment the standard of the pleasure enjoyed, and would not have permitted the guests to depart earlier. Even Erica at last grew weary, and longed for the end. Werner had not approached Sidonie again, or paid the slightest attention to her; and when the young ladies now donned their wraps, and drew their hoods over their heads to protect themselves from the cold air of the corridors, he eagerly proffered his services to assist

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

them, without noticing that she stood close beside him.

Sidonie wrapped her white cloak closely around her, and, without waiting for Elmar or Erica, walked slowly towards her room. The lamps in the corridors burned dimly, and many of the turnings were left almost in darkness. Perhaps this gloom induced the young girl to drop the mask she had worn with so much effort. The anguish that wrung her heart could scarcely be endured longer without some external relief, and, utterly exhausted, she leaned against the balustrade of one of the flights of stairs. The cold, calm features betrayed the most violent suffering, and a low moan escaped her lips. She stood a long time in this drooping, despairing attitude, for she had no occasion to fear any observer, as none of the guests occupied this portion of the castle. And yet, close beside her, there was a spectator whose steps had been inaudible on the soft carpet, and who remained as motionless as herself.

Werner, who, instead of occupying the rooms prepared for him, had accepted an invitation to share Elmar's, was obliged to take the same direction as Sidonie, and when he saw the drooping figure, which he instantly recognized by the white cloak and blue silk dress, paused and also stood still. For some time he hesitated whether to advance or retire, and at last determined to adopt the former course, as he thought her seriously ill. When, however, he saw the compressed lips and eyes dim with tears, he knew that no bodily suffering had caused this prostration, and hastily tried to withdraw. But it was too late, she had already seen him, and slowly drawing herself up to her full height, cast a cold, repellant glance through her tears. Perhaps at this moment she really felt an emotion of actual hatred towards the most dreaded witness of a weakness she would fain have concealed even from herself.

Werner probably suspected her feelings, but maintained his composure, and approaching her, said in the formal tone in which he had last spoken, —

"You are ill, countess, and must therefore except my arm to your room. The heat in the ball-room was actually suffocating, and even my strong nerves could scarcely endure it."

Sidonie made no reply, but drew back, as if to intimate her wish that he would retire. But as Werner still stood quietly in the same place, she forced herself to say curtly, —

"Thanks, I need no help."

"This is mere wilfulness, countess," was the somewhat unexpected reply, "and I must not submit to it."

He then unceremoniously drew her hand into his arm, adding, half bitterly, "Do not fear that I shall interpret this necessary concession in my favor, you have shown me your feelings too openly for that."

Sidonie longed to release her hand, but felt that, under the circumstances, this could only be accomplished by a very unseemly scene, and therefore, without uttering a single word, mechanically allowed Werner to lead her forward. Her companion seemed equally disinclined to have any further conversation, and they parted silently and coldly at the door of Sidonie's room.

Another couple, who came down the corridor a short time after, talked far more eagerly. Erica had given Elmar the bouquet and the various favors received in the German to carry, and was telling him all the little adventures of the evening like a merry child. Elmar saw, with great satisfaction, that this time he had really no occasion to be jealous of anything but the pleasures of the ball, and that the various young men she had met were only judged and valued according to their skill in dancing.

Neither did they part silently and coldly like the first couple, but remained standing at Erica's door for some time, that she might finish her story. When she gave Elmar her hand in farewell, and he was about to raise it to his lips, the white kid gloves seemed no fitting object for a kiss, and he therefore pressed his lips to the white arm above it. Erica blushed, instantly withdrew her hand, and disappeared so hurriedly that there was a certain uneasy haste in the leave-taking, which had not existed during the interview.

XXXV.

WERNER.

Only a small portion of the guests had driven home after the ball; by far the majority accepted the princess's hospitality for the night, and some even extended their visit some time longer. Werner also spent the following day at Altenborn, and after the two young men had taken a late breakfast, Elmar ordered horses to be saddled, that his guest and himself might take advantage of the beautiful autumn day to enjoy a ride.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY · Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Erica was looking out of the baroness's winter garden, whose windows were opened to give the flowers fresh air, eagerly watching the horses led up and down before the castle by the grooms. Elmar's rooms were directly under his grandmother's, and as she knew that no one lodged in this wing except Werner, the horses must be intended for them.

"I believe Elmar is going out to ride with Count Meerburg," she said to Sidonie, who was sitting in one of the iron chairs in the conservatory, idly pulling to pieces a flower she held in her hand. "I think that horse is Salvator, which threw his groom a little while ago, a pleasant custom in which he often indulges. I mean, of course, Salvator, for the groom — oh, yes, Elmar and Werner. Elmar is so absorbed in patting and caressing his unruly Salvator, that he has not even time to look up."

Half unconsciously, Sidonie rose and slowly approached the window. The gentlemen had just swung themselves into their saddles, and were in the act of riding down the avenue, when Elmar looked up and spoke to Werner. Erica had eagerly leaned forward, and as she now saw herself caught by the latter, hastily drew back, while Sidonie, deeply as she undoubtedly regretted her act, was too proud to move, and therefore quietly stood still, and returned the gentlemen's bow with cold politeness. She even remained a long time at the window, and saw the riders again appear at a turn in the road, before they finally vanished.

"Have you arranged any plan about the course you intend to adopt towards Sidonie, Werner?" asked Elmar, who had told his groom to remain behind, that they might converse without fear of being overheard.

"I told you yesterday, Elmar, that I shall try to forget her."

"You cannot be serious; that would only be the last desperate resource, when everything else was exhausted."

"Everything is exhausted, Elmar. Do you suppose that, during the long time I have watched her, I have not sufficiently fathomed her character to know that there is no hope for me at present? I say at present, and leave the future an open question — it is the straw to which, like a drowning man, I cling."

"And what is to speak in your favor in future, that might not do so equally well now?"

Werner smiled. "Time alone can perhaps purify me from the obscurity of the secretary, which at this moment still rests too gloomily upon me. I ought really to say book-keeper, for secretary — since as we know there are very distinguished secretaries — has quite too aristocratic a sound. But the title of book-keeper, Count Rodenwald's book-keeper, has such a prosaic, plebeian twang, that it would transform even an Apollo into an ordinary mortal, and that was the very reason I chose it, and hired myself — I believe that is the proper word — to the count in that capacity."

"So you really wished to make an open breach? But how did you avoid the rocks of payment? You could not possibly accept a salary from the count."

"Say wages, my dear Elmar, it will describe the situation more appropriately. Besides, why should I not accept payment for the services rendered him? Fortunately, however, the count did not cause me any embarrassment on that score. I paid the wages of all his employees, and if I did not provide for myself, it was my own affair, to which the count never gave a thought. The first part of your question I cannot answer so explicitly, for though it was my earnest wish that Sidonie should refuse me, I was not quite clear in my own mind whether to endeavor to produce this result. At all events, under any circumstances, I first wished to make her acquaintance, and discover what guarantee her character afforded for my future happiness, before I allowed myself to be bound to her for life. We always show our real natures most freely to those who are our inferiors in rank, because we do not think it worth while to secure their good opinion, and therefore our servants know us most thoroughly, and — however our pride may rebel against it — are the real reporters of our characters. That they often draw false conclusions and make wrong estimates, arises from their limited powers of thought, not their opportunities of observation, and I should perhaps have been a footman or gamekeeper at Dorneck, if the cleaning the knives and forks, and the thought of the spots of oil I have always found in servants' rooms, had not deterred me.

"True, as book-keeper, I should have very little opportunity to see Sidonie myself, but I had all the better chance to make use of the servants' remarks for my own purpose, and out of the various shreds and patches could thus construct a perfect whole. Ottomar, however, whom I could not prevail upon to deny me, as Peter did his master, obtained for me an undesired

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

position in the household, but as I could not assume the manner of an humble inferior, I at last let affairs take their course, and the more willingly, as I was thus oftener thrown into the society of Sidonie, whose beauty had allured at the first glance. I did not dream that my heart would so soon confirm the verdict of my eyes, and when I became aware of it, it was too late to draw back."

Werner paused, and the young men rode on side by side in silence for some time, ere he continued: "One afternoon at Dorneck one of those impromptu parties took place, which are so pleasant because no one anticipates any unusual enjoyment, such as is promised by an invitation, and therefore each seeks entertainment on his own account. Sidonie looked wonderfully beautiful that day, her airy, light summer dress seemed as if it had been woven by fairy fingers, transparent lace revealed her snowy arms and neck, and the dark red pomegranate blossoms she had placed in her hair and at her throat increased the charm of her appearance.

"I was forced to turn my eyes resolutely away, to exert the strongest control over myself, that I might not betray my feelings to all. It sometimes seemed as if her eyes also wandered towards me, and at last I fancied I perceived that the careless neglect shown by some of the guests to the insignificant secretary was painful to her sensitive feelings — I must here observe that I had speedily metamorphosed myself into the aristocratic secretary, nay, I would have gladly been transformed into an attaché, had this been possible. She has the true pride of race, which never humiliates an inferior, and she therefore coolly dismissed some of the young men, whose conversation probably wearied her, and turned towards me with a winning smile as I stood near.

"As I saw her for the first time so close beside me, admiration of her beauty so completely overpowered and intoxicated me that I could scarcely control my emotion. The music of her voice entered my ear and heart, but I was so bewildered that I could not understand the meaning of her words. As if to solve the enigma, I gazed into the dark eyes that rested so graciously upon me, but this only destroyed my composure still more, and ere I regained it, I had already betrayed myself. The passionate ardor with which I gazed into her deep, fathomless eyes was but too faithful an interpreter of my feelings, and as if the flame were contagious, it awoke a responsive glance, which made me gasp for breath.

"The moment of happiness was only too short, for the next instant an expression of terror, paralyzing horror, came into those eyes, a sudden flush crimsoned her neck and face to the very brow, and without addressing another word to me, she turned and walked quickly away. It is the first and has remained the last proof of love — if I may be permitted to use the word — I have ever received from Sidonie. From that hour her regard has shown itself only by avoidance.

"When I now reflect upon the past in cold blood, I am forced to confess that my stay at Dorneck, my — yes it must be said — my effort to win her love, so far as it was possible in my subordinate position, was very indecorous, extremely wanting in tact, nay, even insulting to her. On the evening which made me so happy, I had no room for any other thought than the ardent longing to see her again, the blissful certainty of being able to revel in the sight of her beauty on the morrow.

"This meeting, however, produced a complete change in our relations, which, spite of the pain it caused, had an indefinable charm, for her chilling reserve showed me how dangerously near I had approached. Sidonie has certainly never treated any one with more repellant hauteur than me; she rejected every advance on my part with a want of consideration which amounts to actual rudeness. I had been once more degraded in her eyes to the book-keeper, who is but one grade above a lackey, and she had spoken of Ottomar's friendship for me as a most incomprehensible and indecorous weakness. But when necessity compelled her to accept my aid in entering the carriage or boat, her hand trembled in mine, and she felt my gaze even through her drooping eyelids, for the treacherous blood revealed an emotion, which her marble-like features sternly denied.

"There was an inexpressible charm in watching this secret conflict, a charm so unspeakably sweet and intoxicating that I could not escape its spell, though I soon told myself that I might thus destroy the very happiness for which I longed. Besides, the easy argument that the sin, once committed, could never be atoned for, was perhaps not so far wrong, and moreover, the effort to increase this sternly repressed love to a degree which would compel its acknowledgment, seemed to me the only means of deliverance.

"Was there not a greatness, which I

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

might well expect to find in Sidonie's character, in the thought of sacrificing all to the beloved object; of bartering all the advantages the world so highly values in exchange for love? Had not princesses descended from their thrones, and laid their crowns at their lovers' feet? And if the attempt to obtain such a sacrifice in this case, seemed like presumption, let it be said, in my defence, that I first made the attempt when I was madly in love myself, and saw in it my only hope of salvation.

"But there was an error in my calculations that I had not noticed, which, when I discovered it, filled me with horror at the thought of the sacrilege I was in the act of committing. I had based my hopes upon the expectation that love would conquer pride, and reject all worldly advantages, but I had overlooked the fact, that, with the consciousness of rank, the thought of the sacred duty this rank imposes is inculcated and fostered.

"The standard-bearer, who, bleeding from countless wounds, still defies all bullets, and uplifts his banner before the enemy, does not struggle more chivalrously than this girl battled against a love, to which she might not yield without being, as she believed, utterly dishonored. And I had cruelly renewed this conflict, added fresh wounds to the old ones; and when I discovered my crime, I felt as if I had rent the flag from that standard-bearer, who strives, even in his death-agony, to protect his country's banner, and, scornfully waving it before the eyes of the dying man, exulted in his defeat and my victory.

"Never shall I forget the look of unspeakable sorrow with which she gazed at me when I interrupted her solitude that afternoon. There was so much sorrowful accusation, such unspoken suffering, such mortal anguish in the glance, that I was petrified, horror-stricken at my crime, which seemed like the profanation of a sanctuary. From that moment, I knew that I could not conquer, and if Sidonie really threw herself into my arms, the arms of the base-born secretary, she would no longer be Sidonie, and I should have slain her better self. From this moment I knew that I had lost my game, whose stake had been the happiness of my life, lost it in every respect." Werner paused, and the two friends rode on in silence. At last Elmar said, —

"And you suppose that time may heal the breach which now seems so hopeless?"

"I hope so, Elmar, because it is the last anchor to which I can cling," said Werner sadly. He passed his hand over his eyes, and then continued: "Time, which leads to calm reflection, will enable Sidonie to perceive what portion of my conduct was premeditated, and what part the result of a perhaps weak submission to chance. Reflection will undoubtedly bring her to the same conviction which you have received from my story, and this must plead with her in my favor. Now her pride rebels not only against the insult offered to her, but also the opinion of the world, which would see, in her marriage with Count Meerburg, only the conclusion of her flirtation with her uncle's secretary. The interference of that beautiful fiend, Katharina, has deprived me of all hope of bridging the gulf. If, however, we are parted for years, I can perhaps begin my suit afresh. No one will then imagine that the secretary Werner won the heart of the aristocratic countess for Count Meerburg, and ——"

"You speak of years, Werner. Would it require so long an interval?"

"I fear it will be absolutely necessary, and I should like to take advantage of it to win laurels and lay them at Sidonie's feet, to show how greatly I honor her, whom I apparently wished to humiliate. But I should also strive for these laurels for my own sake, to give purpose to a life that now seems very cheerless and dreary. With us Germans, there is, unfortunately, little prospect of such an opportunity, and I shall rob myself even of the chance of Parliamentary honors, as I am inclined to reside upon my estates in Prussia. Since I have travelled through Europe and entered Asia and Africa, the narrow world of my home oppresses me, and I long, like a caged bird, for freedom."

"And so you will go to Prussia, which serves other kingdoms as a bugbear by which to frighten and quiet unruly children?"

"It is sad enough that a pretended bugbear must be put forward to conceal real weakness. As the invention of gunpowder destroyed the age of chivalry, so telegraphs and railways inexorably undermine the existence of small countries. Our eyes and brains enlarge with the rapid transit over great distances. We obtain another standard, not only for these distances, but other relations. As adults look with a pitying smile at objects which to children seem grand and magnificent, we gaze at the views of a past, where each man was bound to his own clod of earth, and considered the little world around him

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the whole universe. We can imagine the patriarchal existence of this little world very comfortable, but we no longer revere it, and therefore it does not appear desirable to us.

"Pourquoi exister, old Metternich is said to have answered a diplomat, who eagerly assured him that his native land could have no political existence without the help demanded. In fact, a country which does not understand how to defend itself has no right to exist, for it is destitute of the conditions which are the fundamental idea of every government. The safety of the individual under the care of the whole community, is the first requisite of every civil government, and if this was possible in the past by means of alliances, the condition of affairs has changed in the present, and in future will become impossible.

"The league between the various countries of Germany might have harmonized the past and present, and thus fulfilled one of the most beautiful and noble of missions. But, instead of forming a strong body, with a head to guide the different members, it became a sort of hydra, only unfortunately its numerous heads were too weak to intimidate foreign enemies, and just powerful enough to hold each other in check. If the emperor, instead of being elected, had, as was natural, inherited his power, these very dissimilarities between the different portions of Germany would have fostered the most perfect development, and what is now our weakness, would, with the head that ruled over all, have become our strength.

"The almost absurd incongruity which our league presents, has, in addition to its moral disadvantages, the political one of fostering the importance of the smaller countries, so that it will cost a violent struggle to break these chains. Young enthusiasts, moreover, talk of a German republic, as if we republicans in mind did not require a strict form of government to save us, in case of any too great temptation, from falling asunder in a shapeless mass."

"There are not only young, but old enthusiasts who cherish the same dreams."

"I know no old enthusiasts, Elmar. I call such people fools or blockheads. Your Prussian sedateness, unattractive as it is, still forms the necessary basis for the new State edifice, for it alone can bridle the exuberant German romance, which it would be suicidal madness to take for a foundation, while it uses it as an ornament, the decoration required by every building. Our haughty aristocracy look down with great contempt on the poor Prussian nobles, who lived in straw-roofed huts and wore home-made linen, while their ancestors ruled in their castle as sovereign lords. But they forget that, during the last century, these poor Prussian nobles have begun to write their names on the pages of history, while our South German aristocracy are consuming much of the capital their forefathers bequeathed.

"I myself look proudly back on a long line of noble ancestors, but I believe that a race, whose descendants for centuries add no new lustre to the old laurels gained by the forefathers, must descend from their high position. Even the halo of noble deeds may be destroyed by the rust of time, and fall from the brow of its owner. The descendants of Norwegian and Irish kings are said to be shepherds and peasants, and we feel no injustice on the part of fate, but recognize, with a faint shudder, the eternal law of nature.

"The vital energy which gives promise of a glorious future, pulses in the veins of the Prussian nobility alone. That strange blending of aristocracy and democracy, which reaches its climax in the army, shows, in spite of all temporary discord, a harmony which we must admire.

"We reproach Prussia for having a despotic king, but a country so democratic in its elements can endure despotism better than any other. Besides, the Prussian throne is occupied by the Hohenzollerns, who not only desire to be gracious rulers, but pride themselves on being also the first servants of the State. Our princes, like our nobles, cannot forget their longer line of ancestors, but they do forget that the eagle of the Hohenzollerns is soaring upward with a powerful flight, while their own races have passed the zenith of their renown, and are therefore moving downward.

"What a throng of heroic forms appear before us in the house of Hohenzollern within the last few centuries! and — rare good fortune — even the women of the family stand forth as meet consorts for these sovereigns. These lofty and noble dames twine around the long succession of the noble names of this race, like a gleaming necklace of pearls. They are authoresses, even philosophers, and yet remain true women, and, with rare exceptions, the royal families have the happiest home life. While, at nearly every court, the predominant feature is lavish expen-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

diture and thirst for pleasure, and the imitation of French fashions and frivolity rises to such a height that it becomes a repulsive caricature, the court of the Hohenzollerns is almost the only one at which a wise economy rules, and German customs and German virtue find an asylum."

"I rejoice to hear such opinions, Werner. This is the result of your travels, which have enlarged your views and removed your prejudices. As for the economy of our royal family, I read a striking proof of it a short time ago. A chronicle of the court of the elector of Brandenburg, states that on the evening before the wedding of one of the princesses, the dinner consisted of goose giblets and apple sauce, from which it may be concluded, with tolerable certainty, that a roast goose adorned the wedding feast."

"Consult the histories of other countries at the same period, Elmar, and they will tell you of hundreds, nay, thousands of roes, stags, calves, etc., which would have been served on such an occasion, and therefore we cannot deny these goose-giblets a certain historical importance."

"So you really intend to place yourself under the sceptre of the Hohenzollerns, my dear Werner. But did not the vicinity of Dorneck have some influence upon your resolution to reside upon your estates in that country?"

"You are mistaken, Elmar. I shall not see Sidonie again for a long time. I am entirely mistaken in her if she does not soon inform her guardian that she positively refuses to marry me. Yet, in spite of this, as I said before, I should not entirely resign all hope of winning her, if the existence of an unlucky document — which had far better have remained buried in eternal forgetfulness — does not, against my expectation, come to her knowledge. This would be the death-blow to all my hopes, for she would perceive that a marriage with me might secure her such great advantages that it would be impossible for her pride to permit her, under these circumstances, to say yes, where she had previously uttered such a positive no."

"So you hope for the disappearance of a paper, as I stake all my happiness on finding one. But our road is already leading us to the castle, and I see a crowd of Katharina's guests walking in the park. We must dine with her, it is only civil on your part, so I will tell grandmamma we will come back to tea."

"Certainly, Elmar, though I shall thus compel Sidonie to pass a constrained, or perhaps solitary evening; but the hope of speedy emancipation will enable her to endure it."

When the two young men dismounted, they vainly gazed up to the second-story windows; neither Sidonie nor Erica appeared, and only little Carlos, who was playing in the conservatory, nodded a greeting.

Werner had really feared that Sidonie would avoid spending the evening with him, by pleading indisposition, and was therefore pleasantly surprised when he found her sitting with Erica beside the fire. She cordially extended her hand to Elmar, while she answered Werner's greeting only by a slight bend of the head. The dim light cast by the shaded lamps prevented him from seeing her very distinctly, especially as she avoided the glow of the fire and drew back into the gloom.

The old lady was very cordial to her guests, and soon turned the conversation upon Werner's travels. He told his adventures readily and well, and thus the evening passed swiftly and pleasantly for all, even Sidonie, though she scarcely uttered a syllable, and the little party did not separate until the baroness had several times given the signal for retiring.

Werner, who was going away the next morning, took his leave when he said good-night. His farewell to Sidonie was only a slight bow, which she answered by another bend of the head, while he held out his hand to Erica. When the door closed behind his retreating figure, an involuntary sigh escaped Sidonie's lips; she thought she had seen him for the last time.

From Macmillan's Magazine.

"IL RE GALANTUOMO."

THE combination of mortal diseases by which King Victor Emanuel was struck down in the fifty-seventh year of his age, and twenty-seventh of his reign, found perhaps no man in his dominions more prepared for the event than himself. I do not mean, in making this statement, to refer merely to the fact that for a short time before his decease the king had not been in the enjoyment of his usual health. I allude rather to a much more singular occurrence, — that for at least the full term of a year he had been in the habit of broaching in his intercourse with those most nearly attached to his person, a topic which they certainly would never have dared to introduce, and of expressing his belief that the part which he was best

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

qualified to perform in the great national drama, had been almost achieved; that it would perhaps be well if other actors appeared upon the stage, and that if it pleased Providence to remove him, his sole feeling would be that of gratitude for having been permitted to do so much. He held this language at a time when his robust frame and iron constitution seemed as able to defy or overcome the most serious attacks of illness as in his two previous illnesses, separated by intervals of about ten years, and no sinister indication of any kind gave warning to his family, his statesmen, and his people, of the evil which would so soon befall them.

What King Victor Emanuel himself felt and expressed will be not indeed the first or second thought of those whom the intelligence of his sudden death has shocked, and almost stunned. Their first thoughts will be those of deep sympathy with his children and his people, of apprehension as to the effects which his death may produce on the fortunes of the new European State which he chiefly contributed to found, of anxiety as to the fitness of his successor to continue in the same spirit his father's work, of doubt whether the complications of the papal and Eastern questions may not be increased by the substitution of a new personal element, with a character as yet unknown, for another with which European statesmanship has been long familiar. Such, I repeat, must be naturally and necessarily the first thoughts of all on learning the sad news. But to those whose inclination and duties have led them to devote a more special and unbroken attention to the story of King Victor Emanuel's career from the day when he received the crown from his father, Charles Albert, after the rout of Novara, to the day when he breathed his last on his little iron camp-bed in the ground-floor of the Quirinal Palace, to those who during that period of almost twenty-nine years have most closely studied his character, and followed his career, his reign presents itself as a marvellously harmonious and completed epic. And the key to the whole poem is to be found in the title which the instinctive discernment and love of his people so early gave him, "Il Rè Galantuomo," "King Honestman." Honesty of purpose: that was what Italy most wanted in the young sovereign who received from his father's hand a sceptre under circumstances which would have made the stoutest heart to quail. The little kingdom of Sardinia had been wont to look on the army as its backbone. At Novara it found itself betrayed by a general, and its different divisions more intent on firing upon each other than upon the enemy; Sardinians firing during the engagement upon Genoese, and then sacking the shops of Novara as a worthy pendant to the last feat, and the old troops of Savoy deliberately turning their backs on their comrades, and marching off the field. This frightful disorganization of an army was only the too faithful reflection of the discord and dissension between the various political parties in the State: Piedmontese cursing Lombards, and declaring that the royalists of Piedmont had been sacrificed to the republicans of Milan, the population of Genoa denouncing that of Turin, rising in open revolt, and only reduced to silence by the stern action of an armed force; the cannons of the Austrian conqueror frowning from the bastions of Alexandria, whilst in every town and village throughout the country reactionary priests, doing the work of Rome, were pointing the moral that all these national calamities were but the just penalty paid by a people for disobeying the Roman pontiff. Such was the kingdom of Sardinia in the first months of the new king's reign. He summoned a parliament to help him in his fearful task. The members of his first parliament only brought to, and reproduced in, the chambers of Turin, the political and moral anarchy of which the whole country was the scene. The king made a second appeal to his people, spoke to them in the famous proclamation of Moncalieri, in terms of reproach, of exhortation, of warning, such as has seldom fallen to the lot of a constitutional king to use: "I have done my duty; why have you not done yours?" To the honor of the Sardinian people, be it said, the strong, outspoken appeal went straight to, and sank deeply in, their hearts.

King Victor Emanuel's second parliament furnished him at length with the fitting instruments by which the work of constitutional government was to be carried on, and since the meeting of that second parliament, the like instruments have never yet been wanting, and the regular functions of constitutional government have not been even for a single day interrupted or delayed.

It would be impossible to overrate the services rendered by King Victor Emanuel during the long struggle for constitutional freedom and national independence, and when we now look back upon all that he was and did, it is difficult to repress the

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

feeling that much even of what was deemed his personal eccentricity, contributed to the result. Forty years ago Vinet wrote some admirable papers to prove that marked individuality of character was the thing most wanted in the nineteenth century. Mr. John Stuart Mill has written a good deal to the same effect, and the readers of Lord Macaulay's "Life" will doubtless recollect the criticism to which these opinions of Mr. Mill gave rise.

If a strongly marked individuality, if a total absence of conventionalism, are things as greatly to be desired in domestic and social life as freedom, unity, and independence are in the life of states, it would be difficult to deny that the life of King Victor Emanuel must often have proved quite as suggestive to his subjects in its private as in its public phases. The two sides were in truth closely connected. He inherited from the example given, and the sacrifices made by, his father, the task of freeing his country from every foreign yoke. He equally derived, from the whole experience of his youth and early manhood, the conviction that by nothing in the performance of his task could he be so fettered and restrained as by the vast and strong network of court usages and court etiquette, with all the crouching and fawning creatures of sycophancy and espionage, its eavesdropping chamberlains, its wily, oily chaplains, its eternal contrast to plain dealing, and truth, and nature. The resolve to free Italy from the foreigner became with him an idea so absorbing and so engrossing, that it never let him go for a single moment; and not even the hold which philanthropy had on Howard's mind, was stronger than that which patriotism had on the mind of Charles Albert's son. In an almost equal degree, and for a kindred reason, the feeling of King Victor Emanuel towards an ordinary court life was not one of mere dislike or repugnance, it was that of detestation, of aborrence.

Superficial observers, ignorant of the king's true character, were quite unable to reconcile the contradictory facts that, whilst his usual mode of life might be termed almost rough and coarse, he perfectly understood and even rigidly exacted on state occasions the most minute forms of court ceremonial. There really was no contradiction whatever. The court ceremonial relates to the royal office, and ought therefore not only to be done, but to be done with care, and neither the high dignitaries of his own state, nor the ministers of foreign states accredited to his government, ought ever to be furnished with the slightest excuse for neglecting the signs which reflected more important realities. Every Italian knew that King Victor Emanuel infinitely preferred chamois hunting on the mountains of Piedmont, or wild boar hunting amidst the juniper thickets of San Rossore, to receptions of other royal personages, whom, in many cases, he had never seen before, and would perhaps never see again. But however great the attractions of the chase, they never prevented the king from abandoning at a moment's notice his favorite sport, and hurrying to his capital to do the honors of his kingdom if so required. Next to the chase his chief delight was in farming, and those who only saw him at La Mandria, might, if familiar with the traditions of English history, have imagined that they were beholding a counterpart of George III. at Windsor. The resemblance was somewhat treacherous, for our Farmer George, in the intervals of his agricultural pursuits, saw many fair provinces torn from his empire, whilst Farmer Victor's care for his flocks and herds did not divert him from the task of building a new empire up. The real fact was that whether in contact with or at a distance from his ministers, whether farming or hunting, his mind was always occupied with the same idea. It formed not the sole, but the chief, subject of his reading, and he rarely went to bed without reading an hour or more in the royal logbook, constructed according to his own direction, and for his own special use. He had in his cabinet two secretaries, whose sole duty was to read during the day all the more striking passages in the journals of Europe that bore on the acts of his government, or on the relations between Italy and Europe. If written in French or Italian, the scissors did the necessary work, and the extracts were pasted down. If in German, English, or any other European language, of which the king was ignorant, one of the secretaries, a Venetian polyglot, rendered the foreign notice or commentary into Italian for the sovereign's use. That formed King Victor Emanuel's nightly reading.

He exacted with unsparing rigor from his secretaries that, in the performance of their task, they should always give the preference to dissentient or hostile criticism. He possessed, according to the testimony of all the statesmen who had most intercourse with him, whether Cavour or Ricasoli, La Marmora or Minghetti, great natural talent, an extraordinary power of taking in the bearings of a polit-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ical situation at a single glance, a shrewd estimate of character, and that peculiar development of memory in reference to all the persons he had ever seen or spoken to, which appears to be as inherent in royal personages as the power of a shepherd to distinguish the faces of his sheep. To these natural gifts he united, after the fashion just described, a continuous course of reading on the subject which after all it was most important for him to know. Foreign statesmen, when conversing with him for the first time, were often surprised at his knowledge of the views held by the politicians of other countries. When one knows how constant and familiar was his mental intercourse with the first publicists of the Continent, there was nothing surprising in the matter. And it may fairly be questioned whether, for the special task which he had set before him, this very peculiar discipline, these lonely readings under the Alpine tent, the Tuscan shooting-box, or the Roman villa, were not more useful and suggestive than the eternal recurrence of the same court conventionalisms from which he could scarcely have disentangled himself had he lived in the usual court fashion. His reading was not, however, confined to this daily chronicle of Italian and European politics; he delighted in books of voyages and travels, and sometimes at the close of a day's Alpine sport would get his huntsmen to sit on the grass around him, while he read aloud for their amusement something by which he had been more especially interested when reading the night before.

Even this slight insight into the private life and personal character of the king may suggest the conclusion that King Victor Emanuel's decided individuality was of a kind not inharmonious with his great patriotic task. The man — the honest man — took precedence of the king, and the title of Rè Galantuomo was but the national expression of that belief. As in the case of the founder of the Bourbon dynasty in France, his deep, broad, strong humanity was the foundation of Victor Emanuel's influence. In contrasting the character of Henry IV. with the last false and sanguinary rulers of the house of Valois, we think not so much of the valor in arms or the skill in diplomacy which the first Bourbon king displayed, as of the kindliness and geniality and generosity which endeared him to all classes of his subjects, and of the thousand traits of good humor by which, in the most common occurrences of life, the intercourse of the man with his fellow-men was marked. Doubtless the Bourbon was of a higher and a more varied intellectual type. No future Nodier or Ampère of Italian letters will ever point, in the columns of the Pasquino or the Fischietto, to such exquisite morsels of fun and satire as the editors of the "Satire Menipée" ascribed to the pen of the royal leader of the Huguenots. Yet Victor Emanuel will leave his own stamp, and it will remain as long as the name of Italy and the story of her struggles shall endure on that field of letters in which he most loved to toil. Each of his royal speeches, from 1849 to 1878, marks an epoch in the history of Italian regeneration, and in each of those speeches the most forcible and spirit-stirring passages, such as the famous "I am not insensible to the cry of pain which comes to me from all parts of Italy," are from the king's own pen.

How far Victor Emanuel merited the title of "King Honestman," by his bearing during the long national movement, may be best estimated by a rapid review of the successive influences employed to divert him from his straightforward path. "Get rid of the constitution," was the language addressed to him by Marshal Radetzki just after his accession to the throne; "all will then be well. You will find in Austria your warmest friend, and she will help you to the possession of Modena and Parma." And the simple answer was, "I cannot; I must keep my oath to my people." "Abolish the constitution," was urged in blind good faith by a large section of the old Piedmontese aristocracy, and the chief military men; and the counsel was echoed, in more affectionate and imploring tones, by an Austrian mother and an Austrian wife. He stood firm. Then came the Sicardi laws, placing priest and layman on the same level of civil equality; and the storm rose higher and howled louder. To the councils preceding the passing of the law he showed greater boldness and more true political sagacity than his own ministers. "If you deal with priests at all, don't merely tease and worry them; do enough to render them innocuous." Such was the language held by him to his cabinet. The two chambers voted the law, but the royal assent was not yet given. Might it not at the last moment be withheld? His old tutor, Bishop Charvaz, implored him to withhold his signature. His mother threw herself on her knees at his feet; but the maternal influence which turned back a Coriolanus from his march against republican, did not deter Victor Emanuel from his onward course against papal, Rome. Then, as if to mark the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

wrath of heaven against the impious foe, wife and mother and brother were all struck down by the hand of death, almost at the same time. "It is too much — it is far too much to bear," he exclaimed, in an agony of grief. "Wife, mother, brother, all taken away, and the priests yelling in my ears that it is the just punishment of my sins, and that I shall never enter paradise. But my road to paradise shall be the happiness of my people (La mia via del paradiso sarà la felicità del mio popolo)." Great and patriotic ministers stood by his side, but even those ministers were not always agreed amongst themselves. The chivalrous, high-minded, but too morbidly sensitive and fastidious Massimo d'Azeglio took fright at the violent language of the Turin press, and was willing to have trenched on the freedom of that press at the suggestion of foreign powers. Count Cavour held a bolder tone. Victor Emanuel sided with Count Cavour, made him his premier, and had to witness before long a Turin mob brought together by joint clerical and protectionist influences, attacking the premier's dwelling, and shouting beneath the windows of the royal palace, "We want bread, not laws." Again, Victor Emanuel stood firm by free trade, as he had stood firm against Jesuit assaults.

Then came the Crimean war, in which the participation of Sardinia, chiefly through the king's cordial concurrence, was openly denounced in parliament as a piece of quixotic folly. King Victor Emanuel had then to bear up against, first the rebuffs of the French and English governments, which did not receive his offers of alliance with much cordiality, and next, against the, for a time, dissentient views of his own minister of war, La Marmora, and the, to the very last, most honest opposition of his own minister of foreign affairs, Dabormida. How the negotiations at the Paris conference of 1856 prepared the way for the memorable events of 1859 is known to all the world, but those only who lived in Italy during that period and saw a little of what was then passing behind the scenes can estimate the difficulties by which the king and his great minister were surrounded in their task. If at Paris the old traditions of French diplomacy and an infinite variety of court influences were brought to bear upon Napoleon III., at Turin the jealousy of rival statesmen was as constantly seeking to undermine Count Cavour. Successful as the war of 1859 was, its abrupt termination by the Villafranca armistice called into existence a host of political and diplomatic embarrassments more threatening at the time to the Italian cause than the cannons of the still unoccupied Quadrilateral. And here at this precise moment the true strength of King Victor Emanuel's character made itself felt. Cavour had withdrawn dismayed and to all appearance broken-hearted to Switzerland. His successor, Rattazzi, was writing to the provisional governors of the revolted provinces desirous of annexation to Sardinia, and to the Sardinian ministers at foreign courts, telling them not to indulge in delusive hopes, as there was no chance of obtaining better conditions. The king, on the contrary, hoped bravely on, and told Tuscans and Romans to share his hopes. As the national prospects brightened there came another cloud, nothing less dark and ominous than the menace of a religious war. And when all these difficulties were overcome, and the successes of Garibaldi in the following year had placed nine millions of Neapolitans under the Sardinian dominion, it almost appeared as if the fresh difficulties, the democratic hopes and provincial rivalries, called into being by the Garibaldian movement would neutralize the advantages which it had procured. Then followed the death of Count Cavour, and in every corner of the civilized world might be heard the mournful prediction that the hopes of Italy were buried in the tomb of her greatest statesman. But seventeen years have elapsed since Count Cavour was laid in that tomb, and the onward march has never been arrested; and foremost in the van was still to be seen the figure of King Honestman, trusted by Venetians and Romans whilst they were still held down beneath the Austrian and papal yoke, and permitted by Providence to justify their trust by the final liberation of Venice and of Rome.

A portrait to be true must have its shades equally with its lights; but the writer who pens a notice of the late king of Italy with a whole nation around him weeping for the monarch's loss, may be pardoned if at such a moment he refrains from adding these shades in the presence of the darker and more solemn shadows which have sunk down on the palace of the Quirinal. In speaking of the late king I have mentioned in connection with his name that of Henry IV. of France. The people to whom the first Bourbon king gave peace and order were willing to overlook, in their gratitude for such boons, the faults which they could not ignore; and reverting to that large-souled humanity

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

which was common to both princes, I believe that the memory of King Victor Emanuel will become associated in the mind of posterity with the thousand little traits of good temper and good humor, of personal tact and keen sagacity, with which it was associated in the minds of his own contemporaries. Of the anecdotes illustrating his ready tact one or two known as quite authentic may be given. When the conflict between Church and State in Piedmont was at its height a deputation of noble ladies from Chambery waited on the king, imploring him to revoke the decree by which the nuns of the Sacred Heart were expelled from their city. They saw no prospect, such was their declaration made by them to the king, of having their daughters properly educated if the pious sisterhood should be removed. The king heard them very attentively, and at the close of their appeal most courteously replied: "I believe you are mistaken. I know that there are at this moment in the town of Chambery many ladies much better qualified to educate your children than the Sisters of the Sacred Heart." The ladies looked surprised, exchanged inquiring glances with each other, until at last one of them, addressing the king, begged him to point out the pious teachers of whose existence they were ignorant. "The pious teachers," replied the king, bowing more courteously than before, "are yourselves; your daughters can have no persons better qualified to superintend their education than their own mothers." The ladies of Chambery offered no further remarks, but left the royal presence-chamber in silence.

An equally characteristic trait was furnished when, after the annexation of Tuscany, he visited Pisa for the first time. On driving to the cathedral, where an immense crowd had gathered to welcome him, he found the great gates closed by order of the reactionary archbishop, Cardinal Corsi. After a delay of one or two minutes it was found that a small side entrance had been left open, and the king proceeded towards this door. But the crowd of Pisans, resenting the insult offered to the king, broke out into indignant and even menacing cries against the cardinal archbishop. Victor Emanuel, waving his hand from the top of the steps, told them to be calm, exclaiming at the same time in a good-humored tone, "It's all right. His Eminence is only teaching us by a practical instance the great truth that it is by the narrow gate we have a chance of getting to heaven."

Beloved as he was by all classes of his subjects he seems to have inspired an unusual degree of affection amongst the humble classes with whom he came most in contact, and of all the tributes to his kind-heartedness spontaneously paid in the Italian capital during the last hours of his life none perhaps was much more touching than the token of sorrow offered by the groups of peasants and farm laborers who came in from the estates of Castel Porziano, Belladonna, Porta Salara, etc., and remained in the garden of the Quirinal Palace, asking the news every five minutes, and not leaving until all was over. Immense as is the shock which his unexpected death has given to his own family, to all who knew and loved him, and to the entire Italian people, the calamity has not been without its compensations and consolations. It has bound together by the sentiment of a common loss the various members of the great national family. It has made them once more pass in review with the mind's eye the various forms of degradation and suffering which they not long ago endured, and has rekindled the feeling of joy and gratitude for their deliverance. It has taught them that in the battle of life — which in one form or another, for one cause or another, all men, either as individuals or as classes, must be prepared to fight — the best sword is simple honesty, the best buckler is unwavering faith. It was by the use of such weapons that King Honestman came forth triumphant in the successive campaigns of the long national warfare, and no better prayer can be breathed at the dawn of a new reign than that in these matters of singleness of heart and honesty of purpose the son and successor of King Honestman may tread in his father's steps.

JAMES MONTGOMERY STUART.

ROME, Feb. 10, 1878.

From The Cornhill Magazine.

THE THREE CITIES.

On the island-fringed shore of the far Asiatic East, within a geographical circle of less than sixty miles in diameter, built on almost identical soil, bathed by the same waters, canopied by the same sky, rise the Three Cities, three nationalities, three civilizations, three histories, three destinies; united in the closest juxtaposition of circumstance and site; sundered by divergence wide as the extremest limits

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

of human mind and race. Hong Kong, Canton, Macao; three monuments respectively raised by England, China, Portugal; three embodiments of as many most dissimilar energies, distinct in their starting-point, concurrent in their course, divergent in their goal.

Not sisters, though linked together by the closest ties of mutual adoption; not strangers, though aliens in language, in institutions, in blood; not hostile, though confronting each other with the bitterest antipathy of caste; not friendly, though compelled to union by links intimate as existence itself; rivals, yet associated in common interest; associates, yet necessary, unreconciled rivals; leagued, but unloving; repellent, yet allied; essentially three, accidentally one. Three tall trees from three most different seeds, unlike in flower, in foliage, in fruit; nor unlike only but antagonistic; yet planted close side by side, expanding to the same atmosphere, nourished by the same elements, above, beneath. One of them a natural, indigenous growth; two with branches of indigenous life grafted into them, but exotic in root, in stem, in type; for, in spite of the busy, yellow-complexioned, long-haired population that swarms almost equally in the streets of all three, Canton is scarcely more Chinese throughout than Macao is truly Portuguese, and Hong Kong English.

Hong Kong, genuine offspring of British energy, and whose every feature bears the unmistakable impress of the great parent. The granite quays fringing the lake-like harbor, the tall merchant offices and cavernous warerooms beyond, the solidly-constructed buildings, where artistic taste and architectural beauty are not, but comfort, usefulness, and stability are, climbing tier over tier far up the steep hillside, that hill mere barren rock scarce forty years since; the skilful windings of the flood-defying roads, triumphantly secure amid precipices down which a goat might look with justified diffidence; the dense, often exotic, foliage of the tree-planted gardens, frequent among the trim dwellings, the costly public buildings and huge works of associated enterprise, reaching from the wharves and docks below to the white signal-station and flagstaff that crown the granite peak nigh two thousand feet in perpendicular height above: these are — and whose else could they be? — the marks of England, the impress of her seal, the bold firm lines to be stamped on earth's face by her, and by her alone.

Not a character of those in which England writes herself on the world's great page but is here plainly legible. Her liberal welcome is seen in the countless sails of all merchant-flags, European, Asiatic, American, Australasian, native, foreign, dragon-bannered, crossed, three-colored, striped, chequered, starred, ship and steamer of every size, every construction, every color, not scattered over, but literally covering, concealing, the still harbor-waters. Seen too is her watchfulness — may it never fail her! — over her own rights and over the rights of those she shelters — may these too never be forgotten or lightly discarded amid the giddiness of fanatical clamor and the calculated bigotry of party! — in the cruisers, the gunboats, the war-ships and their disciplined crews, the white flag and the black metal, the protection and menace of the seas. Nor less is her mercantile supremacy, feebly foreshadowed by the Tyres of antiquity, and the Genoas and Venices of later days, proclaimed in the long ranges of warehouses, piled with goods and thronged with dealers along the quay; nor her provident care of health, and that love of fresh air and the enjoyment of nature in which so few even of her European sisters share, in the broad highways, the tree-planted walks, the public gardens, the wide spaces for popular gathering and amusement, freely allotted where the sacrifice of every inch of ground means a sacrifice of golden wealth. Seen is England's imperial munificence in the size and solidity of the public buildings, the town hall, the palace, the club, the barracks, the hospitals; seen too is her poverty of artistic feeling in not so much the absence as the contradiction of architectural proportion and grace that characterizes the exterior of almost every edifice; seen is her wise toleration of men's varied fancies in the close proximity of well-nigh every known fane, where each sect adores its own proper representative symbol of the one unknown truth; seen too her childish toying with the puerilities of a happily dead past, in the Gothic structures that rear their incongruous pinnacles against a background of tropical rock and sky. What influence but the law-abiding rule of England could at a word call together and maintain in mutual security and orderly peace the motley, nor seldom faction-nurtured, crowd of the Hong Kong thoroughfares, with all their antipathies, their rivalries, their hereditary feuds, their daily jarrings? What even-handed justice but hers could so smooth away in the level of caste-ignoring administration every local separation of race, and abolishing the jealous distinctions, too manifest elsewhere, of assigned "wards" and "quarters," bring Asiatic and European, white, dark, and yellow, hat, turban, and braided queue, Chinese, Parsee, Briton, Portuguese, Malay, Australian — who not? — to dwell side by side in the same street, on the same level? Truly Hong Kong is a compendium of the British empire, as the British empire of the world.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Every town, every village even, attentively considered, has its special characteristic, its proper epithet; the keynote of its expression, the air-tint of its landscape, the formula of its existence. Anglo-Chino-cosmopolitanism (I apologize, but a complex object demands a complex word) is the characteristic of Hong Kong. A British seaport, but on a Chinese coast, it has necessarily much of the Chinese, much of the cosmopolitan about it; its residents belonging chiefly to the former, its fluctuating population to the latter category. Were, indeed, the inhabitants of Hong Kong polled at any given moment, the English, numerically taken, would show for but a meagre figure on the list. A little leaven, yet potent not to leaven merely, but in a manner to assimilate the whole mass; a drop, but one that has diffused its own peculiar tint through all the waters, many-colored else, of the entire pool.

Many-colored indeed and many-formed as is the inner life of Hong Kong, its outer aspect, as we gaze on it near at hand from the harbor in front, is essentially, undeniably English. Before us, it may be, is the deep-eaved, low-fronted Chinese temple, the large barn-like Portuguese church, the Arabo-Malay mosque, the Parsee Tower of Silence; but these, and whatever other typical buildings of public or private use attest the presence of the subject or protected races, modestly elude the eye, and hide themselves unobserved among the larger constructions and symmetrical masses proper to the English colonists. Ungraceful enough many of the constructions, heavy the masses; and yet a very lovely sight is Hong Kong as a whole. Close to the sparkling water's edge, curving with the little promontories and indentations of the mountain-base, run the town houses in a long, white, wavy strip, much narrower in appearance when looked at thus from a somewhat lower level than it really is, while the inevitable unsightlinesses of a large and crowded city are hidden from view by the stately warehouse frontage. Next above this rises, in seemingly perpendicular steepness, a broad belt of dark and glossy green, the tree-shaded gardens, luxuriant though trim, that for five or six hundred feet upward from the sea clothe the nakedness of the old granite slopes, and almost conceal the white dwellings nestled amid the pleasing shade, where forty years since — no more — existed neither house nor tree. Higher yet, towering to the violet-blue sky, rise the giant crags, the precipitous, torrent-furrowed slopes, the massive mountain ridges, here grass-clad in bright emerald, there again naked boulders tinted red or grey; there dark with brushwood and low, gnarled trees adown the track of some deep-cleft ravine; and amid grass and rock gleam out countless specks of liveliest yellow, blue, purple, and red, tokens that even these comparatively barren shelves belong to the region emphatically and not undeservedly called the "Flowery Land." Clinging to the steepest slopes, like a red-tinted ribbon unrolled and let hang from mountain crest to base, winds the well-constructed path for horse or foot from the town below to the peak above; other tracks, each one a triumph of engineering skill, lead right and left amid gorge and precipice to remote villages and little anchorages on the further side of the central heights. Small Swiss-like cottages, the summer retreats of Hong Kong rank or wealth, glitter in the sun among the topmost crags; and from two thousand feet above land and sea towers England's flag-staff over all.

Such is the southward view: turning from it north, west, or east, the ship-peopled harbor shows as though closed in by the fantastic forms of high, yellow-streaked mountains, the Chinese mainland chain, nor less by the countless peaks and crags of innumerable islands, some large, some small, some massive, some mere reefs; a labyrinth of land and water, of rock and shining inlet, of which the centre and heart is Hong Kong. On every side fisher hamlets, pretty enough at a distance, and dense Chinese trading-stations fringe the bay-indented coast; while here a white light-tower, there a fantastic dark outline of rocky pinnacle, breaks the larger landscape lines. Showered down over all, penetrating all, is the violet daylight known to West Indian skies, also on the tropical verge, but nowhere so pure, so delicate, so transparent as here in eastern Asia, along the coasts of the furthermost, world-encircling sea.

A town built against steep hillsides, rising right from the water's edge, can hardly fail of being picturesque; and even

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

where, owing to climate, material, soil, or local cause, the enlivenments of color are wanting, beauty at least of outline will not be absent. Thus, for instance, Trebizond, Sanpsoon, Sinope, Cherasond, that ancient sisterhood of history and decay, dingy-tinted as they are, and overshaded besides by the murky Black Sea atmosphere, yet attract the eye by the grandeur of their outline and position; dank dark ruins with broad-spread lines of dense forest and cloud-veiled mountains for their background, they suit well with the gloomy waters of the Euxine below. But in the bright tropical and in the yet brighter sub-tropical zone, grandeur, even where most present, is in a manner hidden under the exceeding charms of color and light. From the countless towns and villages, each lovely to gaze on from the deck of the by-sailing yacht of the Mediterranean coast, on to West Indian latitudes and Brazilian shores, seaports present an almost monotonous beauty; every voyager has the tale by heart. A known example, and one to which Hong Kong in some of its features offers a certain resemblance, is the much-visited port of St. Thomas in the West Indies; the first appearance and general outline of each have, to him who sees them entering either bay, a great deal in common. But the difference is in truth more than the likeness. For while the stateliness of its buildings and the verdure of its surroundings are what most distinguish Hong Kong, St. Thomas, though to the imaginative view of a Kingsley bosomed in orange groves, displays in truth neither orange groves nor any others round and amid its white dwellings to the average human eye, which ranges instead over a brown expanse of stunted "bush;" while the smallness of its dwelling-places gives the town somewhat of the appearance of a children's toy-box turned out at random adown the hills; the hills themselves, too, are wanting in height, and commonplace in outline. What, however, St. Thomas lacks Hong Kong possesses, offering to view just the right combination of brightness, tint, and color, along with solidity, dignity, and size, in the perfected proportionateness of all.

Again, "From the sea, charming, on shore, detestable," is the often-repeated verdict of the British voyager who first visits some Levantine Jaffa or Brazilian Rio; and, all due allowance made for British fastidiousness, there is only too often in the untidiness of a sub-tropical seaport interior wherewithal to justify the sentence. But it does not apply to Hong Kong. The town streets, the principal thoroughfares at any rate, are broad and clean; the tree-shaded roads that wind among the gardens and residences higher up are of park-like trimness; nothing neglected, nothing dilapidated, offends the view. No quality, in fact, commends itself so much to the pleased visitor, especially if recent from the slovenly, tumble-down, patched-up cities too common in less favored spots of the Asiatic tropics, than the neatness, the spruceness, the completeness of Hong Kong; all praiseworthy qualities, but especially the last, considering the frequent, and indeed, as it here happens, by no means remote, ravages of tempest and flood in this cyclone-swept region.

Towns, like men, age quickly in the tropics; and thirty years, though of little account for the change they bring in temperate Europe, are in Indo-Chinese latitudes more than enough, unless constant attention and repair prevent, to confer an air of decrepitude and decay on buildings no less than on the builders. But no blotched and crevassed wall, no bush-grown ruin, no broken pavement, no grass-mantled court, announces the decrepitude of Hong Kong; energy, not the unsteady, often misdirected, energy of a colony's first youth, but the enduring, judicious energy of vigorous manhood, is her very type, her characteristic, her keynote, not less so than art of Florence, enjoyment of Vienna, majesty of Rome.

Energy is but another name for life; and of human life scarcely any of its Old World varieties, and not many from among those of the New, are absent from Hong Kong. The predominant ones, of course, are the English and the Chinese. Of the latter, though, numerically taken, the most abundant, and, next to the English, the most influential in the colony, little need here he said; we shall have a much better opportunity of studying it in its native home, in Canton, where it attains its complete development. But, be it much or be it little in quantity and importance, essentially it is the same everywhere; of all nations in the world, the Jews themselves not excepted, the Chinese, while the readiest to expatriate themselves, are the least modified by expatriation. How many ages of climatic and local influences, how many generations traversed under foreign rule, amid foreign institutions, might, by the slow operation of natural selection, struggle for life, survival of the fittest, and so forth, suffice to bring them into somewhat of even ap-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

proximate conformity with the dominant races among which they settle, in California say, in Queensland, in the streets of Calcutta or the woods of Borneo, Darwin himself might, in the absence of so much as a hint, let alone a fact, to guide him, be puzzled to conjecture. But here, on their own soil, in daily intercourse with their fellow-countrymen of the great empire, the Celestials are doubly proof against all influences of change. And hence the Chinese denizens of Hong Kong differ little or nothing, outwardly or inwardly, in dress, customs, or ideas, from their brethren of similar rank or occupation at Canton. When arrived there we may study them at our leisure. Enough for the present to say that in British Hong Kong the Chinese Club, known from the profession of its first founders as that of the compradores, or "middle-men," their hospital, worthy in its orderly neatness and studious care to rank with many English hospitals, or even German, their large theatre, their quaint temples, and the other results of their combined and communal action, exhibit Chinese munificence, good taste, and methodical accuracy in a most favorable light.

As it is with the Chinese, so it is, after a manner, with the English. An Englishman self-exiled to the tropics dons a solar hat fearful and wonderful to behold, patronizes light flannels, and occasionally white shoes, doubles and trebles his already frequent national ablutions, and even at times dines, greatly daring, in a white jacket. More yet, he may, when absolutely compelled thereto by the fitness of things, exchange his favorite mode of locomotion, pedestrian or equestrian, for others peculiar to the land of his adoption, may recline in an Indian palanquin, or, as here in China, take seat in the uncomfortable sedan-chair. Never surely was a contrivance so thoroughly adapted for making, in appearance at least, slaves of your fellow-creatures and an invalid of yourself; and yet to invent anything else equally well suited to the precipitous inclines of Hong Kong, or the narrow lanes of a Chinese city, would, all agree, be a task beyond the inventive genius of man born of woman. But to return to our Englishman. Despite the modifications just indicated in his outer self, he is yet, for all essential characteristics, the same identical man who rode to hounds in the county, or sat on a high stool at a city desk, who dined in a dress-coat at a quarter past eight, and went, mayhap, in a cylinder hat to church on the Sabbath morn; unchanged, unchangeable as Byron's ocean, or Shakespeare's "northern star." For the rest, his works declare him; by these he is best known; and of these, as here displayed on the furthest Eastern marge, I have spoken, cursorily indeed, yet I think sufficiently already.

Next in local importance and mercantile wealth to the British community ranks the German; that nationality destined, it would seem, to become in no distant future our rival on equal terms, perhaps even our supplanter in the world's commerce. Like the English on the one hand, and the Chinese on the other, the Germans have their own social centre, their own club, and, I believe, their own appropriate place of worship; a thriving, thrifty race. Like Englishmen, too, a hundred and more degrees of longitude or latitude make little difference in Germans; not indeed so absolutely unplastic as ourselves, yet slow to adopt the usages of others, reluctant to modify their own.

The Portuguese, rarely of genuine European origin, mostly of mixed or Asiatic strain, are as much superior in numbers as inferior in weight to the English. A few merchants lead the van of the Lusitanian host; its bulk is a "mixed multitude" of clerks, accountants, writers, apothecaries, and the like. Intelligent, good-natured, sociable, but with somewhat of Reuben's doom upon them, they lack the backbone of the Teutonic — I use the word with becoming diffidence — races, and the elastic energy of the genuine Celt. But their minuter delineation is best reserved for a survey of their neighboring headquarters, Macao. To complete the European, or quasi-European, catalogue, come a few French, Italians, Spaniards, and Manilese; some Danes also. These last excepted, those now briefly catalogued form the bulk of the Catholic population, which includes a small number of the Chinese themselves; and is supplemented by a whole army of clergy, regular and secular, congregationists, nuns, and missionaries of various orders and robes; all, like their Protestant rivals, who are also numerous in the field, intent on the well-meant but infructuous task of pouring very new wine into very old bottles — task which for three centuries and more baffled the skill of the old-society Jesuits themselves, though masters the like of whom the world has never seen of the soul-winning craft, and with a Xavier or a Ricci at their head. Where such have failed who can hope success? However, the small result which yet attends missionary efforts,

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

and sustains the laborers in an ungrateful vineyard by the ever-delusive hope of greater things and a more abundant vintage to come, here falls, as at Singapore, and indeed elsewhere generally, to the share of the Catholic apostles rather than the Protestants; a circumstance the reasons of which are sufficiently well known to all.

Jews, at least those distinctly such, are few at Hong Kong; nor, indeed, as I am told, do they dwell numerously in any of the tents of the Celestial Empire, whether those tents belong, as is commonly supposed, to the Japhetic camp or not. Jacob and Laban together would not, if the truth be told, make much out of a contract with a Chinaman. But the "highly respectable" Parsee in his quasi-episcopal garb, the turbaned Arabo-Malay trader, the dusky Hindoo, the energetic Japanese, and many other Asiatic types of less note have their representatives here. Towering amid all, the grim Sikhs, from amongst whom the strong and well-organized police force of the place is mostly recruited, slowly stalk past in moustached majesty, offering the completest contrast that fancy could devise to the sleek, smooth-faced, smiling, briskly-moving Chinese.

Such is Hong Kong; a picture chequered to minuteness in detail, uniform in general coloring, and that coloring English. Examined, however, more closely, and with the eye of a resident rather than of a traveller, a further characteristic, hardly perceptible indeed on the surface, but existent immediately below it, and extending downwards to the lowermost layers of colonial life, comes to view. It is the deep demarcation line that sunders the entire community into two parts, a line not less real because at first sight unapparent, a gulf all the more impassable because not dug by law and ordinance, but by custom and instinct. On the one side of this social gulf are the English, with a few, by no means the majority, of their European compeers; on the other almost all those included in the general designation of "foreigners;" but especially the Asio-Portuguese and the Chinese natives of the land. Years of a common home, common pursuits, common interests, have not for social intimacy and domestic intercourse, hardly even for mutual knowledge of each other's characters, habits, and modes of thought, brought the Briton and the Chinaman one step nearer to each other than they were when the flag of British sovereignty first waved over the island thirty-five years ago. Between English and other nationalities the division is not quite so rigorous, yet the barrier fence exists, and as yet gives no sign of weakening at any point. Something of the kind may be observed in many other British colonies of the Old World and of the New; but in none, I believe, is exclusiveness carried so far as in Hong Kong, where circumstances, many of them beyond the control of the colonists themselves, have promoted, and in a manner rendered inevitable, a condition not otherwise wholly uncongenial to the British mind. There is something to be said in its favor, something also in blame.

Within, however, its comparatively narrow limits, necessary or self-imposed, Hong Kong society — the English section of it, I mean — is remarkable for its cordial geniality, and liveliness tempered by refinement and education. Many are the British colonies, if settlements be not the correcter title, deservedly commended for similar qualities in the far East; but in none, so at least I am told, can the National Club boast a better reading-room and library than those at Hong Kong; no public hall shows choicer diversions, gayer dances, or sprightlier amateur performances; no racecourse is the scene of better-contested emulation, no tennis-lawns more frequented, no saloons brighter than hers. Without depreciation of her half-sisters, let England's eldest-born daughter in the Celestial Empire have her due.

A goodly city, a goodly colony, this Hong Kong of the present. But the forward-stretching link of real, surely, yet undefined significance that will not let us rest in acquiescent stability on the firm ground of what is, because dragging us ever on to the uncertain cloudland of what is to be, compels us even here to lift up our eyes beyond the pleasing Hong Kong of the day to the possible Hong Kong of coming years in the foreshadowed destinies of Asio-British dominion.

Commanding as it does the main entry, the portal of the south-Chinese empire, and through it of the central provinces and inner sanctuary of the ancient shrine, as strong in position as secure in sheltered anchorage, alike easy of access to friends, and difficult of approach, if not impossible, to foes, Hong Kong can then only lose its nature-ensured importance when the power that now grasps it loses its own. Till then — a far distant day — it is the easternmost extremity of the mighty imperial lever, reaching from the far European West to the Chinese shore, and ever ready to move, it might be absolutely to

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

overturn, the entire Middle Kingdom. Such it already is in English eyes, more so in the wakeful eyes of Continental jealousy: what then in the eyes of the Chinese themselves?

Very different indeed, from the aspect of things to the fevered speculator of irritable Europe is that they assume in the quiet, common-sense gaze of the placid Chinese. Nothing, in European estimate, irritates national antipathies more than territorial occupation; it is a thorn that, abiding in the wound, keeps it ever festering; a centre-point round which gathers every worst feeling of contempt in the stronger power, hatred and desire of revenge in the weaker, aversion in both. Two centuries have not reconciled Spain to our presence in Gibraltar; the hostility of the Arabs is not less bitter now than forty years agone to the French settlers of Algiers; Ceuta maintains the Moorish and Christian feud; could any Englishman endure for an instant the bare thought of a foreign flag, whatever its nationality, floating over the Portland heights? We occupy Hong Kong, a few hours distant, no more, from one of the greatest, the most important, the most national of Chinese cities; and the Chinese look on with not a frown on their smooth faces, not a thought but of quiet accommodation to circumstances, with a feeling not practically distinguishable from great indifference. Within the narrow but densely-peopled island, without it, along the village-fringed shores that stretch back to the wharves of Whampoa and the gates of Canton, the Chinese population shows itself, all due allowance made for the prejudices of mutual ignorance and difference of blood, friendly, kindly even, to the English — their first frays over, the Chinese dragon has no further misliking for St. George; rather seeks amicably to share with the stranger champion the favors of the Golden Princess and the treasures of her store.

Nations may, though rarely, be friends, their officials hardly or never; and it would be a millennium, or rather a very Utopia on earth, did no grudges, no complaints, no grievances exist between Chinese hoppos and British harbor-masters, the retinue of the yellow flag and that of the Union Jack. Yet, considering the war of 1842, and the storming of Canton, with all that preceded and followed it, in 1857, remembering what passed at Tien-tsin in 1858, and what at Pekin in 1860, all recent dates, and, the first alone in a measure excepted, belonging to the living generation rather than the past, we must admit that the Chinese mind would have been justified in entertaining a far greater degree of alienation from us than exists at the present day. And if to these we add the daily bickerings kept up — with how much of blame on the one side, how much on the other, is not here the place to inquire — of the smuggling trade; the shocks, of little consequence perhaps in themselves, but irritating from their frequency, between Chinese formalism and British roughhandedness, the vagaries of tourists, the intrusive bigotry of missionaries; and last, not least, the easily-made confusion in Chinese apprehension between English and other less law-abiding nationalities, European or New World, our wonder at Chinese tolerance, even good nature, even courtesy, may well increase to admiration. True that a diversity of ideas, of customs, wide enough to make the one race at first sight the seeming antipodes of the other, separates the Briton and the Chinaman; nor can we wish it done away. Little, indeed, does a nation gain — much, incalculably much, does it ever lose — by abandoning its ways for the ways of the alien, its usages for his usages, its fashions for his fashions, its gods for his gods. History in this, through all her pages, reads us only one lesson, and its latest illustration is no further from China than is Japan. But the fusion of mutual advantage, of good feeling, and of kindly intercourse is not less possible than beneficial; the more so that the glaring but superficial unlikeness between the British and the Chinese types covers much of deeply-seated real resemblance, nay, in some regards, identity of character. And in this fusion it is for us, the uninvited intruders on Chinese territory, to lead the way. Manchester goods and opium are excellent things of their kind, but honor, justice, good faith, and good government are more; of these, unless England be indeed untrue to her imagined self, we have plenty and to spare; these too we can in our measure communicate by a policy not wholly summed up in "Væ victis" and "Gunboats to the fore."

And of this wider policy what better basis could be found than in the British city that guards the entry of southern China, the friendly though foreign Piræus of Canton? "Hong Kong for the merchants" has long been the colonial motto, and though, if taken absolutely, a narrow one, I would not say that at the outset it may not have been adequate to the requirements of the day. But its time has gone by, or rather it has been, in its complete meaning, transferred to Shanghai and the

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

busy free ports, situated indeed on Chinese soil, but dedicated by British protection to trade, and trade alone. This is their one obligation: well they fulfil it, and with it they may be content. But on our own national soil, within our own waters, "Hong Kong for the empire" should now be our device. Elsewhere, even more abundantly than here, we have mercantile relations, mercantile interchange, mercantile duties, with China; why not, here at least, imperial also? Why should not the "Flowery Land" be to us, in due process of time, not merely a market for our goods, but a recruiting-ground for our nationality, for our armies, our navies, our enterprise, our manifold life? Wide range for our imperial growth; and its starting point, so we know its true bearing, is already made, is no other than Hong Kong. Born on British ground, or preferring it by exchange of permanent residence to their own, what hinders the extension of British national rights, the equalization of British law, the privileges of British citizenship to the Chinese indwellers of the colony? Better surely subjects than aliens, union than division. Is England too weak a mother to nurse other children than those of her own island-womb? Are her means too restricted to adopt? Do the cords of her tent admit of no lengthening? Can her heart only fear, nor be enlarged to the gathering of the abundance of the sea? Idle fear! Unison of sympathy, of feeling, of thought, of purpose, will follow close on unity of national existence; and Hong Kong may — we have but to will it — prove the first link in the golden band to bind in one the vastest energies of the East and of the West, China and England.

By such policy did ancient Rome consolidate that empire which for five hundred years summed up the world in one citizenship, one name; this is > the seal of that most firm assurance

> Which bars the pit over destruction's strength.

More than inheritor of Rome's empire, Promotheus of the age, England touches that seal already by her world-wide colonies; why not grasp it, and make it her own?

Such is the youngest-born of the three sister rivals, emblem of progressive energy, of expansive strength. Elder by uncounted centuries, her birth-date lost in the mists of fable, Canton is not less emblem also of strength, but more of stability, of energy, but energy linked to repose.

There are cities that once desolated have never risen again; there are others that ravaged not once but often ever renew their interrupted life, changed, it may be, somewhat in outward style, essentially the same. Babylon, Palmyra, Aventicum, are examples of the former; of the latter Damascus, Rome, Canton; hill-bandit, Tartar, French, English, each in turn has wasted land and town with sword and fire; to-day you pass through the gaily decorated streets, amid smiling peace, prosperity, abundance, and, unless taught from history, would never guess the ruin and horrors of scarce twenty years since. Hong Kong may fade, as Macao has already faded; not so Canton; her roots are those of the great empire itself, her life its life — a life that has outlasted the birth, increase, decline, death of countless kingdoms, and may well yet outlast countless more.

Of Canton then, and of that third city, once a vigorous growth, now a withered memory, yet beautiful in decay, fallen Macao, there would be much to say; but time and circumstance, the boundary-marks of our little day, have traced me too narrow a line to admit of its enclosing, even in miniature, the vast dimensions of history, description, and thought that open out with the gateways of the Middle Kingdom, the Celestial Empire. But he who would realize, by analogy at least, what Egypt was in her earlier better days, before Hyksos or Persian, Greek or Roman, Arab or Turk, had dwarfed her down to the measure of their own lesser stature, let him visit Canton. Even there, and without pursuing his path further into the wonders outstretched for thousands of leagues beyond, throughout the vastest as the most enduring of earth's kingdoms, he may form a not inadequate idea of the entire empire, as he who has seen the pylons of the Rhamession or Edfou, and them only, may judge, nor hesitatingly, what were the glories of the Nile Pharaohs, and what the greatness of their sway. Further investigation may complete the details, but will not add much to the proportion of the first view.

Let him visit Canton. There he may study the results of a government based on reverence, on literature, on guarded rank, on respected age; of a priesthood kept within its proper limits of ceremonial observances and rational rites, nor permitted to arrogate blasphemous dictation to the minds and souls of men; of administrative wisdom, wisely limiting itself to the good order, sufficiency, and happiness of man's actual life, without pretension or preoccupation for what may come after.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

There too he may see, what in Europe he will hardly see, in America never, how well it is with a nation that knows when it is well off, and knowing this prefers to enjoy in quiet the steady if not brilliant light of its own tried and hereditary lamp, to running after bright wills-of-the-wisp, delusive imitations, fancied progress, hoped improvement, and all the promise-phantoms of a restless vision. What particular "fifty years of Europe" those may be that the poet of our age pronounces "better than a cycle of Cathay" I know not; but should hardly fancy he intended the quinquagesimal that includes the Commune of 1871, or that of the chaos of 1793, any more than those lighted up by the hell-fires of the Inquisition, or the blood-stained days of the barons, first or last. Doubtless there is much that China might advantageously learn from Europe; but Europe too, unquiet, disintegrating Europe, might with at least equal advantage to herself take more than one lesson from Cathay. In Canton, in China, there are many wonders for the tourist; there are hints for the statesman also.

W. G. Palgrave.

From Cassell's Magazine.

HOW GREAT MEN WORK.

One of the most interesting chapters in literary history would, undoubtedly, be that which should record the whims and eccentricities of men of genius when engaged in the active pursuit of their calling. First, because it is always pleasant to know how works, which have taught and delighted whole generations of readers, have been produced; and secondly, because such little personal traits, if not directly instructive, are, at any rate, suggestive and curious. But, strange to say, this chapter remains unwritten; and among all the "curiosities of literature" these, the greatest of all its curiosities, are by some inadvertency passed over unnoticed. Such an omission is very much to be regretted, for the author possessed singular qualifications for the task, as well from his enormous reading as from his custom of collecting and noting down such minutiæ when he encountered them in scattered biographical or autobiographical notices, where alone they can be found.

The methods of authors in the course of composition have been singular, and though no two of them have worked alike, they have, most of them, illustrated the old proverb that genius is labor, and that few great works have been produced which have not been the result of unwearied perseverance as well as of brilliant natural powers. Some men have undoubtedly possessed astonishing facility and readiness both of conception and expression, as we shall presently see; but, as a rule, the writings of such men, except in the case of Shakespeare, are not so valuable as they might have been, and are marred by crudities which might otherwise have been finished beauties, by deformities which should have been graces. First among the sons of literary toil stands Virgil. He used, we are told, to pour out a large number of verses in the morning, and to spend the rest of the day in pruning them down; he has humorously compared himself to a she-bear, who licks her cubs into shape. It took him three years to compose his ten short eclogues; seven years to elaborate his "Georgics," which comprise little more than two thousand verses; and he employed more than twelve years in polishing his "Æneid," being even then so dissatisfied with it, that he wished before his death to commit it to the flames. Horace was equally indefatigable, and there are single odes in his works which must have cost him months of labor. Lucretius's one poem represents the toil of a whole life; and so careful was Plato in the niceties of verbal collocation, that the first sentence in his "Republic" was turned in nine different ways. It must have taken Thucydides upwards of twenty years to write his history, which is comprised in one octavo volume. Gibbon wrote the first chapter of his work three times before he could please himself; and John Foster, the essayist, would sometimes spend a week over one sentence. Addison was so particular that he would stop the press to insert an epithet, or even a comma; and Montesquieu, alluding in a letter to one of his works, says to a correspondent, "You will read it in a few hours, but the labor expended on it has whitened my hair." The great French critic, Ste.-Beuve, expended incredible pains on every word, and two or three octavo pages often represented a whole week's incessant effort. Gray would spend months over a short copy of verses; and there is a poem of ten lines in Waller's works, which, he has himself informed us, took him a whole summer to formulate. Miss Austen, Charlotte Brontë, Hume, and Fox have all re-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

corded the trouble they took. Tasso was unwearied in correcting; so were Pope and Boileau. Even Macaulay, with all his fluency, did not disdain the application of the file; and there are certain passages in the first chapter of his history which represent months of patient revision. There is a good tale told of Malherbe, the French poet, which illustrates very amusingly the elaborate care he took with his poems. A certain nobleman of his acquaintance had lost his wife, and was anxious that Malherbe should dedicate an ode to her memory, and condole with him in verse on the loss he had sustained. Malherbe complied, but was so fastidious in his composition, that it was three years before the elegy was completed. Just before he sent it in, he was intensely chagrined to find that his noble friend had solaced himself with a new bride; and was, consequently, in no humor to be pestered with an elegy on his old one. The unfortunate poet, therefore, lost both his pains and his fee. So morbidly anxious was Cardinal Bembo about verbal correctness, that every poem he composed is said to have passed successively through forty portfolios, which represented the various stages towards completeness. The great Pascal affords another instance of similar literary conscientiousness. What he especially aimed at was brevity. He once apologized to a friend for writing him a long letter, on the ground that he had had no time to make it shorter — and the result is that his "Provincial Letters" scarcely yield to Tacitus, or to the "Letters of Junius," in concise, epigrammatic brilliancy.

Some authors have rapidly sketched the plan of their intended work first, and have reserved their pains for filling out the details. The great French novelist, Balzac, followed this method. He sent off to the printer the skeleton of the intended romance, leaving pages of blank paper between for conversations, descriptions, etc.; as soon as that was struck off he shut himself up in his study, eat and drank nothing but bread and water till he had filled up the blank spaces, and in this way laboriously completed his book. Godwin wrote his "Caleb Williams" backwards — beginning, that is to say, with the last chapter, and working on to the first. Richardson produced his ponderous novels by painfully elaborating different portions at different times. Burton, the author of the "Anatomy of Melancholy;" the great scholars Barthius and Turnebus; Butler, the author of "Hudibras;" Locke; Fuller, the "witty" divine; Bishop Horne, Warburton, Hurd, and many others kept commonplace books, which may account for the copious and apposite illustrations which enrich their volumes. Sheridan and Hook were always on the alert for bits of brilliant conversation and stray jokes, which they took good care to jot down in their pocket-books for future use. The great Bentley always bought editions of classical authors with very broad margins, and put down the observations which might occur to him in the course of his reading — which is the secret of his lavish erudition. Pope scribbled down stray thoughts for future use whenever they struck him — at a dinner-table, in an open carriage, at his toilet, and in bed. Hogarth would sketch any face that struck him on his finger-nail, hence the marvellous diversity of feature in his infinite galleries of portraits. Swift would lie in bed in the morning, "thinking of wit for the day;" and Theodore Hook generally "made up his impromptues the night before." Washington Irving was fond of taking his portfolio out into the fields, and laboriously manipulating his graceful periods while swinging on a stile. Wordsworth and De Quincey did the same. It would be easy to multiply instances of the pain and labor expended on compositions which to all appearance bear no traces of such effort.

But it is now time to reverse the picture, and to mention meritorious pieces produced against time and with extraordinary facility. Lucilius, the Roman satirist, wrote with such ease, that he used to boast that he could turn off two hundred verses while standing on one leg. Ennius was quite as fluent. Of Shakespeare we are told, "His mind and hand went together, and what he thought he uttered with that easiness that we (the editors of the first folio) have scarce received from him a blot in his papers." When the fits of inspiration were on Milton, his amanuensis could scarcely keep pace with the fast-flowing verses; but we must remember that the poet had been brooding over his immortal work for years before a line was committed to paper. The most marvellous illustrations of this facility in writing are to be found in the two Spanish poets Calderon and Lope de Vega. The latter could write a play in three or four hours; he supplied the Spanish stage with upwards of two thousand original dramas, and Hallam calculates that during the

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd course of his life he "reeled off" upwards of twenty-one million three hundred thousand lines! Of English writers, perhaps the most fluent and easy have been Dryden and Sir Walter Scott. In one short year Dryden produced four of his greatest works — namely, the first part of "Absalom and Achitophel," "The Medal," "Mac Flecknoe," his share in the second part of "Absalom and Achitophel," and the "Religio Laici." He was less than three years in translating the whole of Virgil. He composed his elaborate parallel between poetry and painting in twelve mornings. "Alexander's Feast" was struck out at a single sitting. Indeed, he says himself that, when he was writing, ideas thronged so fast that the only difficulty he had was in selection. Everybody knows the extraordinary literary facility of Sir Walter Scott — how his amanuensis, when he employed one, could not keep pace with the breathless speed with which he dictated his marvellous romances. If we can judge from the many original MSS. of his novels and poems which have been preserved to us, it would seem that he scarcely ever recast a sentence or altered a word when it was committed to paper. The effect of this is that both Dryden and Scott have left a mass of writings valuable for the genius with which they are instinct, but defaced with errors, with grammatical blunders, and with many pleonasms and tautologies, the consequence of their authors' not practising what Pope calls

The first and greatest art, the art to blot.

Dr. Johnson's "Rasselas" was written in a week, to defray the expenses of his mother's funeral. Horace Walpole wrote nearly all "The Castle of Otranto" at a sitting which terminated not by mental fatigue, but by the fingers becoming too weary to close on the pen. Beckford's celebrated "Vathek" was composed by the uninterrupted exertion of three whole days and two whole nights, during which time the ecstatic author supported himself by copious draughts of wine. What makes the feat more wonderful is, that it was written in French, an acquired language, for Beckford was of course an Englishman. Mrs. Browning wrote her delightful poem entitled "Lady Geraldine's Courtship," a long elaborate romance in a difficult metre, in twelve hours, while the printer was waiting to put it into type. It is comparatively easy to understand the rapidity with which these compositions were produced, because, being works of imagination couched in a style essentially bold and free, choice phraseology, careful rhythm, and copious illustration were not so much needed; but when we learn that Ben Jonson completed his highly-wrought comedy of "The Alchymist" in six weeks, and that Dr. Johnson could throw off forty-eight octavo pages of such a finished composition as his "Life of Savage" at a sitting, one is indeed lost in bewildering admiration, and perhaps half inclined to doubt the author's word. However much we may wonder at feats like these, we should not forget Sheridan's witty remark, that very easy writing is generally very hard reading; and comfort our commonplace selves with the thought that, in nine cases out of ten, genius in literature is like genius in practical life, little else than honest, indefatigable labor fortunately directed. The wise Lord Bacon has observed that prodigies, of what kind soever they may be, belong to what is monstrous in nature, and as they are not produced in accordance with the laws which determine man's condition, ought neither to be sought out nor imitated. But we must turn now to our third point — the strange circumstances under which celebrated works have been produced.

It is curious that two of the greatest historical works in the world were written while their authors were in exile — the "History of the Peloponnesian War," by Thucydides, the "History of the Rebellion," by Lord Clarendon. Fortescue, the chief justice in Henry's VI.'s reign, wrote his great work on the laws of England under the same circumstances. Locke was a refugee in Holland when he penned his memorable "Letter concerning Toleration," and put the finishing touches to his immortal "Essay on the Human Understanding." Lord Bolingbroke had also "left his country for his country's good" when he was engaged on the works by which he will be best remembered. Everybody knows Dante's sad tale, and his miserable wanderings from city to city while the "Divine Comedy" was in course of production. Still more melancholy is it to review the formidable array of great works which were composed within the walls of a prison. First come the "Pilgrim's Progress" and "Don Quixote;" the one written in Bedford gaol, the other in a squalid dungeon in Spain. James I. (of Scotland) penned his sweet poem "The Kynge's Quhair," while a prisoner in Windsor Cas-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

tle; and the loveliest of Lord Surrey's verses were written in the same place, under the same circumstances. Sir Walter Raleigh's "History of the World" was composed in the Tower. George Buchanan executed his brilliant Latin version of the Psalms while incarcerated in Portugal. "Fleta," one of the most valuable of our early law works, took its name from the fact of its having been compiled by its author in the Fleet Prison. Boethius' "Consolations of Philosophy," De Foe's "Review" and "Hymn to the Pillory," Voltaire's "Henriade," Howel's "Familiar Letters" — to which we have recently directed attention — Dr. Dodd's "Prison Thoughts," Grotius' "Commentary on St. Matthew," and the amusing "Adventures of Dr. Syntax," all these were produced in the gloomy cells of a common prison. Tasso wrote some of the loveliest of his sonnets in a mad-house, and Christopher Smart his "Song to David" — one of the most eloquent sacred lyrics in our language — while undergoing confinement in a similar place. Poor Nathaniel Lee, the dramatist, is said to have revolved some of his tragedies in lucid intervals within the walls of a lunatic asylum. Plautus fabricated some of his comedies in a bake-house. The great Descartes, Berni, the Italian poet, and Boyse, the once well-known author of "The Deity," usually wrote while lying in bed. Hooker meditated his "Ecclesiastical Polity" while rocking the cradle of his child; and Richardson slowly elaborated his romances among the compositors of his printing-office. Byron composed the greater part of "Lara" while engaged at his toilet-table, and his "Prologue at the Opening of Drury Lane Theatre" in a stage-coach. Moore's gorgeous Eastern romance, "Lalla Rookh," was written in a cottage blocked up with snow, with an English winter roaring round it. Burns dreamed one of his lyrics, and wrote it down just as it came to him in his sleep. Tartini's "Devil's Sonata" was another inspiration from Morpheus; and so also was Coleridge's "Kubla Khan."

Such were the extraordinary circumstances attending the composition of works which have amused and instructed thousands of people; such have been some of the methods, and such some of the habits of authors. Various and unintelligible often are the forms in which human genius will reveal itself; but quite as various, and perhaps quite as unintelligible, at first sight, are the ways in which it has surmounted the obstacles which opposed it, asserted its claims, and effected its development.

From The Spectator.

THE HATRED OF INDIVIDUALS FOR NATIONS.

PEOPLE begin to hate nations just as they begin to hate individuals, but the progress of their hatred is so different as to deserve a moment's study. A man hates another usually for some reason, producible, at all events, to his own mind, either because he has suffered from his enemy, or because he is in his way, or because he is insolent towards him, or because, for some reason not quite clear even to himself, he entertains a secret fear of his adversary's possible action. There are, no doubt, what we may call sympathetic hatreds, aversions springing from no known or recognized cause, born instantly on contact, and really produced by a perceived conflict of natures, temperaments, or sometimes aspirations. It is the hatred of a horse for a camel, of an ichneumon for a snake, of a Chinaman for a negro, and inexplicable by mere reasoning. Such cases do occur, just as love at first sight does occur, but they are rare, and as a rule a hater requires provocation from the object of his hatred, though, of course, the provocation may occasionally be found merely in the fact of the provoker's existence. Kings have hated their heirs very bitterly for no better reason than that, and hatred to a man who stands between yourself and a pleasant life, though he may be standing there quite innocently, is among the commonest of social phenomena. The hatred, however, commonly begins with a reason, is exasperated by a series of actual or supposed events, and then, in Christian society and in our modern world, receives a check. We cannot, indeed, quite agree with Bulwer, who maintained in one of his novels that hatred was an extinct motor, for we see murders committed every day for which we can perceive no other motive, and hear perpetually of social quarrels in which hatred has at last moved two men to violent and hostile action, but it is true, we think, that modern hatred is subject to checks. Not only is the hater subject to those influences from the variety and complexity of modern life of which Bulwer speaks, from the number of the interests which necessarily press upon his mind and prevent him

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

from brooding over the villanies, real or imaginary, of any individual, but he is almost sure at some step in the progress of his malady to pull himself sharply up. He recognizes that his mind has been dram-drinking. Either he is a reasonable human being, and suddenly appreciates the humor of his own exaggerated view, or he is a Christian, and is shocked at the impulses of his own mind, or he is under the influence of the Christian atmosphere, and recoils before the first suggestion of an act which would cause suffering, — that is, from any approach towards making his hatred active. "After all," he says to himself, "perhaps I mistake the fellow, or perhaps he has mistaken me;" or, "He may be only acting after his nature," or, "He has a right, annoying as he is in the exercise of it." At all events, he reflects, — and reflection is nearly sure to be as fatal to hatred as it is to that form of rage which carries a man out of himself, and ends in a burst of destructiveness, only innocent when confined to his own china.

The man who hates a nation rarely feels this check. He never pulls himself up, for he never perceives that such a process is obligatory on the conscience of a Christian human being. On the contrary, when he lets himself go full swing, he exults over himself for the moral virtue shown in the pace he has attained. It is immoral to hate an individual, but patriotic to hate a nation. It is foolish to be eternally suspecting a personal enemy, but politic to regard every national act as deserving of suspicion. To grudge your cousin his luck is mean, so basely mean, that most men would deny it; but to detest France, or Germany, or Russia for getting a new estate, even by legacy, is positively virtuous. It is feeble to be moved by taunts from an adversary, but if he has a few million heads it is only proper pride, a duty you owe to your country, to be very wrath with his most meaningless impertinence. It is wicked to desire to kill a rival merely because he has succeeded, but to desire to kill a nation for succeeding is an emotion to be avowed and to be proud of. "I would give a finger if I could kill him," says the angry man, and the bystanders pronounce him, in their hearts, a malignant fool; but if he says, "I would give my life if only I could destroy the Russian army," they think the sentiment quite creditable, and describe him ever after as "a little violent, but frank and patriotic." If he invents ingenious methods of killing, he is a man deserving of honor; and if he kills in heaps, he is a hero. The hater's very virtues, his love for his country, his desire for the national honor, his indignation at wrong, are all called in to foster his rancor, until moderation seems to himself scarcely less than a crime, and he talks, and especially writes, as if he were bereft of reason. In modern life, hereditary hatred, the active dislike of a man because his grandfather was a brute, is considered foolish, and is disowned — though few men are entirely free from unconscious antipathies of the kind, or could conceive of a Lord Ruthven as a benevolent philanthropist — but where a nation is the subject of hatred, distance of time matters nothing. Half Europe hates the Jews of to-day, because their remote ancestors executed Christ; the Greeks, who have not held Byzantium for four hundred years, still suffer from the opprobrium attaching to the word "Byzantine;" and educated men to this hour hate Russians hard, because Russian proprietors, like English proprietors in the West Indies, were occasionally frightfully cruel to their serfs. Nothing the serf-owners ever did surpasses the deeds narrated before the last committee of inquiry into slavery in the West Indies, — but what then? So strong, indeed, is this cause of hatred, that we question whether if a people arose who called themselves Carthaginians, English educated men would ever quite overcome an inclination to believe that they were abnormally cruel. Men who hate nations actually read themselves into blazing fury by studying their history, and are ready to refuse votes to Irishmen because their fathers passed a confiscating act, and delight in Dutch defeats before Acheen because of the massacre of Amboyna. It is just the same about evidence. An Englishman believes a man a fool who is always worrying himself about things his adversary says, who listens to every morsel of tittle-tattle about epigrams against him which his adversary has made, or who greedily receives stories of insults offered by the enemy's hangers-on to his servants. He quotes all manner of proverbs about listeners, asks how society is to go on if everybody "repeats," and is positively angry if malicious gossip is traced to inferior servants. If, however, the enemy is a nation, all these rules are discarded. It is absurd to believe that John contemplates stealing your cabbages, particularly as, if the gout were away, you could kick John off the premises, but to

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

believe that the nation called "John" would not steal your mortgages is suicidal trustfulness. You are besotted to think that Brown, who is half insolvent, wants a law-suit with you, who have the bank of England in your breeches-pocket, but to suppose that Czar Alexander wants a war with England is only far-seeing and wise. If your coachman tells you that your groom tells him that your enemy's stable-boy was heard to say he should like to duck the said groom, you smile, and bid him be silent; but if a telegram-maker reports that Count Ignatieff said jestingly that a dragoman in English service ought to be shot, it is proper to massacre armies to wipe that insult out. A merchant who believed about a rival half the rubbish that England has believed for the past fortnight about Russia would be regarded as out of his mind, but the rival being a nation, he who believed most was regarded as necessarily the acutest man. In private life, and as regards individuals, even Dr. Johnson, who "loved a good hater," would have asked on what authority statements justifying hatred were made; but in international life any authority is good enough, and a story utterly improbable in itself is swallowed down on the authority of a perfectly anonymous bulletin-maker, who may, for aught that appears, have been paid to invent it, or may be gratifying a sardonic humor at the expense of the credulous, because irritated Englishman. The hatred, in fact, being supposed to be virtuous, is fostered until it becomes a passion, and rejects all control from either reason or experience. Othello's mind about Desdemona was a judicial mind when compared with the mind of a good many Englishmen about Count Ignatieff, and Dissenting ministers are hardly more credulous about General Bex than English Tories about Prince Gortschakoff. And finally, the man who hates a nation, with reason or without, always desires to transmute his hatred into an act. At the exact point where the hater hating an individual usually stops, the hater hating a nation usually boils over. The individual must not only hate very hard but be very bad, who throws vitriol at his foe, but if the foe is a nation, that is the first thing he thinks of. He thinks it actually noble to let loose barbarism at him, and counts up the Kurds or the Arabs he might employ with a glow of gratified pride, in which he perceives no wickedness whatever. Only an oppressive man relies on his wealth to ruin his opponent by taking him from court to court, but if the opponent is a nation, kindly men will wag their purses, and exult in the number of times they can commence a new campaign.

Of course, the real origin of all this rancor is ignorance, an inability on the part of the hater to recognize that he is hating persons, and not merely a force like a flood or a stream, which he has to dam up; but that excuse is valid only at the price of the hater's reputation for knowledge and discernment. He ought to know what he is hating, ought to attribute sane motives, ought to be self-controlled enough to test evidence and distinguish among informants. That he is not so, that an imaginary story of insult to an envoy can make a nation rush to war, is one of the many evils which attend the progress of the world towards democracy, and one of the many which impose day by day heavier responsibilities on those who guide. We think they are being felt, and that within a few years the statesman who can madly hate a nation will be regarded as society now regards the man who can madly hate an individual, as a little mad, very bad, and dangerous to know. Fifty years hence statesmen will regard nations as leading counsel regard opponents at the bar, as persons they may quarrel with if provoked, and must contend with in business, but for the rest, as human beings exactly in essentials like themselves. Whether average men, however, will attain that amount of wisdom, we doubt. They will hardly in any reasonable time become wiser than the politicians who let loose out of rancor Red Indians on people of their own race, creed, and language, or the peers who to-day would declare war on Russia because they say Russia is ambitious, tricky, and strong.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXII. | No. 1765.—April 13, 1878. | From Beginning, Vol. CXXXVII.

CONTENTS.

I. EQUALITY. By Matthew Arnold, . . . Fortnightly Review, ... 67
II. ERICA. Part XVIII. Translated for THE LIVING AGE, from the German of . . Frau von Ingersleben, ... 80
III. THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE AS SPOKEN AND WRITTEN. By Francis W. Newman, . . Contemporary Review, ... 94
IV. WITHIN THE PRECINCTS. By Mrs. Oliphant. Part V., ... Advance Sheets, ... 103
V. ON THE DECAY OF FINE MANNERS, . . Cornhill Magazine, ... 110
VI. ON TEACHING ENGLISH. By Francis W. Newman, ... Fraser's Magazine, ... 115
VII. MADONNA DUNYA. By Emily Pfeiffer, . Contemporary Review, ... 117
VIII. THE LAST OF THE GASES, ... Nature, ... 121
IX. THE CENTENARY OF VOLTAIRE, . . . Pall Mall Gazette, ... 123
X. THE USE AND ABUSE OF PRINCES, . . Tatler, ... 125
XI. THE GREEN FLAG OF THE PROPHET, . . Chambers' Journal, ... 126

POETRY.

TWO CITIES, ... 66
A STRANGE SINGER, ... 66
HOMEWARD, ... 66
HACIA CASA, ... 66
MADONNA DUNYA, ... 117

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY

LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

For EIGHT DOLLARS, remitted directly to the Publishers, the LIVING AGE will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of THE LIVING AGE is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of LITTELL & GAY.

Single Numbers of THE LIVING AGE, 18 cents.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

TWO CITIES.

SIDE by side rise the two great cities,
Afar on the traveller's sight;
One, black with the dust of labor,
One, solemnly still and white.
Apart, and yet together,
They are reached in a dying breath,
But a river flows between them,
And the river's name is — death.

Apart, and yet together,
Together and yet apart,
As the child may die at midnight
On the mother's living heart.
So close come the two great cities,
With only the river between;
And the grass in the one is trampled,
But the grass in the other is green.

The hills with uncovered foreheads,
Like the disciples meet,
While ever the flowing water
Is washing their hallowed feet.
And out on the glassy ocean,
The sails in the golden gloom
Seem to me but moving shadows
Of the white enmarbled tomb.

Anon, from the hut and the palace,
Anon, from early till late,
They come, rich and poor together,
Asking alms at thy beautiful gate.
And never had life a guerdon
So welcome to all to give,
In the land where the living are dying,
As the land where the dead may live.

O silent city of refuge
On the way to the city o'erhead!
The gleam of thy marble milestones
Tells the distance we are from the dead.
Full of feet, but a city untrodden,
Full of hands, but a city unbuilt,
Full of strangers who know not even
That their life-cup lies there spilt.

They know not the tomb from the palace,
They dream not they ever have died:
God be thanked they never will know it
Till they live on the other side!
From the doors that death shut coldly
On the face of their last lone woe:
They came to thy glades for shelter
Who had nowhere else to go.

REV. S. MILLER HAGERMAN.

A STRANGE SINGER.

JOY'S the shyest bird
Mortal ever heard;
Listen rapt and silent when he sings;
Do not seek to see,
Lest the vision be
But a flutter of departing wings.

Straight down out of heaven
Drops the fiery leaven,
Beating, burning, rising in his breast;
Never, never long
Canst thou bear the song,
All too high for labor or for rest.

Hope can sit and sing
With a folded wing,
Long contented in a narrow cage;
Patience on the nest,
Hour by hour will rest,
Brooding tender things in hermitage.

Singers true and sweet,
Mockers bright and fleet,
Close about thy door they flit and call;
One that will not stay
Draws thy heart away;
Listen! listen! It is more than all.

Spectator. CARL SPENSER.

HOMEWARD.

"There remaineth a rest."

[The following poem, which was published in No. 1750 of THE LIVING AGE, is reprinted by request, together with a Spanish translation of the same, which appeared in the Boston Advertiser. ED.]

THE day dies slowly in the western sky;
The sunset splendor fades, and wan and cold
The far peaks wait the sunrise; cheerily
The goatherd calls his wanderers to their fold:
My weary soul, that fain would cease to roam,
Take comfort; evening bringeth all things home.

Homeward the swift-winged seagull takes its flight;
The ebbing tide breaks softly on the sand;
The red-sailed boats draw shoreward for the night;
The shadows deepen over sea and land:
Be still, my soul; thine hour shall also come;
Behold, one evening God shall lead thee home.

H. M.

HACIA CASA.

"Luego te resta un descanso."

LENTO el dia va declinando al ocaso;
El brillante sol decae, y su levante
Aguardan las sierras lejanas; con alegre paso
El cabrero se retira con sus rebaños delante:
O alma mia, tan oprimida y lasa,
Confórtate, que la noche lleva á todos á casa.

La gaviota aligera se refugia á su nido;
Las olas menguantes se rompen en la ribera;
Los barcos sol-dorados hácia tierra han ido;
Las sombras se ofuscan sobre el mar y la tierra:
Aquiétate, mi alma, tu hora tambien vendrá,
Que Dios una noche á casa te guiará.

C. F. B.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The Fortnightly Review.

EQUALITY.*

BY MATTHEW ARNOLD.

THERE is a maxim which we all know, which occurs in our copy-books, which occurs in that solemn and beautiful formulary against which the Nonconformist genius is just now so angrily chafing — the burial service. The maxim is this: "Evil communications corrupt good manners." It is taken from one of the chapters of the Epistles to the Corinthians; but originally it is a line of poetry, of Greek poetry. Quid Athenis et Hierosolymis? asks a father; what have Athens and Jerusalem to do with one another? Well, at any rate, the Jerusalemite Paul, exhorting his converts, enforces what he is saying by a verse of Athenian comedy, a verse, probably, from the great master of that comedy, a man unsurpassed for fine and just observation of human life, Menander. Φθείρουσιν ἤθη χρῆσθ' ὁμιλίαι κακαί — "Evil communications corrupt good manners."

In that collection of single, sententious lines, printed at the end of Menander's fragments, where we now find the maxim quoted by St. Paul, there is another striking maxim, not alien certainly to the language of the Christian religion, but which has not passed into our copy-books: "Choose equality and flee greed." The same profound observer, who laid down the maxim so universally accepted by us that it has become commonplace, the maxim that evil communications corrupt good manners, laid down too, as a no less sure result of the accurate study of human life, this other maxim also: "Choose equality and flee greed" — Ἰσότητα δ' αἱροῦ καὶ πλεονεξίαν φύγε.

Pleonexia, or greed, the wishing and trying for the bigger share, we know under the name of covetousness. We understand by covetousness something different from what pleonexia really means: we understand by it the longing for other people's goods; and covetousness, so understood, it is a commonplace of morals and of religion with us that we should shun. As to the duty of pursuing equality, there is no such consent amongst us. Indeed, the consent is the other way, the consent is against equality. Equality before the law we all take as a matter of course; that is not the equality which we mean when we talk of equality. When we talk of equality, we understand social equality; and for equality in this Frenchified sense of the term almost everybody in England has a hard word. About four years ago Lord Beaconsfield held it up to reprobation in a speech to the students at Glasgow; a speech so interesting, that being asked soon afterwards to hold a discourse at Glasgow, I said that if one spoke there at all at that time it would be impossible to speak on any other subject than equality. However, it is a great way to Glasgow, and I never yet have been able to go and speak there. But the testimonies against equality have been steadily accumulating from the date of Lord Beaconsfield's Glasgow speech down to the present hour, when Sir Erskine May winds up his new and important "History of Democracy" by saying: "France has aimed at social equality. The fearful troubles through which she has passed have checked her prosperity, demoralized her society, and arrested the intellectual growth of her people." Mr. Froude is more his own master than I am, and he has been able to go to Edinburgh and to speak there upon equality. Mr. Froude told his hearers that equality splits a nation into "a multitude of disconnected units," that "the masses require leaders whom they can trust," and that "the natural leaders in a healthy country are the gentry." And only just before the "History of Democracy" came out, we had that exciting passage of arms between Mr. Lowe and Mr. Gladstone, where equality, poor thing, received blows from them both. Mr. Lowe declared that "no concession should be made to the cry for equality, unless it appears that the State is menaced with more danger by its refusal than by its admission. No such case exists now or ever has existed in this country." And Mr. Gladstone replied that equality was so utterly unattractive to the people of this country, inequality was so dear to their hearts, that to talk of conces-

* Address delivered at the Royal Institution.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

sions being made to the cry for equality was absurd. "There is no broad political idea," says Mr. Gladstone quite truly, "which has entered less into the formation of the political system of this country than the love of equality." And he adds: "It is not the love of equality which has carried into every corner of the country the distinct undeniable popular preference, wherever other things are equal, for a man who is a lord over a man who is not. The love of freedom itself is hardly stronger in England than the love of aristocracy." Mr. Gladstone goes on to quote a saying of Sir William Molesworth, that with our people the love of aristocracy "is a religion." And he concludes in his copious and eloquent way: "Call this love of inequality by what name you please — the complement of the love of freedom, or its negative pole, or the shadow which the love of freedom casts, or the reverberation of its voice in the halls of the constitution — it is an active, living, and life-giving power, which forms an inseparable essential element in our political habits of mind, and asserts itself at every step in the processes of our system."

And yet, on the other side, we have a consummate critic of life like Menander, delivering, as if there were no doubt at all about the matter, the maxim: "Choose equality!" An Englishman with any curiosity must surely be inclined to ask himself how such a maxim can ever have got established, and taken rank along with "Evil communications corrupt good manners." Moreover, we see that among the French, who have suffered so grievously, as we hear, from choosing equality, the most gifted spirits continue to believe passionately in it, nevertheless. "The human ideal, as well as the social ideal, is," says George Sand, "to achieve equality." She calls equality "the goal of man and the law of the future." She asserts that France is the most civilized of nations, and that its pre-eminence in civilization it owes to equality.

But Menander lived a long while ago, and George Sand was an enthusiast. Perhaps their differing from us about equality need not trouble us much. France, too, counts for but one nation, as England counts for one, also. Equality may be a religion with the people of France, as inequality, we are told, is a religion with the people of England. But what do other nations seem to think about the matter? Now this is most certainly not a lecture on law and the rules of bequest. But it it evident that in the societies of Europe, with a constitution of property such as that which the feudal Middle Age left them with — a constitution of property full of inequality — the state of the law of bequest shows us how far each society wishes the inequality to continue. The families in possession of great estates will not break them up if they can help it. The owners will do all they can, by entail and settlement, to prevent their successors from breaking them up. They will preserve inequality. Freedom of bequest, then, the power of making entails and settlements, is sure, in an old European country like ours, to maintain inequality. And with us, who have the religion of inequality, the power of entailing and settling, and of willing property as one likes, exists, as is well known, in singular fulness — greater fulness than in any country of the Continent. The proposal of a measure such as the Real Estates Intestacy Bill is, in a country like ours, perfectly puerile. A European country like ours, wishing not to preserve inequality but to abate it, can only do so by interfering with the freedom of bequest. This is what Turgot, the wisest of French statesmen, pronounced before the Revolution to be necessary, and what was done in France at the great Revolution. The Code Napoléon, the actual law of France, forbids entails altogether, and leaves a man free to dispose of but one-fourth of his property, of whatever kind, if he have three children or more, of one-third if he have two children, of one-half if he have but one child. Only in the rare case, therefore, of a man's having but one child, can that child take the whole of his father's property. If there are two children, two-thirds of the property must be equally divided between them; if there are more than two, three-fourths. In this way has France, desiring equality, sought to bring equality about.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Now the interesting point for us is, I say, to know how far other European communities, left in the same situation with us and France, having immense inequalities of class and property created for them by the Middle Age, have dealt with these inequalities by means of the law of bequest. Do they leave bequest free, as we do? then, like us, they are for inequality. Do they interfere with the freedom of bequest, as France does? then, like France, they are for equality. And we shall be most interested, surely, by what the most civilized European communities do in this matter — communities such as those of Germany, Italy, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland. And among those communities we are most concerned, I think, with such as, in the conditions of freedom and of self-government which they demand for their life, are most like ourselves. Germany, for instance, we shall less regard, because the conditions which the Germans seem to accept for their life are so unlike what we demand for ours; there is so much personal government there, so much Junkerism, militarism, officialism; the community is so much more trained to submission than we could bear, so much more used to be, as the popular phrase is, sat upon. Countries where the community has more a will of its own, or can more show it, are the most important for our present purpose — such countries as Belgium, Holland, Italy, Switzerland. Well, Belgium adopts purely and simply, as to bequest and inheritance, the provisions of the Code Napoléon. Holland adopts them purely and simply. Italy has adopted them substantially. Switzerland is a republic, where the general feeling against inequality is strong, and where it might seem less necessary, therefore, to guard against inequality by interfering with the power of bequest. Each canton has its own law of bequest. In Geneva, Vaud, and Zurich — perhaps the three most distinguished cantons — it is identical with that of France. In Berne, one-third is the fixed proportion which a man is free to dispose of by will; the rest of his property must go among his children equally. In all the other cantons there are regulations of a like kind. Germany, I was saying, will interest us less than these freer countries. In Germany — though there is not the English freedom of bequest, but the rule of the Roman law prevails, the rule obliging the parent to assign a certain portion to each child — in Germany entails and settlements in favor of an eldest son are generally permitted. But there is a remarkable exception. The Rhine countries, which in the early part of this century were under French rule, and which then received the Code Napoléon, these countries refused to part with it when they were restored to Germany; and to this day Rhenish Prussia, Rhenish Hesse, and Baden, have the French law of bequest, forbidding entails, and dividing property in the way we have seen.

The United States of America have the English liberty of bequest. But the United States are, like Switzerland, a republic, with the republican sentiment for equality. Theirs is, besides, a new society; it did not inherit the system of classes and of property which feudalism formed in Europe. The class by which they were settled was not a class with feudal habits and ideas. It is notorious that to hold great landed estates and to entail them upon an eldest son, is neither the practice nor the desire of any class in America. I remember hearing it said to an American in England: "But, after all, you have the same freedom of bequest and inheritance as we have, and if a man to-morrow chose in your country to entail a great landed estate rigorously, what could you do?" The American answered: "Set aside the will on the ground of insanity."

You see we are in a manner taking the votes for and against equality. We ought not to leave out our own colonies. In general they are, of course, like the United States of America, new societies. They have the English liberty of bequest. But they have no feudal past, and were not settled by a class with feudal habits and ideas. Nevertheless it happens that there have arisen, in Australia, exceedingly large estates, and that the proprietors seek to keep them together. And what have we seen happen lately? An act has been

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

passed which in effect inflicts a fine upon every proprietor who holds a landed estate of more than a certain value. The measure has been severely blamed in England; to Mr. Lowe such a "concession to the cry for equality" appears, as we might expect, pregnant with warnings. At present I neither praise it nor blame it; I simply take it as one of the votes for equality. And is it not a singular thing, I ask you, that while we have the religion of inequality, and can hardly bear to hear equality spoken of, there should be, among the nations of Europe which have politically most in common with us, and in the United States of America, and in our own colonies, this diseased appetite, as we must think it, for equality? Perhaps Lord Beaconsfield may not have turned your minds to this subject as he turned mine, and what Menander or George Sand happen to have said may not interest you much; yet surely when you think of it, when you see what a practical revolt against inequality there is amongst so many people not so very unlike to ourselves, you must feel some curiosity to sift the matter a little further, and may be not ill-disposed to follow me while I try to do so.

I have received a letter from Clerkenwell, in which the writer reproaches me for lecturing about equality at this which he calls "the most aristocratic and exclusive place out." I am here because your secretary invited me. But I am glad to treat the subject of equality before such an audience as this. Some of you may remember that I have roughly divided our English society into barbarians, Philistines, populace, each of them with their prepossessions, and loving to hear what gratifies them. But I remarked at the same time, that scattered throughout all these three classes were a certain number of generous and humane souls, lovers of man's perfection, detached from the prepossessions of the class to which they might naturally belong, and desirous that he who speaks to them should, as Plato says, not try to please his fellow-servants, but his true and legitimate masters, the heavenly gods. I feel sure that among the members and frequenters of an institution like this, such humane souls are apt to congregate in numbers. Even from the reproach which my Clerkenwell friend brings against you of being too aristocratic, I derive some comfort. Only I give to the term aristocratic a rather wide extension. An accomplished American, much known and much esteemed in this country, the late Mr. Charles Sumner, says that what particularly struck him in England was the large class of gentlemen as distinct from the nobility, and the abundance amongst them of serious knowledge, high accomplishment, and refined taste — taste fastidious perhaps, says Mr. Sumner, to excess, but erring on virtue's side. And he goes on: "I do not know that there is much difference between the manners and social observances of the highest classes of England and those of the corresponding classes of France and Germany; but in the rank immediately below the highest — as among the professions, or military men, or literary men — there you will find that the Englishmen have the advantage. They are better educated and better bred, more careful in their personal habits and in social conventions more refined." Mr. Sumner's remark is just and important; this large class of gentlemen in the professions, the services, literature, politics — and a good contingent is now added from business also — this large class, not of the nobility but with the accomplishments and taste of an upper class, is something peculiar to England. Of this class I may probably assume that my present audience is in large measure composed. It is aristocratic in this sense, that it has the tastes of a cultivated class, a certain high standard of civilization. Well, it is in its effects upon civilization that equality interests me. And I speak to an audience with a high standard of civilization. If I say certain things in certain classes do not come up to a high standard of civilization, I need not prove how and why they do not; you will feel whether they do or no. If they do not, I need not prove that this is a bad thing, that a high standard of civilization is desirable; you will instinctively feel that it is. Instead of calling this "the most aristocratic and exclusive place out," I conceive of it as a civilized place; and in speaking about civilization half one's labor is saved when one speaks about it among those who are civilized.

Politics are forbidden here; but equality is not a question of English politics. The abstract right to equality may, indeed, be a question of speculative politics. French equality appeals to this abstract natural right as its support. It goes back to a state of nature where all were equal, and supposes that "the poor consented," as Rousseau says, "to the existence of rich people," reserving always a natural right to return to the state of nature. It supposes that a child has a natural right to his equal share in his father's goods.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

The principle of abstract right, says Mr. Lowe, has never been admitted in England, and is false. I so entirely agree with him, that I run no risk of offending by discussing equality upon the basis of this principle. So far as I can sound human consciousness, I cannot, as I have often said, perceive that man is really conscious of any abstract natural rights at all. The natural right to have work found for one to do, the natural right to have food found for one to eat, rights sometimes so confidently and so indignantly asserted, seem to me quite baseless. It cannot be too often repeated — peasants and workmen have no natural rights, not one. Only we ought instantly to add, that kings and nobles have none either. If it is the sound English doctrine that all rights are created by law and are based on expediency, and are alterable as the public advantage may require, certainly that orthodox doctrine is mine. Property is created and maintained by law. It would disappear in that state of private war and scramble which legal society supersedes. Legal society creates, for the common good, the right of property, and for the common good that right is by legal society limitable. That property should exist, and that it should be held with a sense of security and with a power of disposal, may be taken, by us here at any rate, as a settled matter of expediency. With these conditions a good deal of inequality is inevitable. But that the power of disposal should be practically unlimited, that the inequality should be enormous, or that the degree of inequality admitted at one time should be admitted always — this is by no means so certain. The right of bequest was in early times, as Sir Henry Maine and Mr. Mill have pointed out, seldom recognized. In later times it has been limited in many countries in the way that we have seen; even in England itself it is not formally quite unlimited. The question is one of expediency. It is assumed, I grant, with great unanimity amongst us, that our signal inequality of classes and property is expedient for our civilization and welfare. But this assumption, of which the distinguished personages who adopt it seem so sure that they think it needless to produce grounds for it, is just what we have to examine.

Now, there is a sentence of Sir Erskine May, whom I have already quoted, which will bring us straight to the very point that I wish to raise. Sir Erskine May, after saying, as you have heard, that France has pursued social equality, and has come to fearful troubles, demoralization, and intellectual stoppage by doing so, continues thus: "Yet is she high, if not the first in the scale of civilized nations." Why, here is a curious thing, surely! A nation pursues social equality supposed to be an utterly false and baneful ideal; it arrives, as might have been expected, at fearful misery and deterioration by doing so; and yet, at the same time, it is high, if not the first, in the scale of civilized nations. What do we mean by civilized? Sir Erskine May does not seem to have asked himself the question. So we will try to answer it for ourselves. Civilization is the humanization of man in society. To be humanized is to comply with the true law of our human nature: servare modum, finemque tenere, naturamque sequi, says Lucan; "to keep our measure, and to hold fast our end, and to follow nature." To be humanized is to make progress towards this, our true and full humanity. And to be civilized is to make progress towards this in civil society; in that civil society "without which," says Burke, "man could not by any possibility arrive at the perfection of which his nature is capable, nor even make a remote and faint approach to it." To be the most civilized of nations, therefore, is to be the nation which comes nearest to human perfection in the state which that perfection essentially demands. And a nation which has been brought by the pursuit of social equality to moral deterioration, intellectual stoppage, and fearful troubles, is perhaps the nation which has come nearest to human perfection in that state which such perfection essentially demands! M. Michelet himself, who would deny the demoralization and the stoppage, and call the fearful troubles a sublime expiation for the sins of the whole world, could hardly say more for France than this. Certainly Sir Erskine May never intended to say so much. But into what a difficulty has he somehow run himself, and what a good action would it be to extricate him from it! Let us see whether the performance of that good action may not also be a way of clearing our minds as to the uses of equality.

When we talk of man's advance towards his full humanity, we think of an advance, not along one line only, but several. Certain races and nations, as we know, are on certain lines pre-eminent and representative. The Hebrew nation was pre-eminent on one great line. "What nation," it was justly said by their lawgiver, "hath

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

statues and judgments so righteous as the law which I set before you this day? Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations which shall hear all these statutes and say: Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people!" The Hellenic race was pre-eminent on other lines. Isocrates could say of Athens: "Our city has left the rest of the world so far behind in philosophy and eloquence, that those educated by Athens have become the teachers of the rest of mankind; and so well has she done her part, that the name of Greeks seems no longer to stand for a race, but to stand for intelligence itself, and they who share in our culture are called Greeks even before those who are merely of our own blood." The power of intellect and science, the power of beauty, the power of social life and manners — these are what Greece so felt, and fixed, and may stand for. They are great elements in our humanization. The power of conduct is another great element; and this was so felt and fixed by Israel that we can never with justice refuse to allow Israel, in spite of all his shortcomings, to stand for it.

So you see that in being humanized we have to move along several lines, and that on certain lines certain nations find their strength and take a lead. We may elucidate the thing yet further. Nations now existing may be said to feel or to have felt the power of this or that element in our humanization so signally that they are characterized by it. No one who knows this country would deny that it is characterized, in a remarkable degree, by a sense of the power of conduct. Our feeling for religion is one part of this; our industry is another. What foreigners so much remark in us — our public spirit, our love, amidst all our liberty, for public order and for stability — are parts of it too. The power of beauty was so felt by the Italians that their art revived, as we know, the almost lost idea of beauty, and the serious and successful pursuit of it. Cardinal Antonelli, speaking to me about the education of the common people in Rome, said that they were illiterate indeed, but whoever mingled with them at any public show, and heard them pass judgment on the beauty or ugliness of what came before them — "E brutto" "E bello" — would find that their judgment agreed admirably, in general, with just what the most cultivated people would say. Even at the present time, then, the Italians are pre-eminent in feeling the power of beauty. The power of knowledge, in the same way, is eminently an influence with the Germans. This by no means implies, as is sometimes supposed, a high and fine general culture. What it implies is a strong sense of the necessity of knowing scientifically, as the expression is, the things which have to be known by us — of knowing them systematically, by the regular and right process, and in the only real way. And this sense the Germans especially have. Finally, there is the power of social life and manners. And even the Athenians themselves, perhaps, have hardly felt this power so much as the French.

Voltaire, in a famous passage, where he extols the age of Louis XIV. and ranks it with the chief epochs in the civilization of our race, has to specify the gift bestowed on us by the age of Louis XIV., as the age of Pericles, for instance, bestowed on us its art and literature, and the Italian Renascence its revival of art and literature. And Voltaire shows all his acuteness in fixing on the gift to name. It is not the sort of gift which we expect to see named. The great gift of the age of Louis XIV. to the world, says Voltaire, was this: l'esprit de société, the spirit of society, the social spirit. And another French writer, looking for the good points in the old French nobility, says that this at any rate is to be said in their favor: they established a high and charming ideal of social intercourse and manners, for a nation formed to profit by such an ideal, and which has profited by it ever since. And in America, perhaps, we see the disadvantages of having social equality before there has been any such high standard of social life and manners formed. We are not disposed in England, most of us, to attach all this importance to social intercourse and manners. Yet Burke says: "There ought to be a system of manners in every nation which a well-formed mind would be disposed to relish." And the power of social life and manners is truly, as we have seen, one of the great elements in our humanization. Unless we have cultivated it we are incomplete. The impulse for cultivating it is not, indeed, a moral impulse. It is by no means identical with the moral impulse to help our neighbor and to do him good. Yet in many ways it works to a like end. It brings men together, makes them feel the need of one another, be considerate of one another, understand one another. But, above all things, it is a promoter of equality. It is by the humanity of their manners that men are made

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

equal. "A man thinks to show himself my equal," says Goethe, "by being grob — that is to say, coarse and rude; he does not show himself my equal, he shows himself grob." But a community having humane manners is a community of equals, and in such a community great social inequalities have really no meaning, while they are at the same time a menace and an embarrassment to perfect ease of social intercourse. A community with the spirit of society is eminently, therefore, a community with the spirit of equality. A nation with a genius for society, like the French or the Athenians, is irresistibly drawn towards equality. From the first moment when the French people, with its congenital sense for the power of social intercourse and manners, came into existence, it was on its road to equality. When it had once got a high standard of social manners abundantly established, and at the same time the natural, material necessity for the feudal inequality of classes and property pressed upon it no longer, the French people introduced equality and made the French Revolution. It was not the spirit of philanthropy which mainly caused that Revolution, neither was it the spirit of envy; it was the spirit of society.

The well-being of the many comes out more and more distinctly, as time goes on, as the object we must pursue. An individual or a class, concentrating their efforts upon their own well-being exclusively, do but beget troubles both for others and for themselves also. No individual life can be truly prosperous, passed, as Obermann says, in the midst of men who suffer — passée au milieu des générations qui souffrent. To the noble soul, it cannot be happy; to the ignoble, it cannot be secure. Socialistic and communistic schemes have generally, however, a fatal defect; they are content with too low and material a standard of well-being. That instinct of perfection, which is the master-power in humanity, always rebels at this, and frustrates the work. Many are to be made partakers of well-being, true; but the ideal of well-being is not to be, on that account, lowered and coarsened. M. de Laveleye, the political economist, who is a Belgian and a Protestant, and whose testimony therefore we may the more readily take about France, says that France, being the country of Europe where the soil is more divided than anywhere except in Switzerland and Norway, is at the same time the country where material well-being is most widely spread, where wealth has of late years increased most, and where population is least outrunning the limits which, for the comfort and progress of the working-classes themselves, seem necessary. This may go for a good deal. It supplies an answer to what Sir Erskine May says about the bad effects of equality upon French prosperity. But I will quote to you from Mr. Hamerton what goes, I think, for yet more. Mr. Hamerton is an excellent observer and reporter, and has lived for many years in France. He says of the French peasantry that they are exceedingly ignorant. So they are. But he adds: "They are at the same time full of intelligence; their manners are excellent, they have delicate preceptions, they have tact, they have a certain refinement which a brutalized peasantry could not possibly have. If you talk to one of them at his own home, or in his field, he will enter into conversation with you quite easily, and sustain his part in a perfectly becoming way, with a pleasant combination of dignity and quiet humor. The interval between him and a Kentish laborer is enormous." This is indeed worth your attention. Of course all mankind are, as Mr. Gladstone says, of our own flesh and blood. But you know how often it happens in England that a cultivated person, a person of the sort that Mr. Charles Sumner describes, talking to one of the lower class, or even of the middle class, feels, and cannot but feel, that there is somehow a wall of partition between himself and the other, that they seem to belong to two different worlds. Thoughts, feelings, perception, susceptibilities, language, manners — everything — are different. Whereas, with a French peasant, the most cultivated man may find himself in sympathy, feel that he is talking to an equal. This is an experience which has been made a thousand times, and which may be made again any day. And it may be carried beyond the range of mere conversation, it may be extended to things like pleasures, recreations, eating and drinking, and so on. In general the pleasures, recreations, eating and drinking of English people, when once you get below that class which Mr. Charles Sumner calls the class of gentlemen, are to one of that class unpalatable and impossible. In France there is not this incompatibility. The gentleman feels himself in a world, not alien or repulsive, but a world where people make the same sort of demands upon life, in things of this sort, which he himself does. In all these respects France is the country where the people, as distinguished from a

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

wealthy, refined class, most lives what we call a humane life, the life of civilized man. Of course, fastidious persons can and do pick holes in it. There is just now, in France, a noblesse newly revived, full of pretensions, full of airs and graces and disdains; but its sphere is narrow, and out of its own sphere no one cares very much for it. There is a general equality in a humane kind of life. This is the secret of the passionate attachment with which France inspires all Frenchmen, in spite of her fearful troubles, her checked prosperity, her disconnected units, and the rest of it. There is so much of the goodness and agreeableness of life there, and for so many. It is the secret of her having been able to attach so ardently to her the German and Protestant people of Alsace, while we have been so little able to attach the Celtic and Catholic people of Ireland. France brings the Alsatians into a social system so full of the goodness and agreeableness of life; we offer to the Irish no such attraction. It is the secret, finally, of the prevalence which we have remarked in other Continental countries of a legislation tending, like that of France, to social equality. The social system which equality creates in France is, in the eyes of others, such a giver of the goodness and agreeableness of life, that they seek to get the goodness by getting the equality.

Yet France has had her fearful troubles, as Sir Erskine May justly says. She suffers, too, he adds, from demoralization and intellectual stoppage. Let us admit, if he likes, this to be true also. His error is that he attributes all this to equality. Equality, as we have seen, has brought France to a really admirable and enviable pitch of humanization in one important line. And this, the work of equality, is so much a good in Sir Erskine May's eyes, that he has mistaken it for the whole of which it is a part, frankly identifies it with civilization, and is inclined to pronounce France the most civilized of nations. But we have seen how much goes to full humanization, to true civilization, besides the power of social life and manners. There is the power of conduct, the power of intellect and knowledge, the power of beauty. The power of conduct is the greatest of all. And without in the least wishing to preach, I must observe, as a mere matter of natural fact and experience, that for the power of conduct France has never had anything like the same sense which she has had for the power of social life and manners. Michelet, himself a Frenchman, gives us the reason why the Reformation did not succeed in France. It did not succeed, he says, because la France ne voulait pas de réforme morale — moral reform France would not have, and the Reformation was above all a moral movement. The sense in France for the power of conduct has not greatly deepened, I think, since. The sense for the power of intellect and knowledge has not been adequate either. The sense for beauty has not been adequate. Intelligence and beauty have been, in general, but so far reached as they can be and are reached by men who, of the elements of perfect humanization, lay thorough hold upon one only — the power of social intercourse and manners. I speak of France in general; she has had, and she has, individuals who stand out and who form exceptions. Well then, if a nation laying no true hold upon the powers of beauty and knowledge, and a most failing and feeble hold upon the power of conduct, comes to demoralization and intellectual stoppage and fearful troubles, we need not be inordinately surprised. What we should rather marvel at is the healing and bountiful operation of nature, whereby the laying firm hold on one real element in our humanization has had for France results so beneficent.

And thus, when Sir Erskine May gets bewildered between France's equality and fearful troubles on the one hand, and the civilization of France on the other, let us suggest to him that perhaps he is bewildered by his data because he combines them ill. France has not exemplary disaster and ruin as the fruits of equality, and at the same time, and independently of this, an exemplary civilization. She has a large measure of happiness and success as the fruits of equality, and she has a very large measure of dangers and troubles as the fruits of something else.

We have more to do, however, than to help Sir Erskine May out of his scrape about France. We have to see whether the considerations which we have been employing may not be of use to us about England.

We shall not have much difficulty in admitting whatever good is to be said of ourselves, and we will try not to be unfair by excluding all that is not so favorable. Indeed, our less favorable side is the one which we should be the most anxious to note, in order that we may mend it. But we will begin with the good. Our people has energy and honesty as its good characteristics. We have a strong sense for

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the chief power in the life and progress of man — the power of conduct. So far we speak of the English people as a whole. Then we have a rich, refined, and splendid aristocracy. And we have, according to Mr. Charles Sumner's acute and true remark, a class of gentlemen, not of the nobility, but well-bred, cultivated, and refined, larger than is to be found in any other country. For these last we have Mr. Sumner's testimony. As to the splendor of our aristocracy, all the world is agreed. Then we have a middle class and a lower class; and they, after all, are the immense bulk of the nation.

Let us see how the civilization of these classes appears to a Frenchman, who has witnessed, in his own country, the considerable humanization of these classes by equality. To such an observer our middle class divides itself into a serious portion, and a gay or rowdy portion; both are a marvel to him. With the gay or rowdy portion we need not much concern ourselves; we shall figure it to our minds sufficiently if we conceive it as the source of that war-song produced in these recent days of excitement, —

> We don't want to fight, but by jingo, if we do, > We've got the ships, we've got the men, and > we've got the money too.

We may also partly judge its standard of life, and the needs of its nature, by the modern English theatre, perhaps the most contemptible in Europe. But the real strength of the English middle class is in its serious portion. And of this a Frenchman, who was here some little time ago as the correspondent, I think, of the Siècle newspaper, and whose letters were afterwards published in a volume, writes as follows. He had been attending some of the Moody and Sankey meetings, and he says: "To understand the success of Messrs. Moody and Sankey, one must be familiar with English manners, one must know the mind-deadening influence of a narrow Biblism, one must have experienced the sense of acute ennui which the aspect and the frequentation of this great division of English society produce in others, the want of elasticity and the chronic ennui which characterize this class itself, petrified in a narrow Protestantism and in a perpetual reading of the Bible." You know the French; a little more Biblism, one may take leave to say, would do them no harm. But an audience like this — and here, as I said, is the advantage of an audience like this — will have no difficulty in admitting the amount of truth which there is in the Frenchman's picture. It is the picture of a class which, driven by its sense for the power of conduct, in the beginning of the seventeenth century, entered — as I have more than once said, and as I may more than once have occasion in future to say — entered the prison of Puritanism, and had the key turned upon its spirit there for two hundred years. They did not know, good and earnest people as they were, that to the building up of human life there belong all those other powers also — the power of intellect and knowledge, the power of beauty, the power of social life and manners. And something, by what they became, they gained, and the whole nation with them; they deepened and fixed for this nation the sense of conduct. But they created a type of life and manners, of which they themselves indeed are slow to recognize the faults, but which is fatally condemned by its hideousness, its immense ennui, and against which the instinct of self-preservation in humanity rebels.

Partisans fight against facts in vain. Mr. Goldwin Smith, a writer of eloquence and power, although too prone to acerbity, is a partisan of the Puritans, and of the Nonconformists who are the special inheritors of the Puritan tradition. He angrily resents the imputation upon that Puritan type of life, on which the life of our serious middle class has been formed, that it was doomed to hideousness, to immense ennui. He protests that it had beauty, amenity, accomplishment. Let us go to facts. Charles I., who with all his faults, had the just idea that art and letters are great civilizers, made, as you know, a famous collection of pictures — our first national gallery. It was, I suppose, the best collection at that time north of the Alps. It contained nine Raphaels, eleven Correggios, twenty-eight Titians. What became of that collection? The journals of the House of Commons will tell you. There you may see the Puritan Parliament disposing of this Whitehall, or York House, collection, as follows: "Ordered, that all such pictures and statues there as are without any superstition, shall be forthwith sold. . . . Ordered, that all such pictures there as have the representation of the Second Person in Trinity upon them, shall be forthwith burnt. Ordered, that all such pictures there, as have the representation of the Virgin Mary upon them, shall be forthwith burnt." There we have the weak side of our Parliamentary government and

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

our serious middle class. We are incapable of sending Mr. Gladstone to be tried at the Old Bailey because he proclaims his antipathy to Lord Beaconsfield; a majority in our House of Commons is incapable of hailing, with frantic laughter and applause, a string of indecent jests against Christianity and its founder; but we are not, or were not, incapable of producing a Parliament which burns or sells the masterpieces of Italian art. And one may surely say of such a Puritan Parliament, and of those who determine its line for it, that they had not the spirit of beauty.

What shall we say of amenity? Milton was born a humanist, but the Puritan temper, as we know, mastered him. There is nothing more unlovely and unamiable than Milton the Puritan disputant. Some one answers his "Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce." "I mean not," rejoins Milton, "to dispute philosophy with this pork, who never read any." However, he does reply to him, and throughout the reply Milton's great joke is, that his adversary, who was anonymous, is a serving-man. "Finally, he winds up his text with much doubt and trepidation; for it may be his trenchers were not scraped, and that which never yet afforded corn of favor to his noddle — the salt-cellar — was not rubbed; and therefore, in this haste, easily granting that his answers fall foul upon each other, and praying you would not think he writes as a prophet, but as a man, he runs to the black jack, fills his flagon, spreads the table, and serves up dinner." There you have the same spirit of urbanity and amenity, as much of it and as little, as generally informs the religious controversies of our Puritan middle class to this day.

But Mr. Goldwin Smith insists, and picks out his own examplar of the Puritan type of life and manners, and even here let us follow him. He picks out the most favorable specimen he can find, Colonel Hutchinson, whose well-known memoirs, written by his widow, we have all read with interest. "Lucy Hutchinson," says Mr. Goldwin Smith, "is painting what she thought a perfect Puritan would be; and her picture presents to us not a coarse, crop-eared, and snuffling fanatic, but a highly accomplished, refined, gallant, and most amiable, though religious and seriously-minded gentleman." Let us, I say, in this example of Mr. Goldwin Smith's own choosing, lay our finger upon the points where this type deflects from the truly humane ideal. Mrs. Hutchinson relates a story which gives us a good notion of what the amiable and accomplished social intercourse, even of a picked Puritan family, was. Her husband was governor of Nottingham. He had occasion, she says, "to go and break up a private meeting in the cannoneer's chamber;" and in the cannoneer's chamber "were found some notes concerning pædobaptism, which, being brought into the governor's lodgings, his wife having perused them and compared them with the Scriptures, found not what to say against the truths they asserted concerning the misapplication of that ordinance to infants." Soon afterwards she expects her confinement, and communicates the cannoneer's doubts about pædobaptism to her husband. The fatal cannoneer makes a breach in him too. "Then he bought and read all the eminent treatises on both sides, which at that time came thick from the presses, and still was cleared in the error of the pædobaptists." Finally, Mrs. Hutchinson is confined. Then the governor "invited all the ministers to dinner, and propounded his doubt and the ground thereof to them. None of them could defend their practice with any satisfactory reason, but the tradition of the Church from the primitive times, and their main buckler of federal holiness, which Tombs and Denne had excellently overthrown. He and his wife then, professing themselves unsatisfied, desired their opinions." With the opinions I will not trouble you, but hasten to the result: "Whereupon that infant was not baptized."

No doubt to a large division of English society at this very day, that sort of dinner and discussion, and, indeed, the whole manner of life and conversation here suggested by Mrs. Hutchinson's narrative, will seem both natural and amiable, and such as to meet the needs of man both as a religious and as a social creature. You know the conversation which reigns in thousands of middle-class families at this hour about nunneries, teetotalism, the confessional, eternal punishment, ritualism, disestablishment. It goes wherever the class goes which is moulded on the Puritan type of life. In the long winter evenings of Toronto Mr. Goldwin Smith has had, probably, abundant experience of it. What is its enemy? The instinct of self-preservation in humanity. Men make crude types and try to impose them, but to no purpose. "L'homme s'agite, Dieu le mène," says Bossuet. "There are many devices in a man's heart; nevertheless the counsel of the Eternal, that shall stand." Those who offer us the Puritan

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

type of life offer us a religion not true, the claims of intellect and knowledge not satisfied, the claim of beauty not satisfied, the claim of manners not satisfied. In its strong sense for conduct that life touches truth; but its other imperfections hinder it from employing even this sense aright. The type mastered our nation for a time. Then came the reaction. The nation said: "This type, at any rate, is amiss; we are not going to be all like that." The type retired into our middle class, and fortified itself there. It seeks to endure, to emerge, to deny its own imperfections, to impose itself again; impossible! If we continue to live we must outgrow it. The very class in which it is rooted, our middle class, will have to acknowledge the type's inadequacy, will have to acknowledge the hideousness, the immense ennui of the life which this type has created, will have to transform itself thoroughly. It will have to admit the large part of truth which there is in the criticisms of our Frenchman, whom we have too long forgotten.

After our middle class he turns his attention to our lower class. And of the lower and larger portion of this, the portion not bordering on the middle class and sharing its faults, he says: "I consider this multitude to be absolutely devoid, not only of political principles, but even of the most simple notions of good and evil. Certainly it does not appeal, this mob, to the principles of '89, which you English make game of; it does not insist on the rights of man; what it wants is beer, gin, and fun." *

That is a description of what Mr. Bright would call the residuum, only our author seems to think the residuum a very large body. And its condition strikes him with amazement and horror. And surely well it may. Let us recall Mr. Hamerton's account of the most illiterate class in France; what an amount of civilization they have notwithstanding! And this is always to be understood, in hearing or reading a Frenchman's praise of England. He envies our liberty, our public spirit, our trade, our stability. But there is always reserve in his mind. He never means for a moment that he would like to change with us. Life seems to him so much better a thing in France for so many more people, that, in spite of the fearful troubles of France, it is far best to be a Frenchman. A Frenchman might agree with Mr. Cobden, that life is good in England for those people who have at least £5,000 a year. But the civilization of that immense majority who have not £5,000 a year, or £500, or even £100, of our middle and lower class, seems to him too deplorable.

And now what has this condition of our middle and lower class to tell us about equality? How is it, must we not ask, how is it that, being without fearful troubles, having, as a nation, a deep sense for conduct, having signal energy and honesty, having a splendid aristocracy, having an exceptionally large class of gentlemen, we are yet so little civilized? How is it that our middle and lower class, in spite of the individuals among them who are raised by happy gifts of nature to a more humane life, in spite of the seriousness of the middle class, in spite of the general honesty and power of true work, verus labor, which prevail throughout the lower, do yet present, as a whole, the characters which we have seen?

And really it seems as if the current of our discourse carried us of itself to but one conclusion. It seems as if we could not avoid concluding, that just as France owes her fearful troubles to other things and her civilizedness to equality, so we owe our immunity from fearful troubles to other things, and our uncivilizedness to inequality. "Knowledge is easy," says the wise man, "to him that understandeth;" easy, he means, to him who will use his mind simply and rationally, and not to make him think he can know what he cannot, or to maintain, per fas et nefas, a false thesis with which he fancies his interests to be bound up. And to him who will use his mind as the wise man recommends, surely it is easy to see that our short-comings in civilization are due to our inequality; or in other words, that the inequality of classes and property, which came to us from the Middle Age and which we maintain because we have the religion of inequality, that this constitution of things, I say, has the natural and necessary effect, under present circumstances, of materializing our upper class, vulgarizing our middle class, and brutalizing our lower class. And this is to fail in civilization.

For only just look how the facts combine themselves. I have said little as yet about our aristocratic class, except that it is splendid. Yet these, "our often very unhappy brethren," as Burke calls them, are by no means matter for nothing but ecstasy. Our charity ought certainly, as he says, to extend "a due and anxious

* So in the original.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

sensation of pity to the distresses of the miserable great." Burke's extremely strong language about their miseries and defects I will not quote. For my part, I am always disposed to marvel that human beings, in a position so false, should be so good as these are. Their reason for existing was to serve as a number of centres in a world disintegrated after the ruin of the Roman Empire, and slowly re-constituting itself. Numerous centres of material force were needed, and these a feudal aristocracy supplied. Their large and hereditary estates served this public end. The owners had a positive function, for which their estates were essential. In our modern world the function is gone; and the great estates, with an infinitely multiplied power of ministering to mere pleasure and indulgence, remain. The energy and honesty of our race does not leave itself without witness, and in no class are there more conspicuous examples of individuals raised by happy gifts of nature far above their fellows and their circumstances. But on the whole, with no necessary function to fulfil, never conversant with life as it really is, tempted, flattered, and spoiled from childhood to old age, our aristocratic class is inevitably materialized, and the more so the more the development of industry and ingenuity augments the means of luxury. Every one can see how bad is the action of such an aristocracy upon the class of newly enriched people, whose great danger is a materialistic ideal, just because it is the ideal they can easiest comprehend. The effect on society at large, and on national progress, is what we must regard. Turn even to that sphere which aristocracies think specially their own, and where they have under other circumstances been really effective — the sphere of politics. When there is need for any large forecast of the course of human affairs, for an acquaintance with the ideas which in the end sway mankind, and for an estimate of their power, aristocracies are out of their element, and materialist aristocracies most of all. In the immense spiritual movement of our day, the English aristocracy, as I have said, always reminds me of Pilate confronting the phenomenon of Christianity. Nor can a materialized class have a serious and fruitful sense for the power of beauty. They may imagine themselves in pursuit of beauty; but how often, alas, does the pursuit come to little more than dabbling a little in what they are pleased to call art, and making a great deal of what they are pleased to call love! For the power of manners, on the other hand, an aristocratic class, whether materialized or not, will always from its circumstances have a strong sense. And although for this power of social life and manners, so important to civilization, our race has no special natural turn, in our aristocracy this power emerges, and marks them. When the day of general humanization comes, they will have fixed the standard of manners. The English simplicity, too, makes the best of the English aristocracy more frank and natural than the best of the like class anywhere else, and even the worst of them it makes free from the incredible fatuities and absurdities of the worst. Then the sense of conduct they share with their countrymen at large. In no class has it such trials to undergo; in none is it more often and more grievously overborne. But really the right comment on this is the comment of Pepys upon the evil courses of Charles II. and the Duke of York and the court of that day: "At all which I am sorry; but it is the effect of idleness, and having nothing else to employ their great spirits upon."

Heaven forbid that I should speak in dispraise of that unique and most English class which Mr. Charles Sumner extols — the large class of gentlemen, not of the landed class or the nobility, but cultivated and refined. They are a seemly product of the energy and of the power to rise in our race. Without, in general, rank and splendor and wealth and luxury to polish them, they have made their own the high standard of life and manners of an aristocratic and refined class. Not having all the dissipations and distractions of this class, they are much more seriously alive to the power of intellect and knowledge, to the power of beauty. The sense of conduct, too, meets with fewer temptations. To some extent, however, their contiguousness to the aristocratic class materializes them, as it does the class of newly enriched people. The most palpable action is on the young, and on their standard of life and enjoyment. But in general, for this whole class, established facts, the materialism they see regnant, too much block their mental horizon, and limit the possibilities of things to them. They are deficient in openness and flexibility of mind, in free play of ideas, in faith and ardor. Civilized they are, but they are not much of a civilizing force; they are somehow bounded and ineffective.

So on the middle class they produce singularly little effect. What the middle class sees is that splendid piece of

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

materialism, the aristocratic class, with a wealth and luxury utterly out of their reach, with a standard of social life and manners, the offspring of that wealth and luxury, seeming utterly out of their reach also; and thus they are thrown back upon themselves — upon a defective type of religion, a narrow range of intellect and knowledge, a stunted sense of beauty, a low standard of manners. And the lower class see before them the aristocratic class, and its civilization, such as it is, even infinitely more out of their reach than out of that of the middle class; while the life of the middle class, with its unlovely types of religion, thought, beauty, and manners, has naturally, in general, no great attractions for them either; and so they too are thrown back upon themselves; upon their beer, their gin, and their fun. Now, then, you will understand what I meant by saying that our inequality materializes our upper class, vulgarizes our middle, brutalizes our lower. And the greater the inequality the more marked is its bad action upon the middle and lower classes. In Scotland the landed aristocracy fills the scene, as is well known, still more than in England; the other classes are more squeezed back and effaced, and the social civilization of the lower middle class and of the poorest class, in Scotland, is an example of the consequences. Compared with the same class even in England, the Scottish lower middle class is most visibly, to vary Mr. Charles Sumner's phrase, less well-bred, less careful in personal habits and in social conventions, less refined. Let any one who doubts it go, after issuing from the aristocratic solitudes which possess Loch Lomond, let him go and observe the shopkeepers and the middle class in Dumbarton, and Greenock, and Gourock, and the places along the mouth of the Clyde. And for the poorest class, who that has seen it can ever forget the hardly human horror, the abjection and uncivilizedness of Glasgow?

What a strange religion, then, is our religion of inequality! Romance is good in its way, but ours is not even a romantic religion. No doubt our aristocracy is an object of strong public interest. The Times itself bestows a leading article by way of epithalamium on the Duke of Norfolk's marriage. And those journals of a new type, full of talent, and which interest me particularly because they seem as if they were written by the young lion of our youth — the young lion grown mellow and, as the French say, viveur, arrived at his full and ripe knowledge of the world, and minded to enjoy the smooth evening of his days — those journals, in the main a sort of social gazette of the aristocracy, are apparently not read by that class only which they most concern, but are read with avidity by other classes also. And the common people too have undoubtedly, as Mr. Gladstone says, a wonderful preference for a lord. Yet our aristocracy, from the action upon it of the Wars of the Roses, the Tudors, and the political necessities of George III., is for the imagination a singularly modern and uninteresting one. Its splendor of station, wealth, show, and luxury, is then what the other classes really admire in it; and this is not an elevating admiration. So that when Mr. Gladstone invites us to call our love of inequality "the complement of the love of freedom or its negative pole, or the shadow which the love of freedom casts, or the reverberation of its voice in the halls of the constitution," we must surely answer that all this mystical eloquence is not in the least necessary to explain so simple a matter; that our love of inequality is really the vulgarity in us, and the brutality, admiring and worshipping the splendid materiality.

Our present social organization, however, will and must endure until our middle class is provided with some better ideal of life than it has now. That organization has been an appointed stage in our growth; it has been of good use, and has enabled us to do great things. But the use is at an end, and the stage is over. Ask yourselves if you do not often feel in yourselves a sense, that in spite of the strenuous efforts for good of so many excellent persons amongst us, we begin somehow to flounder and to beat the air; that we seem to be finding ourselves stopped on this line of advance and on that, and to be threatened with a standstill. It is that we are trying to live on with a social organization of which the day is over. Certainly equality will never of itself alone give us a perfect civilization. But, with such inequality as ours, a perfect civilization is impossible. To that conclusion, facts, and the stream itself of this discourse, do seem, I think, to carry us irresistibly. We arrive at it because they so choose, not because we so choose. Our tendencies are all the other way. We are most of us politicians, and in one of two camps, the Liberal or the Conservative; and Liberals tend to accept the middle class as it

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

is and to praise the Nonconformists, while the Conservatives tend to accept the upper class as it is, and to praise the aristocracy. And yet here we are at the conclusion, that one of the great obstacles to our civilization is British Nonconformity, and the other, British aristocracy! — and this while we are yet forced to recognize excellent special qualities, as well as the general English energy and honesty, and a number of emergent humane individuals, in both of them. Clearly such a conclusion can be none of our own seeking. Then again, to remedy our inequality, there must be a change in the law of bequest, as in France; and the faults and inconveniences of the French law of bequest are obvious. It tends to over-divide property; it is unequal in operation, and can be eluded by people limiting their families; it makes the children, however ill they choose to behave, independent of the parent. To be sure, Mr. Mill and others have shown that a law of bequest, fixing the maximum, whether of land or money, which any one individual may take by bequest or inheritance, but in other respects leaving the testator quite free, has none of the inconveniences of the French law, and is in every way preferable. But evidently these are not questions of practical politics. Imagine Lord Hartington going down to Glasgow, and meeting his Scotch Liberals there, and saying to them: "You are ill at ease, and you are calling for change, and very justly. But the cause of your being ill at ease is not what you suppose. The cause of your being ill at ease is the profound imperfectness of your social civilization. Your social civilization is indeed such as I forbear to characterize. But the remedy is not disestablishment. The remedy is social equality. Let me direct your attention to a reform in the law of bequest and entail." One can hardly speak of such a thing with out laughing. No, the matter is one for the thoughts of those who think. It is a thing to be turned over in the minds of those, who, on the one hand, have the spirit of scientific inquirers, bent on seeing things as they really are; and, on the other hand, the spirit of friends of the humane life, lovers of perfection. To your thoughts I commit it. And perhaps, the more you think of it, the more you will be persuaded that Menander showed his wisdom quite as much when he said, Choose equality, as when he assured us that evil communications corrupt good manners.

ERICA.*

TRANSLATED FOR THE LIVING AGE FROM THE GERMAN OF

FRAU VON INGERSLEBEN.

XXXVI.

QUIET DAYS.

THE princess's guests, some of whom had prolonged their visit for weeks, usually came very little in contact with the occupants of the other wing of the castle. They paid the baroness a short morning call, enquired with great interest how the old lady had borne the exertion of attending the ball, discussed all sorts of agreeable nothings, and then rustled away again. No one came to tea, and as the old lady showed no inclination to issue any invitations, the little party usually spent the evening alone. Now and then, at the princess's urgent request, the young ladies went over to the other wing of the house to join the company there, whose numbers were almost daily augmented by visitors from the neighborhood.

Erica had felt rather uncomfortable at the thought of meeting Katharina after the scene at the ball, but the latter seemed to have forgotten the whole affair, or was too much accustomed to such things to take any special heed of them, and was therefore entirely at her ease. The number of her guests gradually lessened, and at last the castle was entirely empty of visitors. The princess found the ennui produced by this loneliness almost unendurable, and in desperation went more and more frequently to the baroness's rooms. To be sure, Sidonie did very little to entertain her, for she was always silent, but as all Katharina's attempts to irritate her utterly failed, the cousins remained at peace with each other.

Erica was therefore obliged to exert herself to amuse the princess, and as she was a keen observer, and endowed with a good memory, easily succeeded, especially as she could detect the little weaknesses and absurdities of her dear fellow-mortals. But her efforts to relieve the baroness of a burden had a wholly unexpected result, for Katharina wanted her constant companionship, and the old lady's authority was scarcely sufficient to protect her from being obliged to spend the whole day in her rooms. She was called upon to walk and drive with her, play on the piano, and even read aloud. Nay, Katharina insisted

* Copyright 1877, by Littell & Gay.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

that she must learn to ride, in order to accompany her on her daily expeditions.

None of the young ladies at Dorneck rode, except Sidonie; the countess probably considered the cost of keeping so many saddle-horses, and the count, unlike his usual indolence in other matters, was a very fearless rider, and his horses were therefore unsuitable for ladies. Erica had often envied Sidonie when she rode out accompanied by her uncle or Ottomar, and was now anxious to enjoy this pleasure herself. When Elmar saw her eyes sparkle at the prospect, he suddenly recollected that he had long desired to own Miss Ella, a horse belonging to a lady in the neighborhood, whose physician had forbidden her to ride. The very next day the new horse found itself close beside Salvator, who, without any trace of hospitable feeling, began the acquaintance by taking advantage of the freedom of his long halter to pull the hay out of her rack, and then bit her when she timidly tried to approach.

Elmar's precaution was not at all unnecessary, for in spite of the numerous horses at Katharina's disposal, most of them had been ridden lame or made ill by their mistress. She knew no consideration, and it never occurred to her that an animal was a living creature, susceptible to pain, and therefore had claims upon human sympathy and care. Willingly as Elmar would have become Erica's riding-master, he left the duty to the head groom, as he feared to rouse a storm unnecessarily. Besides, Erica was such an apt pupil, that she could soon dispense with instruction, and as she was also very fearless, ere long rode out with Katharina and Sidonie. When the latter made one of the party, their rapid pace was somewhat moderated, for even in this Sidonie did not belie her usual character, and was not fond of riding at a furious rate. Erica, on the contrary, delighted in a swift gallop, and therefore was perfectly satisfied with Katharina's taste.

But when one day, after such a ride, Miss Ella came limping home, and was obliged to remain in the stable for several days, she saw the matter in a very different light, and could never again be induced to ride quickly over rough or stony roads. With great obstinacy, as Katharina vehemently complained to the baroness, she remained quietly behind, to the great delight of the head groom, and thus compelled the princess also to take a slower pace, if she did not wish to continue her ride without her companion.

Sometimes Elmar also accompanied the ladies, but only when Sidonie was a member of the party. He did not come to his grandmother's room as often as seemed desirable to Erica, and frequently took his tea alone, or with Katharina, a course, however, he adopted principally on account of the old lady, who was greatly disturbed by her granddaughter's restless movements. One day the latter declared that no mortal could endure the stupidity of Altenborn, and she should be obliged to go to Cologne for a few weeks. She wanted to take Erica with her, but the baroness refused to consent, and at last asked Elmar to accompany her.

"You must find another chamberlain, Katharina," he replied; "my business will not allow me to leave Altenborn at present."

"Business is the constant, easy excuse of every man; it means the same as 'I won't go.'"

"Then it is like a lady's headache, which says, 'I am cross, let me alone,'" said Elmar laughing.

"Sidonie can explain the meaning of that, she often suffers from headache," replied Katharina, with a glance at the young countess, who was absorbed in a book.

"No matter," she continued, as the latter did not seem inclined to mingle in the conversation; "I am glad you perceive how much I need a chamberlain, Elmar."

"How have I expressed such an opinion, Kathinka?"

"Do you intend to retract it? Didn't you say just now that I must find another chamberlain?"

"I expressed your wish, but did not admit its necessity."

"That is mere trifling, to excuse yourself. I see that I really can scarcely do without a gentleman, who — don't you think so too, grandmamma?"

"If I am to understand you, child, you must speak more plainly."

"So you have already selected the future chamberlain, Kathinka?" asked Elmar.

"Yes, and I declare at the same time that I will listen to no objections from you; I am tired of these continual discussions."

"What is the necessity of such a display of your strength of will, Kathinka? You can marry your chamberlain, if you choose. I have given up all attempts to exert any influence over you."

Erica suddenly thought of Wehlen, and involuntarily remembered the princess's familiar greeting in church. She looked

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

at Elmar to see whether the same idea had occurred to him, but as the latter talked gaily on, resigned her fancy as absurd.

When the princess's travelling-carriage rolled up to the door, all the occupants of the castle felt an emotion of relief. Elmar congratulated himself on the reserve which had been the means of obtaining so much freedom, and told his grandmother that he felt as happy as a schoolboy on the eve of a long vacation. He did not lose any time, but was very often in the ladies' society, and it never occurred to him to take tea alone in his own room.

Life at Castle Altenborn was now far more quiet than before. It was late in the autumn, and though the weather still continued mild, the shortness of the days made the old lady give up paying any visits in the neighborhood, and guests were rare. Neither Sidonie nor Erica missed society, however, the former on account of her mood, and the latter because she had so many sources of amusement that she no longer desired it.

The baroness's ideas in regard to the freedom which should be bestowed upon young girls, were far less rigid than Aunt Vally's, probably on account of the greater seclusion of Altenborn. Erica was very happy in being able to resume her old habit of taking long walks, and accompanied by Elmar's great dog — which, in sympathy with its master, showed a wonderful affection for her — rambled about the neighborhood in every direction. She could also, without fear of reproof, make use of the boats, and row on the lake which was visible from the terrace of the old castle, and whose surface was covered with swans, whose houses were on the wooded island nearly in the centre of the water.

These beautiful, much-praised birds, however, have a disposition by no means in harmony with their external appearance, and there were some among them which received all advances with angry hisses and furious flappings of their wings. Sandor could not endure such insults, either to his mistress or his own dignity, and met such assaults so vigorously and successfully, that the defeated enemy not only lost numerous feathers, but bore bloody marks of the fray.

On one occasion, when Erica was rowing over the lake with Sandor as her only passenger, a battle even took place on the water. Sandor, in his zeal, planted his fore-paws on the edge of the boat, and by his restless movements was in the most imminent danger of upsetting it. Erica only saved herself by violently pushing the dog back, and when she turned the boat and tried to gain the shore, while the animal swam panting beside it, she reflected that peace must be concluded between the parties, if she wished to continue her excursions on the water in Sandor's company.

She chose the simple and always effectual method of making the alliance depend upon mutual advantages; for, while giving the swans their favorite titbits, Sandor received in their company his lumps of sugar. The prospect of the anticipated dainties soon made them very peacefully disposed, and as Sandor was obliged to atone for his warlike appetite by enduring the tortures of Tantalus — such as holding a lump of sugar a long time on his nose — the dog and swans lived in the greatest harmony, and the barking and flapping of wings were only tokens of friendly greeting.

The baroness had at first been anxious when Erica went out, even in the worst weather, but as she soon saw that her health did not suffer, nay, on the contrary, seemed to grow stronger and better, made no objections. The horseback rides, however, were given up on such days, as Sidonie was sensitive to the weather, and, moreover, the roads gradually became so muddy that riding was attended with difficulties.

The castle itself also afforded Erica many sources of amusement, nay, its many nooks and corners and winding passages gave her numerous opportunities for making little rambles and exploring expeditions. She preferred to wander through the oldest portion of the building, or citadel, as it was called, whose narrow and comparatively low rooms, thick walls, which made the windows seem like niches, narrow, dark passages, concealed doors, and mysterious corners, recalled former days with vivid reality.

When, in the gathering dusk of twilight, she walked through the great hall, where the huge suits of armor, with their closed helmets, seemed almost like living men, she fancied herself back in the days when this iron harness enclosed moving forms, and bold eyes flashed through the barred visors. The dark shadows of approaching night gathered mysteriously in the hall, while ever and anon the rays of the setting sun flashed and glittered on the steel and silver coats of mail with a thousand changeful hues. The corners and angles of the huge apartment, which were already veiled in darkness, appeared peo-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

pled with gigantic forms that glided slowly through the hall. The terror which at first was not without its charm, then became so great that she fled at full speed, and uttered a sigh of relief when the door had closed between her and the old knights.

The same mysterious magic haunted the dusky corridors. Here, too, the ghosts of the past emerged from the dark corners, and floated slowly down the long passages. The huge carved chests of polished oak, which stood in these corridors, assumed distorted shapes, and seemed to become alive. The reflection of the sunset glittered softly on the smooth, polished surfaces, and cast a faint light, which battled with the shadows and drove the ghosts back to their dark corners; but it soon died away, the shadows victoriously resumed their sway, and grew blacker and blacker, while the young girl's footsteps echoed loudly through the old corridors.

At such moments Erica greeted the servant bringing in the lamps with a sigh of relief, though the light completely dispelled the poetic charm of the soft dusk, and also hailed with delight the patter of Sandor's feet, as, returning from a walk with his master, he dashed in to greet her. To be sure, it seemed as if even Sandor felt the mysterious spell that ruled in these rooms, for he nestled timidly to his mistress, or remained standing before a dark corner, barking loudly.

Erica had soon completely won the baroness's heart, and she herself really loved the old lady as fondly as if she had a right to the name by which the young girl addressed her. Her own mother's ill health had made her appear so much older than she really was, that it seemed to Erica as if the baroness were just the same age, and thus it was all the more easy to give the old lady the vacant place in her heart. Besides, she felt that she was not useless here, as at Dorneck, but necessary to cheer and amuse the baroness, and this consciousness made her more at ease. She soon had her favorite seat on the little stool at the old lady's feet, and with the same loving warmth she had formerly shown her mother, leaned her head against her knee, or threw both arms around her neck and drew her down to give her an affectionate caress.

"You would scarcely be able to do without me, grandmamma!" she often said jestingly, as she sat on the stool beside her.

"It would be impossible, little one," the old lady always answered earnestly, stroking the brown hair caressingly, as her mother had formerly done.

Sidonie was also contented at Altenborn, for she did not speak of going away, and seemed determined to spend the winter here. Soon after the ball, she had startled the old lady by the declaration that no consideration would induce her to marry Count Meerburg. The baroness vainly strove to change her resolution, vainly entreated her to defer her decision for a time. Sidonie firmly insisted upon having her own way, and therefore wrote to Count Hardeck, to whom, at the same time, she communicated her intention of entering the convent of Hardrungen. Strangely enough, she received no reply to this important letter, and anxiety about her guardian's silence caused her considerable uneasiness, though his reply could have no influence upon her destiny, and the future lay before her dark and joyless.

Such was the state of affairs when Christmas slowly approached, and the numerous occupations it brought roused even Sidonie from her melancholy mood. The old lady had a great many poor people to be remembered, and Sidonie, who was very generous in almsgiving, spent a large sum in these Christmas presents. To invest this in suitable articles required both time and labor, and the two young girls therefore had plenty of occupation for several weeks.

One evening, when the little circle had assembled as usual, Elmar asked what Erica wanted for a Christmas gift. "I am on tolerably good terms with the Christ-child," he added, in a jesting tone, "and will say a good word for you to him."

"And I hope answer for my good behavior," replied Erica.

"I'll see what can be done. If you beg me very earnestly, I will even say nothing about the walk you took to-day with Sandor in the most horrible weather, though you both returned in anything but a presentable condition."

Sandor, who was lying between them half under the sofa, raised his head at the mention of his name, and looked earnestly at his master.

"Don't let the lecture trouble you too much, Sandor," said Erica, patting the dog; "even grandmamma says you are worthy to be admitted into a drawing-room."

"I am still very jealous of this statement, for hitherto his feet were never allowed to enter the sacred apartment."

"You never took the trouble to tell me the superior qualities of the interesting

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

dog," replied the baroness; "but since Erica's stories have cast a halo of heroic wisdom around his brow, I could not reconcile it to my conscience to close the doors of my drawing-room against such a remarkable animal. But let me repeat the question, what do you want at Christmas, Erica?"

"My wishes are very moderate, grandmamma, I should like to have Miss Ella for my own property."

"You don't need the aid of the Christ-child for that, Erica. Miss Ella has long been yours, you must think of something else."

"I can want nothing more, unless it is a waterproof cloak for myself, and, if possible, Sandor too; they might be very useful to us."

"It is fortunate that I have seen your pleasure in balls and ball-dresses, Erica," said Elmar half angrily, "or I should be forced to think that you were interested in nothing that usually makes young ladies happy."

"I am a child of the moment," replied Erica laughing, "and interest myself only in what the moment brings. If I were in a whirl of gayety, I should probably wish for jewels and fine clothes, but now such things are in the dim distance, and I think only of walks and rides."

"And is it the same with people? Do you prefer those who surround you at the present moment to all others?"

"I have not reflected upon the subject, but I suppose a little of this theory of life extends to them also."

"Then we must beware of going away from you, so I will give up the visit I intended to pay Werner to-morrow."

A servant, who at this moment entered the room, disturbed the universal feeling of comfort by the very unexpected announcement that the princess had just returned. They had expected, with a tolerable degree of certainty, that she would spend the winter in the city, and all therefore involuntarily looked a little startled. The baroness gave expression to the universal sentiment when she said: "Katharina might have remained longer in Cologne."

XXXVII.

THE CHAMBERLAIN.

THE next day, when Erica chanced to stand at the window looking out upon the terrace, she suddenly uttered an exclamation of alarm, and turned toward Elmar. "My fear is realized, he has come," she murmured.

"Who has come, Erica?" asked Elmar in surprise, approaching the window to look at the new arrival. The sight did not make him turn pale like Erica, on the contrary he grew crimson with anger, when he saw Wehlen's well-known figure pacing along the terrace beside Katharina.

"This insolence goes too far!" he exclaimed indignantly; "I will assert my rights as the master of the house, and order the man to leave it instantly."

"You have scarcely the authority to do that, my dear Elmar," said the baroness quietly. "You assigned a portion of the castle to Katharina for her own use, and in so doing gave her the liberty to receive whoever she pleases."

"But this liberty cannot possibly be extended so far as to permit her to have thieves and murderers for guests."

"That accusation is a little strong, Elmar, and if just you need only invoke the aid of the law."

Elmar bit his lips, he knew that he could not appeal to the law, that he could not even inform his sister of the last disgraceful crime of her chosen companion. He was convinced that Wehlen suspected his share in detecting the latter, but, notwithstanding this, the certainty of his enforced silence gave him the hardihood to appear here. He therefore made no reply, but left the room and went to Katharina's wing of the castle, where he ordered the servant to show him to Wehlen's room.

When he entered, unannounced, the latter, who was standing at the window, hastily turned and came forward to meet him. He must have carefully planned his conduct, for there was not the slightest trace of embarrassment in his manner; on the contrary, he said, with frank cordiality,—

"How very kind in Herr von Altenborn to anticipate my visit! I was just about to call on you."

"I have neither the talent nor the inclination to play a farce, Herr von Wehlen," replied Elmar coldly, "and therefore decline to enter into this one. I have come here to ask how you can justify the boundless effrontery of this visit?"

Wehlen's dark eyes cast a glance as keen as a dagger at Elmar, but he replied, in his former courteous tone, "I have hitherto considered conventional politeness a necessary form, never a farce, and am surprised that this is not the case with yourself. In order, however, to give a plain answer to your very uncivil question, I have come here by no means of

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

my own free will, but in response to the urgent entreaties of the Princess Bagadoff, not as a guest, but a member of her household."

Elmar, whose agitation was so great that he was in danger of completely losing his usual studied composure, did not answer immediately, but strove to partially regain his self-control. But in spite of all his efforts, his voice trembled with anger as he said,—

"You have turned my sister's folly to your own advantage with your usual skill, but you should have remembered that in becoming a member of her household, you enter Castle Altenborn, whose master is only too well acquainted with your past career."

This time a contemptuous smile played around Wehlen's lips, as he replied, "As for my past, the one dark spot upon it is closed with a seal, which even the co-owner of Altenborn cannot break, since he would thereby make his friends dishonorable. Besides, I have already remarked that I only yielded to the pressing entreaties of the princess, and had the less reason to think of another owner of Altenborn, as I was told that his right to the property was more than doubtful."

Although Elmar had said to himself that Katharina would probably confide her hopes and claims to a man who was so intimately associated with her, Wehlen's words affected him very unpleasantly, and he answered hastily, and perhaps rather inconsiderately,—

"You have probably allowed yourself to be enlisted as a ready tool to deny these rights?"

"Perhaps so, most honored baron!" replied Wehlen, with the same scornful smile. "But in that case, a little reflection will tell you all the more plainly that it is not wise to so recklessly offend a man whom you have not the power to remove, while he very probably has the opportunity to injure you. On the contrary, it would, I think, be for your advantage to claim my good-will and assistance in this matter. With my help, you would doubtless succeed in accomplishing what, against my will, you will be unable to obtain."

Elmar's involuntary gesture of loathing showed Wehlen that there was little prospect of carrying out his plans here, so he shrugged his shoulders, and said, as if in answer to Elmar's movement,—

"Just as you choose, baron. We are enemies, then?"

"Your open enemy, sir!" cried Elmar angrily. "And as, unfortunately, it is not yet possible for me to exert my full authority as master of the house, I forbid you at least to enter the portion of the castle where I have my own apartments. If you presume to set your foot within it, I will have you turned out by my servants."

"Very well, Herr Baron, I will inform myself of the exact boundaries of your domain. I hope, however, I shall be permitted to visit the baroness and the young ladies; it is a duty imposed by politeness, to which I at least have always yielded."

"You will omit the visit, sir," replied Elmar, with flashing eyes. "I will at least protect my grandmother from your presence. Her rooms are in the same portion of the castle as mine, so I need make no new prohibition."

"I might have supposed so. In contrast with mine, the pure presence of the flower found by the seaside is doubtless infinitely refreshing to you."

Elmar, who was in the act of leaving the room, turned and faced his opponent. "Beware, Herr von Wehlen," he said, in a cold, quiet tone, which formed a striking contrast to his former agitated manner, "an insult in that direction would make me forget all other considerations, and end your stay here at once."

Although Elmar had very little hope of inducing Katharina to listen to his representations, he thought it his duty to speak to her; so he went to her room, and had, as he feared, an unpleasant scene, without the least satisfaction. The princess, on the contrary, complained violently of the lack of consideration in her brother's conduct, which formed a striking contrast to the undue regard for his wishes she had unfortunately hitherto shown. After such behavior, Elmar need not be surprised if she claimed other and positive rights, of which she had been so unwarrantably deprived.

Elmar left his sister in a very disturbed and irritated mood, and paced restlessly up and down his room, reflecting what steps he could take to meet the ever-approaching storm. He had discussed the matter with his lawyer long before, and the latter—even without the possession of the important document—spoke very encouragingly of the result of the possible lawsuit. An open quarrel with his sister was, however, so extremely repugnant to his feelings, that he wished to do everything in his power to avoid it. Now the measure of forbearance seemed exhausted, and he almost regretted that he had not imperiously asserted his rights as the master of

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the house, in order to escape from the uncertainty which tortured and irritated him so that it destroyed all the pleasure of life.

His mood was thus little in harmony with the happy, joyous festival the family was preparing to celebrate. Besides, the princess's return had put an end to the happy, quiet life of the little circle, for she had invited a throng of guests, who gradually arrived, and soon made the rooms and corridors of the castle echo with the noise and bustle that always attend a numerous company. It required all the baroness's authority to keep Erica to herself, at least during the evening, for Katharina constantly claimed her attention. Sidonie, on the contrary, resolutely declined all the princess's invitations, without taking the trouble to give any special reason for her refusal, and Katharina therefore declared her to be perfectly unendurable.

When, on Christmas eve, the little party entered the baroness's brilliantly lighted drawing-room, where a glittering Christmas-tree formed the central point of the festive preparations, Erica saw the waterproof cloak she had wished for spread out to its full width. She joyously raised it, and found under the dark cover a motley array of jewels, flowers, and various articles of dress, so that she stood in silence, almost startled. The memory of the former Christmas eves, whose gifts, though so much simpler, had yet made her so inexpressibly happy, overwhelmed her; with them came thoughts of her lost mother, whose love had rendered the trifling presents so rich and brilliant, and she suddenly burst into tears.

The baroness must have guessed the cause of her emotion, for she went up to her and clasped her affectionately in her arms. "If the departed can look down upon us, Erica," she said tenderly, "she will be glad to see you surrounded by love, happy and cheerful."

"Ah! if she could look down upon us," murmured Erica; "she was so anxious about my future life, and how happy it has been!"

"Hush, child!" said the old lady, with an involuntary exclamation of terror, as she laid her hand on the speaker's lips. "Who can tell what the future will bring? let us rejoice and thank God for a happy present."

Erica seemed to think that the splendid gifts of the Christ-child had come to her through Elmar's special mediation, for she turned to him in expressing her delight. "The Christ-child knew what I wanted better than I did myself," she said warmly; "I believe I really like all these beautiful things better than the waterproof."

"He must of course provide for you, the child of the moment, since there are so many balls in preparations. Katharina even wanted, against all Christian custom, to dance on Christmas-day, and only my threat to put out the lights in the ball-room and send the music home, deterred her. But afterwards we shall have enough of the pleasures of dancing."

During the holidays, the young pastor Reinhardt had an opportunity to preach before as brilliant a congregation as he had had when he delivered his unlucky sermon at Dorneck; but habit, as well as the exertion of his strength of will, made him this time appear neither timid nor confused, and the parish had every reason to be satisfied with the young pastor.

The intercourse between the latter and Erica had not been quite so familiar and cordial as was the case at Dorneck. The little scenes with Elmar about him had enlightened her in regard to the young man's interest, and, from fear of exciting false hopes, she had of late become colder in her manner, though her feelings were unchanged. The young pastor felt this only too keenly, and therefore became reserved in his turn. Even his eager consent to her request that he would aid in searching for the important document, had no influence upon their relations, perhaps because he felt that, in fulfilling her desire, he was acting against his own interest.

He sometimes spent half the day in the library, rummaging among the old manuscripts, though the printed treasures often drew him from the search. Now and then Erica also visited the room, and uttered a few words of thanks for his trouble, but she never lingered long, for the collection of books that principally interested her was in another part of the castle, close at hand. The novels and volumes of light literature were arranged in a pleasant, airy room adjoining the baroness's apartments, while the solid books occupied several of the large, somewhat gloomy rooms which formed the old library.

The whirl of entertainments which followed one another in unbroken succesion, had not left even the young pastor entirely undisturbed. Although dancing by no means harmonized with his dignity as a clergyman, he could not decline the invitations the princess sent for all these parties, and although he did not feel perfectly at home among the strangers, whose ideas were so different from his, he was still too

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

young not to have some interest in the gay scene around him. This interest was bestowed partly, or rather principally, upon Erica, who, radiant with delight, floated over the floor like some winged creature, and perfectly justified the baroness's comparison to a butterfly.

The attention of the old lady, who sometimes appeared for a short time in her granddaughter's drawing-room — was attracted by the young pastor's frequent glances at Erica. True, Elmar's remarks about the young man had probably made her notice him, and therefore one evening, when his eyes followed Erica's movements with specially eager interest, she approached and spoke to him.

"Shall we not soon have the pleasure of seeing your mother and sister in Altenborn, my dear Reinhardt?"

The young man was evidently embarrassed by the question. Formerly it had been his most ardent desire to be able to offer his mother and sister a home, and yet, when he became pastor, he had contented himself with supporting them without asking them to come to him. His ideal of home had undergone a change, and the question now seemed like a reproach, which involuntarily made him blush.

The old lady did not appear to notice his emotion, for she continued in the same cordial tone: "Erica, who knows and loves both, would be particularly delighted, and you have probably perceived that there is every prospect of our keeping the little woodland fairy, as Elmar calls her, with us for life."

This time the young pastor's blush was so vivid, that the baroness could not overlook it, and she therefore smilingly answered the question in his eyes.

"It seems that I have been too hasty, and you have not yet noticed anything. Well, fortunately such a little indiscretion to the pastor will do no harm, as he is always a member of the family. I hope, therefore, you will gratify my wish, and send for your relatives very soon. Erica will be glad to have the young girl's society, but I shall make special claim to your mother, so I beg you to give her my kindest regards."

The old lady nodded pleasantly to the young man, and turned to other guests. The flush which had crimsoned his cheeks was replaced by a very marked pallor, and he now saw Erica, leaning on Elmar's arm, just taking her place in the dance, and heard the latter say, —

"The waterproof, Miss Ella, and Sandor are things of the past, Erica, whose former charms we can scarcely understand."

"They have certainly retired into the background at present," she replied, "but I can imagine that I shall return to them again with the same affection."

"What vivid fancy leads you into such distant, misty regions? I am really happy to be of use in riding and dancing, in order to secure a certain degree of interest in both occupations; but unfortunately my well-known laziness, which you so soon discovered and so carefully watched, precludes me from sharing the long walks."

The young pastor turned away and walked through the room. He could not endure to hear any more of the conversation. He did not understand the blindness with which he had previously overlooked the relations between the lord of the castle and Erica, the more so as he suddenly remembered that he had noticed tokens of intimacy, even at Dorneck. The bitter anguish which at this moment made his heart bleed, rendered the throng oppressive, and he took advantage of the first opportunity to withdraw.

After this time he found frequent pretexts for declining the princess's invitations, and also never called upon the old baroness, though he was still to be found in the castle library. It seemed as if he wished to forget his disappointed hope by devoting himself entirely to another's interest, for he continued his investigations more eagerly than before.

One evening, when Katharina had gone with her guests to some entertainment at a neighboring castle, the usual little circle once more assembled in the baroness's drawing-room, as Elmar, on plea of indisposition, had remained at home. Sandor lay in his old place under the little sofa, and Elmar, to celebrate the quiet evening, was allowed to have his cigar before tea. The conversation flowed briskly, and they would scarcely have noticed the opening of the door leading into the corridor, if Sandor had not uttered a deep, angry growl, and then come out from under the sofa. All looked up, and, to their astonishment, saw the young pastor, who entered the room holding some papers in his hand.

Elmar quieted Sandor's wrath, while Erica, at the sight of Reinhardt and the papers, instantly thought the document was at last found. She eagerly started up and hurried towards the new-comer, exclaiming, —

"The document is found! You have the document?"

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

"I certainly have found a document of priceless value," said the young pastor with sparkling eyes, as he approached the lamp with his papers; "and the pleasure of the discovery, as well as the earnest desire to inform Herr von Altenborn of it at once, caused my late visit, and, as I found no servant in the ante-room, my unceremonious entrance."

Elmar now also sprang from his seat and approached the table, and even Sidonie rose and looked eagerly at the papers.

"There is no doubt," began the young pastor in a voice trembling with joy, "that we have here the original manuscript of the famous 'De Concordantia Catholica,' the first and at the same time the best work of Nicolaus von Kusa. In this he most freely expressed his opinions, and his views about the pope and council ——"

A half-suppressed imprecation from Elmar interrupted and silenced him, while Erica, in spite of her disappointment, felt the absurdity of the scene vividly enough to burst into a smothered laugh, and even Sidonie's lips curled in a faint smile. The speaker looked around the circle in mingled surprise and alarm, and the baroness, the only person whose face expressed calm attention, came to his assistance by saying, —

"The disappointed hope of seeing in these papers the important family document, makes your hearers indifferent to the treasure you bring us, my dear Reinhardt. You must have patience with us."

"How gladly I would have gratified that hope, if it were in my power!" he answered, with a sigh of relief; "but meantime the treasure I have found is really valuable, and many great libraries will envy us its possession. It is evidently an original manuscript, for here at the end you can distinctly see the name, Nicolaus Chrypffs. He was born near Treves, and lived a long time in Mayence, which explains the fact that the manuscript is here. Unfortunately the beginning and part of the middle are missing, but I hope to find them yet, and then the comparison between the manuscript and the printed copies of it will be of absorbing interest, and possibly very instructive."

Neither Elmar nor the young girls were able, or perhaps in the mood, to soften the contrast between their guest's mental atmosphere and their own, and the baroness once more spoke for all, and expressed an interest — which, to be sure, seemed, on the part of the others, somewhat cool — in the prize. The young pastor felt like a somnambulist who suddenly awakes and finds himself in a strange place. He declined the invitation to tea which the old lady cordially gave him, muttered a few unintelligible words of farewell, and hurriedly withdrew.

The annoyance which the manuscript of Nicolaus of Cusa had caused the little party could not be immediately dispelled, and for a long time all were very silent. At last, with a violent effort, Elmar shook off his ill-humor, and turning to Erica, said half laughing,—

"The scene we have just witnessed is of some advantage at any rate. We now know with positive certainty that the young pastor will not break his heart at losing you, and a few pages of the manuscript of that unlucky Krebs, or Chrypffs, is enough to console him for everything. Yet there is so much less hope of seeing our wish fulfilled," he added, with a faint sigh.

"Don't say that," replied Erica eagerly. "I am firmly convinced that his search will yet be crowned with success."

XXXVIII.

THE DOCUMENT.

THIS time the princess seemed as if she could not be satisfied with balls and parties, for even after most of the guests had again left the castle, she gave large soirées nearly every evening, which were fully attended by the persons residing in the neighborhood. Even Erica at last grew weary of the whirl of gayety, and took refuge behind the baroness's authority, in order occasionally to remain aloof from it.

The relations between her and the princess were, on the whole, more agreeable than she had expected. Although Katharina was not able to wholly belie her character, and treat her with kindness and consideration, she showed a regard for Erica which was rarely displayed towards those around her. True, scenes like the one which occurred on the night of the first ball often took place between them, but Erica's quiet resistance seemed to awe Katharina, and she submitted with wonderful forbearance to her just, and, if necessary, energetic interference, even when it thwarted her own plans.

The plain and unattractive young girl, who had formerly seemed to her an excellent, because not at all dangerous, companion, was now, when she had become pretty and lively, indispensably necessary to increase her own importance. The

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

relations with Elmar gave her the less anxiety, as she had almost determined to make herself mistress of Altenborn, so she had only to contend against the obstinacy with which the baroness insisted upon her rights to Erica, and which induced the latter to adopt a more independent and unconstrained manner than, with all Katharina's forbearance, was entirely agreeable to her.

Elmar closely watched this change in his sister's feelings, and it excited his surprise, nay, almost perplexity, when he found that the new chamberlain's influence produced no alteration in them. He himself now remained entirely in the background, and left the princess's business affairs, and the task of entertaining her company, to Wehlen, while he appeared only as a guest. The hostile attitude between the brother and sister, now daily becoming more apparent, made such a state of affairs seem doubly desirable, and Katherina herself, as she no longer needed his services, was perfectly willing to appear as the sole dispenser of hospitality.

Little as the latter liked Sidonie, she nevertheless earnestly desired to have her entertainments graced by the presence of the brilliant, aristocratic girl. The fair Sidonie, however, continued to frequently decline her cousin's invitations, and her absence constantly roused the latter's anger afresh. It was the discord between her own mood and social gaiety, which induced Sidonie to refuse to attend these parties so frequently, for she had no cause to dread a meeting with Werner, since Katharina, with malicious pleasure, had told her that he had declined her invitations because he was making a long visit at Dorneck, where the intrigues he had woven as secretary would probably come to light. Sidonie smiled bitterly at Katharina's useless stab; she unfortunately knew only too well that none of her cousins had won his love.

She also learned from Elmar, when the latter was preparing to drive over to Werner's castle, that the latter had already come home from his visit, and could not help eagerly awaiting the young baron's return, as, if the hour were not too late, he always came up to his grandmother's room. The day had been a very lonely one; Katherina was ill and remained in her rooms, or Sidonie would gladly have mingled in society to fill the long hours. Even the baroness was somewhat indisposed, and went to lie down, so the two girls sat silently together, each absorbed in reading a book.

Erica had commenced a very interesting novel, written by Mademoiselle de Scudéry, which she had taken from the old library, as, on account of its age, it had found no place among the literature of the present day in the new rooms. When she reached the end of the volume, she found that it was not the conclusion of the story, and being very much interested in it, determined to take the long walk through the corridors to get the next volume from the library. As she could not expect to find a light there, she took one of the candles from the table by the door, and walked down the passage.

At first, while going through the wide, brilliantly lighted corridors, it did not occur to her that an expedition to the library at this late hour might be a little hazardous; but when the passages grew narrower and darker, and the light more dim, a feeling of fear gradually stole over her. She leaned against the wall a moment to rest, or rather to consider whether to relinquish her interest in the fate of Mademoiselle de Scudéry's heroes and heroines and turn back, or boldly go on and execute her first design. The dark rooms of the library, whose ghostly shadows would be deepened rather than dispelled by the twinkling candle in her hand, rose in menacing forms before her imagination, and strove to prevent her progress.

Directly opposite to her was a window, upon whose panes she heard the raindrops beat violently, while the wind howled mournfully around the towers and angles of the castle, and sent a melancholy echo through the winding passages. She shivered with a sudden chill, and involuntarily glanced down at her side, as if to seek comfort and protection from her constant companion, Sandor, but the next instant remembered that the dog had gone away with Elmar early in the morning, so her thoughts wandered to the latter, and as a violent gust of wind made the window-panes rattle, recollected with terror that on his return he would probably be exposed to all the fury of the storm.

Anxiety for Elmar effaced all the terrors she had first felt. She put the candlestick on a projection in the wall, went to the window and opened it. The rain and wind swept into her face, and the darkness seemed so impenetrable that she was soon compelled to resign her post. She closed the window, took her candle, and walked rapidly onward.

When she approached the goal of her expedition, it seemed as if a ray of light shone through a chink in the door of the library into the dusky corridor. She started and involuntarily shrank back, but instantly regained her composure and went forward to the door. No doubt Reinhardt was still there, and she need not fear being alone in the large, dark rooms. She hastily turned the handle and entered. The door moved noiselessly on its hinges, and the soft carpet muffled the sound of her footsteps; so that her entrance was unheard by the man, who was bending over a table in the middle of the room covered with books and papers, which he seemed to be eagerly reading. A lamp, whose full light fell upon this table, while it left the room itself nearly dark, revealed to Erica's astonished and terrified eyes, instead of Reinhardt, the features of the feared and hated Wehlen.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

For a moment she stood motionless with dread and horror. Besides the unpleasant situation of being alone in this out-of-the-way room, with a man whom she had feared and hated ever since she had known him, she also felt very uneasy at his conduct. What was the meaning of his presence at so late an hour in a place, whose treasures certainly usually possessed little charm for him? Had he too heard of the important document, on which perhaps Elmar's whole future depended, and come here to look for it, to place it in the princess's hands? His eagerness in reading the papers before him proved his interest in them; had he perhaps already found what had hitherto been so vainly sought?

Erica stood irresolute. Should she go forward to convince herself whether her suspicion was well founded, and thus place herself in the power of this man, from whom she had hitherto instinctively fled? And would he permit her to see what he was reading, would she not be in real danger if Wehlen had cause to fear that she would again thwart his plans? Was it not better to disappear as noiselessly as she had come, and satisfy herself with telling Elmar her suspicions? These thoughts darted through her brain with the speed of lightning, but her brave, resolute nature soon triumphed, and she walked quickly forward almost up to the table. Her keen eye glanced over the paper in Wehlen's hand, and she saw that it was an old yellow parchment, whose appearance, as well as its huge wax seal, gave it the aspect of an old document.

Wehlen started in terror at her approach. At the first moment he did not seem to recognize her, but the next instant said, with the laugh that had always been so repulsive, —

"Really, the little demon appears with most dramatic opportuneness, though I have summoned neither the spirits of earth nor heaven."

"Will you have the kindness to allow me to read the paper in your hand?" said Erica, with tolerably well-assumed composure, though her heart beat so violently that she fancied she could hear its throbbings.

Wehlen did not reply, but looked at Erica with an expression which made the blood crimson her cheeks, and transformed her fear into anger.

"Is this a situation to think of an old faded sheet of paper?" he replied, with the same repulsive smile, putting the parchment on the table, and approaching a step nearer to her. "If you have unfortunately perceived no metamorphosis in me, I have observed all the more clearly what a charming butterfly has emerged from the by no means pretty chrysalis."

Erica's eyes blazed with anger, but her quick perception told her that the insolent speech was intended to insure her speedy departure, and therefore, in all probability, the paper was really important. She would not give up the struggle, and controlling her agitation, answered coldly, —

"As you yourself acknowledge, Herr von Wehlen, that no change has taken place in my feelings towards you, I must beg you to drop this very unseasonable conversation and gratify my wish."

"A superb display of anger, which every lady knows gives her new charms," replied Wehlen, in the same tone he had previously adopted. "Besides, so far as I am aware, it was not your humble slave who arranged this pleasant scene, but the fair lady herself had the kindness to grant me a private interview."

Erica slightly shrugged her shoulders, and answered, with a very tolerable degree of composure, "I came into the library to get a book."

"Then allow me to help you in the search," replied Wehlen, this time in a polite, deferential tone, as he took the lamp from the table to approach the bookcases.

Erica was now convinced that her enemy wished, at all hazard, to prevent her from obtaining a sight of the paper, and it would therefore be of the utmost importance to succeed in doing so against his will.

"You would oblige me by finding Mademoiselle de Scudéry's works," she said, without moving from the spot where she stood, while she fixed her eyes steadily

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

upon the parchment, in order to be able to find it again among the confused heaps of papers.

Wehlen, when he saw that Erica did not follow, instantly turned back, set the lamp on the table, and said, with his old disagreeable smile, "Oh, yes, I forgot! You probably know as well as I that there are no novels in this room. The pretext charms me all the more, because it is so extremely transparent."

"I do not understand you, Herr von Wehlen," replied Erica, somewhat timidly, for she did not know how to explain his conduct.

"I hope to understand you all the better, Fräulein," he replied, with another unpleasant laugh, hastily approaching so that she started back in alarm. "If the rôle of Don Carlos is so graciously allotted to me, I certainly shall not receive so charming a princess coldly."

He again took several paces towards her, but instead of retreating, as he probably expected, towards the door, she darted swiftly forward and, gliding round the table, interposed it between herself and her pursuer. Now, when she could consider herself in comparative security — for she was well aware of her supple dexterity — she threw aside the mask hitherto worn, and, somewhat to Wehlen's surprise, said calmly,—

"Let us drop this farce, Herr von Wehlen, you see your insults do not succeed in frightening me away. I insist upon looking at the paper you were reading; and, if you have no evil-designs, you will gratify my wish without further ceremony."

Wehlen folded his arms and leaned against the table opposite to her. His expression had totally changed; the old well-known glance of hate and anger met her eyes and made her tremble, then a scornful smile flitted over his face, and he said, in a very different tone from the one he had previously used, —

"Do you want to get possession of the document, of which I have been told, in order to give it as a bridal present to your future husband, to conceal the lack of any other dowry? If that is the case, I doubly regret my inability to gratify your wish, but I do not possess it."

"Show me the paper you held in your hand when I came in," persisted Erica, without heeding his words.

"I tell you the paper is utterly worthless; it is an old document, which interests me, but not you," he replied with a frown.

"No matter, I want to see it."

He looked at her, as if considering what course to pursue, but the dark, steady gaze fixed upon her did not excite any great alarm, since she had the solid table between her and her enemy.

"And if I gratify your amiable obstinacy, what reward shall I have," he asked scornfully after a pause.

"A friendly thank you."

He laughed loudly. "That would be cheaply purchased, Fräulein, so cheaply, that only a simpleton would dispose of his wares in such a way. He contracted his eyebrows as if in thought, looked steadily at her again, shook his head, and then said, in a tone which he now adopted for the first time: —

"When a young lady insists so obstinately upon a half-absurd request, it would be folly in a young man not to take advantage of it. I am ready, for one kiss from those fresh rosy lips, to let you rummage among the whole pile of papers."

Erica's cheeks crimsoned with anger, and she was about to give a hasty refusal, when she reflected that this was the least feasible means of gaining her object. She therefore stood for a few moments absorbed in thought, as Wehlen had just done, then darted towards the table and seized the parchment. Wehlen, however, had closely watched her movements, and ere she could obtain a firm hold, leaned forward and snatched it from her.

"You see, Fräulein, the battle is not quite as easy as you supposed," he said scornfully. "True, you are accustomed to conquer, and, as I know, do not fear even revolvers; and since a more gallant weapon, namely, my threatened embrace, also has no terror for you, I shall be compelled to fly myself, taking with me, as a punishment, the interesting paper."

Holding the parchment in his hand, he advanced towards the door. Erica was very much agitated, for Wehlen's conduct plainly showed that it must be the important document. In this moment of consternation, she suddenly heard a slight noise in the corridor, and a happy smile played around her lips, for she recognized the quick patter of Sandor's feet, and knew that the dog, having returned, was coming to seek her. Now she had help; Sandor, at her command, would prevent Wehlen's departure.

The latter's ears had also caught the faint sound, for he started and listened intently.

Sandor had now reached the library; he knew that his mistress was inside, and

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

sprang heavily against the door to inform her of his presence. Erica did not dare to open it, as she would have been compelled to pass close by Wehlen, so she called, in a loud, eager tone, —

"Here, Sandor! Come, Sandor!"

The dog again sprang against the door and succeeded in touching the handle, which turned, and the animal dashed into the room. He instantly seemed to understand the situation of affairs, for, planting himself beside Erica, while his hair bristled with anger, he curled his lips, displaying two formidable rows of white teeth, and uttered a low, menacing growl, like distant thunder.

Wehlen had remained standing in the centre of the room; he knew that the chances of the game were now far more unfavorable to him, since he dared not leave the library on account of the dog, which would then attack him at once. While, in the consciousness of superior strength, he had hitherto been disposed to carry on the struggle with a certain show of good humor, his soul was now filled with hate and fury, and the glance he cast at Erica made her tremble.

"Will you allow me to leave the room, Fräulein, or do you intend to force me to remain here against my will?" he said, trembling with anger.

"You already know that I have no other intention than to read the paper in your hand."

Wehlen shrugged his shoulders. "After what has happened, it would be an unwarrantable weakness for me to yield to you," he replied with tolerable composure. "I must therefore run the risk, and see whether you will really set your dog upon me."

He bowed, and then once more began to walk towards the door. Sandor accompanied the movement by a louder growl, at the same time fixing his eyes on Erica, to see what she thought of the matter.

"Don't let him go! Stop him, Sandor!" cried Erica suddenly, and the dog instantly darted after Wehlen's retreating figure, overtook him not far from the door, and, raising himself to his full height, placed his forepaws heavily on his shoulders, and thus compelled him to stand still.

An expression of the wildest fury distorted Wehlen's face. "Call the dog back, or, by Heaven, I will murder him and you!" he exclaimed, grinding his teeth.

"Do you carry daggers or revolvers here in this castle, to be able to threaten people with death?" said Erica, now in her turn passionately agitated. "Sandor will not harm a hair of your head, if you keep quiet. Give me the paper, and I will call him away at once."

Wehlen stamped his foot furiously on the floor. "Call the beast away this moment!" he shouted fiercely, "or it shall be dead at your feet."

Sandor must have partly understood the threat, for he no longer satisfied himself with growling, but began a loud, piteous howling, which echoed and re-echoed with almost unendurable noise through the lofty hall. Soon after the commencement of this clamor, one of the inner doors opened, and Reinhardt appeared on the threshold, where he stood motionless for a few moments, fairly petrified with surprise and terror at the unexpected and incomprehensible scene, and then said, in a tone which vividly portrayed his feelings, —

"What, in Heaven's name does this mean? Fräulein Erica, what has happened?"

"Will Herr von Wehlen perhaps feel more disposed to give the paper in question to Herr Reinhardt?" was Erica's only reply.

Wehlen was too much accustomed to control his passions, not to be able to instantly alter his manner to suit the change in the situation. "Certainly, Fräulein," he therefore answered, almost laughing, "if you will only relieve me from the necessity of murdering this beast, which, as I know, belongs to the master of the house, and I should therefore like to spare."

Wehlen's composure, which formed so strange a contrast to his previous fury, actually startled Erica. "Here, Sandor, here!" she called, and Sandor released his enemy and obediently went to his mistress.

Wehlen approached the table, and, with the same composure, turned smilingly to Reinhardt, saying, "You have reason to be surprised, Herr Pastor, at the somewhat dramatic means this young lady chose to carry out her will. She wanted to see a paper, I declined, and she therefore fancies it is the missing document. The desire to tease, which induced me to withhold it, may perhaps have been a little out of place, but whether the method she used to defeat my purpose does not somewhat overstep the bounds of womanly delicacy, I do not presume to judge."

Reinhardt and Erica had also approached the table. The latter kept her eyes steadily fixed upon the papers, for she suspected that Wehlen intended to try to substitute another in its place. She was not mistaken, and the exchange was made so quickly and skilfully, that even her keen eyes could scarcely perceive how Wehlen hastily pushed the parchment under the other papers, and held in its place one of the upper sheets in his hand. Probably the document was too large to be concealed about his person, and he had therefore chosen this expedient. The young pastor evidently had no suspicion of the exchange, and Erica therefore thought it would be her wisest course to act as if this were also the case with her, although she saw that the paper Wehlen now held in his hand did not even have a seal.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

"How delightful it will be for us all, if you have really found the missing document, Herr von Wehlen!" said Reinhardt, who seemed destined by fate never to perceive the real feelings of those around him. "To be sure, I thought there was a prospect of discovering it in this very pile of papers, and therefore, in accordance with your urgent entreaties, gave them to you to examine, as I now cordially relinquish to you the pleasure of the discovery."

"I have found a quantity of interesting housekeeping accounts," replied Wehlen laughing; "the consumption of wine seems to have been tolerably large here in former times. This interesting paper, which so enraged Fräulein Erica, is the statement of an old steward, long since dead, about the purchase of a number of casks of remarkably good wine."

He handed the paper across the table to the pastor, and, turning to Erica, asked with an almost roguish smile, "Was it worth so much trouble?"

"At any rate, I don't think it at all polite in you to refuse my request so decidedly," replied the latter. "I certainly will not place the smallest obstacle in the way of your departure now."

She bowed, as if to bid him farewell, and looked towards him as if she expected a response. He involuntarily cast a dark, angry glance at her, but the next instant his features smoothed, and probably in order to make her feel perfectly safe, he entered into her wish and actually made the expected bow.

"I see you wish me to go away, Fräulein, and therefore will relieve you from my presence, that I may not disturb a tête-à-tête which was perhaps arranged in advance."

He left the room with a smile on his lips, but when the door had closed between him and Erica, his features were again distorted by the wildest fury, and shaking his clenched hand towards her, he muttered an oath of vengeance, which, could she have heard it, would have made the young girl tremble.

Fortunately, however, she had no suspicion of it, but as soon as he had left the room turned hastily towards Reinhardt, saying, "The document is almost in the centre of the pile of papers; I saw him put it there, let us look for it at once."

"I don't understand you, Fräulein Erica," replied the young man in astonishment. "What should induce Herr von Wehlen to hide the important paper, when for a long time he has been eagerly searching for it?"

"He has been searching for the document?"

"Yes; he offered me his assistance with the utmost kindness, and —— "

"Then take my assurance that he has deceived you; he wanted to steal the paper to use it for his own purpose."

"It is going a little too far when you make such an accusation, Fräulein Erica," said Reinhardt, greatly alarmed.

"Well, let us waste no more words about the matter, but first search for the hidden parchment. There — here it is!" cried Erica exultantly, the next instant; "I know it by the peculiar writing and the great seal. Read it, read it, and then tell me whether it is the desired paper."

"Yes, Fräulein Erica, it is as you suppose," said the young pastor, who was more perplexed than pleased. "I am really terrified at the thought that I was so near depriving the family of this important document; but how could I suspect that agreeable, interesting man to be a traitor?"

"Don't grieve over that, my dear Reinhardt," cried Erica joyfully, waving the document in the air. "We have it in our possession, and must give Sandor special thanks, for Sandor was really the one who obtained it."

Sandor, however, took very little notice of Erica's caresses, for his attention was directed towards the corridor, and he now sprang towards the door as Elmar hastily entered.

"Are you here, Erica?" he exclaimed approaching her. "I was anxious about you, and scolded Sidonie, who confessed that you had already been in the library an hour to get a book."

"The document, Elmar!" interrupted Erica joyously, "the document! Read it yourself;" and pressing the parchment into

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

his hand, she drew him towards the lamp. Elmar was so surprised, that instead of reading it as Erica desired, he looked at Reinhardt for an explanation.

The latter said in a somewhat mournful tone, which contrasted strangely with Erica's delight, "It is true, Herr von Altenborn. She has won for you the document my carelessness almost lost."

"Tell me, Erica ——"

"Come, come, Elmar, we must go to grandmamma!" cried Erica joyously. "There is plenty of time for explanations." She laid her hand on his arm, and nodding to Reinhardt, drew the baron out of the room. The young pastor looked sadly after her, and then slowly left the hall.

On the way to the baroness's room, Erica related to her companion the principal incidents of the scene which had just taken place, and though she softened them as much as possible, Elmar found ample cause for fresh anger against Wehlen; but while his heart throbbed indignantly at the thought of the latter's interview with Erica, the joyous assurance that he now possessed the right to protect her in every situation, thrilled him with delight.

The occupants of the baroness's drawing-room were greatly agitated. Sidonie, infected by Elmar's anxiety, fancied that Erica was in some real danger, her fear had made the old lady uneasy, and they were in the act of going to the library with a numerous train of servants, when Elmar and Erica appeared and speedily changed alarm into the greatest joy.

From The Contemporary Review.

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE AS SPOKEN AND WRITTEN.

It is surely needless here to set forth the importance of facilitating to foreigners, especially in Asia, a knowledge of the English language, and of extirpating plebeian errors among ourselves. As little can it be needful to insist on the grave difficulty interposed by the discord between our writing and our speaking. The topic no longer belongs to mere closet students, for it has been taken up by our school boards; and the enthusiastic party which would, in the interest of education, revolutionize our orthography, now joins hands with kindred spirits in the United States; where especially the Germans, annoyed to find how hard to their children is the mastery of English orthography as compared to German, are naturally and rightfully impatient of its artificial difficulties. In calling those enthusiastic who desire to effect uniformity and simplicity at the cost of simple neography (that is, as though their problem were — to create literature for a language as yet unwritten), no disparagement of enthusiasm is intended; indeed to achieve a conquest far less complete much enthusiasm is needed. Still, it is here contended, that those who fix their aim so high have no due understanding of the task before them, nor any discernment that to win a stronghold does not ensure keeping it when won. Their argument (even that of the widely learned Professor Max Müller) does not touch the bottom of the subject.

The history of the English language has been peculiarly unfavorable to uniformity in writing its sounds. No principles were laid down among Anglo-Saxon writers; and Norman clerks, importing Norman words, caused a confusion, which was increased by Latin and Greek superimposed. In modern days Dr. Samuel Johnson's dictionary, which more than any other has for the present fixed our spelling, followed no intelligent principles. In different shires the pronunciation differed and differs. Between north and south England there is sensible variety, and much greater between England and Ireland. The vastness of our literature and its diffusion in foreign countries complicates the problem of converting our two languages — that which is spoken and that which is written — into a harmonious pair. A sudden jump which should break continuity of development would present to the foreigner and to the child two written languages instead of one, and would presently aggravate difficulty for any but very superficial knowledge. No fact is more obvious than that our spoken language (as perhaps that of all nations) varies with time as well as place. One function of literature is to arrest this change, as far as may be; to regulate the admission of new words, and to forbid novelties of pronunciation, especially all that promote confusion. Small indeed is the shifting in orthography, compared to the innovations in utterance, especially in a country which has many provincial dialects, and no public schools in which uniformity of pronunciation is cultivated. Such exactly is our case. We barely yesterday attained any general system of national teaching, and in it we have not even begun to make elocution a substantive object of culture. Precisely because the pronunciation has changed while the orthography is nearly fixed, a far

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

greater chasm has arisen between the written and the spoken language than existed two centuries ago. Yet, as if blind to this fact, people are vehemently urging us to take that which is ever shifting as our standard, and remodel into conformity with it that which is comparatively stable. Nor is this the only extravagance of the proposal: its advocates seem blind also to the fact, that the written medium of thought is at once more distinctive and far more copious than the spoken tongue; and they are proposing to degrade the nobler instrument into the weakness of the less noble. It is surprising to hear a learned man gravely reason that we seldom make any serious mistake in listening to a speech, as to whether a soul or a sole is intended, or in what sense sole is used; therefore, there will be no harm in adopting a single mode of writing the four words right, rite, write, wright. Undeniably it is a defect that any such ambiguity exists as the pronouncing sole and soul alike: but because we have this defect in one instance, are we therefore to introduce it, knowingly and voluntarily, in other instances, and to confound four more words because we have already confounded two? Nay, we are coolly told that we might drop the word rite out of the language and use ceremonial for it; and drop the use of sole in the sense of alone, only. No doubt the wear and tear of time does thus cast out words which are uncomfortably ambiguous; and modern Greek instructively shows how the immense degradation of the national utterance has forcibly ejected or remodelled numbers of classical words; but it is rather despotic to suggest extinction of words in the literature where is no ambiguity, merely because a corrupt pronunciation has introduced ambiguity. Surely, if we must change, the more rightful way is to adopt the Irish pronunciation of soul (sowl), which is very probably the correct one, and certainly is the more convenient. . And this points to the thought, which will presently be enlarged on, that the Irish in some important respects have evidently retained a purer and better pronunciation than that of London and southern England; nay, in one respect better than that of all England. Hence, instead of ridiculing all their peculiarities as brogue, some of them (if we are wise) will rather be imitated and cultivated, thereby bringing our utterances nearer to the written standard, with advantage also to distinctiveness.

Be that as it may, it is at least absolutely necessary to define what is the right pronunciation (whether or not we can persuade this generation to adopt it) before we can wisely begin so vast a change as a total remodelling of our orthography; especially when it is possible that before those die out who are "bigoted" against the new spelling, the pronunciation might make new and grave deviation from the much-lauded phonotype. This is every way to be expected, unless in the national schools the tendencies to slang and laziness of utterance be held in with a strong bridle. Such, according to Virgil, is the proneness of all things to degenerate.

> Sic omnia fatis
> In pejus ruere . . .
> Non aliter quam qui adverso vix flumine lembum,
> Remigiis subigit, — si brachia forte remisit, etc.

In the memory of the present writer, change (he would rather say corruption, depravation) has been observable enough; and the remark may be extended to France. Paris had an Academy, to which all France looked up. In accordance with its decisions a grammar for the English was compiled by M. de Lévizac. The seventh edition, dated 1817, was revised by M. Stephen Pasquier of the University of Paris. (I have before me my schoolboy copy.) It lays down (p. 22), "H, when aspirated, is sounded with a strong guttural impulse, as in 'harpe, 'héros, 'hideux, 'honte, and about a hundred more words." The Greek aspirate is prefixed to the h, as if to make assurance doubly sure; and certainly until of late I quite believed, from old remembrance, that in "C'est une honte," the h was sounded more emphatically than in English speech. But now I am informed by most decisive authority that no initial h at all is to be heard in Parisian utterance. A decree from the Academy, without schoolmasters to enforce it, apparently has been unfruitful of result, although all educated France intended reverential submission. Other changes of pronunciation are also going on.

That which early in this century was called namby-pamby, or the pronunciation of "a dandy" (itself a word quite new then), appears to be in London current and fashionable — the use of short a instead of broad a in grant, command, grass, task, and numerous other words; and besides, an entire suppression of r at the end of a syllable or before a consonant. Thus lord, hard, door, lorn, pore, pork, are sounded laud, haad, daw, lawn, paw, pawk, without reproof, if I am rightly in-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

formed. Arms and alms are alike corrupted into aams. Are we now invited to change our writing into conformity with this corruption, for the convenience of schoolchildren who are required to learn English quickly? Probably northeners will say no: but in any case we have to define what is right. My mother was a Londoner: she may have been a little old-fashioned in her tongue, but she did not confound which with witch, wheel with weal, etc., but gave to the h in wh its rightful sound. In the combination wh the English writing has deviated unwisely from the Anglo-Saxon, which had hw for it, as in hwilc, which; hwîl, while; hwistl, whistle; hwît, white. This corrupt sounding of wh as mere w damages at least seventeen root-words, and surely ought to be rebuked as sharply as the perversion of horse, hand, hedge, hill, into 'orse, 'and, 'edge, 'ill, etc. W for hw is an especial disgrace of southern England. At least Ireland and Scotland are staunch for the h; how far northward in England the mischief has now spread, may be hard to decide. My schoolmaster always sounded in whole the w as well as the h; which was not pedantry, if (as I am told) in some counties this is the pronunciation of the peasants. To distinguish whole from hole, is an advantage; and in spite of Anglo-Saxon hael (hale), whole may be related to wheel. As a general remark — if any one is too old to change his utterance, he can at least confess and counsel the right way to the new generation. The word whole suggests two small corrections which are needed in orthography: first, we ought to write wholely (just as solely, vilely) so as to secure the sounding of double l; next, in the unseemly word whore, we ought to omit the w, which is a stupid, causeless addition. Wickliffe writes hore. Wholly ought not to rhyme to holy.

Further, it may be remarked, that in many names of places the w of wick and wich is omitted by Londoners and others; as in Berwick, Dulwich, Greenwich, Keswick, Norwich. But in Keswick itself I observed that residents sounded the w, as indeed in the town of Derby its name is sounded as it is spelt; while the aristocracy call it Darby.* Names, both of places and of men, are a problem apart; and (it may seem) need first attention and summary treatment. As in manuscript it is pre-eminently important that names be clearly written, because it is impossible or hazardous to guess at them by the context, so in speech the sound of a name ought to be in close harmony with the writing. If we insist on writing Keswick, Greenwich, with the w we ought to sound the w; conversely, if it be thought better to drop the w, in utterance, we ought not to write it. Considering the value attached to archives and legal documents, few will desire to omit the w in writing the names; and as there is no intelligible gain in omitting it in speech, it seems evident that our pronunciation ought to go back to the earlier standard. If any one's time is so precious that he cannot say "a gentleman," but feels constrained to say "a gent," of course we cannot put him into Newgate for the offence; but we can condemn it as vulgar, and such condemnation has its weight. To speak more generally — we are forced to admit in many words two pronunciations: one, which alone is correct, which ought always to be used on solemn occasions, or in any public address, in poetry and serious reading; another, permissible in rapid and familiar speech, where small deviations from accuracy may pass. So we tolerate tuppence for twopence; but not in the parable of the good Samaritan. In poetry, as we prefer the old medicînal to medícinal which has mischievously supplanted it, so we may hold to médicine in three syllables as alone correct, though in homely speech we admit méd'cin. Are we therefore to write it medsn? But in names it seems needful to be pedantically accurate. It is deceptive to say Ciciter when we mean Círencéster; and many persons are therefore sensible enough to utter the latter word in full. When we can endure the length of Chichester and Colchester, is it a great drain on our time and strength to say Gloúcester, Wórcester, and not Gloster, Wooster? If, to humor Shakespeare, we must say Gloster, then let us write Gloster, as in the old books, and admit a double spelling. To accept Gloucester and Gloster side by side, and pronounce one with three syllables, the other with two, is just what the Greeks did in poetry and prose, or in various dialects. So in Pope, Diomed and Diomedes, Merion and Meriones. Grave remonstrance may fitly be made to families who write themselves Beauchamp, Cholmondely, Colquhoun, and pronounce the names Beecham, Chumley, Cohoun. If they are proud of the old spelling, ought they not to be equally proud of the old pronunciation?

* "They have learned from their grooms," said an old lady to me in my boyhood, "to say Darby and Barkshire."

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

No one, I suppose, will desire to present to the foreigner two or three dialects of England, instead of a single normal language. To go on as we are, has its serious inconvenience; yet it does not display and avow arrogance of one part of the United Kingdom to another. London does not now say to the great northern towns, "We are the metropolis; our pronunciation must be your standard;" nor to the Irish does she say, "Let us have none of your brogue." So to speak outright certainly would not win their efforts to strive for a common standard of utterance; but this is what one county will have to say to all the rest, if we attempt to fix the pronunciation without a previous well-considered survey based on principle and right. Before proceeding to enunciate what principles ought to guide us where there is local diversity, it may be permitted to make some minor suggestions as to the choice of spelling where choice is allowed, where also there is no variety of pronunciation. For this is a small field, as to which there is least occasion for controversy; in which therefore one may hope for earliest agreement. Next, I will suggest a few cautious innovations.

First, then, I place words in which a double spelling is current; and I maintain (what I hope will be generally conceded) that we ought to select that mode of writing which agrees the better with the sound. According to which principle we ought to write:—

Jail, not gaol.
Jailer, not gaoler.
Show, not shew.
Hiccup, not hiccough.
Hocks, not houghs.
Chesnut, not chestnut.
Guage, not gauge.
Lackey, not lacquey.
Licorice, not liquorice.
Alchymy, as of old.
Chymist, not chemist.
Chymistry, not chemistry.
Accounts, not accompts.
Accountant, not accomptant.
Harken, not hearken.
Cartridge, not cartouch.
Vial, not phial.
Skeptic, not sceptic; and perhaps a few others.

Assailants who aim at a total upturn swell their forces by producing some of these words. Their argument, without these, is abundantly strong in favor of partial change and other aids. By not conceding this, we strengthen them.

Gaol, gaoler, stand alone in English with g soft before a. Of course the French geôle is the origin; but in this, e follows the g. Few now write shew; but the word is produced by phonotypists to reproach us. Strew and strow are (I believe) both good, as verbs; identical in sense, differing slightly in pronunciation. To straw is a third variety, but nearly obsolete. Hiccough is confessed to be a mere fancy. Hough, houghs, are quite isolated in giving to gh the sound of k. To retain the t before n in chesnut, because it comes from Latin castanus, is as weak as it would be to write lacrme, poulsser, in modern French. Skeptic is the American way of writing.

Secondly, where irregularity is unique, or nearly so, the public will never be sorry to get rid of it. A few illustrations shall be ventured.

1. Schedule is the only word in use in which sch has the German sound. (How the obsolete seneschal was pronounced, I do not know.) I think we ought to write shedule, in conformity with sheet, from scida; also scism (as scissors), not schism. Then every remaining sch means sk. 2. Clerk, sergeant, and heart, hearth, have er or ear for ar. Clerk has a new sense, diverse from cleric. Might we not extinguish these exceptions? 3. Yacht, alone in the language, has ch mute. Who will regret the loss of the ch? We shall only need then some fit mark on the a to denote the right sound. 4. By collating conceive, conceit, deceive, deceit, we see that receive ought to form receit. The p in receipt is surely a mere vexation. 5. The word guild until recently (in London at least) used to rhyme to mild, child, wild. I never heard in my early days guild, Guildhall, sounded with short i. Now it seems, guild is gratuitously confounded with gild. On Aristotle's principle, that perspicuity is the first excellence of language, we may claim to go back to the long i in this word, though we cannot help confounding guilt with gilt in our utterance. 6. That ia has no proper place in Parliament, has been pointed out by Mr. E. Jones of Liverpool, and, no doubt, by others. Parlement is the old and only right spelling; and the sooner it is resumed the better. 7. Busy, business, with u sounded as i, is a peculiar anomaly, and without historical justification. Busy is in Dutch besig, in Anglo-Saxon bisig. Surely we ought, without hesitation, to write bisy, bisiness, if not rather bizy, biziness. 8. Perhaps ten words end in mb, with b mute. Tomb got its b from the French, which probably had it from the Massilian Greek; womb, lamb, have b

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

from the Anglo-Saxon; but Dutch has wam, Swedish vame, Danish vom; also German has lamm, Dutch and Danish lam. In Latin, tum-ulus has tum for root. Certainly if we wrote toom, woom, lam, no one would miss the b. But in limb, numb (benumb), thumb, the b has no support in etymology, nor in kindred languages. In dumb it has perhaps a small excuse from Icelandic. Lam would presently look to us as natural as ram, ham, jam, sham, slam; lim (the true Anglo-Saxon) as slim, dim, vim, brim, prim; num, benum, thum, as gum, hum, rum, sum. But in the word climb, the b has both etymological reason (compare French grimper) and potential life, as chamber shows. In Cumberland I have heard climb sounded with short i and vocal b, which I doubt not is the old and only true pronunciation; nor is it more difficult than to sound p in limp, imp, jump. Here, to write clime for climb would be mere depravation. 9. In two words, beginning with bu, the u is strangely superfluous. I do not mean in buoy; for careful speakers rightly sound the u, and do not confound the word with boy; but I mean build and buy. The German bild at once ought to warn us of what is right, and embolden us to drop the u. In Wedgwood's learned and valuable dictionary I find that to build was in old English expressed by to bylle, even the d being unessential, as in sound, soun; but for u there seems no pretence. The verb buy was in old English bigge, again without u. Wycliffe writes bigger for buyer. Unless we are going to extirpate gh in nigh, high, and many other words, it is obvious to correct buy, buyer, into bigh, bigher. The past tense, bought, still displays the gh. 10. The eccentric word women ought certainly to be written wimen. 11. Nephew should be nevew, French neveu. Dabitur licentia sumta pudenter.

But to resume the general question, "How is the best pronunciation to be settled?" Here we may rest on two principles: first, that is best which gives (mentally) most distinction of sense; secondly, when other things are equal, that is best, which (orally) is best heard. The second condition is almost identical with preference of long Italian vowels, which are melodious, or fitted to music. Each topic admits much illustration; but I will advert to the latter first. Consonants are not so well heard as vowels, or at least as long vowels. In the hum of an assembly the hearers of vowels are often able to guess at consonants which they cannot hear. Men with large lungs, as practised singers, can peal forth long vowels with a strength hard to limit, because these vowels can be dwelt upon; but liquids and sibilants are the only consonants on which the voice can dwell; and of vowel sounds, the Italian are the clearest, especially broad a, long o, and long u. Of all vowels, the short i is the hardest to utter audibly, as will easily be found in shouting out such a name as Dickson or Hickson (Dixon, Hixon). On the ground of melody and ease of hearing, I claim for our old-fashioned southern broad a (Italian a) and for the still fuller-voiced aw, au, modern Greek ω), a preference over the narrower sounds by which the more northern counties have been invading the south for fifty years past. Let me denote Italian broad a by à. To me the standard pronunciation in the following words (and many others) is àss, gràss, pàss; àsk, tàsk, gràsp, bàsket; grànt, commànd, plànt; Frànce, trànce, glànce; fàst, làst, pàst; fàsten, vàst, càst; càstle, fàther, ràther, etc.;

in which the utterance of short a is by many thought elegant. Again, let me denote Greek ω (English au, awe) by ò. In my mother tongue I learnt: òff, dòff, tòss, cròss, sòft, òft, lòft, còffee, còffer, òffer, etc.; but I am told that a short o is the now prevalent fashion, and is much prettier. Further, the clipping of words, to which a slipshod pronunciation ever tends, by omitting vowels, lessens the number of syllables and crams consonants together. This surely ought to be resisted with all our might. The greatest defect of our language as to melody (which is nearly measured by penetration of the air) is its excess in consonants; a mischief which the contraction of words by elision of the vowels ever tends to aggravate. The vulgar are not satisfied with 'peach for impeach, 'prentice for apprentice, 'spose for suppose; but they confound pelisse and police in plice. Nothing more distinguishes careful and cultured pronunciation than the accurate utterance of the *un*accented vowels, generally short — a task which often is not easy. In hystérical and históricaI the contrast of the accented vowels is clear enough; but it is not so easy to distinguish e from o in mystery and history, literal and littoral, or to discriminate accessary from accessory, if indeed there ought to be two words. When unaccented vowels are long, as in cóntrīte, fīnīte, fémāle, no embarrassment arises; but when they are short, they are

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

obscured and confused, and a is undistinguishable from u, or even from e, i. If we learned by the ear alone the words mútăble, émphăsis púrpŏse, fávōrăble, plíănt, líŏn, we might suppose the ă and the ŏ to be ŭ. Similarly dámage, rávage, sávage, órange, might seem to be damej or damij, ravij, savij, orenj or orinj. Again, e and i ending an unaccented syllable cannot be discriminated; as in pérmĕate, végĕtate, gérmĭnate, persĕvére, pársĭmony, púrĭty. Such being the natural result of the stress accent placed strongly on one syllable, it would be a great error to invent a set of short vowels to define these varied utterances. It suffices to know on which syllable the stress falls; and this for the foreigner is sometimes the chief matter, in words of more than two syllables — a circumstance out of which will presently arise some discussion.

But with such facts before us, it is evident that no recasting of our orthography can make the ear alone a guide to correct writing, unless we make disgraceful havoc of words.

But continuing the argument of melody, we must admit, that if it is to dictate that the broad vowels à, ò, of the south shall dominate the narrow ones of the more northern counties, it equally decides against the southerners in favor of the long Italian ú as the true sound of oo. In Hull, for instance, they say book with the long oo of southern fool, and (as far as known to me) never give to oo the short southern sound. In the midland counties also room, groom, have oo = ú, but in my native London I learned to pronounce near twenty words with oo short, equivalent to the vowel of puss, full. They are book, brook, cook (cookery), crook, hook, look, nook, rook (rookery), shook, took; broom, room (roomy), groom (bridegroom; good, hood (hoodwinked), wood, (woody, wooden), stood, foot, wool (woolly, woollen). Not a single inconvenience appears from sounding every oo long; and if any high authority will enunciate that Yorkshire and the north are here right (hard as I might find it to adapt my tongue to the change), I should rejoice in it as removing arbitrary anomalies, and in some measure promoting audible speech. The new generation would grow up into the better way. Blood, flood, soot, remain anomalous in the south, as foot in Lancashire, — sounded so as to rhyme with nut!

I go back to illustrate the principle, that, of two rival pronunciations, that is better which better discriminates words, and aids to fix the sense. In the culture which ennobles a language there is a constant striving towards sharper distinction, which (by a perverted use of the word) Herbert Spencer would call "differentiation." In the Iliad ἕλκος and ὠτειλὴ indifferently mean a wound; but in prose Greek τραῦμα is a wound, ἕλκος an ulcer or sore, ὠτειλὴ a scar, ἐσχάρα the scab over a burn. This is a single illustration of a general fact. Accurate thought leads to distinctive phrase. Poets, for metre or rhyme, or to avoid prosaic accuracy, take liberties; so too do silly persons, thinking themselves witty when they are only coarse — as in saying the hide of a man for his skin; his shell (testa, tête) for his head; his beak or snout for his nose; amalgam (μάλαγμα) for gold; tin for silver; gizzard and pluck (odious word!) for heart; and so on. Moreover by lazy pronunciation words slightly differing in sound are confounded, which above was illustrated by police and pelisse. We are bound to struggle against every such degradation of our tongue. The enemy is ever at work, attacking in detail; and we must resist in detail, or he beats us. Moreover our written tongue is sedulously cultivated for accuracy, while our spoken tongue has been left to the untender whims of slang and laziness. Necessarily our written medium of thought is both more copious and more accurately distinctive: we must vehemently refuse in a single word to degrade it where it is more exact, in compliment to the spoken tongue. As said above, better to pronounce soul sowl, as the Irish do, than deliberately confound it with sole. I have compiled a list of two hundred and seven groups of words, pairs or triplets, in which the written language makes distinctions unknown to us in speech. Granting that in very few cases of this list can a distinctive utterance be suggested, that is no reason for renouncing the written distinction. We are traitors if we surrender any point of superiority which our higher organ possesses. But sometimes it is not impossible to elevate the lower organ, the spoken tongue, by recovering for it lost discriminations. I have already named the wh (hw), but I proceed to treat of the r.

How far the Scots retain the full vibration of r, I less perfectly know; but every Irish gentleman seems to me accurately to pronounce it, and I cannot doubt that he has the true primitive sound, which we from carelessness have lost. For instance, we have three words, or, ore, oar, for which the Irish have three sounds, but

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the English only two. The same is the case with for, fore, four. Notoriously in many languages the r is liable to transposition, but that does not necessarily lead to a weakening of its vibratory force. R is indeed among the consonants easiest to hear. At least I think that in a room full of people mirror would be better heard than even miller; merry certainly than mewy (the "dandy" substitute), roar than lone, lawn, though the last is a mouth-filling word. We emasculate the language by getting rid of as many r's as possible. See the process in the word iron. Its proper sound is exactly as in irony, and what can be better? This is still the Irish pronunciation; is also that which we English instinctively give to it in poetry or other solemn reading. But in the uneducated mouth the r was first transposed, as if we wrote i-orn, next it became i-ern, very similar to the Welsh haiarn. Anglo-Saxon has iren and isen, German Eisen. It is open to possibility that the Welsh modified our pronunciation. Be that as it may, i-arn has almost been softened into i-an in careless lips, the r quite vanishing. But this is only one word out of a hundred.

So few persons seem to have pondered on the topic here brought forward that yet further illustration may be expedient. We have no difficulty in distinguishing own from owen; nor if we sounded bowl so as to rhyme with fowl, should we be prone to mistake bowl for bowel, or growl for growel (if gruel were so sounded, rhyming with bowel); yet we cannot in speech discriminate flour from flower. Why is this? It is because we do not fully vibrate final r, but insert a furtive short vowel between it and the ou, converting flour into flou-ăr, flou-ĕr. Growl is a monosyllable, but an Englishman seems forced to make flour into two syllables.

We have almost made two letters out of r, which may be distinguished as the perfect r and the imperfect or broken r. Of these, the latter must be carefully noted for its influence on the vowel preceding. Our r is broken, when it ends a syllable or precedes a consonant; then a part of its vibration is lost, and the previous vowel is elongated and modified. Hereby e, i, u, lose all distinction, as in her, fir, fur; hers, furze; pert, flirt, spirt, spurt. Indeed, when the syllable is unaccented, even ă and ŏ seem to be merged in ŭ; as in friăr, briăr, liăr, buyĕr, mirrŏr, honŏr or honour. Not only so, but a peculiar sound (elsewhere unheard in English) is assigned to a, e long, before broken r, which seems to be the French è grave, as in stare, wary, there, hair, bear, heir, wear, were, ere, which all rhyme perfectly. Thus tear is really two words, tear (to rend) sounded as tare, and tear (larme, lacruma) sounded as tier. The Irish, on the contrary, ignore this French è sound, and consistently sound mare, fare, pair, etc., with the vowel of mane, fane, pain, retaining for r its full vibration: likewise, as I think, they give the same vowel sound to there as to here, mere, near. It is not at all likely that we shall ever follow them throughout. If just enough difference remain to mark nationality, who can grudge it? a compatriot of Bellerophon might surely talk Doric! But if we cannot go the Irish length, and pronounce ore, fore, with a fully vibrated r, with long Italian ô, and without any interpolated vowel, any "patahh furtive" of the Hebrews, before r; yet we may strongly insist that in every r something of vibration shall be heard; that born shall not rhyme to gône and lawn, nor car to ah, nor or to paw; that arms shall not sound as alms; nor order, lord, be as awder, laud; in short, that in corn, cart, court, mortal, murky, war, worn, short, and all other words with r, this letter shall have a most unmistakable roughness. Even so, we do not solve the whole question how r is to be sounded where our counties differ, — as, how to discriminate ore from oar or or, which is a type of many other words; whether door, floor, four, pour, are to rhyme with oar, or with or, nor, for. Until such questions are settled, we cannot adopt a complete consistent phonotype.

It may here be added, that Irish ladies, without the smallest affectation or effort, pronounce calm, palm, alms just as they are written, retaining the l and making the a sharp and short as in măn. About half and calf I am not so sure, but it seems impossible to doubt that such was the English pronunciation at no distant time, and such it ought to be now. The lip has been unschooled and wilful: we must not let it be master of the situation. There is no more difficulty in sounding the l, than in elm, helm, elf, pelf, shelf, in all which we sound the l, and make the vowel short. A specious compromise would be, to allow breadth to the à in calm, palm, psalm, alms, etc., to lay down that in strictness the l ought to be at least slightly heard, and that its omission in homely talk is a regrettable liberty. Whoever approves this as a theory will perhaps extend it to walk, stalk, talk, chalk, balk or baulk, in all of which a has the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

sound of au. So in falcon we utter a as au, yet do not with the French omit to sound the l. Indeed, no good case is made out to phonotypists for eliding the l.

Another topic opens upon us with initial kn, gn, ps — combinations which people seem to imagine are unpronounceable to English lips. Yet no English schoolboy finds difficulty as to these in Greek, nor even to the yet harder initial sounds kt, khth, pt, bd, phth, mn, pn. No one thinks of dropping the first consonant in ψάλλω, ψαλμὸς, μνήμη, κνήμη, γνήσιος, γνωτὸς, γνόφος, δνόφος, βδελυρος, κνίζω, κνάω, etc. Not inability, but mere laziness or inobservance, make the English say salm for psalm, nife for knife, nat for gnat, nihgt for knight, nave for knave. German accuracy here rebukes us. They do not boggle over the k of Knabe and Knecht, which at bottom are the same words as our knave and knight. To one (German or English) who comes to us with the request that we will drop the k in order to accommodate the popular speech which confuses knave with nave, knight with night, we may respectfully but firmly reply: "Sir, you mistake the culprit (the spoken language): he has debased himself; and now to please him, you try to wheedle his comrade (the orthography) into like debasement. The only cure is, that he repent and retrace his steps. We may wink at his laziness, but we will not sanction it. If we are implicated in his offence, we will not justify ourselves, nor plunge into new mischief by tampering with sound literature." For knife the French have canif; and it surely were better to pronounce a furtive vowel between k and n than to lop the k off; and similarly of the other words. Difficulties in detail remain. The g in cognizance will probably ere long be sounded, since recognize gives the hint. Just so, ignore, which forty years ago was sounded with Italian gn as in signor, now is assimilated to ignorant and ignoble with g hard. The g in sign, benign, malign, cannot be spared. It has potential life. Sign must not be confounded with mathematical sine, nor divorced from signal. Some mark must be devised to show that g is mute. When mn ends a word, it is hardly needful to tell that n is mute; for the tongue naturally fails. But since with derivatives the n reappears in vigor, as in solemn, solemnity; condemn, condemnable; most of us will regard solem, condem, as the opposite of improvement. One who loves and reveres his native English may well feel indignation, that those who shrink from enunciating initial k, g, p, in the combinations kn, gn, ps, as harsh, at the same time, by clipping or shortening all our vowels, crowd our consonants into unpronounceable combinations. Who first made diddest, haddest into didst, hadst, we cannot know. In Shakespeare the ending ation makes three syllables for the metre. Poets, whose task is to develop and conserve melody, in later days seem rather to have studied to cram words and thought into the smallest possible compass, and thus (perhaps!) to make poetry a philosophy. Whenever two vowels come together, they must (forsooth) forbid their belonging to different syllables. Thus -tion became -shun in utterance; chariot, warrior, became two syllables instead of three, and heaven, tower, power, etc., were clipped into monosyllables. In boyhood I used to hear from modest, unlearned, but not unrefined lips in Hampshire such plurals as birdis, nestis, houndis, according to the old melodious principle which forbids great agglomeration of consonants. If we can manage to utter nests, breasts, sixths, it is monstrous to complain of initial kn, ps, as hard. The Germans say die Sonne, the sun; mein Sohn, my son: we, by shortening the vowel of Sohn corrupt sun and son into one sound. Our poets bear a strong responsibility for much of this depravation. Nay, some of them, not unadmired, write as if aiming to get into one syllable as much as possible, as, viewst for viēwēst, rigidst for rigidest, and a hundred of other examples; whereby they produce a lumbering jumble of consonants comparable to those of some old Latin tragedian. If we are to fix the language now, let us first define its noblest and least unmelodious state, and not assume that every deprivation is to be acquiesced in as a κτῆμα ἐς ἀεί.

If in this generation we protest in favor of a right pronunciation, and schools do their duty, the next generation will grow up with a new ideal. The defective utterance will gradually be thought vulgar, and it will become possible, without diverting attention injuriously from the matter to the manner, to pronounce rightly upon all high occasions. That is the proper way of healing the discord between our literature and our speech, whenever the former is wholly right and the latter wholly wrong. The argument applies even to initial wr. The w was certainly once sounded. It is more difficult to be heard than the k, the g, or the p just discussed; therefore, no doubt, it insensibly went out of use. In Dutch and Scandinavian the wr becomes vr, which is as well heard as fr. If we

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

seriously tried to utter the wr in wry, writhe, write, etc., probably either vr or hr would be the practical result. Just so, in ancient Greek, when the old digamma (w) got before an r, in few dialects could it stand. It either vanished or became β (v?) or was converted into the aspirate (h): thus Ϝρέζω became ῥέζω. The root Ϝριχ (Sanscrit, vrih), according to Benfei, "to roar," generated βρύχω. It is also possible that the effort to sound w before r would introduce a furtive vowel, as in woríte, wory′, worénch, worést.

The words just written down show the immense importance of the stress accent. In the Greek language, each dialect having strictly conformed its orthography to its local pronunciation, nothing more was needed after the Macedonian conquest of western Asia to facilitate the use of Greek to Asiatics, than the adding of accents, — three indeed, the distinction of which is lost to the modern Greeks. To Indians and others who try to learn English from a book, the information concerning our accent can hardly be given in grammars, since it is matter of detail, and to consult the dictionary for every word separately is most laborious. Practically no one can so learn; every one must have an oral teacher, until grammars are written in Indian languages for learners in English, and accent the English words. But it would be a great assistance to have the right accent printed in all the English pieces set before them, at least on polysyllables. How unintelligible do words become with the accent misplaced; as capáble, tabérnacle, penultíma, modérate, bravéry! But even dissyllables sometimes change their sense with the accent, and contrast a verb with a noun. I have no complete list of such, nor is usage quite uniform with some words. The following are a specimen: —

Verb.	Noun.
insúlt	ínsult
accént	áccent
desért	désert
transpórt	tránsport
condúct	cónduct
refúse	réfuse
subjéct	súbject
objéct	óbject
colléct	cóllect
ejéct	éject
digést	dígest
incréase	íncrease
allý	álly (?)
perfúme	pérfume
detaíl	détail
convért	cónvert
commúne	cómmune
defíle	défile
prodúce	próduce
prefíx	préfix
suffíx	súffix

Not unlike are preténd, prétext; compóse, cómpost.

More peculiar is it that to móderate (verb) has a secondary accent on the last syllable, and its a is long (German ä), while móderate (adjective) has no secondary accent on the last, and the a is, in consequence, almost an e (móderet), nearly as the a in órange (orenj).

In numerous cases the accent has been thrown back in this century from the penultima to the antepenultima, or even to the fourth syllable from the end, against all law of Greek and Latin euphony, and generally with damage to the sound. In my early childhood I learned to say indústry (as indústrious) and contráry (as contrárious), and was surprised to be afterwards told that índustry, cóntrary, were alone correct. (The nursery rhyme has, "Mary, Mary, quite contráry," etc.) Alexánder was the first pronunciation, which ere long changed (surely for the worse) into A′lexander, reversing the primary and secondary accent. Accéptable accéssary, have been corrupted into áccept-able, áccessary; even Parliaméntary into Párliamentary, monstrously throwing the accent on to the fifth syllable from the end. Contémplate, illústrate, have been changed to cóntemplate, íllustrate, perhaps to give a rhyme to some versifier; medicínal to medícinal, much for the worse. It is remarkable that the tendency appeared in Athens, about the time of Pericles. The melodious τροπαῖον, ὁμοῖος were changed to the flimsy τρόπαιον, ὅμοιος. But plenty of old-fashioned people among us stand out against throwing the accent farther back than the antepenultima, in some of these words; indeed insist on retaining contémplate, illústrate. Decōrous and sonōrous stand firm against their rivals décorous and sónorous, which I believe are going out. Decádence has of late been supplanted by décădence, imported from France; rhymesters of course prefer décadence; but perhaps the verb decáy will keep decádence, aided also by the noun cadence. The time may shortly arrive, when a middle class well educated from books, and not reared in the trail of aristocratic pronunciation, will restore to the language a better accentuation and add to our long vowels. Already they insist on saying opposīte, maritīme, dy′nasty. Before long they may give us medicīne,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

infīnīte, and literāry instead of the obscure literăry. We cannot fix the language: but it would be something if we could guide the movement aright. The foreigner needs to be informed that in words of Greek and Latin origin the accent shifts by a law of its own; as in démocrat, demócracy; hármony, harmónious; mélody, melódious; expressly that it may not be thrown further back than the antepenultima. There is also a frequent tendency to shorten in a trisyllable the vowel which was long in a monosyllable; as gráve, grăvity; cáve, căvity; suāve, suăvity; but this rule will mislead us, if applied to Saxon words, as appears in brāve, brāvery. For this and very many reasons the pupil, especially the foreign learner, requires a text in which the length and quality of vowels is marked. How deceptive are fīnīte and infīnīte! dĭvīne, an iamb with accent on the last; fīnīte, a pure spondee, accented on the first. If direct is known to be an oxytone, the doubt remains whether it be an iamb or a spondee. In fact this is not at the speaker's will; though prevalently perhaps the adjective dīrect is a spondee, and the verb direct oftener has i short. It is easy so to mark our vowels as to set all these doubts at rest in that part of our language which is derived from Latin and Greek. It is the Saxo-Norman portion which contains the words which are so capriciously written as to puzzle us, even when we cannot throw the fault on pronunciation changing with lapse of time. Superfluous letters are the greatest vexation. Final e mute is held not to be superfluous, because it lengthens the vowel next preceding it, as in the difference between pan and pane; the latter being = pän. Yet this very e mute is apt to be obtruded out of place, where it only misleads. Here are a dozen words in which (seemingly) e ought to be expunged; have, give, to live, love, glove, shove, dove; shone, bade, sate, ate. In the three first I advise its omission, also in all verbal adjectives from Latin -ivus, as activ, plaintiv, fugitiv. A properly dotted o sets right the four next words; the four last are antiquated forms,—what may be called first aorist, co-existing with the more popular second aorist, shon, bad, sat, et.

With a simple mark to denote that a letter is mute * (say a compact little mathematical zero), our worst difficulties of notation vanish. The cedilla and the Greek aspirate, to modify consonants, remove a large number of uncertainties concerning consonantal sounds. How to mark s when it has the sound of z is difficult, only because there are so many solutions. Here let the remark be dropt, that the dot on i and j ought to be removed from print. Neither is found with the capital letters I and J. With j the dot is useless even in MS. In handwriting the loop of e is apt to blot, which leads to writing e almost like i; therefore alone a dot is of use even in MS. All useless dots dull the eye to the perception of useful ones, and ought to be cleared off. Reserving (´) to denote the stress accent, we at once have at our disposal for modified vowels, ä, ë, ï, ö, ü; à, è, ì, ò, ù; â, ê, î, ô, û; of which some are superfluous, viz., ì, ù; indeed ê is wanted for three English words only, viz., brêak, grêat, stêak, sounded as brake, grate, stake, from which they differ in sense. Nevertheless this triple row of vowels is not sufficient, unless we largely alter our received spelling. I want double dots under a, e, o, u (a̤, e̤, o̤, ṳ).

Thus armed, we can make our received orthography suggest to a learner precisely the right sounds, with very few and insignificant exceptions which perhaps ought to be summarily dealt with.

Here may be noticed a very few words in which the spoken tongue may vaunt itself as more discriminating than our manuscript. But a few marks added will give equal precision to the latter.

Böw, of an archer or of a shoe-tie; bow, bend the head.

To söw (seed); sow, female pig.

To röw (a boat); row (ignoble word), tumult.

Döes, female deer; does, doeth.

To möw (grass); a barley mow, rick, stack.

Any other such ambiguities can by easy devices be removed.

The problem of teaching the foreigner or the child to read correctly a book set before him is but half the problem of phonotype. It is complex enough in our received mode of writing, yet with a sufficiency of well-devised marks, it can be solved; and may be made simpler by very moderate correction, also without disfiguring the text, especially if by slight change we revert to better pronunciation. To solve this half of the problem would be of immense importance, and in my judgment ought not to be delayed. To solve the other half would be so to write and print that he who hears the sounds of our tongue shall at once be able to write them down

* But g is certainly wrong in foreign, sovereign, and may perhaps be well dropt also in feign and deign. The t can well be spared in -tch.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

from his ear in the very way which we hold to be orthographic. This would require a total reconstruction of the written language. To attempt it I account to be irrational, and believe all effort for it to be a misdirection of energies which might otherwise be of avail: moreover, such effort damages the hope of attainable reform, inasmuch as it stirs up disgust against all change. But there is a remark, not yet made, which may bear usefully on a large class of words.

The phonotypists make very light of diligently confounding rain, rein, reign, under a single spelling (and this is but one example out of two hundred), arguing that we could well endure rane as expressing all three, because in every language words have many ambiguities. For instance, box means: 1, a certain shrub or tree; 2, a coffer made of boxwood, and hence, any wooden coffer; 3, a blow on the cheek; 4, a bakhshiesh, or small gift at Christmas. What hardship, then, would it be if rane had three very different senses? The reply is, that if we could write the sound box in four different ways answering to the four different senses, it would facilitate the learning of English. Suppose that we wrote — 1, bocs; 2, boks; 3, box; 4, bokhs, sounding all alike, the pupil would at once be warned of four different senses, and would the better remember them by reason of the different writing, which acts as a memoria technica. Also, inasmuch as bad reasoning chiefly rises out of ambiguous words, nothing so aids accurate thought as accurate marks of distinction. If it were possible, we ought to remove ambiguities both to the ear and to the eye, or at least to the eye, if we cannot to the ear. But we are unable thus to create distinctions at will. Surely, then, when tradition itself freely gives us in certain words distinctions for which we vainly wish in others, it were great folly to throw away the advantage. This would be a levelling down, and not a levelling up.

Finally, to fix ideas, I briefly explain one vowel system which would be efficient and sufficient. I say one system; for there are, of course, many possible, and in twenty-five years' effort I have changed my mind often enough.

1. System of circumflexed vowels: —

â, âll, fâll, fâlcon, âltar, âlter, wâter, wâr, wârd.
ê, only in brêak, grêat, stêak.
î (French i long), marîne, machîne, suîte.
ô, môve, tômb, shôe.
û (Italian long u), rûe, rûle, blûe, roûte.

2. System of grave accents: — à (Italian broad a), tàsk, fàther, fàst.

ò, òrder, òft, lòft, lòst.
è, ì, ù, are in general superfluous.

3. System of double dots above the vowel: — ä, mäne, ängel, chämber, dänger, cäpable, sävor, to moderäte.

ë, lëver, ëvil, këy, concëit, wëir, hëar, tëar, ëqual.
ï, sïgh, tïe, lïe, whïlom, ïron, sïnecure, divïne.
ö, böne, böld, öld, öar, möw, töw, gö.
ü, ünite, müle, türeen, valüe, nätüre.

These might, with excellent result, be printed in all our literature.

4. System of double dots beneath the vowels: —

a̤ (after w or qu), wa̤sp, wa̤s, wa̤tch, qua̤rrel, equa̤l. e̤ he̤ad, ple̤asure. (Better to drop a in seventy words.)
o̤, so̤n, to̤n, co̤ver, co̤vet, wo̤rry, o̤nion, fro̤nt.
ṳ, pṳt, pṳsh, pṳll, bṳshel, bṳtcher, bṳlwark.

5. Long ā and ē (only before r), as in māre, thēre.

Besides the omission of a in about seventy words, such as deaf, dead, dreamt, early, etc., the u should be dropt in honour, favour, etc. No one approves u in rector, editor, tutor, etc. To printers, writers, and learners, all really superfluous letters are an annoyance. Happily we have got rid of k in publick, musick, etc. For one, once, I propose to write 'one, 'once.

Many have suggested marks for our consonants. "Webster's Dictionary" has a complete system, and many others would succeed. The practical question is, "Which least offends the eye, and will meet least opposition?" It is not requisite here to lay before the reader what most pleases the present writer. Suffice it to insist that the problem has more than one good solution. F. W. NEWMAN.

WITHIN THE PRECINCTS.

BY MRS. OLIPHANT.

CHAPTER X.

THE MINOR CANON.

MR. ASHFORD had not said much to Miss Despard on the way home; it was but crossing the road, a brief progress which left little room for conversation, and the signor was better acquainted with

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

her than he was. Besides, the minor canon was not a man who could carry on a conversation with several people at a time, or open his heart to more listeners than one. He could sometimes be eloquent with a single interlocutor, but he was a silent man in society, with very little to say for himself, even when his companions were of the most congenial kind. He was an unsuccessful man, and carried in his soul, though without any bitterness, the burden of his own unsuccess. He was a man of "good connections," but none of his connections had done anything for him — and he had considerable talents, which had done nothing for him. He had got a scholarship, but no other distinction, at the university. Nobody was at all clear how this came about. He was not idle, he was not careless, but he did not succeed; his talents were not those that win success. At twenty he published a little volume of poetry, which was "full of promise." At thirty he brought out a learned treatise on some matter of classical erudition, which, as it is too high for us to understand, we will not venture to name. But nothing came of it; his poems were not sold, neither was his treatise. His fellow-scholars (for he was a true scholar, and a ripe and good one) occupied themselves with pulling holes in his coat, writing whole pages to show that he had taken a wrong view of a special passage. And there was something worse than this that he had done. He had put a wrong accent upon a Greek word. We tremble to mention this, but it cannot be slurred over, for it was one of the heaviest troubles in Mr. Ashford's life. Whether it was his fault or the printer's fault will never be known till the day of judgment, and perhaps not even then, for it seems more than likely that a mistake in an accent, or even the absence of the accent altogether, will not affect the reckoning at that decisive moment; but this was what had been done. Not once — which might have been an accident, or carelessness in correcting the press, such a misfortune as might occur to any man — but a dozen times at least had this crime been perpetrated. It disfigured at least the half of his book. It was a mistake which no properly conducted fourth-form boy would have been guilty of. So everybody said; and it crushed the unlucky man. Even now, five years after, that incorrect accent colored his life. He went in mourning for it all his days. He could not forget it himself, even if other people might have been willing to forget it. It seemed to justify and explain all the failures in his career. Everybody had wondered why he did not get a fellowship after he had taken his degree, but this explained everything. A man capable of making such a mistake! The buzz that arose in the university never died out of his ears. Robuster persons might laugh, but Ernest Ashford never got over it. It weighed him down for the rest of his days.

Nor was he a man to thrive much in his profession. He tried a curacy or two, but he was neither High Church enough for the High, nor Low Church enough for the Low. And he could not get on with the poor, his rectors said. Their misery appalled his gentle soul. He emptied his poor pockets in the first wretched house he went into, and retreated to his lodgings after he had done so with a heart all aching and bleeding, and crying out against the pain he saw. He was not of the fibre which can take other people's sufferings placidly, though he had a fine nerve in bearing his own. This, no doubt, was weakness in him; and in all probability he got imposed upon on every side; but the fact was he could not support the wretchedness of others, and when he had given them every sixpence he had, and had entreated them to be comforted, he fled from them with anguish in his heart. He could not eat or drink for weeks after for thinking that there were people in the world near at hand who had little or nothing on their board. He suffered more from this than his fellow-curate did from neuralgia, or his rector from biliousness, and he did what neither of these martyrs felt themselves compelled to do — he fled from the trouble he could not cope with. They quoted Scripture to him, and proved from the text "The poor ye have always with you" that nothing better was to be expected. But he answered with a passionate protestation that God could never mean that, and fled — which, indeed, was not a brave thing to do, and proved the weakness of his character. Thus the Church found him wanting, as well as the university. And when at last he settled down into a corner where at least he could get his living tranquilly, it was not by means of his talents or education, but because of a quality which was really accidental, the possession of a beautiful voice. This possession was so entirely adventitious that he was not even a learned musician, nor had he given much of his time to this study. But he had one of those voices, rich, and tender, and sweet,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

which go beyond science, which are delicious even when they are wrong, and please the hearers when they perplex the choir, and drive the conductor out of his senses. Mr. Ashford did not do this, having an ear almost as delicate as his voice, but both of these were gifts of nature, and not improved by training to the degree which the signor could have wished. He had been persuaded to try for the minor canonry of St. Michael's almost against his will; for to be a singing man even in the highest grade did not please his fancy. But no one had been able to stand before him. The signor had strongly supported another competitor, a man with twice the science of Mr. Ashford; but even the signor had been obliged to confess that his friend's voice was not to be compared with that of the successful candidate. And after knocking about the world for a dozen years without any real place or standing-ground, Ernest Ashford found himself at thirty-five suited with a life that was altogether harmonious to his nature, but which he felt half humiliated to have gained, not by his talents or his learning, or anything that was any credit to him, but by the mere natural accidental circumstance of his beautiful voice. He was half ashamed and humbled to think that all his education, which had cost so much, went for nothing in comparison with this chance talent which had cost him nothing, and that all his hopes and ambitions, which had mounted high, had been thus proved altogether vain. But as, by fair means or foul, for a good or bad reason, life had at last found a suitable career for him, where he could be independent, and do some sort of work, such as it was, he soon became content. The worst thing about it (he said) was that it could not be called work at all. To go twice a day and sing beautiful music in one of the most beautiful churches in the world would have been the highest pleasure if it had not been the business of his life. He had never even been troubled by doubts which might have introduced a complication, but was of a nature simply devout, and born to go twice a day to church. When, however, he found himself thus, as it were, exalted over the common lot, he made an effort to bring himself down to the level of common mortality by taking pupils, an experiment which succeeded perfectly, and brought him into hot water so speedily that he no longer felt himself elevated above the level of mankind.

This was the man whom Lottie had seized the opportunity of making acquaintance with and speaking to that evening at the Deanery. Mr. Ashford was not badly treated at the Deanery to be only a minor canon. He was often enough asked to dinner. When there was not anybody of much consequence about, the dean was very willing to have him, for he was a gentleman, and talked very pleasantly, and could be silent (which he always was when the company was large) in a very agreeable, gentlemanly sort of way; not the silence of mere dulness and having nothing to say. But when there was a large dinner-party, and people of consequence were there, Lady Caroline would often ask Mr. Ashford to come in the evening, and he had come to understand (without being offended) that on these occasions he would probably be asked to sing. He was not offended, but he was amused, and sometimes, with a little well-bred malice, such as he had never shown in any other emergency of his life, would have a cold, and be unable to sing. He had not strength of mind to carry out this little stratagem when there seemed to be much need of his services, but now and then he would wind himself up to do it, with much simple satisfaction in his own cleverness. Mr. Ashford was well treated in the cloisters generally. The other canons, those whom Mrs. O'Shaughnessy called "the real canons," were all more or less attentive to him. He had nothing to complain of in his lot. He had at this moment two pupils in hand: one, the son of Canon Uxbridge, whom he was endeavoring to prepare for the simple ordeal of an army examination, and another, who was clever, the son of the clergyman in the town, and aspiring to a university scholarship. In consequence of that unfortunate accent it was but few engagements of this more ambitious kind that Mr. Ashford had; his work was usually confined to the simplicity of the military tests of knowledge; but the rector of St. Michael's was a man who knew what he was about, and naturally, with a sharp young scholar forever on his traces, the gentle minor canon, conscious of having once committed an inaccuracy, was kept very much upon his p's and q's.

On the same day on which Rollo Ridsdale wrote for Lady Caroline that invitation to Lottie of the terms of which Lady Caroline was so little aware, the dean gave a verbal invitation to the same effect to Mr. Ashford in the vestry. "Will you dine with us to day, Ashford?" he said. "My nephew Ridsdale, who is mad about

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

music, and especially about this girl's voice who sang last night, has persuaded Lady Caroline to ask her again. Yourself and the signor; I believe nobody else is coming. Ridsdale has got something to do with a new opera company, and he is wild to find an English prima donna ——"

"Is Miss Despard likely to become a professional singer?" said the minor canon in some surprise.

"I am sure I can't tell — why not? They are poor, I suppose, or they would not be here, and I don't see why she shouldn't sing. Anyhow, Rollo is most anxious to try. He thinks she has a wonderful voice. He is apt to think anything wonderful which he himself has anything to do with, you know."

"She certainly has a wonderful voice," said Mr. Ashford, with more decision than usual.

"But — pardon me if I interrupt," cried the signor, who had come in while they were talking — "no method; no science. She wants training — the most careful training. The more beautiful a voice is by nature, the more evident is the want of education in it," the musician added, with meaning. He did not look at Mr. Ashford, but the reference was very unmistakable. The dean looked at them, and smiled as he took up his shovel hat.

"I leave you to fight it out, science against nature," he said; "as long as you don't forget that you are both expected this evening at the Deanery — and to sit in judgment as well as to dine."

"I know what my judgment will be beforehand," said the signor; "absolute want of education — but plenty of material for a good teacher to work upon."

"And mine is all the other way," Mr. Ashford said, with some of the vehemence of intellectual opposition, besides a natural partisanship. "A lovely voice, full of nature, and freshness, and expression — which you will spoil, and render artificial, and like anybody else's voice if you have your way."

"All excellence is the production of art," said the signor.

"Poeta nascitur," said the canon; and though the words are as well known as any slang, they exercised a certain subduing influence upon the musician, who was painfully aware that he himself was not educated, except in a professional way. The two men went out together through the door into the great cloister, from which they passed by an arched passage to the minor cloister, where was Mr. Ashford's house. Nothing could be more unlike than the tall, stooping, short-sighted scholar, and the dark, keen Italianism of the Anglicised foreigner — the one man full of perception, seeing everything within his range at a glance, the other living in a glimmer of vague impressions, which took form but slowly in his mind. On the subject of their present discussion, however, Ashford had taken as distinct a view as the signor. He had put himself on Lottie's side instinctively, with what we have called a natural partisanship. She was like himself, she sang as the birds sing — and though his own education after a few years of St. Michael's had so far progressed musically that he was as well aware of her deficiencies as the signor, still he felt himself bound to be her champion. "I am not sure how far we have any right to discuss a young lady who has never done anything to provoke animadversion," he said, with an old-fashioned scrupulousness, as they threaded the shady passages. "I think it very unlikely that such a girl would ever consent to sing for the public."

"That is what she says," said the signor, "but she can't understand what she is saying. Sing for the public! I suppose that means to her to appear before a crowd of people, to be stared at, criticised, brought down to the level of professional singers. The delight of raising a crowd to one's self, binding them into mutual sympathy, getting at the heart underneath the cold English exterior, that is what the foolish girl never thinks of, and cannot understand."

"Ah!" said the minor canon. He was struck by this unexpected poetry in the signor, who was not a poetical person. He said, "I don't think I thought of that either. I suppose, for my part, I am very old-fashioned. I don't like a woman to make an exhibition of herself."

"Do you suppose a real artist ever makes an exhibition of herself?" said the musician almost scornfully. "Do you suppose she thinks of herself? Oh, yes, of course there are varieties. Men will be men and women women; but any one who has genius, who is above the common stock! However," he added, calming himself down, and giving a curious, alarmed glance at his companion to see whether, perhaps, he was being laughed at for his enthusiasm, "there are other reasons, that you will allow to be solid reasons, for which I want to get hold of this Miss Despard. You know Purcell, my assistant, a young fellow of the greatest promise?"

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

"Purcell? Oh, yes; you mean the son of ——"

"I mean my pupil," said the signor hurriedly, with a flush of offence.

"I beg your pardon. I did not mean anything unkind. It was only to make sure whom you meant. I know he is a good musician and — everything that is good."

"He is a very fine fellow," said the signor, still flushed and self-assertive. "There is nobody of whom I have a higher opinion. He is a better musician than I am, and full of promise. I expect him to reach the very top of his profession."

Mr. Ashford bowed. He had no objection to young Purcell's success. Why should he be supposed to have any objection to it? But the conversation had wandered widely away from Miss Despard, in whom he was really interested, and his attention relaxed in a way which he could not disguise. This seemed to disturb the signor still more. He faltered; he hesitated. At last he said with a sudden burst, "You think this has nothing to do with the subject we were discussing; but it has. Purcell, poor fellow! has a — romantic devotion, a passion which I can't as yet call anything but unhappy, for Miss Despard."

"For Miss Despard?" The minor canon turned round at his own door with his key in his hand, lifting his eyes in wonder. "That is surely rather misplaced," he said the next moment, with much more sharpness than was usual to him, opening the door with a little extra energy and animation. He had no reason whatever for being annoyed, but he was annoyed, though he could not have told why.

"How misplaced?" said the signor, following him up the little oak staircase, narrow and broken into short flights, which led to the rooms in which the minor canon lived. The landing at the top of the staircase was as large as any of the rooms to which it led, with that curious misappropriation of space, but admirable success in picturesque effect, peculiar to old houses. There was a window in it, with a window-seat, and such a view as was not to be had out of St. Michael's, and the walls were of dark wainscot, with bits of rich old carvings here and there. The canon's little library led off from this and had the same view. It was lighted by three small, deep-set windows set in the outer wall of the Abbey, and consequently half as thick as the room was large. They were more like three pictures hung on the dark wall than mere openings for light, which indeed they supplied but sparingly, the thickness of the wall casting deep shadows between. And the walls, wherever they were visible, were dark oak, here and there shining with gleams of reflection, but making a sombre background, broken only by the russet color of old books and the chance ornaments of gilding which embellished them. Mr. Ashford's writing-table, covered with books and papers, stood in front of the centre window. There was room for a visitor on the inner side between him and the bookcases on the further wall, and there was room for somebody in the deep recess of the window at his left hand; but that was all.

"How misplaced?" the signor repeated, coming in and taking possession of the window-seat. "He is not perhaps what you call a gentleman by birth, but he is a great deal better. You and I know gentlemen by birth who — but don't let us talk blasphemy within the precincts. I am a Tory. I take my stand upon birth and blood and primogeniture."

"And laugh at them?"

"Oh, not at all; on the contrary, I think they are very good for the country; but you and I have known gentlemen by birth —— Well! my young Purcell is not one of these, but sprung from the soil. He is a capital musician; he is a rising young man. In what is he worse than the daughter of a shabby old soldier, a poor, needy, sham gentleman of a chevalier?"

"Gently! gently! I cannot permit you to say anything against the chevaliers. They are men who have served their country."

"Better than a good musician serves his?" cried the signor. "You will not assert as much. Better than we serve the country who put a little tune and time into her, an idea of something better than fifes and drums?"

"My dear Rossinetti," said Mr. Ashford with some heat, "England had music in her before a single maestro had ever come from the south, and will have after —— "

"No tragedy," said the signor, with a low laugh, putting up his hand. "I am not a maestro, nor do I come from the south. I serve my country when I teach these knavish boys, that would rather be playing in the streets, to lengthen their snipped vowels. But suppose they do better who fight — I say nothing against that. I am not speaking of all the chevallers, but of one — the only person who has anything to do with the argument — a wretched frequenter of taverns, admirer of milliners'

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

girls, who is said to be going to marry some young woman of that class. Why should not Purcell, the best fellow in the world, be as good as he?"

"I don't know the father — and it is not the father Purcell has a romantic devotion for. But don't you see, Rossinetti, we are allowing ourselves to discuss the affairs of people we know nothing of, people we have no right to talk about. In short, we are gossiping, which is not a very appropriate occupation."

"Oh, there is a great deal of it done by other persons quite as dignified as we are," said the signor with a smile; but he accepted the reproof and changed the subject. They sat together and talked, looking over the great width of the silent country, the trees and the winding river, the scattered villages, and the illuminated sky. How beautiful it was! fair enough of itself to make life sweeter to those who had it before their eyes. But the two men talked and took no notice. They might have been in a street in London for any difference it made.

When, however, the signor was gone, Mr. Ashford, having closed the door upon his visitor, came straying back to the window in which Rossinetti had been seated, and stood there gazing out vaguely. In all likelihood he saw nothing at all, for he was short-sighted, as has been said; but yet it is natural to seek the relief of the window and look out when there is something within of a confused and vaguely melancholy character to occupy one's thoughts. Twenty-four hours before Mr. Ashford had not known who Lottie Despard was. He had seen her in the Abbey, and perhaps had found without knowing it that sympathy in her face which establishes sometimes a kind of tacit friendship long before words. He thought now that this must have been the case; but he knew very little about her still — nothing except that she had a beautiful voice, a face that interested him, and something she wanted to talk to him about. What was it she wanted to talk to him about? He could not imagine what it could be, but he recollected very well how pleasant a thing it was when this beautiful young lady, lifting the long fringes which veiled them, turned upon him those beautiful blue eyes which (he thought) were capable of expressing more feeling than eyes of any other color. Probably had Lottie's eyes been brown or grey Mr. Ashford would have been of exactly the same opinion. But to think of this creature as the beloved of Purcell gave him a shock. Purcell! it was not possible. No doubt he was a respectable fellow, very much to be applauded and encouraged: but Mr. Ashford himself had nothing to do with Miss Despard; he was pleased to think that he should meet her again and hear her sing again, and he must try, he said to himself, to find an opportunity to ask her what it was about which she wanted to speak to him. Otherwise he had no hand, and wanted to have no hand, in this little conspiracy of which she seemed the unconscious object. On the contrary, his whole sympathies were with Lottie against the men who wanted to entrap her and make her a public singer whether she would or not. He was glad she did not want it herself, and felt a warm sympathy with her in those natural prejudices against "making an exhibition of herself" which the signor scorned so much. The signor might scorn those shrinkings and shyness; they were altogether out of his way; he might not understand them. But Mr. Ashford understood them perfectly. He liked Lottie for having them, comprehended her, and felt for her. Anything rather than that, he thought, with a little tremulous warmth, as if she had been his sister. If there should be any discussion on this subject to-night at the Deanery, and she was in need of support, he would stand by her. Having made this resolution, he went back to his writing-table and sat down in his usual place, and put this intrusive business which did not in the least concern him out of his mind.

The most intrusive subject! What had he to do with it? And yet it was not at all easy to get it out of his mind. He had not read three lines when he felt himself beginning to wonder why Rollo Ridsdale had chosen Miss Despard as his prima donna above everybody else, and why the signor concerned himself so much about it. She had certainly a beautiful voice, but still voices as beautiful had been heard before. It could not be supposed that there was no one else equal to her. Why should they make so determined a set at this girl, who was a lady, and who had not expressed any wish or intention of being a singer? To be sure, she was very handsome as well, and her face was full of expression. And Rollo was a kind of enthusiast when he took anything in his head. Then there was the other imbroglio with the signor and Purcell. What was Purcell to the signor that he should take up his cause so warmly? But then, still more mysterious, what was it all to him, Ernest Ashford, that it should come

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

between him and the book he was reading? Nothing could be more absurd. He got up after a while, and went to the window again, where he finally settled himself with a volume of Shelley, to which he managed to fix the thoughts, which had been so absurdly disturbed by this stranger and this question with which he had nothing to do. It was a very idle way of spending the afternoon, to recline in a deep window looking out upon miles of air and distance, and read Shelley; but it was better than getting involved in the mere gossip of St. Michael's, and turning over in his head against his will the private affairs of people whom he scarcely knew. This was the disadvantage of living in a small circle with so few interests, he said to himself. But he got delivered from the gossip by means of the poetry, and so lay there while the brilliant sunshine slanted from the west, now sending his thoughts abroad over the leafy English plain, now feeding his fancy with the poet among the Euganean hills.

From The Cornhill Magazine.

ON THE DECAY OF FINE MANNERS.

It is scarcely necessary to occupy ourselves with the demonstration that the manners of the community have, during the present century, undergone a serious change for the worse. Their deterioration is a matter of notoriety and universal comment, and the unanimity with which this conclusion is affirmed acquits us of the obligation of proving it. Nor, supposing the point to be contested, would it be an easy matter to establish it. How are you to prove that manners have deteriorated? Manner is so impalpable a thing that there is no crucible in which it can be impounded, no scales, be they ever so fine, in which it can be weighed.

But while we fully recognize the practical impossibility of proving that the manners of society are not as good as they once were, there is not the same difficulty in showing how they have come to suffer degradation. Assuming, then, that the prevalent opinion on the subject is a correct one, let us see if we cannot account more or less clearly for the fact it deplores.

Wherein consist good manners? I think it will be found that the secret or essence of good manners, as of goodness in all other things, consists in suitableness, or in other words of harmony. When we speak of harmony, we necessarily imply a relation between two things. We signify that the relation between them is what it should be; that the just proportion between them has been observed; and that out of this justness of proportion, this relation as it should be, springs what is designated by the significant word propriety.

What is manner? Manner is the deportment of one individual to another; which is as much as to say, the outward and phenomenal relation of one individual to another. Now, every person — if we make exception of monarchs — can stand towards other people in three distinct social relations. You may be the superior of the person you are speaking to, you may be his equal, or you may be his inferior; and I venture to affirm that your manner will be good or bad according as it recognizes or fails to observe the fact in each case, respectively. I am not addressing myself to those persons who avow themselves insensible to subtle distinctions, and whose only notion of distinction between one manner and another is that it is vulgar or the reverse, polite or the opposite. I address myself to those who make the complaint that fine manners have suffered decay, and who are alive to all the infinite shades and gradations of which a really fine manner is susceptible.

And, firstly, as regards the deportment of a person of fine manners to his superior. In this there will be a standing deference, but never a shade of servility; and the inclination of tone, gesture, and language will be as slight, as natural, as graceful, but as perceptible to an observant eye and ear, as the movement say, of a weeping willow in a light breeze. Suppose that two persons are conversing, and a third enters. The third ought to be able to tell at once which is the superior, and which the inferior, supposing the distinction to exist, and though the distinction be by no means a strongly marked one. Ask him how he knows; and he can no more tell you how, than one can say why one face is beautiful and another is not, or than a neuralgic subject can say, save by his own impressions, that there is brewing a thunder-storm. The superiority I speak of may be one either of rank, age, or acquired distinction; but a well-bred person, a person of fine manners, never fails to give it recognition. A man of thirty, who comports himself to a man of seventy as he would to a person of his own age, is wanting in this instinct,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

and is as much a clown as is one who addresses a woman with the familiarity he employs towards a man. What constitutes good manners in this case is, as I have observed, the maintenance of a just proportion, in plainer language, of a proper distance, between the two people; in other words, the preservation of harmony. The neglect of a just relation makes impropriety or discord.

Quite as subtle but quite as certain a line will mark off the superior from the inferior; though perhaps the distance is created rather by the inferior than by the superior, and by the obligation the latter feels himself under to accept the situation laid down by the other. Here again an absolute stranger ought to find quick indications of the relative position of the two, though he might be sorely put to it to give an account of the faith which is in him.

The relation of equal to equal might, at first sight, seem to be a much simpler matter. On the contrary, I take it to be considerably more complex. For there are more faults that can be committed in this last of the three relations than in either of the other two. The only mistake an inferior, deficient in fine manners, is likely to commit in dealing with his superior, is to act as though he were the latter's equal; and the only danger to which the superior is subject, in conversing with his inferior, is the danger of asserting, or over-asserting, his superiority, instead of leaving it to the other to establish the fact by insensibly conceding it. But your equal obviously can commit either blunder. He may be arrogant and presuming, or he may show himself apologetic, timid, and uneasy. Either blunder serves to introduce an element of awkwardness and discomfort into the conversation, and, if the blunder be one of large proportions, renders the situation intolerable. You may have your bumptious cad, or your cringing cad. It is difficult to say which is the more insufferable. At last the horrible discrepancy between what you have a right to expect, and what as a fact you encounter, becomes so trying, that it "gives on your nerves," like bells jangled and out of tune. The discord is excruciating. The fellow has violated the laws of harmony. He knows nothing about the just proportion or fitness of things. Suitableness is to him a word without a meaning, and his life is one long unconscious impropriety.

If this analysis of the essence or kernel of good manners and bad manners be correct, it is not difficult to explain why manners should have deteriorated so strikingly during the last forty or fifty years. I must ask the reader to be good enough not to conclude, because I venture to point out what I believe to be the cause of this deterioration, that I have a political or even a social grudge against the cause, or that I am hostile to all the effects it has produced. I am merely seeking for a vera causa of the decline of fine manners, and have no arrière pensée whatever, either political, social, or religious. A thing is not bad altogether because it induces certain unfortunate results. It is of the nature of nothing human to confer unalloyed benefits; and though fine manners may be a precious possession, and their decay a just theme for lamentation, they are not the most precious of all possessions, and there are other gifts with which we could even less satisfactorily dispense.

It will not be disputed that it is considerably easier for people to comport themselves properly and justly towards their superiors, towards their inferiors, and towards their equals, when they know who their superiors, who their inferiors, and who their equals are, than when they do not, but are left to ascertain the point as best they may, or to settle it by an effort of their own. Now the time was when no man in England could be in doubt upon the point. There existed a sliding scale in the social hierarchy; and the precise tariff of deference which was required by one man to another, was as clearly ascertained as the number of inches in a mile, the amount of gills in a quart, or the quantity of firkins in a kilderkin. It must be obvious that this greatly simplified the matter; indeed, that it rendered it quite as simple as to ascertain the current price of native wheat, or the market figure of Flemish wool. From the sovereign downwards, there was a gradation of ranks, titles, and position; ending, as far as gentlemen were concerned, with the small country squire. It was the habit, the instinct, and in no slight measure the law, of the time, to recognize this gradation; and any man received, and paid, the exact amount of homage and deference custom prescribed.

We have still a monarch. We have still dukes, marquesses, earls, barons, baronets, knights, esquires, and — gentlemen. But what is a gentleman? No one can any longer answer the question. There are many persons indisputably gentlemen; there are others who hope they are gentlemen; others, again, who are trying hard to become such, or be recognized as such. In plain parlance, there are a

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

number of people who are laboring to assert themselves, and who are going through life with no fixed and definite position in it, but are perpetually seeking to become that person's equal, and that other's superior.

How is it possible that such people should have fine manners, or manners at all? They are certain to be bumptious and presuming; it is possible they may, on occasion, be servile likewise, for they are perpetually "trying it on." When they find themselves in the society of persons whom they can hardly help suspecting to be their superiors in breeding and education, they strive straight-off to annihilate the distinction they know to exist by putting on what they consider the manners of an equal. The "putting on" of this manner is, as might have been expected, a disastrous failure. They only become contemptible or offensive, or both. They parade their inferiority by the very effort to drape it; and their natural superior turns from them with disgust, and a determination never, if possible, to consort with them again.

The treatment by this class of persons of their inferiors is not more happy than their address towards their superiors, or towards those who would willingly be considered their equals, if their manners entitled them to the right of equality. There are no persons so quick to distinguish a true gentleman from a pinchbeck one as those who are called the lower orders. This is so, at least, in rural parts; the yokel not having lost his partly primitive, partly traditional instincts in the matter, by seeing more than one kind of manner reputed gentlemanlike, and never having had his discrimination confused by the practical ambiguities concerning good manners, engendered in towns. Your gamekeeper, coachman, groom, stable-help, gardener, watcher, odd-man, tells almost at a glance what "sort of customer" he has to deal with. Each master may be kind, either may be cold and "stand-off;" but there is a world of difference between the familiarity of the gentleman, and the familiarity of the man who would like to be a gentleman; and there is nothing in common between the tone of command of the one, and the orders of the other.

There may have been seen, any night we believe during the past twelvemonth, a piece at a well-known London theatre, in which the manners of gentlefolk and people rich but not gentle are supposed to be depicted and contrasted. The piece has been most successful. I could scarcely wish for more conclusive proof that fine manners have decayed. An audience sensitive to the difference between fine manners and clumsy manners would have turned away with contempt from an exhibition of vulgarity on the part of gentlefolk and non-gentlefolk alike, of the most extravagant kind. It is perfectly true that thousands of persons whose manners are not "fine," are admitted into society supposed to be constituted of gentlemen, and to a certain extent justly supposed to be so constituted. But, in the play in question, the vulgarity of the vulgar is of that outrageous and incredible kind that requires to be seen to be credited. No person who had the faintest notion what fine manners are would suppose that he had found a foil for them in what we should imagine to be a caricature of the manners of Billingsgate or Margate; and no person similarly endowed could witness the performance without pity and annoyance. We do see fine manners caricatured every day of the week; but we see the spectacle off the stage, and with the absolute unconsciousness of the chief performers.

It has frequently been observed that modern manners are too familiar. This is but to say briefly what we have said more at large, to state the fact without analyzing it. A person of fine manners is never familiar with his superiors, even ostensibly; never familiar with his inferiors in reality, and not often familiar even with his equals. Horse-play is an extreme type of familiarity, and should be the exclusive amusement of country bumpkins and gutter-children. It is a subject for much regret that this coarse kind of diversion has been found delightful by some of those who are called "the highest in the land." To pull a man out of bed in the middle of the night; to throw his bed-clothes or the contents of his portmanteau out of window on to the lawn; to lock up a gentleman and a lady in the billiard-room at one in the morning, and put out the lights; these and such like performances have been deemed the height of polite enjoyment in more than one country house of ancient dignity and modern notoriety. I observe that a stand is being made against this sort of thing by the wiser and better-bred portion of society, in spite of its having received very august countenance.

The familiarity to which we have incidentally alluded is doubtless an extravagant form of declension of good manners; but it will be found that excessive famil-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

iarity runs through our manners generally, and that to it must be ascribed the decline. People, having forgotten how to comport themselves properly to their superiors — perhaps not being willing to recognize that they have any — soon lose the secret of how to behave towards their equals.

But, perhaps, one of the most lamentable, if not the most marked feature in the decay of fine manners, is to be observed in the change which has come over the manner of men towards women, or let me say, for fear I should be misunderstood, of gentlemen towards ladies. We will not conjure a storm of remonstrance by presuming to decide who "first began it." But we need not be afraid to say that, even supposing it was men who first led the decline down the path of excessive familiarity, women have so affably followed their lead, that it has become exceedingly difficult for a man to preserve with some women that distance which every well-bred person feels, and every thoughtful person must grant, is indispensable to the maintenance in society of the due relations of the sexes. When a woman playfully tells you, you are a "pig," and addresses you with exquisite humor, "Oh, you beast!" it is difficult to observe towards her that fineness of manner which you imagined was her due. If she may call you by such affectionate names, what may you not call her in turn? Why should you trouble yourself to be decorous in the presence of a person to whom decorum is apparently of so little moment? Why should you not swear, loll, expectorate — if you like, go to sleep? Why should you hand her a chair, if she wants one? She probably tells you, "I can get it myself." Why should you not take her at her word? Why rise when she rises? You are tired, or at any rate you find it inconvenient. It is a "nuisance" to have to "put oneself about so" for women; and certainly when women cease to thank you for doing so, one of the motives for suffering inconvenience has passed away. This is no question of morals. I dare say women are as good as ever they were. I believe they are. But their manners are indisputably decaying. They no longer silently exact that deference from men which is every woman's natural right, and which no sagacious women ever forfeits. She will not long receive it, even if she hankers after it, from her "pig" and her "beast." The consequence is that men "swagger" in the presence of women to a degree that even the women we speak of find offensive. They have corrupted men's manners; and then they complain of the corruption. Corruptio optimi pessima est; and there is nothing so sad as lack of fine manners in a gentleman, except the lack of them in a lady.

In the deference which every woman should exact and every man either instinctively or cheerfully concede, we may perhaps catch the indications of the answer to be made to a possible objection. It might be objected, in these days, that it is not agreeable, and is even humiliating, to have to recognize superiority in others, especially when the superiority does not rest upon virtue, but upon purely artificial qualifications. But the recognition of a something due to women, and equally to old age, which a man of fine feeling, no less than of fine manners, should feel, surely puts us upon the trace of a reply to this objection. No one feels humiliated by deferring to a woman, or to a person much older than himself. If it be answered that such deference is paid to their weakness, and is on that account not humiliating, we respond — waving the extraordinary cynicism of the argument to which we reply — that in that case a weak man need not defer to a strong woman, and also, that, as a matter of fact, many persons who are much older than oneself are likewise much stronger. Young men do not defer to their fathers solely out of consideration for their fathers' failing powers. It is a sense of propriety which leads them to be deferential to both parents alike, to the one who is weak, and to the other who is strong. Absolutely artificial superiority, no doubt, is willingly recognized by no one; but, while, as a rule, conventional superiority does represent some sort of real superiority, the truly wise man does not refuse to concede a slight shade of deference to superiority merely artificial, provided it is of the sort that is bound up with the general constitution and machinery of the body politic and social. A man would be a fool as well as a clown who, being a commoner, objected to a peer taking precedence of him in so trivial a matter as taking the hostess in to dinner. Yet the commoner might well be a great astronomer or dazzling orator, and the peer the greatest numskull that ever walked on two legs. When an astronomical question came to be discussed, or an after-dinner speech had to be made, such a peer would fall into the background, and the superiority of the commoner would in turn obtain recognition. Indeed, fine manners depend upon "trifles light as air;" but nothing is too trifling for the

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

consideration of the poet or great artist, and nothing too trifling for the fine art of the perfect gentleman.

There is yet another element in modern life which is radically hostile to the cultivation or even the retention of fine manners. This is its extreme hurry and its constant bustle. Fine manners require calm grace; and calm grace is not easily preserved amid the hubbub, jostling, and anxiety of the existence of to-day. Fine manners require time; indeed, they take no note of time. A person of fine manners may himself always be punctual; but he can scarcely preserve his fine manners while laboring to compel other people to be so. Fine manners are absolutely incompatible with fussiness. Fine manners take their time over everything. This is not to say that they are inconsistent with exertion or even with great energy. But the exertion must be equable; the energy must be uniform, not spasmodic or hysterical. Watch different orders of persons proceeding to take the train from one place to another. Persons of an inferior condition of life appear to be deeply tormented with the idea that they will fail to catch it. They arrive out of breath, though they are ten minutes before the time fixed for starting. They bustle over the taking of their tickets; they scramble for a place in some carriage or other; the whole business is with them one of haste and disquietude. People of a higher grade, but still of what is ordinarily termed a middle condition of life, do not manifest so much incoherent solicitude as all this. But they are fidgety and uncertain. They trouble themselves and their neighbors, instead of taking the matter quietly and as a matter of course. People of fine manner do not exhibit these symptoms of gratuitous distress. They take all reasonable care to be at the station in time, but as they cherish an immovable belief that five minutes are always and invariably of the same length, and that the hour-hand moves no faster even if their own pulse does, they are content to abide by the law of cause and consequence, and entertain no doubt that having given themselves an abundant interval for traversing a well-ascertained distance, it will be accomplished in the period duly allotted to it. There is perfect repose in the taking of their tickets, in the despatch of their baggage, in the selection of their places. Persons who do not understand that this method of procedure is a second nature with many, and a first nature with some, half playfully denominate those they see practising it as "cool hands." But where in the world is there any necessity for heat, or for that feverish trepidation which accompanies the smaller movements of people who have not learned, to use a not inapt phrase to be met with in a modern poem, that there is nothing so tedious as haste?

Much might yet be said upon the subject of fine manners and their decay; but an essay had better be suggestive by its brevity than wearisome by its exhaustiveness. But there is one point I must not omit to notice. Many excellent persons, not unnaturally displeased to find that such importance is attached to a quality which seems in no degree to partake of a moral character, labor to argue that the secret of gentlemanliness and fine manners is virtue, generosity, amiability, consideration for others. It seems to me that though the argument may prove that he who employs it has a noble enthusiasm for morality, he allows his worthy partiality to lead him into sophistry, or at least to lose sight of a true distinction, and one that goes to the root of the whole business. I do not think I should be guilty of exaggeration were I to affirm that some persons of the finest manners have been uniformly and systematically selfish, and that it is possible to perform the most ungracious act in the most graceful manner conceivable. Fine manners are paper-money, not sterling coin; but they are invaluable as currency, whether they be convertible or not into something more solid. But surely the severest moralist would not deny that the most abandoned scoundrel may offer you a chair with the finest air of breeding, though he has just with equal grace deprived some one else of it who stood infinitely more in need of it, while a model of virtue and self-sacrifice may hand it you with such awkwardness as to bruise your shins or tear your dress, though he has been standing the whole night and is almost fainting with fatigue. This, no doubt, is an extreme though by no means an uncommon case; but it is a fortunate circumstance that the tradition of fine manners and the resolution not to part with them often compel a thoroughly selfish man to seem to do a generous thing and in any case to be of use to his neighbor. The worst condition in which we can find ourselves is to be surrounded by people who have neither morals nor manners; who are at one and the same time thoroughly selfish and utterly ill-bred. Society had perhaps better take care lest it fall a victim to the double evil.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

From Fraser's Magazine.

ON TEACHING ENGLISH.

BY FRANCIS W. NEWMAN.

It is fifty years since the University of London was planned. Already the complaint was heard among the reformers of education, that the English language did not receive due attention; that it ought to be practised and studied as a substantive object, and with this view a professor of English ought to be appointed. The actual result has been, a professor of both the English language and the English literature: but as regards the cultivation of the language there is little to boast of. When at length, some ten years later, the present university arose, and the earlier university took the surname of college, the London examination papers in English were far more learned than beneficial; inasmuch as to call forth the remark from an eminent scholar, that to answer the questions in English, a student ought to be familiar with Mœso-Gothic. Practical power over the language was not cultivated, nor delicate appreciation of the distinctions of words and force of composition; but mere theory and historical erudition.

The older doctrine, upheld by such accomplished men as Dr. Coplestone, afterwards Bishop of Landaff, and Dr. Arnold, head of Rugby School, was, that English grammar is best understood by contrast with some other language whose grammar is more complex; and that English composition has its best exercise in careful translation from such a language. For this very purpose, it was urged, the Latin, which is our ordinary school basis, is admirably suited; because, first, as used by its best writers, it is signally concise; next, it is nobly free from that vice imported by the Middle Age schoolmen into our modern tongues — the excessive use of abstract terms. Latin loves concrete expression, and works by the finite verb rather than by the infinitive and by verbal nouns: hence simplicity and energy. Further, its power of transposition enables it so to arrange words that the emphasis of a sentence shall fall just where it ought. This excellence we can but imperfectly attain in English; but by the practice of translation the student learns to aim at it so far as our language allows. On the contrary, the French naturally subsides into the true logical order. Whately, intimate friend and almost coadjutor of Coplestone, illustrates this well in his "Rhetoric," by observing that our "Great is Diana of the Ephesians," becomes in a French version, "Diana of the Ephesians is a great goddess." To place the negative particle where it will have its full energy, is in our idiom thoroughly native, as "Never shall I believe," which the half-educated would explode, and use only, "I shall never believe." If it be true, as some say, that familiarity with French saps the energy of English, and that few writers attain our best style without some cultivation of Latin, a good case is made out for the old Oxford doctrine.

But the doctrine, true or false, has no place in our primary schools. No one now contends that Latin should be taught universally, that grammar schools ought still to mean Latin schools, or indeed that into the most elementary teaching some foreign language ought to enter. Thus we are driven back into the necessity of either not teaching English at all, but taking for granted that it will be sufficiently picked up out of school, or else teaching it on a purely English basis. Must we thence infer that to teach the theory of its grammar — simple and meagre as it is — or to teach the irregularities of spelling, is our main business? We might answer this from the case of the old Athenians. Greeks learnt no language but their own in the ordinary course of high education. That before the time of Pericles the theory of their own grammar was unknown to the Athenians, may be safely inferred from the fact of which Aristotle informs us, that Protagoras was the first to teach them that Greek had three genders, masculine, feminine, and neuter. To recite poetry to the lyre, and pronounce every word distinctly and accurately, was the accomplishment first coveted. The noblest poetry was selected — especially that of Solon, Simonides, and Theognis — for moral culture, besides Homer and Hesiod. Pindar and Æschylus were probably rarer, by reason of their greater difficulty. Thus far it is evident at what they aimed; which surely ought to be our aim also: to impart a correct pronunciation and a practical knowledge of their high poetry; to cultivate the taste, the moral sentiment, and an ample knowledge of noble words; to extirpate plebeian utterance, coarse, obscure, or inaccurate, and awake the power of relishing and even criticizing high compositions. The common Athenian citizens are said to have attained the last-named power to a remarkable extent, though it is far from certain that they could read fluently, and almost certain that they were void of grammatical theory.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Grammar was a practical art, not a philosophy. It aimed at correct speaking as its end, not in accounting for the forms of words through historical erudition. The first great prose writer, Thucydides (who with Protagoras was about co-eval with Pericles), is a very clumsy composer; but in the next generation Euripides and Xenophon show signally the improvement from the new grammatical training; and Aristotle's allusions hardly let us doubt, that it included a sedulous instruction in the precise meaning of words, in the distinction of poetical and ordinary phrase, also of high style and low, so as to avoid alike bombast, affectation, and meanness. Surely nothing short of learning these things is to learn a language. To the vast mass of a nation, — even now, when print is so voluminous and letter-writing so common, — to understand the sense of words well, and the delicate shades of meaning, and to have them at hand for use in speech, is vastly more important than to be able to write them down with the received orthography. Of course a right knowledge of irregular verbs is essential: and the contrast of I and me, thou and thee, he and him, she and her, we and us, they and them, if due advantage be taken of these pronouns, easily leads the pupil to understand the contrast of nominative and accusative in nouns also. A wrong use of the pronouns being a prevalent error, it ought to receive primary attention for itself, as well as for its utility in giving aid beyond itself. To speak rightly is the first accomplishment at which we ought to aim.

May it not appear that in our paper-examinations (whether for the Civil Service or in our primary schools) we are proceeding as though the main effort were to train every one to become an essay-writer or penny-a-line scribbler? Those who desire to revolutionize our spelling, and to write nashun for nation, appear totally to misunderstand why bad spelling is thought disgraceful. They ridicule severity against it as absurd; and at the same time themselves make it out to be so great an evil, that we ought to consent to a total change of writing in order to enable our millions to avoid it. Manifestly (though they overlook this) it is held for certain by the public that one who spells common words ill has read very little English. This is why they are severe on the error. Next, it is urged on us that Sir Walter Scott perpetrated several false spellings in a few lines of MS. If this be ever so true, it is nothing to the point; for we have abundant proof that Sir Walter was peculiarly learned, not only in modern literature, but in numberless old ballads and legends. His very erudition may have so familiarized him (as other antiquaries) with spellings which we now reject, that his eye was (what one may call) vitiated. At the same time, until the words said to be misspelt are produced, we cannot tell but that he wrote deliberately, and held a different judgment from certain dictionaries which have been set up as a standard.* But this is to digress. The thing now urged is, that to know English aright is a far greater and nobler acquirement than these gentlemen (English or American) seem to be aware. They set up the miserably low standard of spelling aright, as though to attain it were to attain a high result; and next, think to win that high result by altering our spelling. But the children thus accommodated would not hereby learn the English language in any worthy sense: at best they would, from mere hearing of a word, write it down more easily. But (it is calculated) not one-third of our written language is familiarly spoken. The children would thus only learn (what in the East is called) the language of the bazaar; and in the endeavor to enlarge their vocabulary by reading our printed literature they would be more embarrassed than now.

I insist, that one who teaches English has primarily to teach — 1, a pure pronunciation, according to the most correct standard; 2, an ample vocabulary; 3, an accurate knowledge of the distinction of words which approach in sense; 4, a delicate sense of the suitability of words for different styles; 5 (what is most arduous of all because it implies a general cultivation of the mind, and therefore cannot be taught to children, nor indeed to any but advanced pupils), a rapid choice of fitting words, and an arrangement of them in well-measured sentences, without complexity and without monotony.

The first topic, a pure and correct pronunciation, can be imparted up to a certain point; and even so, while imperfect, it is of great value. It cannot be perfect until we come to some compromise and agreement between north, middle, and south England, also between England, Scotland, and Ireland. This is a very considerable and difficult work, which must be done before it can be worth while

* The present writer frequently has much difficulty in getting printers to print tiro, sibyl, indispensable, Nicolas, which they wrongly change into tyro, sybil, indispensible, Nicholas. Other words might be added.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

to adopt any wide reorganizing of our spelling. Nevertheless, it would be a very great gain to teach in every primary school the elements of clear articulation. In Derbyshire water may be heard sounded as waiter. Ludicrous as this seems, it is but an isolated oddity. To correct it, is less important than to tune the ear to distinguish, and the tongue to utter rightly, the pure English sounds of au and ai: to insist on a due opening of the lips, and a smooth utterance of vowels, a full enunciation also of consonants opposed to all mumbling, and without any provincial coarseness or superfluity and peculiarity of sound suitable only to utterances of passion. This first aim of the teacher belongs properly to elocution, cultivating the ear and the tongue; those which have been recounted after it are purely mental; but all strictly belong to a knowledge and power over our language, all are more valuable than the correct spelling, especially of words foreign in origin and little used by children and simple people. If inspectors of schools pick out words not current with young people and demand that they be spelt correctly, no one need wonder at their reporting very poor success. To require children to spell words which they do not familiarly hear and read, is an error akin to that of expecting them to reduce a puzzling complication of fractions — a problem which does not meet them in the market. Inspection and examinations are intended to guide judicious teaching, but if the questions proposed be injudicious, they may hurtfully misdirect teaching. Children ought to have access to pleasant story-books which they will read voluntarily; then those who read much will not go far wrong in the spelling of familiar words. An immense range is open for contrasting and discriminating words so as to fix distinctions in the mind. Simple, well-chosen poetry, not too philosophical or abstract, will refine the taste, while it extends knowledge of the language and imparts a sense of rhythm and emphasis. Failure marks the present schools, and will not be removed if the right spelling of unfamiliar words is made a substantive object; because it is dry, repulsive, and cannot interest children. To kindle a love of learning is the only way to elicit from them active effort. They above all need popular teaching, as little scholastic as may be.

In the last fifty years a great change (which to the present writer seems lamentable) has been made in the teaching of Latin; namely, learning by heart, which used to be most extensively imposed, is all but given up; boys are taught less orally, more by book; far more writing is exacted of them; and the aim has less been to insure a wide and correct knowledge of the vocabulary and a practical mastery of the syntax, than to gain insight how it has been built up; concerning which our scholars know much more than did Cicero and Virgil. Especially zeal for examinations, and the idea that all excellences and all mistakes can be valued numerically (a bright idea which has come from Cambridge), has led to a supreme trust in paper-work, and has all but exploded oral examination. This system now spreads as a leprosy over the country, and is even said to impair the sight of young pupils. There is reason for much jealousy lest the primary schools be infected by it, so far as the different circumstances admit. One might be glad to know how much of popular and valuable English poetry the children learn by heart; whether as much as Athenian boys learned of Solon's; how much pains is taken to make them pronounce every word correctly, without a confused plebeian squeak or drawl; how far the teacher aims at leading them to chose simple words and use them rightly, and to avoid vulgar slang. On this whole subject it is easier to conjecture than to know; but the very unsatisfactory reports of inspectors justify a suspicion that the teaching is conducted on unwise principles.

From The Contemporary Review.

MADONNA DUNYA.*

THREE long days o'er the barren steppe, where the earth lay dead in her winding-sheet,
She measured the hours from dawn to down, and trod out the seconds with ceaseless feet.

* This poem is founded on a Russian legend, which, if somewhat unique in its tender grace, may yet be taken as typical of that love of children, and reverence for the maternal relation, which would seem, in these rudely conditioned lives, to be the solitary hold of sentiment. While few if any of the Russian sagas turn upon the love between man and woman, many are instinct with this passionate love of offspring. It is noteworthy that this one of the two primary aspects of love viewed as a great natural force, — the aspect under which it is the moving cause and vital principle of all morality, — should be strongly represented in the nation now at war with that other in which the corresponding aspect of the passion has long reached the ultimate limit of possible degradation. Not to interrupt the progress of the narrative with unnecessary foot-notes, it may be as well to state in this place, that the allusion in the fifth couplet to the rainbow-drawn fountain, roofs, and spire, is based upon a natural fact:

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

'Neath the floor of God that is pierced by the stars, and swept by the tongues of the northern lights,
The wanderer lay with a load on her heart which kept out the cold of the northern nights.

White, all white as she walked by day, from the print of her foot to the shining mist
Where the earth rose up and the heaven came down, and, glad in each other, they met and kist;

White at night as the face of a corpse, with the dead-locked secret beneath its smile,
The mask of the earth lay calm and mute, and the candles of heaven burned bright the while.

. . . .

Broad daylight in the frozen noon, — an hour before her the village spire,
Its roofs and fountain, all rainbow-drawn, traced on the white as with festal fire.

Slower her steps with the dwindling hour, and her failing hope is a growing fear,
When she bears her load through the empty street where the seven green cupolas stand out clear.

Still at length are the weary feet as she stands with her head o'er her burthen bowed,
Watching a door like a vagrant dog, — she whom the neighbors had called "the proud."

And the door falls back on the skirling hinge, in answer, as if to her silent prayer,
And Grunya, the stern bolshūka,* looks out, barring her way with a stony stare.

Like a withered leaf in the stress of the storm, the wanderer sped through the guarded door, Kneeled to the Icon, the Mother of God, then stood on her feet on the old house floor.

Fair to her greeting the Icon smiled, holding her babe to her mother's breast, Smiled in the flickering light of her lamp, telling of comfort, and eke of rest.

Straight she turned to that ancient one who ruled the house as to her seemed good:
"We crave your grace by the yielding breast, and the pitiful heart of motherhood!"

"What brings you, Dūnya, the homeward way? Our bread and our work are as hard as of yore."
Then the wanderer looked in her face and drew the sheepskin back from the burthen she bore:

A three-months' child in its rosy sleep, a child as the Christ of the Icon fair,
Was the load which had lain on the wanderer's heart, and stood revealed to the woman there.

"What mean you, Dūnya, to lay the child on my hands that are weary, and hard, and old?"
"If you feel but a moment his breathing warmth, you will hold him safe from the peril of cold."

At a break in the infant's sleep his hand round the woman's knotted finger twined,
As a flower whose tendrils grasp a stake to keep it firm in the rock of the wind.

"Fair and soft I will keep the babe from the peril of winter's cold," quoth she;
"But go your way till St. George's Day, there is nothing to bind betwixt thee and me."

"God save you for pity, my father's wife! but tie not your hands with a babe to wean;
Though your heart o'er his tender head should bleed, your breasts would be dry as they ever have been.

"The Don in its banks is a wedge of ice, and the heel rings hard on the snow new snowed, With my frozen drink and my frozen tears, his fountain failed not, but flowed, still flowed.

"I will beat your hemp, I will hew your wood, I will do your bidding both high and low,
And then in the spring if you need me not, on St. George's Day I will rise and go;

"An you bid me stay, I will drive your plough, drive or draw, if your beasts are spare;
My heart is stout as my hands are strong, and my face — it is nothing now too fair."

Then the vanquished woman gave back the babe, and the door with the skirling hinge made fast:
The Icon brightened behind her flame, — the mother and child were housed at last.

When the other two women came home i' the dusk, they saw, 'neath the Virgin in gold and sheen,
A tattered pilgrim who bore a child as fair as the living Christ had been.

. . . .

that the eye, revolted by the insufferable unity of light upon the snowy wastes, makes for itself a sort of mirage of color, surrounding the rare objects of the scene with iridescent lines. Further, that the Russ peasant expresses the poetical notion that the storms of thunder and lightning, very frequent about St. Elijah's Day, are the result of the flash and rumbling of the prophet's fiery car and steeds. It is perhaps superfluous to mention that Icon (Ikona) is a holy picture.

* Head of the house: literally, female big one; big one being the title common in the days of serfage to the men or women who ruled over the large combined households.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Sleep is good to the working brain, and sleep for the weary body is meet,
But the broken sleep of the nursling babe, and the nursing mother, is sweet, how sweet!

The day for the many, for trouble and care, for thankless labor and empty noise;
The night alone with the one beloved, spent in golden dreams and in silent joys;

By day, the dull, cold service within, and without the featureless mask of death;
By night, the coverlet warm and sweet with the milk and honey of infant's breath.

Not loud alarum or matin bell from her happy dreams made Dūnya start,
But the gentle suasion of longing lips, feeling their way to her mother's heart.

You may say that she dreamed by her one beloved, when the morning light broke sad and wan,
Of another belovèd who once had been — of a man who had come, a man who had gone;

I tell you no, — that not Mary's self, the Virgin Mother, the vestal soul
That of mortal passion had known no throb, had a heart for her first-born son more whole;

That the smile which went and the tear which came, having nothing to do with a foregone past,
Were the tremulous shapes of a boding love on the ground of her own dark fate forecast.

But they melted away with the urgent day, and his image, e'en as the village spire,
Rose from the colorless field of life, traced on the blank as with festal fire.

So passed the days, so passed the nights; the sun rose early, and late went down;
A change came over the earth's dead face; the smell of death rose rank from the town.

Then the new-born year broke sudden and sweet, from the same dark womb that had swallowed up death,
And out of the silence, the jubilant birds, and out of the foulness, the violets' breath.

As the beasts came forth from their winter stalls, said Dūnya: "Now is St. George's Day,
All the winter through you have housed us two, — is it now your will we should go or stay?"

And the woman spake: "We are frail and spent, and our men from the homestead are wandering free;
We bid you to stay for your own young strength, and the sake of the child who is frailer than we."

So she stayed and wrought; she ploughed their ground, and sowed the seed in their plot of the mîr,
Till, sweet in the shade of the flowering rye, she laid the flower of all the year.

Laid and left it at play with itself, as she worked her way in the fiery June,
To wear it fain on her breast again at morn, at eve, at night, and noon.

And her little lover grew jealous and coy, and learned in all love's tender wiles;
He wreathed her neck with his silken arms, and gave her back her kisses and smiles.

One eve when behind them the sun went down, and his beams got tangled in Dūnya's hair,
Three mowers looked on through the golden haze, and they crossed themselves all unaware.

. . . .

St. Peter's Day had come and gone; oh, the heavy heads of the ripening rye!
Oh, the brazen heaven, and the breathless earth, and the sun that glowered as an angry eye!

They sat again as the sun went down, but the air was choked with the new-mown hay,
And she felt his weight on her weary arm, and he fell asleep in the midst of his play.

And the beasts were lowing as if in pain, and sad over all came the feeble bleat
Of a motherless lamb; as she rose to go, a bird from the sky dropt dead at her feet.

She stumbled and fell by the dead bird's side; oh, the bleating lamb in the distant fold!
With the fierce red sun in the coppery sky, what meant that shudder of deadly cold?

What meant that deadly grip at the heart, the livid flesh, and the fiery breath?
She was 'ware of the fiend that was haunting the Don; she had felt the touch of the fierce black death.

No parting kiss, no cry, no word, — she held the babe at her full arms' length,
Then laid him asleep by the wayside cross, and fled from the sight with a desperate strength.

Three men — the mowers who late had been — that evening were setting their reaping-hooks,
When a woman who seemed to rise out of the ground chilled the blood in their veins with her frozen looks.

She spoke: "For love of the Mother of God, take the child who lies by the cross asleep,
And bear him to Grunya; so God the Son shall bless you whether you mow or reap."

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Then one of the three from the foot of the cross took the babe, and he handled him tenderly;
She saw him carried by meadow and mere; then she cried her cry: "He is safe from me!

"He is safe from the kiss of the foul black death I will fight with alone 'neath the drooping rye;
I will fight for our lives in my own young strength, with an open way to God's pitying eye."

That night with the lowing of stricken herds was mingled the voice of a woman's moan;
And, drowning the bleat of the motherless lamb, came an infant's cry from a cradle alone;

That dawn the voice of a woman who prayed, of a woman who sobbed in the drooping rye:
"Oh, Mother of God! feed a motherless lamb if his poisoned fountain should soon be dry!"

In the night of that dawn the weanling child, who had wearied the day with his cry forlorn,
Was breathing deep in his balmy sleep, and he sighed and slept till the morrow's morn.

So night after night in his cradle alone, he gurgled, and sighed, and sweetly slept,
And day after day, passed from hand to hand, upon alien bosoms he lay and wept.

And the wondering women peered into the dark, and listened with senses keenly bent,
For a sign, for a word, but no sound they heard, save the sighs of the infant's deep content.

Then wondering, whispering, Grunya arose from her bed as the night and the morning met,
And she found the babe, with his wide, bright eyes, awake with the milk on his lip still wet.

Then she signed the sign of the cross and said, — said half in wonder and half in fear:
"His mother, the wandering Dūnya, is dead, and the Mother of God has been with him here.

"She has come and gone in the dead o' the night, and the babe has sucked from her sacred breast,
If by day or night we beheld that sight, our eyes would forever and ever be blest;

"The wandering woman came back again, grown brave and patient, loving and mild;
Her body was claimed by the fierce black death, but the Virgin's self has been good to her child.

"We will take the Virgin's lamp," she said, "from before the Icon and set it alight,
We will cover it close in an earthen jar, and break the jar in the dead o' the night."

They took the Virgin's lamp, and trimmed, and they set it alight in the earthen jar;
Then they lay and watched, but they heard no sound for Elijah's chariot rumbling afar.

Then they thought it stopped, for there fell a lull; the dog in the yard gave a quick low bark;
The clock told one, — their hearts beat hard; the infant gurgled and crowed in the dark.

Then up rose Grunya and broke the jar; the pent-up light leapt forth and clung
To the sheen of the Virgin's golden stole, and her breast where the laughing baby hung.

The women fell on their knees in prayer, and slowly, fearfully, from her place
The mother, stoled in jewels and gold, on the kneeling wives turned her sorrowful face;

Not the Icon's face in its passionless peace, but the face of the wandering Dūnya glowed
On the trembling women, with mild reproach in the eyes which the sudden tears o'erflowed.

They drooped, they turned from the vision away, for sorrow and pity they saw no more,
Till they heard the fall of reluctant feet, as the gold-stoled woman swept out of the door.

Then dawn and day in the cradle alone the baby waited with wide bright eyes;
He would none of their food, he would none of their drink, he had tasted the milk of paradise.

When the clock struck one of the gloomy night, as they watched again they held their breath,
And they heard the child laugh out in the dark, ere a silence fell as the silence of death.

When the women arose in the still small hours, — in the light of the dawning day more bold, —
The babe lay dead with his arms outspread, and the laugh on his parted lips grown cold.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Then they saw the flash of Elijah's steeds, and they heard the wheels of his chariot roll, —
And within was a babe in his mother's arms made safe for the night in her golden stole.

EMILY PFEIFFER.

From Nature.

THE LAST OF THE GASES.

THE year 1877 will ever be memorable in the history of scientific progress, its close having been marked by a brilliant series of researches which have ended in an absolute demonstration of the fact that molecular cohesion is a property of all bodies without any exception whatever.

This magnificent work divides itself into two stages, which we shall refer to separately: first the liquefaction of oxygen, and then, following close upon this, the liquefaction of hydrogen, nitrogen, and atmospheric air.

In the liquefaction of oxygen, which we announced last week as having been accomplished by M. Pictet of Geneva, we have not only an instance of the long time we may have to wait and of the great difficulties which have to be overcome, before a theoretical conclusion is changed into a concrete fact — something definite acquired to science; but also another instance of a double discovery, showing that along all the great lines of thought opened up by modern investigation and modern methods, students of science are marching at least two abreast.

It appears that as early as December 2 M. Cailletet had succeeded in liquefying oxygen and carbonic oxide at a pressure of three hundred atmospheres and at a temperature of — 29° C. This result was not communicated to the Academy at once, but was consigned to a sealed packet on account of M. Cailletet being then a candidate for a seat in the section of mineralogy. Hence, then, the question of priority has been raised, but it is certain that in the future the work will be credited to both, on the ground that the researches of each were absolutely independent, both pursuing the same object, creating methods and instruments of great complexity. We regret, therefore, that M. Jamin, at the sitting of the Academy to which we have referred, seemed to strain the claims of M. Cailletet by stating that to obtain the gas non-transparent was the same as to obtain it liquefied. We are beginning to know enough of the various states of vapor now not to hazard such an assertion as this. This remark, however, rather anticipates matters, and indeed, as we shall show afterwards, M. Cailletet need not himself be very careful of the question of priority — even if it were ever worth caring for except to keep other people honest.

Owing to the double discovery and the curious incident to which we have referred, the meeting of the Academy on the 24th ult. was a very lively one, as not only was the sealed packet and a subsequent communication from M. Cailletet read, but M. Pictet had sent a long letter to M. Dumas giving full details of his arrangements. MM. Dumas, H. St. Claire Deville, Jamin, Regnault, and Berthelot all took part in the discussion, the former admirably putting the work in its proper place by the following quotation from Lavoisier : —

> . . . Considérons un moment ce qui arriverait aux différentes substances qui composent le globe, si la température en était brusquement changée. Supposons, par exemple, que la terre se trouvât transportée tout à coup dans une région beaucoup plus chaude du système solaire, dans une région, par exemple, où la chaleur habituelle serait fort supérieure à celle de l'eau bouillante ; bientôt l'eau, tous les liquides susceptibles de se vaporiser à des degrés voisins de l'eau bouillante, et plusieurs substances metalliques même, entreraient en expansion et se transformeraient en fluides aériformes, qui deviendraient parties de l'atmosphère.
>
> Par un effet contraire, si la terre se trouvait tout à coup placée dans des régions très froides, par exemple de Jupiter et de Saturne, l'eau qui forme aujourd'hui nos fleuves et nos mers, et probablement le plus grand nombre de liquides que nous connaissons, se transformeraient en montagnes solides.
>
> L'air dans cette supposition, ou du moins une partie des substances aériformes qui le composent, cesserait, sans doute, d'exister dans l'état de fluide invisible, faute d'un degré de chaleur suffisant ; il reviendrait donc à l'état de liquidité, et ce changement produirait de nouveaux liquides dont nous n'avons aucune idée.

When Faraday in the year 1823 (at the age of 31) began the researches indicated in the last paragraph quoted by M. Dumas, and first liquefied chlorine and then several other gases, he had no idea that he had been anticipated, as he had been, by Monge and Clouet, who condensed sulphurous acid before the year 1800, and by Northmore, who liquefied chlorine in 1805. If the great experimenter were among us now how delighted he would be to see one of the greatest ironmasters of France

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

employing the enormous resources at his disposal at Châtillon-sur-Seine, and a descendant of the Pictet, the firm friend of his great friend De la Rive (who was the first to whom he communicated his liquefaction of chlorine), thus engaged in carrying on the work which he made his own.

The methods employed by MM. Pictet and Cailletet are quite distinct and are the result of many years' preparatory study, as testified by M. H. St. Claire Deville and M. Regnault. It is difficult to know which to admire most, the scientific perfection of Pictet's method or the wonderful simplicity of Cailletet's. It is quite certain that the one employed by the latter will find frequent use in future experiments. We may briefly refer to both these methods.

M. Cailletet's apparatus has already been briefly alluded to in these columns. It consists essentially of a massive steel cylinder with two openings; through one hydraulic pressure is communicated. A small tube passes through the other, the sides of which are strong enough to withstand a pressure of several hundred atmospheres, and which can be inclosed in a freezing mixture. It opens within the cylinder into a second smaller cylinder serving as a reservoir for the gas to be compressed. The remainder of the space in the large cylinder is occupied by mercury. M. Cailletet's process consists in compressing a gas into the small tube, and then by suddenly placing it in communication with the outer air, producing such a degree of cold by the sudden distention of the confined gas that a large portion of it is condensed, a process perfectly analagous to that used to prepare solid carbonic acid by the rapid evaporation of the liquefied gas.

In M. Cailletet's experiment with oxygen it was brought to a temperature of — 29° C. by the employment of sulphurous acid and a pressure of three hundred atmospheres; the gas was still a gas. But when allowed to expand suddenly, which, according to Poisson's formula, brings it down to two hundred degrees below its starting-point, a cloud was at once formed. The same result has since been obtained without the employment of sulphurous acid, by giving the gas time to cool after compression. M. Cailletet has not yet obtained, at all events, so far as we yet know, oxygen in a liquid form as M. Pictet has done; on being separated from its enormous pressure it has merely put on the appearance of a cloud.

M. Pictet's arrangements are more elaborate. He uses four vacuum and force pumps, similar to those which were recently exhibited in the Loan Collection of Scientific Apparatus for making ice, driven by an engine of fifteen horse-power. Two of these are employed in procuring a reduction of temperature in a tube about four feet long containing sulphurous acid. This is done in the following way: the vacuum-pump withdraws the vapor from above the surface of the liquid sulphurous acid in the tube, which, like all the others subsequently to be mentioned, is slightly inclined so as to give the maximum of evaporating surface. The force-pump then compresses this vapor, and sends it into a separate reservoir, where it is again cooled and liquefied; the freshly-formed liquid is allowed to return under control to the tube first referred to, so that a complete circulation is maintained. With the pumps at full work there is a nearly perfect vacuum over the liquid and the temperature falls to — 65° or — 70° C.

M. Pictet uses this sulphurous acid as a cold-water jacket, as we shall see. It is used to cool the carbonic acid after compression, as water is used to cool the sulphurous acid after compression.

This is managed as follows. In the tube thus filled with liquid sulphurous acid at a temperature of — 60° C. there is another central one of the same length but naturally of smaller diameter. This central tube M. Pictet fills with liquid carbonic acid at a pressure of four or six atmospheres. This is then let into another tube four metres long and four centimetres in diameter. When thus filled the liquid is next reduced to the solid form and a temperature of — 140° C., the extraction of heat being effected as before by the pump, which extracts three litres of gas per stroke and makes one hundred strokes a minute.

Now it is the turn of the oxygen.

Just as the tube containing carbonic acid was placed in the tube containing sulphurous acid, so is a tube containing oxygen inserted in the long tube containing the now solidified carbonic acid. This tube is five metres long, fourteen millimetres in exterior diameter, and only four in interior diameter — the glass is very thick. The whole surface of this tube, except the ends which project beyond the ends of the carbonic acid tube, is surrounded by the frozen carbonic acid.

One end of this tube is connected with a strong shell contaning chlorate of potash, the other end is furnished with a stopcock.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

When the tube was as cold as its surroundings, heat was applied to the chlorate, and a pressure of five hundred atmospheres was registered; this descended to three hundred and twenty. The stopcock was then opened, and a liquid shot out with such violence that none could be secured, though we shall hear of this soon.

Pieces of lighted wood held in this stream spontaneously inflamed with tremendous violence.

In this way, then, has oxygen been liquefied at last. But this result has no sooner filled us with surprise than it has been completely eclipsed. On the last day of December, a week after the meeting of the Academy to which we have referred, M. Cailletet performed a series of experiments in the laboratory of the Ecole Normale at Paris, in the presence of Berthelot, Boussingault, St. Claire Deville, Mascart, and other leading French chemists and physicists, using the same method as that formerly employed for oxygen, and he then and there liquefied hydrogen, nitrogen, and air!

M. Cailletet first introduced pure nitrogen gas into the apparatus. Under a pressure of two hundred atmospheres the tube was opened, and a number of drops of liquid nitrogen were formed. Hydrogen was next experimented with, and this, the lightest and most difficult of all gases, was reduced to the form of a mist at two hundred and eighty atmospheres. The degree of cold attained by the sudden release of these compressed gases is scarcely conceivable. The physicists present at the experiment estimated it at — 300° C.

Although oxygen and nitrogen had both been liquefied, it was deemed of interest to carry out the process with air, and the apparatus was filled with the latter, carefully dried, and free from carbonic acid. The experiment yielded the same result. On opening the tube a stream of liquid air issued from it resembling the fine jets forced from our modern perfume-bottles.

These more recent results are all the more surprising as, at an earlier stage, hydrogen, at a pressure of three hundred atmospheres, has shown no signs of giving way.

These brilliant and important results, though, as we have said, they give us no new idea on the constitution of matter, open out a magnificent vista for future experiment. First, we shall doubtless be able to study solid oxygen, hydrogen, and air, and if MM. Pictet and Cailletet succeed in this there will then be the history to write of the changes of molecular state, probably accompanied by changes of color, through which these elemental substances pass in their new transformations.

There is a distinct lesson to be learnt from the sources whence these startling tours de force have originated. The means at the command of both MM. Cailletet and Pictet arise from the industrial requirements of these gentlemen, one for making iron, the other for making ice.

Why then in England, the land of practical science, have we not more men like MM. Cailletet and Pictet to utilize for purposes of research the vast means at their disposal, or at all events to allow others to use them?

It is also clear that to cope with modern requirements our laboratories must no longer contain merely an antiquated air-pump, a Leyden jar, and a few bottles, as many of them do. The professor should be in charge of a work instead of an old curiosity shop, and the scale of his operations must be large if he is to march with the times — times which, with the liquefaction of the most refractory gases, mark an epoch in the history of science.

From The Pall Mall Gazette.

THE CENTENARY OF VOLTAIRE.

If Voltaire were to come back to life he would be the first to laugh at the singular preparations which are being made in France to celebrate his centenary. The Municipal Council of Paris have voted £400 towards the solemnity; and a committee of eminent men, under the presidency of M. Victor Hugo, are soliciting private subscriptions all over the country. Whether there will be one dinner or a hundred dinners, a procession, the inauguration of a monument, a gala performance at the "Français," or whether the funds will be centralized and serve to found a "Collége Voltaire" for the education of the sons of freethinkers — as M. Edmond About suggests — are points not yet settled. M. Victor Hugo, with characteristic grandeur, would have the "Denier de Voltaire" preached by laymen as the "Denier de St. Pierre" is by the clergy, until pence enough had been collected from irreligious pockets to institute not only a college, but a public library, a hospital, and a primary school, all to be conducted on strictly anti-clerical principles. These are fine schemes; but what would amuse Voltaire is the attempt

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

that is being made to set him up as the great champion of popular rights. Few men loathed the masses more than he. He was the boon companion of Frederick the Great, the flatterer of Catherine II., the by no means dignified courtier of Mme. de Pompadour. He plainly expressed his preference for monarchical despotism over every other form of rule; he was an aristocrat to the marrow, and he never alluded to the people but as the canaille, the rabble — a vile herd whom it was not worth trying to educate. What is more, he never foresaw how his writings would tend to popular emancipation. Though he died so late as 1778, he caught no sound of the advancing revolutionary tide which was to burst over France, and thence over the world, eleven years later. Jean Jacques Rousseau, who died in the same year, had a much shrewder prescience of the coming changes; and if these two men, who greatly disliked each other, had lived until 1793 their fates would have been very different. Rousseau would have been acclaimed as the patriarch of the Revolution; he would have been the patron of Marat, and would have approved Robespierre. Voltaire would have posted off to Ferney at the first signs of mob rule, to avoid being guillotined as a friend of the émigrés.

The author of the "Dictionnaire Philosophique" had not even the merit, which his admirers claim for him, of having begun the war against the Christian dogma. That credit, such as it is, belongs to deeper thinkers than he. The philosophy of the eighteenth century was based more on the writings of Hobbes, Locke, D'Alembert, and Diderot than on anything Voltaire wrote; and he was as far behind a modern positivist in his ultimate conclusions as a Gallican Catholic like Fénelon was behind an infalliblist like Monsignor Dupanloup. One cannot help thinking that if it had not been for his unfortunate quarrel with Cardinal Fleury and then with Boyer, Bishop of Mirepoix, which put him into disgrace with the court, Voltaire would never have been numbered among the Encyclopædists at all; anyhow, he nowhere stated his wish to see the Christian religion abolished and its churches closed. He admitted religion as a necessity for government, and would have been content with the universal establishment of Protestantism pending the time when that modified dogma could become gradually transformed into pure deism. But what Voltaire did, and what gave him such immense influence, was that he assailed the abuses and superstitions of the Church with a ridicule which everybody could understand. Diderot was prosy, often abstruse, and always over-earnest, even when he tried to be jocular; but Voltaire was ever lively, clear, and amusing. He poked incessant fun at the clergy, and made the whole order contemptible by exposing individual members of it. He compared biblical texts and showed up their apparent discrepancies; he expounded the religions of the ancients, and endeavored to prove how in many cases Christian doctrine had been grafted on to mythology; and he raked up the private histories of the popes, informing an astonished world what very curious persons some of the wearers of the tiara had been. Many of Voltaire's criticisms were shallow, and were successfully refuted by Church writers even in his time; but they were written for a shallow class of readers who only wanted to see one side of the question. The court, the nobility, the upper bourgeoisie were all sceptics then in a more or less degree; and it required no great courage to attack institutions at which everybody was sneering out of hatred for the Jesuits. The Jesuits were expelled from France in 1753, and Voltaire hailed this event as a first step towards the ultimate downfall of Romanism. He continued till his dying hour to think that the days of what he called "Papal superstition" were numbered; and if he were to come out of his grave nothing would surprise him more than to see the old thing flourishing with greater vigor than ever under the protection of the descendants of those grands seigneurs who a hundred years ago were the most arrant scoffers in the country. Certainly the author of "Zadig" never imagined that a day would come when Luynes, Larochefoucaulds, and Montmorencys would be seen making pilgrimages to Lourdes with tapers in their hands; he was persuaded that France had seen the last of that kind of thing under the League, about a century before he was born.

In seeking to place nineteenth-century liberalism under the patronage of Voltaire the French liberals are guilty of an absurdity which can only be perpetrated out of full reliance on popular ignorance; but, after all, it is an absurdity easily to be accounted for by the fact that there is no other worthy of the past who could serve their present purpose — which is to make a demonstration against the Church — so well. Jean Jacques Rousseau was a democrat; but he sent his children to the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Foundling, and his private life was in other respects so unsatisfactory that he is hardly a fit person to deify. Diderot and D'Alembert were both friends of the people; but their works are little read now, and they personally have kept but a hazy prestige. All the other Encyclopædists were comparative mediocrities who have lapsed into oblivion. Voltaire, however, remains popular chiefly on account of his amusing novelettes, which can be bought for five sous the volume, and also on account of his reputation as an arch-enemy not so much of religion as of its ministers. This is a subtle distinction, but it is worth noting. The French of to-day are rather anti-clerical than anti-religious, and Voltaire's deism suits the mass of them better than does the positivism of their more thoughtful leaders. Besides, Voltaire was eminently a gentleman and a universal genius, a man whose private life can brave scrutiny, and a writer who excelled in everything he wrote; so that the rabble whom he contemned may be proud to claim him as an apostle, just as they lately accepted for their chief M. Thiers, who disliked them not less than Voltaire did. For all these reasons the Voltaire centenary will be celebrated with enthusiasm; and it will be a significant fact, as showing the intensity of the anti-priestly feeling that has spread among the masses. Possibly, though, some of the organizers of the demonstration may laugh a little in their sleeves when they see the socialist citizens of 1878, who abhor nobiliary privileges and dream daily of a revanche against Prussian militarism, cheering the name of a man who bought himself a title, had glebe serfs on his estate, wore a chamberlain's key at his button-hole, and rejoiced in the defeat of his own countrymen at Rosbach.

From The Tatler.

THE USE AND ABUSE OF PRINCES.

We lately took occasion to point out the mischievous consequences resulting in this country from giving members of the royal family high military command without regard to their qualifications. We omitted, however, to draw attention to the objectionable practice of bestowing on them highly-paid military appointments, such as the colonelcies of regiments. It has frequently happened, in the course of the present century, that two out of the three most lucrative colonelcies have been held at the same time by princes. Two of these colonelcies are worth £2,000 and one £2,200 a year. Other colonelcies of less value, but the worst paid bringing in £1,000 a year, have also been enjoyed by members of the royal family. The officers of the army are absurdly under-paid, and these colonelcies constitute the bulk of the prizes of the profession. If any of them are given to princes, it materially diminishes the chances of distinguished generals who much need the emoluments. It is no doubt desirable that princes should be associated with the army, for its social position is thereby improved; but the connection might easily be accomplished by simply giving the members of the royal family commissions as generals supernumerary to the establishment, or by appointing them colonels-in-chief of the Rifle Brigade, Sixtieth Rifles, the Royal Artillery, and the Royal Engineers. We by no means advocate that princes should be discouraged from taking an interest in, and becoming acquainted with, military matters. On the contrary, the more they do so the better. The army cannot have too many friends in high quarters. The heir to the throne especially should study assiduously all relating to the army and navy, for the sovereign ought not to be ignorant of the two branches of the public service on whose efficiency the honor and safety of the country mainly depend. Any one who studies the third volume of the "Life of the Prince Consort" will see how great was the theoretical knowledge of military affairs possessed by his Royal Highness, how deep was his interest in them, and how usefully he exerted himself to bring about military reform. Again, there is the subject of military dress. Philosophers may sneer, but practical men are aware how greatly the self-respect both of women and soldiers is increased by giving them a becoming costume. It is all very well to have a soul above buttons, but they constitute an important part of the pomp and circumstance of glorious war. We must say that in this respect none of the princes of the house of Hanover has failed in his duty. With other branches of the science of war, however, we should be sorry to see princes meddle. Let them interest themselves in the cut of a tunic, spend serious hours in devising improvements on a head-dress, but, for the sake of the national fame and money, let them not venture beyond the sartorial department. There is plenty of other scope for their

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

energies. Charity is never felt to be so sweet as when given by a society patronized by a royal personage, for piety and royalty are thus combined. A royal chairman at a public dinner invariably insures a success. It may be a bore to have to deliver a speech on a threadbare subject; but the knack of piecing together pretty platitudes can soon be acquired, and sometimes an intelligent private secretary can supply an idea, which if not new can be made to appear so. The worst of accepting the office of chairman at a public dinner is that it generally involves a large subscription. That is unfair; where patronage is given the pocket ought to be spared. This was probably the idea of a certain royal personage who, during the second quarter of the present century, was always ready to eat a bad dinner in a good cause; but his countenance was all that he gave.

But there are other functions open to junior royalties besides those of presiding at charity dinners, or even in awarding prizes for bloated bullocks and obese sheep. Art in its most comprehensive shape merits the patronage of princes, and certainly derives benefit from it. Many dull souls become regular attendants at the theatre, the opera, and concerts simply because royalty sets the example. Apart from the refining influence of such modes of spending leisure time and cash, the pleasurable sensation produced by breathing the same oxygen as a R. H. is very great to some people. Fancy, for example, the delight of hearing a prince fiddle! Then there are the duties of a country gentleman, which are supposed to afford ample occupation to the most active, though what their precise nature is we have not yet been able to determine with exactitude. We fancy, however, that "improving the property and neighborhood" by building laborers' cottages on æsthetic principles, erecting model dairies, attending a few meets, giving prizes for gigantic cabbages and clean faces, breeding and slaughtering thousands of pheasants, wearing gaiters, and solemnly displaying ignorance of law at petty sessions, may be considered as among the chief functions of a landowner. A prince cannot very well dispense gratuitously bad law, but he may do everything else in the above catalogue.

To our thinking, however, the widest scope for a prince who is anxious, at all events, to do no harm, is afforded by social science. He may devote himself to this pursuit as much as he likes. If he really has studied and understands any branch of the subject, his rank will give weight to truths which, enunciated by a humbler person, would possibly meet with neglect. If he is quite ignorant, his countenance is still valuable to those who are not, and his want of knowledge may be veiled by generalities. We therefore earnestly entreat princes in want of employment to take up social science. It is a field that much needs cultivation, and has hitherto been but superficially scratched. It is inexhaustible also, and, no matter how numerous our royal family may become, there will be ample occupation for every one of them. The greatest of English poets has hazarded a conjecture that Alexander's dust may be used to stop a bunghole; how much more glorious would it be for our princes were some of them to use their influence, while still alive, to get our drains cleaned!

From Chambers' Journal.

THE GREEN FLAG OF THE PROPHET.

SINCE the commencement of the war between Russia and Turkey, the world has several times been startled by the announcement that the "flag of the Prophet" was about to be unfurled in the streets of Stamboul. Such an event, if it should happen (which may Heaven avert), would proclaim a crusade in which all true Mussulmans would be bound to take an active part, and to fight against Christianity in every part of the world. They may be in India, Arabia, Egypt, or wherever else their scattered race has found a home: the raising of the green standard is a call which none may disobey, without, as the Koran lays it down, sacrificing all his hopes of Paradise.

This fearful appeal to all the worst passions of the Eastern races hangs like a menace over the Mohammedan world; and if the word was once uttered and the dread flag unfurled, there is no telling to what sanguinary excesses it might lead an enthusiastic and half-savage people. It may be of interest to our readers if, under these circumstances, we endeavor to make them acquainted with the origin and history of a banner which has not seen the light of day since the empress Catharine of Russia attempted to reinstate Christianity in the city of the sultans, and which, once unfurled, would set a whole world ablaze.

There have been many flags or signals

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

used by various nations at different crises in their history to incite the peoples to battle on behalf of religions, dynasties, and ideas; but none has attained to the fearful notoriety which appertains to the terrible flag of the Prophet, which is really a banner of blood, for it dispels the idea of mercy from the minds and hearts of its followers, and gives no quarter to man, woman, or child.

The red cross banner of the Christian Crusaders was an emblem of chivalry, mercy, gentleness, and love; but under its folds many a dark deed and many a shameless act were committed; and it was understood by the members of the Mohammedan faith to mean nothing less than the utter extermination of their race. This feeling, with its consequent hatred of Christianity, shows itself even at this advanced period in the world's history, by the recent refusal of the Turkish government to allow its ambulance corps and hospitals to bear the red cross of the Geneva Convention (a sign which is entirely neutral, and is designed to protect its wearers while they are engaged on their errands of mercy to the sick and wounded of both sides), adopting instead thereof their own emblem of the crescent. Thus we see these rival emblems once more waving over the field of battle, though, happily, to mitigate rather than increase the horrors of war.

In France the "oriflamme," or golden sun upon a field of crimson, signified "no quarter;" but this celebrated flag of the Prophet means infinitely more than this. It is a summons to an anti-Christian crusade, a challenge of every believer in the Prophet to arms; a war-signal in fact, which, like the fiery cross of Scotland, would flash its dread command through the domain of Islam. In the interests of humanity, however, we may hope that the "commander of the faithful" will never utter the dreadful word; for then indeed would the whole soul and strength of Christendom turn against the enemy of all civilized laws, human and divine.

The Prophet himself predicted that one day when his followers should number a hundred millions — which they do now, with twenty millions more added to it — his flag should fly against the advancing power of the northern races; and the Koran, or Mohammedan Bible, says that when its silken folds are flung forth "the earth will shake, the mountains melt into dust, the seas blaze up in fire, and the children's hair grow white with anguish." This language is of course metaphorical; but it is easy to conceive, by the light of very recent history, that some such catastrophe might take place, as the displaying of this terrible symbol would raise a frenzy of fanaticism in the breasts of the Mohammedan race all over the globe.

The origin of the insignia is a curious one. Mohammed gazing out upon a vast prospect of fields, said: "Nature is green, and green shall be my emblem, for it is everlasting and universal." In course of time, however, it lost that innocent significance; and, amid his visions, the great dreamer saw the green flag floating as a sign that all true believers should take up their arms and march against the infidel; in fact the green turban was the sacred head-dress of the pilgrim or perfected Islamite who had gone to Mecca; and hence the sanctity of this formidable standard.

When once unfurled, it summons all Islam by an adjuration from the Koran that the sword is the solitary emblem and instrument of faith, independence, and patriotism; that armies, not priests, make converts; and that sharpened steel is the "true key to heaven or hell." Upon that fearful ensign are inserted the words which are supposed to have been written at Mecca itself — namely, "All who draw it [the sword] will be rewarded with temporal advantages; every drop shed of their blood, every peril and hardship endured by them, will be registered on high as more meritorious than either fasting or praying. If they fall in battle, their sins will be at once blotted out, and they will be transported to Paradise, there to revel in eternal pleasures in the arms of black-eyed houris. But for the first heaven are reserved those of the faithful who die within sight of the green flag of the Prophet." Then follow the terrible and all-significant words, the fearful war-cry against God and man: "Then may no man give or expect mercy!"

This is the outburst of barbarism with which the world is threatened in this year of grace 1877; and the reader cannot do otherwise than mark the cunning nature of the portentous words inscribed on the Prophet's banner. What would not most men do, civilized or savage, for "temporal advantages"? While to the Eastern peoples fasting and praying are looked upon as of so meritorious a nature that to find something else, which, in the eyes of Allah, would be deemed of greater value still, would be a desideratum which none would fail to grasp, by any means what-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ever, if it came within their reach. But Mohammed's wonderful knowledge of human nature, and more especially of Eastern human nature, is shown in his picture of Paradise as prepared for the Faithful who fall in battle; while his declaration that the highest heaven in this so-called Paradise will be reserved for those who die within sight of the green flag, is a masterpiece of devilish policy unequalled in the annals of mankind.

It scarcely needed the fearful words which follow to add emphasis to this dreadful appeal to the passions of a semi-barbarous race. Another motto on this sacred flag is not without significance at the present time: "The gates of Paradise are under the shade of swords;" and this alone would, if the flag were unfurled in the holy mosque of Constantinople, give to the Turk a moral power over his subordinates the effect of which it would be vain to calculate. Civilized though he partially is, he still firmly believes in the old doctrine of kismet or fatality, and in angels fighting on his behalf; not less implicitly than did his ancestors at the battle of Beder, where this formidable green standard was first unfurled. "There," says the historian, "they elevated the standard, which Mohammed from his height in heaven blessed."

Thus arose the great tradition of this sacred war-emblem, which it is a Turkish boast was never yet captured in battle, though it was once in extreme peril in a fight between hill and plain; when Mohammed himself had it snatched out of his hands. Ali, his kinsman, however, thrust himself in front of a hundred spears, and won the victory with the immaculate flag flying over his head.

It is scarcely to be wondered at that a race so superstitious as the Turks should attach an almost miraculous value to such a symbol of their past history and their present power. It is a spell wherever their race or religion flourishes, and its invocation in the serious form now menaced cannot be regarded without anxiety. The day of the military apostles of Mohammed may be past, it is true; but the tradition survives; and the unfurling of this flag might be the spark which would set fire to the latent enthusiasm of the Mohammedan race and involve the world in a religious war.

We have referred to the great French banner, the oriflamme; and it was that which led the French Crusaders through the Holy Land and headed the royal armies of France in the campaigns of the sixteenth century, while it also divided the Blue from the White in the Burgundian civil wars; but this flag of the Prophet to-day exercises a magical influence over one hundred and twenty millions of the human race, scattered about in Arabia, Syria, Asia Minor, Persia, and Egypt, over the Nile and the Ganges, and from Jerusalem to the Red Sea.

The desire of Mohammed, however, was, that while all pilgrims whose task had been duly fulfilled should wear the green turban, no sovereign in his succession should unfurl the green flag of the faith unless Islam were in imminent peril. The unfurling of the banner would be performed with great religious ceremony, and in the presence of the commander of the faithful, who is himself supposed to carry it at the head of his army; while a fearful curse would be called down upon the head of every Mohammedan who, capable of bearing arms, failed to rally round it.

The standard itself is not a very handsome one, and is surpassed both in value and appearance by many of the banners which belong to the various benefit societies and other mutual associations of men in this country. It is of green silk, with a large crescent on the top of the staff, from which is suspended a long plume of horsehair (said to have been the tail of the Prophet's favorite Arab steed), while the broad folds of the flag exhibit the crescent and the quotations from the Koran already mentioned.

The state color of one of our regiments of the Guards is a much prettier and more expensive standard than the great banner of Islam; but (to such small things is man's enthusiasm attached) if the latter were the veriest "rag" in existence, nothing could mar the beauty which the prestige of more than a thousand years has given to it in the eyes of a Mussulman.

The flag of the Prophet is kept in the mosque of St. Sophia at Constantinople, and is in the custody of the Sheik-ul-Islam, or Mohammedan chief priest, where all well-wishers of humanity may sincerely trust it will ever remain.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXII. | No. 1766.—April 20, 1878. | From Beginning, Vol. CXXXVII.

CONTENTS.

I.	A BROAD-CHURCH BISHOP,	Church Quarterly Review,	131
II.	MACLEOD OF DARE. By William Black. Part VI.,	Advance Sheets,	143
III.	MR. FROUDE'S "LIFE AND TIMES OF THOMAS BECKET." By Edward A. Freeman,	Contemporary Review,	150
IV.	ERICA. Part XIX. Translated for THE LIVING AGE, from the German of	Frau von Ingersleben,	164
V.	STORY OF GEORGE CRUIKSHANK,	Chambers' Journal,	178
VI.	THE ANALOGIES OF PLANT AND ANIMAL LIFE,	Nature,	182
VII.	THE TOBACCO-TAX IN GERMANY,	Spectator,	187
VIII.	THE GARDENER BIRD,	Spectator,	189
IX.	THE LEGITIMATE SPHERE OF AGNOSTICISM,	Spectator,	192

POETRY.

DEATH'S CHANGED FACE, ... 130 | THE EXPLORER, ... 130

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY

LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

FOR EIGHT DOLLARS, remitted directly to the Publishers, the LIVING AGE will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of THE LIVING AGE is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of LITTELL & GAY.

Single Numbers of THE LIVING AGE, 18 cents.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

DEATH'S CHANGED FACE.

SWEET Saviour, since the time thy human feet
Trod thirty years our parched and dusty ways,
How hath the wilderness of life grown sweet
With flowers and warbled praise!

How hath the heavy mist that wrapt us round,
The weary mist of tears and soul-wrung sighs,
Lifted, and bared to us the blue profound
Of God's far quiet skies!

And more than all, how hath a gracious change,
To poor scared men that slunk with fluttering breath,
Passed o'er the face, that erst was stern and strange,
Of thy strong angel, Death!

Lo, through the mazes of a tangled wood,
Nowhither bound, we groped through vistas dim,
While shadowlike amid the shadows stood
Old Death, the archer grim.

We deemed his face was pitiless and blind;
Shot all at random seemed each whirring dart,
Yet none did fail a resting-place to find
In some wrung, quivering heart.

And there, with writhen limbs and sightless stare,
Down in the drenchèd grass the victim lay,
What erst was man, erect and tall and fair,
Now shrunk and fading clay.

And over him in dull and hopeless pain
The mourners stood, sore stricken and perplext:
"He lieth prone; he will not rise again;
And who shall fall the next?"

O sweet changed face! We see, we know him now,—
Rent the thick mist that blurred our straining ken,—
Death: of all angels round the throne that bow,
Most pitiful to men!

Through the dusk chamber where the watchers weep
Slowly he moves with calm and noiseless tread,
And o'er the weary one that longs for sleep
He bends his gracious head.

"Poor eyes!" he saith, "long have ye wept and waked;
I come to bid your tears and vigils cease."
"Poor heart!" he saith, "long hast thou yearned and ached;
I come to give thee peace."

"Be of good cheer," he saith, "world-weary waif.
One sharp, swift step, and all the way is trod:
Through the heaped darkness I will lead thee safe
To the great light of God."

A sharp, sweet silence smites the tingling ears.
How snow-like falls the peace upon his brow!
Hark! happy mourners, smiling through their tears,
Whisper, "He sleepeth now!"

Good Words. FREDERICK LANGBRIDGE.

THE EXPLORER.

LUCRECE.

OUT of the unknown into the known,
From the infinite sea to the sea of time
Cometh a voyager, sailing alone,
Steering with confidence all sublime
Straight to the land of joy and rest:
The tropic isle of his mother's breast.

Little he cares whether hall or cot
Shelter his shallop from wind and wet;
Cotton or velvet, he heedeth not—
Peasant or lord—they are nothing yet!
Crown for head and sceptre for hand
Are toys and playthings in baby-land.

Oh, but he finds out wonderful things!
The dome of his cradle high and wide;
The drowsy sense when the mother sings;
The swinging ebb of the outward tide,
Which somewhere underneath him seems
To drift him into the land of dreams!

Then wide awake, from the distance dim
In far, mysterious realms of space,
A soft, bright moon doth rise for him:
The tender round of his mother's face.
In this wide world finds he charm on charm,
As he rides round the room on his mother's arm.

Smiles and tears in your bonny eyes,
Shine and cloud on your coral lips,
Little explorer, out of the skies,
Searching out truth with your finger-tips!
You know not yet, as we old folks know,
There is nothing new in this world below!

Ah! What disdainful looks you cast—
Captain, who sailed from the unknown shore!
Rogue's eyes answer me: "Not so fast,
Filling my ears with your well-worn lore;
Baby or fairy or sprite or elf,
You'll find I am something new myself!"

Golden Rule.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

From The Church Quarterly Review.

A BROAD-CHURCH BISHOP.*

IF there be a country in the world in which Episcopacy is on its trial, that country is Scotland. It is there exposed to the rivalry of a form of the Christian religion which retains the fundamental doctrines of the faith; it ministers to flocks composed of elements identical with those of the various bodies, Free and Established, around them; and it is inevitable that comparisons should be constantly drawn between the two polities — the Episcopal and Presbyterian. The spiritual results of each will be carefully scanned. The Scottish Church, like all branches of the ancient catholic organization, makes a high claim for itself; and the inquiry will certainly be made how far that claim is justified by facts, how far the intensity of spiritual force generated within her pale, how far the spiritual standard reached by her sons and daughters, recommends the claim made in her traditions and formularies to an organization of apostolic authority, to a ministerial commission transmitted through successive generations, direct from the Founder of Christianity himself.

Especially will such a severity of criticism follow the persons and the actions of the bishops themselves. Upon the catholic theory to which we have been referring, they are the foremost men of their communion — the élite of its entire ministry. It is true that the "gift which is in them" does not include personal infallibility, and has never been even supposed necessarily to guarantee learning, or ability, or even holiness of life. It has a strictly defined purpose, viz., to continue the ministry of the Church and to guarantee the grace of the sacraments. Whatever is not precisely involved in these objects cannot be supposed to be supplied by that which is confined to the attainment of them alone. But, nevertheless, the higher be the conception which is formed of the episcopate, the more exacting surely will be the tests applied to the men who are to bear and to exercise it; and any church will be acting with criminal levity and disrespect of the gift committed to its guardianship, which selects, or suffers to be selected, any other than its foremost sons to fill an office so exacting and so august.

The episcopate may be characterized in fact as the most highly vitalized portion of the Church's organization, and the motive power of the whole. If even a part of its spiritual force be neutralized by its being committed to unfit men, — men, that is to say, whose natural powers or whose acquired habitudes do not work in harmony with the requirements of their office — men whose want of learning causes it to be lightly esteemed, whose secularity of temper finds a spiritual office uncongenial, or, worse than all, whose want of faith paralyzes spiritual energy, and saps with secret decay all the life of the dioceses entrusted to them, — then the Church whose chief pastors are such as these will find herself, just in the proportion in which their influence and example extend, unfruitful within her own borders and unable, perhaps even undesirous, to extend those borders; in short, she will have failed in her mission. Of so great importance to a Church are pious and faithful bishops. And in following this train of thought, which the perusal of the memoir before us has aroused in our minds, we by no means intend to prejudge the career of the bishop who is its subject, but merely seek to indicate some of the conditions under which it was run.

Alexander Ewing, first bishop after its revival of the ancient diocese of Argyll and the Isles, was born in 1814, at Aberdeen, and was therefore a Highlander pur sang. His childhood was not eventful until the loss, when he was but in his fourteenth year, of his father by death, which was followed in the next year by that of his mother, and speedily afterwards of an only sister, thus leaving him and his brother alone in the world. We need not linger over his youth and early manhood. It was a scrambling kind of education that he got; first at one place, then at another; and for a considerable time not even the pretence of learning was kept up. The two youths received occasional attention

* Memoir of Alexander Ewing, D.C.L., Bishop of Argyll and the Isles. By ALEXANDER J. ROSS, B.D., Vicar of S. Philip's, Stepney. 1877. (Daldy, Isbister, & Co., 56 Ludgate Hill.)

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

from their guardians; but in a general way they seem to have lived where they pleased and done what seemed good in their own eyes. "It surprised their neighbors somewhat," says their biographer, "that two youths, without a tutor or other senior, should be left so entirely without any visible control over their actions." Well it might!

One consequence of this unrestrained freedom of action was that the elder brother became engaged to be married before he was twenty; but on the whole it answered better than could have been expected. The younger brother, John, was, indeed, afterwards brought under more systematic training at Oxford, was ordained in the Church of England, and is at the present time, we believe, rector of Westmill, in Herts. But with a brief attendance at some of the classes of the University of Edinburgh in 1834-5, Alexander Ewing's status pupillaris came to an end. The deficiency in theological learning, as in power of exact thought, which the inadequacy of his early studies left in his mind, cannot be said to have been ever quite filled up. The miscellaneous gatherings of his subsequent reading, which, however, seems to have lain but little along the severer and more arduous paths of literature, and the powers of a mind rather elegant than massive, enabled him to reach a respectable proficiency in one or two directions. But there was always an amateur air about most of his work. He never at any period of his life had any pretension to have gone below the surface of systematic theology; and the consequence was that he was always more or less at the mercy of theological quacks. What he might have been and have done, had his unquestionable powers been educed and bent to work in youth by serious and continuous training, and his memory stored with the elements of the higher knowledge, it is hard to say. For the present we resume the thread of the narrative before us.

He married in 1835, three months after he was twenty-one, and tried to settle down to the tranquil enjoyment of that "love in a cottage" which so many have dreamed of in their callow youth. He does not seem to have felt the slightest need or desire for a career at this time. We hear nothing of any whispers of ambition, or any stirrings of latent powers in his nature. "Here I should like to live all my life," he says, "with Katherine and John, and my books and the river." But his Eden-dream was soon shattered by an attack of illness which came near being a fatal one; and a long, tedious convalescence, followed by a change of residence, opened new horizons in his life; and it is at this point that we hear first of an inclination towards the sacred ministry. He was attracted at first towards the English Church. "He had discovered," we are told, "and been attracted by the comprehensiveness of many of her great affirmations on the subject of the redemption of humanity; while life in an English country parsonage seemed to him the ideal of quiet beauty and secluded usefulness." But we are not surprised to find that he shrank from the labor and excitement of a career at Oxford or Cambridge, although encouraged by the Bishop of Winchester, to whom he applied on the subject, and ultimately he drifted by the force of events towards the ministry of the Scottish Episcopal Church. His biographer relates the circumstances which precipitated his decision at last, in a passage whose curiously infelicitous wording is characteristic, and will meet us often: —

He was led by a special combination of circumstances seriously to entertain the thought of applying for orders in the Scottish Episcopal Church. For there were those, and they too Episcopalians, who seemed to have been of opinion that Mr. Ewing was possessed of ministerial gifts which no ordination by human hands could insure, and on the 9th of March, 1837, a formal proposal was made to him to undertake the charge of the Episcopalian congregation at Elgin. This proposal he declined, chiefly on the ground of his own inexperience; but that it should have been addressed to him while still a layman, and only in his twenty-third year, by his own immediate neighbors, must be regarded as the highest testimony that could be borne by them to his religious character and intellectual endowment; and there is no doubt that this entirely unexpected manifestation of feeling on the part of the Elgin congregation first suggested the question

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

whether there might not be special work for him to do in the Scottish Episcopal Church (p. 35).

Still more odd are the circumstances that followed. This proposal from Elgin seems to have dropped; Mr. Ewing determined to spend one or two years abroad; and, therefore, "formed the resolution of applying for admission to the ministry of the Scottish Episcopal Church." We confess that after all the biographer's elaborate explanations, we are unable to understand the therefore; and we refrain from ascribing hypothetical reasons. The material fact is that he was ordained deacon by Bishop Low, of Ross and Moray, in 1838, without cure or title as far as appears, and left Scotland a fortnight afterwards to spend some years upon the Continent. On this we must needs observe with his biographer that the determination to give some years to foreign travel "might have been reason enough for deferring to a future day" this step of ordination. Probably his course was regarded as nothing unusual in the Scottish Church then. We have no reason to suppose that the same Church, in the earnestness of her great revival, would tolerate anything like this now. But in that day of small things in the sister Church it was then more unusual than happily it is now to find men of good family and competent fortune offering themselves for ordination; and they were eagerly accepted when they did come. Still, it is manifest that to treat the ministry as a mere ornament and subordinate adjunct of a country gentleman's life was not to give it its due; and there must have been a certain sense of unreality in a solemn ordination to the ministry which was followed by no corresponding action, and, for the moment at least, was treated as if it were of no account.

He remained abroad at Pisa, Lucca, and Rome about three years, living the usual dilettante life of the English abroad, but growing strong physically, and growing also in mental breadth and stature. His correspondence during this time is much occupied with Italian art, as was not unnatural.

In 1841 he returned to Scotland, was ordained a priest by the Bishop of Aberdeen, and undertook clerical duty for the first time in the charge of a congregation at Forres. During some four years of quiet work in that charge, Mr. Ewing distinguished himself, as his biographer seems to think, by the part which he took in the controversies of the day. It may, at all events, be conceded that he had taken his line and declared it decidedly enough on two important questions — the disabilities of the Scottish Episcopal Church and the Scottish communion office, to which he thus early declared his hostility. He was now thirty-three years of age; and we are next to find him elected and consecrated Bishop of Argyll and the Isles. The circumstances under which he became bishop were somewhat peculiar.

The office of bishop in the Scottish Church is an onerous one; and apostolic as in other respects, so in this, that it is not burdened with the goods of this world. Bishop Eden, speaking in 1861 at London House on behalf of the Argyll fund, makes the remarkable statement that "the Scotch bishops for some years have been living on incomes of £127 a year, and that without any house or residence." We believe that matters are somewhat better now; but at that time it was evidently impossible for any but rich men to accept the episcopal office in Scotland. Mr. Ewing was a man of competent means, and did not need to depend upon the small endowment of the see (which never amounted to more than £270 a year); on the contrary, he spent his own private fortune liberally upon it in his early years as bishop. But the fact of the general poverty of the see tended most undesirably to limit the choice of possible men for bishops, and to make the selection turn, not so much upon learning or mental power or personal fitnesses of any kind as on the possession of pecuniary means to enable the bishop-elect to live independently of official emoluments, and to uphold in temporal matters the dignity of the episcopate. We are not saying that the other necessary pre-requisites were in practice neglected, but that they could not be made the sole criteria; and this was bad. Bish-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

op Ewing himself draws the inference in a letter to the Hon. G. Boyle in 1855: —

In the Episcopal Church, according to the theory of its constitution, more than in any other system, it must always hold good that, "if the head suffers, all the members suffer with it;" and I am of opinion that, until something is done to enable us to hold our episcopates without constant pecuniary anxiety, no real good will be effected by our Church. It is true that we can get down wealthy men from England; but this mode of filling the Scottish bench does not develop the resources of the native Church, does not foster the real growth of the native plant. I do think that, if our bishops and deans could be provided with such means for the efficient discharge of their offices as are supplied even to the colonial bishops and deans, we should find the road opening to a better state of things in Scotland (p. 244).

Without undervaluing the many estimable qualities that afterwards showed themselves in him, it was probably more because he was a wealthy man than for any other reason that Mr. Ewing, a comparatively young man, and quite undistinguished in every way, was selected by Bishop Low to administer the re-founded diocese for which he himself had, with marked and splendid generosity, provided a modest endowment of £7,000. He was confirmed as bishop after some delay and demur, consecrated at Aberdeen in 1847, and seems to have thrown himself at once with great energy and devotion into the work of his diocese. "He was at once initiated," says his biographer, "into that locomotive amphibious kind of life which must be led by every Bishop of Argyll and the Isles who simply does his duty." He had made the circuit of his scattered diocese, we are told, before a month was over; and then at once proceeded to hold a synod of the revived diocese at Oban. His first charge, delivered at this synod, appears to us a very suitable one. It shows, indeed, already the signs of that disposition in the bishop's mind habitually to dissociate the sign and the thing signified — the outward and the inward — in the ordinances of the Church, and to depreciate the former, of which we shall see the workings later on. For the present the material interests of his diocese required his consideration; and no man could have set himself to have supplied these with more judgment and goodwill, nor, we may add, with more munificent liberality, than did Bishop Ewing. The scattered communities of Episcopalians in the Highlands and islands were sadly in want of his pastoral care. "There were wanted additional pastors, schoolmasters, schoolmistresses, churches, parsonages, schoolhouses, Gaelic Bibles and prayer-books." The synod service was held, it seems, "within the old abbey [at Iona], and was the subject of a sketch in the Illustrated Times of the day;" but "so great was the sectarian bitterness displayed by certain Scotch papers, that the Duke of Argyll was moved to write to the bishop a remonstrance on the invasion of his private property," a want of courtesy which seems scarcely credible to those who have no personal acquaintance with the rancor which theological differences can occasion in Scotland. The bishop was not without other reminders that his very existence was an offence to some of his Presbyterian neighbors, who seem hardly to have realized that the Church in Scotland had obtained even mere toleration.

In journeying to Iona, Bishop Ewing made the acquaintance of the Rev. H. B. Wilson, of "Essays and Reviews" celebrity; and on the return voyage of the steamer the latter, forgetful or unaware at the time of the relation of the Episcopal Church of Scotland to the great majority of the population, stood up and proposed, at the crowded dinner-table, a toast that he was sure would be specially acceptable to all present, "The health of the Bishop of Argyll and the Isles." The English tourists on board were, of course, ready to drink the bishop's health; but the words of Mr. Wilson called forth from the Scottish passengers expressions and looks of utter astonishment, which for a brief space threatened to convert the dining-saloon into an arena of ecclesiastical controversy; but in the end the good-humor and good breeding of the majority of the voyagers prevailed (p. 141).

Besides this gentleman, whose zeal, it may perhaps be thought, outran, though very innocently and pardonably, his discretion, we find other well-known names with whom the bishop delighted to surround himself. Dean Stanley was an habitué of the new church at Oban; with Mr. Jowett the bishop maintained a close friendship; and his biographer relates how Dr. Sumner, the Bishop of Winchester, who had "come down to Oban rather disposed to regard the Church in Scotland as a very questionable daughter of the Reformation, with Laudian proclivities," went back with "an entirely new feeling of interest in the future of Episcopacy in Scotland," and ever thereafter maintained "a lifelong intimacy" with the "Highland chieftain," who was then the Bishop of Argyll. This we presume to be one of the examples of the biographer's historical imagination; for, let a man have the dialectical skill and the gift of tongue of a Crichton, he could hardly produce such wondrous effects in a ten minutes' conversation.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

It now, however, became abundantly clear that Bishop Ewing meant to take, or took without meaning, a line in the Scottish Church strictly analogous to that taken among ourselves by Dr. Stanley or Mr. Jowett. But, as the poet laureate says of another matter, he was

Not like in like, but like in difference.

He was broad enough in all conscience; but, as became his nationality, he was broad with unction. Other differences occur to us. His liberal views on religion were the outcome of far less culture and scholarship than those of his southern congeners, and, as a consequence, they were far less original. He took them up from time to time from one or another among more powerful thinkers; as, for example, Mr. Erskine, of Linlathen, of whom the bishop wrote in his impulsive way, and with a momentary forgetfulness of his usual good taste, "He is the man of God, indeed, and with reverence I may say of him that he takes away the sins of the world from all who have the happiness of knowing him," and to whom he wrote still more strongly: —

> Now as to your two letters, I cannot say what help and comfort they have been to me and others; for you know, my dear sir, I am but a medium for communicating your spirit rappings and sensations, a bank for issuing your notes. Stanley, Jowett, the Bishop of London, and the Bishop of Oxford (with the last of whom, en route here, I stayed three days last week), Miss Winkworth (who is here), and many others have read, and were all more or less benefited by them.
>
> It is a most charming place. I wish you were able to come, or I to go and see you. I owe you more, dear sir, than to any man alive: I owe you belief in God — in God as my and our true friend and Father.

Mr. Campbell of Row, Mr. F. H. Myers, the author of "Catholic Thoughts," may also be mentioned as sources from which he derived what was peculiar (which, after all, was not much) in his theology. So far as it was original, it appears to us to be the common-sense method of a mind rather receptive and intelligent than powerful, and for the most part ignorant of theology in the scientific sense. He did not, we fully believe, know what treasures of divine thought there are in the "queen of sciences," and would have been far more respectful to it had he known. He was so good a man, and so sincerely modest and deferential (as we have just seen) to those few men in whom he recognized the leaders of his mind, that it was a pity he allowed himself to adopt so violent a tone of partisanship, to use terms so disparaging and undignified in controversy as for example at the time of the Lambeth Conference; terms which stand now as an exception to his usual amiability and tolerance of disposition. His charge before his diocesan synod in 1860, also, belongs to this class of little-worthy utterances; indeed, the language which he uses in it about the catholic view of the holy communion,* calling it "an apparatus manipulated by a priestly caste, from contact with which alone eternal life was to be secured" (p. 304), and saying that, "according to the materialistic conception of the sacrament, the secret of Hamlet would be mastered by eating a bit of Shakespeare's body" (p. 305), seems to us simply horrible; and, considering the official character of the speaker, and the occasion upon which it was used, we cannot characterize it as it deserves without using strong language ourselves. His complete misunderstanding of the catholic doctrine is evident enough. And he had a feminine kind of way of jumping to conclusions which was also characteristic.

Going back for the present to the point we had reached before our digression, we find the next noticeable point in the bishop's career to be the Gorham decision in 1850 on baptism, and the action taken thereon. It is true that this "great liberating decision of the Privy Council," as the present biographer calls it, had no legal authority in the Church of Scotland, as the bishops took care immediately to make known. But the body of the Scottish clergy were laudably anxious that the doctrine of baptismal regeneration should not be compromised. The effect of the decision of the State was to make the question an open one in England, as far as the establishment was concerned. The Scottish clergy and most of the bishops were determined that it should not be so among them. A demonstration was immediately organized in support of the protest of Bishop Blomfield; and an agitation arose for a fresh definition of doctrine, which Bishop Ewing did his best to stem. He disliked, as we know, dogmatic "fetters"

* It was at the time of the Brechin and Cheyne trials for alleged unsound doctrine on this subject.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

each and all. In this case he had the further ground for opposition that any fresh doctrinal decision would "erect a fresh wall of partition between their own communion and that of the Church of England," which he held, not without reason, would be a "fatal blunder." For there can be no doubt whatever, that, if the Church of England has suffered grievously from its isolation, the Church of Scotland has very nearly died from the same cause; and that there is a real necessity that the smaller and the weaker community should seek in all respects, as far as is possible, to share the fortunes of its southern sister; and to recruit with the life-blood of a larger and richer organization the energies which unpropitious circumstances, and a poverty far from fully deserved, have sometimes caused to flag. And such a connection is almost as advantageous to England as to Scotland. Any step, therefore, which would have had the effect of hindering this intercommunion in the very smallest degree would have been a mistake; and it seems to us that their projected action would have been a mistake. It was eminently praiseworthy, and was prompted by the purest of motives; but it was a mistake all the same; and it was well, that, whether by Bishop Ewing or somebody else, it should be quietly shelved. Not that Bishop Ewing's plan of action seems to us in all respects admirable. His strategy was a little uncandid; and that he disliked the Aberdeen resolutions, although he gave his adhesion to them, is evident enough. His object, he says, was "to prevent a general synod, which would probably have undertaken to lay down some formula on baptism, which might have been the cause of severing our connection with the Church of England. To avert such a catastrophe, I went further than I had intended, as you will see; but I could not set myself in opposition to the words of our formularies, and the resolutions are almost entirely based upon them." Nor was there, if we are to take the following letter to his brother as representing a deliberate view of doctrine, any reason why he should so set himself in opposition: —

What I objected to in the Declaration was the Declaration itself; for I did not see that we were called upon to take any action whatever in the matter, and I do not think that we are affected by the Gorham decision. The Catholic Church has always held that some special benefit was attached to the due administration of the rite of baptism; and, so far, I am not prepared to dissent from the teaching of the Catholic Church, and take part with the Zuinglians (p. 175).

In short, he was altogether right here. Not so in the matter of the Scottish communion office, "the Dagon of a Scottish office" as he called it. In this case, strong dislike of the doctrine which the formulary was supposed to teach, combined with his wish to efface all marks of distinction between his own and the English Church, to make him its most bitter and persistent opponent; and we shall find him in later years making effort after effort to get rid of it.

At the present time his mind was full of another scheme, and one which could hardly have been entertained by any other bishop of the entire Anglican communion. This was nothing else than to settle himself in Turin as a bishop unattached, and supply episcopal ministrations to the non-Catholic Vaudois — or as he puts it in a letter to his brother: —

I think it not unlikely that a bishop representing the Church of England, and whose mission it would be to form a centre of unity for the descendants of the "slaughtered saints" among the Vaudois, and for others who are claiming liberty of faith in Sardinia, would be acceptable in Turin. . . . This position for a year or two would suit me delightfully (p. 227).

Strange as it may seem, this preposterous scheme was a pet project of his, and one which he made great efforts to carry out, going so far as even to make a public appeal for funds. But after endless correspondence, the plan fell through the hands even of Bishop Ewing and his friends. Cooler thinkers pointed out that the English population of Turin was at all times small and essentially fluctuating in character, that there was little probability of the Italian Protestants caring for episcopal ministrations, and a great probability that the Italian government would regard such a mission with marked jealousy and disfavor; if indeed they had not put a veto upon it altogether. In short, the thing would not do; this those persons who were in an authoritative position gave Bishop Ewing distinctly to understand, and its abandonment followed of course. It does not seem to have occurred to any one of those concerned, what an enormous and unprovoked breach of Church order and propriety it involved; for it would not have at all fallen under the shelter of the principle upon which the Gibraltar bish-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

opric was founded, upon British territory and for British subjects.*

It was not surprising, considering the views which Dr. Ewing † held, that this should not have occurred to him in the least; and as a matter of personal choice to be made by himself the scheme had much to recommend it. The climate of Scotland had been too severe for his always feeble and uncertain health. He "talked with Bishop Trower about going as a missionary bishop to foreign parts" (for which, with his feeble health, he was most unfit), in order to live in a milder climate. Then the pecuniary responsibilities of his diocese (from which he had all this time but 270*l.* a year of income) were too heavy for his means. So he writes to his brother, his constant and confidential correspondent: —

> I am almost afraid of my ability to carry on the work of this Argyll bishopric. The expenses are very heavy, and the continual journeying is as laborious as if I were a bishop in New Zealand. I have not as yet obtained the income arising from the endowment of the see, and I have had to sacrifice no inconsiderable amount of my capital. If this kind of expense goes on, in the event of my being called out of the world my children would be ill provided for. I have, therefore, been thinking of offering myself as a missionary bishop to our Church. Some years ago a proposal to send out such a missionary from the Scotch Church was mooted, but no definite action was taken in the matter. In fact, the project was reckoned premature. I have no doubt it would receive a more general support now, and might be carried through. I believe the Bishop of London would lend it all his influence, and our Church would give to the mission all she now contributes to the various missionary societies. Probably Australia or a Pacific island would be the spot or sphere chosen (p. 189).

However, all these various plans came to nothing; and at length he resolved to bear to the end the burden laid upon him in Scotland, and we hear thenceforth no more of projects for removal. But to the end of his life, we are told, so persistent is a fixed idea, he remained of opinion that in the Turin scheme a great opportunity had been missed.

We must pass over, without special notice, the bishop's efforts in furtherance of the Highland emigration fund, to relieve the widespread distress among the Highlanders, caused by the failure of the potato crop, and go on to give some slight sketch, so far as it is narrated here, of Bishop Ewing's connection with the college at Cumbrae, the munificent foundation of the noble family of Boyle. The Church in Scotland has sometimes been accused of "lairdism." But if the "lairds" were always willing to display a similar liberality to that shown during a long series of years, in the foundation and nurture of this college, the charge would become the highest title to honor of the laity of the Scottish Church; and specifically, the clergy would ere this have a less inadequate provision than the pittance which, in some dioceses, is to this day all they receive. As to Cumbrae, after being originally founded in 1849 by the present Lord Glasgow, then the Hon. G. F. Boyle, for the training of theological students to minister as clergy in the diocese of Argyll and the Isles only, it has gradually extended its scope until it is at the present time one of the two great feeders of a native ministry to the Scottish Church. To the same liberality it owes the imposing pile of collegiate buildings, of which the central portion is a noble cathedral church, occupying the island of the Little Cumbrae in the Frith of Clyde, which is some three miles long by two broad.

The objects of this foundation were of a pious and catholic kind, and the language of the statutes recalls those "ages of faith" with whose noble benefactions this institution may of right be classed. Its intention was to further "the worship and service of Almighty God, by daily prayer and frequent celebration of the holy communion." There was to be a provost and three to six canons, and, besides being a theological college, it was to be a centre for clergy to be habitually engaged in mission work somewhere in the diocese; and the bishop was to be provost. Accordingly this noble gift, with a suitable endowment, was made over by the founder to trustees, representing the diocese of Argyll and the Isles, and solemnly accepted by the synod which met at Lochgilphead in 1853, when a unanimous and well-deserved resolution of thanks was returned to the donor. The following year the bishop was himself installed as provost; and we find him writing to Lady Glasgow of "the ceremonies of the installation, the splendor of the evening services, and the solemnity of those of the next day. . . . Our services in church and

* "One of the Oxford authorities, while warning him against 'the Waldensian heresy,' said, greatly to his surprise, 'You are surely far more needed in your own country, to proclaim there the Church's great message of the redemption of all mankind by Christ'" (p. 235).

† We ought to have mentioned that he had received the honorary degree of D.C.L. from the University of Oxford in 1851.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd meetings for various purposes are really doing us all good."

But these bright anticipations were too soon overclouded. The ritual and service at Cumbrae fell under what was, we have no doubt, very unmerited suspicion. The bishop began to "feel a difficulty in being officially connected with an institution which was generally regarded with extreme suspicion as a seminary established for the diffusion of anti-Reformation principles" (as they were then understood, it may be, in Scotland). In 1858, when the declaration on the eucharist was causing wide-spread strife throughout the Scottish Church, we find the bishop observing that it was "hot at Cumbrae." In fact, in the 1860 synod of Argyll and the Isles, Mr. Cheyne's case was brought forward by Mr. Cazenove, Mr. Keigwin, and Mr. Mapleton, the first two being canons of Cumbrae, which thus espoused the condemned eucharistic doctrine. An English visitor, a clergyman, observes on this: —

> Whether Cumbrae, with the tone of mind prevailing there, is a benefit to your brother's diocese, seems to me a question. Whether Episcopalians there look to their Church as a means of sustaining their inner life, or whether they regard their ritual only as the expression of a high-caste religion, seems to me also a question. My complete ignorance of course suggests these questions; and I speak of them only as questions, and not as convictions. Mr. Boyle himself, beyond a doubt, looks to his Church in its best and highest sense (p. 307).

There was undoubtedly a wide divergence of opinion from the first, and it grew wider as years went on. The bishop was altogether out of harmony, not only with the authorities at Cumbrae, and with the religious and catholic tone which the founder had with sedulous care impressed upon the place, but with the entire body of clerical opinion throughout the Scottish Church. And so, after holding the provostship for thirteen years, though his connection with the college was not much more than nominal, it was felt by him too irksome to be borne, and he severed it. We are anticipating somewhat the course of events; but we shall complete our view of this episode in the bishop's career if we insert here the letter, dated 1866, in which the bishop expressed to the founder his resignation of the office of provost: —

> The fact of my having, in all probability, to be abroad for the next three or four months, induces me to come to a conclusion on a subject which I have long had on my mind, and which I feel ought no longer to be delayed — my resignation of the office of provost of the college. I need not say with what regret I have formed this resolution, but I feel that it is due both to you and to myself. I am of no active benefit to the college, and I feel that my spirit is not in unison with that which is most precious to you. You may feel quite sure that this resignation which I now make is prompted by no greater divergence on matters of opinion than that which existed between us from the first. My acceptance of the office was prompted by the difficulty which existed at the time of finding a suitable head; that difficulty does not now exist. No one, I conceive, could be found more suited for the post than your present excellent vice-provost, Mr. Cazenove, who has had so long experience of the work. In severing my nominal connection with the college, I hope I do not sever any real bonds between us. Believe me, I shall ever retain for you and yours a feeling of the deepest honor and friendship (p. 457).

It should not, however, be imagined that the bishop's personal relations with the staff of the college were other than most kind and cordial throughout. The personal winningness and amiability which were remarkably characteristic of Bishop Ewing prevented the theological divergence ever hardening into a rupture of friendliness. And he more than once withstood attacks made by others upon the institution. And when (we have been told) an alteration of the canons of the Scottish Church appeared to discountenance the use of the simple vestments which had always been worn at Cumbrae, the bishop, far from taking advantage of this to urge their discontinuance, said that he did not read so the new canon, and would be sorry to see the vestments discontinued.

When he had divested himself of responsibility for the college his kindly interest increased. He was in the habit of attending, whenever he could, the meetings of chapter; and it was, we are told, "the dearest wish of his heart to see the collegiate church raised to the position of cathedral of the Isles; and on the last occasion when he was present in chapter, he expressed himself strongly on this head. Owing to the peculiar circumstances of the college at that time, he was unable to see his wish realized, but the difficulties having at length been removed, one of the first steps taken by his successor was to carry out his wishes in this respect."

In 1856 Mrs. Ewing died; and the bishop, a man who was always, as we have seen, particularly home-loving and affectionate, was heart-broken. His letters at

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

this time, though inexpressibly touching, breathe an utter depression and complete abandonment to sorrow, too absolute, we may say, or at all events very unusual for a man. He says himself in one of his letters, "No man understands me — I fear I was intended to be feminine!" He felt acutely the deprivation of a helper the strength of whose character seems to have made up what was wanting in his own; and some of the letters are so unreserved in their expressions of feeling, that we almost doubt whether they should have been printed. A sorrow, so full and overshadowing, so almost bitter at times (p. 271), would naturally be peculiarly open to the beneficent influences of time. He grew calmer and more resigned after some years, and in 1862 he married, for the second time, Lady Alice Douglas, daughter of the Earl of Morton.

Meanwhile his work went on; and he was brought face to face with that subject which had already been, and continued still more to be, one of the great preoccupations of his life, — the doctrine of the eucharist and the Scotch communion office; for 1857 had seen the issue by Bishop Forbes of his famous charge on the doctrine of the eucharist, which at once "alarmed the Protestant feelings of many, both of the clergy and laity," and was freely stigmatized as "Romanizing and materialistic" — terms of opprobrium, whose meaning it may be fairly questioned whether many of those who used them understood. An episcopal declaration which Bishop Ewing, after some hesitation, signed, condemning the Bishop of Brechin's views, proved insufficient to calm the storm; and a formal trial for unsound doctrine was resolved on.

The bishop's hesitation arose partly from his dislike to new "definitions on the eucharist," and partly because he thought a more drastic measure was needful — the disuse of the Scotch office. He had long disliked it as "Laudian," and as an obstacle to "identification in all points with the Church of England." In his own diocese, he had, as far as he could, put an end to its use; and he would fain have done so universally. Now the time seemed favorable for an attempt. So he went into print with his "letter to the primus," which he followed up by a motion (in the synod that condemned Bishop Forbes) to depose the office from its position among the formularies of the Church; but even here he had not one supporter. Then came on the charge against Mr. Cheyne, and by this time Bishop Ewing was himself senior bishop,* and presided at Mr. Cheyne's trial, though without voting or taking any active part in the proceedings.

In fact, he could not have spoken at all without seeming to affront the right reverend brethren by whom he was surrounded, for while agreeing with the majority of them in their beliefs as to the symbolic significance of the holy communion, and while he could not regard with indifference the blundering materialism of Mr. Cheyne, he deprecated from his inmost heart all doctrinal persecutions. He shrank from "definitions of the undefinable," and, in the present instance, his rooted conviction was that the prosecution struck the wrong object. The sentence of indefinite suspension was pronounced by the synod against Mr. Cheyne, but Bishop Ewing could not record his vote in favor of "a judgment involving penal consequences" (p. 285).

"Mr. Keble," he writes immediately afterwards, "was at the trial, and left today in very low spirits. We all thought Mr. Henderson too much for the Bishop of Brechin. As to the judgment itself, I should be prepared to move that we should not deliver any penal sentence, and chiefly on the ground of our sanctioning the use of an office for the holy communion which teaches we know not what. So long as that is used, similar troubles must and will arise." He expressed sentiments strongly resembling this, besides entering fully in his usual a priori way into the doctrinal aspect of the question in his charge this year (1860). For this he was (justly as we think) exposed to the reprehension of his brother bishops, one of whom told him that "he deserved a presentment."

The two following years were marked chiefly by the institution in London of an Argyll episcopal fund, which was very successful. By its success, the bishop was reimbursed some part of the great pecuniary advances he had made for his diocese, and may be said to have been freed from anxiety upon the subject for the future.

In 1862 and 1863 the Scottish Church was again convulsed with the question of the abolition of the Scottish office, on which two successive meetings of synod voted with varying results, the more decided course of entire abolition from the service of the Church not proving to be sustained by the feeling of the various diocesan synods, to whom, in accordance, we believe, with the constitution of the Scottish Church, it was submitted in the

* The primus was just at this time laid aside by a stroke of paralysis.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

interim. Bishop Ewing was, of course, in the forefront of the abolition party. It was one of the great questions which he had made his own all through his career. But his success was only partial, notwithstanding that he had a great body of lay opinion at his back, and that a gradual modification of view had been proceeding among the bishops themselves. The upper house in the Scottish Church is so small (only six bishops sat on this occasion), that when opinions are evenly balanced, a defection of one vote from either side decides a question; and that was precisely the issue on this occasion. A compromise, therefore, was arrived at, by which the English prayer-book was to be ordinarily and generally used; but that each new congregation might elect to use either the Scottish or the English office in the holy communion. The bishop called this "a great victory for the Scottish-office party," which it certainly was not, unless it be a victory to avoid entire defeat; and looking to the circumstances of the case, we cannot but regard this compromise (which is still in force, and forms the rule of the Church) as a wise and statesmanlike course. So one of Bishop Ewing's great objects was at length partially attained; and although he protested, "This synod has thrown back our Church twenty years. We have, I fear, done a very foolish or a very wrong thing. There was no feeling for the Scotch office until the last fifteen years. It is altogether a Tractarian galvanizement;" yet he was well contented to let the matter rest, and have an end of it so far as he was concerned. In truth he saw and said that there was "nothing else for him to do." The matter had been fought out to the end, and there was no more to be said.

The "Essays and Reviews" controversy was to the bishop as a storm looked upon from a safe distance, and it does not appear to have extended at all to the Scottish Church. We find abundant evidence in his letters, however, that he viewed it with the keenest interest. "I would," he says, when writing to Bishop Tait, "be a Liberal as to the future, a Conservative as to the past, i.e., tolerate Wilson and ask Stanley to leave the standards alone." On this latter point he is emphatic; and there is a striking letter from him to the same prelate on the subject which is worth transcribing in part: —

I am not, and I have not been, ever satisfied that much can be done at present in the way of alterations of subscriptions or standards. The questions now at issue are beyond solution by small amendments, and great ones none of us are prepared to make. I think that when such questions are in the field as "Has God indeed spoken, and to what extent?" any move which does not relate to them is, in military language, changing our front in face of the enemy — an operation of great hazard. I do not think, moreover, that any great number of men whom it is desirable to satisfy would be satisfied by such alterations as we are prepared to make, and the others are not worthy of much consideration — not so much, at least, as removing landmarks for their sakes. I am, on the whole, inclined myself at present to an attitude of simple conservatism, believing that the only difficulties really pressing are not those which alteration of standards or subscriptions would satisfy. My own opinion is, that standards go a very little way towards the formation or maintenance of belief, and that this is pretty much formed and held apart from standards and is untouched by them, people throwing them off, perhaps, with violence when they oppress the conscience by their sanction of visible evils, as at the time of the Reformation; but when they do not, sitting quietly under them, as if unconscious of them, or signing them merely as conventionalities. If the clergy could agree by memorial to their bishop upon what they would like done, I would gladly go along with them. I doubt if it is wise to go ahead of them, except in matters of faith. I look upon standards as a sort of property, which, without their own consent, I would not take from the clergy. Let us seek to alter opinion rather than change the standards. These must be changed (or will be) so soon as opinion is really formed and pressing. I doubt very much if it is so yet. I am sure that it is not so as to what changes are desirable (p. 358).

The question especially of future punishment was of intense interest to him, and he had strong views on the subject, which we find expressed in various letters à propos of the Wilson and Colenso cases. "I think," he writes to his brother, "that the Bishop of Capetown has weakened his case by introducing so many counts in his indictment against Colenso; for by so doing he has censured views, that on future punishment among the number, on which Colenso has sympathizers." And in the same letter: . . . "Observe that Colenso was only killed on the head of every man, by Capetown firing off the creed of St. Athanasius. Do not you fire that Mons Meg. It is a barbarous old piece, honeycombed, rusty, more dangerous to friends than foes." To Bishop Wordsworth (of St. Andrew's), he says, "I am against altering the standards, save St. Athanasius!"

To Bishop Tait again: "Evil has noth-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ing divine in it, and must end." Such utterances show clearly enough in what direction his sympathies were tending, and what he would have called his doctrinal position was. Yet there is a pregnant utterance in a (somewhat questionable) letter to his brother some time before: —

> One sentence, however, before I close, on "eternal judgment." That expression, as I conceive, simply means that we are always under unchanging laws. It reminds us that God is always judging us, or rewarding us, "according to our works," ordaining for us that that which we sow we shall also reap. But whereas it is said that "after death is the judgment," I can only understand the words as conveying to us the intimation that the righteous judgments of God which are now always taking place, but which we do not always recognize, will at last be made manifest to the heart and conscience (p. 319).

Such utterances were the intuitions of the man, and show the manner of his inmost thought. But they do not seem to have been got by any deliberate reasoning process. They are utterly arbitrary and a priori in character. Cogito — not ergo sum, but "Cogito ergo credo." Owing, it may be to the somewhat slender outfit of theological knowledge upon which we have remarked before, the bishop was thrown back more than was good for himself or others upon this method; and a very dangerous method it is for most men. Thus it was that his treatment of most questions, broadest of liberalizing Churchmen though he was, was wanting in the breadth which a fuller study would have given to him. It proceeds invariably upon a single line of more or less valid inference, which was always liable to be upset by the fact that he was dealing with one face of the question only, and that fuller knowledge would probably modify the premises which he took for granted.

In 1864, he sojourned at Ems, and afterwards at Palermo and various Italian towns. From Sion, in the Valais, he writes to the Bishop of London, à propos, we suppose, of the movement for a new court of ecclesiastical appeal: —

> But now of Dr. Pusey and this movement, of which I see a lengthened account in the Guardian just sent me. He cannot do much harm, there is so much good in him; but the Church of England would surely have been on the wrong tack (and he knows it), in a catholic sense, if she had defined in the Gorham case, or any of those matters left undecided by the Privy Council. Dr. Pusey seems to think there is no belief if there is not definition of everything seen in the mount, even to the scarlet and blue edgings. In this age, when the conveyance of property is simplified, property is as much property as before. He is a religious botanist, with a large hortus siccus, and long dry names. Nevertheless, the poor and ignorant are saved, and although England may be hazy as to the Monophysite question, I think the mass of the English people are in a healthier state of mind than Dr. Newman (p. 387).

We may say once for all, about Bishop Ewing's letters, that they are among the most charming letters we have ever read — clear, pleasant, and with a bright, lively touch for persons and things, which he puts not seldom in a new point of view. The writing of letters was a very congenial occupation to him, as the great number of them inserted in this memoir proves; and it suited the light artillery of his mental equipment better than labored disquisitions. A curious incident is recounted as having happened to him on this tour: —

> At Bologna there was a service in the hotel, and the bishop came down to be among the worshippers. The service began by the officiating minister giving out a hymn, and then asking if there was any one among the congregation who could "raise the tune." As no one volunteered, Dr. Ewing himself led the music. It was not until the service was over that the bishop discovered that he for the nonce had been "precentor" to a Wesleyan preacher (p. 387).

We find in these later years the bishop's aversion to dogma stronger than ever, and now we observe with regret some want of that kindliness of temper always observable in earlier years. He refused to concur in the approval expressed by the other Scottish bishops, of the sentence on Bishop Colenso. "Can I join in an excommunication," he writes, "because a man will not say that six times six is thirty-seven? Can excommunication alter a matter of fact?" and so on; which is painful to read. Against Bishop Gray, his cry was law, law, law: the law of the Church of England as a State establishment; and he looks no higher. One would suppose from his letters at this period, and on this subject, that he had never heard of the Church Catholic, or that he supposed it to have no existence out of England, or that it had no laws of its own. The Erastianism which had so got hold of him by this time is unintentionally illustrated by a passage in one of his letters to the Bishop of London, after the latter's serious illness: —

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Pray, my dear bishop and brother, keep yourself for these things. Any one can do your ordinations and confirmations, and other such business, but no one can take your place at the Privy Council, or in Parliament, or in Convocation. Pray tide over the summer anywhere out of London, and come and spend the winter with me in Italy. I am quite serious. All your other work is nothing to that which you can do, and you only, in the Privy Council in the years to come (p. 447).

Our readers will perhaps wonder that they have heard so little of Bishop Ewing's performance of similar duties to those he thus relegated to the second place; or of the administration of his diocese, and the progress of his people. But the fact is that we hear little of them after the first years of organization, of keen energy and interest, and that they apparently ceased to be the chief business of his life. His diocesan synod consisted of twelve clergy, as far as we can gather; and his "charges" were manifestoes, for the most part, to the world without, and not to the "few sheep in the wilderness" within his pale.

With a few words on the description given here of the Pan-Anglican Conference, and of Bishop Ewing's attitude towards it, we must bring this review of his life to a conclusion.

What is said of the former must be considered to be the biographer's work; and it could not well be worse in taste and temper than it is. The one aim of the writer appears to be to belittle the Conference itself, and especially the colonial and foreign bishops, to deny their statements, to ridicule their pretensions, and to represent the entire meeting as "a conspiracy against Protestantism in the interests of sacerdotal dictation." Of such words and of such a temper we cannot approve. Nor is Bishop Ewing's own language better. It needs hardly to be said that he was in the Extreme Left all through; he was averse to the action attempted to be taken about the bishopric of Natal; he fully approved of the inexcusably discourteous refusal of Westminster Abbey for the closing service. But we had better quote entire what is represented to be the record of a conversation held between the bishop and some unnamed interlocutor immediately after the closing, which will speak for itself: —

"What," said the interrogator, "is your main feeling after the Conference?" "Relief, relief, relief." — "Was there any sense of solemnity at any part of the proceedings?" "Only the solemnity of being on board a ship that might blow up at any moment." — "Any possibility of thinking that it was an assembly in which the Spirit of God was at work?" "That depended on where I sat. When I was with the Bishop of Chester (Jacobson), yes; but when near, etc., etc., quite the reverse." — "What was your impression at the conversazione?" "It was like a scene from 'Hypatia.'" — "What is the worst thing that has been done?" "That the meeting has taken place at all. You will never get rid of it. They will always be clinging to it. They know that they have got fifty-six names which they can append to any document that they choose." — "What do you think of the pastoral letter?" "It is words, words, words, and nothing else. It was written by the Bishop of Oxford (Wilberforce), and very much shortened and cut down by the others. The Bishop of Winchester (Sumner), by one clean sweep, took out the whole viscera of a sentence in the Declaration on the Councils, and remained the hero of the field on the first day. We fought through it paragraph by paragraph, and by that evening reached the word primitive. Then the Bishop of Oxford proposed that the remainder of the sentence should be referred to a committee, which endeavored on the next day to undo what had been done on the day before, but they were beaten." — "Great havoc made on the second and third days on the schemes for establishing ecclesiastical tribunals?" "A splendid speech from the Bishop of London (Tait), knocking them all to pieces. The metropolitans were kept down by a masterly argument of Bishop Harold Browne. . . . The Natal question was brought on at the very last moment by a kind of ruse. . . . One or two comical things took place. On the 28th, at Lambeth Church, the first lesson was Tobit ii. None of the American bishops would read it, so the Bishop of Lincoln (Jackson) did" (p. 481).

I am not sorry that the battle of the Establishment (in re Colenso) was dropped. It never could have been fought on worse ground. For, consciously or unconsciously, the Bible was felt to be the question at stake, and all the Evangelicals, etc., were to a man with the priestly party. Had not Dr. Pusey, by a strange infatuation, thrown over the Americans by his tract on the Scandinavian admission first, before the meeting at Lambeth (in which he sneered at the American Church as a whole), they also would as one man have joined the metropolitans! Happily the Americans' amour propre made them hang in the wind (p. 485).

After the Conference had separated, he wrote an article upon it, containing even stronger language, which several magazines declined to publish, and which its author at length put forth at his own expense in pamphlet form.

From this time his activity of mind took for the most part a literary direction. The "Present-Day Papers" which the bishop himself projected, and to which he contributed no less than eleven papers, besides editing the whole, served as the outlet for many of his most cherished ideas; and the series ran to three volumes before it was discontinued. There is much in these volumes that is admirable; and while they exhibit the characteristic faults of the writer's mode of thought, it would be unjust not to acknowledge that they show also much earnestness of thought, considerable charm of style, and an increased degree of spiritual insight. Thought is the best of educations; and Dr. Ewing had now been a thinker for many years.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

At this point, however (1871), we must bring to an end our long scrutiny of this interesting life; a life which, however we may lament some incidents of it, was one of high aims, pure affections, and blameless tenor, not unworthy of a Christian bishop. Bishop Ewing passed away in 1873.

We are by no means certain that it is needful to say anything more by way of pointing the moral of his career. That he had many winning and lovable qualities as a man, is perfectly clear; and we have already pointed out the unselfishness and generosity with which he discharged the duties of his office. But the episcopate is not a mere matter of routine to be worked by (as it were) turning a crank. It requires a clear, undoubting belief in the spiritual powers of the office, and a strong and straightforward purpose, in order that the episcopate may convey its full weight, and do the entire work for which it is intended. How far the subject of the present memoir came up to these requirements, we must leave it to our readers to determine.

Another point that occurs to us is, the demoralizing tendency of ecclesiastical controversy, and that Bishop Ewing's career exemplifies it. Too often, it is to be feared, the haute politique of parties calls to its aid passions and tempers the very reverse of spiritual; and we cannot but think that the hard, partisan tone of the bishop's letters and public utterances in the later years of his life, so unlike the sweet persuasiveness of his earlier years, shows that this influence had told upon him for evil. He is not the first — we fear he will not be the last — to whom "our unhappy divisions" have done harm. History repeats itself; and the embittered party spirit and mutual repulsion which are caused by the wide divergence of belief, and still more of speculation, among us in this age recall nothing so forcibly as the factions of the Lower Empire, and the bitter comment of St. Gregory Nazianzen.

[Published by arrangement with HARPER & BROTHERS.]

MACLEOD OF DARE.

BY WILLIAM BLACK.

CHAPTER XII.

WHITE HEATHER.

AND now behold! the red flag flying from the summit of Castle Dare — a spot of brilliant color in this world of whirling mist and flashing sunlight. For there is half a gale blowing in from the Atlantic, and gusty clouds come sweeping over the islands, so that now the Dutchman, and now Fladda, and now Ulva disappears from sight, and then emerges into the sunlight again, dripping and shining after the bath, while ever and anon the huge promontory of Ru-Treshanish shows a gloomy purple far in the north. But the wind and weather may do what they like to-day; for has not the word just come down from the hill that the smoke of the steamer has been made out in the south? and old Hamish is flying this way and that, fairly at his wits' end with excitement; and Janet Macleod has cast a last look at the decorations of heather and juniper in the great hall; while Lady Macleod, dressed in the most stately fashion, has declared that she is as able as the youngest of them to walk down to the point to welcome home her son.

"Ay, your leddyship, it is very bad," complains the distracted Hamish, "that it will be so rough a day this day, and Sir Keith not to come ashore in his own gig, but in a fishing-boat, and to come ashore at the fishing quay, too; but it is his own men will go out for him, and not the fishermen at all, though I am sure they will hef a dram whatever when Sir Keith comes ashore. And will you not tek the pony, your leddyship? for it is a long road to the quay."

"No, I will not take the pony, Hamish," said the tall, white-haired dame, "and it is not of much consequence what boat Sir Keith has, so long as he comes back to us. And now I think you had better go down to the quay yourself, and see that the cart is waiting and the boat ready."

But how could old Hamish go down to the quay? He was in his own person skipper, head keeper, steward, butler, and general major-domo, and ought on such a day as this to have been in half a dozen places at once. From the earliest morning he had been hurrying hither and thither, in his impatience making use of much voluble Gaelic. He had seen the yacht's crew in their new jerseys. He had been round the kennels. He had got out a couple of bottles of the best claret that Castle Dare could afford. He had his master's letters arranged on the library table, and had given a final rub to the guns and rifles on the rack. He had even been down to the quay, swearing at the salmon-fishers for having so much lumber lying about the place where Sir Keith Macleod was to land. And if he was to go down to the quay now, how could he be sure that the ancient Christina, who was mistress of the kitchen as far as her husband Hamish would allow her to be, would remember all his instructions? And then the little granddaughter Christina — would she remember her part in the ceremony?

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

However, as Hamish could not be in six places at once, he decided to obey his mistress's directions, and went hurriedly off to the quay, overtaking on his way Donald the piper lad, who was apparelled in all his professional finery.

"And if ever you put wind in your pipes, you will put wind in your pipes this day, Donald," said he to the red-haired lad. "And I will tell you now what you will play when you come ashore from the steamer: it is 'The Farewell to Chubraltar' you will play."

"'The Farewell to Gibraltar'!" said Donald peevishly, for he was bound in honor to let no man interfere with his proper business. "It is a better march than that I will play, Hamish. It is 'The Heights of Alma,' that was made by Mr. Ross, the queen's own piper; and will you tell me that 'The Heights of Alma' is not a better march than 'The Farewell to Gibraltar'?"

Hamish pretended to pay no heed to this impertinent boy. His eye was fixed on a distant black speck that was becoming more and more pronounced out there amid the grays and greens of the windy and sunlit sea. Occasionally it disappeared altogether, as a cloud of rain swept across toward the giant cliffs of Mull, and then again it would appear, sharper and blacker than ever, while the masts and funnel were now visible as well as the hull. When Donald and his companion got down to the quay, they found the men already in the big boat, getting ready to hoist the huge brown lug-sail; and there was a good deal of laughing and talking going on, perhaps in anticipation of the dram they were sure to get when their master returned to Castle Dare. Donald jumped down on the rude stone ballast, and made his way up to the bow; Hamish, who remained on shore, helped to shove her off; then the heavy lug-sail was quickly hoisted, the sheet hauled tight; and presently the broad-beamed boat was ploughing its way through the rushing seas, with an occasional cloud of spray coming right over her from stem to stern. "Fhir a bhata," the men sung, until Donald struck in with his pipes, and the wild skirl of "The Barren Rocks of Aden" was a fitter sort of music to go with those sweeping winds and plunging seas.

And now we will board the steamer, where Keith Macleod is up on the bridge, occasionally using a glass, and again talking to the captain, who is beside him. First of all on board he had caught sight of the red flag floating over Castle Dare; and his heart had leaped up at that sign of welcome. Then he could make out the dark figures on the quay, the hoisting of the lug-sail, and the putting off of the boat. It was not a good day for observing things; for heavy clouds were quickly passing over, followed by bewildering gleams of a sort of watery sunlight; but as it happened one of these sudden flashes chanced to light up a small plateau on the side of the hill above the quay, just as the glass was directed on that point. Surely — surely — these two figures?

"Why, it is the mother — and Janet!" he cried.

He hastily gave the glass to his companion.

"Look!" said he. "Don't you think that is Lady Macleod and my cousin? What could have tempted the old lady to come away down there on such a squally day?"

"Oh yes, I think it is the ladies," said the captain; and then he added, with a friendly smile, "and I think it is to see you all the sooner, Sir Keith, that they have come down to the shore."

"Then," said he, "I must go down and get my gillie, and show him his future home."

He went below the hurricane deck to a corner in which Oscar was chained up. Beside the dog, sitting on a camp-stool, and wrapped round with a tartan plaid, was the person whom Macleod had doubtless referred to as his gillie. He was not a distinguished-looking attendant to be travelling with a Highland chieftain.

"Johnny, my man, come on deck now, and I will show you where you are going to live. You're all right now, aren't you? And you will be on the solid land again in about ten minutes."

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Macleod's gillie rose — or rather, got down — from the camp-stool, and showed himself to be a miserable, emaciated child of ten or eleven, with a perfectly colorless face, frightened gray eyes, and starved white hands. The contrast between the bronzed and bearded sailors — who were now hurrying about to receive the boat from Dare — and this pallid and shrunken scrap of humanity was striking; and when Macleod took his hand, and half led and half carried him up on deck, the look of terror that he directed on the plunging waters all around showed that he had not had much experience of the sea. Involuntarily he had grasped hold of Macleod's coat as if for protection.

"Now, Johnny, look right ahead. Do you see the big house on the cliffs over yonder?"

The child, still clinging on to his protector, looked all round with the dull, pale eyes, and at length said,—

"No."

"Can't you see that house, poor chap? Well, do you see that boat over there? You must be able to see that."

"Yes, sir."

"That boat is to take you ashore. You needn't be afraid. If you don't like to look at the sea, get down into the bottom of the boat, and take Oscar with you, and you'll see nothing until you are ashore. Do you understand?"

"Yes, sir."

"Come along, then."

For now the wild skirl of Donald's pipes was plainly audible; and the various packages — the new rifle, the wooden case containing the wonderful dresses for Lady Macleod and her niece, and what not — were all ranged ready; to say nothing of some loaves of white bread that the steward was sending ashore at Hamish's request. And then the heaving boat came close to her, her sail hauled down; and a rope was thrown and caught; and then there was a hazardous scrambling down the dripping iron steps, and a notable spring on the part of Oscar, who had escaped from the hands of the sailors. As for the new gillie, he resembled nothing so much as a limp bunch of clothes, as Macleod's men, wondering not a little, caught him up and passed him astern. Then the rope was thrown off, the steamer steamed slowly ahead, the lug-sail was run up again, and away the boat plunged for the shore, with Donald playing "The Heights of Alma" as though he would rend the skies.

"Hold your noise, Donald!" his master called to him. "You will have plenty of time to play the pipes in the evening."

For he was greatly delighted to be among his own people again; and he was eager in his questions of the men as to all that had happened in his absence; and it was no small thing to them that Sir Keith Macleod should remember their affairs, too, and ask after their families and friends. Donald's loyalty was stronger than his professional pride. He was not offended that he had been silenced; he only bottled up his musical fervor all the more; and at length, as he neared the land, and knew that Lady Macleod and Miss Macleod were within hearing, he took it that he knew better than any one else what was proper to the occasion, and once more the proud and stirring march strove with the sound of the hurrying waves. Nor was that all. The piper lad was doing his best. Never before had he put such fire into his work; but as they got close inshore the joy in his heart got altogether the mastery of him, and away he broke into the mad delight of "Lady Mary Ramsay's Reel." Hamish on the quay heard, and he strutted about as if he were himself playing, and that before the queen. And then he heard another sound — that of Macleod's voice.

"Stand by, lads! . . . Down with her!" — and the flapping sail, with its swinging gaff, rattled down into the boat. At the same moment Oscar made a clean spring into the water, gained the landing-steps, and dashed upward — dripping as he was — to two ladies who were standing on the quay above. And Janet Macleod so far forgot what was due to her best gown that she caught his head in her arms, as he pawed and whined with delight.

That was a glad enough party that started off and up the hillside for Castle Dare. Janet Macleod did not care to conceal that she had been crying a little bit; and there were proud tears in the eyes of the stately old dame who walked with her; but the most excited of all was Hamish, who could by no means be got to understand that his master did not all at once want to hear about the trial of the young setters, and the price of the sheep sold the week before at Tobermory, and the stag that was chased by the Carsaig men on Tuesday.

"Confound it, Hamish," Macleod said, laughing, "leave all those things till after dinner."

"Oh ay, oh ay, Sir Keith, we will hef plenty of time after dinner," said Hamish, just as if he were one of the party, but very nervously working with the ends of his thumbs all the time, "and I will tell

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

you of the fine big stag that has been coming down every night — every night, as I am a living man — to Mrs. Murdoch's corn; and I wass saying to her, 'Just hold your tongue, Mrs. Murdoch' — that wass what I will say to her — 'just hold your tongue, Mrs. Murdoch, and be a civil woman, for a day or two days, and when Sir Keith comes home it iss no more at all the stag will trouble you — oh no, no more at all; there will be no more trouble about the stag when Sir Keith comes home.'"

And old Hamish laughed at his own wit, but it was in a sort of excited way.

"Look here, Hamish, I want you to do this for me," Macleod said; and instantly the face of the old man — it was a fine face, too, with its aquiline nose, and grizzled hair, and keen hawk-like eyes — was full of an eager attention. "Go back and fetch that little boy I left with Donald. You had better look after him yourself. I don't think any water came over him; but give him dry clothes if he is wet at all. And feed him up: the little beggar will take a lot of fattening without any harm."

"Where is he to go to?" said Hamish doubtfully.

"You are to make a keeper of him. When you have fattened him up a bit, teach him to feed the dogs. When he gets bigger, he can clean the guns."

"I will let no man or boy clean the guns for you but myself, Sir Keith," the old man said, quite simply, and without a shadow of disrespect. "I will hef no risk of the kind."

"Very well, then; but go and get the boy, and make him at home as much as you can. Feed him up."

"Who is it, Keith," his cousin said, "that you are speaking of as if he was a sheep or a calf?"

"Faith," said he, laughing, "if the philanthropists heard of it, they would prosecute me for slave-stealing. I bought the boy — for a sovereign."

"I think you have made a bad bargain, Keith," his mother said; but she was quite prepared to hear of some absurd whim of his.

"Well," said he, "I was going into Trafalgar Square, where the National Gallery of pictures is, mother, and there is a cab-stand in the street, and there was a cabman standing there, munching at a lump of dry bread that he cut with a jack-knife. I never saw a cabman do that before; I should have been less surprised if he had been having a chicken and a bottle of port. However, in front of this big cabman this little chap I have brought with me was standing; quite in rags; no shoes on his feet, no cap on his wild hair; and he was looking fixedly at the big lump of bread. I never saw any animal look so starved and so hungry; his eyes were quite glazed with the fascination of seeing the man ploughing away at this lump of loaf. And I never saw any child so thin. His hands were like the claws of a bird; and his trousers were short and torn so that you could see his legs were like two pipe-stems. At last the cabman saw him. 'Get out o' the way,' says he. The little chap slunk off, frightened, I suppose. Then the man changed his mind. 'Come here,' says he. But the little chap was frightened, and wouldn't come back; so he went after him, and thrust the loaf into his hand, and bade him be off. I can tell you the way he went into that loaf was very fine to see. It was like a weasel at the neck of a rabbit. It was like an otter at the back of a salmon. And that was how I made his acquaintance," Macleod added carelessly.

"But you have not told us why you brought him up here," his mother said.

"Oh," said he, with a sort of laugh, "I was looking at him, and I wondered whether Highland mutton and Highland air would make any difference in the wretched little skeleton; and so I made his acquaintance. I went home with him to a fearful place — I have got the address, but I did not know there were such quarters in London — and I saw his mother. The poor woman was very ill, and she had a lot of children; and she seemed quite glad when I offered to take this one and make a herd or a gamekeeper of him. I promised he should go to visit her once a year, that she might see whether there was any difference. And I gave her a sovereign."

"You were quite right, Keith," his cousin said gravely; "you run a great risk. Do they hang slavers?"

"Mother," said he, for by this time the ladies were standing still, so that Hamish and the new gillie should overtake them, "you mustn't laugh at the little chap when you see him with the plaid taken off. The fact is, I took him to a shop in the neighborhood to get some clothes for him, but I couldn't get anything small enough. He does look ridiculous; but you mustn't laugh at him, for he is like a girl for sensitiveness. But when he has been fed up a bit, and got some Highland air into his lungs, his own mother won't know him. And you will get him some other clothes, Janet — some kilts, maybe — when his legs get stronger."

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Whatever Keith Macleod did was sure to be right in his mother's eyes; and she only said, with a laugh, —

"Well, Keith, you are not like your brothers. When they brought me home presents, it was pretty things; but all your curiosities, wherever you go, are the halt and the lame and the blind, so that the people laugh at you, and say that Castle Dare is becoming the hospital of Mull."

"Mother, I don't care what the people say."

"And indeed I know that," she answered.

Their waiting had allowed Hamish and the new gillie to overtake them, and certainly the latter — deprived of his plaid — presented a sufficiently ridiculous appearance in the trousers and jacket that were obviously too big for him. But neither Lady Macleod nor Janet laughed at all when they saw this starved London waif before them.

"Johnny," said Macleod, "here are two ladies who will be very kind to you, so you needn't be afraid to live here."

But Johnny did look mortally afraid, and instinctively once more took hold of Macleod's coat. Then he seemed to have some notion of his duty. He drew back one foot and made a sort of curtsy. Probably he had seen girls do this, in mock-heroic fashion, in some London court.

"And are you very tired?" said Janet Macleod, in that soft voice of hers that all children loved.

"Yes," said the child.

"Kott bless me," cried Hamish, "I did not know that!" — and therewith the old man caught up Johnny Wickes as if he had been a bit of ribbon, and flung him on to his shoulder, and marched off to Castle Dare.

Then the three Macleods continued on their way — through the damp-smelling fir wood; over the bridge that spanned the brawling brook; again through the fir wood; until they reached the open space surrounding the big stone house. They stood for a minute there — high over the great plain of the sea, that was beautiful with a thousand tints of light. And there was the green island of Ulva, and there the darker rocks of Colonsay, and further out, amid the windy vapor and sunlight, Lunga, and Fladda, and the Dutchman's Cap, changing in their hue every minute as the clouds came driving over the sea.

"Mother," said he, "I have not tasted fresh air since I left. I am not sorry to get back to Dare."

"And I don't think we are sorry to see you back, Keith," his cousin said modestly.

And yet the manner of his welcome was not imposing; they are not very good at grand ceremonies on the western shores of Mull. It is true that Donald, relieved of the care of Johnny Wickes, had sped by a short cut through the fir wood, and was now standing in the gravelled space outside the house, playing "The Heights of Alma" with a spirit worthy of all the MacCruimins that ever lived. But as for the ceremony of welcome, this was all there was of it. When Keith Macleod went up to the hall door, he found a small girl of five or six standing quite by herself at the open entrance. This was Christina, the granddaughter of Hamish, a pretty little girl with wide blue eyes and yellow hair.

"Hallo, Christina," said Macleod, "won't you let me into the house?"

"This is for you, Sir Keith," said she, in the Gaelic, and she presented him with a beautiful bunch of white heather. Now white heather, in that part of the country, is known to bring great good fortune to the possessor of it.

"And it is a good omen," said he, lightly, as he took the child up and kissed her. And that was the manner of his welcome to Castle Dare.

CHAPTER XIII.

AT HOME.

THE two women-folk, with whom he was most nearly brought into contact, were quite convinced that his stay in London had in no wise altered the buoyant humor and brisk activity of Keith Macleod. Castle Dare awoke into a new life on his return. He was all about and over the place, accompanied by the faithful Hamish; and he had a friendly word and smile for every one he met. He was a good master: perhaps he was none the less liked because it was pretty well understood that he meant to be master. His good-nature had nothing of weakness in it. "If you love me, I love you," says the Gaelic proverb; "otherwise do not come near me." There was not a man or lad about the place who would not have adventured his life for Macleod; but all the same they were well aware that the handsome young master, who seemed to go through life with a merry laugh on his face, was not one to be trifled with. This John Fraser, an Aberdeen man, discovered on the second night after Macleod's return to Castle Dare.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Macleod had the salmon-fishing on this part of the coast, and had a boat's crew of four men engaged in the work. One of these having fallen sick, Hamish had to hire a new hand, an Aberdeenshire man, who joined the crew just before Macleod's departure from London. This Fraser turned out to be a "dour" man; and his discontent and grumbling seemed to be affecting the others, so that the domestic peace of Dare was threatened. On the night in question old Hamish came into Macleod's conjoint library and gun-room.

"The fishermen hef been asking me again, sir," observed Hamish, with his cap in his hand. "What will I say to them?"

"Oh, about the wages?" Macleod said, turning round.

"Ay, sir."

"Well, Hamish, I don't object. Tell them that what they say is right. This year has been a very good year; we have made some money; I will give them the two shillings a week more if they like. But then, look here, Hamish. If they have their wages raised in a good year, they must have them lowered in a bad year. They cannot expect to share the profit without sharing the loss too. Do you understand that, Hamish?"

"Yes, Sir Keith, I think I do."

"Do you think you could put it into good Gaelic for them?"

"Oh, ay."

"Then tell them to choose for themselves. But make it clear."

"Ay, Sir Keith," said Hamish. "And if it was not for that —— man, John Fraser, there would be no word of this thing. And there is another thing I will hef to speak to you about, Sir Keith; and it is John Fraser, too, who is at the bottom of this, I will know that fine. It is more than two or three times that you will warn the men not to bathe in the bay below the castle; and not for many a day will any one do that, for the Cave Bay it is not more as half a mile away. And when you you were in London, Sir Keith, it was this man John Fraser he would bathe in the bay below the castle in the morning, and he got one or two of the others to join him; and when I bade him go away, he will say that the sea belongs to no man. And this morning, too ——"

"This morning!" Macleod said, jumping to his feet. There was an angry flash in his eyes.

"Ay, sir, this very morning I saw two of them myself — and John Fraser he was one of them — and I went down and said to them, 'It will be a bad day for you, says I to them, 'if Sir Keith will find you in this bay.'"

"Are they down at the quay now?" Macleod said.

"Ay, they will be in the house now."

"Come along with me, Hamish. I think we will put this right."

He lifted his cap and went out into the cool night air, followed by Hamish. They passed through the dark fir wood until they came in sight of the Atlantic again, which was smooth enough to show the troubled reflection of the bigger stars. They went down the hillside until they were close to the shore, and then they followed the rough path to the quay. The door of the square stone building was open; the men were seated on rude stools or on spare coils of rope, smoking. Macleod called them out, and they came to the door.

"Now look here, boys," said he, "you know I will not allow any man to bathe in the bay before the house. I told you before; I tell you now for the last time. They that want to bathe can go along to the Cave Bay; and the end of it is this — and there will be no more words about it — that the first man I catch in the bay before the house I will take a horsewhip to him, and he will have as good a run as ever he had in his life."

With that he was turning away, when he heard one of the men mutter, "I would like to see you do it." He wheeled round instantly — and if some of his London friends could have seen the look of his face at this moment, they might have altered their opinion about the obliteration of certain qualities from the temperament of the Highlanders of our own day.

"Who said that?" he exclaimed.

There was no answer.

"Come out here, you four men!" he said. "Stand in a line there. Now let the man who said that step out and face me. I will show him who is to be master here. If he thinks he can master me, well; but it is one or the other of us who will be master!"

There was not a sound or a motion; but Macleod suddenly sprang forward, caught the man Fraser by the throat, and shook him thrice — as he might have shaken a reed.

"You scoundrel!" he said. "You coward!" Are you afraid to own it was you? There has been nothing but bad feeling since ever you brought your ugly face

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd among us — well, we've had enough of you!"

He flung him back.

"Hamish," said he, "you will pay this man his month's wages to-night. Pack him off with the Gometra men in the morning; they will take him out to the 'Pioneer.' And look you here, sir," he added, turning to Fraser, "it will be a bad day for you the day that I see your face again anywhere about Castle Dare."

He walked off and up to the house again, followed by the reluctant Hamish. Hamish had spoken of this matter only that Macleod should give the men a renewed warning; he had no notion that this act of vengeance would be the result. And where were they to get a man to put in Fraser's place?

It was about an hour later that Hamish again came into the room.

"I beg your pardon, sir," said he, "but the men are outside."

"I cannot see them."

"They are ferry sorry, sir, about the whole matter, and there will be no more bathing in the front of the house, and the man Fraser they hef brought him up to say he is ferry sorry too."

"They have brought him up?"

"Ay, sir," said Hamish, with a grave smile. "It was for fighting him they were one after the other because he will make a bad speech to you; and he could not fight three men one after the other; and so they hef made him come up to say he is ferry sorry too; and will you let him stay on to the end of the season?"

"No. Tell the men that if they will behave themselves, we can go on as we did before, in peace and friendliness; but I mean to be master in this place. And I will not have a sulky fellow like this Fraser stirring up quarrels. He must pack and be off."

"It will not be easy to get another man, Sir Keith," old Hamish ventured to say.

"Get Sandy over from the 'Umpire.'"

"But surely you will want the yacht, sir, when Mr. Ogilvie comes to Dare?"

"I tell you, Hamish, that I will not have that fellow about the place. That is an end of it. Did you think it was only a threat that I meant? And have you not heard the old saying that 'one does not apply plaster to a threat'? You will send him to Gometra in the morning in time for the boat."

And so the sentence of banishment was confirmed; and Hamish got a young fellow from Ulva to take the place of Fraser; and from that time to the end of the fishing season perfect peace and harmony prevailed between master and men.

But if Lady Macleod and Janet saw no change whatever in Macleod's manner after his return from the south, Hamish, who was more alone with the young man, did. Why this strange indifference to the very occupations that used to be the chief interest of his life? He would not go out after the deer: the velvet would be on their horns yet. He would not go out after the grouse: what was the use of disturbing them before Mr. Ogilvie came up?

"I am in no hurry," he said, almost petulantly. "Shall I not have to be here the whole winter for the shooting?" — and Hamish was amazed to hear him talk of the winter shooting as some compulsory duty, whereas in these parts it far exceeded in variety and interest the very limited low-ground shooting of the autumn. Until young Ogilvie came up, Macleod never had a gun in his hand. He had gone fishing two or three days; but had generally ended by surrendering his rod to Hamish, and going for a walk up the glen, alone. The only thing he seemed to care about, in the way of out-of-door occupation, was the procuring of otter-skins; and every man and boy in his service was ordered to keep a sharp look-out on that stormy coast for the prince of fur-bearing animals. Years before he had got enough skins together for a jacket for his cousin Janet; and that garment of beautiful thick black fur — dyed black, of course — was as silken and rich as when it was made. Why should he forget his own theory of letting all animals have a chance in urging a war of extermination against the otter?

This preoccupation of mind, of which Hamish was alone observant, was nearly inflicting a cruel injury on Hamish himself. On the morning of the day on which Ogilvie was expected to arrive, Hamish went into his master's library. Macleod had been reading a book, but he had pushed it aside, and now both his elbows were on the table, and he was leaning his head on his hands, apparently in deep meditation of some kind or other.

"Will I tek the bandage off Nell's foot now, sir?"

"Oh yes, if you like. You know as much as I do about it."

"Oh, I am quite sure," said Hamish brightly, "that she will do ferry well tomorrow. I will tek her whatever; and I can send her home if it is too much for her."

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Macleod took up his book again.

"Very well, Hamish. But you have plenty to do about the house. Duncan and Sandy can go with us to-morrow."

The old man started and looked at his master for a second. Then he said, "Ferry well, sir," in a low voice, and left the room.

But for the hurt and the wounded and the sorrowful there was always one refuge of consolation in Castle Dare. Hamish went straight to Janet Macleod; and she was astonished to see the emotion of which the keen, hard, handsome face of the old man was capable. Who before had ever seen tears in the eyes of Hamish MacIntyre?

"And perhaps it is so," said Hamish, with his head hanging down, "and perhaps it is that I am an old man now, and not able any more to go up to the hills; but if I am not able for that, I am not able for anything; and I will not ask Sir Keith to keep me about the house, or about the yacht. It is younger men will do better as me; and I can go away to Greenock; and if it is an old man I am, maybe I will find a place in a smack, for all that ——"

"Oh, nonsense, Hamish," Janet Macleod said, with her kindly eyes bent on him. "You may be sure Sir Keith did not mean any thing like that ——"

"Ay, mem," said the old man proudly, "and who wass it that first put a gun into his hand; and who wass it skinned the ferry first seal that he shot in Loch Scridain; and who wass it told him the name of every spar and sheet of the 'Umpire,' and showed him how to hold a tiller? And if there is any man knows more as me about the birds and the deer, that is right — let him go out; but it is the first day I hef not been out with Sir Keith since ever I wass at Castle Dare; and now it is time that I am going away; for I am an old man; and the younger men they will be better on the hills, and in the yacht too. But I can make my living whatever."

"Hamish, you are speaking like a foolish man," said Janet Macleod to him. "You will wait here now till I go to Sir Keith."

She went to him.

"Keith," said she, "do you know that you have nearly broken old Hamish's heart?"

"What is the matter?" said he, looking up in wonder.

"He says you have told him he is not to go out to the shooting with you to-morrow; and that is the first time he has been superseded; and he takes it that you think he is an old man; and he talks of going away to Greenock to join a smack."

"Oh, nonsense," Macleod said. "I was not thinking when I told him. He may come with us if he likes. At the same time, Janet, I should think Norman Ogilvie will laugh at seeing the butler come out as a keeper."

"You know quite well, Keith," said his cousin, "that Hamish is no more a butler than he is captain of the 'Umpire' or clerk of the accounts. Hamish is simply everybody and everything at Castle Dare. And if you speak of Norman Ogilvie — well, I think it would be more like yourself, Keith, to consult the feelings of an old man rather than the opinions of a young one."

"You are always on the right side, Janet. Tell Hamish I am very sorry. I meant him no disrespect. And he may call me at one in the morning if he likes. He never looked on me but as a bit of his various machinery for killing things."

"That is not fair of you, Keith. Old Hamish would give his right hand to save you the scratch of a thorn."

She went off to cheer the old man, and he turned to his book. But it was not to read it; it was only to stare at the outside of it in an absent sort of way. The fact is, he had found in it the story of a young aide-de-camp who was intrusted with a message to a distant part of the field while a battle was going forward, and who in mere bravado rode across a part of the ground open to the enemy's fire. He came back laughing. He had been hit, he confessed, but he had escaped; and he carelessly shook a drop or two of blood from a flesh wound on his hand. Suddenly, however, he turned pale, wavered a little, and then fell forward on his horse's neck, a corpse.

Macleod was thinking about this story rather gloomily. But at last he got up with a more cheerful air, and seized his cap.

"And if it is my death-wound I have got," he was thinking to himself, as he set out for the boat that was waiting for him at the shore, "I will not cry out too soon."

From The Contemporary Review.

MR. FROUDE'S "LIFE AND TIMES OF THOMAS BECKET."

Mr. Froude's appearance on the field of mediæval history will hardly be matter of rejoicing to those who have made medi-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

æval history one of the chief studies of their lives. They cannot welcome him as a partner in their labors, as a fellow-worker in the cause of historic truth. On the other hand they cannot afford to pass by his appearance without notice. He cannot be treated as one of the crowd of blunderers who may be left to perish of their own insignificance. Mr. Froude has a name and a following. What he writes will be read by many and will be believed by some. Even if he were now beginning as an unknown writer, he would be sure of a more attentive and favorable hearing than falls to the lot of most unknown writers. His style is admired by many, and it undoubtedly has its merits. When Mr. Froude can keep himself both from metaphors and from vulgarisms, he knows how to tell a story clearly and attractively. It would be a pleasure to read a narrative by Mr. Froude about times, places, and persons of which one had never heard before, among which there would therefore be no means of judging whether his statements were accurate or inaccurate. In such a case the critical faculty would slumber, and we might simply enjoy what we might be sure would supply much for us to enjoy. And there can be little doubt that there are many with whom the influence of Mr. Froude's style goes very much further than this. His way of writing is eminently fitted to impose on those who have not the means of judging for themselves. When Mr. Froude is most inaccurate, when he is most thoroughly ignorant of the subject on which he writes, he still writes with an air of quiet confidence which is likely to take in all whose own studies have not qualified them to answer him. It is because the air of confidence is so quiet that it is so dangerous. As a rule, those who write on subjects which they have not mastered betray their lack of mastery in their manner. But there is nothing in Mr. Froude's manner to suggest either lack of knowledge or unfair treatment of materials. Never surely did a false prophet succeed so thoroughly in putting on the outward garb of the true. There can be no doubt that many who read in perfect good faith and with a sincere desire of knowledge are led away by this singular appearance of knowledge and fairness where both are in truth absent. Still it is lucky that, even when Mr. Froude is most plausible, he is almost sure to let something out to startle the reader who reads in good faith, however small may be his amount of critical knowledge. Many were doubtless tempted to accept Mr. Froude's new theory of Henry the Eighth,—a theory which Hallam so vigorously demolished beforehand,—who drew back when they were asked to believe that Henry beheaded Anne one day and married Jane the next from no motive but the severest sense of public duty. So Mr. Froude, in his present attempt to paint the picture of the great men of the twelfth century, puts on the outward garb of one who has read and tested his materials, and has come to a critical judgment on what he has read and tested. But he happily leaves a little cranny open which enables us to look within. The very first words of Mr. Froude's "Life and Times of Thomas Becket"* are enough to show us that the seeming historical inquiry is really designed as a manifesto against a theological party which once numbered its author among its members. To those who know the whole literature of the subject, it has a look more unpleasant still. Those whose study of twelfth-century history goes back to times when those who are now in their second half-century were young, will not fail to remember a time when the name of Froude reminded them of another, an earlier, and I have no hesitation in saying a worthier, treatment of the same subject. And some of those who go back so far may be tempted to think that natural kindliness, if no other feeling, might have kept back the fiercest of partisans from ignoring the honest work of a long-deceased brother, and from dealing stabs in the dark at a brother's almost forgotten fame.

Of the historical work of the elder Froude with regard to the great controversy of the reign of Henry the Second I shall have a few words to say presently. I am as yet concerned rather with the relation of the younger bearer of that name to the reign of Henry the Second and to mediæval history generally. Mr. J. A. Froude has mainly confined himself to later periods of English history; in one of his works he has dealt with times which a few living men can still remember. He has appeared as the apologist of Henry the Eighth, and as the apologist of Flogging Fitzgerald. The way in which he has treated his subjects has been commonly such as now and then to suggest the thought that the whole thing is an elaborate joke. The thought will force itself upon the mind that Mr. Froude is simply laughing at his readers, and trying to see what amount of paradox they may

* Nineteenth Century, June, 1877, p. 548.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

be made to swallow. That any man could venture, in a civilized, not to say in a Christian, community, to put forth some of the moral theories which Mr. Froude puts forth, to defend some of the acts which Mr. Froude defends, might indeed seem beyond human belief. Yet some very astounding performances in this line are no more than might be looked for from one who turned from legendary hagiography to write "Shadows of the Clouds" and "The Nemesis of Faith." On purely moral points there is no need for me now to enlarge; every man who knows right from wrong ought to be able to see through the web of ingenious sophistry which tries to justify the slaughter of More and Fisher. Still the apologist of King Harry has hardly done the best that might be done for his own hero. Mr. Froude's flattering picture comes hardly nearer to the real man than the vulgar Bluebeard portrait of which he very rightly complains. Both pictures alike slur over the distinguishing lines in a character which is in truth a most singular moral study. In Mr. Froude's lofty contempt for ecclesiastical details he perhaps hardly thought it a fact worthy of his attention that Henry the Eighth himself drew up the statutes of some of the cathedral churches which he refounded, that he drew them up with his own hand, and that the statutes so drawn up breathe a spirit worthy of the most pious founders on record. That this same man had robbed those very churches of their most sacred treasures, that he had squandered and gambled away all that men before his time had agreed to respect, that his hand had been stretched out to lay waste and to spoil the very resting-places of the dead, seems at first one of the strangest of moral contradictions. Yet both are parts of a strangely mixed character, the character of a tyrant the form of whose tyranny has no exact parallel elsewhere. Mr. Froude's belief that Henry married Jane Seymour as "an indifferent official act," which he went through for the good of the nation, quite wipes out the peculiar character of Henry's tyranny with regard to his marriages as with regard to anything else. A tyrant who was determined to have his own will in all things, but who always strove to find something like legal sanction for the gratification of his own will, was specially ingenious in finding out pretexts which gave some kind of legal sanction to his divorces, beheadings, and remarriages. We can well believe that when Henry had beheaded Anne and married Jane, he returned thanks that he had reformed his "old and detestable life," that he was no longer an adulterer as other kings were, not even as his friend and brother, Francis of France. A character like this deserved drawing in its minutest lights and shadows; but all its characteristic features have been daubed out by the indiscriminate apology of Mr. Froude. From the purely artistic point of view, it is to be regretted that so remarkable a specimen of human nature has not had better justice done to it. From the point of view of historic and of moral truth, it is to be regretted that a portrait so wide of the reality should be accepted as genuine. It is still more to be regretted, if any have been found at once to accept Mr. Froude's statement of Henry's acts and to accept his judgment upon them.

Mr. Froude, it may be remembered, made his first appearance as a writer on historical subjects — for his contribution to the "Lives of the Saints" can hardly be looked on as history — in a paper in one of the volumes of "Oxford Essays," which deservedly drew to itself much attention, and in which truth and error were mingled in a remarkable way. Mr. Froude's main proposition was that English history ought to be studied in the statute-book. Taken with some qualifications, the profession is a thoroughly true one. It is perfectly true that many readers and writers of history have devoted themselves to personal matters, or at the most to battles and negotiations, and have left legislation and all that legislation touches too much in the background. Mr. Froude did really good service by calling attention to the necessity of giving to the internal legislation of any country at least as prominent a part in its history as any of those aspects of the story by which internal legislation has often been overshadowed. But, in putting forth this really important truth, Mr. Froude was led into two errors. One of these lurks in the word "statute-book." If we are allowed to extend the meaning of the word "statute-book" so as to take in our earliest written "dooms," and our scattered notices of laws and institutions yet older than our earliest written "dooms," then we may fully admit that the statute-book is the true text-book of English history. Still the use of the phrase "statute-book" might seem to imply a somewhat modern way of looking at things; it might seem to imply that the study of the laws and history of England could safely begin at some arbitrary point later than their beginning. And while Mr. Froude did right

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

in claiming for acts of Parliament and for other public documents their due value among the sources of history, he went further, and seemed to claim for them a kind of infallibility which the lawyers themselves do not venture to assert. It is, I believe, an acknowledged legal rule that the preamble of an act of Parliament need not be received as of any binding force. Mr. Froude seems to think otherwise. He seems to look on the statements of motives and causes set forth in any public document as being of necessity the real motives and causes. On this point Gibbon and Sismondi held quite another view from Mr. Froude.* Acts of Parliament, proclamations, public documents of every kind, have indeed their use; but it is not the particular use which was claimed for them by Mr. Froude. The motives which are set forth in a public proclamation are by no means necessarily the real motives of the potentate who puts forth the proclamation. But they have their historical value none the less. For it is often important to know, not only by what motives a man really acted, but by what motives he wished that others should believe that he acted. Now these two forms of error, which disfigured an argument which was highly ingenious and to a great extent true, are both of them worth studying, because they point to one great cause of error in Mr. Froude's writings. They are exactly the errors of a novice; they are the errors of a man who had taken up historical writing and historical study in the middle instead of at the beginning. Mr. Froude had clear-sightedness enough to see at a glance the importance of documentary evidence. But the conviction had to him something of the charm of a discovery; an official proclamation, judgment, assertion of any kind, became in his eyes clothed with a kind of sacred character, before which the ordinary rules of morals and the ordinary rules of historical evidence had to give way. All this could hardly have happened to one who had made history the study of his life. But Mr. Froude, by his own statement, had not made history the study of his life. Nor was he, like Mr. Finlay, led to the study of the past because he saw that no otherwise could he find the key to what he saw around him in the present.

* I am unavoidably writing without the means of reference to books, except such as I have brought with me for the express purpose in hand. But I have discussed Mr. Froude's way of treating documents, and quoted the passages from Sismondi and Gibbon, in an article in the Fortnightly Review (No. 57, September, 1871) on "The Use of Historical Documents."

Mr. Froude, in that singular confession which he once published,* explained that he took to the writing of English history chiefly because he had nothing else to do. The consequence naturally was that he rushed at a particular period without any preparation from the study of earlier periods. No one who really knows English history can fail to see in almost every page of Mr. Froude's account of Henry the Eighth signs of imperfect knowledge of the days before Henry the Eighth. This fault mends itself to some extent as he goes on; but its effects can never be fully got rid of. Constant inaccuracy of reference and quotation betray the man who has begun to write without having gone through any thorough discipline of reading. Endless displays of ignorance on points of detail bear the same witness. The man who insisted on the statute-book being the text-book of English history showed that he had never heard of peine forte et dure and had no clear notion of the nature of a bill of attainder. A crowd of mistakes on ecclesiastical and foreign points have been pointed out by Mr. Froude's reviewers. And there is one point in which Mr. Froude shows a striking contrast to Lord Macaulay. One of the best points in Lord Macaulay's history is the vivid way in which he brings before his readers the past history and present state of every place which witnessed any event of importance in his story. Lord Macaulay clearly made it his business to see with his own eyes the places of which he had to speak. Mr. Froude seems never to have done anything of the kind. He can vividly describe a place which he has seen; but it is plain that a large part of the places which figure in his story he has never seen. Take the story of the martyrdom of Hooper. As far as personal incident goes, Mr. Froude tells his story well; but Lord Macaulay would have added a vivid picture of Gloucester city in its transition state, when the abbey had so lately become the cathedral church. In Mr. Froude's hands the story, full of personal life, is utterly without that local life which it would certainly have received at the hands of Lord Macaulay.

But, besides all this, Mr. Froude's treatment of later times displays one characteristic which goes yet further than all these to disqualify him for treating any subject of mediæval history. This is his fanatical hatred towards the English

* It appeared in a fly-leaf of "The English in Ireland."

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Church at all times and under all characters. Reformed or unreformed, it is all the same; be it the Church of Dunstan, of Anselm, or of Arundel, of Parker, of Laud, or of Tillotson, it is all one to Mr. Froude. It is a hatred compared to which I should think that the enmity of any Nonconformist, religious or political, must be a lukewarm feeling. It certainly surpasses anything into which an ordinary layman can throw himself even dramatically. It is, I should guess, a degree of hatred which must be peculiar to those who have entered her ministry and forsaken it, perhaps peculiar to the one man who first wrote "Lives of the Saints" and then "Shadows of the Clouds." How deep-set and bitter Mr. Froude's anti-ecclesiastical feelings are is shown by the fact that they are consistent with the fullest artistic perception of whatever is touching and poetic in the ecclesiastical system. Mr. Froude as a writer never reaches so high a point as in several passages where he describes various scenes and features of monastic life. To do justice to a bishop or a monk is what Mr. Froude can never bring himself to; but to paint this and that poetic aspect of a bishop or a monk is what few men can do better. Hatred must be fierce indeed which is in no way softened by so remarkable a power of merely artistic appreciation. In a student of mediæval history Mr. Froude's artistic appreciation is undoubtedly no contemptible help; but it will hardly stand in the place of unswerving justice. What the mediæval Church asks from the student of mediæval history is simply justice. And justice will never be done to her either by fanatical votaries or by fanatical enemies. Mr. Froude has tried both characters; and both characters are alike incompatible with justice, incompatible with truth.

Thus prepared or unprepared, Mr. Froude has made more than one raid, as it may be called, on the history of times earlier than those with which he deals in his chief work. It is curious to mark the exactly opposite way in which his mediæval sketches have been received by those who have, and those who have not, studied the times in which Mr. Froude has ventured himself. The sketches, simply as sketches, are brilliant and effective; the only unlucky thing is that the things sketched have, for the most part, no existence except in Mr. Froude's imagination. By those who are not themselves historical students, who have not the means of testing the truth of the pictures which Mr. Froude has given them, those pictures have naturally been admired. They have been admired as a well-executed picture, good in drawing and color, may be admired by those who have not the means of knowing that it bears no likeness whatever to the scene or the buildings which it professes to represent. But historical scholars, those who have lived and made their homes in the ages in which Mr. Froude shows himself only as an occasional marauder, have passed a different judgment. These lesser writings have indeed seriously affected their estimate of Mr. Froude's greater work. They are no longer inclined to look on the defence of Henry the Eighth as a mere ingenious paradox. They are now fully convinced that, even in dealing with the relations between Henry and his wives, Mr. Froude really meant what he said. They are now disposed to set down Mr. Froude's vagaries of narrative and judgment to an inborn and incurable twist, which makes it impossible for him to make an accurate statement about any matter. They see in these lesser writings that when Mr. Froude undertakes one of the simplest of tasks, that of fairly reporting the statements made by a single writer, he cannot do it. By some destiny which it would seem that he cannot escape, instead of the narrative which he finds — at least which all other readers find — in his book, he invariably substitutes another narrative out of his own head. That Mr. Froude can hardly be called a free agent in this matter appears from the nature of the points of difference between his narratives and those of the writers whom he professes to copy. That Mr. Froude should color his story in accordance with his own ideas is not very wonderful: everybody does so more or less; Mr. Froude could hardly fail to do so a great deal. That Mr. Froude, in writing the history of a monastic house, turns everything as far as may be to the discredit of monasticism and of the ecclesiastical system generally might have been taken for granted beforehand. But it is the smallest instances which best prove a law; and the law which compels Mr. Froude to tell his story in a different way from his authority is best illustrated by those instances which are of no controversial and of little historical importance. Be the matter in hand what it may, be the interest of the story great or small, Mr. Froude finds the same necessity laid upon him. Come what may, Mr. Froude's story must not be the story in the book. If the book calls a man by one name or title, Mr.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Froude must give him another name or title. If the book says that a thing happened in one place, Mr. Froude must say that it happened in another place. If the book says that it happened on one day of the week, Mr. Froude must say that it happened on another day. It is only on this theory of overwhelming necessity that some of Mr. Froude's astounding departures from his text can be explained. It cannot be supposed that a man who has undertaken to write any part of the history of England can be ignorant of the name of Robert Fitzwalter, marshal of the army of God and of the holy Church. Mr. Froude could not have been a free agent when, meeting with "Robertus filius Walteri," fully and clearly described, he changed him into "Sir Robert Fitz*william*," without any description at all. Nor can it be supposed that a man who has been fellow of Exeter College can really believe that "prædictæ rationes" means "shortened rations," or that "sæcularis potestas" means "rude policeman from London." But the necessity was upon him; as his book said one thing, Mr. Froude was bound to say something else.

Now all this opens a serious question with regard to Mr. Froude's earlier writings. In those writings Mr. Froude's narrative constantly depends on authorities which very few of us can examine and see whether they bear out the statements which Mr. Froude draws from them. Very few of us can test references to manuscripts at Simancas; it is not every one who can, at a moment's notice, test references to manuscripts much nearer home. But every man who has learned Latin can test statements which profess to be grounded on the volumes published by authority of the master of the rolls. When we find that, whenever Mr. Froude professes to tell the same story which is found in those volumes, he nine times out of ten tells us a quite different story, we are tempted to argue from the known to the unknown, and to suspect that the Simancas manuscripts stand to Mr. Froude's narrative of later times in the same relation in which the Saint Albans history stands to Mr. Froude's narrative of earlier times. The feeling is the same as when a profound inquirer into early Eastern history expects us to take his word for his knowledge of Hamite, Scythic, and Babylonish, while he shows in the course of his argument that he does not understand Greek, Latin, French, or English. It may be that the suspicion is unjust in both cases; it may be that some special guidance is afforded to walkers in rough places which is not to be looked for by those who keep in smoother roads. Still, rightly or wrongly, the thought will force itself upon the mind that the man who cannot be trusted for a single detail in a narrative where every educated man can test him is not likely to be more trustworthy in a narrative where he has the vast majority of his readers at his mercy.

Mr. Froude's present attempt at mediæval history is the third of his efforts in the same field. Their scale has grown with each attempt. He first dealt with the life of Saint Hugh of Lincoln, professing to found his story on the "Magna Vita Sancti Hugonis" published by Mr. Dimock in the master of the rolls' series. This monograph appeared in one of the earlier volumes of Mr. Froude's "Short Studies on Great Subjects." The last volume of that collection contains "The Annals of an English Abbey," which profess to be founded on the series of Saint Albans histories — beginning with the "Gesta Abbatum" of Matthew Paris — which are also published in the "Chronicles and Memorials." In both of these cases the relation between Mr. Froude's narrative and the original which he professes to copy is of the kind which has been already described. If there is any difference between the two, it is that the departures from the original narrative are far more numerous and glaring in Mr. Froude's second mediæval study than they were in the first. Mr. Froude's annals of Saint Albans are in no sense the same story as the annals of Saint Albans of the only writers to whom Mr. Froude has to go for his facts. Mr. Froude's narrative differs from the original on countless points great and small, some of which may serve for controversial purposes, while in others the departure from the original seems to be wholly arbitrary. Mr. Froude's annals are in short annals of his own devising, of which the utmost that can be said is that most of the names and many of the incidents seem to have been suggested by the original annals. The narrative was not long ago so minutely examined in one of the weekly journals that it is needless to go again through the whole of the evidence which shows the real character of Mr. Froude's imaginary history of the greatest of English abbeys. I will only once more remind the reader that this is not a case for any deep research, nor a case where there is any field for difference of opinion. It is not a case where the truth has to be got by comparing various and sometimes con-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

flicting statements. In such cases men of equal learning, equal judgment, and equal honesty may often come to different conclusions. In the Saint Albans history there is no such balancing of statements to be gone through. There is only one detailed narrative; there is nothing to confirm or to contradict its statements, except when our one source for the local history of Saint Albans comes into contact with some of our many sources for the general history of England. In all other cases we must take our story for what it is worth, and judge it by internal evidence only. It is open to Mr. Froude or to anybody else to make any objections which he may think good to its authority. But Mr. Froude makes no objections to its authority. He professes to follow it as an authentic narrative, and then gives us a quite different narrative of his own instead. And, as an instance of Mr. Froude's singular indifference to accuracy in local matters, it is plain that he wrote nearly the whole of his Saint Albans narrative in the belief that the abbey church, lately raised to cathedral rank, was a ruin like Rievaux or Tintern.

In his third undertaking Mr. Froude has ventured upon a subject of far greater importance and far greater difficulty than the life of Saint Hugh or the annals of Saint Albans Abbey. The life and times of Thomas Becket form a subject which has been surrounded with controversy from the days of Thomas to our own day. It is a subject which involves the treatment of some of the greatest questions which ever divided Western Christendom. It is a subject which involves the portraiture of some of the foremost men of our own history, and which is not dealt with in its fulness without some notice of men in other lands who were famous on a yet wider field. It is a subject which involves the examination of a state of things when causes which had been long working were bringing forth their final results; it calls for the treatment of the time when we see the issue of the Norman Conquest and of the causes which led to the Norman Conquest, and when we see that that issue was, not to turn Englishmen into Normans, but to turn Normans into Englishmen. It calls too for the treatment of that time in its œcumenical, as well as in its insular rspect. The days of the first Angevin king were days when the immediate rule, not of England but of her ruler, stretched from the Pyrenees to the Cheviots, and when his policy took in all lands from Ireland to Jerusalem. Emperors and popes, Sicilian kings and Lombard commonwealths, should be as familiar to him who would write the "Life and Times of Thomas Becket" as the text of the Constitutions of Clarendon or the relations between the sees of Canterbury and York. And the mastery of so vast a subject calls, not for the study of a single narrative, the biography of a single man, or the annals of a single monastery, but for familiarity with a whole contemporary literature. The life of Thomas Becket has to be read in a crowd of independent biographies, and yet more in the endless correspondence of himself, his friends, and his enemies. All these writings have to be carefully studied, carefully weighed, alike in their actual statements and in the coloring with which their statements are overlaid. And to master the times of Thomas Becket needs a further study of the general sources of English, and indeed of European, history. Nor is contemporary history enough either in England or elsewhere. No man can understand the twelfth century, who has not thoroughly mastered the eleventh. And no man can master the eleventh century who has not gone pretty deep into the centuries before it. A man who should begin his studies of the eleventh century in the eleventh century itself, will certainly find it a hard matter to grasp the true position either of William king of the English or of Henry emperor of the Romans.

But, beyond all this, the life and times of Thomas Becket is, of all subjects, that which should least be approached in the spirit of the fanatic or of the partisan. It is a time of controversy, of controversy from which we should, as far as may be, shut out the passions and even the memories of our own times. There are times, distant times, whose controversies are absolutely the same in principle as the controversies of our own day. Both in the earlier and the later shape of those controversies, we must do all that we can to be fair to the supporters of both sides; but we cannot help taking a side ourselves. We feel that, being what we are, we must, if we had lived in those times, have thrown in our lot with one side against the other. In the controversies of the twelfth century there is no absolute need thus to take a side. The controversies are quite unlike anything which we can conceive going on in our own times. Looking at the dispute between Henry and Thomas by the light of earlier and of later ages, we see that the cause of Henry was the right one; that is, we see that it was well that the cause of

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Henry triumphed in the long run. But we cannot feel at all certain whether, being what we are, we should, if we had lived in the days of Henry and Thomas, have taken the side of Henry or the side of Thomas. We feel that, with the same sense of right and wrong which we have now, we must, whether we had been clerk or laymen, earl or churl, have gone along with Stephen Langton and Simon of Montfort. In those controversies right is distinctly on one side and wrong is distinctly on the other. In the dispute between Henry and Thomas, we now see that right was on one side, but it would be too much to say that wrong was on the other side. Given the same sense of right and wrong which we have now, our application of it to the points at issue would most likely have varied, according as we might have been clerks or laymen, earls or churls. In estimating such a time and its actors, we ought to be specially able to throw ourselves into the position of the men of both sides, to understand how both sides felt, and fully to take in that there were wise and good men on both sides. There are those who hold that, in any dispute between a king and a bishop, the king must necessarily be right and the bishop wrong. There are others who hold that, in any such dispute, the bishop must necessarily be right and the king wrong. Some on each side go so far as instinctively to set down the king or the bishop not only as being necessarily in the wrong in the controversy, but as being necessarily an evil man in himself. Fanatics of either of these kinds can never deal fairly with the great controversy which Mr. Froude has taken in hand. If we look calmly at the matter, we shall see that both Henry and Thomas acted as, being the men that they were and placed in the position in which they were placed, they could hardly fail to have acted. We may give our sympathy to both as far as the general case of each side goes. We must refuse our sympathy to very many of the particular acts and sayings of both. Both disputants have sadly degenerated from an earlier pair of disputants in a quarrel which has many points of connection with their own. Henry the First and Anselm knew how to carry on a controversy without loss of dignity on either side, and even without breach of personal friendship. Henry the Second and Thomas had doubtless their predecessors before them as their models; but the copy was in either case very far from reproducing the better points of the original.

Such is, according to my notions, the way in which the life and times of Thomas Becket ought to be approached. And I do not fear that any one who knows what the twelfth century was, whether his view either of king or archbishop be more or less favorable than mine, will think any other way of approaching it likely to be of service to the cause of historic truth. Let us contrast Mr. Froude's way of approaching it. He is controversial, something more than controversial, from the beginning. He undertakes the study, not to throw fresh light on the history of the twelfth century, but to deal a blow at a party in the nineteenth. His first words are, — > Among the earliest efforts of the modern sacerdotal party in the Church of England was an attempt to re-establish the memory of the martyr of Canterbury.

It is not everybody who reads this who will fully take in what is here meant. The first attempt made, within the memory of our own generation, to examine and compare the materials for the great controversy between king and primate, was made by Richard Hurrell Froude of Oriel College — the Froude of the once famous "Remains," the elder brother of the man who makes this somewhat unbrotherly reference. The elder Froude doubtless belonged to what the younger calls "the modern sacerdotal party." His wish undoubtedly was "to re-establish the memory of the martyr of Canterbury." To those with whom historic truth comes foremost, and who have no special fanaticism, sacerdotal or anti-sacerdotal, the effort of a "sacerdotal party" to re-establish the memory of Thomas of Canterbury may seem at least as worthy an object as to re-establish the memory of Flogging Fitzgerald or of King Harry himself. To re-establish the memory of Thomas is at the worst a question of words and names, and of a certain law; it does not, like the two other "re-establishments," imply the defence of any matter of wrong or wicked lewdness. And the elder Froude's history of the controversy, if undertaken with a purpose of theological partisanship, was still a piece of creditable historical work. Done forty years or so ago, it was of course not up to the level of modern criticism on the subject. But it was the beginning of modern criticism on this subject. The elder Froude is entitled, at the hands of every one who writes or reads the story of Thomas, to that measure of respectful thanks which belongs to a pioneer on any subject. As

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

for his spirit of partisanship, those who stand outside the arena of all such partisanship might say that, when the elder Froude wrote, it was time that the other side should be heard in its turn. The name of "Thomas à Becket" had been so long the object of vulgar and ignorant scorn; his character and objects had been treated with such marked unfairness, even by historians of real merit, that fair play might welcome a vindication, even if it went too far the other way. Such a vindication was the object of the elder Froude: in the course of it he got rid of several prevalent errors, and made ready the way for more impartial and critical examination at the hands of others. The elder Froude did something to put one who, whatever were his objects, whatever were his errors, was still a great and heroic Englishman, in a historic place more worthy of him. At all events, he deserves better than to have his work thus sneeringly spoken of by his own younger brother: —

> And while churchmen are raising up Becket as a brazen serpent, on which the world is to look to be healed of its incredulities, the incredulous world may look with advantage at him from its own point of view, and if unconvinced that he was a saint, may still find instruction in a study of his actions and his fate.

This way of speaking may seem startling to those who know the relation between the long-deceased champion of the one side and the living champion of the other. It may cease to be startling to those who have read Mr. Froude's slenderly veiled works of fiction, and who know the key to them. But to come to more general questions, the point of view of those whose sole object is historic truth may well be different either from the point of view of "churchmen" or from that of "the incredulous world." At all events, historic truth has nothing to do with the point of view of either. From that point of view which regards historic truth alone, Thomas appears in more than one character of which Mr. Froude takes no notice. In the wider view of history, the primate and martyr may perhaps hardly claim a larger space than the Englishman of Norman descent whose career shows before all things how soon England turned her foreign conquerors and settlers into her own children. The canonized saint may, perhaps, hardly claim a larger space than the great chancellor who did more than any holder of that office to raise it to its later greatness, and who, in that office, was the right-hand man of one of our greatest kings, in bringing back peace and order after the days of anarchy. Had Thomas never become primate, martyr, and saint, he would still have been entitled to no small place in English history. Indeed, with him as with not a few characters in history, a world-wide fame of one kind has gone far to defraud him of a fame less brilliant, but perhaps more solid, of another kind. Leaving "churchmen" and "the incredulous world" to dispute about his saintship, both may perhaps "find instruction in the study of his actions" in that part of his life when he appears as the great minister of a great king.

And here I would ask leave for a word or two of a more personal kind. In approaching the life and times of Thomas Becket, I may perhaps be allowed to speak as one who cannot call himself a novice in the study of the subject. It is a subject which has been before my eyes, I might say, from my childhood. I long ago said what I had to say on the matter, in an essay which was reprinted in the first series of my collected "Historical Essays." I have since had occasion to give a summary of the tale in the last volume of the "History of the Norman Conquest." And I feel that, at both stages, I have labored, with whatever success, to extract the simple truth out of conflicting statements, and to deal fairly with the disputants on either side. I have drawn my picture of Thomas according to my light; and I suspect that I have not drawn him exactly according to the pattern either of those whom Mr. Froude calls "churchmen," or of those whom he calls "the incredulous world." That Mr. Froude has ever done me the honor to read those writings of mine I cannot venture to think. I am vain enough to believe that, if he had, he would have altered, not perhaps any expressions of opinion, but possibly some statements about plain facts. But I discern in Mr. Froude's treatment of his subject signs of a far greater lack than failure to read anything of mine. I see no sign of his having made use of the advantages which are offered in a special degree to him who studies the English history of the latter half of the twelfth century. To the popular mind, Mr. Froude probably seems to be, before all other men, the historian of Henry the Eighth; he seems to be, in those days at least, master of a domain which is thoroughly his own. It is perhaps only a scholar here and there who knows that the domain which seems to be Mr. Froude's is in truth the rightful possession of Mr. Brewer. But there is at least no doubt to whose domain the reign of Henry the Second belongs. The Angevin reigns are the immediate possession of the great master of English history. He must be a bold man who shall venture to paint King Henry and King Richard, Bishop Hugh of Puiset and Bishop William of Longchamp, in rivalry or in ignorance of the living portraits which have been given to us by Professor Stubbs. In his great prefaces, the professor has set before us the reign of Henry the Second in every aspect but one. Unhappily the master of rolls has given the special memorials of Thomas to another hand, and has thus hindered us from having the whole reign of Henry, in all its relations, dealt with by the one man who could do justice to it.* Had Professor Stubbs directly told the story of Thomas, the appearance of Mr. Froude in the same field would have been grotesque indeed. As it is, one would have thought that no man would have ventured to deal with any matter in the Angevin period without mastering the writings which make the men of the Angevin period, the state of England and Europe during the Angevin period, stand out in full life before us. But Mr. Froude's sketch of the state of things when Henry and Thomas come on the stage shows no sign of any such studies. Even where Mr. Froude does not directly misconceive everything, nothing can be more meagre than his general picture. There is not a word to show how the controversy came about, not a word to connect it with earlier controversies. Yet the reign of Henry the Second cannot be understood without going back to the reigns of William the Conqueror, of William Rufus, and of Henry the First. Mr. Froude, in his introductory sketch, has something to say about Gregory the Seventh; he has not a word to say about Anselm. Yet the position of Thomas cannot be understood without understanding the career of Anselm. Of the great work of the century, the fusion of Normans and English, that fusion of which Thomas himself is the most illustrious example, Mr. Froude clearly knows nothing. Nothing is more certain than the origin of Thomas. The idea that he was of old-English descent, the conscious champion of English nationality against the Norman, is a dream of Thierry's, which is now as thoroughly exploded as the wild legend of his Saracen mother, which Mr. Froude rejects indeed, but still seems to think worthy of discussion. Some of Thierry's kindred dreams I trust that I have myself dispelled; but this one was dispelled long ago by Dr. Giles and Mr. Robertson, following out hints given by the elder Froude. The mistake was most likely owing to the fact that Thomas was the first Englishman — in the sense of a native of England of whichever race — who rose to the metropolitan throne after the Norman Conquest. This fact might easily be so misunderstood as to represent him as having been an Englishman in the sense of being of old-English descent. The fact that, from the Conquest to the elevation of Thomas, no Archbishop of Canterbury, and not very many bishops of any see, were natives of England is in itself one of importance; but it has not the meaning which Thierry puts upon it. To Mr. Froude the fact seems to suggest nothing one way or another. But a point of far more importance in the history of Thomas and his age is the fact that Thomas himself, born in London of Norman parents, in the second decade of the twelfth century, was in all but actual descent a thorough Englishman. He has the warmest national patriotism for England, the warmest local patriotism for London. Of the feeling conventionally attributed to men of Norman descent in his age, there is not a trace in his story. There is not a word in the history of the writings of himself, his friends, or his enemies, which could suggest that Thomas was looked on by any man in the land as a stranger, or that he looked on any man in the land as other than his countryman. The importance of all these facts in forming our conception of the life, and still more of the times of Thomas Becket, can hardly be overrated. But Mr. Froude is so far from being able to make any inferences from the facts that he has not yet mastered the most elementary facts themselves. We seem to

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

* Let me do all justice to the editor, Mr. J. C. Robertson, who has been actually chosen for this work. On the score of minute accuracy, nothing is to be said against him. Some time back he wrote a life of Thomas, which forms a very useful summary, and in which he has cleared up several points of detail. Its fault is a sneering and carping spirit, the result, it would seem, of sheer inability to understand men of the scale of Henry and Thomas. Even local association — for Mr. Robertson is described on his title-page as a canon of Canterbury — cannot raise him to the level of his subject. But in all minute points, Mr. Robertson's hard-working accuracy is most praiseworthy. In the volumes of the "Memorials" which have already appeared, we have to thank him for a good text, well edited, to take the place of the helpless attempts of Dr. Giles. And in his prefaces he gives us many sound and useful editorial remarks. But the master hand would have given us all this, and much more. The whole materials for the Angevin reigns from the hands of the editor of Benedict and Roger of Howden would have been a possession indeed.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

have gone back a generation or so when we read: —

Thomas Becket was born in London in the year 1118. His father, Gilbert Becket, was a citizen in moderate circumstances. His name denotes Saxon extraction. Few Normans as yet were to be found in the English towns condescending to trade. Of his mother nothing authentic is known, except that she was a religious woman who brought up her children in the fear of God.

Mr. Froude adds in a note: —

The story that she was a Saracen is a late legend. Becket was afterwards taunted with the lowness of his birth. The absence of any allusion to a fact so curious if it was true, either in the taunt or in Becket's reply to it, may be taken as conclusive.

The argument doubtless is conclusive; but at this time of day the historical scholar as little needs conclusive arguments to prove that Thomas's mother was not a Saracen as the astronomer needs conclusive arguments to prove that the moon is not made of green cheese. As for the other point Mr. Froude does not vouchsafe to explain how either the name Gilbert or the surname or nickname Becket "denotes Saxon extraction." As however Thomas's father was a Norman of Rouen, while his mother came from Caen,* Mr. Froude's etymological speculations do not greatly matter. And, as Gilbert Becket was not engaged in trade,† Mr. Froude's somewhat hasty assumption against the likelihood of a Norman "condescending to trade" does not much matter either. These assumptions are important only as showing with how little knowledge of his subject a man may undertake to describe the life and times of one of the most representative characters in English history, when his avowed object is, not to discover or to set forth historic truth, but to run a tilt against a theological party which he has forsaken.

In short Mr. Froude, in his opening picture, gives us no picture at all of the state of Europe or of England. We get, to be sure, a few grotesque misstatements.

Over Scotland the English monarchs asserted a semi-feudal sovereignty, to which Stephen, at the Battle of the Standard, had given a semblance of reality.

What form of the threefold relation in which the English overlord stood to Scotland proper, to Lothian, and to the old Scottish fief of Cumberland may be darkly hinted at in Mr. Froude's queer phrase of "semi-feudal sovereignty," it might be vain to ask. But Mr. Froude seemingly thinks that Stephen was present at the Battle of the Standard; he clearly thinks that the English supremacy over Scotland was more firmly established after the Battle of the Standard than it was before. He plainly never took in that David, worsted in the battle, was successful in the war; he would seem never to have heard how the Northumberland of Waltheof and the Cumberland of Rufus were granted to a Scottish prince as its result. So we presently read: —

In 1159 Pope Adrian died. Alexander the Third was chosen to succeed him with the usual formalities, but the election was challenged by Frederic Barbarossa, who set up an antipope.

This is an odd way of expressing the fact that, in a disputed election, the emperor took the side of the candidate who, as his party was in the end unsuccessful, appears in ecclesiastical history as an antipope. In short, Mr. Froude took no trouble at all to master the real state of things in England or in Europe; he had work on hand much more to his liking; he had lighted on a contemporary writer whose witness he thought would tell with killing effect against the contemporary Church.

Mr. Froude's excuse for thus giving an opening picture of the times of Thomas Becket in which every characteristic feature of the man and his times is slurred over is that "characteristic incidents, particular things which men representative of their age indisputably did, convey a clearer idea than any general description." In a certain sense this is true: a particular story is likely to fix itself more strongly on the mind than any general description. But, if only the general description be a true one, the idea given by the particular incident, though it may be clearer, is not likely to be more accurate, unless the particular incidents are chosen with great care both as to the actors and as to the particular acts chosen. It may always be a question what are "characteristic incidents," what men are "representative of their age." If any man in a prominent

* The whole matter of Thomas' parentage is discussed by Mr. Robertson: see "Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury: a Biography," p. 14.

† I think that the witness of William Fitz-Stephen must be accepted on this head. He says (p. 183, Giles) that Thomas was born "ex legitimo matrimonio et honestis parentibus; patre Gilberto, qui et vicecomes aliquando Londoniæ fuit, matre Matilde, civibus Londonæ mediastinis neque fœnerantibus neque officiose negotiantibus, sed de reditibus suis honorifice viventibus." The Lambeth writer, on the other hand, makes Gilbert a merchant.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

position, a king, a bishop, or the like, may be taken as a representative man, and if anything that he indisputably did may be taken as a characteristic incident, it would be possible to give several ideas of the age, all of which might be very clear, but which would be singularly inconsistent with one another. One chooser of anecdotes might represent all twelfth-century bishops as being like Saint Hugh; another might represent them as being all like William of Longchamp. Nay, it would be easy to convey most opposite ideas by picking out different anecdotes of the same man. By taking this or that act which Henry the Second or his son Richard, to go no further, indisputably did, one might make a series of remarkably incongruous pictures of the ideal king of the twelfth century. Mr. Froude picks out the story of the death of the young king Henry, son of Henry the Second,* as showing "one aspect of the twelfth century, the darkest crimes and the most real superstition existing in the same character." To me the story is a very touching one. I am not clear that, under the circumstances, Mr. Froude's language is not a little too strong. That Henry rebelled against his father, that, having rebelled against his father, he carried on the war according to the brutal fashion of the time, are indisputable facts. The "burning towns and churches," and so forth, of which Mr. Froude complains, was bad enough, but it was at least not worse than the kind of warfare waged in Scotland by Edward Earl of Hertford at the express bidding of Henry the Eighth. And blameworthy as was young Henry's rebellion, it should be remembered that his mother and his overlord had a share in it as well as himself. If the elder Henry had been a better husband, he might have had more dutiful sons. And if, as Mr. Froude says, young Henry "drew on himself general hatred," he also drew to himself the deep affection of some. There is a contemporary narrative which even strives to make him out to be a saint and martyr.* And I can at least see nothing to sneer at in the deep and solemn repentance of his death-bed. I do not know whether Mr. Froude would have thought better of him, if his life had been equally criminal and his latest hours had not been equally penitent.

Mr. Froude next wishes to prove that "men who had so little pity on themselves were as pitiless to others." He tells — from Stowe † — the story of the heretics who were condemned at Oxford in 1166. It is a very remarkable story in many ways. I suspect that their tale concerns Mr. Tylor at one end and Mr. Arthur Evans at the other. At all events, Mr. Froude would have done well to mention that they are the only recorded heretics in English history for several centuries, and that they made only one English proselyte. They seem to have belonged to some of the sects which passed from Asia into Bulgaria and Bosnia, and thence into various parts of western Europe, southern Gaul above all. They were not burned or put to death in any way; they were whipped and branded, and turned loose, all men being forbidden to help them. Mr. Froude truly calls this "a fate more piteous than the stake." I think that we may see in this sentence a feeling of superstition — I can this time freely use the word — deeper than Mr. Froude seems to suspect. It is of a piece with various ways in which men have sought to cause death without incurring the responsibility of taking life, especially in the form of shedding blood. It is of a piece with the imprisonment of Antigonê in the tomb; it is of a piece with Bishop Odo's club on the day of Senlac. I will not say that it is of a piece with the substitution of mutilation for death in the legislation of the Conqueror, because I believe that that was honestly meant to be a legislation of mercy, however different it

* The hand of a novice is curiously displayed in Mr. Froude's description of the young king, Henry the Third, as some called him in his own day. He becomes "Henry Plantagenet, eldest son of Henry the Second, Prince of Wales as we should now call him, called then the 'young king,' for he was crowned in his father's lifetime." This is not the way in which those who are familiar with the young king and with his coronation would speak of him. The phrase "Henry Plantagenet" shows that Mr. Froude is one of those who fancy that the nickname of Count Geoffrey was borne as a hereditary surname by his grandchildren. And why "Prince of Wales as we should now call him"? We call the present heir-apparent Prince of Wales, because his mother and sovereign has so created him. If the creation had not taken place — and in the case of several heirs-apparent it did not take place till long after their birth — we should not call him Prince of Wales. But why anybody should have dreamed of the eldest son of the king of England being Prince of Wales in the twelfth century, no man can guess. It is like the Dauphin who, in so many histories, is made to invade England in the time of John, a good deal more than a hundred years before the Viennese Dauphiny became the possession of the eldest son of the French king. Elsewhere Mr. Froude talks about "Prince William," "Princess Margaret," exactly as if they had belonged to the illustrious house of Hanover.

* This is a piece by Thomas Agnellus, a canon of Wells, printed, I think, in one of Mr. Robertson's volumes.

† Not that Stowe is to be despised. He was the only writer who made use of the contemporary life of Edward the Confessor while it was still in manuscript. Still it is odd to quote from him rather than from a contemporary writer.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

may now seem in our eyes. But in any case the partisans of Thomas may comfort themselves with the thought that with this act he and his friends had nothing to do; it was wholly the doing of the king and of the bishops of his party.

Mr. Froude then goes on to ask, "What were the bishops and clergy like themselves?" The answer which any fair inquirer into the time would give is that there were among them, as among other men, both good and bad. The fault lay not at all in the absence of the good, but in the toleration of the bad. The bishops of Henry the Second's reign — setting aside the saint of Lincoln who had not yet shown himself, and numbering among them some men who were strongly opposed to Thomas — were by no means a contemptible set of men, either in attainments or in character. Age had tamed the fire of Henry of Winchester; Gilbert of London, Bartholomew of Exeter, Hilary of Chichester, were by no means men to be thrust aside in a few general words. Some of them had distinctly risen by personal merit. But all that Mr. Froude has to say in answer to his own question is to tell, and — what Mr. Froude surely need not have done — to spoil in the telling, the grotesque story of the scuffle between the two archbishops in the Council of 1176. As Mr. Froude has given an extract from Stowe, I will send my readers to enjoy the story in its fulness in Godwin's "Catalogue of Bishops." Here the chief performer was Roger Archbishop of York, Thomas's great enemy. Of him it is perfectly true that John of Salisbury repeats, as Mr. Froude says, a tale of crime than which nothing could be worse. But I suspect that Mr. Froude has hardly stopped to think on what light evidence such stories were told and believed in days when the restraints which in our day put a check on both speaking and writing were quite unknown. A man must have a large faith in the depravity of mankind, if he believes that all the enemies of Giraldus were quite so black as Giraldus paints them. John of Salisbury was a man of higher stamp than Giraldus; but it is easy to believe that even he would not bring the severest rules of evidence to bear on a story which told so strongly against the chief of the other party. And against the report which described Archbishop Roger as the most infamous of mankind, we may fairly set the fact, that his early promotions were due to the favor of such a man as Archbishop Theobald.

Mr. Froude then goes on to say: —

> As to the inferior clergy, it might be enough to quote the language used about them at the conference at Montmiraux in 1169, where their general character was said to be atrocious, a great number of them being church-robbers, adulterers, highwaymen, thieves, ravishers of virgins, incendiaries, and murderers.

Mr. Froude gives the original in a note, and adds the reference, "John of Salisbury to the Bishop of Exeter. Letters, 1169." A reader who did not verify the reference might be tempted to think that it was John of Salisbury who gave this description of his brethren. But happily the letters of John of Salisbury are not at Simancas, and the passage may be found with an effort, even in the edition of Dr. Giles. He who makes the effort will find that the words come from the mouth of King Henry. The reader may judge how much or how little qualification is to be made on this account; but at all events when Mr. Froude says, "it is said," he should have added who it was that said it.

One specimen more does Mr. Froude give before he comes to his strong point of all. This is the character of Abbot Clarembald of Saint Augustines. Nothing, except the story about Roger, can be worse, and there is no reason to doubt the truth of an official report. Some might whisper that one cause of evil in this case was the exemption of the monastery from ordinary jurisdiction. But this is just the kind of point which Mr. Froude is not likely to stop and think about. The case of Clarembald — a strong partisan of the king's, as Mr. Froude does not conceal — undoubtedly proves a fearful lack of discipline when such a man could have been endured for a day. But it does not prove, as Mr. Froude evidently wishes to imply, that the clergy in general, or that abbots in general, were men of the same type. It would be just as fair to describe the virtues of Saint Hugh or of Saint William of York, and to infer that all other bishops were like them.

But Mr. Froude has a stronger point than all. He loves to take some one book or some one author, and to make use of him as a kind of text. It is not always a fair way of handling a subject; but it is often an effective way. Mr. Froude, we know, has tried it with the "Magna Vita Sancti Hugonis" and with the "Gesta Abbatum." He now tries it with the satires, prose and verse, of Nigel of Canterbury, printed among the "Satirical Poems" in the "Chronicles and Memorials." Here beyond sea I have not the book at hand; but I remember its general purport,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY and Mr. Froude gives large extracts. Mr. Froude says with truth: —

> In reading him we feel that we are looking at the old England through an extremely keen pair of eyes. We discern, too, perhaps that he was a clever fellow, constitutionally a satirist, and disappointed of promotion, and we make the necessary allowances.

A man must have a much deeper acquaintance with the writings of those times than we can fairly give Mr. Froude credit for before he fully understands how much allowance is necessary in such a case. Mr. Froude, in drawing his black picture of the twelfth century, has left out one of its chief vices, utter unscrupulousness of statement in the whole class of writings of which these of Nigel are specimens. I have mentioned some examples already. It is a case in which goodness of purpose is no guaranty of literal truth. No man was so likely to draw an utterly one-sided, a grossly exaggerated, picture, as a man who was really stirred up by righteous zeal against the vices of his age. As a rule, no sinner uses fiercer, or even fouler, language than a saint in a rage. One chief motive which imposes some measure of restraint on a modern reformer was absent. In our times, with our endless variety of sects and parties, each is a check on every other. Each is on its good behavior in the presence of all the rest. Gross scandals are less likely to happen, and, when they do happen, if there are those whose interest it is to expose them, there are those whose interest it is to hush them up. Every man observes some moderation in denouncing the vices of his own party, lest, in denouncing its vices, he should chance to endanger either its principles or its success. Every disputant now remembers the saying about washing one's dirty linen at home. But when all western Europe, setting aside Jews and Saracens, was of one theological mind, none of these motives had any play. Wherever the dirty linen was washed, it was equally at home. Wherever and to whomever the fierce reformer made his declaration, there were no Nonconformists, no outsiders of any kind, to hear it. He might rebuke the vices of priests, bishops, and popes, without being supposed to shake the foundations of the priesthood, the episcopate, or the popedom. The greater was his faith in the thing itself, the more unsparing, the more reckless, would be his denunciations of all its abuses. In such a case we must take off at least as much from the denunciations of an internal reformer as we should now take off from the denunciations of an external enemy. In both cases the charges are sure to have some foundation in fact: in both cases they are sure to be exaggerated; in both cases there is sure to be that particular form of exaggeration which consists in taking the worst case that can be found and making it typical of the whole class. In this way it would be easy to draw a very black picture of almost any class of men in almost any age. It would certainly be easy to draw a very black picture of classes of men whose average is far higher than that of the English clergy in the twelfth century. When we turn to the particular charges made by Nigel, we shall see that some of them, allowing for exaggeration, are true enough, while others seem quite wide of the mark. When he complains that the officers of the king's court and household were forced as bishops upon unwilling chapters and convents, he describes one of the chief abuses of the time, and it is quite possible that in this or that particular case all the scandalous details which he describes may have taken place. But when he speaks of the sons of nobles being put into bishoprics while they were still children, he is describing an abuse which was rather Continental than English. The English bishops of that age did not, as a rule, belong to great families, and they were not, as a rule, appointed in extreme youth. Henry of Winchester, grandson, nephew, and brother of kings, stands alone among the bishops with whom Thomas had to deal as an example of a bishop belonging to the highest rank.* Most of the prelates of his time had made their way to high places by personal qualifications of some kind, though those qualifications were not always of a kind for which we should now think ecclesiastical office the fitting reward. On one point there is little doubt that Mr. Froude has failed, through lack of familiarity with the language of the time, to understand the formulas of reviling employed by his author. Hugh Nonant, Bishop of Chester, Coventry, or Lichfield, whichever we choose to call him, drove out the monks of Coventry and put secular canons in their stead. Richard of Devizes bewails the act as well as Nigel.

* Saint William of York is also said to have been a nephew of King Stephen; but the pedigree is hard to make out. The custom of using bishoprics as provisions for cadets or bastards of the royal family, so common in some other countries, never prevailed in England. Bishops of noble families were not wholly unknown at any time, but they became much more common some centuries later.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

In an age when change more commonly was the other way, the act of Bishop Hugh was indeed startling. Any one who knows the age will understand how any monastic writer would speak of it. The monk Nigel speaks of the monastery being turned into a brothel and of harlots being openly brought into cloister and chapter-house. Most likely all this means nothing more than that some of the canons were married.

I do not undertake the defence of an age when the deepest abuses were undoubtedly rife. But I ask for justice. I ask that a whole class of men shall not be described from the portraits of the very worst among them. And, leaving this matter aside, I ask that a picture of the faults of one class of men in that or in any other age shall not be taken as a sufficient picture of that age. To understand the life and times of Thomas Becket, it is indeed necessary to take in the great and crying evils which prevailed in the Church of that day. But it is also necessary to take in a great many other things, to the understanding of which Mr. Froude gives no help whatever. Having thus cleared the way by giving the reader some help towards forming an estimate of Mr. Froude's capacity for dealing with twelfth-century history, I may go on in another paper to see how he deals in detail with the life and times of the man whose age he has so thoroughly failed to understand, and whose own origin and position he has so utterly mistaken.

EDWARD A. FREEMAN.

ERICA.*

TRANSLATED FOR THE LIVING AGE FROM THE GERMAN OF

FRAU VON INGERSLEBEN.

XXXIX.

THE GUARDIAN'S LETTER.

ELMAR had resolved to say nothing to Katharina about the discovery of the document, but merely use it as a shield against the attack which she would probably soon commence. Moreover, he thought that Wehlen would speedily search for the hidden treasure, and, on missing it, suspect the truth and withhold Katharina from any violent assault, and in this way there was a prospect of avoiding an open quarrel with his sister.

* Copyright 1877, by Littell & Gay.

The young pastor, who was greatly depressed by the consciousness that he had involuntarily been greatly to blame in bestowing his confidence upon Wehlen, was kindly, nay, even cordially, consoled by Elmar, while at the same time he informed him, so far as he was able, of the man's past career, as well as the circumstances which compelled him to permit the presence of such a person.

The worthy Reinhardt was actually horrified by these communications, and as he also remembered that Wehlen had told him at Dorneck that he owed his parish to his efforts, felt doubly saddened by the thought that, in a certain sense, he had been placed in his present position only to serve as Wehlen's tool.

A happy smile hovered around Elmar's lips, as he assured him that Wehlen's intercession had been utterly useless, and very different considerations had induced him to allow Reinhardt to appear as a candidate for his present parish.

Although the young baron rarely dined with his grandmother, he appeared at the dinner hour the following day, and the old lady must have expected him, for though he had not announced his intention, he found a place prepared.

All were very gay, even Sidonie was more talkative than usual, and Elmar was so delighted with his companions that he did not, as usual, go to his own room after dinner to smoke his cigar, but remained in the baroness's apartments. In spite of this, however, the old lady soon retired to take her usual afternoon nap, and Sidonie — though she generally spent this time in reading by the fire — also preferred the solitude of her room.

Erica, on the contrary, had taken her favorite seat, and when Elmar approached, said mischievously, —

"I am sure you are going to appeal to my compassionate heart, Elmar; so, out of my overflowing kindness, I will anticipate your request, and most solemnly grant you permission to smoke your cigar."

"Are you really so sure that your compassionate heart is to be put in requisition for a cigar, or have you perhaps some faint suspicion that, at this moment, it is very far from my thoughts?" replied Elmar, laughing as he seated himself beside her.

"How could I imagine such a remarkable circumstance?" replied Erica, also laughing, though there was something in her voice which belied the words.

Elmar leaned eagerly forward and looked into her face, but Erica's eyes were fixed intently on the fire, and he could not

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

catch a glance. "You are, as I told you in Dorneck, a wicked little coquette, Erica," he said at last; "no longer the truthful little heather-blossom, whose feelings were so legible in her eyes."

"If that were the case," replied Erica, still fixing her thoughtful gaze upon the flames, "you must have read a great deal of anger against yourself, for at first I was in a state of chronic rebellion against you."

"Against me, Erica? I don't believe it. I saw only resistance against the feelings with which I inspired you. The little untamed bird struggled against imprisonment, as was natural."

"You at least have kept your sincerity, Elmar," replied Erica, laughing gaily. "This frank confession of the blindest vanity can almost be called magnificent."

"Will you deny your childish love, Erica? Can you look me in the eyes and say that my image was not in your heart in those days?"

The young girl must have feared that this experiment would disclose the truth, for instead of looking at him, she cast down her eyes and made no reply.

"Since the little heather-blossom has been transformed into a lady, who no longer shows her feelings so openly," continued Elmar, in a lower tone, "I am not so sure of my happiness, but I hope the lady will not give the lie to the child."

In spite of the treacherous flush on her cheeks, Erica answered in her former tone,—

"If the child really behaved like a little goose, we will, on the contrary, hope that the girl has become more sensible."

"Such boundless coquetry deserves a severe punishment, Erica," cried Elmar; and he seemed to wish to leave her in no uncertainty as to the nature of the punishment, for he leaned hastily forward, and only her quick movement saved her cheek from his kiss, for his lips lightly brushed her hair.

"I will tell grandmamma, Elmar," she said, pouting.

"Tell tales, Erica?" he asked, without apparently being much alarmed by the threat.

"To expose any one to well-merited punishment is not telling tales."

"Then if I am to be reproved, I will at least deserve it;" and this time he carried out his intention more successfully, for ere Erica had time to prevent it, she felt his kiss on her lips.

"Elmar!" she exclaimed, breathless with indignation, and tried to spring from her seat to leave the room, but the arm he had thrown around her waist held her firmly, and she could make no resistance when he whispered,—

"These are the consequences of incautious threats, Erica."

"But, my sweet little heather-blossom," he continued in the same low whisper, "how happy I am in the thought that I can soon show the little woodland fairy to the world as my bride! When I bade you farewell in Waldbad, I was forced to summon up all my strength of will not to clasp you to my heart, and call you mine. The tears you shed at our parting fell heavily on my heart, and my resolution, which had hitherto wavered, became firm; I vowed at some future day to claim you for my own."

"If those tears were the cause of your resolution, I must unhappily undeceive you, Elmar. Those tears were principally caused by the separation from little Carlos."

His arm clasped her still more closely, as he said, "You forget that in those days I could read the language of your eyes very plainly. Those deep brown eyes, into which I so unexpectedly gazed when I awoke, are really to blame for everything, for they exerted a magnetic power over me. I have often thought of the strange fatality by which Katharina's obstinacy in insisting upon choosing that particular watering-place, to protect me from all the arrows of Cupid, was the turning-point in my destiny, and I — who had hitherto felt only a passing fancy — must needs fall seriously in love with a child."

"And what part did Caroline Sternau play in these passing fancies?" asked Erica archly.

"A very pleasant one. But for the society of that agreeable girl, I should, in spite of everything, have been scarcely able to endure the stupidity of Waldbad, and as, moreover, she served to divert Katharina's suspicion, she played a most praiseworthy double rôle. But, Erica," continued Elmar, again bending towards her, "you must now give me a direct answer to my suit."

"To your suit? You have not asked for my love, sir, but only authoritatively declared that you intended to show me to the world as your bride."

"You frighten me, Erica. I am in despair that my kiss has so signally failed in interpreting my feelings. I will try to make amends for the oversight as soon as possible;" and Erica did not seem to be so much on her guard as before, for he again succeeded in pressing his lips to hers.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

"Elmar, you monster!" she murmured, but made no farther attempt to escape, and Elmar would perhaps have continued his declaration of love still longer in this very impressive manner, had not a slight noise in the ante-room announced the return of the old baroness.

"Grandmamma!" exclaimed Erica in alarm, trying to release herself from Elmar's arm.

"Will you tell tales, Erica?" he whispered, and seemed inclined to make the old lady a witness of the scene. At last, however, he slowly withdrew his arm, and had scarcely placed the necessary distance between himself and Erica, when the baroness entered the room.

"I hope you have slept well, for you have stayed away a long time, grandmamma," cried Elmar.

The old lady glanced at the young couple, took her usual seat, and said, smiling: "You look as if you could have dispensed with my society for some time longer, children."

"There you are mistaken, grandmamma, for your entrance, as on the first time you found us here, interrupted a very serious quarrel. The young lady by my side was just bitterly reproaching me for not having made her a satisfactory declaration of love."

Erica flushed crimson, but instantly regained her composure, and said: "The insolent assurance with which Elmar takes my love for granted, is really insulting, grandmamma."

"I hope you have repelled his bold advances with fitting severity, Erica."

"I was just doing so when you came in, grandmamma."

"So I appeared at a very unsuitable time. But calm yourself, my little Erica. I will protect you in your rights, and insist that Elmar shall go down on his knees to express his feelings in a proper manner and conquer your hard heart by his humility. But defer your quarrel for the present. I hear Sidonie coming; she received the long-expected letter from her guardian to-day, so she will not be in the mood to feel any special interest in your affairs."

The expression of Sidonie's face when she entered the room certainly seemed to justify this prediction. She was deadly pale, dark rings surrounded her eyes, and her delicate lips were firmly compressed. She held the letter she had just received in her hand, and approaching the old lady, said in a hollow tone, —

"Read it, grandmamma."

She then took her usual seat, rested her head on her hand, and gazed at the fire, almost without noticing the presence of Elmar and Erica.

The old baroness took the letter, and read the following lines: —

"My reply has been long delayed, my dear Sidonie, partly because I wished to give you time to repent of your foolish refusal to marry Meerburg, and partly because I could not send you the necessary information before.

"You know that the sudden death of your parents prevented me from seeing them to tell them how gladly I undertook the charge of your property, and how much pleasure it would give me to receive you into my own family, if your uncle Rodenwald did not have the nearest claim to you. But at the same time, this sad circumstance deprived me of obtaining any exact information in regard to their wishes concerning you, and although aware that young Count Meerburg was intended for your husband, and the marriage was desirable on account of your property, my knowledge of the matter was very incomplete and superficial.

"By an unlucky accident, this future husband's uncle and guardian, at whose suggestion the arrangements for the marriage had been made, died almost immediately after your parents. You were still a child; Werner Meerburg was roaming about in Spain or Egypt, so I felt that there was no occasion to trouble myself much about the affair. When, however, Meerburg returned, and you reached your nineteenth year, I went to him — as matters did not seem to progress very rapidly — and asked for further particulars about the intended alliance, with which he, as I knew, was thoroughly familiar.

"He would not speak frankly, declared he knew nothing about any imperative considerations of property, and when I urged him to conclude his marriage, told me — it must be said, my dear Sidonie — that if he should decide to do so, he would not at any rate be betrothed to you until you had reached your twentieth year, as he hated such early marriages. I plainly perceived that this was a mere subterfuge to delay the decisive moment, and therefore became somewhat vexed, and said I would give him that length of time, but should then insist upon his declaration.

"As he would not consent that this should be the limit, I unfortunately believed that he was averse to the marriage, but thought it my duty to ask the question in plain terms, and was extremely sur-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

prised by his answer. Instead of, as I supposed, being averse to it, he declared his willingness in terms of almost exaggerated joy.

"This was very satisfactory to me, and I supposed the affair settled, for I could not imagine that you, my dear Sidonie, would have any possible objection to Werner Meerburg. Your letter, which reached me soon after Werner's, therefore fell upon me like a thunderbolt from a clear sky, and you must hear that I was really very angry with you, nay, am so still.

"Of course it now first of all became my unpleasant duty to ascertain the exact reasons for the intended alliance, and I therefore applied to Herr Sommer, the lawyer who had managed all old Meerburg's affairs, and was therefore probably acquainted with the matter. As, however, I preferred to discuss the affair verbally, and the gout confined me to my bed for some time, after which I was detained by other important business, I have only just succeeded in calling upon him.

"The news he gave me was certainly exact enough, but at the same time of such a different nature from what I expected, that I reproached myself for not having obtained more particular information sooner, in order to prevent a refusal on your part. Your parents were almost compelled to betroth their only child, when scarcely out of her cradle, to Meerburg's son, for this boy was the real owner of all your father's entailed estates. Yes, my dear Sidonie, a document Sommer showed me proves that Werner Meerburg is the heir of all the estates which have descended to you, and — if you persist in your refusal — only a small property, which bears no comparison to your present income, will remain.

"I hope, however, my dear child, that a due consideration of all these circumstances will change this capricious whim. Werner Meerburg is in every respect a brilliant match, for besides his great wealth, he is clever, agreeable, honorable, and, so far as I can judge, a handsome young man — a refusal to marry him, without any special reason, is madness. I should certainly shut my Luise up in her own room for her obstinacy, if she played me such a trick as you have done, my little daughter; and though you may be sure that I shall not stretch my authority over you so far, it is absolutely necessary for me to represent the matter verbally in all its bearings, that you may not run into any misfortune. Therefore, if you persist in your folly, I shall insist upon having a visit from you, for you cannot expect your gouty old cousin to come to Altenborn.

"As for your desire to become abbess of Herdrungen, I have no reply to make, my dear Sidonie, for the whole affair is quite too ridiculous. Women do not become abbesses when they are young and beautiful, but wait until both charms have vanished, so there is no other course for you except to defer your wish until you are of age, and I am no longer accountable for your folly. I trust, however, that during the long time I have given you for reflection, you have grown more sensible, and will not continue to annoy me, since the gout and similar things afford me vexation enough. In this hope I am, my dear Sidonie,

"Your affectionate cousin,

"GUNTHER HARDECK."

The baroness laid the letter on the table, and looked at Sidonie. "This is no pleasant news, my dear child," she said quietly, "but I confess that I share Count Hardeck's hope, and see in it the only solution of this complicated affair."

Sidonie's black eyes flashed with a light by no means in harmony with the old lady's words, and the old repellant expression was once more plainly visible in the haughty curl of her lip. "You are joking, grandmamma," she answered, drawing herself up to her full height. "If it was formerly possible for me to retract my refusal, the opportunity is now forever lost. If, for the sake of paltry wealth, I should now consent where I before declined, I should be forced to despise myself, and never dare to hold up my head again. No; rather poverty and wretchedness, than happiness purchased by such dishonor!"

Elmar and Erica gazed in astonishment at Sidonie, whose loud, passionate words formed so striking a contrast to her usual manner. Elmar recollected Werner's words, and found in them the key to the mystery, so he turned towards her saying,—

"I know that Werner feared the impression of the news you have just received, Sidonie."

"What? You knew that Werner was the real heir of my property, and yet left me in ignorance of the fact," cried Sidonie vehemently, her dark eyes blazing with an almost threatening light.

"No, Sidonie, I did not know it. Werner expressed himself in general terms, and was the more cautious, as he cher-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

ished the hope that this dreaded information would never reach you."

"A generosity for which I owe him little gratitude," replied Sidonie, with quivering lips; "it wounds, humiliates me. I am ashamed of the elegance of my dress, the luxury which has hitherto surrounded me, for I am in consequence Count Meerburg's debtor. I believe the thought flattered his vanity and caused his silence."

"You are excited, Sidonie, or you would not make such an unjust accusation. In spite of your prejudice against him, you must feel how sincerely Werner loves you, and ——"

A hasty wave of the hand silenced him. "Hush, Elmar!" she passionately exclaimed, "I will hear nothing about him. He has tried to humiliate me in every way, and I reject with loathing a love, which ——"

"Sidonie!" interrupted the grave, almost angry voice of the baroness.

The reproof expressed in the exclamation seemed to fall heavily on Sidonie's heart, for she relapsed into silence, and gazed steadily into the fire, while her usually quiet features, now distorted with pain, looked actually corpse-like in their pallor. Suddenly she started up, and, hastily approaching the old lady, threw her arms around her neck, burst into tears, and exclaimed amid her sobs,—

"Forgive me, grandmamma, forgive me! You do not know how utterly miserable I am."

The old lady clasped the weeping girl in her arms, murmuring low, soothing words, and then led her into her own room, where she remained a long time, until Sidonie had become comparatively calm. She thought it perfectly natural, however, that the latter declined to return to the drawing-room, but preferred to spend the evening in her own appartment, as she needed solitude to regain her composure.

After Sidonie left the room, Elmar instantly rose, went to the table, read the letter lying upon it, and then communicated its contents to Erica. It was a sorrowful thought to both, that just as their own happiness was beginning to dawn, this new shadow should fall upon Werner and Sidonie. The baroness found the young lovers engaged in earnest conversation, and they still continued to talk of Sidonie, so the evening was spent in a much more serious way than it had begun. But when Elmar withdrew, notwithstanding the baroness's presence, he could not refrain from clasping the blushing Erica in his arms, and in spite of the unsatisfactory declaration of love, she permitted his good-night kiss.

XL.

THE RIDE.

When Sidonie entered the sitting-room the next morning her features again wore their usual quiet, cold expression, and her increased pallor alone betrayed past agitation, as the weary look in her eyes perhaps revealed a sleepless night. She did not mention the letter again, and both the old lady and Erica knew her well enough to be aware that she had conquered her grief so far as not to show any external signs of it, and therefore desired total silence to be maintained in regard to the affair.

In the course of the morning the princess, who for several days had not been well, and therefore remained in her own room, asked if the young ladies felt disposed to join her in a ride. In spite of the season of the year, the air was mild and pleasant, the sun shone brightly, and Erica's eyes sparkled at the thought of once more enjoying the pleasure of a swift gallop. Sidonie hesitated, she evidently wished to gain sufficient self-control to accept the invitation. The bodily weakness caused by her mental sufferings was, however, so great, that, against her will, she was obliged to decline, and, perhaps in order to render her own absence less remarkable, earnestly desired Erica to make one of the party, and eagerly persuaded her to join it.

"Perhaps Elmar will be displeased, grandmamma?" asked Erica doubtfully, in order to obtain the old lady's sanction.

The baroness certainly feared that Elmar would not be particularly pleased to learn that his betrothed bride was in Wehlen's company, but she had already gone out to ride with him several times, and the sight of Erica's sparkling eyes made it impossible for her to deprive her of the eagerly desired pleasure.

"You can go without fear, little one," she said; "Elmar, as you know, drove over to one of the neighboring estates early this morning, so we cannot get his opinion. I think, however, he will have no objection."

Erica was therefore soon standing in her riding-habit on the terrace, where Miss Ella was already waiting. Katharina had not yet appeared, but Wehlen was there, and apparently engaged in some little dispute with the head groom. Both were standing close beside Miss Ella, and she heard the latter say angrily,—

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

"The horse was saddled under my care, Herr von Wehlen, and does not need your inspection."

"I have no desire to interfere with your business," replied Wehlen, in a much more courteous tone; "I am only surprised that a lady's horse should be ridden with a mere snaffle."

"It is easily governed, docile, and good-tempered, so it does not need the curb."

"Very well," said Wehlen, shrugging his shoulders, "I am not responsible if any accident happens."

He now perceived Erica, and approaching her greeted her with courteous ease,— not even the quiver of a muscle betrayed any recollection of the unpleasant scene they had had at their last meeting. Erica did not possess this ready tact, and answered curtly in an almost embarrassed manner.

Katharina now appeared, and the whole party mounted and set off at a gallop. Wehlen's horse must have become impatient from waiting so long, for it suddenly reared and then sprang forward so violently that it required all his skill to keep his saddle.

"Wouldn't one suppose Herr von Wehlen was riding Satan, the head groom's horse, instead of Antonius, the quietest beast in the whole stable?" said one of the stable-boys, who had remained on the terrace, looking after the party. "I believe he spurred the animal to show off before the ladies."

"I think so too," remarked one of his companions, "for he gave special orders that Antonius should be saddled for him to-day, and it wasn't out of fear, I'll bet. A man can always show off his riding better on a docile horse than a spirited one."

"And did you hear how our head groom was quarrelling with him again? He seems full of gall and venom whenever he sees him."

"To be sure, and it is only because Lebrecht was sent off yesterday evening. He has deserved it often enough, for he is a perfect idler, but his connection with Herr von Wehlen was what first made him lose favor with the head groom."

"And did he find it out last evening?" asked one of the men.

"Well, he has probably suspected for a long time that Lebrecht was a spy, and told everything that happened in the stable, but yesterday evening, as the head groom happened to go in to look after one of the horses, he found the strange gentleman busily talking to Lebrecht, and saw him put some money into his hand. I don't know whether he heard anything wrong or not, but at any rate he took the sickness of Cleopatra, the horse Lebrecht almost killed, for an excuse, and discharged him on the spot. Herr von Wehlen tried to intercede for him, but received no very pleasant answer, Heaven knows, and oh! if the head groom had only seen the look he gave him when he went out of the stable, he might perhaps be a little anxious about his own place here."

Meantime the little party had gone down the winding avenue and passed through the gate of the park, where, leaving the castle on one side, they entered a road which led them now between level fields, anon past high hills, and then for a considerable distance along the banks of a brawling stream. In summer it was undoubtedly one of the most charming roads that could be selected, but, notwithstanding this, the head groom was not pleased with the choice, as in the slippery condition of the soil at this season of the year, it might not be wholly free from danger. He therefore rode forward to the princess, and remonstrated with her, but the latter was not in the habit of relinquishing her caprices, and perhaps was rendered still more obstinate by the half-contemptuous smile that curled Wehlen's lips, so she made a short, stern reply, and, touching her horse with the whip, dashed swiftly forward along the road selected.

The air was delightful, and — rare combination — united to the mild softness of spring the bracing freshness of autumn. The riders eagerly inhaled the invigorating atmosphere, their cheeks flushed, their eyes sparkled, and if the reins were sometimes involuntarily held in a looser grasp, that they might more fully enjoy the delicious air by riding at a slower pace, its very freshness soon tempted them into a swift gallop. The blue veils of the ladies fluttered in the breeze, their dark habits were sprinkled with flakes of foam from the horses' bits, and their gloved hands applied the whip lightly, but in consequence of always striking the same spot, in a tolerably impressive fashion. Either Miss Ella was offended by the persistent caress of the riding-whip, or, in spite of the fine weather, she felt in a remarkably bad humor; at all events, she did not show her usual quiet docility. Several times already she had shied violently, though Erica had been unable to discover any cause for her alarm, and now, with a loud snort of terror, she again sprang entirely across the road, so that the young girl was nearly thrown from the saddle.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

The head groom was instantly at her side to offer his assistance; but Erica laughingly declined it, and patted the trembling animal, which in answer to the caress, turned its head trustingly towards its mistress.

"What is the matter with you to-day, miss? You are not apt to be timid," said the latter, as she again patted the horse's slender neck.

"I think I have noticed that Ella shies whenever An — Antonius approaches her;" said the head groom in a low tone, fixing his eyes angrily on Wehlen.

"We sympathize with each other, Ella," replied Erica gaily. "You don't like the horse, nor I the rider, so we will both be on our guard."

"That is what I would seriously advise, Fräulein," said the head groom significantly. "I don't understand this business at all, our steady Antonius seems positively frantic to-day."

"He has probably been standing a long time, and the beautiful weather excites him," replied Erica carelessly, and giving her horse a light tap with the whip, galloped swiftly forward over the soft, grass-grown road.

The head groom remained a little in the rear looking after her slender figure. The graceful ease with which she sat her horse seemed to relieve his anxiety a little, for his face brightened, though he continued to watch Wehlen distrustfully, to see how far his suspicions were justified. Antonius, however, appeared to have grown more quiet, for Wehlen rode for some time beside the princess, engaged in eager conversation.

This had probably withdrawn his attention from his horse, for the latter suddenly became restless again, and ere his rider could prevent it, darted forward, and the next instant was close beside Erica, who was riding alone. So violent was the bound with which the unruly animal sprang against Erica's horse, that the latter was pushed on one side of the road, and in its terror reared, and was in imminent danger of plunging over the steep bank into the stream. Erica's cheeks grew pale, and her trembling lips were firmly compressed, but the next instant her eyes sparkled, and turning her horse with all her strength, she guided it directly against Wehlen. For a moment the two animals dashed forward side by side, then Ella darted ahead, and was soon in safety on the other side of the road.

Erica now looked back, and saw Wehlen bending down to soothe his horse. She could not see his eyes, but even through the drooping lids felt the hate and anger they expressed. He pressed his hand upon his foot, as if it pained him, or he wished to convince himself that it was not injured, and then rode slowly towards her.

"I shall be careful to choose the other side, Fräulein," he said on reaching her, "that I may not again run the risk of having my foot crushed by your horse. In this situation, in case of a similar manœuvre, Ella's fair rider would suffer even more than I, so I feel perfectly safe."

"I am sorry if I have unintentionally hurt you, Herr von Wehlen," replied Erica gravely; "but I cannot apologize, as it was the only way to save myself from falling into the stream and thereby meeting instant death."

Wehlen laughed loudly. "I beg ten thousand pardons, Fräulein," he said courteously, "but this view of the matter really seems somewhat ridiculous. A quiet horse like yours does not plunge recklessly into a river, and even if you had lost control over it, the soft bank would have yielded and Miss Ella at the utmost only wet her feet."

"Perhaps so," replied Erica curtly, "my position, however, seemed dangerous."

"Then I have to apologize for placing you in this apparent danger. I don't know what has happened to Antonius to-day. I chose him particularly because I always like to ride a quiet horse when I accompany ladies."

Wehlen seemed disposed to ride on with Erica, for though she did not reply, and gave no tokens that she desired his presence, he remained at her side, and regulated the pace of his horse by hers. Erica did not know how to avoid the companionship, as she did not wish to openly offend this dangerous man, so she silently endured his presence, while reflecting upon some means to get away.

"For so little experience, you are already a very skilful rider, Fräulein," Wehlen began, after a short pause. "I see you know the favorite manner of apparently playing with the whip, and yet making it plainly felt."

"It is not necessary in galloping, but the English trot cannot be kept up for any length of time without it," replied Erica, whose interest in the subject conquered her repugnance to the speaker. "In galloping the regular movement goes on naturally, while the trot, on the contrary, must be skilfully aided, in order

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

to maintain its uniformity. An actual blow, by suddenly increasing the speed of the horse, would destroy this regularity, while this constant playing with the whip encourages the animal, and keeps it moving at the same pace."

"So the art of riding has been reduced to a certain system. But do you know how to make a horse caracole?"

"I am not curious about it, Herr von Wehlen, for I don't ride for others' pleasure, but my own."

"You are still in the first stage of riding, Fräulein Erica," cried Wehlen, laughing; "afterwards we are no longer satisfied with that; we want to shine, to reap fame and honor by our horsemanship. Besides, these little feats are very easy, and excite more fear in the spectators than is at all necessary."

"Does our road lead into the mountains?" asked Erica, almost anxiously, fixing her eyes on some lofty hills that rose before them.

"I hope we have not missed our way," said Wehlen, looking round; "besides, so far as I am aware, it only leads through the mountains for a short distance, and we then come out on the level ground again."

"We have left the others far behind," exclaimed Erica in alarm, as she also looked around. "Let us turn and ride back."

"Or rather go forward more slowly, to give them time to overtake us. If you will allow me, I can show you some of the feats of horsemanship we were just talking about."

"Thank you," replied Erica coldly, "but I have no desire to make Ella restless so near these cliffs."

"As you please, Fräulein," replied Wehlen, with a contempt, which, spite of his efforts, be was unable to conceal.

His tone and manner affected Erica very unpleasantly. The fact that she was alone with him suddenly fell with oppressive weight upon her heart, and she resolved to turn back and join the princess, who was at some distance in the rear.

"Merciful God, Fräulein, what are you doing? Take care of your horse!" shouted Wehlen anxiously, as, without informing him of her intention, she tried to turn Miss Ella. She had either pulled the bridle too hard, or the sudden exclamation frightened the horse, for it again started violently, sprang half way across the road, so that Erica almost lost her seat, and then stood still for a moment, trembling all over, while its nostrils dilated with its terrified snorting.

"Keep back!" she cried angrily, as Wehlen officiously hurried to her assistance, but the latter paid no heed and was already at her side.

"Pull the bridle firmly, that you may keep your control over the horse!" he exclaimed anxiously.

She made no reply, but took good care not to follow the advice, for the same manœuvre had just made Ella rear. Strangely enough, the latter suddenly, without any apparent cause, once more rose in the air, and then, as if pursued by the furies, darted forward at such furious speed that Erica momentarily expected to be thrown from the saddle.

Wehlen instantly dashed after her, and Ella, as if in mortal fear of her pursuer, only quickened her pace whenever she heard him approach. Erica retained sufficient presence of mind to exert all her skill to keep in the saddle, while she held the reins loosely in her hands, as the terrified animal could not yet be controlled.

The road now entered the mountains, and as it grew narrower, the declivities on either side became more steep, and the wild speed of the horse more dangerous. Erica felt that she must fight for her life for the second time, and terror began to make her eyes grow dim, and rob her mind of its clearness. By a violent effort she struggled against the weakness, and summoned all her strength to try to regain control of the horse. The bridle was suddenly pulled with so powerful a hand that the animal, taken by surprise, seemed to yield to her authority, and Erica perceived with delight that she was beginning to regain her control.

It was high time, for the road constantly became wilder and more dangerous, the precipices on either side deeper, and Erica gazed in horror at the dangers surrounding her, whose full extent she realized for the first time when they seemed almost at an end. But Wehlen now rode up close beside her, and his snorting horse frightened Ella again, so that she reared, sprang from the road, dashed along a projecting cliff, and rushed straight towards the spot where it fell abruptly down into the valley.

Erica's deathlike pallor showed that she was only too well aware of this new and terrible danger, yet she did not lose her presence of mind, but exerted all her strength to save herself.

"Throw yourself from the horse! In God's name, be quick! Throw yourself from the horse!" she heard the voice of the head groom shouting from the distance.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Scarcely had her ear caught the words, when, with the quick, supple activity peculiar to her, she released herself from the saddle, and, spite of the horse's furious speed, sprang to the ground. She fell heavily on the earth, for a moment her long riding-habit caught and she was dragged along, but the next instant it fell, and she remained unhurt, while Ella dashed on, and in a few moments rushed over the edge of the precipice.

Erica heard the plunge of the horse, and the dull thud as it rolled from one projection of the cliff to another, and then fainted. When she recovered her consciousness, she saw the head groom kneeling beside her, looking anxiously into her face. She raised herself a little, and said soothingly, —

"No harm has happened to me. God has mercifully preserved my life; but without your shout I should probably be lying yonder beside poor Ella."

She shuddered, and her eyes filled with tears. "Look for Ella," she continued, sobbing, "perhaps she can still be saved."

"That is impossible, Fräulein," he answered sadly, "we must devote our whole attention to you. Lean on my arm, and try to stand, that we may see whether any of your limbs are broken."

Erica took his arm, and, with some little difficulty, stood erect. She felt bruised and lame, but seemed to have sustained no other injury. She walked slowly forward a few steps, to be sure that no bones were broken, and when she saw the princess and Wehlen waiting in the road, looking at her, a sudden shudder ran through her whole frame, and, turning to her companion, she murmured with quivering lips, —

"Keep that man from coming near me again; take me home, and see that he does not approach us."

"Unfortunately that is not in my power, Fräulein. I am the princess's servant, and cannot act independently in her presence. If it is possible, try to walk the little distance to where she is waiting, for she cannot possibly ride here."

Leaning on the arm of the head groom, Erica slowly approached Katharina, who called to her in a tone by no means so sympathizing as the young girl had probably expected.

"These are the consequences of your obstinacy, Fräulein! Why did you presume to enter another road of your own accord? I was half inclined to leave you to your fate, if my good-nature had not interceded in your behalf."

Erica gazed at Katharina, without fully understanding her words. Her head felt so confused that she was incapable of thought, and the expression of her features must have aroused the princess's sympathy, for she said more kindly, —

"You have been punished for your obstinacy severely enough, so I won't scold you about it. The head groom must take you on his horse, for how are we to continue our ride?"

"I should like to have some one look after Miss Ella first," replied Erica faintly. "If it is impossible to help her, it is our duty to put her out of her misery."

Katharina's eyes lost their gentle expression, as she answered harshly, "I believe it is my place to give orders here, not yours. Your conduct has already caused so much trouble that you have every reason not to tax my patience farther."

"Your Highness would undoubtedly have given the same order immediately yourself," said Wehlen, laughing, "and your caution has provided even for this very remarkable case; since the groom always carries pistols in his saddle-bags."

"That is true," replied Katharina, her face brightening; "and Elmar always declared my precaution ridiculous, and said I was not on the steppes of Russia. We see the wisdom of my order now."

"I presume no one ever seriously doubted that," replied Wehlen craftily. "Shall I give the necessary commands, your Highness?" he continued, and, without waiting for her reply, turned to communicate the order to the groom. The latter sprang from his horse, took one of the pistols from his saddle-bags, and entered a narrow footpath which led gradually down to the depths into which poor Ella had just plunged.

Erica sat down on a rock, and seemed to take no notice of those who surrounded her. The bewilderment caused by the mortal peril to which she had just been exposed, as well as her violent fall, produced a heavy stupor, which she was unable to shake off. The report of the pistol which echoed from the valley and announced Miss Ella's death, roused her from her lethargy, and made her start. She passed her hand over her eyes to conceal the tears that filled them, and then gazed eagerly at the approaching figure of the groom. She even tried to rise and meet him, but felt too faint to do so.

"Was Ella crushed, did she suffer very much?" she asked.

"No, Fräulein. The fall was too great,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

she was probably killed at once," the man replied, placing the side-saddle he had taken from the dead horse on the ground beside her.

"Her Highness wishes you to put the saddle on your horse, Worlitz," said Wehlen.

"On Salvator?" asked the man in surprise.

The head groom now approached, and said: "On the contrary, the princess ordered me to take the young lady on my horse."

"As in the ancient days of romance, when elopements were conducted in that way," exclaimed Wehlen, laughing. "It would, however, attract considerable attention, if we made our entrance into the little city, from which we are fortunately not very far away, in so chivalric a fashion."

"We have probably had enough riding to-day, and shall return home," replied the head groom angrily.

"Will your Highness yield to your servant's very decidedly expressed wish?" asked Wehlen scornfully.

"I have no idea of doing so," cried Katharina, frowning. "Worlitz shall dismount, put the saddle on his horse, and go home on foot."

"Salvator is not a lady's horse," remonstrated the head groom, "and the young lady might easily meet with an accident a second time."

"Then give her your horse."

"I am riding Satan, and your Highness knows he deserves his name only too well. Antonius —— "

"You surely will not recommend my horse, which has nearly broken my neck several times to-day?" cried Wehlen, and, as if in confirmation of his words, the animal reared and plunged violently.

"I forbid any farther objections," said Katharina angrily. "Obey my first order, and make haste; I am tired of waiting. Mount, Erica, that we may at last reach our destination."

"I shall ride home," said Erica resolutely.

The princess's eyes flashed angrily. "What does this mean, Fräulein? You will ride where I say."

Erica's wan features grew more animated, her eyes sparkled as they met Katharina's, and her lips curled with mingled anger and defiance, as she answered,

"I shall ride home, Princess Bagadoff, and never trouble you with my company in your excursions again. If my horse is not disturbed, I am not afraid to ride Salvator, and shall probably be able to find my way." She sprang into the saddle, waved her hand, and rode quietly in the opposite direction.

Katharina was at first petrified with astonishment, then she burst into loud reproaches. The head groom, who had involuntarily followed Erica, was angrily recalled, and had only time to whisper, —

"Don't keep too tight a rein, Salvator cannot bear it. Ride him quietly, but not too slowly, for that makes him impatient. And don't be afraid, he is only unruly when people irritate him."

Erica nodded and rode on. Salvator seemed to find the light hand that held the reins pleasant, for he behaved perfectly well, and evidently knew the way to his stable, for when Erica hesitated at a cross-road, he chose the direction so decidedly that she quietly yielded. The castle soon appeared, and she reached the park gates without accident. Salvator moved up the winding avenue at a somewhat rapid pace, for it was long after his dinner hour.

Elmar was standing on the terrace watching for the party. The news of Erica's expedition had not affected him very pleasantly. Wehlen's companionship, without the protection of his presence, excited his anxiety. Now, to his surprise, he saw a solitary rider coming up the avenue, and soon recognized Erica. His heart began to throb with vague alarm, and he hurried forward to meet her. Salvator, who was anxious to reach his stable, now approached at a rapid gallop, and, without heeding his rider's attempt to check him, dashed past Elmar and stopped directly before the door of the castle. One of the grooms instantly sprang forward to help the lady dismount, but Elmar was already beside her, and lifted her from the saddle. She smiled at him, but could not utter a syllable; his anxious eyes wandered from her pale face to the horse, and he asked in bewilderment, —

"What has happened, Erica?"

She waved her hand, as if to say that she would answer presently, and Elmar instantly led her into the castle. When she found herself alone with her companion, she suddenly threw both arms around his neck, and, sobbing convulsively, exclaimed,

"Save me, Elmar! He will murder me," and then murmured in a lower tone, with the same convulsive sobs: "Save me, Elmar; save me!"

The little riding-cap had fallen from her head, and her hair fell in dishevelled waves over her shoulders. Trembling and sob-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

bing, she clung to his arm; now that she knew herself safe, the strain upon her nerves, caused by her exertions to save herself, relaxed, and an agitation, bordering almost upon insanity, threatened to throw her into convulsions.

Elmar's first surprise was now changed to the most agonizing anxiety about her condition. He kissed her quivering lips, her tearful eyes, and whispered with soothing tenderness: "Be calm, my darling, you are in my arms, you are safe."

She clasped him in a convulsive embrace, as if she could not impress the certainty of his presence upon her mind vividly enough, and again murmured: "Save me; don't let him come near me."

Elmar well knew the name of the person who had thus aroused her terror, and, spite of the deep anxiety his features expressed, a heavy frown darkened his brow. He made no reply, however, but took the trembling girl in his arms, and carried her up the staircase into the old baroness's drawing-room.

When he entered with his burden, a loud cry of terror escaped Sidonie's lips, while the old lady started up in astonishment and hurried towards him.

"Erica has had a terrible fright," said Elmar as calmly as possible. "Her nerves have been greatly excited, and you must try, grandmamma, to soothe her and put her to sleep."

He went to one of the sofas and laid his burden gently down upon it. Erica seemed scarcely to notice the presence of the others; her dim eyes rested upon Elmar, and when he now moved as if to turn away, she seized his hand in terror, saying imploringly, —

"Don't go! Stay with me, Elmar! I am frightened when you leave me."

In spite of the young man's anxiety, a feeling of inexpressible joy thrilled his heart. Could he receive a stronger proof of her love, than this half-unconscious clinging to him as her support and protector? He instantly bent over her again, stroked her hair as one soothes a child, and whispered fondly, —

"I will not leave you, my darling; I will sit down here by your sofa and watch you."

She smiled, but held his hand so firmly that it was somewhat difficult for him to keep his word, and sit down in a chair beside her couch. The baroness now brought a soothing-powder, but Erica instead of looking at the old lady, fixed her eyes on Elmar's face, and only when the latter bent over her and begged her to take the medicine, obediently submitted.

It was a strong narcotic, whose effect was soon visible. The convulsive trembling gradually ceased, and only at rare intervals a shiver ran through the young girl's limbs; the lids drooped heavily over her eyes, and her regular breathing showed that Erica was beginning to enter the kingdom of sleep.

Now and then her eyes suddenly opened, and her eager glance sought Elmar's figure, as if she wished to convince herself of his presence. Her hand still grasped his, but by degrees the pressure grew lighter, the fingers gradually loosened their clasp, and Elmar laid the sleeper's hand gently on the silk coverlid which the baroness had carefully spread over her.

XLI.

NEW OBSTACLES.

When Elmar cautiously rose from his seat and approached the old lady and Sidonie, both looked anxiously into his face with an expression of eager inquiry.

"I can tell you nothing," he said gloomily, in reply to the mute question; "I lifted Erica from her horse in the condition in which you saw her. She came alone and rode Salvator."

"Salvator!" exclaimed Sidonie almost aloud.

He made a hasty, anxious sign for her to be cautious. "It is some rascally trick of that worthless scoundrel," he whispered softly, while, in spite of his apparent composure, his teeth were pressed so firmly on his under lip that it bled. "Her incoherent exclamations revealed so much. The miserable coward probably tried to revenge himself in this way."

"And Katharina?" asked the baroness in surprise.

"Katharina, I hope, will soon be fit for the insane asylum, where her caprices can be watched, and do no farther mischief."

There was such deep anger in the speaker's words, spite of the low tone in which they were uttered, that the old lady answered reprovingly, —

"Your excitement carries you too far, my dear Elmar."

"It only reveals what has long been hidden in my heart. There are the worthy couple!" he exclaimed, interrupting himself and approaching the window. Katharina is talking to Wehlen; it seems as if I could hear her disagreeable laugh. There is no trace of anxiety about Erica's fate, no qualms of conscience."

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Elmar paused, and his teeth again pressed his under lip till it bled.

"I will go down, grandmamma," he said, when he had partially regained his self-control; "I want to send for the head groom to ascertain the particulars of the affair."

The latter came to Elmar's room just as he was in the act of summoning him, and, after relating the events which had occured, said, —

"I came to you myself, Herr Baron, to beg you to interfere, and send that man away from the princess and the castle. Although I have no positive proofs, I am perfectly sure that he is to blame for the whole accident, and indeed caused it intentionally. Terrible as the accusation sounds, it must have been his design to murder the young lady, and Lebrecht, to whom I heard him talking secretly in the stable yesterday, was to have given Ella something to make her unmanageable. As this plan failed, in consequence of my dismissing the rascally fellow, Herr Wehlen probably intended to perform the trick himself, for he had scarcely come out of the castle, when he went up to Ella, took her from the groom, and led her a few paces by the bridle, as if he wanted to see whether she was properly saddled. My approach prevented this also, and so he tried to gain his object in another way.

"At first I thought he was frightening Ella out of malice, to make me angry; but afterwards I saw very plainly that he really had designs on the young lady's safety. The latter, however, had ridden forward, and the princess was talking to me, so I could not prevent what I really thought was only a fancy caused by my distrust of the gentleman. Afterwards I almost decided to defy the princess's orders, and ride back with Fräulein Erica, but I knew that Salvator, unlike other horses, always goes most quietly alone, and besides, I could not risk a sudden dismissal from my place. I have a wife and children, and the former's sickness has used up my savings, and even while I am employed causes me to practise the greatest economy, so ——"

"Have no anxiety, my good Willich," interrupted Elmar; "you have done all you could, and I thank you for it. Leave the rest to me."

When Erica opened her eyes, her first glance fell upon Elmar, who had resumed his former seat. A sunny smile flitted over her face, and she held out her hand, but no convulsive pressure betrayed any agitation. Her face was calm, though somewhat pale, and she said, in a jesting tone, —

"Do you know, Elmar, I have given you the rôle old Christel so often played in my childhood. When I was afraid to go to sleep, I made her sit down by me and held her apron, so that she could not get away, but she was not so faithful a guardian as you, for when I awoke I found myself alone, and the apron lying beside my bed."

"Don't praise me so much, Erica," replied Elmar, laughing; "I have not remained at my post all the time, for I went away to dinner."

"What! is it so late?" cried Erica in astonishment, starting up. "Why, yes, the lamps are lighted, and there is grandmamma too! I have a dim recollection that you were in the room before, grandmamma, and I did not notice you; pardon my rudeness."

"Don't trouble yourself about that, little one; but think what you will have to eat, for I hope you are hungry."

"No, I am only tired, spite of my long nap; I will take tea with Elmar at his little marble table, if you will allow it."

"The marble table is entirely at your service; but you will probably want to change your dress first."

Erica's startled eyes rested upon her riding-habit, whose torn, soiled condition bore only too distinct traces of her fall. She shuddered, and the old lady, fearing that her former agitation would return, tried to divert her attention, and then led her to her own room.

On her return, she took her usual seat by the fire, and called Sandor to her side.

"If you had been with me, Sandor," she exclaimed, patting the dog's head, "you would have protected me and saved Ella. You do not know, Elmar, that poor Ella is dead, lying crushed at the bottom of a precipice. I shall never ride her again."

Tears filled her eyes, and Elmar anxiously threw his arm around her and said hastily: "Calm yourself, my darling, I know all, and in order to do nothing hastily, shall not speak to Katharina until to-morrow morning."

Erica involuntarily started, and then, with flashing eyes, exclaimed: "I will never go to the princess's rooms again. How could she treat me so unkindly, so cruelly?"

"I think you will soon be entirely relieved of her presence, Erica; from what I know of her character, she will prefer to leave Altenborn with the chamberlain she has chosen, rather than yield. But let us

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

talk of pleasanter things now, and one of them is that Fritz is coming to visit us."

"Fritz coming here! cried Erica joyously, and then eagerly asked for the news from Dorneck, which his letter undoubtedly contained. But she could scarcely understand Elmar's answer; the exhaustion which she had hitherto conquered by the exertion of all her strength now overpowered her, so that she was obliged to withdraw and retire to rest, even before she had taken tea at the little marble table.

The following morning Elmar went to his sister, to demand Wehlen's instant departure. He had hesitated for some time, whether to satisfy himself with his mere removal, or hold him answerable for his conduct before a court of justice, but finally decided upon the former course. When he entered Katharina's drawing-room, he found Wehlen himself in the apartment, and the sight sent the blood so quickly to his heart, that he turned deadly pale. The next instant, however, by exerting all the strength of will of which he was capable, he controlled himself, and without looking at Wehlen, said, —

"Leave the room, sir. I wish to speak to my sister alone."

"I will await the princess's commands, Herr Baron," replied Wehlen with scornful defiance.

Katharina, who at her brother's entrance had displayed a little timidity, was now perfectly calm.

"You are quite right, Herr von Wehlen; it is a little too soon for you to play the master, my dear Elmar," she said, with her disagreeable laugh.

Elmar looked at her in surprise — her words excited no little astonishment, as Wehlen had undoubtedly informed her of the discovery of the document — and saw in her restless eyes the strange light which sometimes terrified him by its appearance, though its existence after it had vanished once more seemed merely a horrible fancy. But he now perceived that there was less hope than ever of conquering his sister by calm reasoning, and, in order to avoid everything which would irritate her, said as quietly as possible, —

"Give the order, my dear Kathinka, I wish to speak to you alone."

"I regret that I cannot gratify your wish. Herr von Wehlen must hear what you have to say to me."

Elmar's steady gaze caused a vague feeling of discomfort, and to avoid it she rose, and began to move about the room.

"Then the gentleman can thank himself, if he hears things which ——"

"I forbid any such conversation, Elmar," Katharina hastily interrupted. "I will hear nothing against Herr von Wehlen."

"You will be compelled to do so, Kathinka, for ——"

"Do you mean to insult me in my own apartments, Elmar?" exclaimed Katharina, angrily approaching him. The strange light in her eyes glittered so brightly, and there was such undoubted certainty of its existence, that he involuntarily turned away with a shudder.

"You see he does not venture to defy me, Wehlen," cried the princess exultantly; "he knows that I am the real owner of this house."

Elmar had regained his composure, and answered quietly, but in a loud, resolute tone: "You are mistaken, Kathinka, on the contrary I have come to use my authority as master. You will send this — your pretended chamberlain away to-day, or leave Altenborn with him."

Katharina laughed shrilly, and Wehlen's lip curled with scarcely perceptible but still deeper scorn.

"You hear, Wehlen, what we should have to expect from this so-called brother of mine, if you had not ——"

"Do not allow yourself to become so much excited, your Highness," interrupted Wehlen, hastily approaching her. "Consider your delicate health."

"And all this ado about that ugly little girl, to whom I really gave the few attractions she has. You have practised a most unwarrantable deception upon me in this respect, Elmar," she suddenly continued, in a very different tone. "You always spoke of her with indifference, to mislead me, and you too, Wehlen, you never rested in your machinations until I took this creature into my house. I am deceived and betrayed by all!" she exclaimed passionately, as she paced up and down the room wringing her hands.

Elmar stood at the window with folded arms, considering what course to pursue. He could scarcely talk to his sister to-day, and was inclined to leave the room and send the doctor to her, when she suddenly paused before him, and said hoarsely,—

"Elmar, you cannot possibly be so destitute of all sense of honor, as to make this low, worthless creature your wife."

The blood rushed to his brain, his eyes blazed with anger, and, seizing her hand as she tried to turn away, he exclaimed in a threatening tone,—

"Beware of trying my patience too far,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Katharina. Your treatment of Erica yesterday was shameful, disgraceful, and if I thought you fully responsible for your acts, I would hold you to a strict account for it."

Katharina seemed intimidated by his glance or the firm grasp of his hand, for her restless eyes sought the ground, and she asked almost timidly: "Is she really your betrothed bride, as Wehlen says?"

"Herr von Wehlen is the last person of whom I should make a confidant, but he may now hear, with you, that I have been engaged to her a short time."

Katharina wrested her hand from Elmar's, and once more paced wildly up and down the room. "I'll go to grandmamma! She must interfere, must prevent this horrible affair."

"Grandmamma entirely approves of my choice, and sincerely loves Erica."

"Of course, you were always the favorite, whose faults were continually overlooked." Katharina threw herself into a chair so violently, that it was in danger of breaking. "Come here, Wehlen! Repeat what you just told me."

Wehlen obeyed, approached her, and whispered a few words. Elmar also came forward, for as Katharina seemed somewhat calmer, he hoped to make her listen to reason.

"I trust you will not forget what I told you just now, Katharina. If your chamberlain does not leave Castle Altenborn before nightfall, the abuse of my hospitality to you will force me to adopt severe measures, and cause your own departure. The gentleman may congratulate himself on escaping so easily, but I think the jail will not be deprived of his presence long."

"You shall give me satisfaction for this insult!" exclaimed Wehlen furiously.

Elmar shrugged his shoulders. "I should consider myself dishonored to use even my riding-whip on you, and if the task were necessary, would commit it to the lowest of my servants."

"You shall answer for this, sir!" Wehlen hissed between his clenched teeth, while his eyes flashed with fury.

"I hope you have understood me, Kathinka," continued Elmar, turning to her, without taking any farther notice of Wehlen, "and will act accordingly."

The strange glitter had vanished from her eyes, but they only expressed a deeper contempt, as she replied,

"We will mutually adopt our own measures. You must be satisfied with love in a cottage, while I take possession of Castle Altenborn as my rightful inheritance."

"What do you mean by that, Kathinka?"

"I mean to cleanse my father's memory from the stain of having made a woman who was so far beneath him his wife. In a mistress, one can, fortunately, be less particular in his choice."

"Katharina!" exclaimed Elmar, trembling with anger, as he pressed her forcibly back into the chair from which she attempted to rise. "If madness has already overpowered you so far that you wish to expose the honor of your father and the woman who so lovingly watched over your childhood to public scorn, it is my duty to interfere, and I will prove your mental incapacity."

"In that case, I will appear as a witness for the princess, Herr Baron," interrupted Wehlen. "True, it is a frequent expedient in English novels, to make troublesome persons harmless by placing them in a mad-house, but in Germany you would probably find it somewhat difficult to execute such an infamous plan. Besides, the assertion, which certainly greatly imperils your rights, has by no means originated with the princess. The rumor has long been in circulation, and at last reached her ears."

"A rumor, which is fully worthy of the originator. But this new piece of rascality, which does not spare even the dead, shall not prevent me from enforcing my rights as the master of the house."

"Those rights will be denied, sir. Even by the most liberal interpretation of the terms used in the document which establishes the entail, Baron von Altenborn's natural son can never be acknowledged as the heir."

Elmar summoned up all his self-control, that the scene might not become still more repulsive than it was already. He too now paced up and down the room several times to regain his composure, and after a pause, said,—

"I believe we are already in the mad-house just mentioned. My mother lived here for years as my father's loved and honored wife, and I have been the acknowledged heir from my boyhood. Your chamberlain seems to have exhausted his intrigues, Kathinka, or he would not have hit upon this half-absurd, though disgraceful expedient."

The princess had leaned back in her chair, and her restless glances wandered uneasily around the room. She seemed startled herself by the accusation she had made, and, as her excitement gradually passed away, her face assumed a weary,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

haggard expression. Now she started, and said with evident effort: "On the contrary, is it not shameful to have been so long defrauded of my rights?" She suddenly paused, and sinking back again, murmured faintly, "Speak for me, Wehlen, I cannot remember what I wanted to say."

"If you wish to remain here as master any longer," Wehlen obediently began, "you will, under any circumstances, be obliged to produce your parents' marriage certificate. It is not to be found in the church. So long as your rights are not proved by this document, the property belongs to the princess, and ——"

"Do not attempt to prove the consistency of your words, or you will repent it!" cried Elmar, with flashing eyes. "If this evening finds you still in the castle, you shall be put out by my servants; so make your arrangements accordingly."

Without vouchsafing his enemy a glance, Elmar left the room, but when the door closed behind him, he involuntarily paused to draw a long breath, and then passed his hand over his forehead as if to smooth away the angry frown, but a deep line still remained between the eyebrows. When he had reached his room, he paced up and down several times, murmuring involuntarily,—

"He knows that the scandal this matter will excite, the indignation at the insult offered to the dead, will cause me inexpressible annoyance and grief; so even if the whole affair is speedily settled, his revenge will be sufficiently gratified. And yet I see no way to prevent it, for, even if he leaves the castle, his influence over that crack-brained woman will remain."

From Chambers' Journal.

STORY OF GEORGE CRUIKSHANK.

A PASSING sigh of regret has noted the recent demise, at the good old age of eighty-six, of one of the most remarkable men of our time. Seldom has it been our lot to record in the pages of this journal the story of one whose genius was of so wild and fantastic a character as that of this veteran artist, who won his maiden fame in the days of George III., and has passed away in the latter part of the reign of Queen Victoria.

George Cruikshank, who was of Scotch parentage, was born in London on September 27, 1792. His father was an artist of the caricature order, contemporary with Gilray; and his elder brother Robert was a draughtsman who, though of no great ability, had a strong Cruikshankian manner about him. George began to sketch at a very early age; and at the commencement of the present century he got a living by making etchings for the booksellers. His father had originally intended to train up his son for the stage; but perceiving that his inclinations lay in quite another direction, he allowed him to cultivate those artistic talents which were afterwards to be a source of delight to himself and to the public. In 1805 the lad sketched Lord Nelson's funeral car; and his illustrations of the "O. P." riots at Covent Garden Theatre in 1809 attracted considerable attention at the time. Some of his earliest sketches depict characters who were the centre of interest at that period, but whose names have now quite an ancient ring about them.

Before the reign of George III. was over, the young artist had made a conspicuous name as a caricaturist and comic designer. His first designs were in connection with cheap songs and children's books; and after that he furnished political caricatures to the Scourge and other satirical publications, besides doing a good deal of work for Mr. Hone's books and periodicals during several years. Indeed this famous publisher was the first to perceive the talents of the artist, and to introduce his rather eccentric sketches to the public. It is related of the young Cruikshank that, having a desire to follow art in the higher department, he endeavored on one occasion to study at the Academy. The schools at that period were restricted in space and much crowded. On sending up to Fuseli his figure in plaster, the professor returned the characteristic but discouraging answer: "He may come, but he will have to fight for a seat." Cruikshank never repeated his attempt to enter the Academy, although he afterwards became an exhibitor. His pencil was ever enlisted on the side of suffering and against oppression, and it is therefore not surprising to find that the cause of the ill-used Queen Caroline was greatly benefited by its scathing satire. Some special hits were made by the artist on this occasion, for it was a subject on which the public mind was very much excited, and one design, which was entitled "The Queen's Matrimonial Ladder," ran through fifty editions.

In 1830, when the government had determined to suppress the agitation for

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Parliamentary reform, Cruikshank, at the request of his old patron Hone, produced some political illustrations, which are said to have convulsed with laughter the ministry at whom they were directed, and to whom they did incalculable damage. One of these, called "The Political House that Jack Built," was particularly good, and within a very short time one hundred thousand copies of it were sold. A few years later George abandoned political caricature and gave himself up to the illustration of works of humor and fancy, to the exposure of passing follies in dress and social manners, and to grave and often tragic moralizing on the vices of mankind.

In the year 1821 he illustrated — and indeed originated — the celebrated "Life in London" of Pierce Egan, a work better known by the title of "Tom and Jerry." The book was published in sheets and enjoyed an enormous success, establishing the name of George Cruikshank as the first comic artist of the day. The plates for this work were in aquatint, and though not in Cruikshank's best manner, they exhibited that variety of observation and marvellous fulness of detail for which the designer was always remarkable. The letterpress of the work was, however, written in too free a manner for the moral intention with which the plates were drawn; and offended at the gross use to which his illustrations were applied, the great artist retired from the engagement before the work was completed.

It was related to the writer of this article by Cruikshank himself that, when a very young man, he was one day engaged in hastily sketching a work of rather questionable character. While he was doing it, his mother and another lady entered the room, and he quickly hid the sketch away. The act, however, so disturbed him that he resolved never to allow his pencil to produce any work in the future at which a virtuous woman could not look without a blush. The pure moral tone of all his works attests how well he kept so noble a resolve.

From 1823 down to many years later, George Cruikshank was the most highly esteemed of English book-illustrators. Work poured in upon him at a prodigious rate; but being a man of singular energy and tireless industry, he was always equal to the demand. His designs for "Italian Tales," Grimm's "German Stories," the wild legend of "Peter Schlemihl," the shadowless man, "Baron Munchausen," and Sir Walter Scott's "Demonology and Witchcraft," are amongst his best and highest works. He also illustrated some of Washington Irving's works of fiction, Fielding and Smollett's books, beside Maxwell's graphic "History of the Irish Rebellion." It would, however, be impossible, in this brief notice of his life, to mention one tithe of the works that have emanated from the untiring pencil of this remarkable man. But the generation which is passing away cannot fail to remember his celebrated "Mornings at Bow Street," a series of sketches which depicted and ruthlessly exposed the dark and savage side of London life.

The genius of Charles Dickens, as we formerly had occasion to remark, received invaluable assistance from Cruikshank's pencil, which illustrated the first writings of the young author, and thus paved the way for him to a larger audience than he might otherwise have had. In the first month of 1837 appeared the opening number of Bentley's Miscellany, edited by "Boz" (Charles Dickens), then in the flush of his "Pickwick" success, and illustrated by Cruikshank. In the second number of the Miscellany, Dickens commenced "Oliver Twist," a work not only illustrated by Cruikshank, but for which the latter it appears had himself supplied, unwittingly, some of the characters.

George used to say that he had drawn the figures of Fagin, Bill Sikes and his dog, Nancy, the Artful Dodger, and Charley Bates, before "Oliver Twist" was written; and that Dickens seeing the sketches one day shortly after the commencement of the story, determined to change his plot, and instead of keeping Oliver in the country, resolved to bring him to town, and throw him (with entire innocence) into the company of thieves. Fagin, was sketched from a rascally old Jew whom Cruikshank had observed in the neighborhood of Saffron Hill, and whom he watched and "studied" for several weeks. The artist had also conceived the terrible face of "Fagin in the Condemned Cell" as he sits gnawing his nails, in the curious, accidental way we lately narrated to our readers. He had been working at the subject for some days without satisfying himself; when sitting up in bed one morning with his hands on his chin and his fingers in his mouth, he saw his face in the glass, and at once exclaimed: "That's it! that's the face I want!"

Nobody who has seen the sketches to "Oliver Twist" can ever forget them, and two at least of the series are perfect chefs-d'œuvre of genius, namely the death of

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Sikes on the roof of the old house at the river-side, and the despair of Fagin in his cell. In fact some of Cruikshank's best work in the delineation of low and depraved life and the squalid picturesqueness of criminal haunts, appeared in the above-named book. His illustrations to Harrison Ainsworth's works were also for the most part charming specimens of what may be appropriately termed the "Cruikshankian" art. At the same time he sketched the designs for some of the "Ingoldsby Legends," as they appeared from time to time in the Miscellany. In 1841 he set up on his own account a monthly periodical called the Omnibus, of which Laman Blanchard was the editor; and subsequently joined Mr. Ainsworth in the magazine which that gentleman had started in his own name; the great artist, in a series of splendid plates of the highest conception, illustrating "The Miser's Daughter" and other works from the pen of the proprietor. For several years Cruikshank had been publishing a "Comic Almanac," which was a great favorite with the public, and was always brimming full of fun and prodigal invention. In 1863 a "Cruikshank Gallery" was opened at Exeter Hall, in which were exhibited a great number of his works, extending over a period of sixty years. The exhibition originated from a desire on the artist's part to shew the public that they were all done by the same hand, and that he was not, in fact, his own grandfather; some people having asserted that the author of his later works was the grandson of the man who had sketched the earliest ones.

He will perhaps be remembered most affectionately by the great industrial portion of the people as the apostle as well as the artist of temperance. Perceiving drunkenness to be the national vice, he depicted its horrors from the studio, and denounced its woes from the platform. It was about the year 1845 that he joined the teetotalers; and in 1847 he brought out a set of plates called "The Bottle," a kind of "Drunkard's Progress," in eight designs, executed in glyphograpy with remarkable power and tragic intensity, not unlike some of the works of Hogarth. The success of these extraordinary engravings was enormous. Dramas were founded on the story at the minor theatres, and the several tableaux were reproduced on the stage. He soon published a sequel to "The Bottle," and did a great deal of work for the temperance societies; but it was observed that his style suffered somewhat by the contraction of his ideas and sympathies, and his reputation declined amongst the general public in proportion to the increase of his popularity amongst the teetotalers. He remained, however, the staunch friend and ally of the temperance leaders up to the day of his death; and he used to say that for years before he became a total abstainer he was the enemy of drunkenness with his pencil, but that later experience had taught him that precept without example was of little avail. There is no doubt that, though the good he was able to do by persuading others to whom drink was a positive injury, brought great satisfaction to his mind, it alienated from him to a great extent the friendship, to their loss, of his former companions. But to know his duty was for George Cruikshank to do it, and nobly did he stand by the cause which he had espoused. His advocacy of temperance is also said to have been a great pecuniary loss to him; and the writer of this article remembers having heard him say, a few years since, that he had lost a commission to paint the portrait of a nobleman, because somebody had told the latter that since George Cruikshank had become a teetotaler he had lost all his talent! The hearty laugh which accompanied the recital of the story rings in the writer's ears still.

Perhaps his greatest work in the cause of temperance, as it is certainly his most extraordinary one, is the large oil-painting called "The Worship of Bacchus," which now hangs in the National Gallery. It represents the various phases of our national drinking system, from the child in its cradle to the man's descent to the grave. There are many hundreds of figures depicted on the canvas, engaged in all the different customs of so-called civilized life; and the sad lesson it reads is well deserving the attention of all who love their country, and would prefer to witness its increased prosperity rather than its decline. Cruikshank had the honor of describing the picture to her Majesty the queen at Windsor in 1863; and since then it has been exhibited in all the principal towns and cities of the United Kingdom. Finally, it was presented by the teetotalers to the nation, having been purchased from the artist by means of a subscription. The time spent in the preparation of this work must have been very great, indeed it might well have been the study of an ordinary lifetime. An engraving of the picture was published some time ago, in which all the figures were outlined by the painter and finished by Mr. Mottram.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

In his own way, George Cruikshank was a philanthropist, and to the end of his life it was his proud boast that he had put a stop to hanging for forging bank-notes. The story, as told by himself, is so interesting, that we need not apologize for placing it before our readers. He lived in Salisbury Square, Fleet Street; and on his returning from the bank of England one morning he was horrified at seeing several persons, two of whom were women, hanging on the gibbet in front of Newgate. On his making inquiries as to the nature of their crime, he was told that they had been put to death for forging one-pound Bank of England notes. The fact that a poor woman could be put to death for such a minor offence had such an effect upon him, that he hurried home, determined, if possible, to put a stop to such wholesale destruction of life.

Cruikshank was well acquainted with the habits of the low class of society in London at that time, as it had been necessary for him to study them in the furtherance of his art, and he knew well that it was most likely that the poor women in question were simply the unconscious instruments of the miscreants who forged the notes, and had been induced by them to tender the false money to some publican or other. In a few minutes after his arrival at his residence he had designed and sketched a "Bank-note not to be Imitated." Shortly afterwards, William Hone, the publisher, called on him, and seeing the sketch lying on the table, he was much struck with it.

"What are you going to do with this, George?" he asked.

"To publish it," replied the artist.

"Will you let me have it?" inquired Hone.

"Willingly," said Cruikshank; and making an etching of it there and then, he gave it to Hone, and it was published; the result being, that "I had the satisfaction of knowing that no man or woman was ever hanged afterwards for passing forged one-pound Bank of England notes."

In 1863 he published an amusing pamphlet against the belief in ghosts, illustrated by some weird fantastic sketches on wood. But his public appearances now became less frequent. During the later years of his life he gave considerable attention to oil-painting, and he used greatly to regret that he had not received a more artistic education, stating that when he first saw the cartoons of Raphael he felt overpowered by a sort of shame at his own comparative deficiencies. He has, however, left some good specimens of his power in oil in "Tam o' Shanter," "A Runaway Knock," and "Disturbing the Congregation;" the last-named having been bought by the late prince consort, and afterwards engraved. The design of the Bruce Memorial, which has been so much admired, was also from the pencil of George Cruikshank; and the last contribution from his pen to the public press was a letter on this subject.

His personal appearance was no less remarkable than his works. Rather below middle stature, and thick-set, with a rather sharp Roman nose, piercing eyes, a mouth full of lurking humor, and wild elf-locks flowing about his face, he at once attracted attention as a man of genius, energy, and character. He was always famous for great courage and spirit, which, added to his muscular power, made him very capable of holding his own everywhere.

Though accustomed to depict life in its shadier phases, Cruikshank was of a naturally joyous disposition. In social life his humor was inimitable; and his readiness to add to the amusement of his host and his host's guests was only equalled by the unique way in which he played the part of actor, singer, and dancer. The fact of his being a teetotaler in no way interfered with his honest natural merry nature; with old and young alike he was a deserved favorite. Young folks were especially fond of the dear old man. Dining with some other guests at the London house of a friend of the writer's some five-and-twenty years ago, Mr. Cruikshank when asked to favor the company with a song, struck up the comic ditty of "Billy Taylor, that Brisk Young Fellow," and danced an accompaniment, much to the amusement of the good folks present. "Not so bad for one of your teetotalers," quoth the veteran as he returned to his seat.

In his earlier years he ventured alone into the worst dens of criminal London, and since he had grown old he actually captured a burglar in his own house and with his own hands. In many ways he contributed to the public amusement and the public good; and during the later years of his life he was in receipt of a government pension, for though he helped to make fortunes for others, he made very little money for himself. He was a volunteer so far back as 1804; and in our own days he commanded a regiment of citizen soldiers of teetotal principles.

There is on view at the Westminster Aquarium at the present time a splendid

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

collection of Cruikshank's works, each of which is a study in itself, while the whole, consisting of about five hundred sketches, forms a unique monument to his skill and genius.

As an artist he will be certain of lasting fame, for he managed his lights and shades with a skill akin to Rembrandt, while his delineation of low life in its every phase was marvellous. His illustrations to fairy and goblin stories were also beyond praise, as they could not be surpassed in strangeness and elfin oddity; and in this respect he was popular with young and old. His sketches must be innumerable, for he was, like all true men of genius, a great worker, and he must have toiled unceasingly through at least seventy years of his long life. He was attacked with bronchitis a few weeks previous to his death, yet with great care he was actually enabled to recover from this disease; but alas! only to succumb to an older complaint from which he had been free for years. He died painlessly, on the evening of the first of February last, at his residence in Hampstead Road, London; and while to comparatively few was given the inestimable privilege of the great artist's friendship, the grief of a nation for his loss attests the universality of his fame.

From Nature.

THE ANALOGIES OF PLANT AND ANIMAL LIFE.*

LET us begin our inquiry into the analogies of plant and animal life by comparing the egg of an animal with the seed of a plant. Let it be the ripe seed of a common plant, and the egg of a bird. Both seed and egg may be said to consist of the young creature and a supply of food which is stored up for its use, and is gradually exhausted as the young creature develops. Every one who has tried when a boy to blow a late bird's egg must have been painfully alive to the fact of its containing a young animal, and the egg we eat for breakfast may serve to remind us of the store of food which we diverted from its proper course of nourishing a young chicken.

Here is a diagram representing a section through the seed of a poppy, in which the young plant may be seen lying in its store of food containing a supply of carbohydrates and nitrogenous matter, which is consumed as the yolk of the egg is consumed by the young chicken. Other seeds, such as a bean, an acorn, or an almond, seem at first sight to consist of nothing but the young plant, and to have no store of food. The two halves into which a pea splits are the two first leaves or cotyledons of the young plant, the embryo stem and root being represented by the little projecting mass lying between the two halves at one end of the seed. Here the store of food is laid up in the body of the young plant just as many young animals carry with them a store of food in the shape of the masses of fat with which they are cushioned; the two leaves which seem so gigantic compared with the rest of the plant are filled with nutriment, and perform the same function of supplying food for the growth of the seedling, which is performed by the mass of nutrient material in which the embryo of the poppy seed is embedded. Recent researches have shown that embryo plants are possessed of powers which even in the present day it seems almost ludicrous to ascribe to them. I mean powers of digestion. Gorup-Besanez,* a distinguished German chemist, found that in the germinating seed of a vetch a ferment exists similar to the ferment in the pancreatic secretion of animals — a secretion having the power of reducing both nitrogenous bodies and starch to a condition in which they can be utilized and absorbed by the tissues, so that the embryo plant behaves exactly as if it were a minute animal digesting and absorbing the store of food with which it is supplied. The power of digesting starch possessed by the embryo plant has been brilliantly demonstrated by Van Tieghem,† who found that the embryo removed from the seed of the marvel of Peru (Mirabilis jalapa) was distinctly nourished if placed in an artificial seed made of starch paste. He found that the starch paste was actually corroded by the young plant, proving that a digestive ferment had been at work.

This wonderful experiment is of special interest as proving that the digestive ferment is a product of the young plant itself, just as the digestive juice of an animal is a secretion from its stomach. It is indeed a striking thought that whether we grind up a grain of wheat to flour and eat it ourselves as bread, or whether we let the seed germinate, in which case the young

* A lecture delivered at the London Institution on March 11 by Francis Darwin, M.B.

* Deutsch. chem. Gesellsch., 1874; Botanische Zeitung, 1875, p. 565.

† An. Sc. Nat., 1873, xvii., p. 205.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

plant eats it, the process is identically the same.

The power of storing up food in a fixed condition and utilizing it when required is a most important function both in animal and plant physiology. And just as this utilization is seen in the seed to be brought about by a ferment — by a digestive process — so probably wherever the transference or utilization of food-stores occurs it is effected by ferments. If this be so it would seem that the processes of digestion proper, as they occur in the stomach and intestines of animals and on the leaves of carnivorous plants, I say it is probable that these processes are only a specialization * of a widely-spread power, which may exist in the simplest protoplasmic ancestor of animals and plants. In this case we shall have no right to consider the existence of carnivorous plants anything strange or bizarre; we should not consider it, as seems sometimes to be done, an eccentric and unaccountable assumption of animal properties by plants; but rather the appearance of a function which we have quite as much right to expect in plants as in animals. Not that this view makes the fact of vegetable digestion any less wonderful, but rather more interesting as probably binding together by community of descent a wide class of physiological functions. Let us now pass on to consider the analogies of plants and animals in a more advanced stage of life.

Great differences exist among animals as to the degree of development attained before the young ones enter the world. A young kangaroo is born in a comparatively early stage of development, and is merely capable of passive existence in its mother's pouch, while a young calf or lamb soon leads an active existence. Or compare a human child which passes through so prolonged a condition of helplessness, with a young chicken which runs about and picks up grain directly it is out of its shell. As analogous cases among plants, we may take the mangrove and the tobacco-plant. The ripe seed of the mangrove is not scattered abroad, but remains attached to the capsule still hanging on the mother plant. In this state the seeds germinate and the roots grow out and down to the sea-level, and the plant is not deserted by its mother until it has got well established in the mud. It is due to the young mangrove to say that the conditions of life against which it has to make a start are very hard on it. The most intrepid seedling might well cling to its parent on finding that it was expected to germinate on soft mud daily flooded by the tide. Perhaps the same excuse may be offered for the helplessness of babies — the more complicated the conditions of life, the greater dependence must there be of offspring on parent.

Now compare a young tobacco-plant with the mangrove. All the help the seedling tobacco receives from its parent is a very small supply of food; this it uses up in forming its first pair of leaves; it has then nothing left by way of reserve, but must depend on its own exertions for subsistence. By its own exertions I mean its power of manufacturing starch (which is the great article of food required by plants) from the carbonic acid in the air. In this respect it is like a caterpillar which is formed from the contents of the egg, but has to get its own living as soon as it is born.

In many cases there is a certain degree of independence in young creatures, which are nevertheless largely dependent on their parents' help. Thus, young chickens, though able to feed themselves, depend on their mother for warmth and guidance. A somewhat parallel case may be found among plants. It has been shown that the large store of reserve material in a bean is not all needed for the development of the seedling. It has been proved that well-formed and flourishing seedlings are produced, even when a large part of the cotyledons has been removed. In fact, the store of food in the bean has been said to play a double part in the economy of the plant,* first, as giving absolutely necessary formative material, and secondly, as protecting the young plant in the struggle with other plants, by supplying it with food till it is well established and able to make its own food. This view was fully established by my father,† who sowed various kinds of seed among grass in order to observe the struggle; he found that peas and beans were able to make a vigorous start in growth, while many other young plants were killed off as soon as they germinated.

The young bean is thus indirectly protected by its mother from death, which the severe competition entails on less fortunate seedlings. This kind of protection can only in a certain general sense be com-

* See Morren, "La Digestion Végétale," Gand, 1876; and Pfeffer, "Landwirth. Jahrb.," 1877.

* Haberlandt, "Schutzeinrichtungen in der Entwickelungen der Keimpflanzen," 1877, p. 29. The idea is quoted as originally given by Sachs, Vienna Acad., xxxvii., 1859.

† See "Origin of Species," 6th edition, p. 60.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

pared with the protection given by parent to offspring. Nevertheless, a more strictly parallel case may be found among animals. Certain fishes retain the yolk-bag, still containing a supply of food, and swim about leading an independent life, carrying this store with them. Among plants, a good case of a retention of a store of food occurs * in the oak. Young trees possessing woody stems and several leaves may still have an acorn underground with an unexhausted store of food.

In comparing the lives of plants and animals, one is struck with the different relation which the welfare of the race bears to the welfare of the individual. In plants it is far more obvious that the aim and object of existence is the perpetuation of the species. The striking and varied development of the reproductive organs in plants is one factor in this difference. Roughly speaking, plants strike us most by their flowers and seed — that is by organs serving the interest of the race. Animals are most striking on account of their movements, which are chiefly connected with the wants of the individual. If a child wants to know whether a stick is a stick or a caterpillar, he touches it, and if it walks off, classes it in the animal kingdom. Of course, I do not mean that the power of movement is a mark of distinction between animals and plants, but it certainly is a power which is well developed in most animals, and badly developed in most plants. It is the absence of locomotive powers (as opposed to the absence of simple movements) that especially characterizes most plants. One sees the meaning of this if one inquires into mode of life of stationary and of locomotive animals. Stationary animals either inhabit the water, or else are parasitic in habits, and live on tissues of plants or animals. In either case the absence of locomotion has the same meaning. Many aquatic animals derive their food from the minute organic particles floating in the water, so that even though they lead a stationary life, food will be brought to them by the currents in the water. Parasitic animals obtain their food directly from the juices or sap of their host, so that they do not need to move about as other animals do in search of food. In the same way plants live like parasites on the earth, penetrating it with their roots, and sucking out its juices; and their food — carbonic acid — is brought to them by the currents of the air, so that like both an aquatic and a parasitic animal, they have no need of locomotion, as far as concerns the obtaining of food.

In the case of many young animals their powers of locomotion would be useless unless the eggs were deposited by the mother in a proper place; one cannot imagine anything more forlorn than a caterpillar reared from an egg laid anywhere by chance, and expected to find its proper plant. The necessity of finding proper places to lay her eggs implies the necessity of locomotion on the part of the mother. This need of locomotion is, of course, equally a need to the plant, but it is supplied in a distributed way. The seeds themselves become locomotive; they either acquire plumes to fly on the wind like the seeds of dandelions or they become burrs and cling to passing animals, or are distributed in other ways. Various and strange are the means of transportal adopted by seeds; for instance, the acorn seems to distribute itself by deliberately trading on the carelessness of creatures which are usually considered its superiors in intelligence. Good evidence exists that young oaks which grow scattered in large number over a wide extent of wild, healthy land have sprung from the acorns accidentally dropped by passing rooks. In all these cases the young plant has to trust to chance as to what kind of soil it will be deposited in, and this of course accounts for the enormous number of seeds produced by plants. Some seeds are more fortunate in possessing a kind of mechanical choice or power of selecting suitable places to grow in. Many years ago my father described a plumed seed which, when damped, poured out a sticky substance capable of glueing the seed firmly to whatever touched it. Imagine such a plant blown by the wind over some sandy waste; nothing tends to stay its course till it happens to pass by a region where the soil is damper; then it sends out its sticky anchors, and thus comes to rest just where it has a chance of germinating favorably. Again, some seeds have a certain amount of locomotive power independent of such external agencies as wind or passing animals. I mean a power of burying themselves in the ground; the seeds of grasses are the best known of these self-burying seeds; and among them the feather-grass, or Stipa pennata, is the most conspicuous. These seeds possess a strong, sharp point, armed with a plume or tuft of recurved hairs, which act like the barbs of an arrow and prevent the seed from coming out again when it has once

* Haberlandt, p. 12.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

penetrated the soil. This arrow-like point is fixed at the lower end of a strong awn, which has the remarkable property of twisting when dried and untwisting when wetted. Thus the mere alternations of damp nights and dry days cause the arrow-like point to rotate, and by another contrivance, which it would take too long to go into, the point is pressed against the surface of the ground and actually bores its way into it. Fritz Müller described in a letter to me how these twisting grass-seeds bury themselves in the extremely hard and dry soil of Brazil, and are thus no doubt enabled to germinate. Unfortunately these boring grass-seeds do not always confine themselves to penetrating the soil, but exercise their powers on both men and animals. I have received accounts from India and from Italy of the way in which the sharp-pointed seeds work their way through thick trousers into the legs of unfortunate sportsmen. But the most extraordinary case is that of certain grasses which work their way into sheep. They often penetrate the skin deeply and in large numbers, inflicting great tortures, and often causing death by emaciation. Mr. Hinde, of Toronto, has given me the details of this plague to sheep-farmers as it occurs in Buenos Ayres. Another observer has described it in Australia.* He states that not unfrequently the seeds are found actually piercing the heart, liver, and kidneys of sheep which have died from the effects. I believe that the northern part of Queensland has been actually given up as a sheep country because of the presence of this grass.

Another use to which locomotion is applied by animals is that of finding a mate at the proper season. The curious imitation of the courtship of animals which is found in Vallismeria is well known. The stalk grows with extreme rapidity up through the water till the female flower reaches the surface, and there awaits the approach of the male flower, which breaks loose and floats down the stream to meet her. But most plants have not even this amount of locomotive power, and are therefore compelled to employ either the wind or insects as go-betweens. Fortunately for the beauty and sweetness of our woods and fields, insect fertilization is the commonest means adopted; and all the bright flowers and sweet smells of flowers are nothing but allurements held out to insects to entice them to carry the fertilizing pollen from one flower to another. It is curious to find a plant adopting a new mode of conveying its pollen when the old one fails. Thus, a wild, cabbage-like plant which grows in Kerguelen's Land is now fertilized by the wind, that is, it produces dry, dust-like pollen, which is easily carried by the wind. Now this cabbage is the only species in the enormous order of the Cruciferæ which is not fertilized by insects; so that we may be certain that a change has taken place for which some sufficient reason must exist. And the reason of the change is no doubt that the insects in Kerguelen's Land are wingless, and are therefore bad distributors of pollen. And to go one step further back, the reason why the insects are wingless is to be found in the prevalent high winds. Those insects which attempt to fly get blown out to sea, and only those are preserved which are gradually giving up the habit of flying. Thus the pollen of the cabbage has to learn to fly, because the insects will not fly for it.

In considering the analogies between plants and animals, one cannot merely compare those functions which are strictly and physiologically similar in the two kingdoms. One rather sets to work and studies the needs which arise in either a plant or an animal, and then discovers in what way the same need is supplied in the other kingdom. There is no connection between a plant having bright flowers and an animal's power of walking about, yet they may, as we have seen, play the same part in the economy of the two lives.

In the life of animals the first needs that arise are supplied by certain instinctive movements. The young chicken only escapes from its egg by some such movements. Mr. W. Marshall has also shown that the chrysalides of certain moths possess instinctive movements by which they escape from the cocoon or outer case. In one case a sharp spike is developed, sticking out from the side of the chrysalis, and as the latter rotates the spike saws the cocoon all round, so that the top lifts off like a lid. Again, in young chickens Spalding has shown the existence of an instinctive power of obtaining food, and instinctive recognition of the hen by sound only. This was proved by a newly-hatched chicken, which had never heard or seen its mother, running towards a cask under which a clucking hen was hidden. The powers of growth which exist in young seedlings would certainly be called instinctive if they existed in animals, and they are quite as indispensable as those

* C. Prentice, Journal of Botany, 1872, p. 22.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

just mentioned in supplying the wants which first arise.

These two instincts are the power of directing the growth in relation to the force of gravity, and in relation to light; the first being called geotropism, the second heliotropism. As soon as the young root emerges from the seed-coats, it turns abruptly downwards, perceiving like the chick in what direction the earth, its mother, lies. Thus the young plant fixes itself firmly in the ground as quickly as possible, and is enabled to begin to make arrangements for its water-supply. At the same time the young stem grows upwards, and thus raises itself as much as possible over its neighbors. The power of directing itself vertically upwards is also a necessity to the plant, because without it no massive growth like that of a tree would be possible. It would be like a child trying to build a wooden house with bricks that did not stand straight. Thus, both the young stem and the young root have an instinctive knowledge as to where the centre of the earth is — one growing towards the point, the other directly away from it. This fact is so familiar to us, that we fail to think of it as wonderful; it seems a matter of course, like a stone falling or a cork floating on water. Yet we cannot even generalize the fact so far as to say it is the nature of all stems to grow up, and all roots to grow down, for some stems, such as the runner of a strawberry, have a strong wish to grow down instead of up, and side roots that spring from the main ones, though their method of growth is identical with that of the main roots, have no wish to grow downwards. We can find no structural reason at all why a root should grow down and a stem up. But we can see that if a plant took to burying its leaves and rearing its roots into the air, it would have a bad chance in the struggle for life. It is, in fact, the needs of existence which have impressed these modes of growth on the different organs of the plant in accordance with their various requirements. On the other hand, the plant is not absolutely tied down by geotropism, it is not bound to grow always in a vertical line, but is ready to be turned from its course if some other direction can be shown to be more advantageous. Thus Sachs * planted peas in a little sieve, and as the roots emerged underneath, they were enticed from the vertical by an oblique damp surface. This power of giving up the line of growth for the sake of a more advantageous position, must be of great service to roots, by enabling them to choose out damp places in the earth which a blind adherence to rule would have caused them to pass by.

* "Text-Book of Botany," Eng. Tr., p. 764.

The other tendency, which may be also compared to an instinct, is the power possessed by the growing parts of plants of perceiving the position of the chief source of light. This tendency of course interferes with the geotropic tendency, for if the tip of a growing shoot bends towards the light it deviates from its vertical course. This contest between two instincts is well shown by placing a pot of seedlings close to a lamp or a window, in which case the heliotropic beats the geotropic tendency and the young plants curve strongly to the light; now if the pot is removed to a dark room the geotropic tendency reasserts itself, and the seedlings become once more upright. One might fancy from this that the darkness of night would be always undoing any good gained by heliotropic growth in the day. An imaginary case in the life of a seedling will show that it is not so. A seedling germinates under a pile of sticks: having few competitors it makes a good start, but in consequence of the darkness it begins to starve as soon as it has exhausted the supply of food given it by its mother plant stored up in the seed from which it sprang. It starves because it is dark under the pile of sticks, and without light it cannot decompose the carbonic acid of the air and make starch; carbonic acid may be said to be the raw material from which a plant makes its food, but without the help of the light the plant is powerless to make food — it starves in the midst of plenty. So that the power of knowing where the light is and of moving towards it may be just as necessary to prevent a young plant starving as the power of knowing a grain of corn when it sees one and of snapping it up are to a young chicken. Luckily for our imaginary plant a ray of light streams in between two sticks — if the plant insisted on growing straight up in obedience to the geotropic instinct it would lose its chance of life. Fortunately the other light seeking instinct wins the day and the plant thrusts its summit between the sticks and reaches the light. And now it is clear that when the plant has once got between the sticks the tendency to straighten again in the night will not be able to undo the advantage gained in the day by heliotropism. Besides the tendency to seek the light, there is in some plants another exactly opposite tendency to grow away from it. Just as in the case

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

of geotropism no reason can be given why two organs should be affected in exactly an opposite manner by the same cause, no difference of structure can be perceived and no difference in manner of growth can be found between a tendril which grows away from the light and one which grows towards it. The convenience of the plant seems to dictate the result. Thus the Virginian creeper climbs by forming little sticky feet at the end of its tendrils, and as it climbs up a support each new tendril is enabled by its power of seeking for darkness rather than light to find out little dark crannies in which to place its feet. On the other hand a bryony climbs by seizing anything it can get hold of, and as each tendril reaches out towards the light the whole plant will tend to be dragged towards the lighter side of the bush or hedge on which it clambers.

It looks as if the case might be put thus: given the fact that light produces some kind of movement, the convenience of the plant shall decide whether it be towards the light or away from it; or in other words, grant the plant the power of knowing where the centre of the earth is, and grant it the power of knowing where the light comes from, then the plant itself can decide what course of growth is most advantageous.*

* I have spoken as if the existence of positive and negative helio- and geotropism could be simply explained by considering the convenience of the plant. But in details many difficulties arise; for instance, some roots are heliotropic. (Sachs' "Text-Book," p. 755.)

From The Spectator.

THE TOBACCO-TAX IN GERMANY.

IN spite of all the preoccupations in Germany, the tobacco-tax may almost be called the question of the day. It has a political as well as a financial aspect, and although the latter seems at first sight to be the most important, a little reflection will show that it is not much more so than the former. It is pretty well known by this time in England what is the nature of the proposal made by Prince Bismarck in this matter. He starts with the argument that the tobacco-duties in Germany are now lower than they need be, and he proposes to raise them accordingly, with a view to the benefit of the national exchequer. This alteration, moreover, he proposes to make by gradual and progressive steps. First, the cultivation and consumption of tobacco within the German Empire is to be subjected to a higher impost; next, its importation will begin to be restricted by more onerous dues at the ports and frontiers, and last of all the reform would be completed by establishing a government monopoly such as exists in France and some other countries. The first of these steps is that which is now recommended, but it is pretty well understood by all parties in the German Parliament that it forms the basis of the more complete changes above described as likely to follow. Under these circumstances, it is not difficult to understand why a vehement opposition is expected, and indeed already apparent, on the part of the National Liberals. The effect of the complete scheme, when carried out, would be to strengthen immensely the hands of the central government, and to give it pro tanto, in as far as its financial resources were augmented, that which Charles II. and Louis XIV. used to call "a position independent of Parliament." This is exactly the sort of independence in which the National Liberals do not intend Bismarck to entrench himself, and they see, accordingly, in the chancellor's proposals and arguments, not so much a scheme for reorganizing the national finances, as a design to grasp more firmly the reins of arbitrary power, and depress the already weak representatives of popular election. As for the several states of the empire, they have an equal interest in resisting what they deem another attack upon their separate prerogatives, and a fresh means of aggrandizing the central authority at their expense.

Beset by such a host of adversaries as this, backed, as they are, by a solid grievance, and fortified by the natural unpopularity which the proposed tax must excite, it is obviously necessary for Prince Bismarck to show some very good grounds for his propositions. He does so by proving, in the first place, the absolute need of fresh supplies; and secondly, by attempting to make out that no other means of procuring these supplies is so easy, natural, just, and satisfactory as that which he suggests. He disposes at a blow of all ideas of an increase in direct taxation, by reverting to the well-known objections always urged against this sort of impost; and on the other four points — the justice of the tobacco-tax, its utility, its obviousness, and the facility with which it can be levied — he enters into details which may be grouped together and explained in a few words.

The assumption that Germany is under-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

taxed in the matter of tobacco is not, of course, one about which there need be any doubt. The thing is a question of statistics, and the statistics show without possibility of doubt that on this first and essential point the chancellor has complete reason on his side. The duties upon tobacco in Germany amount to 12*s.* 2*d.* a cwt. for unmanufactured tobacco, £1 13*s.* 6d. for manufactured sorts; and about £3 for cigars. The only rates which are lower than these are those levied in Belgium and Holland, in which latter country they are so ridiculously small as to be hardly worth mentioning. Comparing rates current in other countries, it is found that they vary from about £2 in Denmark to £35 in Austria, if regard is had only to the unmanufactured leaf, while the duty on manufactured tobacco and cigars varies in a like proportion, some countries being, however, like Austria and England, far more indulgent to cigars, while others, like Russia, charge enormous rates for this luxury, but are comparatively lenient to simple tobacco. It may be taken as a thoroughly well-established fact, therefore, that the impost in Germany, whether resulting from import dues or internal taxation, is exceptionally low, and might be raised without at all violating any principles of abstract justice which a financier might choose to set up. With regard to the facility with which Germany could afford to pay a higher tax, there is little greater difficulty in giving an affirmative answer. No one who has ever travelled in a German railway-carriage, or sat an evening in a German students' club, will for one moment deny that Germans smoke too much. The excess of nicotine which they imbibe does not apparently damage their appetites nor perceptibly impair their vitality, but it makes them blind, and it makes them unhealthy, and makes them very unpleasant companions. It may be urged that to impose a tax would drive them only to smoke worse tobacco, and not to smoke less of it; but the argument is fallacious, for the simple reason that they could not procure worse. The cheapness of German tobacco and German cigars is such that no cheaper could be made, and the whole population smokes the cheapest that can be bought, leaving the superior sorts for princes, Englishmen, and Americans. To prove this fact, it is only necessary to examine the statistics of import into any German town, and observe what is the proportion of Cuban cigars to raw leaf and other cheap tobacco. To say that an augmentation of the tax would soon be regarded only as a natural phenomenon, is only to describe one part of the modern Teuton's character. He has become used to changes of such infinitely greater dimensions, and has been taught by such severe lessons to acquiesce, that a change which would reduce the consumption of tobacco from twenty to fifteen pipes a day would certainly not be long before it was accepted, as an evil to be patiently borne in the great cause of the united fatherland.

We arrive at the question how far the proposed tax would fulfil its destined purpose in regenerating the national finances. And the simplest answer to this inquiry is to be found in the fact that the Germans are a nation of smokers. From the time when Frederick William I. started his tobacco-club till now, every soul in the country, from prince to peasant and from professor to schoolboy, is early broken to a love for tobacco, and persists in it to his dying day. The average consumption for each head of the population in 1873 was no less than five and one-half pounds in the year; and although this total sank in the year following to less than four pounds, there is a constant tendency to revert to the standard of consumption which in a temporary flush of prosperity has been attained. To provide tobacco for this enormous number of smokers, there are in cultivation in the empire some seventy-four thousand acres of land. The tobacco grown within the empire provides, practically speaking, for the whole needs of the consumers, for although Germany imports a vast quantity, notably of the inferior sorts, yet it exports annually in its turn a somewhat larger quantity, these exports being, of course, of a still coarser quality than that which is delivered at the ports. An estimate of the quantity of cigars and tobacco brought into Germany may be formed from a glance at the statistics of the port of Bremen, at which there paid duty in 1874 one million hundredweights of unmanufactured leaf, two hundred and fifteen thousand hundredweights of manufactured tobacco, and thirty-six and one-half millions of cigars, the number of the latter having suddenly decreased in that year from fifty-six millions, or thirty per cent. It must be admitted, however, that no other port in Germany shows anything like such figures, and probably all of them together do not import as large a quantity as Bremen alone. It results from these data that it will not require a great augmentation either in the excise or custom duties, or both together, to increase the German Imperial revenues by a very re-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

spectable amount. By adding only one mark to the tax on the production or consumption of tobacco, and increasing the import duties in a like proportion, some two millions would be gained, while by doubling each of these imports the chancellor would obtain the two and a half millions upon which he seems to count.

This is, however, supposing that the consumption and importation of tobacco remained pretty much the same after the new taxes had been imposed as they were in the preceding years. Is there any reason to suppose that this would be the case? Herein lies the gist of this, as of most other fiscal projects. The Germans are, it is true, "a nation of smokers," but are they too securely wedded to the practice to be able to diminish the huge mass of tobacco which they burn every day and every year? Those who cultivate the plant in Wurtemburg and Baden and in the Prussian provinces make a living out of their labors, but they do not grow rich upon it. Would they continue the cultivation, if a new impediment were thrown in the way of their profits? On the other hand, are there not signs that the revenue from tobacco is precarious and insecure? We have seen that the consumption per man sank suddenly in one year from five and a half pounds to four pounds, and that in the same year the importation of cigars to Bremen declined from fifty-six millions to thirty-six and one-half millions. It may be added that the general revenue from tobacco sank in that same year (1874) from above thirty-three millions of thalers to very little over twenty-three millions. Whatever may be the various reasons alleged for those changes, one thing seems beyond dispute, — that the consumption of tobacco in the country is very fluctuating in its amount, and that the demand for it is very sensitive, and liable to be easily and seriously affected. Everything, or almost everything, that has been said upon the last subject is applicable to the proposal to establish an ultimate government monopoly. By undertaking the exclusive trade in tobacco, the government would, according to Prince Bismarck's calculation, make some twelve or fifteen millions sterling a year, instead of the comparatively petty revenue which it now derives from the duties. But to assume the exclusive privilege would be a very strong measure, and the boldest financier would not dream of attempting it at one stroke. The other countries where such a monopoly is enjoyed are France, Spain, Italy, and Turkey, and in these it has been established either by slow steps, or very long ago. In France the monopoly was assumed by the government two hundred years ago, and only interrupted during the great Revolution, for a period of ten years. The French have acquiesced easily in the system, because they are rich enough to afford it, and are content to regard smoking as a luxury rather than a necessity. They do not grumble, because they have always been accustomed to the price they pay and the way in which they pay it, and in all questions of national finance that is most easy which has been longest regarded as the rule. It is a very different question whether a poorer nation, which regards tobacco as almost a prime necessity of life, would admit with ease or advantage a fiscal arrangement to which they are altogether unused, and against which the objections above mentioned, and perhaps a great many others, may be raised on every side. If it is to do so, it can only be by degrees, and after a course of gradual preparation. And this is the reason why Prince Bismarck has elected to begin with a very thin end of the wedge.

From The Spectator.

THE GARDENER BIRD.

In the last number of the Gardener's Chronicle, a very curious account is translated for that journal, and illustrated with engravings by a traveller in New Guinea, — Signor Odoardi Beccari, — of a new species of bower-bird, very similar in its habits to the Australian bower-birds of which Mr. Darwin gives so striking an account in the second volume of his "Descent of Man." This new Papuan variety is called the Amblyornis inornata, and is, in fact, a bird of paradise in plain clothes, without the gorgeous costume that is usually associated with the name. It is, says Signor Beccari, about the size of the ordinary turtle-dove, and both the male and the female appear to have a plumage of the most unostentatious description,— their feathers only showing a few different varieties of brown. But it would be a very mistaken inference to suppose that bright coloring is not enjoyed and valued by these birds. They appear, indeed, to be birds of great capacity for the plastic arts. They are wonderful actors, — in the sense of presenting accurately the voices and notes of a great variety of other birds, so as to deceive completely those who are in search of them. "It is a clever bird,"

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

says Signor Beccari, "called by the inhabitants buruck gurea,—'master bird,'—since it imitates the songs and screamings of numerous birds so well, that it brought my hunters to despair, who were but too often misled by the bird. Another name of the bird is tukan robon, which means 'a gardener,'" and in fact, the chief peculiarity of the bird is its great taste for landscape gardening, in which art it seems to excel almost all the bower-birds. Signor Beccari apparently regards the bower he describes as the bird's "nest," but unless the New Guinea variety differs in this respect from the other kinds of birds of this description, he was probably mistaken in this. Mr. Darwin says distinctly, "The bowers, which, as we shall hereafter see, are highly decorated with feathers, shells, bones, and leaves, are built on the ground for the sole purpose of courtship, for their nests are formed in trees." We should think it most likely that this is the case also with the New Guinea species. And if so, the beautiful arbors described and illustrated by Signor Beccari, are mere places of social resort, like our marquees or tents for picnics; and though so much more beautiful, are much more durable also, for Signor Beccari says that the amblyornis bowers last for three or four years, which our marquees, even in that climate, hardly would. And the beauty of the structure shows how far superior these birds are to human beings in their æsthetic architecture. They select for their bowers a flat space round a small tree, the stem of which is not thicker than a walking-stick, and clear of branches near the ground. Round this they build a cone of moss of the size of a man's hand, the object of which does not seem to be explained, but may be perhaps merely to make a soft cushion round the tree in parts where the birds are most likely to strike against it. At a little height above this moss cushion, and about two feet from the ground, they attach to the tree twigs of a particular orchid (Dendrobium), which grows in large tufts on the trunks and branches of trees, its twigs being very pliant, and weave them together, fastening them to the ground at a distance of about eighteen inches from the tree all round, leaving, of course, an opening by which the birds enter the arbor. Thus they make a conical arbor of some two feet in height, and three feet (on the ground) in diameter, with a wide ring round the moss cushion for promenading; and here they are sheltered from the elements, and have a pavilion of the most delicate materials. They appear to select this particular orchid for their building, because, besides the extreme pliancy, the stalks and leaves live long after they are detached from the plant on which they grow. Both leaves and stalks remain fresh and beautiful, says Signor Beccari, for a very long period after they have been plaited in this way into the roofing of the arbor.

But all birds are great architects, and the only peculiarity in this respect of the bower-bird is that it builds separate structures for domestic life and for social amusement; that its house is not its pavilion for pleasure but a different kind of structure altogether. The bower-birds, however, are still more remarkable for laying out pleasances round their pavilions, than even for building these special resorts for social amusement. The satin bower-bird, says Mr. Darwin, "collects gaily-colored articles, such as the blue tail-feathers of parakeets, bleached bones and shells, which it sticks between the twigs or arranges at the entrance. Mr. Gould found in one bower a neatly-worked stone tomahawk and a slip of blue cotton, evidently procured from a native encampment. These objects are continually rearranged and carried about by the birds whilst at play. The bower of the spotted bower-bird is 'beautifully lined with tall grasses, so disposed that the heads nearly meet, and the decorations are very profuse.' Round stones are used to keep the grass-stems in their proper places, and to make divergent paths leading to the bower. The stones and shells are often brought from a great distance. The regent bird, as described by Mr. Ramsay, ornaments its short bower with bleached land-shells belonging to five or six species, and with 'berries of various colors, blue, red, and black, which give it, when fresh, a very pretty appearance. Besides these, there were several newly-picked leaves and young shoots of a pinkish color, the whole showing a decided taste for the beautiful.'" And now to this description is to be added Signor Beccari's description of the greatest of landscape gardeners amongst birds, who makes himself first a lawn of moss before the bower,—the Papuan grass, like all tropical grass, is probably of the poorest and coarsest kind, and quite incapable of anything like the velvet smoothness of an English lawn,—and then strews this mossy lawn with the most beautiful flowers and fruits it can find, so arranged as to produce the same effect as

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

the flower-bed of an English garden, or more exactly, perhaps, the flower-strewn turf of an English churchyard. The gardener bird is very careful to keep its lawn free from any disfigurement, and though it does not seem to have invented a garden roller, the moss probably is a material which does not need such an instrument. This is what Signor Beccari says: "Before the cottage there is a meadow of moss. This is brought to the spot, and kept free from grass, stones, or anything which would offend the eye. On this green turf, flowers and fruits of pretty color are placed, so as to form an elegant little garden. The greater part of the decoration is collected round the entrance to the nest, and it would appear that the husband offers there his daily gifts to his wife. The objects are very various, but always of vivid color. There were some fruits of a garcinia like a small sized apple. Others were the fruits of gardenias of a deep-yellow color in the interior. I saw also small rosy fruits, probably of a scitaminaceous plant, and beautiful rosy flowers of a splendid new vaccinium (Agapetes amblyornidis). There were also fungi and mottled insects placed on the turf. As soon as the objects are faded, they are moved to the back of the hut." So that the gardener bird carefully renews the beauty of his garden. Just as the gardener takes away the flowers whose bloom is over, and replaces them with new ones whose beauty is still fresh, so the amblyornis removes to the back of its pavilion all the faded flowers and fruits, and renews the coloring on its lawn by a fresh supply. Thus at least three of the plastic arts are pursued by this remarkable bird, and all of them apparently from artistic feeling, rather than from any domestic want. As we have seen, it is a great actor, deceiving the most experienced ear, by rendering in turn the songs and screams of all its various companions. It is a great architect, and this, again, — if the analogy of the other bower-birds may be trusted, — not in the interest of family life, but of the lighter social amusements of its tribe. And it is a great gardener, making artificially for itself a lawn of moss, and disposing on this lawn all the beautiful coloring with which the blossoms and fruits of the neighborhood supply it. Signor Beccari contrasts its habits in this way with those of the human inhabitants of the neighborhood. "I discovered," he says, "that the inhabitants of Arfak did not follow the example of the amblyornis. Their houses are quite inaccessible from dirt."

Indeed, the sense of beauty and of art which these bower-birds seem to possess is so great, that we may well imagine it possible that they may, to some extent, generalize upon the principles of art, and that amongst these plain, brown-clad birds of paradise there may be some germinal Burkes, or even rudimentary Ruskins. If such there be, what, we wonder, are the principles of beauty which recommend themselves to these winged devotees of the plastic arts? Do they, perhaps, believe, as our theorists upon art do, that there is no true art in imitation, — nor indeed without an expression of the mind of the artist? Would they not maintain, perhaps, — if they could expressly maintain anything, — that the key to a true picture consists in the bird-thought, — the "aviary element," — which gives it unity; that the secret of beauty in their bowers, and mossy lawns, and in the flowers and fruits of various colors strewn thereupon, is never in the mere form and color, but rather in the explicit reference to the feelings of the brown birds which thus lay down their offerings, and the other brown birds to whose affections and hopes these offerings appeal? Our own artists assure us that landscape, however beautiful, is naught without the "human element" to give it meaning. Do the birds of paradise think the same, — substituting, of course, the "aviary" for the "human" element? When he looks at the Papuan forests and fruits, does the amblyornis think of them merely with a view to the nests or the bowers and gardens for which they are available? If he could picture nature as delicately as he can build, and as he can arrange color, would he find fault with any landscape in which there was nothing better than a human interest, unless indeed that human interest happened also to involve an "aviary" interest, — in other words, unless the men concerned were intending to bring about tragedies among the birds? Certainly, if the great artistic teachers of our own society are right, this should be so; and art should have a different meaning for each species of creature capable of conceiving in any degree what art means. Yet, so far as we can see, the ideas of beauty and art entertained by the bower-birds, though very rudimentary indeed, are entirely of one piece and one origin with the more developed ideas of the human race.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

THE LEGITIMATE SPHERE OF AGNOSTICISM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SPECTATOR.

SIR, — Among the many hindrances to clearness of faith in these days, there is one which does not appear to me to be sufficiently recognized in its bearing upon the spiritual life. It is the vastness of the supply of materials for theory, and therefore for controversy, provided by the extraordinarily complete system of literary irritation, by which every house in the kingdom is saturated with daily information from all the ends of the earth about the doings and the sufferings, the struggles and the destinies, of some hundreds of millions of human beings. The mass of problems challenging our faith grows daily more unmanageably vast and intricate, while the intellectual and spiritual organs by which they must be dealt with are incapable of any corresponding increase of grasp. The mere demand upon our sympathies is exhausting (if not hardening), but when we are called upon not only to rejoice with thousands and to weep with millions, but to justify the ways of God towards nation after nation, according to each day's telegraphic reports of famine and slaughter, on pain of confessing that we have no sufficient reason for the faith that is in us, then it does seem to me that it is time for a resolute limitation of our jurisdiction.

Some recent discussions in your own columns have goaded me to enter this protest on behalf of those of your readers whose knowledge, like my own, is by no means as complete as might be wished. I believe there are many besides myself to whom (to speak only of the most external framework of knowledge) the history of China for the last three centuries is not much better known than its history for the next three, and who would be very sorry without due notice to enter an examination in the histories of Russia and Turkey, in the provisions of the American Constitution, on the relations between France and Germany for the last few centuries, not to mention many facts in the history of Austria, of Italy, of Denmark, of Prussia, and of the British possessions in India, a knowledge of which would be essential to any true judgment upon the right and wrong of the most exciting events of the last twenty years. Yet all these events are forced upon the imagination with a vividness and minuteness of detail which make havoc of our impartiality, and cast the sense of our ignorance to the winds. The most peaceable of recluses can find no shelter from the din of battle; the most stay-at-home of women cannot shut her eyes to the horrors of Oriental famine and pestilence. And not only are the events themselves daily and almost hourly brought home to us, and often strangely jumbled in our half-educated minds, but all sorts of questions arising out of them are discussed in every newspaper, at every table, almost in every morning call. Questions which a generation or two ago were reserved for the deepest study of the wise and prudent are now debated by every babe without any study at all, and if we have not a ready answer for every difficulty, our neighbors are apt to make short work with our faith.

I do not complain of this. Accusation and reply are often about equally shallow, and if we choose to discuss the attributes of the Creator in the columns of our newspapers, and to plead before the editor that the Lord's ways are equal, we cannot complain of any incidental shocks to our reverence. What I wish to suggest is that it is altogether idle to suppose that when the premises are utterly beyond our grasp, our conclusions can be worth anything, and that the battle between faith and agnosticism (if that be the proper opposition) must by most of us be fought upon a narrower field, if it is to be fought to any purpose. If the battle-field be the universe, agnosticism is the only condition of mind possible to limited mortals. But if the battle-field be the human heart, and my own trust all that I am called upon to justify, then surely the wars and rumors of wars, the pestilences and famines, the vast surrounding atmosphere of suffering and perplexity and evil in every form to which I may not shut my eyes, are yet, with all their infinite actual importance, only secondary, in point of relevance and logical impact, to the experience of pain and sin derived from my own narrow struggles. The only faith which cannot be touched by difficulties suggested from without, is that which springs from a victory won within, and the best use of our unlimited exposure to attack is to enforce a more perfect inward discipline. Giving up the attempt to "solve the riddle of the painful earth," not because we see it to be insoluble, but because we see ourselves to be incompetent, we may yet learn, in the words of one of your own recent contributors, that

> Each interprets for the whole
> When he learns his destiny.

I am, Sir, etc., M.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXII. | No. 1767.—April 27, 1878. | From Beginning, Vol. CXXXVII.

CONTENTS.

I. England as a Military Power in 1854 and in 1878, ... Nineteenth Century, ... 195
II. Erica. Part XX. Translated for The Living Age, from the German of . . Frau von Ingersleben, ... 209
III. Modern Japan, ... Fortnightly Review, ... 222
IV. Macleod of Dare. By William Black. Part VII., ... Advance Sheets, ... 229
V. French Home Life. The Influence of Women, ... Blackwood's Magazine, . . . 236
VI. Change-Ringing, ... Chambers' Journal, ... 247
VII. Our Irresponsible Ambassadors, . . Spectator, ... 250
VIII. The Loss of the "Eurydice," . . . Spectator, ... 252
IX. The Domestic Sphinx, ... Spectator, ... 254

POETRY.

Lost and Found, ... 194
At the Theatre, ... 194
Beautiful Things, ... 194

Miscellany, ... 256

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY

LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

For Eight Dollars, remitted directly to the Publishers, the Living Age will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of The Living Age is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of Littell & Gay.

Single Numbers of The Living Age, 18 cents.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

LOST AND FOUND.

I LOST the brook as it wound its way
Like a thread of silver hue;
Through greenwood and valley, through meadows gay,
'Twas hidden away from view:
But I found it again a noble river,
Sparkling and broad and free,
Wider and fairer growing ever,
Till it reached the boundless sea.

I lost the tiny seed that I sowed
With many a sigh and tear,
And vainly waited through sunshine and cold
For the young green to appear;
But surely after many long days
The blossom and fruit will come,
And the reapers on high the sheaves will raise
For a joyful harvest-home.

I lost the life that grew by my own
For one short summer day;
And then it left me to wander alone,
And silently passed away:
But I know I shall find it further on,
Though not as it left me here;
For the shadows and mists will have passed and gone,
I shall see it fair and clear.

I lost the notes of the heavenly chime
That once came floating by;
I have listened and waited many a time
For the echo, though distantly:
But I know in the halls of glory it thrills,
Ever by day and night;
I shall hear it complete when its harmony fills
My soul with great delight.

I lost the love that made my life,
A love that was all for me;
Oh! vainly I sought it amid the strife
Of the stormy, raging sea:
But deeper and purer I know it waits
Beyond my wistful eyes;
I shall find it again within the gates
Of the garden of paradise.

I shall lose this life! it will disappear,
With its wonderful mystery;
Some day it will move no longer here,
But will vanish silently:
But I know I shall find it again once more,
In a beauty no song hath told;
It will meet with me at the golden door,
And round me forever fold.

Golden Hours. M.

AT THE THEATRE.

ON the stage an acted horror,
A king crime-haunted to death;
Around me glitter and glare,
And fans that harry an air
That stifles me breath by breath;
And eyes all one way gazing
On the magical master-player,
Whose face, chameleon-wise,
Reflects all moods that arise,—
Craft, crime, and credulous prayer.

I gaze, and listen—but sudden
I dream in midst of the play;
And the king may threaten or whine,
It seems no matter of mine,—
I am twenty miles away.

Down in a mossy dingle,
Where sinless, a stranger to pain,
And friend to all winds that blow,
And hearing the fresh herbs grow,
And feeling the dew or the rain,

A slight wind-flower is hiding,
Green-scarfed, white-faced as the snow;
The young year's earliest child,
That I found last morn growing wild,
And spoke with, and left it to grow.

Spectator. F. WYVILLE HOME.
7 Belgrave Villas, Lee, S.E.

BEAUTIFUL THINGS.

BEAUTIFUL faces are those that wear—
It matters little if dark or fair—
Whole-souled honesty printed there.

Beautiful eyes are those that show,
Like crystal panes where hearth-fires glow,
Beautiful thoughts that burn below.

Beautiful lips are those whose words
Leap from the heart like songs of birds,
Yet whose utterance prudence girds.

Beautiful hands are those that do
Work that is earnest and brave and true,
Moment by moment the long day through.

Beautiful feet are those that go
On kindly ministries to and fro—
Down lowliest ways, if God wills it so.

Beautiful shoulders are those that bear
Ceaseless burdens of homely care
With patient grace and daily prayer.

Beautiful lives are those that bless—
Silent rivers of happiness,
Whose hidden fountains but few may guess.

Beautiful twilight, at set of sun,
Beautiful goal, with race well won,
Beautiful rest, with work well done.

Beautiful graves, where grasses creep,
Where brown leaves fall, where drifts lie deep
Over worn-out hands—oh, beautiful sleep!

ELLEN P. ALLERTON.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The Nineteenth Century.

ENGLAND AS A MILITARY POWER IN 1854 AND IN 1878.

When a house in your neighborhood is on fire, it is high time to look to your water-supply, and to ascertain the condition of your perhaps hitherto neglected fire-engine. If that is out of order, your only resource is to patch it up as best you can to meet the immediate emergency; but as soon as the danger is over, some trifling or unexpected accident having perchance saved your property from destruction — unless, indeed, you are a recklessly unthrifty and unbusinesslike householder — you will lose no time in taking precautions against any future recurrence of such a danger. The man who has had a warning of that nature and failed to benefit by it, meets with no sympathy when, a few years later, nothing of his house remains to him but some smoking ruins.

What holds good with individuals may be appropriately applied to nations also. England has had many warnings and several hairbreadth escapes from calamity, but we have learned experience from none. We can only be saved from the fire of war — the greatest of all scourges — by our national fire-engines, the army and the navy. When danger approaches we realize this, but during a spell of profound peace we laugh at the dangers we have escaped, and we scoff at those which foreseeing men tell us may be in store for us. We take the advice of medical men upon sanitary subjects; we follow their recommendations to protect us from epidemics; to guard ourselves, or those who are to come after us, against injury arising from ill-constructed wills, leases, or other legal documents, we employ the best lawyer we can afford to pay; and, lest our house should tumble about our heads, we build in accordance with the advice of an experienced architect. When danger is upon us, when an angry country insists upon our ministry vindicating its insulted honor by force of arms, the soldier is sent for and his opinion requested, but until then his views are decried as foolish, and the warnings he dares to utter are neglected with undisguised scorn. We never tire in advertising ourselves as an eminently practical people; as individuals or as commercial companies we insure our lives, our ships, our houses, etc., against various risks, but as a nation we take no trouble to insure our empire against disasters of the most serious nature. The Duke of Wellington in his day, with all the weight of his renown, was unable to convince the English people of the terrible dangers to which the country was then exposed, and all the best of our soldiers since his time have been equally unsuccessful. As a rule we have been content to patch up our fire-engine in a temporary and, I may add, in a most ineffective manner upon each occasion when our neighbor's property was in flames; but no sooner has the fire been put out, even although it had, we know, ruined our friend before it was got under, than we put back our engine into its former resting-place, taking no trouble to remedy the defects which a practical trial of it had brought to light. Lord Palmerston alone of all our recent ministers, it would seem, was alive to England's danger, and, thanks to him, the Thames and our principal dockyards are now safe against a coup de main. The heart of our empire may now be said to be tolerably safe, but how about our extremities? Our commerce, we boast, covers the globe, but to protect it in distant seas our ships of war must practically encircle our sphere also. Our fleet is now propelled by steam, so it cannot keep the sea unless we have coaling stations in every ocean. But unless these coaling places are fortified they can be of no use during war. Year after year the vital importance of erecting works to protect those stations has been urged by soldiers upon successive administrations, both officially and in the press, but still they remain at the mercy of the first enemy's ironclad that reaches them.

To illustrate our present unfortunate position I have only to tell the following story. When the czar's army crossed the Pruth last year, his ironclad squadron, which happened to be in European waters, was despatched to America, evidently in the first instance to get it away from our fleet in the event of England's having declared war. Let us consider what that insignificant squadron might have done

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

against us. Being kept ready coaled and prepared for sea, as soon as the telegraph announced the declaration of war it would most probably have started for St. Helena, picking up some of our finest West India and South America steamers en route. Upon arrival at St. Helena it would most likely have found there one of the small English wooden war-vessels belonging to our west coast of Africa squadron. Such a vessel would of course have fallen an easy prey to the Russians, who, filling up with coal, burning all they could not carry away, and, having taken from Jamestown as much money as it could pay to save it from destruction, would steam for Simon's Bay, where the same performance would be gone through. There we have a small dockyard establishment, and almost always one or two wooden war-vessels. All would be destroyed as well as every coal store in Cape Town; every merchantman in Table Bay — and there is always a large quantity of shipping there — would be captured, and most probably burned. This game would then be repeated at the Mauritius, Aden, Bombay, Point de Galle, Singapore, and Hongkong, whence the Russian squadron would make its way to Petropolovski, where it would be comparatively safe from our fleet. Now this is no fanciful chimera; it is a practical and feasible scheme, and I have no doubt in my own mind that had we declared war it would have been attempted. Not only should we have thus lost millions of pounds' worth of property and several small ships flying her Majesty's pennant, but the destruction of the coal stores at those several ports would have completely paralyzed the action of our war-vessels in those seas, and would therefore have secured the Russians against all danger of pursuit. It would have brought our trade almost to a standstill, for merchantmen depend now nearly as much upon coal as our navy does.

To all thinking men in both services the dangers we should be exposed to in the event of war are familiar, and many, even the bravest among us, turn pale as they count them over. Should war find the nation unprepared, it is we who shall have to pay the penalty with our lives; and yet we are daily taunted publicly with wishing for it, and with desiring for our own selfish ends to force on a conflict for which we, above all others, know we are never ready. Past history teaches us how little mercy we may expect at the hands of whatever party happens to be in power. British ministries have never failed to shift the blame of failure from themselves to the commanders, no matter how hard may have been their struggle for victory, and notwithstanding the ministers' responsibility for their selection.

The English general has not hitherto occupied an enviable position in the field; he has always been pitted against an enemy his superior in numbers, and he has often had to act with jealous allies, whose touchy susceptibilities it has been no easy matter to avoid offending. The small army placed under his orders is generally composed of raw, disjointed units, unaccustomed to work together, with a faulty, inexperienced administration suddenly called into existence for the occasion, and generally with a totally inadequate supply of transport. It is a poor scratch pack which he has to whip into shape if he is given time to do so. This he is seldom allowed, for an impatient people at home call aloud for immediate active operations, and few ministries have ever had the firmness to resist such a cry. To add to his difficulties, his unwillingness to act until he is ready lays him open to be misunderstood and even misrepresented by his subordinates, who find themselves called upon to take part in an organization with the working of which they are wholly unfamiliar. Of all the many difficulties with which the Duke of Wellington had to contend in the Peninsula, none was greater than the distrust of his best-planned schemes which was excited in England by letters from officers serving under his orders. The same evil was rampant in the Crimea. It will be aggravated in future campaigns by the almost irresistible temptation presented to even the best-intentioned newspaper correspondents to court popularity with the officers and men they are thrown amongst, by retailing for home readers every grumble they hear which sounds like effective

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

military criticism. In reality these grumbles represent only the sense of annoyance felt by men called upon to work out ideas they do not comprehend — ideas which as a whole are unknown to them, and their special share of which they regard as absurd, because they do not understand how it fits in with some other part that supplements and completes it.

How different all this is from what takes place in the German army, where every man during war is called upon merely to help in the working of a machine that all have been accustomed to in peace! In this respect the German commander has a great advantage over the English general, for the German subordinate officers during peace training have acquired confidence in their military system and in their superiors entrusted with its working. They are less prone to criticise the acts of those above them, because they understand the machinery employed, and have learned to appreciate grumblers at their true value. In the English army, unfortunately, our peace system, clearly indicated as it is by regulations, is not based upon the requirements for war; a new system has therefore to be inaugurated by the general in the field, when his time and thoughts are already severely strained by the responsibilities of his position.

The history of the Crimean war is still fresh in the memory of those who took part in it. Never was any expedition planned by a home government with more reckless ignorance of war and its requirements than that which landed at Eupatoria. At the beginning of the campaign our treasury was as parsimonious as it was subsequently lavish in expenditure. About twenty-four thousand British soldiers — no finer body of men have ever worn her Majesty's uniform — were hurled ashore without the means of carrying their wounded, and even without sufficient tools to bury their dead. British discipline in two or three hard-fought battles won for England a brilliant but a short-lived success; and when, through the military ignorance of those in Downing Street who planned the campaign, that devoted little army dwindled down almost to a handful of half-starved scarecrows, those who had starved us through their ignorant parsimony sent out commissioners, whose avowed business it was to select a victim from amongst our generals on whom to cast the blame. They selected the ablest of them as their scapegoat, and held him up to public opprobrium because he had not made a road from Balaclava to the camp, although they knew full well he had neither the tools nor the labor at his disposal for such an undertaking.

At the present time, when war may be forced upon us at any moment, we see the same spirit of ignorance upon war's requirements rife in the country. Owing to this ignorance many, who are as sincere patriots as any of our public men, denounce the present ministry for asking for money to make those preparations which their military advisers declare to be necessary in the event of war if they wish to avoid the mistakes and their attendant misfortunes of 1854. We hear men say: "Why ask for money now? if war is forced upon you, it will be ample time to ask for it then." In 1854 there was perhaps some excuse for the military ignorance of our statesmen, but after the lessons taught us that year no one can now plead ignorance in justification of such conduct.

Why is it that England is never ready for war, nor possesses the machinery by means of which she can expand her military peace establishments into a condition for active service? It is a proverbial saying that we are never fit for anything in the first campaign. Writing of the English troops which landed at Calais in 1475, Philippe de Comines says: "Car il n'est rien plus sot ny plus mal adroit, quand ils passent premièrement: mais en bien peu d'espace ils sont très-bonnes gens de guerre, sages et hardis." As it was then, so it is in a measure at present. During peace our government — that is, in reality, the English people — reduce our military establishments to such an extent that nothing remains but the bare skeletons of weak regiments, the administrative departments being kept up in name only. John Bull has been taught by experience that he cannot buy ready-made soldiers, much less a ready-made army, as he can his clothes in a slop-shop; still he

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd never will take that lesson to heart. He is such a believer in money, and has been so often told that it is the real sinews of war, that he cannot or will not realize how impossible it is for him to procure an army with it the moment he wants one. What have we seen within the last few days? The ministry obliged to ask for 6,000,000*l.* to prepare, not for war, but to fill its magazines, naval and military stores, so that, in case of necessity, its little army may be in a condition to mobilize — in fact, to bring it to that state in which the armies of all the other great powers are always kept in peace.

I have alluded to the military ignorance of our ministers in the Crimean war: here is an example of it. A letter was read in the House of Parliament one evening from an officer in the field, in which he referred to the want of all means for conveying our sick and wounded to the ships for embarkation, adding that our army had to depend upon the French cacolets lent to us for that purpose. The English minister who was responsible for army affairs at once got up and indignantly denied the statement, adding that he knew it to be untrue because he had the best authority for asserting positively that there were a hundred hospital panniers at that moment in the Crimea. He might just as well have said there were so many toothpicks there, as a hospital pannier, which he evidently thought was a conveyance of some sort, is nothing more than a wicker-work basket, made in a peculiar manner, for the reception of medicines, operating instruments, and other medical appliances. The page of Hansard which records that reply is the gravest of all possible satires upon our war administration of that time. Great reforms have been effected in our system of home military administration since then, and the war minister has now always at his side the field-marshal commanding-in-chief and his able staff. That staff is no longer composed of men selected through family or political interests, but on account of their well-proved merits and ability. We are fond of depreciating everything we possess, but I do not hesitate to assert that our headquarter staff would compare most favorably on every point with that belonging to any other army.

It is an interesting study to go back to 1854 and compare the staff which left England early that year for Turkey with the staff employed upon recent expeditions, such as that to Ashanti, or with that now at Aldershot or at almost any of our military stations. Curious stories without end might be told to illustrate my statement as to the inefficiency of many of those who composed the staff which originally embarked in 1854: here is one as it was told me by an eye-witness. Whilst the army was in Turkey before it left for the Crimea, an important military operation had to be undertaken. A few days before that named for the operation my friend went to a staff-officer in high position, who was his immediate superior, and whose duty it was to make all the necessary arrangements, and to draw up instructions for all the departments and general officers concerned, and asked if he had any orders to give. The reply was: "No; I have not yet thought over the matter, but I will see to it by-and-by." The next day the question was repeated with a similar result, and upon the third day — the day before this very complicated and difficult operation was to have taken place — as my friend repeated his question he saw that his superior was whittling a piece of a stick. That superior was an amiable old gentleman and an excellent carpenter. He listened calmly to my friend, who was rather excited, seeing that nothing was ready for the move, and that no attempt had as yet been made to prepare for it. After a pause the man on whom for the moment a great national responsibility rested, looked up and said: "Perhaps, Captain ——, you do not know what I am doing." "No, sir," replied my friend. "Well," said the old general, "upon strolling about here this morning I perceived that there was no latch or bolt to Lord Raglan's cupboard, and I am making one as an agreeable surprise for him." Here was an army about to begin a most serious undertaking, the preparations and arrangements for which could only be made by this high official; but so utterly was he incapable of taking in the serious responsibility that rested on him, so ignorant was he of the duties attached to his position, that he employed his time in carpentering when all his intellect, all his energies, should have been devoted to the great duty which devolved upon him. He was neither lazy nor stupid, but if ever there was a round man in a square hole it was he. Such a man in that position would be impossible nowadays, and why? Because public opinion would not sanction it.

Public opinion had little weight in the selection of general officers in 1854 when the war began. But when the splendid victories with which our army opened the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

campaign were succeeded by the calamities which befell it during the winter, the people at home grew angry, and accused those in power of selecting men for high military positions rather for their family and political connections than for their proved ability. In writing to Baron V. von Ense, in March, 1855, on this subject, Miss Charlotte Williams-Wynn says: "The people are determined on a reform in the army and the official appointments." She adds: "The lower and middle classes are certainly in thorough earnest in their determination that the aristocracy shall have justice and not favor; but so long as they only clamor for the fittest men to be put into the different posts, I can see no cause for alarm. They will repudiate an idiot sailor in an office as much as an idiot lord; and the nation is too sensible to join in an empty cry merely against a class." Notwithstanding this determination, however, on the part of the people, all the inefficient men originally appointed to the staff from England were never got rid of. As an illustration of how strong family interest was to the end of the war, I remember a general officer reporting one of his staff as utterly useless, and imploring his removal. His inefficiency was patent to all who had any dealings with him, yet owing to his family influence at home he was retained in his place. All appointments to high office in both army and navy are now sharply criticised, and "Dowb" must in future be content to stand or rise on his own personal merits.

Yet we hear it said that the English people take no interest in their army or in military matters. I deny that this is the case at present, although I admit that it was true in past times. During the long peace that intervened between the great French war and 1854, no one seems to have realized that frequent reforms are as necessary to the well-being of an army as they are to that of all political constitutions. Our troops under Wellington had then won for England a great military reputation, upon the credit of which we lived, and, politically speaking, traded, for nearly fifty years. The excellence of our soldiers was unquestioned abroad, and to have doubted it at home would have earned for the unbeliever a reputation of silliness. Had not the army of all other European nations bowed the neck before Napoleon's legions? had not Vienna, Berlin, Madrid, Moscow, and all great capitals except London received French garrisons? and yet had not those renowned soldiers been signally defeated by our army in Spain and in Portugal, and finally crushed by it at Waterloo? It is no wonder, therefore, that for many years afterwards the English people should have regarded their army as so perfect that there was no necessity for their troubling themselves about it. From time to time, especially during periods of commercial depression when the necessaries of life were dear and taxation was felt severely, a cry arose to reduce our army expenditure. Even then, however, the people took little interest in military details, and Parliament contented itself with curtailing the army estimates by one or two millions of money, leaving it to the military authorities in power to distribute that reduction over the numerous items of expenditure as they thought best. A general confidence was then felt in our military chiefs who had won their spurs in action; they had proved their ability as leaders in the field, and the country was satisfied to leave the army during peace in the hands of those who had shown themselves capable of directing it in war. The militia had disappeared; nowhere at home was any considerable body of troops to be seen; public attention was directed to questions of internal government and political reform, which absorbed all general interest so completely that the army was forgotten as if it had never existed. As a consequence of this condition of things, the nation lapsed into ignorance of all military subjects, and those who desired to obtain a reputation as economists were allowed to pare and pare away until absolutely nothing was left of those establishments and departments which are as essential to an army as coal is to a steam-engine. This was allowed to go on through ignorance until at last nothing remained but a handful of splendid soldiers fed and clothed by contract. Shortly before our war with Russia, one step was taken towards restoring our military strength by the revival of the militia force; but with this single exception the warnings of our ablest soldiers were ignored, and the war of 1854 found us in consequence totally unprepared, with an army in every respect unfit for field service. The misfortunes which overtook our gallant soldiers in the winter of 1854-55 — the direct result of the nation's ignorance of war and of its requirements — turned public attention to military subjects. Ministers rushed into studies of army administration, some even dipped into "Jomini," and since then our public men have had at least a superficial knowledge of soldiers and their science. It was not, however, until the volunteer

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

movement had directed the thoughts of England's manhood generally towards those subjects, that the nation really set about studying them in earnest. It was that movement which popularized the army and everything belonging to it. The soldier became the model whom a large and important section of the community sought to imitate and to equal in military knowledge, and a public opinion upon army subjects has sprung up in consequence. It would be impossible for such a public opinion to be absent from a country possessing, as we do now, a splendid force of one hundred and ninety-three thousand drilled men under arms, whilst over six hundred thousand more, having passed through that force, are scattered about the kingdom, most of whom are ready and willing to rejoin in case of need.

The volunteer force was called into existence for the protection of our shores. It was a spontaneous movement of the people to supply a want that our government had not the courage to provide against. It is a great and real element of strength, and should this country ever be invaded, it will be a sword of might in the hands of those who know how to use it. Its existence alters greatly the conditions under which we shall henceforth engage in any European conflict, for, thanks to it, we could now send every regular soldier out of England, entrusting the home defence to that force. To it the army especially owes a deep debt of gratitude for many reforms in drill brought about through the persistent advocacy of its members, who have especially devoted themselves to that particular subject. The Elcho bayonet and the Moncrieff gun-carriage are inventions of its members, and it is very much to be doubted whether we should at present have the admirable small-bore rifle with which we are armed, if the volunteer force had never existed.

Most of the great reforms recently effected in our institutions and professions have come from without: it is to the pressure of public opinion brought to bear upon abuses or obsolete systems that we are indebted for all great useful changes. Few professions — and the army, I think, least of all — are capable of reforming themselves. The cause is easily explained. The governing body in all great services at home and in foreign countries is usually composed of men advanced in years; this is markedly the case with armies during peace, whose generals must naturally be then mostly past the prime of life. I think it will be found that the older men grow, the less they are disposed to changes in the institutions or professions they have belonged to for most of their lives. This is peculiarly the case in an army, where the young school with advanced ideas are held very much in check by habits of discipline and by their own inward respect for their military superiors, and have consequently a greater difficulty than is experienced in other professions in making their own views known. Trochu was tabooed in the French army for pointing out its defects and advocating their reform; the same was the fate in the German army of the gifted author of the "Tactical Retrospect." It is no wonder, therefore, that great reforms are seldom effected in an army except after great reverses. A great successful war may lead to very important changes when the nation concerned is essentially military, as was the case with the German army after the Bohemian campaign of 1866; but that result was exceptional.

Although many most important reforms have been carried out of late years in our army, much still remains to be done. Indeed, if it is to be converted into a really effective fighting instrument, not only equal, but superior in every respect, except in numbers, to the best army in Europe, then most assuredly it must undergo considerable modifications. No army can stand still and be effective in these days; frequent reforms in its armament, and consequently in its tactical formations, in its organization and administration, are essentially necessary. Without them it can never reap all the benefits opened to it by successive inventions and discoveries, such as those of railways, telegraphs, etc. The tendency with us general officers is to go asleep, to accept as perfect the army as it has descended to us, and to be blind to its defects — to forget that what were in many points its highest excellences some five-and-twenty or thirty years ago may now possibly be its weakest points most hurtful to efficiency. It is men like Mr. Holms who wake us up, and, by directing public attention to the army, cause searching inquiry to be made into its condition. Although the remedies they themselves prescribe may be fanciful and even unpractical, still so powerful is the stream of light which is thrown upon it when examined by the microscope of public opinion, that its real diseases are discovered, although their exact seat and their real nature may not agree with the diagnosis made by the amateur practitioner. What a boon homœopathy has conferred

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

upon mankind, not, as I take it, so much by the cures it has effected, as through the reforms it has been the happy means of bringing about in the general practice of physic! In the same way I believe we owe many of our improvements in the army since the Duke of Wellington's time to the suggestions made by civilians; and I must in fairness add that many of them were carried out by the force of public opinion, in direct opposition to the wishes, views, and opinions of our senior officers.

When, towards the close of the seventeenth and the beginning of the eighteenth centuries, the army of England was billeted amongst the people, it can scarcely be said to have been a standing army at all. A few regiments had been for some years in existence under varying titles, but it was not until the wars under Marlborough that the army as a permanent institution took final root in the country. The people for a long time had a great aversion to the construction of barracks, regarding their erection as indicating the fixed intention of the government to keep a standing army on foot. The theory of our constitution has always been that standing armies were dangerous to civil liberty. It is no wonder that under the despotism of the Stuarts the maintenance of an armed force, raised and paid by the king, should have been generally dreaded. With such a weapon in the hands of a despot all civil liberties were in danger; but when constitutional took the place of personal government, and the funds for the payment of the army had to be annually voted by Parliament, this danger became a myth, and passed into the limbo where constitutional theories are interred, its epitaph being, however, recorded in the Mutiny Act to remind us of a fear entertained by our ancestors which is now as unreal as the wildest bogie of our childhood. Prior to the erection of the numerous barracks which now exist, public opinion was very much exercised in opposition to any increase to our army. It was not, however, a healthy, unbiassed public opinion; it was a selfish, although perhaps, under the circumstances, a very natural, feeling. The troops, being billeted upon the people, were an intolerable nuisance to them. It is a feeling we are well acquainted with even now, for so intense is the hatred to this system at present that in practice billeting is restricted to public-houses, inns, and hotels, the owners of which obtain the special privilege of selling intoxicating liquor to her Majesty's subjects on condition of furnishing billets to her Majesty's soldiers when required by the exigencies of the service. In the last century those who were strongly opposed to the erection of barracks based their opposition upon a dread lest the army should become "so closely united as to be able to support itself against the law," and not upon any idea that barracks would so withdraw the army from the influence of public opinion that all interest in its organization would cease. The plan of housing the home garrisons in barracks was not adopted with a view to stifle public opinion, as was then alleged by the opposition. It was because the billeting system was felt by the people to be such an intolerable burden, that it had become a question of either building barracks or of having no army at all. Mr. Pulteney and Mr. Fox in their speeches pleaded in favor of the billeting system, as it encouraged "the mixing of the soldiers with the people, by which they imbibed the same principles and the same sentiments," and so secured "the Constitution against the danger of a standing army." These sentiments are out of date now: any fear that the army can be dangerous to the Constitution is a nightmare, as unreal as would be now the dread of Spain which haunted our forefathers in the reigns of Elizabeth and James the First.

It is a very common error on the part of non-military men to imagine that "the conversion of the recruit into an efficient soldier" is a purely mechanical process — that you have merely to teach him a certain amount of drill, and to make him proficient in the use of his rifle. The highest and the most essential quality to be learned by the soldier is discipline; without it all true military efficiency is impossible. Without it, no large army in the field can ever achieve great things; the undisciplined army will be destroyed, if opposed to an army of disciplined soldiers, as effectually as the rods of Pharoah's sorcerers were swallowed up by that of Aaron. It is the influence of discipline that distinguishes an army from a mob. It is when both of two contending armies are undisciplined that wars are unmarked by decisive battles, and are spun out over many years, the American struggle between the North and South being a striking example. A man may be perfect in all that the drill-instructor can impart, but unless his mind is as disciplined as his body, unless he has learned self-control, unquestioning obedience and respect for his superiors, and habits of order and of method, he never can be a really useful soldier in the field. These are attributes

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

more easily imparted to individuals the higher they are in the social scale of life, and more easily acquired by a body of men like a regiment the more the mass is leavened by men of education and of the better classes. In a country like Germany, where every able-bodied man is obliged to serve as a soldier, all classes of the body politic are represented in every individual battalion, and consequently it is far easier to convert it into a disciplined unit than with us, whose army is, I may say, unfortunately to a large extent composed of the lowest classes in our community.

This great difficulty of converting the ignorant rustic laborer, the urban idler, and the waifs and strays generally of the nation into disciplined soldiers has been of late seriously but unavoidably increased through the action of short service. Formerly the thirty or forty recruits who joined a regiment annually were lost in the hundreds of disciplined soldiers by whom they were surrounded and kept in order. The force of example soon imparted habits of cleanliness, order, and punctuality to the three or four recruits in a company. It is very different now, where, during peace, the recruits in a battalion are more numerous than the disciplined soldiers. This discipline of the mind can only be satisfactorily imparted to our men when removed from the influence of their own class in civil life. In billets, very little check can be placed on their doings; neither their health, cleanliness, feeding, nor moral conduct, can be effectively looked after. It is a well-known fact that in the militia those regiments for whom it is impossible to provide barrack accommodation when out for training, are never as well disciplined — in other words, are not as effective military instruments — as those housed in barracks or collected together in camps. The great cry on the part of militia colonels has long been, "Give us barracks for our men; billets are their ruination." Many a country youth who joins a militia regiment is ruined for life by the habits he acquires from the associations he is surrounded by when trained in billets. To put the case concisely, discipline is a process by which a little leaven is made to leaven the whole mass, but, that the leaven may act, there must be a mass to be acted upon. You cannot leaven scattered crumbs. Although the volunteer force is mostly composed of a different stamp of men from those who join the army, still I think it is generally admitted that the one great defect from which it suffers, and must always suffer, is a want of discipline, which it has a difficulty in acquiring except when collected together by regiments in barracks or camps. All connected with that splendid force know well what an advantage it is for a corps to be in camp for a week or a fortnight — to have, in fact, a slight taste of the system which some, through ignorance of it, denounce as "a curse to the country."

Since the days when the system of housing men in barracks was finally adopted, the greatest and most radical change effected in our military organization has been the final adoption of the short-service system of enlistment. When that system has reached its full development, our standing army at home will be little more than a great national training-school, where disciplined soldiers will be "manufactured" by a three years' training, and then returned to civil life for nine more years, receiving a small monthly retaining fee as a compensation for the liability they assume of being recalled to the colors when required for active service. To form the regimental machinery and provide the "hands" and superintendents required to work it, about one hundred and fifty or two hundred non-commissioned officers and other oldish soldiers — i.e., men over six years' service — will be required for each battalion. It is evident that if all were young, inexperienced men, the machine could not be worked to any good effect; the manufactured article would be of very poor quality, even as regards drill knowledge, and utterly deficient in discipline, the most essential of all military qualities. The cordial acceptance of that system a few years ago answers the question: "When will this country accept the plain truth that the safety of the nation does not depend upon the number of men under lock and key in barracks, but upon the number of trained young men in the country living freely in their own homes?"

If, however, all the military requirements of our extensive empire are to be provided for, the necessary number of these trained reserved men cannot be obtained from an army smaller than that now maintained in Great Britain. Those requirements differ materially and essentially from those of all other nations. In common with other countries we must have an army strong enough to defend our territory from invasion. Being surrounded by a broad wet ditch, our home fortress does not require an overgrown army like that maintained by France, by Germany and by other Continental states; but unlike them we have

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

great distant outworks, some of them located amongst hostile populations, for which necessarily strong garrisons are required. Most of these outworks are so far removed from the main fortress itself, that troops can only be conveyed to them at considerable expense per head. Financially speaking, it would be therefore impossible to have these garrisons composed of men engaged to remain only three years with the colors. As the number of men required for those garrisons is about equal to that we must keep on foot in England for the purpose of manufacturing the reserve army required for the defence of our shores and the protection of other great imperial interests, we have to encounter here a difficulty unknown to the army of Germany. Let my reader picture to himself what the military difficulties of the German Empire would be, had it to provide not only a home army of four hundred and six thousand men, but also a similar number for the defence of provinces many thousands of miles distant from its seaboard!

Another great difficulty surrounding the military question with us is the possession of distant colonies more or less peopled by barbarous tribes; and, although we may not find it necessary to keep strong garrisons in them permanently, yet we must be ready at all times to despatch thither a small force to repress internal rebellion, or to resist the inroad of neighboring warlike tribes. This latter difficulty is one for which we have not yet effectively prepared ourselves. Our home regiments, being little more than training-schools under the short-service system, are not composed of the seasoned material necessary for contending with tribes inured to war, and to whom fighting is the only recognized occupation of existence. When a force is required for such small wars as those of New Zealand, Ashanti, or South Africa, it is wisely considered inexpedient to recall to the colors the reserve men from civil life who are intended to be used only for great and serious occasions. To do otherwise would strike a death-blow to the existence of that reserve; men would not willingly join a reserve from which they could be withdrawn at any moment to join a force required for these frequently recurring little colonial wars. Even upon the understanding that our reserve men are only to be recalled to serve in the event of a great national emergency, they have considerable difficulty in obtaining employment in civil life: the great employers of labor prefer engaging men free from all such engagements to the State. A couple of years ago the Army Reserve was called out for a few days' drill, really for the purpose of ascertaining the truth or falsehood of the croaking statements of those who, disliking the short-service system, predicted that the reserve was a myth, and would not be forthcoming if required. It was then found that in many instances the men who responded to the call — and there were only about five per cent. absent — lost their situations in civil life, being discharged there and then by their unpatriotic employers, who said they would not have servants subject to such a liability. If that liability were increased by the men being bound to rejoin at any moment for little colonial wars such as that now unfortunately existing on the river Kei, the creation of an effective army reserve would, I believe, be impossible. The necessity for always having some half dozen full battalions of effective soldiers ready to go abroad in cases of emergency will be more fully appreciated when I state that of the men sent to Malta last year as a precautionary measure, a considerable proportion — I believe about one-third of them — had never even fired a round of ball cartridge.

For the due relief of our foreign garrisons, we have annually to send abroad about six battalions of infantry. It is most essential that at least three years' supply for foreign requirements — namely, eighteen battalions — should be maintained on an establishment of eight or nine hundred men. If this were done, we should always be able to send abroad for any colonial emergency at least half that number of effective battalions on the shortest notice, and the danger and scandal of embarking men who might at any moment be required for serious work, undisciplined and even undrilled, would be to a great extent remedied. Indeed, having due regard to the many calls upon us, to which we are always liable, it is most desirable that the Aldershot division and the Curragh Brigade should always be kept with their ranks full of disciplined soldiers, all regiments required for foreign reliefs being invariably drawn from Aldershot, where every regiment embarked for ordinary foreign service should have been two years previously to leaving our shores. Aldershot is an admirable school for practical military instruction, and after two years' training there the men would be fairly fit for active service.

Much yet remains to be done before our army is thoroughly remodelled in accord-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ance with modern requirements, but I cannot ignore the great strides that have been made in that direction since 1870, and still more since 1854. Indeed, when I remember the conservative elements — I do not use that expression in a political sense — of which our army, in common with that of all other nations, is composed, I am not so much astonished at what still remains to be accomplished, as at the great and important reforms already adopted. Of those improvements, none has been more remarkable or more calculated to reform our army than the progress made by its officers in professional education. The severity of the examinations which all must now undergo before they can obtain commissions secures the army against those dunces formerly only too numerous in it; and the subsequent examinations for promotion, on military subjects, insure that all the junior ranks shall be well grounded in the theory of military art. It is, from my point of view, to be regretted above all things that these professional examinations are not carried still further, by insisting that no man shall be given command of a regiment or made a general officer until he has passed a severe examination in tactics, strategy, fortification, and other important subjects. The time has now arrived when no man should be made a colonel or a general who is not a thorough master of his art. Formerly a large proportion of our officers entered the army because it held out the inducements of a pleasant life. They despised all study of military science: had not their fathers done well as leaders whilst ignorant on such points, and why should they not be allowed to follow in their footsteps? I am glad to say that this line of argument is confined to a small and antiquated school of thought in the army, now fast disappearing. Our officers of to-day are fully alive to the necessity for study, and are well aware that a mere knowledge of barrack-yard drill will no longer obtain for them the reputation of being good officers: that knowledge is as essential as ever, but it has ceased to be sufficient. There is abroad in the army an eagerness to learn unknown in 1854, and although progress may be somewhat retarded through the influence of a few commanding officers who still pooh-pooh education, still the mass of our regimental officers has been leavened with an amount of tactical knowledge entirely absent from our army five-and-twenty years ago. This has worked such an improvement in the fighting value of the army, that I have no hesitation in asserting that, had we now to send a force into the field, it would be in many most important respects infinitely superior to that which stormed the heights of the Alma, but in none more so than in the professional efficiency of its officers. The army now is the greatest and most important of our national schools, of which in future the officers will be the masters. The days of special instructors for the education of recruits are numbered, and company and troop officers must learn to teach their own men to drill, to shoot, and to ride without the assistance of musketry and gunnery instructors or of riding-masters.

Every military man is deeply impressed with the necessity of having behind our standing army a reserve of twice its strength; indeed, this is a universally admitted necessity in all armies. But in applying it to our peculiar position we are met with serious difficulties unknown to foreign nations. In considering deductions, which are based upon the German system, designed only for a home army, it must not be forgotten that at least one-half of our line battalions are constantly abroad — at present there are more — which must be always kept up to fighting strength and composed exclusively of good fighting material. They cannot be used as military schools for the creation of a reserve force; indeed, no recruit should ever be in their ranks. Upon our sixty-eight or sixty-nine line and seven guard battalions stationed at home must therefore fall, not only the responsibility of furnishing seasoned soldiers to fill up the gaps caused in the seventy-two or seventy-three battalions constantly abroad by the discharge of those who have completed their army engagement, by death, and by the invalids sent home from tropical climates, but also the duty of contributing the great bulk of those who are to form our army reserve.

The conditions to be fulfilled by our army are so totally different from those of the German army, that it is as unprofitable to draw any comparison between the systems upon which each is based, as it would be utterly and entirely impossible to apply that of Germany to England. If this be true as regards the conditions of military service in the two nations, how much more striking still is the difference between the fundamental principles and laws upon which their respective armies are based. With us all laws and customs are designed for the free exercise of individual liberty; no restrictions are placed

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

upon men who wish to emigrate and transfer their allegiance to a foreign flag. To obtain men for the army and navy, we have to compete in the open labor market with those who offer their servants high wages; Parliament tells us it will not pay for soldiers at men's rate of hire, so all our coaxing to induce men to enlist is of no avail, and the military authorities are forced to be content with youths in their teens. Our population is so migratory that recruits are seldom enlisted in the parishes they were born in; and as a human being's age cannot, like that of a horse, be told by his teeth, we are obliged to accept the recruit's own statement on that point. The result is that we frequently get boys instead of even youths eighteen years old. When a recruit deserts, the civil authorities, who appear to assume that they exist exclusively for civil purposes, take no trouble to assist the military in their endeavors to recapture him. Even the police will only help when they are offered a good reward by the War Office for his apprehension. Magistrates too frequently avail themselves of every possible legal loophole to avoid convicting a deserter, lest their county should be saddled with the expense of maintaining him in its prison for a few months. How different is all this in Prussia, where everything is made to give way to the wants and requirements of the army; its interests and welfare are recognized as the first national consideration; the rights of the individual are regarded as of secondary importance. We may adopt the tactical formations of Germany in our army — although even in doing so we must be content to modify them, owing to the difference between the raw material of which the two armies are composed — but to attempt to engraft the Prussian military system upon the English Constitution as it exists at present, would be as impossible as to grow tropical orchids in the open air of this country. In Germany every citizen is liable to military or naval service from the beginning of his eighteenth to the end of his forty-second year of age. During those twenty-five years, every one physically capable of bearing arms is bound to serve in the army or navy for twelve years if called upon, and men between those two ages who are not called up for service in either are obliged to serve in the Landsturm in the event of war. The government of the country is, I may say, purely military, and for the convenience of military administration the whole empire is parcelled out into districts furnishing army corps, divisions, brigades, etc., down to companies, with as much precision as England is divided, for purposes of civil administration, into parishes and hundreds. To a German, military training is as much a part of his education as reading and writing are now to us under the school-board system. To say we should Anglicise the German system, but still retain our English characteristics, is as reasonable as it would be to say, "Let us convert beasts into birds without giving them wings or feathers." I have no intention here of entering upon any disquisition from a national point of view as to which system is best for the people. It is a great problem for the statesman whether the advantages of the physical and mental training undergone by the youth of Germany during their two or three years' service in the army do not compensate the empire for losing their labor at reproductive occupations by the improved physical development it imparts to their bodies, and by the habits of obedience, order, cleanliness, and method it instils. This is a larger subject than I wish to embark upon in this article; but this I maintain, that nothing approaching or resembling the German military system can be built up in any country, except upon the foundation of obligatory universal service. The professional architect knows it to be impossible, and it is only the amateur craftsman, whose knowledge is superficial, who would so attempt to make bricks without straw.

The maintenance of an army strong enough to meet our military requirements is only possible by having about two-thirds of it in a reserve employed in civil life; and for our home army, the shorter the time our men remain with the colors, compatible with their conversion into efficient soldiers, the better. These are axioms upon which all army reformers of the present day will agree. It is not, however, on account of any supposed demoralizing effects resulting upon a prolonged stay in barracks that these axioms are accepted, but because no considerable army reserve can be created under any system of long service in the ranks. It is therefore of vital interest to determine what is the shortest space of time in which it is possible to manufacture an efficient soldier, one who shall be efficient, not only in the volunteer sense of the word — that is, in his drill and in the management of his weapons — but thoroughly well disciplined. These are two points essentially distinct, although the non-military man may fail to appreciate the difference between them.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

About ninety-four or ninety-five per cent. of the volunteer force are efficients — that is, passed in drill — yet it must always compare unfavorably with the regular army through its want of discipline.

The time required to convert a civilian into an efficient soldier depends in some measure upon the class of life in which he has been brought up and educated, or not educated at all, as is too often the case with English recruits. Thus, without doubt, the volunteers learn their drill quicker than the men who join either the militia or the army, for as a rule they come from a higher stratum in the social scale of life. For the ordinary recruit who joins us at seventeen or eighteen years of age, few soldiers will argue that a shorter period of training than three years would suffice; he would thus pass into the reserve at twenty or twenty-one years of age, before which he is not physically fit for the hardships inseparable from war. In Germany the regulated period of training is four years for the cavalry and three for the infantry, but in reality it is a few months of less duration. For instance, a man who reaches the age of twenty at any time in 1878 will join his battalion about the middle of next November, and will pass into the reserve when the autumn manœuvres of 1881 are over, that is, about the latter end of the September in that year. It is common to allow them a short furlough for the harvest time in the last year of their training service, but after it is over they must return to take part in the annual manœuvres of that year. They are thus actually under arms with the colors for about two years and nine months, before receiving furlough to pass into the reserve, where they remain four years, and then pass into the Landwehr. All men whilst in the reserve are liable to be called upon twice to take part in annual manœuvres lasting eight weeks upon each occasion. It would be foreign to this article to go further into the German army system, or to describe the regulations regarding the four thousand men (about) who join annually for only one year's actual service, or those referring to the men whom the officer commanding a battalion can allow to pass into the reserve after two years' service in the ranks.

During last year I am glad to say that all men of three years' service who were supernumerary to our home infantry establishment, were passed on to the reserve, and I am sure that all army reformers will agree with me in hoping that this practice may be unswervingly persisted in, for it is only by doing so that we can ever hope to have an army reserve of any considerable numerical strength. This system cannot, however, be applied to our line battalions which are in India and the colonies. As already explained, the expense of applying that system to them would be enormous for the item of sea transport, even if it were desirable to do so, which it is not, for they should always be ready to take the field at any moment, and must therefore be composed of seasoned soldiers over twenty-one years of age. This question of age is a most important factor in this military problem, and nothing can be truer than the remark "that, as continuous training is somewhat severe, it is absolutely necessary to have completely formed men (and not boys) capable of bearing it." As I have already pointed out, at present we practically only obtain boys and youths of about eighteen years of age as recruits. Mr. Holms's solution to this difficulty is: "Abolish the militia, and improve our terms, and the supply of a better article will follow." As to the first-named remedy, more further on; but as to the latter one, it will be echoed by every British officer, and by none, I should imagine, more earnestly than by our present commander-in-chief. We want men as recruits, and for the sake of the safety and welfare of the empire we ought to have them. This is, however, a matter for the consideration of ministers and of Parliament. We soldiers are helpless in the matter: we can do nothing more than warn the nation of the terrible risk it incurs under our present system of boy recruits. If we are to enlist only men, we must offer them men's wages, and I do not believe that the expense of raising the soldier's pay would be anything like what is commonly supposed, for better pay would certainly supply us with an article better morally as well as physically. If better morally, we should not suffer, as at present, from desertion, and should therefore save largely in our prison expenses, and if better physically, we should not suffer as we now do from "invaliding," and our saving in hospital expenses would be considerable in consequence.

That a militia regiment is not as good as a line one, all will admit. That the militia force would be immensely improved if, instead of three months' training, the militia recruit upon joining were kept continuously with the colors for a year or a year and a half, all will agree also. But there are two considerations to be thought of on this point — first the expense, and

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

secondly the question whether, under those conditions, we should be able to keep up our militia at all. Were we to insist upon this lengthened training, it is quite certain that the competition for recruits between the army and the militia, which I do not believe exists at present, would then become a reality, for both would be bidding for the same class of men. A perusal of the report of Mr. Stanley's militia committee of 1876, and of the evidence upon which it is based, will satisfy those who wish to go deeply into the matter that the militia and the line recruit from different classes, and that the large bulk of those who join the former would not enlist in the latter. Besides, it is generally believed that those doubtful men who might possibly in the first instance have joined the army had there been no militia, do in fact subsequently become soldiers. I have good grounds also for saying that many of the men who come to the army from the militia would never have become soldiers at all, if we had no militia force in which they can try whether a soldier's life suits them or not. Every facility is now given to the militiaman to transfer his services to the line, and, practically speaking, it would be no easy matter for any militia officer to prevent those under his command from becoming soldiers.

The militia force has doubtless many weak points, although recent reforms in its organization have done much to remove them. These points are made the most of by those who dislike the force, but in my opinion it is a great element of strength to the country, unobtainable under any other conditions as long as our military system is based upon voluntary recruiting. It draws into the military net men of ideas and aspirations different from the army recruit. It has the very great merit of being a cheap force, and in every respect fulfils the objects for which it is maintained. It is not designed for active service out of England, and before we can be invaded we should have time afforded us to convert it into a most reliable body of infantry. One of its weak points is the little military knowledge possessed by its officers and non-commissioned officers. However, much has recently been done to remedy this defect by forming schools at which they can qualify. It must not be forgotten that all the adjutants are officers now holding commissions in the regular army; that the quartermasters are almost all army officers, and will in future be exclusively so; that the non-commissioned staff of every regiment is composed of old soldiers; that belonging to every company of militia there are two sergeants of the line; and that finally over seven hundred of the officers belonging to the militia have served for years in the regular army.

In the event of war, without calling upon the volunteers, the militia will supply us with garrisons for Malta, Gibraltar, the Channel Islands, for North America if required, and for all our stations in Great Britain and Ireland, leaving an ample force still available to hold our base of operations wherever it may be abroad, and to guard our line of communications between it and our army in the field. The whole of our line battalions now at home, and those at the stations abroad already enumerated, besides seven battalions of foot guards, would thus become available if required for active service. This would supply us with more than the infantry required for four army corps.

According to our existing military system, upon war being declared the militia is called out, and hands over its reserve at once to the line, who together with our First Class Army Reserve would give us about forty-thousand good men to bring up our line battalions to war strength. Our Second Class Army Reserve, consisting of old soldiers, although past the prime of life, would supply us with about fifteen thousand bayonets quite fit for garrison duty. The four companies of regular infantry now at each of the seventy brigade depôts would at once be formed into the cadres of seventy depôt battalions, and begin recruiting locally. To them would be despatched all the men who last year joined the battalions it is intended to engage in active service. There is at present a considerable number of men in the country, who, having completed their ten years' army engagements, are employed in civil avocations; a large proportion of them could easily be induced to re-engage for any popular war by the offer of a good field allowance while it lasted, and the prospect of a bonus on discharge, calculated at the rate of about 1*l.* per month for the time they were called upon to serve. In no country would it be so easy as in ours to raise a special corps from the waifs and strays of the middle and upper classes, and under carefully selected officers it would be the finest military body in the world. If converted into mounted infantry — as I think it should be — it might have a very great influence upon the result of a campaign. Its value for scouting and raiding duties

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

would be incalculable. Should war be forced upon us, I sincerely trust that a corps of this nature may be raised. The loyal spirit of our colonies has never been more healthy or sincere than now; I know Canada well, and I am only doing it justice when I say that in the event of war it would furnish us with a contingent of certainly ten thousand men, drawn from its militia, who would soon equal our best regiments.

Our island position and our commanding fleet give us many great military advantages possessed by no other nation. Great Britain could only be invaded by either France or Germany; indeed I might say only by both combined, and the operation, even under more than ordinarily favorable circumstances, would always be one of great magnitude and difficulty, and very hazardous. With our great naval supremacy we can at present afford to dismiss it from our calculations, and are consequently able to reckon on having ample time for our needed preparations. I have heard it said, "We cannot go to war because we are not ready." I should like to know when we ever were or ever can be so ready. Our Constitution secures us liberty and freedom of speech, but its very excellence precludes the possibility of the nation being ever prepared for war. Some of our ablest men who have been in power have lately told us emphatically, even when war is hanging in the balance, that it will be high time to prepare for war when it has been declared. Such an opinion could only emanate from a mind essentially non-military, however great it be in other fields of thought. Surely it behoves all true lovers of their country in a great national crisis to support those in power in preparing for the contingency of war. Whatever may be our individual opinions as to the conduct of our government in grave complications like that now existing, all real patriots agree in wishing to see the country strong, and the army ready for active service. We are most likely to avoid war by being able to speak with the confidence which real military strength alone can give us. I would venture to protest against the notion that we must play a feeble part because we are not as yet in every way quite ready for war. We must accept our position as we find it with all its advantages and disadvantages. We have enjoyed life and prospered under our Constitution, and we are not likely to surrender the daily blessings it confers upon us in order to be at all times ready to encounter the rarely occurring calamity of war. If therefore we are never to engage in hostilities because we are not prepared for them, we had better save the large sums we annually spend upon both army and navy, for under our existing Constitution it is hopeless to dream of our ever being ready to draw the sword without long previous preparation.

At no previous period of our history have we ever been so strong in a military sense as at present. In 1854 we were very weak in field artillery; the military force in these islands was under seventy thousand men, and there was no reserve whatever beyond some pensioners, who were too old for field service. Were war declared to-morrow, about four hundred thousand drilled men would fall into line if required, supported by three hundred and seventy-two field-guns, manned and horsed by the Royal Artillery. That number would roughly be made up as follows: —

Standing army at home . .	99,000 men
Army and Militia Reserve .	40,000 "
Militia	85,000 "
Volunteers	180,000 "
Second Class Army Reserve .	10,000 "
Total	414,000 men

In this calculation I have put the figures very low, and have left out altogether the ten thousand yeomanry who would be available for home service. I have likewise not taken into consideration the number of regular troops that would be available for war when the Mediterranean garrisons were furnished by the militia. It will thus be seen that we could at once take the field with two fully equipped army corps of more than thirty thousand soldiers each, leaving a similar force of regular troops at home as a reserve. When I compare the military strength of England now with what it was in 1854, I am as amazed at the condition of military weakness and helplessness in which we were when we began the Russian war of that year, as I am at the ignorance of those who are now to be heard croaking over our supposed want of strength and our alleged consequent inability to fight. Unlike most other nations, if we declare war we need have no apprehension of invasion; this confers upon us the great advantage of being able to choose our own time for beginning active hostilities, and as our army would necessarily have to be conveyed by sea to the theatre of war, we are always able to select the line of operations considered best and most suitable to the force we act with. In fact the initiative would

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

rest with us, and I need not tell the student of history how invaluable it is to the commander who knows how to take advantage of it. But if we are to secure this national advantage of the initiative, we must act with unity of purpose. "In seasons of great peril it is good that one bear sway," and all should support the mode of action selected, even although some may think the plans they have themselves conceived would lead to better results. It is far more important in warlike matters that all should act as one man, than that the ideally best course of action should be adopted.

England can never engage in any great war unless it be thoroughly popular with the nation; but if the warlike spirit of the people be aroused in earnest we all know that her Majesty will never want soldiers to fight for the honor and welfare of her kingdom. A great empire has been built up for us by the military achievements of our forefathers. I for my part trust we may be able now and always to address them after the manner of Prince Hal: —

You won it, ruled it, kept it, gave it us,
Then plain and right must our possession be;
Which we with more than with a common pain
'Gainst all the world will rightfully maintain.

G. I. WOLSELEY.

ERICA.*

TRANSLATED FOR THE LIVING AGE FROM THE GERMAN OF

FRAU VON INGERSLEBEN.

XLII.

FRITZ.

WEHLEN seemed to fear Elmar's present authority, for before darkness closed in, the latter saw him drive away in the princess's carriage. He was glad to be spared an unpleasant scene, and this thought partially dispelled the gloom, which had been increased by a conversation with the baroness. Contrary to his expectation, the old lady could give him no information about his parents' marriage; she only knew that her son's wedding had taken place in a foreign country, and he had then brought his young wife to Altenborn.

A visit from Werner, which greatly surprised Elmar, roused him from his own troubles, and at the same time afforded him a pretext for not going to the baroness's room that evening, a state of affairs which harmonized with his wishes, inasmuch as it would otherwise have been scarcely possible to conceal his clouded brow from Erica, whose anxiety he did not wish to arouse. Werner, on learning that morning through a letter from Count Hardeck that Sidonie had been informed of his right to her property, had instantly driven over to Altenborn to discuss the matter with Elmar, whom he entreated to become his mediator and inform Sidonie that he should renounce this unlucky right in any case.

"I am afraid you will scarcely be able to do that, Werner," said Elmar thoughtfully; "for if you withdraw, other claimants will doubtless arise, so the matter would only grow worse."

"I am the last of my name, and therefore the only person who can stand between Sidonie and her inheritance. Do you suppose, Elmar, I would have made the marriage dependent upon my own inclination, if there had been no possibility of resigning my claims? In such a case, I should have considered the slightest hesitation dishonorable, and married the Countess Hardenfels, even if she had inspired me with actual aversion."

"Very well, Werner, only I doubt whether Sidonie will consent to the arrangement."

"I should sincerely deplore her opposition, but it can have no effect upon my resolution. If I state my intention to resign the entailed property in the daughter's favor, she cannot, with all her anger against me, prevent it."

"But she can also renounce her claims, and she will do so."

"Then let it go to the poor," exclaimed Werner bitterly. "For the present, however, she is under her guardian's authority, and Count Hardeck certainly will not give up the property."

"At any rate, you will have one of the most peculiar law-suits which has ever occurred. I assure you, Werner, that, though my own affairs give me sufficient occupation, I have constantly sought for some clue that might guide you out of the labyrinth where you are so helplessly wandering, but without avail. Sidonie's feelings towards you are so irritated or unduly excited, that the slightest allusion to the affair causes the most terrible agitation, and I really feel anxious about even delivering your message. Let us take no farther steps in this matter to-night. Sidonie

* Copyright 1877, by Littell & Gay.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

has heard of your visit, through the apology I sent for my non-appearance, and can easily guess the object of your coming, so let her have time to reflect upon the subject until to-morrow, and, above all, to grow calmer."

Werner assented to the proposal, and they spent the evening in animated conversation. Elmar related to his friend the events which had recently occurred, and also told him of the half absurd, and yet exasperating and perhaps dangerous scheme, which had been planned by the subtle brain of the adventurer. Werner listened with interest and attention, and as the ambassador to whom the young baron must apply for the necessary information was nearly related to him, and therefore a personal friend, offered to write to him himself.

"I sincerely regret that we let the scoundrel off so easily," added Werner. "My sole thought was to save Rodenwald, and as I wished to gain my object in the easiest way, I very foolishly, as I now see, chose this expedient."

Elmar's interview with Sidonie on the following morning resulted exactly as he had anticipated. She obstinately refused to accept an inheritance which, under such circumstances, would seem exactly like a gift. Moreover, in her excited state of feeling, she looked upon Werner's conduct as designed to inflict a fresh humiliation upon her, and declared that if Count Hardeck, against her will, should favor the acceptance of this gift, he could never force her to make use of it during the interval before which she should have full freedom of action.

All Elmar's arguments fell powerless on Sidonie's firm resolution, and he returned to his friend in a very sorrowful mood.

Even Werner's entreaties that she would grant him a personal interview were refused, on the ground that it could lead to no other result, and although this denial plainly revealed the danger Sidonie apprehended from Werner's presence, her positive refusal showed the resolute will with which she resisted the peril.

Elmar proposed the expedient of a longer stay at Altenborn, that Werner might owe to some lucky chance the interview that was refused to his entreaties; but the young count would not consent, and was only persuaded to remain through the day, by the news that Fritz was expected to arrive before evening.

The latter came at the appointed hour, and his presence somewhat brightened the gloom that now brooded over Altenborn, and even cast a ray of sunlight upon Sidonie's marble-like face. As Werner's presence, and the latter's refusal to see him, made it impossible for the little party to assemble in the old baroness's room, Fritz divided his evening between the "two hostile camps," as he called them. Fortunately he had brought with him a sufficient stock of good spirits to cheer both parties, but he declined to give any detailed account of matters at Dorneck, reserving it until he was alone with Elmar. After taking tea with the baroness, and by his merry stories making Sidonie smile and Erica laugh, he went down to Elmar to talk to him and Werner.

Very soon, perhaps intentionally, Fritz turned the conversation upon Sidonie, and thus became acquainted with the last turn in the situation of affairs between the latter and Werner. He listened with interest and sympathy, but shook his head and said half laughing, —

"It is incredible. Here are two men, who I formerly supposed possessed some little share of common sense, and in this important matter they confess themselves utterly helpless. If my own invention leaves me in the lurch, I am at least clever enough to take advantage of the wit of others. Why do people read novels and go to plays, if they make no use of their manifold unfastenings of Gordian knots? Your brow darkens, most noble count; you doubtless think my words frivolous and indecorous; even when a secretary, you were inclined to exercise severe criticism, far more so than, to speak frankly, suited your position, to say nothing of the preference for the nobility, which awed me in the secretary, but seems very natural in the aristocrat."

"Your words form a somewhat intricate chain, Fritz," replied Werner; "in which I vainly seek the connection."

"Which I should be glad to find; acknowledge that, Werner. The complication, however, is a punishment for the frown on your brow, which condemns the frivolity you would willingly turn to account. But I won't allow people to wrap themselves in the majesty of manly dignity, when my boyish levity is to be used as a viaduct over yawning abysses."

"You are a young fool, Fritz!" replied Werner, with an involuntary smile. "What have you to propose? I am ready to hear the expedient drawn from your novels or plays."

"You must wait a little longer, I want to reflect upon the matter. It will be better for you to give me full power to act,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

and remain yourself as white as a snow-drop, especially as, in Sidonie's eyes, you already wear the hue of Othello. This time I will assume the dark livery of sin, and hope better things of your gratitude than that you will tell tales of the Moor after he has done his duty."

"I cannot give you authority to play any foolish trick upon Sidonie, Fritz; so if you can't reveal your wisdom, you won't dispose of your wares in this market."

"Then I'll make you happy on my own responsibility, Werner. I need no assistance, except your opportune appearance at my call, and with exactly the same expression you are kind enough to adopt towards me at the present moment. A proper blending of contempt and anger, with a slight dash of grief and resignation, and you will be exactly what I want for my tableau."

Werner rose and approached him. His face certainly plainly expressed the feelings Fritz had suggested, as he said: "I will not, under any circumstances, allow you to meddle with my affairs, Fritz!"

Fritz looked at him with a careless laugh. "If you can only prevent it, Werner. Besides, I don't see why you keep such a jealous watch over the privilege of being the only person who acts foolishly in regard to Sidonie; it could not fail to be an advantage to you to have me for a foil. Besides, I won't allow myself to be robbed of my right to give friendly assistance, so we will say no more about it."

Werner really perceived that he could not prevent an act, of which he was ignorant, or else thought the whole affair a mere piece of mischief on the part of Fritz, for he said no more, and the conversation soon turned upon other subjects. The little party did not separate until late at night, and Fritz, in bidding Werner farewell, promised him an immediate visit.

The next day, to make amends for his absence, Elmar remained in the baroness's drawing-room much longer than usual. All were extremely comfortable, as Katharina, either because she was angry with Elmar, or really ill, remained in her own apartments, would see no one, and even refused to welcome Fritz.

Although no one had informed the latter of the tie between Elmar and Erica, a very short time was sufficient to enlighten him.

"So the little heather-blossom has fallen a victim to the inevitable," he said to Erica. "Fatality and guilt in strange unison fill my heart with grief and horror."

"You seem to have been very much occupied with tragedies lately, Fritz," observed Elmar; "you revert to them so often."

"Well said, Elmar; we cannot do better than fly from the tragedy of life to that of nature. In spite of our sympathy, the sorrow of others excites a feeling of comfort, not unlike that which we experience when sitting in a warm room listening to the raging of a strom. Fate, however, has steadily worked out its own designs at Dorneck. The tangled skeins of the love-affairs have smoothed more and more, and seem to be gradually approaching their climax. I will not apply the laws of dramatic gradation to my tale, but begin at once with the most interesting subject, — myself.

"Since Elmar robbed us of the learned theological student and eloquent preacher Reinhardt, the instruction of our worthy pastor fully satisfied my own ardent thirst for knowledge, it is true, but not so mamma's aspiring desires. I was therefore sent every day to Bonn, to attend the high school, while I spent the evenings and nights at Dorneck as before. Of course the care of transporting my valuable person did not devolve upon papa's shoulders, or I should probably have been frequently compelled to spend the days at Dorneck and the nights at Bonn.

"Under such circumstances, my information increased to a most disproportionate extent, and when Uncle Rodenwald — the fox-hunter, Sidonie — came to visit us at Christmas, he was surprised, and, I think, a little annoyed at the dominion knowledge had acquired over me. He therefore declared that he would no longer delay a project which had occupied his mind ever since his wife's death, namely, to make me his adopted son and sole heir. As the family were pleased, I had no objection, so I was solemnly declared Uncle Rodenwald's adopted son; a ceremony which made little impression upon me, as from my earliest childhood I had considered myself the real son of my good old uncle.

"Thus the illustrious family of Rodenwald is now divided into an older and younger branch, and as my rich aunt has left her husband her whole property, the younger line of Rodenwald stands on the same footing as the older. I am now what the world calls a brilliant match, and expect that the mothers of marriageable daughters will consider me desirable game in the matrimonial chase.

"Mamma's eyes, I perceive, are fixed upon a granddaughter of old Countess

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Ingolstein, a little Princess von Runingen, who is still in short dresses. Our intercourse was characterized less by increasing tenderness, than great vivacity. During a quarrel, she pulled my curly hair with such energy that I lost several locks forever, and — when she wanted to sail on the Rhine on a plank, and all arguments proved powerless — I pinched her wrist so violently to pull her back, that she burst into a flood of tears, and complained of me to all the grandmothers, mothers, and aunts she possessed. These incidents have, of course, strengthened my mother's conviction that we were specially created for each other's happiness, so we are only waiting till she is out of short dresses, and my beard has grown, to fall lovingly into each other's arms.

"For the present, however, the thermometer of love, even without our affairs, stands high enough at Dorneck. It seems to be approaching the culminating point, from which any retreat is impossible. But before I speak of that, I'll say a few words about papa, who has altered strangely in some respects.

"When Sidonie and Erica came here, a very oppressive atmosphere brooded over Dorneck, which seemed all the more mysterious, as we felt, without being able to explain it. Papa was in the worst possible humor, and scarcely uttered a syllable. Mamma, as usual, appeared grave and cold, but her red eyelids and pale cheeks revealed a sorrow which she would not express in words. It required little keenness of perception to connect the disappearance of Herr von Wehlen, who had gone sans adieu, with this gloomy state of affairs; neither was it difficult to guess that here was a new proof that gold is not entirely the chimera philosophy and the aria from 'Robert le Diable' would fain represent it.

"Papa, at all events, had squandered this gold very lavishly, and mamma probably meted out her lectures in proportion, for — spite of the latter's effort to conceal it — there was evidently a great coolness between them. My father was not only often hasty and rude to his wife, but treated her, if I may so express it, with studied want of consideration; and, as my good papa, with his natural love of self-indulgence, possesses plenty of this commodity, it was sometimes really painful to witness his conduct.

"This mood probably caused considerable bodily discomfort, for in a short time he fell sick, and was confined to his room. The illness increased, and the doctor was not without fears for his life, which perhaps we owe entirely to mamma's faithful, devoted nursing. She never left his bed night or day, and the invalid must have noticed this care, as well as her soothing composure and caution, for he would not let any one else come near him, and drove even the sister of charity who was sent to Dorneck out of his room.

"Terribly exhausting as the nursing thus became for mamma, she did not seem to suffer from this want of consideration, for her eyes grew brighter and her cheeks, spite of her want of sleep, seemed less pale. When papa's gradual convalescence gave her more liberty to dispose of her time, she instantly assumed control, not only of indoor but out-of-door matters. Although hitherto she had been utterly ignorant of these things, she soon contrived to make herself so familiar with them that papa, in his indolence, constantly delayed assuming the management again, and at last left them entirely in her hands. He only reserved the final decision in important matters and a few insignificant details, and with all due filial love and reverence for papa, we are all satisfied with the change.

"Mamma instantly sent for Werner, who came to Dorneck for some time to aid her with his advice. Papa was at first very angry with Werner; the thorough insight into his affairs which the latter had obtained had not annoyed him from the secretary, but was extremely vexatious in Count Meerburg. But this anger did not continue long, and the count at last won the same affection which had been bestowed upon the secretary. With Werner's assistance, mamma held a searching review of her servants; the negligent and useless were instantly dismissed, and I believe ere long the wheels of the domestic economy out of doors will roll as smoothly as those of the household have long done.

"No one is more comfortable in this situation of affairs than my dear father. Having no real interest in all these details, he formerly occupied himself very little with them, and the thought of this carelessness was often an uncomfortable monitor of his own indolence. Moreover, he is now relieved of the sometimes oppressive care of keeping a proper balance between the receipts and expenditures, while he himself has more money for his favorite pursuits than before, for mamma — who, between ourselves, as I perceived to my astonishment, has a little weakness for her beloved husband — really deprives

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

herself of many things to be able to gratify his wishes. Werner has calculated that the revenues must increase at least a third, so in future they will probably be sufficient to supply her too.

"In addition to all these advantages, papa also has the extreme satisfaction of being adored by his servants, and hearing them sigh for his former rule, as the 'good old times.' He is therefore perfectly contented, does not trouble himself about the way in which his wife raises these large sums, and lets, as they say, Providence provide for him. He now follows his various amusements, among which, strangely enough, is the study of heraldry, though he values the illustrious name of Rodenwald far less than is agreeable to mamma. Now, however, he is collecting material and intends to write a history of the family, as a surprise to his wife on some Christmas or birthday festival.

"It is already evident that he feels it his duty to make some return for so much love, and we are therefore subjected to the strangest surprises. A short time ago he kissed mamma before us all, and she blushed like a young girl, and was so confused that she could not even reprove such a terrible breach of decorum. The junior members of the Rodenwald family were so startled that their cheeks reflected the color of mamma's — at least I can speak positively in regard to the younger branch — but papa did not notice it, and looked around the circle with the air of a conqueror. His boldness increases with his freedom from censure, and his comfortable self-indulgence passes the limits of all previous traditions.

"A short time ago, at the tea-table, he answered one of mamma's remarks with a thoroughly plebeian slap on her shoulder, and the still more vulgar exclamation: 'Right, as usual, my dear old lady!' This time blushes were not sufficient to express the feelings of the Rodenwald family, on the contrary we sat around the table like a row of marble images. My half-emptied cup fell from my hand, little Lolo stared at her delinquent papa with eyes dilated with horror, and the governess was so overcome that she sprang from her seat and hurried off to her own room, where, as I afterwards heard, she went into hysterics. Mamma remained the calmest of all; true she said in her usual manner: 'You are somewhat dramatic in your gestures, my dear Edwin!' but the smile which accompanied the words gave the reproof a shade of coquetry, which produced the most terrible effect upon papa. Before we were aware of it, he threw his arm around her, and drawing her towards him gave her another kiss, and said, —

"'Devil take me if you're not the best wife a man can want, Vally! I'm really in love with you.'

"It was fortunate for the governess, that her hysterics spared her this scene. We looked into our cups, examined the pattern of the damask table-cloth, scrutinized with absorbing interest the basket of cake, gazed at the pictures on the walls, in short everywhere except at papa and mamma. When I at last ventured to cast a glance at the latter, I saw tears sparkling in her eyes; she did not release herself from her husband's arm, but, bending towards him, whispered, 'Your words make me very happy, Edwin. I will always try to please you.'

"The younger Rodenwalds now raised their heads and uttered a sigh of relief. They knew that a new era was dawning upon Dorneck, and the rights of feeling would have a place beside the eternal laws of decorum and social etiquette. This expectation has not been disappointed, for although when in society we throw the necessary shade of aristocratic hauteur into our manners, we are far more cordial and affectionate among ourselves, or rather show our love more openly. No teacups fall victims to the sight of a little token of tenderness exchanged between our parents, and even the governess has submitted to fate, and when a short time ago papa pulled mamma's ear in jest, she only uttered one hysterical sob, and controlled herself sufficiently to remain in the room.

"This new and surprising warmth of feeling extends its sheltering wings even over the hitherto unhappy loves of the older scions of the family. Mamma, to be sure, has not changed her opinions — and, spite of her greater gentleness, she is still hard as steel where she thinks her duty is concerned — but circumstances have fortunately somewhat altered. A distant relative of Landsheim was kind enough to die and leave him a very handsome legacy, which though it does not make him rich, is enough to secure the future of his wife. Generode instantly reviewed all his relations, to see if he could not discover some rich uncle or ditto aunt, but was obliged to renounce the useless search in despair, for even the cousins to the twentieth and thirtieth degree were richly blessed with children.

"Nevertheless, little reason as he formerly had to aspire to the title, 'Cousin'

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Genererode has been mamma's special favorite for a long time. He ventured to come to Dorneck so often, that I was amazed at his presumption, and wondered still more that his reception continued cordial, and he was even frequently invited to supper. When one day he jestingly bewailed the numerous representatives of his family, who made him so destitute of expectations, mamma said, with a somewhat peculiar smile, —

"'You must marry a wife who has money, Generode.'

"The latter stared at her in perfect bewilderment, but he must have seen something in her face which gave him a clue to the words, for his cheeks flushed, and he said quickly, —

"'If, contrary to my expectation, the woman of my choice should bring me a dowry, my happiness would be complete, for I could then make her life as pleasant as I ardently desire it to be.'

"Olga must have considered herself 'the woman of his choice,' for she blushed crimson, and then looked at mamma with the same peculiar expression as Generode. I could not exactly understand the scene, but a few days after was informed that mamma had made her will and disinherited Ottomar and me, to share her property among her daughters. I also heard that the fortune was to be divided into five equal portions, and Olga, as crown princess, would receive twice as much as her younger sisters. So she will have a very pretty little property, and Generode probably will not delay in marrying the woman of his choice.

"For the present, both he and Landsheim spend every afternoon at Dorneck, and as they always stay to supper, and even remain some time after, it is usually midnight before they return to Bonn. If they don't break their necks in their nocturnal rides, or fall into the water and get drowned in some of their excursions on the Rhine, the summer sky will probably bend over two pairs of happy wedded lovers, and Dorneck become much quieter."

"Olga has written to me a full account of Generode," said Erica, "but, in spite of my questions, not a syllable about Sonnenstein. What does he say to a change so sad for him?"

"He says nothing at all, but looks more than ever like the knight of the sorrowful countenance. Since Generode so suddenly gained mamma's favor, a terrible suspicion that he had lost his last anchor of hope must have dawned upon him. He came to Dorneck more rarely, and then his appearance reminded one so vividly of a drowned poodle, that he could not have felt very comfortable. Mamma was just as friendly as ever, and favored him, if not his love, even more than usual. She gave him bushels of good advice, which he seemed to need, and at last sent him away with a sort of mentor, under the name of a friend, to travel. If the gosling that flew over the Rhine does not return a thorough fool, he will probably be quietly assigned to Lolo, to whom he has paid considerable attention of late in a very touching way. Besides, he is a thoroughly good man, and it would not be the worst fate that could befall little Lolo.

"Now I come to the schoolgirl Edith, and am unfortunately compelled, Queen Sidonie, to plant a dagger in your heart. Prince Eduard, in spite of your cruel disappearance, still remains in Bonn to continue his studies, and seems to try to act with me the part of the quarrelsome couple in the barometer, for when I come he goes, and when I go he comes; so he spends his nights in Bonn, and his days for the most part at Dorneck. As, however, he could not even sprain his foot again, much less always complain of headache or sudden giddiness, he did not often receive an invitation to supper, and therefore watched Generode with the bitterest envy.

"Edith, who enters society this winter, and at first pouted a great deal because mamma intends to spend it in the country, has now yielded to her fate with wonderful resignation, and modestly contents herself with Prince Eduard's homage. I must, however, confess that she has become far more amiable, for since she has been officially recognized as a young lady, she no longer takes any special trouble to constantly assert her dignity. Besides, she has developed into a beauty of the first rank, and the Rodenwald family, who are not too well endowed with the commodity, feel proud and pleased to be able to present such loveliness to the world.

"Prince Eduard, who at first probably devoted himself to Edith only to obtain news of Sidonie, gradually became more and more attached to her. She perhaps noticed the change in his feelings even before it was perceptible to himself, and as she had long been interested in him, met his advances in a way which strengthened his love. Mamma, perhaps for the first time in her life, was surprised with a fait accompli, and although she imposed her veto upon an immediate betrothal, Prince Eduard, even without a sprained

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ankle, is sometimes permitted to take his supper at Dorneck.

"As mamma was obliged to relinquish the hope of seeing Queen Sidonie Princess von Wolfenhagen, this was the best and only compensation which could be made for her baffled wish, and I fear her kindness will soon induce the prince to make the third in the midnight rides and sails on the Rhine. These visitors, however, are certainly not very interesting to impartial spectators, and papa openly declares that the stupidity is unendurable, and no power in the world shall prevent him from taking a nap in his sofa-corner directly after supper."

"I am sorry for poor Edith," remarked Sidonie gravely. "If my aunt had not been surprised with a fait accompli, I would have warned her against the prince."

"Your warning, under any circumstances, would have come too late, Sidonie, for, as I said before, Edith has long loved the prince. Perhaps he might also justify himself in your eyes, if you would only deign to make an accusation against him; for he is really winning and agreeable, and we all like him. Besides, Edith will play the princess admirably, for she is her mother's own daughter."

"You have not yet mentioned Ottomar, Fritz," said Sidonie, to change the subject. "I know less of him than any of the family, for he seldom writes."

"The favorable star which has risen in his sisters' heaven of love, seems disposed to cast its light on him also. He loves, as everybody knew except himself, the beautiful Rosa Steinfurt, and the latter, spite of his frequent assurances to the contrary, was firmly convinced of it. Mamma, who expected for her oldest and favorite son, if not a royal princess, at least the most exalted rank, struggled against this alliance with all her power, and, to please her, Ottomar resisted his own heart too, and the natural consequence of all these efforts was, that he only loved Rosa more passionately than ever.

"During a hunt which took place late in the autumn, young Steinfurt unfortunately met with such a terrible fall that he died a few days after. He was the only son, and the blow was crushing to the parents, while for Ottomar this loss resulted in the blooming of the flower of perfect happiness. Rosa will be the sole heiress of her parents' great wealth, and if she was formerly a brilliant match, her advantages are now so great that even the 'Gotha' must stand back and drop the question of ancestry. Rheinau and Dorneck united will form a princely estate, and mamma already sees the ermine rustling around the shoulders of her first-born.

"Even the old countess has seen fit to mention the death with one wet and one sparkling eye, and while deeply commiserating the unfortunate parents, heartily congratulated mamma on the brilliant match Ottomar was making, and for which he would doubtless be the object of universal envy. The old lady's sanction, out of respect for the 'Gotha,' was doubly valuable to mamma, and when, a short time ago, the beautiful Rosa came to Dorneck with her parents, mamma kissed her affectionately on the forehead as she bade her farewell.

"Ottomar gave vent to his delight by an enthusiastic hug, and though, spite of the increased display of family affection, such an indiscretion on the part of the younger branch would have called forth a grave rebuke, the candidate for the ermine was allowed to pass unpunished. The time for the wedding will probably be fixed as soon as the period of mourning has expired, and Hymen bind his fetters round this couple also. Mamma's sphere of activity will thus be so greatly diminished that the void can probably only be filled by increased zeal in the management of the estates of Dorneck, whose revenues will not only increase a third, but one-half."

Fritz paused and bowed, like an orator who has finished his speech. The little party gave him a vote of thanks for his circumstantial report, and when they parted, the light of pleasurable excitement again sparkled in Sidonie's eyes, and a smile played round her lips. For this change Fritz also received eager though unexpressed thanks, and all rejoiced that the uncle's longing to see his adopted son had enabled him to visit Altenborn on his way home.

XLIII.

SIDONIE.

ALTHOUGH Fritz had only received permission to remain absent from home a short time, the united entreaties of all, together with his own desire, induced him to defer resuming his studies in Bonn a few days longer; and these days passed all the more pleasantly, as Katharina still continued to play the invalid, and remained alone in her own apartments.

Elmar had learned through the head groom that Wehlen had only gone as far

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

as the village inn, where he had taken lodgings. Disagreeably as this intelligence affected him, he had no power to prevent his remaining there, and was therefore obliged to content himself with telling his servants not to allow him to enter the castle on any pretence whatever.

Fritz had still delayed paying his promised visit to Werner, but when the end of his stay at Altenborn approached, begged Elmar to give him a conveyance to drive over there. The latter offered to accompany him, but Fritz laughingly declined, as he did not wish to arouse Erica's anger by taking her lover away so long. Elmar fancied that Fritz wished to go alone, and therefore made no farther opposition, especially as he had seen his friend a short time before.

When Fritz returned from his expedition that evening Sidonie's face expressed the old eager interest which her features always revealed whenever Elmar came home from a visit to Werner; but the questioning glance was soon transformed into one of anxiety, as she noticed the boy's excited yet troubled face.

"Has anything happened to Werner?" Elmar asked, as the first glimpse of Fritz's features aroused the same feeling. "You seem very much excited."

"You can't expect me to look otherwise, Elmar; for I'm not only excited, but thoroughly upset. Here is a letter from Werner to you; he will probably tell you what has happened himself, and thus spare me the recital."

Elmar hastily seized the note, while Sidonie, turning deadly pale, leaned back in her chair, and with half-closed eyes waited for farther disclosures.

"Werner does not say a syllable about any misfortune that has happened to him," Elmar said hastily, to soothe the fears of the little party. "But it is strange that he stops in the village, instead of coming here. I am to go there to take leave of him, and bring certain papers he minutely describes. Where is he going, Fritz, and why didn't you bring him here, at any rate?"

"I should have considered it positive cruelty, for I think it only too natural that, under the circumstances, he should wish to take leave of you alone."

"What are the circumstances, Fritz?" exclaimed Elmar anxiously; "pray speak out."

"He wants to tell you himself, Elmar. Just get into the carriage I ordered to wait at the door, and go to him at once; your presence is urgently needed."

Elmar hastily bade the little party farewell and left the room. A pause of painful suspense ensued. Fritz did not seem disposed to be communicative even now, for he gazed silently into the fire, while his features again assumed their former troubled expression. Sidonie asked no questions, but her quivering lips showed how deeply she was suffering. At last the baroness interrupted the silence.

"Did Werner forbid you to tell us about the misfortune that has befallen him, Fritz?"

"Oh, no, grandmamma. It must be a matter of very little importance to him who hears it, especially as he is going away at once. One can scarcely imagine a more rapid decision or energetic action. Preparations for a journey, which would occupy others months, cost him scarcely as many days."

"Where is he going to travel that it requires such extensive preparations? Do speak out, Fritz!" cried Erica impatiently.

"Travel is scarcely the right word. He intends to emigrate to America."

"To America!" exclaimed the baroness and Erica in astonishment, while Sidonie half sprang from her seat, and gazed at the speaker with dilating eyes.

"You are as much startled as I was," said Fritz sadly, "and you will be still more so when you learn the cause. 'People must not call the devil, or he will come,' says an old proverb, and it has proved sadly true in Werner's case. When the noble count transformed himself into a secretary, he little thought his disguise was very near reality."

"What do you mean by that, Fritz?" asked Sidonie, leaning forward in her chair, and speaking in a clear, almost loud tone.

"It sounds so incredible that, even while telling you, I can scarcely believe it myself, though Werner's own story unfortunately admits of no doubt. When I reached his house to-day, I found all the servants in such a state of excitement that they scarcely heeded the arrival of a guest. The butler was holding his head in both hands, the footmen were running helplessly about, and even the valet was in such a state, that he could not possibly show me to his master, so I was obliged to make my way myself, and only succeeded in finding Werner after a long search.

"He was sitting before a heap of papers, but, unlike his servants, seemed perfectly calm. 'Why, Fritz!' he exclaimed, 'have you already heard of the affair, and do you come to condole with, or congratulate

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

me? For my own part, I really don't know on which side — the bright or the dark one — to look at my fate.'

"'What has happened, Werner?' I asked in my turn; 'I only came here to call on you.'

"'So you came to see Count Meerburg; but you must content yourself with a visit to plain Werner Bothmer.'

"He said this in a half-jesting tone, but I saw he was trying to appear more cheerful than he felt.

"'Are you going to take another position as secretary, Werner?' I asked, entering into the tone he had adopted.

"His face darkened for a moment, he cast a reproving, and yet half-sorrowful glance at me, and said sadly, 'Do not remind me of a fault which has been too bitterly punished. I told you just now that you are not visiting Count Meerburg, but Werner Bothmer, and the latter has even more cause to blush for a part he played with such mistaken anticipations, and for which the ruin of his whole happiness can scarcely atone. But we will say nothing about it now,' he continued in a somewhat imperious tone, 'let me, without farther circumlocution, tell you what has happened. While unknown individuals sometimes become princes and counts, fate has assigned to me the opposite destiny. I thought I had lost both my parents when a child, and yesterday was summoned to my father's death-bed.'

"'Your father's death-bed?' I repeated; I was so utterly amazed that I was scarcely capable of a single clear thought.

"'Yes, he is the accountant Bothmer, formerly employed by my father, or rather Count Meerburg, and has lived a long time in the nearest town. When he earnestly entreated me to visit him, I granted the request the more willingly, as he had so long and faithfully served my family, and myself.'

"Werner paused, covered his eyes with his hand, and then hastily continued: 'Spare me a long account of the sad affair. Enough — the dying man gave me unquestionable proof that I was his son, not Count Meerburg's. While the latter's child died immediately after its birth, Frau Bothmer at the same time had healthy twins, and as it was feared that the news of the infant's death might kill the countess, love for her aided the earnest entreaties of the count, and Frau Bothmer consented to give up one of her children.

"'Count Meerburg wished to wait until his wife's health improved before informing her of the deception that had been practised, but she remained so delicate that a confession seemed more and more impossible.'"

"But she died several years before her husband," interrupted the baroness.

"Certainly; but the count himself at last became so much attached to the boy, that he could not bear to part with him, and as the accountant's wife died before the countess, and the latter married a second time, he felt no special necessity for insisting upon the possession of little Werner."

"Egon Meerburg would have been acting in a most unwarrantable manner, to rear a boy in the expectation of a brilliant future, when he had no right to it," cried the old baroness, who was greatly agitated. "I do not believe it possible, for Meerburg was a man of honor."

"So far as I understood, the count intended to legally adopt him, but always deferred doing so on account of the explanation which would first be necessary, and at last died suddenly."

"And what proofs has this Herr Bothmer given for his assertion?"

"Werner did not tell me, he only said he was firmly convinced that he was Werner Bothmer."

"Then this man might have continued to keep silence!" exclaimed the old lady, in the utmost agitation. "Why did he uselessly destroy the happiness of a son, to whom he had never been a father?"

"He wanted to ease his conscience before his death, and moreover cherished the hope that Werner would keep the secret in his turn."

"The man must have troubled himself very little about his son, or he would have known that such an expectation was built on sand. Werner would never be made an accomplice in a fraud."

Sidonie, who had listened to the story as if bewildered, and in her drooping attitude looked as if its weight bowed her to the earth, now sat upright. Her eyes sparkled with a radiant light, and the deep flush crimsoned her cheeks, as she said with feverish excitement, —

"Steps must be taken to repair the count's unwarrantable negligence, and induce the king to make the intended adoption legal. It is the sacred duty of the whole nobility to support this petition to the monarch by their united influence, for he whom education has made so true a nobleman belongs to our ranks, and it must be our pride to give him a place among us."

"I scarcely know whether Werner

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

would accept this expedient, for he is determined to make a new career by his own strength. Besides, he is overjoyed at the thought that he no longer stands between you and your inheritance, and this almost compensates him for his own loss."

Sidonie sprang from her seat; there was no longer any trace of her usual statuesque repose; every feature was instinct with life, and in the magical light shed by the fitful flames on the hearth her beauty looked almost unearthly in its transfiguration. Her eyes sparkled, a sweet smile hovered around her lips, and her bosom heaved passionately with her quickened breathing.

"Come here, Fritz, I want to speak to you!" she exclaimed in a ringing voice, and putting her hand on his shoulder, as if she wished to convince herself of his presence, drew him out of the room; but had scarcely entered the corridor, when she turned towards him with the hasty question, —

"Do you know where Werner is?"

"Yes, he is at old Morstedt's, whose son he saved from drowning."

"Very well, wait here for me a moment; I will come back directly."

She hurried to her own room, and the next instant stood beside him wrapped in a dark waterproof cloak, whose hood she had drawn over her head.

"Come, Fritz, take me!"

"To Werner? Am I to take you to Werner, Sidonie?" asked Fritz in breathless astonishment.

"Quick! We have no time to lose," replied Sidonie, without noticing his astonishment. "He will soon leave Altenborn."

"Then I will order a carriage; the avenue is dark and slippery; in this gloom, really dangerous."

"Come," was her only reply, as she drew him forward.

When they stepped into the open air, thick darkness surrounded them. Sky and atmosphere seemed blended into a black chaos; not a star gleamed from the heavens, and a keen cutting wind blew into their faces, bringing a chilling dampness, half rain, half mist, which covered them with a cold moisture. Fritz shivered as he drew the cloak he had hastily thrown on closer round him, and once more begged Sidonie to give up her plan.

"Come," was again her only reply, and, in spite of the darkness, she walked rapidly down the well-known road.

It grew somewhat lighter as their eyes became accustomed to the gloom, and ever and anon the wind rent the veil of clouds, and the moon, floating in the clear, bright ether, appeared for a moment and illuminated the scene with her rays, whose pale light gave the trees and bushes indistinct, huge, ghostly outlines, which looked so menacing and sinister that the beautiful surroundings appeared mysterious and horrible. The fountains, which usually plashed so cheerily, fell with a gloomy, monotonous cadence, and the sighing of the wind, as it moaned through the trees, or dashed their leafless branches violently against each other, increased the melancholy feelings aroused by the dense gloom. Now and then a branch fell crashing to the ground, and the oaks creaked loudly under the violent gusts, whose fury soon diminished, passed with long, wailing sighs, and finally died away in low moans.

Sidonie had neither ears for the weird modulations of the wind, eyes for the mysterious, ghostly scene around her, nor consciousness of the steady, fine rain, that drenched her clothing. The hood had half fallen from her head, but she did not heed it; her cloak fluttered in the wind without affording her any protection from the weather, yet she moved steadily forward. Her companion, though far more sensible of the discomfort of the walk, followed her example, and they went on in perfect silence.

On reaching the park-gates, they found them wide open, probably on account of the baron's expected return. Sidonie uttered a sigh of relief; she had dreaded the necessity of calling some one to unlock them, in which case she would certainly have been recognized. The lights of the village houses now pierced the gloom, and Elmar's carriage was standing before one of the first cottages they reached.

"Is it here?" said Sidonie, in a half-inquiring, half-exultant tone.

"Yes, it is here," replied Fritz. "Let me go first and see if Werner is alone."

"The whole world can hear what I have to say to him," she exclaimed, in a haughty, yet at the same time joyous tone, and she walked quickly towards the house, passing close by the windows, whose half-closed shutters afforded a glimpse of the room within.

Werner was seated in the middle of the apartment, gazing sadly at the ground, while Elmar stood beside him talking earnestly. Sidonie cast a hasty glance at both men, then turned the handle of the door and entered the house. She paused a moment in the dark entry, her bosom heaved convulsively, then she moved quickly forward and entered the room.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Werner did not hear the door open, but Elmar suddenly stopped, and, starting violently, gazed towards it. Werner now turned, and springing to his feet with an inarticulate cry, stood directly before Sidonie. Her hood had fallen completely back, and her hair seemed dishevelled and wet, while her clothing was heavy with moisture, and here and there torn by the thorns against which she had brushed. The animated, eager expression of her face contrasted strangely with her disordered dress, and when she now threw aside the heavy cloak and approached Werner, her beauty was so dazzling that it almost seemed to illumine the low, dimly-lighted room.

"I have come to ask if you will take me for your wife, Werner," she said, before he had time to utter a word, in a manner as simple and quiet, as if her conduct were perfectly natural, nay, a matter of course.

She paused, but he made no reply. The surprise was so overpowering that it produced the paralyzing effect of terror, and perhaps both were mingled in the feeling that took possession of his soul.

"You do not answer, dear one," she instantly continued. "You are angry with me, but should I not have dishonored myself and you also, if I had pursued any other course? Did not the inexorable consistency of circumstances rest upon me like a mountain, which would soon have crushed me into an early grave, and will you not join in blessing a misfortune that removes this burden? Do not say I cannot love Werner Bothmer, if I felt dishonored by my affection for the secretary Werner. The sacred duty that compelled me to struggle against my regard for him, now bids me love Werner Bothmer. He is the man whom my parents selected to be my husband, who, but for this unhappy accident, would doubtless already occupy that relation; he is the man who has proved himself in every respect my peer, on whom the nobility look with pride. May not such an accident happen to any one of us, and is birth alone to decide? Ought not education and intellect to throw a greater weight into the scale? No, dearest. If, contrary to our expectation, contrary to justice, you are not once more declared to be Count Meerburg, the Countess Hardenfels will feel proud and honored to become the wife of Werner Bothmer. But you must not fly from your home, beloved, as if you were to blame. Let America become the refuge of those who can find no home in their native country; you, on the contrary, must remain a bright example to all who seek true nobility, not only in name but in deeds. My estates, which belonged to Count Meerburg, shall now be Werner Bothmer's as his wife's bridal gift; they will not only afford us a luxurious and beautiful home, but give you an ample field for all your energy, and I hope you will never regret that love detained you in your native land."

She had spoken quickly and eagerly, but with no excitement; her eyes rested lovingly upon his features, but they expressed no joy, no exultation. Surprise, it is true, had gradually disappeared, but only to give place to a look of terrible anxiety. He gazed into her radiant face with inexpressible tenderness and sorrow; several times he had attempted to interrupt her, but a wave of the hand induced him to relinquish his design. When she at last paused, he took her hands in his, and said in a tone in which ardent love struggled with deep anxiety, —

"Sidonie, dear Sidonie! What can have happened to excite you so?"

She cast a startled glance at his face, then hastily withdrew her hands, and, retreating a step, murmured in a tone of agony: "He does not love me, he rejects me."

Fritz, who had hitherto been standing with a very penitent air in a dark corner of the room, watching the scene, now came slowly forward. His usual vivacious spirits had entirely deserted him, and he was evidently very much troubled, as he said in a low tone, —

"I believe there is a misunderstanding here, my dear Werner. I had heard that you had discovered you were not Count Meerburg, and in despair intended to go to America, and was perhaps a little hasty in telling the news to Sidonie."

Werner's eyes darted a look of furious anger at the delinquent, but the next instant a far different expression brightened his face, anxiety and sorrow vanished, and love blended with the deepest emotion.

He again clasped Sidonie's hands, and said, in a trembling voice, —

"Fritz has practised a most unwarrantable deception upon you, Sidonie. I have neither been transformed into another person, nor do I intend to go away. But is the happiness this deception caused me to vanish with it like a fata morgana? Must Werner Meerburg renounce the joy with which you meant to bless Werner Bothmer?"

She gazed at him with dilated eyes; for

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

a few moments surprise rendered her speechless, then, bursting into tears, she threw herself into his arms and stammered in broken accents, —

"Oh, thanks for a deception which has saved me from utter misery! I could not have borne to live without you, Werner, — I hoped and prayed that death would soon release me from my torture."

Werner, in an ecstasy of delight, pressed her to his heart, murmuring words of the fondest love, while Fritz, whose expression had wholly changed and become perfectly radiant, said pathetically, —

"'What is hid from the wise and prudent is revealed unto babes.'"

"Because the wise know and see dangers, over which the babe Fritz passes like a sleep-walker," said Elmar. "Your experiment might have had a very dangerous result."

"Might! But it didn't," exclaimed Fritz laughing. "The drama went off admirably. When Werner told me about his visit to Count Hardeck, and said he must see you a few minutes without coming to the castle, and moreover wanted to examine papers you were to bring with you, the plan instantly matured in my brain. I so constantly forgot the names of the papers, that if Werner did not openly call me a dunce, it was only on account of his innate courtesy. At last, in despair at my stupidity, he determined to write a few lines to you, and in so doing helped my design, for this mysterious letter had a great deal to do with the success of the little farce. Of course I was obliged to wait till you had gone, for you were quite capable of spoiling the whole affair, and when I had once got you safely out of the castle, I felt sure of my victory.

Grandmamma seemed most incredulous, while Erica was only sympathizing, and Sidonie instantly fell into the mood I desired. Grandmamma's objection that Countess Meerburg died before the count, almost spoiled my plan, for I had mentioned the change of children for her sole benefit, but I quickly recovered my wits, and the old count's touching love for Werner saved me the more quickly, as all thought it so natural."

The two persons most interested seemed for the present entirely indifferent to the story of the successful deception, for they paid no attention to the conversation between Fritz and Elmar. Sidonie was still clasped in Werner's arms, listening with a happy smile to his professions of love. The latter, however, now noticed her damp dress, and, greatly alarmed, hastily asked the cause.

"Water, my dear Werner, the usual cause of dampness," replied Fritz, before she could answer. "When people run here from the castle on foot, especially on a pitch-dark night, the matter is perfectly intelligible."

"You came here on foot through the darkness!" repeated Werner in horror, which was instantly transformed into delight, as he once more clasped Sidonie in his arms.

"It certainly was not very sensible," said Sidonie, smiling, "but Fritz had excited me so, that I really did not exactly know what I was doing."

"Then I will represent reason, and insist upon returning home as quickly as possible," said Elmar. "Where is your carriage, Werner? I'll order the coachman to drive up."

"I came with Fritz, and intended to take a post-chaise home."

"Excellent!" laughed Elmar, "and this carriage has only one seat, so Fritz and I are condemned to return on foot."

"Not at all!" exclaimed Fritz, "I had romance enough for one evening in coming down. I'll take the reins and act coachman."

"No, I prefer to assume that honorable office myself, Fritz. I believe it will be safer for all concerned. You can sit beside me as footman, and the two servants may return to the castle on foot and exchange their remarks upon the eccentricities of their superiors."

Werner would not allow Sidonie to put on her wet cloak again, but wrapped her in his own, and then helped her into the carriage, taking his seat beside her, while Elmar and Fritz mounted the box. Elmar took the whip from the dethroned and somewhat sulky coachman, and the carriage rolled through the park gates towards the castle.

The wind had increased almost to a gale, shook the boughs of the trees furiously, and howled fiercely down the ravines, but in so doing swept the sky clear; the moon shone brightly, and only now and then a long, ragged cloud floated rapidly over the heavens. The trees and bushes still seemed gigantic, but no longer ghostly and threatening, the loud creaking of the firs no longer sounded like moans of anguish, and the fountains plashed as if the night and storm only made them more gay. The melancholy nature had expressed only one short hour ago had dis-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd peared, and she now seemed to echo the happiness that filled Sidonie's heart.

When the carriage stopped before the door, the face of the servant who hurried forward bore a slight reflection of the surprise his master's features had portrayed a short time before. Werner lifted Sidonie, who was so muffled as to be unrecognizable, out of the vehicle, but she could scarcely ascend the steps in the heavy, uncomfortable cloak, and at last smilingly threw it back, took Werner's hand, and led him directly into the baroness's room.

Sidonie's absence had made both the latter and Erica very uneasy. As she could not be found in her own room, and none of the servants knew anything about her, both ladies probably suspected the true state of affairs, but only became more anxious about the result of the adventure.

When Sidonie now entered the room with Werner, she drew him towards the old lady, and said, with a warmth very unlike her usual cold manner, —

"Here is my betrothed husband, grandmamma. Unfortunately, he is not, as I hoped, Werner Bothmer, and I have been unable to make any sacrifice for him; but as he remains Count Meerburg, I must conquer my dislike, for, after all, he will always be Werner."

After the baroness and Erica had sufficiently recovered from their astonishment to be able to express their congratulations, Sidonie glided out of the room, leaving the explanation of the affair to the others. She soon appeared again in another dress, and the warm fire, as well as the hot tea the baroness instantly ordered, soon dispelled all chilly feelings.

"Have you thought of my reward yet?" asked Fritz in the course of the conversation. "I hope you won't forget that you would never have reached the goal but for me. Sidonie would probably have spent her life as the revered abbess of Herdrungen, and Werner remained a bachelor."

"I will remunerate you magnificently, Fritz. I'll give you three years' unlimited freedom to adore Sidonie," replied Werner.

"As if you could help that! I adored Sidonie before you were even mentioned."

"Well, then, we will say three years' unlimited freedom to pay attention to Sidonie."

"You mean because, during that time, it won't be dangerous, but you will be very much mistaken. For the present, however, I waive my right, and will try to make up for lost time in future. Grandmamma, I sincerely pity you. There seems to be a prospect of having about as much amusement here as at Dorneck, and you will have no resource except to follow papa's example, and take a little nap in the sofa corner."

"Dorneck reminds me of all my sins," said Werner, "but I can clear myself of one at least, Sidonie. I never insulted you so deeply as to ask you to grant me a clandestine interview; it was the work of that unprincipled adventurer, Wehlen."

"I don't understand you, Werner. I never received a letter containing such an insolent request from any one except Prince Eduard, and the regard I had previously felt for him instantly changed to loathing."

"You did him bitter injustice, Sidonie. I can give you my word that the letter was forged by Wehlen. He wished to ruin me, though he must also pitilessly cast you into the abyss. He thought me vain and presumptuous enough to be lured into the snare by a letter from you, while to you he put forward the prince, as he did not suppose the secretary's request would be sufficiently powerful."

"That was certainly the time when you asked the 'children' to meet you on the balcony, Werner!" cried Fritz eagerly. "Wehlen arranged the scene dramatically enough, but he was less successful than I. And that is the reason you treated the poor prince so coldly, Sidonie?"

"It has been the means of making the poor prince a happy man, and I have cause to be grateful for that deception, as well as the one practised upon me to-day. My regard for the prince might easily have induced me to give him my hand, in order to defy a certain very uncivil count, and escape a still ruder secretary. So thank the deception that saved me from myself."

"Then Wehlen for once did a good work, though against his will," said Elmar.

"That is natural, my dear Elmar," observed Fritz, with an air of precocious wisdom. "He is a portion of that power which ever seeks to do evil and always accomplishes good. Papa would never have pinched mamma's ear so affectionately, if Wehlen had not caused the terrible coldness between them which produced such a happy reaction."

The baroness now gave the signal to retire, and remarked that it was long after midnight. The lovers were obliged to separate, and when the two friends came into the corridor they fancied that a figure glided down the stairs before them.

"I should have thought that was Weh-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

len, Elmar," said Werner, "if you had not told me he was not allowed to enter the castle."

"I have certainly forbidden him to do so; but we will keep a strict watch, to see that the order is not disobeyed, for I also thought I recognized him."

From The Fortnightly Review.

MODERN JAPAN.

THE actual condition and the recent history of Japan present some of the most startling phenomena recorded anywhere in the authentic annals of the human race. In this marvellous country a few years have sufficed for effecting changes such as have elsewhere required many centuries, and even the best-informed of the strangers in whose presence these changes have actually been wrought are loud in their expressions of astonishment. It is sometimes said that the longer a foreigner remains in Japan the less he understands the country and its inhabitants; but of course this is merely a paradoxical mode of stating the difficulty of the subject, and the consciousness of ignorance which a careful study produces. Less than ten years ago the British envoy, while surrounded by Japanese officials and European soldiers, narrowly escaped assassination by the swords of fanatical patriots, and every foreigner on Japanese soil carried his life in his hand whenever he ventured to appear in public. Now the same foreigner rambles unarmed through town or country, with a sense of security equal to that of the legendary lady in Irish song, and far greater than he can feel in many countries of the civilized West. The truculent swaggering warriors of two swords have subsided into peaceable citizens, bearing no weapons more deadly than a fan and a Liliputian tobacco-pipe. A complete revolution, social and political, has taken place; feudalism, apparently in full force even as late as 1870, has been utterly swept away, and a centralized government with a national army has replaced the feudal levies and petty courts of the numerous semi-independent daimios. How it was possible that such a revolution could be wrought so rapidly, so thoroughly, and with so little bloodshed, may well perplex even those who have given much thought to the subject. One thing is evident, that a slight external impulse only was required to topple down the existing fabric of Japanese society at the time when foreigners forced their way into the country, producing an effect analogous to that of a solid dropping into a fluid on the verge of crystallization, and converting it suddenly into a solid mass.

It is well known in England that important changes have recently occurred in Japan, although their nature and extent are imperfectly understood, and a strong desire is manifested to understand them better. A traveller returning home from a tour of circumnavigation will (if I may judge from my own experience) be asked more questions about Japan than about any other foreign land, and will hear the strongest expressions of a desire to visit that country. The Japanese are known to be an intelligent and progressive people, but strange notions prevail as to the manner in which they have displayed their appreciation of Western ideas. Persons generally well-informed will even ask: "Is it not true that the Japanese have adopted the European costume, the English language, and the Christian religion in place of their own? Will not the distinctive charms of Japanese life and manners within a few years disappear forever beneath the monotonous surface of modern civilization?" A stranger landing at one of the treaty ports may fancy at first that there are some grounds for entertaining these notions, but a very different impression is produced by a visit to the interior, where the face and dress of a foreigner are rarely seen, where no foreign speech is ever heard, and where the country people are not less conservative of their costume, their language, and their religion, than the rural inhabitants of other lands. Even in the great cities, political and social changes have failed to destroy the characteristics and coloring of Japanese life, and have produced upon the mass of the people but little visible effect. It is true that European evening costume has been adopted as official full dress, and that military and police are clothed in European uniforms; but except those in government employ, very few Japanese have modified their national costume to any greater extent than is involved in wearing colored spectacles and a straw hat. Natives speaking English or other foreign languages are extremely rare, even in the treaty ports of Nagasaki, Hiogo-Ozaka, and Yokohama, although the common coolies can read directions written in their own difficult character. As regards religion, Buddhism, a foreign creed, has indeed been displaced from its position of supremacy, but there has never been any

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

intention of establishing Christianity upon its ruins. Shinto, the ancient faith of Japan, has been identified with the revolution which restored the mikado to his legitimate position as ruling emperor, and Shinto in a purified form may now be regarded as the dominant national religion.

Japan is a lovely country, a sort of northern Java, rivalling the tropical island in its fertility and verdure, its volcanic mountains, its abundant rivers, and its stately forests. But the principal charm of travel in Japan is due to its human inhabitants, the most affable and friendly race in the world, so far as I have yet seen. It is indeed a new sensation to the European in Asia, when he finds that his dress and complexion produce an attractive instead of a repellent effect, and that even the women and children neither hate nor fear him. Without being able to speak three words of the language, you cannot help feeling at home in a country where every one seems delighted to see you, where the very dogs are too well-mannered to bark at a stranger, and where you are welcomed with friendly salutations of "Ohaio!" by all, from the village patriarch down to the smallest urchin. A ragged, neglected child may be looked for vainly in city or in country; plump, rosy, and clean, with ample clothing, and their little heads carefully shaven in a variety of fantastic fashions, the children afford a sure indication of prosperity among the lower orders in Japan. The rising generation, who in China (and even nearer home) will ridicule and insult a foreigner, display towards him in Japan a dignified courtesy, which is at once ludicrous and charming. Babies, carrying still smaller babies on their backs, greet the passing stranger with a gracious bow, and if he seats himself, collect around, silently surveying him with an intelligent interest. Their gravity, however, is merely on the surface, and if the aspect of the "red bristled barbarian" proves, as it occasionally does, too much for the nerves of a girl more timid than the rest, and sends her clattering away in a panic on her wooden pattens, her flight is the signal for a peal of derisive merriment from her companions. As soon as they receive a little encouragement they become more demonstrative, and are almost equally gratified by a distribution of small coins or by gestures of simulated wrath. In the latter case they disperse with shouts of laughter, only to collect again in larger numbers, until some of the elder children, usually girls, venture to approach close enough to touch and examine the stranger's coat and buttons, or the contents of his travelling-belt. All this is done in the most gentle and confiding manner, as if certain that there can be no cause for fear, and perhaps their trust is seldom misplaced; but certainly their behavior towards a stranger is in marked contrast to that of rural youth in other parts of the world, and it is to be hoped that when they know foreigners better they may not like them less. Affection for their children is a distinct characteristic of the Japanese, and their hearts are easily touched by kindness shown to the little ones, whose long robes and elaborate coiffure render them the very images of their parents in miniature. It is not too much to say that in Japan the class known as "gamins," "larrikins," or "hoodlums," has no existence at present; even the street boy is a little gentleman, and long may he so continue. On the other hand, if the children resemble grown men and women, these in their turn are eminently childlike in manners and disposition. The entire Japanese nation is still in its early youth, emerging for the first time upon the wide world, with no experience beyond the limits of its own home, eager for knowledge, eager for amusement, with a firm belief in the superior power and capacity of its elders, and a determination to imitate them now, in the hope of rivalling them hereafter. During a lethargic slumber of many centuries, this gifted race, unlike Taro, the Rip Van Winkle of Japan, has renewed its youth; the feudalism of yesterday has passed away like a dream, leaving scarcely a trace behind, and to-day all that we see reminds us far less of mediæval Europe than of earlier days, when Greece and Rome were young. As regards their dress, their amusements, their personal habits, and their ceremonial observances, the modern Japanese are remarkably classical, and many a scene of their daily life recalls the Roman pictures of Mr. Alma Tadema. They are a gens togata, long-robed and bareheaded. Their delight is in the warm bath. They practise cremation; they celebrate funeral games in honor of slain heroes (as was done the other day on the final suppression of the Satsuma insurgents). The sports which find favor among them are contests of naked athletes. In the cities professional wrestlers and fencers rivet the attention of large audiences for many hours in succession; but the bold and vigorous peasantry are not contented with merely witnessing manly sports, and love to conclude the day with athletic performances

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

on their own account. Having lost our way after nightfall on the hills near Fuji Yama, we were guided by the glare of torches to an open space before a rustic temple, where we found the whole population of the village assembled to assist at a series of wrestling matches between the youths of the neighborhood, women and boys acting as torch-bearers, while the old men seated in front officiated as umpires. Each champion held the arena against all comers until he was overthrown, when the victorious challenger at once took his place, until he too in his turn went down before a fresh antagonist; they were fine, muscular young fellows, and seemed to think nothing of the violent falls which they occasionally experienced. Professional wrestlers are exceedingly fleshy, and do not struggle with as much zest and vigor as the village amateurs, although they make a far greater fuss about the matter. Seated opposite each other in two divisions, they await a signal from the umpire's fan; when this is given, from each side rises a hero, naked, with the exception of a small loin-cloth, and steps into the arena, slapping his thighs and stamping violently upon the ground. After glaring fiercely upon each other, both champions rinse out their mouths with water, take a little salt in their hands, and repeat the process of stamping and slapping, after which they take some more water and salt. They then squat down facing each other at very close quarters, the umpire asks if both are ready, and alternately one assents while the other objects, until at last the signal is given by mutual consent, and they leap up with a yell. The main point is to get an advantageous grip, and this causes considerable manœuvring, but when they have fairly tackled each other the struggle is soon over; "they tug, they strain, down, down they go," and the umpire's fan at once indicates the victor. As a rule the award is received in silence, the rivals retire, and a fresh pair steps to the front, but occasionally the excited audience demurs with loud cries, and the decision is then appealed to a referee.

A famous company of professional fencers were performing at Yokohama while I was there, and we went to see them along with several English residents, who had been many years in the country, but had never witnessed a similar exhibition. The gladiators were encased in armor, and were distinguished from each other by the color of their cuirasses; their appearance was heralded by the blast of a conch-shell, and all their proceedings were superintended by a handsome young man attired and shaven in the most orthodox style. Wielding his fan like a marshal's truncheon he set the combatants upon each other, and separated them, with loud ejaculations; it was clear that he believed thoroughly in his own office, and discharged it with as great punctilio as if the bamboos had been sharp swords and the combat à outrance. At each corner of the arena sat a judge with all the dignity of a Roman senator, motionless and silent until referred to upon a doubtful point of order. Cuts are interchanged so rapidly that it is often hard to say who had dealt the successful stroke. The weapons are long bamboos held in both hands like quarter-staffs, and any sort of blow above the waist is permissible, but the favorite is a good crack on the top of the helmet. Occasionally the combatants get too near together for striking, and the struggle becomes literally hand to hand until they are separated; notwithstanding their savage yells and fierce blows, they preserve the perfect good-humor characteristic of their race. By way of variety there was a fight between the sword and the "morning-star," a sphere fastened by a cord to a spiked handle. Although the latter appeared to be the inferior weapon, its bearer did not come badly off, as he played the part of a retiarius with the ball and string, and when at close quarters brought his sharp hook into active operation. Then two girls, elaborately attired in the wide sleeves and trousers of Japanese knights, attended by female squires to arm and equip them, took their places on opposite sides of the lists, and went through the motions of a fight, one having a halberd and the other a couple of swords. Finally, another amazon had a duel with a male antagonist, and completely overthrew him; but this was a mere burlesque, as he evidently tumbled over on purpose, and behaved like the clown in a pantomime, whereas an air of stern reality pervaded the other mimic battles. It is remarkable that the Japanese are able to derive keen enjoyment from performances which involve no peril to life or limb, and if their public spectacles differ in this respect from those of the Roman amphitheatre, they may also compare favorably with many which find favor in the eyes of the British public. Various games of skill, including "go bang," are popular, but the passion for gambling and cock-fighting, so strongly developed in most parts of eastern Asia, is not conspicuous in Japan,

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

where animals in general may be said to have a good time. Among other civilized arrangements a close time is enforced for game during the breeding season.

There are no roads practicable for wheeled vehicles drawn by horses throughout the whole of Japan, except the streets of towns and a few recently constructed thoroughfares in the immediate neighborhood of the two capitals.* Travelling in the interior is usually done on foot, or in kago (an uncomfortable sort of litter), heavy baggage being transported on packhorses. Where the nature of the road will permit, those who can afford it employ the jin-riki-sha, or "man-power car," a light vehicle on two wheels, containing one or two persons, and propelled by men, as the name implies. Usually the jin-riki-sha is drawn by two men tandem-fashion, one in the shafts and another with a rope as leader; an individual of moderate weight may thus travel thirty miles in a day for a very small sum, and an extra trifle given to his faithful and willing bipeds makes them bow to the earth in gratitude. Where the ground is smooth and level they will go at racing speed — faster indeed than is pleasant, if one thinks of what might result from the wheeler's bare foot coming against a sharp stone — and even on rough, hilly roads they seem to consider it a bad compliment if one relieves them by walking. Crystal brooks are frequent by the wayside, and the coolies, who wear only a rag round the waist and another round the head, lose no opportunity of washing themselves and their limited wardrobe, after which they start again like giants refreshed. For pluck and endurance combined with politeness and good-humor, the Japanese coolie stands pre-eminent, and if properly trained and led would make a splendid light-infantry soldier. But so steep and rough in many places are the two main roads between Kioto and Yedo as to be practically impassable for loaded jin-riki-shas, and on the Nakasendo, or Central Mountain road, we found it expedient to send back our little vehicles, and to proceed on foot through a country eminently suited for a pedestrian excursion. In the months of July and August central Japan is certainly hot, even at the elevation of several thousand feet above the sea, and insect life is somewhat troublesome, but we experienced no other drawbacks, being accompanied by an interpreter who thoroughly understood his duties as dragoman, and was at once cook, waiter, guide, philosopher, and friend. The scenery is beautiful and varied, highly cultivated and richly wooded, with glassy, rushing rivers and flowery hills. Most of the trees are evergreens; but so numerous are the different tints of foliage, from the sombre hue of the pine to the tender green of the bamboo, as to impart an exquisitely varied coloring to the hanging woods, and to obviate the monotony which often characterizes forest scenery. Each village has its own peculiar industry: stone-carving, cotton-weaving, silk-winding, mat-plaiting, umbrella or comb making.

Trim little gardens, some not much larger than a tablecloth, exhibit the fondness of the Japanese for flowers and dwarfed shrubs; and each garden has its tiny pond full of goldfish. At frequent intervals along the road flags and streamers fluttering in the breeze indicate a tea-house, or native inn, whence proceeds a chorus of "Ohaio!" welcoming the strangers. When disposed to rest you kick off your shoes and step upon the spotless matting, where the first thing brought to you is fire for your pipe, the second is water for your feet, and the third is tea. All these services are performed by neat-handed, smiling maidens, tastefully attired in scarlet or purple sashes, hopping about, bird-like, with rapid movements and pleasant chirping voices. Village tea-houses contain no furniture except wooden pillows, mosquito-curtains, and little tables six inches high, so that the foreign pedestrian must adapt himself to native modes of sleeping and eating. Meat is very rarely to be had, even in the shape of a fowl, but fish and vegetables are abundant and good. Bathing is universal among the villagers, and there is a little room set apart for the purpose, where you may splash to your heart's content; and, however hot the weather may be, you have only to clap your hands in order to get ice-cold water. In short, any one who enjoys roughing it a little, with complete change of life and scene, will find few pleasanter places for an excursion than the uplands of "Dai Nihon," or Great Japan. The trains of feudal chiefs, proceeding with small armies of retainers to or from the capital, are no longer to be seen upon the roads leading to the Nihon Bashi, or central bridge of Yedo, and grass now grows between the large stones paving the pass of Hakoné. During the summer,

* Since 1868 Yedo, the great city of the shogun, and Kioto, the capital of the mikado, have received respectively the names of Tokio and Saikio. These words are derived from the Chinese, and signify eastern and western capital.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

however, all the young men in the country seem to start upon religious pilgrimages, which take them through the finest scenery to the tops of the highest mountains, and are, in fact, very pleasant holiday tours. Ascending Fuji San, the "Matchless Mountain," on the 5th of August, we found the pilgrims there in thousands, streaming up one track and down another in almost constant succession, all dressed in white, with clean mats on their shoulders, bells dangling at their sides, chaplets of beads round their necks, long poles in their hands, and large hats, marked with the names of their villages upon their heads.

Love of the beautiful in nature as well as in art is a marked characteristic of the Japanese, and although timber is used almost exclusively in the construction of every building, sacred and profane, every great city is adorned with groves of magnificent trees, and tracts of primeval forest enclose the mikado's capital. Here the heat and glare of the crowded streets may be at once exchanged for coolness and solitude beneath the dense shade of lofty conifers, whose red stems and dark-green foliage almost rival the giant sequoias of California. In these noble groves are many temples and tombs, clear fountains of water flow into many a basin of bronze or granite, doves and crows flutter overhead (the notes of the latter bird being oddly enough regarded by the Japanese as a "sweet, sad song," suggestive of love), and occasionally tame deer come out of the thickets to be fed by those whom piety and pleasure have attracted to these shady retreats. Even where fire or the axe may have caused a temporary denudation, the mischief is soon repaired; plantations are made, young seedlings spring up, and fencing is unnecessary, owing to the absence of sheep and goats and the scarcity of all domestic quadrupeds, except dogs and cats. Thus it comes about that waste land in Japan is usually covered with luxuriant forest, where the camellia is a tall tree, and the ground is covered with gardenia and azalea. This is, in fact, the only country that I have visited where no alarm of drought has been produced by the rapid destruction of timber in recent times, and where a dry season is even regarded with satisfaction, as promising a particularly good harvest. Judging by the experience of other countries, this state of matters would soon be altered, were a large increase to take place in the number of cattle and sheep. It is doubtful how far the latter animals will thrive in Japan, for as yet they are mere exotics; neither climate nor pasture seem suitable for them in the central districts, where rank, weedy herbage covers such land as is neither timbered nor cultivated, and where rice flourishes exceedingly.

In Japan the term "foreigner" is in general use, as "European" is inapplicable to a society largely composed of American citizens, and "white" is not a suitable adjective to distinguish Aryans from the fair and ruddy Japanese. The foreign element is restricted to the treaty ports, being found principally at Yokohama, near Yedo, and at Kobé, on the Inland Sea. In order to pass beyond the limits prescribed by treaty to the various settlements, a stranger must provide himself, through the minister of his own nation, with a passport, issued only for the journey which he has in view, and specifying his intended route, from which he may not diverge. This passport the traveller is bound to produce, if demanded, for the inspection of the police; and it is almost invariably asked for by the proprietor of any house where he may pass the night, or even remain for a few hours. Such regulations seem at first sight to be vexatious, but they are not dictated by jealousy of foreign intrusion on the part of the Japanese government, and have been adopted in consequence of the extra-territorial privileges enjoyed by foreigners, over whom the native magistrates have no jurisdiction, civil or criminal. If a foreigner should misconduct himself while travelling in the interior, he must be brought down for trial to the nearest port, where a consul of his nationality resides, the transmission of culprit and witnesses under police surveillance involving, of course, considerable expense and trouble. In business transactions, where money payable by foreigners has to be recovered, similar difficulties arise, and it is only natural that the Japanese authorities should seek to restrict the influx of persons for whose safety they are held responsible and over whose actions they can exercise no control. Hence passports for the interior are issued only to persons of known or supposed respectability, for a specific purpose and a limited period; but there is no doubt that the country would be at once thrown open to foreigners if the privileges of "extra-territoriality" were abolished. It is felt as a degradation by a high-spirited people not to be masters in their own house, and they cannot bear to be treated as a barbarous Asiatic race by the civilized nations of Europe and America, among whom it is their grand ambition to be

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

ranked. They assert, with perfect truth, that life and property are now as secure in Japan as in any Western country, and they do not see why strangers wishing to visit their country should decline submission to the authorities by whom such security is maintained. "Come here and welcome! But if you accept our protection, accept our jurisdiction, otherwise we would rather be spared the difficulties and the humiliations which your presence within our territory is so apt to involve." These words appear to express the feelings of the Japanese government as to the admittance of foreigners into the country; but hitherto the answer given has been to this effect: "Our people claim the right of entering Japan, and you must admit them, but your judicial system is not satisfactory to us, and we cannot permit you to judge cases in which our countrymen are concerned." While the maritime powers concur in such a reply to all appeals on the subject of extra-territoriality, the Japanese must of course submit. Japan is not powerful enough to defend her own sovereignty single-handed against foreign aggression, and she is not protected by the comitas gentium, or the general indignation aroused in Christendom when a weak nation is the object of unprovoked attack. She has not been formally admitted into the society of civilized nations, and although her internal administration has given peace and prosperity to her own people, she is deprived within her own territory of rights enjoyed by the feeblest and worst-governed of Christian states. We have heard sad stories of ill-usage and injustice suffered by British subjects in Peru, and of mild, ineffectual remonstrances from the British Foreign Office. Even in Spain the diplomatic intervention of our government on behalf of imprisoned Englishmen has not always produced satisfactory results, and it would be easy to multiply instances illustrating the inconveniences to which English travellers, merchants, or sailors, must submit, when business or pleasure takes them to foreign shores. It is not very clear why Japan is entitled to less consideration than Peru, unless it be that having a well-organized civil government, with comparatively feeble military and naval resources, it is very easy to coerce her. From barbarians and savages, concessions or compensation must be extorted on each separate occasion after warfare and carnage, but the Japanese are acute observers, and have good memories, so that it is now only necessary to remind them that we possess long-range guns. They know that for the present resistance is hopeless, and while waiting for a time when they may be better able to vindicate their independence, they content themselves with protesting against a policy which holds in all cases the central government strictly responsible, but denies them the rights essential to their independence and self-respect.

Another grievance of the Japanese against foreigners is the tariff fixed by treaty to regulate the duties upon foreign goods imported into Japan, and they complain that they are compelled under this tariff to "receive such commerce as it suits the Western nations to offer, and have no word to say as to the terms upon which it is to be admitted." Either for the purpose of raising revenue, or of protecting native industry, they are powerless to fix the rate of duty which seems to them desirable, while foreign governments are bound by no reciprocal obligation, and the results are disastrous to Japanese finance, necessitating the imposition of export duties upon native manufacturers. For this infringement of financial liberty England, the apostle of free trade, is mainly responsible, but it must be admitted that upon this and kindred questions there prevails among the maritime powers a degree of unanimity which would be admirable if it did not lead to combined acts of injustice. Deliverance from the fetters placed upon Japanese commerce in the supposed interests of foreign traders can only be looked for through an awakening of public opinion in Europe, or through a falling out among the leagued oppressors.

The Japanese have never been a commercial people, and they regard with aversion what seems to them a grasping, covetous spirit in foreign governments no less than in foreign merchants. The exaction of pecuniary indemnities for personal injuries appears to a samurai sordid and unworthy either of a gentleman or of a great nation; but in this matter also modern ideas have prevailed with the present government, and an indemnity has been recently paid by China to Japan in connection with the Formosa difficulty.

It is remarkable at the present time to observe how in the case of Simonoseki Straits the Japanese were able to quote against us our own stipulations as to the Dardanelles and Bosphorus, and to justify their attempt to exclude foreign ships of war from their own narrow seas with precedents drawn from recent European history. Should the Japanese ever appeal to the British for aid in repelling Russian

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

encroachments, they will certainly make out a better case than the Turks have been able to do, and so far as British interests are concerned there is no part of the world, except the north-eastern corner of Asia, where Russia, by the acquisition of coal-producing territory with permanently open harbors, appears seriously to menace British maritime and colonial supremacy.

Foreign trade with Japan has proved to be a far less lucrative affair than seemed probable, when that country was first thrown open to external commerce. The extensive purchase by the Japanese of ships, machinery, and warlike stores; the abundance of gold in Japan as compared with silver;* the demand in Europe for Japanese "curios" and works of art, all combined to augment the profits of the first foreign traders, and to raise exaggerated hopes of the permanent traffic to be developed. This has, in fact, assumed very moderate dimensions: in 1874 the imports of the Japanese empire were $24,223,629, and the exports $20,001,637, the former consisting mainly of cotton and woollen fabrics, and iron wrought and unwrought; the latter of silk, tea, and rice. This foreign trade was carried on at four treaty ports, Yokohama or Kanagawa absorbing two-thirds of the whole, and Kobé or Hiogo-Ozaka most of the remainder; the trade of Hakodate being quite insignificant, and that of Nagasaki, so long the only accessible port, amounting only to four millions of dollars. In population as well as in area the Japanese archipelago somewhat exceeds the United Kingdom, containing about thirty-three million inhabitants, and one hundred and fifty thousand square miles of territory, so that the above stated amount of foreign trade seems ridiculously small. In 1874 the imports of the United Kingdom were £370,082,701; and the exports, including colonial and foreign produce, were £297,650,464, the total being £667,733,165, as against the Japanese total of $44,000,000 or £9,000,000. That is to say, the external commerce of the United Kingdom bears to that of the Japanese empire the proportion of seventy-four to one. No doubt the foreign trade of a fertile and populous country must tend to increase as new wants are developed among the people, but so ingenious and industrious a race will never be very extensive consumers of foreign manufactures: Japan can grow upon her own soil almost every useful product not essentially tropical, and her people will soon learn to make almost every necessary article for themselves. The Japanese might take for their motto, "Il Giappone farà da se," and they display their prudence and judgment in employing foreigners in all capacities as instructors only, dispensing with their services as soon as natives have learned how to do the work. In the mint at Ozaka, for example, when the machinery was first imported, the whole establishment was placed under foreign supervision, and many foreigners were employed as subordinates. When I visited Ozaka in July, 1877, the master of the mint was a Japanese, and the European staff had been reduced to four gentleman in charge of special departments; by one of them I was assured that in course of time the natives would be perfectly competent to manage unaided the entire establishment, the coinage of which would do credit to any mint in the world.

Education of the yonng is an object for which public money is liberally expended: in country villages the one large building is generally the new school, and where a modern house in European style has not been built it is usual to find the residence of a samurai, or even of an ex-daimio, appropriated for tuition. One practical reform, which would greatly promote educational progress, is the adoption of Roman letters in place of the complex characters now used in writing the Japanese language — a terrible stumbling-block to foreigners as well as to children.

A deformed person is an exceedingly rare sight in Japan, but it is distressing to observe the number of young persons under twenty who are badly scarred with small-pox, many having lost their sight; among children there are far fewer sufferers, and we were assured by the minister of the interior that small-pox has of late years diminished in virulence, having evidently been at its worst soon after the first influx of foreigners. The government afford every facility in their power for vaccination, but have not yet seen their way to making it compulsory by penalties.

It is a remarkable fact that since the Japanese authorities were induced by Sir H. Parkes to substitute death by the hands of the executioner for seppuku,* as the punishment of any samurai who might be convicted of a murderous attack upon a

* The relative value of gold to silver was, until 1860, only as 6 to 1.

* Seppuku or harakiri was a privilege of the samurai, or gentleman of the military class, when condemned to die. It implies either self-despatch, or (more frequently in recent times) death by the hand of a chosen friend.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

foreigner, there has not been a single instance of such an attack being made. Death in itself never had any terrors for a samurai, whether man or woman, and Japanese story is full of heroic suicides rivalling Cato or Lucretia, but a disgraceful mode of death none have been willing to face. DAVID WEDDERBURN.

[Published by arrangement with HARPER & BROTHERS.]

MACLEOD OF DARE.

BY WILLIAM BLACK.

CHAPTER XIV.

A FRIEND.

HIS death-wound! There was but little suggestion of any death-wound about the manner or speech of this light-hearted and frank-spoken fellow who now welcomed his old friend Ogilvie ashore. He swung the gun-case into the cart as if it had been a bit of thread. He himself would carry Ogilvie's top-coat over his arm.

"And why have you not come in your hunting-tartan?" said he, observing the very precise and correct shooting-costume of the young man.

"Not likely," said Mr. Ogilvie, laughing. "I don't like walking through clouds with bare knees, with a chance of sitting down on an adder or two. And I'll tell you what it is, Macleod; if the morning is wet, I will not go out stalking, if all the stags in Christendom were there. I know what it is; I have had enough of it in my younger days."

"My dear fellow," Macleod said seriously, "you must not talk here as if you could do what you liked. It is not what you wish to do, or what you don't wish to do; it is what Hamish orders to have done. Do you think I would dare to tell Hamish what we must do to-morrow?"

"Very well, then, I will see Hamish myself; I dare say he remembers me."

And he did see Hamish that evening, and it was arranged between them that if the morning looked threatening, they would leave the deer alone, and would merely take the lower-lying moors in the immediate neighborhood of Castle Dare. And Hamish took great care to impress on the young man that Macleod had not yet taken a gun in his hand, merely that there should be a decent bit of shooting when his guest arrived.

"And he will say to me, only yesterday," observed Hamish confidentially — "it wass yesterday itself he wass saying to me, 'Hamish, when Mr. Ogilvie comes here, it will only be six days or seven days he will be able to stop, and you will try to get him two or three stags. And, Hamish' — this is what he will say to me — 'you will pay no heed to me, for I hef plenty of the shooting whatever, from the one year's end to the other year's end, and it is Mr. Ogilvie you will look after.' And you do not mind the rain, sir? It is fine warm clothes you have got on — fine woollen clothes you have, and what harm will a shower do?"

"Oh, I don't mind the rain, so long as I can keep moving — that's the fact, Hamish," replied Mr. Ogilvie; "but I don't like lying in wet heather for an hour at a stretch. And I don't care how few birds there are, there will be plenty to keep us walking. So you remember me after all, Hamish?"

"Oh ay, sir," said Hamish, with a demure twinkle in his eye. "I mind fine the time you will fall into the water off the rock in Loch na Keal."

"There, now," exclaimed Mr. Ogilvie, "that is precisely what I don't see the fun of doing, now that I have got to man's estate, and have a wholesome fear of killing myself. Do you think I would lie down now on wet seaweed, and get slowly soaked through with the rain for a whole hour, on the chance of a seal coming on the other side of the rock? Of course when I tried to get up I was as stiff as a stone. I could not have lifted the rifle if a hundred seals had been there. And it was no wonder at all I slipped down into the water."

"But the sea-water," said Hamish gravely; "there will no harm come to you of the sea-water."

"I want to have as little as possible of either sea-water or rain-water," said Mr. Ogilvie, with decision. "I believe Macleod is half an otter himself."

Hamish did not like this, but he only said respectfully, —

"I do not think Sir Keith is afraid of a shower of rain whatever."

These gloomy anticipations were surely uncalled for; for during the whole of the past week the Western Isles had basked in uninterrupted sunlight, with blue skies over the fair blue seas, and a resinous warmth exhaling from the lonely moors. But all the same, next morning broke as if Mr. Ogilvie's forebodings were only too likely to be realized. The sea was leaden-hued and apparently still, though the boom-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

ing of the Atlantic swell into the great caverns could be heard; Staffa and Lunga and the Dutchman were of a dismal black; the brighter colors of Ulva and Colonsay seemed coldly gray and green; and heavy banks of cloud lay along the land, running out to Ru-Treshanish. The noise of the stream rushing down through the fir wood close to the castle seemed louder than usual, as if rain had fallen during the night. It was rather cold, too: all that Lady Macleod and Janet could say failed to raise the spirits of their guest.

But when Macleod — dressed in his homespun tartan of yellow and black — came round from the kennels with the dogs, and Hamish, and the tall, red-headed lad Sandy, it appeared that they considered this to be rather a fine day than otherwise, and were eager to be off.

"Come along, Ogilvie," Macleod cried, as he gave his friend's gun to Sandy, but shouldered his own. "Sorry we haven't a dog-cart to drive you to the moor, but it is not far off."

"I think a cigar in the library would be the best thing for a morning like this," said Ogilvie, rather gloomily, as he put up the collar of his shooting-jacket, for a drop or two of rain had fallen.

"Nonsense, man; the first bird you kill will cheer you up."

Macleod was right; they had just passed through the wood of young larches close to Castle Dare, and were ascending a rough stone road that led by the side of a deep glen, when a sudden whir close by them startled the silence of this gloomy morning. In an instant Macleod had whipped his gun from his shoulder and thrust it into Ogilvie's hands. By the time the young man had full-cocked the right barrel and taken a quick aim, the bird was half-way across the valley; but all the same he fired. For another second the bird continued its flight, but in a slightly irregular fashion; then down it went like a stone into the heather on the opposite side of the chasm.

"Well done, sir!" cried old Hamish.

"Bravo!" called out Macleod.

"It was a grand long shot!" said Sandy, as he unslipped the sagacious old retriever, and sent her down into the glen.

They had scarcely spoken when another dark object, looking to the startled eye as if it were the size of a house, sprang from the heather close by, and went off like an arrow, uttering a succession of sharp crowings. Why did not he fire? Then they saw him in wild despair whip down the gun, full-cock the left barrel, and put it up again. The bird was just disappearing over a crest of rising ground, and as Ogilvie fired he disappeared altogether.

"He's down, sir!" cried Hamish, in great excitement.

"I don't think so," Ogilvie answered, with a doubtful air on his face, but with a bright gladness in his eyes all the same.

"He's down, sir," Hamish reasserted. "Come, away, Sandy, with the dog!" he shouted to the red-headed lad, who had gone down into the glen to help Nell in her researches. By this time they saw that Sandy was recrossing the burn with the grouse in his hand, Nell following him contentedly. They whistled, and again whistled; but Nell considered that her task had been accomplished, and alternately looked at them and up at her immediate master. However, the tall lad, probably considering that the whistling was meant as much for him as for the retriever, sprang up the side of the glen in a miraculous fashion, catching here and there by a bunch of heather or the stump of a young larch, and presently he had rejoined the party.

"Take time, sir," said he. "Take time. Maybe there is more of them about here. And the other one, I marked him down from the other side. We will get him ferry well."

They found nothing, however, until they had got to the other side of the hill, where Nell speedily made herself mistress of the other bird — a fine young cock grouse, plump, and in splendid plumage.

"And what do you think of the morning now, Ogilvie?" Macleod asked.

"Oh, I dare say it will clear," said he shyly; and he endeavored to make light of Hamish's assertions that they were "ferry pretty shots — ferry good shots; and it was always a right thing to put cartridges in the barrels at the door of a house, for no one could tell what might be close to the house; and he was sure that Mr. Ogilvie had not forgotten the use of a gun since he went away from the hills to live in England."

"But look here, Macleod," Mr. Ogilvie said; "why did you not fire yourself?" — he was very properly surprised; for the most generous and self-denying of men are apt to claim their rights when a grouse gets up to their side.

"Oh," said Macleod simply, "I wanted you to have a shot."

And indeed all through the day he was obviously far more concerned about Ogilvie's shooting than his own. He took all the hardest work on himself — taking the

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd outside beat, for example, if there was a bit of unpromising ground to be got over. When one or other of the dogs suddenly showed by its uplifted fore-paw, its rigid tail, and its slow, cautious, timid look round for help and encouragement, that there was something ahead of more importance than a lark, Macleod would run all the risks of waiting to give Ogilvie time to come up. If a hare ran across with any chance of coming within shot of Ogilvie, Macleod let her go by unscathed. And the young gentleman from the south knew enough about shooting to understand how he was being favored both by his host and — what was a more unlikely thing — by Hamish.

He was shooting very well, too; and his spirits rose and rose until the lowering day was forgotten altogether.

"We are in for a soaker this time," he cried, quite cheerfully, looking around at one moment.

All this lonely world of olive greens and browns had grown strangely dark. Even the hum of the flies — the only sound audible in these high solitudes away from the sea — seemed still; and a cool wind began to blow over from Ben-an-Sloich. The plain of the valley in front of them began to fade from view; then they found themselves enveloped in a clammy fog that settled on their clothes and hung about their eyelids and beard; while water began to run down the barrels of their guns. The wind blew harder and harder; presently they seemed to spring out of the darkness; and, turning, they found that the cloud had swept onward toward the sea, leaving the rocks on the nearest hillside all glittering wet in the brief burst of sunlight. It was but a glimmer. Heavier clouds came sweeping over; downright rain began to pour. But Ogilvie kept manfully to his work. He climbed over the stone walls, gripping on with his wet hands. He splashed through the boggy land, paying no attention to his footsteps. And at last he got to following Macleod's plan of crossing a burn, which was merely to wade through the foaming brown water instead of looking out for big stones. By this time the letters in his breast pocket were a mass of pulp.

"Look here, Macleod," said he, with the rain running down his face. "I can't tell the difference between one bird and another. If I shoot a partridge it isn't my fault."

"All right," said Macleod. "If a partridge is fool enough to be up here, it deserves it."

Just at this moment Mr. Ogilvie suddenly threw up his hands and his gun, as if to protect his face. An extraordinary object — a winged object, apparently without a tail, a whirring bunch of loose grey feathers, a creature resembling no known fowl — had been put up by one of the dogs, and it had flown direct at Ogilvie's head. It passed him at about half a yard's distance.

"What in all the world is that?" he cried, jumping round to have a look at it.

"Why," said Macleod, who was roaring with laughter, "it is a baby blackcock, just out of the shell, I should think."

A sudden noise behind him caused him to wheel round, and instinctively he put up his gun. He took it down again.

"That is the old hen," said he; "we'll leave her to look after her chicks. Hamish, get in the dogs, or they'll be for eating some of those young ones. And you, Sandy, where was it you left the basket? We will go for our splendid banquet now, Ogilvie."

That was an odd-looking party that-by-and-by might have been seen crouching under the lee of a stone wall, with a small brook running by their feet. They had taken down wet stones for seats; and these were somewhat insecurely fixed on the steep bank. But neither the rain, nor the gloom, nor the loneliness of the silent moors seemed to have damped their spirits much.

"It really is awfully kind of you, Ogilvie," Macleod said, as he threw half a sandwich to the old black retriever, "to take pity on a solitary fellow like myself. You can't tell how glad I was to see you on the bridge of the steamer. And now that you have taken all the trouble to come to this place, and have taken your chance of our poor shooting, this is the sort of day you get!"

"My dear fellow," said Mr. Ogilvie, who did not refuse to have his tumbler replenished by the attentive Hamish, "it is quite the other way. I consider myself precious lucky. I consider the shooting first-rate; and it isn't every fellow would deliberately hand the whole thing over to his friend, as you have been doing all day. And I suppose bad weather is as bad elsewhere as it is here?"

Macleod was carelessly filling his pipe, and obviously thinking of something very different.

"Man, Ogilvie," he said, in a burst of confidence, "I never knew before how fearfully lonely a life we lead here. If we were out on one of the Treshanish Islands,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

with nothing round us but skarts and gulls, we could scarcely be lonelier. And I have been thinking all the morning what this must look like to you."

He glanced round — at the sombre browns and greens of the solitary moorland, at the black rocks jutting out here and there from the scant grass, at the silent and gloomy hills and the overhanging clouds.

"I have been thinking of the beautiful places we saw in London, and the crowds of people — the constant change, and amusement, and life. And I shouldn't wonder if you packed up your traps to-morrow morning, and fled."

"My dear boy," observed Mr. Ogilvie confidentially, "you are giving me credit for a vast amount of sentiment. I haven't got it. I don't know what it is. But I know when I am jolly well off. I know when I am in good quarters, with good shooting, and with a good sort of chap to go about with. As for London — bah! I rather think you got your eyes dazzled for a minute, Macleod. You weren't long enough there to find it out. And wouldn't you get precious tired of big dinners, and garden parties, and all that stuff, after a time? Macleod, do you mean to tell me you ever saw anything at Lady Beauregard's as fine as that?"

And he pointed to a goodly show of birds, with a hare or two, that Sandy had taken out of the bag, so as to count them.

"Of course," said this wise young man, "there is one case in which that London life is all very well. If a man is awful spoons on a girl, then, of course, he can trot after her from house to house, and walk his feet off in the Park. I remember a fellow saying a very clever thing about the reasons that took a man into society. What was it now? Let me see. It was either to look out for a wife, or — or —— "

Mr. Ogilvie was trying to recollect the epigram, and to light a wax match at the same time, and he failed in both.

"Well," said he, "I won't spoil it; but don't you believe that any one you met in London wouldn't be precious glad to change places with us at this moment."

Any one? What was the situation? Pouring rain, leaden skies, the gloomy solitude of the high moors, the sound of roaring waters. And here they were crouching under a stone wall, with their dripping fingers lighting match after match for their damp pipes, with not a few midges in the moist and clammy air, and with a faint halo of steam plainly arising from the leather of their boots. When Fionaghal the Fair Stranger came from over the blue seas to her new home, was this the picture of Highland life that was presented to her?

"Lady Beauregard, for example?" said Macleod.

"Oh, I am not talking about women," observed the sagacious boy; "I never could make out a woman's notion about anything. I dare say they like London life well enough, for they can show off their shoulders and their diamonds."

"Ogilvie," Macleod said, with a sudden earnestness, "I am fretting my heart out here — that is the fact. If it were not for the poor old mother — and Janet — but I will tell you another time."

He got up on his feet, and took his gun from Sandy. His companion — wondering not a little, but saying nothing — did likewise. Was this the man who had always seemed rather proud of his hard life on the hills? who had regarded the idleness and effeminacy of town life with something of an unexpressed scorn? A young fellow in robust health and splendid spirits — an eager sportsman and an accurate shot — out for his first shooting-day of the year: was it intelligible that he should be visited by vague sentimental regrets for London drawing-rooms and vapid talk? The getting up of a snipe interrupted these speculations; Ogilvie blazed away, missing with both barrels; Macleod, who had been patiently waiting to see the effect of the shots, then put up his gun, and presently the bird came tumbling down, some fifty yards off.

"You haven't warmed to it yet," Macleod said charitably. "The first half hour after luncheon a man always shoots badly."

"Especially when his clothes are glued to his skin from head to foot," said Ogilvie.

"You will soon walk some heat into yourself."

And again they went on, Macleod pursuing the same tactics, so that his companion had the cream of the shooting. Despite the continued soaking rain, Ogilvie's spirits seemed to become more and more buoyant. He was shooting capitally; one very long shot he made, bringing down an old black-cock with a thump on the heather, causing Hamish to exclaim, —

"Well done, sir! It is a glass of whiskey you will deserve for that shot."

Whereupon Mr. Ogilvie stopped, and modestly hinted that he would accept of at least a moiety of the proffered reward.

"Do you know, Hamish," said he, "that

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd it is the greatest comfort in the world to get wet right through, for you know you can't be worse, and it gives you no trouble."

"And a whole glass will do you no harm, sir," shrewdly observed Hamish.

"Not in the clouds."

"The what, sir?"

"The clouds. Don't you consider we are going shooting through clouds?"

"There will be a snipe or two down here, sir," said Hamish, moving on; for he could not understand conundrums, especially conundrums in English.

The day remained of this moist character to the end; but they had plenty of sport, and they had a heavy bag on their return to Castle Dare. Macleod was rather silent on the way home. Ogilvie was still at a loss to know why his friend should have taken this sudden dislike to living in a place he had lived in all his life. Nor could he understand why Macleod should have deliberately surrendered to him the chance of bagging the brace of grouse that got up by the side of the road. It was scarcely, he considered, within the possibilities of human nature.

CHAPTER XV.

A CONFESSION.

AND once again the big dining-hall of Castle Dare was ablaze with candles; and Janet was there, gravely listening to the garrulous talk of the boy officer; and Keith Macleod, in his dress tartan; and the noble-looking old lady at the head of the table, who more than once expressed to her guest, in that sweetly modulated and gracious voice of hers, how sorry she was he had encountered so bad a day for the first day of his visit.

"It is different with Keith," said she, "for he is used to be out in all weathers. He has been brought up to live out-of-doors."

"But you know, auntie," said Janet Macleod, "a soldier is much of the same thing. Did you ever hear of a soldier with an umbrella?"

"All I know is," remarked Mr. Ogilvie — who, in his smart evening dress, and with his face flushed into a rosy warmth after the cold and the wet, did not look particularly miserable — "that I don't remember ever enjoying myself so much in one day. But the fact is, Lady Macleod, your son gave me all the shooting; and Hamish was sounding my praises all day long, so that I almost got to think I could shoot the birds without putting up the gun at all; and when I made a frightful bad miss, everybody declared the bird was dead round the other side of the hill."

"And indeed you were not making many misses," Macleod said. "But we will try your nerve, Ogilvie, with a stag or two, I hope."

"I am on for anything. What with Hamish's flattery and the luck I had to-day, I begin to believe I could bag a brace of tigers if they were coming at me fifty miles an hour."

Dinner over, and Donald having played his best (no doubt he had learned that the stranger was an officer in the Ninety-third), the ladies left the dining-hall, and presently Macleod proposed to his friend that they should go into the library and have a smoke. Ogilvie was nothing loath. They went into the odd little room, with its guns and rods and stuffed birds, and, lying prominently on the writing-table, a valuable little heap of dressed otter-skins. Although the night was scarcely cold enough to demand it, there was a log of wood burning in the fireplace; there were two easy-chairs, low and roomy; and on the mantelpiece were some glasses, and a big, black, broad-bottomed bottle, such as used to carry the still vintages of Champagne even into the remote wilds of the Highlands, before the art of making sparkling wines had been discovered. Mr. Ogilvie lit a cigar, stretched out his feet toward the blazing log, and rubbed his hands, which were not as white as usual.

"You are a lucky fellow, Macleod," said he, "and you don't know it. You have everything about you here to make life enjoyable."

"And I feel like a slave tied to a galley oar," said he quickly. "I try to hide it from the mother — for it would break her heart — and from Janet too; but every morning I rise the dismalness of being alone here — of being caged up alone — eats more and more into my heart. When I look at you, Ogilvie — to-morrow morning you could go spinning off to any quarter you liked, to see any one you wanted to see —— "

"Macleod," said his companion, looking up, and yet speaking rather slowly and timidly, "if I were to say what would naturally occur to any one — you won't be offended? What you have been telling me is absurd, unnatural, impossible, unless there is a woman in the case."

"And what then?" Macleod said quickly, as he regarded his friend with a watchful look. "You have guessed?"

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

"Yes," said the other: "Gertrude White."

Macleod was silent for a second or two. Then he sat down.

"I scarcely care who knows it now," said he absently, "so long as I can't fight it out of my own mind. I tried not to know it. I tried not to believe it. I argued with myself, laughed at myself, invented a hundred explanations of this cruel thing that was gnawing away at my heart and giving me no peace night or day. Why, man, Ogilvie, I have read 'Pendennis'! Would you think it possible that any one who has read 'Pendennis' could ever fall in love with an actress?"

He jumped to his feet again, walked up and down for a second or two, twisting the while a bit of casting-line round his finger so that it threatened to cut into the flesh.

"But I will tell you now, Ogilvie — now that I am speaking to any one about it," said he, and he spoke in a rapid, deep, earnest voice, obviously not caring much what his companion might think, so that he could relieve his overburdened mind — "that it was not any actress I fell in love with. I never saw her in a theatre but that once. I hated the theatre whenever I thought of her in it. I dared scarcely open a newspaper, lest I should see her name. I turned away from the posters in the streets; when I happened by some accident to see her publicly paraded that way, I shuddered all through — with shame, I think; and I got to look on her father as a sort of devil that had been allowed to drive about that beautiful creature in vile chains. Oh! I cannot tell you. When I have heard him talking away in that infernal, cold, precise way about her duties to her art, and insisting that she should have no sentiments or feelings of her own, and that she should simply use every emotion as a bit of something to impose on the public — a bit of her trade, an exposure of her own feelings to make people clap their hands — I have sat still and wondered at myself that I did not jump up and catch him by the throat and shake the life out of his miserable body."

"You have cut your hand, Macleod."

He shook a drop or two of blood off.

"Why, Ogilvie, when I saw you on the bridge of the steamer, I nearly went mad with delight. I said to myself, 'Here is some one who has seen her and spoken to her, who will know when I tell him. And now that I am telling you of it, Ogilvie, you will see — you will understand — that it is not any actress I have fallen in love with — it was not the fascination of an actress at all, but the fascination of the woman herself; the fascination of her voice, and her sweet ways, and the very way she walked, too, and the tenderness of her heart. There was a sort of wonder about her; whatever she did or said was so beautiful, and simple, and sweet. And day after day I said to myself that my interest in this beautiful woman was nothing. Some one told me there had been rumors: I laughed. Could any one suppose I was going to play Pendennis over again? And then as the time came for me to leave, I was glad, and I was miserable at the same time. I despised myself for being miserable. And then I said to myself, 'This stupid misery is only the fancy of a boy. Wait till you get back to Castle Dare, and the rough seas, and the hard work of the stalking. There is no sickness and sentiment on the side of Ben-an-Sloich.' And so I was glad to come to Castle Dare, and to see the old mother, and Janet and Hamish; and the sound of the pipes, Ogilvie, when I heard them away in the steamer, that brought tears to my eyes; and I said to myself, 'Now you are at home again, and there will be no more nonsense of idle thinking.' And what has it come to? I would give everything I possess in the world to see her face once more — ay, to be in the same town where she is. I read the papers, trying to find out where she is. Morning and night it is the same — a fire, burning and burning, of impatience, and misery, and a craving just to see her face and hear her speak."

Ogilvie did not know what to say. There was something in this passionate confession — in the cry wrung from a strong man, and in the rude eloquence that here and there burst from him — that altogether drove ordinary words of counsel or consolation out of the young man's mind.

"You have been hard hit, Macleod," he said, with some earnestness.

"That is just it," Macleod said, almost bitterly. "You fire at a bird. You think you have missed him. He sails away as if there was nothing the matter, and the rest of the covey no doubt think he is as well as any one of them. But suddenly you see there is something wrong. He gets apart from the others; he towers; then down he comes as dead as a stone. You did not guess anything of this in London?"

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

"Well," said Ogilvie, rather inclined to beat about the bush, "I thought you were paying her a good deal of attention. But then — she is very popular, you know, and receives a good deal of attention; and — and the fact is, she is an uncommonly pretty girl, and I thought you were flirting a bit with her, but nothing more than that. I had no idea it was something more serious than that."

"Ay," Macleod said, "if I myself had only known! If it was a plunge — as people talk about falling in love with a woman — why, the next morning I would have shaken myself free of it, as a Newfoundland dog shakes himself free of the water. But a fever, a madness, that slowly gains on you — and you look around and say it is nothing, but day after day it burns more and more. And it is no longer something that you can look at apart from yourself — it is your very self; and sometimes, Ogilvie, I wonder whether it is all true, or whether it is mad I am altogether. Newcastle — do you know Newcastle?"

"I have passed through it, of course," his companion said, more and more amazed at the vehemence of his speech.

"It is there she is now — I have seen it in the papers, and it is Newcastle — Newcastle — Newcastle — I am thinking of from morning till night, and if I could only see one of the streets of it I should be glad. They say it is smoky and grimy; I should be breathing sunlight if I lived in the most squalid of all its houses. And they say she is going to Liverpool, and to Manchester, and to Leeds; and it is as if my very life were being drawn away from me. I try to think what people may be around her; I try to imagine what she is doing at a particular hour of the day; and I feel as if I were shut away in an island in the middle of the Atlantic, with nothing but the sound of the waves around my ears. Ogilvie, it is enough to drive a man out of his senses."

"But look here, Macleod," said Ogilvie, pulling himself together; for it was hard to resist the influence of this vehement and uncontrollable passion — "look here, man; why don't you think of it in cold blood? Do you expect me to sympathize with you as a friend? Or would you like to know what any ordinary man of the world would think of the whole case?"

"Don't give me your advice, Ogilvie," said he, untwining and throwing away the bit of casting-line that had cut into his finger. "It is far beyond that. Let me talk to you — that is all. I should have gone mad in another week, if I had had no one to speak to; and as it is, what better am I than mad? It is not anything to be analyzed and cured: it is my very self; and what have I become?"

"But look here, Macleod — I want to ask you a question: would you marry her?"

The common sense of the younger man was reasserting itself. This was what any one — looking at the whole situation from the Aldershot point of view — would at the outset demand? But if Macleod had known all that was implied in the question, it is probable that a friendship that had existed from boyhood would then and there have been severed. He took it that Ogilvie was merely referring to the thousand and one obstacles that lay between him and that obvious and natural goal.

"Marry her!" he exclaimed. "Yes, you are right to look at it in that way — to think of what it will all lead to. When I look forward, I see nothing but a maze of impossibilities and trouble. One might as well have fallen in love with one of the Roman maidens in the temple of Vesta. She is a white slave. She is a sacrifice to the monstrous theories of that bloodless old pagan, her father. And then she is courted and flattered on all sides; she lives in a smoke of incense: do you think, even supposing that all other difficulties were removed — that she cared for no one else, that she were to care for me, that the influence of her father was gone — do you think she would surrender all the admiration she provokes and the excitement of the life she leads, to come and live in a dungeon in the Highlands? A single day like to-day would kill her, she is so fine and delicate — like a rose-leaf, I have often thought. No, no, Ogilvie, I have thought of it every way. It is like a riddle that you twist and twist about to try and get the answer; and I can get no answer at all, unless wishing that I had never been born. And perhaps that would have been better."

"You take too gloomy a view of it, Macleod," said Ogilvie. "For one thing, look at the common sense of the matter. Suppose that she is very ambitious to succeed in her profession, that is all very well; but mind you, it is a very hard life. And if you put before her the chance of being styled Lady Macleod — well, I may be wrong, but I should say that would count for something. I haven't known many actresses myself —— "

"That is idle talk," Macleod said; and then he added proudly, "You do not know this woman as I know her."

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

He put aside his pipe; but in truth he had never lit it.

"Come," said he, with a tired look, "I have bored you enough. You won't mind, Ogilvie? The whole of the day I was saying to myself that I would keep all this thing to myself, if my heart burst over it; but you see I could not do it, and I have made you the victim after all. And we will go into the drawing-room now; and we will have a song. And that was a very good song you sung one night in London, Ogilvie — it was about 'Death's black wine' — and do you think you could sing us that song to-night?"

Ogilvie looked at him.

"I don't know what you mean by the way you are talking, Macleod," said he.

"Oh," said he, with a laugh that did not sound quite natural, "have you forgotten it? Well, then, Janet will sing us another song — that is 'Farewell, Manchester.' And we will go to bed soon to-night, for I have not been having much sleep lately. But it is a good song — it is a song you do not easily forget — that about 'Death's black wine.'"

From Blackwood's Magazine.

FRENCH HOME LIFE.

THE INFLUENCE OF WOMEN.

THE main properties of natural and mechanical forces have been determined with sufficient exactness to enable us to recognize that, amongst other conditions, they may be either momentary or continuous; that, again, when they are continuous they may be regular or varied, according as their successive impulsions are equal or unequal; and also, that they may be accelerating or retarding, because they act sometimes in the direction of an existing movement and sometimes in opposition to that direction.

Now, does it not seem that these same characteristics apply to certain human influences as positively and as really as to material energies? Are not almost all of us acting on our neighbors, just as physical agencies do, either permanently or exceptionally, either methodically or tumultuously, either precipitatingly or checkingly? The moral pressures which we are exerting on each other appear, in all these respects, to obey laws so analogous to those which guide the movements of matter, that even our special privilege of free-will does not look powerful enough to liberate us from the common rules which hold the whole of nature. With all our advantages of liberty of intention, with all our faculties of volition and choice, we do not succeed in emancipating ourselves from the universal yoke: we remain bound towards each other by the great principles of motion, just as if we were comets, cannon-balls, or clouds.

And when we come to think about it, we can scarcely fail to acknowledge that it is quite reasonable it should be so, for the influences which we exercise around us may be described, after all, as mere shapes of force; our sympathies and our repulsions do substantially the same work in us as centripetal and centrifugal attractions effect in matter; our affections proceed like gravitation, with the same persistence, with the same convergence to a centre. We may therefore consider, without much exaggeration, from what we see in ourselves, that the correlation of forces applies to other mights than those of substance; that latent potencies, and equivalents, and conservation of power, are not terms of physics alone; that the ideas expressed by them belong perhaps as much to human nature as to science. But if the actions of men are tied, like those of solids, by general regulations of universal application, they are subject — in contradistinction to ponderable matter — to a scarcely calculable variety of what astronomers call "disturbing causes;" to so many, indeed, that the perturbations provoked by them are far more numerous and important than the workings of the rules which they invert. They produce an irregularity so immense, so contorted, and so elastic, that it almost resembles liberty. Their caprices effect what neither routine nor reasoning is able to attain. Exceptional and temporary though they be, they move as masters within us and around us; they are more prevalent, more acknowledged, and more generating than the permanent laws whose application they suspend. "Disturbing causes" constitute, in fact, the great essential leverage of our lives.

It is not, however, until we consider the separate action of women that we remark the full diversity of these wayward forces, and note the extreme eccentricity of the orbits into which they sometimes manage to fling the bodies that they exercise their power upon. The closer we look at this action, the more we try to measure and to weigh it, to analyze it and to decompose it into its constitutive parts, the more do we discover in it strange atoms and heteroge-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

neous vigors, the more do we recognize the amazing inconsistencies, the prodigious contradictions, of the results which it provokes. It is the most protean of agencies, the most fitful of activities, the most contingent of causations. In no two women in the world is it precisely alike; and even in the same woman it presents continually such strange mutations, exhibits such sudden transformations, performs such violent revolutions, that its fluctuations and its aberrations are as difficult to follow out as the shiftings of the waves.

Yet, varying as are the aspects of the cause, the effects produced by it are a thousand times more multiform still; they are so diverse, so disparate, and so divergent, so all-including, so all-dominating, and so sweeping, that they suffice to prove, by their own evidence alone, that an extraordinary, powerful agent must be at work behind them. Of the three great springs which stir up men — money, vanity, and women — the last, if we may judge it by its products, is incontestably the most puissant. And not only is it the strongest and the widest in its movements, but it has also the special and the splendid capacity of sometimes leading men to the noblest and the least selfish of their deeds — a capacity which can scarcely be imputed, even exceptionally, to either vanity or money.

Furthermore, in addition to these potencies, the influence of women has, not unfrequently, the virtue of acting on us by memory as visibly as by direct employment. It does not necessarily need the presence of the operator; it governs often from afar; it extends its sway through time and distance; it maintains it unimpaired indeed, in many cases, after death; it has the privilege of outliving its source.

All these characteristics lie outside and beyond laws; they are essentially the offspring of "disturbing causes." Laws continue to exist beneath them and beside them; but though those laws are immutable and omnipresent, they are not only obscured and hidden away by the profusion of external accidents which are littered about them, but their action itself is incessantly arrested by the obstacles which those accidents cast in its way. In the struggle between the two, we observe one of the rare examples of a defeat of order by hazard, of an effacement of natural essences by random artifices. The chances of personal character and of personal situation, the agitation of the passions, and, more than all perhaps, the great mass of activities which we habitually describe by the vague name of civilization, are the main producers of these accidents; so that, as the modern woman is essentially personal, so she is by far the most complex, the most curious, and the most highly-wrought of the products of civilization; and it is not astonishing that the constitution and the manner of her influence should partake of her own origin and nature, and should re-echo the salient peculiarities of her own character.

But though the forms of action of that influence are as many as the stars, its issues all spring from one common source. Those issues include every shifting shape, every pulsating mood, every vibrating form that sentiment can assume, from love to hate, from longing to remorse, from ambition to disdain, from obedience to revolt; yet all of them, without distinction, rise from one general birthplace — imagination. Whether women work upon us by the heart or by the head, through our eyes or through our ears, by vainglory or by virtue — whether they lift us up or drag us down — whether they lead us to honor or to shame, to sorrow or to joy, to error or to truth — it is invariably by some thrusting of imagination that they guide us. We do not always perceive this truth at first, because we naturally hesitate to recognize identity of origin in results which vary like the color of sunset clouds; but their very variety supplies a crowning evidence of their common paternity, for no germ but imagination could bud into such boundless dissimilitudes.

As, then, imagination is in some measure or shape the essential root of all the influence which women wield around them, it is natural that, in looking over Europe for signs of the activity of that influence, we should find its most conspicuous expansions amongst those who most excite imagination, amongst the creative, brightening women of France — the women who nationally possess, above all others, and in exuberant abundance, the special idiosyncrasies, the exceptional efficiencies, the delicate capacities which are indispensable to the full, thorough, plenary evolution of the power which we are considering. The sway of women over the acts of men presents in France an intensity of undisputed reality which we can discover in no other land. It is there that it can be studied in its most advanced actual form; it is there that it exercises its highest prerogatives, that it asserts its strongest will, that it thrusts itself most vividly forward as a ruler of the generation. Its action on in-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

dividuals is immense there, for good and bad; but that part of the subject lies altogether outside our limits; we are discussing it here exclusively in its general effects.

In Christian countries the influence of women is everywhere: it is in everything we think, and wish, and do; it is in all the questions of our time — in politics, in religion, in morals, in virtue, and in vice; it constitutes in each kingdom a distinct and preponderating form of the national movement. Its local efficacy rises not only with the habits and the tendencies of the race, not only with the individual ability of each woman, but almost more — with the impressibility, with the faculty of imagination of each man. It therefore naturally presents its most complete and most vigorous manifestations in lands where specificness of personality, sentiments of prompt emotion, and facility of ardor, eagerness, and passion, are developed between the sexes in the proportions best suited to the case. It is because these rare conditions are found, in all their force, in the strangely endowed, impressionable French blood, that France has become the great triumphant field of women's action. Numbers of women there are, in their own eyes, apostles — apostles in the world and in their homes. They are, both of themselves and in their ways of life, professors of the political, religious, artistic, or sentimental faith to which they may happen to have given up their will; they take for themselves, individually, all the victories of their cause. And as they preach to an eager and excited audience, the union between actors and spectators produces a play such as no other theatre in the world can show.

In the other lands of Europe the influence of women may be said, in general terms, to present certain determined but limited aspects; it is calming, soothing, restraining, and it is simultaneously duty-teaching, elevating, purifying. But in France it assumes, in a multitude of cases, an additional characteristic of a totally different species. It is often all that it is elsewhere; it is often moderating and softening, rectifying and redeeming: but it is, continually, something else besides; it is — visibly and nationally — stimulating. There is, perpetually, in the leverage which Frenchwomen exert around them, a manifestly instigating tendency — a palpably enkindling force — a quickening, impelling, inflaming agency. Their action can be as tender, as moderating, as that of any women on earth; but it can also assume, with amazing ease, all the forms of incitation and arousing. Here lies its great characteristic: it is in the examination of the results produced by this marked form of work that we discover the special national effect of the influence exercised by Frenchwomen. In the other elements of their empire they act, more or less, like other women: but in this great line of action they are themselves alone; in this they expend a power which no other women of the world display.

To see this power in its fullest effectiveness, we must not seek for it at either the top or the bottom of society; it is in the middle strata that it is especially discoverable in the true fulness of its capacity. The women of the lower sections possess no directing energies of the sort which we are discussing here; and those of the highest rank are too utterly without class influence to be able to exercise a national domination. It is in the centre that we find the real acting women of France — the women of energy, of number, and of will. There we see at work a mass of organized pressure which stretches out to the corners of the land, which grasps and urges on the entire life of the people, — which makes itself felt in thought, in talk, and in events.

On the strange fact of the absence in French society of any guidance from above, it is, however, necessary to say something more before proceeding further. The difference between the position and the ascendancy of the high-born in England and in France is so enormous, that it is essential, in addressing English readers, to insist upon it with special emphasis. We all know how immense is the force of that position and that ascendancy amongst ourselves; but in France no such force exists at at all. A certain small part of the best noblesse there constitutes a group apart — a group, of which the members bear great names, but which enjoys no prerogatives, exercises no rights, applies no teaching, awakes no praise, provokes no sympathy. This group is rarely accessible to outsiders, excepting as mere acquaintances; it purposely surrounds itself by a barrier within which it vegetates, in ancient prejudices, in self-esteem, and in horror of our time; it has but few contacts with the true life of France, with the movements of opinion, with the realities of to-day. It offers to the generation no accepted model; it supplies no admired example; it serves in nothing as a recognized guide. There is no national imitation of it, no national admiration of it, no national employment for it. It exists as a force in its own eyes only;

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

the country does not even regard it as a representative social order, still less as a valued national instrument. And yet the members of this group, with all their feebleness and unproductiveness, do form, most incontestably, the highest society in France. But France cares nothing for them; it asks them for no instruction. It invents; or if it sometimes imitates, it does so by modifying, by substituting, and by arranging; by casting aside all notions that do not tend to practical application and employment. It has worked out for itself a general state, in which neither blood nor money is regarded as an inevitable master — in which both are envied but not adored; a state which is based on equilibrium of sentiments rather than on parity of birth — on fundamental sympathies of idea rather than on accidental unities of situation.

Foremost in the eminently national labor of creating and maintaining this state stand the women of the middle classes. It is they alone who are the typical women of the land. Abandoned by the recluses at the top, unaided by the toilers at the bottom, it is they who are the instituting workers; it is by them and by their efforts that the lesson of women's present social use in France is now taught.

The peculiar organization of France offers, it is true, a special and a magnificent field of action for them. But how cleverly they use it! The effacement of the noblesse as a caste leaves the ground clear for them, it is true. But how skilfully they till it! Their very faults assist them. Outside their own homes their fond indoor temperament seems to change. In society they show themselves inferior in heart and (as a natural consequence perhaps) superior in intelligence to the men around them. Possessing all the abilities of women, and working on all the weaknesses of men; wielding all the arms of shrewdness, aptitude, coquetry, and charm, and directing them against sensation, emotion, and excitement, — they conquer almost as much by their defects as by their qualities. In their action on society, their failings and their merits labor side by side.

The great glaring fact distinctive of the Frenchwoman is that she is herself. Unlike the Englishwoman, she yields to no dictation from above, she imitates no nationally admired type, she accepts no pattern: her manner, her tactics, her language, and her art are forcedly her own, for the excellent reason that no adopted text stands before her to be copied. The effect of this absence of a constantly repeated model is naturally to create variety in an abundance which is unknown elsewhere. And here lies the first explanation of that stimulating action to which allusion has been already made. As no woman is exactly like any other woman, or handles any two men in the same fashion, or even operates by the same method on the same man for two days running — as bearing, attitude, and procedure are perpetually changing — it follows that the subjects operated on find themselves exposed to a continuous stream of fresh sensations, and to all the incitements which necessarily result therefrom. In the personal originality of each Frenchwoman lies the great secret of her action. Her processes of each moment are varied with the shiftings of the situation; she consults no precedents, no usages, no rules; she admits neither facsimiles nor duplications. Her habit of individual performance, and her conviction that she is as capable as any other woman of deciding how she ought to behave in any given case, combine to endow her with fertility of resource and rapidity of decision; she stands before her circle of the world as an unceasing appropriator of new means to her ends, and as an equally unceasing provoker of new emotions around her. Her sovereignty is generated by her variety. As the mass of the women of the middle class assume this attitude, it follows that variety attains, in France, a development, and possesses a virtue, of which we can discover the like nowhere else. In England we get on without it, or, at all events, with very little of it. We all live substantially alike; we think, and talk, and move almost exactly as our neighbors do, and we are content; our system of society is based on uniformity; our women behave in the self-same fashion to everybody they know. But in France, if a lady has a dozen people in her salon, she acts a dozen parts to them; she is a distinct person to each one of them, and each of her incarnations is proper to herself alone — it contains nothing that is recognizably borrowed from another. And she does all this instinctively, unconsciously, without an effort.

This remarkable capacity is not, however, acquired by pure self-teaching. Although no guidance to it is attainable from above, the women of the middle class do aid each other copiously. The influence of contact which, in so many forms, is so strangely powerful in France, applies here with immense effect. All the women of a

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

set act and react upon each other; each one of them attentively observes the doings round her; each one of them absorbs, digests, and reissues whatever pleases in her friends. What she gives back is different from what she took. She weaves a new fabric with the materials she has seized, so fresh, so transformed, that no one but a very close observer would detect its origin. And yet it is in part by this means that the infinite variety of her action is composed. The faculty of adaptation is the second of the great secrets of women's influence in France.

But that faculty could scarcely be exercised on so elastic a scale unless the composition of the society which supplies the elements of this ceaseless adaptation were equally elastic. It is precisely because the middle class in France is multifold in the diversity of its components, almost unmeasured in the determination of its limits, and most generously open-handed in its reception of new recruits, that the women who belong to it find before their eyes a ceaseless study of peculiarities, distinctions, novelties, and originalities. If the social section to which they are attached were a closed order, they would rapidly rust in it; their natural capacities would be insufficient to protect them from the mouldiness induced by solitary inaction. The condition of the small band above them supplies proof enough of that. But that section is singularly wide, for it stretches upwards and downwards as well as sideways. The highest class is so limited, it guards itself so strictly (excepting in cases of marriage for money), that the mass of the ordinarily well-born are excluded from it, and are forced, in spite of themselves, to enter the ranks of the middle class. A vast majority of the bearers of titles must therefore be counted as forming part of the latter; and though titles have no meaning now in France, they continue, all the same, to possess so real a social value, that their proprietors occupy, as a rule, a front place in the group to which they may happen to belong. After them come the rentiers, the members of professions, the upper employés of the State, and all the undetermined stragglers who, in France as elsewhere, aid to make up the great central array. And this is not all. Just as the middle class dilates overhead in a fashion strange to England, so also does it swell out beneath with a charity equally unknown to us. It is the great incorporator of France, the great assimilator, the great absorber. Its gates are open to all the clean, to all the well-behaved, and, above all, to all the intelligent — to every one who can personally contribute to the joy of those who receive him. Degrees exist in it — human vanity requires that they should — but they are degrees over which it is easy to leap: they serve, indeed, to mark out the sympathies of groups, far more than to bar the progress of individuals.

The result is, that the so-called middle class of France includes, in reality, representatives of almost every grade in the land, of every occupation, of every ambition, and of every idea: it is, practically, an all-containing, universal association, which offers to a studying woman a virtually limitless field of teaching. Under conditions of such a nature, it is not surprising that the result should be as large as the cause, and that the diversities of tone and attitude assumed by Frenchwomen should be as abundant and as diverging as the types and temperaments from which those women have the opportunity of extracting impressions and conceptions. The variety of their conduct is a product of the variety of their contacts; and this latter, again, is a consequence of the variety of the elements of the society in which they live.

And if the women are assisted by these special conditions of the national system to develop their inherent capacities, and to appropriate, fertilize, and utilize all the means which accidents of situation may cast before them, the men beside them are led on, simultaneously, by the action of the self-same causes, to throw open their own natures, and to eagerly breathe the exciting social atmosphere which surrounds them. Both men and women are thrust forward on the same road by the same impulsions; the faculties of the one, and the impressibility of the other, are augmented side by side, by an agency which equally affects them both. The constant manipulation of new sensibilities not only provokes in the man a growing appetite for more and more of them, but also educates the women to supply them. In this reciprocal community of action and counter-action between the two lies the third mainspring of the stimulating force of Frenchwomen.

A mutual position of such a kind — a position which is observable nowhere but in France — would not, however, be realizable even there, if very special natural dispositions did not lend themselves with rare appropriateness to its attainment. A passing allusion has been already made to

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the most strange but very evident fact, that, in the details of social relation, the men are more emotional than the women, and the women more intelligent than the men. Of course, there are exceptions in tens of thousands; but, taking the population as a whole, it is one of its most manifest characteristics that, in society, it is the women who think most, and the men who feel most. This inversion of the rules which apply elsewhere to the distribution between the sexes of the temperaments and dispositions which are generally supposed to be essentially proper to each of them, is one of the strange social signs of the France of to-day. Indoors, in families, the proportions seem equal. But out of doors, there is nationally a perceptibly greater spread of mental qualities amongst the women than amongst the men — more quickness, more acuteness, more discrimination, more judgment; and, simultaneously, as if to counterbalance this exception, there is a relative drying up of the heart amongst the women, and an abnormal development of it amongst the men. It cannot be too often repeated, that towards their own kindred, as daughters, as wives, and especially as mothers, Frenchwomen are as tender, as loving, as devoted and unselfish as any women on earth; and that no deficiency of heart is discoverable in them in their houses, or in their attitude towards their parents, their husbands, or their children. But in their social practice it is, in innumerable cases, distinctly discernible. Now it is precisely of social practice that we are talking: we shall come presently to the influence of women at their firesides; thus far we are considering it exclusively in its action on the outside world. One of the principal characteristics of that action is, that the women who exercise it are rarely carried away by emotions — that, on the contrary, they retain almost always a perfect control over their impulses, and are able to suppress all unneedful fervency and pathos, and to conduct their lives with prudent equanimity. And their circumspection and reserve are exhibited quite as much in their relations with other women as in their conduct towards men. Frenchwomen do not often make hearty friends with each other. They are the most perfect acquaintances that the earth can supply; but there is something in the constitution of their nature which seems to force them to put aside their real attachments for their own blood alone, and to deprive them of the faculty of solid, durable fellowship with anybody who is not of their stock. There are exceptions, as was said just now; but no spectator who has had opportunities of sufficiently observing the characteristics of French society will deny that this is the rule.

Under such conditions, the women start with an immense working pre-eminence over the men. They are calm, collected, wary; they are not weakened by idle enthusiasms or by foolish magnanimities; no stupid generosities affect their coolness or enfeeble their self-control; they never forget that their objects in society are amusement, not interest — power, not sympathy — vanity, not fraternity. They do not generally care to be made love to, for love-making is a process which sometimes entails inconvenience if it be carried too far; so, as they abhor inconvenience, they all shrink from its possible causes. And these women, mistresses of their acts and thoughts, untouched and unimpassioned, operate on men whose whole natures are eager, glowing, excitable — on men who feel instinctively and profoundly, and who exhibit everything they feel. The contest is unequal. By mere superiority of self-possession the women dominate the men.

And when we see that, in addition to this first advantage, they possess the second power of greater endowment in all that concerns the clever handling of social contacts — when we recognize that they are brighter talkers, quicker thinkers, more attentive observers than the men around them — we are confirmed in the impression that men meet women in French society without a fair chance of victory, and that the issue of the battle is decided before the strife begins. In this double supremacy of indifference and intelligence we find the fourth great source of the incentive nature of the reign of Frenchwomen.

The fifth cause is more difficult to perceive; for, instead of being general like the other four, it is personal — instead of being national, it is individual. But though it is the least easy to detect and to measure with precision, it is by far the most curious and attractive, for it is the performance of the woman herself. The other elements of the subject are, more or less, external hazards; this part of it leads us into the very core of the question. Here it is that we observe how fitnesses of situation are utilized; how peculiarities of national organization are wielded for a purpose; how characters are played on; how opportunities are seized and fertilized; how advantages are developed; how expe-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

dients and resources are applied. Here it is that we detect at work the specialties of the Frenchwoman, — her inventivity, her activity, her assiduity, her laborious preparation of her plans, her infinite forms of variety, her particular fashions of self-love. Her character comes out entire in her manner of composing and directing her influence over the society in which she lives. But all these details differ somewhat in each example; they are exactly alike in no two cases. It is not, therefore, possible to describe them by generalities or approximations; a separate picture of each model would be essential in order to set them forth completely. As, however, there are one or two millions of models, and as it would be difficult to correctly depict them all, we cannot attempt a study of persons; we must content ourselves with a glance at the processes employed.

Of the three exterior forms of action — talk, manner, and dress — which are at the disposal of all women, it is from talk that the French extract their real results. Their employment of manner and of dress is conducted with a scientific skill unknown in any other land; but, great as is their proficiency in the handling of those two sources of influence, it is by talk alone that they bring about the highest and most subjugating of their effects. Even the accident of beauty helps them little; it is so unfrequent amongst them; they are, by their nature, so disinclined to trust to passive elements of attraction; they are, on the contrary, so accustomed to energetically employ the most active measures of attack; they are all so thickly surrounded by examples of constant and vigorous use of personal exertion in order to please, to influence, and to win,— that, by the joint force of habit and example, they learn to regard mere ordinary beauty, if they happen to possess any of it, as a weapon which is usually insufficient to carry them to a victorious position in their world. Scarcely any of the Frenchwomen who are endowed with it attach excessive pride to it. They perceive that it disposes other people to look at them admiringly, and to talk somewhat about them; but with their prodigious common sense, and with their singular national capacity for rightly estimating the relative values of things, they recognize that, by itself, it rarely leads them to any solid influence. The men and women round them want something more than prettiness — they desire to talk, to listen, to be amused and interested. So, as looking or being looked at is not enough for any of them, they end by laying down the law that beauty alone gives no sufficient masteries in life to its holder. And, furthermore, even if it did bestow complete authority and undisputed control, there are not many women in France who would content themselves with unwon homage — who would consent to leave their faces to inertly conquer for them — who would sit down silently in their beauty and abandon the inspiriting strife which leads to well-gained, consciously merited command. The women of France are an essentially living race — a race of combatants, who scorn unfought-for victories and torpid triumphs. Their joy in life is, not only to fight, but to fight with arms which they have forged themselves for their own hands, and so to accomplish a double success as belligerents and as manufacturers.

Under such conditions, and with such natures, it is comprehensible enough that Frenchwomen should regard talk as their sword of war, manner and dress as supplementary weapons of attack, and beauty as an unaggressive ally, which adds, it is true, to the effect of a review of troops, but which is of little reliable service in campaigning.

Still there is, all the same, a special vitality of function about their dress and manner. Those two agents are not idlers; they are not, like beauty, passive waiters on destiny: they are, on the contrary, producing workers; they are animated provokers of sensation; they are worthy to be counted as active colleagues of talk, as accentuators of its effects, as fortifiers of its arguments. Manner, indeed, forms an essential ingredient of the rhetoric of a Frenchwoman; it underlines her meanings by look, by attitude, and tone, by movement and expression. Her eyes, her hands, her shoulders, add intention to her words. Without the aid which they bring up, without the background which they supply, her oratory would perceptibly lose vigor. She knows that verbal eloquences, however admirable they may be, gain in spirit, in import, and in power, if they are supported, strengthened, and emphasized by the physical eloquences which dexterous women can annex to them. Talk is the real conquering force. It is to their tongues, not to their bodies, that the women of France intrust their cause; yet dress and manner are regarded by them as indispensable auxiliaries. None but the foolish place them in the front of the combat; but every woman who merits to be counted as a social artist takes care to utilize them in subordination to her

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

speech, as tools, assistants, confidants, or servants. Even her clothes alone, apart from her manner, supply subservient symptoms of her individuality; they help to constitute herself. They are not a being detached from her, an annexe, a supplement, or a support — they are not even a frame for her; they are an element of the picture she presents, a breathing of her essence.

The union of these forces makes up the visible strength of a Frenchwoman in society. That strength, in its external element, is an outcome of them all — of all of them held in one collective yoke, all pulling with a will together, all reined and guided by a skilful hand. How acts their charioteer?

Almost every Frenchwoman who has a place in her world pursues two main objects — amusement and power; it is only subsidiarily that she looks for satisfactions of her vanity of body. First, and above all, she wants to laugh; secondly, she wants to govern; it is only thirdly that she wants to be admired. There are, of course, a multitude of exceptions of all kinds; but the rule is, that she puts diversion first, ambition second, and conceit third; and she organizes her actions so as to attain those three results, in that order, if she can. Her ordinary purpose being to serve and please herself alone — her head and heart being usually indifferent to any will but her own — she is able to pursue her task and to utilize her means without the hesitations or contritions which preoccupy and hinder other women less imperturbable than herself. This does not imply that she is exactly and completely selfish; she certainly is not so — in the strict meaning of the word, at least: it means only that she is extremely self-possessed, extremely reasonable, extremely capable of defending her opinions and of abetting her desires. In handling the team of personal forces which draws her through life she would shrink from driving over other people, but she would unhesitatingly expel them from her road; she would be pained to hurt them, but she gives them to understand distinctly that their duty is to get out of her way. Her whole proceeding is collected, calculated, cool; but it is not cruel. Her head controls her heart, but she never ceases to be a woman.

A temperament like this makes of her, however, a predestined despot. She pursues her own designs with a will which beats down obstacles, and with an indifference to other wills which doubles the value of her own. And yet, cold-blooded as she is herself, she generates around her an atmosphere of excitement and emotion, and finds her own amusement in the eagerness, the earnestness, and the vehemence which she stirs up in others.

Her influence consists in rousing sentiments which she does not feel, in provoking agitations which she does not share, in creating stimulants which have no action on her. All France proclaims that influence: its character, its tendencies, its merits, and its faults, are all, in some degree, the children of her work. Her fashioning is everywhere; the history of her country is half made up of it; and her power is even greater now than it has ever been before.

She is aided in her procedure by certain conditions which extend the field of her operations, and multiply the effect of her acts. The national longing for easily-attained, inexpensive social amusement, especially in the shape of bright talk and laughter, creates a situation which seems to be made on purpose for her; for not only does she participate in the longing, but she is, additionally, exactly fitted to satisfy it. Both her disposition and her education prepare her to take an active place in a society of which the elements and the objects are almost exclusively personal — in a society which subsists, essentially, by itself alone, without extraneous aid. Its food is chatter; it lives on conversation. It does not reject balls, or dinners, or any other special additions to its habitual nourishment; but it can get on perfectly without them, for the reason that nearly all its members are competent to supply the one aliment which is really indispensable to its existence. This general independence of all accessory forms of entertainment, this faculty of fabricating their diversion without any other instrument than their tongues, create for each man and woman a position of active individual participation in the movement of society, which is entirely different from anything that we usually see in England. Our own tendency is to claim, wherever we go, that effective amusement be provided for us, without imposing on ourselves the labor of supplying part of it. In France, the exact contrary is the case. There, everybody produces; and those who produce most — for the common advantage — are the most popular, and the most dominant. So that, as the women are more productive than the men — as they are the great contributors — as they talk more and laugh more — they lead

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

more and dictate more. It is mainly they who have made the society of France what it is — gay, intelligent, natural, and self-supporting; they have well earned the place of power which they occupy in it.

But they have not done all this quite alone. If they have worked out such remarkable results on so vast a scale — if they have succeeded in creating a system of social intercourse, so complete in its own properties and abilities that it can dispense with most of the added pleasures which are needed generally elsewhere, it has been, in some degree, because they have been silently aided by a most powerful co-operator. The simplicity of the forms of French society, the fact that people meet in it for the unaided satisfaction of being together, with nothing to do or to look at, are due, not only to the labors and the capacities of the women, but also, partly, to the national love of economy. An association which costs nothing has been created. It would scarcely have been invented by any women whatever, unless they had been driven to it by pressure which they could not resist. But such a pressure existed, and exists, in France: the women could not battle with it, so they turned its current cunningly into the direction of their own work, and made a helper of it. It is they who have led the society of France to adopt and apply the admirable principle that, though poverty is an extreme inconvenience, it is neither a disgrace nor a crime. In England it shuts the door to contact with the world in any of its recognized manifestations. In France it obliges certain people to be less smart than others, but it deprives them of no rights whatever — it diminishes in nothing the sympathy with which they are received. Rich and poor meet, other things being alike, on a footing of absolute equality. The accident that one came in a carriage and the other in a cab — that one wears diamonds and the other no jewels at all — has not the faintest influence on their respective positions in a salon. As has been said already, money is envied in France, but it is not yet regarded there as a personal quality; neither its absence nor its presence constitutes a reason for knowing or not knowing, for liking or disliking. Parity of privileges is not dependent on parity of fortune. Some of the brightest and most influential women in the society of Paris are the wives of poor men, and live in little rooms on fourth floors. The result is, that as social rights proceed from social merit — that is to say, from the power of pleasing and attracting — the struggle for influence is scarcely affected by the possession of money. All that money really does for those who own it is to create for them opportunities of action; it does not give to them the faculty of using those opportunities.

From this situation results a special instigation for women. They are all, in their respective sets, substantially equal to each other at the start; not one of them is dragged down because her purse is light, or pushed up because it is heavy. The place of each one in the race is earned for herself by herself — by her own individual science and efforts. Mothers do their best to aid their daughters, and friends occasionally help friends; but assistance so supplied is rarely durable. In nearly every case each woman ends by recognizing that no one can really succor her, and that she must do her work alone.

Against the amplified and varied personality which is evoked amongst Frenchwomen by all these causes — against the developed but concentrated individual preponderance which results from it — society, as a whole, has no resistance to offer. The ablest of the women go to the front, by sheer force of superior value; the rest of them fall, successively, into such places as they can win and hold; and the men form around them all a cluster of unquiet, expectant, but submissive associates in the common task of rendering life agreeable.

This domination of women endows them to perform a great and special work. It is they who hold society together; it is they who cement and aggregate it; it is they who prevent disunions, who ward off the dislocations and decompositions of coteries which are so frequent elsewhere; it is they who bestow on their sets and circles the rare faculty of preserving their composition substantially unchanged, of going on for years without allowing any of their members to stray off to other gatherings; it is they who achieve the wonderful feat of keeping up in man, as years climb on, the love of social gladnesses; it is they who agglutinate all ages and all ambitions in the common pursuit of drawing-room excitements; it is they who, as they grow old, find means of pleasing in new ways — who decorate their white hair with winning charms — who make of the French grandmother one of the most delightful and most respect-inspiring types of Europe.

If, then, with these results before us, we regard the action of women in France in its purely cohesive effects — if we look at it as a creator and maintainer of a brilliant, seductive, susceptive society, we

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

have no reason for hesitating to proclaim that it is an admirable and most productive agent. So long as the point of view is limited to pleasures, laughter, and personally-produced distractions, it is scarcely possible to conceive anything more perfect than the result attained, or any course more thoroughly adapted to its function than the one we have before us here. If we consider it, again, as a developer of the imaginative faculties — as a provoker and a teacher of graceful talk, of instructive contacts, of excited fancies and conceptions, of all the stimulants which we can suppose to be applicable to the constitution of a social state where women are the sole chiefs, and where men accept vassalage for the sake of the diversions which they find in it; if we contemplate it as a system which permits all merit to conquer its own place — which excludes no candidates, no conditions, no aspirations, no shapes of power or attraction; if we watch it as a magnificent example of the process of public competitive examinations, — if we view it in any of these special lights, we must own that it does its work perfectly.

But if we carry the survey further, — if we look at the outcome of all this in the national character; if we follow out, according to our means of observation, its issue in the race as a whole; if we endeavor to determine how far French qualities are strengthened, how far French faults are cured, by the immense and undisputed social leverage which is left in the hands of women, — then we become disposed to doubt whether, after all, this most brilliant instrument is really worthy of the admiration which, at first sight, we were led to feel for it.

It is difficult to avoid suspecting, when we look at the matter in this broad light, that a general excitability such as that which permeates through the greater part of French society, must constitute a somewhat unhealthy régime for those who are subjected to it. Even if we can perceive no strain, no effort; even if all seems natural and fitted to its place; even if we can discover no signs of histrionic artifice; even there, if we can detect no labor, and therefore no fatigue — no acting, and therefore no deceit, — it remains difficult to admit that the constant stimulations which form the inherent substance of this society can fail to deleteriously affect the systems of those who are perpetually exposed to them.

And again, as regards the choice of objects and desires in life, is it not reasonable to conceive that all this facile tempting, all this easily-attained emotion, must naturally draw men away from solid thoughts, and disable them somewhat for the work of life?

If it be imagined that there is exaggeration in suggesting that such a result can be produced by such a cause, it may reasonably be answered that the contemporaneous history of France is offering many proofs that special hidden causes are dragging down the temperament and the vigor of the nation, and that those causes may perhaps be discoverable in directions where their existence would not necessarily be suspected at first sight. In the influence before us we find a social power which, taken as a whole, and allowing nothing for exceptions of any kind, may be described, in general terms, to be exhilarating but not elevating, brightening but not educating, appetizing but not strengthening. Is it not then just to point to it as presenting precisely some of the very characteristics which are proper to exhausting causes, some of the very components which must of necessity be included in unbracing atmospheres?

If the multiplication of the imaginative faculties, the development of conversational ability, the increase of affectionateness, were the sole recognizable fruits of its action, even then there might be, as regards national advantage, some arguments to urge against it; but as it cannot be pretended that these products stand alone, as they are manifestly surrounded by a variety of other far less desirable outgrowths, it is surely quite fair to suggest, with recent events before us, that the want of character and sturdiness which France has exhibited of late years, has possibly been provoked, in some degree at least, by an enfeeblement resulting from the excessive supremacy of women, and by the enervating operation of a system of society based mainly on personally-created excitements.

It is perfectly true that the systems which are applied elsewhere may not be producing any better consequences; but that argument proves nothing as concerns France. Her society remains what it is, what her women have made it — delightful to the individuals who compose it, but in all probability debilitating to the country as a whole.

If, however, the influence of Frenchwomen has reached no higher end than this in its outdoor applications, it has produced a decidedly better issue in its home employments. It is not perfect there, but

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

it presents itself in a form which invites much admiration.

In their families most Frenchwomen are seen at their best, both in their personal attitude and in the work they do. Some few of the worst amongst them present, it is true, an even less satisfying aspect in their private than in their public outlines; but the mass of them are, certainly, remarkably good performers of home labor. The particular faults which are so discernible out of doors, disappear, in great part, inside the houses; and though they are often replaced by other defects, — though bad temper, impatience, and dictation may be substituted for frivolity, vanity and ambition, — yet, on the whole, the change begets a manifest improvement. The selfishness of society becomes converted into the affection of home, and everybody gains by the transposition; for the modifications induced by it are perceptible, not only in the woman herself, but also in those upon whom she works. The soothing, improving influences which we usually attribute to women are exercised in such strength around the firesides of France that their frequent absence in the world outside is partially compensated by their general presence indoors.

Indoors the Frenchwoman exhibits a rare capacity for becoming the faithful friend, the active companion, the true helpmate and guide. Indoors she shows how thoroughly she understands the active partnership of marriage; how effectively she can practise the duties which result from keenly-felt associations and from common responsibilities. Indoors the calculating woman of the world almost always disappears; in most cases the daughter, wife, and mother stand forward in completeness. The home ties, the home tendernesses, efface all outside thoughts. It is within her own walls that the Frenchwoman is, most of all, herself.

And this home power is not limited to one class. Unlike the social influence of women, it is found from top to bottom of the ladder, — in cottages as in châteaux — in shops as in salons — amongst workwomen as amongst ladies; and the miscellaneousness of its actions is proved by the almost total absence of brutality and ruffianism in the lowest of the men. The intimate bond which holds French families together is no monopoly of a rank or a place — is a universal property of the nation; and in stimulating the vigor of that bond — for, in a different fashion, there is stimulation indoors as well as without — the women render the very highest of all the services of which women are capable. In the capacity of exciting as well as attaching — of rendering home bright as well as sweet — of increasing the value of home duties by decorating them with attractions — lies one of the most enviable faculties of the Frenchwoman; for by its aid the charm of home life can be carried to a higher wealth of national productiveness than seems to be attainable by any other system yet applied.

All this is the work of women. They are often well aided by the men; but the true merit is attributable to the women alone. They have had the sense to perceive that their home action should not be limited to the placid discharge of moral functions and of regulated proprieties. They have recognized that, in addition to that element of their labor, they have also to brighten life around them; that they have not only to aid men to do their duty, but to help them to be content while they are doing it.

It is in this fashion, and by this agency, that the singular development of the family tie, which is so marked a feature of French life, has been attained; that the extreme personal attachment which usually joins together the members of the same kindred has been generated.

The action of these influences on the nation at large has been to provoke remarkable reverence for authority in families. It has inclined the young and old to live together; it maintains a willing respect from children to their parents. Rebellion against the elders is very rare in France; they are, on the contrary, habitually surrounded by an earnest and unweakening deference, so feminine in its tenderness that, though it is exhibited equally by both men and women, it is, manifestly and unmistakably, a product manufactured by the latter alone. No man could have originated such gentle, loving veneration as we see bestowed upon the old in many of the homes of France. In this, again, no class distinctions are discoverable; the disposition to honor the grey hairs of the house seems to be inherent throughout the land.

This attitude towards ancestors is, however, only one of the many shapes in which the frank, cordial acceptance of home obligations is exhibited in France; it supplies only one example of the eagerness of the people to try to render pleasant and attractive every home duty which they have to perform. In varying degrees and fashions nearly every other indoor liability is

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd discharged by them with the same successfully-worked-up surrounding of welcomeness, with the same will to facilitate its execution by ornamenting it.

The skill of the women shows itself in this in all its creative and productive force; and certainly it would be difficult to conceive any more useful end to which it could possibly be directed than that of luring on successive generations to fulfil the responsibilities of kinsmanship as if they were pleasures. It is not always easy to love all one's relations; but the French manage to do it habitually, as if it were the most natural and the most delightful process to which they could possibly be subjected. Aunts, uncles, and cousinhood to the third degree, come in for fondness; neither ugliness nor stupidity deprives them of it; for everybody seems to regard the offering of it not only as an inherited necessity, but as a delectable operation. As for children, the entire nation lives to cherish them; nowhere is the love of them carried to such extremes as in France; but as that particular element of the subject has been discussed here on a former occasion, it may be omitted now.

The other influences exercised indoors by Frenchwomen seem limited and dwarfed, comparatively, by the side of those which have just been indicated. Their great essential work is one of affection; their great object is to intensify home attachments; the rest counts as little. Intellectually, they cannot be said to generally produce any striking effects on the members of their families; on the contrary, they appear to reserve the greater part of the action of their intelligence for the world outside. Their home labors are so concentrated on the cultivation of flowers of the heart, that the ripening of fruits of the head is, relatively, a neglected procedure. And furthermore, as a general rule, the Frenchwoman is rarely a good or a willing teacher in the ordinary educational sense of the word; she unconsciously guides by the accidents of contact, but she hates to give ostensible lessons. Of course there are exceptions to this rule; but those exceptions are rare.

Regarded as a whole composed of two parts, the influence of the women of France can scarcely be considered, in either of its divisions, as producing entirely satisfactory results. In one direction it develops the head and weakens the heart; in the other, it works almost entirely by the heart and neglects the head. In neither does it combine all the powers of our nature; in neither does it seek to attain the great results which might be effected by the union of those powers in equal force.

Out of doors it assumes one form; indoors it takes another: but both are incomplete, for each wants what the other possesses. There is no majesty, no loftiness in the issue either way. It is amusing, or it is tender; but it is not grand. It is charming to the stranger; it is dear to the Frenchman: but to neither of them is it a real teaching, elevating, ennobling force.

From Chambers' Journal.

CHANGE-RINGING.

The frequent allusions to bells by our poets are directly conclusive to the strong attachment which binds these sounds to English ears. We all delight in listening to the merry peal, and yet notwithstanding our fondness for the same, and although all our days of rejoicing are considered incomplete without the ringing of bells, it is strange how very little is understood either of the art or science of what is termed change-ringing.

Ringing bells in changes is peculiar to England. When rung thus, the bells are necessarily rung "up;" that is, each bell, by an arrangement of wheel and rope, is gradually swung until, after describing larger and larger arcs, it swings through a complete circle at each sound or stroke of the clapper. The swinging motion also materially increases the sweetness of the tone. When bells are rung in changes, each bell is brought to a balance after each revolution; and when the bell "runs" well, very little actual strength is required, and the work, unless prolonged, is not so exhaustive as many suppose. In this as in many other things, it is more "knack" than strength that is required. The tenor bell of the ring of twelve at St. Saviour's, Southwark, weighs fifty-two hundredweight; and the wheel, in the grooves of which the rope for ringing it runs, is about nine feet in diameter; yet this ponderous bell with its huge gearing has often been rung by one man for four hours without rest, involving more than five thousand changes; and was once rung for six and a half hours by one man. This, however, was a great feat.

A number of bells hung together is called a "ring," the number generally varying from five to a dozen, which last is

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the greatest number that has yet been hung in a steeple. When the highest note — the treble bell — is sounded first, and followed by the consecutive notes until the deepest or "tenor" bell is struck, the bells are said to be rung in "rounds." And it is worthy of remark that this is the order in which they are rung before "going off" into changes, and again on "coming round."

Those uninitiated in the mysteries of bell-ringing will be surprised to learn that on six bells no fewer than 720 changes can be obtained; that is, the six numbers can be arranged in 720 distinct combinations. The addition of another bell increases the combination to 5,040; while on eight bells the enormous number of 40,320 changes may be obtained. As about twenty-eight changes are rung per minute, it takes about three hours to accomplish the whole of the changes on seven bells; and thus to ring five thousand changes is considered a feat, and called a "peal;" any less number being merely a "touch." When changes are rung on seven, nine, or eleven bells, all the eight, ten, or twelve bells are rung, the tenor bell — the key-note — always striking last; this practice is more musical than when the whole number of the bells are working in the changes. Change-ringing upon each number of bells has a distinctive name; thus changes on five bells are called doubles; on six, minor; seven, triples; eight, major; nine, cators; ten, royal; eleven, cinques; and twelve, maximus.

Changes are produced according to certain laws or "methods;" and by a previously acquired knowledge of the methods, each performer, by watching the rise and fall of the ropes, is able to work his bell in the same path in which it would be found to move if the changes were written down on paper. There are several different methods which are practised — namely, Plain Bob, Grandsire, Oxford or Kent Treble Bob, Stedman's Principle, Cambridge, London and Superlative Surprise, and Double Norwich Court. These can all be applied to the different numbers of bells. Thus a touch of Kent Treble Bob Major is that method rung on eight bells.

Although very few persons could possibly be debarred from practising change-ringing by want of physical strength, a good deal of perseverance is necessary to become a proficient in the art. After acquiring the sleight of hand necessary to ring a bell in rounds, a fair amount of practice is also necessary to obtain the quickness of eye — called "rope-sight" — to work among the other ropes, in changes. While his hands and eyes are thus busily employed, the ringer must also listen to ascertain whether the swing of the bell is so regulated that it strikes at a proper interval after the one immediately preceding it. In ringing on eight bells the eight sounds are produced in about two seconds; a quarter of a second therefore elapses between the sounds of the consecutive bells; and as a variation of a quarter of this time is appreciable to a practised ringer, the error of the sixteenth part of a second would lead to jarring results. The hands, eyes, and ears must therefore be in constant unison during change-ringing; and as at the same time the mind must never be relaxed from the consideration of the "method by which the changes are produced," the mental and physical powers are kept in pretty active employment.

The fascination which this art has for its followers is shown by the fact that all the great performances in ringing have been undertaken solely for the honor accorded to such feats. When a peal of five thousand changes is attempted, it is considered of no account unless it is "true." The requirements are somewhat exacting. If the same change should occur twice, through an error of the composer, it is a "false" peal. The ringing must be completed without a stop or hitch; and as at any time during the three hours that will probably be occupied, a ringer may lose his way, and cause the others to be confused, a "jumble out" will probably ensue; the conductor may miss a "call," which is required to carry the changes to the length required, or may make one too many; a man may miss his rope and send his bell over the balance; or a rope may break. Thus until the last change of a peal is struck, it is never safe for the ringers to congratulate themselves upon its performance.

Nowadays long peals are only considered as feats when the same men — only one man to each bell — ring throughout the peal. When a peal of great length is attempted there is, therefore, cause to fear that at the last moment one of the men at the "heavy end," as the bells near the tenor are called, may knock up. For instance, in ringing according to Stedman's principle — a very complicated method, on eleven bells — the peal of 7,392 changes rung in 1848 in four hours and fifty-five minutes at St. Martin's, Birmingham, where the tenor bell weighs thirty-five hundredweight, continued the "longest on

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

record" until 1851, when it was beaten by the College Youths, a very old-established London society of ringers, who rang 7,524 changes in five hours and twenty-four minutes at St. Giles', Cripplegate, where the tenor weighs thirty-six hundredweight. The Cumberland Youths, another old London society, thereupon tried to beat this performance by ringing 8,184 changes at St Michael's, Cornhill, the tenor of which ring weighs forty-one hundredweight. On the first occasion they "jumbled out" after ringing nearly six thousand changes; and at a subsequent attempt rang six hours and two minutes, but were then so knocked up that they could not finish the peal, and were compelled to stop when they had rung 7,746 changes. Now, although this was longer than the peal rung by the College Youths, it was an incomplete performance, not being continued until the bells returned to the order of rounds, which they would have done at the 8,184th change. The Cripplegate peal was at last beaten by a peal of 8,448 changes, rung in 1858, at Painswick in Gloucestershire. Although the tenor of the ring of twelve at Painswick only weighs twenty-eight hundredweight, the College Youths actually attempted to beat this length at St. Saviour's, Southwark, where the tenor weighs fifty-two hundredweight. They were, however, unsuccessful, as after ringing over eight thousand changes in six hours and a half, they got into a "jumble," and thus a most remarkable feat was lost, and considered of no account, when another half-hour would have completed a performance which might never have been excelled. In their next attempt the College Youths were more fortunate, as on April 27, 1861, they rang at St. Michael's, Cornhill, in six hours and forty-one minutes, a peal of 8,580 changes of Stedman's cinques, which still remains the longest length rung in this method on eleven bells.

The College and Cumberland Youths have long been worthy rivals in the different mysteries of change-ringing. While the former society dates its origin back to 1637, the latter claims its descent from an old society called the "London Scholars," whose origin, however, is lost in antiquity. The earliest known peal by the London Scholars is one of 5,040 changes, rung in 1717, on the ten bells which were then in the tower of St. Bride's, Fleet Street. This is said to have been the first five thousand ever rung on ten bells.

The rivalry between the societies of College and Cumberland Youths was at its greatest height in 1777. On January 20th, in that year, the Cumberlands rang 6,240 changes on the bells at St. Leonard's, Shoreditch. This was the longest which had been rung on ten bells by ten men only, and occupied four hours and thirty-four minutes. The tenor bell of St. Leonard's weighs thirty-one hundredweight; and as in ringing these 6,240 changes, the ringer would never be in a state of rest, as during nearly five hours he would cause a revolving plaything of over a ton and a half to make 6,240 revolutions, it might be supposed that no set of men could easily be found who would be desirous of gaining the empty honor of merely exceeding such a performance by so many more hours or minutes. This, however, was not the opinion of the College Youths, who, on February 18th, in the same year, on the same bells, completed a peal of 10,000 changes in seven hours and twenty-eight minutes. After this the Cumberlands evidently took a little preliminary training on the bells of Shoreditch, as on March 12th they rang 5,080 changes; on April 5th, 8,120 changes; and then on May 10th capped the College Youths' performance by a peal of 10,200 changes in seven hours and forty minutes. The non-university college men were, however, equal to the occasion, and nine days afterwards rang 11,080 changes at the same place in eight hours and two minutes; a performance so extraordinary, that the Cumberland Youths were fain to let it stand as the longest on record until 1784, when, on March 27th, they actually accomplished, at Shoreditch, 12,000 changes in nine hours and five minutes; which peal until this day remains the longest ever rung on ten bells, when all the bells are rung in the changes.

It might be thought that such prolonged physical and mental exertion would have a bad effect upon the performers; but, whether it is from the fact that only men of the strongest constitutions take a fancy for such exertion, or that the splendid exercise of ringing is, even when carried to such great excess, really productive of benefit, it yet remains a fact that ringers are noted for the great ages to which some of them live to take part in their favorite exercise. As an instance of longevity, the case of Thomas Barham is especially noteworthy. This man was a gardener at Leeds, in Kent, was passionately fond of ringing, and during his lifetime rang in considerably over one hundred peals, each of five thousand changes and upwards. He was born in 1725, and

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd died in 1818, aged ninety-three years. At that time, in ringing long peals it was not regarded as a strict rule that there should be no relief to the performers, or that, as now, each bell should be rung throughout the peal by the same man; consequently there does not seem to have been any ordinary limit to the aspirations of the ringers of those days.

About 1750, Barham and his companions were endeavoring to achieve the extent of the changes on eight bells (40,320 changes), any man who was fatigued being relieved by some other ringer. In one of these attempts, on Monday, March 31, 1755, they commenced ringing at two o'clock in the afternoon, and rang until six o'clock on the Tuesday morning, when the sixth bell-clapper broke, after they had rung 24,800 changes. In this attempt, Barham rang the seventh bell for fourteen hours and forty-four minutes before he required to be relieved. On March 23, 1761, they again attempted it, but had the misfortune to overturn a bell after ringing seventeen thousand changes; but on April 7th and 8th in the same year, they are said to have accomplished the 40,320 changes in twenty-seven hours, the eight bells being manned at different times by fourteen men.

The most remarkable of the records which Barham left behind him were perhaps the "Veteran" peals in which he took part. When fifty-five years of age, he rang in a peal of 5,040 changes of Bob Major, occupying three hours and thirteen minutes, when the average age of the eight performers was sixty-one years. In another peal which occupied three hours and twelve minutes, the ages of the performers were 82, 70, 77, 65, 70, 65, 67, and 86; making an average of nearly seventy-three years. Barham also rang in peals occupying over three hours, when eighty-four and eighty-eight years of age. In Barham's case, it is thus fully shewn that the extraordinary performances he took part in did not in any way tend to disable him in his old age. Southey, in his "Doctor," mentions a peal of Bob Major rung at Aston Church, near Birmingham, in the year 1796 — but really in 1789 — when eight men, some of whom he mentions were under twenty years of age, rang 14,224 changes in eight hours and forty-five minutes. This, Southey remarks, "was the longest peal ever rung in that part of the country or anywhere else." Certainly it was a very clever performance, considering that the tenor of the ring weighs twenty-one hundredweight; but it was really surpassed by a rival band of ringers, who rang at the same church on October 1, 1793, a peal of 15,360 changes of Bob Major in nine hours and thirty-one minutes. This continued the greatest number of changes rung single-handed until 1868, when the College Youths rang 15,840 changes in nine hours and twelve minutes at St. Matthew's, Bethnal Green. The tenor, however, at Bethnal Green is very much lighter than that of the Aston peal, and the latter still remains the longest length rung with such a heavy tenor, and in point of time exceeds the Bethnal Green performance by nineteen minutes.

So little is known about bell-ringing, that erroneous illustrations are prepared by even the best of our illustrated papers, at Christmas-time, and not a little faulty information regarding the modus operandi is added. Very few persons seem to be aware that many matters of practical and scientific interest are to be found in the almost unknown art of change-ringing.

From The Spectator.

OUR IRRESPONSIBLE AMBASSADORS.

WE wish it were possible to bring home to the proprietors of English journals the responsibility now falling on them for the selection and guidance of their foreign correspondents. Day by day, almost hour by hour, the importance of these agents increases, while we see no increase either in their ability or their habit of self-restraint. The position of Englishmen in respect to the control of their foreign policy is just now very perplexing, not to say disheartening. They have abandoned to an immense extent the old practice of leaving politics to a few experts and the responsible chiefs of the two great parties. They have not adopted the American practice of leaving the ultimate decision almost entirely to the president, and following his lead as if it were that of the people,—a policy which saved them from war in the Mason and Slidell case. Nor have they quite accepted the democratic idea — never, that we know of, acted on anywhere — that they should themselves directly regulate their own foreign affairs, as they do, for example, their taxation. The power of the House of Commons is now too great in England and the sway of the constituencies over the House too permanent for any of these courses, and a middle plan has been adopted which has most serious disadvantages. The official

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

opposition leaves foreign questions almost exclusively to the government, fearing to embarrass negotiation, but the people of both parties continually and determinedly press on them immature or ignorant ideas of their own. As Sir Stafford Northcote hinted on Saturday, government is told how to dot its "i's" and cross its "t's," till the transaction of delicate business becomes nearly impossible. Irresponsible members on both sides, sometimes with considerable groups behind them, rise to question, to urge, to worry, till but for the respect still paid to stereotyped declarations about the public interest in secrecy, the Cabinet could hardly move at all, and is perpetually obliged to consult opinions which are not its own. The fleet, for example, is moved quite as much to conciliate support as to carry out a policy. This tendency has, of course, enormously increased the power of the unofficial ambassadors, who now report daily and publicly to the people. Owing to circumstances of which we have occasionally spoken, the press in London is becoming a separate and very extraordinary institution, quite unlike any other existing in the world. No press, strictly speaking, has grown up in this vast capital, but five or six journals, controlled and for the most part guided by an excessively limited number of persons — certainly not a full score — have attained an unequalled development. For their purposes, they have unlimited means, they spend them very freely, and they protect themselves effectually from dangerous competition. They are, as far as regards foreign politics, the public opinion of London. Their agents in foreign capitals are almost as well known as the ministers of smaller states, and for certain purposes and in certain crises are much more important. Governments, embassies, leaders of parties study them, make use of them, and we are afraid very often deceive them; and the reports they send home are studied occasionally with passionate interest by a whole people. They do not, it is true, quite control opinion. Readers wait to see whether responsible Parliamentary leaders will confirm their statements, or deny them, as entirely or partially inaccurate. They exercise, however, a powerful initative in forming public opinion, they always catch the public ear first; and if they are incapable, or fanatic, or dishonest, they can do an infinity of mischief, more especially when they happen to differ with the government as to the importance of an incident. Then they raise the suspicion that government is yielding, and create an angry condition of opinion which renders it most difficult, sometimes almost impossible, for government to act freely. Take, for instance, the melancholy case of the embarkation of the Russian guard at Buyukdere.

One correspondent believed, or was told, or assumed a belief, that this embarcation was preliminary to one of the most astounding acts of treason on record,— the seizure by a power which had just signed a treaty, of forts belonging to its submissive adversary, which, if occupied, would secure advantages equivalent to the occupation of the capital. Instantly a whole country is in commotion, the funds recede, and there is a general expectation of war. So powerful is the impact of such a statement, that but for its prompt denial by other correspondents, it might have been impossible to prevent resolutions which would have rendered war inevitable. It is not too much to say that if four or five correspondents had combined, the policy of half the statesmen of Europe might have been overturned, and the world once more visited with that most grave of calamities, a European war without a defined object. It is difficult to exaggerate the influence of men in such a position, or the importance which attaches to their careful selection and their guidance, and the country has no guarantee for either,— for their ability, for their information, or even for their good-faith. They may be in the hands of parties, may be men with a habit of credulity, may even be men with personal and private ends of their own at variance with their reporting duty. There is not the slightest security for them, while they can affect the whole world. It is, we believe, strictly true to say that for ten years the whole position of this great country has been affected by the letters forwarded home by the Times' American correspondent during the Civil War, — letters written by a man whose good intentions were never suspected, but who sympathized so far with the South, or with English sympathy with the South, that he could not see which way the struggle would go, or what its inner meanings were. To the lasting injury of the country, therefore, the Times went Southern and with it the whole upper and middle class. We confess, recollecting that incident, and perceiving, as we perceive day by day, how under a Tory government the democratic influence over foreign policy increases, we cannot look around us with any feeling of reassurance. The popular Foreign Office seems to us most indiffer-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

ently served. There are men of great ability in it, and men of great information, but the total effect of their work is not to instruct, not to supply grounds to the people for a judicial decision. We rarely, if ever, see a letter the visible intention of which is to pour white light upon the facts. Half, at least, of the intelligence from Constantinople, to begin with, is deceptive, the mere reflection of the opinions of men who either report the idlest rumors, or are deliberately deceptive, or, as their rivals affirm, think accuracy nothing in comparison with particular political ends. No doubt that is true occasionally, and in great crises, of State envoys also. The legations do not always believe each other, even to the extent of accepting as accurate positive statements of fact. Prince Bismarck has just stated publicly that in 1866 he did not believe one word any Austrian diplomatist said to him. But then the diplomatists know one another; they are trained to discount what they hear; they are suspicious by habit, and by a tradition still fearfully effective. The people are not. They have no means of knowing who is reporting to them; their tradition is to believe, not to suspect, and they are, like every other mass of persons, almost incurably credulous. The necessity for protecting them, therefore, is as great as the necessity for protecting children, or rather, for protecting the blind. It seems to us positively as shameful to allow a correspondent invested with powers like these to deceive the public, even through wholly unconscious defects of character, as to teach a blind man's dog to lead his master astray. The slightest approach to a doubtful statement on important affairs ought to be visited by the conductors of the journals as a breach of duty to the work, a high moral offence, a sort of treason to the country, which, after all, pays the popular envoys, as directly as it pays the members of the legations.

It is so nearly impossible for outsiders to know who is to blame for false reports, that we carefully abstain from pointing our remarks by individual references. Hardly any correspondent in Europe would decline to forward a statement which he wished to believe, and which his ambassador clearly trusted, and very few indeed would fail to be greatly impressed with the views poured into them by really important personages. The division of responsibility between informant and correspondent is almost too subtle for analysis; and the responsibility of the editor, though it exists, is not yet fully acknowledged. But we have no hesitation whatever in saying that in the face of the new standing obtained by foreign correspondents, the new influence they are obtaining over policy, and the new relations they are assuming towards all foreign governments, the anonymous ought to disappear. Ambassadors misunderstand and misrepresent, and occasionally, it is asserted, make deliberate mistatements, but at least they put their names to them. We know who they are, we know what their careers have been, and we can insist on holding their chiefs responsible for their assertions. If Mr. Layard recklessly credits stories of Mr. Gladstone, or Count Beust is eloquent on Austria's devotion to England, or Count Schouvadoff declares that his government wants nothing in this world, we know exactly who the speaker is, what he desires, and how far it is probable that he is acting under orders. In the case of the popular ambassador, we do not know even this much, have no means of deciding whether the man who says the Russians have eaten British babies, or the man who says English babies are always Russian pets, is the more likely to know, or the more worthy to be trusted. That is an unsafe position, and until it is altered, all readers ought to load with responsibility the conductors of journals whose correspondents make serious statements discovered afterwards to be false.

From The Spectator.

THE LOSS OF THE "EURYDICE."

THERE is reason for sorrow at the loss oi the "Eurydice," the beautiful ship, and the trained officers, and the three hundred men or more, so young and so hopeful, for the loss is as great as the misery inflicted, and both are very great. And it is difficult not to be shocked as well as sorrowful at such an illustration of the irony occasionally discernible in the ways of Providence, all in the ship being condemned to a dreadful death in the very hour, so to speak, of success, when she had completed her voyage and returned home, and arrived almost in sight of port, and all on board were full of expectation and cheerfulness, and even glee; one promising officer, for instance, was hurrying to meet his young wife, married to him but a twelvemonth before, under circumstances that promised both a long lease of

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

happiness. We can see, however, no reason for irritation, either with the Admiralty, or the builder of the ship, or the captain of the vessel, though the latter was doubtless actually responsible. Rather, the loss of the "Eurydice" appears to us one of those cases which should teach the public with a certain sternness that in this world arrangements cannot be made perfect; that we may strive as we like for an ideal of efficiency, but that after all, all we can obtain is a rough approximation. That disturbing cause, that unforeseen but irresistible factor which we call Providence, and some call chance, can never be completely provided against, more especially when one of the agents to be controlled is anything so uncontrollable as the human mind. There never was an accident which ought so little to have happened. The "Eurydice," by the testimony of all experts, was an excellent vessel, trusted by all on board, which had just made a voyage to the West Indies, and which, so far as appears, had not a weak spar or a frayed rope on board. She was, as a training-ship, over-manned, if anything, with men whose training was just completed, and in the very prime of their health and their efficieney. Her officers were all of them picked men, one or two of them likely to become among the best in the service; and her captain, Captain Marcus Hare, had the best of characters in the navy. He was on deck, attending to his duty, and during the few moments between the catastrophe and his death gave his orders coolly, courageously, and as the evidence would indicate, wisely also. There is a hint in the evidence that the water carried on board had been used to supplement deficient ballast, and that the tanks had not been carefully refilled as they were emptied, a dangerous practice, both because it lightens the ship too fast, and unequally, and because, if the vessel once loses her equilibrium, the remaining full tanks roll with the weight of cannon, and especially dangerous to the "Eurydice," which was remarkable in the navy for the amount of sail she could spread; but with this exception, there was nothing about the ship to suggest or account for her fate. That the captain was at the last moment slightly careless or over-confident is probably true. The barometer had been falling for some hours, all the ports of the ship were open, as, with such a condition of the mercury, they ought not to have been; and the ship was carrying, for such weather as science indicated, far too much sail. The probability is that the captain, joyous at the notion of getting home, elated with the bright, cold weather — first of luxuries to a man just returning from the tropics — and the sun, which shone brightly just before and just after the squall, and with his destination almost in sight, had been careless in consulting the glass, or expected a mere snow-storm, or thought Spithead too near for precautions, and in that carelessness of an hour was his own and his vessel's doom. The mental failure for which no orders or precautions can provide had supervened, and the Admiralty and its jealous care were as powerless as the ship herself. The squall, coming down Luccombe Chine as through a funnel, struck the "Eurydice," and as Wilson sang,—

Many ports will exult at the gleam of her mast —
Hush, hush, thou vain dreamer! this hour is her last.
Five hundred souls in one instant of dread
Are hurried o'er the deck;
And fast the miserable ship
Becomes a lifeless wreck.

. . . .

Oh! many a dream was in the ship
An hour before her death;
And sights of home with sighs disturbed
The sleepers' long-drawn breath.
Instead of the murmur of the sea
The sailor heard the humming tree,
Alive through all its leaves,
The hum of the spreading sycamore
That grows before his cottage-door,
And the swallow's song in the eaves.
His arm enclosed a blooming boy,
Who listened with tears of sorrow and joy
To the dangers his father had passed;
And his wife — by turns she wept and smiled,
As she looked on the father of her child
Returned to her heart at last.
He wakes at the vessel's sudden roll,
And the rush of waters is in his soul.
Astounded the reeling deck he paces,
Mid hurrying forms and ghastly faces.

What possible fever of anxiety on the part of the Admiralty, what multiplication of orders, what energy in fitting ships can prevent such an accident as that? The captain had barometers enough. He knew what his ship could do. He knew what sail she was carrying, for he was trying to lessen it when the "Eurydice" capsized; and he had an excellent crew; and still, because of an inattention, a miscalculation, an emotion of eagerness, usually as unimportant as a passing thought, he and his men went down as hopelessly in the snow-storm as if they had been struck by a typhoon in the China Seas. The force of a squall of this kind, its direct impact,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

is almost inconceivable to those who have not witnessed it. The writer was once in the Red Sea during an incident of the kind. The day was apparently quite fine, when a squall coming from the east, through the aperture between Sinai and Horeb, struck the giant steamer, and though she was of more than three thousand tons, and moving at ten miles an hour, she was thrown on her side, and but for the immense momentum from her engines would have been utterly lost. We have somewhere also, but cannot find, an account of a squall which struck a railway train in New Jersey, and though it was moving, as the drivers declared, at twenty miles an hour, blew it from the rails, a feat which seems, of all incidents that ever occurred through the agency of wind alone — as a rule, when heavy bodies are lifted and deposited far off, there is water, with its unyielding pressure, to help — to be the most impossible. There is practically no one to blame, and no conceivable human method of preventing such catastrophes entirely. There is no substitute for the human mind, and no plan of making the human mind equally efficient, cautious, and decided at all seasons and under all circumstances. Captain Hare's mistake may have been the most accidental thing in the world, and of all human beings he had most to protect him from making it.

It is just the same in all human affairs, and the law is just as often forgotten. In the storm of comment which the modern critical spirit flings upon all occurrences, we forget the limitations of our powers. Make what laws we will, and occasionally they will be harsh, and often inapplicable. Construct what tribunals we will, and the judge will now and again be prejudiced, or tired, or sleepy, the leading juryman stupid, or the counsel forgetful of his duty. Relax punishment as you will, and sometimes it will fall too heavily, or fall upon the innocent. Abolish the penalty of death, and the sentence may kill as certainly as the guillotine; graduate sentences to imbecility, and no two inflicted for the same crime will ever fall with equal weight; elaborate trials till human patience is overborne, and still perjury will sometimes be successful. All that human beings can obtain by the most unrelaxing effort, and patience, and attention to duty is an approximation to justice, which to beings a little higher, who can see facts, but not motives, must often appear a mockery of fair play. It is a limit put upon us by nature or by God, and we shall not get past it. Arthur Helps was not always profound, but it was a profound thought of his that if the object of the arrangements of the universe was to make man happy, he would have been gifted with at least five minutes' foresight. He will never get one minute, and if he had it, the limit would be but imperceptibly pushed back. Sir Arthur Helps's minute would not have saved the "Eurydice" or her crew.

We have often wished exceedingly that this notion of the occasional necessity of accepting an approximation to the ideal could be made to take a stronger hold in the popular mind. It would create much content, and would prevent much shiftiness in our politics. It is quite hopeless to expect that a reform, or a new constitution, or a war can produce, or be made to produce, all the results expected from them, — as hopeless as to look for an Admiralty whose ships will never be lost. The influence of mind must enter into every human concern, and where mind is present, the mathematical ideal cannot reasonably be hoped for. Some one will always err, whether from incapacity, or vice, or negligence, and the error upsets often half the calculation. All that the politician can do is to fix principles as accurately as possible, to select the best men he can get, to furnish all necessary means, and then to await the result as confidently or as submissively as he can. At the last moment, all his precautions may fail, or his whole plan be overthrown, by a squall as sudden and as unexpected as that which proved fatal to the unfortunate "Eurydice."

From The Spectator.

THE DOMESTIC SPHINX.

COMPARED to a cat, a dog is a very simple and transparent creature. Sometimes, indeed, he is guilty of acts of deception and hypocrisy, but they are crude and ingenuous compared to the unfathomable wiles of a cat. Mr. North's dog, for instance, who ate the pigeon out of the pie and stuffed up the hole with Mr. North's ink-sponge, was not an adept in the art of theft; and a fox-terrier with whom the present writer enjoys the intimacy of a common household has disgraced herself this last week by what was, to all intents and purposes, a lie, when a little more astuteness would have shown her the futility of falsehood, in the face of an alibi. She had been tearing up paper and strew-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ing it about the floor, with fine literary freedom, when the servant whose duty it was to clean the carpet asked her, with magisterial severity, "Who tore those letters?" The culprit looked at first terribly abashed, and hung her head and tail in expectation of chastisement, till her mistress, as a trial, observed, "I wonder did Gyp do it?" (Gyp being the offender's usual companion and fellow-sinner, but as it chanced, two hundred miles off at the moment.) Instantly the perfidious little wretch perceived a way of escape from the penalty of her own misdeeds, by throwing the blame on her friend, and looking up briskly, shook her tail frantically, and almost nodded, "You are right. It was that wicked Gyp! As for me, I am quite incapable of touching a piece of paper."

It is as useless for a dog to attempt these deceptions as for a good honest Englishman to profit by the counsels of Macchiavelli. But the case is quite different with a cat. She is a domestic sphinx, — whose countenance is solemn as that of her stony prototype who has gazed for sixty centuries over the field of death at Ghiza, and whose tail is not, as George Eliot describes the tail of a dog, a "vehicle for the emotions," and never betrays her, except in the case of leonine rage. No philosopher, we are persuaded, ever yet got to the bottom of a cat's mind. She is a bête incomprise, for good and for evil. No one fathoms her implacable resentments, her deep, unspoken suspicions of her enemies, or her unalterable confidence and gratitude towards her friends. Few people attempt to study her; she is rarely even given a name (unless it be the banale and meaningless everlasting "Minnie"), but is spoken of, like a poor workhouse orphan by her surname, as "the cat," — or in the vocative, "Puss," — and treated a little better by one, a little worse by another, but rarely watched with any attention or sympathy, such as many of us bestow on our dogs. Yet there must be something really profound in a cat's feelings, since there are numberless instances on record where they have perished and died for grief at the loss of their masters or mistresses; and the following, which occurred last week, affords touching proof of a sentiment still more rare in any animal, — pure friendship. A correspondent writes to us: —

Colonel C——'s little black-and-tan pet dog "Flo" died last Monday morning about three o'clock. He had had her many years, and she had long had an internal complaint. She was a dear, little, affectionate, intelligent creature, and had always been treated as kindly as a child. He buried her in his garden, and over her little grave his housekeeper's children shed many tears. Yesterday I heard from him as follows: "Another of my domestic pets was an old black cat, which came to me a kitten years ago, a few weeks before I brought 'Flo' from Oxford. They grew up together, and were very fond of each other, eating from the same plate and drinking from the same glass. I have often seen them stand side by side before my fire, and occasionally put their mouths together, as though they were absolutely kissing. Well, the poor old cat seemed very miserable all day yesterday (that is, Monday, the day on which 'Flo' had died early in the morning), and we could not induce her to eat. She could not be found last night when the house was closed, but as this occasionally happened, not much was thought of it. This morning she was found stiff and cold, stretched out by the side of 'Flo's' grave! I could not have believed it, if I had not seen it with my own eyes. Whether it is only a coincidence, I will not pretend to say, but I would rather believe that the poor animal died from grief at the loss of her old friend. But if so, how did she know that 'Flo' was dead? Such a fact as this leads to strange thoughts, or what would be called strange, by those who can see in these creatures 'only a dog' or 'only a cat.'"

When we reflect on the amount of thought and tenderness of sentiment which this story reveals, does it not seem as if, in our usual treatment of cats, we must be stupidly ignoring something very wonderful and beautiful, close beside us all day long?

A more painful impression is the remembrance that on creatures like this have been heaped for ages back every sort of cruel treatment by thoughtless people, — by brutal boys, or wretches like the one convicted last week of skinning a cat alive; and, last and worst of all, by vivisectors, of whom one in London avowed to the Royal Commission that he had destroyed ninety poor animals in one series of painful experiments. Mere carelessness causes annually at the end of every London season the misery of multitudes of cats, left to starve when the owners of their homes go out of town. As a cat has proverbially "nine lives," and survives the most terrible hardships, the sufferings of many of them from this cause must be shockingly prolonged. A friend has described to us the case of a poor puss, which, in its starvation, poked its head through the bars of a cellar window, and being unable to withdraw it, remained in the trap for many days and nights, of course without food or water. At last somebody took heed of its moans,

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd and a blacksmith was sent for to loosen the bars. The cat obviously comprehended perfectly what was being done for her release, and when at last set free, literally leaped on the neck of a friendly cook, and expressed her gratitude and joy by such demonstrations as fairly drew tears from the witnesses of the little scene.

A century or two ago, the destiny of cats — especially of black ones, or of such as belonged to poor lonely old women who could possibly be suspected of witchcraft — was wretched and perilous indeed. No notion of mercy towards them seems to have occurred to anybody, even to men exercising judicial functions. We read that a woman was burnt alive in France for murdering some babies, and the mode of the execution was that she was put in a cage with fourteen cats over a fire, so that the animals in their agony should tear her while burning. Another story equally horrible appears, without a word of comment or reprobation, in a familiar letter of just two hundred years ago, in the Hatton correspondence. The writer describes a pageant of the period, performed in London in commemoration of the coronation of Queen Elizabeth. "There were," he says, "mighty bonfires, and the burning of a most costly pope, carried by four persons, and the effigies of two 'divells.'" The interior of the "pope" was filled with live cats, who "squalled most hideously as soon as they felt the fire," the people making the joke that it was the language of the pope and the devils!

Such were the amusements of that age to which a great living man of science looks back with sighs of regret, because people were not so "softly nurtured" then as we are now; and Queen Victoria only sends for artists to paint her animals, — unlike her predecessor, James I., who sent for physiologists to cut them up alive.

Holy Basil. — Dr. George Birdwood writes thus in the Academy: "The most sacred plant in the whole indigenous materia medica of India is the tulsi, or holy basil (Ocymum sanctum), sacred to Krishna, and called after the nymph Tulasi, beloved of Krishna, and turned by him into this graceful and most fragrant plant. She is, indeed, the Hindu Daphne. The plant is also sacred to Vishnu, whose followers wear necklaces and carry rosaries (used for counting the number of recitations of their deity's name), made of its stalks and roots. For its double sanctity it is reared in every Hindu house, where it is daily watered and worshipped by all the members of the household. No doubt also it was on account of its virtues in disinfecting and vivifying malarious air that it first became inseparable from Hindu houses in India as the protecting spirit or lar of the family. In the Deccan villages the fair Brahminee mother may be seen early every morning, after having first ground the corn for the day's bread, and performed her simple toilet, walking with glad steps and waving hands round and round the pot of holy basil planted on the four-horned altar built up before each house, invoking the blessings of Heaven on her husband and his children — praying, that is, for less carbonic acid, and ever more and more oxygen. The scene always carries one back in mind to the life of ancient Greece, which so often is found to still live in India, and is a perfect study at once in religion, in science, and in art."

"Survival of the Fittest." — The Medical Examiner has given an amusing illustration of Darwin's theory of "the survival of the fittest" in the expulsion of physicians from various parts of London. Darwin has pointed out not only that the strongest of the same species survive and develop, but that the stronger species has a tendency to destroy or drive away the weaker. At the West End of London the fashionable physicians have been gradually but ignominiously expelled from certain quarters by the not less fashionable tailors. Forty years ago Conduit Street was occupied by Sir Astley Cooper, and a few years later Dr. Elliotson and several other celebrities were to be consulted in that street, but the tailors gradually invaded the regions of Æsculapius, and now there is not a doctor in the street. The profession retired into George Street and Maddox Street, but the knights of the needle and thread have already invaded these streets, and the doctors are rapidly declining. Brook Street has been attacked, but still has an air of professional respectability. Grosvenor Street at present remains inviolate; but that portion of the medical profession which withdrew across Oxford Street to the more inaccessible regions adjoining Cavendish Square has been assailed, and Wimpole Street is now occupied by three hostile forces. Harley Street for the nonce is unpolluted, but we understand that the eminent ex-prime minister, who resides in that street, is "keeping his mind open" as to the possibility of the present occupants being driven "bag and baggage" out of the district. The territorial position of the leading consultants appears to be very precarious.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXII. | No. 1768.—May 4, 1878. | From Beginning, Vol. CXXXVII.

CONTENTS.

I. RUSSIA AND INDIA, ... Nineteenth Century, ... 259
II. WITHIN THE PRECINCTS. By Mrs. Oliphant. Part VI., ... Advance Sheets, ... 266
III. THE POLITICAL ADVENTURES OF LORD BEACONSFIELD, ... Fortnightly Review, ... 276
IV. ERICA. Conclusion. Translated for THE LIVING AGE, from the German of . . Frau von Ingersleben, ... 286
V. THE GOTHIC FRAGMENTS OF ULFILAS, . Macmillan's Magazine, . . . 300
VI. ÆS TRIPLEX, ... Cornhill Magazine, ... 307
VII. A RECOLLECTION OF THE INDIAN MUTINY. By Thomas Farquhar, ... Sunday at Home, ... 311
VIII. THE PLEASURES OF MEDIOCRITY, . . Saturday Review, ... 315
IX. A FEARFUL SWING, ... Chambers' Journal, ... 317
X. JAPANESE FANS, ... Chambers' Journal, ... 319

POETRY.

WHEN WE WERE CHILDREN, . . . 258
IRISH SONG, ... 258
LOVE'S CALENDAR, ... 258
"LEAD, KINDLY LIGHT," 258

MISCELLANY, ... 320

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY
LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

For EIGHT DOLLARS, remitted directly to the Publishers, the LIVING AGE will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of THE LIVING AGE is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of LITTELL & GAY.

Single Numbers of THE LIVING AGE, 18 cents.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

WHEN WE WERE CHILDREN.

HAVE you forgotten, little wife,
Our far-off childhood's golden life?
Our splendid castles on the sands,
The boat I made with my own hands,

The rain that caught us in the wood,
The cakes we had when we were good,
The doll I broke and made you cry,
When we were children, you and I?

Have you forgotten, little wife,
The dawning of that other life?
The strange new light the whole world wore,
When life love's perfect blossom bore?

The dreams we had, the songs we made,
The sunshine, and the woven shade,
The tears of many a sad good-bye,
When we were parted, you and I?

Ah, nay! your loving heart, I know,
Remembers still the long-ago;
It is the light of childhood's days
That shines through all your winning ways.

God grant we ne'er forget our youth,
Its innocence, and faith, and truth;
The smiles, the tears, and hopes gone by,
When we were children, you and I.

FREDERICK E. WEATHERLY.

Cassell's Magazine.

IRISH SONG.

ON Innisfallen's fairy isle,
Amid the blooming bushes,
We leant upon the lovers' stile,
And listened to the thrushes;
When first I sighed to see her smile,
And smiled to see her blushes.

Her hair was bright as beaten gold,
And soft as spider's spinning,
Her cheek outbloomed the apple old
That set our parents sinning,
And in her eyes you might behold
My joys and griefs beginning.

In Innisfallen's fairy grove
I hushed my happy wooing,
To listen to the brooding dove
Amid the branches cooing;
But oh! how short those hours of love,
How long their bitter rueing!

Poor cushat! thy complaining breast
With woe like mine is heaving.
With thee I mourn a fruitless quest;
For ah! with art deceiving
The cuckoo-bird has robbed my nest,
And left me wildly grieving.

THE AUTHOR OF "SONGS OF KILLARNEY."

Spectator.

LOVE'S CALENDAR.

A YOUNG year's freshness in the air,
A spring-tide color to the wood;
The flowers in spring-time most are fair,
And life in spring-time most is good;
For why? — I will not let you hear
Until the summer is a-near.

A summer all of burning lights
With crimson roses, passion red,
And moonlight for the hot, white nights,
And jasmine flowers, sweet, dew-fed.
Why has each rose a double scent?
You may divine when it is spent.

Autumn with shining yellow sheaves,
And garnered fruit; and half regret
To watch the dreary falling leaves
And eaden skies above them set;
And wny e'en autumn can seem dear
Perchance you'll guess, when winter's here.

Winter, in wide, snow-covered plains,
And drifting sleet, and piercing wind,
That chills the blood within our veins,
But our warm hearts can never find —
Ah, little love, you guess, I know,
What warms our hearts in spite of snow.

Argosy. E. NESBIT.

"LEAD, KINDLY LIGHT." *

DUC, alma Lux, circumstat umbra mundi,
Duc, alma Lux;
Est atra nox, mei jam vagabundi
Sis ergo dux:
Serva pedes, — non cupio longinqua
Videre; satis semita propinqua.

Non semper eram, ut nunc, doctus precari
Ductorem te, —
Magis me exploratorem gloriari:
Duc tamen me.
Præclara amabam, neque expers timorum
Regebam me: sis immemor actorum.

Tam diu præsens adfuit vocanti
Divina vox.
Sic erit vel per ima dubitanti
Dum fugit nox,
Et manè lucent nitidæ figuræ,
Notæ per annos, paullulum obscuræ.

Translated at sea, December, 1877. C. S. O.

Spectator.

* This bold attempt to render Dr. Newman's hymn in rhymed Latin stanzas, of the same number and the same number of lines as in the English original, is sent home to the translator's friends as the recreation of nights at sea by an English scholar on his way to the antipodes. Any old Oxford friends who may recognize the initials will feel the point and pathos added by the fact that news of the unlooked-for loss of a truly "nitida figura, nota per annos," which has darkened his home since he left it, is following him round the world. — J. O.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The Nineteenth Century.

RUSSIA AND INDIA.

THE supposed danger to our possession of India from the advance of Russia has now become an article of faith with a great many of our countrymen. Even that large proportion of them whose interest in Indian affairs is of such a vague sort that they would be puzzled to say in which hemisphere India is situated, and with whom central Asia is a geographical expression conveying no definite idea — even this class may be credited with a very real anxiety on the point. It must be admitted, moreover, that the sentiment is not confined to the ignorant, for many of those who are best informed on Asian affairs hold a strong opinion on the same side. Among Anglo-Indians themselves the alarmists would appear to be just now in a decided majority, and as they are presumably better acquainted with the subject than their fellow-countrymen at home, it may be thought that this fact affords a presumption for the reasonableness of the notion. But it must be remembered that India is a very dull country, and life there exceedingly monotonous, and in the absence of the forms of excitement available at home, frontier politics are naturally welcomed as some sort of substitute; nor should it be surprising if, in a society in which the military element largely predominates, the development of a state of feeling which would be likely to result in a spirited foreign policy should be regarded with toleration. On the other hand there are not wanting those who have access to the same facts whereon to form an opinion, who hold that our supremacy in India has nothing to fear from any attacks made against it in that quarter, even should they ever be attempted, and that, whatever cause England may have for jealousy of Russia in Europe, there is no real cause for alarm from her advances towards the East. The upholders of this view, it must be admitted, would probably be found in a minority, especially at the present time. But in order to arrive at a just verdict on the issue, it may be useful, instead of counting heads, to try and form a proper estimate of the real merits of the case.

The argument of the alarmists may be stated in a very few words. Russia is advancing by rapid strides in her dominion over the various countries of central Asia. The territories she has annexed so far are barren, profitless conquests; they can therefore only be a means to an end, which again can be nothing else but our Indian possessions, the rich goal to be reached after her long and weary pilgrimage. And what we have to expect is a repetition, some day or other, of what has happened already so often in the history of India, an invasion from the north-west frontier, with the object that has been so often achieved before, the conquest and permanent occupation of the country by the hardy and warlike races of central Asia. And the question which exercises a great many minds is, when and where shall we oppose ourselves to check and baffle this dangerous movement? Indeed opinions differ more about the best mode of meeting the danger than about the existence of the danger. Some are for awaiting the enemy within our frontier, and catching him as he debouches from the mountains; others denounce this as bad strategy, and would anticipate the invasion by going to meet the enemy beyond the frontier and occupying ourselves the strong ground which now intervenes between us. But by both sides the reality of the danger has been taken for granted.

In endeavoring to weigh properly the evidence for and against this notion, it must be admitted in the first place, in favor of the alarmist view, that the defence sometimes attempted to be set up in justification of Russian progress, from the supposed analogy of our own gradual occupation of India, fails under examination. The conquest of central Asia by Russia has resembled the conquest of India by the English in only the most superficial way. In our case this advance became a political necessity from the first day of our entering on the field of Indian politics, although the fact was not clearly discerned except by a few statesmen whose views were in advance of their times. Our frontier could never be secure till the natural frontier was reached of the Himalaya and the sea. And it was far more costly to guard our territories against the attacks of neighboring states than to occupy those states with our own troops, and extend the state of peace and settled government still further and further. At whatever point we halted in our advance, a fresh line confronted us of dangerous and hostile frontier, involving the need of large garrisons maintained in a state of constant watchfulness. On this account the policy of Lord Wellesley was essentially a policy of peace. He would have made internal wars impossible in India by occupying the whole country with British garrisons. And so the annexation of the Punjab was eminently conducive to peace, by transforming a warlike and dangerous neighbor, who needed that a large armament should be kept up to watch him, into a peaceful subject, and adding to the general revenues without increasing the charge of government. For this reason the ultimate extension of British dominion over the whole of India has been inevitable from the first. But no necessity on military or financial grounds impels Russia to advance. The petty states of central Asia, as each in succession finds itself her neighbor, offer her no threats, but, like the shipwrecked voyagers in the cave of Polyphemus, await trembling their turn for being swallowed up. But although Russia is not impelled to this continued advance by the needs of the military and financial situation, and, as some think, loses much more than she gains in both ways with every step she takes, not the less is her progress the result of necessity, but necessity rather of a moral than a material kind, and which must always arise whenever an organized government comes into contact with barbarous or uncivilized peoples. Between states thus differently constituted peace and good fellowship are, from the nature of the case, impossible; sooner or later cause of offence is given to the more civilized power, and the quarrel once set up is followed by one inevitable result. Even had it been against their interest instead of to their advantage to do so, the English would assuredly have established their supremacy throughout India in the long run, after they once made a beginning by occupying a portion of the country; and it is reasonable to believe that when once the Russians began to establish themselves in central Asia, their dominion must equally have gone on extending even if there had been no India at the end of the goal.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY · Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 · Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Yes, it may be replied, but then it so happens that India does lie at the end of the goal, which makes all the difference. True, but there is one consideration which, when the matter is discussed, seems usually to be left altogether out of sight. We are apt to forget, or rather we omit to note, how much the military position of Russia is weakened, how much less formidable she becomes, the further she advances to the east. We hear a great deal about her establishing a base at every point of conquest, from which to make the next advance, but in reality this merely means that a very long line is getting still longer and consequently weaker. So much has been said lately about the use of employing a large map when dealing with this subject, that probably a juster notion than was formerly prevalent now obtains of the enormous distances involved; but no map gives a complete view of the difficulties involved in maintaining a base of operations along the line in question, by reason of the physical obstacles to be encountered — the deserts, the mountains, the villanous climate, and the want of population. We are told, indeed, that it is only eight hundred miles, as the crow flies, from the Caspian to Tashkend, and five hundred more, bating deserts, from Tashkend to Merv, a fertile district where food is grown sufficient for an army; and Merv again being less than three hundred miles from Herat, while Herat is only six hundred from Peshawur, may be said to be next door to India. This insistence on the value of Merv, by the way, which is a very noticeable feature in the arguments referred to, is merely to say that food is to be got at some point of the line; if the whole country to be traversed were as devoid of resources as the greater part, then there would be an end of the matter — no army, small or large, could make use of it. But what the greater part is like any one can judge for himself by the accounts contained in such books as

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Burnes's "Bokhara," Wood's "Journey to the Oxus," Vambéry's "Travels," Schuyler's "Turkestan," and Burnaby's "Ride to Khiva." The two last-named works moreover bring out very clearly the fact that the Russian military establishments in these parts are so far on a very small scale, sufficient for their purpose of subduing the petty rulers of these regions, but utterly insignificant as a means for meeting on equal terms the military power of India, and that even these small establishments are maintained with difficulty in so poor a country.

Not a bad way of viewing the case is to put ourselves in the place of Russia, and discuss the feasibility of an advance in force towards the same regions. Kurrachee is less than a month's sail from England, over tranquil seas; so that this part of the distance is practically annihilated. From Kurrachee there will shortly be a railway up the Indus, from which it is only two hundred miles to Quettah, and Quettah again is only six hundred miles from Merv, where a British army would find abundant supplies. What therefore could be easier than an undertaking of this sort? Now at Merv we should be much nearer our base of operations than Russia would be to hers, and able to bring an overwhelming superiority of force. Yet we all know very well how such a scheme would be received by even the most pronounced advocates for anticipating Russian designs by a spirited policy. An advance to a point so distant from our base would be pronounced in the last degree foolhardy and rash, and on the score of expense alone beyond the range of practical consideration; and this by men who speak as if Russia had only to place a gunboat or two on the Caspian, or to lay down a railway over the steppes — a line which the climate will render extremely difficult to keep open in winter — to be master of the situation. We should be told, too, of the hostility that such an advance would excite among the various peoples whose territories we had to occupy; but is it not obvious that this enmity has already been incurred by Russia over a broad region of central Asia? With these races the power which brings them under subjection is of course their natural enemy; the one that holds aloof their natural ally. Heaven forbid that we should ever be compelled to act in alliance with such ruffians, to employ whom in war would be only one degree less revolting than to use Red Indians; still the fact remains that England need only hold up her hand to raise all central Asia upon Russia.

A good deal has been said about the supposed greater influence of Russia over the Persian government than we could exercise; whence it is argued that the resources of Persia, such as they are, could be used against us; but even among Orientals the ordinary motives which govern human nature find effect, and it is not reasonable to suppose that Persia, which sees her grasping neighbor extending her dominion on every side, should be in greater sympathy with Russia than with England, which she must know has no object to gain at her expense. And if, in the event of war, a diversion were made from India on the side of Persia, what would become of the attenuated line of Russian communications, reaching from the Caspian almost to the boundary of China? The truth appears to be, that Russia, so far from gaining power in the East, is really becoming weaker by each extension of her territory in that direction, while England becomes relatively stronger. The people who inhabit these regions have not as yet become amalgamated with the Russian empire, but are thoroughly hostile to it, and the country is held by purely military rule on a weak strategical line. Russia, by her occupation of this territory, has in effect given a mortgage for her good behavior which England, if necessary, could foreclose. It is Russia and not England which need fear a collision in this quarter, the effect of which would be to throw her back again for many a year.

The policy of the Russians themselves may, however, be brought up as an objection to this view of the case. If their position is so strategically weak, it may be asked, why do they occupy it? Besides, the Russians themselves make no secret of their aims and intentions.

The first of these objections has been to a certain extent anticipated by what has

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

gone before. In constantly advancing so far, Russia has practically been unable to help herself, but has been driven onwards by the necessary consequence of contact between two races in different stages of civilization. Her progress may be explained on this ground alone, without giving her credit for sinister motives. It must however be admitted, that even if the views of the Russian government on this head were moderate in themselves, they may often be but coldly responded to, or even opposed, by its agents. There is probably nothing more difficult for despotic governments than to secure obedience. Nor, if they could insure obedience, does it follow that they have a monopoly of wisdom; on the contrary, it is reasonable to believe that a despotic government may often fail to secure the best instruments for its service. In India, where no political or family considerations interfere to prevent the best choice being made, it yet often happens that dull men rise to high positions; under a government which lends itself to the full operation of favoritism, we may readily believe that the service of the State is often entrusted to very inefficient agents. And it is pertinent to ask whether Russia has lately shown any marks of being directed by special wisdom. It seems to be generally taken for granted that the late war is to tend to her advantage, but it may be permitted at least to express a doubt whether, next after Turkey, Russia will not be found to have been the greatest loser by the war, and whether, apart from any question of morality, her policy may not prove to have been highly injurious to her own interests, just as was the policy which led up to the Crimean war.

But then again it may be replied to this view that, admitting Russia is often shortsighted, and acts sometimes against her real interest, still that merely goes to prove the reality of the danger of Russian aggression. For that her plans may be likely to recoil on herself affords no reason why she should not try to carry them out. Are we not, however, dealing in fiction when we speak of there being such a thing as a definite and persistent Russian policy in these matters? It is easy to understand and believe in the reality of a national aspiration for unity, for example, or that of a people under a foreign yoke for liberty, and that a sentiment of this sort implanted in the national mind should be transmitted from one generation to another. But to suppose a bureaucratic government to be always continuously actuated by the desire to pursue a specific course of policy, and to be always persistently following it up, is to assume that such bodies are exempt from the ordinary failings to which mortals are liable. We may safely infer rather that so long as human beings vary, so long succeeding rulers will be likely to display differences of mood and character which must affect the policy of their governments, despotic rulers more than any; while among the agents of such governments there will surely be found all the phases of indecision, and vacillation, and imperfect execution, due to the various infirmities of human nature — a more than adequate share of the indolence and stupidity and vanity which clog so much of the world's business.

The gist of the argument here advanced is, then, that there is no sufficient evidence for crediting Russia with a definite policy which aims at ousting us out of our Indian possessions, her advance across central Asia being reasonably accounted for otherwise. And if it be said that, whatever be the policy of Russia, this is at least the undisguised aim of some of the agents of her government, it may be replied that, if this be so, any attempt to carry it out is likely to recoil upon herself. Just in proportion as she extends her long line of posts to the eastward through a hostile country, does her military position become the weaker; and if ever the two great powers do come into hostile contact, the nearer that point of contact is to India the greater in a military point of view will be our relative advantage. Lastly, it may not be out of place to point out, what our countrymen are too apt to leave out of sight when considering the matter, that, whatever may be their notion of the dangers to British interests involved in the extension of Russian dominion in the East, it is at any rate an unmixed good to the regions which have come under its sway. We may not have been led to form a very exalted estimate of Russian government, measured by the standard applied to the civilized administrations of the West; but it is perfection compared with the reign of brutality which it has replaced. Let the reader turn to the account of Bokhara given by Vambéry — not by any means a champion of Russia — or let him remember the tortures inflicted by the barbarous ruler of that country on our own Stoddart and Conolly; let him also bear in mind how much Russia has already accomplished towards the extinction of the slave-trade in central Asia with its abominable attendant

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

cruelties, and it must in candor be admitted that her conquest of these regions has been a real gain to humanity. Indeed, since we ourselves are not prepared to undertake the task, it is the only possible means apparent for rescuing those countries from the barbarous desolation which now overspreads them, and restoring to them some portion of the prosperity of which they were once the scene. Russia may exercise a narrow commercial policy, and make a foolish mystery about admitting foreigners into her outposts, but at any rate travellers who succeed in visiting those parts can do so without running the risk of being first tortured and then murdered. And if the considerations here offered have any real force, our countrymen may be able to do justice to the good work which Russia is accomplishing in this part of the world, without allowing their equanimity to be disturbed by needless alarms of the consequences to ourselves.

Are we therefore to lay aside all precaution, and to abandon our attitude of watchfulness or even suspicion? Certainly not. It must be admitted, indeed, that we have done our best to make the danger a real one by the great importance we have ourselves attached to it. The Russian humorist must often have cause for amusement in noticing how great effects can be produced from trifling causes — the importance attached in England to the movement of some petty Russian outpost, the excitement caused in India by some almost bloodless skirmish several hundred miles away; and considering how persistently we have been educating our Indian subjects through the press to believe in our fear of Russian influence, it would be surprising if we had not been in a certain degree successful. But there is surely a middle course practicable between blind confidence and the undignified prognostications often so freely indulged in. For a people who have their fair share of courage, surely we English are strangely addicted to taking alarm at political bugbears. Does another nation set up manufactures, our commercial supremacy is about to pass away from us. A check occurs to the expansion of our trade, and it is forthwith assumed that our prosperity is on the wane. The cry that the material for our soldiery is falling off in quality has been raised many a time before during the last century, while every change in the condition of the navy has been held to forebode calamity to the nation whose defence was bound up in its wooden walls. The same sort of spirit runs through much that is said about Indian affairs. It was gravely asserted the other day in a newspaper that the capture of Kars had lowered our prestige in every Indian bazaar. Now certainly it may be admitted that our hold on India is based on opinion, although the aphorism will hardly bear all the strained applications it is often put to; and if it had been we who had lost Kars, the effect on our prestige might be serious enough. But the sort of prestige which a third party C is in danger of losing because A, with whom he has nothing to do, suffers an injury from B is surely of so evanescent a kind as not to be worth keeping. The people of India, like some more educated communities, are much addicted to gossip, and are ready enough to believe anything they hear without inquiring too closely into the evidence. This need not surprise us. When we find our own friends and neighbors ready to attach credence to any scandalous story which goes the round of London society, if only it is sufficiently improbable, and the subjects of it highly placed enough, what more natural than that people with even less occupation and fewer opportunities of getting at the truth should greedily swallow the floating rumors of the hour, especially when they see the English newspapers from which they get their items take them so seriously? In every petty native court, no doubt, the news of the day, served up with such spice in the way of bazaar gossip as may give flavor to the dish, is eagerly discussed, with a more or less imperfect appreciation of its import, for a knowledge of European history and geography is not a common accomplishment in these quarters; but it would be quite a mistake to suppose that the people or the princes of India are at all moved in consequence to any action, or that there is any evidence of the existence among them of a spirit of combination for throwing off our authority. The different native governments of India have never at any period of their history exhibited any capacity for political combination, while such a thing is unknown to the people. What they most desire is to be let alone, and to suppose that they are profoundly affected, or affected at all, by what passes in Europe or other parts of Asia, seems to be an assumption as far-fetched as that lately made by Sir Charles Trevelyan in a letter to the Pall Mall Gazette, that we should forfeit the respect and confidence of the people of India if we did not come forward to liberate the Christian races of

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Bulgaria. Probably not one Indian in a hundred thousand has ever heard of Bulgaria, or knows that the sultan rules over any but Mussulman subjects. To credit the simple agriculturists who make up the great bulk of the people of India with this degree of political acumen is about as reasonable as it would be to suppose that the Dorsetshire peasant watches with profound interest the course of legislation in the Austro-Hungarian empire, or the progress of a discussion on the ultimate composition of matter. This is an absurdity in the other direction. One side represent the Indian as profoundly moved by the news of foreign wars, and ready to join in any desperate enterprise for throwing off the English yoke; the other as a being whose loyalty to the British government is determined by approbation of the benevolent principles which govern their conduct. The real fact would appear to be that the Indian is a very ignorant but very inoffensive creature, who only wants to be suffered to dwell in quietness and not taxed inordinately, and who is vastly more interested in discussing the character of the English magistrate, or other official with whom he comes immediately in contact, than in talking about things of which he has never heard. And with regard to the upper classes of Indians it is surely but reasonable, when making forecasts of their probable conduct in the future, to take into consideration their behavior in the past. If ever there was a time when it might be expected that they would turn against us, it was during the Mutiny. Their dearest interests were threatened by the policy of annexation which had just at that time been so loudly asserted, while the fabric on which English power had been built up during a long course of years had suddenly crumbled away. Here then was the opportunity, favorable beyond what their most fervid expectations could have pictured, for throwing off the English yoke and establishing their independence. Nevertheless, with scarcely an exception, they withstood the temptation, and held by us loyally in our direst need. In face of such evidence as this, surely the dictates of both reason and honesty should lead us to give the heads of our tributary states credit for being still actuated by the motives which governed their conduct on that critical occasion, and to turn a deaf ear to the rumors now so busily propagated, which have no better foundation than the petty gossip always in course of fabrication for the credulous.

These considerations are not offered for the benefit of the Anglo-Indian community, who will for the most part treat these idle rumors at their proper value, so much as for the people of England, whose knowledge of India is usually of such an elementary sort that they may be as ready to be made uneasy without any real cause as to suppose that the ethical propositions of Sir Charles Trevelyan convey a profound political truth. At the same time it must be observed that the tendency to exaggerate the importance of trifling occurrences which is manifested at the present time originates in India, while it is aggravated of course by the increased facility for sending news about the world. The late expedition beyond the north-west frontier is a case in point. The tribes which occupy the regions in question have been noted for their lawless and savage disposition from the earliest times. They offered a desperate resistance to the advance of Alexander the Great, and they were a source of constant trouble to the Mogul emperors, and later to the Sikhs; and as soon as we replaced the Sikhs on the frontier, and came in contact with them, they began to annoy us. And numerous expeditions have been made during the thirty years of our occupation of the Punjab to chastise one or other of these lawless tribes for acts of hostility. Now, quite apart from the question whether our attitude towards these people has been the most judicious possible, and whether they might not have been kept in order by adopting some other course — an opinion one may respect without assenting to — the point to be insisted on here is that the trouble is essentially a local one, of no deep political import, and which is sufficiently accounted for by the fact that a strong and civilized government finds itself face to face with a turbulent race, to whom law, as we understand it, is unknown. And so, until quite lately, the matter was viewed. Every regiment stationed at Peshawur expected as a matter of course to have a turn of duty in one of these expeditions, and took the matter as coming, so to speak, in the day's work. Sometimes the fighting was pretty hard, and rising officers made their reputations; at other times the expedition proved to be merely a demonstration; but in every case the affair was appraised at its real political value, as essentially a local difficulty, the influence of which was quite unfelt anywhere beyond the immediate scene of action, and about which it behoved not to make too much fuss. But now forsooth

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the same thing is to be dealt with as part of a chain of important events connected with the whole central Asian question, and with Russia looming large in the background. The Jowaki expedition has been the mildest, from a military point of view, of any yet undertaken; yet the movements of the little force were gravely chronicled from day to day, as if all England were watching its progress; the leading Indian newspaper set up a special correspondent in the camp, and the important fact that a solitary Jowaki was killed is telegraphed all over the country. The English in India laugh at this; but people at home, seeing that the press think the news worth spending so much upon, begin to think that something serious is going on. The telegraph, indeed, is responsible for a good deal of this morbid excitement and anxiety. A European gentleman in the service of a native state who will not work harmoniously with the officials of the Indian government is required to resign, under the provisions of a treaty clause which has always been in existence to govern such cases, and which has repeatedly been enforced; this is telegraphed to England as a grave political occurrence, and questions are put and answered about it in Parliament. An Indian prince omits a visit of ceremony; and the omission, if it has really occurred, would no doubt be taken notice of in the proper quarter, and there the matter would have ended. But this, too, is telegraphed to England, and we are asked to scent the coming danger in the air, while significant remarks are added, eminently calculated to produce ill-feeling on both sides, on the large military establishment the prince in question is keeping up; the circumstance that he showed the most perfect loyalty and good faith in a time of our direst need is to be allowed to weigh as nothing in face of a breach of etiquette, as if princes were never to be allowed to be out of temper. It is on the evidence furnished by these and such-like scraps of miserable gossip that some portions of the English press are ready to base an alarmist cry that our Indian rule is in danger, one newspaper only a few days ago gravely asserting that the combination of the native states for rising against us is now matured, and only awaits the signal from Russia to declare itself; and no doubt it finds plenty of readers ready to believe a statement unsupported by a particle of evidence. A leading newspaper published lately a telegram from its Indian correspondent to the effect that the amir of Cabul was mobilizing his army with hostile design. It is certainly possible that he may be doing so, because everything is possible to the whimsical nature of an oriental prince; but, considering the comparative attitudes and positions of England and Russia with regard to Afghanistan, the rumor is at least extremely improbable. And even if it were true, the fact is about as important as if Costa Rica were mobilizing her navy for invading England. Afghanistan might be a troublesome country to occupy, but for offensive purposes it is practically powerless.

Are we then to believe that no dangers beset our rule in India, and that no precautions are necessary? Assuredly not: on the contrary, the conviction produced on the minds of some of the most courageous and experienced of our Indian administrators is that we are always living there over a mine, which may indeed never be fired, but which may explode at any time. The difficulty is to say from what quarter the match will be applied. Hitherto the predictions made about coming danger have always proved false. No one predicted the Mutiny. Lord Dalhousie surrendered his office under the full belief that he left India firmly established in the course of peace and prosperity. Sir Charles Napier, who disagreed with Lord Dalhousie on every point, drew a vivid picture of the dangers he thought he could discern in the state of the country, but amongst these he did not include a mutiny of the army. On the contrary, he proposed a measure which, perhaps more than any other, would probably have conduced to precipitate it, the massing of a large force of sepoys in the imperial city of Delhi. And when the Mutiny did break out, the course it took was altogether different from what was universally expected. No one who knew anything of the Bengal sepoys anticipated that the decrepid native officers would retain their places throughout the war at the head of their regiments; it was unanimously expected by the European officers who had passed their lives with them, that these old men would have to give place to younger and more adventurous spirits. Another prediction falsified by the event was that the Hindoo and Mussulman sepoys would fall out with and separate from each other. Still less was it expected that the people of the country generally would look on at the struggle with indifference, and that the princes of India, standing loyally by the paramount power, would take an active part against our rebellious army.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

When probability and the conclusions of experience have once been falsified so signally, who shall venture to prophesy about the future? The new conditions which are arising every year in India, if in some respects they tend to strengthen our hold on the country, introduce also new and special elements of danger, and every one who pleases may readily forecast for himself a combination of possible circumstances which, if they did occur, would suffice to produce our downfall. But no one can properly assert that a particular thing the possibility of which can be foreseen is therefore a probable occurrence. As it has been said with epigrammatic force, nothing is likely to happen in India but what is unexpected. While, therefore, it behoves the government to maintain an attitude of unceasing watchfulness and preparation, mindful always of the abnormal and extraordinary conditions under which our Indian empire is held, the people of England may exhibit with advantage a more dignified attitude in this matter than has been lately manifested, not lending a too ready ear to every idle rumor, or forming unsound notions of the condition of the country on imperfect and inaccurate information, or allowing themselves to be frightened by political hobgoblins of Russian intrigue or native disaffection. Above all, we shall do well to act on the golden maxim which should govern every man's judgment in public as well as private, that, in the absence of any evidence for or against, we ought to judge of people by their past conduct. If we find that the princes of India have stood loyally by us under the greatest temptation, we have no right to assume without proper proof that they are ready to intrigue against us now; and the people of the country having shown so far no impatience of our rule, it is unreasonable, in the absence of any clear evidence to that effect, to believe in the present existence of such a feeling.

GEORGE CHESNEY.

WITHIN THE PRECINCTS.

BY MRS. OLIPHANT.

CHAPTER XI.

ANOTHER EVENING AT THE DEANERY.

MR. RIDSDALE had perhaps never touched, and rarely heard, anything so bad as the old cracked piano which Lottie had inherited from her mother, and which was of the square form now obsolete, of a kind which brokers (the only dealers in the article) consider very convenient, as combining the character of a piano and a sideboard. Very often had Lottie's piano served the purpose of a sideboard, but it was too far gone to be injured — nothing could make it worse. Nevertheless Mr. Ridsdale played the accompaniments upon it, without a word, to Lottie's admiration and wonder, for he seemed to be able to draw forth at his fingers' ends a volume of sound which she did not suppose to be within the power of the old instrument. He had brought several songs with him, being fully minded to hear her that morning, whatever obstacles might be in the way. But it so happened that there were no obstacles whatever in the way; and Mrs. O'Shaughnessy was of the greatest service as audience. With the true talent of a manager, Mr. Ridsdale addressed himself to the subjugation of his public. He placed before Lottie the song from "Marta," to which, hearing it thus named, Mrs. O'Shaughnessy prepared herself to listen with a certain amiable scorn. "Ah, we shall have you crying in five minutes," he said. "Is it me you're meaning?" she cried in high scorn. But the fact was that when the melting notes of "The Last Rose of Summer" came forth from Lottie's lips, Mrs. O'Shaughnessy was altogether taken by surprise, and carried out Rollo's prophecy to the letter by weeping abundantly. There was much of Mr. Ridsdale's music which Lottie could not sing — indeed, it would have been wonderful if she had been able to do so, as he had brought with him the finest morceaux of a dozen operas, and Lottie's musical education had been of the slightest. But he so praised, and flattered, and encouraged her that she went on from song to song at his bidding, making the best attempt at them that was possible, while Mrs. O'Shaughnessy sat by and listened. Her presence there was of the utmost consequence to them. It at once converted Rollo's visit into something allowable and natural, and it gave him a pretence for beginning what was really an examination into Lottie's powers and compass, at once of voice and of intelligence. Lottie, innocent of any scheme, or of any motive he could have, save simple pleasure in her singing, exerted herself to please him with the same mixture of gratitude and happy prepossession with which she had thought of him for so long. If she could give a little pleasure to him who had given her

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

his love and his heart (for what less could it be that he had given her?) it was well her part, she thought, to do so. She felt that she owed him everything she could do for him, to recompense him for that gift which he had given her unawares. So she stood by him in a soft humility, not careful that she was showing her own ignorance, thinking only of pleasing him. What did it matter if he were pleased whether she attained the highest excellence? She said sweetly, "I know I cannot do it, but if you wish it I will try," and attempted feats which in other circumstances would have appalled her. And the fact was, that thus forgetting herself, and thinking only of pleasing him, Lottie sang better than she had ever done in her life, better than she had done in the Deanery on the previous night. She committed a thousand faults, but these faults were as nothing in comparison with the melody of her voice and the purity of her taste. Rollo became like one inspired. All the enthusiasm of an amateur, and all the zeal of an enterprising manager, were in him. The old piano rolled out notes of which in its own self it was quite incapable under his rapid fingers. He seemed to see her with all London before her, at her feet, and he (so to speak) at once the discoverer and the possessor of this new star. No wonder the old piano grew ecstatic under his touch; he who had gone through so many vicissitudes, who had made so many failures — at last it seemed evident to him that his fortune was made. Unfortunately (though that he forgot for the moment) he had felt his fortune to be made on several occasions before.

Mrs. O'Shaughnessy gave a great many nods and smiles when at last he went away. "I say nothing, me dear, but I have my eyesight," she said, "and a blind man could see what's in the wind. So that is how it is, Lottie, me darling? Well, well! I always said you were the prettiest girl that had been in the lodges this many a year. I don't envy ye, me love, your rise in the world. And I hope, Lottie, when ye're me lady, ye'll not forget your old friends."

"How should I ever be my lady?" said Lottie; "indeed, Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, I don't know what you mean."

"No, me honey, the likes of you never do, till the right moment comes," said the old lady, going down the narrow stairs. She kissed her hand to Lottie, who looked after from the window, as she appeared on the pavement outside, and with her bonnet-strings flying loose turned in at her own door. Her face was covered with smiles, and her mind full of a new interest. She could not refrain from going into the major's little den, and telling him. "Nonsense!" the major said, incredulous; "one of your mare's-nests." "Sure it was a great deal better than a mare, it was turtle-doves made the nest I'm thinking of," said Mrs. O'Shaughnessy; and she took off her bonnet and seated herself at her window, from which she inspected the world, with a new warmth of interest, determined not to lose a single incident in this new fairy-tale.

Law came out of his room where he had been "reading", when Mrs. O'Shaughnessy went away. "What has all this shrieking been about," said Law, "and thumping on that old beast of a piano? You are always at a fellow about reading, and when he does read you disturb him with your noise. How do you think I could get on with all that miauling going on? Who has been here?"

"Mr. Ridsdale has been here," said Lottie demurely. "He brought me a note from Lady Caroline, and I am going again to the Deanery to-night."

Law whistled a long whew—ew! "Again, to-night! she'd better ask you to go and live there," said the astounded boy; and he said no more about his interrupted reading, but put his big book philosophically away; for who could begin to read again after all the disturbances of the morning, and after such a piece of news as this?

Lottie dressed herself with more care than ever that evening. She began to wish for ornaments, and to realize how few her decorations were; the little pearl locket was so small, and her arms seemed so bare without any bracelets. However, she made herself little bands of black velvet, and got the maid to fasten them on. She had never cared much before. She spent a much longer time than usual over the arrangement of her hair. Above all she wanted to look like a lady, to show that, though their choice of her was above what could have been expected, it was not above the level of what she was used to. Their choice of her — that was how it seemed to Lottie. The young lover had chosen, as it is fit the lover should do; but Lady Caroline had ratified his selection, and Lottie, proud, yet entirely humble in the tender humility born of gratitude, wanted to show that she could do credit to their choice. She read the note which purported to be Lady Caroline's over and over again — how kind it was! Lady Car-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

oline's manner perhaps was not quite so kind. People could not control their manner. The kindest heart was often belied, Lottie was aware, by a stiffness, an awkwardness, perhaps only a shyness, which disguised their best intentions. But the very idea of asking her was kind, and the letter was so kind that she made up her mind never again to mistake Lady Caroline. She had a difficulty in expressing herself, no doubt. She was indolent, perhaps. At her age and in her position it was not wonderful if one got indolent; but in her heart she was kind. This Lottie repeated to herself as she put the roses in her hair. In her heart Lady Caroline was kind; the girl felt sure that she could never mistake her, never be disappointed in her again. And in this spirit she tripped across the Dean's Walk, Mrs. O'Shaughnessy watching from her window. It was almost dark, but it was not one of the signor's nights for practice, and only a few of the inhabitants of the Abbey precincts were enjoying the air on the terrace pavement. They all saw her as she came out in the twilight with her uncovered head. Law had gone out, and there was nobody to go with her this time to the Deanery door. But Lottie had no difficulty in finding an escort, as she came out, looking round her shyly to watch for a quiet moment when no one was about. Captain Temple came forward, who lived two doors off, and was passing as she came to the little garden gate. He was the preux chevalier of all the chevaliers. He came forward with a fatherly smile upon his kind face. "You are looking for some one to go with you," he said; "your father has gone out. I saw him. Let me take his place."

"Oh, thanks! I am going to the Deanery. I thought Law would have waited for me."

"Law, like others of his age, has his own concerns to think of," said Captain Temple, "but I am used to this kind of work. You have heard of my girl, Miss Despard?"

"Yes, Captain Temple——" Lottie, touched suddenly in the sympathetic sentiment of her own beginning life, looked up at him with wistful eyes.

"She was a pretty creature, like yourself, my dear. My wife and I often talk of you and think you like her. She was lost to us before she went out of the world, and I think it broke her heart — as well as ours. Take care of the damp grass with your little white shoes."

"Oh, Captain Temple, do not come with me," said Lottie, with tears in her eyes. "I can go very well alone. It is too hard upon you."

"No — I like it, my dear. My wife cannot talk of it, but I like to talk of it. You must take care not to marry any one that will carry you quite away from your father's house."

"As if that would matter! As if papa would care!" Lottie said in her heart, with a half pity, half envy, of Captain Temple's lost daughter; but this was but a superficial feeling in comparison with the great compassion she had for him. The old chevalier took her across the road as tenderly and carefully as if even her little white shoes were worth caring for. There was a moist brightness about his eyes as he looked at her pretty figure. "The roses are just what you ought to wear," he said. "And whenever you want any one to take care of you in this way, send for me; I shall like to do it. Shall I come back for you in case your father should be late?"

"Oh, Captain Temple, papa never minds! but it is quite easy to get back," she said, thinking that perhaps this time he——

"I think it is always best that a young lady should have her own attendant, and not depend on any one to see her home," said the old captain. And he rang the bell at the Deanery door, and took off his hat with a smile which almost made Lottie forget Lady Caroline. She went into the drawing-room accordingly much less timidly than she had ever done before, and no longer felt any fear of Mr. Jeremie, who admitted her, though he was a much more imposing person than Captain Temple. This shade of another life which had come over her seemed to protect Lottie, and strengthen her mind. The drawing-room was vaguely lighted with clusters of candles here and there, and at first she saw nobody, nor was there any indication held out to her that the mistress of the house was in the room, except the solemn tone of Jeremie's voice announcing her. Lottie thought Lady Caroline had not come in from the dining-room, and strayed about looking at the books and ornaments on the tables. She even began to hum an air quietly to herself, by way of keeping up her own courage, and it was not till she had almost taken her seat unawares on Lady Caroline's dress, extended on the sofa, that she became aware that she was not alone. "Oh, I beg your pardon," she cried out in a sudden panic. "I thought there was no

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

one in the room." Lady Caroline made no remark at all, except to say, "How do you do, Miss Despard?" That was what she had made up her mind to say, feeling it to be quite enough for the occasion — and Lady Caroline did not easily change her mind when it was once made up. She thought it very impertinent of this girl to come in and look at the photographs on the tables, and even to take the liberty of singing, but there was no calculating what these sort of people might do. She had nearly sat down on Lady Caroline's feet! "This is what I put up with for Rollo," the poor lady said to herself; and it seemed to her that a great deal of gratitude from Rollo was certainly her due. She did not move, nor did she ask Miss Despard to sit down; but Lottie, half in fright, dropped into a chair very near this strange piece of still life on the sofa. The girl had been very much frightened to see her, and for a moment was speechless with the horror of it. Nearly to sit down upon Lady Caroline! and a moment of silence ensued. Lady Caroline did not feel in the least inclined to begin a conversation. She had permitted the young woman to be invited, and she had said "How do you do, Miss Despard?" and she did not know what more could be expected from her. So they sat close together in the large, half-visible, dimly illuminated room, with the large window open to the night, and said nothing to each other. Lottie, who was the visitor, was embarrassed, but Lady Caroline was not embarrassed. She felt no more need to speak than did the table with the photographs upon it which Lottie had stopped to look at. As for Lottie, she bore it as long as she could, the stillness of the room, the flicker of the candles, the dash and fall of a moth now and then flying across the lights, and the immovable figure on the sofa with its feet tucked up, and floods of beautiful rich silk enveloping them. A strange sense that Lady Caroline was not living at all, that it was only the picture of a woman that was laid out on the sofa came over her. In her nervousness she began to tremble, then felt inclined to laugh. At last it became evident to Lottie that to speak was a necessity, to break the spell which might otherwise stupefy her senses too.

"It is a beautiful night," was all she managed to say; could anything be more feeble? but Lady Caroline gave no reply. She made the usual little movement of her eyelids, which meant an assent; indeed it was not a remark which required reply. And the silence fell on them again as bad as ever. The night air blew in, the moths whirled about the candles, dashed against the globe of the lamp, dropped on the floor with fatal infinitesimal booms of tragic downfall; and Lady Caroline lay on the sofa, with eyes directed to vacancy, looking at nothing. Lottie, with the roses in her hair, and so much life tingling in her, could not endure it. She wanted to go and shake the vision on the sofa, she wanted to cry out and make some noise or other to save herself from the spell. At last, when she could keep silence no longer, she jumped up, throwing over a small screen which stood near in her vehemence of action. "Shall I sing you something, Lady Caroline?" she said.

Lady Caroline was startled by the fall of the screen. She watched till it was picked up, actually looking at Lottie, which was some advance; then she said, "If you please, Miss Despard," in her calm tones. And Lottie, half out of herself, made a dash at the grand piano, though she knew she could not play. She struck a chord or two, trembling all over, and began to sing. This time she did not feel the neglect or unkindness of the way she was treated. It was a totally different sensation. A touch of panic, a touch of amusement, was in it. She was afraid that she might be petrified too if she did nothing to break the spell. But as she began to sing, with a quaver in her voice, and a little shiver of nervous chilliness in her person, the door opened, and voices, half-discerned figures of men, life and movement, came pouring in. Lottie came to an abrupt stop in the middle of a bar.

"This will never do," said the suave dean; "you make too much noise, Rollo. You have frightened Miss Despard in the middle of her song."

Then Rollo came forward into the light spot round the piano, looking very pale; he was a good deal more frightened than Lottie was. Could it be possible that she had made a false note? He was in an agony of horror and alarm. "I — make a noise!" he said; "my dear uncle!" He looked at her with appealing eyes full of anguish. "You were not — singing, Miss Despard? I am sure you were not singing, only trying the piano."

"I thought it would perhaps — amuse Lady Caroline." Lottie did not know what she had done that was wrong. The signor wore an air of trouble too. Only Mr. Ashford's face, looking kindly at her, as one followed another into the light,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

reassured her. She turned to him with a little anxiety. "I cannot play; it is quite true; perhaps I ought not to have touched the piano," she said.

"You were startled," said the minor canon kindly. "Your voice fluttered like those candles in the draught." The others still looked terribly serious, and did not speak.

"And I sang false," said Lottie; "I heard myself. It was terrible; but I thought I was stiffening into stone," she said, in an undertone, and she gave an alarmed look at Lady Caroline on the sofa. This restored the spirits of the other spectators, who looked at each other relieved.

"Thank heaven she knew it," Rollo whispered to the signor; "it was fright, pure fright — and my aunt —— "

"What else did you suppose it was?" answered in the same tone, but with some scorn, the signor.

"Miss Despard, don't think you are to be permitted to accompany yourself," said Rollo. "Here are two of us waiting your pleasure. Signor, I will not pretend to interfere when you are there. May we have again that song you were so good —— Ah, pardon me," he cried, coming close to her to get the music. "I do not want to lose a minute. I have been on thorns this half-hour. I ought to have been here waiting ready to receive you as you ought to be received."

"Oh, it did not matter," said Lottie, confused. "I am sorry I cannot play. I wanted — to try — to amuse Lady Caroline."

By this time the signor had arranged the music on the piano, and began to play. The dean had gone off to the other end of the room, where the evening paper, the last edition, had been laid awaiting him on a little table on which stood a reading-lamp. The green shade of the lamp concentrated the light upon the paper, and the white hands of the reader, and his long limbs and his little table, making a new picture in the large dim room. On the opposite side sat Lady Caroline, who had withdrawn her feet hastily from the sofa, and sat bolt upright as a tribute to the presence of the "gentlemen." These two pieces of still life appeared to Lottie vaguely through the partial gloom. The master and mistress of the house were paying no attention to the visitors. They were not of sufficient importance to be company, or to disturb their entertainers in the usual habits of their evening. Lady Caroline, indeed, seldom allowed herself to be disturbed by any one. She put down her feet for the sake of her own dignity, but she did not feel called upon to make any further sacrifice. And as for Lottie, she was not happy among these three men. She shrank from Rollo, who was eyeing her with an anxiety which she could not understand, and longed for Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, or, indeed, any woman to stand by her. Her heart sank, and she shivered again with that chill which is of the nerves and fancy. The dean with his rustling paper, and Lady Caroline with her vacant eyes, were at the other end of the room, and Lottie felt isolated, separated, cast upon the tender mercies of the three connoisseurs, a girl with no woman near to stand by her. It seemed to her for the moment as if she must sink into the floor altogether, or else turn and fly.

It was Mr. Ashford again who came to Lottie's aid. "Play something else first," he said softly to the signor, disregarding the anxious looks of Rollo, who had placed himself on a chair at a little distance, so that he might be able to see the singer and stop any false note that might be coming before it appeared. The others were both kind and clever, kinder than the man whom Lottie thought her lover, and whose anxiety for the moment took all thought from him, and more clever too. The signor began to play Handel, the serious, noble music with which Lottie had grown familiar in the Abbey, and soon Mr. Ashford stepped in and sang in his beautiful, melodious voice. Then the strain changed, preluding a song which the most angelic of the choristers had sung that morning. The minor canon put the music into Lottie's hands. "Begin here," he whispered. She knew it by ear and by heart, and the paper trembled in her hands; but they made her forget herself, and she began, her voice thrilling and trembling, awe and wonder taking possession of her. She had heard it often, but she had never realized what it was till all human, womanish, shivering with excitement and emotion, she began to sing. It did not seem her own doing at all. The dim drawing-room, with the dean reading the paper, the men in their evening coats, the glimmering reflection of herself which she caught in the long mirror, in her simple decorations, the roses trembling in her hair, all seemed horribly inappropriate, almost profane, to Lottie. And the music shook in her hands, and the notes, instead of remaining steadily before her eyes, where she could read them, took wings to themselves and floated about, now here and there, some-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

times gleaming upon her, sometimes eluding her. Yet she sang, she could not tell how, forgetting everything, though she saw and felt everything, in a passion, in an inspiration, penetrated through and through with the music and the poetry and the sacredness, above her and all of them. "I know that my Redeemer liveth," — oh, how did she dare to sing it, how could those commonplace walls enclose it, those men stand and listen as if it was her they were listening to? By-and-by the dean laid down his paper. Rollo, in the background, gazing at her at first in pale anxiety, then with vexed disapproval (for what did he want with Handel?), came nearer and nearer, his face catching some reflection of hers as she went on. And when Lottie ended, in a rapture she could not explain or understand, they all came pressing round her, dim and blurred figures in her confused eyes. But the girl was too greatly strained to bear their approach or hear what they said. She broke away from them, and rushed, scarcely knowing what she did, to Lady Caroline's side. Lady Caroline herself was roused. She made room for the trembling creature, and Lottie threw herself into the corner of the capacious sofa and covered her face with her hands.

But when she came to herself she would not sing any more. A mixture of guilt and exaltation was in her mind. "I ought not to have sung it. I am not good enough to sing it. I never thought what it meant till now," she said, trembling. "Oh, I hope you will forgive me. I never knew what it meant before."

"Forgive you!" said the dean. "We don't know how to thank you, Miss Despard." He was the person who ought to know what it meant if anybody did. And when he had thus spoken he went back to his paper, a trifle displeased by the fuss she made, as if she could have any new revelation of the meaning of a thing which, if not absolutely written for St. Michael's, as good as belonged to the choir, which belonged to the dean and chapter. There was a certain presumption involved in Lottie's humility. He went back to his reading-lamp, and finished the article which had been interrupted by her really beautiful rendering of a very fine solo. It was really beautiful; he would not for a moment deny that. But if Miss Despard turned out to be excitable, and gave herself airs, like a prima donna! Heaven be praised, the little chorister boys never had any nerves, but sang whatever was set before them, without thinking what was meant, the dean said to himself. And it would be difficult to describe Rollo Ridsdale's disappointment. He sat down in a low chair by the side of the sofa, and talked to her in a whisper. "I understand you," he said; "it is like coming down from the heaven of heavens, where you have carried us. But the other spheres are celestial too. Miss Despard, I shall drop down into sheer earth to-morrow. I am going away. I shall lose the happiness of hearing you altogether. Will you not have pity upon me, and lead me a little way into the earthly paradise?" But even these prayers did not move Lottie. She was too much shaken and disturbed out of the unconscious calm of her being for anything more.

CHAPTER XII.

BROTHER AND SISTER.

Lottie ran out while Rollo Ridsdale was getting his hat to accompany her home. She caught up her shawl over her arm without pausing to put it on, and ran through the dark cloister and across the Dean's Walk to her own door, before he knew she was ready. "The young — lady is gone, sir," Mr. Jeremie said, who was rather indignant at having to open the door to such sort of people. He would have said young woman had he dared. Rollo, much piqued already in that she had refused to sing for him further, and half irritated, half attracted by this escapade now, hurried after her; but when he emerged from the gloom of the cloister to the fresh, dewy air of the night, and the breadth of the Dean's Walk, lying half visible in summer darkness in the soft, indistinct radiance of the stars, there was no one visible, far or near. She had already gone in before he came in sight of the door. He looked up and down the silent way, on which not a creature was visible, and listened to the sound of the door closing behind her. The flight and the sound awoke a new sentiment in his mind. Ladies were not apt to avoid Rollo.

> Not his the form nor his the eye,
> That youthful maidens wont to fly.

He was piqued and he was roused. Heretofore, honestly, there had been little but music in his thoughts. The girl was very handsome, which was so much the better — very much the better, for his purpose; but this sparkle of resistance in her roused something else in his mind. Lottie had been like an inspired creature as she sang this evening. He had never seen on the stage or elsewhere so wonderful an exhibition of absorbed, impassioned feeling. If he could secure her for his prima donna, nowhere would such a prima donna be seen. It was not that she had thrown herself into the music, but that the music had possessed her, and transported her out of herself. This was not a common human creature. She was no longer merely handsome, but beautiful in the fervor of her feeling. And for the first time Lottie as Lottie, not merely as a singer, touched a well-worn but still sensitive chord in his breast. He stood looking at the door which still seemed to echo in the stillness with the jar of closing. What did her flight mean? He was provoked, tantalized, stimulated. Whatever happened, he must see more of this girl. Why should she fly from him? He did not choose to return and tell the story of her flight, which was such an incident as always makes the man who is baulked present a more or less ridiculous aspect to the spectators; but he stood outside and waited till the steps of the minor canon and the signor had become audible turning each towards their habitation, and even the turning of Mr. Ashford's latch-key in his door. Everything was very still in the evening at St. Michael's. The respectable and solemn canons in their great houses, and the old chevaliers in their little lodges, went early to bed. Rollo saw no light anywhere except a dim glow in the window of the little drawing-room where he had spent the morning, and where no doubt the fugitive was seated breathless. His curiosity was raised, and his interest, supplanting that frantic eagerness about her voice which he had expressed so largely. Why did she run away from him? Why did she refuse to sing for him? These questions suddenly sprang into his mind, and demanded, if not reply, yet a great deal of consideration. He could not make up his mind what the cause could be.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

As for Lottie, she could not have given any reasonable answer to these questions, though she was the only living creature who could know why she ran away. As a matter of fact, she did not know. The music had been more than she could bear in the state of excitement in which she was. Excited about things she would have been ashamed to confess any special interest in — about her relations with the Deanery, about Lady Caroline, and, above all, about Rollo — the wonderful strain to which she had all unconsciously and unthinkingly, at first, given utterance, had caught at Lottie like a hand from heaven. She had been drawn upward into the fervor of religious ecstasy, she who was so ignorant; and when she dropped again to earth and was conscious once more of Rollo and of Lady Caroline, there had come upon her a sudden sense of shame, and of her own pettiness and inability to disentangle herself from the links that drew her to earth, which was as passionate as the sudden fervor. How dare she sing that one moment, and the next be caught down to vulgar life, to Lady Caroline and Rollo Ridsdale? Lottie would sing no more, and could not speak, so strong was the conflict within her. She could not even encounter the momentary tête-à-tête which before she had almost wished for. She was roused and stirred in all her being as she had never been before, able to encounter death or grief, she thought vaguely, or anything that was solemn and grand, but not ordinary talk, not compliments, not the little tender devices of courtship. She flew from the possible touch of sentiment, the half-mock, half-real flatteries that he would be ready to say to her. Love, real, and great, and solemn, the love of which the Italian poet speaks as twin sister of death, was what Lottie's mind was prepared for; but from anything lower she fled, with the instinct of a nature highly strained and unaccustomed to, though capable of, passion. Everything was seething in her mind, her heart beating, the blood coursing through her veins. She felt that she could not bear the inevitable downfall of ordinary talk. She ran out into the soft coolness of the night, the great quiet and calm of the sleeping place, a fugitive driven by this new wind of strange emotion. The shadow of the Abbey was grateful to her, lying dimly half way across the broad, silent road — and the dim lamp in her own window seemed to point out a refuge from her thoughts. She rushed across the empty road, like a ghost, flitting, white and noiseless, and swift as an arrow, from the gate of the cloister, wondering whether the maid would hear her knock at once, or if she would have to wait there at the door till Mr. Ridsdale appeared. But the door was opened at her first touch, to Lottie's great surprise, by Law, who seemed to have been watching for her arrival. He wore a very discontented aspect, but this Lottie did not at first see, in her grateful sense of safety.

"How early you are!" he said. "I did not expect you for an hour yet. It was scarcely worth while going out at all, if you were to come back so soon."

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Lottie made no reply. She went upstairs to the little drawing-room where the lamp had been screwed as low as possible to keep a light for her when she should return. The room was still more dim than Lady Caroline's, and looked so small and insignificant in comparison. On the table was a tray with some bread and butter and a cup of milk, which was Lottie's simple supper after her dissipation; for Lady Caroline's cup of tea was scarcely enough for a girl who had eaten a not too luxurious dinner at two o'clock. She had no mind, however, for her supper now; but sat down on the little sofa and covered her eyes with her hand, and went back into her thoughts, half to prolong the excitement into which she had plunged, half to still herself and get rid of this sudden transport. It would be difficult to say which she wished most; to calm herself down or to continue that state of exaltation which proved to her new capabilities in her own being. She thought it was the former desire that moved her, and that to be quiet was all she wanted; but yet that strong tide running in her veins, that hot beating of her heart, that expansion and elevation of everything in her, was full of an incomprehensible agony of sweetness and exquisite sensation. She did not know what it was. She covered her eyes to shut out the immediate scene around her. The little shabby room, the bread and butter, and Law's slouching figure manipulating the lamp — these, at least, were accessories which she had no desire to see.

"Bother the thing!" said Law, "I can't get it to burn. Here, Lottie! you can manage them. Oh! if you like to sit in the dark, I don't mind. Were your fine people disagreeable? I always told you they wanted nothing but that you should sing for them and amuse them. They don't care a rap for you!"

Lottie took no notice of this speech. She withdrew her hand from her face, but still kept her eyes half-closed, unwilling to be roused out of her dream.

"They're all as selfish as old bears!" said Law; "most people are, for that matter. They never think of you; you've got to look after yourself; it's their own pleasure they're thinking of. What can you expect from strangers when a man that pretends to be one's own father ——"

"What are you talking about?" said Lottie, slowly waking, with a feeling of disgust and impatience, out of her finer fancies. She could not keep some shade of scorn and annoyance from her face.

"You needn't put on those supercilious looks; you'll suffer as much from it as I shall, or perhaps more, for a man can always do for himself," said Law; "but you — you'll find the difference. Lottie," he continued, forgetting resentment in this common evil, and sinking his voice, "he's down there at the old place again."

"What old place?"

As soon as his complaining voice became familiar, Lottie closed her eyes again, longing to resume her own thoughts.

"Oh! the old place. Why, down there; you know — the place where —— I say!" cried Law, suddenly growing red, and perceiving the betrayal of himself as well as his father which was imminent, "never mind where it is; it's where that sharp one, Polly Featherstone, works."

Lottie was completely awakened now; she looked up, half-bewildered, from the dispersing mists. "Of whom are you talking?" she cried. "Law, what people have you got among — who are they? You frighten me! Who is it you are talking of?"

"There's no harm in them," cried Law, coloring more and more. "What do you mean? Do you think they're —— I don't know what you mean; they're as good as we are," he added sullenly, walking away with his hands in his pocket out of the revelations of the lamp. Dim and low as it was, it disclosed, he was aware, an uncomfortable glow of color on his face.

"I don't know who they may be," said Lottie, severe, yet blushing too; "I don't want to know! But, oh, Law! you that are so young, my only brother, why should you know people I couldn't know? Why should you be ashamed of any one you go to see?"

"I was not talking of people I go to see; I wish you wouldn't be so absurd; I'm talking of the governor," said Law, speaking very fast; "he is there, I tell you, a man of his time of life, sitting among a lot of girls, talking away fifteen to the dozen. He might find some other way of meeting her if he must meet her!" cried Law, his own grievance breaking out in spite of him. "What has he got to do there among a pack of girls? it's disgraceful at his age!"

Law was very sore, angry, and disappointed. He had gone to his usual resort in the evening, and had seen his father there before him, and had been obliged to retire discomfited, with a jibe from Emma to intensify his trouble. "The captain's twice the man you are!" the little dressmaker had said; "he ain't afraid of no-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

body." Poor Law had gone away after this, and strolled despondently along the river-side. He did not know what to do with himself. Lottie was at the Deanery, he was shut out of his usual refuge, and he had nowhere to go. Though he had no money, he jumped into a boat and rowed himself dismally about the river, dropping down below the bridge to where he could see the lighted windows of the workroom. There he lingered about, nobody seeing or taking any notice of him. When he approached the bank, he could even hear the sound of their voices, the laughter with which they received the captain's witticisms. A little wit went a long way in that complaisant circle. He could make out Captain Despard's shadow against the window, never still for a moment, moving up and down, amusing the girls with songs, jokes, pieces of buffoonery. Law despised these devices; but, oh, how he envied the skill of the actor! He hung about the river in his boat till it got quite dark, almost run into sometimes by other boats, indifferent to everything but this lighted interior which he could see, though nobody in it could see him. And when he was tired of this forlorn amusement he came home, finding the house very empty and desolate. He tried to work, but how was it possible to work under the sting of such a recollection? The only thing he could do was to wait for Lottie, to pour forth his complaint to her, to hope that she might perhaps find some remedy for this intolerable wrong. It did not occur to him that to betray his father was also to betray himself, and that Lottie might feel as little sympathy for him as he did for Captain Despard. This fact flashed upon him now when it was too late.

Lottie had not risen from her seat, but as she sat there, everything round seemed to waver about her, then settle down again in a sudden revelation of mean, and small, and paltry life, such as she had scarcely ever realized before. Not only the lofty heaven into which the music had carried her rolled away like a scroll, but the other world, which was beautiful also of its kind, from which she had fled, which had seemed too poor to remain in, after the preceding ecstasy, departed as with a glimmer of wings; and she found herself awaking in a life where everything was squalid and poor, where she alone, with despairing efforts, tried to prop up the house that it might not fall into dishonored dust. She had borne with a kind of contemptuous equanimity Law's first story about her father. Let him marry again! she had said; if he could secure the thing he called his happiness in such a way let him do it! The idea had filled her with a high scorn. She had not thought of herself nor of the effect it might have upon her, but had risen superior to it with lofty contempt, and put it from her mind. But this was different. With all her high notions of gentility, and all her longings after a more splendid sphere, this sudden revelation of a sphere meaner, lower still, struck Lottie with a wild, sudden pang. A pack of girls! what kind of girls could those be of whom Law spoke? Her blood rushed to her face, scorching her with shame. She who scorned the chevaliers and their belongings! She who had "kept her distance" from her own class, was it possible that she was to be dragged down lower, lower, to shame itself? Her voice was choked in her throat. She could not speak. She could only cry out to him, clasping her hands. "Don't tell me any more — oh, don't tell me any more ——"

"Hillo!" said the lad, "what is the matter with you? Don't tell you any more? You will soon know a great deal more if you don't do something to put a stop to it. There ought to be a law against it. A man's children ought to be able to put a stop to it. I told you before, Lottie, if you don't exert yourself and do something ——"

"Oh," she said, rising to her feet, "what can I do? Can I put honor into you, and goodness, and make you what I want you to be? Oh, if I could, Law! I would give you my blood out of my veins if I could. But I can't put me into you," she said, wringing her hands — "and you expect me to listen to stories — about people I ought not to hear of — about women — O Law, Law, how dare you speak so to me?"

"Hold hard!" said Law, "you don't know what you are speaking of. The girls are as good girls as you are" — his own cheeks flushed with indignant shame as he spoke. "You are just like what they say of women. You are always thinking of something bad. What are you, after all, Lottie Despard? A poor, shabby captain's daughter! You make your own gowns, and they make other people's. I don't see such a dreadful difference in that."

Lottie was overpowered by all the different sensations that succeeded each other in her. She felt herself swept by what felt like repeated waves of trouble — shame to hear of these people among whom both her father and brother found

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

their pleasure, shame to have thought more badly of them than they deserved, shame to have betrayed to Law her knowledge that there were women existing of whom to speak was a shame. She sank down upon the sofa again trembling and agitated, relieved yet not relieved. "Law," she said faintly, "we are low enough ourselves, I know. And if we don't do much credit to our birth, is it not dreadful to be content with that, to go down lower, to make ourselves nothing at all?"

"It is not my fault," said Law, a little moved, "nor yours neither. I am very sorry for you, Lottie; for you've got such a high mind — it will go hardest with you. As for me, I've got no dignity to stand on, and if he drives me to it, I shall simply 'list — that's what I shall do."

"'List!" Lottie gazed at him pathetically. She was no longer angry, as she had been when he spoke of this before. "You are out of your senses, Law! You, a gentleman!"

"A gentleman!" he said bitterly, "much good it does me. It might, perhaps, be of some use if we were rich, if we belonged to some great family which nobody could mistake; but the kind of gentlefolks we are! — nobody knowing anything about us, except through what he pleases to do and say. I tell you, if the worst comes to the worst, I will go straight off to the first sergeant I see, and take the shilling. In the Guards there's many a better gentleman than I am, and I'm tall enough for the Guards," he said, looking down with a little complacence on his own long limbs. The look struck Lottie with a thrill of terror and pain. There were soldiers enough about St. Michael's to make her keenly and instantly aware how perfectly their life, as it appeared to her, would chime in with Law's habits. They seemed to Lottie to be always lounging about the streets stretching their long limbs, expanding their broad chests in the sight of all the serving maidens, visible in their red coats wherever the idle congregated, wherever there was any commotion going on. She perceived in a moment, as by a flash of lightning, that nothing could be more congenial to Law. What work might lie behind, what difficulties of subordination, tyrannies of hours and places, distasteful occupations — Lottie knew nothing about. She saw in her brother's complacent glance a something of kin to the swagger of the tall fellows in their red jackets, spreading themselves out before admiring nurse-maids. Law would do that too. She could not persuade herself that there was anything in him above the swagger, superior to the admiration of the maids. A keen sense of humiliation, and the sharp impatience of a proud spirit, unable to inspire those most near to it with anything of its own pride and energy, came into her mind. "You do not mind being a gentleman — you do not care," she cried. "Oh, I know you are not like me! But how will you like being under orders, Law, never having your freedom, never able to do what you please, or to go anywhere without leave? That is how soldiers live. They are slaves; they have to obey, always to obey. You could not do anything because you wanted to do it — you could not spend an evening at home — oh," she cried with a sudden stamp of her foot in impatience with herself, "that is not what I mean to say; for what would you care for coming home? But you could not go to that place — that delightful place — that you and papa prefer to home. I know you don't care for home," said Lottie. "Oh, it is a compliment, a great compliment to me!"

And, being overwrought and worn out with agitation, she suddenly broke down and fell a-crying, not so much that she felt the slight and the pang of being neglected, but because all these agitations had been too much for her, and she felt for the moment that she could bear no more.

At the sight of her tears sudden remorse came over Law. He went to her side and stood over her, touching her shoulder with his hand. "Don't cry, Lottie," he said, with compunction. And then, after a moment, "It isn't for you; you're always jolly and kind. I don't mind what I say to you; you might know everything I do if you liked. But home, you know, home's not what a fellow cares for. Oh, yes! I care for it in a way — I care for you; but except you, what is there, Lottie? And I can't always be talking to you, can I? A fellow wants a little more than that. So do you; you want more than me. If I had come into the drawing-room this morning and strummed on the piano, what would you have done? Sent me off, or boxed my ears if I'd have let you. But that fellow Ridsdale comes and you like it. You needn't say no; I am certain you liked it. But brother and sister, you know that's not so amusing! Come, Lottie, you know that as well as I."

"I don't know it! it is not true!" Lottie cried, with a haste and emphasis which she herself felt to be unnecessary. "But what has that to do with the matter? Allow that you do not care for your home,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Law; but is it necessary to go off and separate yourself from your family, to give up your position, everything? I will tell you what we will do. We will go to Mr. Ashford, and he will let us know honestly what he thinks — what you are fit for. All examinations are not so hard; there must be something that you could do."

Law made a wry face, but he did not contradict his sister. "I wish he would cut me out with a pair of scissors and make me fit somewhere," he said, with a shrug of his shoulders. Then he added, almost caressingly, "Take your supper, Lottie; you're tired, and you want something; I have had mine. And you have not told me a word about to-night. Why did you come in so early? How are you and Ridsdale getting on? Oh! what's the good of making a fuss about it? Do you think I can't see as plain as porridge what that means?"

"What what means?" cried Lottie, springing from her seat with such passionate energy as half frightened the lad. "How dare you, Law? Do you think I am one of the girls you are used to? How dare you speak to me so?"

"Why should you make such a fuss about it?" cried Law, laughing, yet retreating. "If there is nothing between you and Ridsdale, what does the fellow want loafing about here? Lottie! I say, mind what you are doing. I don't mind taking your advice sometimes, but I won't be bullied by you."

"Go to bed, Law!" said Lottie, with glowing eyes. Her face was crimson and then pale with excitement. After all the agitations of the evening it was hard to be brought down again to the merest vulgarities of gossip like this. She paid no more attention to her brother, but gathered together her shawl, her gloves, the shabby little fan which had been her mother's, and put out the lamp, leaving him to find his way to his room as he could. She was too indignant for words. He thought her no better than the dressmaker-girls he had spoken of, to be addressed with vulgar, stupid raillery such as no doubt they liked. This was the best Lottie had to look for in her own home. She swept out, throwing the train of her long white skirt from her hand with a movement which would have delighted Rollo, and went away to the darkness and stillness of her own little chamber, with scarcely an answer to the "Good-night" which Law flung at her as he shuffled away. She sat down on her little bed in the dark without lighting her candle; it was her self-imposed duty to watch there till she heard her father's entrance. And there, notwithstanding her stately withdrawal, poor Lottie, overcome, sobbed and cried. She had nobody to turn to, nor anything to console her, except the silence and pitying darkness which hid her girlish weakness even from herself.

From The Fortnightly Review.

THE POLITICAL ADVENTURES OF LORD BEACONSFIELD.

I.

LORD BEACONSFIELD'S career has been reviewed at different stages of it by many able critics and biographers variously affected to their subject. Perhaps the time has now come when it may be expedient to take another survey of it. Lord Beaconsfield has reached a point beyond which it is not constitutionally possible that he should pass. He cannot be more than prime minister of England and a peer of the realm. Whatever be the duration of his premiership and his Parliamentary life, his career will simply be continued; it can scarcely have new features. The point will be lengthened into a line, and that is all. The record is not closed, but there cannot be much to add to it of a kind likely to affect its general character or the public judgment. Lord Beaconsfield has been the subject of bitter attack and of unscrupulous praise. His career has been described as demoralizing to the national character, and as lowering the standard and aims of English politics. We should say that it is rather unmoralizing than demoralizing. We are, at any rate, not conscious of depraving influences as the result of a continuous survey of it; its effects seem to be merely privative. Lord Beaconsfield appears somehow or other to be outside the sphere of moral judgment. You do not, as a too indulgent critic said of the dramatists of the Restoration, get into a world in which considerations of right and wrong have no place, but you see introduced into the affairs of the ordinary world a creature to whom apparently these considerations do not apply. Like the sorcerer, in Mr. Gilbert's play, he moves about taking part in all that concerns men's businesses and bosoms, wearing the dress, speaking the language, using the slang, and not exempt from the other vulgarities of ordinary life.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Still you feel that he has come from another world, and that he is to be judged by the law of his domicile, wherever that may be, rather than by the rule according to which Englishmen pass moral sentence upon each other. Robin Goodfellow, or the elfin king, or any other weird or graceful creature of extra-natural superstition seems to have as much connection with our prosaic world as the Earl of Beaconsfield. If some fine day he should cast aside his peer's robes, and the dull vesture of decay which seems to hem him in less closely and more incongruously than it sits upon other men, and if he should appear in a blaze of light as the genius of the gardens of joy, or descend in red fire through a trap-door, the transformation would not appear more strange or theatrical than many incidents of his history. On the whole, we are not disposed to think that Lord Beaconsfield has done as much harm to political morality as might be thought likely. People have declined to think of political morality in connection with him; they have found it impossible to associate the two ideas, and therefore it has escaped injury or deterioration. He has done most mischief by the sort of charm which he has exercised over creatures of a different sphere. He has tempted ungainly mortals of respectable character, successful Parliamentary lawyers and squires moulded out of their own heavy clays, to imitate his wanton and sportive gambols with a result to which no Æsopian fable can do justice. He has done Sir William Harcourt and Mr. Henry Chaplin much harm. On the other hand, he has been of some use to the British public. He has helped to prevent them from taking life and politics too ponderously; he has stimulated their sense of wonder, and applied incentives to the somewhat slow and feeble imagination of a rather dull and prosaic community. From the beginning Lord Beaconsfield has at least never failed to pique curiosity. We propose to try and satisfy it by following, in two or three articles, his political life. Before essaying to do so, it may be well to endeavor to get some general idea of the influences of race, of ancestry, and of contemporary circumstances which at least contributed to make the man what he was and is. Lord Beaconsfield's Parliamentary career began with the first session of the first Parliament of the present reign. In some respects no single life more instructively connects and illustrates the various aspects of the Victorian epoch of our history.

Very early in his career, Lord Beaconsfield — or as he then used to style himself, Disraeli the younger — published a pamphlet with the title, "What Is He?" The "He" in question was of course Mr. Disraeli, who has always been a good deal occupied with himself. The inquiry to which in this instance he volunteered a reply is said to have been made in conversation by the late Earl Grey. The Whig chief had heard with amazement, and probably some feeling of half-articulate indignation, of a young man unknown in the lobbies and saloons, unvouched for either by Mr. Ellice or by Lady Holland, who had ventured to stand against one of Lord Grey's sons as a candidate for High Wycombe, that "very respectable street" which subsequently had the honor of being represented by Mr. Bernal Osborne, who paid historic tribute to it in the phrase which we have just quoted. On a later occasion, when a candidate for another constituency, Mr. Disraeli explained to a plebeian inquirer, as curious as Lord Grey, that High Wycombe was a borough in Buckinghamshire belonging to his father, who, he added with a certain territorial pride which has marked him through his career, owned property in three counties. Since Dogberry modestly vaunted his possession of two gowns and everything handsome about him, a more ingenuously pleasing declaration has not been made. Unhappily the pamphlet in which the younger Disraeli stood and unfolded himself for the edification of Lord Grey has perished. It is unknown to the shelves of the British Museum. It remains dispersed over a multitude of scattered trunks, defying the industry of the most indefatigable collector to bring them together and to reconstruct it. The loss is to be deplored. In this little work Lord Beaconsfield stood forth, avowing in substance: "I am my own interpreter, and I will make it plain."

The pamphlet is probably, like its author, unique in English, or in any other literature. There have been men in abundance who have written apologies and confessions, some of which the world could have very well spared. They have given an account of the things they have done and of the motives by which they were actuated. Lord Beaconsfield took a different course. He began his career by writing a preface to a life of which scarcely the first pages wore composed, and of which nobody had at that time shown any disposition to turn the leaves. In one of his essays Dr. James Martineau refers to a German play in which Adam is intro-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

duced crossing the stage, going to be created. This is something like the position in which Mr. Disraeli presents himself in this early explanation of himself to the wondering mind of the old Whig peer. The loss of Mr. Disraeli's early treatise upon himself is irreparable, and there is no use in shedding more tears over it. In one sense the pamphlet and the question to which it offers a reply may be considered as prefiguring the attitude of the public to Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Beaconsfield's attitude towards himself. For fifty years "the great lubber," as he somewhere styles the nation which has made him prime minister, has been rubbing its eyes and scratching its head and asking, with a perplexed amazement like Lord Grey's, "What is he?" Lord Beaconsfield in his turn has made reply, during half a century, in speeches and essays and novels, which together form a considerable bulk of literature. Still his countrymen ask, "What is he?" So we get no further. He is himself alone. To explain is to refer to more general categories. Lord Beaconsfield can scarcely be classified; no one but himself can be his parallel.

Nevertheless attempts have been made from time to time to gather together the scattered voices and to put some sort of interpretation upon them. They are likely to be continued. An enigma however trivial, a mystery however worthless, piques curiosity; and Lord Beaconsfield's strange character and fortunes, neither trivial nor worthless, will always possess a certain degree of interest for the student of human nature in its more eccentric and whimsical developments. In the dull succession of arch mediocrities who for the greater part make up the list of English prime ministers, his fantastic figure must always draw attention and stimulate speculation. How he came to be what he was and where he is, is likely to be a theme of mildly renewed surprise and conjectural explanation for many generations. A Hebrew proverb which Lord Beaconsfield quotes in one of his novels, speaking of what is to happen in the fulness of time, announces that "we shall yet see an ass mount a ladder." We are reluctant to quote the proverb in this connection; but the ass, it must be remembered, is in the East a very fleet, spirited, and beautiful creature, and is held there in high and just esteem. Lord Beaconsfield, if we recollect rightly, applies the proverb to the wonderful elevation of his own wonderful Alroy, who, from being the prince of the captivity, became the king of Judah and the deliverer of his people. In a similar sense, and disembarrassed of the injurious associations with which centuries of oppression and domestic servitude have surrounded a once noble and still useful quadruped, the image may be applied to Lord Beaconsfield. The Hebrew proverb has received its fulfilment: we have seen the ass mount the ladder. Not only so, he has maintained himself there as if the posture and situation were natural. This personal elevation may, perhaps, be considered as part of a more general phenomenon. It applies not only to Lord Beaconsfield, but to the historic race of which he is one of the most remarkable illustratory ornaments. Some time ago a respectable member of Parliament in arguing some question, we forget what, found it necessary to recall to the recollection of his hearers the historic fact that we do not now live under the Mosaic dispensation. Lord Beaconsfield held office at the time, and gazed at the orator from the treasury bench. The Opposition laughed. Even the docile ministerialists tittered and coughed. The impression seemed to prevail that we do live in some sense under a Mosaic dispensation. In administration, in finance, and in journalism, Jewish influences notoriously shape and guide English politics. This is not a new thing in European history, though in England it is now more pronounced and obvious than it has ever been before. The phenomenon itself, however, is two thousand years old. In the latest volume of his "Histoire des Origines du Christianisme," M. Renan, speaking of Josephus, says: "Il avait cette facilité superficielle qui fait que le Juif, transporté dans une civilization qui lui est étrangère, se met avec une merveilleuse prestesse au courant des idées au milieu desquelles il se trouve jeté, et voit par quel côté il peut les exploiter." The same phenomenon is observable now. The politicians and journalists who carry on the largest trade in patriotic phrases and national prejudices, are Jews who, like Josephus, transported into a civilization which is foreign to them have placed themselves with marvellous dexterity in the current of the ideas which float about them, in order to find a means of turning them to account. In one of his early papers, Thackeray describes an incident at a city dinner: "The royal health having been imbibed, the professional gentlemen ejaculated a part of the national anthem; and I do not mean any disrespect to them personally in mentioning that this emi-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

nently religious hymn was performed by Messrs. Shadrach and Meshech, two well-known melodists of the Hebrew persuasion." Later in the evening, "the elderly Hebrew gentleman before mentioned began striking up a wild, patriotic ditty about the 'Queen of the Isles" on whose sea-girt shores the bright sun smiles and the ocean roars, whose cliffs never knew, since the bright sun rose, but a people true who scorned all foes." Practically this has been the course of politics during the last two years. The Parliamentary Shadrachs and the journalistic Meshechs have been singing the national anthem and patriotic melodies to an amused and excited audience who have shouted and banged their glasses, and have believed in the spontaneity and disinterestedness and genuine British feeling of Shadrach and Meshech and the other Hebrew gentleman, who pays these pipers.

Everybody who has read Lord Beaconsfield's novels must recollect one of the cleverest things in any of them, — the conversation in "Tancred" about the "Revelations of Chaos," a work which occupied the world of Lord Beaconsfield's characters at the the time when the world of flesh and blood was talking about the "Vestiges of Creation." "You know all is development: the principle is perpetually going on. First, there was nothing, then there was something; then, I forget the next, I think there were shells, then fishes; then we came. Let me see — did we come next? Never mind that, we came at last: and the next change, there will be something very superior to us; something with wings. Ah, that's it: we were fishes, and I believe we shall be crows." No one, however proud he may be of having been a fish, or however anxious he may be to become a crow, can object to banter of this kind which, like the noises in Prospero's island, "gives delight, and hurts not" even the doctrine which it plays with. Earlier, however, in his course of philosophic speculation, Lord Beaconsfield had professed a different theory, which has more affinity than his later view with what is fundamental in his writings, and especially with his doctrine of race. In "Contarini Fleming" he sets forth the proposition that "the various tribes (of men) that people this globe, in all probability spring from different animals." Civilization, he complains, has deserted the regions and intellects she once most favored. The Persians, the Arabs, the Greeks, are now unlettered slaves in barbarous lands. "The arts are yielded to the flat-nosed Franks." Lord Beaconsfield has never been able to get over his dislike, or even to refrain from the expression of his deep-seated repugnance for the unfortunate Frankish nose. "And they toil and study and invent theories to account for their own incompetence. Now it is the climate, now the religion, now the government; everything but the mortifying suspicion that their organization may be different; that they may be as distinct a race from their models as they undoubtedly are from the Kalmuck and the negro." We may admit to Lord Beaconsfield that distinctions of race, whether they be aboriginal or derivative, of animal or of circumstantial origin, have at last been formed, and ought to be taken into account. There is no one from a consideration of whose life they can be less safely omitted than from his own. There is little need of reserve on the subject, for Lord Beaconsfield has practised none himself, and his relations to his own people are the most honorable and attractive element in his story.

Lord Beaconsfield is the most remarkable illustration of his own doctrine of the ascendancy of Hebrew genius in modern Europe. The latest philosophy propounds that what is peculiar to himself in each individual is really a smaller part of him than the qualities which he derives from his personal ancestry and the race to which he and they belong. Lord Beaconsfield unites, in a manner which the history of his family explains, the qualities of the Hebrew and of the "super-subtle Venetian." In the sketch of his father's life which is prefixed to one of the editions of the "Curiosities of Literature," he narrates the fortunes of his house. In the fifteenth century, some of his ancestors, driven from Spain by Torquemada and the Inquisition, took refuge in Venice. During two centuries they remained there. Possibly sufficiently careful research might detect some trace of them in the relics of the old Hebrew burial-ground on the Lido. Like Timon "entombed upon the very hem of the sea," these poor Jews have "made their everlasting mansion upon the beached verge of the salt flood." Slabs of stone, half buried into the earth or covered with grass and creeping vegetation, recall in their often still legible Hebrew characters the names and families of the Jews banished in their death from the society in which they were barely tolerated during their lives. The favorable position of Mr. Pelham gave a new opening to Jewish enterprise in England towards

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the middle of the eighteenth century. In 1749 Benjamin Disraeli, the grandfather of the present prime minister, who may, perhaps, have had Shylock or Tubal among his ancestors, settled in England. At this time, Lord Beaconsfield records, "There might be found, among other Jewish families flourishing in this country, the Villa Reals, who brought wealth to these shores almost as great as their name, though that is the second in Portugal, and who have twice allied themselves with the English aristocracy: the Medinas, the Laras, who were our kinsmen, and the Mendez de Costas, who, I believe, still exist." Mr. Pelham's good intentions bore fruit, but not very lasting fruit. The Jews' Naturalization Bill, which he succeeded in passing in 1753, was repealed the next year after his death by the Duke of Newcastle, under the influence of a popular and ecclesiastical clamor which must have taught the Venetian emigrant that he had little to expect from liberal opinion in England. Sir John Barnard put the conclusive argument that if the Jews were allowed to hold land in this country, all security would be gone for the maintenance of Christianity as the fashionable religion. But the argument of the streets was yet more decisive. Political recognition would probably have cost the Jews such social toleration as they enjoyed by the connivance of interest rather than that of generosity or friendship. If the policy of Mr. Pelham had been persisted in and extended, the character and career of the present prime minister might have been very different from that which we propose to examine. The Jewish families, his among the rest, were forced to remain foreigners and Israelites. They were not allowed tb become Englishmen. The development of a new species, by the process of evolution and transformation, is, according to the most trustworthy authorities in natural history, a very slow one, except in cases of very rare flexibility. There has not yet been time for the conversion of the Jew into the true Briton. This would require Ovid's metamorphosis, and not Darwin's. Certainly a century and a quarter of residence in England on the part of his ancestors and himself has left little trace on the mind and character of Lord Beaconsfield. He is in almost every essential point far more of a Venetian and a Jew than of an Englishman. The two cities to which his imagination stretches backwards most constantly and affectionately are Jerusalem and Venice. They enter into his political visions, in which Lord Beaconsfield takes things a great deal more seriously than he does his dealings with practical English politics, in which there is always a great deal of make-believe, too obvious to be called deceptive. Thackeray has remarked upon the odd fate which sent Mr. G. P. R. James as consul to the only city in Europe in which it would be impossible for him to encounter the two horsemen, at least with their horses, who figure on the first page of nearly all his romances. It was an odder destiny which derived the champion of the British territorial interest and landed aristocracy from a race debarred from owning property in land, and from a city in which from the nature of the case a territorial aristocracy could not exist. Perhaps the principle of reaction and antagonism made the descendant of a family of Venetian Jews the champion and representative of the large-acred lords and squires of England. More probably it was his possession in the nineteenth century of that faculty which Renan has noted in the Jew of the first century. It is another instance of the wonderful dexterity of the Hebrew in throwing himself into the current of ideas foreign to him, and of humoring the prejudices of the people among whom he may be thrown for his own advantage.

Lord Beaconsfield has described the home of his grandfather at Enfield in a few delicate yet distinct touches. The Venetian settler was a zealous man of business and an accomplished man of the world. He occupied himself impartially in trade and pleasure, dividing his time between activity in making a fortune and the sweet indolence of its enjoyment. He laid out an Italian garden at Enfield, he played whist with Sir Horace Mann, he ate macaroni which was dressed by the Venetian consul — who, we hope, was worthy of the confidence thus reposed in him, and dressed his macaroni as skilfully as the prime minister in "Contarini Fleming" was reported to have made cream cheeses. Lord Beaconsfield, who was a lad of twelve when his grandfather died, draws his character with evident sympathy for it, both in its fine gentleman or macaroni aspect, and on its more strenuous business side. Perhaps there is some consciousness of inherited qualities and aptitudes in his delineation of the Venetian emigrant as a man of "ardent character, sanguine, courageous, speculative, and fortunate; with a temper which no disappointment could disturb and a brain amid reverses full of resource." In the sketch

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

of his father there is more tenderness, and even a touch of something like affectionate compassion. Isaac Disraeli lived only in his library and his literary projects, careless of the politics of the day, and utterly unintelligent of them. In these two men it is not perhaps fanciful to trace, in addition to the workings of natural character and tastes, the influences of isolation from the society in which they lived, owing to the prejudices of race, religion, and the undefined social prescription thence derived, which hemmed in them in a sort of moral Ghetto or Juden Strasse. The grandfather sought a refuge in the ordinary commercial enterprises of the Jew and in the amusements of the exile. The father fled from his own world and his own time into the past and to his books. A sense of isolation and detachment was apparently impressed upon the household.

But to complete the understanding of the silent influence of persons and feelings which is likely to have contributed insensibly to shape the character and aims of the lad who was afterwards to be prime minister of England, another figure needs to be sketched in the family group. Lord Beaconsfield has not omitted it from his picture of a Jewish interior, though it must have required some courage to draw its outlines, as he has done, with stern strokes and an unfaltering hand. In the two men, father and son, we see the flexible and accommodating nature of the Jew who bows to circumstances, and with a patient shrug lets the world pass in which he is disinherited and proscribed. But the Jewish character has another side than that of accommodation and acquiescence. It has a fierceness of hate and resentment which, when it cannot wreak its passions upon its enemies and persecutors, preys upon and rends itself. Lord Beaconsfield describes his grandmother as hating her race, and as detesting the very name which her marriage had given her, and which was a perpetual witness of her Jewish connections. He adds that she was "so mortified by her social position that she lived until eighty without indulging a tender expression." It is perhaps from this strange figure, in which it is easy to recognize in an introverted form the stern lineaments that have marked the zealots and fanatics of the race, that the author of "Daniel Deronda" has drawn the Jew-hating Jewess who is the mother of her hero. Lord Beaconsfield had never probably at any period of his career much in common with the amiable walking gentleman whom the genius of George Eliot has vainly endeavored to convert into a man of thought and action. But Daniel Deronda could not more thoroughly and openly avow the ties of blood, which in spite of an ostensibly Christian profession and training bound him to his people, than Lord Beaconsfield has always done. So far as has depended upon himself, he has been faithful to the purpose of his ancestors, who on their escape from Spain to Venice "assumed the name of Disraeli, a name never borne before or since by any other family, in order that their race might be forever recognized." Lord Beaconsfield has never been untrue in spirit to this virtual vow of a persecuted house, "grateful to the God of Jacob, who had sustained them through unprecedented trials, and guarded them through unheard-of perils." Perhaps on the whole, though the error is on the side of courage and manliness, he has been almost too ostentatiously faithful to it. Judaism and the Jews have been thrust by him with an almost unnecessary pertinacity into English politics and literature. The consciousness of his race and of their faith seems never to escape him. Lord Beaconsfield has made that a matter of honorable pride, and even occasionally of something like bravado, which was to his ancestress one of lifelong shame and torment. He has never been able to leave the matter alone, and to consider the question of Jew or Gentile as a thing socially and politically indifferent. Perhaps this would have been impossible in the midst of the prejudices of race and religion by which he has been surrounded, and in face of the coarse insults which those prejudices have occasionally prompted. Lord Beaconsfield's conduct on this point during the whole of his political and literary career is entitled to genuine and cordial respect. Even the extravagances into which he has been betrayed are extravagances of courageous championship and of manly self-assertion. They deserve indulgent and tender treatment. No one can judge of them fairly who does not keep in mind the mortifying and sometimes painful and cruel domestic experiences out of which they have sprung. Of the builders of the temple in Jerusalem it is recorded that "every one with one of his hands wrought in the work, and with the other hand held a weapon. For the builders every one had his sword girded by his side and so builded." In rebuilding the fortunes of their race in Europe the Jews have labored under precisely similar conditions. Toiling under

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the eyes of watchful and relentless enmity, with one of their hands they have wrought in the work, and with the other hand held a weapon. In no one has this militant attitude, half defensive, half offensive, but only aggressive for the sake of more effectual self-defence, been more conspicuous and successful than in Lord Beaconsfield. But the success is not personal merely or his alone. He is but the signal type, the prerogative instance of the completeness of the conquest by which the Jewish captivity, like captive Greece, has taken captive its fierce victor. Lord Beaconsfield has been in his way, not less than his Alroy, a prince of the captivity, and to have become prime minister of England, even at the cost of quitting the faith of his fathers, is not a less achievement than, like his hero, to have become caliph.

In literature, Lord Beaconsfield has been essentially a Jewish apologist; Josephus and the false Aristobulus simply anticipated his method, or rather he applied theirs with a difference. They set themselves to prove to an indifferent and laughing Gentile world that the philosophy and morals of the Greek and Roman poets and sages were derived from the Hebrew Scriptures; and perpetrated not a few forgeries to make good their point. Lord Beaconsfield has with more boldness claimed as of Jewish race nearly all the most distinguished men of science and art, of thought and action, whom modern Europe has produced, and in doing so has been genealogically a rather credulous Apella. He has pleaded the cause of his race and original faith with one great advantage. He has done so as an ostensible convert to Christianity. But he is essentially, if we may use a distinction as old as the religion itself, a Hebrew and not a Gentile Christian. His view of the religion is perhaps rather peculiar in our day, whatever it may have been two thousand years ago. He apparently regards it as a kind of second part or continuation of Judaism, bearing the same sort of relation to it of affiliation and of inferiority as that which the second part of "Faust" sustains to the first; or which "Paradise Regained" has to "Paradise Lost." The work is genuine; it is, perhaps, a necessary supplement to its predecessor and recompletion of it, but showing signs of the old age and the declining powers of the race from whose religious genius it has sprung. Of course, Lord Beaconsfield does not say as much as this. He does not even insinuate it. Nevertheless, an impression such as that we have conveyed is distinctly produced. If we may trust statements commonly made, Lord Beaconsfield owes in the main to accident his opportunity of pleading, in the character of a professor of the second part of the Jewish religion, on behalf of the social and personal claims and the civil rights of those of his race who accept only the first. Through a personal quarrel Isaac Disraeli broke off relations with the synagogue without entering into any relations with the Church. It is said that the Church of England is indebted to the good nature of that heathen money-changer and verse-maker, Samuel Rogers, for the presence of Lord Beaconsfield among its faithful sons. Rogers did not kidnap the young Benjamin Disraeli as the young Mortara was kidnapped. He was not consumed by any zeal for souls. Thinking it hard that an empty form should stand in the way of a clever boy's prospects, Rogers it is said, we do not know with what truth, took him off to St. Andrew's Church, Holborn. There it is certain that on 31st of July, 1817, Benjamin Disraeli, "said to be about twelve years of age," as the baptismal register records, was made perhaps as much of a Christian as he ever became. Whatever the instrumentality employed, Benjamin Disraeli became a member of the Church of England in the year 1817, and as such entered upon all the privileges, civil and political, which were still denied not only to Jews and unbelievers but to Papists and Dissenters.

The discipline of a private academy, and, it is said, of a solicitor's office, were substituted in his case for that of the public school and the university. Whatever the loss to him may have been morally and socially, Lord Beaconsfield has never been deficient in those intellectual attainments which it is common to connect with university training — too exclusively, as the names of Mill and Grote have sufficiently shown even to a British House of Commons. It is perhaps to be regretted that what seems a premature mannishness should have thrust young Disraeli into the world of action and of authorship, when he would have been more naturally and profitably under the discipline of pupilage and spurred by the emulation and friendships of college life. A certain self-enclosure and isolation to which he has been prone through life might have been in some degree combated, if Lord Beaconsfield had ever been a boy among boys or a young man among young men. Silence and the concentrated self-absorption,

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

which save at rare moments have marked him in Parliament and in general society, might have given way if more genial influences in early manhood had followed upon the unhappy experience to which his race and religion subjected his childhood. It would probably be a mistake to read the more remarkable of his earlier novels, "Vivian Grey" and "Contarini Fleming," as directly and designedly autobiographic. If the author had been consciously drawing his own portrait in either, the lineaments would almost certainly have been more pleasing. The tone of mockery and burlesque with which the young heroes comment on their own proceedings would have been spared. It is quite obvious that the author of "Vivian Grey" and "Contarini Fleming" regards those young gentlemen as very often a pair of intolerably conceited and unamiable jackanapes, who would have been the better for a chastening. Unconsciously, however, the ideas over which the author's mind was brooding, ideas springing out of his own position in society and his relations to life, constantly appear. A very young writer who has had very little experience of mankind and the world, describes himself without knowing it because he has nothing else to describe. Vivian Grey's lament: "If I were the son of a millionaire or a noble, I might have all. Curse on my lot! that the want of a few rascal counters, the possession of a little rascal blood, should mar my fortune," is very likely, with the patriotic change of a single word, to have been on the lips of the younger Disraeli. In the preface to "Contarini Fleming," again, the author sets forth one of the aims which he had in writing. He "endeavored," he says, "to conceive a character whose position in life should be at variance and, as it were, in constant conflict with his temperament. . . . The combination that connected in one being Scandinavia and the South, and made the image of a distant and most romantic city continually act upon a nervous temperament surrounded by the snows and forests of the north, though novel, it is believed, in literature, was by no means an impossible or even an improbable one." If we substitute the mist and rain of England for the snows and forests of Scandinavia, and conceive the image of Jerusalem as well as that of Venice constantly present to the mind of the exile, we have a combination not only possible in literature but actual in the author's own experience. "Contarini Fleming" grew out of a pilgrimage to the East and to Jerusalem, which took in Spain and Venice and all the ancestral lands through which the author's race and house had passed during the long wanderings of their exile. The feeling which animates the passage we have quoted from the preface of "Contarini Fleming," finds constant expression all through the work. There is very likely no conscious personal identification of the author and the hero; but the pervading sentiment is for that all the deeper. "Some exemption," Contarini hopes, "from the sectarian prejudices which embitter life may be surely expected from one who, by a curious combination of circumstances, finds himself without country, without kindred, and without friends. Wherever I moved I looked around me and beheld a race different from myself. There was no sympathy between my frame and the rigid climate whither I had been brought to live." "Their blue eyes, their flaxen hair, and their white visages claimed no kith and kindred with my Venetian countenance." Again Contarini declaims against "the vast quantity of dull, lowering, entangling ties that formed the great domestic mesh, and bound me to a country which I detested, covered me with a climate which killed me, surrounded me with manners with which I could not sympathize." In "Vivian Grey" and "Contarini Fleming" the two barriers which stood in the way of political ambition are presented separately. In a plutocratic aristocracy a poor plebeian laments his possession of rascal blood, or blood more damaging than that of rascaldom, and his lack of rascal counters. In Scandinavia the hero meets the obstacle of foreign race and uncongenial temperament. The foreign adventurers who have been able to overcome difficulties such as these are the object of Contarini Fleming's most constant and earnest admiration. Alberoni and Ripperda are statesmen for whom something like enthusiasm is expressed. Lord Beaconsfield has been more lucky or more dexterous than either of these political fortune-hunters, between the latter of whom and himself there is a certain resemblance, especially in the theological speculations with which they have amused their leisure.

A character and a mind formed in the domestic and social circumstances out of which the stories of "Vivian Grey" and "Contarini Fleming" naturally came, and which they expressed with a faithfulness all the greater for being undesigned, needed above all others the discipline of an English home, and would have been

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the better for the equal companionship of the public school and the university. By no one of these roots was Lord Beaconsfield fixed in British soil. He may be compared rather to one of those air-plants which draw their nourishment and take their color from the atmosphere which surrounds them, and in which they float, but which lay no hold of the solid earth. "Vivian Grey" and "Contarini Fleming" were written at some interval of time, the former appearing in 1826, the latter in 1831. There is, however, a certain natural connection between the two in the unwritten disclosure of their author's purpose and character which they contain. They reveal to us the aims and feelings with which their author entered upon the political career which we propose to review, and of which they are the preface. It is impossible to understand Lord Beaconsfield without them. It may not be possible quite to understand him with them. But neither the books nor the man can be comprehended or judged with due indulgence apart from each other. To the same literary period belong "The Young Duke," "Alroy," and "The Revolutionary Epic." All these works seem to have been produced not because the writer was full of some theme or conception which claimed expression, but because he was a candidate for personal distinction, and was resolved to obtain it by one means or another. "The Revolutionary Epic" is suggested by the reflection that Homer having produced the heroic epic, and Virgil the political epic, Dante the national epic, and Milton the religious epic, for Disraeli the younger there remained the revolutionary epic. In the event of the public failing to recognize, and to be quick about it, the poetic heir of Homer, Virgil, Dante, and Milton, the inspired poet pledged himself "without a pang to hurl his lyre to limbo," both of which words begin most fortunately and expressively with "l." He had no desire to sing to a world which was as the deaf adder to the charmer. Repeating a remark which he had formerly put into the mouths of Vivian Grey and Contarini Fleming, "I am not," he says, "one of those who find consolation for the neglect of my contemporaries in the imaginary plaudits of a more sympathetic posterity." With Lord Beaconsfield it is all a question of applause. The title-page of "The Revolutionary Epic" sets forth in monumental style that it is "the work of Disraeli the Younger, author of 'The Psychological Romance,'" a species of composition of which Disraeli the younger seems to have supposed that he was the inventor in "Contarini Fleming." In that work he had set forth a doctrine of political expression which seems afterwards to have commended itself to Mr. Carlyle. Lord Beaconsfield holds, or then held, that the metrical form of poetry is due to the fact that it was at first composed to be sung to the lyre, and that the artifices of diction and the barbaric clash of rhyme are ill adapted to an age in which reading has taken the place of recitation.

"The Wonderful Tale of Alroy," which, however, does not want its artifices of diction, and its occasional clash of rhyme, was composed in its more impassioned portions on this principle. Disraeli the younger was essentially an inventor and projector in literature. The craving for fame prompted one extravagant design after another. Expressed in the plainest terms, and urged with a reiteration which even the author's liveliness does not always rescue from tediousness in his early writings, Vivian Grey and Contarini Fleming have no other aim in life than to be notorious and powerful, chiefly by duping or terrifying others. Contarini had a deep conviction that life would be intolerable unless he were the greatest of men. The desire of distinction and of astounding action raged in his infantile soul. Nor does he care to win by fair means. His description of a schoolboy fight and of his demeanor in it is prophetic of the spirit in which the writer's political gladiatorship has been conducted. It is the author of the "Letters of Runnymede" and the assailant of Sir Robert Peel who writes of this schoolboy struggle: "I would not have waited for their silly rules of mock combat, but have destroyed him in his prostration." A similar indifference to the rules of the ring and to fair hitting has frequently been observable in Lord Beaconsfield's political encounters. Fame is essential to Contarini, though not posthumous fame. Whether it is to be won as a brigand or as a warrior, as a prime minister or as a revolutionary leader, as a diplomatist or as a conspirator, is a matter of only secondary moment. That may be as time and chance shall determine. The great thing is to wield authority conspicuously and magnificently, to be feared and to be envied. That this power is to be used for the good of others never for one moment occurs to the heroes of Lord Beaconsfield's early novels. It may be said that he is simply describing the wild notions and dreams with which the brains of

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

boys swarm, while they are still in the merely predatory and animal stage which precedes the civilized and human one, in the development of individual character as well as of nature and society. We are quite ready to make such allowance as this consideration requires. But Lord Beaconsfield's heroes never pass into a further stage. There is no sign that he recognizes one. It is quite easy to see the explanation of this shortcoming. The bonds of country and of class have from the very nature of the case scarcely existed for Lord Beaconsfield. The non-personal elements which bind most men by a thousand ties to the community of which they are members, and to the lesser communities, local or of organized sentiment and opinion, into which every nation is divided, have been for him as if they were not. The circumstances of his birth, the legislation and social temper of the country to which his ancestry transferred themselves a century and a quarter since, the inherited qualities of a race whose habits of mind and character have been formed by nearly two thousand years of persecution and social slight, have hindered Lord Beaconsfield from cultivating that subordination of mere personal greed, whether of fame, or wealth, or power, to the well-being of a sect, a party, a class, a nation, without which a genuine community is impossible. In this moral banishment the social and even human element in man is suppressed, or grows up but feebly from its root in what is individual, self-seeking and animal. The one apparent exception in Lord Beaconsfield's case is, when properly viewed, simply an illustration of the general rule. He has been true to the Jewish people who are really his country and church. He has quitted them in semblance, but in so doing he has helped them, to plead for them the more effectually. For the rest a certain fidelity, as of a Swiss mercenary to the chief or party in whose service he has enlisted, belongs to him conspicuously.

It is scarcely Lord Beaconsfield's fault, all things considered, that his career has not been in its main features that of an English statesman, but rather that of a foreign political adventurer. An unfair standard is applied to it when it is judged by the tests by which we try politicians of English blood and training. The Philippe Daims, the Alberonis, the Ripperdas of countries and times different and remote from our own, are the politicians with whom at least during a great part of his public life he may most naturally and fairly be compared. Among political adventurers, admitting the lawfulness of the calling, he holds an intellectually conspicuous, and even by comparison a morally respectable place. The hatred of the Whig oligarchy which runs through the "Letters of Runnymede," and which has inspired many a gibe and scoff from Lord Beaconsfield's lips and pen during half a century, is probably as genuine a sentiment as either he or any one else has ever entertained. It springs from the same root as his admiration of Bolingbroke. A personal rule, the monarchy of a patriot king holding himself above the strife of party, and therefore beyond its control, gives the adventurer and the favorite opportunities which it is not easy to find under any other system. It opens doors which an oligarchy, Venetian or Whig, tries to keep closed. Lord Beaconsfield has not only defended Bolingbroke's doctrines in his "Letters to a Noble and Learned Lord in Vindication of the English Constitution," and elsewhere, but he has striven in later years to give effect to them. He has done so, it is true, by the instrumentality of that very system of government by party, which in his more candid moments he decries, and of that aristocratic class for which he every now and then intimates a sort of good-natured contempt. Circumstances made Lord Beaconsfield a political soldier of fortune. In the reign of Queen Anne he would probably have been the pamphleteer of a faction. Under George III. he would have been the dependant and Parliamentary spokesman of a great noble, as Barré was of Lord Shelburne, whom Lord Beaconsfield admires only less than he admires Bolingbroke, and in part for the same reasons. Under the reign of Queen Victoria he has passed through both these embryo stages, as is the law with fully developed animals. He has been the pamphleteer of a party, and the Parliamentary spokesman of aristocratic chiefs. He was the Barré of Lord George Bentinck and of Lord Derby. But he has brought the art of political adventure to a higher point than it has reached in England since the full development of Parliamentary institutions. Probably two things were needed for this perfect and final success. The formation under the personal and hereditary influences which we have endeavored to trace of a typical adventurer was one of these conditions. The reign of a female sovereign was the other. It was Queen Anne who made Bolingbroke possible. Queen Victoria has been as essential to Lord Bea-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

consfield. The faint parody of Bolingbroke's career and doctrine which Lord Beaconsfield has been able to exhibit has required a state of things resembling, though but distantly, that which prevailed under the latest preceding queen regnant.

ERICA.*

TRANSLATED FOR THE LIVING AGE FROM THE GERMAN OF

FRAU VON INGERSLEBEN.

XLIV.

THE PORTFOLIO.

WERNER naturally prolonged his stay at Altenborn, nay, he remained until Sidonie returned to Dorneck, for both Countess Rodenwald and the baroness thought it better for her to spend the time of her betrothal in her own home. For this reason Fritz again received an extension of his leave of absence, that he might accompany Sidonie on her journey. The latter found it very hard to leave Altenborn — the suffering she had endured there formed a special bond — but the thought of living so near her relatives consoled her, and made the separation easier for all.

Letters had been instantly sent to Count Hardeck, but while Sidonie merely informed her guardian that she would yield to his wishes, Werner entered into full particulars. The count's answer this time came very quickly. He cordially expressed his surprise and pleasure, but could not entirely refrain from censuring Sidonie's conduct.

"God must keep a special watch over you capricious young ladies," he wrote, "that you do not cause yourselves greater misery. There is something mad, you must pardon your old relative this strong expression, in violently opposing a marriage for which there are a thousand sensible reasons, and then throwing yourself unasked into the arms of the same man, when all these sensible motives have disappeared, and the match has become a very imprudent one. And, moreover, you pretend to yield submissively to my will, while on the contrary, you have followed your own obstinate caprices, and the fact that God, in his goodness, has allowed your folly to have such a fortunate result, does not alter the affair in the least. I am heartily glad that I can speedily resign my authority over you to Werner Meerburg; he can see whether he will manage you any better than a gouty old man. But may God bless you, my dear child, and make you as happy as I sincerely hope you will be."

After the departure of the visitors, the baroness's drawing-room became far quieter, yet the latter missed them far more than Erica and Elmar, though even now a shadow sometimes flitted over the latter's horizon of life and love, that he could not instantly drive away, and which made Erica the more anxious because she vainly asked its cause.

The ambassador, it is true, had granted Werner's request with friendly zeal, but hitherto had been unable to give any favorable report of the inquiries set on foot. Katharina, probably by Wehlen's advice, kept perfectly quiet, but remained on a war footing with the occupants of the other wing of the castle, as she neither visited them herself, nor allowed little Carlos to go to the old lady as usual.

Her restlessness, however, rendered it impossible to play the invalid long, and she soon again gave parties or paid visits in the neighborhood. Although this was not agreeable to Elmar, as it made the family quarrel public, he nevertheless rejoiced that Katharina had not yet commenced the threatened law-suit.

Elmar's inquiries resulted in the discovery that the figure the two friends had seen was probably Wehlen. The head groom, who, since the accident, had cherished a special hatred towards him, reported that Wehlen had obtained admission to the castle and the princess's apartments through a little door in the old citadel. Immediately after this discovery, Willich set to work to put in order the old rusty bolt, which, when pushed forward, rendered it impossible to open the door, and had completed his task that very day. Wehlen, when he found it impossible to enter by the way he had hitherto used, had doubtless come in through the main door, and, not suspecting so simple an obstacle as a drawn bolt, gone out in the same manner.

The head groom, at the same time, expressed his serious anxiety about the influence Wehlen had obtained over the princess. She would no longer do the simplest thing without his advice, or rather, permission, for he did not seem to rule her entirely by flattery, but, strangely as it might sound, quite as much by fear. In spite of his frequent visits to the castle, notes constantly passed to and fro be-

* Copyright 1877, by Littell & Gay.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

tween the princess and her chamberlain. The maid, who had recently read one of these missives, was amazed at the tone Herr von Wehlen ventured to adopt towards her mistress. She had been the more surprised, because she, as well as the other servants, was firmly convinced that Wehlen was trying to obtain the princess's hand, and this was rather a singular mode of courtship.

The latter hint caused Elmar little anxiety. Wehlen was too well acquainted with the affairs of the family to strive for such a doubtful happiness as a marriage with Katharina. Besides, Elmar thought that such a chain would seem unendurable to the restless adventurer, especially as he would have too much to fear from the vengeance of the family to be able to carelessly shake it off again whenever he chose. On the contrary, it seemed more in keeping with Wehlen's character to reap as much personal advantage from the situation as possible, and when Katharina's fortune had been squandered, or at least greatly diminished, instantly continue his wanderings.

The lever of mingled flattery and fear which he used to gain his object, betrayed the craft of the adventurer. With Katharina's blind vanity, the power of the former was readily discovered, but it required a deeper insight into her character to detect that, in spite of all her recklessness and violence, she had a great respect for a will that resolutely opposed her own. Whether it was because, at such moments, she perceived that she could not defend her own caprices by any reasonable arguments, or from a certain instinctive dread that unconsciously slumbered in her heart, and which makes even wild beasts fear the eye of man, the mirror of his intellectual superiority, suffice it to say that Elmar had sometimes had occasion to notice this trait in her character.

A proper use of this discovery would doubtless have been very advantageous to him, in his conduct towards his sister, but it was repugnant to his nature to play such a tyrannical part, and, moreover, the thought that Katharina had lost a large fortune by his father's second marriage and his own birth, involuntarily induced him to treat her with special indulgence. He could, however, easily imagine that Wehlen, who knew no consideration, would soon make himself her absolute master unless some lucky accident enabled her to escape her jailor.

The idea involuntarily occurred to him, as he remembered the last conversation with his sister, which afforded him undeniable proofs of her increasing unreasonableness. Could Wehlen, from his point of view, be particularly blamed if he made himself master of a will which had forever lost the power of controlling itself, and seemed destined to be a slave? Was not Elmar himself greatly in fault for having left this irrational will without a guide, and thus made it the prey of an adventurer?

The thoughts to which Elmar yielded were very unpleasant, very painful. A perhaps undue sensitiveness made him shrink from a step which might possibly afford him some personal advantage, and he secretly put forward the pretext of his want of legal right to excuse his hesitation. Would not some one of the numerous persons with whom his sister was in constant intercourse have made the same discovery and spoken of it to him if Katharina's want of rationality were really so great as it sometimes appeared to him? With the exception of Aunt Vally, no one had even hinted at such a thing. Relatives and intimate friends had often been offended and spoken angrily about her, it is true, but even the baroness, when he cautiously questioned her, only replied with a shrug of the shoulders, "Katharina was always full of whims."

So he let the matter rest for the present, and waited with still greater anxiety for the news which was to remove the second obstacle. Unfortunately, however, the intelligence was not what he expected, for a letter from the ambassador informed him that all the church records in the capital had been examined, so the marriage must have taken place somewhere else.

Elmar was very much depressed by this news, and determined to instantly go to the city himself to make personal inquiries. He was just going up-stairs to the baroness to discuss the matter, when a letter from the princess was handed to him.

Katharina stated that she had now allowed him sufficient time to procure the marriage certificate, and no longer had any pretext for delaying the performance of her duty. On reflecting upon the circumstances, she hoped that Elmar would voluntarily renounce his pretended rights, in which case she would be disposed to provide for his future in a manner suitable to the change in his position. Otherwise she must of course appeal to the law, and Elmar could then blame himself if she showed no farther consideration for him.

He crushed the letter indignantly in his hand, and hurled it into a corner of the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

room. It was not so much the purport that enraged him, for he had expected it, but the style of the whole epistle, which plainly showed that Wehlen, not his sister, was the real writer. To see himself threatened by this man with the loss of his property, his whole social existence, at once angered and humiliated him.

At last he controlled himself, and as this letter destroyed the hope of keeping Erica in ignorance of the cloud that had darkened the horizon of her life, he resolved to inform her of the matter at once, and tell the whole truth, as she would at least hear it from his lips in the most considerate way.

"How would you bear the loss of Altenborn, Erica? How would you reconcile yourself to your fate?" said Elmar, as he finished his tale.

"How would I reconcile myself to my fate, Elmar?" asked Erica, half laughing. "Am I a fairy princess, who has been rocked in a golden cradle, and did you first see me clad in silk and velvet, or in a somewhat faded calico frock? To one who has spent a happy childhood in circumstances so narrow as mine, poverty is no terrible spectre. On the contrary, I can paint the future in charming hues. We will live in the dear old house at Waldbad, — that certainly belongs to you, Katharina cannot rob you of it; grandmamma will come with us, occupy mamma's room, take possession of her arm-chair, and sit in the sheltered place on the veranda where my mother always went in pleasant weather. Elmar and I will go to walk, or I will row on the sea, and on particularly bright days induce grandmamma to trust herself to my boat; but then Sandor must stay at home, he is an unruly passenger, and might upset it."

"So grandmamma and Sandor are placed on a parallel," said the old lady in a jesting tone. "It will undoubtedly be an enchanting life, Erica, but who will provide our food, or are we to be satisfied with air, sunlight, and walks?"

"Oh, old Christel will cook, and I'll begin to take lessons from the cook here to-morow morning."

"I think your idyl will be far better performed if we leave Altenborn every summer, and spend a few months in Waldbad with grandmamma and Sandor," replied Elmar. "So let us hope that my journey may accomplish the desired result; and to lose no time, I will apply for my passport this very day."

"Then you must be going to some foreign country, Elmar?"

"Yes, to Stockholm; my parents were married there."

"So your mother was a Swede?"

"No; a German. Unfortunate circumstances compelled my grandparents to emigrate to Sweden, where they lived in comparative poverty, until their oldest daughter became a successful and famous actress, and was able to support them by her exertions."

"Then your mother was an actress?" Erica almost screamed.

"Yes; do you think it so very strange?" asked Elmar, somewhat displeased.

"Very strange. Wonderful, Elmar!" exclaimed Erica, with sparkling eyes; "if your mother's name was Agatha, and your father's Roderick."

"Certainly. But how did you know it?"

Erica sprang from her seat, threw her arms around Elmar's neck, and whispered amid tears of joy; "My idyl will, as you wished, be acted only at Altenborn, Elmar; for I know that your parents were married in Malmö by the pastor Dahlström."

Elmar gazed at her in speechless astonishment, and before he had collected his thoughts sufficiently to reply, Erica continued, —

"You don't believe me, Elmar? I will bring you proofs of my assertion."

She hurried out of the room, and soon returned with an old portfolio, originally very handsome, but now shabby and soiled, which she eagerly opened before Elmar and the old lady, who had approached in the greatest agitation.

"Here are your father's own letters, Elmar; read them, and then let us thank God for the wonderful goodness that placed them in my hands."

A solemn silence fell upon the spacious apartment. The baroness and Elmar reverently read the letters which the dead man had written to his betrothed, his bride, and his wife, while Erica was mute in sympathy with their emotion. When the grandmother and grandson had finished reading the letters, she told them how she had found the portfolio among the rubbish cast on the shore by the storm. She hesitated a moment whether to communicate the unfriendly contents of the envelope containing the letters, as the "hoch und wohlgeboren nephew," to whom it was addressed, could be no other than Elmar himself. But she thought she ought to tell the whole truth, and therefore faithfully mentioned that also.

"I am sincerely sorry for my good un-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

cle's anger," said Elmar thoughtfully; "the more so as he has gone to the other world; yet I feel innocent of blame, for I had no idea that one of my mother's brothers was still living."

"The fault rests in a certain degree upon me," said the old lady, "and yet I hope I do not deserve any severe punishment. My son did everything for his wife's family that he promised in these letters, but unfortunately all, except the youngest brother, died very young. The latter had determined to become a merchant, and, against Roderick's wishes, remained in Sweden. He too became dangerously ill, and at his wife's urgent entreaties, Roderick accompanied her to Sweden to see the sick, perhaps dying, man once more. Contrary to our expectations, the brother recovered, while his sister soon lay upon her death-bed. After her decease, Roderick gave his brother-in-law the portfolio, which belonged to Agatha, without suspecting the existence of the letters, which were probably in some secret drawer, or he would undoubtedly have taken them out.

"When he reached Altenborn with the dead body of his wife, he was so overwhelmed by grief that he could not even give me the particulars of her illness. He too soon followed her to the grave, and I confess that I felt deeply wounded and indignant at the want of sympathy on the part of his brother-in-law — who owed his whole fortune to the dead man, and was, though innocently, the cause of all this misery. Perhaps it was a certain timidity which kept him from approaching an aristocratic family, but to me it seemed like the greatest heartlessness and ingratitude.

"Moreover, every recollection of him recalled the memory of my own loss, and it is certainly pardonable if I did not seek to awaken this grief. As he made no effort to see his nephew, I saw no reason to try to keep up the intercourse, especially as I heard he had gradually become a rich man. Elmar, who when his parents died was a mere child, had therefore no suspicion of the existence of this uncle.

"I now hear with surprise, that the latter felt so deeply offended by the want of attention on his nephew's part. He may have attributed it to a pride, which was ashamed to own a merchant as a relative, and here again the trait of character natural to us all asserts itself. We always remember our rights far more distinctly than our duties, and it is easy to see that most conflicts arise from this source."

"But was the old gentleman really drowned at the time of the shipwreck?" asked Erica.

"Yes, for I read his name among the list of passengers lost on a steamer which was wrecked on its way from Stockholm to St. Petersburg. Why he took these letters with him, or whether he perhaps intended to settle there, will now never be known."

"What a strange dispensation of Providence that the waves should cast the portfolio on the shore of Waldbad, and I should be the person to find it! I felt very much disappointed about this yarn and button correspondence," continued Erica, holding up one of the letters, "and mamma teased me about my baffled hope of having saved the letters of a young prince — and now I have really saved those of my prince!"

"And with them your prince's inheritance, Erica; for without these letters how could I have known that my parents were married in Malmö, so I should have sought the certificate in vain. But as your mother belongs to a Rhenish family, I wonder she did not discover the writer."

"I think she had a tolerably correct suspicion, Elmar, but she probably did not think the letters important enough to induce her to renew connections she had completely broken off. Afterwards she became so ill that she doubtless forgot the matter, but I was so much interested in the contents of the portfolio that I took it with me. A short time ago I read the letters, though without the slightest suspicion that I was in the very place to which the last one was addressed. Everything agrees exactly. The terraces which were to be illuminated, the island from which the fireworks were to be reflected in the magical little lake, and you are the little bawler, Elmar, who was to be kissed."

"And who makes the same pretentions now, Erica!" said Elmar, clasping her in his arms with a radiant smile.

XLV.

THE GLASS OF SUGAR AND WATER.

ELMAR instantly informed his sister of the discovery of their father's letters. He desired to have a personal interview with her, but the servant in the anteroom refused to admit him, saying that her Highness positively declined to receive any visits, so he was compelled to content himself with a letter, and carried his caution so far as to omit mentioning the place where the marriage certificate was to be found, but requested a short delay, to

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

enable him to procure the missing document.

As Elmar was convinced that Wehlen had some of his own servants in his pay — for in what other way was his entrance through the main door of the castle to be explained? — he even took the precaution not to place his letter to the magistrate of Malmö in the mail-bag at the castle, but delivered it to the postman himself, and received a speedy and most satisfactory reply, for it contained an attested copy of the certificate.

Katharina had not answered his letter, but he knew that she had hitherto delayed the steps she had threatened. The favorable turn in Elmar's affairs seemed to have made her ill, for she saw no one, and remained quietly in her own apartments.

As Elmar would not again expose himself to the chance of being refused admission by the servant, he made no attempt to see his sister, but once more communicated with her by letter. After informing her that he was in possession of the document she required, he said that he was ready to show her all brotherly affection, but should expect the same treatment from her. If, therefore, she wished to remain at Castle Altenborn, she must change her conduct, and cease all intercourse with the adventurer, who, though he had left the castle, still remained in the neighborhood.

This adventurer was with his mistress, when the letter was handed to Katharina by her confidential servant. Wehlen, without any apology, took it from her, and read it attentively from beginning to end. A heavy frown darkened his brow, and he said in a tone of angry reproach, —

"So all my trouble has been in vain. You might have known it, must have known it, your Highness. It is most unwarrantable to have sent me on such a wild-goose chase."

Katharina's roving eyes rested upon him with a half indignant, half timid expression, as she replied, "It was your own proposal, I objected."

"Ah! the old convenient excuse, with which superiors are so fond of throwing the blame on the shoulders of their subordinates. But if the affair turns out successfully, it never originates with the latter, then all the credit belongs to their employers. But if humble-pie must be eaten with arrogant masters, I can assure you it is far more difficult with haughty mistresses," he added with his disagreeable laugh.

A pleased smile involuntarily hovered around Katharina's lips, and she said apologetically, "It may be that it was my own wish, you probably know, for I have forgotten it. But" — and her voice rose to a loud, almost shrill tone — "what I have not forgotten, will not forget, is my hatred for that beggar wench, whom, in my generosity, I took out of the streets, and who has rewarded all my benefits by shamefully robbing me of my rights."

"Very good, excellent, your Highness! But what is the use of this hatred, what will it accomplish?" Katharina, who had been reclining in her chair, sprang to her feet, and approached Wehlen. "I want you to drive the girl out of the house," she passionately exclaimed; "I order you to think of something that will ruin her in Elmar's opinion."

Wehlen contemptuously shrugged his shoulders, and made no reply.

"Do you refuse?" cried Katharina. "Am I surrounded by traitors, will you too desert me? Did you not voluntarily offer your assistance, and have I ever declined to comply with your demands, unwarrantably large as they have been? Do you suppose I am no longer rich enough to be able to pay you for your services. What do you ask? Speak! I will give any sum, only rid me of this girl!"

While the princess poured forth these words with passionate gesticulations, Wehlen stood before her with folded arms, and eyes fixed quietly upon the floor. He seemed to be reflecting, and when she paused, said coldly, in a tone that formed a striking contrast to her agitation, —

"I believe, princess, you have often had occasion to observe that this violent style of conversation is not to my taste, and does not make the slightest impression upon me. You will not induce me to gratify your wish in this way."

"But my request is so reasonable, so natural. I only want you to make Elmar detest Erica."

"That is, you only want me to get you the man in the moon," cried Wehlen, laughing. "Shall we accuse her of stealing, or charge her with a secret affection for the head groom?"

"Both, both!" exclaimed Katharina; "he can no longer love her, if —— "

"If he believes it, of course; but of course he won't believe it." Wehlen paused, fixed his eyes on the floor, and then asked slowly,—

"Would the young girl's removal really be such an advantage to you, your Highness? Would not another marriage soon threaten you?"

"Only get rid of Erica, and all, all will be

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

well. I know Elmar, he will never love again."

"I certainly put very little faith in your knowledge," replied Wehlen with a scornful laugh. "But no matter. I am your servant, and if you give me sufficient means, will endeavor to gratify your wish."

"Ask what you please. Take everything, only prevent this marriage!"

"Very well. We have just heard of a farce performed to bring two people together, we will now play one for the opposite purpose. As here are fortunately no laws against imitating a drama, I think of borrowing a little from 'Romeo and Juliet' and also 'The Natural Daughter.'"

Katharina threw herself back into her chair, and murmured sulkily, "I don't understand you, and am not inclined to joke."

"Yet your Highness must listen to this joke, if you wish to gain your end."

"Then speak!" replied Katharina peevishly, leaning back into the chair again.

"The Princess Bagadoff must herself undertake the introduction to the intended farce. Drawing the mask of cordial affection closely over her face, her Highness will instantly hasten to the hostile camp, kiss her grandmother's hand, warmly congratulate her brother, and lovingly embrace his betrothed bride."

"I? Have you lost your senses, Wehlen?" cried Katharina furiously. "I will never embrace her!"

"Just as you choose. Then think of another plan."

"I cannot, that is your business."

"Then you must do what I ask, and my farce will not succeed without the embrace. Some other time I will give you the programme of sisterly affection more in detail, for the present it is only necessary that the war should be ended and eternal peace proclaimed. You will then have an opportunity to meet Erica freely, and can mix in her food or drink a powder, which —— "

"Poison? No; the cook can do that, I will not."

Wehlen stared at the speaker, her features betrayed no unusual excitement, and her eyes as usual wandered restlessly around the room. He waited till they rested on him, then made a formal bow, and said coldly,—

"If your Highness wishes to take such radical means of unfastening the gordian knot, I am sorry that I am unable to assist you."

She looked at him in surprise. "Did not you speak of it yourself? You said I was to mix poison in her drink."

"I spoke of a powder, which if taken in too large doses may produce death, but when given in smaller quantities, only causes a deathlike slumber."

"Well, what then?"

"This apparent death will bring the living Erica into the ancestral vault of Altenborn, where I, like a second Romeo, will release her from her coffin, and, more fortunate than he, restore the girl to life. Of course this life must henceforth be passed in some very remote quarter of the globe, but as steamboats and railroads can do wonders, a return might be apprehended, even from there, if we did not, on restoring her freedom, give her a husband. With a sufficient dowry, this will be an easy matter, and —— "

"It will be very difficult," interrupted Katherina, "for I remember Heseler wrote a short time ago that he could send me no more money, and my strong box is empty. How much will you need?"

"If I include the expenses of the journey, and all the rest, perhaps thirty or forty thousand thalers, a bagatelle to the wealthy, aristocratic Princess Bagadoff."

"Write to Heseler yourself, he is obstinate."

"My letter would probably have less effect than one from your Highness. However, any jeweller would give twice the sum for your jewelry, so we can pawn it until Heseler becomes more reasonable."

"If only the court were not to be at Coblentz just now! They say the king and queen are coming to Stolzenfels early this year."

"There go the happy pair!" cried Wehlen, suddenly approaching the window. Katharina also started up and looked out. Elmar and Erica were walking up and down the terrace arm in arm, apparently engaged in eager, animated conversation, while Sandor sneaked after them, as if depressed by the utter neglect to which he was condemned.

"How I hate her, how bitterly I hate her!" muttered Katharina between her clenched teeth. "I'll give you all my jewels this very day!" she suddenly exclaimed; "pawn them, and then get the creature out of my sight."

She rang the bell violently and ordered the maid to bring her jewel-case at once. The secret drawer opened at the pressure of a spring, and the glittering gems which composed various ornaments flashed before Wehlen's greedy eyes.

"Take all these pearls and diamonds!" she eagerly exclaimed; "the necklace alone is said to be worth almost the sum you

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

need. Now make haste, that I may not witness this sight a second time."

"I will most faithfully execute your commission, your Highness, and in order to lose no time, I'll give you the powder now."

"The powder?" said Katharina, shrinking back. "How can you give me the powder now?" she added suspiciously, "when we have just planned the affair."

"I have already told you it was only a strong narcotic," replied Wehlen quietly. "I use it in very small doses to shorten my own wakeful nights, so I always carry it about with me."

He drew a paper out of his pocket, and handing it to Katharina, said slowly, "Half of this quantity will produce the desired effect of apparent death; a larger dose would really kill any one, and I must therefore urgently entreat you to be cautious."

Katharina tapped the floor impatiently with her foot. "Why do you give me more than I need?" she murmured; "divide it."

"Why, your Highness," said Wehlen carelessly, "because some might happen to get spilled; and besides, it is better to be prepared for all emergencies."

"Very well, give it to me. I will be careful."

"And I will bring you the money as soon as possible," said Wehlen, taking the casket.

"No, leave it! I remember — I can't do without the diamonds. Prince Lowenberg's ball takes place day after to-morrow, and I have accepted the invitation. We must think of something else, for I must keep the diamonds."

Wehlen bit his lips and muttered a half-suppressed oath, then made a low bow and said, in a measured tone, —

"Then I will take my leave for to-day, your Highness, and hope, on returning to-morrow, to hear that you have made a far better plan than mine."

"Nonsense! You know I don't trouble myself about such matters, I have other things to think of. I won't allow you to go until we have settled upon something."

"In that case, it can only be what I have already proposed; and this time beauty must replace the sparkling stones, or your Highness remain at home."

"What an absurd idea! It would instantly cause all sorts of gossiping stories. I know a plan. You said yourself that my jewels were worth twice the sum. I will keep a set of pearls, and give you the rest."

"That will scarcely do, for value and the market price are very different things, and I doubt now whether all the gems will bring the necessary sum."

"I won't give up the pearls!" persisted the princess obstinately; "I don't see why my wishes are not to have some weight."

Her companion made no reply, but turned towards the window as if his attention was wholly absorbed by the beautiful landscape. He was reflecting that he could not conquer this obstinacy at present, and considering whether to avail himself of the smaller advantage which presented itself, or wait for a more favorable opportunity. At last he formed his resolution, and, turning to Katharina, said craftily, —

"The reproach you have just uttered, your Highness, wounds me the more deeply because I believe it to be so entirely undeserved. It has always been my endeavor to be guided entirely by your will, and I have put forth all my powers to enable you to gratify it. Firmly as I am convinced that we shall not be able to obtain our object without the set of pearls, I will therefore make every effort to accomplish your wishes. Early to-morrow morning I will go to your jeweller with the diamonds, to see what can be done, and therefore beg you to give me a written order to enable me to pawn the stones."

"I knew it!" cried Katharina, laughing. "Women only need to understand how to manage you men; when you find energetic opposition, you always yield. But your idea about the jeweller seems very unpractical; people always manage such things with very different persons, usurers and similar wretches."

"I am surprised at your Highness's knowledge of business,' replied Wehlen, making another low bow to conceal the smile that hovered around his lips; "I will of course follow your excellent advice, little as I know about those people. Give me the order, and I will do my best to obtain the money. But until then I must beg you not to use the powder, but employ the time in concluding terms of peace with your relations."

"That is my affair; I know what I have to do," said Katharina loftily. "Here is the order, and now be as quick as possible."

Wehlen took the note and the casket, and after again urging the necessity of caution, left the room. Katharina looked after him with a contemptuous glance.

"He was obliged to go without the pearls," she murmured in a tone of great

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd satisfaction; "he is furious because he could not get his own way, but my will was stronger, I conquered." She had uttered the last sentence aloud, and now rose and continued her muttered soliloquy. "And I have the powder too, and can use it whenever I choose. If the innocent heather-blossom has to remain a little longer in the crypt than is agreeable to her, she can take it as a just punishment for her shameful treatment of me."

Katharina's eyes began to glow with the strange light that sometimes startled Elmar, as she continued, in broken sentences, "Ah! I can so well imagine her terror, when she wakes among the coffins; when she gradually regains her senses, and realizes that she is buried alive! Ah, how she will shudder, how she will shriek in frantic terror, and there will be no one to hear, no one to help her! And then, at midnight, all the coffin-lids will open, the dead will rise, and the crumbling, mouldering bones will join together and crowd around. 'What do you want among the dead? How dare you enter our sacred ranks? You shall atone for your crime. Atone! atone!' Those are the words they will shriek, and the bones will rattle, and the hollow sockets of the eyes stare furiously at the intruder, and the skeleton hands shake threateningly, and the terrible army move nearer and nearer.

"What! To me?" Katharina suddenly shrieks in mortal terror. "To me? Is this the tomb of my ancestors? Am I buried alive? Will the dead threaten me? They come nearer, nearer. Help! Help! They surround me, help! They clutch at me; their skeleton hands are thrust towards me with threatening gestures. They will drag me away with them. Help! Save me from the dead. Help! Help!"

The piercing shrieks at last brought the footman into the room, and it was evidently not the first time that he had found his mistress in such a condition of apparently causeless excitement, for he showed no special surprise, but rang the bell to summon the maid, and turning to the princess said soothingly, —

"There are neither dead nor living people here to harm you, your Highness, and I would advise you to take a soothing-powder."

"Powder!" cried Katharina suddenly, with an entire change of manner. "How dare you propose that I should take a powder? Even my patience will not tolerate such liberties, Markort."

"Then your Highness can take some drops," replied the man with great calmness, and as the maid now entered, he left his mistress to her care, and withdrew to the ante-room.

"Well, I should like to know what is brewing again," he said to himself, as he sat down in his comfortable chair. "That Herr Wehlen must have excited her terribly, and I noticed when he went out that he carried something heavy under his cloak, though, contrary to all etiquette, he wore the cloak into the princess's room, probably with the intention of concealing the object, whatever it was, from me. If her Highness could have seen his expression as he came out, she would probably have felt a little afraid of him. Besides, he whispered mysteriously that I must keep an eye on my mistress and warn her to be extremely cautious; she must take no steps until he returned; I was to repeat that to her every day. But as he knows just as well as I, that that would be the very way to make her take the step more quickly, I think he probably wants her to take the chestnuts out of the fire, and keep out of mischief himself. I really wish I had not discovered the bolt on the little door, or it had been nailed up; then he would have been forced to stay in the trap and eat the stew he has made with the rest of us. As it is, he will probably be in some safe place long before the storm breaks here. I'm only curious to see what is really going to happen, but I suppose I shall learn soon enough."

With this philosophical consolation, Markort soothed himself, and his thoughts soon turned to other subjects, while the maid exerted all her skill to calm her excited mistress, and at last succeeded in doing so; but as Katharina was afraid to be alone, and old Fräulein Arensfeld was ill, she was obliged, to her great annoyance, to spend the whole evening with the princess.

The following morning Katharina's agitation seemed to have entirely disappeared; she was in unusually gay spirits, and declared her intention of paying her grandmother a visit. The maid, in silent astonishment, wrapped a cloak around her, and the princess left the room. When she entered the baroness's apartment, Elmar and Erica, who had been seated side by side, talking together, started up in surprise, and Elmar hastily came forward to meet his sister.

"Well, Elmar," said Katharina, laughing, "you look as if it were a very wonderful thing for me to come here; yet it is very natural I should wish to offer my congratulations and embrace my — my new

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

sister-in-law. Who would have supposed, when you were joking about the ugly little girl in Waldbad, that she would so soon be your betrothed bride? What do you say, Erica? Your hopes hardly dared to soar so high in those days?"

"No; my thoughts were very far from an engagement," replied Erica, with great self-control.

"What did you say to this astonishing event, grandmamma?" said Katharina, turning to the old lady.

"I heartily rejoiced over what I had long anticipated, for as Elmar made me the confidante of his love immediately after his return from Waldbad, the news could not possibly surprise me."

Katharina tried to fix her restless eyes on Elmar. "So you systematically deceived me, my good brother!" she vehemently exclaimed; "this is the more unwarrantable ——"

"I thought you had come to offer your congratulations, Katharina," interrupted her grandmother gravely.

"So I have, I just said so! Besides, I have come to flatter my new sister-in-law, that she may look upon me with favor and permit me to remain in her castle."

"You wound me deeply," said Erica with an expression of great pain.

"If that is your intention, you must adopt a different tone, Katharina," Elmar replied. "Uttered in this way, your words sound like an insult, which I suppose was scarcely your object."

"I said what I meant," replied Katharina impatiently; "why do people always make difficulties and misunderstand me? You are master of Altenborn now, Elmar, and therefore I must of course humbly bend my head, that I may not lose your favor. Why are the water-pitcher and sugar-bowl here?" she asked, suddenly changing the subject, and eyeing the objects mentioned with great interest.

"Erica has a headache, and wanted some sugar and water," answered the baroness.

"Ah! sugar and water?" said Katharina quickly. "Yes, a glass of sugar and water is excellent for headache — it gives one such a sound, deep sleep, though dreams are sure to come — I had some frightful ones yesterday," she added with a shudder.

The little party gazed anxiously at the speaker, but she again changed the subject, and turning to the baroness, said hastily, —

"Grandmamma, will you show me the pattern you told me about some time ago? I should like to embroider a rug for Elmar."

"I don't exactly know where it is, child, I will look for it presently."

"Ah! pray find it now, grandmamma. I want to see whether it will suit my purpose."

"Your wishes are somewhat troublesome, my dear Katharina," replied the old lady, half angrily, "however, as I have not seen you for so long a time, I will try to gratify you."

When the baroness had left the room, Katharina hastily approached Elmar, who was standing by the window. "Do you know, Elmar," she whispered hurriedly, "Wehlen says you never received the marriage certificate, it was only a blind, and I ought not to allow myself to be frightened by it."

Elmar shrugged his shoulders. "It is in my writing-desk; if you will come down with me, you can see it."

"Yes, let us go," said Katharina eagerly. She moved quickly towards the door, then paused, turned, and said: "My tooth has ached all night along. I dare not expose myself to the cold air in the corridor again. I should have liked to see the paper, but as you have never gratified any wish of mine, of course I shall not venture to ask you to bring it here."

"I will say, like grandmamma, that your wishes are somewhat troublesome, Katharina. However, as you want to make peace, though in a somewhat singular manner, I will grant your request."

A strange feeling of terror seized upon Erica when she thus saw herself about to be left alone with Katharina. She longed to ask Elmar not to go, but felt ashamed of her cowardice, as he would not be absent more than a few minutes. Besides, Katharina now seemed less excited, and Erica could scarcely help laughing at the triumphant air the princess assumed on finding her wishes gratified.

"Why haven't you taken your sugar and water, Erica?" she asked, approaching her. "I will make it for you myself. I know exactly how to do it, for I always mixed Bagadoff's, who often suffered from headaches."

Erica involuntarily shuddered. The allusion to the prince reminded her of the locket he had once worn around his neck, and which she had in a certain sense inherited from him. Meantime, Katharina, turning her back on the young girl, busied herself with the pitcher and glasses. The latter could not help smiling at the importance Katharina placed upon so simple a matter, as well as the slow, methodical manner in which she performed her task.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

At last the mixture was ready, and turning towards Erica with the glass, she handed it to her. The latter was in the act of taking it, when Katharina drew back so suddenly that the glass almost fell, and though Erica caught it in time to save it, a part of the contents was spilled over her dress.

"That will do no harm," said Katharina with a loud laugh, "it was meant to be shaken."

Erica, startled by the strange words and wild laugh, looked anxiously at the princess, and noticed the singular light that sometimes sparkled in her eyes.

"You are ill, princess," she cried, starting up, "let us go to grandmamma."

Katharina pressed her violently back into the chair. "Stay here, and drink your sugar and water!" she almost screamed, "I am going to grandmamma alone," and she fairly ran out of the room, slamming the door behind her.

Erica was bewildered by the scene, and as Elmar now entered, hurried towards him, and threw herself into his arms in such agitation that he anxiously asked the cause.

"I am afraid Katharina is losing her reason," she whispered, trembling; "I saw the demon of madness lurking in her eyes. Don't leave me alone with her again, Elmar. I am afraid of her."

"Has she insulted you?" asked Elmar hastily.

"On the contrary, she was very kind, but acted like an insane person."

"Unfortunately I am aware that she has long been entitled to that name; let us consult together about the best means of dealing with this misfortune. But first of all calm yourself, and drink the glass of sugar and water, that stands here on the table."

Erica turned, but before she reached it, the door of the room was thrown open and little Carlos rushed up to her.

"I can come and see you again, Erica!" he exclaimed joyously. "Markort told me so when I got back from my ride just now. Mamma said I might go to grandmamma's rooms as much as I liked. Now I shall come every day, Erica, and you'll visit us again."

"Certainly, Carlos," replied Erica kindly; "and what sort of a ride did you have to-day, was the pony good?"

"He used to be rather obstinate," replied the boy importantly, "but he's learning to know me now."

"And how often have you been thrown, Carlos?" asked Erica mischievously.

"Only once, and that was because the head groom pulled the bridle too hard."

"You are a real hero, Carlos. Come, shall I offer you this orange to refresh you after your ride, or don't you like it?"

"Peel it for me, Erica, and put on plenty of sugar."

"And out of gratitude you drink Erica's sugar and water," said Elmar half angrily, for he had no very great affection for the boy.

"Erica won't scold," he answered, pouting. "Look! I haven't left you a single drop," he added, laughing, as he turned to the young girl.

"You little robber! Then Uncle Elmar must make me a new glass while I peel your orange."

Elmar finished his task more quickly than Katharina, and Erica eagerly emptied the glass. Carlos seemed to find equal pleasure in consuming his orange, but soon grew more quiet, and at last said he felt tired.

"You lazy boy!" exclaimed Elmar reprovingly, "you ought to be ashamed to be tired after that short ride."

Erica, on the contrary, who saw real weariness in the boy's face and movements, interceded for him, took him in her arms, carried him to the sofa, and covered him with her shawl.

"Kiss me, Erica, then I will go to sleep," murmured the little fellow, and when Erica had obeyed his wish, his lids drooped heavily, and she moved gently away from his couch.

She had just returned to Elmar's side, when the baroness and Katharina at last came out of the adjoining room. The latter's eyes instantly rested upon the empty glasses, and a look of triumph flitted over her face.

"How did you like my sugar and water, Erica?" she asked sneeringly.

Erica, with well-meant hypocrisy, was about to answer "Very much," but Elmar replied, "You must ask Carlos that question, Katharina, he drank the whole glass."

Katharina's eyes opened so wide that it seemed as if they would start from their socket, and her lips also parted as if she wished to speak, but had no power to form the words. Her whole figure looked as if she were stricken with a sudden paralysis, and Elmar went up to her and asked anxiously,—

"Are you ill, Katharina?"

"Carlos!" she gasped at last, with a violent effort, "Carlos, where — where is he?"

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

"Asleep on the sofa there, you need have no anxiety about him," replied Elmar soothingly.

Katharina rushed towards the little sleeper, convulsively tore away the shawl that was spread over him, and gazed fixedly at the child. He seemed to be sound asleep, for the movement did not rouse him.

"Carlos!" shrieked Katharina, "Carlos! Wake! Hear me!"

Elmar hastened towards his sister to prevent her from frightening the child, but she thrust him violently away, and bending over the boy, screamed in the same piercing tones,— "Carlos! You must not, you shall not sleep! My sweet darling, my angel boy, my Carlos! What will you do in that horrible vault? The dead shall not dare approach you. They must not stretch their skeleton hands towards my boy."

The rest of the party gazed in terror at Katharina's frantic gestures. There could no longer be a doubt in regard to her condition, and the baroness whispered,—

"She alarmed me so much while we were alone in my room, that I secretly sent to Altenborn for a doctor, and I think he must arrive immediately. Try to get her away from the poor little boy, Elmar, she may do him some serious injury."

Elmar instantly went up to his sister, who was hanging over the child, now uttering piercing shrieks, and then low moans. She did not thrust him away again, and he saw with the greatest surprise that the child did not stir, but in spite of all his mother's outcries, continued to sleep soundly and quietly.

"Go back, I will attend to Carlos myself," said Elmar, but Katharina pressed jealously forward. "No!" she screamed, "I alone will watch my darling in his sleep. No one shall touch him. Neither the dead nor the living, only I!" She drew herself up as if to defy all contradiction, then, with a shrill shriek, suddenly sank senseless on the floor.

The baroness and Erica rushed towards the fainting woman, while Elmar pulled violently at the bell. With the aid of the servants, the princess was carried into the baroness's sleeping-room and laid on the bed. During all this noise the child continued to lie perfectly motionless; it was warm, and its limbs were pliant, but it could not be roused, so they let it remain asleep and once more covered it with the shawl.

The expected physician soon arrived, and on being informed of what had happened, shrugged his shoulders, saying,—

"Madness constantly creeps nearer and nearer. It has sometimes been terrible to me to see the progress it was making. In the case of a different, more yielding character, I might have interfered, perhaps saved her, but a person of the princess's peculiarities could not be helped. But what is the matter with the child? Let me attend to the boy first."

When he reached the little sleeper's couch, he involuntarily drew back and cast a startled glance at Elmar, who was standing beside him. "The child is not asleep," he said gently, "he is dead."

"Dead?" repeated Elmar in horror. "Dead? How is that possible? A few hours ago he was bright and well."

The doctor felt the boy's pulse and heart, then shrugged his shoulders and repeated his statement. He again requested an exact account of the events that had just occurred, and asked to see the glass from which the boy had drunk.

"It is one of these two," said Erica, pointing to the goblets with a trembling hand.

The physician carefully examined both, and then carried one to the window. "I think I can detect the presence of pulverized opium in the grounds of this one. We will instantly subject them to chemical tests, to make sure of the fact. The boy has drunk the poison the mad mother intended for this young lady, and the dose was probably so strong for the child, that death resulted almost instantly."

Deep silence fell upon the room, every one seemed paralyzed by the words; then Elmar with a passionate gesture threw his arms around Erica and strained her to his heart.

"Let us offer fervent thanks to God for your merciful preservation!" he exclaimed in the most violent agitation; "I can scarcely endure the terrible thought that I was so near losing you. We will bear our heavy misfortune with resignation, and although I now reproach myself for not having interposed sooner, and thus perhaps prevented this terrible catastrophe, I am absolved by the testimony of the physician, who confessed his own inability to help Katharina."

"Certainly, Baron von Altenborn," replied the latter. "The princess, in my opinion, was only to be guided, or rather controlled, by actual force, and so long as her insanity could not be proved, no one had a right to use violence. There can be no question of neglected duty in this case.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

But now let us go to the unfortunate woman, and see how far it is possible to help her."

XLVI.

THE SISTER OF CHARITY.

THE period which followed the horrible events related in the last chapter, was a very sorrowful one to all the inmates of the castle. The princess was attacked by fever, and the physician declared her life to be in danger. The wildest ravings flowed in a constant stream from her lips, and it was impossible to decide whether they were inspired by delirium or madness; but the magic circle in which these ideas seemed bound at last, spite of the confusion in which they were inextricably mingled in her mind, gradually afforded the watchers a clue to the truth.

Her wild fancies invariably led her to the crypt, where she awoke only to see herself surrounded and threatened by the mouldering forms of the ancestors who had been buried before her. In less feverish moments a deliverer came in the shape of Wehlen, who opened the vault and restored her to life, but carried her across the sea to some distant region.

At other times the invalid's fancy was entirely occupied by her diamonds; she revelled in the sight of the glittering gems, and would not give them up, but the next instant laughed triumphantly because she had saved the pearls, and promised to be very careful of the powder. She gave Wehlen authority to pawn her ornaments to provide for the expenses of the long journey, and advised him not to go to her jeweller, but a pawn-broker.

The constant return of these fancies at last revealed the true state of affairs. The princess's servants, who were closely questioned, confirmed the suspicion by their statements, and all uttered a sigh of relief, when it thus appeared that Katharina had not intended to commit a murder, but only obtain the removal of Erica, by casting her into a sleep which should bear the semblance of death. As the sediment left in the glass really proved to be opium, and this could never have produced apparent death, it was evident that Wehlen had deceived the princess and sought in this way to wreak his revenge upon Erica and Elmar.

The doctor now remembered that he had himself procured the opium for Wehlen, as the latter pretended that he could not control his nerves without it. In this way he had managed, without attracting attention, to procure a sufficient quantity of the poison to gain his object.

Inquiries were instantly made at the inn where he formerly lodged, but he had left it on the very day he received the casket of jewels from Katharina. He had spoken of an immediate return, it is true, but as he had taken his by no means inconsiderable luggage with him, the innkeeper doubted it.

Elmar instantly applied to a magistrate, who issued a warrant for the apprehension of the criminal; but as the latter had obtained several days' start of the officers, he could not be found. Traces of him were discovered, but they only proved that he had reached the sea, and was already beyond pursuit. He had disposed of the larger portion of the gems in Cologne, and taken the sum obtained for them, as well as the rest of the jewels with him, as — without any knowledge of the catastrophe which had happened at Altenborn — he pursued his way to Brussels and Antwerp.

In spite of the self-sacrificing devotion with which the baroness and Erica watched over Katharina, they could not, even with the assistance of the maids, dispense with the aid of an experienced nurse, especially as Katharina's condition kept all who surrounded her in a state of constant excitement. They therefore entreated the help of one of those excellent nurses, the Protestant sisters of charity, who have chosen their arduous vocation from the impulses of their own hearts, from true Christian love and sympathy for the sufferings of their fellow-mortals.

When the sister, clad in her plain dark dress, approached the bed, and bent over Katharina in loving anxiety, all felt as if the danger were no longer so great, and recovery might be possible.

"You will have a difficult task," said the baroness, "for it is often scarcely possible to control the patient, and moreover we understand very little about it, and you can only employ us as assistants, while the principal burden will rest upon your shoulders."

"That is the purpose for which I have come," replied the sister gently, as she stood up and looked at the old lady with an expression of tender sympathy.

"Fräulein Molly!" cried Erica; "grandmamma, it is Fräulein Molly!"

"Sister Molly, Erica," said the latter, holding out her hand to her. "You see the guiding hand of Providence which leads me to a woman towards whom my heart was once full of rage and bitterness,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY in order to give me an opportunity to atone for my sin."

"Then you are doubly welcome to me, sister," said the baroness. "I was very anxious about your fate, and both Elmar and I have made every effort to obtain news of you. You must tell us how you were guided into this path."

"As we are all guided into it," replied Molly with a smile. "Misfortune must first soften the hard soil of our hearts, to prepare it for the good seed, and awaken a yearning for true salvation. If we then take refuge in the safe haven of Christianity, the desire to do some active work there is natural, and for those who are bound by no ties, the care of the sick is at once the most attractive and beneficial. But we must not forget our patient, who is beginning to grow restless."

Molly made the necessary arrangements with so much calmness and care, that all felt grateful to the firm, steady hand, that undertook the direction of affairs. Katharina's condition, in the opinion of the doctors who were summoned, had become perfectly hopeless, and as the balance of her mind was irretrievably lost, her recovery could scarcely be desired.

Little Carlos's body had not yet been placed in the family vault. Erica and even the baroness clung to the belief that the death might be, as Wehlen had declared, only a seeming one, so for the present the little corpse remained in the castle.

Molly was deeply moved as she stood beside the dead child, who had once caused her so much trouble and anger, and for whose life she would now cheerfully have given her own.

The body was kept until the signs of approaching dissolution dispelled every doubt, and the baroness herself gave orders for the funeral. It was a sad day; Elmar felt the loss of the child all the more keenly, as he was forced to acknowledge that he had not given him the full measure of love the poor little fellow, who was entirely innocent of his mother's acts, had a right to claim. This mother alone remained unmoved, and while the child was being lowered into the vault, laughed gaily as she talked of the pearls she had won by her energy.

Katharina's powerful constitution resisted the disease much longer than the physicians had expected, and but for Molly's wise arrangement, which skilfully divided the burden, all would have been exhausted and worn out by their attendance on the invalid.

"I cannot understand, sister, how you can continue this fatiguing work almost without interruption," said Erica one day, when she sat alone with Molly beside the sick-bed. "I am probably as strong as you, but I sometimes feel so tired, that my sleep resembles the apparent death into which Wehlen wanted to throw me. Ah! forgive me, Molly," she added hastily; "I mentioned a name which must have a painful effect upon you."

The sister of charity smiled kindly at the speaker, and answered cordially, "Don't be troubled, Erica, the time when the utterance of that name wounded me has long since passed. If the void in my heart, the dreariness of my life, induced me to bestow my love upon an adventurer, my heart, by God's blessing, is now so full that it has scarcely room for the memory of an affection so unworthily lavished. In those days I longed for kindness, for a love that seemed everywhere refused, and recklessly grasped at the bait held out to me; now I have plenty of kindness and affection, both within and without, and can forgive Wehlen, nay, even bless him for having given me the shock which guided me into this happy path."

"I admire you, Molly, but I do not think I could follow your example; I should be unable to lead a life of such entire self-abnegation."

The sister of charity smiled again. "You speak so, because you do not know this life, Erica; because you have no idea of the deep, blessed satisfaction it bestows. The love I once missed so painfully, I now receive in rich abundance from my patients. When I see their eyes sparkle with joy at my entrance, it affords me a delight the fond glance of your lover can scarcely give. When I see tears of gratitude in their eyes, and feel how indispensable I am to them, how my devotion alleviates their sufferings, perhaps cures them, I could shout aloud in my joy that God has so favored me, given me such unspeakable happiness here on earth.

"I bless the stern school through which I have been led, for in it I have learned that we bear our happiness within us, and are always miserable when we seek it outside. While, in former days, when I tried to find this happiness in external things, my heart was always filled with rage and bitterness towards those who were apparently more fortunate than I, I now live in harmony with the whole world, and sincerely rejoice in the prosperity of all my fellow-mortals, for their good fortune no longer seems stolen from me. The spring from which I have learned to draw this

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

happiness gushes forth in boundless abundance, and can refresh all who seek it; so do not pity me any longer, but join in thanking God for the mercy he has shown me."

Molly's words were confirmed by the expression of her face. Her features were so transformed by the new look they wore, that she could now really be called pretty. She performed her toilsome duties with a cheerfulness which exerted a refreshing and inspiring influence upon all who surrounded her, and made her the object of universal love and reverence.

"I feel so base and wicked beside Molly," said Erica, as she sat with Elmar in one of her intervals of rest. "Although I do everything in my power for Katharina, it is only my duty, and yet it sometimes seems hard, and but for the hope of being with you now and then, I could scarcely bear it."

"I hope your strength will not be overtaxed, Erica," replied Elmar, casting an anxious glance at her weary face. "Although I am sincerely glad that Molly finds so much happiness in her profession, it is not suited to all. You, my little heather-blossom, have a much nearer duty, that of making the happiness of one individual, and I think the occupation will afford you sufficient satisfaction."

"You know it gives me too much joy, Elmar, and almost makes me indifferent to the rest of the world. But it is the very fact that Molly feels so happy without this blessing, that raises her so high in my eyes, and perhaps it is very wrong in me, but I torment myself with extremely traitorous thoughts about her. I have been fancying what an admirable wife she would make for Reinhardt. He likes her very much, for he talked in the most enthusiastic way about her, and she would be such an excellent pastor's wife."

"Perhaps better than he is pastor, in spite of his really admirable sermons. I intend to propose that he should take a position in some university, and would be glad to help Professor Reinhardt in his career. He is too much interested in learned subjects for a country pastor, whose mind must be principally engrossed by the affairs of his parish; and besides, on the other hand, it would be a pity for him to make no use of his fine talents. As a professor who delivers lectures, he will be exactly in his element, and we will see that he obtains such a position as soon as possible."

"Well, Molly would make an excellent professor's wife."

"Let us beware of playing Providence, my darling," replied Elmar gravely, "and leave the matter entirely to God. Molly is contented and happy, let us not disturb her joy. All the cares and troubles which the professor's wife might encounter would weigh heavily on our hearts, and we might reproach ourselves for having torn her from her peaceful asylum."

Katharina breathed her last sigh without recovering her consciousness. Much as the old baroness had longed to receive one farewell look or word from her granddaughter, she could not help acknowledging that it was better so, since the remembrance of what had happened must have exerted too terrible, too prostrating an effect upon the sick woman. The deathbed, however, thereby lost the lofty sanctity which usually surrounds it, and which the survivors treasure in the inmost shrine of their hearts as the dearest and most sacred recollection left them by the dead.

The family vault once more opened to receive a corpse, and the mother slumbered beside the son. The dead woman had no cause to fear the dreams that had tortured her when living; she slept peacefully beside those who had gone before, and the general awakening will not bring conflict and menace, but fervent love, deep peace.

After the funeral Molly left the castle. How different was the departure from the one she had taken from this place scarcely two years before! She thought of it with a certain mournful pleasure, and repeated to Erica what she had so often said during their conversations.

"We must seek happiness and joy within, not without; the external world is only a mirror, which reflects our own faces. Now that I have these two heavenly blessings in my heart, I feel them everywhere, even outside of me, and the same world against which I formerly battled, because it oppressed me, now acts in harmonious unison, and overwhelms me with a wealth of goodness and beauty."

The misfortune which had marched with its iron tread through the halls of Altenborn, cast its shadow over the nuptials of Erica and Elmar, it is true, but could not obscure their happiness. By degrees its memory faded more and more, and the horizon of both was radiant with the brightest sunlight.

The magnificent rooms, in which Erica had danced at her first ball, were refurnished to receive their new mistress, who at first found her home almost oppressively splendid, and would have preferred to remain with Elmar in the baroness's wing,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

but soon became accustomed to the spacious, lofty rooms. She possessed in her own character the firmness, which makes poverty and wealth appear like mere garments, and as poverty had not depressed her, so wealth excited no feeling which could arouse a fear that her head would be turned.

Although, under the new rule, the magnificent rooms were not continually filled with guests, they opened willingly and often for gay parties. The beautiful Sidonie, whose presence Katharina had so often vainly desired, frequently adorned these entertainments, and, to the delight of all, the exquisite statue now showed that it was animated by a soul. Although her reserved, distant manner had become too much a part of her nature to be entirely laid aside, it was only assumed towards the world in general, while her intimate acquaintances were treated with all the more cordiality. Werner, on the contrary, seemed entirely unchanged by his happiness, and as his character — as Fritz had already remarked — suited Count Meerburg better than the secretary Werner, all united in praising him.

The sky at Dorneck was also illumined by the brightest sunlight, and though the family circle had grown smaller, the villa never lacked visitors or gayety. The wives of the two lieutenants still considered their parents' house their home, and usually spent the summer afternoons there, and the beautiful Rosa also felt at home, and nestled more and more closely into the hearts of her husband's mother and father. Prince Eduard and Edith were the only persons not quite satisfied, for as the young prince could not possibly remain in Bonn any longer "on account of his studies," and the countess still refused her consent to a speedy marriage, the young lovers were obliged to content themselves with a constant interchange of letters.

The idyllic life at Waldbad was really enjoyed, though the baroness declared she could not endure the long journey, and begged Erica to content herself with Sandor. The return to her old home moved Erica deeply, but the tears that flowed from her eyes were those of gratitude, and when she knelt with her husband beside her mother's grave her heart overflowed with thankfulness to God.

Old Christine was overjoyed to see Erica again, and proud of the fulfilment of her prophecy. The latter made no attempt to take the faithful old servant to Altenborn, for she felt that she could not make her as happy there as she was in Waldbad. Erica and her husband often visited the place which had been made sacred to her by the events of her childhood, and her life with her mother. True, the little ruinous house soon disappeared to make way for a handsome villa, but the sea and landscape remained unchanged, and the beautiful view from the veranda gave her the old homelike feeling.

Thus her devotion to her old residence still existed, while the new home took deeper and deeper root in her heart. While she called her summer excursion to Waldbad going to the other house, she termed her stay at Altenborn remaining at home. Going to Waldbad and remaining at Altenborn seemed equally delightful, for in both places Elmar was at her side, and wherever he was she felt really at home.

From Macmillan's Magazine.

THE GOTHIC FRAGMENTS OF ULFILAS.

The great majority of English readers are not aware of the vast treasury of wealth which exists for all who love the English language in the fragments of Ulfilas the Goth; and unless they are scholars of some pretension they are probably acquainted with little more than the name. We purpose giving in this article a short sketch of the most conspicuous features of these remains, and showing some of the numerous points in which they become a mine of original ore for those who are interested in the earliest forms of their own speech, and can find a pleasure in tracking home some long-familiar and well-hunted word to its secret lair.

It will be well to give at the outset some brief account of the personal history of Ulfilas, and of the singular fortunes that have attended his work. About the year 258 A.D., in the reign of the emperors Valerian and Gallienus, the Goths laid waste Asia Minor, which was then for the most part Christian, and carried off out of Cappadocia and Galatia numerous prisoners, among whom were some priests. These Christian prisoners became the means of sowing the seeds of their own faith among their new masters, and among the Christians thus captured were the ancestors of Ulfilas. They had already lived sixty years among the Goths when Ulfilas was born, and this fact accounts for his use of the Gothic language and for his Gothic name, which is equivalent to our modern word "wolf." His birth took place somewhere about 318 A.D., when the

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Goths were in possession of the Dacian provinces north of the Danube. After the death of Constantine, and when his son Constantius was reigning in the East, Ulfilas at the age of thirty was made first bishop of the Mœso-Goths. He labored for seven years in the provinces beyond the Danube, when he was compelled to seek refuge with Constantius, about 355 A.D., from the persecution of the heathen Gothic prince Athanaric. The bishop and his followers had a dwelling-place assigned them south of the Danube, in the mountains of the Hæmus, the modern Balkans. This was the sphere of his labors for more than thirty years: he was within the confines of the Roman Empire, and therefore under the protection of Rome, and he spent nearly half his life there preaching, studying, and writing. He preached in Latin, Greek, and Gothic, invented the Gothic alphabet, which was an adaptation of the Greek, and left behind him many translations, sermons, and treatises. He was taken ill, and died at Constantinople, whither he had gone at the bidding of the emperor on the affairs of the Church, in his seventieth year, A.D. 388. He translated from the Greek the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, with the exception of the books of Samuel and Kings, which he prudently omitted, fearing the warlike influence they might have on his inflammable nation. As far as we know, the Gothic language had never before been used for literary purposes. Nor is it probable that it had. As late as the ninth century copies of the translation of the Scriptures by Ulfilas were still in existence; after that we lose sight of them. Up to that time the Goths carried with them in their various migrations this sacred and national literary monument. Till within the last fifty years all that remained of it were fragments of the four Gospels, preserved in what is known as the Codex Argenteus. This MS., now kept in the library of Upsala, in Sweden, was probably written about 590 or 600 A.D., when the East Goths were ruling in Italy, and it came, after unknown fortunes—perhaps by the agency of Charlemagne, who conquered the Goths in Spain, or by other means—into the possession of the Abbey of Werden, near Düsseldorf, where it was found by Arnold Mercator towards the close of the sixteenth century. Thence it found its way to Prague, whence it was taken by the Swedes to Stockholm in 1648. Then it was brought to Holland, and again purchased by the Swedes for six hundred dollars, bound in silver, and given to the University of Upsala. It is written in silver letters, with gold headings to the sections and to the Lord's prayer. Out of three hundred and thirty leaves only one hundred and seventy-seven remain. In 1818 the Epistles of St. Paul in Gothic were discovered by Mai and Castiglione in a monastery of Lombardy, written on palimpsests. With the exception of a few other fragments of minor importance, this is all that remains to us of the priceless version of the Gothic bishop; but this has been the means of making known to us the structure and composition of a language which would otherwise have irretrievably perished; and it is impossible to overrate the importance and the interest attaching to an original version of the New Testament, whether we regard it linguistically, historically, or theologically.

We proceed now to illustrate these observations from specimens which we shall present to the reader in the following order: 1, illustrations of grammar and language; 2, additions found in the Gothic text; 3, omissions; 4, peculiarities of translation; and 5, variations of reading and interpretation.

1. The Gothic language is the oldest representative of the Teutonic branch of the Aryan or Indo-Germanic family of languages, and bears a striking analogy in the structure of its grammar and in its vocabulary to the Greek and the Sanskrit, while in certain points it has retained a perfection of form which is not found in the Greek. It marks the neuter in nouns, adjectives, and pronouns. It possesses a dual of personal pronouns and verbs; and in this respect it is curious to notice in the Gothic version a degree of precision which is absent from the Greek. For example, in St. Mark xi. 2, where our Lord is giving orders to his two disciples concerning the passover, the Gothic runs, "Go ye two into the village over against you," and the dual is preserved throughout. Again in St. John x. 30, the Gothic uses the dual for rendering our Lord's words, "I and my father are one; "i.e., we two are—Greek, ἐσμέν. And again in St. John xvii. 11, 23, "That they may be one as we two are one." So likewise in 1 Cor. xii. 21, "The head cannot say to the feet, I have no need of you two." And in Eph. vi. 22, when St. Paul says "that ye might know our affairs," meaning those of himself and Tychicus, he uses the dual in the Gothic version.

The Gothic language has also a passive voice and a causal form in verbs.

In reading this old version, one is struck

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

by the homeliness and simplicity of the language used, and by the strange light that is thrown upon some common English or German word, as though we suddenly came upon it in an earlier stage of existence. As this is perhaps the point that will most interest the general reader, we will give several examples.

In St. Matt. v. 35, "Swear not at all . . . neither by the earth, for it is his footstool," Gothic, fotubaurd; i.e., foot-board.

The original of our word wreak is seen in St. Matt. v. 44, "Bless them that curse you," Gothic, vrikandans. The word commonly used for Lord, Frauja, is still familiar in the German Frau and Fräulein.

Few persons who are glad to think of and to see their friends are aware that the word friend is a genuine present participle of the Gothic verb frijon, to love; San skrit, pri; and that in like manner the word fiend is a present participle of the verb fijan, to hate (Luke xix. 27); friend and fiend therefore being respectively lover and hater.

A practical difficulty which must always beset those who would write English phonetically is the mode of distinguishing between the son of the family and the sun in the heavens. It is remarkable that this is a difficulty arising out of the original sound of the two words, both being derived from the Sanskrit su, to beget. And there is in Sanskrit one word, súnu, which combines the two meanings of begetter and begotten, or sun and son. In the Gothic sunna or sunno is sun, and sunns, son. (See Matt. v. 45.)

In the modern alms the etymological connection with pity is obscured if not forgotten, but the original tenderheartedness reappears in the Gothic armahairtitha even more plainly than in the German Barmherzigheit.

Two words in common use at the present day are found in the phrase "lock thy door"—galukans haurdai, Matt. vi. 6—the latter word probably containing the origin of hoarding. "They think they shall be heard for their much speaking," Matt. vi. 7, is in the Gothic filuvaurdein, fulness of words. Our word thief is found in the Gothic thiubo, while steal and shop*lift* are representatives of stilan and hlifan, which are both used in Matt. vi. 19, 20. With the latter compare the Greek κλεπτῆς. In "take no thought for your life" we find the earliest use of our own mourn in maur naïth, and in "more than meat" we see the origin of food and fodder in the Gothic fodeinai. "Consider the lilies of the field," Matt. vi. 28, is in Gothic "the blooms of the heath"—blomans haithjos; and so, in ver. 30, "the grass of the field" is the hay, havi, and in John vi. 10, "There was much grass in the place;" while to-morrow is gistradagis, i.e., yesterday. In the Gothic we discover the original meaning of the word believe, German glauben, Gothic galaubjan; for it is a causal form of liuban, to be dear, galaubjan, to hold dear, to trust. So compare gadragkeith, giveth to drink, a causal of drigkan, to drink, Matt. x. 42. "Enter ye in at the strait gate," Matt. vii. 13, and "I am the door," St. John, x. 9, are rendered in the Gothic by the one word, daur. "Ye shall know them by their fruits," Matt. vii. 16, is bi akranam, that is, by their acorns. So "fruits meet for repentance," Luke iii. 8, akran. (Comp. corn.) Centurion is in Gothic hundafaths, so bruthfaths is bridegroom, the last syllable in both cases being the Sanskrit pati, lord. The last syllable of bridegroom, which always strikes one as somewhat harsh, is in Gothic preserved in its original form and meaning, namely, guma, man. So the roughness of the r is absent from the last syllable of the German Bräutigam. In Matt. viii. 13 we read, "And his servant was healed in the self-same while," weilai.

In "when he was come into Peter's house," and "he arose and went to his house," the Gothic has gards and garda, which still remain in our yard and garden, and in Stutt*gart*, etc. So 1 Cor. x. 22, "Have ye not a garden to eat and to drink in?" In Matt. ix. 12, Ni thaurban hailai lekeis, "They that are whole have no need of the physician," we find the words darben, bedürfen, whole and leech.

In "he that taketh not his cross," Matt. x. 38, we find the cross in all its original offensiveness as galga, the gallows. See also Galatians vi. 12, 14.

In Matt. xxv. 42, "I was a hungered," we have gredags, showing that the time was when the word greedy bore less offence than it does now. As a singular illustration of the vicissitudes that befall words in the lapse of ages, we have in the Gothic of Matt. xxvi. 74, and the corresponding passages of Mark and John, "And immediately the cock crew," suns hana hrukida, which in its modern equivalents would be, soon the hen croaked. The same thing is conspicuous in the two words queen and quean, one of which has inherited imperial glory and the other reproach and shame, though neither originally meant more than woman or wife, being the Gothic qino or quens, Matt. xxvii.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

19, 1 Cor. ix. 5, Greek, γύνη. So, in like manner, when Joseph of Arimathea was called gabigs, rich, the modern big meant somewhat more than it does now. Other curious changes in meaning are to be discovered in the elephant hair with which John the Baptist was girded, Mark i. 6, the camel and the elephant being equally unknown, and the name of the one being wrongly assigned to the other; in x. 25, in the leathern girdle which he had about his hup (hips), and in the descent of the Holy Spirit like a hawk, sve ahak, Mark i. 10. So the "two young pigeons" of Luke ii. 24, toos juggons ahake. It is strange that the appellation of a timid bird like the dove should have passed over to its direct opposite in disposition, the hawk.

We find the original of the common word bed, Mark ii. 4, in the Gothic badi.

The advocates of the modern practice of intoning and monotoning may find some countenance for the habit in the fact that there was a time when to sing out and to read out were one and the same thing; and so the Gothic of Mark ii. 25, "have ye never read"—is us*sagg*vuth (Comp. Luke iv. 16, of our Lord "he stood up for to read.") The word for parables is yokes, Mark iv. 2, gayukom; and "the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven," iv. 11, are its runes, runa. The word for millstone, Mark ix, 42, asiluqairnus, is the relic of a time when the mill was worked with asses, and the second half of the word probably survives in our word churn.

"The book of divorcement," Mark x. 4, reminds us of the original Hebrew term, sofer, book, which is rendered in the A. V., "bill of divorcement." The word for riches, in Mark x. 23, reminds us of a time when the chief wealth of the nation was in cattle—faihu, German, vieh; and the turn in the context which is given to "trusting in them" by the change to "hunting after them" (hunjan) is a good practical commentary thereon. We come upon the origin of the modern word kiln where we should perhaps not expect it, in the winefat that was digged by the husbandman, Mark xii. 1, kclikn.

Two other common words are found in strange places in Mark xiv. 14, "say ye to the goodman of the hive"—heiva—and in 43, "a great multitude with swords and trees," trivam. The first origin of the Hanseatic towns is discovered in the Gothic of "they call together the whole band," Mark xv. 16, hansa. Our Lord is described as being "twelve winters old," Luke ii. 42, tvalib vintruns; and the epithet magus (German, Magd), is applied to the "child Jesus" in the next verse.

The original nature of evil as a departure from good is beautifully seen in "to do good or ungood," Luke vi. 9, thiuth taujan, thau unthiuth taujan.

In Luke viii. 20 we see the mother and brethren of our Lord yearning to speak with him, gairujandona; in ix. 5 the disciples are told to shake off the mould from their feet in going out of the unworthy city—mulda; so in 1 Cor. xv. 48, "as is the mouldy;" and in ver. 62 of the same chapter we see that the plough was originally a hoe, hoha, from which he who looked back was not fit for the kingdom of heaven. In x. 19 the disciples are told that they shall tread on serpents—trudan ufaro vaurme—i.e., tread on worms. When the tempters are asked, xx. 24, "Whose image hath it?" the word is mannleika; and in ver. 36, those who are equal to the angels are even with them—ibnans.

In John vi. 63 we find the familiar it boots not in "the flesh profiteth nothing"—boteith.

In John xv. 1, "I am the true vine," veinatriu, i.e., wine-tree, is found; and in xviii. 1, "where was a garden"—aurtigards—we see the original of the modern orchard.

From the Epistles we may take a few examples of interest, e.g., Rom. viii. 3, "what the law could not do in that it was sick," siuks; ix. 27, "sand of the sea," malma mareins, the first word survives in the German zer*mal*men; 1 Cor. i. 20, "Where is the wise"—handugs, handy—recalls a state of society in which dexterity was regarded as wisdom. In 1 Cor. vii. 21, "care not for it," the Gothic is ni karos. In ix. 7 milk is found as miluks. In xv. 9, St. Paul calls himself the smallest of the apostles—smalista. In 2. Cor. xi. 33, he speaks of being "let down through an eye-door"—augadauro—which shows that window was originally wind-door. In Phil. iii. 5, "the stock of Israel" is called the knot, knodai, and the "thrones" of Col. i. 16 are sitlos, settles. It will be readily conceived from these examples, which are given only as specimens of many more, what a rich mine there is in the Gothic fragments to reward the investigation of the student.

2. There are a few additions to be noted in the Gothic text of the New Testament. In Mark iii. 32, "Behold thy mother and thy brethren without seek for thee," the Gothic adds, with some MSS., and thy sisters, which, at all events, corresponds more exactly with the words fol-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

lowing in the last verse of the chapter: "The same is my brother, and my sister, and mother." There is a note at the end of the Epistle to the Romans, which runs, "It was written to the Romans from Corinth." In the account of the institution of the Lord's supper, 1 Cor. x. 17, there is the remarkable addition of the words in italics: "We are all partakers of that one bread and of that one cup," which, considering the antiquity of the version, may be regarded as very important testimony to the practice of the Gothic Christians in the middle of the fourth century. In ver. 29 of the same chapter we find this addition: "Why is my liberty judged of the conscience of the unbeliever?" At the end of the first Epistle to the Corinthians we have this note: "The first Epistle to the Corinthians was written from Philippi, as some say, but it seemeth rather, by the apostle's own showing, to be from Asia" — with which modern writers agree. Comp. xvi. 8. In 1 Cor. xii. 15, 16, the Gothic adds to the clause, "If the foot should say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body," the words, "nor to the body;" and so to the words, "If the ear should say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body," nor to the body; and in xv. 10, it reads, "I labored and endured more than they all." These are some of the additions which are to be observed in the Gothic version of the New Testament Ephesians i. 6, instead of being, "Wherein he hath made us accepted in the beloved," runs "in his beloved son." In Phil. ii. 28, instead of St. Paul saying, "and that I may be the less sorrowful," the Gothic makes him say, "that I may be the more glad, thinking how it is with you."

3. We pass now to the omissions, as distinct from those portions which have unfortunately been lost to us from the defective condition of the MS. The first is the omission of the word openly, with the best MSS., in Matt. vi. 18, "Thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly." Again, in xi. 2, "John sendeth two of his disciples," the word two is omitted, where probably διὰ was read instead of δύο, which is however not without MS. authority. In the narrative of the Pharisees being displeased on account of the disciples eating bread with unwashen hands, Mark vii. 2, the words almost requisite for the sense in English, "They found fault," are omitted, as indeed they are in the best MSS.; and similarly in the eleventh verse, there is in the Gothic nothing answering to the words "he shall be free," which the authorised version has inserted with a view to complete the supposed sense of the Greek. By far the most important omission, however, is that of the narrative of the woman taken in adultery, in the beginning of the eighth chapter of St. John (viii. 1–11), together with the last words of the previous chapter, "And every man went unto his own house." As is commonly known, this is a much-disputed passage, but we are only concerned now to record the fact that the Gothic is one of those ancient versions in which it is not found. The other omission, for which there is also MS. authority, is that of the words, "through his blood," in Col. i. 14.

With regard to the last twelve verses of the Gospel of St. Mark, we are unfortunately not in a position to determine whether or not they were contained in the MS. used by Ulfilas, because there is a defect in the Gothic MS. at that place. As however the hiatus does not begin till the twelfth verse, and the three first verses of the doubtful portion still remain, it would seem to be well-nigh certain that the rest of the remaining verses had originally formed an integral part of the Gothic version of St. Mark.

4. The translation of Ulfilas from the Greek is for the most part wonderfully close and accurate. In a very few instances he has slightly departed from the original, and we may suppose had authority for so doing, and in one or two cases he seems to have endeavored to give a gloss; but, as a whole, there can be no doubt that his version is highly valuable, even on this ground. The expression, Matt. v. 37, "Whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil," as well as the petition in the Lord's prayer, "Deliver us from evil," is ambiguous, as it is in the Greek, but in both cases the probability seems to be that from the evil one is the meaning of the Gothic. In Matt. vi. 14, 26, "your heavenly Father," is "your father who is over heaven," ufar himinam.

Even the Greek order is observed in Matt. viii. 10, "not in Israel such faith have I found," and so in Luke viii. 47, where the construction is more complex, "she came running, and falling down to him, for what cause she had touched him, told him in the presence of all the people, and how she was healed immediately."

In Mark ix. 8, instead of "save Jesus only with themselves," we find "save Jesus only with himself."

In xii. 29, we find, "The Lord God our

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Lord is one," following what is probably the true meaning of the Old Testament Hebrew.

In St. Luke ii. 14, we have the beautiful reading and rendering of Jerome preserved, specially commended by Keble, and generally followed by Roman Catholic interpreters also, indefensible though it may be critically or theologically, "on earth peace towards men of goodwill."

In ix. 46, 47, where the English version has rendered the same Greek word διαλογισμὸς by two, "Then there arose a reasoning . . . And Jesus perceiving the thought," the Gothic has used but one. On the other hand, in John vii. 1, "After these things Jesus walked in Galilee, for he could not walk in Jewry," where the Greek has but one, the Gothic uses two. Again, in Luke xvi. 10, where the Greek and English have used two dissimilar words to express opposite ideas, πιστὸς, ἄδικος, faithful, unjust, the Gothic has chosen two similar words, triggus and untriggus.

It is possible that in Luke xix. 42, we have an instance of a grammatical error, perhaps the only one to be found throughout the fragments, where ἐκρύβη, to which the real subject is τὰ, is rendered "now it is hid from thine eyes."

In John vii, 39, where the A. V. supplies given in the words "the Holy Ghost was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified," the Gothic has "the Holy Ghost was not yet on them, because," etc.

One of the blemishes of the existing English version is found also in the Gothic, namely John x. 14, 15, where it renders, "I am the good shepherd and know my sheep, and am known of mine. As the Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father, and I lay down my life for the sheep," instead of "I know my sheep even as the Father knoweth me, and I know the Father." This, however, may be a matter of punctuation in the printed copies. In the next verse, however, the still greater blemish of the A. V. in not discriminating between flock and fold for ποίμνη and αὐλὴ is avoided by the one word being rendered avethi and the other avistri.

In x. 24, "How long didst thou make us to doubt," which, in the Greek, is lift up our soul, that is, hold it in suspense, the Gothic is literal in its rendering — saivala unsara hahis. In xi. 39, Lazarus is said to have been dead four days, which expresses the single Greek word τεταρταῖος and is one word also in the Gothic, fidurdogs.

It has been a matter of some doubt whether the contest with beasts at Ephesus, to which St. Paul refers (1 Cor. xv. 32), was metaphorical or not. In the Gothic, whatever ambiguity there may be originally is preserved by the verbal following of the Greek, bi mannan du diuzam vaih.

The obscure phrase used by St. Paul in 2 Cor. i. 18, "the things that I purpose, do I purpose according to the flesh, that with me there should be yea, yea, and nay nay?" which is interpreted by Alford to mean that there should be "both affirmation and negation concerning the same thing," is thus rendered by Ulfilas, "that with me the yea should not be yea and the nay nay," which unquestionably gives the sense which the writer intended to convey.

Gal. v. 16, "I say, then, walk in the spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh," is rendered, "I say that ye walk in the spirit and fulfil not," departing slightly from the Greek.

Eph. ii. 16, "Having slain the enmity thereby," that is, by or on the cross, becomes in the Gothic "having slain the enmity in himself," in sis silbin. Gal. iv. 32, follows the Greek exactly, "as God in Christ hath forgiven you."

5. Foremost among the illustrations of reading and interpretation to be gathered from the Gothic version, must be placed the celebrated passage, 1 Tim. iii. 16, where the authority of Ulfilas is distinctly in favor of the reading which all scholars have now adopted, and by which the "God was manifest in the flesh" of the A. V. is shown not to be genuine; the Gothic runs, "Great is the mystery (runa) of godliness which was manifest in the flesh," so that the MS. Ulfilas used may have had ὃ, or more probably ὃς, but certainly not Θεὸς.

In Mark viii. 22, "And he cometh to Bethsaida, and they bring a blind man unto him," Ulfilas reads "Bethany," which is also supported by some MSS.

In Mark ix. 40, the Gothic reads, "He that is not against you is for you," instead of "us." There is authority for either reading, but that which Ulfilas followed is perhaps to be preferred. Alford says, "In the divided state of the critical evidence, the reading must be ever doubtful."

In John ix. 8, the A. V. has, "The neighbors and they which before had seen him that he was blind," but the better reading is "that he was a beggar." The word is the

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

same in the Greek as that for "he sat and begged," or rather the substantive cognate to the verb, but in the Gothic two quite different words are used for the noun beggar and the verb begged.

In John xiv. 31, the Gothic reads, "But that the world may know that I love my Father, and as the Father gave me commandment, even so I do," for which, however, there seems to be no MS. authority.

The "blindness" which "happened unto Israel," of Rom. xi. 25, is in the Gothic daubei, deafness. The Greek is πώρωσις, which is ambiguous.

In Col. i. 12, 13, "who hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light," and "who hath delivered us from the power of darkness," etc., here the Gothic reads you in both cases, for which there is some, but apparently less, MS. authority.

In Col. iii. 8, there is a slight difference of reading. Instead of "filthy communication out of your mouth," the Gothic joins this to the catalogue of the things they are exhorted to put away, and then inserts, "let it not proceed out of your mouth," for which there seems to be some authority.

In 1 Thess. ii. 13, "the word of God which ye heard of us" is rendered "the word of the hearing of God," so that the παρ' ἡμῶν is taken away from ἀκοῆς and joined to παραλαβόντες. The precept in v. 22, "Abstain from all appearance of evil," is rendered, somewhat more feebly, "Keep yourselves from every thing of evil."

In 2 Tim. iv. 10, the Gothic reads Crispus for "Crescens," but there is also a variant Kreskus, which is clearly identical with the ordinary Crescens.

From this brief and fragmentary sketch of the more striking features of the Gothic version it will, it is hoped, be seen how full it is of interest to the philologist, the critic, and the theologian. And yet, except among scholars, it is probably but little known. We are not aware that any modern critical English edition exists. There are several foreign editions, the best probably that of Gablentz and Löbe in quarto, a very excellent one in crown octavo by Massmann, one in octavo by Gangengigl, which however is deficient in accuracy, and the Swedish edition of Upstrom. We may safely affirm that there is no branch of the Teutonic literature of deeper interest to the student than these ancient remains of the primitive Gothic version of the Gospels and Epistles. It is to be regretted that there is not more of them. The ravages of time have been very cruel: the early part of St. Matthew's Gospel is lost to us; there is a terrible gap from the end of the eleventh chapter to the thirty-eighth verse of the twenty-fifth, while part of the twenty-sixth, and the whole of the twenty-eighth, are wanting. St. Mark's Gospel is complete, with the exception of the last eight verses, which have been lost. The eleventh, twelfth and thirteenth chapters of St. Luke are missing. There is a gap at the end of the sixteenth, and the remainder of the Gospel is wanting after xx. 46. The commencement of St. John is imperfect till we come to the middle of chapter v., then it goes on with a few blanks till xix. 13, where it unfortunately ends. The Acts of the Apostles does not exist. The Epistle to the Romans begins at the end of chapter vi., and is fairly perfect till xv. 13, then there is a blank till xvi. 21. The MS. which the Gothic followed evidently ended at xvi. 24. The First Epistle to Corinth is very defective, the second is complete, and a note at the end says it was written from Philippi of Macedonia. The Epistle to the Galatians has a gap in chapter i. and in chapter iii. The Epistle to the Ephesians has a gap in chapter v. and in chapter vi., and the rest of St. Paul's Epistles are more or less imperfect. They come to an end at Philemon xxiii. This is all that we possess of the New Testament. There are a few fragments of the Old Testament, and of a commentary on the Gospel of St. John; but this is all that has as yet been rescued of the original Teutonic language that was spoken by the Goths in the third and fourth century after Christ.

One very important inference fairly deducible from the existence of this version of the New Testament, which dates from the middle of the fourth century A.D., is the existence of a Christian population among the Goths at that early period. We see also that the Scriptures must have been held in high esteem as the treasury of life, for otherwise they would not have been translated. It is also clear that the best MSS. would be chosen for that purpose, and therefore the version of Ulfilas has considerable value as a witness to the reading that stood highest in his day. For instance, his authority in such a case as 1 Tim. iii. 16 must be acknowledged to be very great. It is too early to suppose that a variation so great as that between the revised English version and his had already crept into the text. It could then have had no existence, and therefore the witness of the Gothic version must add very great-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ly to the presumption against it. In like manner, when we find him writing in 1 Cor. xi. such an addition as "we are all partakers of that one cup," whatever may be the authority or the explanation of the words added, there can be no question that they afford unimpeachable testimony to the practice of the Christians of his day, or at least of those over whom he presided. The denial of the cup to the laity is indeed not a point on which we stand in need of any such early testimony, for it is one that was not mooted till long afterwards, but there can be no hesitation as to the nature and importance of the testimony being what it is. We may trust, therefore, that enough has been said to show the high interest and importance of the remaining fragments of the early Gothic version of Ulfilas, and that the sketch now presented, which does not aspire to give more than a cursory account, may have the effect of awakening a wider and more general interest in the study of a noble language which is one of the richest inheritances of the past, and is closely connected with our own, both in structure and vocabulary, as well as with its immediate descendant, the modern German.

STANLEY LEATHES.

From The Cornhill Magazine.

ÆS TRIPLEX.

THE changes wrought by death are in themselves so sharp and final, and so terrible and melancholy in their consequences, that the thing stands alone in man's experience, and has no parallel upon earth. It outdoes all other accidents because it is the last of them. Sometimes it leaps suddenly upon its victims, like a Thug; sometimes it lays a regular siege and creeps upon their citadel during a score of years. And when the business is done, there is sore havoc made in other people's lives, and a pin knocked out by which many subsidiary friendships hung together. There are empty chairs, solitary walks, and single beds at night. Again, in taking away our friends, death does not take them away utterly, but leaves behind a mocking, tragical, and soon intolerable residue, which must be hurriedly concealed. Hence a whole chapter of sights and customs striking to the mind, from the pyramids of Egypt to the gibbets and dule-trees of mediæval Europe. The poorest persons have a bit of pageant going towards the tomb; memorial stones are set up over the least memorable; and in order to preserve some show of respect for what remains of our old loves and friendships, we must accompany it with much grimly ludicrous ceremonial, and the hired undertaker parades before the door. All this, and much more of the same sort, accompanied by the eloquence of poets, has gone a great way to put humanity in error; nay, in many philosophies the error has been embodied and laid down with every circumstance of logic; although in real life the bustle and swiftness, in leaving people little time to think, have not left them time enough to go dangerously wrong in practice.

As a matter of fact, although few things are spoken of with more fearful whisperings than this prospect of death, few have less influence on conduct under healthy circumstances. We have all heard of cities in South America built upon the side of fiery mountains, and how, even in this tremendous neighborhood, the inhabitants are not a jot more impressed by the solemnity of mortal conditions than if they were delving gardens in the greenest corner of England. There are serenades and suppers and much gallantry among the myrtles overhead; and meanwhile the foundation shudders underfoot, the bowels of the mountain growl, and at any moment living ruin may leap skyhigh into the moonlight, and tumble man and his merry-making in the dust. In the eyes of very young people, and very dull old ones, there is something indescribably reckless and desperate in such a picture. It seems not credible that respectable married people, with umbrellas, should find appetite for a bit of supper within quite a long distance of a fiery mountain; ordinary life begins to smell of high-handed debauch when it is carried on so close to a catastrophe; and even cheese and salad, it seems, could hardly be relished in such circumstances without something like a defiance of the Creator. It should be a place for nobody but hermits dwelling in prayer and maceration, or mere born-devils drowning care in a perpetual carouse. And yet, when one comes to think upon it calmly, the situation of these South American citizens forms only a very pale figure for the state of ordinary mankind. This world itself, travelling blindly and swiftly in overcrowded space, among a million other worlds travelling blindly and swiftly in contrary directions, may very well come by a knock that would set it into explosion like a penny squib. And what, pathologically looked at, is the human body with

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

all its organs, but a mere bagful of petards? The least of these is as dangerous to the whole economy as the ship's powder-magazine to the ship; and with every breath we breathe, and every meal we eat, we are putting one or more of them in peril. If we clung as devotedly as some philosophers pretend we do to the abstract idea of life, or were half as frightened as they make out we are for the subversive accident that ends it all, the trumpets might sound by the hour and no one would follow them into battle — the blue-peter might fly at the truck, but who would climb into a sea-going ship? Think (if these philosophers were right) with what a preparation of spirit we should affront the daily peril of the dinner-table: a deadlier spot than any battle-field in history; where the far greater proportion of our ancestors have miserably left their bones! What woman would ever be lured into marriage, so much more dangerous than the wildest sea? And what would it be to grow old? For, after a certain distance, every step we take in life we find the ice growing thinner below our feet, and all around us and behind us we see our contemporaries going threugh. By the time a man gets well into the seventies, his continued existence is a mere miracle; and when he lays his old bones in bed for the night, there is an overwhelming probability that he will never see the day. Do the old men mind it, as a matter of fact? Why, no. They were never merrier; they have their grog at night, and tell the raciest stories; they hear of the death of people about their own age, or even younger, not as if it was a grisly warning, but with a simple, childlike pleasure at having outlived some one else; and when a draught might puff them out like a guttering candle, or a bit of a stumble shatter them like so much glass, their old hearts keep sound and unaffrighted, and they go on, bubbling with laughter, through years of man's age compared to which the valley at Balaklava was as safe and peaceful as a village cricket-green on Sunday. It may fairly be questioned (if we look to the peril only) whether it was a much more daring feat for Curtius to plunge into the gulf, than for any old gentleman of ninety to doff his clothes and clamber into bed.

Indeed, it is a memorable subject for consideration, with what unconcern and gaiety mankind pricks on along the valley of the shadow of death. The whole way is one wilderness of snares, and the end of it, for those who fear the last pinch, is irrevocable ruin. And yet we go spinning through it all, like a party for the Derby. Perhaps the reader remembers one of the humorous devices of the deified Caligula: how he encouraged a vast concourse of holiday-makers on to his bridge over Baiæ bay; and when they were in the height of their enjoyment, turned loose the Prætorian Guards among the company, and had them tossed into the sea. This is no bad miniature of the dealings of nature with the transitory race of men. Only, what a chequered picnic we have of it, even while it lasts! and into what great waters, not to be crossed by any swimmer, God's pale Prætorian throws us over in the end! We live the time that a match flickers; we pop the cork of a ginger-beer bottle, and the earthquake swallows us on the instant. Is it not odd, is it not incongruous, is it not, in the highest sense of human speech, incredible, that we should think so highly of the ginger-beer, and trouble our heads so little about the devouring earthquake? The love of life and the fear of death are two famous phrases that grow harder to understand the more we think about them. It is a well-known fact that an immense proportion of boat accidents would never happen if people held the sheet in their hands instead of tying it; and yet, unless it be some martinet of a professional mariner or some landsman with shattered nerves, every one of God's creatures ties it. A strange instance of man's unconcern and brazen boldness in the face of death!

We confound ourselves with metaphysical phrases, which we import into daily talk with noble inappropriateness. We have no idea of what death is, apart from its circumstances and some of its consequences to others; and although we have some experience of living, there is not a man on earth who has flown so high into abstraction as to have any practical guess at the meaning of the word life. All literature, from Job and Omar Khayam to Thomas Carlyle or Walt Whitman, is but at attempt to look upon the human state with such largeness of view as shall enable us to rise from the consideration of living to the definition of life. And our sages give us about the best satisfaction in their power when they say that it is a vapor, or a show, or made out of the same stuff with dreams. Philosophy, in its more rigid sense, has been at the same work for ages; and after a myriad bald heads have wagged over the problem, and piles of words have been heaped one upon another into dry and cloudy volumes without end,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

philosophy has the honor of laying before us, with modest pride, her contribution towards the subject: that life is a "permanent possibility of sensation." Truly a fine result! A man may very well love beef, or hunting, or a woman; but surely, surely, not a "permanent possibility of sensation"! He may be afraid of a precipice, or a dentist, or a large enemy with a club, or even an undertaker's man; but not certainly of abstract death. We may trick with the word life in its dozen senses until we are weary of tricking; we may argue in terms of all the philosophies on earth, but one fact remains true throughout — that we do not love life, in the sense that we are greatly preoccupied about its conservation; that we do not, properly speaking, love life at all, but living. Into the views of the least careful there will enter some degree of providence; no man's eyes are fixed entirely on the passing hour; but although we have some anticipation of good health, good weather, wine, active employment, love, and self-approval, the sum of these anticipations does not amount to anything like a general view of life's possibilities and issues; nor are those who cherish them most vividly, at all the most scrupulous of their personal safety. To be deeply interested in the accidents of our existence, to enjoy keenly the mixed texture of human experience, rather leads a man to disregard precautions, and risk his neck against a straw. For surely the love of living is stronger in an Alpine climber roping over a peril, or a hunter riding merrily at a stiff fence, than in a creature who lives upon a diet and walks a measured distance in the interest of his constitution.

There is a great deal of very vile nonsense talked upon both sides of the matter: tearing divines reducing life to the dimensions of a mere funeral procession, so short as to be hardly decent; and melancholy unbelievers yearning for the tomb as if it were a world too far away. Both sides must feel a little ashamed of their performances now and again when they draw in their chairs to dinner. Indeed, a good meal and a bottle of wine is an answer to most standard works upon the question. When a man's heart warms to his viands, he forgets a greal deal of sophistry, and soars into a rosy zone of contemplation. Death may be knocking at the door, like the commander's statue; we have something else in hand, thank God, and let him knock. Passing-bells are ringing all the world over; all the world over, and every hour some one is parting company with all his aches and ecstasies; for us also the trap is laid. But we are so fond of life that we have no leisure to entertain the terror of death. 'Tis a honeymoon with us all through, and none of the longest. Small blame to us if we give our whole hearts to this glowing bride of ours, to the appetites, to honor, to the hungry curiosity of the mind, to the pleasure of the eyes in nature, and the pride of our own nimble bodies. We all of us appreciate the sensations; but as for caring about the permanence of the possibility, a man's head is generally very bald, and his senses very dull, before he comes to that. Whether we regard life as a lane leading to a dead wall — a mere bag's end, as the French say — or whether we think of it as a vestibule or gymnasium, where we wait our turn and prepare our faculties for some more noble destiny; whether we thunder in a pulpit, or pule in little atheistic poetry books, about its vanity and brevity; whether we look justly for years of health and vigor, or are about to mount into a bath-chair as a step towards the hearse; in each and all of these views and situations there is but one conclusion possible: that a man should stop his ears against paralyzing terror, and run the race that is set before him with a single mind. No one surely could have recoiled with more heartache and terror from the thought of death than our delightful lexicographer; and yet we know how little it affected his conduct, how wisely and boldly he walked, and in what a fresh and lively vein he spoke of life. Already an old man, he ventured on his Highland tour; and his heart, bound with triple brass, did not recoil before twenty-seven individual cups of tea. As courage and intelligence are the two qualities best worth a good man's cultivation, so it is the first part of intelligence to recognize our precarious estate in life, and the first part of courage to be not at all abashed before the fact. A frank and somewhat headlong carriage, not looking too anxiously before, not dallying in maudlin regret over the past, stamps the man who is well armored for this world.

And not only well armored for himself, but a good friend and a good citizen to boot. We do not go to cowards for tender dealing; there is nothing so cruel as panic; the man who has least fear for his own carcase, has most time to consider others. That eminent chemist who took his walks abroad in tin shoes, and subsisted wholly upon tepid milk, had all his work cut out for him in considerate deal-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

ings with his own digestion. So soon as prudence has begun to grow up in the brain, like a dismal fungus, it finds its first expression in a paralysis of generous acts. The victim begins to shrink spiritually; he develops a fancy for parlors with a regulated temperature, and takes his morality on the principle of tin shoes and tepid milk. The care of one important body or soul becomes so engrossing, that all the noises of the outer world begin to come thin and faint into the parlor with the regulated temperature; and the tin shoes go equably forward over blood and rain. To be overwise is to ossify; and the scruple-monger ends by standing stock-still. Now the man who has his heart on his sleeve, and a good whirling weathercock of a brain, who reckons his life as a thing to be dashingly used and cheerfully hazarded, makes a very different acquaintance of the world, keeps all his pulses going true and fast, and gathers impetus as he runs, until, if he be running towards anything better than wildfire, he may shoot up and become a constellation in the end. Lord look after his health, Lord have a care of his soul, says he; and he has at the key of the position, and swashes through peril and incongruity towards his aim. Death is on all sides of him with pointed batteries, as he is on all sides of us; the nastiest chances pop out against him; mim-mouthed friends and relations hold up their hands in quite a little elegiacal synod about his path: and what cares he for all this? Being a true lover of living, a fellow with something pushing and spontaneous in his inside, he must, like any other soldier, in any other stirring, deadly warfare, push on at his best pace until he touch the goal. "A peerage or Westminster Abbey!" cried Nelson in his bright, boyish, heroic manner. These are great incentives; not for any of these, but for the plain satisfaction of living, of being about their business in some sort or other, do the brave, serviceable men of every nation tread down the nettle danger, and pass flyingly over all the stumbling-blocks of prudence. Think of the heroism of Johnson, think of that superb indifference to mortal limitation that set him upon his dictionary and carried him through triumphantly until the end! Who, if he were wisely considerate of things at large, would ever embark upon any work much more considerable than a halfpenny post-card? Who would project a serial novel, after Thackeray and Dickens had each fallen in mid-course? Who would find heart enough to begin to live, if he dallied with the consideration of death?

And, after all, what sorry and pitiful quibbling all this is! To forego all the issues of living in a parlor with a regulated temperature — as if that were not to die a hundred times over, and for ten years at a stretch! As if it were not to die in one's own lifetime, and without even the sad immunities of death! As if it were not to die, and yet be the patient spectators of our own pitiable change! The permanent possibility is preserved, but the sensations carefully held at arm's length, as if one kept a photographic plate in a dark chamber. It is better to lose health like a spendthrift than to waste it like a miser. It is better to live and be done with it, than to die daily in the sick-room. By all means begin your folio; even if the doctor does not give you a year, even if he hesitates about a month, make one brave push and see what can be accomplished in a week. It is not only in finished undertakings that we ought to honor useful labor. A spirit goes out of the man who means execution, which outlives the most untimely ending. All who have meant good work with their whole hearts, have done good work, although they may die before they have the time to sign it. Every heart that has beat strong and cheerfully has left a hopeful impulse behind it in the world, and bettered the tradition of mankind. And even if death catch people, like an open pitfall, and in mid-career, laying out vast projects, and planning monstrous foundations, flushed with hope, and their mouths full of boastful language, they should be at once tripped up and silenced, is there not something brave and spirited in such a termination? And does not life go down with a better grace, foaming in full body over a precipice, than miserably straggling to an end in sandy deltas? When the Greeks made their fine saying that those whom the gods love die young, I cannot help believing they had this sort of death also in their eye. For surely, at whatever age it overtake the man, this is to die young. Death has not been suffered to take so much as an illusion from his heart. In the hot-fit of life, a-tiptoe on the highest point of being, he passes at a bound on to the other side. The noise of the mallet and chisel is scarcely quenched, the trumpets are hardly done blowing, when, trailing with him clouds of glory, this happy-starr'd, full-blooded spirit shoots into the spiritual land.

R. L. S.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From Sunday at Home.

A RECOLLECTION OF THE INDIAN MUTINY.

BY A COMPANY'S OFFICER.

In the spring of the Mutiny year there were at Agra two or three American Presbyterian clergymen, engaged in missionary work among the natives there. That station was the headquarters of the government of the North-west Provinces, as a northern division of India is called, having a population of above thirty millions, about as great as that of the United Kingdom. Such a government required a number of clerks, who could speak and write English. There were few Englishmen in India then, other than the covenanted civilian and military, so these clerkships were held principally by Eurasians or half-castes, who were educated by their parents expressly for such work. A government college, and missionary schools, were the educational establishments to which these lads were sent. At these mission schools they were welcome, as they gave a Christian tone to the classes, which were otherwise filled by heathen youth. It was also felt that these Eurasians were an important class, over whom it was necessary to watch, lest they should fall into heathenism, and be a hindrance, instead of a help, to the spread of the gospel in India. The certainty of employment for educated sons made the parents eager enough to place them at schools, but as there were few missionary ladies in India at that time, it was very difficult to get any good education for the daughters of this class.

One of the missionaries at that time in Agra was the Rev. Mr. Fullarton, who had pastoral charge of the Presbyterian Church there, which was attended, almost exclusively, by these Eurasians and their families. He was a man of about forty years of age, broad-shouldered and of powerful make, with a fine open face and kindly blue eyes, that shone again with joyous brotherly kindness to all men. His bearing too reminded one of the brave old Covenanter, whom no ills or fears could daunt, and gave the impression that he had a wellspring of life and health within him, that cheered himself and made those about him happy. He was a married man, and his wife, an American lady, was truly a helpmeet to her missionary husband. Though she had three young children, and from the smallness of her husband's missionary salary was unable to have much help in the way of servants, yet she made or found time to assist her husband in his work. Being well-educated, she opened a school for the Eurasian girls of his congregation, and spent her spare strength in teaching them, and preparing them to be good Christian wives and mothers, such as the heathen around might take a lesson from, and imitate.

Like a thunderclap, the news of the mutiny at Meerat, on the 10th of May, fell on the Agra community, and turned the whole current of men's thoughts from the duties and schemes of the day, and bade them prepare for the coming struggle. Duties had, however, to be continued, and Mrs. Fullarton's school was carried on, subject always to the pressing thought that the danger and suffering which had fallen on other stations must be expected some day in Agra. At that time, three native regiments, and one European regiment, with six guns manned by Europeans, formed the garrison of that station.

On Saturday night, the 30th of May, news arrived that some companies of one of the Agra regiments had mutinied at Muttra, a station thirty-five miles off, and had fired on their English officers. The Agra regiments, notwithstanding their protestations of fidelity to their "salt," could no longer be trusted. The lieutenant-governor, Mr. Colvin, after consultation with the brigadier and Mr. Drummond, the magistrate, resolved on disarming them next day, and sending the men to their homes. The brigadier then went to prepare for the disarming, and the magistrate sent orders to rouse all the civilians and Christian clerks, and send them, with their wives and children, to rendezvous that had been appointed beforehand for their reception in the hour of danger.

Mr. Fullarton, with his wife and family, went to the one known as "Boldero's House," a bungalow perched on the top of an old lime-kiln, which from age was covered with sheltering trees, and clothed with grass.

The Sabbath sun rose that morning on a strange scene in the usually well-ordered station of Agra. Instead of early morning church, the troops, English and native, were assembled on parade, and there the natives, to their great astonishment, found themselves drawn up opposite the European regiment and guns with lighted portfires, and ordered to lay down their arms. The great mass of men obeyed, as they had no time to make any arrangements, and, piling their arms, saw them carted away to the magazine in the fort. At night I visited "Boldero's bungalow",

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

about ten o'clock. Outside the house lay groups of gentlemen under the trees, talking quietly over the events of the day, but with loaded double-barrelled guns and plenty of ammunition by their sides. In the verandahs, ladies and native ayahs lay pretty closely placed, while the floors of the rooms inside were strewn with about as many babies and young children as they could readily hold. With one or two exceptions, the children were all asleep; but every now and then a sickly child would waken up and begin to scream. Immediately its watchful mother would start up, and go to its assistance, careful in approaching it lest she should step on any other lady's child. I saw Mr. Fullarton and his fellow-missionaries, with some other gentleman, sitting or lying below one of the trees. The full moon shone through the leaves, and I remember well Mr. Fullarton's face turned up to speak to me with a look or word of thankfulness for the sparing and other mercies of the day. At his side, too, lay a double-barrelled gun, which some gentleman had given him, knowing, however unwilling, his heart was stout enough to use it in defence of the helpless women and children.

That danger passed over, but in five weeks a mismanaged fight required the Christians to retire inside the Agra fort, and Mr. Fullarton's house was burnt with the rest. But the lives of all the civilians and native Christians, with a few painful exceptions, were saved; in this respect being so much better off than the people at Cawnpore, Futtehghur, Delhi, and other stations. Distressing news from all these places harrowed the hearts of the Agra people, whose friends and relatives were the sufferers; but Mr. Fullarton, and the other American missionaries, were touched peculiarly by the massacres at Futtehghur.

At Futtehghur an American Presbyterian mission had been long established, and abundantly prospered. The native converts there had been taught an industry which was of great use to the government and officers of the army. The best tents were made by them that could be had in India; the cloth was sure to be good, and all the ropes, poles, etc., of the best material. You were sure indeed of getting there the best article of its kind which you wanted, and good value for your money. The consequence was the community was largely patronized, and was rich and prosperous. The people had excellent houses, and their village was so clean that it was a model which the Christian could point out to the heathen with some pride and great satisfaction. Two or three American Presbyterian missionaries labored there and in the neighboring heathen city and villages. In the centre of the village stood a handsome little church with a spire, telling all around that Yisu Masih (Jesus the Messiah) was worshipped there.

Vainly did the English officers for weeks trust the deluded Sepoy garrison, and, to show their confidence, refuse to provision the fort. On the approach of another mutinous regiment, the garrison rose on the officers; and they, with the civilians, missionaries, and others, had to flee for refuge to the fort. Starvation, however, soon drove them to the Ganges, where they embarked at night in boats and dropped down the river. When opposite Cawnpore, about seventy miles down, they were, as we know, missionaries and all, foully butchered. The Sepoys and mob from Futtehghur (or rather Furruckabad, the name of the city) went off to the Christian village, wrecked it, and slew or shot all the Christians they could lay their hands on. News came to Agra that they had all perished, but presently other news came that some had escaped, and were wandering in the jungles. Again news kept coming of one and another being caught, tortured, and slain with the sword, or blown away from guns.

In those days there was no getting down from Agra to help these people. At last, in October, the road was cleared. Havelock's victories threw terror into the native mind. Delhi fell, and a force detached from there came down to Agra, and in a brilliant victory defeated an army that threatened the fort. It then passed down country and joined Lord Clyde's army at Cawnpore, and he, before delivering his second attack on Lucknow, marched his headquarters up to Futtehghur. Mr. Fullarton, yearning after the remains of the Futtehghur flock, and hearing of this movement, joined Mr. Raikes, a civilian, in the perilous attempt of reaching, without a guard, the commander-in-chief's camp, some seventy or eighty miles off. They started together one night on the mail-cart, and happily arrived in safety. About a week after, I and others had to follow, and I shall never forget my impressions on arriving in camp, and the first sight of the long and anxiously-looked-for army from home. The first thing I came on was the artillery siege-train of monster guns, guarded by a party of the Forty-second Highlanders, one of whom was standing sentry. His fresh English complexion,

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

so different from what we were accustomed to, gave an impression of vigor and manhood which spoke of certain and speedy victory. I then went to the tent of my friend, the gallant young artillery officer and Christian soldier, Lieutenant Hastings Harington, so soon to be decorated with the Victoria Cross.

The next morning was Sunday, which was spent quietly in camp, with the usual early morning services for the troops on parade. In the forenoon, also, there was a separate service for the headquarter staff, and any other officers who chose to attend, in the commander-in-chief's large tent. Harington and I went there, and a goodly sight it was to see the chiefs of England's brave army in the East coming voluntarily to church. One could not help looking on the manly fellows there, and wondering sadly who of them were to survive the deadly struggle they knew they were so soon to face. In a front place sat Colonel Adrian Hope, commanding the Forty-second Highlanders, whose tall, handsome figure made his reverent bearing and earnestness more conspicuous, and telling and good as an example. He was one of those who not long after fell, trying to get his men out of a false position they were unfortunately sent to occupy.

In the afternoon, as the sun was beginning to go down, Harington and I were sitting in the tent, when "Harington sahib hai?" ("Is Mr. Harington here?") sounded outside as from a well-known voice. On going outside there was dear Fullarton, who had come from the city about two miles off to see Harington, and ask him to attend the first Sunday service he was to hold with the newly-found native Christians of Futtehghur.

We started at once. On the way down he told us the story of how, on his arrival in camp, about a week before, he had heard of some native Christians who had come to the city on being told that the English army was there. He determined to find them out, and, all alone, went down towards the town. On his way he met a blind Christian girl, led by a stranger. He at once recognized her, for he had seen her not long before the Mutiny began, when he was down assisting at a communion service at Futtehghur. He stopped her, and asked where she was going. She said she was on her way to the English camp, to find a padre sahib, who, she heard, had arrived there. Fullarton told her he was the padre sahib she was in search of. The girl stood still, as if in a sore dilemma; the Mutiny days had made her suspicious. At last she said, "May I feel your coat?" "Certainly," said Mr. Fullarton. On which she felt the cloth, and recognized it as that worn by her old clergyman; then, catching his hand, she wept over it with joy. He asked her about the others, and was immediately conducted by her and her friend to a house in one of the streets. On being admitted, Mr. Fullarton walked right into the inner court, and there saw a number of Christians sitting round, who stared at him for an instant, amazed. One of them recognized him, and all rose in a body with the happiness of those relieved from long-continued anxiety and fear. He represented the return of the Christian government, and his presence among them was an assurance of deliverance out of all their troubles. Their deep joy broke him down too, and he could not help mingling his tears with theirs. As Mr. Fullarton was telling us about them, we reached the city of Futtehghur, and were greatly struck with its sad appearance. About the hour when we got there the principal streets of a native town are usually filled with men on business, or strolling up and down meeting friends, and shopping. That evening we met very few. The shops were almost all shut, nor was there any of that "busy hum of men" which is so especially characteristic of Eastern cities. Most of the houses seemed deserted. The people we did meet looked uneasy, no doubt at the presence of the great English army and authority, after the scenes they had joined in or witnessed, without caring or daring to check.

Worst of all, they could not hide the state of preparation they were in to fight the English force, which was now at their doors. Their houses were loopholed all along the principal streets, by order of the nawab and sepoys; but on its arrival they and their rulers had lost heart, and the city now lay at the mercy of the English. What added to their difficulty was, that a sepoy army was advancing on Futtehghur, full of the promise that they would, within the week, destroy the English army, and restore the authority of the nawab. As the boasts of coming victory were no doubt loud and deep, we can fancy there were many who believed the deeds would not belie the words. At last we reached a native house, where Mr. Fullarton stopped, and said that there he was to have his first regular Sunday service with the remnants of the Futtehghur native Christians. We entered through a courtyard, and ascended by some steps to the roof of the house, where was an open space of about twenty feet square. On the street

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

side there was a screen-wall some four or five feet high, which protected the people of the house from the vulgar gaze of the passers-by. The walls of the neighboring houses were also so raised and arranged that the people in them could not see us, nor could we see them. The most noticeable thing was that the screen-wall on the side next the street was loopholed for musketry, as in so many of the other houses. Who the owner was we did not know, though no doubt Mr. Fullarton and the native Christians did; but he had thought it prudent to leave his house, with his property, and stay away from home till the present storm had passed. At the farther end of the roof from the street was a covered-in verandah, for sitting in during the day or sleeping in at night. There Mr. Fullarton took his stand, and was joined by an English-speaking native, whom he introduced to us as a "catechist," and one who had been of good repute for long among the Christian community. The man had an intelligent, pleasant, and unassuming expression and manner, but his garments were in a miserable state. Had we not known his circumstances, we would not readily have believed that a respectable native Christian stood before us. Presently the congregation began to arrive, all presenting the same draggled and worn appearance. They had been wandering for months in the jungle, more or less hunted and harassed. Part had been hidden and cared for by a Hindoo village chief, at his great personal risk. He had compassion on them, and a heart to hate the cruelty of the city roughs and mutinous sepoys. The others had wandered about from place to place, hiding during the day and begging by night.

The congregation on the housetop sat down in rows, with earnest but cheerful faces, with their children by them, and some of the mothers had infants in their arms. "The baby," on this occasion at least, formed no excuse for the mother absenting herself from service, and though, after the manner of babies, cries or shouts frequently interrupted the meeting, no one seemed to be offended with them or their mothers. No, there was deep thankfulness that these little ones were spared, and a mother's love was honored by the care that had been taken, amid sore troubles, to preserve the children through such difficulties, exposure, and dangers. The service began with a Hindustanee hymn, which they all seemed to remember. Mr. Fullarton read a chapter, and spoke to the people many words of comfort and kindness in a short address. After this, we had a prayer from the catechist. It was of course in Hindustanee, but a more touching cry to our Heavenly Father I thought I had never listened to. It gave the impression of having been composed, or thought out, during days of the deepest mental anxiety and bodily want, when the need of heaven's love and care were truly felt, and their supply earnestly sought.

At the close there was a talk all round between the clergyman and his flock, and kindly salaams bade him good-bye for the night. After they were all gone, Harington and I talked a while with Mr. Fullarton, who told us more of his dealings with the people. He found them, as we saw, in rags, and even unable to procure sufficient food. He therefore set about planning for their present needs. He first of all selected all the strongest of the men whom he thought he could get employed as policemen by the magistrate who was in camp. He then went to the camp, and asked if they would be received as such. A ready answer, "Yes," was given, for the English magistrate was then in sore want of men about him on whom he could thoroughly depend. He then returned, and told the men they were to have immediate employment, on seven rupees a month (fourteen shillings), which was good pay in their great need. But there was one difficulty — he could not take the men up to camp in such hopelessly tattered and scanty garments, so they must first be clothed. He therefore sent to the bazaar, and bought the cheapest white cloth that would do at all, had the men measured, and set the women to work at once to make up clothes, so that the men might be presentable. Willing hands worked hard, and soon he was able to go with them to camp, and had them all taken on as government servants. Knowing well the small stipend Mr. Fullarton had from the Mission Board in America, I asked, "But where did you get the money to do all this?" "Oh," he said, "I had it." "And how much have you over?" was my next question. He was silent for a moment; I saw the tear start in his eye; his lip quivered a little; at last he said, "A rupee." The truth was out, he was at starving-point himself, but did not care to tell. Harington and I made him take what we could give, for we knew there was much more he wished to do if he had the means. Mr. Fullarton was to sleep in his church on the roof of the house that night, but he would accompany us a short way towards camp.

On descending the stair into the courtyard, and as Harington and he walked on before, I observed a water-carrier, with a

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

few dry twigs, trying to get a lotah (brass drinking-vessel) to boil. It contained some four or five potatoes. I asked what these were being prepared for. He said, "They are for the padre sahib's (Mr. Fullarton's) dinner." "Is there anything more?" "No." Next day I started back for Agra, where dear Mr. Fullarton was so well-known. I told Mr. Lowe, a civilian and a Christian man, who loved Mr. Fullarton and his work, all I had seen and heard at Futtehghur. He started at once to see a few of his friends, and that evening sent off five hundred rupees, which were cheerfully given to aid Mr. Fullarton in putting his native Christian friends beyond want, at least for a while to come.

If any think that the faith of native Christians in the East is inferior to that of Christians in the West, the company of worshippers we met that Sunday afternoon would have dispelled any vain dream of superiority. These men had borne the spoiling of their goods; they had seen some of their number cruelly murdered; they had suffered the humiliation, and had undergone all the hardships, the watchings, the anxieties and fears that fill up the cup of bitterness that martyrs in other climes and ages have had to drain. They had only to renounce their faith, in order that they and their families might be restored to honor and comfort. But they would not deny their faith, and lived a noble company of witnesses for the truth.

England was at the time busy with the story of the sufferings of English women and children, and there were none able to write to the papers from the Futtehghur jungles, so little was known of what was going on. If England's queen would have been glad to see her army at prayer under the difficulties and distractions of active service, the American people had reason to be proud of their countryman that day, caring for nothing but to do his best for the Indian people, whom his brethren had been the means of rescuing from heathenism, and in ministering to whom they had lost their lives.

When peace was restored other American clergymen came to Futtehghur, and it is again prospering under their care. Mr. Fullarton returned to his duties at Agra, but was not permitted to labor long. Cancer of the tongue attacked him, and he was sent to Landour, a sanitarium in the Himalayas. There he bore his sore trial and painful suffering with the patience and resignation which were so natural to his noble Christian character. He chose to die in India, his adopted country, and the scene of his many labors of love. His widow returned with her children to America. If they read this story in the Sunday at Home, they may not guess or remember the writer, but he cherishes with affection the memory of the dear servant of God who preached on the Futtehghur housetop that happy Sabbath-day.

THOMAS FARQUHAR.

From The Saturday Review.

THE PLEASURES OF MEDIOCRITY.

THE Frenchman who said of the English girl's singing that it was "magnifique, splendide, sublime, pretty good," had no idea that the last part of the compliment was a bathos. Perhaps he was right, though the opinion of the world has certainly gone against him. Perhaps a work of any sort of art which is "pretty good" gives no less pleasure, or more (and to give pleasure is, after all, its end), than any tremendous composition in the grand style. If you don't care for the grand style, or know what it is, then, says a poet in the most devout way, "moriemini in peccatis vestris." To follow the grand style only, to neglect what is "pretty good," is to miss the sweet April mornings, the indolent, easy pleasures of literature. "I think in my heart," said Thackeray before he was famous, before he was the author of "Vanity Fair," "I am fonder of pretty third-rate pictures than of your great, thundering first-rates. Confess how many times you have read Béranger, and how many Milton. If you go to the 'Star and Garter,' don't you grow sick of the vast luscious landscape, and long for the sight of a couple of cows, or a donkey, and a few yards of common?" One suspects people who do not enjoy the common nature, and the art which is not uncommon, of caring very little for either one or the other. They stay in town as long as fashion allows, and they go twice or thrice to stare at the biggest pictures in Burlington House. They hurry abroad, and nothing will satisfy them, after the scenery of Eaton Square, but nature in her grandest moods — the avalanche, the glacier, the tremendous thunderstorm, the first-rate sunset, the Bengal lights on the falls at Schaffhausen. If they visit a picture-gallery in Paris or Dresden, they glance at the designs which Baedeker marks with three stars. It is not so hard to recognize the grand style when it is indicated by this typographical device.

Surely this kind of person has no real love of the beautiful things of the world

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

or of man's making. He lives in commonplace and ugliness all his days, and tries every now and then a violent change of the intellectual air. If a man dwells always as much as he can in the thought and presence of what is beautiful, he cares less for brilliant effects and huge efforts of genius. The scented flowers on a grey old wall, a clump of poplars "whispering to the plane-trees," a river-shallow where the kine stand in the cool water, all these sights are common in his life, and give him from hour to hour as much pleasure almost as he is capable of enjoying. It needs a greater effort, unconscious as the effort may be, to live among the masterpieces of nature, the peaks that bury themselves in mists, or glow like molten steel in the splendors of an Alpine sunset. These beauties become almost intolerable, and lift the spirit into air too rarefied. This show, you cannot but think, has been spread for myriads of years, while there were no human eyes to watch and wonder. These changes and miracles of light and color have revealed themselves indifferently to the blind air before our race was, and when we have gone these eternal peaks will be the same in their barren gorgeousness. It is hard to avoid, and indeed it is not well to avoid, thoughts of this sort in the presence of what we call the sublime — the sea and the mountains which, compared with human fortunes, are immutable; the stars which "brand his nothingness into man." To awake such musings is of the very essence of the sublime. Never to have known them is to have missed a necessary experience, but always to live with them would be intolerable. There is no more pleasant relief than the spectacle of an English common, a Yorkshire moor where one hears the familiar "cluck" of the grouse, after a summer spent with the avalanche and the mountain. The eye and the mind are no longer strained, and nature rounds herself about human life, to foster which, in kindly, commonplace countries, she seems to have been intended from the beginning. People who are all for the austere and elevated natural landscape have souls, it is fair to suppose, naturally attuned to sublimity. In company with Mr. Cook's personally conducted tourists, they "do" their Alps and Dolomites without an effort. They are at home like the eagle in the silent places of the hills, and the Dolomites suggest no fancies with which they are not already quite familiar. Their taste is the same in art; in art, too, it pleases them aerias tentasse domos with unwearied wing. "Milton they never grow tired of, and are as familiar with Raffaelle as Bottom with exquisite Titania." They tell you that they do not read poetry often, which is perfectly true, but when they do take it, they like it good. This means that about once in every three years they make an effort to get through "Paradise Lost" — a conscientious, a gallant effort, but alas! an unsuccessful one. Shakespeare, too, they know is an accepted writer, who is as indisputably great as the Matterhorn itself — a poet marked with three stars in the books of all literary Baedekers. Yet even Shakespeare they can only peruse by help of the division of labor, and the encouragement and mutual aid of a society. No one ever saw the man or woman who likes poetry to be of the best reading "King Lear" for his or her own private pleasure. They would as soon think of taking a lonely walk by moonlight. Organized societies, of which each member is interested in reading his part as well as possible, are needed, with all the accompaniment of tattle and criticism, to see the sturdy Englishman who loves the sublime muse safe through "Macbeth." Shakespeare societies are proofs of the conscientiousness of our race. We are not satisfied with praising le vieux Williams, as the French praise le grand Corneille, without having read him. We are determined to read him, though it takes a dozen of us to work through a drama. When the task is finished, the lovers of the grand style go comfortably back to their newspapers. When they have done their Alps they retire to Eaton Square; when they have done their "Shakespeare" they fall back on the Times. It is not necessary, thank goodness, say they, to go roving in poetry or precipices till another year or another month has passed away.

Readers who like always to have some little memory of beautiful words within reach, as they like to have daffodils or daisies near them, and the sight of a tree from their study windows, do not perhaps visit "Paradise Lost" much more frequently than the sublimer souls of whom we have been speaking. Charles Lamb would have had "a grace before books, those spiritual repasts — a grace before Milton, a grace before Shakespeare, a devotional exercise proper to be said before reading 'The Faerie Queene.'" Milton, more than the others, requires, as it were, a solemn form, a grace chanted and choral, longer and more musical than those Latin exercises in which the deans and scholars of colleges respond each to the other at high tables. One has not always time for the spiritual retirement,

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

and cannot reach the isolation and elevation of thought, which should possess the reader whom Milton "wraps in a fold of his garment, and carries to the places which are his home." What is needed is a bright little garden of poetical flowers and singing birds; a glimpse, so to speak, of a common; a rare passage from some writer who is not named with the great and famous, but whom we have found for ourselves and made our own by right of discovery. Constable, or Habington, or Herrick, may well please for an hour, though they are many leagues remote from the grand style. There is a natural pleasure in reading things which no conscientious people make it a matter of duty to peruse. Thus one can fancy a Scotch Presbyterian in a Popish land going into a chapel or cathedral on a Saturday. He becomes aware of quite a new and charming sentiment; he is in church, yet he need not be there; he is in a place of prayer, though it is not the Lord's Day, and he may go away when he pleases. The minor poets take one with this charm, and, moreover, they are very human. The giants and Titans of art are separated from us in one sense, and in another they are too much like ourselves. They gave voice and form to the great commonplaces; to thoughts that all men have known they imparted majesty unattainable. Their matter is often as trite as the morality of a Sophoclean chorus; their manner makes their maxims sound like "the large utterance of the early gods," ineffably noble. The little poets wander into fantasies; they offer ideas which are not common, which the great men of art might have justly disdained, and they sing in very pleasant minor keys of their own. Probably we have missed much in losing the works of Greek minstrels of the second order. The so-called Homeric hymn to Demeter is the work of one of these men; it is not very grand, but has an air of its own — a pleasure, for example, in the color of flowers and the movements of girls as they run, which perhaps you do not find in the epics, which cannot contain the whole sum of the poetry of their time. The little masters of the "Anthology" are often to be preferred to Æschylus and his dramas of fate and retribution. These minor singers speak to a few in a language they understand. In reading them one has the pleasure of doing a sort of posthumous kindness. Meleager or the hymn-writers have won no very widespread name; no one is obliged to care for them. It is a voluntary offering one makes in studying their verses; it may be some consolation to the neglected shade. The mediocre writers are not obtrusively thrust on you; their acquaintance you make for yourself, and you have a selfish entertainment in their unfrequented pleasance. They are good for the refreshment of tired minds: they can be laid aside as easily as a bunch of violets, and make hardly a more exorbitant demand on the attention. "Earthy are we, and of the earth;" and the works of the pleasant artists who made no great renown have, like violets, that earthy perfume as of things that "smell sweet and blossom in the dust." The true and tender, though certainly minor, poets have no great flights; have been little in the sun and the storm, and the thin air of the hills. Their verse has a fragrance which brings a melancholy not too profound. They take us by surprise, like the unsigned masterpiece in a chapel unknown to Murray. They missed fame, but they give pleasure. They won and they retain affection, and a kind of personal friendship which we do not offer to men greater and more austere.

From Chambers' Journal.

A FEARFUL SWING.

THE "shaftmen" at our collieries are selected for their physical strength and pluck, in addition to the skill and practical knowledge required for their particular work. The incident we are about to relate will shew how severely the former of these qualifications may at times be tested.

The work of these men is confined to the shaft of the pit, and consists mainly in repairing the "tubbing" or lining of the shaft, stopping leaks, or removing any obstructions interfering with the free passage of the cages up and down the pit. The coal-pit at N—— has a double shaft, divided by a "bratticing" or wooden partition. These divisions we will call A and B. Two cages (the vehicles of transport up and down the pit) ascend and descend alternately in shaft A. At a certain point the shaft is widened, to allow the cages to pass each other, and their simultaneous arrival at this point is insured by the arrangement of the wire ropes on the winding-wheels over the pit-mouth. The oscillation of the cages is guarded against by wooden guiders running down each side of the shaft, which fit into grooves in the sides of the cage.

On one occasion during a very severe frost these guiders had become coated

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

with ice, and thus their free passage in the grooves of the cages was interfered with. Before this obstruction was discovered, the engine having been set in motion, the downward cage, which fortunately was empty at the time, stuck fast in the shaft before arriving at the passing-point. The ascending cage, whose only occupant was a small boy returning to "bank," proceeding on its upward course, crashed into the downward cage in the narrow part of the shaft, where of course there was only a single passage. Though the shock was something terrific, the steel rope was not broken; as the engineman, whose responsible position entails the greatest presence of mind and watchfulness, had stopped the engine on the first indication of an unusual tremor in the rope. Yet such was the violence of the meeting, that both cages, though strongly constructed of iron, were bent and broken — in fact rendered useless — by being thus jammed together in a narrow space. The greatest anxiety was felt as to the fate of the boy, as it was seen that even if he had escaped with his life after such a severe crash, his rescue would be a work of great danger and difficulty.

We may imagine the horror of the poor little fellow while suspended in the shattered cage over a gulf some four hundred feet deep, both cages firmly wedged in the shaft, and the ropes rendered useless for any means of descent to the scene of the catastrophe. The readiest way of approach seemed to be by shaft B, the position of which we have indicated above. Down this then, a shaftman, whom we will call Johnson, descended in a cage until he arrived at an opening in the brattice-work by which he could enter shaft A. He found himself (as he supposed) at a point a little above where the accident had occurred; and this conclusion he came to from seeing two ropes leading downwards, which he naturally took to be those by which the cages were suspended. Under this impression he formed the design of sliding down one of the ropes, with a view to liberating, if possible, the entangled cages and securing the safety of the unfortunate boy. The hardy fellow was soon gliding through the darkness on his brave and dangerous errand. He had descended about forty feet, when, to his horror and amazement, his course was suddenly checked by a bend in the rope; and the terrible discovery flashed upon him, that he was suspended in the loop of the slack rope, which here took a return course to the top of the downward cage!

It will be understood that when the descending cage stuck upon the runners, as the rope continued to unwind from the pulley it hung down in a loop, descending lower and lower, until the engine was stopped by the meeting of the cages. This loop or "bight" was naturally mistaken by Johnson for the two ropes, and he did not discover until he found himself in the fearful situation described, that he had entered through the brattice into shaft A below instead of above where the cages were fixed. There he hung then, over a yawning abyss many fathoms deep — closed from above by the locked cages — all below looming dark and horrible.

None of course knew his danger; his hands were chilled by the freezing rope; his arms, already fully exercised, began to ache and stiffen with the strain and intense cold added to the bewildering sense of hopeless peril. Good need there was then that pluck and endurance be found in the shaftman! His square, sturdy frame and unflinching spirit were now on their trial. Had his presence of mind gone or his nerve failed, he must have been paralyzed with fear, lost his hold, and been dashed into an unrecognizable mass.

But self-preservation is a potent law, and working in such a spirit he framed a desperate plan for a struggle for life. The guiders running down the inside of the shaft are fastened on to cross-beams about six feet apart. Johnson hoped that if he could reach one of these, he might obtain a footing whereon to rest, and by their means clamber up to the opening in the brattice-work. How to reach them was the next question that flashed lightning-like through his brain. This he essayed to do by causing the rope to oscillate from side to side, hoping thus to bring himself within reach of one of the cross-beams. And now commenced a fearful swing. Gaining a lodgment with one knee in the loop, he set the rope swinging by the motion of his body, grasping out wildly with one hand each time he approached the side of the shaft. Once, twice, thrice, he felt the cold icy face of the "tubbing," but as yet nothing except slimy boards met his grasp, affording no more hold than the glassy side of an iceberg. At last he touched a cross-beam, to which his iron muscles, now fully roused to their work, held on like a vice. He soon found footing on the beam below, and then letting go the treacherous rope, rested in comparative security before beginning the perilous ascent. With incredible endurance of nerve and muscle he clambered upward alongside the guider, by the aid of the cross-beams, and by

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

thrusting his hands through the crevices of the timber. In this manner he reached the opening into shaft B, where the cage in which he had descended was waiting. Chilled, cramped, and frozen, and barely able to give the signal, he was drawn to the pit-mouth prostrate and exhausted. The boy was rescued unhurt by a man being lowered to the top of the cages in shaft A. Johnson suffered no ill consequences, and though a hero above many known to fame, he still pursues his hardy task as a shaftman; while beneath the homely exterior still lives the pluck and sinew of iron that did not fail him even in his fearful swing.

From Chambers' Journal.

JAPANESE FANS.

DURING the past few years, Japanese fans have become so popular in this country, that a few brief remarks respecting them and the manner in which they are manufactured — culled from the published report by her Majesty's consul on the trade of Hiogo and Osaka — may perhaps prove acceptable to our readers.

Osaka, we learn, is the principal city for the manufacture of the ogi or folding fans, which are those almost exclusively exported, all descriptions of the bamboo kind being made there; the figures, writing, etc, required for their adornment are executed at Kioto. The prices vary from a few pence up to six pounds sterling per hundred, and occasionally even higher prices are given, though the bulk consists of the cheaper sorts. The superior kinds of fans, it may be mentioned parenthetically, which are termed uchiwa by the Japanese, are manufactured at Kioto, and are extensively used by the better classes of the natives.

The following are the principal features in the account which Mr. Consul Annesley gives of the details connected with ogi or folding fans. As in many other branches of industry, the principle of division of labor is carried out in the fan-making trade. The bamboo ribs are made in Osaka and Kioto by private individuals in their own houses, and combinations of the various notches cut in the lower part are left to one of the finishing workmen, who forms the various patterns of the handle according to plans prepared by the designer. In like manner the designer gives out to the engravers the patterns which his experience teaches him will be most likely to be salable during the ensuing season; and when the different blocks have been cut, it still rests with him to say what colors are to be used for the two sides of each fan. In fact, this official holds, if not the best paid, at any rate the most important position on the staff in ordinary. When the printed sheets which are to form the two sides of the fans have been handed over to the workman, together with the sets of bamboo slips which are to form the ribs, his first business is to fold the two sheets of which the fan is to be composed, so that they will retain the crease, and this is done by putting them between two pieces of paper, well saturated with oil, and properly creased. The four are then folded together and placed under a heavy weight.

When sufficient time has elapsed, the sheets are taken out, and the moulds used again, the released sheets being packed up for at least twenty-four hours in their folds. The next process is to take the ribs, which are temporarily arranged in order on a wire, and "set" them into their places on one of the sheets, after it has been spread out on a block and pasted. A dash of paste then gives the woodwork adhesive powers, and that part of the process is finished by affixing the remaining sheet of paper. The fan has to be folded up and opened three or four times before the folds take the proper shape; and by the time the fan is put by to dry, it has received far more handling than any foreign paper could stand; indeed foreign paper has been tried, and had to be given up, as unsuitable for the work; but with great care the Osaka fan-makers had been able to make some fans with printed pictures which had been sent over from America, though they were invariably obliged to use one face of Japanese paper.

The qualities of native paper now used are not nearly so good as those of which the old fans were made, and in consequence the style of manufacture has had to be changed. Instead of first pasting the two faces of the fan together and then running in pointed ribs, the ribs are square and are pasted in their places in the manner described above. The outside lacquered pieces and the fancy-work are all done in Osaka and Kioto, and some of the designs in gold lacquer on bone are really artistic; but the demand for the highly ornamented description of fans is not sufficient to encourage the production of large quantities of first-class work. When the insides are dry, the riveting of the pieces together, including the outer covering, is rapidly done, and a dash of varnish quickly finishes the fan.

The highest price that was ever given

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

for a fan in the days of seclusion from the outer world rarely exceeded a sovereign; but since the arrival of foreigners in the country, some few have been made to order at prices varying from two to three pounds sterling. The general prices of ordinary fans range from two or three shillings to three pounds per hundred, though an extraordinarily expensive fan is turned out at ten pounds per hundred. The sale of fans in olden times seldom exceeded ten thousand a year for the whole country; but in recent years no less than three millions per annum have been exported from the ports of Osaka and Yokohama alone. In concluding these brief notes, it may be interesting to mention that the number of fans ordered in Japan for the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia reached the large figure of eight hundred thousand, the estimated cost of which was ten thousand pounds, and that these were over and above the ordinary annual export alluded to before.

GREEK PRONUNCIATION. — Our classical and scholastic readers will be amused with the following very characteristic letter of Professor Blackie of Edinburgh to the editor of the Times: "I was sorry to observe from a report some time ago in your columns that my esteemed friend Mr. Gladstone, in the matter of the pronunciation of the language which he loves so much, still remains a heretic. The English pronunciation of Greek is a mere figment, a piece of incongruity, absurdity, perverseness, and practical inconvenience altogether indefensible, and I hope you will allow me, as a Scottish scholar, to enter my protest against the scholastic continuance of a practice disgraceful to the philological science of these islands. The vocalization of Greek I will let pass, presuming that by the admission of all scholars it cannot stand a single moment after the overthrow which the bastard Latin of the English schools has received from the strong arm of the editor of 'Lucretius.' But neither does the case stand a whit better in the matter of the accentuation. I never yet found an English scholar who could answer me the simple question, Why do you pronounce Latin with the Latin accents received by tradition from the Latinists of the Roman Church, while you refuse to pronounce Greek according to the combined traditions of the Greek Church, the Greek people, and the Alexandrian and Byzantine grammarians? Mr. Gladstone says, repeating in this the refrain of English scholars ready to catch at any straw in defence of their perversities, that Greek accent means 'musical pitch,' and ought not to be confounded with stress or emphasis, which we all understand. Now it is quite true that one element of the Greek accent is musical pitch, this pitch, however, being part of the common music of spoken language, not of singing or of intonation; but it also means emphasis or stress, as can easily be proved from the language of ancient grammarians and rhetoricians; and there is no contradiction between these two things. But, even supposing it meant only musical pitch and not emphasis at all, this would form not the slightest justification of the present practice of pronouncing Greek with the stress laid on Latin chords by the ancient Romans, rather than with the stress laid on Greek words by the living Greek people, an utterly unscientific and indefensible transference that arose out of mere scholastic carelessness and the want of all rhetorical culture in the great English schools, assisted, I believe, by a certain one-sided hobby-horsicality about metres, which for a considerable period gave a peculiar and somewhat narrow character to English scholarship. There is nothing more natural and more easy than to pronounce at once with that elevation of the tone of the voice which is meant by musical pitch and that dominance of emphasis which is now the more commonly accepted meaning of the word accent. There is, therefore, no mystery in the matter; only the dogged conservatism of English scholarship, too lazy or too proud to abandon its old traditions, and eager to defend an untenable position by any sort of unpractical subtlety and artificial mystery. I have only to add that in my teaching I think it sufficient to insist on the stress being laid on the proper syllable, without insisting on the accompanying elevation of tone, partly because the ears of our students are so gross and their æsthetical culture so utterly neglected that I must fain be content to deal grossly with them, and partly also because the proper stress on the proper syllable is absolutely necessary to make the word intelligible to the ear. I should also wish to state my entire accordance with Dr. Schliemann, that it would be well in all cases that Greek were taught as a living and not as a dead language. The saving of time which this would effect is a most important consideration, and I offer myself, as a practical man, to prove publicly before any assembly of scholars in Oxford or Cambridge how this could be done easily, even on English ground, without the slightest prejudice to that minute accuracy and refined classical tone of which English Hellenism has always been proud to make her boast."

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXII. | No. 1769.—May 11, 1878. | From Beginning, Vol. CXXXVII.

CONTENTS.

I. MR. FROUDE'S "LIFE AND TIMES OF THOMAS BECKET." By Edward A. Freeman. Part II., ... Contemporary Review, ... 323
II. SECOND SIGHT. Translated for THE LIVING AGE, by . . . . E. W. Latimer, ... 337
III. MODERN JAPAN. Part II., ... Fortnightly Review, ... 345
IV. NOTE-DEAFNESS, ... Mind, ... 353
V. POSITIVISM ON AN ISLAND: THE NEW PAUL AND VIRGINIA, ... Contemporary Review, ... 358
VI. CAN JEWS BE PATRIOTS? . . . . . Nineteenth Century, ... 374
VII. A ROMANCE OF THE EAST COAST, . . . Fraser's Magazine, ... 380

POETRY.

SPRING SONGS, ... 322
WIND AND WEATHER, ... 322
TO ETHEL, ... 322

MISCELLANY, ... 384

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY
LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

For EIGHT DOLLARS, remitted directly to the Publishers, the LIVING AGE will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of THE LIVING AGE is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of LITTELL & GAY.

Single Numbers of THE LIVING AGE, 18 cents.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

SPRING SONGS.

WAKE ye, oh! wake thro' the echoing wood,
Sweet birds with songs that are blither than laughter!
Tell us once more how the spring-tide's new blood
Flushes and mantles each dim forest rafter!

Did they not hear you, and know you full well,
They who once wandered thro' Eden's bright bowers?
Knew not the wisest of monarchs your spell,
Oft as ye woke by the temple's fair towers?

Constant your voice as the radiant stars
Shining in beauty far o'er the lone mountain,
Dear to all time as the summer-blue skies,
Fresh as the crystal light thrown from the fountain!

Yes, I can think of the millions of men
List'ning and loving your sweet songs before me.
Ay! and of millions more list'ning again,
When the long grass shall wave silently o'er me.

Blithe little birds! ye are singing to-day
Sweetest of all where our dear dead are sleeping;
There, by the old church walls, timeworn and grey,
Rising thro' bright ivy-wreaths round them creeping,

Over the cold dust that never again
Knoweth a care for the fast-coming morrow;
Lips that are silent, and hearts free from pain,
Eyes that have long closed forever on sorrow.

Well for us all that it rings out so clear,
This your glad song o'er the low graves before us!
Bravely you tell of that spring drawing near
When the dark winter of death shall pass o'er us.

Wake then, oh! wake thro' the echoing wood,
Sweet birds with songs that are blither than laughter!
Wake ye! and sing how the spring-tide's new blood
Flushes and mantles each dim forest rafter!

Sunday Magazine. ROBINA F. HARDY.

WIND AND WEATHER.

METEOROLOGICAL IDYL.

"THE sun bursts out in frequent blaze;
Shade flies, light flashes o'er the wold.
But yet in air there hangs a haze,
And what can make it blow so cold?

"The steeple cock points beak due west;
His tail the other way turns he.
Though that, meseems, is where his crest
In such a breeze as this should be.

"So cold has Christmas seldom been.
It ne'er was colder, e'en in May.
Why does the wind's edge cut so keen?
Turn, pensive shepherd, turn and say."

"Stranger, yon vaporous mountains note,
Cumuli, Alps on Alps, up there!
They're frozen clouds, aloft that float
As icebergs in the sea of air.

"Their rimy crags illumed, how fast
See how they change, and surge, and grow;
Whilst Zephyr apes an eastern blast,
Because the sky is full of snow."

"Thanks, guardian of the fleecy flock.
How rare, how pleasing, 'tis to find
'Mongst rustics reared from lowly stock
A cultured and observant mind!"

"Kind stranger, scant's the laborer's hire
In this inclement atmosphere;
And welcome — pardon the desire —
To his parched lips a draught of beer."

"Nay, shepherd, breathe not that request;
Banish strong drink from downs and plains:
Where Science wears the bumpkin's vest,
Let Temperance rule contented swains."

Punch.

TO ETHEL,

(Who wishes she had lived —

"In teacup-times of hood and hoop,
Or while the patch was worn.")

"IN teacup times!" The style of dress
Would suit your beauty, I confess;
BELINDA-like, the patch you'd wear;
I picture you with powdered hair, —
You'd make a charming shepherdess!

And I — no doubt — could well express
SIR PLUME's complete conceitedness, —
Could poise a clouded cane with care
"In teacup-times!"

The parts would fit precisely — yes:
We should achieve a huge success;
You should disdain, and I despair,
With quite the true Augustan air;
But . . . could I love you more, or less,
"In teacup-times?"

Blackwood's Magazine. AUSTIN DOBSON.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The Contemporary Review.

MR. FROUDE'S "LIFE AND TIMES OF THOMAS BECKET."

PART II.

MR. FROUDE's account of the early life of Thomas, his childhood, his youth, the time spent in the service of the archbishop and the king, is as truly wonderful as his more general picture of the twelfth century. It is equally wonderful, whether we are to look at it as meant for a piece of mere personal biography or as meant for a contribution to the history of the time. It is strange that Mr. Froude, who at all events can tell a picturesque story, should not have been tempted to enlarge on any of the picturesque stories of which Thomas in his young days became the subject. No doubt there is much truth in Mr. Froude's remark that "the atmosphere of legend in which his history was so early enveloped renders them all suspicious." Yet it is sometimes instructive to trace the growth of a legend, to see how a perfectly credible and probable story may, by a very slight change, be turned into a miracle. A story is told by Roger of Pontigny, and, more shortly, in the French life by Garnier of Pont Sainte-Maxence, of a remarkable escape from a fearful death which happened to Thomas in his boyhood. He falls into a mill-stream; he is drawn near to the wheel; just at that moment the miller happens to stop his wheel, and the boy is saved. "Homo qui molendinum curabat," says Roger, "nihil penitus de his quæ agebantur sciens, aquam subito a rota exclusit" (p. 96, ed. Giles). Or in the old French:—

> De de juste la plaunche out un mulin mulaunt,
> De grant ravine ala: Tomas i vint flotaunt,
> Quant il dut en la roue chaïr, le chef avaunt,
> Li muners out mulu, mit l'escloture à taunt:
> Si guarist Deus de mort, à cele feiz, l'enfaunt.
> (P. 9, ed. Hippeau.)

Here is something in which we can hardly blame men for seeing a special providence; but there is nothing miraculous. And we may be sure that in Roger's version we have the story as it was told by Thomas himself. Roger, one of the monks of Pontigny among whom Thomas sojourned in his exile, was more likely to hear stories of Thomas's childhood and youth — as distinguished from legends of his birth — in this way than in any other. When Thomas was at Pontigny, neither Thomas in telling a tale nor Roger in noting it down had any temptation to tell it otherwise than according to the best of Thomas's remembrance. This gives a peculiar value to the few notices of this stage of Thomas's life which Roger preserves. They come more nearly than anything else among our materials to the nature of autobiography. The case is different when the tale came, whether from Thomas's own mouth or from any other source, to the ears of men who naturally looked at Thomas and all his acts from a point of view somewhat different from that of the monk of Pontigny. Roger had known Thomas in the central part of his career. Edward Grim knew him only for a few days before his martyrdom, a martyrdom in which he was himself in some sort a sharer. He would naturally look upon Thomas in quite another way from his older friend, and would be inclined to surround all his acts with any amount of marvel and miracle. No wonder then that in Edward Grim's hands the providential delivery becomes a miraculous one. Instead of the miller happening to stop his wheel just at the right moment, the wheel now stops of itself. "Stetit rota nec se movit semel" (p. 8, ed. Giles). There is no reason to suspect Edward Grim of wilfully falsifying the story; any one who knows the temper of hagiographers will understand how, without any conscious invention, without any conscious rejection of evidence, the miraculous version, differing so very slightly from the unadorned fact, would seem to be, not only the true but the only possible version.

It may be matter of opinion whether Mr. Froude, in a series of papers such as he has given us, was bound to bring in stories of this kind. Yet the picture which our several authorities enable us to put together of Thomas's boyhood is clear and interesting, and this particular story has surely a special value, as illustrating the easy growth of legends, and as further letting us see the different lights in which Thomas appeared to his several biographers. At all events the things which

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

did happen to Thomas in his boyhood have a better claim to a place in his "Life and Times" than the things which Mr. Froude thinks may have happened to him. It is to be hoped that at seven years old, if he "listened to the jests of the citizens at his father's table" about the story of John of Crema, he would not have understood them. It is yet more certain that no person of any age or rank in those days spoke of John of Crema as "his Eminence," a title which Mr. Froude has gone all the way into the seventeenth century to fetch for him. But when we pass from the things which are recorded but which Mr. Froude does not mention, and from the things which are not recorded but which Mr. Froude does mention, and come to Mr. Froude's attempts to reproduce what is recorded, the modernism which talks about "his Eminence" becomes a small matter. Yet it is this very modernism which leads Mr. Froude into many of his worst errors. With all his horror of the bad ways of the twelfth century, he cannot really understand that people did not do the same kind of things and use the same kind of phrases in the twelfth century which they do in the nineteenth.

Thus we find that Thomas, though learning was not his strong point, received a learned education, according to the standard of his age. For that education he naturally went to those places where, in his age, education was to be had. Mr. Froude takes the recorded twelfth-century course, and improves it according to nineteenth-century notions. Thomas, in Mr. Froude's version, must go for learning, not to the place where it was to be had then, but to the place where it is to be had now. Thomas, as a boy, was sent to be brought up by the canons of Merton Abbey. He afterwards attended schools in London, and somewhat later he studied at Paris. Later again, after he had entered the service of Archbishop Theobald, he studied civil and canon law, first at Bologna and then at Auxerre. Mr. Froude disapproves of this course of study, which certainly would be very unusual in our time. He leaves out Auxerre altogether, seemingly as the strangest part of the story. But, that Theobald may not be thought to have sent his promising follower to one school of learning only, he is made to send Thomas first to Paris and then to Bologna, though it is quite plain (W. Fil. S., ap. Giles, 185) that his studies at Paris were before he entered the archbishop's service. Mr. Froude wholly gets rid of the second, the London, stage of Thomas's studies; when he comes to the higher academical course, he simply changes its place from that which is recorded to one which to him seemed more natural. "He was sent to school at Merton Abbey, in Surrey, and afterwards to Oxford." Now Oxford studies on the part of Thomas are just possible, and no more. It would have been a striking fact indeed if he had been one of the very first set of scholars that sought the infant school of Oxford. As such, he might have heard the divinity lectures of Robert Puleyn, and, at a later stage, the law lectures of Vacarius.* If Mr. Froude determined to send him to Oxford at all, he might surely have made something picturesque out of his hazardous guess. A picture of the university in its very first days, with young Thomas as one of the first small party of scholars whom love of learning had drawn thither, might have been painted in Mr. Froude's most attractive manner. But no, Mr. Froude is more anxious to tell us how he spent his leisure time. "In his vacations he was thrown among young men of rank and fortune, hunting and hawking with them." That Thomas was fond of hunting and hawking, that his fondness for those sports began in his boyhood, that he followed them most when he was not actually at school, is most certain. But the Oxford vacation, and the young men of rank and fortune, are Mr. Froude's own improvement.† But why did Mr. Froude

* The divinity lectures of Robert Puleyn or Pulan began in 1133, when Thomas was about fifteen. The lectures in civil law by Vacarius, on which Mr. Robertson has something to say in page 22, began in 1149, under the patronage of Theobald. See "Norman Conquest," vol. v., p. 319.

† Thomas's early sporting tastes are set forth by Roger of Pontigny, that is by Thomas himself. He was led into them by Richer of L'Aigle, of whom presently in the text. "Hunc [Richerium] Thomas adhuc puer, quum per dimidium annum a scholis vacaret ad talia negotia procedentem libenter frequenterque sequebatur, plurimumque talibus occupationibus delecta-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

send Thomas to Oxford at all? It is not at all clear whether Mr. Froude has read Mr. Robertson's "Becket: a Biography." I do not think that he ever refers to it, and he certainly has not imitated those qualities of the book which deserve to be imitated. But in p. 22 of Mr. Robertson's book is a passage which might, to a very careless reader, suggest the notion that Thomas studied law at Oxford, though Mr. Robertson is much too careful really to say or to imply any such thing. Or there is another way in which the name of Oxford might have been suggested to Mr. Froude's mind in connection with Thomas's studies. Mr. Froude has a singular way, when he departs most widely from the meaning of his text, of saying something which seems as if it were suggested by the outward look of the text. Thus, it may be "prædictæ rationes" suggested "shortened rations," though there was nothing about rations in the story. So there is nothing about Oxford in the story, but there are two names which might suggest Oxford. Merton Abbey might easily suggest Merton College, and in mythical Oxford chronology to antedate a foundation by only a century and a half would be a trifle. Or is it possible that Oxford was suggested to Mr. Froude's mind because a name something like it occurs in the text of William Fitz-Stephen not very long after the studies at Paris, and just before the studies at Bologna and Auxerre? At p. 185 comes a mention of the church of Otford. For Otford to suggest Oxford would be exactly the same process as that of the "prædictæ rationes." The earlier London studies would seem to be left out because they are mentioned very briefly, and without any word which stands out in the text.* As for the studies at Auxerre, those who have followed Mr. Froude through all the volumes of his history will understand that "Autissiodorum" might be no less puzzling than "Lexovia."

batur, indeque hujusmodi traxisse creditur consuetudinem, cui etiam in majori postea ætate, quoties vacabat operam impendebat."

Here we see where Mr. Froude got his "vacations," and vacations which lasted "per dimidium annum" might have a specially Oxford look about them. I do not profess to explain "per dimidium annum." It reads to me rather as if, at some particular time, Thomas was absent from school for half a year, and was therefore thrown more into Richer's way. Edward Grim, whose authority on Thomas's early life is less than that of Roger, seems also to imply some temporary absence from school.

"Ad prænominatum divitem a scholis rediens . . . pro libitu nunc domi cum patre, nunc rure cum divite morabatur. Factumque est ut in hunc modum dimissus sibi scholaribus studiis proponeret renunciare."

The mill-stream story then follows. But Edward's chronology is much less clear than that of Roger. In any case the schools were not Oxford schools, nor the vacations Oxford vacations, and the "young men of rank and fortune" seem to have grown out of Richer himself, whom just before Mr. Froude had employed in the quite different character of a careful guardian of the imaginary orphan boy.

We have another case of the hasty way in which Mr. Froude looks at his books in his mention of Richer of L'Aigle or Laigle, the friend in whose company Thomas was when he fell into the mill-stream. That his name, a name which to those who know those times — to Mr. Robertson among them — suggests many thoughts, suggests none to Mr. Froude is not wonderful. And those who both know the times and Mr. Froude's way of dealing with them, will not be surprised to find that he improves the name Rich*er* into the more familiar Rich*ard*, and so writes his place-name as to suggest that he never heard of the town of Laigle. It is not a very famous place, not so famous certainly as Auxerre or Lisieux; but those who have dealt with those times must have heard of it and of the house which took its name from it. But even when Richer of Laigle was turned into Richard de l'Aigle, his story might have been told as it is in the books. Instead of this Mr. Froude tells it as it seems, at a casual glance, to be told in one book only. Edward Grim mentions certain misfortunes which happened to Thomas's parents, and then mentions their deaths. Then he speaks of Richer's fondness for Thomas and his taking him hunting and hawking. But he does not say that this was after the death of Thomas's father; he distinctly implies the contrary, though he shows that he has not quite

* W. Fil. Steph., 183., "Annis igitur infantiæ, pueritiæ, et pubertatis, simpliciter domi paternæ et in scholis urbis decursis." When Edward Grim (6) says, "Literarum primordiis puer traditur imbuendus. Quibus decursus ad artes missus multa in brevi comprehendisse memoratur," the "literarum primordia" would take in both Merton and London. "Artes," one would think, must refer to Paris. Cf. Garnier, 8.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd mastered his story, by speaking of Thomas when he fell into the stream as "adolescens" instead of "puer." Still in Edward's account the death of the parents comes before the first mention of Richer. We therefore read in Mr. Froude —

> His parents, at any rate, both died when he was still very young, leaving him, ill provided for, to the care of his father's friends. One of them, a man of wealth, Richard de l'Aigle, took charge of the tall, handsome, clever lad. He was sent to school, etc.

Here Richer, the hunting companion, who directly after is multiplied into several "young men of rank and fortune," appears as a careful guardian after the death of Thomas's father, and he is seemingly the friend who sends him to Merton and Oxford. All this is pure fiction. Nothing of the kind is said by Edward Grim. Edward himself confutes the story, but it is far more distinctly confuted by the more orderly story in Roger of Pontigny (95–98). We there find that Thomas's parents did not die while he was very young. His mother died when he was twenty-one; his father outlived her; how long we do not know, but according to Edward Grim no long time. There is no mention of Richer of Laigle after Gilbert Becket's death. His hunting with Thomas and the accident in the mill-stream happened while Thomas was quite a boy, and while his mother was alive. So Thomas's earlier studies — at Merton and London — all take place while his mother is alive. William Fitz-Stephen (183) would lead us to think that his studies of the arts at Paris also came within the same time, as by his age they naturally would. Mr. Froude's little romance falls to pieces before a comparison of the authorities: it might also fall to pieces before a reading of Mr. Robertson's account, rather hurried as it is, of these early stages of Thomas's life.

The next event in Thomas's own life is cut very short by Mr. Froude. "After spending three years in a house of business in the city, Becket contrived to recommend himself to Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury." The "house of business in the city" has the same modern sound as "his Eminence" and the Oxford vacations. It certainly draws some support from Mr. Robertson, who says that Thomas, "on returning from France, became clerk and accountant to a rich kinsman, a merchant named Osbern Huit-deniers, and afterwards filled a like situation under the sheriffs (or portreves) of London." I am not clear that Osbern Eightpenny ("Octonummi," "Huit-deniers") was a merchant, any more than Gilbert Becket himself. He was "*quidam Lundrensis cognatus suus, qui non solum inter concives verum etiam apud curiales grandis erat nominis et honoris." No words are used of him which necessarily imply trade, and it is most important for a full understanding of the true position of the London "barons," who play so great a part in Stephen's day, to grasp the fact that many citizens were not traders and that many citizens were Normans. It has also sometimes struck me that the employment under Osbern mentioned by Edward Grim, Roger of Pontigny, and Garnier may have been the same as the employment under the sheriffs mentioned by William Fitz-Stephen.† Osborn, a man so eminent in the city, may very likely have been sheriff. I do not insist on this point, and it is of little importance. What is to be noticed is that Mr. Froude leaves out Thomas's employment by the sheriffs. Yet there can be no doubt that it was a very important stage in Thomas's life, perhaps the turning-point in his whole career. Mr. Robertson understands the position of London, which Mr. Froude does not, and adds, with truth, "Thus, it would seem, the chief magistrate's clerk was introduced into political business." All this happened soon after the death of Thomas's mother, and while his father still lived. Mr. Froude, it will be remembered, had disposed of both parents long before.

But from the service of the sheriffs, Thomas soon moved to the service of the archbishop. In Mr. Froude's words, "Becket contrived to recommend himself to Theobald." When one reads the real story, one is inclined to ask whether by "Becket" is meant Gilbert the father or Thomas the son. In either case no great contrivance was needed. To Mr. Froude, who has ruled that Gilbert Becket was a tradesman, and who sees "Saxon extraction" in either his name or his surname, it might seem that a little contrivance would be needed for his son to get into the favor of the Norman archbishop. But if we turn from the guesses of Mr. Froude to the facts of William Fitz-Stephen, we shall see that there was nothing which needed any contrivance in the matter. Thomas was recommended to the arch-

* P. 98, Giles. If the form "Lundrensem" is genuine, it points to the French form "Lundres," already in use, as is shown by Garnier and by the local form of the name of the founder of Ewenny Priory.

† Cf. R. Pont., 98; Edw. Grim, 8; W. Fil. Steph., 183; Garnier, 9.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

bishop by common friends from the other side of the Channel.* Indeed the archbishop and Gilbert Becket were old acquaintances, if not friends. Norman Theobald, once monk of Bec, now Archbishop of Canterbury, and Gilbert, once of Rouen but now a baron of London,† had known one another in their own country. It needed very little contrivance to make the archbishop take kindly to a young man of promise who brought such good introductions with him. Mr. Froude does not enlarge — perhaps there was no reason why he should enlarge — on the personal incidents of the life of Thomas while he was still in Theobald's service. But he should hardly have left out that it was at this stage that the rivalry of his life with Roger, first Archdeacon of Canterbury and then Archbishop of York, took its first beginning. I have already noticed that the fact that Roger was favored and promoted by Theobald may make us doubt as to the extreme and monstrous wickedness which was laid to his charge in other quarters. It was now that the public career of Thomas began with his two remarkable missions to Rome before the accession of Henry. The really important part which Thomas had in bringing about Henry's succession by hindering the coronation of Stephen's son Eustace is strangely slurred over by Mr. Froude. His summary is curious : —

The question of the day was the succession to the crown. Was Stephen's son, Eustace, the heir? Or was Matilda's son, Henry of Anjou? Theobald was for Henry, so far as he dared to show himself. Becket was sent secretly to Rome to move the pope. The struggle ended with a compromise. Stephen was to reign for his life. Henry was peaceably to follow him. The arrangement might have been cut again by the sword. But Eustace immediately afterwards died. In the same year Stephen followed him, and Henry II. became king of England. With all these intricate negotiations the future martyr was intimately connected, and by his remarkable talents especially recommended himself to the new king.

The journeys of Theobald and Thomas to Rome, whether in company or not, are discussed by Mr. Robertson (p. 23), but a fresh light has been since he wrote thrown on the great dispute before the papal court by the publication of the "Liber Pontificalis," in the twentieth volume of Pertz.* But the action of Thomas comes out plainly enough in the chronicle of Gervase: the point to be noticed is that Thomas did much to secure the crown for Henry, but that he did it in a way which involved the fullest acknowledgment of papal claims.

Stephen wished, exactly as Henry wished afterwards, to secure the succession to his son by having him crowned in his lifetime. Thomas, not yet archdeacon but already in the service of Theobald, suggested the argument that the coronation could not take place without the consent of the pope. Now this act on the part of Thomas is one which it is very important to set forth fully and clearly, though certainly its clear and full setting forth is not convenient for Mr. Froude's argument. Thomas, at this stage, while still in the service of Theobald, appears in two characters, as an assertor of ecclesiastical claims and as a supporter of the Angevin succession. Neither of these sides of him should be passed by in estimating the character of the man. But neither of them falls in with the impression which it is needful for Mr. Froude's purpose to convey.

On the position of Thomas as being at this stage an assertor of ecclesiastical claims I shall speak at a later stage in connection with his appointment to the chancellorship. But the personal importance of Thomas at this time, and the part which he had already taken in affairs, are things to be insisted on. Mr. Froude himself states them clearly enough, though in a general kind of way : —

With all these intricate negotiations the future martyr was intimately connected, and by his remarkable talents especially recommended himself to the new king. No one called afterwards to an important position had

* The story is told by Roger of Pontigny (98) and William Fitz-Stephen (184). William gives the names of Thomas's introducers, and speaks of Gilbert's former acquaintance with the archbishop. "Adhæsit Theobaldo, bonæ memoriæ Cantuariensi archiepiscopo, per duos fratres Bolomienses, Baldwinum archidiaconum, et magistrum Eustachium, hospites plerumque patris ejus, et familiares archiepiscopi, in ipsius notitiam introductus; et eo familiarius, quod præfatus Gilbertus cum domino archipræsule de propinquitate et genere loquebatur; ut ille ortu Normannus, et circa Tierrici villam de equestri ordine, natu vicinus. Horum, inquam et patris introductu, archiepiscopus sui gregis scripsit Thomam." See Mr. Robertson's note, p. 20. I am not quite clear about the person named "Baillehache," "cum securi," "cum ascia;" but the point is of no moment for the present purpose. Roger's version at least shows the opposite to "contrivance" on the part of Thomas. Doubtless in Mr. Froude's eyes all this is surrounded with an atmosphere of legend: but even legend is better than arbitrary assertion.

† Garnier (5, cf. 9) calls Thomas's parents "baruns de la cit," — the application of the name to the citizens is familiar. I suppose the "equester ordo" in the last quotation from William Fitz-Stephen also refers to Gilbert. I suspect some mistake in Dr. Giles's text.

* See Norman Conquest, vol. v., p. 325.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

better opportunities of acquainting himself with the spirit of the age, or the characters of the principal actors in it.*

Perfectly true; but, as usual, Mr. Froude goes on to give everything a false coloring. He adds: "If his services were valuable, his reward was magnificent." He then goes on to speak of the vast mass of Church preferment held by Thomas, and again adds: "It is noticeable that afterwards, in the heat of the battle in which he earned his saintship, he was so far from looking back with regret on this accumulation of preferments that he paraded them as an evidence of his early consequence." Now this is a most unfair comment, as Mr. Froude's own note is quite enough to show. Mr. Robertson puts the case much more fairly. He says that Thomas, "when afterwards reproached as if he had owed everything to favor of Henry II., could fairly reply by mentioning the large pluralities which he had held before entering the royal service." This reference to Thomas's pluralities is found in a letter addressed by him to Gilbert Foliot, Bishop of London, in answer to one which had come to him in the name of the bishops and clergy of England.† The bishops, or at least Gilbert, tell the primate that the king had raised him from a poor and mean estate to glory and power, first as chancellor, then as archbishop.‡ Thomas answers that he was not so very poor when he entered the king's service; as holding the archdeaconry of Canterbury, the provostship of Beverley, and other churches and prebends, he was not at all badly off in this world's wealth; and as for his birth, he was the son of citizens of London of good reputation and by no means of the lowest rank.* It is as hard to see "parade" in this answer as it is to see "contrivance" in the introduction to Theobald. It would not have been hard, on Mr. Froude's own showing, to have pleaded direct and important services done to the king. But Thomas simply answers the immediate charge, and instead of parade, he certainly makes less of his birth than he might have done. It is perfectly true that he expresses no "regret" for "this accumulation of preferments;" but, for the particular purpose in hand, such regret would have been out of place. Gilbert says, "You owe everything to the king, who raised you from poverty to wealth." Thomas answers, "I do not owe everything to the king; for I was a rich man when I entered his service." Surely this is quite answer enough for the matter in hand. He answers a misstatement of fact, and was in nowise called on to mount the stool of repentance then and there.

But this matter of Thomas's pluralities calls for a little further mention. Mr. Froude simply caught at it because he thought it would tell, and confuted himself by his own reference. Mr. Robertson too, unlike most biographers, enjoys a dig at the subject of his biography; but, unlike Mr. Froude, he takes care that his digs shall come within the range of fact and of a kind of formal fairness. He says, with perfect truth: —

> The circumstance that he was only a deacon was no hindrance to the accumulation of benefices on him: for in those days a prosperous ecclesiastic would seem to have regarded his parishes merely as sources of income, while he complacently devolved the care of each on some ill-paid priest. Nor, when Becket afterwards appeared as an ecclesiastical reformer, did he make any attempt to remedy this, which to modern apprehensions may, perhaps, seem the most crying abuse of all.

To modern apprehensions it certainly does seem a very crying abuse. One must

* Mr. Froude here has a singular note: "Very strange things were continually happening. In 1154 the Archbishop of York was poisoned in the eucharist by some of his clergy. . . . Becket could not fail to have heard of this piece of villany, and to have made his own reflections upon it." This is a little dark. Does Mr. Froude mean that Thomas thought that it was on the whole a good thing that Saint William was put out of the way, because it opened the way to his own first great promotion? These stories of poisoning are always very doubtful. But in Mr. Froude's way of speaking, there is again one of those little touches which speak so much to those who know the time. Saint William is to him simply the "Archbishop of York;" the name has no special meaning for him. And a still smaller straw shows the way of the wind: "Wi*ll*elmus" becomes "Wi*lh*elmus."

† See the letters in Giles, vi. 187; iii. 286. Garnier (iii. 116) gives most curious versions in his French rime.

‡ "Insedit alte cunctorum mentibus, quam benignus vobis dominus noster rex exstiterit, in quam vos gloriam ab exili provexerit, et in familiarem gratiam tam lata vos mente susceperit, ut dominationis suæ loca, quæ a boreali oceano ad Pyrenæum usque porrecta sunt, adeo potestati vestræ cuncta subjecerit, ut in his solum hos beatos reputaret opinio, qui in vestris poterant oculis complacere." This means the chancellorship: the letter then goes on to speak of the archbishopric.

* "Congeris et statuis ante oculos nostros beneficia nobis a domino nostro rege collata, et de exili me commemoras ad summa provectum. Ut autem his aliquantisper respondeam, in insipientia mea tamen, de quam exili putas? Si tempus, quo me in ministerio suo præstituit, respicias, archidiaconatus Cantuariæ, præpositura Beverlaci, plurimæ ecclesiæ, præbendæ nonnullæ, alia etiam non pauca, quæ nominis mei erant possessio tunc temporis, adeo tenuem, ut dicis, quantum ad ea quæ mundi sunt, contradicunt me fuisse. Quod si ad generis mei radicem et progenitores meos intenderis, cives quidam fuerunt Londonienses, in medio concivium suorum habitantes sine querela, nec omnino infimi." (He goes on with a discourse on the indifference of high or low birth.) Part of this is quoted by Mr. Froude with a few slight improvements of the text.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

doubt about saying "the most crying abuse of all." That Thomas had, by virtue of a papal exemption, to endure such a wretch as Clarembald almost at his own gates was surely a more crying abuse still. But it is perfectly natural that our modern apprehensions should look at it as a very crying abuse. It was equally natural that in the twelfth century, while a few saints or satirists declaimed against the practice, the average conscience, lay or clerical, should not look at it with any particular horror. It is quite possible — I know of no evidence one way or the other — that Thomas may never have looked back with regret on his accumulation of preferments, except so far as they would go in the lump to make up part of that worldly life which he held himself to have cast aside. The feeling on these matters, as a general feeling, is a very modern one, and it is a growing one. It is whispered that some extreme reformers of our own day have gone so far as to hint that canons of Canterbury should not hold professorships away from Canterbury. Even within this century men did not look back with regret on an accumulation of preferment, small as compared with that of Thomas, but which would certainly startle our generation. In Dursley church in Gloucester is the epitaph of a prosperous ecclesiastic, who was rector of Dursley, vicar of some other place, and curate, of course perpetual curate, of Stroud, and who for so many years "discharged the duties of Archdeacon of Gloucester with credit to himself and satisfaction to a numerous and highly respectable clergy." If the venerable man himself regretted his pluralities, it is clear that his admirers did not. A century earlier the cathedral church of Oxford received the remains of one of its deans — the famous Dr. Fell, whom somebody did not like — who, according to his epitaph, "huic tantæ plus quam par provinciæ, episcopatum una Oxoniensem feliciter administravit." A little earlier again Laud and Williams, rivals something like our Thomas and Roger, almost equalled the standard of Thomas himself. Williams was mockingly said to be "a diocese in himself;" he held at once every kind of office from bishop to parish priest. And so we could carry our catena back to Thomas's own day. If Thomas did not regret his own pluralities, if he did not attempt to reform the pluralities of others, it simply shows that on this point his conscience was not enlightened beyond the average enlightenment of his own age and of many much later ages.

But we must look a little deeper into the matter. The strict ecclesiastical theory always condemned pluralities: a few zealous men denounced them in all ages. But it was in the natural course of human affairs that the practice of pluralities should meet with a good deal of toleration in the twelfth century. The matter has often been explained; * but, as Mr. Froude does not seem to have grasped the exact state of things, it is needful to explain it once again. The practice of pluralities was one side of that general system of secularization, and specially feudalization, of the Church, which was one great feature of the times, and some features of which system it was one great object of Henry to enforce. We keep traces of the feeling out of which it arose whenever we speak of an ecclesiastical office as a "benefice" or a "living." Those words are now confined to ecclesiastical offices, and to one class of ecclesiastical offices. But beneficium once meant a temporal as well as an ecclesiastical possession. It was sometimes hinted that the empire itself was a benefice — a benefice granted by the Bishop of Rome. A benefice, in short, is any feudal holding, and among ecclesiastical preferments the word is applied with greater accuracy to the higher offices, which are now seldom so spoken of, than to the lower, which the word now commonly means. A "benefice," a "living," is an ecclesiastical office looked at from its temporal side, as carrying with it certain temporal profits. In the older view, the higher and truer view, the view to which we have now come back, the office and its duties come first. The holder of the office is first of all bound to discharge its duties, whenever possible, in his own person. The temporal profits of the office are not so much payment for the duties done as a maintenance while he does them. In this view there is no room for pluralities; in all ordinary cases, no man should undertake any office of which he cannot himself discharge the duties. But in days when feudal notions affected everything, when the feudal character of at least the higher Church preferment was strongly insisted on by civil rulers, when the endowments of ecclesiastical offices were turned into beneficia or feudal holdings, another way of looking at such matters naturally prevailed. The ecclesiastical

* I have said something on this head at vol. v., p. 502, of the "History of the Norman Conquest." I believe that I was first led to understand this view of the case by a passage in Dr. Hook's "Lives of the Archbishops," but I have not the volume at hand here.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

benefice came to be looked at very much as the temporal benefice was looked at. In the case of the temporal benefice there were duties, commonly military, attached to the possession. But the benefice came first; the duties were attached to the benefice rather than the benefice to the duties. So that the duties were discharged, it was not necessary that the holder of the benefice should always discharge them in person. King Henry of all men, the inventor of scutage, was perfectly willing to allow such duties to be done by deputy. Consequently neither in that nor in any age have men felt any scruple in increasing the number of their temporal benefices, be those benefices kingdoms or simple manors, or estates yet smaller than manors. No one thought of blaming the duke of the Normans because he was also Count of Anjou. No one thinks of blaming the lord of one manor because he is lord of another manor as well. And when ecclesiastical offices had become benefices, when they were looked at as being, like lay benefices, possessions charged with certain duties, it seemed to follow that, provided the duties were discharged, it did not matter whether they were discharged in person or by deputy. Hence again it seemed to follow that, as no man scrupled to heap together any number of temporal benefices, so there was no reason why any man should scruple to heap together any number of ecclesiastical benefices. All that he had to do was to see that the duties of each were discharged by some one or other. Thus reforming bishops do not absolutely enforce residence on their canons; they attach privileges to residence, but they give each canon the alternative of residing or keeping a vicar. This helps us to see something of the real state of things. We come across occasional notices which show that there were here and there saintly men who undertook no office whose duties they could not discharge in person. We also see that there were careless men, who had to be compelled even to provide deputies to discharge their duties for them. The average conscience of the time was fully satisfied if the holder of several benefices provided a competent person to do the duties of each. If Thomas did this at Beverley and Otford, and wherever else he held preferment, he would not reach the standard either of primitive or of modern morality; but he would fully satisfy the morality of his own age. In fact he is praised at a somewhat later time, when already chancellor, because he did not help himself to ecclesiastical benefices much more largely.* The pluralities of Thomas are an undoubted fact. Mr. Robertson's remark that he did nothing to reform the practice of pluralities is also a fact. Mr. Froude's conjecture that he did not regret his own pluralities may also be a fact; we cannot say whether it is or not. But all that the whole matter proves is that Thomas, on this point, at this stage of his life, had the ordinary ecclesiastical conscience of his time. He was neither better nor worse than those around him.

I now come to the second marked stage in the career of Thomas, when he passed from the service of the archbishop to the service of the king. I shall speak hereafter more at large of the objects which Theobald had in recommending his newly-appointed archdeacon for the office of the king's chancellor, of the measure in which those objects were carried out or disappointed, and of the light which this part of Thomas's life throws on his general character. I wish here to deal with his character as touched by certain particular charges which are brought against him by Mr. Froude during his administration of the chancellorship.

The picture which Mr. Froude draws of Thomas's conduct in that office is one against which it is needful to protest in the name of simple truth. Anything more monstrous never appeared from the pen of one who professed to be narrating facts. In any one else one would be tempted to speak of foul misrepresentation and shamelessly garbled quotation. Mr. Froude is entitled to the excuse which I have made for him already. This description of the chancellorship is doubtless only the highest instance of that inherent defect which hinders Mr. Froude from ever accurately repeating the statements of the book which lies before him. It is the crowning case of an ignorance truly invincible of the man and the times of which he has undertaken to write.

I must quote Mr. Froude's charge in full: —

* W. Fil. Steph., 188. "Omnes vacantes par ochianas ecclesias villarum et castrorum potuit habere; nullus enim ei advocatus negare auderet, si rogare vellet; tanta tamen animi magnitudine vicit ambitionem, ut pauperibus sacerdotibus et clericis perquirendi ecclesias illas locum tollere præoccupando dedignaretur. Magnanimus magna potius perquirebat." He then gives a list of Thomas's promotions, temporal and spiritual: his provostship of Beverley, the donatio of the prebends of Hastings, the Tower of London and the castellaria of Eye, with the services of the knights attached to them, and the castle of Berkhampstead. Elsewhere he is spoken of as Dean of Hastings. Was he dean with the nomination of the prebendaries?

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Of his administration his adoring and admiring biographer, the monk Grim, who was present at his martyrdom, draws a more than unfavorable picture and even charges him with cruelty and ferocity. "The persons that he slew," says Grim, "the persons that he robbed of their property, no one can enumerate. Attended by a large company of knights, he would assail whole communities, destroy cities and towns, villages and farms, and, without remorse or pity, would give them to devouring flames."

Such words give a new aspect to the demand afterwards made that he should answer for his proceedings as chancellor, and lend a new meaning to his unwillingness to reply. At this period the only virtue which Grim allows him to have preserved unsullied was his chastity.

He then adds in a note from Edward Grim's text: —

Quantis autem necem, quantis rerum omnium proscriptionem intulerit, quis enumeret? Validâ namque stipatus militum manu civitates aggressus est. Delevit urbes et oppida; villas et prædia absque miserationis intuitu voraci consumpsit incendio.

Mr. Froude, when he wrote his first paper, evidently wished his readers to believe that these words were meant as a description of Thomas's ordinary behavior as chancellor in England. He would have us call up a picture of the great royal official going about through the land, and carrying havoc and destruction into every corner, at his own pleasure and seemingly out of sheer delight in the work. He even insinuates that it was for deeds of that kind, not for mere reckonings of money, that he was — somewhat tardily — called on to account at Northampton. Mr. Froude has copied his extract right as far as it goes; but he leaves out all that goes before and that goes after. He makes no reference to the other narratives which would have thrown light on the passage; he altogether leaves out in his own narrative a most important part of Thomas's life which there can be no doubt that Edward Grim really had in his eye. Edward records Thomas's appointment to the chancellorship and his power and favor with the king. He goes off into a moral discourse on the danger and temptations of such high places and how men are thereby often led into sin. I must give what follows at length. Mr. Froude's short extract coming in the middle: — Sanctus Thomas ante cancellariam quam innocenter, quam sine querela priora tempora transegerit in imo positus, sermo superior explanavit, nunc autem locatus in sublimi quantæ audaciæ quantæ fuerit præsumptionis difficile dictu. Quantis enim necem, quantis rerum omnium proscriptionem intulerit, quis enumeret? validâ namque stipatus militum manu civitates aggressus est, delevit urbes et oppida, villas et prædia absque miserationis intuitu voraci consumpsit incendio, et inimicis domini sui undecunque insurgerent, intolerabilem se exhibebat. Denique quem unquam timebat offendere ut regis satisfaceret votis pareret imperiis? Sed in his omnibus (licet aliter aliqui æstimaverunt) corpore castus, corde humilis, sed inter humiles, nam inter potentes potentior ipse ac sublimior apparebat: nullus eo discretior, nemo munificentior nec ipso prudentior habebatur, pauperibus absque æstimatione necessaria ministrabat, sed ita omnia dona gratiæ exteriori fastu velabantur, ut nemo nisi pro seculi pompa hunc ipsum, etiam quum archiepiscopus esset, putaverit accitasse. Tantam quoque gratiam adeptus est a rege et regno universo, ut hos solum beatos reputaret opinio, qui in ejus oculis complacere et regis consiliario et cancellario obsecundare in aliquo potuissent.

Now the words out of this passage which Mr. Froude has picked out for quotation are certainly a little startling, even as they stand; but read along with the context they are considerably less startling than they seem when they stand alone in Mr. Froude's note. And the original words, even as Mr. Froude quotes them, are again less startling than the English into which his singular fashion of translation changes them. "Necem et rerum omnium proscriptionem inferre," may sometimes be the duty either of a judge or of a warrior; it is a different matter from "slaying" and "robbing persons of all their property," which is what Mr. Froude substitutes for it. Then again, while Mr. Froude clearly wishes us to believe that Thomas slew, robbed, and burned at his own free will, the words which I have put in italics show that it was at least done only to the king's enemies. Moreover, notwithstanding all this, if not because of all this, Thomas won the favor, not only of the king but of the whole kingdom, which he would hardly have won, if he had been a common robber, murderer, and house-burner. Still, taken alone, the passage would be startling; it is an odd description even of a chancellor, much more of an archdeacon. But, considering all that we know of the history of the chancellorship, and considering the rhetorical way in which the passage is brought in, there can be no doubt that the words refer, not to anything done by Thomas in England, not to anything done by him strictly in his character of chancellor, but to his military exploits in

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the war of Toulouse.* Edward Grim laments that the temptations of power and high office led Thomas, churchman as he was, to forget all ecclesiastical rule and to take a part in the bloody work of a soldier. The censure is perfectly just; but it is made on altogether different grounds from those into which Mr. Froude has so oddly twisted it. But the strangest thing is that of the war of Toulouse, so important an episode in every way in the history of this stage of Henry's reign, Mr. Froude seems never to have heard. He says indeed: —

> The anomalous relations of the king with Lewis the Seventh, whose vassal he was for his Continental dominions, while he was his superior in power, were breaking continually into quarrels, and sometimes into war.

As usual, Mr. Froude misses the special point of the case. The specially anomalous relations between Lewis and Henry consisted, not merely in the fact that the vassal was more powerful than the lord, but in the much more unusual fact that both the duchy and the duchess of Aquitaine had been so strangely transferred from the lord to the vassal. But it is odd, especially in dealing with the life of Thomas, to slur over the war of Toulouse in this fashion. It is a war remarkable in two ways, that so little came of it directly, and that so much came of it indirectly. In our constitutional history it marks a memorable epoch, as the time when personal military service was dispensed with for a scutage. In that constitutional change doubtless both Henry and Thomas had a hand; it is a highly important feature in what we may call their joint administration; but Mr. Froude has not a word to say about it. In the personal character both of Henry and Thomas the incidents of the war bring out new features. Henry did not scruple to wage war against his lord, to lay waste his territories and those of his allies, to do all the damage to his and their subjects which is involved in warfare at any time, and which, as Edward Grim's description brings before us, was involved in a yet more frightful degree in the warfare of those times. But he did scruple directly to bear arms against his lord in his own person. When King Lewis was in the city of Toulouse, Duke Henry could not bring himself to assault the city. Chancellor Thomas did not enter into the layman's point of honor; had Henry listened to him and not to others, he would not have passed by a favorable military opportunity for an assault.* There was nothing military in Thomas's earlier education; yet in this war he appeared as a great captain, leading a large force both feudal and mercenary, and his followers are said to have been among the best troops in his master's army. And he showed himself not only a captain, but also something of a knight-errant. He met the French knight Ingelram of Trie in single combat, charged him, lance in rest, unhorsed him, and carried off his destrier as a prize. This opens to us a new side in Thomas's character. It is one which we may approve or condemn as we think good; but it is a third side as well as that of the chancellor and that of the archbishop. To my mind all three sides fit very easily into one another; but Mr. Froude leaves out this one altogether,† in order to represent Chancellor Thomas as an habitual disturber of the peace in his own country.

The chancellorship of Thomas is so important a stage in the history of Thomas, of Henry, and indeed of England, it is so utterly and scandalously misrepresented

* The exploits of Thomas in the war of Toulouse are described at the greatest length by William Fitz-Stephen (200, 201), from whom we get the account of his single combat with the French knight. But the account most worth notice is that given by Garnier (13). The French writer says that he had himself seen the chancellor warring against his countrymen. As in so many other places his account and that of Edward Grim have a singular agreement, so here also we have words which are very like those which Mr. Froude has misinterpreted: —

> "De chevalers vassals grant mesnies teneit,
> Et duns et livreisuns richement lur doneit,
> Kotereus et archers et serganz reteneit;
> Forferre les menout et grantment mesfeseit.
> Les enemis le rei mult durement greveit.
> Par assaut prist chasteus, motes et fermetez,
> Et burs et viles arst, et assailli citez,
> Sur le destrer esteit del boen haubert armez;
> Taut k'il en fu sovent mult durement grevez,
> Par sajètes le fist, ke il ne fust nafrez.
> En Gascuingne fu-il lung tens pur guerreier.
> As Gascuns i kovint de lur chasteus lesser.
> En Normendie r'out sun seinur grant mester,
> Et jo l'vi sor Franceis plusur feiz chevaucher.
> De ses bensuignes fist le rei mult avauncer."

So also Roger, 102. Herbert, 20.

* W. Fil. Steph., 200. He pronounces the king's scruple to have been "vana superstitio et reverentia."

† Mr. Froude hardly mends matters when in a later paper (LIVING AGE, No. 1730, p. 361) he comes back to his passage from Edward Grim after this fashion: —

"Grim, perhaps, when accusing him of rapine and murder, was referring to a suppression of a disturbance in Aquitaine, not to any special act of which he was guilty in England; but the unsparing ruthlessness which he displayed on that occasion was an indication of the disposition which was displayed in all that he did, and he was wise in anticipating enquiry."

This does look as if some glimmering of the state of the case had made its way into Mr. Froude's mind in the time that passed between writing the two papers. But suppression of a disturbance in Aquitaine is a very odd way of describing a war waged against King Lewis at Toulouse, and Mr. Froude still sticks to his strange notion that the accounts asked for at Northampton had something to do with deeds of rapine and murder, and not simply with sums of money.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

by Mr. Froude, that I must now do something more than point out Mr. Froude's particular perversions of truth. I must attempt a picture of the kind of work which as chancellor he had to do, and of the way in which he did it. If I feel any zeal, any partisanship in the matter, it is at this stage. I claim justice for every man, even for martyred archbishops; I claim that the actions of every man, in whatever age and of whatever order, should be described as they happened, and not as the fancy of a man bent on running down that age or that order may find that it suits his purpose to describe them. But for Thomas the chancellor I ask more. He is not only foully slandered in Mr. Froude's imaginary picture — I was going to write "caricature," but there is not even the likeness of caricature — but I doubt whether he has ever had full justice done to him anywhere. As I have already said, his later career has overshadowed his earlier. A fame which is partly factitious has robbed him of a fame which was truer and better deserved. I could be well pleased to leave sacerdotalists and anti-sacerdotalists to dispute over the body of the archbishop, if I could only win his true place in English history for the man who was the most striking embodiment of the fusion of Normans and English on English ground, who in his own day brought back peace and order to a troubled realm, and who has left the personal impress of his administrative power on several of the most important institutions of our country.

The state of England at the time of the accession of Henry the Second is described by Mr. Froude in a passage of about twenty lines, of which four at the outside are devoted to the special circumstances of that particular time.

> The state of England itself demanded his [Henry's] first attention. The usurpation of Stephen had left behind it a legacy of disorder. The authority of the crown had been shaken. The barons, secure behind the walls of their castles, limited their obedience to their inclinations.

Then comes a discourse on the claims of the clergy to exemption from secular jurisdiction, containing very much which nobody can doubt about in the nineteenth century, but which was not exactly the thing which would first come into the head of a reformer in the middle of the twelfth century. It was doubtless needful, as Henry presently found, to bring the clergy under the full control of the temporal law; but there was something else to be done first. It was needful first of all to give back to the temporal law power enough to control anybody. The "usurpation" of Stephen is the kind of talk to which scholars have long bidden farewell; * his personal perjury does not here concern us; it is a kind of thing as well known in the nineteenth century as in the twelfth. But to say that "the authority of the crown had been shaken" is a ludicrously inadequate description of the nineteen years' anarchy. Has Mr. Froude never so much as read the picture in the Peterborough Chronicle, some scraps of which have found their way into every child's history? As for "the barons secure behind the walls of their castles," the great king and the great chancellor were coming to put an end to all security of that kind. Instead of the authority of the crown being merely shaken, all authority of every kind, save one, had vanished. The Church alone kept up the faintest shadow of law. It is no wonder that, in Stephen's day, ecclesiastical claims grew. It is no wonder that men endured to see appeals constantly made to Rome, and to see ecclesiastical synods at home take upon themselves to bestow the crown of England. When all was violence, when no sovereign, king or empress, could enforce obedience, the pontiff far away ceased to be looked on as the insatiable spoiler of England's wealth; he seemed rather the sublime and dimly seen embodiment of that reign of law which had passed away from our own shores. When the assemblies of the nation ceased to be held, when there was no power to enact or to administer the temporal law of England, men were disposed to hail something of a substitute in the synods of the Church and in the law which still kept up some measure of life in the hands of ecclesiastical judges. Whatever the spiritual powers did, they did not work the kind of horrors which were done by the "devils and evil men" who filled the castles. A great part of the history of Henry's reign is unintelligible, unless we understand how in the days when the royal power had vanished, when violent men did what was good in their own eyes, peaceable men cherished the Church and its jurisdiction as the only source whence aught like justice or mercy was to be had. Mr. Froude not only passes all this by, but he slurs over the horrors of the anarchy; he leaves out the great work of king and chancellor in

* I have gone fully into the question of Stephen's claim in Appendix DD of my fifth volume.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

bringing back peace and order. The one evil that he has eyes for is the claim of the clergy for exemption from temporal jurisdiction. This, I again most fully admit, was a great evil. In 1164 it might fairly be looked on as the greatest evil of the time. My present proposition is that it was not, as Mr. Froude would have his readers think, the greatest evil of the time ten years earlier.

Let us compare with Mr. Froude's picture the doubtless rhetorical, almost poetical, picture of a contemporary. We may take off something from his rhetoric or poetry. We cannot expect him to be specially eloquent on the one point on which Mr. Froude is specially eloquent. But he helps us to some details of work which had to be done, and work which was done, about which Mr. Froude has not a word to say. I do not undertake literally to translate William Fitz-Stephen's account of the restoration of peace; * but I will try fairly to give its substance.

In the days of Stephen then, war and all its ravages had carried havoc everywhere throughout the kingdom.† In every third township a den of robbers, called a castle, had been set up. The nobles of the land were driven from their possessions; strangers, Flemings and other mercenaries, held Kent and a great part of the land. After twenty years of warfare, confusion had become so great that no man deemed that the strangers could ever be driven out, that peace could ever be restored, and the realm ever brought back to its old state of order. Such a change seemed hopeless under a new and young king. But by the counsels of the chancellor, of the clergy, and of the good men of the realm who wished for the blessings of peace, within three months from the king's coronation, William of Ypres, who occupied Kent by force, went away weeping; all the Flemings crossed the sea, bag and baggage; ‡ all the castles through England were overthrown,§ except the ancient towers and fortresses which were kept for the preservation of the peace. The crown of England was restored to its authority and possessions, and those who had lost their lands were restored to the rights of their forefathers.

* W. Fil. S., 186, 187.

† William says, "Bellica undique clades desævisset." The Londoner, in giving a description which was true for the greater part of the kingdom, may have forgotten the comparative exemption of the northern shires.

‡ "Collectis impedimentis et armis:" they were the Circassians and Bashi-bazouks of the time.

§ "Castella omnia per Angliam corruunt." He had perhaps the walls of Jericho in his head.

Such was the main work which the young Henry — the king whom all men loved, for he did good justice and made peace * — had to do as soon as he found himself on the throne which was secured to him by the compromise with Stephen. And in that work there is no doubt that Thomas the chancellor was his right-hand man. Mr. Robertson, after his manner, records the fact with perfect truth, but he does not so record it as to give any lively impression.† Mr. Froude, equally after his manner, leaves it out altogether. He had chosen, with that calm oblivion of fact which distinguishes him from all other men who have taken on themselves to record past events, to say that "Becket was known only to the world as an unscrupulous and tyrannical minister." ‡ He had chosen to describe him as a man stained with rapine and murder. It was convenient for his partisan purposes so to describe him. In this state of mind, Mr. Froude never sees the facts and statements which prove the opposite to what he says. They are to him as though they did not exist. The facts form no part of his picture; the statements are left out, even if they immediately follow words which he himself quotes. Thomas was, for party purposes, to be described as an unscrupulous and tyrannical minister. Facts were accordingly dealt with so as to produce that picture, or at least to produce a picture of unscrupulous tyranny of some kind.§ The statement that Thomas was beloved, not only of the king but of the whole kingdom, and the facts which show how he came to win that love, find no place in the story. Mr. Froude no doubt does all this under the same kind of unhappy necessity of departing from his authorities which follows him in all matters great and small. When he leaves out a passage which tells for Thomas, when he misinterprets a passage which seems to tell against Thomas, it is doubtless by the same ill luck which makes him say William when his book says Walter, which makes him say Tuesday when his

* So says the Peterborough chronicler in all but his last words.

† Pp. 28, 29.

‡ LIVING AGE, No. 1725, p. 12.

§ I speak thus, because Mr. Froude's picture is that of a brigand or a captain of mercenaries rather than that of a minister of state of any kind. Flambard in one age, Empson and Dudley in another, were unscrupulous and tyrannical ministers; but we do not read that they went about the country, burning houses and killing people. Even in the case of Thomas Cromwell, if he did anything of the kind, it was in Italy — perhaps in the suppression of disturbances there — certainly not in England.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd book says Monday. But those who have not studied this peculiar tendency of Mr. Froude's mind might be tempted to think that no Jesuit, as Mr. Whalley may conceive a Jesuit, could go further in prudent dealing with the facts that tell against him than a writer who takes up the history of the sixteenth century only because he has nothing else to do, and who takes up the history of the twelfth century only in order to throw scorn on a theological party in the nineteenth.

It will be a relief to glance at the description — it is almost a poem, or what it is the fashion to call an idyll — which William Fitz-Stephen gives of England while Henry ruled her by the advice of Thomas. No doubt it is William's business to put things at the very best; but it is only fair to hear counsel on both sides. When king and chancellor then had got rid of the Flemings and had destroyed the castles — that great work which had always to be done whenever order was restored after confusion — the brigands * left their dens in the woods; they came to the towns, to beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning-hooks. The lesser thieves, with the fear of the gallows before their eyes, betook themselves to honest labor, to the tilth of the ground or to mechanic trades. The land was at peace; other lands bought her peaceful wares, while weapons of war were no longer wrought in England, but had to be brought in from other lands. The king was prosperous; his people were rich; the hills were tilled; the dales were thick with corn; the fields were full of oxen and the folds of sheep. Every man could go forth safely to his own work and labor; merchants could without fear leave the shelter of the walled towns to sell their wares at fairs and markets. So equable was the rule of those days that, what some might have thought a doubtful blessing, the Jew could go without danger to demand the money which had been lent to his debtor.† The noble kingdom of England put on a new life, as in a new spring. The holy Church was honored; bishoprics and abbeys, as they fell vacant, were given to worthy men unstained by any simoniacal payment. No wonder that the chancellor, the chief adviser of the young king who had wrought all this change, enjoyed the highest favor with all classes; clergy, knighthood, commons, all agreed to look on him with equal good-will.*

Such is the poetic description given by Thomas's liveliest biographer. But a search into the more sober histories of the time will fully bear out his general facts. In the early days of Henry England was brought back from utter lawlessness to as strict an administration of the law as the state of society in the twelfth century allowed. And Thomas the chancellor was the chief worker in the change. No doubt harsh means were needed to bring it about; more eyes and hands were doubtless sacrificed than would suit modern notions of humanity. But the statute of the elder Henry which made mutilation the punishment of wrongs done to the people by the king's followers was put forth by the advice of Anselm. If Mr. Froude had more minutely mastered the customs of the times, he might have given us a thrilling picture of the unscrupulous and tyrannical chancellor going about the country, boring out an eye here and cutting off a hand there, as the fancy took him. But, by whatever means, with whatever degree of severity, order was brought back, and it was by Henry, acting under the advice of Thomas, that it was brought back. That fact stands out plainly in English history, though with the disadvantage that not only is the minister, as usual, overshadowed by the king, but that in this case he is further overshadowed by his own later self. But cast away Thomas the archbishop; think only of Thomas the chancellor; and surely the man who was foremost in bringing back peace and law after the great anarchy — that anarchy which has no later parallel — is fully entitled to one of the very highest places in the bede-roll of illustrious Englishmen.

But the chancellorship of Thomas is not memorable only for the restoration of peace after the anarchy. The administrative and legislative work of Henry's reign began while Thomas was still his

* William carefully distinguishes between the "latrones," robbers on a grand scale, who had "silvarum latibula," and the mere "fures."

† "Exeunt securi ab urbibus et castris ad nundinas negotiatores, ad creditores repetendos Judæi."

* "Cancellarii summus erat, in clero, militia, et populo regni, favor." This is one of the thousand passages which tell negatively against Thierry's notion of a long-abiding and hostile distinction between Normans and Englishmen. Had such feelings existed, had Thomas or anybody else been the representative of one race or the other, now would have been the very time to say that Thomas won the love of both "Saxons and Normans," as a man might now be said to win the love of both Greeks and Turks. But instead of distinct nations, William Fitz-Stephen only mentions ranks in the same nation. Doubtless, if their pedigrees had been gone into, the majority of the "militia" would have been found to be of Norman, the vast majority of the "populus" to have been of English descent; but it was simply as "militia" and "populus" that they appeared in his eyes, not as Norman and English.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

chief counsellor. Henry showed in aftertimes that he could go on with the work by himself; but it was while Thomas was at his side that it began. One of the greatest blows to feudalism was dealt by the hand of Thomas. It was by his counsel that Henry introduced the practice of scutage, the commutation of military service for money. With this money the king hired troops for his foreign wars. Henry showed at a later time, in his Assize of Arms, that no king was more careful that every Englishman of whatever rank, should be ready, when need called, to serve his country at home with the arms befitting his rank. But for wars beyond sea, the great nobles might come, mercenaries or volunteers might come; but King Henry would not drag the country gentleman, the citizen, or the yeoman from his home against his will.* That anti-feudal policy which was hereditary in our kings, since the Conqueror dealt the greatest of all blows to feudalism at Salisbury, was here ably seconded by Chancellor Thomas. So again with Henry's reforms in the administration of justice. The first stages of them must have been largely the work of Thomas. The use of recognitions in judicial proceedings, the greatest of all particular steps towards the full development of jury-trial, is spoken of by the Justiciar Randolf of Glanville as Henry's special gift to his people, as a mode of discerning truth and falsehood far better than the chances of the battle or the ordeal. The recognition, the decision of matters by the oaths of lawful men, was certainly no invention either of Henry or of Thomas. But it was during the reign of Henry that it was systematically used on all kinds of occasions, in a way in which it had not been used before, least of all during the days of anarchy. And the practice of recognition is assumed in the Constitutions of Clarendon as something which was already fully established. It can therefore hardly fail to have been established during the administration of Thomas. Here again we have another sign of the work of that busy chancellorship. So, again, among the charters of boroughs granted by Henry some come early enough in his reign to bear the signature of Thomas the chancellor. Here there are three great changes, three great beginnings of reform and growth, in our military, our judicial, and our municipal system, which come within that part of the reign of Henry where every account sets Thomas before us as his all-trusted and all-powerful minister. We must not expect the biographers and chroniclers of the age to enlarge on points like these. They are more inclined to enlarge on personal adventures, on striking pageants, on warlike or diplomatic achievements. The war of Toulouse and the mission to Paris stand out in their pages in a way in which the legislative work of king and chancellor does not stand out. But they tell us in a general way of Thomas's influence with the king, of his authority over the realm. And from other sources, from incidental notices here and there, we can find out how that influence was used. And, following up our researches in this way, we are fully justified in saying that the man whom Mr. Froude knows only as an unscrupulous and tyrannical minister, stained with deeds of murder and rapine of Mr. Froude's own finding out, is entitled to a place in the foremost rank of those who helped to give the laws of England their later shape. In claiming his due honor for the chancellor we in no way lessen the honor due to the king. For a young prince like Henry to choose or to accept a minister like Thomas, for him to be guided by his counsels till one false step parted them asunder, is the surest sign that, if the minister was worthy of the king, the king was also worthy of the minister. Henry was by instinct a lawgiver; he carried on his work of legislation during his whole reign, even at the most unfavorable times. But he began while he was yet a youth, with Thomas as his guide. When kings reign but do not govern, we give their ministers all the credit or discredit of their actions. And when kings govern as well as reign, we must also give their ministers much of the credit and discredit of their actions, though in another way. The honor — and that honor is great indeed — which belongs to Henry of Anjou for the acts of the first eight years of his reign must in all fairness be shared with him by Thomas the chancellor, the son of Gilbert Becket of London.

I have then, I trust, rescued the memory, whether of a saint or not, at least of a great English minister, from the hasty slanders of a man who seems to write whatever first comes into his head, without

* Mr. Robertson (34) quotes from Robert de Monte, that "the king had recourse to this 'nolens vexare agrarios milites, nec burgensium nec rusticorum multitudinem.'" My copy of Robert is far away; but I know that I can trust Mr. Robertson.

A little later "rustici" distinctively means "villains;" here it seems to take in all below knightly, or at least gentle, rank. The churls are now fast sinking into villains.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

stopping to see whether a single fact bears his statements out or not. But the question now comes: Theobald procured Thomas's appointment to the chancellorship with certain objects; how far did Thomas carry out those objects? The answer to that question is perhaps less simple than may appear at first sight. I believe that Thomas's two great appointments, to the chancellorship and to the archbishopric, have strong points of analogy to one another. That is, in both cases he largely disappointed the expectations which had been formed of him. I believe that it was in the nature of the man that he should in both cases disappoint the expectations which had been formed of him. Had he been either a greater or a smaller man, had he been either a creative genius or a mere clever official, he would probably have fulfilled them better. Being what he was, he disappointed them. But I must put off till another time my picture — very unlike Mr. Froude's picture — of the personal character of both chancellor and archbishop. To my mind Thomas is much the same kind of man in both characters. Only an office for which he was fitted brought out the stronger side of him; an office for which he was unfitted brought out the weaker side. Meanwhile those who have followed me thus far will be able to make up their minds whether they will accept my statement of facts or Mr. Froude's. With those who take the latter alternative I can walk no further. I claim no power of inspiration or divination; I cannot get beyond my books. I have indeed made certain inferences; but I have made them from the only facts that I can get at, and from the general bearing of all those facts. Mr. Froude, from a few facts picked here and there, garnished with a few other statements to be found nowhere but in Mr. Froude's own papers, has made, logically enough, widely different inferences. But, before I put forth my inferences, my position must be understood. Those who accept the life of Thomas, as it stands in recorded history, will, I hope, accept my inferences when I come to state them in full, as a reasonable explanation of those facts. Those who on the other hand accept, not the life of Thomas to be found in recorded history, but the quite different "Life of Thomas" which is contained in Mr. Froude's papers in the Nineteenth Century, may save themselves the trouble of following me any further. From the pages of history I believe that my inferences may be drawn; from the pages of Mr. Froude I certainly could not draw them.

EDWARD A. FREEMAN.

SECOND SIGHT.

TRANSLATED FOR THE LIVING AGE

BY E. W. LATIMER.

CHAPTER I.

THE first train for Paris from London viâ Folkestone and Boulogne stops a few minutes at Verton. Verton is a mere water station, where there are seldom any travellers to be taken on board.

One bright day in July there were seven of us crowded into one compartment of a railway carriage. We had been grumbling ever since we left Boulogne at the meanness of the company, which, in order to avoid putting one more carriage on the train, had given us so little space, when at Verton, just as the train was starting, the guard of our carriage threw open the door, and an eighth traveller entered, who most assuredly was not welcomed by the rest of us.

I was seated in a corner, next the door that had been opened. On my right hand was an Englishman fast asleep, and opposite to him was the only vacant place in the compartment, where the other travellers had put their umbrellas, valises, and railroad rugs. On one side of this empty seat, and opposite to mine, was a young man of about twenty-five, whose nationality was not clear to me till he pulled out of his pocket a heavy silver cigarette-case, containing what are called papyros in Russia. He selected one, pressed it together with his fingers, and lighted it by the help of a match fastened to his cigar-case. Then he drew in a long breath of the smoke and slowly exhaled it, with an air of extreme enjoyment, through his delicate nostrils.

The young Russian wore an elegant travelling-dress. He looked in ill health, and had the manners of a man who had seen the world. Very tall and very thin, he might have passed for a Spaniard or a Brazilian, for his complexion was pale olive. His hands were white and handsome, the fingers thin and bony, the nails carefully trimmed. His hands indeed appeared endowed with extraordinary restlessness, — he was constantly stroking a long moustache which covered his upper lip. His teeth were small, regular, well-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

formed, and of dazzling whiteness. He had short, thick hair, of a dark chestnut color, brushed rather low upon the forehead, and well down on the back of the neck, covering completely the long, narrow head. The lips were red, and showed a nervous temperament. The mouth was that of a young man of kindly, weak, irresolute disposition, and it gave the face which otherwise might not have seemed prepossessing, an expression which called forth my interest and sympathy. The most remarkable things, however, about my opposite neighbor were his small, black, round, bright eyes, set wide apart from each other. His eyes were so restless that it tired me to look at them. They went wandering from one passenger to another, though from time to time they remained fixed upon some one face with a singular steady stare. Several times I detected him gazing at me with this strange look, and found it very disagreeable. There was something enquiring, pondering, questioning, about his look. One felt strongly tempted to answer it by saying, "Do you know me? What do you look at me so for? What do you see in me?" This steady gaze was all the more extraordinary, because it was altogether out of keeping with the gentlemanly manners of the young Russian. It was a scrutinizing look, it showed no consideration for the person stared at, it was half impertinent. I could hardly keep from comparing it to the look of a detective in search of some criminal, "wanted" by his superiors, and inclined to suspect every man he saw of being the one he was in search of.

The other half of the compartment was occupied by four Frenchmen, who appeared to know each other, and were talking together on some of the subjects of the day.

All the party, except my neighbor, the Englishman, who was fast asleep, cast glances of mute reproach at the intruder from Verton. But he did not seem to trouble himself much about our ill-humor.

"If you please," said he briefly, glancing at the pile of things laid down in the seat that was still unoccupied. Each of us was then compelled, though by no means with a good grace, to pull out the impedimenta that belonged to him, and distribute them as well as he could under his own legs. One railway rug, however, remained unappropriated, the Englishman who was its owner not having woke up. The new-comer waited a moment, then without ceremony he rolled up the rug, and pushed it with his foot under the seat. I was rather surprised to see with what coolness he treated another person's property. Immediately after this the train started. Then I began to examine our new travelling companion.

He had a repulsive, sordid look; he was evidently a common man in his Sunday clothes. His shirt was soiled, and limp with perspiration. His clothes were dark and badly made; so were his boots, and he was covered with dust. My first look told me this much. The man seemed about thirty, and was short and stout. He had a bull-neck, round powerful, shoulders, large, thick, red hands, now swollen by the heat, flat, ugly nails, a heavy fist, legs short and thick; everything about him showed great bodily strength. He had light, dirty-brown hair, cut short, and combed down to two points on the temples, bristly whiskers, no moustache, and the ruddy complexion of a man accustomed to be much in the open air. His forehead was low, his nose broad, his mouth wide, though the lips were thin and closely compressed, so that the line of the jawbone was visible. His eyes were light, keen, and disagreeable, and were all the time looking furtively and fiercely round him.

As soon as he was seated he cast a rapid glance at his travelling companions; then, satisfied probably by what he saw, he pulled out of his pocket a plaid cotton handkerchief, and drawing a long breath wiped the perspiration from his forehead. I then remarked that the fore-finger and middle finger of his right hand were tied up in a piece of fine cambric, a lady's handkerchief apparently. On the palm of the hand there was a dried blood-stain. Those two fingers had evidently been lately hurt. A few minutes after he unfastened his long black cravat, and drew several long breaths, like one who has been just taking some violent exercise, and is glad to rest after it is done. Then by a sudden movement of his hand he pushed back the round hat he wore, stretched his two legs apart, leaned both his hands upon his thighs, and, bending down his head and looking straight before him, seemed absorbed in profound reflection.

The young Russian had not failed to cast on the new-comer the same scrutinizing glance he had bestowed on me. This individual appeared indeed to interest him extremely, for whilst a single steady look had sufficed to make him acquainted with my person, he had turned half round to-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

wards his left-hand neighbor, and was looking at him with fixed attention as if he wanted to engrave forever on his memory the vulgar and unpleasing features of our new companion.

The man who was the object of this persistent attention did not notice it for some time. He was too much absorbed in his own reflections to observe what was going on around him. But suddenly, as the train held up as it approached Abbéville, he raised his head and looked out of the window. His eyes then met those of the young Russian, whose face immediately wore a painful look of embarrassment. The brow of our eighth traveller was puckered into a frown, and his face grew red with anger, as he said, in a rough tone, —

"What are you looking at me for? Do you know me? What do you want?"

I could not help feeling that these questions were perfectly justifiable, since I had been tempted shortly before to say the same thing to my opposite neighbor. The manner however in which the Russian gentleman hastened to reply gave me a new impression in his favor.

"I beg a thousand pardons," he said, in a low voice and very gently; "I assure you I had no intention of being indiscreet."

The Verton man growled out some unintelligible reply; then he rose, and merely saying, "I beg your pardon," he pushed between me and the Russian to look out of the carriage window in the side of the station. After a moment he returned to his own seat; but hardly had the train stopped than he sprang out, and with his right hand clinching something in a side pocket, looked eagerly around him. The platform was empty. Except a few railroad men, there was only one gendarme, who, with an indifferent air, was walking down beside the train, throwing a careless glance into each of the carriages. When he got opposite to ours it happened that he paused a moment. Then I distinctly saw the hand of my unpleasant travelling companion tighten its grasp on something he held concealed. The gendarme walked on. Just as the train was beginning to move off our traveller got back into the carriage, though he remained standing up a few moments between the Russian and myself. It was not until the train was under a full head of steam that he sat down again in his place.

The Russian had got out a book, and was making believe to read, but his mind was not upon its pages, and from time to time I saw him looking at his left-hand neighbor. His face wore an expression of great perplexity; he had the air of one who is trying to solve a difficult problem. Once our eyes met. His seemed to ask my help; they seemed to say, "Help me to understand all this." I began myself to be puzzled. At Amiens, where I found myself at the refreshment-stand next to the young Russian, I asked him if he had any knowledge of the traveller from Verton, whom he was looking at so persistently.

"No, I never saw him before," he said politely, in a tone which seemed to invite me to continue the conversation, "but there is something about him which attracts me."

"Ma foi!" I exclaimed with a laugh, "I did not expect that answer. A less attractive face it seems to me I never saw. I think him repulsive. He looks as if he had escaped from the galleys."

"True; it is a horrid face, a repulsive face — but a very strange one." Here the young Russian had a nervous shiver.

"Will you allow me to offer you a piece of advice?" I continued.

"Pray do."

"Well, I think it would be wise of you to give up looking at or thinking of your neighbor. Without intending it you might get involved in something disagreeable. He does not look like a man pleasant to deal with; he certainly is no gentleman. Did you observe the impertinent freedom with which he pushed himself between you and me to look out of the window? He did it at Amiens and he did it at Abbéville. It made me very angry, but prudence told me I had better hold my tongue. It strikes me such a man might easily pass from insolence to menace, and a personal quarrel with a fellow of that sort would be by no means desirable."

As the train went on from Amiens to Creil the conversation between the young Russian and myself continued. I found him a well-bred man, and a very pleasant companion. We very soon found out that we had several acquaintances in common at Paris and St. Petersburg. He gave me his card, and I told him my name. He was Count Boris Stachovitch, and lived in Paris in the Avenue Friedland.

"How small the world is, after all!" he observed. "Did you never notice how a man of a certain age, if he has been a good deal in various countries, always finds out some link that unites him to every one he becomes acquainted with? Half an hour ago you were a total stranger to me. The

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

few words we have already exchanged have shown me that one of my cousins is a friend of yours, and that I went to school with one of your relations. It does not surprise me. It is always so. I would lay any bet that if I were to chat for half an hour with your English neighbor, who is snoring so melodiously, it would turn out that he and I have acquaintances in common. Ah, it is indeed a little world! I have often asked myself how anybody in it can hope to hide his identity. Not very long ago I had quite a curious conversation on that subject with one of the heads of the secret police. He was a man of great experience; he had captured hundreds of thieves and murderers. Amongst other things he told me, 'The authors of many crimes are not discovered, and those who have committed them manage to escape; but not one person in a thousand who has had a crime brought home to him can long keep out of our reach. Sooner or later, however he may disguise himself, into whatever hole he may crawl to hide himself, we track him. Blood shed by a murderer never can be hid. When we get upon a scent we are quite certain never to lose it. The world ——'"

Here our conversation was interrupted. Stachovitch was speaking loud enough for me to hear opposite to him, and of course his words were heard by the man from Verton, who sat beside him. Suddenly this man rose, and, as he had done at Abbéville and Amiens, pushed between us to see out of the window. Then, before we had time to stop him, he flung open the door, and sprang out upon the narrow footboard which runs all along the outside of the railroad carriage.

We looked at each other in astonishment. As we did so the man sprang off on to the track. I leaned out of the window. I saw him leap forward, with his arms spread out, and fall downward. A moment after he was hidden by a garden wall that we were passing.

The Russian turned pale. The four Frenchmen left off talking, and looked anxiously at me. The Englishman, who had woke up at last, was groping for his railway rug that the man from Verton had pushed under the seat.

"What does it all mean?" said Stachovitch.

I could only shrug my shoulders. I had no idea as to the meaning of the affair. But it was soon to be explained to us.

We were drawing near Paris, and the train begun to diminish its speed. When we were about fifty yards from the station it stopped. Two railroad officials, who were waiting for us at the side of the track, jumped on the train, and, passing by the window of each carriage, cried out, as the locomotive slowly went on again, "Keep your seats, messieurs les voyageurs!" Half a minute later we were in the station.

There was not a soul upon the platform. But I saw two gentlemen come out of the office of the station-master, followed by one of the chief railroad officials. One had the ribbon of the Legion of Honor in his button-hole. They stepped briskly up to the train, and paused a few moments before the door of each compartment. They soon reached ours. The gentleman with the ribbon in his buttonhole, put his head in at the window, cast a sharp glance at each of us, and said,—

"Has any one quitted this carriage since the train left Verton?"

He spoke to me, as I was nearest to him, but one of the four Frenchmen answered first, and related rapidly all he knew of the eighth traveller, who had joined us at Verton, and who had jumped off the train before it reached St. Denis. "Monsieur," he said, pointing to me, "can probably tell you the exact spot, for it was out of the door on his side that the fellow, who was an ill-looking rascal, made his escape."

The head agent of police — we all knew him to be such — then begged me to describe the missing traveller. I was able to give him the information he wanted, for I had carefully observed the man.

As I spoke he nodded his head several times, as if satisfied.

"There can be no doubt of it," he said, when I had finished; "it was he. Monsieur, be so good as to come with me."

I gathered together my things, and got out. Stachovitch got out after me. The railroad officials shouted "Paris! all passengers to leave the train!" And while the platform was being filled with travellers and porters, I turned (still accompanied by the young Russian) into the office of the master of transportation. An order was immediately given for a special train, and in a few minutes I found myself in a luggage-car, in the company of the agent of police, his companion, an active young man about thirty, two gendarmes, and the young Russian, who obtained permission to go with us after the agent had heard of the brief altercation that had taken place between him and the man from Verton. I had already mentioned what I believed to be the spot where the fellow had jumped

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

from the train, and I added that I was sure I could find it exactly.

As we went along the agent told me that the Baronne de Massieux, a widow living alone with her daughter in a country house near Boulogne, had been murdered the night before, and that her coachman, a man named Béchouard, was suspected of the murder.

"About an hour ago," said he, "we got a description of him by telegraph, and we should have been in time to arrest him on this train, if he had not thought proper to slip off — prendre la clef des champs — before the train reached Paris. It won't do him any good, however. He cannot be far off, and we shall soon have him in custody. A murderer is no more lost in the world than a needle in a bundle of hay. With plenty of patience you can always find him."

Stachovitch nodded at me, as if to say, "You see I was right. The world is too small for any one to hide in." But it was not the moment for conversation. We had just passed St. Denis, and the engine was going slowly in order to give me time to identify the spot.

"I remember this house," I said, "and here is the garden wall. This is the spot. But see, the man is here still. He is lying where he fell. He is dead."

We all got out of the baggage-car. About five yards from the track lay stretched out at full length, face downward, the miserable wretch we had come to find. His left arm was doubled under him, his right was stretched out, and the fingers had dug deep into the ground. The cambric handkerchief, which had tied up one of his hands, had come unfastened, the wound had opened, and had bled slightly. The legs were apart. The body lay motionless.

The subordinate of the police agent, who had first jumped out, sprang at the body with the alacrity of a terrier on the scent of a wild animal. He bent down, and seizing one shoulder and one leg with a precision and promptitude which showed him accustomed to such things, turned the body slowly over. The man was dead. The face was entirely uninjured. A slight bloody foam was at the corners of the mouth, a few little drops of dark purple blood from his nostrils had tinged his upper lip. The eyes were wide open, only the whites showing, — their look was inexpressibly awful. Stachovitch, who had leaned over my shoulder to look at him, uttered a cry, and fainted away.

CHAPTER II.

THE public soon forgot the murder of the Baronne de Massieux. Investigation showed that the crime had been committed by Béchouard, who had no accomplices; and, as he did not long escape the punishment of his crime, public justice was satisfied. The matter was no longer of any interest to society, and nothing more was said of it. Two persons, however, never forgot it. Young Marie de Massieux, the daughter of the murdered woman, who wore deep mourning and grieved bitterly, and Boris Stachovitch, over whose existence the tragical event seemed to exert an extraordinary influence.

It was December, — six months after the young Russian and I had first met in the railroad carriage. We had become very intimate. We lived in the same quarter of Paris, we had a good many friends in common, we often dined at the same restaurant, and we rarely passed a day without seeing each other. I grew much interested in my new acquaintance. Stachovitch professed a good many strange ideas on various subjects, but it was evident he always spoke and acted without any kind of affectation. I also discovered that the young Russian possessed excellent qualities of heart and mind. He was sincere, charitable, generous, and singularly amiable; he loved knowledge, and considering his age and his position, he had read and learned considerably. He was truly lovable. I may also add that he inspired me with pity. There was no doubt that Stachovitch was an unhappy man, but I could not discover the cause of his melancholy. He never complained, and when I delicately endeavored to question him he answered me evasively, and with so much reserve and embarrassment, that at last, fearing to be tempted to go too far with him, I ceased to question him about his secret sorrow. He lived in a magnificent appartement, he had a carriage and horses, he flung his money, so to speak, out of the window. It certainly was no pecuniary trouble that tormented him, nor did his health seem to give him any especial concern. He always seemed out of spirits, yet he had an excellent appetite, and, after our making a little excursion together, I found out he was a capital walker, a bold horseman, and a man who could indulge in all manner of manly exercises without perceptible fatigue.

He was a capital swordsman too, and had a great reputation as such in Paris in

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

all the fencing-galleries. People talked of him as eccentric, but he was generally beloved, and they overlooked his little peculiarities. For example, among the members of his club there were certain persons whom he never would fence with; and yet he would never give any plausible reason or excuse for not doing so. The fear of meeting more than his match, or of hurting his reputation, certainly had nothing to do with it, for on various occasions he had been known to get beaten with the best grace in the world. He never became angry or excited during a fencing-bout, and it was well known that among those whom he never would use swords with, there were some not nearly such good swordsmen as himself. It appeared to be some personal caprice which made him refuse certain opponents, excusing himself always, however, with the utmost politeness, though no one could ever get any explanation from him. One day I was present on an occasion of that kind.

"Come, Stachovitch," said the young Vicomte de Drieux to him, "take your foil. I want to try a few passes with you."

"Excuse me, mon cher, you know I never fence with you."

"But why not? Be reasonable. I don't believe you are afraid that I shall let my foil go through your mask."

"Not in the least. Still I had rather not fight with you."

The Vicomte de Drieux planted himself opposite to Count Stachovitch, and said with an offended air, —

"M. le Comte, there must be an end of this. I wish to know why you persistently avoid me. I am determined to fight with you, and if you won't fight me in this fencing-room you will have to fight me elsewhere."

"Don't make a joke of this, my friend. You have no idea how much anything of the kind pains me."

Drieux and I looked at each other with astonishment, for Stachovitch had turned quite pale.

"What a queer fellow you are!" cried Drieux, laughing. But, seeing dark gloom on the face of his Russian friend, he added seriously, "I care too much for your friendship, my dear Stachovitch, not to yield this point to you. So now it is settled. I will never again ask you to fight, if you will give over puzzling me, and tell me why you refuse, as far as fencing goes, to have anything to do with me?"

"Do not be angry with me," replied Stachovitch, "attribute my reluctance to mere caprice. I have a presentiment that some accident would happen to you if you crossed swords with me. Shake hands, Drieux. You don't bear me ill-will — do you?"

"Of course not. Only you are the very queerest fellow I ever knew."

Stachovitch, who was very fond of me, and who confided to me a great many little things, made no allusion when we were alone to what had passed with Drieux. We had indeed for some time had other things to talk of. I knew perfectly well what prompted the young Russian to feel so much affection for my society, and why, notwithstanding a considerable disparity in our years, I had become his bosom friend, whose conversation was indispensable. It was because I was the only person with whom he could freely talk of Marie de Massieux.

The theory of Stachovitch on the "smallness of the world" had recently received a new and striking illustration. Not long after the murder of Madame de Massieux he found out that his sister, the Comtesse de Villiers, who had married a Frenchman, had known her, and what was more, that De Drieux, whom Stachovitch met every day in his club, and at the fencing-gallery, was a relative of the same family. Since her mother's death Marie de Massieux had been living with her aunt, Madame de Baudry, in the Faubourg St. Honoré, in the same house in which was also the appartement of the Comtesse de Villiers.

These discoveries delighted Stachovitch. He talked to me about them for several days, and could not say enough about the smallness of "this little, little world."

"Frequent the Bois on horseback for a fortnight," he said, "and you will know by sight every lady and gentleman who rides in Paris; go to all the concerts for a month, and you will know every one who has a taste for music. And then talk to me about its being such a great city! It is bigger, maybe, than a theatre, — a little bit bigger, I grant, but not very much so. If you only set to work rightly, you can know in a month pretty much all those who live in it, and there won't be ten persons you meet a day who will be perfect strangers to you. One will have written something you have read; another will have said something you have heard; one you will pass every evening at a certain house on the Boulevard des Italiens, another will be paying attention to some lady of your acquaintance. Observe, too,

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

how one always distrusts every one who cannot be fastened by any link on to one's previous surroundings. The world is 'ever so little,' I repeat. It is hard to come upon anything that is perfectly unknown."

Stachovitch, who often went to see his sister, one day met Madame de Baudry and Mademoiselle de Massieux in her rooms. He was introduced to them, and soon inspired an interest (though a somewhat sad one) in the mind of the young lady, when she found out that it was to him her mother's murderer had spoken his last words.

"What made you look at him so earnestly?" she asked one day in her aunt's drawing-room, after having heard him relate how near he had been to getting into a quarrel with Béchouard. "Had you any presentiment that he was a murderer?"

"I had no idea of it. But his face was strange — was horrible. Fear and curiosity attracted me to look at him. His eyes were all distorted — dead eyes — white eyes!" He shuddered.

"White eyes?" repeated the young girl, "I do not understand you. I knew the wretch. He had grey eyes — wicked eyes. I see them still."

Stachovitch made no answer, and tried to give another turn to the conversation. Marie, who knew he was generally considered rather a singular character, and who also knew from her aunt and Madame de Villiers that he was amiable and right-minded, did not press the point, and they talked of other things. A little later in the evening the servant announced the Vicomte de Drieux. He came in, casting no gratified look on the young Russian, bowed to his cousin, and sat down next to Madame de Baudry, in whose salon for some weeks past he had met Stachovitch every evening.

Stachovitch, who found the time pass rapidly when he was talking with Marie, now perceived that his visit might be getting too long. He took up his hat, and took his leave. From Madame de Baudry's he came to my rooms, where for the hundredth time I had to listen to the first chapters of the story of his love for Marie de Massieux. I heard him, as usual, if not with great attention at least with patience and kindness. That was why I had grown to be his dearest friend, the man whose advice and encouragement he valued above everything.

"Take courage," I said, "everything is going on as it ought. You are too afraid of being refused, that is the only trouble. You seem to expect the young lady to tell you her own mind before you declare yourself, which is asking too much. I do not understand your hesitation. You know through your sister, the countess, that Madame de Baudry has no objection to your paying court to her niece. Her approval indeed is very evident. If she did not encourage you, would she let you see Mademoiselle de Massieux every day, and talk with her as long as you please? The aunt is on your side. Her approval is a trump card. Your rival, the Vicomte de Drieux, is not very dangerous. He is a charming young fellow, we both know, but he cannot be the man to come up to the poetical ideal that I am sure exists in the heart of Mademoiselle Marie. I have remarked that when she talks to De Drieux she never goes into those abstract subjects, which (it is funny enough) form the favorite bases of the talk of lovers. He tells her what is being acted at the theatre, who are the best-dressed women of Paris, who is the 'favorite' in the coming races. Those things are all useful knowledge for a young girl, who, no doubt, is already looking forward to the time when she will be mistress of an agreeable salon. But she cares for the information, not for the man who instructs her. If her aunt would give her leave to read a newspaper every day, it would more than supply the conversation of her cousin. The vicomte makes her laugh. That is a good sign for you. The young man who makes a young girl laugh is never dangerous as a lover. He may be very acceptable to married women, but not to young ladies. To them love is a sentimental comedy, quite solemn in almost all its scenes. To an experienced spectator, who has gone through it all, and, alas! will act a part in it no more, the solemnity about it is both comic and pathetic. You are playing the lover's part as admirably as Mademoiselle de Massieux is playing that of the lady. She talks to you of her passion for flowers. She plays Chopin for you, and to Drieux she plays noisy waltzes. I have heard her describing to you, with tender sadness, beautiful moonlight walks under the old oaks of the park of Massieux. She was perfectly charming in her innocent sweetness, and some of these days I feel certain she will make an admirable wife at the head of your establishment. You on your part are not less correct. You recommend her good books, you read her poetry, you take her out upon the balcony and show her the constellations of the firmament, Orion, Cassiopeia, and the Great Bear. All this is as innocent as it is edifying; and she has unbounded confidence in your scientific attainments. You have been trying to teach her the first principles of geology; she does not understand one thing you tell her, but she listens with the most earnest attention. She would do the same if you explained to her the beauties of a Murillo, or the philosophy of Don Quixote. You might go further, and endeavor to explain to her the music of Wagner and the philosophy of Kant. Everything is working famously. Only go on. Have courage; make your offer for her hand, and I will guarantee it will be given you."

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

The poor young fellow listened gladly to such speeches, and seemed anxious to believe in the encouragement I gave him, but I could not induce him to follow my advice. He had something at the bottom of his heart which he concealed from me, and which was hindering him from putting an end to his painful uncertainty.

One evening, after a long silence, Stachovitch asked me suddenly if I thought that a man who knew he had not long to live had any right to marry.

His question took me by surprise. I rose, and, standing in front of him, looked at him attentively. He looked badly; he was pale and thin, and his bright eyes were restless and troubled.

"Stachovitch, you make me very uncomfortable," I said, in a paternal tone. "Look me full in the face."

His anxious look had changed to one more calm and pleasant.

"You look like a kind, old, venerable grandpapa," he said. "It does me good to look at you."

I began to laugh. "What a compliment!" I cried. "I may be fifteen years older than you, possibly, but that is no reason for treating me as a grandfather. Besides, my looks have nothing to do with this affair. How is it? Are you expecting to die? What do you mean by it? You are pushing your taste for eccentricity too far. Your being in love does not excuse such nonsense. What do you mean to die of? Heart or lungs? Anything else would be too commonplace for such a lover. What is the matter with you?"

"Nothing is the matter."

"Well, then, why ask me so absurd a question? Why do you want to know if a man who thinks he has not long to live has any right to marry?"

"I am wretched. Nobody knows, nobody can guess, what I suffer."

He spoke with melancholy resignation. His eyes were fixed upon the fire. I saw tears gather under the lids and roll slowly down his cheeks.

I put both hands upon his shoulders, and this time I said very seriously,—

"You are a malade imaginaire, my dear friend. Such things are not new in the history of medicine, and all such delusions are curable. Promise me to go and see a doctor."

He shook his head.

"Do it to please me," I persisted.

"What would be the use?"

"More than you think. Indeed, I must insist upon it. You have given me your confidence, and I am really fond of you. Our friendship imposes certain obligations that I am going to fulfil. I will come for you to-morrow at one o'clock, and take you to see a physician whom you can trust entirely. You must either go with me, or explain why you will not go."

He turned towards me, and answered very gently, "I will do everything you wish, my dear friend. I thank you for the interest that you take in me; but, understand me, I am quite sure the visit you wish me to make will result in nothing. Do not be angry with me, and above all do not give me up. I am very unhappy."

The visit to my physician was entirely satisfactory. The doctor informed my friend that to all appearance he was perfectly well; that his heart and lungs were in first-rate order. As to the nervous excitement of which I have spoken, he attached no particular importance to it, believing it to be a symptom that would yield to his general treatment. We took leave of him, and at parting he said to my friend the Russian,—

"You have so good a constitution, monsieur, that I know no one more likely to live to be a hundred. Only you must not worry yourself on the subject of your health."

When we were in the street I saw Stachovitch shrug his shoulders with a look of hopeless despair.

"Why, Stachovitch!" I cried, "are you not satisfied? What can you want more? Do you wish a lease of life for a hundred and fifty years?"

"I knew beforehand," he replied, "that our visit to your doctor could do no good."

And indeed, after that morning, he fell into a state of more settled melancholy. I grew more and more uneasy about him. I was several times tempted to go back and see the doctor again, and get him to tell me all he thought of his patient, when a new event changed the whole situation.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

From The Fortnightly Review.

MODERN JAPAN.*

II.

MODERN JAPAN has existed for a very few years only, the most important changes having taken place during the new era of "Meiji" within the last decade; it is not yet twenty years since the treaty ports were opened to foreigners, and it is less than a quarter of a century since the American, Commodore Perry, sailed into the bay of Yedo. From this occurrence the modern history of Japan may be said to date, and accordingly the arrival of the American squadron in July, 1853, is the first event chronicled in "Kinsé Shiriaku," a native work giving an account of the most critical period in the annals of Japan, recently translated by Mr. Satow, of the English Legation in Tokio. This chronicle concludes with the capture of Hakodaté by the mikado's forces in 1869, when the existing government was definitively established, and the great struggle between the south-western and north-eastern clans terminated in the triumph of the former. Again and again in Japanese history this struggle has been renewed with varying success, and within the last few months it has been waged with as great determination as ever, the scene of action being changed from the northern island of Yesso to the south-western corner of the empire. Here the energetic and warlike clan of Satsuma has measured its strength single-handed against the mikado's army, to which it so long furnished the most important contingent, and has at last succumbed. The revolution which overthrew the "Bakufu" † was entirely the work of the south-western clans, among which stand conspicuous as leaders Satsuma, Tosa, and Choshiu. They enjoyed the advantage of having in their possession the person of the mikado himself, while their eastern adversaries were stigmatized as being at once friends to the hated foreignor and traitors to the lawful emperor. Then, in addition to this moral superiority, the western clans, Choshiu and Satsuma in particular, had the still more important advantage of being well drilled, lightly clothed, and provided with excellent fire-arms, while the eastern troops were encumbered with heavy armor, and their weapons were principally swords and spears. In the last struggle, which has just been brought to a close, these conditions have been entirely reversed. The cause which brought Satsuma into the field, and roused Tosa to indignant protest, may be as worthy as that for which they both fought victoriously eight or nine years ago, but now the big battalions, the best rifles and cannons, and the mikado himself are all with their adversaries, who bear the title of the "loyal army," and brand with the name of rebels the clansmen of the west. It is hard not to feel sympathy in its downfall with the proud clan of Satsuma, which has played so leading a part in Japanese history as almost to justify the vaunt that "if all Japan weighs one hundred, then Satsuma weighs fifty." Seven years ago the daimio of Satsuma stood foremost among the peers of Japan, his territory extended over three provinces, his revenues were inferior in amount to those of one daimio only, and in political influence he was second to none, holding as he did the Liu Kiu Islands in tributary dependence, and having at his absolute disposal the most warlike and ambitious of the clans. In 1872 four-fifths of those who held the higher offices of the Japanese government belonged to Satsuma and three other allied clans. In a civil war the beaten party is certain to be regarded as in the wrong, and the case of the Satsuma insurgents has never been publicly stated, except by their adversaries, but a fair idea of their leaders' views may probably be obtained from a memorial presented to the mikado in July, 1877, by the Rissisha, a political society formed in the province of Tosa a few years previously. The insurrection was then limited to Kiushiu, the extreme western island of the Japanese archipelago, but grave apprehensions were entertained that an outbreak would take place in the neighboring island of Sikoku, where the influential clan of Tosa is located. At this juncture the Rissisha drew up a memorial, setting forth in temperate language the grievances felt by Japanese reformers, and petitioning the mikado for the establishment of free representative institutions. The principal evils complained of were the despotic nature and changeable policy of the existing government, financial mismanagement, the working of the conscription, extreme centralization, and a lack of patriotic spirit in the conduct of foreign affairs, notably in the cession of Sagalien to Russia without a proper equivalent. That substantial grounds exist for these complaints no one conversant with Japanese

* Concluded from No. 1767.

† Bakufu means literally the "curtain" or "tent" government, in allusion to the original position of the shogun, as a great military commander.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

affairs will deny, and the proposed remedies of free discussion and representative control on behalf of the people recommend themselves naturally to every Englishman, but it may well be doubted whether Japan is yet ripe for a complete parliamentary constitution. Anyhow, the peaceable remonstrance of Tosa was not more successful than the armed insurrection of Satsuma, and all hopes of immediate constitutional reform have perished with the gallant Saigo, whose voluntary death by the sword of his best friend was that of a true Japanese gentleman, and who may bear in future the title of the last of the samurais.

The clan of Choshiu has played a part in recent events hardly second even to that of Satsuma, and with the daimios of these two great clans foreign powers have been brought into actual collision — never with the mikado or the shogun. The affairs of Kagoshima and Simonoseki have been the only occasions on which Japanese blood has been shed by British arms, and it is needless to say that Japanese writers take a somewhat different view of those actions, with their causes and their consequences, to that taken generally among ourselves. The attack on Kagoshima, the capital of Satsuma, in August, 1863, was brought about by the murderous attack made upon a party of English gentlemen on the Tokaido road, near Yokohama, in September, 1862, the assassins being the retainers of Shimadzu Saburo, father of the prince of Satsuma. With respect to this affair, the Japanese allege that, while negotiations were still pending, the British admiral seized three steamers lying in a bay near Kagoshima, that this forcible seizure being regarded as an act of hostility the Satsuma batteries opened fire, and that the engagement resulted in severe damage to the English ships, and in the burning of the town of Kagoshima. A gale of wind was blowing at the time, and it is evident to any one familiar with the combustible nature of a Japanese city, that one or two stray shells would be sufficient in such a case to produce a general conflagration, however careful the British artillerists might have been to direct their fire against the batteries and arsenal only. Except as regards the seizure of the Satsuma steamers during the progress of negotiations, no blame, even by the Japanese account, seems to attach to the British in the affair of Kagoshima. It may be conceded that Shimadzu Saburo was not personally implicated in the death of Mr. Richardson, but it is certain that the fatal blows were struck by his retainers and in his presence. If he had given strict orders, as alleged, that his people were to abstain from all demonstrations of hostility against any foreigners whom they might meet, his duty and his dignity alike required that his disobedient followers should be punished with the utmost severity. The Satsuma ministers did not even pretend that this had been done. They expressed regret indeed for the fatal event, but maintained that the foreigners, in impeding the passage of the Tokaido road, had broken the laws of Japan, and had thus brought violence upon themselves. As to those who committed the violence, it was said that "if after examination they were found to be guilty they should be punished." This was the reply made to a demand for the "immediate trial and capital execution of the chief perpetrators of the outrage," exactly eleven months having elapsed without any action being taken for the punishment of Shimadzu's murderous and mutinous retainers. Thus, upon their own showing, the Satsuma authorities had given just cause of complaint to the British government, and their chastisement seems to have been fully deserved, so far as they were chastised by the bombardment of Kagoshima, or the payment of "£25,000 to be distributed to the relations of the murdered man and to those who escaped with their lives." A promise was also exacted that a diligent search should be made for the murderers, but none of them were ever brought to justice, and our government have laid themselves open to the taunt of having dropped the entire subject as soon as their pecuniary demands were complied with. There would have been little force in such a taunt, perhaps, had there been no other payment demanded beyond the moderate indemnity of £25,000 for the actual sufferers. Unfortunately, the British Foreign Office gave instructions that the daimio of Satsuma was to be held responsible in the second place only, and that the Bakufu must bear the primary responsibility. The two conditions to be exacted were "an ample and formal apology for the offence of permitting a murderous attack on British subjects," and "the payment of £100,000 as a penalty for this offence." As to this part of the Richardson affair, the injustice of English policy seems clear, and there is too great an appearance of truth in the accusation that a private crime was made the pretext by a powerful nation for extorting money from a feeble one.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

In 1862–63 the shogun was not ruler of Japan de facto, any more than de jure, and the unfairness of exacting from his government a large pecuniary penalty is enhanced by the fact that his helplessness at the time was due mainly to the action of foreign powers. To arrest so important a grandee as Shimadzu was quite beyond his power, humbled as he then was. Even in the plenitude of their power, the rulers of Yedo left remote and powerful clans very much to their own devices, but of late years the shogun had been deprived of all authority to the westward of Yedo by the united hostility of the western daimios, acting with the co-operation of the mikado's court. Meanwhile, foreign governments continued to treat with the shogun or taikun as if he were emperor of Japan, and to wring from him concessions which he had neither the right nor the power to grant, ignoring alike the theoretical supremacy of the mikado and the practical independence of the great daimios. By this policy the waning authority of the shogun, founded solely upon military strength and prestige, was rapidly destroyed, and it might be said that his writ had ceased to run, except in the north-eastern provinces.

The Bakufu government were never suspected or accused of complicity in the murder of Mr. Richardson; they did what they could beforehand to obviate by warning and expostulation the catastrophe; and their regret was subsequently expressed in the strongest possible language. Non possumus was in their case a genuine plea, and the want of power, which was their only crime, rendered the extortion from them of £100,000 an easy but dishonorable proceeding, while the unfortunate minister who paid the indemnity was censured and disgraced by the court of Kioto. On the other hand the display of artillery power in the bombardment of Kagoshima, which seemed to many a harsh act at the time, may fairly be said to have prevented serious collisions and much bloodshed by humbling at once and decisively the arrogance of the most pugnacious clan.

The Simonoseki affair furnishes another important episode in modern Japanese history, being the second instance in which a warlike clan defied the foreigners, and paid the penalty of such rashness. Here the conduct of the maritime powers, and that of Great Britain especially, cannot be regarded with complete approval by the impartial historian, and the case for the Japanese is certainly stronger than at Kagoshima, where the original outrage is beyond dispute, and the doubtful point is merely whether a fitting punishment was inflicted upon those who were the true offenders. In the case of Simonoseki it is disputed whether an illegal act was ever committed by the Japanese, it is denied that the British authorities had any concern at all in the matter, and it is maintained that the penalty was exacted from persons in no way responsible, and was altogether in excess of the alleged offence. The facts appear to be these. In 1863 the powerful house of Mori, daimios of Choshiu, or Nagato, constructed batteries at Simonoseki with the avowed object of opposing the passage of the western barbarians through the narrow straits, which here separate Kiushiu from Hondo, the mainland of Japan, and are the channel of navigation between the Inland Sea and the outer Sea of Japan. American, French, and Dutch vessels passing through these straits were successively fired upon by the Japanese, one of the ships so attacked being the Dutch man-of-war "Medusa," which at once took her own part so effectively as to silence one of the batteries. The insults to the American and French flags were in their turn promptly avenged by the "Wyoming" and the "Sémiramis." Supposing the foreign vessels to have been justified by law or treaty, which the Japanese deny, in passing through these very narrow straits into the Inland Sea, it seems impossible to find fault with the action thus far of the three foreign nations concerned. It is not necessary here to discuss whether England was justified in her intervention, no injury having been inflicted upon any of her subjects, or to enter into details as to the diplomatic action of the combined powers. The main interest of the whole matter now consists in affording an illustration of the peculiar political situation at the time in Japan, and the ignorance or perversity of foreign governments as to Japanese affairs. Envoys were dispatched by the Bakufu to reprimand the daimio of Choshiu for having fired without orders upon foreign vessels, but the Choshiu people justified their own conduct, and imprisoned one of the envoys, who never returned home, his ultimate fate remaining unknown. A complete breach was caused between the government of Yedo and this headstrong clan, and soon afterwards the troops of Choshiu were removed from their accustomed post at one of the palace gates in Kioto, whereupon they retreated bodily into their own western land. The Mori

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

family were now prohibited from entering the imperial capital, and found themselves involved in hostilities not only with the maritime powers, but also with the mikado, the shogun, and all the other clans, including their old allies of Satsuma. Their case seemed hopeless, but their courage did not falter, and far from submitting they actually assumed the offensive. On the 20th of August, 1864, the Choshiu clan marched in three divisions upon Kioto, which was then full of troops. A desperate engagement took place, and by the united efforts of all the most warlike clans the Choshiu forces were finally repulsed with severe loss, but the greater part of the capital was reduced to ashes. Twenty-one clans were ordered at once to invade the province of Nagato, while the shogun prepared to take the field in person with his own immediate vassals in order to chastise the rebels. At the same time a still more formidable foe was approaching Nagato by sea: sixteen men-of-war, British, French, and Dutch, together with a small vessel bearing the Stars and Stripes, appeared before Simonoseki on the 5th of September, 1864. The attack lasted during a portion of three days, and resulted in the destruction of the batteries, the town being spared, in consideration of which forbearance a special indemnity was demanded. The policy of making every disturbance a pretext for extorting money, or trade concessions, or both, from the defenceless Bakufu was in this case followed up with remarkable energy, and $3,000,000 were required as the total indemnity to the four powers, payable by instalments of $500,000.

Meanwhile the stubborn clan of Choshiu withstood the united forces of the Japanese empire, and the Bakufu, between the foreigners and the rebels, found itself "like a tom-tom beaten on both sides." For a short time the partisans of peace, who were stigmatized by the opposite faction as the "Vulgar View" party, gained the upper hand in Nagato, and made submission to the officials of the Bakufu; but the warlike spirit of the clan soon blazed up afresh, and the struggle was renewed with increased fierceness. The chiefs of the Vulgar View party were decapitated, a reconciliation was effected with Satsuma, the eastern invaders were defeated at all points in a series of well-contested actions, and compelled to evacuate the rebellious provinces, while the victors proceeded to carry the war into the enemy's territory. On the 19th of September, 1866, the shogun died, and the imperial court immediately gave orders for discontinuing operations against Choshiu. "The war was now over at last. During its continuance the Bakufu had expended vast sums of money, until its treasures were almost exhausted, and yet it was unable to have its way with Choshiu. From this time onwards the great clans neglected to obey the commands of the Bakufu, and its power eventually decayed." Thus the "Kinsé Shiriaku" writes the epitaph of the great Tokugawa family, dominant in Japan for two centuries and a half. In January, 1867, was appointed the last of the shoguns, now living in retirement, and in the following month the reigning mikado ascended the throne, the one hundred and twenty-third sovereign of his dynasty. Foreign encroachments, which were made chiefly at the expense of the shogun, and for which he was held responsible by patriotic Japanese, proved fatal to the dual government established in 1192 by Yoritomo, the first Sei-i Tai Shogun, or "barbarian-subjugating generalissimo." Feudalism, which had been established under the military usurpers of the Kuanto (eastern provinces), did not survive their downfall, and three years after the deposition of the shogun the feudal daimios and samurais were things of the past.

Duarchy and feudalism both received their final death-blow during the war in which the foreign attack on Simonoseki was merely an episode, and the successful resistance offered by the Choshiu clan to forces apparently overwhelming, must be regarded as the victory of regular troops over a feudal militia. Takasugi Shinsaku revolutionized the military system of Japan: he enlisted picked men from the common people, as well as from the samurai class (who had hitherto monopolized the privilege of bearing arms), and formed them into a body of troops receiving high pay and subject to the strictest discipline. He thus created a force, bearing the somewhat inappropriate name of irregulars, before whom no eastern army, however numerous, was able to stand. The new régime in Japan, which claims to be merely the ancient system restored as it was before the usurpations of the military caste under the shoguns, is now founded upon the organization of a national army drawn from all classes of the community, and raised, not by voluntary enlistment, like the soldiers of Shinsaku, but by conscription. In time of war the total strength of the regular army amounts to fifty thousand men, drilled, armed, and even fed like European

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

soldiers. By this new army, the Satsuma insurrection has been crushed, and the mikado's government are by its means enabled to withstand alike reactionists and reformers, although the imperial proclamation which called it into existence was published only five years ago. The central authority, wielding as it now does so formidable a military force, besides possessing a small but efficient navy under trained officers, has little to apprehend from local disaffection. Finance will probably be the serious difficulty of Japanese rulers in the immediate future, if they persist in their ambition of taking rank among the civilized powers of the world. The land-tax is the source from which five-sixths of the public revenue is derived, and this produced a large increase in 1875-76, according to official estimates, as did also the returns from postage, and from spirits and tobacco; on the other hand, there was a serious falling off under the head of customs. By far the largest item of public expenditure is for samurais' salaries and pensions, but this is a diminishing item, and as there is also a considerable reduction in the army estimates, the most recently published financial statement, showing a small favorable balance, is hopeful enough on the whole, if the figures can be trusted.

The political and social revolution which created modern Japan, has been as sudden and complete as a theatrical transformation scene. A country sealed from time immemorial against all outsiders is suddenly thrown open, and foreign ideas, inventions, and fashions are welcomed and adopted by government and people. A mysterious dignitary, supposed to resemble in his spiritual attributes the Dalai Lama of Thibet, is drawn forth from invisible seclusion, is arrayed in European uniform, and appears before the astonished world as ruling emperor of Japan, while the usurping shogun, the representative of military domination, retires into peaceful obscurity, his title and his office being suddenly extinguished after a duration of seven centuries. A great territorial aristocracy, owning impregnable fortresses, princely revenues, and the allegiance of devoted military retainers, decrees its own overthrow, and subsides without a struggle, almost without a murmur, into the position of private citizens pensioned by the State. A proud and warlike caste, enjoying a monopoly of arms, of scholarship, and of social privileges, "jealous in honor, sudden and quick in quarrel," two-sworded Tybalts and Mercutios of the nineteenth century, lay down their cherished blades, abandon their distinctive dress, mingle with the common herd, and peacefully accept their reduction to equality with merchants and mechanics. Such changes seem too vast and too rapid to be permanent, and a certain amount of reaction may be fairly anticipated; but whatever the future may have in store for Japan, it is clear that the duarchy of mikado and shogun, the feudal sway of daimios, and the privilege of samurais are all as completely things of the past as the corresponding institutions of mediæval Europe, and that none of them can be re-established any more than the national isolation, which alone rendered possible their existence at this period of human history. The entire political system of Japan was effete, and had long resembled a structure of timbers, the interior of which has been devoured by white ants: it was barely able to support its own weight, and it crumbled into dust at the first external touch. Like the mikado himself, the shogun in the castle of Yedo, and the daimios in their provincial capitals, while retaining all external attributes of greatness, had become, with a few distinguished exceptions, mere puppets in the hands of their ministers, many of these being novi homines, to whose new ideas the modern revolution is mainly due.

Scattered throughout the length and breadth of Japan are mighty fortifications, with broad, deep moats, and earthworks faced with huge granite blocks, rivalling in extent and in artificial strength the elaborate constructions of Vauban. Six years ago these were the strongholds of great chiefs, by whom, or in whose name, wealthy provinces were ruled like independent principalities, and at whose word thousands of clansmen were prepared literally to sacrifice their lives. Now these fortresses are ruined and deserted as completely as the robber castles of the Rhine, the wooden towers and pavilions which adorned their interiors having in some cases entirely disappeared, while in others they are rapidly falling into decay. Such is the style of Japanese architecture that half-a-dozen years seem to have done the work of centuries; and for centuries to come there will be but little further change in the Cyclopean foundations upon which were raised the ephemeral palaces of paper and wood. The magnificent old trees, which lately overshadowed those structures, remain intact in their grandeur, but the moat has been converted into a rice-field, the bamboo jungle grows already on the thresh-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

old, and huge spiders spin their "thin grey pall" in the massive gateways. The men who once lived there in feudal state are still alive; the knights are not dust, nor are their good swords rust; the individual has survived the system, and an ex-daimio still young may stand under the secular pine-trees amid the ruins of his own castle, and muse over his own departed greatness, departed as utterly as that of the Cæsars from the Palatine Hill. In India we have learnt by sad experience what it may cost to capture the mud fort of a Talukdar, even with the aid of artillery. The original number of great daimios is said to have been sixty-six, but the official list of 1862 gave the number as two hundred and sixty-six, with incomes varying from nearly a million sterling down to £15,000. To subdue by force such an array of chiefs, many of whom merely recognized the supremacy of the mikado, very much as did an Earl Douglas or Lord of the Isles that of the Stuart kings of Scotland, was a task far beyond the strength of the central government.

Efflavit et dissipati sunt — the spirit of the age seems here to have wrought a miracle, and before its breath feudalism, "unsmote by the sword, has melted like snow." In the "last year of feudalism," Mr. W. E. Griffis has described the impressive scene which he witnessed on the 1st of October, 1871, when Matsudaira Mochiaké, lord of Echizen, bade farewell to his clan in the castle hall of Fukui, his capital city, transferring the allegiance of his retainers to the mikado, and surrendering his territorial fiefs. All over Japan similar scenes were enacted. With a calmness which would have been pusillanimous had it not been patriotic, the haughty chiefs laid down their power, and left their ancestral homes forever, exchanging in some cases a principality for the directorship of a joint-stock company in Tokio. Upon their immediate retainers the blow descended with terrible severity; by the stroke of a pen they were all at once converted into ronins, masterless men, samurais without occupation or residence. Mr. Green, speaking of the West Saxons one thousand years ago, tells us that "the 'lordless man' became a sort of outlaw in the realm," and his words are applicable to the modern Japanese. It is true that small pensions are paid by the State to the "disestablished" samurais, but these are at the best mere pittances, and have been in many instances commuted for the payment of a round sum with a view to business speculations. The result too often has been that these persons, utterly devoid of all business experience, have lost or consumed their capital in the vain attempt to increase it. Many of the shizoku, or ancient gentry of the land, are now in abject poverty, and are compelled, they and their families, to earn a livelihood in menial and even degrading occupations. Discussing this subject with an American gentleman who had been brought up in Japan, I asked, "Are the shizoku discontented?" His reply was, "Discontent is a state of mind scarcely compatible with the Japanese temperament: I should rather say that they feel thoroughly humbled and ashamed of their position. Certainly they have abandoned their peculiar costume, and keep as much as possible out of sight, being now as careful to conceal their humiliation as they once were to assert their dignity. They were accustomed to be treated with deference by all, and to carry everything before them; now their swords have been taken from them, they are regarded as stingless drones, and are despised by those who used to fear them." A trying position, beyond question, but one which time will remedy.

Japan has been styled the Britain of Asia, and certain analogies undoubtedly exist between the two groups of islands as to their geography and history, their area and population; but the Japanese have always been more truly toto divisos orbe than the inhabitants of the British Isles. Dai Nihon has only been once invaded and never conquered by a foreign foe, and it has very rarely assailed its neighbors, China and Corea. Hence the Japanese differ from the neighboring continentals, not in mere insular peculiarities of dress and manner, but in essential details of character and customs, so that the traveller passing from China to Japan feels at once that he is among a totally distinct people from those whom he has quitted. The Japanese received the Buddhist religion through China from India, they make use of the Chinese written character, and they study the Chinese classics. They have really far less in common with the Chinese than modern England has with imperial Rome. Their religion and literature, their arts and laws, have felt the influence of the great neighboring empire; but the natural genius of the Japanese people, their language, features, and habits, all are perfectly distinct from those of the Middle Kingdom, and seem to indicate Malay or Polynesian rather than Mongolian affinities. While in Japan I was much more frequently reminded of Java than of China, and when allowance has been made

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

for difference of climate, the resemblance between the Japanese and Javanese races in manners and appearance is as strong as that between the two countries. The likeness may be illusory like that of the names (more correctly written Nihon and Djawa), but there are considerations of physical geography which connect Japan and Polynesia with the Malay archipelago far more closely than at first sight appears, and it is certain that ocean currents have done much to distribute inhabitants over the vast island system of the Pacific.

The Japanese islands lie in comparatively low latitudes — Yedo, which is centrally situated in Hondo, the principal island, being actually to the south of Gibraltar and Cape Matapan, the southernmost points of Europe. Lying to the eastward of a great continent, the shores of which stretch away to north-east and south-west, these islands are brought under the influence of two ocean currents, one flowing to the south-west from the arctic regions between Japan and the mainland, the other, known as the Kuro Shiwo or Black Stream, flowing to the north-east from the tropic of Cancer along the southern coasts of the archipelago. In consequence of this peculiar position between a warm and a cold current the islands are liable to severe gales and even typhoons; and, notwithstanding the possession of a coast line indented with countless bays and fiords, the Japanese have never been a truly seafaring people, and have displayed no maritime enterprise beyond that of fishermen and coast traders. Unskilful seamanship and defective construction cause many coasting vessels, Chinese as well as Japanese, to be swept out to sea by the sudden and violent storms of these regions, and if they do not founder at once, they are very apt to lose rudder and masts, when of course they drift along helplessly with wind and current. The Kuro Shiwo, sweeping up from the Philippines, flows rapidly by the shores of Japan towards the Aleutian Islands, curving to the south down the American coast, and returning by the Hawaiian Archipelago across the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. C. W. Brooks, for many years Japanese consul at San Francisco, has published in the "Proceedings of the California Academy of Sciences, 1875," all attainable information relating to junks stranded on the coast of North America, and on the Hawaiian or adjacent islands. He finds that in every instance these have proved to be Japanese, no case being on record of a Chinese junk having been so stranded or found adrift in the North Pacific; this might have been anticipated from the set of the current along the coasts of Corea and China from the Kurile Islands into the Straits of Formosa. During the present century the number of persons rescued from Japanese junks wrecked or disabled in the North Pacific has amounted to hundreds, and it is certain that, since the time when ships are first mentioned in Japanese history, B.C. 81, many natives of Japan must have found their way to the American and Hawaiian coasts, where they have been so often wrecked in our own days, and must have remained there for the remainder of their lives. Square rudders and open sterns have been compulsory by edict for Japanese craft since A.D. 1639, the intention being to prevent ocean navigation: at the same time, the return home of any Japanese who had visited a foreign country, however involuntarily, was prohibited under pain of death, which law was rigidly enforced until recent times against all shipwrecked sailors sent home by Portuguese, Russians, or others. Recent changes in Japan are well illustrated by the fact that the present government are in the habit of rewarding foreign captains who rescue their shipwrecked seamen, and in 1874 they ordered models of vessels from the United States, recommending their adoption to shipbuilders in place of the old-fashioned junk. The crews of ordinary junks average about ten men each, but the largest are nearly four hundred tons in burthen; as many as seventeen persons have actually been rescued on board a disabled junk, and sometimes the crew consists of double that number. When blown out into the open Pacific, a rudderless, dismasted vessel is safe from typhoons, and drifts steadily eastward with the current (besides the aid of prevailing westerly winds), at an average rate of full ten knots a day. When carrying, as very many do, a cargo of rice or dried fish, there is a fair probability that the junk, passing through a region subject to much rain, will reach land with some of her crew alive, even if carried by the return current as far back as the Sandwich Islands, and as a matter of fact men have been rescued after drifting helplessly for more than a year. In no reported case has a Japanese woman been found on board, but it is common for entire families to sail in junks, either as passengers or residents, and one vessel so freighted might people a group of islands previously uninhabited. It must naturally have occurred that shipwrecked Japanese sailors

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

intermarrying with the natives of inhabited coasts would transmit to their descendants some special characteristics, as well as terms of speech, such as are actually to be found in the dialects of Indian tribes in Oregon and California. The frank and friendly manners of the Japanese, so different from those of continental Asia, have their exact counterpart in Hawaii, and it is easy to understand the remark of a Japanese on landing there, "Why, here we are among our own people!" So strange, on the other hand, do the Chinese appear in Japanese eyes as to resemble Europeans rather than themselves; and in remote districts a European is frequently received by the children with shouts of "Chinaman! Chinaman!" It is clear from all the facts before us that a blood relationship must exist between the races inhabiting the shores washed by the vast circuit of the ocean current, best known as the Black Stream of Japan.

Among the many points of difference which separate the Chinese and Japanese, one of the most striking is that the former (alone, I believe, among Asiatic races) make use of chairs, which are conspicuous articles of furniture in every respectable Chinese house, but were unknown in Japan until within the last few years. However far a Chinaman may go in modifying his habits conformably with foreign fashions, he always clings to his pigtail, and except among prisoners I have never seen a Chinaman of any class minus that ornamental appendage. A Japanese, on the other hand, indicates his political proclivities by the mode in which he wears his hair, and may be recognized as an imperialist, a feudalist, or a radical, by his topknot, his shaven temples, or his close-cropped head. The orthodox samurai fashion is still in high favor, with the front part of the head shaved, a small short cue worn as a sort of crest, and all traces of a beard carefully removed. A native gentleman, who had adopted the coiffure of Young Japan, assured me that the growth of his moustache, small as it was, had greatly increased his travelling expenses: "They treat me now as if I were a foreigner."

Feminine dress and fashions in Japan are quite distinct from those of China; the barbarous custom of crushing the foot is unknown (as also are high-heeled boots), and small, well-shaped hands and feet are characteristic of Japanese women. They continue, however, to blacken their teeth and shave their eyebrows when they marry, although the present empress has set her face against these time-honored observances. The Japanese in general affect a simple style of dress, without gaudy colors or ostentatious ornaments; except for fastening up their hair, even women wear no jewellery, and do not, like their Aryan sisters, pierce the cartilage of nose or ears in order to insert metallic rings. Japan seems to be a country where men never lose their temper, where women and children are always treated with gentleness, where common laborers bow and beg pardon of each other if they happen to jostle accidentally, where popular sports do not inflict suffering upon the lower animals, where a paper screen is a sufficient protection against all intrusion, even that of burglars, and where cleanliness takes such a high rank among social virtues as to be carried almost to a ludicrous excess.

Japanese manners are certainly very different from our own; but even according to such a standard as is generally accepted in Europe, the Japanese are a thoroughly well-bred people. And "manners are not idle:" urbanity, gentleness, and consideration for others are not mere superficial qualities; when such national characteristics are found combined with courage, energy, and intellect, they may surely be accepted as evidence of an advanced civilization. Foreigners, after living in the interior of Japan for a considerable time, on returning into "civilized society," have even stated that the manners of their own countrymen appear to them vulgar and almost brutal, accustomed as they have become to a courtesy singularly free from servile or mercenary considerations. The readiness of the Japanese to adopt what seems to them worthy of imitation in foreigners is regarded by some as indicating a lack of originality and independence. But if they imitate, it is not without discrimination, and their willingness to accept what is new and strange, when convinced of its merits, seems rather to indicate acute intelligence with remarkable freedom from prejudice. The Chinese have just succeeded in getting possession of the only railroad in China, and have at once proceeded to destroy the obnoxious innovation. The Japanese railways are being steadily improved and extended, so as to compare creditably, under native management, with any railways in the world.

DAVID WEDDERBURN.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

From Mind.

NOTE-DEAFNESS.

For many years past, since the celebrated case of Dalton and the researches of George Wilson brought the subject into prominence, the common visual abnormality known as color-blindness or dichroism has largely engaged the attention of physiologists and psychologists; and their observations have been of great value in suggesting new and luminous views with respect to the nature and mechanism of color-perception. But there is a somewhat analogous auditory abnormality, which I believe to be at least equally common, yet of which I have nowhere seen any definite account. We often hear it said in conversation that such and such a person "does not know one note from another;" but most people seem to understand this statement merely as applying to a knowledge of the written musical symbols, not to the sounds which they represent. I have been led, however, to make inquiries into some such cases, and I find that the remark is literally true, in its widest acceptation, of many persons; in other words, that not a few men and women are incapable of distinguishing in consciousness between the sounds of any two tones lying within the compass of about half an octave (or even more) from one another. Upon this abnormality I have ventured to bestow the name of note-deafness; and I propose in the present paper to give a detailed account of one such instance, in a person whom I have had abundant opportunities of observing and experimenting upon.

I need hardly point out, at the present day, the value of such special observations. All psychologists are now agreed upon the necessity for a greatly extended study of individual peculiarities: and I shall be glad if the case which I am about to detail arouses other workers to similar examinations of very unmusical persons amongst their acquaintance.

My subject is a young man of thirty, sufficiently educated to comprehend and answer in psychological terms all inquiries made of him, and with a competent knowledge of the physiological mechanism of hearing. From his youth upward he had never taken any interest in music; but it was not till a couple of years ago that he began to suspect a physical malformation as the basis of his indifference. Since that time he has been subjected to a number of experiments, and with the following results.*

If any two adjacent notes upon a piano be struck, he is quite incapable of perceiving any difference between them. After careful and deliberate comparison, many times repeated, he believes the two sounds to be exactly alike. If the same notes be sung by the human voice, he is equally unable to discriminate between them. And if one of the notes (as for example C) be struck, and the other (D) be sung, he does not perceive any greater incongruity than when the same note (C) is both struck and sung.

Further, if any note, say C, is played on the piano, and another note at a considerable interval, say E or A in the same octave, is subsequently played, he cannot notice any difference between them. As the interval enlarges to an octave or more, as from C to C′ or A′, he becomes gradually aware of a difference in pitch. And when notes separated from one another by very considerable intervals are struck, as for example C and C″ or A″, he is conscious of a very distinct unlikeness. In short, while he can perceive variations in pitch, when extremely great, he cannot perceive those minor variations which constitute what we call notes.

Between the highest and lowest tones on a piano, he notices a very great difference; and between the middle octave and either of the extremes, he can also observe a strong contrast. But when the notes are played in succession from one end of the keyboard to the other, he can nowhere perceive any distinct line of demarcation between one tone and its neighbor. Instead of the notes being separated sharply from one another in consciousness, like strips of colored paper arranged in prismatic order, they merge indistinguishably into one another, like the colors of the prismatic spectrum itself. To him, three successive notes are not three clearly marked individual sounds, but rather resemble three pieces of blue ribbon, so nearly alike in shade that the eye cannot tell with certainty whether they are the same or not.

This incapacity for distinguishing between tones of slightly different pitch is not, however, the same in every octave. Experiment revealed the fact that in the middle octave of an ordinary piano, my subject was able dimly to discriminate

* I have to thank my friend, Mr. G. J. Romanes, F.L.S., for kind assistance in performing most of the experiments hereafter detailed, and for affording me the use of the necessary apparatus. My acknowledgments are also due to Mr. F. Galton, F.R.S., who very kindly gave me the benefit of his advice, and helped me in the performance of one valuable experiment.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

between notes having the interval of a third from one another; that in the octaves immediately above and below the middle, the utmost power of discriminating sank to a third-and-a-half or a fourth; and that in the highest and lowest octaves it required a full seventh or more to impress his ear with the consciousness of distinct difference.

It should also be noticed that in attempting to distinguish between varying pitches he was greatly influenced by the volume of sound. Thus, on a piano, where the volume could be kept pretty constant, his discrimination was more uniform than with the human voice, where differences of intensity confused him sadly. Indeed, his judgment of pitch seemed in every case to be largely supplemented by other considerations. For instance, he could recognize the notes on a piano much better than on a violin, because in the latter instrument his attention was distracted from the pure musical effect by the scraping and twanging noises which necessarily accompany the tones. So, too, in the human voice, he was misled by those inarticulate and unmusical puffs or hisses which may be perceived along with every note. Evidently his ear is far more sensitive to these non-musical noises, relatively to pure tones, than is the case with normal persons. Thus, in the highest notes on a piano, he could hear a mere thud of the hammer, without any musical tone; and if a very shrill whistle was held close to his ear, he could only notice a puff of air, which overbore in consciousness the weak musical tone; while he could readily detect the latter when the whistle was removed to a short distance, so as to lessen the volume of the puff. This compensatory sensitiveness to indefinite noises seems to serve him in place of timbre as a means of recognizing different voices or musical instruments. A piano is, for him, a musical tone, plus a thud and a sound of wire-works; a fiddle is a musical tone, plus a scraping of resin and catgut; while an organ is a musical tone, plus a puff of air and an indistinct noise of bellows.

It might be supposed that mere carelessness of observation led to this want of musical discrimination. Such, however, is not probably the case. As a boy, my subject was trained to sing with the remainder of his family, but never succeeded in learning anything in the way of music. At sixteen, being unaware of the radical nature of his deficiency, he took regular lessons for some time, but was given up as incorrigible. Later on in life, he put himself to the trouble of learning the notes on the piano mechanically, in order to understand the theory of sound, and experimented to some extent with acoustical instruments. It was a series of observations made on the siren and Savart's wheels that first suggested to him the extent of the difference between his own auditory capabilities and those of normal individuals.

His attempts at singing, indeed, form some of the most instructive phenomena in the whole case. He will sing "God Save the Queen" with scarcely a single note correct, and even the few which coincide with the true ones seem to have come right by accident. If a scale be sung to him, and he be asked to repeat the same sounds afterwards, he will utter the articulate words "Do, re, mi," etc., but run up and down the scale in a disorderly manner, singing tones which do not stand in any musical relation whatsoever to one another.

Passing from the perception of separate tones to their effects in combination, experiments revealed the fact that a discord was no more unpleasant to him than a consonance. Though he was warned, so far as language would permit, of the sort of sound which he ought to expect in a discord, he could not perceive any of that roughness or harshness which was pointed out to him. Any two notes sounded together seemed equally agreeable to him, or, to speak more correctly, equally indifferent.

In order to test his power of discriminating between harmonies and discords, he was tried with a pair of movable organ-pipes, which could be made to produce beats of any desired frequency. It was found that when the beats were very conspicuous to an ordinary ear, he heard them readily, and distinguished them as interruptions of the sound; but when they were more frequent, he did not find them disagreeable, though he still cognized them intellectually as a blurring of the sound, which he compared to the buzzing of a bee; and when they sank to a mere discord, he could not observe the roughness at all, nor indeed could he clearly distinguish very rapidly recurring beats while still moderately audible as such to normal ears.

The natural interval of an octave does not affect him at all differently from any other interval. He can perceive no greater resemblance or congruity between C and C′, than between C and D′ or C

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

and E′. In short, the whole distinction of notes, based upon numerical ratios and their corresponding nerve-fibres, is completely lost upon him; and he can only apprehend that of pitch, based upon large absolute differences of frequency.

As regards the general capabilities of hearing, my subject does not seem to differ much from ordinary persons. Several tests, both of distance and lowness, were employed, and they resulted in a conviction that his power of distinguishing non-musical sounds is up to the average, and his hearing is unusually acute. Tried with one of Mr. Galton's little instruments for testing the limits of auditory impressions, he was able to hear notes quite as shrill and quite as low as most other people. For the resonance of a vibrating string and the ticking of a watch, he was rather beyond the average in acuteness. But he is a bad mimic of voices or dialects, and speaks French, to which he has been accustomed from childhood, with a decided English accent. However, as he is himself conscious of the two last-named facts, and can notice the badness of his own imitations, this defect lies more probably in the motor mechanism of speech than in the sensory mechanism of hearing.

With reference to the æsthetic results of these abnormalities, my subject is almost totally careless in the matter of music, for which he has no appreciation whatsoever. He recognizes a considerable number of tunes when played or sung, but he seems to do so by the time alone. Whenever a piece specially strikes him, it is a lively air from an opéra bouffe, or the rollicking chorus to an old English song in which the time is strongly marked. He is equally pleased with the piece if it is played or sung out of tune, and enjoys it just as much when he sings it himself to notes of his own composition. He can distinctly appreciate, however, the beauty of a single note, struck in isolation, and perceives its æsthetic superiority to a mere noise. He likes the sound of a full and rich tone, produced by striking a finger-glass; and he is fond of church-bells and chimes. He has also a delicate ear for metre in poetry, and is attracted by the music of Catullus, of Tennyson, and of Swinburne.

As to the hereditary aspect of the case, I have not been able personally to make observations upon other members of his family, but they have obligingly supplied me with the following particulars in answer to inquiries by letter. The father was quite unmusical, but not note-deaf, being able to distinguish between two adjacent notes on the piano, though incapable of observing any special relation between a tone and its octave.* The mother "is fond of music, vocal and instrumental, but does not sing, or play except after a poor fashion." The remoter ancestors are described as being, on the whole, markedly unmusical. Of the children, a brother was at the same stage as the father, but exceeded him in the ability to tell when a singer was out of tune. The sisters are all more or less musical, and one of them possesses a fine voice. But it is worth notice that one of my subject's sisters had no aperture in the right ear, the auditory meatus being closed by a membrane; a fact which may possibly point to some hereditary defect in the structure of the organ. Unfortunately, no operation was ever performed upon her, so that it is impossible to say whether the internal ear was normal or otherwise. On the whole, the family is described as "in this respect only very moderately gifted."

I have been careful thus to place before the reader all the facts of the case, unencumbered by any hypothetical explanations, because whatever may be the value of my theory on the subject, the facts themselves must possess a great interest for all inquirers into the nature of our sensory system. But I shall now venture to offer a few suggestions as to the possible physical deficiencies which underlie the above-noted psychical peculiarities.

Two principal explanations may be advanced. Either the deficiency may be in the peripheral organs or it may be in the nervous centres. We may examine each hypothesis separately.

If the deficiency is in the peripheral organs, we may plausibly account for it thus. While in the normal ear each one of Corti's organs may be supposed, on Helmholtz's theory, to be tuned in harmony with a very limited range of tones, — or, in objective phraseology, to be capable of vibrating sympathetically with air-waves having very nearly its own natural rate of oscillation only, — we may suppose that in the cases under consideration each one of Corti's organs is badly tuned, so that it can answer to a large number of tones — or, in objective phraseology, can vibrate sympathetically with air-waves possessing a considerable range of frequency. If this view be taken, we can understand why notes lying close to one

* His own words are, "I cannot perceive any greater likeness between the two C's than between C and B."

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

another on the gamut do not arouse differential sensations, because they would both, in that case, stimulate the same fibres; and it would be necessary to take notes whose frequencies differ widely from one another in order to stimulate separate fibres each time, and so arouse a differential sensation. Again, on the same hypothesis, we can understand why the octave is not perceived by my subject as more congruous than any other interval; because the harmonies of each note would stimulate not only the fibre ordinarily assigned to them, but also adjacent fibres, and so a fifth or a seventh would be indistinguishable from an octave. Lastly, this view accords best with the fact that my subject does not notice any superiority in a consonance over a dissonance; because, if the system of damping in Corti's organs was deficient, we may suppose that the very faint interruptions which are the cause of discord would not have sufficient duration to allow of a cessation in the vibratory motions of the organs, and these would consequently yield a continuous state of consciousness, undisturbed by that roughness which results from intermittent stimulation. The point in frequency of beats at which they ceased to be distinguishable would be, in that case, the measure of the damping powers possessed by the organs.

If, on the other hand, we assume that the deficiency exists in the nervous centres, and suppose them to be so ill-differentiated that they do not yield separate sensations for the stimulation of each separate fibre, we shall be enabled to explain all the phenomena except one, in a way that is perhaps simpler of comprehension. We may then imagine that each fibre is excited in the same manner as in normal cases, but that some ataxy of the centres prevents the stimulations from being differentially cognized. This explanation would accord well with the known phenomena of diplacusis, where a single note is heard as of different pitch by the right and left ears respectively: in which case we can hardly avoid the supposition that corresponding fibres on each side are irregularly connected with non-corresponding central ganglia. But there will still remain the difficulty — why does not a dissonance produce its ordinary unpleasant effect? I do not see how we can escape this problem, except by supposing a peripheral malformation: and as, for this particular ear, we are compelled to assume it in the one case, perhaps it is simpler to assume it as the cause in all the others.

And now I should like to point out the special bearings of this abnormality upon æsthetic questions. In the first place, the instance I have given shows how largely our æsthetic feelings may depend upon peculiarities of sensation alone, uncomplicated by emotional or intellectual differences. My subject is often "much annoyed by the imputation of bad taste" which is cast upon him whenever he says that he "does not care for music." This imputation might fairly be made if he deliberately preferred bad music to good. But, as a matter of fact, the whole sensuous basis of music is utterly blank to him. He must not be expected to admire delicate shades of expression which he literally and really cannot hear. Again, what we call bad taste means in most cases the deliberate preference for combinations which arouse low, vulgar, or commonplace emotions, over those which arouse high, sympathetic, or delicate emotions: but in my subject's case, most musical combinations can evidently rouse no emotions at all, and so he cannot fairly be credited with any kind of taste, good or bad. I believe inquiry would reveal the fact that many others are similarly situated, but do not really know the nature of their own deficiency. Such persons are very little likely to turn their attention to questions of sound; and it was the mere accident of the bent taken by his physical inquiries that led my subject to investigate his own case. There is therefore every reason why psychologists should hunt up these unmusical persons, and experiment upon them in the same manner as has been adopted in the present instance.

But while my subject is incapable of appreciating music, he can enter into all those æsthetic auditory feelings which are not based on the sensuous groundwork of harmony and discord. This is the case both as regards the pleasure derived from simple tones, the pleasure derived from metrical arrangement, and (to some slight extent) the pleasure derived from the higher undifferentiated emotional element in music. There is even a certain "compensatory" heightening of his gratification in the second of these instances at least.

First, as to simple tones. If we accept the theory of Helmholtz, that noises are heard by means of the vestibule, while musical sounds are cognized through the instrumentality of the cochlea, it will follow that the nerves in the latter portion of the ear, being less frequently stimulated than those of the former part, will give rise to more pleasurable sensations. This

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

effect we might naturally expect to remain, whatever might be the peculiarities of minor organization within the cochlea itself. And the facts in the present case exactly coincide with this supposition. All musical tones are in themselves pleasing to my subject; and he is even able to discriminate between a rich and a poor note; presumably because the former calls into action an immense number of Corti's organs, while the latter, though it probably rouses sympathetic vibrations in a larger area of those organs than would be the case in a normal ear, yet affects a smaller total of fibres than a note with numerous harmonies.

Next, as to the perception of time and metre. One constantly hears it said by persons unaccustomed to psychological analysis — that is to say, by ninety-nine out of a hundred educated men — "What a curious thing that So-and-so who writes verses, or who is so fond of poetry, should not care for music!" In reality, there is very little connection between the two sources of pleasure. The one is mainly sensuous in its ground-work, and depends upon the phenomena of harmony and discord; the other is mainly intellectual in its ground-work,* and depends partly on the fact of expectation, and partly on that of symmetrical recurrence. As my subject is unable to recognize tunes by the notes, and is consequently forced to recognize them by their time alone, his ear has been considerably trained in this direction. But the fact that the two are usually combined in music makes most people unable to distinguish analytically between them; and they consequently express great surprise when they find a capacity to appreciate the one, without the capacity to appreciate the other. Whereas, analogy would lead us to expect that a person whose attention was never distracted by tune would become unusually discriminative of delicate effects in metre. This I believe to be the case with my subject.

Finally, as to the higher emotional element in music. Mr. Herbert Spencer has shown how the emotional expression of music is derived from the emotional expression of everyday life. But it is, so to speak, the ultimate outcome of that expression, pushed to the very highest pitch of delicate discrimination. Accordingly, we cannot expect that persons with less than average auditory endowments will be sensible to more than its broadest distinctions. And this is just the amount of appreciation exhibited by my subject. He can to some extent recognize the general tone of a piece — lively, gay, bright, subdued, tender, solemn, or majestic; but he cannot recognize those minor changes of feeling which are exhibited within the limits of a uniform composition. Of course his discrimination of the prevailing tone is largely due to time and degree of loudness; but it seems also to be influenced to some extent by the general pitch of the piece, and by the alternations of high and low notes. And it is noticeable that while he cares very little or not at all for purely musical pieces, where everything depends upon that delicate distribution of harmonies which is to him an absolute blank, he is slightly affected by bright, popular tunes, in which the emotional element is pronounced, and in which rapid and striking variations keep alive the attention by the diversity of their arrangement. To put the matter simply, he understands in music only the part that is not strictly musical. And, as might be expected, he generally speaks in a rather monotonous voice, little modulated by emotional tones.

There are two other facts in connection with this case worth notice for their wider psychological bearing. The first is this: my subject seems absolutely indifferent to the vast mass of musical sounds. If he is engaged in mental work, and a German brass-band or a barrel-organ is grinding discord under his very ears, he is quite unconscious of the fact until his attention is called to it. He suffers much from headache; but even in that morbid state of nerve, when noise is so intensely painful to most of us, he "would not perceive a drum-and-fife band just outside his window unless somebody happened to notice it in speaking to him." Music, in fact, under ordinary circumstances, quite escapes his observation. The second point is the converse aspect of the same peculiarity. Whenever circumstances compel his attendance at a concert, a choral service, or a musical party, where no other occupation is possible, he suffers from the most intense ennui, which "becomes after a time almost unsupportable." The music being an absolute matter of indifference to him, the effect is the same as if he "were made to sit quietly in an attitude of attention for two or three hours, while nothing whatsoever was taking place."

In conclusion, I should like to add that if any competent physicist or physiologist wishes to verify any of the above statements, or try any further experiments, I

* I say "in its ground-work" in either case, because of course the higher effects of both are neither sensuous nor intellectual, but purely emotional.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd would endeavor to make arrangements with my subject for the purpose, on receiving a communication to that effect.

GRANT ALLEN.

From The Contemporary Review.

POSITIVISM ON AN ISLAND:

THE NEW PAUL AND VIRGINIA.

"Those who can read the signs of the times, read in them that the Kingdom of Man is at hand." — PROFESSOR CLIFFORD.

I.

THE magnificent ocean steamer, the "Australasian," was bound for England, on her homeward voyage from Melbourne. She carried her Majesty's mails and ninety-eight first-class passengers. The skies were cloudless; the sea was smooth as glass. Never did vessel start under happier auspices. No sound of sickness was to be heard anywhere; and when dinner-time came there was not a single appetite wanting.

But the passengers soon discovered they were lucky in more than weather. Dinner was hardly half over before two of those present had begun to attract general attention; and every one was wondering, in whispers, who they could possibly be.

One of the objects of this delightful curiosity was a large-boned, middle-aged man, with gleaming spectacles, and lank, untidy hair; whose coat fitted him so ill, and who held his head so high, that it was plain at a glance he was some great celebrity. The other was a beautiful lady of about thirty years of age. No one present had seen her like before. She had the fairest hair and the darkest eyebrows, the largest eyes and the smallest waist conceivable; in fact, art and nature had been struggling as to which should do the most for her; whilst her bearing was so haughty and distinguished, her glance so tender, and her dress so expensive and so fascinating, that she seemed at the same time to defy and to court attention.

Evening fell on the ship with a soft, warm witchery. The air grew purple, and the waves began to glitter in the moonlight. The passengers gathered in knots upon the deck. The distinguished strangers were still the subject of conjecture. At last the secret was discovered by the wife of an old colonial judge; and the news spread like wildfire. In a few minutes all knew that there were on board the "Australasian" no less personages than Professor Paul Darnley, and the superb Virginia St. John.

II.

MISS ST. JOHN had, for at least six years, been the most renowned woman in Europe. In Paris and St. Petersburg, no less than in London, her name was equally familiar both to princes and to potboys; the eyes of all the world were upon her. Yet, in spite of this exposed situation, scandal had proved powerless to wrong her, she defied detraction. Her enemies could but echo her friends' praise of her beauty; her friends could but confirm her enemies' description of her character. Though of birth that might be called almost humble, she had been connected with the heads of many distinguished families; and so general was the affection she inspired, and so winning the ways in which she contrived to retain it, that she found herself at the age of thirty mistress of nothing except a large fortune. She was now converted with surprising rapidity by a ritualistic priest, and she became in a few months a model of piety and devotion. She made lace trimmings for the curate's vestments; she bowed at church as often and profoundly as possible; she enjoyed nothing so much as going to confession; she learned to despise the world. Indeed, such utter dross did her riches now seem to her, that, despite all the arguments of her ghostly counsellor, she remained convinced that they were too worthless to offer to the Church, and she saw nothing for it but to still keep them for herself. The mingled humility and discretion of this resolve so won the heart of a gifted colonial bishop, then on a visit to England, that, having first assured himself that Miss St. John was sincere in making it, he besought her to share with him his humble mitre, and make him the happiest prelate in the whole Catholic Church. Miss St. John consented. The nuptials were celebrated with the most elaborate ritual, and after a short honeymoon the bishop departed for his South Pacific diocese of the Chasuble Islands, to prepare a home for his bride, who was to follow him by the next steamer.

Professor Paul Darnley, in his own walk of life, was even more renowned than Virginia had been in hers. He had written three volumes on the origin of life, which he had spent seven years in looking for in infusions of hay and cheese; he had written five volumes on the entozoa of the pig, and two volumes of lectures, as a corollary to these, on the sublimity

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

of human heroism, and the whole duty of man. He was renowned all over Europe and America as a complete embodiment of enlightened modern thought. His mind was like a sea, into which the other great minds of the age discharged themselves, and in which all the slight discrepancies of the philosophy of the present century mingled together and formed one harmonious whole. He criticised everything; he took nothing on trust except the unspeakable sublimity of the human race and its august terrestrial destinies. And in his double capacity of a seer and a savant, he had destroyed all that the world had believed in the past, and revealed to it all that it is going to feel in the future. Nor was he less successful in his own private life. He married, at the age of forty, an excellent evangelical lady, ten years his senior, who wore a green gown, grey cork-screw curls, and had a fortune of two hundred thousand pounds. Orthodox though she was, Mrs. Darnley was yet proud beyond measure of her husband's world-wide fame, for she did but imperfectly understand the grounds of it. Indeed, the only thing that marred her happiness was the single tenet of his that she had really mastered. This, unluckily, was that he disbelieved in hell. And so, as Mrs. Darnley conceived that that place was designed mainly to hold those who doubted its existence, she daily talked her utmost, and left no text unturned to convince her darling of his very dangerous error. These assiduous arguments soon began to tell. The professor grew moody and brooding, and he at last suggested to his medical man that a voyage round the world, unaccompanied by his wife, was the prescription most needed by his failing patience. Mrs. Darnley at length consented with a fairly good grace. She made her husband pledge himself that he would not be absent for above a twelvemonth, or else, she said, she should immediately come after him. She bade him the tenderest of adieus, and promised to pray till his return for his recovery of a faith in hell.

The professor, who had but exceeded his time by six months, was now on board the "Australasian," homeward bound to his wife. Virginia was outward bound to her husband.

III.

THE sensation created by the presence of these two celebrities was profound beyond description; and the passengers were never weary of watching the gleaming spectacles and the square-toed boots of the one, and the liquid eyes and the ravishing toilettes of the other. There were three curates, who, having been very quick in making Virginia's acquaintance, soon sang at nightfall with her a beautiful vesper hymn. And so lovely did the strains sound, and so devotional did Virginia look, that most of the passengers the night after joined in a repetition of this touching evening office.

The professor, as was natural, held quite aloof; and pondered over a new species of bug, which he had found very plentiful in his berth. But it soon occurred to him that he often heard the name of God being uttered otherwise than in swearing. He listened more attentively to the sounds which he had at first set down as negro-melodies; and he soon became convinced that they were something whose very existence he despised himself for remembering — namely, Christian hymns. He then thought of the three curates, whose existence he despised himself for remembering also. And the conviction rapidly dawned on him, that though the passengers seemed fully alive to his fame as a man of science, they could yet know very little of all that science had done for them; and of the death-blow it had given to the foul superstitions of the past. He therefore resolved that next day he would preach them a lay-sermon.

At the appointed time the passengers gathered eagerly round him — all but Virginia, who retired to her cabin when she saw that the preacher wore no surplice; as she thought it would be a mortal sin to listen to a sermon without one.

The professor began amidst a profound silence. He first proclaimed to his hearers the great primary axiom in which all modern thought roots itself. He told them that there was but one order of things, it was so much neater than two; and if we would be certain of anything, we must never doubt it. Thus, since countless things exist that the senses can take account of, it is evident that nothing exists that the senses cannot take account of. The senses can take no account of God; therefore God does not exist. Men of science can only see theology in a ridiculous light; therefore theology has no side that is not ridiculous. He then told them a few of the new names that enlightened thinkers had applied to the Christian Deity — how Professor Tyndall had called him an "atom-manufacturer," and Professor Huxley, a "pedantic drill-sergeant." The passengers at once saw how demon-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

strably at variance with fact was all religion, and they laughed with a sense of humor that was quite new to them. The professor's tones then became more solemn; and, having extinguished error, he proceeded to unveil the brilliant light of truth. He showed them how, viewed by modern science, all existence is a chain, with a gas at one end, and no one knows what at the other; and how humanity is a link somewhere; but, holy and awful thought! — we can none of us tell where. "However," he proceeded, "of one thing we can be quite certain: all that is, is matter; the laws of matter are eternal, and we cannot act or think without conforming to them; and if," he said, "we would be solemn, and high, and happy, and heroic, and saintly, we have but to strive and struggle to do what we cannot for an instant avoid doing. Yes," he exclaimed, "as the sublime Tyndall tells us, let us struggle to attain to a deeper knowledge of matter, and a more faithful conformity to its laws!"

The professor would have proceeded; but the weather had been rapidly growing rough, and he here became violently seasick.

"Let us," he exclaimed hurriedly, "conform to the laws of matter and go below."

Nor was the advice premature. A storm arose, exceptional in its suddenness and its fury. It raged for two days without ceasing. The "Australasian" sprang a leak; her steering gear was disabled; and it was feared she would go ashore on an island that was seen dimly through the fog to the leeward. The boats were got in readiness. A quantity of provisions and of the passengers' baggage was already stowed in the cutter; when the clouds parted, the sun came out again, and the storm subsided almost as quickly as it arose.

IV.

No sooner were the ship's damages in a fair way to be repaired than the professor resumed his sermon. He climbed into the cutter, which was still full of the passengers' baggage, and sat down on the largest of Virginia's boxes. This so alarmed Virginia that she followed the professor into the cutter, to keep an eye on her property; but she did not forget to stop her ears with her fingers, that she might not be guilty of listening to an unsurpliced minister.

The professor took up the thread of his discourse just where he had broken it off. Every circumstance favored him. The calm sea was sparkling under the gentlest breeze; all nature seemed suffused with gladness; and at two miles' distance was an enchanting island, green with every kind of foliage, and glowing with the hues of a thousand flowers. The professor, having reminded his hearers of what nonsense they now thought all the Christian teachings, went on to show them the blessed results of this. Since the God that we once called all holy is a fable, that humanity is all holy must be a fact. Since we shall never be sublime, and solemn, and unspeakably happy hereafter, it is evident that we can be sublime, and solemn, and unspeakably happy here. "This," said the professor, "is the new gospel. It is founded on exact thought. It is the gospel of the kingdom of man; and had I only here a microscope and a few chemicals, I could demonstrate its eternal truth to you. There is no heaven to seek for; there is no hell to shun. We have nothing to strive and live for except to be unspeakably happy."

This eloquence was received with enthusiasm. The captain in particular, who had a wife in every port he touched at, was overjoyed at hearing that there was no hell; and he sent for all the crew, that they might learn the good news likewise. But soon the general gladness was marred by a sound of weeping. Three-fourths of the passengers, having had time to reflect a little, began exclaiming that as a matter of fact they were really completely miserable, and that for various reasons they could never be anything else. "My friends," said the professor, quite undaunted, "that is doubtless completely true. You are not happy now; you probably never will be. But that is of little moment. Only conform faithfully to the laws of matter, and your children's children will be happy in the course of a few centuries; and you will like that far better than being happy yourselves. Only consider the matter in this light, and you yourselves will become happy also; and whatever you say, and whatever you do, think only of the effect it will have five hundred years afterwards."

At these solemn words, the anxious faces grew calm. An awful sense of the responsibility of each one of us, and the infinite consequences of every human act, was filling the hearts of all; when, by a faithful conformity to the laws of matter, the boiler blew up, and the "Australasian" went down. In an instant the air was rent with yells and cries; and all the humanity that was on board the vessel was busy, as the professor expressed it, unit-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ing itself with the infinite azure of the past. Paul and Virginia, however, floated quietly away in the cutter, together with the baggage and provisions. Virginia was made almost senseless by the suddenness of the catastrophe; and on seeing five sailors sink within three yards of her, she fainted dead away. The professor begged her not to take it so much to heart, as these were the very men who had got the cutter in readiness; "and they are therefore," he said, "still really alive in the fact of our happy escape." Virginia, however, being quite insensible, the professor turned to the last human being still to be seen above the waters, and shouted to him not to be afraid of death, as there was certainly no hell, and that his life, no matter how degraded and miserable, had been a glorious mystery, full of infinite significance. The next moment the struggler was snapped up by a shark. The cutter, meanwhile, borne by a current, had been drifting rapidly towards the island. And the professor, spreading to the breeze Virginia's beautiful lace parasol, soon brought it to the shore on a beach of the softest sand.

V.

THE scene that met Paul's eyes as he landed was one of extreme loveliness. He had run the boat ashore in a little fairy bay, full of translucent waters, and fringed with silvery sands. On either side it was protected by fantastic rocks, and in the middle it opened inland to an enchanting valley, where tall tropical trees made a grateful shade, and where the ground was carpeted with the softest moss and turf.

Paul's first care was for his fair companion. He spread a costly cashmere shawl on the beach, and placed her, still fainting, on this. In a few moments she opened her eyes; but was on the point of fainting again as the horrors of the last half-hour came back to her, when she caught sight in the cutter of the largest of her own boxes, and she began to recover herself. Paul begged her to remain quiet whilst he went to reconnoitre.

He had hardly proceeded twenty yards into the valley, when to his infinite astonishment he came on a charming cottage, built under the shadow of a bread-tree, with a broad verandah, plate-glass windows, and red window-blinds. His first thought was that this could be no desert island at all, but some happy European settlement. But on approaching the cottage, it proved to be quite untenanted, and from the cobwebs woven across the doorway it seemed to have been long abandoned. Inside there was abundance of luxurious furniture; the floors were covered with gorgeous Indian carpets; and there was a pantry well stocked with plate and glass and table-linen. The professor could not tell what to make of it, till, examining the structure more closely, he found it composed mainly of a ship's timbers. This seemed to tell its own tale; and he at once concluded that he and Virginia were not the first castaways who had been forced to make the island for some time their dwelling-place.

Overjoyed at this discovery, the professor hastened back to Virginia. She was by this time quite recovered, and was kneeling on the cashmere shawl, with a rosary in her hands designed especially for the use of Anglo-Catholics, and was alternately lifting up her eyes in gratitude to heaven, and casting them down in anguish at her torn and crumpled dress. The poor professor was horrified at the sight of a human being in this degrading attitude of superstition. But as Virginia quitted it with alacrity as soon as ever he told his news to her, he hoped he might soon convert her into a sublime and holy utilitarian. The first thing she besought him to do was to carry her biggest box to this charming cottage, that she might change her clothes, and appear in something fit to be seen in. The professor most obligingly at once did as she asked him; and whilst she was busy at her toilette, he got from the cutter what provisions he could, and proceeded to lay the table. When all was ready, he rang a gong which he found suspended in the lobby; Virginia appeared shortly in a beautiful pink dressing-gown, embroidered with silver flowers; and just before sunset, the two sat down to a really excellent meal. The bread-tree at the door of the cottage contributed some beautiful French rolls; close at hand also they discovered a butter-tree; and the professor had produced from the cutter a variety of salt and potted meats, pâté de foie gras, cakes, preserved fruit, and some bottles of fine champagne. This last helped much to raise their spirits. Virginia found it very dry, and exactly suited to her palate. She had but drunk five glasses of it, when her natural smile returned to her, though she was much disappointed because Paul took no notice of her dressing-gown; and when she had drunk three glasses more, she quietly went to sleep on the sofa.

The moon had by this time risen in dazzling splendor; and the professor went out and lighted a cigar. All during dinner there had been a feeling of dull despair in

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

his heart, which even the champagne did not dissipate. But now, as he surveyed in the moonlight the wondrous paradise in which his strange fate had cast him, his mood changed. The air was full of the scents of a thousand night-smelling flowers; the sea murmured on the beach in soft, voluptuous cadences. The professor's cigar was excellent. He now saw his situation in a truer light. Here was a bountiful island, where earth unbidden brought forth all her choicest fruits; and most of the luxuries of civilization had already been wafted thither. Existence here seemed to be purified from all its evils. Was not this the very condition of things which all the sublimest and exactest thinkers of modern times had been dreaming and lecturing and writing books about for a good half-century? Here was a place where humanity could do justice to itself, and realize those glorious destinies which all exact thinkers take for granted must be in store for it. True, from the mass of humanity he was completely cut away; but Virginia was his companion. Holiness, and solemnity, and unspeakably significant happiness, did not, he argued, depend on the multiplication table. He and Virginia represented humanity as well as a million couples. They were a complete humanity in themselves, and humanity in a perfectible shape; and the very next day they would make preparations for fulfilling their holy destiny, and being as solemnly and unspeakably happy as it was their stern duty to be. The professor turned his eyes upwards to the starry heavens; and a sense came over him of the eternity and the immensity of nature, and the demonstrable absence of any intelligence that guided it. These reflections naturally brought home to him with more vividness the stupendous and boundless importance of man. His bosom swelled violently; and he cried aloud, his eyes still fixed on the firmament, "Oh, important All! oh, important Me!"

When he came back to the cottage, he found Virginia just getting off the sofa, and preparing to go off to bed. She was too sleepy even to say good-night to him, and with evident want of temper was tugging at the buttons of her dressing-gown. "Ah," she murmured as she left the room, "if God, in his infinite mercy, had only spared my maid!"

Virginia's evident discontent gave profound pain to Paul. "How solemn," he exclaimed, "for half humanity to be discontented!" But he was still more disturbed at the appeal to a chimerical manufacturer of atoms; and he exclaimed, in yet more sorrowful tones, "How solemn for half humanity to be sunk lower than the beasts by superstition!"

However, he hoped that these stupendous evils might, under the present favorable conditions, vanish in the course of a few days' progress; and he went to bed, full of august auguries.

VI.

Next morning he was up betimes; and the prospects of humanity looked more glorious than ever. He gathered some of the finest pats from the butter-tree, and some fresh French rolls from the bread-tree. He discovered a cow close at hand, that allowed him at once to milk it; and a little roast pig ran up to him out of the underwood, and fawning on him with its trotters, said, "Come, eat me." The professor vivisected it before Virginia's door, that its automatic noise, which the vulgar call cries of pain, might awaken her; and he then set it in a hot dish on the table.

"It has come! it has come!" he shouted rapturously, as Virginia entered the room, this time in a blue silk dressing-gown, embroidered with flowers of gold.

"What has come?" said Virginia pettishly, for she was suffering from a terrible headache, and the professor's loud voice annoyed her. "You don't mean to say that we are rescued, are we?"

"Yes," answered Paul solemnly; "we are rescued from all the pains and imperfections of a world that has not learned how to conform to the laws of matter, and is but imperfectly acquainted with the science of sociology. It is therefore inevitable that, the evils of existence being thus removed, we shall both be solemnly, stupendously, and unspeakably happy."

"Nonsense!" said Virginia snappishly, who thought the professor was joking.

"It is not nonsense," said the professor. "It is deducible from the teachings of John Stuart Mill, of Auguste Comte, of Mr. Frederic Harrison, and of all the exact thinkers who have cast off superstition, and who adore humanity."

Virginia meanwhile ate pâté de foie gras, of which she was passionately fond; and, growing a little less sullen, she at last admitted that they were lucky in having at least the necessaries of life left to them. "But as for happiness — there is nothing to do here, there is no church to go to, and you don't seem to care a bit for my dressing-gown. What have we got to make us happy?"

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

"Humanity," replied the professor eagerly, — "humanity, that divine entity, which is of course capable of everything that is fine and invaluable, and is the object of indescribable emotion to all exact thinkers. And what is humanity?" he went on more earnestly, "you and I are humanity — you and I are that august existence. You already are all the world to me; and I very soon shall be all the world to you. Adored being, it will be my mission and my glory to compel you to live for me. And then, as modern philosophy can demonstrate, we shall both of us be significantly and unspeakably happy."

For a few moments Virginia merely stared at Paul. Suddenly she turned quite pale, her lips quivered, and exclaiming, "How dare you! — and I, too, the wife of a bishop!" she left the room in hysterics.

The professor could make nothing of this. Though he had dissected many dead women, he knew very little of the hearts of live ones. A sense of shyness overpowered him. He felt embarrassed, he could not tell why, at being thus left alone with Virginia. He lit a cigar, and went out. Here was a to-do indeed, he thought. How would progress be possible if one half of humanity misunderstood the other?

He was thus musing, when suddenly a voice startled him; and in another moment a man came rushing up to him, with every demonstration of joy.

"Oh, my dear master! oh, emancipator of the human intellect! and is it indeed you? Thank God! — I beg pardon for my unspeakable blasphemy — I mean, thank circumstances over which I have no control."

It was one of the three curates, whom Paul had supposed drowned, but who now related how he had managed to swim ashore, despite the extreme length of his black clerical coat. "These rags of superstition," he said, "did their best to drown me. But I survive in spite of them, to covet truth and to reject error. Thanks to your glorious teaching," he went on, looking reverentially into the professor's face, "the very notion of an almighty Father makes me laugh consumedly, it is so absurd and so immoral. Science, through your instrumentality, has opened my eyes. I am now an exact thinker."

"Do you believe," said Paul, "in solemn, significant, and unspeakably happy humanity?"

"I do," said the curate fervently. "Whenever I think of humanity, I groan and moan to myself out of sheer solemnity."

"Then two-thirds of humanity," said the professor, "are thoroughly enlightened. Progress will now go on smoothly."

At this moment Virginia came out, having rapidly recovered composure at the sound of a new man's voice.

"You here — you too!" exclaimed the curate. "How solemn, how significant! This is truly providential — I mean this has truly happened through conformity to the laws of matter."

"Well," said Virginia, "since we have a clergyman amongst us, we shall perhaps be able to get on."

VII.

THINGS now took a better turn. The professor ceased to feel shy; and proposed, when the curate had finished an enormous breakfast, that they should go down to the cutter and bring up the things in it to the cottage. "A few hours' steady progress," he said, "and the human race will command all the luxuries of civilization — the glorious fruits of centuries of onward labor."

The three spent a very busy morning in examining and unpacking the luggage. The professor found his favorite collection of modern philosophers; Virginia found a large box of knickknacks, with which to adorn the cottage; and there was, too, an immense store of wine and of choice provisions.

"It is rather sad," sighed Virginia, as she dived into a box of French chocolate creams, "to think that all the poor people are drowned that these things belonged to."

"They are not dead," said the professor: "they still live on this holy and stupendous earth. They live in the use we are making of all they had got together. The owner of those chocolate creams is immortal because you are eating them."

Virginia licked her lips, and said, "Nonsense!"

"It is not nonsense," said the professor. "It is the religion of humanity."

All day they were busy, and the time passed pleasantly enough. Wines, provisions, books, and china ornaments were carried up to the cottage and bestowed in proper places. Virginia filled the glasses in the drawing-room with gorgeous leaves and flowers; and declared by the evening, as she looked round her, that she could almost fancy herself in St. John's Wood.

"See," said the professor, "how rapid is the progress of material civilization!

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Humanity is now entering on the fruits of ages. Before long it will be in a position to be unspeakably happy."

Virginia retired to bed early. The professor took the curate out with him to look at the stars; and promised to lend him some writings of the modern philosophers, which would make him more perfect in the new view of things. They said good-night, murmuring together that there was certainly no God, that humanity was very important, and that everything was very solemn.

VIII.

NEXT morning the curate began studying a number of essays that the professor lent him, all written by exact thinkers, who disbelieved in God, and thought humanity adorable and most important. Virginia lay on the sofa, and sighed over one of Miss Broughton's novels; and it occurred to the professor that the island was just the place where, if anywhere, the missing link might be found.

"Ah!" he exclaimed; "all is still progress. Material progress came to an end yesterday. Mental progress has begun to-day. One third of humanity is cultivating sentiment; another third is learning to covet truth. I, the remaining and most enlightened third, will go and seek it. Glorious, solemn humanity! I will go and look about for its arboreal ancestor."

Every step the professor took he found the island more beautiful. But he came back to luncheon, having been unsuccessful in his search. Events had marched quickly in his absence. Virginia was at the beginning of her third volume; and the curate had skimmed over so many essays, that he professed himself able to give a thorough account of the want of faith that was in him.

After luncheon the three sat together in easy-chairs, in the verandah, sometimes talking, sometimes falling into a half-doze. They all agreed that they were wonderfully comfortable, and the professor said, —

"All humanity is now at rest, and in utter peace. It is just taking breath, before it becomes unspeakably and significantly happy."

He would have said more, but he was here startled by a piteous noise of crying, and the three found themselves confronted by an old woman, dripping with sea-water, and with an expression on her face of the utmost misery. They soon recognized her as one of the passengers on the ship. She told them how she had been floated ashore on a spar, and how she had been sustained by a little roast pig, that kindly begged her to eat it, having first lain in her bosom to restore her to warmth. She was now looking for her son.

"And if I cannot find him," said the old woman, "I shall never smile again. He has half broken my heart," she went on, "by his wicked ways. But if I thought he was dead — dead in the midst of his sins — it would be broken altogether; for in that case he must certainly be in hell."

"Old woman," said the professor, very slowly and solemnly, "be comforted. I announce to you that your son is alive."

"Oh, bless you, sir, for that word!" cried the old woman. "But where is he? Have you seen him? Are you sure that he is living?"

"I am sure of it," said the professor, "because enlightened thought shows me that he cannot be anything else. It is true that I saw him sink for a third time in the sea, and that he was then snapped up by a shark. But he is as much alive as ever in his posthumous activities. He has made you wretched after him; and that is his future life. Become an exact thinker, and you will see that this is so. Old woman," added the professor solemnly, "you are your son in hell."

At this the old woman flew into a terrible rage.

"In hell, sir!" she exclaimed; "me in hell! — a poor, lone woman like me! How dare you!" And she sank back in a chair and fainted.

"Alas!" said the professor, "thus is misery again introduced into the world. A fourth part of humanity is now miserable."

The curate answered promptly that if no restoratives were given her, she would probably die in a few minutes. "And to let her die," he said, "is clearly our solemn duty. It will be for the greatest happiness of the greatest number."

"No," said the professor; "for our sense of pity would then be wounded, and the happiness of all of us would be marred by that."

"Excuse me," said the curate; "but exact thought shows me that pity for others is but the imagining of their misfortune falling on ourselves. Now, we can none of us imagine ourselves exactly in the old woman's case; therefore it is quite impossible that we can pity her."

"But," said the professor, "such an act would violate our ideas of justice."

"You are wrong again," said the curate;

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

"for exact thought shows me that the love of justice is nothing but the fear of suffering injustice. If we were to kill strong men, we might naturally fear that strong men would kill us. But whatever we do to fainting old women, we cannot expect that fainting old women will do anything to us in return."

"Your reasoning cannot be sound," said the professor; "for it would lead to the most horrible conclusions. I will solve the difficulty better. I will make the old woman happy, and therefore fit to live. Old woman," he exclaimed, "you are yourself by your own unhappiness expiating your son's sins. Do but think of that, and you will become unspeakably happy."

Meanwhile, however, the old woman had died. When the professor discovered this he was somewhat shocked; but at length with a sudden change of countenance, "We neither of us did it," he exclaimed; "her death is no act of ours. It is part of the eternal not-ourselves that makes for righteousness — righteousness, which is, as we all know, but another name for happiness. Let us adore the event with reverence."

"Yes," said the curate, "we are well rid of her. She was an immoral old woman; for happiness is the test of morality, and she was very unhappy."

"On the contrary," said the professor, "she was a moral old woman; for she has made us happy by dying so very opportunely. Let us speak well of the dead. Her death has been a holy and a blessed one. She has conformed to the laws of matter. Thus is unhappiness destined to fade out of the world. Quick! let us tie a bag of shot to all the sorrow and evil of humanity, which, after all, is only a fourth part of it; and let us sink her in the bay close at hand, that she may catch lobsters for us."

IX.

"At last," said the professor, as they began dinner that evening, "the fulness of time has come. All the evils of humanity are removed, and progress has come to an end because it can go no further. We have nothing now to do, but to be unspeakably and significantly happy."

The champagne flowed freely. Our friends ate and drank of the best, their spirits rose; and Virginia admitted that this was really "jolly." The sense of the word pleased the professor, but its sound seemed below the gravity of the occasion; so he begged her to say "sublime" instead. "We can make it mean," he said, "just the same, but we prefer it for the sake of its associations."

It soon, however, occurred to him that eating and drinking were hardly delights sufficient to justify the highest state of human emotion; and he began to fear he had been feeling sublime prematurely; but in another moment he recollected he was an altruist, and that the secret of their happiness was not that any one of them was happy, but that they each knew the others were.

"Yes, my dear curate," said the professor, "what I am enjoying is the champagne that you drink, and what you are enjoying is the champagne that I drink. This is altruism; this is benevolence; this is the sublime outcome of enlightened modern thought. The pleasures of the table, in themselves, are low and beastly ones; but if we each of us are only glad because the others are enjoying them, they become holy and glorious beyond description."

"They do," cried the curate rapturously, "indeed they do! I will drink another bottle for your sake. It is sublime!" he said, as he tossed off three glasses. "It is significant!" he said, as he finished three more. "Tell me, my dear, do I look significant?" he added, as he turned to Virginia, and suddenly tried to crown the general bliss by kissing her.

Virginia started back, looking fire and fury at him. The professor was completely astounded by an occurrence so unnatural, and exclaimed in a voice of thunder, "Morality, sir, — remember morality! How dare you upset that which Professor Huxley tells us must be forever strong enough to hold its own?"

But the last glass of champagne had put the curate beyond the reach of exact thought. He tumbled under the table, and the professor carried him off to bed.

X.

The professor, like most serious thinkers, knew but little of that trifle commonly called "the world." He had never kissed any one except his wife; even that he did as seldom as possible; and the curate lying dead drunk was the first glimpse he had of what, par excellence, is called "life." But though the scene just described was thus a terrible shock to him, in one way it gave him an unlooked-for comfort. He felt that even yet things were not quite as sublime as they should be. He now saw the reason. "Of course," he said, "existence cannot be perfect, so long as one-third of humanity

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

makes a beast of itself. A little more progress is still necessary."

He hastened to explain this next morning to Virginia, and begged her not to be alarmed at the curate's scandalous conduct. "Immorality," he said, "is but a want of success in attaining our own happiness. It is evidently most immoral for the curate to be kissing you; and therefore kissing you would not really conduce to his happiness. I will convince him of this solemn truth in a very few moments. Then the essential dignity of human nature will become at once apparent, and we shall all of us at last begin to be unspeakably happy."

The curate, however, altogether declined to be convinced. He maintained stoutly that to kiss Virginia would be the greatest pleasure that humanity could offer him. "And if it is immoral as well as pleasant," he added, "I should like it all the better."

At this the professor gave a terrible groan; he dropped almost fainting into a chair; he hid his face in his hands; and murmured half-articulately, "Then I can't tell what to do!" In another instant, however, he recovered himself; he fixed a dreadful look on the curate, and said, "That last statement of yours cannot be true; for if it were, it would upset all my theories. It is a fact that can be proved and verified, that if you kissed Virginia it would make you miserable."

"Pardon me," said the curate, rapidly moving towards her, "your notion is a remnant of superstition; I will explode it by a practical experiment."

The professor caught hold of the curate's coat-tails, and forcibly pulled him back into his seat.

"If you dare attempt it," he said, "I will kick you soundly, and, shocking, immoral man! you will feel miserable enough then."

The curate was a terrible coward, and very weak as well. "You are a great hulking fellow," he said, eyeing the professor; "and I am of a singularly delicate build. I must, therefore, conform to the laws of matter, and give in." He said this in a very sulky voice; and, going out of the room, slammed the door after him.

A radiant expression suffused the face of the professor. "See," he said to Virginia, "the curate's conversion is already half accomplished. In a few hours more he will be rational, he will be moral, he will be solemnly and significantly happy."

The professor talked like this to Virginia the whole morning; but in spite of all his arguments she declined to be comforted. "It is all very well," she said, "whilst you are in the way. But as soon as your back is turned, I know he will be at me again."

"Will you never," said Paul, by this time a little irritated, "will you never listen to exact thought? The curate is now reflecting; and a little reflection must inevitably convince him that he does not really care to kiss you, and that it would give him very little real pleasure to do so."

"Stuff!" exclaimed Virginia, with a sudden vigor at which the professor was thunderstruck. "I can tell you," she went on, "that better men than he have borne kicks for my sake; and to kiss me is the only thing that that little man cares about. What shall I do!" she exclaimed, bursting into tears. "Here is one of you insulting me by trying to kiss me; and the other insulting me by saying that I am not worth being kissed!"

"Ah me!" groaned the poor professor in an agony, "here is one-third of humanity plunged in sorrow; and another third has not yet freed itself from vice. When, when will sublimity begin?"

XI.

At dinner, however, things wore a more promising aspect. The curate had been so terrified by the professor's threats, that he hardly dared to so much as look at Virginia; and to make up for it, he drank an unusual quantity of champagne, which soon set him laughing and chattering at a rate that was quite extraordinary. Virginia, seeing herself thus neglected by the curate, began to fear that, as Paul said, he really did not so much care to kiss her after all. She, therefore, put on all her most enticing ways; she talked, flirted, and smiled her best, and made her most effective eyes, that the curate might see what a prize was forever beyond his reach.

Paul thought the state of affairs full of glorious promise. Virginia's tears were dried, she had never looked so radiant and exquisite before. The curate had foregone every attempt to kiss Virginia, and yet he seemed happiness itself. The professor took the latter aside, as soon as the meal was over, to congratulate him on the holy state to which exact thought had conducted him. "You see," he said, "what a natural growth the loftiest morality is. Virginia doesn't want to be kissed by you. I should be shocked at your doing so shocking a thing as kissing her. If you kissed her, you would make both of us miserable; and, as a necessary conse-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

quence, you would be in an agony likewise; in addition to which, I should inevitably kick you."

"But," said the curate, "suppose I kissed Virginia on the sly, — I merely put this as an hypothesis, remember, — and that in a little while she liked it, what then? She and I would both be happy; and you ought to be happy too, because we were."

"Idiot!" said the professor. "Virginia is another man's wife. Nobody really likes kissing another man's wife; nor do wives ever like kissing any one except their husbands. What they really like is what Professor Huxley calls 'the undefined but bright ideal of the highest good,' which, as he says, exact thought shows us is the true end of existence. But, pooh! what is the use of all this talking? You know which way your higher nature calls you; and, of course, unless men believe in God, they cannot help obeying their higher nature."

"I," said the curate, "think the belief in God a degrading superstition; I think every one an imbecile who believes a miracle possible. And yet I do not care two straws about the highest good. What you call my lower nature is far the strongest; I mean to follow it to the best of my ability; and I prefer calling it my higher, for the sake of the associations."

This plunged the professor in deeper grief than ever. He knew not what to do. He paced up and down the verandah, or about the rooms, and moaned and groaned as if he had a violent toothache. Virginia and the curate asked what was amiss with him. "I am agonizing," he said, "for the sake of holy, solemn, unspeakably dignified humanity."

The curate, seeing the professor thus dejected, by degrees took heart again; and as Virginia still continued her fascinating behavior to him, he resolved to try and prove to her that, the test of morality being happiness, the most moral thing she could do would be to allow him to kiss her. No sooner had he begun to propound these views, than the professor gave over his groaning, seized the curate by the collar, and dragged him out of the room with a roughness that nearly throttled him.

"I was but propounding a theory — an opinion," gasped the curate. "Surely thought is free. You will not persecute me for my opinions?"

"It is not for your opinions," said the professor, "but for the horrible effect they might have. We can only tolerate opinions that have no possible consequence. You may promulgate any of those as much as you like; because to do that would be a self-regarding action."

XII.

"Well," said the curate, "if I may not kiss Virginia, I will drink brandy instead. That will make me happy enough; and then we shall all be radiant."

He soon put his resolve into practice. He got a bottle of brandy, he sat himself down under a palm-tree, and told the professor he was going to make an afternoon of it.

"Foolish man!" said the professor; "I was never drunk myself, it is true; but I know that to get drunk makes one's head ache horribly. To get drunk is, therefore, horribly immoral; and therefore I cannot permit it."

"Excuse me," said the curate; "it is a self-regarding action. Nobody's head will ache but mine; so that is my own lookout. I have been expelled from school, from college, and from my first curacy for drinking. So I know well enough the balance of pains and pleasures."

Here he pulled out his brandy-bottle, and applied his lips to it.

"Oh, humanity!" he exclaimed, "how solemn this brandy tastes!"

Matters went on like this for several days. The curate was too much frightened to again approach Virginia. Virginia at last became convinced that he did not care about kissing her. Her vanity was wounded, and she became sullen; and this made the professor sullen also. In fact, two-thirds of humanity were overcast with gloom. The only happy section of it was the curate, who alternately smoked and drank all day long.

"The nasty little beast!" said Virginia to the professor; "he is nearly always drunk. I am beginning quite to like you, Paul, by comparison with him. Let us turn him out, and not let him live in the cottage."

"No," said the professor; "for he is one-third of humanity. You do not properly appreciate the solidarity of mankind. His existence, however, I admit is a great difficulty."

One day at dinner, however, Paul came in radiant.

"Oh holy, oh happy event!" he exclaimed; "all will go right at last."

Virginia inquired anxiously what had happened, and Paul informed her that the curate, who had got more drunk than usual that afternoon, had fallen over a cliff, and been dashed to pieces.

"What event," he asked, "could be

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

more charming — more unspeakably holy? It bears about it every mark of sanctity. It is for the greatest happiness of the greatest number. Come," he continued, "let us begin our love-feast. Let us each seek the happiness of the other. Let us instantly be sublime and happy."

XIII.

"Let us prepare ourselves," said Paul solemnly, as they sat down to dinner, "for realizing to the full the essential dignity of humanity — that grand être, which has come, in the course of progress, to consist of you and me. Every condition of happiness that modern thinkers have dreamed of is now fulfilled. We have but to seek each the happiness of the other, and we shall both be in a solemn, a significant, and unspeakable state of rapture. See, here is an exquisite leg of mutton. I," said Paul, who like the fat best, "will give up all the fat to you."

"And I," said Virginia resignedly, "will give up all the lean to you."

A few mouthfuls made Virginia feel sick. "I confess," said she, "I can't get on with this fat."

"I confess," the professor answered, "I don't exactly like this lean."

"Then let us," said Virginia, "be like Jack Sprat and his wife."

"No," said the professor meditatively, "that is quite inadmissible. For in that case we should be egoistic hedonists. However, for to-day it shall be as you say. I will think of something better to-morrow."

Next day he and Virginia had a chicken apiece; only Virginia's was put before Paul, and Paul's before Virginia; and they each walked round the table to supply each other with the slightest necessaries.

"Ah!" cried Paul, "this is altruism indeed. I think already I can feel the sublimity beginning."

Virginia liked this rather better. But soon she committed the sin of taking for herself the liver of Paul's chicken. As soon as she had eaten the whole of it, her conscience began to smite her. She confessed her sin to Paul, and inquired, with some anxiety, if he thought she would go to hell for it. "Metaphorically," said Paul, "you have already done so. You are punished by the loss of the pleasure you would have had in giving that liver to me, and also by your knowledge of my knowledge of your folly in foregoing the pleasure."

Virginia was much relieved by this answer; she at once took several more of the professor's choicest bits, and was happy in the thought that her sins were expiated in the very act of their commission, by the latent pain she felt persuaded they were attended by. Feeling that this was sufficient, she took care not to add Paul's disapproval to her punishment, so she never told him again.

For a short time this practise of altruism seemed to Virginia to have many advantages. But though the professor was always exclaiming, "How significant is human life by the very nature of its constitution!" she very soon found it a trifle dull. Luckily, however, she hit upon a new method of exercising morality, and, as the professor fully admitted, of giving it a yet more solemn significance.

The professor having by some accident lost his razors, his moustaches had begun to grow profusely; and Virginia had watched them with a deep, but half-conscious admiration. At last, in a happy moment, she exclaimed, "Oh, Paul! do let me wax the ends for you." Paul at first giggled, blushed, and protested, but as Virginia assured him it would make her happy, he consented. "Then," she said, "you will know that I am happy, and that in return will make you happy also. Ah!" she exclaimed when the operation was over, "do go and examine yourself in the glass. I declare you look exactly like Jack Barley — Barley Sugar, as we used to call him — of the Blues."

Virginia smiled; suddenly she blushed; the professor blushed also. To cover the blushes she begged to be allowed to do his hair. "It will make me so much happier, Paul," she said. The professor again assented, that he might make Virginia happy, and that she might be happy in knowing that he was happy in promoting her happiness. At last the professor, shy and awkward as he was, was emboldened to offer to do Virginia's hair in return. She allowed him to arrange her fringe, and as she found he did no great harm to it, she let him repeat the operation as often as he liked.

A week thus passed, full, as the professor said, of infinite solemnity. "I admit, Paul," sighed Virginia, "that this altruism, as you call it, is very touching. I like it very much. But," she added, sinking her voice to a whisper, "are you quite sure, Paul, that it is perfectly moral?"

"Moral!" echoed the professor, "moral! Why exact thought shows us that it is the very essence of all morality!"

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

XIV.

MATTERS now went on charmingly. All existence seemed to take a richer coloring, and there was something, Paul said, which, in Professor Tyndall's words, "gave fulness and tone to it, but which he could neither analyze nor comprehend." But at last a change came. One morning, whilst Virginia was arranging Paul's moustaches, she was frightened almost into a fit by a sudden apparition at the window. It was a hideous, hairy figure, perfectly naked but for a band of silver which it wore round its neck. For a moment it did nothing but grin and stare; then it flung into Virginia's lap a filthy piece of carrion, and in an instant it had bounded away with an almost miraculous activity.

Virginia screamed with disgust and terror, and clung to Paul's knees for protection. He seemed unmoved and preoccupied. All at once, to her intense surprise, she saw his face light up with an expression of triumphant eagerness. "The missing link!" he exclaimed, "the missing link at last! Thank God! — I beg pardon for my unspeakable blasphemy — I mean, thank circumstances over which I have no control. I must this instant go out and hunt for it. Give me some provisions in a knapsack, for I will not come back till I have caught it."

This was a fearful blow to Virginia. She fell at Paul's feet weeping, and besought him in piteous accents that he would not thus abandon her.

"I must," said the professor solemnly; "for I am going in pursuit of truth. To arrive at truth is man's perfect and most rapturous happiness. You must surely know that, even if I have forgotten to tell it to you. To pursue truth — holy truth for holy truth's sake — is a more solemn pleasure than even frizzling your hair."

"Oh," cried Virginia hysterically, "I don't care two straws for truth. What on earth is the good of it?"

"It is its own end," said the professor. "It is its own exceeding great reward. I must be off at once in search of it. Good-bye for the present. Seek truth on your own account, and be unspeakably happy also, because you know that I am seeking it."

The professor remained away for three days. For the first two of them Virginia was inconsolable. She wandered about mournfully with her head dejected. She very often sighed; she very often uttered the name of Paul. At last she surprised herself by exclaiming aloud to the irresponsive solitude, "Oh, Paul, until you were gone, I never knew how passionately I loved you!" No sooner were these words out of her mouth than she stood still, horror-stricken. "Alas!" she cried, "and have I really come to this! I am in a state of deadly sin, and there is no priest here to confess to! I must conquer my forbidden love as best I may. But, ah me, what a guilty thing I am!"

As she uttered these words, her eyes fell on a tin box of the professor's, marked "Private," which he always kept carefully locked, and which had before now excited her curiosity. Suddenly she became conscious of a new impulse. "I will pursue truth!" she exclaimed. "I will break that box open, and I will see what is inside it. Ah!" she added, as with the aid of the poker she at last wrenched off the padlock, "Paul may be right after all. There is more interest in the pursuit of truth than I thought there was."

The box was full of papers, letters, and diaries, the greater part of which were marked "Strictly private." Seeing this, Virginia's appetite for truth became keener than ever. She instantly began her researches. The more she read, the more eager she became; and the more private appeared the nature of the documents, the more insatiable did her thirst for truth grow. To her extreme surprise, she gathered that the professor had begun life as a clergyman. There were several photographs of him in his surplice; and a number of devout prayers, apparently composed by himself for his own personal use. This discovery was the result of her labors.

"Certainly," she said, "it is one of extreme significance. If Paul was a priest once, he must be a priest now. Orders are indelible — at least in the Church of England I know they are."

XV.

PAUL came back, to Virginia's extreme relief, without the missing link. But he was still radiant in spite of his failure; for he had discovered, he said, a place where the creature had apparently slept, and he had collected in a card-paper box a large number of its parasites.

"I am glad," said Virginia, "that you have not found the missing link; though as to thinking that we really came from monkeys, of course that is too absurd. Now if you could have brought me a nice monkey, I should really have liked that. The bishop has promised that I shall have a darling one, if I ever reach him — ah me!

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

if —— Paul," continued Virginia, in a very solemn voice, after a long pause, "do you know that whilst you have been away I have been pursuing truth? I rather liked it; and I found it very, very significant."

"Oh, joy!" exclaimed the professor. "Oh, unspeakable radiance! Oh holy, oh esentially dignified humanity! it will very soon be perfect! Tell me, Virginia, what truths have you been discovering?"

"One truth about you, Paul," said Virginia very gravely, "and one truth about me. I burn — oh, I burn to tell them to you!"

The professor was enraptured to hear that one-half of humanity had been studying human nature; and he began asking Virginia if her discoveries belonged to the domain of historical or biological science. Meanwhile Virginia had flung herself on her knees before him, and was exclaiming in piteous accents,—

"By my fault, by my own fault, by my very grievous fault, holy father, I confess to you ——"

"Is the woman mad?" cried the professor, starting up from his seat.

"You are a priest, Paul," said Virginia; "that is one of the things I have discovered. I am in a state of deadly sin; that is the other; and I must and will confess to you. Once a priest, always a priest. You cannot get rid of your orders, and you must and shall hear me."

"I was once in orders, it is true," said Paul reluctantly; "but how did you find out my miserable secret?"

"In my zeal for truth," said Virginia, "I broke open your tin box; I read all your letters; I looked at your early photographs; I saw all your beautiful prayers."

"You broke open my box!" cried the professor. "You read my letters and my private papers! Oh, horrible! oh, immoral! What shall we do if half humanity has no feeling of honor?"

"Oh," said Virginia, "it was all for the love of truth — of solemn and holy truth. I sacrificed every other feeling for that. But I have not told you my truth yet; and I am determined you shall hear it, or I must still remain in my sins. Paul, I am a married woman; and I discover, in spite of that, that I have fallen in love with you. My husband, it is true, is far away; and, whatever we do, he could never possibly be the wiser. But I am in a state of mortal sin, nevertheless; and I would give anything in the world if you would only kiss me."

"Woman!" exclaimed Paul, aghast with fright and horror, "do you dare to abuse truth, by turning it to such base purposes?"

"Oh, you are so clever," Virginia went on, "and when the ends of your moustaches are waxed, you look positively handsome; and I love you so deeply and so tenderly, that I shall certainly go to hell if you do not give me absolution."

At this the professor jumped up, and, staring very hard at Virginia, asked her if, after all that he had said on the ship, she really believed in such exploded fallacies as hell, God, and priestcraft.

She reminded him that he had preached there without a surplice, and that she had therefore not thought it right to listen to a word he said.

"Ah," cried the professor, with a sigh of intense relief, "I see it all now. How can humanity ever be unspeakably holy so long as one-half of it grovels in dreams of an unspeakably holy God? As Mr. Frederic Harrison truly says, a want of faith in 'the essential dignity of man is one of the surest marks of the enervating influence of this dream of a celestial glory.'" The professor accordingly redelivered to Virginia the entire substance of his lectures in the ship. He fully impressed on her that all the intellect of the world was on the side of humanity; and that God's existence could be disproved with a box of chemicals. He was agreeably surprised at finding her not at all unwilling to be convinced, and extremely unexacting in her demands for proof. In a few days, she had not a remnant of superstition left. "At last!" exclaimed the professor; "it has come at last! Unspeakable happiness will surely begin now."

XVI.

No one now could possibly be more emancipated than Virginia. She tittered all day long, and whenever the professor asked her why, she always told him she was thinking of "an intelligent First Cause," a conception which she said "was really quite killing." But when her first burst of intellectual excitement was over, she became more serious. "All thought, Paul," she said, "is valuable mainly because it leads to action. Come, my love, my dove, my beauty, and let us kiss each other all day long. Let us enjoy the charming license which exact thought shows us we shall never be punished for."

This was a result of freedom that the professor had never bargained for. He could not understand it; "because," he argued, "if people were to reason in that

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

way, morality would at once cease to be possible." But he had seen so much of the world lately, that he soon recovered himself; and, recollecting that immorality was only ignorance, he began to show Virginia where her error lay — her one remaining error. "I perceive," he said, "that you are ignorant of one of the greatest triumphs of exact thought — the distinction it has established between the lower and the higher pleasures. Philosophers, who have thought the whole thing over in their studies, have become sure that as soon as the latter are presented to men they will at once leave all and follow them."

"They must be very nice pleasures," said Virginia, "if they would make me leave kissing you for the sake of them."

"They are nice," said the professor. "They are the pleasures of the imagination, the intellect, and the glorious apprehension of truth. Compared with these, kissing me would be quite insipid. Remain here for a moment, whilst I go to fetch something; and you shall then begin to taste them."

In a few moments Paul came back again, and found Virginia in a state of intense expectancy.

"Now" — he exclaimed triumphantly.

"Now" — exclaimed Virginia, with a beating heart.

The professor put his hand in his pocket, and drew slowly forth from it an an object which Virginia knew well. It reminded her of the most innocent period of her life; but she hated the very sight of it none the less. It was a "Colenso's Arithmetic."

"Come," said the professor, "no truths are so pure and necessary as those of mathematics; you shall at once begin the glorious apprehension of them."

"Oh, Paul," cried Virginia, in an agony, "but I really don't care for truth at all; and you know that when I broke your tin box open and read your private letters in my search for it, you were very angry with me."

"Ah," said Paul, holding up his finger, "but those were not necessary truths. Truths about human action and character are not necessary truths; therefore men of science care nothing about them, and they have no place in scientific systems of ethics. Pure truths are of a very different character; and however much you may misunderstand your own inclinations, you can really care for nothing so much as doing a few sums. I will set you some very easy ones to begin with; and you shall do them by yourself, whilst I magnify in the next room the parasites of the missing link."

Virginia saw that there was no help for it. She did her sums by herself the whole morning, which, as at school she had been very good at arithmetic, was not a hard task for her; and Paul magnified parasites in the next room, and prepared slides for his microscope.

When they met again, Paul began skipping and dancing, as if he had gone quite out of his senses; and every now and then between the skips, he gave a sepulchral groan. Virginia asked him, in astonishment, what on earth was the matter with him.

"Matter!" he exclaimed. "Why, humanity is at last perfect! All the evils of existence are removed; we neither of us believe in a God or a celestial future; and we are both in full enjoyment of the higher pleasures, and the apprehension of scientific truth. And therefore I skip because humanity is so unspeakably happy; and I groan because it is so unspeakably solemn."

"Alas, alas!" cried Virginia, "and would not you like to kiss me?"

"No," said the professor sternly; "and you would not like me to kiss you. It is impossible that one-half of humanity should prefer the pleasure of unlawful love to the pleasure of finding out scientific truths."

"But," pleaded Virginia, "cannot we enjoy both?"

"No," said the professor; "for if I began to kiss you, I should soon not care two straws about the parasites of the missing link."

"Well," said Virginia, "it is nice of you to say that; but still — ah me!"

XVII.

VIRGINIA was preparing, with a rueful face, to resume her enjoyment of the higher pleasures, when a horrible smell, like that of an open drain, was suddenly blown in through the window.

"Oh, rapture!" cried the professor, as Virginia was stopping her nose with her handkerchief, "I smell the missing link." And in another instant he was gone.

"Well," said Virginia, "here is one comfort. Whilst Paul is away I shall be relieved from the higher pleasures. Alas!" she cried, as she flung herself down on the sofa, "he is so nice-looking, and such an enlightened thinker. But it is plain he has never loved, or else very certainly he would love again.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Paul returned in about a couple of hours, again unsuccessful in his search.

"Ah," cried Virginia, "I am so glad you have not caught the creature!"

"Glad!" echoed the professor, "glad! Do you know that till I have caught the missing link the cause of glorious truth will suffer grievously? The missing link is the token of the solemn fact of our origin from inorganic matter. I did catch one blessed glimpse of him. He had certainly a silver band about his neck. He was about three feet high. He was rolling in a lump of carrion. It is through him that we are related to the stars — the holy, the glorious stars, about which we know so little."

"Bother the stars!" said Virginia; "I couldn't bear, Paul, that anything should, come between you and me. I have been thinking of you and longing for you the whole time you have been away."

"What!" cried Paul, "and how have you been able to forego the pleasures of the intellect?"

"I have deserted them," cried Virginia, "for the pleasures of the imagination, which I gathered from you were also very ennobling. And I found they were so; for I have been imagining that you loved me. Why is the reality less ennobling than the imagination? Paul, you shall love me; I will force you to love me. It will make us both so happy; we shall never go to hell for it; and it cannot possibly cause the slightest scandal."

The professor was more bewildered than ever by these appeals. He wondered how humanity would ever get on if one-half of it cared nothing for pure truth, and persisted in following the vulgar impulses that had been the most distinguishing feature of its benighted past — that is to say, those ages of its existence of which any record has been preserved to us. Luckily, however, Virginia came to his assistance.

"I think I know, Paul," she said, "why I do not care as I should do for the intellectual pleasures. We have been both seeking them by ourselves; and we have been therefore egoistic hedonists. It is quite true, as you say, that selfishness is a despicable thing. Let me," she went on, sitting down beside him, "look through your microscope along with you. I think perhaps, if we shared the pleasure, the missing link's parasites might have some interest for me."

The professor was overjoyed at this proposal. The two sat down side by side, and tried their best to look simultaneously through the eye-piece of the microscope. Virginia in a moment expressed herself much satisfied. It is true they saw nothing; but their cheeks touched. The professor too seemed contented; and said they should both be in a state of rapture when they had got the right focus. At last Virginia whispered, with a soft smile, —

"Suppose we put that nasty microscope aside; it is only in the way. And then, oh, Paul! dear love, dove of a Paul! we can kiss each other to our hearts' content."

Paul thought Virginia quite incorrigible, and rushed headlong out of the room.

XVIII.

"ALAS," cried Paul, "what can be done to convince one-half of humanity that it is really devoted to the higher pleasures and does not care for the lower — at least nothing to speak of?" The poor man was in a state of dreadful perplexity, and felt well-nigh distracted. At last a light broke in on him. He remembered that as one of his most revered masters, Professor Tyndall, had admitted, a great part of humanity would always need a religion, and that Virginia now had none. He at once rushed back to her. "Ah!" he exclaimed, "all is explained now. You cannot be in love with me, for that would be unlawful passion. Unlawful passion is unreasonable, and unreasonable passion would quite upset a system of pure reason, which is what exact thought shows us is soon going to govern the world. No! the emotions that you fancy are directed to me are in reality cosmic emotion — in other words are the reasonable religion of the future. I must now initiate you in its solemn and unspeakably significant worship."

"Religion!" exclaimed Virginia, not knowing whether to laugh or cry. "It is not kind of you to be making fun of me. There is no God, no soul, and no supernatural order, and above all there is no hell. How then can you talk to me about religion?"

"You," replied Paul, "are associating religion with theology, as indeed the world hitherto always has done. But those two things, as Professor Huxley well observes, have absolutely nothing to do with each other. 'It may be,' says that great teacher, 'that the object of a man's religion is an ideal of sensual enjoyment, or ——'"

"Ah," cried Virginia, "that is my religion, Paul."

"Nonsense!" replied Paul; "that cannot be the religion of half humanity, else high, holy, solemn, awful morality would never be able to stand on its own basis. See, the night has fallen, the glorious moon

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

has arisen, the stupendous stars are sparkling in the firmament. Come down with me to the seashore, where we may be face to face with nature, and I will show you then what true religion — what true worship is."

The two went out together. They stood on the smooth sands, which glittered white and silvery in the dazzling moonlight. All was hushed. The gentle murmur of the trees, and the soft splash of the sea, seemed only to make the silence audible. The professor paused close beside Virginia, and took her hand. Virginia liked that, and thought that religion without theology was not perhaps so bad after all. Meanwhile Paul had fixed his eyes on the moon. Then in a voice almost broken with emotion, he whispered, "The prayer of the man of science, it has been said, must be for the most part of the silent sort. He who said that was wrong. It need not be silent; it need only be inarticulate. I have discovered an audible and a reasonable liturgy which will give utterance to the full to the religion of exact thought. Let us both join our voices, and let us croon at the moon."

The professor at once began a long, low howling. Virginia joined him, until she was out of breath.

"Oh, Paul," she said at last, "is this more rational than the Lord's prayer?"

"Yes," said the professor, "for we can analyze and comprehend that; but true religious feeling, as Professor Tyndall tells us, we can neither analyze nor comprehend. See how big nature is, and how little — ah, how little! — we know about it. Is it not solemn, and sublime, and awful? Come, let us howl again."

The professor's devotional fervor grew every moment. At last he put his hand to his mouth, and began hooting like an owl, till it seemed that all the island echoed to him. The louder Paul hooted and howled, the more near did he draw to Virginia.

"Ah," he said, as he put his arm about her waist, "it is in solemn moments like this that the solidarity of mankind becomes most apparent."

Virginia, during the last few moments, had stuck her fingers in her ears. She now took them out, and, throwing her arms round Paul's neck, tried, with her cheek on his shoulder, to make another little hoot; but the sound her lips formed was much more like a kiss. The power of religion was at last too much for Paul.

"For the sake of cosmic emotion," he exclaimed, "O other half of humanity, and for the sake of rational religion, I will kiss you."

The professor was bending down his face over her, when, as if by magic, he started, stopped, and remained as one petrified. Amidst the sharp silence, there rang a human shout from the rocks.

"Oh!" shrieked Virginia, falling on her knees, "it is a miracle! it is a miracle! God is angry with us for pretending that we do not believe on him."

The professor was as white as a sheet; but he struggled with his perturbation manfully.

"It is not a miracle," he cried, "but an hallucination. It is an axiom with exact thinkers that all proofs of the miraculous are hallucinations."

"See," shrieked Virginia again, "they are coming, they are coming. Do not you see them?"

Paul looked, and there, sure enough, were two figures, a male and a female, advancing slowly towards them, across the moonlit sand.

"It is nothing," cried Paul; "it cannot possibly be anything. I protest, in the name of science, that it is an optical delusion."

Suddenly the female figure exclaimed, "Thank God, it is he!"

In another moment the male figure exclaimed, "Thank God, it is she!"

"My husband!" gasped Virginia.

"My wife!" replied the bishop (for it was none other than he). "Welcome to Chasuble Island. By the blessing of God it is on your own home you have been wrecked, and you have been living in the very house that I had intended to prepare for you. Providentially, too, Professor Darnley's wife has called here, in her search for her husband, who has overstayed his time. See, my love, my dove, my beauty, here is the monkey I promised you as a pet, which broke loose a few days ago, and which I was in the act of looking for when your joint cries attracted us, and we found you."

A yell of delight here broke from the professor. The eyes of the three others were turned on him, and he was seen embracing wildly a monkey which the bishop led by a chain. "The missing link!" he exclaimed, "the missing link!"

"Nonsense!" cried the sharp tones of a lady with a green gown and grey corkscrew curls. "It is nothing but a monkey that the good bishop has been trying to tame for his wife. Don't you see her name engraved on the collar?"

The shrill accents acted like a charm

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

upon Paul. He sprang away from the creature that he had been just caressing. He gazed for a moment on Virginia's lovely form, her exquisite toilette, and her melting eyes. Then he turned wildly to the green gown and the grey corkscrew curls. Sorrow and superstition he felt were again invading humanity. "Alas!" he exclaimed at last, "I do now indeed believe in hell."

"And I," cried Virginia, with much greater tact, and rushing into the arms of her bishop, "once more believe in heaven."

W. H. MALLOCK.

From The Nineteenth Century.

CAN JEWS BE PATRIOTS?

"Der Gedanke ist mächtig genug, ohne Anmassung und Unrecht, über die Anmassung und das Unrecht zu siegen." — ZUNZ.

IN the month of February last appeared an article by Professor Goldwin Smith, entitled "England's Abandonment of the Protectorate of Turkey." With the political portion of that article I do not propose to deal. I am one of those ministers of religion who, rightly or wrongly, think it preferable not to add to the strife of tongues which political questions are apt to evoke. But the writer has thought fit towards the end of his paper to level a most violent diatribe against Jews and Judaism, and to revive charges which, it was imagined, had forever been relegated to the limbo of mediævalism. I feel myself bound, as one professing that ancient religious faith which has been attacked, not to allow those statements to pass unchallenged.

The time was when, on being reproached and reviled, we had no alternative but to muffle our faces in our gaberdines and meekly to hold our peace. Those times, it is to be hoped, have gone forever. We need no longer speak

With bated breath and whispered humbleness.

The interests of truth, the sacred cause of civil and religious freedom, demand that we should repel with indignation charges against our faith and our race — charges which I cannot characterize otherwise than as cruel and gratuitous calumnies.

The gist of the indictment brought against us is that we are no patriots. "They [the Jews] have now been everywhere made voters; to make them patriots while they remain genuine Jews is beyond the legislator's power." I shall anon test the truth of this astounding proposition by the teachings of Judaism and the history of the Jews. But, before doing so, I shall examine the arguments whereby Mr. Goldwin Smith seeks to make his statement good. He says that the monotheism of the Jew, like that of Islam, is unreal. "The Jewish God, though single, is not the Father of all, but the deity of his chosen race." One could almost imagine that he who could pen such words had never taken the Bible in his hand, for the very first pages of Holy Writ contradict the assertion. The Hebrew Scripture brings before us the Lord as Creator of heaven and earth. It tells us that all the families of the earth have one common origin, have sprung from one and the same stock. Not as a mere poetical fancy, but with the sober logic of fact, this venerable document "makes the whole world kin," and teaches, in the genealogical table of nations written in the tenth chapter of Genesis, that the Semite, the Aryan and Turanian, Slav, Kelt, and Teuton are descended from one common ancestor. It is true we read in Exodus (xix. 5), "Now, therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people." And from this text it has often been erroneously represented that this selection by the Lord implied a partiality, as though he loved the descendants of Jacob only, whilst the fate of the rest of mankind was a matter of indifference to him. The chosen people! How often has that expression been repeated with ill-disguised contempt, as though the assumption of this term were due to our self-satisfied righteousness, as though it were an outcome of pride and haughtiness, as though it breathed an exclusive spirit which caused us to regard ourselves as the sole objects of divine care and providence! Accordingly Lessing, in his noble plea for universal tolerance, "Nathan der Weise," puts these words into the mouth of the Templar, the representative of Christianity: —

Doch kennt Ihr auch das Volk
Das diese Menschenmäkelei zuerst
Getrieben? Wiszt Ihr, Nathan, welches Volk
Zuerst das auserwählte Volk sich nannte?
Wie? wenn ich dieses Volk nun, zwar nicht hasste,
Doch wegen seines Stolzes zu verachten
Mich nicht entbrechen könnte? Seines Stolzes
Den es auf Christ und Muselmann vererbte
Nur sein Gott sei der rechte Gott!

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

But surely the words which immediately follow the above Biblical text would suffice to disprove the charge. "For the whole earth is mine." The words spoken by the Lord when he called Abraham, "In thee shall all families of the earth be blessed," * equally proclaim the divine concern in the welfare of the entire human family, and indicate the relation intended to subsist between the chosen race and the rest of the world. And in that same spirit of catholicity does Moses, the representative man of this exclusive race, address his "tribal God" as "the Lord, the God of the spirits of all flesh," † the God alike of Jew and Gentile. All human beings form part of his universal family, all are alike created in his image, all are alike sustained, loved, and redeemed by him, the eternal, merciful Father of the human race." ‡

Nor do the teachings of the prophets disprove the professor's assertion less distinctly. "Adonai," in whose name the inspired seers speak, is not the tutelary Deity of the Israelites, is not the God of one people only, whose territory is bounded by the Lebanon and the Jordan. We hear their glowing admonitions addressed to all the great empires of the East — to Egypt, Assyria, and Babylonia no less than to the kingdom of Judæa. Obadiah and Jonah, indeed, were sent exclusively to preach repentance to pagan Edom and pagan Nineveh. Nor do the interpreters of the divine will announce their messages with cold insensibility. Their hearts overflow with pity while they declare Heaven's stern decree. "My compassion yearneth for Moab as a harp," § Isaiah exclaims. "Raise the lamentation over the king of Tyre, over Pharaoh," are the words of Ezekiel.‖ Nor are these kingdoms any the less objects of divine mercy than is Israel himself. "Blessed be Egypt, my people, and Assyria, the work of mine hands, and Israel, mine inheritance." ¶

Whilst the ancient classical poets taught that the golden age of the world was a thing of the past, the prophets of Israel announce that it must be looked for in future time. And what is the picture they unroll before us? Not Israel, the triumphant, enthroned in majesty on Zion as the conqueror of the earth, but all the nations of the globe beatified by the possession of truth and the acknowledgment of the divine unity. "For then will I turn to the nations a pure language, that they may all call upon the name of the Lord to serve him with one consent." * And Malachi, the last of the prophets acknowledged by Judaism, sums up these teachings in the touching words: "Have we not all one father, hath not one God created us?" † — a quotation heard many a time and oft from Christian as well as Jewish pulpits. How can the learned professor assert, in the face of it, that the Jews regarded God as the Deity of his chosen race, and not as the Father of all?

Mr. Goldwin Smith next states that the morality embodied in the Mosaic law was in its day a nearer approach to humanity than any other known law. But he adds the damaging qualification that both the morality and the law were distinctly "tribal." It "sanctioned a difference of principle between the rule of dealing with a Hebrew and that of dealing with a stranger, which the civilized conscience now condemns." A strange misconception! Amid the great divergence of opinions in the theological world, there is one point on which unanimity prevails — that the decalogue taught on Sinai contains the germs of all the duties which man owes his Creator and his fellow-creatures. The professor may look upon the opinion of a Jewish rabbi as warped by partiality. Will he reject with like disdain the authoritative teaching of the Dean of Westminster?

> The Ten Commandments delivered on Mount Sinai have become embedded in the heart of the religion which has succeeded. . . . They represent to us both in fact and in idea the granite foundation, the immovable mountain, on which the world is built up, without which all theories of religion are but as shifting and fleeting clouds; they give us the two homely fundamental laws, which all subsequent religion has but confirmed and sanctioned — the law of our duty towards God and the law of our duty towards our neighbor.‡

When Israel was about to be redeemed from Egypt, when the first precept was given him, the divine order was issued, 'One law shall be to him that is homeborn and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you." § Again in Leviticus,‖ where

* Gen. xii. 3.
† Numb. xxvii. 16.
‡ Cf. Pirke Aboth, ch. iii., § 14. "Man" (not the Israelite) "is the object of divine love, inasmuch as he has been created in the image of the Lord."
§ Isa. xvi. 11.
‖ Ezek. xxviii. 12, xxxii. 2.
¶ Isa. xix. 25.

* Zeph. iii. 9.
† Mal. ii. 10.
‡ Dean Stanley's "Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church," vol. i., p. 150.
§ Exod. xii. 49.
‖ xxiv. 22.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the penalty of the homicide is declared, the monition is added: "Ye shall have one manner of law as well for the stranger as for one of your own country, for I am the Lord your God." It was first commanded by the Hebrew Scriptures, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself: I am the Lord." * There is no justification whatever for interpreting this command as applicable solely to the Israelite. The veriest tyro in the knowledge of Hebrew could prove satisfactorily by many a quotation that the word reá is also applied to a non-Israelite.† Again and again we are told not to vex "the stranger," but "the stranger that dwelleth with you shall be unto you as one born among you, and thou shalt love him as thyself." ‡ In his sublime prayer of dedication, Solomon implores the Lord: "Moreover, concerning a stranger that is not of thy people Israel, but cometh from a far-off country . . . when he shall come and pray toward this house, hear thou in heaven thy dwelling-place, and do according to all that the stranger calleth to thee for." § What grand, all-embracing brotherhood do these words breathe!

I am aware that here and there in the Pentateuch some enactments may be found, which, at the first blush, would seem to bear out the professor's assertion, and with these I shall now very briefly deal. The statement has been made that according to the Mosaic law it was only forbidden to lend the Israelite at a usurious rate, but that no prohibition of this nature existed with respect to the non-Israelite. This opinion is sought to be supported by a verse in Deuteronomy ‖ which is translated in the authorized version, "Unto a stranger thou mayest lend upon usury, but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury." The error is, that neshech is supposed to be synonymous with usury in the present acceptation of the term. The word, like usury in old English, simply means interest — any compensation whatever paid for the use of money. Accordingly the passage should be rendered: "Unto a stranger thou mayest lend upon interest, but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon interest." With respect to the Israelite it was prohibited both to take and to give any interest whatever, for it was clearly the design of the Mosaic legislation to prevent the few growing rich at the expense of the many, and to maintain the simple primitive conditions of self-reliant, self-contained industrial support by agriculture and handicrafts, credit being regarded as an evil and a humiliation to the borrower. "Thou shalt lend to many nations, but shalt not borrow," * is a blessing which sufficiently indicates the advantage of an internal commerce free from internal credit and indebtedness. Had the Israelites been allowed to lend to one another at interest, their lands would have been encumbered, and their energies as agriculturists would have been crippled. This happened in Athens and in Rome, where all the landed property gradually fell into the hands of the rich, and where the poor were so oppressed by the debts they owed the landowners that a social revolution ensued. The like condition of things even now exists in India. But this danger could not arise from lending to the foreigner. It was found necessary since the earliest times of the Hebrew commonwealth to carry on some commerce with neighboring countries, in order to exchange the surplus of their own produce for the commodities of other lands. Solomon sent to Hiram, king of Tyre, to purchase sandalwood and sycamore for the construction of the temple. Thus, also, if an Israelite possessed any capital or produce which he could not utilize in his own country, he had a right to demand from a member of a foreign state some compensation for the use of the money or produce lent to him, and if the foreigner applied that capital to commercial enterprise no Mosaic principle was infringed by charging him interest. This permission, however, only applied to sums borrowed for mercantile purposes. When the Gentile needed the loan of money, not for commerce, but for his subsistence, the Mosaic law made no difference between him and the Hebrew. "And if thy brother be waxen poor, and his hand faileth with thee, then thou shalt relieve him; yea, though he be a stranger and sojourner; that he may live with thee. Take thou no usury of him or increase; but fear thy God." † Yes, this "tribal" law, which we are told "sanctioned a difference of principle between the rule of dealing with a Hebrew and that of dealing with a stranger," did not allow the Jew to make any distinction between the Israelite and the Gentile in the exercise of philanthropy.

* Lev. xix. 18.
† E.g. in the passage, "And they shall ask every one of his neighbor" (Exod. xi. 2), where the word reá applies to the Egyptians.
‡ Lev. xix. 34.
§ 1 Kings viii. 41–43.
‖ xxiii. 20.

* Deut. xxviii. 12.
† Lev. xxv. 35–36.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

He was bidden to visit the sick among the non-Israelites, to relieve their poor, and to bury their dead, even as those of his own people; for he was bound to walk in the ways of his Lord, "who is good to all, whose tender mercies are over all his works." *

The article proceeds: "At length humanity itself appeared. . . . The less noble part of the Jewish nation, led by national pride and ceremonialism, embodied in the Pharisee, rejected humanity." If Mr. Goldwin Smith desires to condemn us in these words for having refused to acknowledge the divinity of the teacher of Nazareth, we unhesitatingly plead guilty to the charge. We did refuse, and we still refuse, to pay divine adoration to a human being. We have been, and we are still, faithful to the teachings of Sinai: "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." † Nor can we bind our heaven-given reason in iron fetters, such as a belief in the mystery of the Trinity would throw around us. But humanity we have never rejected. We are not genuine Jews unless we be humane, merciful, brotherly, tender, and considerate. And does not the professor himself admit: "Benevolent and munificent they [the Jews] often are in the highest degree"?

Next the old prejudice is revived — for prejudices die hard — that during the Middle Ages the Jews were "cruel usurers," "and learned to surpass all races in the art of handling money with profit, and in whatever is akin to that art." Unfortunately for humanity, the times have been when the Hebrew was shut out from every honest and honorable occupation, when money-lending constituted almost his sole means of obtaining a livelihood, and when the impost heaped upon him, together with the unscrupulous conduct of his borrowers, compelled him to exact usurious rates of interest. I will not seek to exculpate the cruel usurers, but simply repeat what was said by a high-minded prelate, Gregory, Bishop of Blois (in his memoir in favor of the Israelites): "O nations! If you recall the past faults of the Jews and their corruptions, let it be to deplore your own work." Similarly, Martin Luther observes in a pamphlet published in 1523: "If we prohibit the Jews from following trades and other civil occupations, we compel them to become usurers."

And how different is the estimate formed by another eminent contemporary historian of this martyr people, in whom Mr. G. Smith can see nothing, at the best, but agents and partners of royal and feudal extortion! Mr. Lecky, whose views were not blinded by party spirit, sees in them almost the only representatives of commercial activity, of learning and progress, during the Middle Ages.

> While those around them were grovelling in the darkness of besotted ignorance; while juggling miracles and lying relics were themes on which almost all Europe was expatiating; while the intellect of Christendom, enthralled by countless persecutions, had sunk into a deadly torpor, in which all love of inquiry and all search for truth were abandoned, the Jews were still pursuing the path of knowledge, amassing learning, and stimulating progress, with the same unflinching constancy that they manifested in their faith. They were the most skilful physicians, the ablest financiers, and among the most profound philosophers. While they were only second to the moderns in the cultivation of natural science, they were also the chief interpreters to western Europe of Arabian learning.*

There now remains the gravest charge of all to be dealt with, that genuine Jews cannot be patriots. "Their only country is their race, which is one with their religion." "Alles schon dagewesen," says the rabbi in Gutzkow's "Uriel Acosta." It is not the first time that this cruel accusation has been preferred against us. We have heard it before from the lips of Haman, when he said, "There is a certain people scattered abroad and dispersed among the people in all the provinces of thy kingdom; and their laws are diverse from all people; neither keep they the king's laws; therefore it is not for the king's profit to suffer them." †

Granted that eighteen hundred years ago our ancestors dwelt amid the vine-clad hills of Judæa, is that any reason why we should be less solicitous for the glory and interest of the empire we now inhabit? True, we still obey certain religious ordinances commanded by our law; we still practise "an oriental and primeval rite." Can Mr. Goldwin Smith show in what

* Talmud. Gittin, p. 61; and Maimonides, Kings, ch. x., p. 12.

† Exod. xx. 3.

* See Lecky, "Rise and Influence of Rationalism in Europe," vol. ii., p. 281, and the authorities there quoted. Cf. Draper's "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe," vol. i., ch. xviii., and vol. ii., ch. iv. A valuable monograph on this subject has recently been published by Prof. Schleiden, entitled "Die Bedeutung der Juden für Erhaltung und Wiederbelebung der Wissenschaften im Mittelalter." The writer, neither a Jew nor of Jewish extraction, begins his treatise: "Die Juden sind und bleiben das merkwürdigste Volk, und wenn man sich auf die Symbolik einer Vorsehung einlassen will, darf man sie wohl das 'auserwählte Volk Gottes' nennen."

† Book of Esther iii. 8.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

manner it prevents us from being loyal citizens? With as much right he can assert that they who have substituted adult for infant baptism cannot be patriots. He surely cannot wish to set up the monstrous doctrine, that only they who belong to the Established Church can be imbued with love of their country. He surely cannot desire to push his proposition to its logical conclusion, and to brand Nonconformists and Roman Catholics as deficient, if not altogether lacking, in patriotism.

Or does the professor mean to assert that the sacred books, from which the Jewish religion is derived, fail to inculcate the virtue of patriotism? There are no grounds whatever for such a supposition. There was a time when Israel was carried away captive into Babylon, with its king, its priests and its prophets, its officers and artisans. Then there were some among the people — Jeremiah calls them dreamers and diviners — who were anxious to prevent the people from becoming too deeply attached to the country of their adoption, as they were not to abide there for more than seventy years. But the prophet sent them the missive, "Serve the king of Babylon, and live." * "Build ye houses, and dwell in them; and plant gardens, and eat the fruit of them. And seek the welfare of the city whither I have caused you to be carried away captives, and pray unto the Lord for it; for in the peace thereof shall ye have peace." † And the counsel here given has ever since regulated our course of action. From the time of the second temple, where, as we are told by Philo and Josephus,‡ sacrifices were offered twice every day for Cæsar and for the Roman people, to this day, prayers ascend from every synagogue throughout the globe for the prosperity of the country in which the Jew may dwell, and for the welfare of his sovereign.

And we have proved by our actions that our prayers were not mere vain lip-service. Whenever and wherever the members of this "exclusive race" were permitted to occupy responsible posts in the administration of their country, they devoted their energies loyally and zealously to discharge their functions for the welfare of the State and the ruler they served. We see them faithful to the traditions of their race; we see them treading in the footsteps of Joseph, who was called the "Saviour of the World" by the grateful Egyptian people. We see them following the example of Daniel and his colleagues, of Mordecai, Ezra, and Nehemiah, who served non-Jewish kings with willing allegiance. We read in history that some of the most faithful diplomatic envoys of Charlemagne were Jews.* Many of those men who by their writings have shed lustre on Hebrew literature were wise statesmen, ministers for foreign affairs and ministers of finance, who brought prosperity and renown to the countries they served. Rabbi Chisdai ibn Shaprut was the trusted counsellor of the khalif Abdul-Rahman the Third. For nearly thirty years did Samuel ibn Nagrela conduct the diplomatic and military affairs of the kingdom of Granada. His biographer says of him that with equal devotion he served the State, science, his religion and his race — separate interests, each of which had its own claims upon him.† In addition to these could be named Don Isaac Abravanel, Don Joseph, Prince of Naxos, and a long list of illustrious statesmen. It could further be easily shown that devoted loyalty was evinced not merely by a few exceptional men who, it might be argued, rose superior to the prejudices of their race, but by the bulk of a Jewish population.

In the declaration to the Commonwealth of England by Manasseh Ben Israel, recently published in the "Miscellany of Hebrew Literature," many an historical illustration is given of the steadfast faithfulness of the Jewish people as subjects. One example may suffice: —

> In Spain, the Jews of Burgos, as the chronicles do declare, most generously showed the same fidelity in the time of Don Henry, who, having killed his brother the king, Don Pedro, made himself lord of all his kingdoms, and brought under his obedience all the grandees and people of Spain. Only the Jews of Burgos denied to obey him, and fortified themselves within the city, saying, that God would never have it that they should deny obedience to their natural lord, Don Pedro, or to his rightful successors — a constancy that the prudent king, Don Henry, very much esteemed of, saying, that such vassals as those were, by kings and great men, worthy of much account, seeing they held greater respect to the fidelity they owed to their king, although conquered and dead, than to the present fortune of the conqueror. And a while after, receiving very honorable conditions, they gave themselves over.‡

* Jer. xxvii. 17.
† Jer. xxix. 5, 7.
‡ Wars of the Jews, Book II., chap. x., § 4.

* The authorities for these and the following facts are given in Grätz's "Geschichte der Juden."
† See "Miscellany of Hebrew Literature," 1st issue, "The Minister Rabbi Samuel ibn Nagrela," by Dr. Grätz.
‡ The truth of this fact is attested by a contemporary chronicler, Ayala, in his Cronica for the year 1367, ch. 34, 35.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

It is but rarely that Jews have been permitted the opportunity of fighting for their country, but whenever they have been allowed to enter the lists, they have proved that the yellow badge of degradation and contumely had not altogether quenched the soul of manhood within them, that they were not unworthy descendants of the Maccabean heroes who cast off the yoke of the Syrian king. An imperial Austrian standard is to this day suspended in the Alt neu Schule at Prague, one of the oldest synagogues in Europe — a standard presented to the inhabitants of the Judenstadt by the emperor Ferdinand the Third in recognition of the valor they had displayed in keeping at bay the Swedish besiegers in the year 1648.

During the present century until very recently Jews were not permitted to enter military service. Now that they have been admitted, have they proved themselves cowards or traitors on the day of battle? "Patriots they cannot be," says Professor Goldwin Smith. Is it just to cast this opprobrium upon the Jews of Germany who but lately shed their life's blood in defence of their fatherland? Is this insult deserved by the brave Jews of France who rallied with equal alacrity under the banner of the empire and the republic when the safety of their country was imperilled? The Iron Cross and the badge of the Legion of Honor which decorate the breast of many a valiant Jew of Germany and France prove how confidently a state may reckon upon its Jewish sons in the hour of danger. Nay, even the poor, down-trodden Jews of Roumania volunteered in large numbers to serve in the national army, and fought patriotically at the side of their oppressors, in the war with Turkey just ended.

And in this dear England of ours have we Jews ever been guilty of an offence that could deserve the stigma of the professor? Have the Jewish members of Parliament shown that "they cannot really share the political life of a European nation"? Have Jewish magistrates, has a Jewish master of the rolls, discharged judicial and magisterial functions less faithfully than their Christian fellow-citizens? When the cry of the famine-stricken indwellers of India reached our shores, did the members of this "exclusive race" hold back their hand? When the heir-apparent was laid low by disease, did the Jews fail to send up their fervent prayers on high? Did not the primate in that memorable thanksgiving service at the Metropolitan Cathedral state in his sermon, "None were more hearty in their prayers than God's ancient people"?

I have been informed that of the two hundred thousand volunteers enrolled in England there are no fewer than two thousand Jews. And this I can assert without fear of contradiction, that of all the subjects of our most gracious Majesty there is no section more deeply concerned for the honor, the highest and truest interests of our beloved country, no class more ready at the same time to make for its sake every sacrifice of comfort, of substance, aye, and of life, than that which professes the ancient, primeval faith of Judaism.

It is quite true that we Jews feel ourselves bound by the ties of religion with our brethren in foreign lands. It is quite true that when we hear that they are oppressed and persecuted we seek to do what is in our power to mitigate their sufferings. We invoke the powerful help of the British government that is ever ready to lift up its voice on behalf of persecuted humanity. But does this feeling of kinship militate against the loyalty we owe our country? Are those Christians less loyal citizens of England who have pleaded for the better government of their co-religionists in Bulgaria? Inasmuch as we are Englishmen, it behoves us to sympathize with the oppressed throughout the globe. We never prove ourselves better Englishmen than when we plead on behalf of humanity and justice, and in the name of civil and religious freedom.

I am aware that I have left one loophole to the professor. He may say, "Granted then that you are patriots, but then you are not genuine Jews." Genuine Jews perhaps not, according to the distorted conceptions of an Eisenmenger, a Chiarini, or a Billroth. I, however, deny the right of an historian to first set up the travesty of a Jew, and then to say, "This is a Jew, and he who does not resemble him is not a genuine Jew." And so, conscious of my own Judaism, I distinctly refuse the professor the right to deny me the appellation of genuine Jew.

An old Talmudic adage has it that it is the function of the scholar to plant peace and goodwill upon earth. It should, in truth, be his mission to extirpate prejudice and to banish sectarian hatred. Is it not then to be deplored that a teacher of history should have lent the weight of his name to perpetuate prejudice and to galvanize into a spurious vitality the hydra of religious intolerance?

A teacher of history should regard him-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

self as an apostle of truth. If, pandering to popular prejudice, he substitutes sensational fiction for inexorable fact, though he may achieve distinction among the ephemeridæ of his time, posterity will refuse him the title of historian.

HERMANN ADLER.

From Fraser's Magazine.

A ROMANCE OF THE EAST COAST.

THERE has been no systematic research or connected relation of the touching history of loss and stirring event, that belts our island below the waves that encircle its coasts. We frequently hear of encroachment of the sea in one place; of land hardly fought for and hardly regained in another; yet few people trouble themselves to recall the circumstances under which the sea stole in and the soil crumbled and fell. Many a time-worn cliff and shifting sand-beach could testify to histories as strange and tragic as any fiction could invent.

It was with an attempt to unveil the oblivion that has covered one of the most interesting spots in the England of former years that the present paper was begun. Keble's bequest of a lifeboat drew momentary attention to a place known best to lovers of ecclesiastical history, and led us to investigate a history of its growth and decline, which an antiquary of the last century, Gardner, made it his work to record, leaving a history as strange and touching as any in our annals.

On the edge of a cliff, on a desolate part of the Suffolk coast, stands in solitude a grey, ruined tower, looming grimly over the yellow sandstone rock which the sea has eaten and furrowed with wave-lines down to the bar of white sand which stretches below. That ruin is almost all that remains of a considerable city, one of England's principal towns and seaports, a flourishing place that was member of the Cinque Ports at one time; while now the white-tipped waves and pale blue sea roll heavily over tower and spire, streets and houses, which for six miles to seaward lie buried beneath, to the border of the horizon where we see the breakers lashing over the bar, and where the waste cliff was washed up and piled to the destruction of many a good ship.

Dunwich (or Don Wyc), now represented by a small fishing village, was, as Gardner tells us, a royal residence, and the first episcopal see in the kingdom of East Anglia; and not merely from his record, but from other sources, it is easy to trace its history as it was torn away bit by bit, and street by street fell into the merciless sea. An account of Dunwich is given by Bede. It was first distinguished through Sigebert's establishing his court there with his favorite, Bishop Felix, who founded the see, and he "graced it with many royal palaces." If chroniclers be trustworthy, this king must have been an able ruler and reformer to have so quickly established "civility, morality, and Christianity throughout his domains." Stow relates of him that "his great desire was to suppress idolatry, and in this he was assisted by Felix, a pious priest from Burgundy, who was consecrated first bishop of East Anglia by Honorius, Archbishop Cantuar, who sent him to preach the gospel in 636." Many famous men then resorted to Dunwich to be coadjutors in promoting the grand design of conversion, which by their zeal was effected. Seminaries were established there, "and the sable cloud of paganism dispelled." We find in Speed's chronicle this curious rhyme: —

> At Donmok there was Felix bishop
> Of East Angle and taught the Christian faith,
> That is full hye in heaven I hope.

The fourth bishop — Bisus, or Bosa — in his old age divided the see into Dunwich for Suffolk, and Elmham for Norfolk.

Goodwin mentions nine bishops of Dunwich and eleven of Elmham. Humbert, the last of Elmham, was consecrated about 826. He crowned Edmund king of East Anglia, and with him was martyred by the Danes in 870, Nov. 20. Wibred, Bishop of Dunwich, succeeded him, and again united both sees at Elmham.

There can be no doubt that Dunwich was a town of considerable size. Suckling gives a tradition "that the tailors of Dunwich would formerly sit in their shops and see the shipping at anchor in Yarmouth roads." To do that, the coast must have been convex on the south, and Dunwich six miles to eastward.

In Edward the Confessor's survey, Edin de Laspuld held Dunwich for one manor, two carves of land besides one in the demesne, twelve bordari, and one hundred and twenty burgesses, one church.

When Robert Malet held it, only one carve of land remained, for the sea had already commenced its destructive work.

The town has been fully described by more than one historian. It was built on a cliff forty feet high, with a rampart of earth east and west, fortified with pali-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

sades, at the foot of which was a deep ditch. To frustrate ascent from the river on the north side, artificial mounds were raised on the ridges, also fenced with palisades adjoining "Pales dikes." Within, a spacious plot was encompassed, of hills and hollows, replenished with buildings fair and magnificent, called "Cite de Denwyk" and "Civitas Dunwic." Gardner also relates how a forest called "Eastwood" or "King's Forest" extended for several miles southeast of the town, "for mnay ages destroyed by the sea, and become a road where boats and vessels now sail." Another forest, "Westwood," stood westerly. Weever states that the men of Dunwich required aid of William I. against the rage of the sea, affirming that it destroyed their forest. In 1739, the sea uncovered the roots of a great number of trees, supposed to be a part of the submerged forest, and still occasionally to be seen. Gardner had seen a MS. which mentioned that the Conqueror gave leave to the Rouses of Baddington to hunt and hawk in his forest of Dunwich.

The town boasted of a mint with its own coinage; and Stow speaks of the "coynes which many men of the town can yet show," sterling pence — with this inscription, "Civitas Dunwic, XX." — which weighed an ounce, twelve ounces of a pound troy, and so, being twenty shillings in money, were both a pound in payment and in weight. During Felix's time the city was governed by a mayor and three bailiffs, with inferior officers. We hear of ten churches, and others that fell, monasteries, and hospitals, at a very early date. The entrance to the haven was on the north side, where a pier was erected. In Gardner's time a part of the quay was visible, and about two hundred of the piles exposed at low water. Some ancient writings speak of the road of St. John, a king's highway to Norwich. Dunwich was besieged by Robert, Earl of Leicester, and was strong enough to withstand his army of three thousand Flemings and other troops sent by Lewis of France for Henry's assistance — an army which had subdued Ipswich and Norwich, but retired in despair from before Dunwich. Remains of the earl's fortifications are still to be found on Westleton Heath close by. Dunwich ranked itself under the White Rose later, and afforded considerable aid to Edward IV.

Before entering into any further historical details, it may be well to sketch Dunwich as it now appears. We were curious to see the last remains of the city, and as no railway comes within some miles of the place, we chose the pleasantest route, going from the village of Thorpe by sea.

For some time the coast on our left presented the same unvarying features — long banks of grey shingle, a bar of white sand between each, rising tier on tier to the cliff, which was always of sandstone fringed with dark corn-grass and harebell, and a barren country with stunted trees, few and far between, alternating with patches of wild common, all golden and purple with gorse and heather.

The sea moans a ceaseless knell over the treacherous bar, and spars of wreck continually strewed on the shore tell a melancholy tale. At Sizewell the bay extends widely, and Dunwich first becomes visible at a dark wooded point descending abruptly to the line of white sand, and the gaunt drear ruin of All Saints Church on the cliff stands sharply against the sky. Beyond Dunwich are fainter reaches of rock and cliff, broken only by the large half-ruined church of Walberswich; and Southwold, a white, sun-tipped mass, glistens at the farthest point of the bay. No other buildings break the line of desolate beach. No sounds disturb the silence, but the lashing of the waves, the melancholy curlew's song and the plover's cry.

Landing near the point, we climbed up the side of the cliff by sand steps to a path which led through a wood of gnarled oaks and ancient firs (a weird spot, whose audible stillness was broken by the wild dove cooing hoarsely) to a massive ivy-grown wall. Passing through a low arch and a little wicker gate, we found ourselves in a barley field inclosed by a heavy grim wall with lofty gateways. In the centre of the field before us a noble pile of ruins arose, thickly clothed with ivy, but even in decay most beautiful and stately.

We could discern much of the building, and arches and numerous entrances invited closer investigation, unfortunately forbidden by the ripe barley through which we could find no path. To our right the wall jutted out abruptly into the field, above which rose the ruined grey tower of All Saints Church. We were within the walls of the Grey Friars, whose monastery, the so-called "Monks' Palace," was before us. Gardner gives a very complete account of the Grey Friars or Friars Minor, which was in his time very much in the same dismantled state as we now see it.

The monastery was founded by Richard Fitzjohn and Alice his wife, and augmented by Henry III. A part of the ram-

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

part was pulled down to make room for it on the east. Gardner says: "This friary contains seven acres encompassed with a stone wall, and had three gates eastward (one demolished) and two adjoining west, whose arches continue pretty firm, not without some curiosity of workmanship, but clad as most of the wall with ivy. The bigger gate was the entrance to the house, the greater part of which now lies in ruinous heaps, and the standing remains converted into a good tenement and hall with apartments where affairs of corporation are transacted, and a gaol having a red brick front built of late years. The lesser gate was the way to the church." The inhabited portion he speaks of has now disappeared. The common garden was a plot of ground, whereon grew large crops of thyme, which was washed away in 1770. The seal of the Grey Friars was oval and had a ship under sail, the king at the prow, a bishop with mitre and crozier at the stem; the inscription, "* Sigillu. + Frm. — Minor. — Dominic." At the dissolution of monasteries, the Grey Friary was granted to John Eye.

We retraced our steps through the wood and entered a lane which took us into the road on the other side of the friary wall, then down a steep incline, and a path led us up to the edge of the cliff and into the churchyard and ruined church. The latter had been pulled down at no very distant period. The date on one of the tombstones was 1814. The sea has worked to the very foot of the building, and a few years later must witness its fall.

Standing between the roofless walls and broken arches and pillars with the tower behind us, we enjoyed a view unusually beautiful, an almost unbroken expanse of fine sea and distant coast, only a ruined fragment of grey wall in the foreground, deep in the clefts of which the "Dunwich rose" was springing and throwing long sprays and wreaths of blossoms over the crumbling stone. Even nature's productions in this spot have an historical interest. Tradition relates that this flower was brought by the monks from Normandy centuries ago, and that it will grow nowhere else. It certainly degenerates under cultivation, and partakes of the nature of the Scotch rose — hardy, and spreading rapidly. It grows all over the sand cliffs and pentlands about there, creeping along the ground when it can find nothing to cling to. The flower has a powerful scent; it is a single blossom of purest white velvet, with anthers of black or brown, a smooth brown stem, with long sharp thorns, and smooth, pointed, dark-green leaves, growing like the blackberry leaves, for which at first we mistook them.

The church is of flint and freestone. Gardner describes it as "old, but pretty strong, and indifferently handsome, crowned with a battlement, each angle supporting the statue of an angel, Gabriel, Michael, Raphael, and Uriel, whereof one is blown down and destroyed; it formerly enjoyed a clock, but now possesses three bells instead." In the aisle were magisterial seats, decorated with curious carved work, and some very ancient tombs, with inscriptions "illegible to any." In a later account we find All Saints mentioned as the only church in being where divine service was celebrated fortnightly from Lady Day to Michaelmas, and monthly afterwards. The minister's stipend was not to exceed 12*l.* a year, with a small allowance for refreshment in consideration of his journey there. The church at that time was but mean externally, and in a tottering state, especially the chancel; and our writer speaks of the walls inside "being infected with an incurable, spreading leprosy," probably damp; but of remains of grandeur in the roof, and of the antiquity of the gravestones and brasses. He also praises the painted glass windows, and the image of St. Mary Magdalene. Most of the churches at Dunwich and in the neighborhood seem to have been profusely decorated. In "Dowsing's Journal" we find a note of one church in Dunwich marked for destruction, St. Peter's, northeast of All Saints, and that alone "contains sixty-three cherubims, sixty at least of Jesus, writings in capital letters on the roof, and forty superstitious pictures, all promised by church wardens to be destroyed."

It would be difficult to recall all the ornamentation, or reconstruct mentally the bare and shattered ruin we saw. Yet Gardner's descriptions are so vivid that the entire city is made to rise before our eyes and seem a familiar place. He follows its history from the building of the first church in Edward the Confessor's reign, and only in the steady catalogue of loss can the size of the place be realized. The following list may give some idea of his patient research in chronicling the churches and buildings which fell into the sea: —

The church of St. Felix and a cell of monks, lost very early.

A hospital of St. James for lepers, of Richard I.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Several churches washed away in 1286, on the night after New Year's Day.

The old port destroyed in the first year of Edward III., and in the twenty-third year of his reign a great part of the town — four hundred houses, with shops and wind-mills.

1331. St. Michael and St. Bartholomew's (Register of Eye); St. Leonard's and St. Martin's Church in 1335.

1385. The eighth year of Rich. II. The sea ate away the shore to Black Friars.

1540. The churches of St. John Baptist, St. Anthony, and St. Francis; also the South Gate and Golden Gate; not a quarter of the town left standing.

1570. Great damage. St. John's Church was large, and in the centre of the town lay the market-place. The inhabitants took it down to save the material, and found in the chancel the tomb of one of the bishops, "with a pair of boots (still remaining on his feet), and on his breast two chalices of coarse metal."

The losses at this period excited great commiseration in England. Dunwich suffered greatly in Henry VIII.'s reign, both by the religious houses and in the fishing trade, through the removal of their port. Queen Elizabeth gave them, in compensation, the money arising from the sale of bells and other material of Ingate church, and the chancel of Kissingland church. St. Leonard's fair, which was very profitable, survived for many years.

In Charles I.'s reign the foundation of the Temple buliding was reached.

1677. The market-place suffered, and the cross was taken down and sold.

1680. All the buildings of Maison Dieu Lane destroyed.

1702. St. Peter's Church and the Town Hall pulled down.

1715. The gaol undermined.

1729. Utmost bounds of St. Peter's Cemetery.

1740. Terrible devastations in December.

And this last storm destroyed Dunwich as a town. The picture of devastation and the irresistible force of its energy is so striking that we must give it in Gardner's words: —

The wind blowing very hard N. E. for several days, occasioned great seas, doing much damage on the coast by inundations, breaking down banks, and overflowing marshes, the sad effects of which were felt at Dunwich; much of their cliffs was washed away with the last remains of St. Nicholas churchyard and the great road leading to the town from the Key, leaving several naked walls and tokens of antient buildings.

From Maison Dieu Lane northwards was a scene of confusion. Part of the Old Key, built with stone, lay bare, making canals across the beach, through which the river had communication, hindering foot-passengers. King's Holm or St. Leonard's Marsh under water, and much shingle and sand thrown on it, ever since of little worth. The sea raged with such fury that Cock and Hen Hills (140 feet) had their heads levelled with their bases, and the ground about them so rent and torn that the foundation of St. Francis' Chapel, between the hills, was discovered, where besides the ruined walls were five round stones 4 feet in diameter, also a circle of large stumps of piles 24 feet in circumference. The bounds of the cemetery were staked, within which the secret repositories of the dead were exposed to view, several skeletons, divested of their coverings, some in order, others interrupted and scattered as the surfs carried them. A stone coffin lined with tiles broken by the sea in two pieces, which now serve as steps at each foot of Deering bridge.

Another writer describes "how while wind and sea roared, the dead were seen sticking to the sides of the cliff in ghastly and terrible fashion." Gardner also relates of the old quay, the foundations of earlier buildings, and the pipes of an ancient aqueduct "of lead and grey earth, like that of some Urus being laid bare, all reduced to beach, over which the sea plays at high tide." He gives a carefully-drawn map of Dunwich in 1542, marking the line of cliff in his own time, so that its former dimensions might be estimated. Since he wrote a large portion has been washed away.

From time to time we find mention of Dunwich in history. In Richard I.'s reign the town was fined one thousand and sixty marks for the illicit practice of supplying the enemy with corn. They seem to have redeemed their character later, for Edward I. allowed the men of Dunwich 200*l.* that his father granted them for faithful services. In the twenty-fourth year of his reign they, at their own cost and charges, built eleven ships of war, furnished with munition. These sailed with the king's brother, Edmund, Earl Leicester, for France, and remained on the coast of Gascoign from St. Andrew's Day till Pentecost, serving the king without pay, and had four ships, with their artillery, taken and destroyed by the enemy.

In 1282 there is a grievous complaint against the pirates of Zetland and Holland, who spoiled and robbed them, slaying many men, and carrying away their ships

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd and goods. Dunwich suffered much loss from time to time by these raids. One noted man only we find living there after the dissolution of its monasteries in 1518: Fox, the first who printed in Saxon characters in England. He was imprisoned and exiled by Mary.

With an antiquarian delight Gardner devotes a large part of his book to the descriptions and drawings of the curiosities and relics he found in large numbers at Dunwich, some of which were very curious. Whether Roman, Anglo-Saxon, Norman, or relics of a later time, all receive full description, the circumstances of their discovery and their history are impartially given with equal care. The book may be commended in this respect to the curious in such matters, while the recollections of our excursion must be now limited.

Descending by the road to some cottages, we walked under the Grey Friars' wall again, past the lane before mentioned, which really led to Scott's Hall, a fine old tri-gabled house, now a farm, and we gained the open common — Westleton Common — when we turned and looked our last at Dunwich remains, of which we had the finest view. Perhaps the beauty of its situation is better manifested from this point than any other. At the top of the hill, clearly outlined against the purple lowering evening clouds, rose All Saints tower, a light grey mass of stone, above a crown of trees. From this leafy crest descended a steep incline of common, richly clothed with many-hued heather of crimson purple and brown, and with green and gold bracken, a sandy road winding tortuously down the hill, in one curve of which a corn-laden wain crept its slow way. Between the elm coronal and a broken bit of common was a peep of blue sea, with white-sailed, motionless ships; right and left of us trees and woody ravine. We were not strictly in Dunwich then, but in the parish of Westleton, by which route we wended our way to the nearest station, nine miles distant; a pleasant walk through old-world villages with round-towered and thatched churches and gossip-seats on the green, through pleasant fields, where the cattle stood in the after-glow, and rustic bridges spanned the tiny streams, till the railroad brought us back to a modern busy world once more.

EMILY L. CORNISH.

CARDINAL YORK (Henry Stuart). — One day, in Campagna di Roma, we saw a splendid carriage and six horses of most brilliant caparison coming towards us across the plain. The carriage stopped; down went the window, and out came a head with a large red hat on it. He leant his arms on the window-ledge, saying, "Are you Englishmen?" "Yes, sir," I said. "Come to see Rome?" "Yes." And then he began asking questions, all of which I don't remember, till he stopped for a moment, and then, in a loud voice, said, "How are all my armies and navies in Britain?" I looked up with astonishment, and could not understand what he had to do with armies and navies. After staring in his face with amazement, I said, "The sailors are as jolly as ever, and the soldiers very comfortable in their barracks;" and while I still stood in confusion of mind, I saw him putting out his two fingers, and saying, "God bless you, my children!" he pulled up the window and drove off. Turning round, I went two or three steps to my companion, who stood behind me, and he said to me, "John, do you know who you have been talking to?" "No, Frank, I don't know him; who is he?" "That was 'Charley is my darling's' brother!"

Life of J. C. Schetky, Marine Painter, born 1778, died 1874.

FROM THE RECORDS OF WINCHESTER CATHEDRAL, A.D. 1182.

(A WORKMAN'S BILL.)

	s.	d.
For work done,
In soldering and repairing St. Joseph, .	0	8
Cleaning and ornamenting the Holy Ghost, ...	0	6
Repairing the Virgin Mary before and behind, and making a new Child,	4	8
Screwing a nose in the Devil, putting in the hair in his head, and placing a new joint in his tail, . .	5	6

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXII. | No. 1770.—May 18, 1878. | From Beginning, Vol. CXXXVII.

CONTENTS.

I.	POPULAR BUDDHISM ACCORDING TO THE CHINESE CANON,	Westminster Review,	387
II.	SECOND SIGHT. Conclusion. Translated for THE LIVING AGE, by	E. W. Latimer,	402
III.	THE POETRY OF DOUBT.—ARNOLD AND CLOUGH,	Church Quarterly Review,	410
IV.	MACLEOD OF DARE. By William Black. Part VIII.,	Advance Sheets,	421
V.	THOMAS ARNOLD, D.D.,	Macmillan's Magazine,	428
VI.	THE CHINA-CLAY INDUSTRY OF CORNWALL AND DEVON. By J. H. Collins, F.G.S., Secretary of the Royal Institution of Cornwall,	Popular Science Review,	434
VII.	FLOWERS OF ANGLO-INDIAN LITERATURE,	St. James's Magazine,	438
VIII.	THE LUXURY OF READING OLD NOVELS,	Spectator,	442
IX.	COURTESY AT HOME,	Saturday Review,	444
X.	THE CHINESE RECONQUEST OF EASTERN TURKESTAN,	Spectator,	446

POETRY.

TWO SONNETS,	386	IN A MEADOW,	386
A CHILD'S HEART,	386	A ROOM,	386

MISCELLANY, ... 448

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY

LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

For EIGHT DOLLARS, remitted directly to the Publishers, the LIVING AGE will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of THE LIVING AGE is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of LITTELL & GAY.

Single Numbers of THE LIVING AGE, 18 cents.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

TWO SONNETS.

HER LAUREATE.

I AM, indeed, no theme with you for song —
A poet you, yet not for me your praise —
You crowned another woman with your bays,
Lifting your voice to heaven, triumphant, strong,
And fear by future rhymes to do her wrong:
If I should walk beside you in your ways
An echo would pursue us from old days,
And men would say, "He loved once, and for long!
So now without great love he is content,
Since she is dead for whom he used to sing,
And daily needs demand their aliment."
Thus some poor bird who strives with broken wing
To soar, then stoops, strength gone and glad life spent,
To any hand that his scant food will bring.

HEREAFTER.

In after years a twilight ghost shall fill
With shadowy presence all thy waiting room —
From lips of air thou canst not kiss the bloom,
Yet at old kisses will thy pulses thrill,
And the old longing that thou couldst not kill,
Feeling her presence in the gathering gloom,
Will mock thee with the hopelessness of doom,
While she stands there and smiles, serene and still.
Thou canst not vex her then with passion's pain;
Call, and the silence will thy call repeat,
But she will smile there with cold lips and sweet,
Forgetful of old tortures, and the chain
That once she wore — the tears she wept in vain
At passing from her threshold of thy feet.

LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON.

Macmillan's Magazine.

A CHILD'S HEART.

BY THE REV. FREDERICK LANGBRIDGE.

Give me thy heart, O little child!
Just for one golden hour;
Thine eyes by passion undefiled,
Thy soft cheek's peachy dower.
Give me thy curls that float and fall
In tangles sweet and wild;
But more than all, oh, more than all,
Give me thy heart, O child!
O glad child's heart!

Give me thy heart of careless sun,
And I will give to thee
My present schemes, my triumphs won,
My dreams that might not be,
My precious hoard of garnered thought
Piled in the fruitful years,
My worldly wisdom, dearly bought
With blood, and toil, and tears,
O glad child's heart!

He gives his curls a saucy shake
And blithely darts away;
Not all the promises I make
Will tempt the child to stay.
For if he lent for one sweet hour
That priceless boon I lack,
Full well he knows no earthly power
Could make me give it back —
O glad child's heart!

Sunday Magazine.

IN A MEADOW.

How may a grateful mortal speak his thanks
For such a day as this? The rillet plays
Between a paradise of lilied banks;
Cool, sheltered by a million moving sprays.
The early sweets of life, that long had been Forgotten in the darkened days of pain,
Come back to give old charms to each new scene,
And withered hopes, like trees, grow green again.

Midmost the leafage of the bending lane,
Half hid in shade, half shining in the sun,
Rumbles the heavy, rocking farmer's wain;
And after it barefooted children run
To cheer the wagoner, and reach the hay
Plucked by the hedges; and old women sit
To knit in silence and to nod away
The hours on cottage-steps with noon-light lit.

Cassell's Magazine. GUY ROSLYN.

A ROOM.

In Florence, sacred to a great man's fame
Remains the room of Michael Angelo,
Wherein we softly breathe, with motion slow,
As if a spirit might intrusion blame.
Could it be yesterday he sketched the same
Sad *Dies Iræ all the world doth know,
Each touch itself a monument of woe;
Or are we captive to an ancient name?
Time's periods move with still increasing might
Of reverence, for the man whose cunning hand,
Direct from his soul's impulse, opened sight
To blind imaginations, whose command
Removed the hanging veil of Day and Night,
Where Death and Time are vanquished from the land.

Athenæum. J. W. INCHBOLD.

* The sketch for the "Last Judgment" is (or was till recently) there.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The Westminster Review.

POPULAR BUDDHISM ACCORDING TO THE CHINESE CANON.*

In the year 1875 there was delivered, at the library of the India Office in London, a collection of books in seven large boxes, carefully packed in lead, with padding of dry rushes and grass. The books are the Buddhist Tripitaka, in Chinese characters, with Japanese notations, issued in Japan, with an imperial preface, in the years 1681–1683 A.D. The entire series of two thousand volumes is contained in one hundred and three cases or covers. When placed in the library, they required eleven shelves of ten feet in length. This was the magnificent gift of the Japanese government to England, made on the suggestion of the ambassador who had recently visited Europe. He had doubtless been struck by the anomaly between the intense desire of the English to convert the heathen, and their profound ignorance of all religions except their own, and especially of the one which most closely resembles it, the state religion of his own country, Buddhism. Mr. Beal and Dr. Rost requested him to solicit the gift. No more appropriate gift could have been sent; and the secretary of state directed the Rev. Samuel Beal, professor of Chinese in the University of London, to prepare a "compendious report of the Buddhist Tripitaka." The result of his labors is the catalogue raisonné now before us. Professor Beal is well known as one of the first Buddhist scholars in Europe, and he had already reported upon the Chinese books in the library of the India Office.

The importance of the Chinese copy of the Buddhist canonical scriptures lies in the fact that it was commenced in the first century A.D. The translation was made from the Sanskrit, or from some Indian vernacular, by early Buddhist missionaries from India to China.

Like Socrates and other great religious teachers, Buddha taught only by word of mouth. Immediately after his death his disciples assembled in conclave to recall and commit to memory the words of the master. These "words" were, like the Vedas, handed down from disciple to disciple, until they were finally committed to writing.* They were divided into three parts, or baskets, Tri-pitaka: (1.) Doctrinal and practical discourses; (2.) Ecclesiastical discipline for the religious orders; (3.) Metaphysics and philosophy. So long as the words of Buddha were handed down by oral tradition, there was danger of heresies and false teaching; therefore, about the year 246 B.C., King Asoka, who stood to Buddhism in a relation similar to that of the emperor Constantine to Christianity, summoned a council to fix the canon. This council was to India what the Council of Nice became to Europe. The assembled fathers, who numbered a thousand, received the excellent advice from the king, that they should seek only for the words of the master himself, for "that which is spoken by the blessed Buddha, and that alone, is well spoken." The canon drawn up by this council is the one accepted by the southern Buddhists of Ceylon, Siam, and Burmah. None of the Pitakas can be traced back with certainty to an earlier date, although they contain matter which is much older. The northern canon, which is somewhat larger than the southern, was fixed at a council held in Kashmeer about the commencement of the Christian era. The Chinese is translated from this northern canon; and many of the monasteries in China contain complete copies of the scriptures in the vernacular, and also of the Sanskrit originals from which the Chinese version was made. Great impetus to the work of translation was given by the influx of Buddhist missionaries on the conversion of the Chinese monarch in the middle of

* 1. The Buddhist Tripitaka as it is known in China and Japan. A Catalogue and Compendious Report. By SAMUEL BEAL. Printed for the India Office. 1876.

2. A Letter to Dr. R. Rost, Librarian, India Office, London. By SAMUEL BEAL. Printed for the India Office. 1874.

3. A Catena of Buddhist Scriptures from the Chinese. By S. BEAL. Trübner. 1871.

4. The Romantic History of Buddha from the Chinese-Sanskrit. By S. BEAL. Trübner. 1875.

* Vassilief thinks that writing was not known in India until long after Buddha's death. "Der Buddhismus," 1860.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the first century of our era.* Thus, at the very time when Christianity was being carried westward into Europe by St. Paul and his companions, Buddhism was being carried eastward into China by missionaries no less courageous and zealous for the faith which they believed.

As Buddha did not claim any revelation, so the canon stands alone among the sacred scriptures of the world in not assuming any special inspiration for its contents: "For the attainment of those previously unknown doctrines, the eye, the knowledge, the wisdom, and the light were developed within me."

We propose to carry out the good intentions of the Japanese ambassador by giving an account of the life and teaching of Buddha as it is accepted by the popular Buddhist mind, apart from the metaphysical speculations of the philosophical schools in the scholastic and mystic periods.

I. The Personality. — In the fifth century, B.C., there arose in the civilized world the remarkable intellectual movement of which Pythagoras is the representative in Europe, Zoroaster in Persia, Buddha in India, Confucius in China. Buddha is more fortunate than the others in having bequeathed to the world not only words of wisdom, as did they, but also the example of a life in which the loftiest morality was softened and beautified by unbounded charity and devotion to the good of his fellow-men. His walk through life was along "the path whose entrance is purity, whose goal is love." The personality of the Buddha is still a living power in the world, and by its exquisite beauty it attracts the heart and affection of more than one-third of the human race.

Buddha is not, strictly speaking, the name of a man. The word means "the Enlightened," and is the title applied to a succession of men whose wisdom has enlightened mankind. It has, however, become identified with the founder of Buddhism, Gautama. Buddhists think it irreverent to say the word "Gautama," so they speak of him as the Buddha, Sakyamuni, "the sage of the Sakyas,"* "the lion of the tribe of Sakya," "the king of righteousness," "the blessed one." Gautama, then, is the Buddha, and his followers have been called Buddhists from the characteristic feature of the founder's office — he who enlightens mankind. Gautama claimed to be nothing more than a link in the chain of Buddhas who had preceded and who should follow him.† This modest claim is characteristic of great reformers: Confucius said, "I only hand on, I cannot create new things; I believe in the ancients." Mohammed claimed to return to the creed of Abraham, "the Friend." Nevertheless, the glory of a religion belongs to the founder, not to his predecessors nor his successors, he it is who makes all things new; and therefore it is to the life and teaching of Gautama that we must look for the mainspring of the religion. Buddha is one of the few founders of religion who did not claim a special revelation or inspiration: "I have heard these truths from no one," he said; "they are all self-revealed, they spring only from within myself." And he believed them to be true for all time: "The heavens may fall to earth, the earth become dust, the mountains may be removed, but my word cannot fail or be false."

Buddha commenced his preaching at the city of Benares on the banks of the Ganges, where Brahmanism was the religion of the mass of the people. He was a reformer. His reformation bears to Brahmanism the relation which Protestantism bears to Roman Catholicism, rather than that which Christianity does to Judaism, though it may be doubted whether a schism actually took place during Buddha's lifetime. It was primarily a protest against the sacrificial and sacerdotal system of the Brahmans; it rejected all bloody sacrifice, together with the priesthood and social caste so essentially bound up with them.

† Ramusat, "Foe-koue-ki," p. 41; Beal, "Fahian," pp. 20–22.

* Sakya = the able ones: "These princes are able to found a kingdom and to govern it. Hence the name Sakya" ("Rom. Hist." 23). Muni comes from man, to think; hence the thinker, the sage, the monk. Gautama is still the family name of the Rajput chiefs of Nagara, where Buddha was born.

† Traditional sayings of former Buddhas are translated in Beal's "Catena," pp. 158, 159.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

The logical consequence of animal sacrifice he admirably showed in the words: "If a man, in worshipping the gods, sacrifices a sheep, and so does well, why should he not kill his child, his relations, or his dearest friend, in worshipping the gods, and so do better?" But while Buddhism was opposed to sacerdotalism, it was in close alliance with the teaching of the philosophers, for all its main positions may be traced to their origin in the teaching of the philosophical schools of India.* Buddha states and accepts the high aim of these schools: "All the different systems of philosophy are designed to one end — to overthrow the strongholds of sin." He endeavored to popularize this end of the philosophy of the day, and to bring it within the comprehension of the poorest and most outcast of the people. Indeed, one secret of his success lay in the fact that he preached to the poor as well as to the rich, and that the common people heard him gladly.

II. The Birth and Early Manhood. — The birth of Buddha † is veiled in a myth, the outward objective expression of the inner subjective idea, which is the ethical centre of his religion, — unbounded self-sacrifice and tenderest compassion for mankind. The scriptures say that Buddha, having by the law of evolution passed through the various stages of existence, at length attained the perfection of being in the highest of the heavens. It was not necessary for him to be again re-born; he was prepared to pass into the rest and repose of nirvâna. Nevertheless, "he was so moved by the wretched condition of mankind and all sentient creatures, that by the force of his exceeding love" ‡ he took upon him the form of man once more, in order that he might "save the world" by teaching them the way to escape from their wretchedness, and attain that perfection to which he had attained, and enjoy the rest and repose of nirvâna. "I am now," he said, "about to assume a body, to descend and be born among men, to give peace and rest to all flesh, and to remove all sorrows and grief from the world." * He chose as his earthly mother the wife of the king of Kapilavastu, named Mâyâ, who was henceforth known as the "holy mother Mâyâ." He was her first and only son.† In an account of his incarnation contained in a Chinese translation made in the year 194 A.D., this event is literally translated: "The Holy Ghost descended into the womb." ‡ The purity of Mâyâ is described in a very beautiful sutra: —

* Prof. Monier Williams gives a popular sketch of these philosophical systems in "Indian Wisdom."

† M. Senart has investigated the story as a solar myth in his "Essai sur la légende du Bouddha, son Caractère et ses Origines." Paris, 1876.

‡ Catena, pp. 15, 130.

As the lotus springs unsullied from the water,
So was thy body pure and spotless in the womb.
What joy and delight was it to thy mother,
Desiring no carnal joys, but rejoicing only in the law,
Walking in perfect purity, with no stain of sin, etc., etc. §

The "incarnation scene" is frequently met with in the Buddhist sculptures at Sanchi and Amravati, which are about the date of the Christian era. Around this myth there have gathered a string of legends which bear a striking resemblance, and a no less striking difference, both to the Gospel history and the Apocryphal Gospels. On the day of the child's birth the heavens shone with divine light, and the earth shook withal, while angelic hosts sang, "To-day Buddha is born on earth, to give joy and peace, to give light to those in darkness, and sight to the eyes of the blind." The light shone because Buddha should hereafter enlighten the darkness of men's minds, the earth shook withal because he should shake the powers of evil which afflict the world. An aged hermit of the Himalayas is divinely guided to the spot where the young child lay in the arms of Mâyâ, his mother, and placing his venerable head under the tiny

* Rom. Hist., p. 33.

† St. Jerome says: "It is handed down as a tradition among the Gymnosophists of India, that Buddha, the founder of their system, was brought forth by a virgin from her side." — Cont. Jovian, i.

‡ "Catalogue of Buddhist Tripitaka," in the Indian Office, 1878, pp. 115, 116.

§ "Romantic History of Buddha," p. 275, a Chinese translation from the Sanskrit, made in the year 69 or 70 A.D. "We may therefore safely suppose," says Mr. Beal, "that the original work was in circulation in India for some time previous to that date." — Introd. vi.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY feet of the infant,* spoke of him as the "deliverer of sin and sorrow, and death." Weeping, he repeated the following canticle: —

Alas, I am old and stricken in years;
The time of my departure is at hand;
I rejoice and yet I am sad.
The misery and the wretchedness of man shall disappear,
And at his bidding peace and joy shall everywhere flourish.

And he added: "Alas! while others shall find deliverance for their sins, and arrive at perfect wisdom through the preaching of the child, I shall not be found among them." The princes of the tribe of Sakya brought rare and costly gifts and presented them to the child; but the brightness of his person outshone the lustre of the jewels, and a voice from heaven proclaimed:

In comparison with the fulness of true religion
The brightness of gems is as nothing.

The neighboring king of Maghadha is advised to send an army to destroy the child who is to become a universal monarch; but he answers: "Not so, if the child become a holy man and wield a righteous sceptre, then it is fitting for me to reverence and obey him, and we shall enjoy peace and safety under his rule. If he become a Buddha, and his love and compassion leads him to save and deliver all flesh, then we ought to listen to his teaching, and become his disciples." He astonished his teachers when he entered the schools of letters and of arms: they said, "Surely this is the instructor of gods and men, who condescends to seek for a master!" He simply said, "It is well; I am self-taught." † This is the only record of his youth until his twenty-ninth year, when he was converted.

It is difficult to assign any definite date to those legends. "All evidence tends to prove that they are earlier than the Christian era." ‡ There is little doubt, however, that they arose after the death of Buddha; because he would have rejected all such appeals to the miraculous. Buddha never refers to them,§ and when some enthusiasts sought a sign from him to convince the people, he answered, "The miracle my disciples should show is to hide their good deeds and confess their faults." * The chief are sculptured on the rails of the tope at Sanchi, which is a sort of Buddhist picture-Bible carved in stone.†

These legends are of comparatively small value, for they add nothing to the glory of the man's life, which, after his "conversion," became a life of the loftiest moral perfection and the noblest self-devotion to the good of others. Born the son of a king, he was brought up in all the luxury of an Oriental court. From this epicurean life he was converted by three sights — an old man tottering under the weight of his years, a young man tossing in the raging heat of fever, and a corpse lying exposed by the roadside. These sights made him reflect that though he were now young and vigorous, yet he, too, was liable to the sorrows of old age, disease, and death.

While he pondered in his heart over these things, he saw a holy mendicant with the placid expression of a disciplined spirit who had renounced all pleasures and had attained to perfect calm. He asked who the holy man might be, and was told: "Great prince! this man constantly practises virtue and flees vice; he gives himself to charity, and restrains his appetites and desires; he is at peace with all men; and, so far as he can, he does good to all, and is full of sympathy for all."

These sights depressed his spirits, and he sought for means to escape from such sorrows, if, indeed, they were not irrevocably fixed upon all men alike. Herodotus mentions a Thracian tribe who mourned when a child was born and rejoiced when any one died. The same sad aspect of life oppressed the mind of the young prince. His sadness was no selfish desire of escape from his own troubles; it arose from intense sympathy with the sorrows of others. As he walked about the palace, men heard him repeat: "Nothing on earth is stable, nothing is real. Life is passing as a spark of fire or the sound of a lute. There must be a Supreme Intelligence wherein we can rest. If I attained it, I could then bring light to men. If I were free myself, I could deliver the world."

This thought of the salvation of mankind and the deliverance of the world became the dominant aim of his life. On

* In Spier's "Ancient India" there is a drawing from the Cave of Ajanta, which represents the old man with the infant Buddha in his arms (p. 248).

† Cf. Apoc. Epistle of Thomas vi., Pseudo-Matthew xxx. xxxi. The same legend reappears in the biography of Nanak, founder of the Sikh religion (1469 A.D.). The "Adi Granth," p. 602. Printed for India Office, 1877.

‡ Beal's "Rom. Hist." ix.

§ Christ never refers to the events recorded in St. Matthew and St. Luke i. and ii.

* So Mohammed's reply: "My Lord be praised! am I more than a man sent as an apostle? . . . Angels do not commonly walk the earth, or God would have sent an angel to preach his truth to you."

† Fergusson's "Tree and Serpent Worship," p. 182.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the birth of his first-born son, the people flocked joyfully to the palace gates; but the sight almost moved him to tears: "All these people are without the means of salvation, without any hope of deliverance, constantly tossed on the sea of life and death, old age and disease; with no fear or care about their unhappy condition, with no one to guide or instruct them; ever wandering in the dark, and unable to escape. Thinking thus, his heart was moved with love, and he felt himself strengthened in his resolution to provide some sure ground for the salvation of the world." In the night watches he hears a voice calling him: "A man whose own body is bound with fetters, and who yet desires to release others from their bonds, is like a blind man who undertakes to lead the blind." In the daytime the songs of the singing-girls seemed to say: "Quit the world, prepare thy heart for supreme wisdom; . . . thy time is come, it behoveth thee to leave house and home." He again hears the divine voice —

Whatever miseries of life or death are in the world,
The Great Physician is able to cure all.

It is in vain that his father tries to dissuade him; he replies: "Your Majesty cannot prevail against my resolve; for what is it? Shall a man attempt to prevent another escaping from a burning house?" At length his resolution is taken: "I will go; the time is come to seek the highest law of life." *

Very touching is the account of the temptations of the young prince. When his child was born he said, "This is a new tie, yet it must be broken." At midnight he seeks the chamber where lay his wife; he pauses in the doorway — their first-born lay upon her breast. He fears to take the infant in his arms lest he should wake the mother. He tears himself away, vowing that he will return not as husband and father, but as teacher and saviour. He rides forth to the city gate; here Mâra, the evil one, meets him, and now by threats, now by the offer of the "kingdoms of the world" for his empire, seeks to turn him from his resolution. "A thousand honors such as those you offer have no charm for me to-day. I seek enlightenment. Therefore begone, hinder me not."

Riding far enough from the city to baffle pursuit, he turns to take one farewell look; he then dismounts, strips himself of his princely robe, and putting on a mendicant's dress, takes an alms-bowl * to beg his daily bread, and determines henceforth to be known by no other name than the recluse of the Sakyas, Sakyamuni.

Many were the temptations which now beset him; for "as a shadow follows the body, so did Mâra follow the blessed one, striving to throw every obstacle in his way towards the Buddhahood." The nausea of the mendicant's food, the recollections of the affection, the home, the kingdom he had renounced, tried him sorely. His father sent to entreat him to return to him, to his wife and child; he answered, "I know my father's great love for me, but then I tremble to think of the miseries of old age, disease, and death, which shall soon destroy this body. I desire above all things to find a way of deliverance from these evils; and therefore I have left my home and kinsfolk to seek after the complete possession of supreme wisdom. A wise man regards his friends as fellow-travellers, each one going along the same road, yet soon to be separated as each goes to his own place. If you speak of a fit time and an unfit time to become a recluse, my answer is, that death knows nothing of one time or another, but is busy gathering his victims at all times. I wish to escape from old age, disease, and death, and have no leisure to consider whether this be the right time or not." The beauty of his person and the wisdom of his mind induced a neighboring king to offer him a share in his kingdom; "I seek not an earthly kingdom," he replied; "I seek to become enlightened."

To attain this enlightenment, he first studied under the Brahmans, but he soon found that they and the Vedas could not help him. He next joined some hermits in the jungle, and underwent such austerities that, while his body became "worn

* The "fulness of the time" is marked by the conjunction of a certain star with the moon.

* The legend of Buddha's alms-bowl migrated to Europe as the legend of the Sanc Greal. Fa-hian, pp. 162–164. "Mémoires sur les Contrées Occidentales," by Hiouen-Thsang, A.D. 648. Stanislas Julien, i. 81. Fa-hian was told that when men became very bad, the alms-bowl should disappear, and then the law of Buddha would gradually perish. Hiouen-Thsang caught a glimpse of it in a cave: "Suddenly there appeared on the east wall a halo of light, large as an alms-bowl, but it vanished instantly. Again it appeared and vanished." Both these characteristics of the legend are unconsciously preserved by Mr. Tennyson in his "Legend of the Holy Grail:" —

"What is it?
The phantom of a cup that comes and goes.
. . . If a man
Could touch or see it, he was healed at once
By faith of all his ills. But then the times Grew to such evil, that the holy cup
Was caught away to heaven and disappeared."

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd and haggard," his fame as an ascetic "spread abroad like the sound of a great bell hung in the canopy of the sky." But after six years' trial, he found that the road to enlightenment did not lie through asceticism. Therefore he abandoned it, and enunciated one of the fundamental truths of his system, "Moderation in all things." He had tried the two extremes of luxury and asceticism; true enlightenment was not to be found in either. Then he learned that "like as the man who would discourse sweet music must tune the strings of his instrument to the medium point of tension, so he who would arrive at the condition of Buddha must exercise himself in the medium course of discipline." *

Once more he went begging through the villages. At length the day of enlightenment came, as he was seated one evening under a tree, which for many centuries afterwards became the most interesting object of the pilgrim's pilgrimage.† The temptation which preceded that supreme moment is most touching. A peasant woman led her little child by the hand to offer food to the holy man. The sight carried back his thoughts to the home he had left. The love of wife and child, the wealth and power of place, came upon him with a force overwhelmingly attractive. It was a sore temptation.‡ He agonized in doubt. But as the sun set, the religious side of his nature won the victory; he came forth purified in the struggle; he abandoned all — wife, child, home, princely power — in order to win deliverance for mankind: "I vow from this moment to deliver the world from the thraldom of death and of the evil one. I will procure the salvation of all men, and lead them across to the other shore." The supernatural side of this struggle is described with all the wealth of oriental imagery. Mâra § with his daughters and angels alternately rage against and caress him; all nature is convulsed at the conflict "between the saviour of the world and the prince of evil;" the earth shakes as she only does when a man's virtue reaches perfection or is utterly lost. The Buddhist description bears a striking resemblance to the passage in "Paradise Regained" in which the "patient Son of God" was tempted in the wilderness, and sat "unappalled in calm and sinless peace." * Buddha sat "unmoved from his fixed purpose, firm as Mount Sumeru," until Mâra, having exhausted all his powers, fell at his feet, in terror; and the cry went through the worlds of heaven and hell, "Mâra is overcome, the prince is conqueror." Then Buddha's mind was enlightened, and he saw the way of salvation for all living creatures.

From out the darkness and gloomy night of the world,
The gross darkness and ignorance that envelop mankind,
This Holy One, having attained the perfection of wisdom, Shall cause to appear the brightness and glory of his own light.

The tree beneath which Buddha attained enlightenment and the Buddhaship has become to his followers a symbol as expressive of their faith as is the cross to the Christian. The victory won beneath that tree has brightened, and to this day brightens, the lives of more men and women than does any other victory in the history of the world; for out of the thousand million inhabitants which it is computed people this earth, four hundred and fifty million are Buddhists. On that day heaven and earth sang together for joy, flowers fell around the holy one; "there ceased to be ill-feeling or hatred in the hearts of men; all wants of food and drink and clothing were supplied; the blind saw, the deaf heard, the dumb spake; the prisoners in the lower worlds were released; and all living creatures found rest and peace." †

III. The Enlightenment. — What was the enlightenment which made the young prince the enlightened one, the Buddha, who should enlighten the world? It was the way by which men should escape from the sorrows of old age, disease, and death. The way was contained in the four sublime truths, or noble truths, proclaimed in his first sermon, the sutra of "The Foundation of Righteousness." These truths are, (1) sorrow exists; (2) sorrow increases and accumulates through

* Cf. the philosophical position of the Hebrew preacher: "Be not wise overmuch; be not foolish overmuch; be not righteous overmuch; be not wicked overmuch" (Eccles. vii. 16, 17).

† Asoka's daughter brought to Ceylon in 245 B.C. a branch of this tree (Fiscus religiosa). The branch grew, and is now "the oldest historical tree in the world." Its history is preserved in a series of continuous chronicles, which are brought together by Sir Emerson Tennent, "Ceylon," vol. ii., pp. 613 sq. Fergusson, "Tree and Serpent Worship," p. 56.

‡ The temptation scene is figured on the middle beam of the northern gateway at Sanchi. Frontispiece to "Tree and Serpent Worship."

§ "Mâra est le démon de l'amour, du péché et de la mort; c'est le tentateur et l'ennemi du Buddha." — Burnouf, Introd. 76. Mâra, as the night-mare, still torments English people.

* Mr. Rhys Davids has worked out the parallel in "Buddhism," S.P.C.K. Ed.

† Rom. Hist., p. 225.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

desires and cravings after objects of sense; (3) sorrow may be destroyed by entering on the "four paths;" (4) the four paths are perfect faith, perfect thought, perfect speech, perfect deed.* These paths lead to the rest and repose of nirvâna.

Thus Buddha taught that it is through perfection of life that men attain enlightenment and knowledge. "Not study," he said, "not asceticism, but the purification of the mind from all unholy desires and passions," — a position we may place side by side with the words of Christ: "If any man willeth to do God's will, he shall know of the doctrine." The perfection of goodness, bringing with it the perfection of wisdom, Buddha taught as the end and aim of our existence. When man has attained this perfection, his soul is freed from all slavery to the objects of sense, and as there is therefore no longer any need for him to be re-born, he passes into the rest and repose of nirvâna, which is the perfection of being.

This religion of perfection Buddha based upon the cornerstones of self-conquest and self-sacrifice. Self-conquest is developed by the observance of the five commandments: "Thou shalt do no murder; Thou shalt not commit adultery; Thou shalt not steal; Thou shalt not lie; † Thou shalt not become intoxicated." The man who keeps these commandments orders his conduct aright, and "remains like the broad earth, unvexed; like the pillar of the city gate, unmoved; like the tranquil lake, unruffled." ‡ Self-sacrifice is to be shown by an unbounded charity, and a devotion to the good of others which rises to an enthusiasm for humanity.

The motive for this self-conquest and self sacrifice was, that by their development to perfection of character they would enable men to escape from the sorrows and miseries of life. This motive appealed to the common sense of mankind, for Buddha taught that every thought, word, and deed bear their own consequences. Goodness is rewarded, badness is punished, in the way of natural consequence; and these consequences continue through countless births and re-births on earth, in heaven, in hell. We are now reaping, in this present stage of our existence, the natural harvest of the seeds of good or evil sown by us in previous stages; we shall in the future reap the harvest of the sowing in the present. Whatever a man hath sown he is now reaping; whatever a man is now sowing, that shall he also hereafter reap. We are that which we have made ourselves in the past; we shall be that which we are now making ourselves. A man is born blind because in a previous stage of existence he indulged in the lust of the eye; a man has quick hearing, because in a previous stage he loved to listen to the reading of the law. Each new birth is conditioned by the karma — the aggregation of the merit and the demerit of previous births — the conduct of life.

A man once asked the master, "From some cause or other mankind receives existence; but there are some persons who are exalted, others who are mean; some who die young, others who live to a great age; some who suffer from various diseases, some who have no sickness until they die; some who are of the lowest caste, some who are of the highest; what is the cause of these differences?" To this Buddha replied: "All sentient beings have their own individual karma. . . . Karma comes by inheritance from previous births. Karma is the cause of all good and evil. It is the difference in the karma which causes the difference in the lot of men, so that some men are low and some exalted, some are miserable and some are happy. A good action well done, a bad action wickedly done, when they reach maturity, equally bear inevitable fruit." * The master himself had obtained the Buddhaship by the same law, "by the meritorious karma of previous births." Step by step had he won his way; born as a bird, as a stag, as an elephant, through each successive stage of human rank and condition by continued births had he at last reached the highest elevation of purity and self-sacrifice; and now he has come into the world the saviour of mankind, to teach them the way by which they might all attain to the same perfection.

* Nanak, the founder of the Sikh religion (1469–1538 A.D.), taught that nirvâna was to be reached by the four paths of (1) extinction of individuality, (2) disregard of ceremonies, (3) conversion of foes into friends, (4) the knowledge of good. "The Adi Granth, or the Holy Scriptures of the Sikhs," by Trumpp; Trübner, 1877.

† The absolute necessity of truthfulness is constantly enforced. Buddha once said to Mâra, "O Mâra! I am born a Kshatriya, and therefore I scorn to lie." This oath of the Kshatriya is the origin of "the word of honor" in chivalry. "Rom. Hist," 222, n.

‡ Dhap., xc.–xcvi.

* Hardy's "Manual of Buddhism," pp. 445, 446. The Jews believed in the pre-existence of souls (St. John ix. 2); see Lightfoot's "Exercit. Talmud" on this passage; Alger's "Critical History of a Future Life," New York, 1867, for the history of the subject. There is an interesting passage on pre-existence in Lessing's "Die Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts," which is pure Buddhism.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Of the first origin of things, of the first birth, Buddha knew nothing. "When he was asked whether the existence of the world is eternal or non-eternal, he made no reply," because he considered such inquiries of no profit. He starts from the material world and the conscious beings in it. Here he finds all things changing by the law of cause and effect; nothing continues in one stage. Then this reflection came into his mind. Birth exists, and is the cause of decay, disease, and death. Therefore, destroy birth, and the effects of birth are destroyed likewise; and this world, which is but a mass of sorrows culminating in decay and death, will be annihilated.

As of the beginning of existence, so of the end of existence Buddha knows nothing. He traces the progress of the human being as it develops towards perfection through a series of ever-ascending heavens, until the last and final heaven is attained. Gradually, by a series of steps, has all imperfection been purified, and man has become perfect, so far as the mind of man can conceive of perfection. And when made perfect, there is no further need for it to be re-born, because no more births could make it more humanly perfect than it is. Therefore it passes into the rest and repose of nirvâna, that transcendental stage of being which overpasses the horizon of man's conception. What the nature of that state may be Buddha knows not — it is nirvâna. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man." * Beautifully is it described as "the eternal place of bliss, where there is no more sorrow, no more disease, nor old age, nor death." It is the "home of peace," "the other shore of the ocean of existence," the "shore of salvation," the "harbor of refuge," the "mecicine of all evils." The rest and repose of nirvâna may be obtained on earth by the man who attains the ideal holiness. Indeed, Mr. Rhys Davids proposes to translate nirvâna by the word "holiness — holiness, that is, in the Buddhist sense, perfect peace, goodness, and wisdom." † Some people, not in harmony with the mind of Buddha, have spoken of nirvâna as though it meant annihilation. But there is no thought of annihilation in the mind of the founder who said, "I devote myself wholly to moral culture, so as to arrive at the highest condition of moral rest, Nirvâna." * There can be no thought of the loss of personal being in the place whose four characteristics are "personality, purity, happiness, eternity." †

Indeed, the controversy between the Confucians and the Buddhists in China turns upon the belief in a future life as a motive for virtue, as may be seen from the biographical section of the history of the Sung dynasty: "The instructions of Confucius include only a single life; they do not reach to the future state, with its illimitable results. His only motive to virtue is the happiness of posterity. The only consequence of vice he names is present suffering. The reward of the good does not go beyond worldly honors. The aims of Buddha, on the other hand, are illimitable. His religion removes care from the heart, and saves men from all danger. Its one sentiment is mercy seeking to save. It speaks of hell to deter from sin; it points to heaven that men may desire its happiness. It exhibits the nirvâna as the spirit's final refuge, and tells us of a body (dharmakâya) to be possessed under other conditions, long after the present body has passed away." ‡

Thus Buddha taught that the aim of life is perfection, and that rest and repose can only be found in the perfection of the moral and spiritual being. How closely this coincides with the teaching of Christ on this point five hundred years later, will appear from the words, "Be ye perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect," — τέλειοι, complete, all-embracing, godlike in your charity and love to others, like the Father, who sendeth his rain and maketh his sun to shine both on the evil and the good. Again, "He that is perfect shall be as his master," — κατηρτισμένος, fully instructed, well-conditioned, knowing his duty and doing it.§ So also St. Paul urges men to arrive at the "perfect man" (εἰς ἄνδρα τέλειον), "to the measure of the stature of Christ's fulness."

It is quite true that Buddha did not give as the standard of ideal perfection "our Father in the heavens," that most touching name by which the early Aryan clan spoke of God, and which reappears in the lan-

* 1 Cor. ii. 9.
† "Buddhism," p. 112; Childers' Pali Dict., "Nibbanam."

* Catena, p. 183.
† Letter, Dr. Rost, p. i.
‡ "Travels of Fa-hian," introd., p. xxvi. "If we look in the Dhammapada," says Prof. Max Müller, "at every passage where nirvâna is mentioned, there is not one that would require that its meaning should be annihilation; while most, if not all, would become perfectly unintelligible if we assigned to the word nirvâna that meaning." — Buddhaghosha, p. 41.
§ The Buddhistic spirit of this passage was pointed out to the writer by the veteran scholar, Mr. Bryant Hodgson.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374 Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

guage of their European descendants. Buddha, as a rationalist, knew nothing of a personal God, but only of his manifestation in the law of karma.

There are some who have described Buddhism as atheistic, but the mind which refuses to predicate attributes of God which it cannot prove is different from the mind which boldly asserts, "There is no God." It may be difficult to prove the existence of a personal God; it is not less difficult to prove his non-existence. Buddha neither asserted nor denied. Buddha is accused of atheism because he rejected Indra, Brahma, and the whole material pantheon; but the accusation comes with a bad grace from those who must know that the early Christians were called ἄθεοι, because they refused to believe in Jupiter and the other divinities of Greece and Rome. Buddha had a very high conception of deity; but so far did he push the refinement of deity or the divine existence, that he not only eliminated from it all human conditions and relationships, but he thought that it must embrace all existence. In other words, nothing really exists but it, and phenomenal existence is really phenomenal. Therefore, the leading idea of his religion, when regarded as a rule of faith for shaping our lives and raising them to the ideal of the divine, is that we must not only get rid of all the imperfections included in the idea of ill-conduct, but also the limitations included in the idea of individual existence. This is not pantheism, but, if anything, transcendentalism — a conception of deity which transcends human thought.

The idea of a perfect life on earth Buddha taught not merely by word of mouth, but also by the moral purity and the lofty purpose of his character, and by his devotion to the good of his fellow-men. Every Buddhist believes that it was Buddha's "exceeding great love" which moved him with compassion for suffering humanity, and brought him back from heaven to earth to teach mankind the way of salvation. His enemies blamed his disciples for applauding his saying, "Let all the sins that have been committed fall upon me, in order that the world may be delivered." * This spirit of self-sacrifice we constantly find in his disciples. For instance, King Rantiveda, who endured hunger and thirst that he might relieve others, says, "I desire not from the Lord that highest destiny which is accomplished in the eight perfections, neither do I ask to be exempted from future births. I seek to live within all corporeal beings, and endure their pains, so that they may be freed from suffering." * The traditions show this self-sacrifice pushed to the point of extravagance, in stories of Buddha having, in previous stages of existence, given his body to a famished tigress to enable her to succor her young. "As a mother," he said, "even at the risk of her own life, protects her son, her only son, so let there be good-will without measure among all beings. Let unmeasured good-will — unhindered love and friendliness — prevail in the whole world, above, below, around. If a man remain in this state of mind at all times, then is brought to pass the saying that is written, 'Even in this world has holiness been found.'" One of the highest acts of charity is to pray to a Buddha "from a desire to save all living creatures." "Our object should be by personal profit to profit others." "It is because men seek their own profit that sorrows come upon them." "Love is the greatest of all things, and frees the man whose heart is full of it from all bonds of ignorance and sin." † "When a man abstains from evil, and experiences in his heart a feeling of universal charity and love, and desires to arrive at perfection in order that he may benefit others, and from no selfish desire, then, like dry wood, the fire may be easily kindled." Indeed, Buddha is described as "that great man who, unaided, works out salvation for the world." ‡

IV. The Teacher. — Buddha, having attained this enlightenment, shrank at first from the task of proclaiming it to the world. Men, weighed down by sorrow, oppressed by false teaching, would not be able to understand this law of enlightenment; had he not better remain a solitary hermit? As he thought thus, the divine voice of his better nature spoke: "Oh, do not act thus; be not silent, but, for the sake of man sunk in sin, declare thy law! Let thy love constrain thee to do so, let thy compassionate heart move thee to declare thy law; for though the world be wicked, yet are there many prepared to receive this message of love and to be converted, many who would otherwise perish. Let the world-honored one, therefore, resolve to preach the law for the good of others." Then by the power of his wisdom he beheld the various conditions

* Max Müller, "Ancient Sanskrit Literature," p. 80. A similar noble sentiment was expressed by Moses (Exod. xxxii. 32) and by St. Paul (Rom. ix. 3).

* Bhâgavata Purâna, ix. 21.

† Cf. the Hebrew proverb, "Love covereth all sin" (x. 12), quoted in 1 Peter iv. 8.

‡ Burnouf, "Lotus de la Bonne Loi," p. 332.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

of men, in ignorance and in knowledge, like the lotus flowers in a tank, some emerging from the mud but not yet above the water, others above the water but not yet expanded, others just opening, waiting for his word to complete their development. Then his resolution was formed, and he said, "I am willing now to open the gate of immortality. If any will listen, let them come gladly; let them hearken as I declare the tidings of this law."

The first persons to whom he preached the kingdom of righteousness, or "turned the wheel of the law," were the five hermits who had been with him in the time of his penance, and who now dwelt in the Deer Park near Benares. Afterwards he went to preach in the city. An acquaintance met him on the road, and inquired whither he was going. "I am going to Benares," he answered, "to establish a kingdom of righteousness,* by giving light to those who are shrouded in darkness, and by opening to all men the gate of immortality." At Kapilavastu, he offered salvation to his father: "My father, when a man has found a treasure, it is his duty to offer the most precious of his jewels to his father first. Do not delay; let me share with you the treasure I have found." His wife had fasted and wept during his absence; he went to her, for he said, "She is exceeding sorrowful. Unless her sorrow be allowed to take its course, her heart will break. She may embrace me. Do not stop her." But when she saw him enter, no longer the husband she remembered, but a recluse with shaven head and face, and in the yellow † robe, she fell at his feet, and held them, watering them with her tears. Then, feeling how great was the distance between them, she rose and stood on one side. So they parted either from other, and in after years she became a Buddhist nun. His son came and asked for his inheritance. "The boy asks for an earthly inheritance which availeth nothing. I will give him a spiritual inheritance which fadeth not away. Let him be admitted among us."

Buddha preached to all men alike, but it was to the poor that his teaching came home with peculiar force; for he broke down the caste which degraded society; he taught them the way to escape from the sorrows of their daily life, and he held out to them a brighter future, dependent upon their goodness and their charity. He showed his love and compassion for them by becoming a poor man himself, although born son of a king. The people were astonished: "Our young prince is gone mad!"* The priests were indignant that one not of their order should teach the people; they were still more indignant when they heard him announce that no one was of a caste too low and despised but that he could attain to the moral perfection and the enlightenment of Buddha himself. Ananda, his favorite disciple, meets a poor Chandala woman beside a well of water, and asks her for a drink. She tells him she is a Chandala,† an outcast; but he replied, "My sister, I ask not after thy caste and thy family, I only ask for a draught of water." She became a disciple. "Not by birth," said Buddha, "does one become a slave (vasala), not by birth does one become a Brahman; one becomes a slave by bad conduct, as one by good conduct becomes a Brahman." "Not by plaited hair or family shall one become a Brahman; for what avail thy plaited hair and garment of skins when within thee there is impurity, and the outside only thou makest clean. He who walks truthfully and righteously, he is the true Brahman." ‡

No one was too unlearned. When Patisma, who could only learn one gâtha, attained supreme wisdom, men exclaimed, "How hath this man this wisdom?" Buddha replied, "Learning need not be much; conduct is the chief thing. Patisma has allowed the words of the gâtha to penetrate his spirit. . . . To explain one sentence of the law, and to walk according to it, this is the way to find supreme wisdom." §

No one was too poor to win Buddha's praise. He tells the story of a poor old woman who wished to offer him a gift. She had only two small coins (mites), so she spent them in buying a little oil, which she took to a sacred place, and burned it in a lamp to his honor. The lights of all the rich folk were extinguished, but hers burned on continually.‖ Poor people were able with a few flowers to fill his alms-

* This is the translation proposed by Mr. Rhys Davids for the usual Buddhist phrase, "to turn the wheel of the law." — Encyclopædia Britannica.

† This color was first chosen as one of contempt, being the color of old cast-off rags of white cotton cloth; it soon became the sign of the highest honor (Dhap. 9).

* Klaproth, Journ. As., vii. 181, qd. by Köppen.

† The Chandalas were the outcasts of Indian society; they had no caste. When they entered a town or market-place, they struck a piece of wood to keep themselves separate. People hearing their sound, avoided touching or brushing against them.

‡ Dhap. 393, 394. "Young philosophers assume a cloak and grow a beard, and say, 'I am a philosopher.'" — Epictetus, iv. 8. Cf. 1 Pet. iii. 3, 4.

§ Dhap. xvi.

‖ Beal's Letter to Rost, p. 7.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd bowl, although there were rich men who could not fill it with many baskets of flowers.*

During the famine a certain Pratyeka Buddha got up early one morning, and putting on his robe, took his alms-dish in his hand, and entered the city of Benares, where he begged from door to door. He obtained nothing, so he went home again, washed his alms-bowl, and sat down. Now there was in Benares a certain poor man who had watched the holy man, and seen that he received nothing; so he went to him, and invited him to his house to share all that he had, which was just one measure of coarse cockle-seed. A servant girl, whose mistress had refused to relieve a dirty old man, ugly and graceless, begged her daily portion of meal, and gave it in charity to the man; "for," said she, "in holy men one does not look for comeliness of person, but for purity of heart."

But not only did he preach to the poor and the low-caste, he preached to the rich and the high-caste also, and gathered disciples from all ranks of society. To all he laid down as the characteristic of the "true disciple, the disciple indeed" — "He ministers to the worthy, does harm to none, gives honor to whom honor is due, loves righteousness and righteous conversation, rejoices in meditating on the law, reflects in his life the divine wisdom, practises self-discipline in order to lead a pure and chaste life, always does good to those around him." For one class, indeed, he made special provision — the hermits. Brahmanism had developed by its teaching men who retired from the world under vows of chastity and poverty. Buddha had himself tried their system, and it had failed to give rest and repose to his spiritual being. He now offered to those ascetics the way by which they might escape from the sorrows of life and find spiritual rest. The way of salvation was the same for all men, but for those who desired to live a higher life he provided special "counsels of perfection." Hence there sprang the elaborate conventual system which so keenly exercised the speculation of the early Jesuit missionaries, and which is so powerful to this day in Buddhist countries. The monastic order was bound by vows of celibacy and poverty; but those vows did not bring in themselves merit, they were only to be regarded as a help to the men and women who bound themselves by them. All men and women were admitted without distinction of caste, and no one who was under age was received without the consent of their parents. They were not priests, for they neither offered sacrifice nor prayers. Originally they lived under trees, but they soon assembled in religious houses — the men in monasteries, the women in convents. Their time was spent in meditation, which is the effort of the "true self" to obtain freedom from the trammels of sense. "Cleansed from all personal defilement, the candidate," says Buddha, "comes out of the world, and is truly a homeless one — a disciple indeed." Henceforth he must give himself up to work and chastity, for "the man who has left home to become a shaman, and yet gives way to idleness and sloth, or whose mind hankers after impure indulgence, is like the rotten tree against which the wind blows, which can hardly resist its force, but is soon blown down."* To this day the admission of a neophyte is one of the most imposing ceremonies of the Buddhist culte.†

The number of inmates in some of the monasteries at the present day is enormous. Huc and Gabet found four thousand at Kounboun. When Father Bury saw the Chinese bonze tonsured, using the rosary, praying in an unknown tongue, and kneeling before images, he said, "There is not a piece of dress, not a sacerdotal function, not a ceremony of the court of Rome, which the devil has not copied in this country;" and the young De Beauvoir says, "What struck me was the outward resemblance of the religious ceremonies of the temples to those of our own religion. A bonze, surrounded with clouds of incense, and dressed in a chasuble of red silk, officiated with great pomp."‡ The rock-cut Buddhist temples of India, which date two hundred years before our era, have a nave, side aisles, and an apse round which the aisle is carried, resembling in form the early Christian churches. The rock-cut monasteries are also earlier in date than the Christian; there are between seven and eight hundred in India, dating from 200 B.C., to 500 A.D.

The wife of Buddha and their son were among the first admissions into the con-

* Travels of Fa-hian, p. 38.

* Dhap. xxxiv.

† The rules of the order are translated in Beal's "Catena," p. 240. The initiation is described by Rhys Davids in "Buddhism," p. 161. The two hundred and fifty monastic rules were translated into Chinese from the Sanskrit about 70 A.D., and are therefore anterior to Christian monasticism ("Catena," p. 189).

‡ Voyage, Japan, p. 151.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ventual orders; others quickly followed. We read of a young man whom Buddha called: "Follow me, Yasa." The youth passed on; but by night he returned secretly, and was so won over by the loving character of the master, that he became his disciple. He ordained fifty-four of Yasa's friends with the formula, "Follow me." One day a rich young man came to Buddha clothed in costly garments and riding in a sumptuous chariot; he wished to become a disciple. Buddha, looking on him, bid him return home and selling all that he had, bestow his wealth in charity, so as to fit himself to become a disciple.* Some joyous youths, looking in a wood for a dancing-girl, who had left them after a night's debauch, lighted on Buddha seated under a tree, and asked him if he had seen the girl; he answered, "Listen to me, O youths! I will ask you a question. Whether is it better, think you, to find yourselves, or to find the woman whom ye seek?" They replied, "It would certainly be better to find ourselves." Then Buddha invited them to sit down, and he taught them the way of salvation, and they became his disciples. He placed the highest ideal of purity before his disciples: "Say to yourself, 'I am placed in this sinful world; let me be the spotless lily, unsoiled by the mud in which it grows.' The heart is the busy contriver of lust; compose the heart, and those evil thoughts will all be still."

To all men Buddha taught the laws which ought to govern the life of man. We will mention a few of these.

One day Buddha found his disciples in fierce anger because the master had been reviled by a priest. Gently does he rebuke them: "Beloved! if others speak against me, or against the truth, be not displeased with them, or you will not be able to judge whether they speak truly or not."

There was no limit to the forgiveness of injuries. Among the parting words he spoke on the evening of his death are these: "If a man should do you such injury as to chop your body in pieces limb for limb, yet you ought to keep your heart in perfect control; no anger or resentment should affect you, nor a word of reproach escape your lips; for if you once give way to a bitter thought, you have erred from the right way." "To a man who foolishly does me wrong, I will return my ungrudging love; the more evil comes from him to me, the more good shall return from me to him." He explains to a young nobleman named Chamah the four aspects under which patience exhibits itself in a son of Buddha: "When reviled, he revileth not again; when smitten, he bears the blow without resentment; when treated with anger and passion, he returns love and good-will; when threatened with death, he bears no malice." "Liberality, courtesy, kindliness, and unselfishness are to society what the linch-pin is to the chariot."

He was singularly sympathetic, and could be touched by every tale of sorrow. The only child of a young mother died, and she carried the little cold body in her bosom, and going from house to house, entreated all she met to give her medicine to cure the child. Among others she met Buddha. "Lord and master," she said, "give me some medicine for my child." He bid her bring a handful of mustard from a house in which no child, parent, wife, husband, or slave, had died. She went to search; but she found that in every home death had entered; all said to her gently, "Lady, the living are few, the dead are many." Then at last, when she found no house free from death, the truth broke gently upon her. She laid down her baby boy and returned to Buddha, who, when he saw her, said, "You thought that you alone had lost a son; the law of death is among all living creatures; there is nothing that abides." She became his disciple.*

He set no limit to the power of faith. One day as Buddha was preaching by the side of a deep and rapid river, a man appeared on the other bank and walked across upon the surface of the water. The villagers, astonished, asked him by what power he did so marvellous a feat; he answered, "I asked the people on the other side if I might cross without a boat; they said, 'Yes, you can cross without fear;' then I walked over because I believed. Simple faith and nothing more enabled me to do so." Buddha said, "It is well spoken! well spoken! Faith like yours alone can save the world; such faith alone can enable men to walk across dry-shod to the other shore." "Faith with obedience is the path of wisdom." †

"As flowers, when waved to and fro by the wind, scatter their scent far and wide, so wide is the renown of the accumulated

* Rom. Hist., 378.

* Encyclopædia Britannica, Art. "Buddhism."

† Dhap. iv. The Dhammapada dates about 100 B.C.; it was translated into Chinese about 149 A.D., by An-shi-ko, a prince-royal of the Parthians (An-si), who left his kingdom, became a Buddhist monk, and went as a missionary to China.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd merits of him who once is born and lives as he ought."

Buddha once sent Ananda to ask an old man of eighty years why he had pulled down his old house and built a larger one, when death was so near. The man gave his reason, and stated the purposes of his numerous chambers. Buddha said, "'I have children and wealth,' such is the constant thought of the fool. He is not even master of himself; what then are his children and his money? The fool who says he is wise is foolish indeed." On the old man returning to his dwelling he suddenly fell dead from a blow.*

He was very tender and loving towards children. A child one day came beside him as he sat at a feast, and covered himself over with his robe. The disciples wished to drive him away, but "the world-honored one forbade them, and said, 'Let him stay, and let him hide himself in my robes.'"

V. The Missionaries. — The salvation of all men was a new thought in the world. It necessitated another thought equally new, viz., the duty of preaching the way of salvation to the world. The spirit of the true missionary inspired the soul of Buddha. As soon as he had sixty disciples, he said to them, "There is laid on us, who know the truth and who have been thereby made free, the duty of giving mankind the priceless blessing of salvation; go ye and visit the towns and villages throughout the land, preach the excellent law, and teach men to believe in the triple gem, Buddha, the law, and the church. Go ye, prepare the way for my coming; I will retire for a time into solitude." "Two by two" he sent them forth, and bid them take "only one robe, and one alms-bowl," for they were vowed to poverty. Poverty was their bride, charity their sister. As an earlier Buddha, Wassabhu Tathagata, had said, "As the butterfly alights on the flower and destroys not its form or its sweetness, but sipping forthwith departs, so the mendicant follower of Buddha takes not nor hurts another's possessions." † When he was left alone Buddha reflected, "These disciples of mine are gone to convert the world. Delivered from sin and at peace, they can now deliver others." "I will not die until this holy religion becomes known to many people, and is grown great, and is universally published among men." He then went into the solitudes of Uravilva, and prepared himself by fasting and meditation for the conversion of the fire-worshipper Kasyapa and his brothers. This missionary plan he carried out every year. In the rainy season he gathered round him his disciples for instruction, and in the dry season he sent them forth to preach the way of salvation and to make disciples.

The history of these missionaries is full of interest. The spirit that animated them may be gathered from the story of one who asked leave to preach to his relations. "'The people of that place,' said Buddha, 'are exceedingly violent. If they revile you, what will you do?' 'I will not revile again.' 'If they strike you?' 'I will not strike in return.' 'If they try to kill you?' 'Death is no evil in itself; I shall try neither to hasten nor to delay my departure.'" When threatened by an infuriated mob, one of the missionaries of later times confronted them with the words, "If the whole world were to come to terrify me, they could not cause me to be afraid." Then when he had persuaded the people to listen, he dismissed them with the simple words, "Do not hereafter give way to anger; do not destroy the crops, for all men love happiness. Show mercy to all living beings, and let men dwell in peace." * Missionary zeal carried on the work after Buddha's death, whose disciples went forth into all lands; and it received a great impulse after the Council of Asoka. The names of the missionaries mentioned by the chronicler are inscribed on the relics found at some of the stations.† The old chronicler closes his first chapter on missions with the words, "Who would demur, when the salvation of the world is at stake?"

The success of Buddhist missionaries is shown by the fact that after more than two thousand years "Buddism rules supreme in central, northern, eastern, and southern Asia, and it gradually absorbs whatever there is left of aboriginal heathenism in that vast and populous area." ‡

VI. Buddha's Death. — When Buddha was eighty years of age, he felt death coming on. He lay down under some sal trees, and calling his favorite disciples round him, he conversed with them long and earnestly. "It was now the middle of the night," says the sutra; "all was perfectly quiet and still." For the sake of his disciples he gave a brief summary of the law. We will quote a few passages: "Beloved, after my death keep my word

* Dhap. xii.
† Catena, p. 159.

* Max Müller, "Chips," vol. iv., p. 257.
† Köppen, "Die Religion des Buddha," p. 188.
‡ Chips, vol. iv., p. 265.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

with reverence, as the poor man the pearl of great price which he has found. . . . Keep the body temperate in all things. . . . By self-control and upright thought aim at emancipation. Conceal none of your faults, but confess them before the congregation. . . . Be content with such things as are allotted you. Keep your senses within bound, just as a shepherd with his crook prevents the sheep from straying into the neighboring pastures. . . . The heart is lord of the senses, govern therefore your heart well, for it is like a venomous snake, a wild beast, a cruel robber, a great fire. . . . Restrain therefore and keep in subjection your heart; let it not get the mastery. Above all things, let modesty govern every thought and every word of your daily life. It is characteristic of truly great men to keep the rules of moral restraint without wavering, and to exercise patience without tiring. Strive after wisdom, for it is a lamp shining in darkness, a medicine for all diseases, a hatchet to cut down the tree of sorrow, a strong and trustworthy boat to cross the sea of old age, disease, and death. Continual perseverance is like a little fire that keeps on burning, but he who tires in the practice of religion is like a fire that goes out. Never forget self-examination and meditation; for if you neglect them, all perseverance is at an end. In the practice of these you put on a helmet of defence, so that no sword can hurt you, and no enemy get the advantage over you. Think only of the words I have given you; meditate on them on the mountain-pass and in the depths of the valley, in the congregation and in the solitary cell. I, as the good physician, knowing the disease which affects you, give this as a medicine fit for the case; without this you die. Like the guide that knows the way, I direct you whither to go and what path to follow; without this you perish."

As Socrates in the "Phædo"* asks his friends if they have any doubts respecting the future life, so Buddha asks his disciples if they have doubts concerning the four noble truths which are the foundation of his teaching. They answer, that their only thought is "one of grief that the world-honored one is about to depart and enter nirvâna, just when we have entered on the practice of the law, — as in the night a flash of lightning lights up the way for the weary traveller and is gone, and he left to wander in the dark." He said, "Lament not my departure. If I continued in the world it would do no good; those who were to be saved are saved; those who are not saved shall be saved by the seeds of truth I have sown. The word I have preached is everlasting and imperishable. The world is fast bound in fetters and oppressed with affliction; I now give it deliverance, a physician who brings heavenly wisdom." His favorite disciple, Ananda, here turned aside to weep.* "I am not yet perfect, and my master is passing away." Buddha called him: "O Ananda! do not weep, let not your heart be troubled. Sooner or later we must part from all we hold most dear."

Then to all his disciples: "When I have passed away, and am no longer with you in bodily presence, do not think that the Buddha has left you, and is not still in your midst. You have my words, my explanations of the deep things of truth, the laws I have laid down; let them be your guide — Buddha has not left you. Beloved! if you revere my memory, love all the disciples as you love me. Love my words. Beloved! keep your minds on these. All other things change, my word changeth not. I will speak no more with you. I desire to depart. I desire nirvâna. These are my last words with you." As the sun rose, the old man calmly and unconsciously passed away." †

As at Buddha's birth the aged Asita laid his venerable head beneath the infant's feet, so at the funeral the "old and wrinkled" Kasyapa thrice perambulated the pyre,‡ and said, "May I once more behold the sacred feet, and bow my head before them." §

Legends collect around the funeral, which was by cremation, after the "old rule of the wheel kings." None could move the sacred coffin, which rose by itself into the air; none could light the funeral pyre, which became self-enkindled. Then, in order that the relics of the sacred body might be preserved, Sakra, pouring water from the golden pitcher, extinguished the

* Phædo, 84.

* Cf. Phædo, 59, 117.

† "Sutra of Buddha's Dying Instructions," translated in Beal's Letter to Dr. Rost, p. 9; and Rhys Davids, Encycl. Brit.

‡ So at the funeral rites of Patrocles —

"Thrice in procession round the dead they drove Their coursers sleek." — Il. xxiii. 13.

§ The last act towards a corpse among the Jews is for the friends to uncover the feet, and touching the two great toes, ask pardon for offences against them, and desire to be remembered in the other world. At the entombment of Pope Pius IX., the cardinals, in passing the body on their way to their seats in the chapel of the choir, each stopped for a moment and kissed his foot.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

flames of the royal sandalwood pyre.* The relics, which were like a heap of pearls, shed around sweet perfume. Afterwards came gorgeous retinues of the princes carrying golden vessels for the relics, each emulous to raise precious chaityas over the remains.

The personal influence of Buddha while he lived, the enthusiasm for humanity with which he inspired his followers, the attractive beauty of character which he bequeathed "a rich legacy" to mankind, place him as the central figure of his religion. The result has been that he has been idealized until he is regarded as divine, and omniscient, and free from all sin. "There is no deity above him; he stands out alone, unrivalled, unequalled, and unapproachable." † Prayers are addressed to him, flowers and incense offered, and his relics are enshrined in stupas. Nevertheless, Gautama stands but as one in a long chain of Buddhas who have preceded him, and who will follow. His teaching was higher and nobler than the teaching of those who came before him; the teaching of the Buddhas who will in the course of the ages follow will be greater and more divine than was his. Therefore he bade men look forward to and hail their advent.‡ The next Buddha will be Maitreya, the Buddha of charity.§

It is difficult to fix the exact date of Buddha's death; it may have been as early as 477,‖ or as late as 412 B.C.¶ Upon his death, Kasyapa claimed to be leader of the assembly, because Buddha had said to him, "Thou shalt wear my hempen robes." Therefore Kasyapa, fearing lest the words of Buddha should be forgotten, summoned an assembly of five hundred disciples; and the young Ananda, Buddha's beloved disciple, recited aloud the sutras. Missionaries carried the words abroad to all lands; the religion spread over India, and King Asoka made it the state religion of his dominions about the year 250 B.C. He promulgated decrees which remain to this day inscribed on stone pillars and cut in the living rock, enjoining morality and toleration, and justice and charity, on his subjects; commanding the foundation of hospitals; appointing a minister of religion, who should preserve the purity of the faith and protect the aborigines and subject nations, and a minister of education, who should promote the instruction of the women in the harems and elsewhere in the principles of the religion of Buddha. The son and daughter of Asoka introduced it into Ceylon, where it still retains its purity. Missionaries carried it into Kashmir in the first century, A.D., and into Burmah in the fifth century, and thence into Siam in the seventh century. In the golden age of India, the state religion was Buddhist. We catch glimpses of its influence in the travels of the Chinese pilgrims Fa-hian in 400 A.D., of Sung-yun, in 518, and of Hiouen-thsang in 629–648 A.D.* For a thousand years it maintained its supremacy. In the eighth or ninth century A.D., there seems to have been a reaction against it in favor of Brahmanism, and a persecution to have taken place, which was so thorough that there is now scarcely a Buddhist in India. In this it resembles the history of Christianity; the Aryan race from whose bosom it sprang cast it forth, and it became the religion of a race entirely different, the Turanian.

VII. Christians of all shades of opinion have spoken with reverence of Buddha. The Venetian Marco Polo said, "Indeed had he been a Christian, he would have been a great saint of our Lord Jesus Christ, so good and pure was the life he led;" and he tells us how pilgrims came to Adam's Peak in Ceylon "from very long distances with great devotion, just as Christians go to the shrine of Messer Saint James in Gallicia." † M. St. Hilaire says, "Je n'hésite pas à ajouter que, sauf le Christ tout seul, il n'est point, parmi les fondateurs de religion, de figure plus pure ni plus touchante que celle de Bouddha. Sa vie n'a point de tache. Son constant héroïsme égale sa conviction; et si la théorie qu'il préconise est fausse, les exemples personnels qu'il donne sont irréprochables. Il est le modèle achevé de toutes les vertus qu'il prêcha." ‡ An Anglican clergyman, Mr. Baring Gould, bears witness that "the ethic code of Buddha can hardly be ranked lower than that of Christianity; and it is immeasurably superior to every heathen system that the world has ever seen." §

* So Apollo sends a miraculous rain to preserve the body of Crœsus. Herod., i. 84.
† "Analysis of Religious Belief," Lord Amberley, ii. 146.
‡ Cf. Phædo, 78; Alcibiades, ii.
§ Maitreya, possessed of love, (root maitra, love or charity). Fa-hian, p. 20 n.
‖ Max Müller, "Chips," i. 311.
¶ Rhys Davids' "Ancient Coins and Measures of Ceylon."
 Westminster Review, New Series, civ., p. 435.

* "Mémoires sur les Contrées Occidentales," by Hiouen-thsang, A.D. 648, St. Julien. Paris, 1857.
† Yule's ed., ii. 258. "He only is a pilgrim who goeth towards or frowards the house of St. James, . . . who journey unto the holy house of Gallicia." — Dante, "Vita Nuova."
‡ Le Bouddha et sa Religion, introd. v.
§ Development of Christianity, i. 357.

Generated on 2020-05-10 18:32 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079570374
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

But, most remarkable of all, is the fact that Buddha is a canonized saint of the Christian Church. St. John of Damascus in the eighth century wrote a religious romance, of which the narrative is taken from the "Lalita Vistara," the story of Buddha's life. It became very popular in the Middle Ages, and the hero was canonized. He has his festal days in the Roman communion on the 27th November, in the Eastern on 26th August, under the name of Josaphat, a corruption of Bodhisattva.*

In all times and in all places men have lived pure and holy lives, and have shown themselves Christians even "before Christ came in the flesh." † Buddha, whose teaching approaches nearer than does that of any other founder of a religion to the teaching of Christ, has won, by the attractive beauty of his character, the unconscious homage of Christendom. He has been placed in the golden roll of Christian saints, side by side with St. Francis d'Assisi and other founders of religious orders, with St. Francis Xavier and other missionary heroes, and with Francis de Sales and other saintly men. Worthily does he stand among "the sons of God who were righteous in their lives." ‡ "THEY WERE LOVELY AND PLEASANT IN THEIR LIVES, AND IN THEIR DEATH THEY WERE NOT DIVIDED."

* Max Müller, "Chips," iv. 174–189; Beal's "Fahian," p. 86, n.
