

Cornell University Library

Ithaca, New York

FROM THE

BENNO LOEWY LIBRARY

COLLECTED BY

BENNO LOEWY

1854-1919

BEQUEATHED TO CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Cornell University Library
E 340.C54B87 1879

The life of Rufus Choate /

3 1924 016 841 037

olin

Cornell University Library

The original of this book is in the Cornell University Library.

There are no known copyright restrictions in the United States on the use of the text.

<http://www.archive.org/details/cu31924016841037>

THE LIFE OF RUFUS CHOATE.

Portrait of the author from a photograph by Southworth & Hawes

13 miles Chouk

THE LIFE OF
RUFUS CHOATE.

BY
SAMUEL GILMAN BROWN,
PRESIDENT OF HAMILTON COLLEGE.

Ἐν μύρτου κλαδί τὸ ξίφος ἐφόρει.

THIRD EDITION.

BOSTON:
LITTLE, BROWN, AND COMPANY.

1879.

D. K. F.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1878, by

LITTLE, BROWN, AND COMPANY,

In the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the District of Massachusetts.

11046B

CAMBRIDGE :

PRESS OF JOHN WILSON AND SON.

IS RESPECTFULLY INSCRIBED,
THIS THIRD EDITION OF THE LIFE OF RUFUS CHOATE
MASSACHUSETTS, FOR THIRTY YEARS CHIEF JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF

LEMUEL SHAW, L.D.,

OF

TO THE MEMORY

P R E F A C E

TO THE

THIRD EDITION OF THE LIFE.

IT is now more than nineteen years since the death of Mr. Choate, but the interest in the man as scholar, advocate, master of eloquence, statesman, and patriot, seems hardly to have diminished: seems, indeed, of late, to have revived and spread. His genius has formed the subject of lectures and critical essays to many audiences, and in publications widely separated. It would be impossible to refer to these in detail, but it may be proper to mention a lecture by James T. Fields, Esq., of Boston; a thoughtful and discriminating article in "The Western," — a magazine published in St. Louis; a critical essay in "Harper's Monthly" (republished, with additions, in the "Half Hour Series"), by Edwin P. Whipple, Esq.; two articles published in the "Albany Law Journal," in 1876, by Irving Browne, Esq.; and, especially, a series of papers in the "Albany Law Journal," extending through many months of the years 1877 and 1878, by his Honor Judge Neilson, of the City Court, Brooklyn. It is to be hoped that this last-named series, containing reminiscences gathered with much care from gentlemen in almost all departments of professional and public life,—the earlier and the later friends of Mr. Choate, — will be published in a form easily accessible to the many who would delight to read them.

The second edition of the Life of Mr. Choate has for some time been nearly out of print, and is now entirely so. The present edition, somewhat enlarged from the former ones, will, I hope, meet the wishes of those who desire to possess some authentic record of a great lawyer and advocate, whose sweetness of temper, and unselfish love of all things great and good, were almost as remarkable as the acknowledged splendor of his genius.

S. G. B.

HAMILTON COLLEGE,
CLINTON, N. Y., Dec. 14, 1878.

P R E F A C E

TO THE

SECOND EDITION OF THE LIFE.

THE first edition of the Works of Mr. Choate, with the Memoir of his Life, was early disposed of, and for many years it has been almost impossible to obtain a copy. In the mean time the wish has been frequently expressed that the Life might be republished by itself. In accordance with this desire, the present edition has been prepared. Although in the main unchanged, it will be found to contain some additions in the form of letters, reminiscences, and selections from the writings of Mr. Choate.

While I cannot fail gratefully to recognize the kindness with which the work, as originally published, was received, especially by those most competent to judge, — the members of the Massachusetts Bar, and those who knew Mr. Choate most familiarly, — yet I cannot but feel more than ever how inadequate is any delineation to present a complete picture of that subtle, versatile, and exuberant mind, “to display with psychological exactness" (if I may use his own words) "the traits of his nature," to unveil "the secrets — the marvellous secrets — and sources of that vast power which we shall see no more in action, nor aught in any degree resembling it among men."

We shall not fail, however, I trust, to learn some lessons of fidelity, and unsparing diligence, and unremitting labor, for which no genius can prove a substitute, as well as those other lessons of high purpose, and broad patriotism, which informed his life, and which the new condition of the Republic demands of us even more strenuously than did the old.

S. G. B.

HAMILTON COLLEGE,
CLINTON, N. Y., Dec. 22, 1869.

P R E F A C E

TO THE

FIRST EDITION OF THE LIFE AND WORKS.

WHEN first requested to prepare a sketch of the life of Mr. CHOATE, I was not ignorant of the difficulty of writing it so as to present a fair and complete portraiture, — the traits of his character were so peculiar, its lights and shades so delicate, various, and evanescent. The difficulty has not grown less as I have proceeded with the work, and no one, I think, can be so well aware as I am, of its insufficiency.

It may seem singular that none of Mr. Choate's addresses to a jury are included in this collection of his speeches, — that the department of eloquence in which perhaps he gained his greatest fame should here be unrepresented. In this disappointment, those by whom this selection has been made certainly share. It was not until the very last, and after making a careful examination of every accessible report of his legal arguments, that they reluctantly came to the conclusion that no one remained which, considering the nature of the subject, or of the report itself, would do justice to the advocate, or very much gratify the reader.

As to Mr. Choate's political sentiments and action during the later years of his life, it did not seem necessary to do more than to give his opinions as they were honestly formed and frankly expressed. The time has not yet come for treating fully and with entire fairness the questions of those days. One still "walks on ashes thinly covering fires."

A word should perhaps be said with reference to the fragments of translations from Thucydides and Tacitus, which close these volumes. They were prepared solely as a private exercise and for a personal pleasure and advantage. They were never revised, and are given precisely as found on loose scraps of paper, after Mr. Choate's decease. But they have struck me, as well as others upon whose better judgment I have relied, as affording examples of felicitous and full rendering of difficult authors, and as indicating something of the voluntary labors and scholarly discipline of an overtaxed lawyer, who, amidst the unceasing and wearisome calls of an exacting profession, never forgot his early love of letters.

No one unacquainted with Mr. Choate's handwriting can understand the difficulty of preparing his manuscripts for the press. For performing so well this very perplexing labor, the public are chiefly indebted to RUFUS CHOATE, Jr., and EDWARD ELLERTON PRATT, Esqs.

With a singular and almost unaccountable indifference to fame, Mr. Choate took no pains to preserve his speeches. The manuscript of the lecture, — written at first with the most rapid pen, with abbreviations, erasures, and interlineations, — had no sooner fulfilled its temporary purpose, than it was thrust among waste papers, and forgotten. He had not the time, or could not bring himself to take the trouble to recall his lost orations or legal arguments. His lecture on the Romance of the Sea, one of the most beautiful and popular of his lectures, was lost or stolen in New York. He was solicited to rewrite it, and could doubtless, at any time for years afterward, have reproduced the whole — — “apparell’d in more precious habit,

More moving-delicate, and full of life,”

than at first, but other matters seemed to him of more importance, and the half promise with which he beguiled his friends was never fulfilled.

When urged, as he frequently was, to prepare a volume of speeches for the press, he usually quieted the solicitor by seeming to accede to his request, or evaded him by some rare bit of pleasantry.

It is a matter of congratulation, then, that so much has been rescued from irretrievable loss. It has even been found necessary, in order not to overcrowd the volumes, to omit many lectures and speeches, which all who heard them would doubtless be glad to possess in a permanent form. Among these are several congressional and political speeches, his speech in the Massachusetts Convention on The Basis of Representation, and his lectures on The Influence of Great Cities, on The Mercantile Profession, on Macaulay, on Rogers, on Jefferson, Hamilton, and Burr, and an earlier lecture on Poland.

The engraving which accompanies this volume, from a photograph by Messrs. SOUTHWORTH & HAWES, is considered the best likeness which exists of Mr. Choate in repose. A very striking portrait by MR. AMES, — the original of which is in Dartmouth College, — gives the orator in action. Besides these, MR. BRACKETT has moulded a spirited head in plaster, and MR. THOMAS BALL has sculptured one in marble, which for dignity, force, and truthfulness, can hardly be surpassed.

While I have received aid from many sources, which I should be glad particularly to designate, I cannot help acknowledging my special obligation to the Members of the Bar, especially of Suffolk and of Essex, many of whom I have had occasion to consult, and from all have received every assistance possible without reserve or hesitation. I am also much indebted to the courtesy of Mr. EVERETT for kindly placing at my disposal books and manuscripts not easily accessible elsewhere, which were indispensable in preparing the sketch of Mr. Choate's life in Congress; and to EDWARD G. PARKER, Esq., for a free use of materials which he had collected in preparing his "Reminiscences."

The publication of these volumes, though ready for the press many months since, has been delayed by causes which will occur to every one. In the great peril of the Republic, what else could be thought of? What eloquence be heard but that of the civil war? But the counsels of the wise will acquire a deeper meaning, and the eloquence of patriotism be listened to with a readier acquiescence, when from the present tumult and strife we shall emerge upon another era "bright and tranquil."

S. G. B.

HANOVER, N. H., October 13, 1862.

CONTENTS.

| | PAGE |
|--|------|
| CHAPTER I. — 1799–1830 | 1 |
| Birth — Ancestry — Boyhood — Account by his Brother — Studies — Characteristics — Enters College — Rank — Testimony of Classmates — Dartmouth College Case — Its Influence on his Choice of a Profession — Extract from Judge Perley's Eulogy — Tutor at Dartmouth — Letter from Dr. Sewall — Enters Law School in Cambridge — Goes to Washington and studies with Mr. Wirt — Death of his brother Washington — Returns to Essex — Admission to the Bar — Testimony of Mr. Wirt — Opens an Office in South Danvers — Letter to James Marsh — Marriage — Success — Fidelity to Clients — Letter from Judge Shaw — Testimony of Hon. Asahel Huntington. | |
| CHAPTER II. — 1830–1840 | 41 |
| Removal to Salem — The Essex Bar — Successes — Appearance — Counsel in the Knapp Case — Studies — Letter to President Marsh — Elected to Congress — Commonplace Book — Letter to President Marsh — Enters Congress — Speeches on Revolutionary Pensions, and on the Tariff — Letter to Dr. Andrew Nichols — Letters to Professor George Bush — The Second Session — Georgia, and the Missionaries to the Indians — Letter to Professor Bush — Re-elected to Congress — Speech on the Removal of the Deposits — Resigns his Seat — Removes to Boston — Lecture on the "Waverley Novels," and on "The Romance of the Sea" — Death of his Youngest Child. | |

CHAPTER III.—1841–1843 71

Professional Advancement—Letters to Richard S. Storrs, Jr.—Chosen Senator in place of Mr. Webster—Death of General Harrison—Eulogy in Faneuil Hall—Extra Session of Congress—Speech on the M'Leod Case—The Fiscal Bank Bill—Collision with Mr. Clay—Nomination of Mr. Everett as Minister to England—Letter to Mr. Sumner—Letters to his Son—The next Session—Speech on providing further Remedial Justice in the United States Courts—Letters to Mr. Sumner—The North Eastern Boundary Question—Journal.

CHAPTER IV.—1843–1844 106

Address before the New England Society of New York—Letter from Mr. Van Cott—Letter to Professor Bush—Letters to Charles Sumner—Letter to his Daughters—Speech on Oregon in reply to Mr. Buchanan—Recollections of Alexander H. Stephens—First Speech on the Tariff—Second Speech in reply to Mr. M'Duffie—Journal.

CHAPTER V.—1844–1845 141

Political Excitement—Speaks for Mr. Clay—Meeting of Congress—Diary—Annexation of Texas—Admission of Iowa and Florida—Establishment of the Smithsonian Institution—Library Plan—Letters to Hon. C. W. Upham—Illness of Dr. Sewall—Letter to Mrs. Brinley.

CHAPTER VI.—1845–1849 165

Address before the Law School in Cambridge—Argues the Case of Rhode Island v. Massachusetts—Defence of Tirrell—The Oliver Smith's Will Case—Speaks in favor of General Taylor—Offer of a Professorship in the Cambridge Law School—Offer of a Seat upon the Bench—The Phillips Will Case—Journal.

CHAPTER VII.—1850 215

Change of Partnership—Voyage to Europe—Letters to Mrs. Choate.—Journal.

PAGE

CHAPTER VIII. — 1850–1855 249

Political Excitement — Union Meetings — Address on Washington, February, 1851 — The Case of Fairchild v. Adams — Address before the "Story Association" — Webster Meeting in Faneuil Hall, November, 1851 — Argues an India-Rubber Case in Trenton — Baltimore Convention, June, 1852 — Address to the Phi Beta Kappa Society, Burlington, Vt. — Journey to Quebec — Death of Mr. Webster — Letter to E. Jackson — Letter to Harvey Jewell, Esq. — Letter to Mrs. Eames — Offer of the Attorney-Generalship — Convention to revise the Constitution of Massachusetts — Eulogy on Daniel Webster, at Dartmouth College — Letter to his Daughter — Letters to Mrs. Eames — Letter to Mr. Everett — Letters to his Son — Letters to his Daughter — Address at the Dedication of the Peabody Institute, September, 1854 — Letters to Mr. Everett — Letter to Mrs. Eames — Accident and Illness — Letters to Mr. and Mrs. Eames.

CHAPTER IX. — 1855–1858 301

Love of the Union — Letter to the Whig Convention at Worcester, October, 1855 — Letter to Rev. Chandler Robbins — Letter to Mr. Harvey — Letter to Mr. Everett — Lecture on the Early British Poets of this Century, March, 1856 — Sir Walter Scott — Political Campaign of 1856 — Determines to support Mr. Buchanan — Letter to the Whigs of Maine — Address at Lowell — Letter to J. C. Walsh — Professional Position — His Library — Lecture on the Eloquence of Revolutionary Periods, February, 1857 — Defence of Mrs. Dalton — Oration before the Boston Democratic Club, July 4th, 1858.

CHAPTER X. — 1858–1859 358

Failing Health — Speech at the Webster Festival, January, 1859 — Address at the Essex Street Church — Last Law Case — Goes to Dorchester — Occupations — Decides to go to Europe — Letter to Hon. Charles Eames — Letter to Alfred Abbott, Esq. — Sails in the Europa, Captain Leitch — Illness on Board — Lands at Halifax — Letter from Hon. George S. Hillard — Sudden Death — Proceedings of Public Bodies —

Meeting of the Boston Bar—Speeches of Hon. C. G. Loring, R. H. Dana, Jr., Judge Curtis, and Judge Sprague—Meeting in Faneuil Hall—Speech of Mr. Everett—Funeral.

CHAPTER XI. 413

Letter from Hon. John H. Clifford—Reminiscences of Mr. Choate's Habits in his Office—Thoroughness of Preparation of Cases—Manner of Legal Study—Intercourse with the Younger Members of the Bar—Manner to the Court and the Jury—Charges and Income—Vocabulary—Wit and Humor—Anecdotes—Eloquence—Style—Note from Rev. Joseph Tracy—Memory—Quotations—Fondness for Books—Reminiscences by a Friend—Life at Home—Conversation—Religious Feeling and Belief.

APPENDIX 489

INDEX 495

M E M O I R
OF
R U F U S C H O A T E.

CHAPTER I.

1799-1830.

Birth of Rufus Choate — Ancestry — Boyhood — Account by his Brother — Studies — Characteristics — Enters College — Rank — Testimony of Classmates — Dartmouth College Case — Its Influence on his Choice of a Profession — Extract from Judge Perley's Eulogy — Tutor at Dartmouth — Letter from Dr. Sewall — Enters Law School in Cambridge — Goes to Washington and studies with Mr. Wirt — Death of his brother Washington — Returns to Essex — Admission to the Bar — Testimony of Mr. Wirt — Opens an Office in South Danvers — Letter to James Marsh — Marriage — Success — Fidelity to Clients — Letter from Judge Shaw — Testimony of Hon. Asahel Huntington.

IN the south-eastern part of the old town of Ipswich, Mass., on an island which rises in its centre to a considerable elevation and commands a view of the open ocean and the neighboring villages, RUFUS CHOATE was born, as his father, with ancient precision, recorded the event in the Family Bible, "Tuesday, Oct. 1, 1799, at 3 o'clock, P.M." He was the second son, and the fourth of six children. The district was then called Chebacco: it has since been formed into a separate town bearing the name of Essex. The inhabitants, for the most part devoted to agriculture, were enterprising, frugal, thrifty, and intelligent. The earliest ancestor of Mr. Choate in this country was John Choate, who took the oath of allegiance in 1667. From him, the subject of this biographical sketch is of the fifth generation by direct descent. The family spread widely in Essex County, and several members of it attained to considerable distinction.¹

The paternal grandmother of Mr. Choate, whose maiden name was Mary Giddings, was a matron worthy of the best days of New England.² His father was David Choate, a man of uncommon intellectual endowments, of sound and independent judgment, a wise counsellor, sociable, sagacious, modest, keen, and witty. He was held in high estimation as a man of stability, unswerving integrity, and weight of character, and was often chosen to fill places of responsibility and trust.

On one occasion, as administrator on the estate of his uncle, John Choate, he was obliged to go to Boston to look after a case in court. At the trial, the counsel upon whom he had relied failed to appear. Mr. Choate thereupon asked that the cause might be continued. On stating the matter as clearly as he could, the judge, after a little consultation, said to him, "I think you understand the case, Mr. Choate, and we can manage it together. You had better conduct it yourself." Thus unexpectedly summoned to the bar, after some hesitation he called his witnesses, made his argument, and obtained a verdict.

¹ In 1741, John Choate, Esq., was a member of the House of Representatives for Ipswich, and was elected Speaker; but the election was negatived by Governor Belcher. He continued a prominent member of the House — his name appearing on many important committees — till 1761, — when he was elected into the Board of Councillors, (who were then what both the Senate and Council now are in Massachusetts), to which responsible position he was re-elected every successive year till 1766.

² Her courage is indicated by an anecdote told of her, that in the war of the Revolution, when all the men left the island, driving to the uplands the herds of cattle which would otherwise have offered a tempting prize to the British cruisers, she, with her two small children, remained fearless upon the farm.

There is a report, which seems to rest on good authority, that at the time of the ratification of the Federal Constitution in Massachusetts he wrote several articles for a Boston newspaper in favor of that measure, under the signature of "Farmer," some of which were currently ascribed to Theophilus Parsons, already an eminent lawyer, and afterwards Chief Justice of the State. Mr. Choate died in 1808, before his son had attained his ninth year.

The mother of Rufus was Miriam Foster, a quiet, sedate, but cheerful woman, dignified in manner, quick in perception, of strong sense and ready wit. Her son was said to resemble her in many characteristics of mind and person. She lived to see his success and enjoy his fame, and died in 1853, at the venerable age of eighty-one.

When his son was about six months old, Mr. David Choate removed from the island to the village on the mainland, about three miles distant, but still retained the old homestead. It had been in possession of the family for four generations, and for more than a hundred years, and is still owned by the descendants of an older brother of Mr. Choate.¹ An arm of the sea flows pleasantly about it, and a little creek runs up to within twenty rods of the old dwelling, which stands on the hillside, hardly changed from what it was sixty years since, of two stories, heavy-timbered, low-roomed, with beams across the ceiling, bare and weather-beaten, but with a cheerful southerly outlook towards the marshes, the sea, and the far-off rocky shore of Cape Ann.

¹ Hon. David Choate, greatly honored and beloved by all who knew him, died Dec. 17, 1872.

The new residence still commanded a view of the ocean. The little village was the head of navigation for a species of fishing-craft much built there, known along the coast as "Chebacco boats." Frequent excursions to the old farm were, of course, necessary; and these little voyages down the river which forces its crooked way through the salt marshes, were generally made in a canoe dug out of a solid log. During the war of 1812, the English and American cruisers were frequently seen in the bay. On one occasion especially, the "Tenedos" and "Shannon," tall and beautiful, "sitting like two swans upon the water," were watched from the shore with great interest, and by none with more concentrated gaze than by the boy Rufus. All these circumstances, — the murmur of the sea which lulled him to sleep, the rage of the ocean in a storm, the white sails in the distant harbor, the boats which went out of the river and never returned, the stories of adventures and perils, — naturally tended to stimulate his imagination, to cherish that love of the sea which became almost a passion, and which so often shows itself in his speeches and writings. To the last, he thought that to be a sea-captain was "eminently respectable." Accounts of naval battles he read with the greatest eagerness; and many were the mimic contests on land to which they gave birth. "I well remember," says his brother, "his acting over certain parts of a sea-fight with other boys, he telling them what to do, how to load, at what to aim, not how to strike a flag (that never seemed to come into the category), but how to nail one to the mast, with orders to let it wave while he lived. Many of his chimney-corner sports had relation to either naval or land engagements. I remember that while he and Washington¹ were waiting for the family to breakfast, dine, or sup (that was the way the children were then taught to do), one would have the dog and the other the cat, each holding it fast; and, at the signal, bringing them suddenly together, in imitation of two hostile ships or armies, Rufus, in the mean time, repeating the story of a real or imagined fight with as much volubility as he ever afterwards used in court, and with such an arrangement of the plan of the fight as made all seem wonderfully real."

Scenes of military and naval life fastened strongly upon his imagination. He often said that nothing ever made a deeper impression upon his boyish mind than the burial of an officer with military honors, and the volleys fired over his grave. In August, 1813, he went to Salem to witness the ceremony of the reinterment of the bodies of Capt. James Lawrence and Lieut. Augustus C. Ludlow, who were killed on board the "Chesapeake," and were at first buried at Halifax. Although he could not hear Judge Story's Eulogy, he made his brother repeat to him all that he could remember of it. The opening sentence, "Welcome to their native shores be the remains of our departed heroes," especially filled him with ecstasy. It is not surprising, then, that the dreams of his early ambition should have been of braving the perils of the sea, or commanding a man-of-war.

¹ His younger brother.

. His constitution was vigorous, and in all the sports of boyhood he was more than a match for his companions, spending as many hours as any one upon the play-ground, and tiring out almost all his competitors by his activity and skill. In the necessary labor of the farm he was equally diligent and faithful. A man is now living with whom he once worked in laying a stone wall, and who thought it a pity that so strong and active a lad should be sent to College, but pardoned it, when really determined upon, because he worked so well.

"Even in doing field-work," says his brother, "if the nature of the employment could possibly admit of it, he would get up some excitement to enliven the hour. Thus, in the laborious occupation of building the wall, or digging and hauling stone preparatory to it, he was the favorite of the master-workmen. Although no part of the labor was such as admitted of much haste, yet the wall-builder would often refer to these occasions after my brother began to figure a little in life, to tell how springy he was about his work; how he would jump to hook or unhook the chain, to start or stop the team, hand a crowbar, clap a bait (as it is called in New England) under the lever; and how he would shout when the rock started from its bed and reached the surface, or its place in the wall. A single remark once made by him, while at work as above, goes to show that even then, as he had just got under way in Latin, he sometimes glanced a thought forward to the future: thus, 'Mr. N. (to the wall-builder), if ever I'm a lawyer, I'll plead all your cases for nothing.' "

An intense love of reading and of knowledge in general was early developed. Before he was six years old, he had devoured the "Pilgrim's Progress," and used afterwards to gather his companions and rehearse it to them from memory. Bunyan was always a great favorite. But a few years before he died, he borrowed from his brother the old volume, with its quaint pictures and soiled pages, which brought back so much of his childhood. Another book, of a different kind, which he used to read with the greatest avidity, was a worn and well-thumbed copy of the "Life of Maurice, Count Saxe," from which a year or two since he repeated page after page, to the surprise and amusement of some of his family by whom a question had been started with reference to the battle of Fontenoy. "Marshal Saxe at the Opéra" (accenting the second syllable according to his boyish habit) used long to be one of the playful phrases in use between himself and his children.

The apparent ease with which he mastered the contents of a book has been the subject of remark. This characteristic was as noticeable, perhaps, in childhood as any other. Dr. Sewall, his brother-in-law, took the numbers of the Edinburgh Encyclopædia, which came uncut and half-bound. Rufus used to offer to cut the leaves, and even begged to do it. The truth was, that while doing it, and even while conversing with others, he would run his eye over the articles which interested him; and, as the doctor said, "he knew more about the book by the time the leaves were cut, than he (the doctor) was likely to know for a long time."

His tenacity of memory was equally remarkable, so that to his friends he seemed to remember about all that he read. Years after, indeed, while a member of college, he would take a book into his sleeping-chamber and look over a chapter the last thing before retiring, and then on awaking in the morning, without looking at the page, would repeat it to his brother, handing him the book to look over and see if he repeated correctly. Nor were these voluntary trials selected from poetry or fiction or narratives merely, but sometimes, at least as his brother remembers, from such condensed and weighty writings as John Foster's essay on "Decision of Character."

The village library of a few hundred volumes, containing such works as "Rollin's Ancient History," "Josephus," "Plutarch," "Telemachus," and "Hutchinson's History of Massachusetts," he had pretty nearly exhausted before he was ten years old. During all these early years the Bible was read and re-read with more than ordinary thoughtfulness; and early in the war of 1812, he made what he thought was the great discovery of an undoubted prophecy of Napoleon Bonaparte, in the Book of Daniel. He was, at the same time, an attentive and critical hearer of sermons, even if the minister was dull. "When about nine years old," says his brother, "he took us all by surprise one Sabbath noon, by saying 'Mr. — (naming the preacher) had better mind what he says about James (the apostle), even James,' repeating the words emphatically. The minister had been quoting Paul, and added, 'even James says, For what is your life?' The remark went to show us — the family — not only that he had attended to what had been said (which we had not done), but that he saw an objection to the comparison, implied at least, between the two apostles, both of whom were inspired, and consequently that the inspiration of James must have been as good as that of Paul, because of the same origin in both."

He was remarkable during his youth for the same sweetness of temper, and quick sense of the ludicrous, which he carried with him through life. He was easily persuaded to a particular course of conduct, by his mother or sisters, and could not bear to grieve them, and so in all differences between them, if he could not carry his point by good-natured pleasantry, he would yield with the best grace in the world. By the same humor, he sometimes warded off reproof, even when justly merited. An older sister was once beginning to admonish him for something which he had done, which was clearly wrong. He saw it coming and was determined to break the force of it. While she was bestowing the rebuke with the earnestness which the offence seemed to deserve, happening to raise her eyes, she saw him standing with his right hand up by the side of his head, in the attitude of a person to whom an oath is administered, and with a face of extraordinary demureness and solemnity. The sight of him in this roguish position put an end at once to the lecture and to the feeling which prompted it. The loudest of laughs ended the scene.

In all boyish sports and studies, his companions were few: the most intimate of them all was his brother Washington, a little more than three years younger than himself. Although during his early youth neither of his parents were members of the church, the moral discipline of the family was careful and exact. A portion of the "Assembly's Catechism" was recited every Sabbath, and the lessons thus learned were so deeply engraven on his memory as never to be forgotten. On one occasion in later life, in commenting upon the testimony of a witness who professed his willingness to do any job that might offer on Sunday, just as he would on any other day, Mr. Choate repeated, word for word, one of the long answers of that venerable symbol on the import of the fourth commandment, and then turning to the Court, said, "May it please your Honor, my mother taught me this in my earliest childhood, and I trust I shall not forget it in my age."

Mr. Choate was favored in his childhood with some excellent friends beyond the circle of his own relatives. Among these was Dr. R. D. Mussey,¹ who commenced the practice of the profession in which he afterwards became so eminent, in Essex, and for several years resided in the family of Mr. David Choate. At the age of ten years, Rufus began the study of Latin, under the instruction of Dr. Thomas Sewall,² who had taken Dr. Mussey's place. He continued his studies for a few months, yearly, during the next six years, under the clergyman of the parish, Rev. Mr. Holt, or the teachers of the district school. Among these should be mentioned Rev. Dr. William Cogswell, who taught the school during the successive winters of his Junior and Senior years in college.

¹ After a life of great honor and usefulness, Dr. Mussey died in Boston, June 21, 1866, at the advanced age of eighty-six years.

² Dr. Sewall afterward married Mr. Choate's oldest sister, and subsequently removed to Washington, D.C., where he was long known as an eminent physician.

These opportunities, of course, afforded the young student a very imperfect discipline, but they served in some degree to stimulate his mind, while teaching him the necessity of self-reliance and independent exertion. Certain it is that with his poor chances he accomplished more than most others with the best. He meditated upon what he read, and treasured up the fruits in a retentive memory. His imagination even then pictured the scenes of ancient story, and transferred the fictions of Homer and Virgil to the shores of Essex. "There," said he, pointing out a rocky, cavernous knoll to his son-in-law, as they were riding a few years since from Ipswich to Essex, "there is the descent to Avernus." This habit of making the scenes of poetry and history real, of vivifying them through his imagination, was one which followed him through life, and contributed largely to his power as an orator. Something allied to this is that touch of human sympathy for inanimate objects, of which Dr. Adams speaks in his Funeral Address. When as a boy he drove his father's cow, "he has said that more than once, when he had thrown away his switch, he has returned to find it, and has carried it back, and thrown it under the tree from which he took it, for, he said, 'Perhaps there is, after all, some yearning of nature between them still.'"

By way of completing his preparation for college he was sent, in January, 1815, to the academy in Hampton, N. H., of which James Adams was then the principal. Here he remained till summer, when he entered the Freshman class in Dartmouth College, near the close of his sixteenth year. His classmates remember him as a diffident, modest, beautiful boy, the youngest in the class with two exceptions, singularly attractive in person and manner, of a delicate frame, with dark curling hair, a fresh, ruddy complexion, a beautifully ingenuous countenance, his movements marked with a natural grace and vivacity, and his mind from the first betraying the spirit of a scholar.

“There he brought,” says one of his eulogists,¹ “a mind burning with a thirst for knowledge, which death alone had power to quench, kindled with aspirations lofty, but as yet undefined and vague, and stocked with an amount of general information quite remarkable for his years; a physical constitution somewhat yielding and pliant, of great nervous sensibility, but equalled by few for endurance and elastic strength. He came pure from every taint of vice, generous, enthusiastic, established in good principles, good habits, and good health.” The necessary imperfection of his fitting for college, and his own modesty, prevented, in a measure, the full recognition of his ability during the first term of his residence at Dartmouth. But the deficiency, if it were one, was soon supplied. He acquired knowledge with extraordinary rapidity. His memory was very retentive; the command of his faculties, and his power of concentration, perfect. “His perception of the truths of a new lesson,” says one of his classmates, “and their connection and relation to other truths already familiar to him, was so intuitive and rapid, that I have yet to learn of the first man who could study a new subject in company with him, and not prove a clog and an incumbrance.” At the same time he was a most diligent and faithful student.

¹ Hon. Ira Perley, lately Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of New Hampshire, in a eulogy pronounced at Dartmouth College, July 25, 1860.

“I entered the class,” writes another member of it,¹ “in the spring of the Freshman year, when its members had already joined the societies and found their affinities. . . . I was acquainted with some members of the class before I entered college, and remember making natural inquiries in the winter vacation, about the associates I should find in it. Several were named as having taken high rank during the fall term, but Choate was not mentioned. I was the more struck therefore, at the first recitation, as I watched each successive voice with the keen curiosity of a new-comer, when Choate got up, and in those clear musical tones put Livy’s Latin into such exquisitely fit and sweet English, as I had not dreamed of, and in comparison with which all the other construing of that morning seemed the roughest of unlicked babble. After the first sentence or two, I had no doubt who was the first classical scholar among us, or who had the best command of English. I was on one side of the room and he on the other, and I remember as if but yesterday, his fresh, personal beauty, and all the graceful charm of modest, deferential look and tone that accompanied the honeyed words. . . . The impression that his first words made upon me was peculiar ; and nothing, literally nothing, while in college or since, ever came from him to disturb the affectionate admiration, with which in the old recitation-room, in the presence of Tutor Bond, I first heard his voice, his words, his sentences, — all, even then, so exquisite in their expression of genius and scholarly accomplishments. I have always felt my connection with that class as a peculiar felicity of my college life ; and to us all Choate’s companionship through the four years was a blessing and an honor."

¹ E. C. Tracy, for many years editor of the “Vermont Chronicle.”

What was thus begun, he carried through to the end. As early as his Sophomore year he entered upon a course of thorough, systematic study, not with the object of excelling his classmates, but to satisfy the ideal of excellence which filled his own mind. He never, while in college, mingled very freely in the sports of the play-ground, and yet was never a recluse. His door was always open to any one who called to see him. But his example did much to set the standard of scholarship, and to impart a noble and generous spirit to the class and the college.

The years that Mr. Choate spent at Dartmouth were among the most critical in the history of that institution. A difficulty of many years' standing, between President John Wheelock and the Board of Trustees, culminated in 1815 in his deposition from office, and the election of another President in his place. The question soon became involved in the politics of the State, and the legislature, in June, 1816, passed an act incorporating an adverse institution, called the Dartmouth University, and granting to it the seal, the libraries, the buildings, and the revenues of the college. New officers were appointed, and a small number of students collected. The trustees denied the constitutional power of the legislature to pass such an act, and carried the case before the legal tribunals. In November, 1817, the Supreme Court of the State decided against them. The college was without buildings, without libraries, without apparatus, without resources. The recitations were held wherever rooms could be found in the village. A President, two Professors, and one or two Tutors, performed the whole duty of instruction and government. The public mind was profoundly agitated with hopes and fears, in which the students largely shared. From the decision of the State Court, an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court at Washington. A question of local interest spread itself to dimensions of national importance. Jeremiah Mason, Jeremiah Smith, Daniel Webster, and Francis Hopkinson were counsel for the College. John Holmes and William Wirt, for the University. The minds of the students were stimulated by the unusual circumstances, and probably there never was a time in the history of the college, when a spirit of study, of order, and of fidelity to every duty, more thoroughly pervaded the whole body, than when there were hardly any means of enforcing obedience, and the very existence of the institution depended upon the doubtful decision of a legal question. The contest itself imparted a sense of reality and practicalness to the college life, and a desire of high attainment and honorable action seemed to be the pervading spirit of the community of students. It was during this period that Mr. Choate's mind was, by several circumstances, decisively turned to the law as a profession. He probably heard Judge Smith, Mr. Mason, and Mr. Webster in their defence of the college at Exeter in September, 1817. "He certainly heard Webster in the celebrated trial of the Kennistons at Ipswich, in the autumn of the same year." In the college, there existed at this time two rival literary societies, The Social Friends and The United Fraternity, each possessing a small but valuable library. On the plea of preserving these libraries, some of the officers of the University determined to remove them from the college building. Not having the keys, the door of The Social Friends was broken in by a number of persons, headed and directed by an officer of the University, and preparations made for carrying away the books. They had hardly entered before the students of both societies, exasperated at the unexpected attack, rallied for a defence of their property. The band which had entered the room was at once imprisoned in it, and finally disarmed and conducted to their several homes. Mr. Choate was then librarian of the society whose property was invaded, and, as a result of the proceedings in which he bore some share, found himself with several fellow-students, summoned the next day before a pliant justice of the peace, who bound them all over to take their trial before a superior court on the charge of riot. Their accusers were also arraigned before another justice, and bound over to answer to the same tribunal. To the court they went at Haverhill. The most eminent lawyers in the State then practised in Grafton County. The case never came to a hearing, the Grand Jury finding no bill against the parties ; but the appearance of the court, — Chief Justice Richardson, Judge Bell, and Judge Woodbury upon the bench, — and the eminent legal ability of the bar, where were such lawyers as George Sullivan, Jeremiah Mason, Jeremiah Smith, Richard Fletcher, Ichabod Bartlett, Ezekiel Webster, and Joseph Bell, might be presumed to impress a mind much less susceptible of such influences than was Mr. Choate's.

In the mean time, Mr. Webster made his great argument for the college, on the 10th of March, 1818.

All these circumstances, and perhaps especially the laurels won by Mr. Webster in that effort, directed the young student's attention to the advantages, the attractions, and the grandeur of that profession in which he was destined to attain such eminence. "The victory of Miltiades would not suffer him to sleep." "The Dartmouth College case," says a distinguished statesman,¹ "was almost the first legal controversy which brought into view the relations of the judiciary and the bar to the great interests of American learning. The questions involved in it were generally thought vitally important to the cause of education in its highest and most liberal aspects, and the discussion of them established a harmony and excited a sympathy between two vocations before thought almost antagonistic,—the academic and the forensic, — which was not without favorable results to both of them."

While Mr. Choate was a member of college, there were in the classes a larger number of students than usual distinguished for breadth and thoroughness of scholarship, as they have been since for honorable positions in literature and in society. With some of these he formed friendships which terminated only with their lives. By all who knew him then he was ever remembered for his warm and generous sensibilities, his open, balmy kindness, as well as for his influence over the younger students, and his readiness to help them. After having decided upon his profession, his desire was to become a national man. The Country, the Union of the States, the Fathers of the Republic, — these words were frequently in his mouth.

¹ Hon. George P. Marsh.

General literature, which before had been an end with him, now became but the means for the accomplishment of the purpose to which he had consecrated his life. All pursuits, whether of elegant learning or of graver non-professional knowledge, were made but adjuncts and auxiliaries. Nor was it in scholarship more than in the power of using his acquisitions that he excelled. In the classics, in history, and general literature, he read far beyond the requirements of the curriculum, but knowledge never outran the power of thought. His intellectual growth was sound and healthful. Chief Justice Perley says of him (in his eulogy), with reference to this and some kindred points: —

“It was not merely in scholarship, in knowledge of books, and literary attainments that he then stood high above all competition and rivalry. He was even then far less distinguished for the amount of his acquisitions, than for vigor and grasp of mind, for the discipline and training which gave him complete command of himself and all that he knew. He was already remarkable for the same brilliant qualities which distinguished him in his subsequent career. To those who knew him then, and watched his onward course, little change was observable in his style of writing, or in his manner of speaking, except such as would naturally be required by subjects of a wider range and more exciting occasions. His judgment seemed already manly and mature. He comprehended his subject then, as he did afterwards, in all its bearings and relations; looked all through it with the same deep and searching glance, had the same richness and fulness of style, and the same felicitous command of the most beautiful and expressive language, the same contagious fervor of manner, and the same strange fascination of eye and voice, which on a wider stage made him in later life one of the most powerful and persuasive orators which our country has produced.

“I entered college at the commencement of his Senior year, and can myself bear witness to the supremacy which he then held here, in the unanimous judgment of his fellow-students. No other man was ever mentioned in comparison with him. His public college exercises were of a very uncommon character. Unless I was greatly misled by a boyish judgment at the time, or am strangely deceived by looking at them through the recollections of forty years, no college exercises of an undergraduate that I have ever heard are at all worthy to be compared with them, for beauty of style, for extent and variety of illustration, for breadth and scope, and for manly comprehension of the subject. At this distance of time, I well remember every public exercise performed by him while I was a member. I have heard him often since, and on some of the occasions when he is understood to have made the most successful displays of his eloquence; I heard him when he stood upon this spot to pronounce his eulogy on Webster, which has been considered, on authority from which, on such a question, there lies no appeal, to be unequalled among the performances of its class in this country, and I can sincerely say that nothing I have ever heard from him in the maturity and full growth of his powers, has produced upon me a deeper impression, or filled me at the time with a more absorbing and rapt sensation of delight, than those college exercises.

“His Honor, Mr. Justice Nesmith, in his remarks made here at the last Commencement, spoke of Mr. Choate’s address as President of the Social Friends, to certain Freshmen who were admitted to the Society in the first term of the year 1818. I was one of those Freshmen, and shall never forget the effect produced by that address. I remember, too, what Mr. Nesmith is more likely to have forgotten, that on the same evening there was a high discussion in the Society between two members of Mr. Choate’s class, on a very large question, not then entirely new, nor yet, that I have heard, finally decided, ‘whether ancient or modern poetry had the superiority.’ Mr. Choate was required, as President, by the rules of the Society, to give his decision upon the question. As might be expected from the general bias of his mind, he took strong ground for the ancients, and I well remember, at this distance of time, the general course of his remarks upon the subject.”

But though the position of Mr. Choate among his classmates was early determined, and never for one moment afterwards in doubt, no student ever bore his academic honors with greater modesty, or was regarded by his classmates with a more sincere affection. Envy was swallowed up in admiration. The influence of so distinguished a scholar was not confined to his own class, but was diffused throughout college. In all matters of literature he was the oracle from which there was no appeal. With sensibilities warm and generous, never showing an unkind emotion, or doing a dishonorable act, it is not surprising that his influence should have been great, or that his memory should be affectionately cherished by many who have hardly seen him for forty years. "Meeting him one day about the last of November," writes one who was in college with him,¹ "something was said about the manner of spending the winter vacation, and I frankly told him that the want of funds required me to teach a school the next quarter. In reply he said, 'You had better hire money and pay ten per cent interest, and remain here and study and read, than to lose any part of your college life.' . . . Being the word of a Senior to a Freshman who had no personal claims to his friendly regards, — and of a Senior who stood head and shoulders above his coevals, — it made a deep impression on my mind. It was a word not to be forgotten."²

¹ Rev. A. Converse, D.D.

² The testimonies to the elevating and inspiring influence of this ardent and enthusiastic scholar might be greatly multiplied. I will quote but one from the interesting series of papers communicated to the "Albany Law Journal" by his Honor Judge Neilson of the City Court, Brooklyn. It is a part of a letter from the Hon. Henry K. Oliver of Salem. After giving many interesting particulars of Mr. Choate's college life, he goes on to say, "As I said, I was not of his class, that more intimate association blessing the class of 1819; yet his influence, both personal and as a scholar, was operative with every member of the seven classes that enjoyed a college life with him; an influence that, seeming but small in the beginning, assumed, before the end of the first year, a power and reach far beyond that of any other member of college. . . . Having once taken root, and feeling the power and strength of the wider instruction under which his own power and strength were being evoked, he grew with marvellous rapidity; his facility at concentrating his mind upon any given subject, and acquiring all that was to be acquired about it, being something which to the rest of us was without parallel, and in every department of study rapidly putting him far in advance of his fellows. The general standard by which scholarship among us was to be measured, received from him a posi-

On the 17th of August, 1819, Mr. Choate ended a college course which had been full of joy, prosperity, and success. "The ideal scholar, and the pride of the college, no one had ever so completely won the admiration of the Faculty, of his fellow-students, and of the people of Hanover."¹ In the appointments for Commencement, the highest place, with the valedictory oration, was, of course, assigned to him. His health had thus far been uninterrupted and vigorous, but towards the close of the college year it seemed about to give way. He became emaciated, walked feebly, and was often unable to attend to college duties. Dr. Mussey, an old friend of the family, and already eminent in his profession, took him to his house, and watched over him by day and by night. The six weeks' vacation, which then preceded Commencement, he passed upon a sick bed, and up to the final moment it was quite uncertain whether he would be able to perform his part. At last he came upon the platform, pale and feeble, with every thing in his appearance and the tones of his voice to awaken the sympathy of the audience, and with barely strength enough to deliver the strictly valedictory address. But in the few words that he spoke, occupying probably not more than six or eight minutes, he moved his tive and most noticeable elevation by what he achieved; excellence rising to a higher grade, and mediocrity becoming less esteemed. This influence was felt among both officials and undergraduates, and it began to be realized that the old rule of the arithmetics, that 'more required more,' was making men work harder and with more of a will, and that a decided new departure had been taken, never thereafter to be ignored, and from which there was to be no retrogression."

¹ Letter of Hon. Nathan Crosby, of Lowell.

hearers as they were seldom or never moved before on any similar academic occasion. He spoke of the peculiar friendships of scholars ; of their common love of letters and arts ; of reverence for the great and good ; of the protracted and bitter struggle through which their Alma Mater — the object of their first and warmest love — had just successfully passed, and how grateful it became them to be as they saw her at last standing, as befitted her, proudly and in her robes, with her children and friends all around her ; of their high hopes and aims ; of the duty of devotion to the prosperity and honor of one's country ; of their possible disappointments, as some, whom they all knew, had already finished their work. In all this he unconsciously revealed some of the grand moving springs of his own life, some of his hopes, and some of his fears. "To understand the power of his address," writes one of his classmates¹ more than forty years after they had separated at Dartmouth, "one must see the whole scene. Here was Choate pale and wasted by fever, with just strength enough to enable him to stand, and yet with an eye flashing with the fires of genius. The tones of his voice were surpassingly tender and affectionate. Behind him sat President Francis Brown with the hectic flush upon his cheek, and around him the men to whose wisdom and eloquence he so delicately alluded, the Trustees, and Daniel Webster, who had carried the college triumphantly through the conflict. I doubt whether Mr. Choate ever in his life moved the sensibilities of an audience more deeply than on this occasion."

There was, in what he said, so much of manliness

¹ Hon. John Aiken.

and beauty, a tone so high, so pure, so vigorous, that every eye was fixed ; and when he alluded to his own feeble health, his appearance and manner gave deep solemnity and almost a prophetic force to his words. The effect is said to have been unexampled. Not only his classmates, but half the audience, and not a few among the grave trustees, used to such occasions, were dissolved in tears.

The next year Mr. Choate spent in the then responsible office of tutor in the college, — a year to him, and almost equally to his pupils, all sunshine. “ He entered upon his duties,” writes one who then became his pupil,¹ “ with such a reputation for scholarship, and with such high commendations freely expressed by classmates and the College Faculty, that the class came to him with what in almost any case would be extravagant expectations ; but in the trial there was no abatement of their first love and admiration. Mr. Choate’s first appearance in the recitation-room, and his brief address to the class, won their confidence, and inspired them with purposes of noble emulation. And in a like manner he influenced them through the whole of his tutorship. He threw a charm over the services of the recitation-room, mingling enjoyment with labor in such a way that his pupils loved to be there, and with him. How much time and labor he expended in preparation we of course did not know ; but we did know that he was wholly in his business, that he was ready at all points, that he was most exact and severe in the class-drill, while, at the same time, every thing was done with such urbanity and generous familiarity, and with such affluence of auxiliary suggestions, that weariness was unknown in the recitation-room. He was a master in Latin: he revelled in Greek.

¹ Rev. Paul Couch.

“Mr. Choate had such power over his class, and used his power with such consummate skill, with such natural adroitness, that they were enthusiastic in their esteem of his admirable gifts, and in their attachment to his person. In whatever circumstances he met them, he caused them to feel easy and gratified. They were proud of his friendship, and of his familiar though dignified intercourse with them. He had no pedagogical airs, no tutorial affectation of wisdom and dignity; but he had authority, and received the willing tribute of respect. In his own room, especially, they found him teacher and companion so happily combined, that every visit created a desire for its repetition. When his one year's service was closed, he left the class undivided in their attachment to him, and expressing the deepest regret that they could not be favored longer with his instructions.”

The year thus spent at Dartmouth brought him into closer connection with a society of scholars, and led him along in friendly emulation with many who afterwards became eminent in their professions. He reviewed his studies and consolidated his knowledge. He formed attachments which were never broken, and which exerted a very important influence on his future prosperity and happiness. The college was resting, and trying to recover strength after the severe and protracted struggle with the State. The President was absent for a considerable part of the year, having spent the winter and spring at the South, in the vain hope of arresting a disease fastened upon him by his labors and exposures in behalf of the institution. From this long and wearisome journey he returned only to die at home a few weeks before the Commencement of 1820. This was a sorrow which affected Mr. Choate very deeply. Between the older officer and the younger had grown up very tender relations founded on mutual respect and love.¹

The following letter from Dr. Thomas Sewall, of Washington, a brother-in-law of Mr. Choate, is interesting in itself, and was probably not without influence on the mind of the young student just about to begin the study of his profession:—

“ WASHINGTON CITY, March 18, 1820.

“ Saturday evening.

“ DEAR BROTHER RUFUS, — I enclose to you the ‘Intelligencer’ of this day, containing the speech of Barbour of the Senate,² late governor of Virginia, a man of fine talents, and probably the greatest orator in Congress. The closing part of the speech I heard, and it was overwhelming to all who heard it. He is about as large a man as Webster, is as dark complexioned, and has much of the same commanding air. I shall endeavor to send you the speeches of Pinkney, Otis, Burrill, Clay, Lowndes, Storrs, Sergeant, and Barbour (of the House), as soon as they are printed; these, with one or two others, comprising nearly all that has been said on the subject.

“ The Supreme Court adjourned yesterday sine die.
Webster left nearly a fortnight since, as he found a great part of his business could not come on this Term. While here he showed me many marks of distinguished friendship, which I had no right to expect. He spent many hours with me in my study, walked and rode round the city with me repeatedly, and called on private families, &c. . . . One particular instance of his notice I will mention, but not to be communicated to any one at Hanover but Washington,¹ on any account. While here he sat, by my suggestion, to a young portrait painter to gratify me with the picture. This unfortunately was not completed, as he left unexpectedly, and before he anticipated. It is however the exact outlines of Webster, giving all the prominent characters of his face. I would not part with it for any thing. Every one knows it instantly. He paid the painter himself. When he comes to the city again he has promised that it shall be completed.

¹ An affectionate estimate of President Brown's character and services will be found given by Mr. Choate in a letter to Rev. Dr. Sprague, published in “The Annals of the American Pulpit.”

² James Barbour, Senator from Virginia, 1815–1825; Secretary of War, 1825; Minister to England, 1828.

“While here I talked with him respecting the advantages of the Law School you referred to in your letter. His opinion I will at some future time communicate, unless you get it from his own lips. He wished, when I wrote you, that I would request you to visit him at the next vacation. This I hope you will do, and stay, as by his request, a few days with him.

“I am aware, Rufus, that you have too much independence to be greatly influenced in your future course by the advice of any one, yet you have, I am persuaded, too much candor to be offended if I tell you what my feelings and opinions are on this subject, — a subject deeply interesting to me as well as to your other friends.

“Nothing could be half so gratifying to me as to have you, after the expiration of your year at Hanover, commence the study of Divinity at Andover, could you bring your feelings to such a course. In this I look to the end, which would be happy to yourself and glorious to the Church. I am not without a strong hope that whatever you engage in for the present, you will finally be called to devote those talents which God has distinguished you with in so eminent a degree, to that cause which will ultimately swallow up all others.

“If you cannot come to this for the present, let me advise you to commence the study of the Law without the loss of any further time than will carry you to the next Commencement. With respect to the place of study I will here make several remarks. I hope to have my wife and little son here the next autumn. I need not tell you that nothing could add more to her happiness and mine than to have you with us, and I doubt whether there is any place where you would pursue your studies to greater advantage than at Washington. Yet, as by bringing my family here I shall take from our friends at Essex two darling objects, I ought perhaps to be willing to be deprived of your society here for the sake of having you placed near, and where you can visit them often, especially as we shall here be surrounded by the best of friends and acquaintances, while the family at Essex will be forsaken and surrounded by wolves and tigers on every side! Besides, Washington will be at college, and the family, of course, quite alone. Taking these and many other things into view, I must advise that you commence your course with Webster. Him you will find a different man from what you can have an idea of without a more intimate acquaintance; a friend, a companion, and equal. I am fully satisfied that you will find his office a better place to become an active lawyer, politician, and man of usefulness than at Cambridge.

¹ Washington Choate, a younger brother of Rufus.

“It will be in my power to introduce you to many men in Boston whose society you will value highly, besides introducing you to a literary club embracing all the science of that town and vicinity. At any rate, I anticipate much pleasure should it please Providence to spare my life, in seeing you here, if not the next fall, at some future period. Your funds, I suppose, must be nearly exhausted. At Cambridge you will be at great expense. With Webster, I can get you in on any terms. I should like to know if there was ever any thing of the trial published.¹ I have not been able to learn that there was.

“Judge Story was very polite to me while here; called on me, &c. I used to send him the ‘Centinel,’ which I take. Do write soon and often. Keep this letter between you and Washington . . .

“With love to all who feel enough interest in my welfare to inquire after me, and with much love to Washington,

“Your brother,

“THOMAS SEWALL.”

Whether in accordance with these suggestions he endeavored to secure a place in the office of Mr. Webster, is not known; but we find that soon after leaving Dartmouth in the summer of 1820, he entered the Law School at Cambridge, presided over, at that time, by Chief Justice Parker, and Asahel Stearns. From them he gained his first insight into the methods, objects, and morality of the law. Still yearning, however, for a wider view of affairs, and influenced, perhaps, by the wishes of his brother-in-law, Dr. Sewall, he entered, in 1821, the office of Mr. Wirt, then Attorney-General of the United States, and in the ripeness of his powers and fame. The year at Washington, although he did not see so much as he wished of Mr. Wirt, who was confined for a considerable portion of the time by indisposition, was not without considerable advantage. It enlarged his knowledge of public men and of affairs. He became familiar with the public administration. He spent some hours almost daily in the library of Congress. He began to comprehend still more fully the dignity of his chosen profession. He saw Marshall upon the bench, and heard Pinkney in the Senate, and in his last speech in court, and thenceforth became more than ever an admirer of the genius of those eminent men. Pinkney he thought the most consummate master of a manly and exuberant spoken English that he ever heard, and he always kept him in view as a sort of model advocate.

¹ Probably the Dartmouth College case.

Among the college friends of Mr. Choate, to whom he was strongly attached, was James Marsh, whose early attainments and wide culture gave promise of his future eminence, and who already had pushed his studies into the then almost unknown regions of German metaphysics. To him Mr. Choate writes from Washington:—

TO MR. JAMES MARSH, Theological Seminary, Andover, Mass.

“ Aug. 11, 1821.

“I take great shame to myself for neglecting so long to answer your letter, and beg you will explain it anyhow but on the supposition that I have meant to requite your own remissness in kind. My remissness, you might know, if you would think a moment, is never so intentional a matter as that comes to; ‘idleness and irresolution’ will account for it always; and since you, whose fine habits are the envy of all your literary friends, set the example, ‘idleness and irresolution’ I shall plead without evasion and without remorse now and henceforward for ever. But I wonder if I shall act quite as wisely in pleading, too, other matters of apology? in telling you for instance, that your letter and my own reflections, since I read it, have assured me of what I was suspicious of before, though I never owned it to myself, and pretended not to believe it, that I can really walk no longer ‘within that magic circle,’ where we used to disport ourselves. . . . This I own I am ashamed of, but that ocean of German theology and metaphysics (not to say criticism),—ah, Marsh, you may swim on alone in that if you will, and much good may it do you! I never could swim in it myself at any rate (it was like being a yard behind a cuttle-fish), and have long since made up my mind that any smaller fry than a leviathan stand no sort of chance in its disturbed, muddy, unfathomable waters. On the whole, however, this is no reason at all why we should cease to be very warm friends, and in our way, very punctual correspondents, and so let me thank you at last heartily, for writing such a full and interesting letter, and beg you to repeat your kindness very frequently till we shake hands again in your own cell at Andover, or in some one of the gay halls of our endeared Hanover. Our correspondence will certainly answer one end, and that I hope we both think, no inconsiderable one,—it will bring us often into each other’s thoughts and presence, and keep green in our memories the days, well spent and happy and dear to us both, of our literary intimacy. We go on together no longer; our paths are widely asunder already, to diverge still more at every step. But for this very reason let us carefully cherish a kindly remembrance of each other, and of the time when our studies, tastes, and objects of ambition were one; and the same intense first love of a new and fascinating department of literature burned in both our bosoms. I darkly gather from what you tell me, that you are plunging still more and more deeply into that incomprehensible science in which you are to live and to be remembered, and are contriving every day to detect in it some before-unsuspected relation to those other branches of learning with which a less acute, or less enthusiastic eye would never see it to have the loosest connection. . . . I am sadly at a loss for books here, but I sit three days every week in the large Congressional library, and am studying our own extensive ante-revolutionary history, and reading your favorite Gibbon. The only classic I can get is Ovid; and while I am about it, let me say, too, that I read every day some chapters in an English Bible. I miss extremely the rich opportunities we enjoyed formerly, and which you still enjoy, but I hope I shall at last begin to think.

“Most truly yours,

R. CHOATE.”

From his residence at the capital, and the abundant advantages which it offered to a mind so observant as his, he was suddenly called away before fully completing his first year, by an event which affected him with the deepest sorrow. His brother Washington, his early playmate and fellow-student, younger than himself by nearly four years, entered Dartmouth College the year that Rufus graduated. Unlike his older brother in personal appearance, he resembled him in many intellectual and moral qualities, and gave promise of equal distinction. He was a tall and slender young man, of a fair complexion, with light hair and light blue eyes. Entering college with a comparatively thorough preparation, he at once became, by universal and cheerful acknowledgment, the leader of his class, and yet he was the most gentle, modest, and unobtrusive of them all. The few papers which he left behind him, to which I have had access, indicate unusual scholarship and a remarkable extent of attainment in languages and modern literature. They show also uncommonly pure and deep religious sensibilities. Kind, companionable, and true, loving and beloved, he had already consecrated his life to a service in which none could have fairer hopes of eminence and usefulness, but upon which he was not permitted to enter. Having taught school near home during the winter of his Junior year, he was attacked by the scarlet fever on the very day of his proposed return to college, and after a brief illness, died Feb. 27, 1822, at the age of nineteen. During his sickness his thoughts turned with unwavering and intense affection towards his absent brother. He began to dictate a letter to him on the morning of the day on which he died. "There is one subject, Rufus," he said, "upon which we must not be dumb so that we speak not, nor deaf so that we hear not, nor blind so that we may not see. It is not a subject upon which" — The sentence was never completed. Not the letter, but the news of his death, was borne to Washington, and it proved almost too much for the elder brother to endure. He sought out and re-read the old books which they had studied together, while the floodgates of grief were opened, and he refused to be comforted. His studies at Washington were abandoned, and he returned for a while to the seclusion of Essex. Some time afterwards he received the following testimonial from Mr. Wirt, — the italics being his: —

“WASHINGTON, NOV. 2, 1822.

“Mr. Rufus Choate read law in my office and under my direction for about twelve months. He evinced great power of application, and displayed a force and discrimination of mind from which I formed the most favorable presages of his future distinction in his profession. His deportment was in all respects so correct as to entitle him to respect, and he carried with him my best wishes for his professional eminence, prosperity, and happiness.

“WM. WIRT.”

After remaining for a time at home, he entered his name in the office of Mr. Asa Andrews, of Ipswich, and subsequently continued his studies with Judge Cummins, a distinguished lawyer of Salem. He was finally admitted an Attorney of the Court of Common Pleas, in September, 1823, and two years later was enrolled as Attorney of the Supreme Court.

It has been generally stated that Mr. Choate first opened his office in South Danvers,—and this is substantially true. But in fact, he first put up his sign in Salem. It remained up, however, but one night, when his natural modesty, or self-distrust, led him to remove it to Danvers, a little farther from the courts and from direct rivalry with the eminent lawyers who engrossed the business and controlled the opinions of that distinguished bar.

The four or five years that he spent in Danvers were the years of solicitude and hope which can never come twice to a professional man, and which endear to him the place where his first successes are achieved, and the men from whom he receives his first encouragement. He regarded no other place with exactly the feelings which he entertained for Danvers; and the kindness seemed to be fully reciprocated. During his short residence there he twice represented the town in the Legislature, and for one year was a member of the Senate.

Not long after opening his office, and perhaps when under some feeling of discouragement, he thus closes

a letter to his friend Mr. Marsh, then tutor in Hampden Sydney College, Virginia: —

“There is a new novel by the author of ‘Valerius,’ that a friend of mine here says is very clever, but I haven’t got it yet. He seems, from that specimen, at any rate, to be a man of elegant and thorough studies, and, without any such fertility and versatility as that other, — our Shakespeare, — might hit out a single performance of pretty formidable pretensions to equality in some great features. How wretchedly adapted is our American liberal education and our subsequent course of life, to form and mature a mind of so much depth, taste, and beautiful enlargement. How vulgar and untaught we generally are with all our unquestionable natural capacity. . . . I don’t remember to have ever looked upon the coming in of the first month of winter, with a more prostrating sense of miserableness, than presses upon me every moment that I am not hard at study. Cold is itself an intolerable evil, and it comes with such a dreary accompaniment of whistling wind and falling leaf, that ‘I would not live away’ if these were the terms on which we were to hold out. I really think that the time of life, when the nakedness and desolation of a fast darkening November could be softened and relieved by blending in it fancy, romance, association, and hope, is gone by with me, and I actually tremble to see lifting up from one season of the year after another, from one character after another, and from life itself, even a life of study, ambition, and social intercourse, that fair woven cover, which is spread upon so much blackness, hollowness, and commonplace. But towards you my feelings change not, and so of about five more persons only whom I have ever known. — Begging you to excuse every thing amiss, “Yours, R. C.

“DANVERS, Nov. 23, 1823.”

Mr. Choate’s immediate success, although as great as could be anticipated, was not particularly striking, and during the first two or three years, in some seasons of despondency, he seriously debated whether he should not throw up his profession, and seek some other method of support. In the mean time, in 1825, he was united in marriage with Helen Olcott, daughter of Mills Olcott, Esq., of Hanover, N. H. Few men have been more widely known in New Hampshire, or more deeply respected than Mr. Olcott. He was a person of remarkable sagacity, of great wisdom in the conduct of affairs, magnanimous and generous, eminently courteous, dignified and kind, one of the few to whom the old-fashioned name of gentleman could be applied without restriction or reserve. This congenial alliance was one of the many felicitous circumstances of Mr. Choate's early career. It brought him sympathy, encouragement, and support. It not only gave him a new stimulus to labor, but proved in all respects most congenial with his tastes, and favorable to his social aspirations. Although he did not at first escape the fate of most young lawyers, the number of whose clients is not always equal to their wishes, yet his unwearied diligence, his fidelity, and the fame of his eloquence and skill, soon brought to him a full share of the business of the town and country. He early formed the habit of doing for his client every thing that the case required irrespective of reward. Before a justice of the peace, in an office not larger than a shoemaker's shop, in defence of some petty offender, he poured forth the same wealth of words and illustrations, of humor and wit, and, in its measure, of learning and argument, which afterwards delighted the Supreme Court and the Senate. Indeed, throughout his life, he never reserved his brilliant arguments for a suitable audience. He early made it a rule, for the sake of increasing his power as an advocate, to argue at full length every case he tried, and to do his best on every occasion. He as resolutely determined to shrink from no labor which might be necessary to the perfect completion of whatever he undertook. In a famous dog case at Beverly, it was said that "he treated the dog as though he were a lion or an elephant, and the crabbed old squire with the compliment and consideration of a chief justice!"

On one very stormy night during his residence in Danvers, he was called upon, at a late hour, to draw the will of a dying man who lived several miles distant. He went, performed the service, and returned home. But after going to bed, as he lay revolving in his mind each provision of the paper he had so rapidly prepared, there flashed across his memory an omission that might possibly cause the testator's intention to be misunderstood. He sprang from his bed and began dressing himself rapidly, to the great surprise of his wife, only answering her inquiries by saying that he had done what must be undone, and in the thick of the storm rode again to his dying client, explained the reason of his return, and drew a codicil to the will which made every thing sure. He related this in after-life in illustration of a remark, that sometimes, years after a case had been tried, he would feel a pang of reproach that he had not urged some argument which at that moment flashed across his mind. He always fought his lost cases over again, to see if he could find any argument whereby he might have gained them. Nor did he at this time neglect his purely literary studies. A literary society, already existing in the town, found in him an active and valuable member. The lecture on "The Waverley Novels" was then prepared. He also delivered two 4th of July orations, one before the Danvers Light

Infantry, of which corps he became a member, and one before the citizens at large.

In the mean time his professional fame was spreading. His unique and vigorous eloquence, his assiduity, care, and fidelity to his clients, adorned with a modesty as singular as it was beautiful, gained him many friends and more admirers.

An extract from a letter of Chief Justice Shaw will show how his reputation gradually increased at the bar: "I had an opportunity to see Mr. Choate, and witness his powers as an advocate very early, when he first opened an office in Danvers, and when I had scarcely heard his name mentioned. It happened, that in consequence of one or more large failures in Danvers, a number of litigated suits were commenced between various parties, all of which — to avoid delay and obtain a more early decision I suppose — were referred to the late Hon. Samuel Hoar, of Concord, and myself, as arbitrators. We attended at the courthouse in Salem and heard them, I think, in June, 1826. Mr. Choate appeared as counsel in several of them. As he was previously unknown to us by reputation, and regarding him as we did, as a young lawyer just commencing practice in a country town, we were much and very agreeably surprised at the display of his powers. It appeared to me that he then manifested much of that keen, legal discrimination, of the acuteness, skill, and comprehensive view of the requirements of his case, in the examination of witnesses, and that clearness and force in presenting questions both of fact and law, by which he was so much distinguished in his subsequent brilliant professional career. He soon after this removed to Salem, and in a short time became extensively and favorably known, as a jurist and advocate.”

Salem and Danvers were then, as now, closely connected. The first case in which he professionally appeared in the former city was in defence of a number of young men of respectable families, charged with riotous proceedings at a low dance-house. I cannot do so well as to take the account furnished to the “Salem Register” by one of the distinguished members of the Essex bar.¹ “The case excited much interest from the character and position of some of the parties implicated, and especially from the fame, even then, of the young advocate. He had before that time, I believe, appeared before some of the magistrates of Danvers. . . . Under these circumstances it is not strange that when the ‘Mumford Case,’ as it was called, came up in Salem,—a somewhat larger and broader theatre,—a more diversified audience,—shipmasters, old salts, supercargoes, clerks, merchants, and the various men of the various callings of the chief town of the county,—an interest and a feeling altogether unusual should have been excited on the occasion. It was so. The place where Justice Savage held his court was a large room on the second floor of a substantial building, in one of the principal streets, and it was immediately densely packed with all the varieties of the population. The trial commenced and proceeded; witness after witness was called, and all subjected to the severest and most rigid cross-examination by the young counsel. Now and then a passage at arms with the counsel for the government (a gentleman of very considerable experience in criminal courts, and of some fifteen or twenty years' standing at the bar) would come up to give variety to the scene; and now and then a gentle, most gracious, and reverential rencontre with the honorable court would intervene, and again a hard contest with some perverse and obstinate witness would relieve the tedium of the protracted examination. Some of the immediate auditors would get overheated, and then work themselves out into the fresh air, and report the proceedings, — the sayings and doings of the young lawyer, — what he said to his antagonist, Esq. T., or to the honorable court, or this or that fugitive comment on the witness, or case, as the trial proceeded (an inveterate habit of Mr. Choate's, in all his early practice, and no court or counsel were or could be quick enough to prevent it, — it would breathe out, this or that comment, or word, or suggestion).

¹ Hon. Asahel Huntington.

“In this way, and by such means, the fame of the case extended, while the trial was in progress, some two or three days, in the office of a police justice! Men of the various classes would assemble around the court-room, in the entry, on the stairs, outside, to hear the fresh reports, and so things continued till the argument came, and then there was a rush for every available point and spot within or without the compass of the speaker's voice, and the people literally hung with delighted and most absorbed attention on his lips. It was a new revelation to this audience. They had heard able and eloquent men before in courts of justice and elsewhere. Essex had had for years and generations an able, learned, and eloquent bar; there had been many giants among us, some of national fame and standing, but no such giant as this had appeared before, — such words, such epithets, such involutions, such close and powerful logic all the while, — such grace and dignity, such profusion and waste even of every thing beautiful and lovely! No, not waste, he never wasted a word. How he dignified that Court, — how he elevated its high functions, with what deference did he presume to say a word, under the protection, and, as he hoped, with the approving sanction of that high tribunal of justice, in behalf of his unfortunate (infelicitous, from the circumstances in which they were placed) clients! I could give no word or sentence of this speech. I did not even hear it, but I heard much about it, and all accounts agreed in representing it as an extraordinary and wholly matchless performance. They had never heard the like before, or any thing even approaching it, for manner and substance. It was a new school of rhetoric, oratory, and logic, and of all manner of diverse forces, working, however, steadily and irresistibly in one direction to accomplish the speaker's purpose and object. The feeling excited by this first speech of Mr. Choate in Salem was one of great admiration and delight. All felt lifted up by his themes. . . . And all were prepared to welcome him, when, a few years afterwards, he took up his abode here, after the elevation of his old friend and teacher, Judge Cummins, to the bench of the Court of Common Pleas."

CHAPTER II.

1830-1840.

Removal to Salem — The Essex Bar — Successes — Appearance — Counsel in the Knapp Case — Studies — Letter to President Marsh — Elected to Congress — Commonplace Book — Letter to President Marsh — Enters Congress — Speeches on Revolutionary Pensions, and on the Tariff — Letter to Dr. Andrew Nichols — Letters to Professor George Bush — The Second Session — Georgia, and the Missionaries to the Indians — Letter to Professor Bush — Re-elected to Congress — Speech on the Removal of the Deposits — Resigns his Seat — Removes to Boston — Lecture on the "Waverley Novels," and on "The Romance of the Sea" — Death of his Youngest Child.

IN 1828, Mr. Choate removed to Salem. The Essex bar was then, as it had long been, distinguished for learning and skill. The memory of Dane and Parsons, and Story and Putnam, was fresh and fragrant; John Pickering, Leverett Saltonstall, Eben Mosely, David Cummins, and John Varnum, were still in full practice; Caleb Cushing, Robert C. Rantoul, and others like them, were making their influence felt as young men of ability and ambition. Mr. Choate was already known for the qualities by which he was afterwards distinguished, learning, assiduity, a judgment almost unerring, an ornate and exuberant style, and remarkable powers of advocacy. Without assumption, modest, deferential, he yet rose at once to a high position through the combined force of eminent talents and professional fidelity.

He became the leading counsel in criminal practice, and it was said that during his residence in Salem "no man was convicted whom he defended." It was however true that he was not eager to assume a defence unless there appeared to be a good legal ground for it. Many stories were current of his ingenuity and success. One of the most characteristic was that told of a man by the name of Jefferds, indicted for stealing a flock of turkeys. "We had this case," says a distinguished member of the bar, to whose reminiscences I am already indebted,¹ "at every term of the court for a year or more, and the inquiry used to be 'When are the turkeys coming on?' The proofs accumulated on the part of the government at each successive trial. The County Attorney, a man of experience and ability, fortified himself on every point, and piled proof upon proof at each successive trial, but all without success. The voice of the charmer was too powerful for his proofs, and at each trial — three or four in all, I forget which — there was one dissenting juror. The case at last became famous in the county, and in the vacations of the court the inquiry was often heard, 'When is the turkey case coming on again?' and persons would come from different parts of the county on purpose to hear that trial. Here the theatre was still larger. It was the county, the native county, of the already distinguished advocate. I heard those trials. One was in old Ipswich in December, I think — a leisure season — within four miles of the spot where the orator was born. They came up from Essex, — old Chebacco, — the old and the young men of the town. Representatives, more or less, from the whole body of the county, were present, and the court-house was crowded with delighted and astonished listeners. I remember how they all hung upon him, spellbound by his eloquence, and I verily believe these bystanders would have acquitted by a majority vote; but the jury, bound by their oaths to return a true verdict according to the evidence, would not do so; but still there was one dissenting juror; and finally the prosecuting officer, in utter despair, after the third or fourth trial, entered a nolle prosequi, and thus the turkeys were turned or driven out of court. I have heard that this alleged turkey-thief years afterward called on Mr. Choate at his office in Boston. Mr. Choate did not recollect him, which greatly surprised the old client, and he said, 'Why, Mr. Choate, I'm the man you plead so for in the turkey case, when they couldn't find any thing agin me.' There had been only forty-four good and true men against him (if there were four trials, and I believe there were), without including twenty-three more of the grand jury!"

¹ Hon. Asahel Huntington.

The power of presenting things in a ludicrous aspect, by an odd turn of expression or a laughable exaggeration, was exhibited at this early period no less decidedly than in later life, and was equally effective in attracting attention. A mischievous boy had proved very troublesome to a man by the name of Adams, by letting down the bars of his pasture, destroying the fences, and similar misdeeds. Adams one day caught him at his tricks, and not being in a very humane or careful mood, seized and swung him round by the hair of his head. The father of the boy prosecuted Adams, and Mr. Choate defended him. In the course of the argument, he characterized the act as "a little paternal stretching of the neck, which perchance may save this froward lad from a final and more eventful stretching." The jury seem to have thought so too, for Adams was acquitted.

One Philip Finnigan was charged with stealing grease and ashes from a Mr. Nichols. Finnigan, on getting the articles, said they were for Mr. Winchester, a noted soap-manufacturer, but Mr. Winchester, coming up at the moment, exposed the falsehood, and the articles were returned. Mr. Choate, in the defence, contended that it was only a trick to defraud Mr. Winchester out of a customer, not to steal from Mr. Nichols; "a shabby and ungentlemanly affair, to be sure, but not the crime he is charged with." I believe the defence was successful.

Mr. Choate was at this time in full health, muscular and vigorous, of a pale or nearly colorless complexion, with a remarkably intellectual countenance. A gentleman, then a boy, who lived very near him, has told me that he often stopped to look at him through the window, as he passed by the house early in the evening, thinking him the handsomest person he had ever seen.

It would be a mistake to suppose that during these years at Salem he was mainly occupied with inferior cases, or interested in the criminal law to the neglect of other branches of the profession. Dependent as he was upon his own exertions, he probably, like other young lawyers, felt obliged to accept such cases as were offered to him. But few, perhaps, so early in their career, have had a wider range of clients. One of the most important trials in which he was engaged, although his name does not appear on the record, was that of Knapp, for the murder of Capt. Joseph White. That celebrated case is familiarly known. Capt. White was found dead in his bed on the morning of April 7, 1830. Richard Crowninshield, Jr., Joseph J. Knapp, Jr., and John Francis Knapp, were arrested and charged with the murder. Crowninshield committed suicide in prison, and Frank Knapp was put on trial as principal, the law then requiring that some one should be convicted as principal, before any one could be tried as accessory. He was defended by Franklin Dexter and William H. Gardiner. Mr. Webster was employed, by the relatives of Capt. White, to assist the attorney for the government, and besides him were retained several other lawyers, who were prevented by professional etiquette from publicly acting in the case. Among these was Mr. Choate. The trial came on at a special term of the Supreme Court held at Salem, July 20th. It continued with some intermission till the 20th of August. The community was profoundly shocked by the crime, and watched the course of the trial with the deepest interest. The counsel for the government were fully aware of the responsibility resting on them, and shared the agitation pervading the town and county. Every evening they deliberated together, and I have been told by one of them, that Mr. Webster obviously gave great heed to the suggestions of Mr. Choate, who was always present and a prominent adviser. On one occasion during the trial, an obscure but important fact was denied by the counsel for the defence. They had omitted to record it, and it was found to have escaped the attention of every one except Mr. Webster and Mr. Choate, who were thus able to corroborate each other.

During his entire residence in Salem, Mr. Choate was a diligent and untiring student not only of law, but of the whole circle of literature, and especially of mental and political philosophy. He had laid a broad foundation, and was erecting a lofty and beautiful superstructure. He complained sometimes of his desultory habits, but his friends saw how carefully he methodized his knowledge, and how entirely he had it at command. His habit was to study standing at a high desk, with pen in hand, and a manuscript book open before him. These little volumes, or brochures,—for they are generally a quire or two of letter-paper stitched together,—are crowded with facts, incidents, principles, and reflections, which demonstrate both his diligence and thoughtfulness. The equity practice of Massachusetts was then in an unsettled and confused state. He devoted himself for a while to gathering up the statutes and reducing the decisions to a regular code. The words with which, many years afterward, he briefly delineated the character and attainments of a brother lawyer, may even at this time describe his own.

“His knowledge of the jurisprudence of chancery and his fondness for it, were very remarkable. Few men of any time of life had studied it so thoroughly, discerned so well how it rose above, and how it supplied the deficiencies of the common law, or loved it as truly and intelligently. To such a mind and such tastes as his, its comparative freedom from technicalities, its regulated discretion, and its efforts to accomplish exact justice and effectual relief, possessed a charm, and had a value far beyond that of the more artificial science, whose incompleteness and rigidity it supplies and ameliorates, and whose certainty at last reposes on the learning, or the ignorance, or the humors of man.

“Beyond his profession he read and he speculated more variously and more independently than most men of any profession. Elegant general literature, politics, theology, in its relation to the religion revealed in the Bible, and to that philosophy which performs its main achievements in conciliating faith with reason, — these were his recreations.”

With special care he studied again the philosophy of the Mind, making Dr. Reid's Essays his text-book, and during a considerable part of one summer devoted himself to the study of theology, in preparation of a case, which finally he did not argue, in defence of a person charged before an association of ministers, with error in doctrine.

His literary pursuits, and the increasing demands of his profession, compelled him to keep somewhat secluded from society, but there were a few college acquaintances of kindred tastes, with whom he maintained a correspondence, and in whose welfare he ever had a deep interest. Foremost among these was his old friend Rev. Dr. James Marsh, then President of the University of Vermont, through whose efforts the American public were first introduced to a knowledge of the philosophical writings of Coleridge, and whose early death took from us one of the most thorough scholars, and one of the profoundest Christian philosophers, which our country has produced. There were few men for whom

Mr. Choate had such unqualified respect and affection.

The following letter is in reply to one from Dr. Marsh asking him to review the forthcoming edition of the "Aids to Reflection:" —

TO PRESIDENT JAMES MARSH.

"SALEM, Nov. 14, 1829.

"MY DEAR SIR, — I thought it due to the respect and love I bear you, and to the kindness and delicacy of the terms in which you make it, to give your suggestion one week's consideration before trusting myself to act upon it. The result is that I feel it will be wholly impossible for me to execute this duty of friendship and literature in a manner worthy of the book or its editor, or of the elevated and important purposes at which you aim in this high enterprise. I know you believe me to be willing to do every thing in such circumstances which the relation we sustain to each other gives a right to expect, and it is with very real regret that I feel myself unable adequately to do this great thing. My habits have become almost exclusively professional, and my time, I don't very well know how, seems to be just about as completely engrossed by the cases of business, as if, like Henry Brougham, I was habitually arguing my five causes a day. But there are obstacles in the way which lie deeper, such as the difficulty of gathering up the faculties which are now scattered over the barren technicalities and frivolous controversies of my profession, and concentrating them fixedly upon a great moral and philosophical conception, like this of yours, worthily to write, edit, or review such a book. Though I never saw it I may say so. One should sit whole weeks and months, still, alone, in a study, with the Apollo Belvedere in marble to look upon, and Plato, Cicero, Bacon, Milton, and 'all those' to converse with. I could no more raise myself into the mood for this achievement than I could make a better epic poem than the Iliad. But I rejoice that you have taken this matter in hand, and I firmly believe you will produce a glorious book most nobly edited. The employment of preparing it must be elevating and salutary, and I sincerely hope its general public success may be brilliant beyond the hopes of literary ambition. I shall buy the book, though I dare not undertake to review it.

“I had no suspicion that the Orthodoxy of Andover ‘looked askance’ at you or yours, and I suspect the matter has been overstated to you. But it may be so, since very much narrowness of mind and very great soundness of faith do sometimes go together, and the Professors have all a sort of strange horror of speculation, however regulated by a general orthodox belief, and a sincere love of truth and of man. But ‘nitor in adversum,’ says Burke, ‘is the motto for a man like me.’ I should no more stop to consider how a volume of matured and brilliant thoughts would be received at Andover, than how it would be received by the Pope or President Jackson. ‘Tu ne cede malis, sed contra audentior ito.’ Such was George Canning’s self-exhortation, when he went forth morning and evening to fight the great battles of liberty and emancipation with the armed and mailed champions of old abuse, error, and political orthodoxy, and a thrilling and sustaining scripture it is.

“And now I shall insist upon your being perfectly satisfied with my declining this honor. If a more specific reason were necessary, I might add that the principal term of our S. J. C. is now holding here, has been for a fortnight, and will be till the last of December. Then I have to go to Boston for our winter’s session. Nay, before that is over, I hope the country will ring from side to side with the fame of your book.

“With best regards and wishes, and Mrs. Choate’s respects,
“I am yours affectionately,

“R. CHOATE.”

In 1830, Mr. Choate was nominated by the National Republicans of Essex as Representative to Congress. The result of the Convention was communicated to him in the following characteristic letter:—

“SALEM, 10th Mo. 18, 1830.

“RUFUS CHOATE, ESQ.,—The Convention have determined, after several ballotings, to support thee for Representative to Congress for this district; the last ballot, which produced this result, stood twenty-three to twelve. I called at thy office previous to the balloting to ascertain whether the nomination would be agreeable, and after the vote was determined I informed the Convention of thy absence, and a committee was appointed to inform thee of the result, and obtain an answer of acceptance or otherwise. I can now say that I believe no other name would run as well in Lynn, Chelsea, Saugus, and Lynnfield, and I have no doubt of an election at the first meeting, provided thy acceptance is seasonably announced. If consistent with thy interest and inclination it would be gratifying to me to hear of thy acceptance. When we find the right man in all other respects, we are willing to waive the Masonic objection; believing the time is coming when all men of talents and respectability will leave that mere shadow for things more substantial.

“Thy friend,

“STEPHEN OLIVER.”

Mr. Choate was then thirty-one years old and had already, as we have seen, passed through the usual initiatory steps of public life, by serving in the State Legislature. The old district of Essex South, as it was called, had been represented in Congress for eight years by Hon. Benj. W. Crowninshield, a gentleman of great respectability, wealth, and family distinction, who had been Secretary of the Navy under Madison and Monroe. A good deal of feeling was naturally expressed by his friends, that a young and untried man, whose political opinions were not widely known, and whose acquaintance with the great commercial interests of the district could not be presumed to equal that of the veterans in politics, should be nominated in place of their tried and proved representative, and Mr. Crowninshield was supported as an independent candidate. Strong influences were of course brought to bear against the young lawyer, who had little to sustain him in the conflict besides his own character and merits. He was charged with being ambitious; and one young politician, then a student at law in the office of Mr. Saltonstall, in a vehement declamation, declared, that so far from being a substantial and permanent citizen, like Mr. Crowninshield, he was only stopping in Salem for a short time "while he oated his horse," as he was on his way to Boston.

In all the contest, however, it was remarked that no unkindness seemed to be felt towards Mr. Choate personally. His name had been brought forward without his own knowledge, mainly through the agency of his old friends in Danvers, and he was, with some difficulty, prevailed on to accept the honor. About the severest thing said of him, politically, during an active canvass, was a remark in one of the papers that "Mr. Choate is a gentleman of distinguished talents, but we regret to state that he is suspected of Jacksonism!" Suspected or not, however, he was chosen, after an honorable and exciting contest, by a majority of more than five hundred votes over all opposing candidates. Although not ambitious of political life, he was not insensible to its honors, nor untouched by its fascinations. He regarded it, however, as a means rather than as an end. The opportunities it gave for acquaintance with distinguished men, for wide observation of affairs, and study of great national questions, he certainly thought much of, but his heart was fixed upon his profession, both as a necessity, and as offering large opportunities for attainment and eminence. The new position brought with it new duties and responsibilities from which he did not shrink, and which he did not undervalue. He at once endeavored to prepare for them. No sooner was he elected than he laid out a plan of study which should best fit him honorably to represent his constituents. I have before me a commonplace book, one of the small manuscript folios spoken of before, which shows both the subjects to which he devoted himself, and his methods of study. The first page is as follows; the words are often abbreviated, and in his peculiar handwriting, difficult to decipher.

“Nov. 4, 1830.

“FACIENDA AD MUNUS NUPER IMPOSITUM.

“1. Pers. quals. [personal qualities]. Memory, — Daily Food and Cowper dum ambulo. Voice, Manner, — Exercitationes diurnæ.

“2. Current Politics in papers. 1. Cum Notulis, daily, — Geog. &c. 2. Annual Regr., Past Intelligencers, &c.

“3. District S. E. [i.e. Essex South], Pop. Occs., [Population, Occupations]. Modes of living. Commerce, — The Treaties, — and principles on which it depends.

“4. Civil History of U. States — in Pitkin and [original] Sources.

“5. Exam. of Pending Questions: Tariff, Pub. Lands, Indians, Nullification.

“6. Am. and Brit. Eloquence, — Writing, Practice.”

Then follow more than twenty pages of the closest writing with abbreviated and condensed statements of results drawn from many volumes, newspapers, messages, and speeches, with propositions and arguments for and against, methodically arranged under topics, with minute divisions and subdivisions. Some of these heads, under which he endeavors to compress the most essential political knowledge, are these: —

1. Public Lands, giving the number of acres in the whole country, the States where they lie, the sources whence derived, the progress and system of sales, &c., &c.

2. Politics of 1831, brought down to the beginning of the session in December, an analysis of the President's Message, and notes upon the subjects which it suggests; the measures and policy of the government.

3. The Tariff, beginning with an analysis of Hamilton's Report in 1790; History of Legislation respecting it; Internal Improvements, their cost and the Constitutional power of making them.

Then follow three or four closely written pages on particular articles: wool, cotton, flax, hemp, iron, as affected by the tariff.

4. Analysis of British opinions.

5. Cause of the Excitement in the Southern States.

6. Commerce of the United States in 1831.

These are but a sample of the subjects which occupied his attention, but they may serve to indicate the thoroughness with which he prepared for his new position. A letter to President Marsh will in some measure show his feeling and views respecting political life:—

TO PRESIDENT JAMES MARSH.

“SALEM, November 14, 1830.

“MY DEAR SIR, — I am extremely obliged to you for the very kind notice which you have taken of what has lately befallen, — a new and most pleasant indication how far and how high in life you have carried with you the generosity and friendliness of our earlier intimacy. Your letter was handed me in court, — in the very middle of the agony of the trial of a man for his life, — but I opened it straightway, and read it with the keenest pleasure, — and forgetting for a moment your glances at the future, mused for an hour over the ‘sweet and bitter fancies’ that are spread over the recollections of the days of our personal studious intercourse, so long past. Then I just showed the outside of the letter to a brother lawyer who knows a little literature, as being a letter from JAMES MARSH, of Burlington, — and having thus sacrificed to vanity a trifle, roused myself up to hear Webster argue a great question of law, on which the life of the worst of the murderers of Captain White depended.

“The matter of my election I do suppose rather a foolish one on my part, — but the nomination was so made that I could not avoid it without wilfully shutting myself out of Congress for life, — since my declining would undoubtedly have brought forward some other new candidate, who, if elected, would go ten years at least, — long before which time, if living, I might have removed from the District. The opposition which was got up was a good deal formidable, for noise and anger at least, and the wonder is that so little came of it. I, more than once, while it was raging about me, wished myself a tutor in the Indian Charity School, upon $350 per annum, teaching the first book of Livy to the class, and studying with you that dreadful chapter in Mitford about the Dialects. The responsibilities of the new place I appreciate fully; — pro parte virili, I shall try to meet them. I have a whole year yet, you know, before me, before I take my seat, — quite short time enough for me to mature and enter on a course of study and thought adapted to this sphere of duty. I hardly dare yet look the matter in the face. Political life — between us — is no part of my plan, although I trust I shall aim in good faith to perform the duties temporarily and incidentally thus assigned.

“Why don't you let me know your daily literary employments, — how you divide your hours, — what you read, think, or write. I should dearly love to know just where you are on the ocean of knowledge, and what are at any given moment the great objects with you of intellectual interest, or active or official pursuit. Have you read a little book called the ‘Natural History of Enthusiasm’? I approve its religious character entirely, and should think it the book of a noble and full mind. . . . Please to present my respects to Mrs. Marsh, and believe me ever,

“Respectfully yours,

“R. CHOATE.”

Mr. Choate took his seat in Congress in December, 1831, and soon acquired from all parties that involuntary respect which a vigorous and well-stored mind is sure to receive. He was modest and retiring, seldom obtruding upon the House by a formal speech, was not very tolerant of committees, but eagerly watched the course of events, carefully examined public questions, and made free use of the Library of Congress. Massachusetts was then represented by men of whom any State might be proud. In the Senate were Nathaniel Silsbee and Daniel Webster, then in the fulness of his strength and fame. In the House were John Quincy Adams, Nathan Appleton, George N. Briggs, Edward Everett, and John Davis. The Congress itself was composed of an unusual number of statesmen. Among the Senators were Peleg Sprague, Samuel Prentiss, William L. Marcy, George M. Dallas, John M. Clayton, Henry Clay, and Thomas H. Benton. The House had such men as James M. Wayne, George M'Duffie, George Evans, James K. Polk, Thomas Corwin, and G. C. Verplanck. In this body Mr. Choate took his seat, as it soon proved, an equal among equals. It was a period of great political excitement. General Jackson was drawing near the close of the first term of his Presidency, sustained by warm friends, yet opposed by some of the ablest statesmen in the country.

Mr. Choate made but two speeches during the session, one on Revolutionary Pensions, the other on the Tariff, but these gave him a position at once among the most able and persuasive speakers of the House. One of these speeches was made under unusual circumstances. The subject of the Tariff had been hanging for some time in the Committee, when one afternoon Mr. Choate obtained the floor. There were but few members present when he rose, but as he continued to speak, one after another came from the lobbies to the door, stood a moment to listen, were caught and drawn to their seats by the irresistible charm of his mellifluous utterance, till gradually the hall became full, and all, for convenience of hearing, gathered in a circle about the speaker. He had a nervous dread of thunder, and was never quite at ease in a severe storm. Before he had half finished his speech a dark thunder-cloud rolled up and suddenly burst over the Capitol. Mr. Choate was standing directly under the central skylight; his face pale with a blackish paleness, and his whole frame tremulous with unusual excitement. The hearers caught his emotion and listened intently as he went on. At the same time the increasing darkness, the rushing wind and rain, the lurid light through the distant windows, the red and searching gleams of the lightning, the rattling peals of thunder, the circle of upturned white faces, lighted from above, gazing earnestly on the speaker, — all made it a scene not easily to be forgotten. He spoke in the modest, deferential manner natural to him, with the same delicious, uninterrupted flow of choice words, and with hardly a gesture except the lifting and settling of the upper part of the body, and he sat down amidst the enthusiasm of those who heard him, members of all parties rushing to offer their congratulations. His position as a parliamentary orator was established.

The tariff and nullification were the great subjects which interested the public mind during this session. A single letter to a constituent will give an insight into the political hopes and fears of the writer, and of those who belonged to the same party with him.

TO DR. ANDREW NICHOLS, DANVERS, MASS.

“WASHINGTON, 14th Jan. 1832.

“DEAR SIR, — I have just received your favor of the 9th, and assure you that I have read it with interest and pleasure. You will have seen before this reaches you, that the battle is already begun, and that Clay has presented to the Senate and the country a clear and explicit outline of the principles on which the friends of the tariff are willing to meet the crisis occasioned by the extinguishment of the debt. This exposition of his is undoubtedly the result of the combined wisdom of the whole tariff party as here represented, and the committees in each branch will report bills carrying the principle into details. It is considered here a sound, just, and saving creed; and I should think the system in its great features perfectly safe. It is the all-engrossing topic. I cannot help thinking that the excitement at the South is to a considerable degree artificial. Certain it is, the injurious effects of the tariff on them are greatly overrated. To the cotton manufacture, I should say they are very much reconciled, and considering what a vast market it creates for their cotton, — taking a sixth perhaps of the whole crop, — it would be strange if they were not. Coarse woollens are the special objects of their hostility. Then they hate New England, and they think, or affect to think, that the tariff raises the prices of their purchases, for the sole benefit of the New England manufacturer. But all is safe and sure, and fifty years more will probably satisfy South Carolina herself that the New England cotton market, the increased value of slaves, diminished quantity and higher price of cotton from the sugar culture of Louisiana, the fall of prices from the competition of American and foreign manufactures in our own market, afford even her some compensation for the prosperity of the North and East. The article in the last ‘American Quarterly’ is by Senator Johnston, of Louisiana, — a State of great importance to the friends of the system. All the West, the Middle States, and East, except Maine and New Hampshire, are sound, and have just as little fancy for slow poison, and being cut up in detail, as they have for violent instantaneous death, or a general rout. Clay’s presence in the Senate this winter is providential. Surely he is needed more than in 1824, if possible, and he has cordial, most able, and sufficient support in the Senate. His speech was not showy, nor vehement, but cool, plain, paternal, grave, conciliatory.

“With great respect, &c.,

“R. CHOATE.”

Among the college friends of Mr. Choate, sympathizing with him in love of learning, and carrying his pursuits into fields at that time not much cultivated in this country, was Rev. George Bush, a thorough scholar, and an eloquent writer. He had been giving a careful attention to Oriental literature, and sowing the seed which afterwards grew into the “Life of Mohammed,” Hebrew Grammars, and Commentaries on several books of the old Testament. Many years afterwards he adopted the opinions of Swedenborg, and deservedly obtained great respect and influence among the followers of that mystic philosopher and religious apostle. A correspondence with Mr. Bush was revived by Mr. Choate during this his first session at Washington.

TO REV. GEORGE BUSH.

“WASHINGTON, Jan. 21, 1832.

“MY DEAR SIR,—I received a few days since a portion of a work on which I heard you were engaged, addressed to me in a handwriting which I could not fail to recognize as yours, although the most recent specimen of it in my possession is now about eleven years old. I embrace the generous intimation conveyed in this notice, to present to you my respects, and to extend to you, in the language of ordination, the right hand of that old and cherished fellowship to which I owe so much. . . . How have these eleven years,—twelve years is it not?—how has time ‘which changes every thing, man more than any thing,’ dealt with you? What a curiosity one feels to see if he can find the traces of that imperceptible, busy, and really awful touch under which temple and tower at length fall down, upon the countenance and person, in the eye, tones, and feelings of an old friend long absent! In one respect, this long interval has been to both of us alike full of short joy and enduring sorrow, — each having possessed and lost an object of dearest love which the other never saw. But I forgot that perhaps you never heard that I have buried within two years a most sweet and bright child of four years old, whom I would have given a right arm to save. It must be a vast alleviation of your far greater bereavement that your child is spared.

“A hundred thousand recollections come over me as I write to you, which stop me, make me lay down my pen, and rest my head on my hand. Dismissing them all, I beg to know why you will not come on here a little while this winter? Besides your friends at Dr. Lindsley’s, you will find at least one old pupil, — besides myself, — a Mrs. H., the wife of a member who remembers your term of service at Mr. D.’s seminary with respect and affection, — and some few other objects of interest. Let go the pains and pleasures of authorship for a month; come and see with how little wisdom the world is governed, and return with a lighter heart to Mohammed and Joseph, Arabia, Egypt, and the waters of Israel. I have a chamber in the third story by myself; a long table, — perhaps the most desirable of luxuries, — with two windows looking out upon the shores of Virginia, the setting sun, and the grave of Washington, and here you shall sit if you will, and we will sacrifice to renewed friendship and auld lang syne. But I forget all proprieties, like the Dominie upon the recovery of Bertram. I stop short, therefore, first earnestly hoping to hear from you immediately.

“With great regard and affection, yours,

“R. CHOATE.”

TO REV. GEORGE BUSH.

“WASHINGTON, Feb. 12, 1832.

“MY DEAR SIR. — I hardly can get time, so ‘strenuous’ and full of incident is the idleness of our life here, to write a letter, except of a Sunday afternoon, after a morning at church. Last Sunday I began to write to you, — was interrupted, and, like a resolution offered the last month of the session, it has stood over one week. . . . I shall send you what I write to-day, though it be no more than a bare expression of thanks for your letter, and a hope to have many more like it. I learn from Dr. C. that your brother's health compels him to take a voyage, which of course puts it out of your power to continue your personal attentions. If this leaves you so much disengaged that you can come, I hope to see you here yet. You will be driven from that great city by the cholera I am afraid, before long, — an awful scourge of national and personal sins, which we can no more escape in this country, than we can turn back the east wind to his sources in the caves of the sea. I board with a physician, and have, therefore, an instructed and reasonable dread of this business. But whoso best knows Washington, will be least disposed to recommend it as a city of refuge. I was surprised at the reasons you suggest for withdrawing from the pulpit. But it little matters what the vocation is, if it be suited to the measure, fulness, and desires of the mind which it attaches to itself. I think educated, tasteful, and knowing men, however, should remember that 'great parts are a great trust,' and that there is responsibility connected as well with the proper selection of employment, as with the discharge of its duties when selected. I hold a good book and good sermon to be not only well per se, but to be worthy, fitting, and adequate achievements of good minds. Authorship and the business of instruction go well together, however, or else the introduction to Old Mortality is as much a fiction as the main story.

"I should think, quocunque nomine gaudes, however employed, New York would be a pleasant residence for you. To be sure, as in duty bound, I hold Boston, with its University society, rather the best place to live in, in all North America, but I cannot but see its inferiority in some respects to New York. You are so near to England, and so central to all the art, enterprise, science, mind, and politics of the Republic, that you have great advantage over the more provincial portions of the country, so much farther from which the 'sun drives his chariot.' There must be a wide circle of fine minds in that city, — Verplanck here is such an one I should think, — 'a thing that's most uncommon,' an honest, learned, modest, reasonable man, — yet a Van Buren Jacksonian, — credite posteri!

"What do you think now, — I have the Shakspeare here which you gave me, and I read a few lines of Greek and Latin every morning, and I trust, if we should meet, we could take each other up just where we were set down twelve years ago, even in the humanities. In all love and honor, respect and affection, I am sure we could. I wish you would write me very often, assured always that you write to a constant, as well as old friend.

Yours ever,

“R. CHOATE.”

Congress adjourned July 14, 1832. The summer and autumn were full of political excitement. The result of the elections was the renewed choice of Andrew Jackson for President (over Henry Clay), by an immense majority. The result was not unexpected. “The news from the voting States,” wrote Mr. Choate to Mr. Everett on the 10th of November, “blows over us like a great cold storm. I suppose all is lost, and that the map may be rolled up for twelve years to come. Happy if, when it is opened again, no State shall be missing.”

Among the subjects which deeply agitated the popular mind of the North, especially of the religious communities, was the treatment of the Southern Indians, by the States within whose boundaries they existed.

In legislating against the Cherokees, Georgia had passed a law that no white man should reside within the limits of the Cherokee nation, without permission from the governor of the State, and after having taken an oath to support and defend the laws of Georgia, on penalty of imprisonment at hard labor for a term not exceeding four years. Under this law Rev. Messrs. Worcester and Butler, missionaries of the American Board to the Indians, and five others, were tried and sentenced in September, 1831. After conviction, pardon was offered on condition of obedience to the State law. Five persons accepted the offer, but Messrs. Worcester and Butler refused, and appealed to the U. S. Supreme Court. Mr. Wirt and Mr.

Sergeant argued their cause. Georgia did not appear, but the court, in March, 1832, pronounced the law of the State unconstitutional. Georgia refused to obey the mandate or reverse her decision. The missionaries, however, after about eighteen months' imprisonment, were pardoned and released on the 16th of January, 1833. In the mean time nullification, as it was called, had assumed a portentous magnitude in South Carolina. A convention had been holden; the State bristled with bayonets; defiance was upon every lip. At the head of the general government was a man, who, whatever were his faults, never lacked courage, or resolution, or patriotism. In January, 1833, General Jackson issued his famous proclamation against South Carolina. It was honest, weighty, and irresistible. Party feeling for a while was quelled. The moral sentiment of the country sustained the President. A letter from Mr. Choate to his friend, Prof. Bush, who seems for the moment to have taken a view opposed to the President, will indicate his own feeling and that of many others with him.

TO PROFESSOR GEORGE BUSH.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29, 1833.

"MY DEAR FRIEND, — Your letter finds me swallowing lots of wormwood tea, — not to sweeten my imagination, but to check a furious sick headache, — a poor mood for answering deep questions, though an excellent one for appreciating a letter from a loved and honored friend. Did I not talk about you an hour to Dr. Bond, — Tutor Bond, — last Sunday evening? The Doctor stands against time like 'an obelisk fronting the sun.' He reminds me of Livy's pictured page, I warrant me, of Consuls, Lictors, axes, and especially Tarpeian rocks, — down which all nullifiers and states-rights men — except you — ought to be precipitated, Senatus consulto, edicto, plebiscito, — Latin or no Latin, — under the grammar or against it. How the missionaries settled the matter with their cause and consciences I have never heard. Speaking as a politician, I rejoice that Georgia has been thus detached from South Carolina, and harnessed into the great car of the Constitution. It needs tali auxilio et defensoribus istis even. My dear friend, there is no more danger of consolidation (that is, until the States first go apart, snapping these ties of gauze) than there is of an invasion by the real Xerxes of Herodotus. One single mistake now, any yielding, any thing short of a dead march up to the whole outermost limit of Constitutional power, and the Federal Government is contemptible for ever. The Georgia case is, to be sure, a bad business. It is a clear case of nullification by the State. But so far as the missionaries are concerned, the Federal government has not declined any duty. The judiciary performed its part. The President is called on for nothing, until another application to the Federal Judiciary, and that, you see, the pardon interposes to render unnecessary. The two systems have not directly clashed, though they bit their thumbs. The Indians, — the treaties, — the whole code of intercourse law, — all go overboard of course. The moral guilt of the S. C. case is less. The constitutional enormity of the thing is more palpable and more tangible, and the precedent, pejoris exempli — pessimi indeed. . . .

“The session is now one of thrilling interest. Calhoun is drunk with disappointment; the image of an ardent, imaginative, intellectual man, who once thought it as easy ‘to set the stars of glory on his brow’ as to put his hat on; now ruined, dishonored. He has to defend the most contemptible untruth in the whole history of human opinion, and no ability will save him from contempt mentally. Then he hoped to recover himself by a brilliant stroke, permanently inserting nullification into our polity, and putting himself at the head of a great Convention of the States, — a great midnight thunder-storm, hail-storm, meeting of witches and demons, round a caldron big enough to receive the disjecta membra of the Constitution, — thence never to come a whole, still less a blooming, young, and vigorous form. Wherefore pereat. I am somewhat weak from medicine, and must bid you farewell. Write me daily, and reconsider the point of Consolidation. I say that will come with Xerxes.

Truly yours,

“R. CHOATE.”

In April, 1833, having been again nominated by the National Republicans, Mr. Choate was re-elected to Congress by an increased majority. Opposition from the friends of Mr. Crowninshield had nearly died away, and from many of them he received a cordial support. The most exciting subject of the next session was the Bank of the United States. The President had already refused assent to a bill re-chartering this institution, and soon after determined to remove the public moneys deposited in its vaults. After the adjournment of Congress, in March, 1833, William J. Duane, of Pennsylvania, was appointed Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. M'Lane having been transferred to the Department of State. The President at once urged the new Secretary to remove the deposits, which, not being convinced of the wisdom of the measure, he declined to do. Upon this President Jackson removed him from office, and appointed in his place Roger B. Taney, who immediately carried out the wishes of the Executive. Great commercial distress followed this proceeding. The act was condemned by many of the friends of the administration as well as by the opposition. Confidence was destroyed, business interrupted, industry checked, and all moneyed institutions deranged where but a few months before every thing was active and prosperous. The Senate was opposed to the President, and passed a resolution censuring his conduct; but the House had a large majority in his favor. Memorials were addressed to Congress from various cities and public bodies. The Committee of Ways and Means having submitted a report with reference to the removal of the deposits, Mr. Choate addressed the House on the 28th March, 1834. He had prepared himself to consider the whole subject in its constitutional relations as well as financial, but at the suggestion of Mr. Webster confined himself to the latter branch of the subject. The speech is direct, earnest, persuasive, and conciliatory. It was with relation to this speech that the anecdote is told of Benjamin Hardin, — "Old Ben Hardin," — as he was called, of Kentucky, who then heard Mr. Choate for the first time. I give it in the words of one who was present. "Mr. Hardin was an old stager in politics, a strong-minded, though somewhat rough individual, who was not disposed to much leniency in his criticisms of the efforts of younger members. He was, like Mr. Choate, Whig in politics; and several days, or perhaps weeks, after the speech of Mr. Choate, he made an elaborate argument on the same question, and on the same side. At the outset of his remarks he stated that it was his uniform rule not to listen to speeches upon the same side of a question that he intended to discuss, as he wished to be conscious of feeling that no part of his argument had been anticipated by others, 'but,' said he, 'I was compelled to depart from this rule once during this debate. The member from Massachusetts rose to speak, and, in accordance with my custom, I took my hat to leave, lingering a moment just to notice the tone of his voice and the manner of his speech. But that moment was fatal to my resolution. I became charmed by the music of his voice, and was captivated by the power of his eloquence, and found myself wholly unable to move until the last word of his beautiful speech had been uttered.'"

At the close of this session, having determined to remove to Boston, Mr. Choate resigned his place in Congress. While at Salem he had continued his studies in literature, always with him second only in interest to the profession on which he depended for daily bread. Besides the lecture on the "Waverley Novels," he had delivered another on Poland, taking the occasion from the revolution in that country to present a well-considered and careful picture of her government, resources, and people, in a style fervid, yet moderate and sustained. He also delivered an address at the centennial celebration of the settlement of Ipswich.

In removing to Boston Mr. Choate felt that the experiment was doubtful. Some judicious friends advised against the change. He left an established position, and a growing practice, for severer contests and a sharper rivalry. But generous rivalry he never feared, and the result showed how truly he estimated his own powers. He had now a family — two daughters and a son — to stimulate his labor. Two older children he had lost. They now lie in the graveyard at Essex.

Not long after he came to Boston, as early perhaps as 1836, he gave a lecture on "The Romance of the Sea." The subject was one in which he could revel. The mystery, the power of the ocean, the achievements upon its many waters, all that poets have sung, all that history or fiction has told, went to form the substance or illustration of the theme. It was one of the most fascinating of his many lectures. He afterwards lost it, or it was stolen from him, in New York. But if stolen it is really pleasant to think of the disappointment of the thief. A Coptic manuscript would have been to him quite as legible.

The first six or seven years in Boston were marked mainly by a steady growth in his profession. Every young man who enters such a community, bringing a reputation earned in a different field, is necessarily subjected to close scrutiny. His ability is judged by a new, and perhaps severer standard. He is a stranger until he has proved himself worthy of the fellowship of a citizen. The pride of the bar, generous, but necessarily exclusive, grants its honors to him only who can fairly win them. Mr. Choate — whose appearance and manner were unique, whose eloquence then was as exuberant, fervid, and rich as it ever became; who, however modest for himself, was bold almost to rashness for his client; who startled court and jury by his vehemence, and confounded the commonplace and routine lawyer by the novelty and brilliancy of his tactics; who, free from vulgar tricks, was yet full of surprises, and though perpetually delighting by the novelty and beauty of his argument, was yet without conceit or vanity, — could not at once be fully understood and appreciated. He fairly fought his way to eminence; created the taste which he gratified; and demonstrated the possibility of almost a new variety of eloquence. It would have been surprising, if he had not to contend with prejudices which time only could fully melt away. For several years it was rather the fashion to laugh at his excessive vehemence of gesture, and playful exaggerations, but when it was found that the flowers and myrtle concealed a blade of perfect temper, and as keen as any that the driest logician could forge, that the fervent gesticulator never for one moment lost command of himself or his subject, nor failed to hold the thought and interest of the jury, as the ancient mariner held the wedding-guest, till convinced, delighted, entranced, they were eager to find a verdict for his client,—doubt gave place to confidence, and disparagement to admiration. During these six or seven years he was steadily growing in knowledge and in influence. He made the more familiar acquaintance with the leaders of the Suffolk bar, then unsurpassed in the whole land for ability and learning. There he met (not to speak of the living) the polished rhetoric of Franklin Dexter, the subtle and powerful logic of Jeremiah Mason, and the tremendous weight and authority of Webster. He heard the law expounded and declared by the integrity and learning and wisdom of Samuel Hubbard and Samuel Sumner Wilde and Lemuel Shaw. To meet such competitors, to stand unharmed before the judgments of such a tribunal, compelled the most diligent and unremitting study. Distinction could be attained only by merit. Eminence was itself proof of high abilities and of strenuous labor. Preserving his interest in letters, he still found time to deliver a number of lectures before associations of young men, and with ever increasing popularity. He suffered also a severe domestic calamity. Two daughters were born to him in Boston. Of these the younger, Caroline, was in 1840 three years old. To all his children he was tenderly attached, and to her, perhaps as being the youngest, especially. She was a beautiful child, and he never failed, coming home late from the labors of his office, to go up to the room where she was sleeping, to give her an evening kiss. The following account of her last hours, in the words of a clergyman, who, in the absence of Mr. Choate's pastor, Rev. Dr. Adams, was called to be present, will show the extreme tenderness and affection of the father. On the day of her death Mr. Choate had sent him the following note:—

"BOSTON, Saturday morning.

"To Rev. Hubbard Winslow:—

"MY DEAR SIR, — I am apprehensive that I am about losing my youngest child, and I take the liberty to ask you, if not very inconvenient, to do us the great kindness of baptizing her. Her mother is a member of a church, and this ordinance has been accidentally delayed.

"I am aware of the freedom of this request, but I hope the severity and peculiarity of our trying circumstances will excuse it. It seems to us that 3 o'clock P.M., or a little after, may be as late as we shall desire to delay,—perhaps too late.

"If you can consent to do us this favor, and will apprise me of the decision, I will send a carriage for you.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"RUFUS CHOATE."

"Entering the chamber," says Dr. Winslow, "at the appointed time, I found the family all assembled. The beautiful little girl of perhaps three years lay dying. Mr. Choate said, 'I hope you will pardon this liberty. We have given our dear child to God, and we think He is about to take her; but we have neglected her baptism.' I said a few words of the ordinance as not essential to the salvation of the child, but the answer of a good conscience on the part of the parents. He assented, and said he desired to do his duty in that particular. All knelt in prayer, and after the ordinance and a few remarks, I was about to retire, to leave the weeping family to the sacredness of their domestic sorrow, when Mr.

Choate took my hand and besought me to remain with them while the child lived. I consented to remain till evening, when I had another engagement. He stood by the fireplace, resting his elbows on the marble, burying his face in his hands, evidently absorbed in prayer. Mrs. Choate was bending over the pillow, with the yearning tenderness of a mother, and the older children and servants stood around in silent grief; while I sat by the bedside observing the child's symptoms, and sometimes repeating a passage of Scripture or a pertinent stanza of poetry. And thus a full hour passed in silence, in prayer, in tears, in communion with death and eternity, Mr. Choate remaining motionless as a statue during the whole time. Perceiving the pulse failing and the breath becoming very short and difficult, I said, 'Mr. Choate, I fear the dear child is just leaving us.' He then came to the bedside, embraced her, kissed her three times, and then returned and resumed his position as before. All the family followed him in the parting kiss. A few moments after, the angel spirit fled. I closed the sightless eyes, and said, 'My dear Mr. Choate, your sweet child is in heaven!' He burst instantly into a flood of tears, and sobbed aloud. He did not change his position, but remained with his face buried in his hands, and the tears pouring like rain-drops upon the hearth-stone. And thus he continued, until duty compelled me to leave the chamber of death. He then came and thanked me, and said with deep emotion, 'I feel greatly comforted; my dear child has gone home. It was God's will to take her, and that is enough.' "

CHAPTER III.

1841-1843.

Professional Advancement—Letters to Richard S. Storrs, Jr.—Chosen Senator in place of Mr. Webster—Death of General Harrison—Eulogy in Faneuil Hall—Extra Session of Congress—Speech on the M'Leod Case—The Fiscal Bank Bill—Collision with Mr. Clay—Nomination of Mr. Everett as Minister to England—Letter to Mr. Sumner—Letters to his Son—The next Session—Speech on providing further Remedial Justice in the United States Courts—Letters to Mr. Sumner—The North Eastern Boundary Question—Journal.

MR. CHOATE'S professional advancement in Boston was no accident, nor the result of peculiarly favoring circumstances. It was the reward of untiring diligence as well as of great ability. Every day he was gaining ground, enlarging and consolidating his knowledge, and invigorating his faculties. A few years served to give him a position second to none except the acknowledged and long-tried leaders of the bar. His consummate judgment in the conduct of a cause, no less than his brilliant power as an advocate, commanded respect from the most able. He knew when to speak, and, what is more difficult, when to be silent. In the most intricate and doubtful case, when fairly engaged, he did not allow himself to despair, and was often successful against the greatest odds. In defeat he was never sullen, and in victory he bore himself with so much modesty and gentleness, that few envied his success. He especially attached to himself the younger members of the profession by unvarying kindness. He had great sympathy for a young lawyer. His advice and aid were always ready; voluntarily offered if he thought they were needed; and, if sought, cheerfully and freely bestowed. He assumed no superiority in this intercourse, but, by a kind suggestion or a few words of encouragement, insured success by inspiring confidence.

The following letter is in answer to one asking his advice as to a course of reading. The gentleman to whom it was written had entered his office as a student, but subsequently, on account of Mr. Choate's probable absence from Boston, went to spend a year in general studies at Andover.

TO RICHARD S. STORRS, JR.

“BOSTON, 2d Jan. 1841.

“DEAR SIR, — I should have been very happy to answer your letter before this, but a succession of engagements, some of them of a painful kind, have made it impossible. Even now I can do very little more than congratulate you on being able to spend a year at such a place, and to suggest that very general ‘macte virtute,’ which serves only to express good wishes without doing any thing to help realize them. I should be embarrassed, if I were in your situation, to know exactly what to do. The study of a profession is a prescribed and necessary course, — that of general literature, or of literature preparatory to our, or to any profession, is, on the other hand, so limitless, — so indeterminate, — so much a matter of taste, — it depends so much on the intellectual and moral traits of the student, what he needs and what he ought to shun, that an educated young man can really judge better for himself than another for him.

“As immediately preparatory to the study of the Law, I should follow the usual suggestion, to review thoroughly English history, — Constitutional history in Hallam particularly, and American Constitutional and Civil history in Pitkin and Story. Rutherford's Institutes, and the best course of Moral Philosophy you can find, will be very valuable introductory consolidating matter. Aristotle's Politics and all of Edmund Burke's works, and all of Cicero's works, would form an admirable course of reading, 'a library of eloquence and reason,' to form the sentiments and polish the tastes, and fertilize and enlarge the mind of a young man aspiring to be a lawyer and statesman. Cicero and Burke I would know by heart; both superlatively great — the latter the greatest, living in a later age, belonging to the modern mind and genius, though the former had more power over an audience, — both knew every thing.

"I would read every day one page at least, — more if you can, — in some fine English writer, solely for elegant style and expression. William Pinkney said to a friend of mine 'he never read a fine sentence in any author without committing it to memory.' The result was decidedly the most splendid and most powerful English spoken style I ever heard.

"I am ashamed to have written so hurriedly in the midst of a trial, but I preferred it to longer silence. Accept my best wishes, and assure yourself I am "Very truly yours, R. CHOATE."

Subsequently, when Mr. Storrs decided to abandon the study of law for a theological course, Mr. Choate wrote him: —

"MY DEAR SIR, — I have just received your letter and hasten to say that I have been much interested by it. The entire result has been much as I anticipated; and, all considerations of duty apart, I am inclined to think as a mere matter of rational happiness, — happiness from books, culture, the social affections, the estimation of others, and a sense of general usefulness and of consideration, you have chosen wisely. Duty, however, I think was clear, and when it is clear it is peremptory.

"I should not accept a fee, of course, under such circumstances, but shall expect you to send me all the sermons you print, and that they be good ones.

"I am very truly

"Your friend and serv't,

"SENATE CHAMBER,
"30th March."

"RUFUS CHOATE.

In 1841, Mr. Webster having accepted the office of Secretary of State under General Harrison, it became necessary for the Legislature of Massachusetts to elect another Senator to fill his place. The position was both delicate and difficult. The public wishes soon pointed to Mr. Choate, and his friends proceeded to consult him about the matter. The offer was at first met by a decided refusal, nor was it until after repeated interviews, and the greatest urgency, that he finally permitted his name to be brought before the Legislature, and then only with the express understanding that he should be allowed to resign the place within two or three years. The causes of this reluctance to accept so high and honorable and attractive an office were probably many and complicated. His natural modesty, a distaste for the annoyances of public life, a loathing of political schemers, plans of study and achievement with which public duties would interfere, the necessity of an income, the love of personal independence, — all these undoubtedly influenced his judgment.

Before taking his seat, the new Senator was called upon to deliver a eulogium upon the lamented President, in Faneuil Hall. It was a sincere and eloquent tribute to one whom the nation loved as a man even more than it respected as a President. General Harrison was inaugurated on the 4th of March, 1841. He died on the 4th of April, before having had time to establish distinctly the policy of the administration, but having summoned an extra session of Congress to meet on the 31st of May. The Vice-President, Mr. Tyler, immediately assumed the duties of the Presidency, not without solicitude on the part of the Whigs, with whom he had not always been identified, but yet with prevailing hopes. "The President," says Mr. Choate in a letter shortly after reaching Washington, "is in high spirits, — making a good impression. He will stand by Mr. Webster, and the talk of an unfriendly conservative action is true, but not terrifying."

Mr. Choate's first speech in the Senate was upon a subject on which the public mind in some parts of the country had been deeply agitated, and which involved difficult questions of international law. It was the case of Alexander M'Leod, charged with burning the Steamer Caroline. This forward and boastful person, who seems not to have been engaged at all in the exploit in which he had professed to be a prominent actor, having ventured into the State of New York, was arrested on an indictment found against him shortly after the destruction of the boat, and held for trial by the State Courts. The British Government assumed the act, by whomsoever done, as its own, and through its minister, Mr. Fox, demanded the release of the prisoner. This demand could not be complied with, since the prisoner was arraigned before the State Courts; but the Attorney-General of the United States, Mr. Crittenden, under the direction of Mr. Webster, then Secretary of State, was sent to observe the trial and render such assistance as should be proper and necessary. The subject was brought before Congress by the message of the President, when the policy of the Government, and especially the instructions and letter of Mr. Webster, were severely censured by Mr. Benton, Mr. Buchanan, and Mr. Calhoun, and defended by Mr. Rives, Mr.

Choate, Mr. Huntington, and Mr. Preston. In the House, the administration was sustained with great ability by John Quincy Adams and Mr. Cushing. The speech of Mr. Choate called forth warm commendations from all parties. "It was the first appearance of the Senator in debate here," said Mr. Buchanan, in his reply, "and, judging of others by myself, I must say, that those who have listened to him once will be anxious to hear him again."

It was during this extra session, when Mr. Choate was quite new to the Senate, that a slight collision took place between himself and Mr. Clay, the nature and importance of which were, perhaps intentionally, exaggerated by the party newspapers. Mr. Clay was the leader of the Whigs in the Senate, flushed with success, urgent of favorite measures, somewhat distrustful of the new President, Mr. Tyler, and excited by a report of the formation of a new party in opposition to his interests. The finances of the country had, for several years, been much deranged, and the great immediate objects of the Whigs, on coming into power, were the repeal of the Independent Treasury Acts, the re-establishing, in some form, of a National Bank, and an adequate provision for the public revenue. The first of these objects was accomplished without difficulty or delay. The bill for the purpose passed the Senate and the House by large majorities, and was at once approved by the President. The second object, the incorporation of a bank, was a more delicate and difficult matter. Mr. Tyler was known to be opposed to the old United States Bank, though it was thought that a charter might be framed to which he would have no objection. Accordingly Mr. Clay, early in the session, moved a call upon the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Ewing, for the plan of a bank. It was given, and, coming from such a source, was presumed to be in accordance with the ideas of the President. Upon this report a bill was modelled. To this bill Mr. Rives of Virginia offered an amendment, — which he supported by an able argument, — making the assent of the States necessary for the establishment of branches within their limits. Mr. Clay earnestly opposed the proposition, and Mr. Preston with equal earnestness sustained it. On the next day Mr. Choate made a short speech in favor of Mr. Rives's amendment, not because he doubted the constitutionality of the bill as reported by the committee, but mainly from considerations of policy.

“I do not vote for the bill,” he said, “from any doubt of the constitutional power of Congress to establish branches all over the States, possessing the discounting function, directly and adversely against their united assent. I differ in this particular wholly from the Senator who moves the amendment. I have no more doubt of your power to make such a bank and such branches anywhere, than of your power to build a post-office or a custom-house anywhere. This question for me is settled, and settled rightly. I have the honor and happiness to concur on it with all, or almost all, our greatest names; with our national judicial tribunal, and with both the two great original political parties; with Washington, Hamilton, Marshall, Story, Madison, Monroe, Crawford, and with the entire Republican administration and organization of 1816 and 1817.

“But it does not follow, because we possess this or any other power, that it is wise or needful, in any given case, to attempt to exert it. We may find ourselves so situated that we cannot do it if we would, for want of the concurrence of other judgments; and therefore a struggle might be as unavailing as it would be mischievous and unseemly. We may find ourselves so situated that we ought not to do it if we could. All things which are lawful are not convenient, are not practicable, are not wise, are not safe, are not kind. A sound and healing discretion, therefore, the moral coercion of irresistible circumstances, may fitly temper and even wholly restrain the exercise of the clearest power ever belonging to human government.”

He then proceeded to state his reasons for voting for the amendment. The first was, that the country greatly needed the bank, and in his opinion that result would be much sooner and more surely reached by admitting the bill as amended. “By uniting here on this amendment,” he said, “you put an effective bank in operation, to some useful and substantial extent, by the first of January. Turn now to the other alternative. Sir, if you adhere to the bill reported by the Committee, I fully believe you pass no bank charter this session. I doubt whether you carry it through Congress. If you can, I do not believe you can make it a law. I have no doubt you will fail to do so. I do not enter on the reasons of my belief. The rules of orderly proceeding here, decorum, pride, regret, would all prevent my doing it. I have no personal or private grounds for the conviction which holds me fast; but I judge on notorious, and to my mind, decisive indications; and I know that it is my duty to act on my belief, whether well or ill founded, and however conjecturally derived."

Another reason assigned for his vote was, that it would lead to united counsels and actions.

"In a larger view of the matter," he went on to say, "is it not in a high degree desirable to make such a charter, that while it secures to the people all that such kind of instrumentality as a bank can secure, we may still, in the mode and details of the thing, respect the scruples and spare the feelings of those who, just as meritoriously, usefully, and conspicuously as yourselves, are members of our political association, but who differ with you on the question of constitutional power? If I can improve the local currency, diffuse a sound and uniform national one, facilitate, cheapen, and systematize the exchanges, secure the safe-keeping and transmission of the public money, promote commerce, and deepen and multiply the springs of a healthful credit by a bank, and can at the same time so do it as to retain the cordial constant co-operation, and prolong the public usefulness of friends who hold a different theory of the Constitution, is it not just so much clear gain? I was struck, in listening to the senator from Virginia yesterday, with the thought, how idle, how senseless it is to spend time in deploring or being peevish about the inveterate constitutional opinions of the community he so ably represents. There the opinions are. What will you do with them? You cannot change them. You cannot stride over or disregard them. There they are; what will you do with them? Compromise the matter. Adjust it, if you can, in such sort that they shall neither yield their opinions, nor you yield yours. Give to the people all the practical good which a bank can give, and let the constitutional question, whether Congress can make a bank by its own power or not, stand over for argument on the last day of the Greek Kalends, when the disputants may have the world all to themselves to wrangle it out in! Yes, Sir, compromise it. Our whole history is but a history of compromises. You have compromised in larger things; do it in less, do it in this. You have done it for the sake of the Union; do it for the sake of the party which is doing it for the sake of the Union. You never made one which was received with wider and sincerer joy than this would be. Do it then. Do as your fathers did when they came together, delegates from the slave States, and delegates from the free, representatives of planters, of mechanics, of manufacturers, and the owners of ships, the cool and slow New England men, and the mercurial children of the sun, and sat down side by side in the presence of Washington, to frame this more perfect Union. Administer the Constitution in the temper that created it. Do as you have yourselves done in more than one great crisis of your affairs, when questions of power and of administration have shaken these halls and this whole country, and an enlarged and commanding spirit, not yet passed away from our counsels, assisted you to rule the uproar, and to pour seasonable oil on the rising sea. Happy, thrice happy, for us all, if the senator from Kentucky would allow himself to-day to win another victory of conciliation."

"Let me say, Sir," he went on after a brief intervening statement on the nature of the amendment, "that to administer the contested powers of the Constitution is, for those of you who believe that they exist, at all times a trust of difficulty and delicacy. I do not know that I should not venture to suggest this general direction for the performance of that grave duty. Steadily and strongly assert their existence; do not surrender them; retain them with a provident forecast; for the time may come when you will need to enforce them by the whole moral and physical strength of the Union; but do not exert them at all so long as you can, by other less offensive expedients of wisdom, effectually secure to the people all the practical benefits which you believe they were inserted into the Constitution to secure. Thus will the Union last longest, and do most good. To exercise a contested power without necessity, on a notion of keeping up the tone of government, is not much better than tyranny, and very improvident and impolitic tyranny, too. It is turning 'extreme medicine into daily bread.' It forgets that the final end of government is not to exert restraint, but to do good.

"Within this general view of the true mode of administering contested powers, I think the measure we propose is as wise as it is conciliatory; wise because it is conciliatory; wise because it reconciles a strong theory of the Constitution with a discreet and kind administration of it. I desire to give the country a bank. Well, here is a mode in which I can do it. Shall I refuse to do it in that mode because I cannot at the same time and by the same operation gain a victory over the settled constitutional opinions, and show my contempt for the ancient and unappeasable jealousy and prejudices of not far from half of the American people? Shall I refuse to do it in that mode because I cannot at the same time and by the same operation win a triumph of constitutional law over political associates who agree with me on nine in ten of all the questions which divide the parties of the country; whose energies and eloquence, under many an October and many an August sun, have contributed so much to the transcendent reformation which has brought you into power?

“There is one consideration more which has had some influence in determining my vote. I confess that I think that a bank established in the manner contemplated by this amendment stands, in the actual circumstances of our time, a chance to lead a quieter and more secure life, so to speak, than a bank established by the bill. I think it worth our while to try to make, what never yet was seen, a popular National Bank. Judging from the past and the present, from the last years of the last bank, and the manner in which its existence was terminated; from the tone of debate and of the press, and the general indications of public opinion, I acknowledge an apprehension that such an institution, — created by a direct exertion of your power, throwing off its branches without regard to the wishes or wants of the States, as judged of by themselves, and without any attempt to engage their auxiliary co-operation, diminishing the business and reducing the profits of the local banks, and exempted from their burdens, — that such an institution may not find so quiet and safe a field of operation as is desirable for usefulness and profit. I do not wish to see it standing like a fortified post on a foreign border, — never wholly at peace, always assailed, always belligerent; not falling perhaps, but never safe, the nurse and the prize of unappeasable hostility. No, Sir. Even such an institution, under conceivable circumstances, it might be our duty to establish and maintain in the face of all opposition and to the last gasp. But so much evil attends such a state of things, so much insecurity, so much excitement; it would be exposed to the pelting of such a pitiless storm of the press and public speech; so many demagogues would get good livings by railing at it; so many honest men would really regard it as unconstitutional, and as dangerous to business and liberty, — that it is worth an exertion to avoid it. . . . Sir, I desire to see the Bank of the United States become a cherished domestic institution, reposing in the bosom of our law and of our attachments. Established by the concurrent action or on the application of the States, such might be its character. There will be a struggle on the question of admitting the discount power into the States; much good sense and much nonsense will be spoken and written; but such a struggle will be harmless and brief, and when that is over, all is over. The States which exclude it will hardly exasperate themselves farther about it. Those which admit it will soothe themselves with the consideration that the act is their own, and that the existence of this power of the branch is a perpetual recognition of their sovereignty. Thus might it sooner cease to wear the alien, aggressive, and privileged aspect which has rendered it offensive, and become sooner blended with the mass of domestic interests, cherished by the same regards, protected by the same and by a higher law.”¹

It was during this speech that Mr. Clay, who had left his own seat, and, through the courtesy of a younger member, had taken another nearer Mr. Choate, rose and interrupted the speaker with an inquiry as to the grounds of his knowledge that the Bank Bill would not pass without the amendment. The intimacy of Mr. Choate with Mr. Webster, then Secretary of State, gave a weight to his words, and the implication in Mr. Clay's question evidently was, that he had derived his knowledge, directly or indirectly, from the President himself. In a subsequent part of the discussion, Mr. Archer, in opposing the amendment of Mr. Rives, took occasion to express his regret that the Senator from Kentucky had endeavored to draw from Mr. Choate the opinions of the Executive. Mr. Clay rose to explain, and this led to a sharp interlocutory debate between himself and Mr. Choate, which ended by Mr. Clay's interrupting Mr. Choate in the midst of an explanation, and saying, “That, Sir, is not the thing. Did you not say that you could not, without breach of privilege and violation of parliamentary rule, disclose your authority?” “Sir,” replied Mr. Choate, “I insist on my right to explain what I did say in my own words.” Mr. Clay persisted in requesting a direct answer, and Mr. Choate replied again, “that he would have to take the answer as he chose to give it to him.” The parties were here called to order, and the President requested both gentlemen to take their seats. That Mr. Clay in this, bringing all the weight of his experience, age, character, and long public life to bear upon a member of his own party, new to the Senate, and not yet practically familiar with its usages, should have seemed overbearing and arrogant, was unavoidable, and it might have justified a sharper retort than was given. I have been informed by those who were present that the impression in the senate chamber was much less than it was represented by the newspapers, especially by those opposed to Mr. Clay and the Whig party. But whatever may have been the feeling of the moment, at the meeting of the Senate on the next day, Mr. Clay with great magnanimity and earnestness denied the intention which had been imputed to him, and disclaimed entirely the design of placing the Senator from Massachusetts in a questionable position. Those who were present were struck with the nobleness of the apology, and Mr. Choate, of all men the most gentle and placable, went round to Mr. Clay who sat on the opposite side of the chamber, and made open demonstration of reconciliation.

¹ Appendix to Congressional Globe, July, 1841, pp. 355, 356.

Another matter which interested Mr. Choate very much during this session was the confirmation of Mr. Everett as Minister to England. The nomination, which was regarded by all right-minded people as one of the most appropriate that could be made, was fiercely assailed on account of an opinion which Mr. Everett had once given in favor of the right and duty of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. He was charged with being an "abolitionist," a word of indefinite but fearful import. Mr. Choate felt that the rejection of a minister on grounds so intangible, so untenable, and so inadequate, would be for the disgrace of the country, and he exerted himself to the utmost to prevent such a result. Those who heard his principal speech in favor of the nomination considered it one of the most brilliant and eloquent ever delivered within the walls of the senate chamber.¹

A member of the Senate who was present during the debate, in a letter written to Mr. Choate many years afterwards, thus recalls the scene: "My dear Sir, Mr. Buchanan's nomination brings up some reminiscences of you and of him, which are by no means pleasant to me, now that there is a possibility he may be President. I refer, of course, to the lead he took on one side and you on the other, in the debate which preceded Mr. Everett's confirmation as Minister to London. I well remember the cogency and splendor of your argument, and the emotion it raised in Preston, who, completely overpowered by the conviction to which you brought him, exclaimed, boiling with excitement, 'I shall have to vote "No," but by — HE SHALL NOT BE REJECTED.'² With all my admiration for your effort, the whole scene was deeply painful and humiliating to me, more so, probably, than to any man in the chamber. I was indignant beyond the power of language at the requirement of the South, that the nomination should be voted down, and the nominee branded as unfit to represent his country at the British Court, simply and solely because he had replied to the question put to him, ¹ There are no remains of this speech, which was delivered in executive session, with closed doors.

² I have understood that Colonel Preston, when afterwards on a visit to Boston, told a friend that he never regretted any vote he had given as he did that against Mr. Everett.

that Congress might and ought to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. B.'s hostility was vindictive and savage. He distinctly and emphatically denounced Mr. E. as an 'abolitionist,' for this and this only, disclaiming all opposition to him as a Whig, or as otherwise objectionable."

Mr. Clay made a powerful speech in favor of the nomination, and said that if it was rejected, there would never be another President of the United States. A familiar letter to Mr. Sumner, then prominent among the younger members of the Whig party, alludes to this among other things. Though without date (for this was one of the points of a letter about which Mr. Choate was habitually careless), it must have been written in September, 1841, Congress adjourning on the 13th of that month, and the Senate not confirming the nomination till very near the close of the session.

TO CHARLES SUMNER, ESQ.

“WASHINGTON.

“MY DEAR SUMNER,—I have just received the memorandum, and will turn it nocturna et diurna manu,—to quote obscure and unusual Latin words. I hope it will do your friend's business, and the Pope's and England's, and the lone Imperial mother's—as you say.

“Mr. Webster is so much excited (and, confidentially, gratified) with the squaboshment of the Whigs¹ that he will talk of nothing else. He thinks he can seal better with Sir Robert Peel et id genus. Can he? Your acquaintance was made with so whiggish a set, that I suppose you mourn as for the flight of liberty. But, mark you, how much more peaceably, purely, intellectually, did this roaring democracy of ours change its whole government and whole policy, last fall, than England has done it now.

“Yes, Everett's is a good appointment. Ask me, when I get home, if we did not come near losing him in the Senate from Abolitionism;—entre nous,—if we do, the Union goes to pieces like a potter's vessel. But as Eracles' vein is not lightly nor often to be indulged in,—(nec Deus intersit nisi, &c.),—I give love to Hillard, salute you, and am very truly “Yours, RUFUS CHOATE.”

¹ Lord Melbourne's ministry.

“P. S. — We shall have a veto after all, ut timeo.”

The veto, the second veto, was sent in September 9, and Congress adjourned the 13th.

A few letters to his son, then about seven years old, and at school in Essex, will show the affectionate, playful, yet earnest character of his intercourse with his children.

TO RUFUS CHOATE, JR.

“WASHINGTON, 30th May, 1841.

“MY DEAR SON, — It is just a week to-day since I kissed you a good-by, and now I am five hundred miles, or nearly so, from you. I feel quite sad to think of it; and if I did not suppose you were a good boy, and at the head, and going on fast with the Latin, I should feel still worse. But I hope you love books better and better every day. You will learn one of these days who it is that says, ‘Come, my best friends, my books.’ I suppose you have no roses yet at Essex, or green peas, or mown grass,—though you used to say that you saw every thing there nearly. Here, the whole city is in blossom. They are making hay; and rose-bushes bend under their loads of red and white roses. Can you tell now, by your geography, why the season is so much earlier here than at Essex,—especially considering what a handsome place Essex is, and what a good school you go to, and how much pains cousin M—— takes with you? You must answer this question in your letter to me, and think all about it yourself.

“I hope you will write to your mother and the girls often. They all love you dearly, and want to hear from you every day. Besides, it does one good to sit down and write home. It fills his heart full of affection and of pleasant recollections. . . . Write me soon.

“Your affectionate father,
 “RUFUS CHOATE.”

TO RUFUS CHOATE, JR.

“MY DEAR RUFUS, — Your mother and dear sisters have you so far away, that I want to put my own arm around your neck, and having whispered a little in your ear, give you a kiss. I hope, first, that you are good; and next that you are well and studious, and among the best scholars. If that is so, I am willing you should play every day, after, or out of, school, till the blood is ready to burst from your cheeks. There is a place or two, according to my recollections of your time of life, in the lane, where real, good, solid satisfaction, in the way of play, may be had. But I do earnestly hope to hear a great account of your books and progress when I get home. Love cousin M——, and all your school and play mates, and love the studies which will make you wise, useful, and happy, when there shall be no blood at all to be seen in your cheeks or lips.

“Your explanation of the greater warmth of weather here than at Essex is all right. Give me the sun of Essex, however, I say, for all this. One half-hour, tell grandmother, under those cherished button-woods, is worth a month under these insufferable fervors. . . . I hope I shall get home in a month. Be busy, affectionate, obedient, my dear, only boy.

“Your father, RUFUS CHOATE.”

Every letter to his children at this period is replete with affection, and kind suggestions and hopes. “Do not play with bad boys. Love good ones. Love your teacher, and see if you cannot go to the head of your own age of boys. . . . I expect to find all of you grown. If I find the beautiful feelings and bright minds grown too, I shall leap for joy. . . . Give my love to all. Tell only truth; and be just, kind, and courageous. Good-by, my darling boy.”

And again to two of his children: “I hope you are well, obedient, affectionate, and studious. You must learn to take care of yourselves alone, your clothes, books, the place you sleep in, and of all your ways.

Be pleasant, brave, and fond of books. I want to hear that you are both good scholars, but chiefly that you are true, honest, and kind. . . . Give best love to all at Essex. Go, especially, and give my love to grandmother, who was the best of mothers to your father, and help her all you can."

The next session of Congress opened with considerable apprehension and distrust in all minds. The Whigs had broken with the President, and, though powerful, were disheartened, and unable to accomplish their cherished purposes. At the same time, questions of great public importance were pressing upon the attention of the government. During the session Mr. Choate spoke on the Bankrupt Law, in favor of Mr. Clay's Resolution for Retrenchment and Reform, on the Naval Appropriation Bill, on the Tariff, and on the Bill to provide further Remedial Justice in the Courts of the United States.

This last-named bill was introduced by Mr. Berrien, then Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, in order to meet such cases as that of McLeod's by extending the jurisdiction of the United States Courts. It was regarded as of very great consequence, so nearly had the nation been plunged into war by proceedings for which the general government could have no responsibility. The bill was supported by the Whigs generally, and opposed by the Democrats, under the lead of Mr. Buchanan. Mr. Choate supported it on the two grounds of constitutionality and of expediency, and closed a generous and statesman-like yet severe argument in these words: "The honorable senator is against your jurisdiction in all forms and in all stages. Sir, I cannot concur with him. I would assert the jurisdiction, on the contrary, on the same grand, general reason for which it was given to you. It was given as a means of enabling you to preserve honorable peace, or to secure the next best thing, a just war, — a war into which we may carry the sympathies, and the praise, and the assistance of the world. Accept and exert it for these great ends. Do not be deterred from doing so, and from doing so now, by what the honorable senator so many times repeated to you, that negotiations are pending with England; that she has insulted and menaced you, and withheld reparation, and withheld apology; and that, therefore, the passage of the bill, at this moment, would be an unmanly and unseasonable courtesy or concession to her. How much England knows or cares about the passage of this bill; what new reason it may afford to the ‘Foreign Quarterly Review’ for predicting the approach of his monarchical millenium in America, we need not, I believe no one here need, know or care. But does it mark unmanly fear of England, an unmanly haste to propitiate her goodwill, because I would commit the quiet and the glory of my country to you? Where should the peace of the nation repose but beneath the folds of the nation’s flag? Do not fear, either, that you are about to undervalue the learning, abilities, and integrity of the State tribunals. Sir, my whole life has been a constant experience of their learning, abilities, and integrity; but I do not conceive that I distrust or disparage them, when I have the honor to agree with the Constitution itself, that yours are the hands to hold the mighty issues of peace and war.

“Mr. President, how strikingly all things, and every passing hour, illustrate the wisdom of those great men who looked to the Union, — the Union under a general government, — for the preservation of peace, at home and abroad, between us and the world, among the States and in each State. Turn your eyes eastward and northward, and see how this vast but restrained and parental central power holds at rest a thousand spirits, a thousand elements of strife! There is Maine. How long would it be, if she were independent, before her hardy and gallant children would pour themselves over the disputed territory like the flakes of her own snow-storms? How long, if New York were so, before that tumultuous frontier would blaze with ten thousand ‘bale-fires’? Our own beautiful and beloved Rhode Island herself, with which the Senator rebukes you for interfering, — is it not happy even for her that her star, instead of shining alone and apart in the sky, blends its light with so many kindred rays, whose influence may save it from shooting madly from its sphere?

“The aspect which our United America turns upon foreign nations, the aspect which the Constitution designs she shall turn on them, the guardian of our honor, the guardian of our peace, is, after all, her grandest and her fairest aspect. We have a right to be proud when we look on that. Happy and free empress mother of States themselves free, unagitated by the passions, unmoved by the dissensions of any one of them, she watches the rights and fame of all, and reposing, secure and serene, among the mountain summits of her freedom she holds in one hand the fair olive-branch of peace, and in the other the thunderbolt and meteor flag of reluctant and rightful war.

There may she sit for ever; the stars of union upon her brow, the rock of independence beneath her feet! Mr. President, it is because this bill seems to me well calculated to accomplish one of the chief original ends of the Constitution that it has my hearty support."

A few extracts from private letters will indicate some of the other topics which interested him during the session. January 24th he wrote to Mr. Sumner: "Lord Morpeth is come and pleases universally. He attends our atrocious spectacles in the House with professional relish." And a little later: —

"I have received and transmitted your papers for Lieber; and read the D. A.¹ with edification and assent. We are wrong. Lieber sent me a strong paper on the same subject. He is the most fertile, indomitable, unsleeping, combative, and propagandizing person of his race. I have bought 'Longfellow,' and am glad to hear of his run. Politics are unpromising, but better than last session. The juste milieu will vindicate itself. With much love to G. S. H.

"Yours faithfully,

"R. CHOATE."

On the 19th of February he writes again: —

"MY DEAR SUMNER, — I hoped to be able before now to tell you what can be done for that elegant and tuneful Professor. No certain thing do I get yet, but I trust soon to have. It is the age of patronage of genius you see. Regnat Apollo, as one may say. . . . That was a most rich speech of Hillard's, as is all his speaking, whether to listening crowds, or to appreciating circles of you and me.² . . . How cheerful, genial, and fragrant, as it were, are our politics! What serried files of armed men, shoulder to shoulder, keeping time to the music of duty and glory, animated by a single soul, are the Whigs! But this delicious winter bears us swiftly through it all, and the sun of to-day lights up the Potomac and burns with the flush and glory of June. Dexter says this city reminds one of Rome. I suppose he meant in its spaces, solitudes, quiet, vices, etc., — though the surrounding country is undoubtedly beautiful. Love to Hillard. Lieber writes in Latin. I mean to answer him in any tongue whatever he chooses to speak, and for that purpose must break off and go at him.

¹ The subject of searching vessels on the high seas was then widely discussed, and this refers to some articles in the "Boston Daily Advertiser," on the right and necessity, in certain cases, of verifying a suspected flag.

² A speech of Mr. Hillard's at a dinner given to Mr. Dickens.

Truly yours,

“R. CHOATE.”

TO CHARLES SUMNER, ESQ.

“WASHINGTON, June 5, 1842.

“MY DEAR SIR, — I mourn that I cannot get you yet a copy of the Opinions, otherwise called Old Fields.¹ I am in collusion with Tims, however; if man can do it, Tims is he. I have never got one for myself, or I would send that. I send you my speech, so that if you do not get Ann Page, you however have the great lubberly boy. . . . Lord Ashburton is a most interesting man, quick, cheerful, graceful-minded, keen, and prudent. The three young men [his suite] are also clever; young rather; one a whig, all lovers of Lord Morpeth. Maine comes with such exacting purposes, that between us, I doubt. . . .

Yours truly,

“R. CHOATE.”

Later in the summer he writes again in the vein of humor and playfulness which so generally characterized his familiar intercourse: —

“WASHINGTON, 10 P.M.

“DEAR SUMNER AND HILLARD, — I have addressed myself with tears of entreaty to the Secretary, and if no hidden snag, or planter, lies under the muddy flood, we shall scull the Dr. into port. There, as Dr. Watts says, he may or exclaim, —

‘Sit and sing himself away,’

‘Spes et fortuna, valete — inveni nunc portum,
Lusistis me satis — ludite nunc alios’ —

¹ Opinions of the Attorney-General, with reference to which Mr. Sumner had quoted the verses of Chaucer, — which is from the Greek, you know, in Dalzell's Græc. Majora, vol. 2d, — and closes some editions of Gil Blas!

“Out of the old fields cometh all this new corn,” &c.

“The voting on the Ashburton Treaty at 9 at night — seats full, — lights lighted, — hall as still as death — was not without grandness. But why speak of this to the poco-curantes of that denationalized Boston and Massachusetts?”

“Yours truly, R. CHOATE.”

Of all the questions of foreign policy none were more pressing, on the accession of the Whigs to the government, than the North-Eastern boundary. Collisions had already taken place on the border. British regiments had been sent into Canada; volunteers were enrolled in Maine. The question seemed hopelessly complicated, and both parties were apparently immovable in their opinions. On assuming the Department of State, Mr. Webster at once informed the British government of our willingness to renew negotiations, and shortly after the accession of Sir Robert Peel and Lord Aberdeen to power, Lord Ashburton was sent as a special envoy to the United States, with the hope of settling the dangerous dispute. On both sides were high purposes, a willing mind, and a determination, if possible, to settle the difficulty to the advantage of both parties. This purpose was finally accomplished; the treaty was made and signed by the respective Plenipotentiaries on the 9th August, 1842. It was submitted to the Senate on the 11th of August, and finally ratified on the 20th of the same month by a vote of 39 to 9. It determined the North-Eastern boundary; settled the mode of proceeding for the suppression of the African Slave-Trade; and agreed to the extradition of criminals fugitive from justice, in certain well-defined cases. At the same time the irritating questions connected with the destruction of The Caroline, the mutiny and final liberation of the slaves on board The Creole, and the right of impressment, were put at rest by correspondence and mutual understanding. Harmony was thus restored between two great nations; the possibility of border forces along the Canadian boundary greatly diminished; and the rights of the flag upon the high-seas rendered more exact and definite. The question of the boundary of Oregon was left undetermined, because the arrangement of that question seemed not to be practicable. That a treaty of so much consequence, affecting questions that had so long interested and irritated the nations, should meet the approbation of every senator, was not to be expected. It was assailed at great length, and with what might be thought intemperate violence, by Mr. Benton, when discussed in secret session, and subsequently during the next session of Congress, when the bill for the occupation of Oregon was under debate. He found fault with what it did and with what it omitted to do, with the spirit and patriotism of its American negotiator, Mr. Webster, and with his resoluteness and intelligence. The treaty was defended with a spirit and ability equal to the occasion. Mr. Choate spoke three times. One only of these speeches has been preserved, that delivered on the 3d February, 1843, during the debate on the bill for the occupation and settlement of the Oregon Territory.

Congress adjourned on the 3d of March, and Mr. Choate returned to the labors of his profession in Boston.

Since Mr. Choate's death there have been found among his papers fragments of journals and translations of portions of the ancient classics. Although these were prepared solely for his own benefit, and the translations seem never to have been revised, it has been thought that no means accessible to us can so fully exhibit some of his mental traits, the methods by which he wrought, and the results which he gained. Parts of the journals are accordingly inserted in their chronological order, and extracts from the translations, if this volume is not too crowded, will be found in the appendix.

“ LEAVES OF AN IMPERFECT JOURNAL OF READINGS AND ACTIONS.

“ May, 1843. — I can see very clearly, that an hour a day might with manifold and rich usefulness be employed upon a journal. Such a journal, written with attention to language and style, would be a very tolerable substitute for the most stimulating and most improving of the disciplinary and educational exercises, careful composition. It should not merely enumerate the books looked into, and the professional and other labors performed; but it should embrace a digest, or at least an index of subjects of what I read; some thoughts suggested by my reading; something to evince that an acquisition has been made, a hint communicated; a step taken in the culture of the immortal, intellectual, and moral nature; a translation perhaps, or other effort of laborious writing; a faithful and severe judgment on the intellectual and the moral quality of all I shall have done; the failure, the success, and the lessons of both. Thus conducted, it would surely be greatly useful. Can I keep such an one? Prorsus ignoro — prorsus dubito. Spero tamen. The difficulty has been heretofore that I took too little time for it. I regarded it less as an agent, and a labor of useful influence, in and by itself, — in and by what it exacted, of introspection, memory, revisal of knowledge and of trains of thought; less by the incumbent work of taste, expression, accuracy, which it itself imposed and constituted, than as a mere bald and shrewd enumeration of labors, processes, and other useful or influential things somewhere else, and before undergone. Better write on it but once a week, than so misconceive and impair its uses.

“I do not know any other method of beginning to realize what I somewhat vaguely, yet sanguinely, hope from my improved journal, than by proceeding to work on it at once, and regularly for every hour, for every half-hour of reading which I can snatch from business and the law. I have a little course for instance of authors whom I read for English words and thoughts, and to keep up my Greek, Latin, and French. Let me after finishing my day's little work of each, record here what I have read, with some observation or some version. I am sure the time I now give to one would be better spent, if equally divided between him and this journal. I am not to forget, that I am, and must be, if I would live, a student of professional forensic rhetoric. I grow old. My fate requires, appoints, that I do so διδασκόμενος, — arte rhetoricâ.¹ A wide and anxious survey of that art and that science teaches me that careful constant writing is the parent of ripe speech. It has no other. But that writing must be always rhetorical writing, that is, such as might in some parts of some speech be uttered to a listening audience. It is to be composed as in and for the presence of an audience. So it is to be intelligible, perspicuous, pointed, terse, with image, epithet, turn, advancing and impulsive, full of generalizations, maxims, illustrating the sayings of the wise. I have written enough to satisfy me I cannot keep this journal; yet seriously do I mean to try. Those I love best may read, smile, or weep when I am dead, at such a record of lofty design and meagre achievement! yet they will recognize a spirit that ‘endeavored well.’

“13th May. — Read in Bloom. G. T. Matth. 3 c. 11–17, and notes, carefully verifying the references. I believe I concur with him in every observation. Qu. tamen 1. If με is not the object of ἄφες as ἀντὸν is of ἀφίησιν and of διεκώλυνε? 2. Why does not εὐθύς qualify ἀνέβη? Yet I think the sense is, that the whole series of incidents — the ascent from the water, and the opening of the heavens, and the vision, and the voice — followed in the order I have enumerated fast and close upon the consummation of the Baptism.

“3. That a miracle is described, the apparent opening of the heavens, so as to bring to the eye of some one, as from above, beyond, within, the image, form, symbol, the Holy Spirit, descending, with the hovering motion of the dove; and that an articulate proclamation of the Sonship, and the love and the complacency indulged towards that son, by the Invisible speaking from on high, is asserted by the evangelist, no one can doubt.

¹ Γηράσκω δ' αἰεὶ πολλὰ διδασκόμενος, — a fragment from Solon.

“ Does Æn. 5, 216-17, describe a descent or a hovering at all, or only contrast a progressive horizontal motion, caused and attended by the moving of the wings, and a similar motion with the wings at rest? Semble the latter only.

“ I read the French of the same verses, and the German, but the latter without profit.

“ I reviewed — for I will not confess I had never read — Quintilian’s first chap. of book 10, de copiâ verborum, Rollin’s Latin edition. I think I do not over-estimate the transcendent value and power, as an instrument of persuasive speech, of what may be comprehensively described as the best language — that which is the very best suited to the exact demand of the discourse just where it is employed. Every word in the language, by turns, and in the circle of revolving oratorical exigencies and tasks, becomes precisely the right one word, and must be used, with one exception, that of immodest ones. This is Quintilian’s remark, [§ 9] exaggerated — modo eorum qui art. præc. tradunt — yet asserting a general truth of great value, the immense importance of a strong hold, and a capacity of easy employment of all the parts of the language — the homely, the colloquial, the trite, as well as the lofty, the refined, the ornamented, and the artistical propriety of a resolute interchange or transition from one to another.

“ How such a language — such an English — is to be attained, is plain. It is by reading and by hearing, — reading the best books, hearing the most accomplished speakers. Some useful hints how to read and how to hear, I gather from this excellent teacher, and verify by my own experience, and accommodate to my own case.

“ I have been long in the practice of reading daily some first-class English writer, chiefly for the copia verborum, to avoid sinking into cheap and bald fluency, to give elevation, energy, sonorousness, and refinement, to my vocabulary. Yet with this object I would unite other and higher objects, — the acquisition of things, — taste, criticism, facts of biography, images, sentiments. Johnson’s Poets happens just now to be my book, and I have just read his life and judgment of Waller.

“ 17th May. — The review of this arduous and responsible professional labor suggests a reflection or two. I am not conscious of having pressed any consideration farther than I ought to have done, although the entire effort may have seemed an intense and overwrought one. Guilty, she certainly appears, upon the proof to have been; and I can discern no trace of subornation or manufacture of evidence. God forgive the suborner and the perjured, if it be so! I could and should have prepared my argument beforehand and with more allusion, illustration, and finish. Topics, principles of evidence, standards of probability, quotations, might have been much more copiously accumulated and distributed. There should have been less said, — a better peroration, more dignity, and a general better phraseology.

“I remark a disinclination to cross-examine, which I must at once check. More discussion of the importance of guarding the purity of married life — the sufferings of the husband — a passage or two from Erskine — should have been set off against the passionate clamor for pity to the respondent. Whole days of opportunity of preparation stupidly lost.

“I have read nothing since Sunday until to-day; and to-day only a page of Greenleaf on Evidence, and a half-dozen lines of Greek, Latin, and French. But I prepared the case of the Ipswich Man. Co. My Greek was the fifth book of the Odyssey — 163–170 — the extorted, unanticipated, and mysterious communication — unanticipated by, and mysterious to, him — of Calypso to Ulysses on the seashore, in which she bids him dry his tears, and cease to consume his life; for at length she will consent to assist his departure from the endearments and the charms whose spell on his passions was for ever broken. There is no peevishness or pettishness in her words or manner; but pity, and the bestowment generously of what she knows and feels he will receive as the one most comprehensive and precious object of desire.

“Saturday, 3d June. — The week, which closes to-day, has not been one of great labor or of much improvement. I discussed the case of Allen and the Corporation of Essex, under the pressure of ill health; and I have read and digested a half-dozen pages of Greenleaf on Evidence, and as many of Story on the Dissolution of Partnership. Other studies of easier pursuit, nor wholly useless, — if studies I may denominate them, — I have remembered in those spaces of time which one can always command, though few employ. The pregnant pages in which Tacitus reports the conflicting judgments expressed by the Romans concerning Augustus, upon the day of his funeral; and paints the scene in the Senate, when that body solicited Tiberius to assume the imperial name and power; the timid or politic urgency of the solicitation; the solicitation of prayers; the dignified, distrusted, unintelligible terms of the dissembler's reply; his proposition to consent to undertake a part of the imperial function, and the incautious or the subtle inquiry with which Gallus for a moment spoiled the acting of the player in the iron mask — 'what part he would take' — I have read for Latin. They include pp. 14-17, in the edition of Ernesti and Oberlin. Observe, Tacitus in his own person paints no character of Augustus. More dramatically he supposes a multitude to witness the funeral, and then to speak among themselves of his character and actions. By the intelligent, he says, a divided opinion of his life was expressed. It was applauded by some; it was arraigned by others. The former found in filial piety, and in those necessities of state which silenced and displaced and superseded the laws, the only motives that compelled him to take up the arms of civil war; arms which can neither be acquired nor wielded by the exercise of the purer and nobler arts of policy. While he had his father's murderers to punish, he conceded a large measure of supreme power to Antony and to Lepidus; but after the latter had grown an old man by sloth, and the former had become debauched and ruined by self-indulgence, there remained no remedy for his distracted country but the government of one man. Yet that government was wielded, not under the name of king or of dictator, but under that of prince. It had been illustrated, too, by policy and fortune. The empire had been fenced and guarded on all sides by great rivers and the sea. Legions, fleets, provinces, however widely separated from each other, were connected by a system and order of intercommunication and correspondence. The rights of citizens had been guarded by the law; moderation and indulgence had been observed towards the allies. Rome itself had been decorated with taste and splendor. Here and there only, military force had been interposed, to the end that everywhere else there might be rest.

"I cannot to-day pursue the version farther. In Greek I have reached the two hundred and fifty-first line of the fifth Odyssey. Without preaching and talk by the poet, as in Fénelon's celebrated work, how the actions and speech of Ulysses show forth his tried, sagacious character. His suspicion of Calypso, and his exaction of an oath that she means fair in thus suddenly permitting him to go; his address in allowing the superiority of her charms to Penelope's, and putting forward rather the general passion for getting home, as his motive of action; his avowal that he is prepared to endure still more of the anger of God, having endured so much, mark the wary, much-suffering, and wise man, sailor, and soldier. I read in French a dissertation in the Memoirs of the Academie of Inscriptions, vol. 2, on the Chronology of the Odyssey; began one on Cicero's Discovery of the Tomb of Archimedes. For English I have read Johnson's Lives to the beginning of Dryden; Alison, a little; Antony and Cleopatra, a little; Quintilian's Chapters on Writing, and on Extempore Speech, I have read and re-read; but mean tomorrow to abridge and judge. I need a Facciolatus and a Stephens. Preserve me from such temptation. The first I must get; and so I close this Saturday.

"I propose now to present in a condensed view all the good sense in Quintilian's Chapters on Writing, and on Extempore Speech. [Ch. I.]—He is treating of the means of acquiring copiousness of speech, and has disposed of the first of these means—the reading of good books—of authors or of orators. [Ch. III., § 1.] 'This is a help from without. But of all the parts of self-education, the most laborious, most useful, is writing. This, says Cicero, not extravagantly, best produces, and is emphatically the master of speech. [§ 2.]—Write then with as much pains as possible, and write as much as possible. In mental culture, as in the culture of the earth, the seed sown in the deepest furrow finds a more fruitful soil, is more securely cherished, and springs up in his time to more exuberant and healthful harvests. Without this discipline, the power and practice of extemporaneous speech will yield only an empty loquacity—only words born on the lips. [§ 3.]—In this discipline, deep down there are the roots, there the foundations; thence must the harvest shoot, thence the structure ascend; there is garnered up, as in a more sacred treasury, wealth for the supply of even unanticipated exactions. Thus, first of all, must we accumulate resources sufficient for the contests to which we are summoned, and inexhaustible by them. [§ 4.]—Nature herself will have no great things hastily formed; in the direct path to all beautiful and conspicuous achievement she heaps up difficulty; to the largest animal she appoints the longest sleep in the parent womb.

“Two inquiries there are then : first how, next what we shall write. [§ 5.] I begin with the first, and urge that you compose with care, even if you compose ever so slowly. Seek for the best ; do not eagerly and gladly lay hold on that which first offers itself ; apply judgment to the crowd of thoughts and words with which your faculties of invention supply you ; retain and set in their places those only which thus you deliberately approve. For of words and of things a choice is to be made, and to that end the weight of every one to be exactly ascertained.

“Tuesday, 6th June. — ‘The taste of selection accomplished, that of collocation follows. Do not leave every word to occupy as a matter of course the exact spot where the order of time in which it occurs to you would place it ; do not let the succession of their birth necessarily determine their relative position. Seek rather by variety of experiment and arrangement to attain the utmost power, and the utmost harmony of style. [§ 6.] The more successfully to accomplish this, practise the repeated reading over of what you have last written before you write another sentence. By this means a more perfect coherence of what follows with what precedes ; a more coherent and connected succession of thought and of periods will be expected ; and by this means, too, the glow of mental conception, which the labor of writing has cooled, will be kindled anew ; and will, as it were, acquire fresh impetus by taking a few steps backward ; as in the contest of leaping we frequently remark the competitors setting out to run at an increased distance from the point where they begin to leap, and thus precipitating themselves by the impulse of the race towards the bound at which they aim ; as in darting the javelin we draw back the arm ; and in shooting with the bow draw back its string.’

“I have written only this translation of Quintilian since Saturday. Professional engagements have hindered me. But I have carefully read a page or two of Johnson’s Dryden, and a scene or two of Antony and Cleopatra every morning — marking any felicity or available peculiarity of phrase — have launched Ulysses from the isle of Calypso, and brought him in sight of Phæacia. Kept along in Tacitus, and am reading a pretty paper in the ‘Memoirs’ on the old men of Homer. I read Homer more easily and with more appreciation, though with no helps but Cowper and Donnegan’s Lexicon. Fox and Canning’s Speeches are a more professional study, not useless, not negligently pursued. Alas, alas! there is no time to realize the dilating and burning idea of excellence and eloquence inspired by the great gallery of the immortals in which I walk!

"24th June. — I respire more freely in this pure air of a day of rest. Let me record a most happy method of legal study, by which I believe and feel that I am reviving my love of the law; enlarging my knowledge of it; and fitting myself, according to the precepts of the masters, for its forensic discussions. I can find, and have generally been able to find, an hour or two for legal reading beyond and beside cases already under investigation. That time and that reading I have lost, no matter how. I have adopted the plan of taking a volume, the last volume of Massachusetts Reports, and of making a full brief of an argument on every question in every case, examining all the authorities, finding others, and carefully composing an argument as well reasoned, as well expressed, as if I were going to-morrow to submit it to a bench of the first of jurists.¹ At the completion of each argument, I arrange the propositions investigated in my legal commonplace book, and index them. Already I remark renewed interest in legal investigations; renewed power of recalling, arranging, and adding to old acquisitions; increased activity and attention of mind; more thought; more effort; a deeper image on the memory; growing facility of expression. I confess delight, too, in adapting thus the lessons of the great teachers of rhetoric to the study of the law and of legal eloquence.

"I resume Quintilian, p. 399. [§ 7.] 'Yet I deny not if the fair wind freshly blows, that the sails may all be spread to catch it. But have a care lest this surrender of yourself to the spontaneous and headlong course of your conceptions do not lead you astray. All our first thoughts, in the moment of their birth, please us, or we should never write. [§ 8.] But we must come to our critical senses again; and coolly revise and reconstruct the productions of this suspicious and deceitful facility. Thus we have heard that Sallust wrote; and indeed his work itself reveals the labor. Varius tells us that Virgil, too, composed but very few verses in a day.

"[§ 9.] 'The condition of the speaker is a different one from that of the author. It is therefore that I prescribe, for the first, preparatory written exercises of the future speaker, that he dwell so long and so solicitously upon his task. Consider that the first great attainment to be achieved is excellence of writing. Use will confer celerity. By slow degrees matter will more easily present itself; words will answer to it; style will follow; all things as in a well-ordered household, will know, will perform their functions. [§ 10.] It is not by writing rapidly that you come to write well, but by writing well you come to write rapidly.' Thus far Quintilian.

¹ This plan he continued down to the end of his life.

"I read, besides my lessons, the Temptation in Matthew, Mark, and Luke, in the Greek; and then that grand and grave poem which Milton has built upon those few and awful verses, Paradise Regained. I recognize and profoundly venerate the vast poetical luminary 'in this more pleasing light, shadowy.' Epic sublimity the subject excludes; the anxious and changeful interests of the drama are not there; it suggests an occasional recollection of the Book of Job, but how far short of its pathos, its agencies, its voices of human sorrow and doubt and curiosity: and its occasional unapproachable grandeur; yet it is of the most sustained elegance of expression; it is strewn and burning with the pearl and gold of the richest and loftiest and best-instructed of human imaginations; it is a mine — a magazine, 'horrent,' blazing with all weapons of the most exquisite rhetoric; with all the celestial panoply of truth, reason, wisdom, duty."

CHAPTER IV.

1843-1844.

Address before the New England Society of New York—Letter from Mr. Van Cott—Letter to Professor Bush—Letters to Charles Sumner—Letter to his Daughters—Speech on Oregon in reply to Mr. Buchanan—Recollections of Alexander H. Stephens—First Speech on the Tariff—Second Speech in reply to Mr. M'Duffie—Journal.

THE twenty-eighth Congress met on the 4th of December, 1843, and Mr. Choate removed to Washington for the winter. In the latter part of the month he visited New York for the purpose of delivering the annual oration before the New England Society of that city. The theme suggested by the occasion was one which seemed always to have a fresh interest for him. He loved to dwell upon it. In lectures and addresses he had many times spoken on the Puritan character and history, and never without the deepest sympathy and heart-stirring emotion. On this occasion he presented the Pilgrims, their Age and their Acts, as constituting a real and true heroic period in the history of this republic. "We have," he said, "a specific duty to perform. We would speak of certain valiant, good, and peculiar men, our fathers. We would wipe the dust from a few old, plain, noble urns. We would shun husky disquisitions, irrelevant novelties, and small display; would recall rather and merely the forms and lineaments of the heroic dead, — forms and features which the grave has not changed, — over which the grave has no power — robed with the vestments and radiant with the hues of an assured immortality.” During his discussion of the general subject he spoke of the influences affecting the minds of the disciples of the Reformation in England, during the residence of many of them in Geneva. Touching lightly upon the impression of the material grandeur and beauty of Switzerland, he turned to the moral agents, the politics, and the ecclesiastical influences to which the exiles were exposed. “In the giant hand of guardian mountains, on the banks of a lake lovelier than a dream of the Faëry land; in a valley which might seem hollowed out to enclose the last home of liberty, there smiled an independent, peaceful, law-abiding, well-governed, and prosperous Commonwealth. There was a State without king or nobles; there was a church without a bishop; there was a people governed by grave magistrates which it had elected, and equal laws which it had framed.” These phrases, “a State without a king,” “a church without a bishop,” were at once caught up and spread through the land. They became the burden of popular songs, and led to a noteworthy discussion of the principles of church government between two eminent divines, — an Episcopalian and a Presbyterian, — of New York.

The entire address was received with the greatest delight and enthusiasm. A member of the New York bar, somewhat advanced in years, and cool in his temperament, said “that it was different in kind from any thing they ever heard in New York before. It came upon them like a series of electric shocks, and they could not keep their seats, and kept clapping and applauding without being conscious of it.”¹

¹ The following account, from the pen of Mr. Joshua M. Van Cott, is taken from the series of papers prepared by Judge Neilson, for the “Albany Law Journal:” —

“The oration was delivered in the old Broadway Tabernacle, then the largest auditorium in the city. The great building was crowded to hear the famous speaker. Mr. Webster and other distinguished men were on the platform. Mr. Choate was then in his prime, and his presence was hardly less striking than that of the great expounder. Tall, thin, his complexion a rich olive, his eyes large, liquid, glowing; the face Oriental, rather than American, and generally rather sad than eager and passionate. His voice was a rich baritone, sonorous, majestic, finely modulated and inimitable in the expression of pathos. He philosophically developed the rise of Puritanism and the causes of the Pilgrim emigration, and came down to the Mayflower, to Miles and Rose Standish, to the landing at Plymouth, the severity of the winter, the famine and the sickness and the many deaths, — fifty out of a hundred, including the beautiful Rose Standish. Pausing, with a sad, far-off look in his eyes, as if the vision had suddenly risen upon his memory, and with a voice inexpressibly sweet and pathetic, and nearly choked with emotion, he said, ‘In a late visit to Plymouth, I sought the spot where these earlier dead were buried. It was on a bank somewhat elevated, near, fronting and looking upon the waves — symbol of what life had been to them — ascending inland behind and above the rock — symbol also of that Rock of Ages on which the dying had rested in that final hour.’

“I have never seen an audience so moved. The orator had skillfully led up to this passage, and then, with a voice surcharged with emotion, symbolized the stormy and tumultuous life, the sudden and sad end, and the heroic faith with which, resting upon the Rock of Ages, they had lain down on the shore of the Eternal Sea. As Choate approached the climax, Webster’s emotion became uncontrollable; the great eyes were filled with tears, the great frame shook; he bowed his head to conceal his face in his hat, and I almost seemed to hear his sob. The audience was flooded with tears, a handkerchief at every face, and sighs and sobs sougled through the house like wind in the tree-tops. The genius of the orator had transferred us to the spot, and we saw the rocky shore, and, with him mourned the

On returning to Washington he wrote to his friend Professor Bush, who had recently adopted the views of Swedenborg. Although of decided theological opinions himself, Mr. Choate rarely entered upon a polemical discussion of religious topics, never indeed but with those intimate friends with whom he sympathized most closely. About himself he never chose to talk, and those who indiscreetly tried to probe his feelings would generally find themselves turned aside with what would seem the most consummate art, were it not done so naturally, and with such suavity and gentleness. Hence in declining a discussion, and in saying a kind word of the opinions of others, he sometimes seemed, to those who did not know him, indifferent as to his own.

TO PROFESSOR GEORGE BUSH.

“WASHINGTON, Jan. 7, 1844.

“MY DEAR MR. BUSH,—I grieve that I did not see you at New York, were it but to have united in a momentary ob-juration of all celebrations on wet days; though I should have been still more delighted to sit down and charm out of their cells of sleep about a million of memories. But it did not occur to me that you could possibly be present,¹ and I had early dead. We have had but one Rufus Choate: alas! we shall never have another. We have had powerful dialecticians, such as Hamilton and Pinkney and Webster; we have had great stump-speakers, such as senator Corwin and Sergeant S. Prentiss, but none who could sway the soul like the great lawyer, scholar, statesman, and orator of New England.

‘So on the tip of his subduing tongue
All kinds of arguments and questions deep,
All replication prompt, and reason strong,
For his advantage still did wake and sleep;
To make the weeper laugh, the laughter weep,
He had the dialect and different skill, Catching all passions in his craft of will.’” not an instant to go out to call on you. I have known, say half a dozen very able men, who hold Swedenborg just as you do. Theophilus Parsons, of Boston, is one, who is a man of genius. For my part, I know him not, and have a timorous disinclination to being shocked, waked, or stunned out of the 'trivial fond' prejudices and implicit takings up of a whole life. But it is your privilege to be a seeker for truth, with pure aims and a most appreciating eye and spirit. Sit mea anima cum tuâ.

[SHAKS. LOVER’S COMPLAINT.]

¹ At the New England Festival.

Yours truly,

"R. CHOATE."

Besides the political business of the session, Mr. Choate was much interested in a law case of great importance, that of Massachusetts v. Rhode Island. Mr. Charles Sumner acted as counsel with him in obtaining and preparing the local proofs. The following letter refers to that case:—

TO CHARLES SUMNER, ESQ.

"MY DEAR SUMNER,—I thank you for the documents. The cause is assigned for the 20th, and being, as Mr. Justice Catron expressly declared, a case of 'Sovereign States,' it has, before this tribunal of strict constructionists, a terrified and implicit precedence. Great swelling words of prescription ought to be spoken. For the rest, I see no great fertility or heights in it.

Most hurriedly yours,

"R. CHOATE.

"Saturday, 5 P. M."

TO CHARLES SUMNER, ESQ.

"MY DEAR SUMNER,—I have written by this mail to Mr. Palfrey, Secretary of State, to send me instantly certain papers for Massachusetts v. Rhode Island. May I entreat you to go as soon as possible to the State House, see my letter, and aid and urge its objects. You will know the what and where, and a mail saved is all one as it were a kingdom for a horse.

"I thank you for your views,—excellent and seasonable. I will speak them to the court so that they shall never know any thing else again as long as they live. Please be most prompt.

Yours,

R. CHOATE.

"15th FEB.—The case is for the 20th!!"

TO CHARLES SUMNER, ESQ.

“Saturday, Feb. 17, 1844.

“MY DEAR SIR,—To my horror and annoyance, the court has just continued our cause to the next term! The counsel of Rhode Island moved it yesterday, assigning for cause that the court was not full; that the Chief Justice could not sit by reason of ill health; Mr. Justice Story did not sit,¹ and there was a vacancy on the bench. The court was therefore reduced to six judges. We opposed the motion.

“To-day Mr. Justice M’Lean said, that on interchanging views they found that three of the six who would try it have formally, on the argument or the plea, come to an opinion in favor of Massachusetts, and that therefore they thought it not proper to proceed. If Rhode Island should fail, he suggested, she might have cause of dissatisfaction.

“I regret this result, on all accounts, and especially that the constant preparatory labors of a month are for the present wholly lost. I had actually withdrawn from the Senate Chamber to make up this argument, which may now never be of any use to anybody. . . .

“Yours, R. CHOATE.”

TO CHARLES SUMNER, ESQ.

“Feb. 1844.

“MY DEAR SUMNER,—All the papers came safe, except as yet the whole volume which is to come by Harnden. I shall print the useful,—keep all safely—with the entire file. Some of them are very good. The continuance of the cause rendered it partially to be regretted that so much trouble was given. But it is better to close the printing at once.

“Please thank Dr. Palfrey, and dry his and Mr. Felt’s tears. I knew it would be like defending a city by holding up upon the walls against darts and catapults, little children, images of gods, cats, dogs, onions, and all other Egyptian theogonics,—but better so than to be taken.

“Yours truly, R. CHOATE.”

¹ Because belonging to Massachusetts.

TO CHARLES SUMNER, ESQ.

[No date.]

“DEAR SUMNER,—I have just had your letter read to me on a half-sick bed, and get up redolent of magnesia and roasted apples, to embrace you for your Burkeism generally, and for your extracts and references. It is odd that I have, on my last year’s brief, a passage or two from him on that very topic which he appreciates so profoundly, but am most happy to add yours. By the way,—I always admired that very letter in Prior, if it is the same.

“I hope you review Burke in the N. A.,¹ though I have not got it and you do not say so. Mind that he is the fourth Englishman,—Shakspeare, Bacon, Milton, Burke. I hope you take one hundred pages for the article. Compare, contrast, with Cicero,—both knowing all things,—but God knows where to end on Burke. No Englishman or countryman of ours has the least appreciation of Burke. The Whigs never forgave the last eight or ten years of that life of glory, and the Tories never forgave what preceded; and we poor, unidealized democrats do not understand his marvellous English, universal wisdom, illuminated, omniscient mind, and are afraid of his principles. What coxcombical rascal is it that thinks Bolingbroke a better writer? Take page by page the allusions, the felicities, the immortalities of truth, variety, reason, height, depth, every thing,—Bolingbroke is a voluble prater to Burke!

“Amplify on his letter in reply to the Duke of Bedford. How mournful, melodious, Cassandra-like! Out of Burke might be cut 50 Mackintoshes, 175 Macaulays, 40 Jeffreys, and 250 Sir Robert Peels, and leave him greater than Pitt and Fox together.

“I seem to suppose your article is not written,—as I hope it is. God bless you. Yours truly, R. C.”

TO HIS DAUGHTERS.

“MY DEAR DAUGHTERS THREE,—I owe you so many letters, that I know not how to begin to pay. I thought of three different letters,—one to each,—but I am so dreadfully busy that I could not achieve such a thing; so I put my arms around you one and all, and make one kiss serve. Sarah's conundrum is très belle and très fine, but thrice très easy. Is it not the letter 'A'?

¹ North American Review.

"Picciola is so famous and fine that I am glad you like it and find it easier. I am reading French law-books to prepare for a case. Dear Minnie writes a pretty short letter. I hope the girls are no longer X to her as she says. Be good, sober girls and help your mother in all her cares and works.

"I am awfully lonesome. But I study quite well, and am preparing to argue a great cause.

"It is extremely cold. Write each day a full account of its studies, its events, its joys and sorrows; and any new ideas you have acquired.

"Take excellent care of my books. Do not let any thing be lost.

"Coleridge I have; but I don't think you would understand it. Try however. Kiss your dear mother for me.

"YOUR AFFECTIONATE FATHER."

Mr. Choate was always interested in naval affairs, and exerted himself during this session to secure a suitable indemnity for the officers and seamen (or their widows and orphans), who lost their property by wreck of United States vessels of war.

Another question received still more attention.

On the 8th of January, 1844, Mr. Semple, of Illinois, introduced a resolution requesting the President to give notice to the British Government of a desire on the part of the United States to terminate the treaty allowing the joint occupation of the territory of Oregon. Mr. Choate opposed the resolution, because negotiation on the subject had already been invited, and to pass the resolution would only impede the efforts of plenipotentiaries, while it imperilled the interests of the United States, and looked towards a declaration of war. These views in substance were maintained by the Whigs generally. They were opposed by the opposite party, and by no one more ably than by Mr. Buchanan, who directed his argument mainly against the speech of Mr. Choate. To this Mr. Choate made a reply on the 19th of March, expanding and enforcing his previous argument.¹

Mr. Buchanan had insisted upon the hostility of the people of the United States to England. "They still remember," he said, "the wrongs we had endured in days past: they remembered these things perhaps with too deep a sensibility. And although Senators might please their ears with the terms 'mother and daughter,' a vast majority of our people were penetrated with the conviction that to us England had ever acted the part of a cruel step-mother. It was this deep-wrought conviction, these associations of former scenes, that lay at the foundation of the national enmity which too extensively prevailed. Injuries on the one side, and their remembrance on the other, kept up this ill blood."

"But is this so?" said Mr. Choate in reply. "Is it so, that the great mass of the people are pervaded, are 'penetrated' by a deep-seated, 'deep-wrought' 'sentiment of national enmity' towards this particular nation, England? Is it so, that our veins are filled with 'ill blood' towards that country,—ill blood generated and fed by the 'memory of wrongs endured in days past'? This I understand the Senator to allege, and even to regret. I have repeated to you, however, exactly what he says, to be interpreted by yourselves. But thus I understand it. The cherished remembrance of wrongs endured in past days, the conviction that England had ever acted the part of a 'cruel step-mother;' 'the associations of former scenes,' — these bitter memories, compose the deep foundations of a too extensive national hostility; these things make the great body of the people enemies of England, in a time of profound peace. Thus I interpret the Senator. Is this so?"

¹ This eloquent and powerful speech may be found complete in the first edition of "The Life and Writings of Rufus Choate," published by Little, Brown, & Co., in 2 vols., 1862.

“ Being, sir, through the favor of a kind Providence, one of the people of America myself, and having been born and bred not in cities, which are said to love England, but in the country, which is said, as I understand the honorable Senator, to hate her; and having been astonished and pained to hear it asserted that such a people, one of as happy, generous, and kind a nature as the sun shines on, were laboring under a sentiment so gloomy and so barbarous as this, — I have been revolving the subject with some care and with some feeling. Exhausted as I am, and as you are, I cannot sit down without denouncing, in the first place, the sentiment thus, as I understand the Senator, ascribed by him to my countrymen, as immoral, unchristian, unchivalrous, unworthy of good men, unworthy of 'gallant men and men of honor;' and without, in the second place, expressing my entire and profound conviction that no such sentiment inhabits the bosom of the American people.”

“ Mr. President, we must distinguish a little. That there exists in this country an intense sentiment of nationality; a cherished, energetic feeling and consciousness of our independent and separate national existence; a feeling that we have a transcendent destiny to fulfil, which we mean to fulfil; a great work to do, which we know how to do and are able to do; a career to run, up which we hope to ascend till we stand on the steadfast and glittering summits of the world; a feeling that we are surrounded and attended by a noble, historical group of competitors and rivals, the other nations of the earth, all of whom we hope to overtake and even to distance, — such a sentiment as this exists perhaps in the character of this people. And this I do not discourage; I do not condemn. It is easy to ridicule it. But ‘grand swelling sentiments’ of patriotism no wise man will despise. They have their uses. They help to give a great heart to a nation; to animate it for the various conflicts of its lot; to assist it to work out for itself a more exceeding weight, and to fill a larger measure, of glory. But, sir, that among these useful and beautiful sentiments, predominant among them, there exists a temper of hostility towards this one particular nation, to such a degree as to amount to a habit, a trait, a national passion, — to amount to a state of feeling which ‘is to be regretted,’ and which really threatens another war, — this I earnestly and confidently deny.”

“No, sir, no, sir. We are above all this. Let the Highland Clansman, half naked, half civilized, half blinded by the peat smoke of his cavern, have his hereditary enemy and his hereditary enmity, and keep the keen, deep, and precious hatred, set on fire of hell, alive if he can; let the North American Indian have his, and hand it down from father to son, by Heaven knows what symbols of alligators and rattlesnakes and war clubs smeared with vermilion and entwined with scarlet; let such a country as Poland, cloven to the earth, the armed heel on her radiant forehead, her body dead, her soul incapable to die, — let her ‘remember the wrongs of days long past;’ let the lost and wandering tribes of Israel remember theirs, — the manliness and the sympathy of the world may allow or pardon this to them; but shall America, young, free, prosperous, just setting out on the highway of heaven, ‘decorating and cheering the elevated sphere she just begins to move in, glittering like the morning star, full of life and joy,’ — shall she be supposed to be polluting and corroding her noble and happy heart, by moping over old stories of Stamp Act, and Tea Act, and the firing of the Leopard upon the Chesapeake in a time of peace? No, sir; no, sir; a thousand times no! Why, I protest I thought all that had been settled. I thought two wars had settled it all. What else was so much good blood shed for on so many more than classical fields of Revolutionary glory? For what was so much good blood more lately shed at Lundy’s Lane, at Fort Erie, before and behind the lines at New Orleans, on the deck of the Constitution, on the deck of the Java, on the lakes, on the sea, but to settle exactly those ‘wrongs of past days’? And have we come back sulky and sullen, from the very field of honor? For my country I deny it. The Senator says that our people still remember these ‘former scenes of wrong with perhaps too deep’ a sensibility; and that, as I interpret him, they nourish a ‘too extensive’ national enmity. How so? If the feeling he attributes to them is moral, manly, creditable, how comes it to be too deep; and if it is immoral, unmanly, and unworthy, why is it charged on them at all? Is there a member of this body who would stand up in any educated, in any intelligent and right-minded circle which he respected, and avow that for his part he must acknowledge that, looking back through the glories and atonements of two wars, his veins were full of ill blood to England; that in peace he could not help being her enemy; that he could not pluck out the deep-wrought convictions and the 'immortal hate' of the old times? Certainly not one. And then, sir, that which we feel would do no honor to ourselves, shall we confess for our country?

"Mr. President, let me say that, in my judgment, this notion of a national enmity of feeling towards Great Britain belongs to a past age of our history. My younger countrymen are unconscious of it. They disavow it. That generation in whose opinions and feelings the actions and the destiny of the next age are enfolded, as the tree in the germ, do not at all comprehend your meaning, nor your fears, nor your regrets. We are born to happier feelings. We look on England as we look on France. We look on them from our new world, not unrenowned, yet a new world still; and the blood mounts to our cheeks; our eyes swim; our voices are stifled with emulousness of so much glory; their trophies will not let us sleep: but there is no hatred at all; no hatred; all for honor, nothing for hate! We have, we can have no barbarian memory of wrongs, for which brave men have made the last expiation to the brave.

"No, sir: if public men, or any one public man, think it their duty to make a war or cultivate the dispositions of war towards any nation, let them perform the duty, and have done with it. But do not say that there is an unfortunate, morbid, impracticable popular temper on the subject, which you desire to resist, but are afraid you shall not be able to resist. If you will answer for the politicians, I think I will venture to answer for the people."

Of the impression made by this speech there seems to have been but one judgment. Two days after its delivery the resolution was rejected by a vote of twenty-eight to eighteen.¹

¹ The following interesting account, taken from the "Baltimore Gazette" of Dec. 25, 1877, gives the reminiscences of the Hon. Alexander H. Stephens of Georgia: "I entered Congress," said Mr. Stephens, "in 1843, when I was of the age of thirty-one years, when the second generation of the great statesmen were still on the boards, lapping the revolutionary age. They were there in the full vigor of intellect, and still figuring prominently on the public stage. John Quincy Adams was a member of the House of Representatives. Calhoun, Clay, and Webster were the three great leaders of particular political ideas. . . . One of the first deep impressions made upon my mind was by Rufus Choate of Massachusetts. Early in my first session I had gone into the Senate to see Mr. Berrien of Georgia. When I was about leaving the senate chamber the order of the day was called, and before I reached the door the tones of voice of a speaker attracted my attention. I turned in the direction of the orator, and saw before me a remarkable-looking man of medium size, with raven locks, a striking black eye, a pallid cheek, a bearing as if fully charged with his subject, and his hand trembling as if with electricity. The Chair had announced the gentleman from Massachusetts, and in an instant I knew it must be Rufus Choate. I soon became very much interested in his speaking. His matter and style were grand, and became more so as he advanced. Every one was enraptured with his eloquence. He was replying to a speech made by Mr. Buchanan, on a resolution to give notice to the English Government of a termination of the joint occupancy of Oregon. Mr. Buchanan had taken the extreme view, calculated to arouse a war-feeling. He spoke of a deep-seated enmity in the

There was probably no subject which awakened a deeper interest during this session, or called out a greater amount of talent in discussion, than the tariff. Soon after the meeting of Congress Mr. M'Duffie asked leave to introduce a bill to revive the tariff of 1833. On this more than twenty senators, the leaders and veterans of that august body, spoke at different times, most of them with elaborate and formal argument, and some of them more than once. Mr. Choate breasts of our people over the wrongs inflicted by England in former days, and of the ill blood and hate that existed in this country in consequence of those wrongs.

"The 'Globe' of 1844, in reporting the reply of Mr. Choate, says it cannot finish the report of the speech, owing to the sudden indisposition of the reporter. I can repeat the omitted portion even at this distance of time, so profound was the impression made upon me. When Mr. Choate came to this part of Buchanan's speech he seemed to rise to a majesty that impressed his audience more deeply than I had ever witnessed any orator accomplish on a like occasion."

[Here follows a long quotation of several passages given above.]

"Ever after this speech I never let an opportunity go by to hear Mr. Choate. I consider him the most interesting man for impassioned oratory I ever heard. He had a faculty which few men possessed of never tiring his hearers. Several years after, I heard him in the Supreme Court argue the case of the boundary line between Rhode Island and Massachusetts. It was as dull a case as any ordinary land-ejectment suit. I was at a loss to understand how Mr. Choate could interest an audience under such circumstances. The court had been occupied five days by some of the ablest lawyers. The room was thronged to hear Choate's reply. From the moment he commenced he enchained the audience, and enlivened the dull subject by apt historical allusions and pleasing illustrations. The logical connection of his argument was excellent, and so well arranged that in two hours he had finished a thorough argument, which was interspersed throughout with sublime imagery. Every paragraph was as the turning of a kaleidoscope, where new and brilliant images are presented at every turn. At the conclusion of that speech I was confirmed in the opinion that he was the greatest orator I ever heard, — in this respect greater than Calhoun, Clay, or Webster."

addressed the Senate first on the 13th and 15th of April, in an exhaustive historical discussion of the early tariffs, especially showing that that of 1789 was essentially a tariff of protection, and deriving from this a general argument in favor of a protective policy; enlivening the necessarily dry enumeration of individual opinions, and the details of an old subject, by occasional pleasantry, and sometimes by high and fervid eloquence. Mr. Benton had spoken of the evils of an irregular policy. "Perhaps," replied Mr. Choate, "I might not entirely concur with the distinguished senator from Missouri, in his estimate of the magnitude of the evil. An evil it no doubt is. Sometimes, in some circumstances, irregularity would be an intolerable one. In the case he puts, of a balloon in the air, 'now bursting with distention, now collapsing from depletion,' it would be greatly inconvenient. But all greatness is irregular. All irregularity is not defect, is not ruin. Take a different illustration from that of the balloon. Take the New England climate in summer; you would think the world was coming to an end. Certain recent heresies on that subject may have had a natural origin there. Cold to-day, hot to-morrow; mercury at eighty degrees in the morning, with a wind at south-west, and in three hours more a sea-turn, wind at east, a thick fog from the very bottom of the ocean, and a fall of forty degrees of Fahrenheit; now so dry as to kill all the beans in New Hampshire, then floods carrying off the bridges and dams of the Penobscot and Connecticut; snow in Portsmouth in July, and the next day a man and a yoke of oxen killed by lightning in Rhode Island,—you would think the world was twenty times coming to an end! But I don't know how it is; we go along; the early and the latter rain falls each in his season; seed time and harvest do not fail; the sixty days of hot corn weather are pretty sure to be measured out to us; the Indian summer with its bland south-west and mitigated sunshine brings all up; and on the 25th of November, or thereabout, being Thursday, three millions of grateful people, in meeting-houses, or around the family board, give thanks for a year of health, plenty, and happiness. All irregularity, whatever the cause, is not defect nor ruin."

He closed with a word for Massachusetts, which had been assailed for her opinions. "Permit me to say, Sir, that you must take the States of America as you find them. All of them have their peculiarities; all have their traits; all have their histories, traditions, characters. They had them before they came into the Union; they will have them after

'Rome in Tiber melts, and the wide arch of the ranged empire falls.'

South Carolina has hers; Massachusetts has hers. She will continue to think, speak, print, just what she pleases, on every subject that may interest the patriot, the moralist, the Christian. But she will be true to the Constitution. She sat among the most affectionate at its cradle; she will follow — the saddest of the procession of sorrow — its hearse. She sometimes has stood for twenty years together in opposition to the general government. She cannot promise the implicit politics of some of her neighbors. I trust, however, that she will not be found in opposition to the next administration. I have heard that once her

Senate refused to vote thanks for a victory for which her people had shed their blood. Sir, you must take the States as you find them; you must take her as you find her. Be just to her, and she will be a blessing to you. She will sell to you at fair prices, and on liberal credits; she will buy of you when England and Canada and the West Indies and Ireland will not; she will buy your staples, and mould them into shapes of beauty and use, and send them abroad to represent your taste and your genius in the great fairs of civilization. Something thus she may do, to set upon your brow that crown of industrial glory to which 'the laurels that a Cæsar reaps are weeds.' More, Sir, more. Although she loves not war, nor any of its works, — although her interests, her morals, her intelligence, are all against it, — although she is with South Carolina, with all the South on that ground, — yet, Sir, at the call of honor, at the call of liberty, if I have read her annals true, she will be found standing, where once she stood, side by side with you on the darkened and perilous ridges of battle. Be just to her, — coldly, severely, constitutionally just, — and she will be a blessing to you."

The debate closed on the 31st of May. Mr. M'Duffie, as having opened the discussion, occupied two days in replying to his different opponents. His hopes of carrying the bill, if ever entertained, had long since vanished; and this may account in a measure for the unusual tone of his speech. The first portion of it was mainly addressed to Mr. Choate, and charged him with drawing very largely, if not exclusively, upon his imagination for his facts, and spinning and weaving a web "about the texture of a cobweb, and produced very much in the same way." He asserted that he gave isolated, if not garbled, extracts from the speeches of members of the first Congress, "picking up from Grub street a worm-eaten pamphlet, with opinions that would form an appropriate argument for the leader of a band of highway robbers." "I confess, Mr. President," he went on to say, "that when I followed the honorable senator, hopping and skipping from legislative debates to catch-penny pamphlets, gathering alike from the flowers and the offal of history, I found it difficult to decide whether his labors more resembled those of a humming-bird in a flower-garden, or a butterfly in a farm-yard." There was more of the same sort. The answer was immediate, and in a strain which Mr. Choate in no other case ever indulged in. "I must throw myself, Mr. President," he said, "on the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes; and offer a few words of explanation, made necessary by the senator's comments upon a portion of the remarks which I had the honor to submit to you some six weeks ago. I do not propose to take notice of any thing which he has said to other senators, nor of what I may call the general tariff matter of his speech. If others have been assailed, as I have been, by stale jests or new jests, stale argument or new argument, stale denunciations or fresh, they well know how to take care of themselves. I rejoice, too, to see that the protective policy of the country is taking excellent care of itself. One more such vote as another branch of Congress has just given,—one such election as will occupy, reward, and illustrate the approaching summer and autumn,—and the universal labor of America will be safe from the jokers of old jokes, or the jokers of new jokes. If then it be assailed by the arguments of men or the arms of rebels, it will, I hope, be quite able to defend itself against them also.

“ Confining myself, then, Mr. President, altogether to the senator’s notice of me, I must begin by saying that never in my life have I been so completely taken by surprise as by this day’s exhibition, just closed, of good manners, sweet temper, courteous tone, fair statement of his opponent’s position, masterly reply to it, excellent stories — all out of Joe Miller — extemporaneous jokes of six weeks’ preparation, gleaned from race-ground, cockpit, and barn-yard, with which the senator from South Carolina has been favoring the Senate and amusing himself. I came into the Senate yesterday with the impression that the occasion was to be one of a sort of funereal character. I supposed that this bill of the senator, never fairly alive at all, but just by your good-nature admitted to have been so for a moment to make a tenancy by courtesy, and now confessedly dead, was to be buried. I came in, therefore, with composed countenance, appropriate meditations on the nothingness of men and things, and a fixed determination not to laugh, if I could help it. The honorable senator, I supposed, would pronounce the eulogy, and then an end. Even he, I expected, would come rather to bury than to praise. I thought it not improbable that we should hear the large and increasing majority of the American people proclaimed robbers and plunderers, — because that we hear from the same source so often, some threatening of nullification in old forms or new, some going to death on sugar, some ‘purging of the passions by pity and terror,' — and then the ceremony would be closed and all be over.

“No tongue, then, can express the surprise with which I heard the honorable senator waste a full hour or more of the opening of his speech, and some precious health and strength, in slowly dealing out a succession of well-premeditated and smallish sarcasms on me. I was surprised, because I think the Senate will on all sides bear witness to what, under the very peculiar circumstances, I may be excused for calling to mind, — my own general habit of courtesy here. Not participating with excessive frequency in debate, nor wholly abstaining from it, I have sought always to observe the manner, as I claim to possess the sentiments, of a gentleman. In such a body as this, such a course is, indeed, no merit and no distinction. It is but an unconscious and general sense of the presence in which we speak.

“In the instance of this discussion of the tariff I am totally unaware of any departure from what I have made my habit. The senator from South Carolina, had, as he had a perfect right to do, introduced a proposition which, adopted, would sweep the sweet and cheerful surface of Massachusetts with as accomplished, with as consummated a desolation, as if fire and famine passed over it; and would permanently, and widely as I believed, and most disastrously, affect the great interests and all parts of the country. That proposition I opposed; debating it, however, in a general tone, and with particular expression of high respect for the abilities and motives of the honorable Senator, and in a manner from first to last which could give no just offence to any man. I acknowledge my surprise, therefore, at the course of the Senator's reply. But I feel no stronger emotion. I do not even remember all the good things at which his friends did him the kindness to smile. If he shall ever find occasion to say them over again, he will have, I presume, no difficulty in re-gathering them from the same jest-book, the same historian of Kilkenny, the same race-ground and cockpit and barn-yard, where he picked them up. They will serve his purpose a second time altogether as well as they have done now." From this the speaker went on distinctly and cogently to reaffirm and prove his former position, respecting the law of 1789, not a new and original idea, as had been charged upon him, but held by Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Dallas, "almost as old indeed as some of his opponent's newest jests and best stories."

Another charge he meets with peremptory denial. "What does the Senator say next? Well, Sir, as far as I could make out a certain enormous and broken-winged metaphor, in which he slowly and painfully wrapped up his meaning rather than displayed it, beginning with his grandfather's regimentals, and ending — I am sure I could not see how — with a butterfly and a barn-yard — a Homeric metaphor — a longue queue — as well as I could take the sense of the figure, he meant to say that, in my former remarks, I contrived by selecting my own speakers, by picking and choosing from what they said, and by interpolations of my own, to give a garbled and unfair exposition of that great debate, its course and topics and interpretative effect. In fewer words, his metaphor went to accuse me of having confined myself to a culling out of a few paragraphs here and there from a debate of two or three hundred pages, and then assuming to pass off these as specimens of the whole; whereas they afforded no idea of it whatsoever. It is cheating by samples, I think, which the Senator figuratively charges.

“Now, Sir, I deny this charge. I dare him to the proof. I challenge him; I challenge any man to produce a particle of proof of it. . . . I meet the Senator’s bad metaphor by good plain English. The accusation or insinuation is totally groundless and totally unjust. Let the Senator sustain it, if he can. There is the speech as it was delivered. He has at last found the debate which it attempted to digest. If it was not fully and fairly done, let him show it.”

Beyond assertion he then went on to demonstrate the correctness of his position by ample quotations from impregnable documents, occasionally throwing in sentiments of a higher character, and closed with a quiet and beautiful appeal to the Senators from Virginia and Georgia. Speaking of a proposition of Mr. M’Duffie, he says, to indicate its absurdity: “To show how willing he is to follow in the footsteps of the fathers, the Senator tells us ‘he will compound for the duties of 1789; nay, he will double them even.’ Really, Sir, he is magnificent. Will he give us back the world and the age of 1789? Will he give us back our hours of infancy, the nurse, the ballad, the cradle? Will he take off our hands the cotton-mill and woollen-mill, and glass-house, and all the other various, refined, and sensitive labor and accumulation which we have to protect; and will he give us back the plain household, and far-inland manufactures and mechanical arts of the olden time? Will he give us back a Europe at war, and a sea whitened by the canvas of our thriving neutrality? Will he give us back the whole complex state of the case which made those duties sufficient then, without the reproduction of which they would be good for nothing now?

“Nay, Sir, not to be difficult, the Senator ‘would even be willing to give us the rates of the tariff of 1816.’ This is rich also. He is perfectly willing to do almost any thing which is less than enough. The labor of the country will not thank him for his tariff of 1816. That labor remembers perfectly well that, under that tariff, manufactures and mechanical arts fell down in four years from an annual production of over one hundred and fifty millions to an annual product of only six and thirty millions.

“The honorable Senator, applying himself diligently to the study of this debate of 1789, says that he finds that it turned very much on the molasses duty. This suggests to him, first, a good joke about ‘switchel’ and then the graver historical assertion that ‘Massachusetts has always been more sensitive about her own pockets, and less about her neighbors’, than any State in the Union.’ Now, Sir, I should be half inclined to move a question with him upon the good taste of such a sally as that, if I did not greatly doubt whether he and I have any standards of taste in common. I should be inclined to intimate to him that such a sarcasm upon a State five hundred miles distant, which he does not represent, to which he is not responsible, is no very decisive proof of spirit or sense. He will judge whether such things have not a tendency to rankle in and alienate hearts that would love you, if you would permit them. Let us remember that we have a union and the affections of union to preserve, as well as an argument to conduct, a theory to maintain, or a jest, old or new, to indulge. . . . It is a grief to the honorable Senator to see protection sentiments spreading at the South.

‘Sun! how I hate thy beams!’

I rejoice to see this, on the contrary. I should be glad of it, though it should raise up a manufacturing competitor in every State of the Union. I rejoice to perceive symptoms of a return to the homogeneous nature and harmonious views of an earlier and better day. I rejoice to see that moral and physical causes, the power of steam, the sober second thought of the people, are combining to counteract the effects of a wide domain, and local diversities, on opinion and on feeling. I am glad to see the whole nation reassembling, as it were — the West giving up, the South holding not back — reassembling on the vast and high table-land of the Union! To the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Berrien], and to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Rives], who have so conspicuously contributed to this great result, I could almost presume to counsel, persevere as you have begun.

‘Sic vobis itur ad astra!’

‘That way,’ in the vindication of this policy, in the spread of this light, in the enforcement of this truth — ‘that way, glory lies.’”

With a brief reply and rejoinder, the debate here ended, and the question, on an amendment which brought the subject itself before the Senate, was decided, — twenty-five to eighteen, — against the resolution.

Congress adjourned on the 17th of June. The plans formed for study during the recess — to him, of course, no remission of labor — will be seen by his journal. The first few leaves have an earlier date.

“ December 25, 1843. Washington. — It ought to be quite easy for me here, when not actually preparing for an immediate discussion, to command an hour for this journal — in its plan altogether the best of the many I have attempted. An hour then I prescribe myself for this labor and this pleasure and this help. I think it may be usually an hour of the evening; but it must be an hour of activity and exertion of mind.

“ I read, as part of a course, two pages in Johnson’s Pope. He records fairly, forcibly, and most pleasingly in point of expression, his filial piety; and asserts and accounts for his sorrow for Gay’s death. He then treats the subject of the publication of his letters. The first question is, Did Pope contrive a surreptitious publication, in order to be able to publish himself with less exposure to imputation of vanity? Johnson first tells the story exactly as if he believed, and meant to put it forth as the true account of the matter, that Curl acted without Pope’s procurement or knowledge; and that he was surprised and angry at Curl’s conduct. He then gives Curl’s account, which, true or false, does not implicate Pope; and declares his belief of its truth. Somewhat unexpectedly then, he intimates, and at length formally declares his own opinion to be, that Pope incited the surreptitious publication to afford himself a pretext to give the world his genuine correspondence. His proofs and arguments are at least few and briefly set forth. At a moment of less occupation I will examine the question by Roscoe’s helps, and express the results.

“ Milton’s father was the son of a Papist, who disinherited him for becoming a Protestant at Oxford. His first instructor was a private instructor, and was Young, a Puritan, who had been also an exile to Hamburg for his religious opinions. His father, too, was educated at the University, was of a profession which a gentleman might follow, and a lover and writer of music. His mother was of a good family, and greatly esteemed for all the virtues; and pre-eminently for her charity. The earliest influences, therefore, on the transcendent capacities yet in infancy and childhood, might dispose to seriousness; to thoughtfulness; to the love and appreciation of musical sounds and successions; to sympathy for, and attention to human suffering; to tendencies towards the classes of religious Puritanism; to dignity and to self-respect, as descended, on both sides, of gentle ancestry, and imbibing its first sentiments from refined and respectable minds, tastes, and character. Milton passed through no childhood and youth of annoyances, destitution, illiberal toil, or unrefined association. It was the childhood and youth of a beautiful and vast genius; irresistibly attracted, systematically set to studies of language; the classical and modern tongues and literature; already marking its tendencies by recreating in the harmonious and most copious speech and flow, and in the flushed and warm airs of Spenser; in the old romances; in its own first 'thoughts voluntarily moving harmonious numbers.' Except that his eyes and head ached with late hours of reading, till he went to Cambridge, in his seventeenth year, I suspect he had been as happy as he had been busy and improving."

"Boston, June 23 [1844].— It is necessary to reconstruct a life at home; life professional and yet preparatory; educational, in reference to other than professional life. In this scheme the first resolution must be to do whatever business I can find to do — tot. vir. maximo conatu— as for my daily bread. To enable me to do this, I must revive and advance the faded memory of the law; and I can devise no better method than that of last summer,— the preparation of a careful brief, on every case in Metcalf's last volume, of an argument in support of the decision. In preparing this brief, law, logic, eloquence must be studied and blended together. The airy phrase, the turn of real reply, are to be sought and written out. I may embody in a commonplace the principles acquired; and I shall particularly strive to become as familiar with the last cases of the English and Federal benches at least, and if possible, of those of New York, Maine, and New Hampshire, as of our own. I have lost the whole course of those adjudications for some years. These studies,— and this practice,— for the law.

"I advance to plans of different studies, and to the training for a different usefulness, and a more conspicuous exertion. To avoid a hurtful diffusion of myself over too wide and various a space — laboriose nihil agens — I at once confine my rhetorical exertions within strict and impassable limits. I propose to translate Cicero's Catiline Orations; or as many as I can, beginning with the first; with notes. The object is, — 1st, The matter and manner of a great master of speech; 2d, English debating style, and words; 3d, The investigation of the truth of a remarkable portion of history. All the helps are near me. I shall turn the Orator, as nearly as I can, into a debater statesman, of this day, in Parliament and in Congress.

“With this, I shall read Burke's American speeches, writing observations on them. The object is his matter and manner; useful gleanings; rules of speech. But to this is to be added the study of politics. And for this circumstances are propitious. The approaching election requires that the true national policy of the country should be impressed on the minds of the people of America. To elect a Whig administration is to prefer, and to secure the practical realization of that policy. To induce the people to elect such an administration, you must first teach them to prefer, to desire that policy. To do that it must be explained, contrasted, developed, decorated. To do that it is to be deeply studied. I mean, therefore, to compose discourses on the tariff; on Texas; on currency; on the general points of difference, and grounds of choice between the parties, and the like, — embodying what I understand to be the Whig politics, and the sound politics of the hour. In all, through all — an impulsive presentation of truths — such an one as will move to the giving of votes for particular men, representing particular opinions, is the aim. Every one ought to be and to involve, 1st, an honest study of the topic — and so an advance in political knowledge; 2ndly, a diligent effort to move the public mind to action by its treatment; and so an exercise in speech. ‘Princip. fons sapientiæ.’ Truth for the staple — good taste the form — persuasion to act — for the end.

“July 16. — The gift of an interleaved Digest of Massachusetts Cases suggests and renders practicable a plan of reviewing and reviving the law. I shall add the fifth volume of Metcalf to the Digest as it stands, and in so doing advert to the whole series of decisions. This will not interfere with my purpose of making a frequent brief on legal theses. A trial of myself in that way yesterday encouraged me to suppose I can recall and advance my law. I am sure I have hit on the right mode of study; by digest, and brief; and I feel in the resolution a revival of zeal, fondness, and ability to work.

“17th July. — Engaged in translating Cicero against Catiline. I would study that famous incident in the Roman history. I must assume Cicero’s orations to be evidence of the highest authority remaining. He pronounced them — one in the presence of Catiline — all of them before the Senate or people of Rome, during the transactions to which they relate — he, the Consul, stating and defending the most public acts of administration, in a great emergency. I see nothing to detract from their decisive weight as testimony, but the fact that he and Catiline were on opposite sides of the conspiracy. This may constitute a vast diminution of title to credit, and I must allow for and measure it. One word on Sallust. For many reasons his authority is not so high. He was not an actor in the scene. He could not have personal knowledge of details to so minute an extent. But consider that he was about twenty-two years of age at the time when the conspiracy was formed; and that he must have written his history within thirty years after the event itself, since he died at the age of fifty-one, and therefore addressed, to some extent, a contemporary public. If he is not to be relied on it must be for other causes than want of means of knowing main facts. Still the circumstances would not assure us against very considerable resort to imagination, and rhetoric, — still less against partisan feeling and aim. Where are the proofs or grounds of suspicion of his untrustworthiness as a historian? Take his sketch of Catiline’s character. Catiline was of noble birth; and possessed extraordinary power of mind and of body; but his moral nature was wholly wicked, and his life habitually vicious.”

[Here appears to be a loss of some pages.]

“There is a pleasure beyond expression, in revising, rearranging, and extending my knowledge of the law. The effort to do so is imperatively prescribed by the necessities and proprieties of my circumstances; but it is a delightful effort. I record some of the uses to which I try to make it subservient, and some of the methods on which I conduct it. My first business is obviously to apprehend the exact point of each new case which I study, — to apprehend and to enunciate it precisely, — neither too largely, nor too narrowly, — accurately, justly. This necessarily and perpetually exercises and trains the mind, and prevents inertness, dulness of edge. This done, I arrange the new truth, or old truth, or whatever it be, in a system of legal arrangement, for which purpose I abide by Blackstone, to which I turn daily, and which I seek more and more indelibly to impress on my memory. Then I advance to the question of the law of the new decision, — its conformity with standards of legal truth, — with the statute it interprets; the cases on which it reposes; the principles by which it is defended by the court, — the law, — the question of whether the case is law or not. This leads to a history of the point; a review of the adjudications; a comparison of the judgment and argument, with the criteria of legal truth. More thought, — producing and improved by more writing, and more attention to last cases of English and our best reports, are wanting still.

“I seem to myself to think it is within my competence to be master of the law, as an administrative science. But let me always ask at the end of an investigation, can this law be reformed? How? why? why not? Cui bono the attempt?

“A charm of the study of law is the sensation of advance, of certainty, of ‘having apprehended,’ or being in a progression towards a complete apprehension, of a distinct department and body of knowledge. How can this charm be found in other acquisitions? How can I hit on some other field or department of knowledge which I may hope to master; in which I can feel that I am making progress; the collateral and contemporaneous study of which may rest, refresh, and liberalize me, — yet not leave mere transient impressions, phrases, tincture; but a body of digested truths and an improved understanding, and a superiority to others in useful attainment, giving snatches of time, minutes and parts of hours, to Cicero, Homer, Burke, and Milton, to language and literature? I think I see in the politics of my own country, in the practical politics of my country, a department of thought and study, and a field of advancement, which may divide my time, and enhance my pleasure and my improvement, with an efficacy of useful results equal to the law.

“My experience in affairs will give interest to the study of the thing. It will assist the study, as well as give it interest. The newspaper of every morning, the conversation of every day, the speech of the caucus, the unavoidable intercourse with men, may help it. One hour of exclusive study a day, with these helps, might carry one very far; so far at least, as to confer some of the sensations, and some of the enjoyments, attending considerable and connected acquisitions. Let me think of methods and aims.

“1. The first great title in this science is the Constitution; its meaning, its objects, the powers it gives, the powers it refuses, and the grand reasons why.

“2. The second is the policy on which that Constitution ought to be administered, the powers it ought to put forth, the interests, domestic and foreign, to which it ought to attend. This is practical statesmanship, the statesmanship of the day. Now, let us see how systematic and scientific acquisitions are to be achieved on these grand subjects.

“1. It is to be done by composing a series of discourses, in the manner of lectures, or speeches, or arguments, or essays, as the mood varied, on the particulars into which these titles expand themselves. Verplanck's letter to Col. D., speeches on the Tariff, might furnish models. I cannot anticipate the several subjects of the discourses composing such a body of study and thought, — but I can anticipate some of them. The history of the making of the Constitution, by which I now mean narrowly the history of the call, and act of the convention which made, and those which adopted it. The history of the causes which led to the formation of such a Constitution, — by which I mean the motives which led the country to desire it, the evils expected to be removed, the good expected to be achieved; as these are recorded in contemporary memorials, in essays, speeches, accounts of meetings, debates, and all the original discussion down to, and through the adoption of the government. This needs a historian. It would reward one. It prepares for — almost it supersedes direct interpretation. It teaches how to administer it in the spirit of its framers and age. It teaches how to value it in the spirit of its framers and its age.

“Thus prepared, you come to the instrument itself; to its meaning, to its powers and their grounds, to its structure and the philosophy and grounds of that structure. But without pursuing this very general analysis of a plan, which will change and unfold itself at every stage of accomplishment, let me return and be a little more definite and more practical.

I am to write then, first, the history of the formation and adoption of the Constitution. For this I have, or can command, the necessary helps. My course will be first to glance at the received general histories, Marshall, Pitkin, and others, and then seek, in original papers and elsewhere, for more minute, more vivid, and less familiar details. Truth, truth, is the sole end and aim. I shall read first, with pen in hand, for collecting the matter, and not begin to compose till the general and main facts are entirely familiar. Let me auspicate the enterprise by recalling the immortal speculations of Cicero on his renowned state.

“My helps I have supposed tolerably complete. In my own library are Marshall, Pitkin, Bradford, the Madison Papers, Story, the Debates in Conventions, the Federalist, Sparks’s Washington, and some less valuable.

“It will give vigor, point, and interest to what I shall write, to throw it in the form of a contention, an argument, a reply to an unsound, or at least hostile, reasoner, debater, or historian. But everywhere, under whatever form, — style, manner, are to be assiduously cultivated and carefully adapted to the subject. Reflection, therefore, rhetorical decoration, historical allusion, a strong, clear, and adorned expression, a style fit for any intelligent audience, are in votis. When shall I prosecute these studies? The hour after dinner seems best, — this leaves the whole morning till two o’clock for the law and for business, from half-past eight, or eight if possible, — and an hour, or half-hour before tea.

“August 24. Odyssey, Book VIII. 166 to 175. — ‘One man has a figure and personal exterior, mean, contemptible; but God crowns and wreathes about his form with eloquence. Men look on him delighted; he speaks unfaltering, but with a honeyed modesty; he is foremost of the assembly; as he walks through the city they look on him as on a god.

“‘Another in form is like the immortals, but he is unadorned by the charm of graceful speech.’

“Mark the recognition of the power of eloquence. It is an endowment which decorates, which crowns an unattractive person like a garland. It is unfaltering, self-relying, yet it charms by the sweetest modesty. Its possessor reigns in the assembly. He is gazed at in the streets. Such praise, such appreciation, such experience, so early, predicts and assures us a Demosthenes in the fulness of time.

“I have gone through a week of unusual labor; not wholly unsatisfactorily to myself. I deliberately record my determination to make no more political speeches, and to take no more active part in the election or in practical politics. One exception I leave myself to make. But I do not expect or mean to make it. I have earned the discharge — honestamissio petitur et concessa erit. To my profession, totis viribus, I am now dedicated. To my profession of the law and of advocacy, with as large and fair an accompaniment of manly and graceful studies as I can command.

“In reference to my studies of eloquence, I would do something to collect and arrange general observations — maxims, proverbs — sententiæ, γνῶμαι — for use. They fix attention. They are argument, authority, illustration, the signs of full minds. Burke, Johnson, Burton’s Anatomy — any great author — any author supplies. The difficulty is of arrangement, so that in the composition of an argument they would be at hand. I see no way but to digest them in my Index Rerum — selecting the letter as best I may — but it must be my business also to connect them in my memory with the truths they belong to, and with the occasions of possible exhibition and use — and to review the collection from time to time, and especially on the preparation of a discourse.

“29th September. — A little attention to things, and persons, and reputations about me teaches that uncommon professional exertions are necessary to recover business to live, and a trial or two teaches me that I can very zealously, and very thoroughly, and con amore, study and discuss any case. How well I can do so, compared with others, I shall not express an opinion on paper — but if I live, all blockheads which are shaken at certain mental peculiarities shall know and feel a reasoner, a lawyer, and a man of business. In all this energy and passion I mean to say no more than that the utmost possible painstaking with every case is perfectly indispensable, and fortunately not at all irksome. The case in hand demands, invites to a most exact, prepared, and deep legal and rhetorical discourse.

“For the rest I grow into knowledge of Homer, and Tacitus and Juvenal — and of the Rome of the age from Augustus to Trajan. A busy professional week has suspended Cicero somewhat, and has as usual made the snatches of my unprofessional readings a little desultory, — which is more and more besetting; more and more deleterious.

“I wish, as I have long wished, that I could acquire a genuine and fervent love of historical reading, — I mean the reading of what I may call authentic and useful history; and by that I mean the series of facts of which the present is the traceable result. The classical historians I do love. I read Tacitus daily. But this is for their language; for their pictures; for the poetical incident; the rhetorical expression; the artistical perfectness, and beauty. We cannot know that any thing more is true than the most general course of larger events. The moment you go beyond that, you are among the imaginative writers. You are dealing with truths; moralities; instructions; but you do not know that you are or are not dealing with actual occurrences.

“The history I would read is modern. I should go no farther back than Gibbon; should recall the general life, thoughts, action, of the Middle Age in him, and Hallam’s two great works; and begin to study, to write, to deduce, to lay up, in the standard, particular histories of the great countries.

“Under this impulse I have decided to start from the revolution of 1688; first with the English writers; and then with Voltaire. The revolution; and the reign of William and Mary, and William the Third are my first study. For this the means are perhaps sufficiently ample. My plan is simple. I examine first the foreign politics of England—her relations to Europe; the objects of her wars; the objects of her treaties; and the results. I have thus surveyed the general course of what we loosely call the history of the time. Then I turn to the Constitutional history. By this I mean the history of the changes of the Constitution; the politics of the Crown; the politics of parties; the politics of prominent men; the politics of Parliament; the laws made; the progress and expression of public opinion as that opinion relates to Government, and to civil and political right and duty. I mean by it the history of so many years of English liberty. The industrial history; the popular history; the history of the condition of the people; their occupations; their enjoyments; their nature; the history of literature, art, and science; and the study of the master-pieces of liberal culture and high art follow.

“I wish then to compress into a few condensed and comprehensive paragraphs the result of hours and of days’ study, under each of these heads. Notes on these summaries may indicate and discuss the materials out of which this is all elaborated.

“Let me begin, then, with such a succinct display of the foreign politics of England in the reign of William.

“The one grand feature of English foreign policy during this reign, was antagonism to France — to the France of Louis the Fourteenth. Its one grand and constant solicitude and effort was to repel, or to attack, France; — its alliances, its battles, its whole series of operations from 1688, till the King sunk into the tomb, pursued this single object.

“There is a simplicity in the foreign politics of this reign in this respect. And when you ascend, or penetrate to the origin and explanation of this policy; when you inquire how and why this antagonism to France became its law; on what principles and with what views so wide a confederacy became associated with England in its prosecution; when, in other words, you look more closely into the entire international politics of the Europe of that day, you find all as simple, and all as intelligible. In the first place, the foreign policy of England became identified with that of the United Provinces; and Holland was under an unintermitted necessity to fight, or to observe France. Turn first to Holland.” —

CHAPTER V.

1844-1845.

Political Excitement—Speaks for Mr. Clay—Meeting of Congress—Diary—Annexation of Texas—Admission of Iowa and Florida—Establishment of the Smithsonian Institution—Library Plan—Letters to Hon. C. W. Upham—Illness of Dr. Sewall—Letter to Mrs. Brinley.

IN the political contest of 1844, the annexation of Texas was the leading issue. Mr. Van Buren failed of a nomination in the Democratic Convention, mainly because he was unfavorable to that measure, and Mr. Polk was substituted in his place. Mr. Clay was the candidate of the Whigs. Mr. Choate entered ardently into the campaign, supporting Mr. Clay with all his ability. He spoke on the 4th of July, at Concord, where speeches were also made by Mr. Berrien, of Georgia, Mr. Webster, Mr. Winthrop, Mr. Lawrence, and others. He addressed a Whig Convention of Western Massachusetts at Springfield, on the 9th of August. He spoke before the Young Men of Boston on the 19th of the same month, and again before a Mass Meeting at Lynn, early in September. He was opposed to the admission of Texas, not on narrow or sectional grounds, but from fear of the final result to the Union itself. In the speech at Lynn, prescient of coming danger, he said, "If Texas is annexed to the United States, these revolutionary soldiers who rocked the cradle of the infancy of the Union, will live to follow its hearse to the grave." We are better able now to judge of the effect of that sudden and immense increase of territory, and of the purposes for which it was urged.

A continuation of the fragmentary "Journal" will best show the intellectual plans of the year, and may indicate what he accomplished in the midst of, and in spite of the incessant demands of politics, and of his profession.

"Boston, Dec. 9, 1844. — About to set off to Washington, there to close in two months, for ever, my political life, and to begin my return to my profession, I am moved with a passion for planning a little — what, in all probability, will not be performed — or not performed without pretty essential variations and interruptions.

"1. Some professional work must be done every day. Probably the preparation of Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, and of Thurlow in Error, may furnish quite enough for these. But recent experiences suggest that I ought to be more familiar with evidence and Cowen's Phillipps; therefore, daily, for half an hour, I will thumb conscientiously. When I come home again, in the intervals of actual employment, my recent methods of reading, accompanying the reports with the composition of arguments upon the points adjudged, may be properly resumed.

"2. In my Greek, Latin, and French readings — Odyssey, Thucydides, Tacitus, Juvenal, and some French orator or critic — I need make no change. So, too, Milton, Johnson, Burke — semper in manû — ut mos est. To my Greek I ought to add a page a day of Crosby's Grammar, and the practice of parsing every word in my few lines of Homer. On Sunday, the Greek Testament, and Septuagint, and French. This and the oration for the Crown, which I will completely master, translate, annotate, and commit, will be enough in this kind. If not, I will add a translation of a sentence or two from Tacitus.

"3. The business of the session ought to engross, and shall, my chief attention. The Smithsonian Fund ought to be applied to a great library; and a report and a speech in favor of such an appropriation are the least I owe so grand and judicious a destination of a noble gift. An edition of the laws, on the plan of the last winter, is only next in dignity and importance. For the rest—the reduction of postage, the matter of Texas, the tariff—will be quite likely, with the Supreme Court, to prevent time from hanging vacantly on my hands. Sit mihi diligentia, sint vires—sit denique et præcipue gratia!

“And now for details of execution.

“I. Walk an hour before breakfast; morning paper; Johnson and Milton before breakfast. Add, if possible, with notes, an Essay of Bacon also, or a paper of the Spectator, or a page of some other paper of Addison.

“II. After—1. The regular preparation for the Senate, be it more or less. Let this displace, indeed, all else, before or after. 2. If that allows—(a.) Preparation of cases for courts. (b.) If that allows—1. Page in Cowen’s Phillipps. 2. Then preparation for courts. 3. Then Senate, &c.

“III. Letters and session.

“IV. Then—subject to claims of debate and of Court,—Greek, Latin, French, ut supra, Burke, Taylor.

“V. The cases to be prepared by—say 20th January; debate oftener than formerly; less preparation is really needful, yet seek one great occasion.

“THE LAST SESSION.

“15th December, 1844.—Under this title I mean to set down any thing which I may collect from reading and intercourse with men in Congress and the Government, that strikes me as having value or interest enough to deserve the trouble. I don’t design it for a diary; or mere record, or in any degree a record, of daily occurrences, for that I keep elsewhere, but rather as a record of daily thoughts and acquisitions and impressions, during what I foresee must be a most instructive session, and what I know is to be my last session.

“I begin a great work. Thucydides, in Bloomfield’s new edition, with the intention of understanding a difficult, and learning something from an instructive, writer,—something for the more and more complicated, interior, inter state, American politics.

“With Thucydides I shall read Wachsmuth, with historical references and verifications. Schömann on the Assemblies of the Athenians. W. especially, I am to meditate and master. Dacier's Horacé, Ode 1, 11th to 14th line, translation and notes,—a pocket edition to be always in pocket.

“Washington, Tuesday eve, 17th December.—I was able to-day almost to resume my courses, such as they are, of classical and elegant reading—Johnson's Life of Addison; the Odyssey, Thucydides, Tacitus, Juvenal, Horace's Art of Poetry in Dacier and Hurd. It was quite mechanical, however, from ill health and fatigue. I begin to-morrow melioribus, ut spero, auspiciis. I read Phillipps's Evidence, beginning at title ‘Incompetency,’ and commonplacéd a reference or two.

“Thursday eve.—Mark how Homer makes the wise and great Ulysses applaud the blind harper and poet and singer Demodocus, Od. 8, 470 to 480, and again, 487, &c. Seq.

“‘Demodocus, above all mortals, I laud you. Either the Muse, the daughter of God, or Apollo, has been your teacher. So clearly and so truly do you sing the dark and sad fortunes of the Greeks; what they achieved; what they suffered; with what manifold trials and labors they contended, as if you had been with them, an eye-witness, a sharer, or had heard from one who had been.’

“Thucydides is explaining why the primitive ages of Greece afford the historian nothing great, neither in war, nor in any thing else. In my reading of to-day, close of 2d and 3d of c. 2, he is saying: ‘And for this reason, they did not strengthen themselves, either by the greatness of cities or by military preparation of any kind. It was ever the most fertile regions which oftenest underwent changes of occupants; such as what is now called Thessaly and Bœotia, and the greater part of Peloponnesus (excepting Arcadia), and the better portions of other countries of Greece. For by means of the richness of their soils certain individuals would attain to a superiority of wealth; and this at once gave birth to factions within, by which they were subverted, and exposed them to enemies from without.’

“Tacitus, Lib. II., sec. 30, relates the accusation and trial of Libo: ‘This compelled the accused to ask a postponement of the trial until the next day; and returning to his house, he committed to P. Quirinus, his kinsman, the last entreaties, to be borne to the Emperor.' 'Let him ask mercy of the Senate.' Such was the reply of Tiberius.

"Saturday night, 28th December, 1844. — My readings have been pretty regular and almost systematic. Phillipps's Evidence, with notes, Johnson, The Tatler, The Whig Examiner, and Milton, in the morning, — some thoughts on the Smithsonian Fund, and one or two other Senatorial matters in the forenoon, and the Odyssey, Thucydides in Bloomfield, Hobbes, and Arnold, Demosthenes for the Crown, Tacitus, Juvenal, and Horace de Arte Poet., with Dacier and Hurd. For the rest I have read Jeffrey's contributions to the Review, and have plunged into a pretty wide and most unsatisfactory course of inquiry concerning the Pelasgi, and the origin of Greek culture, and the Greek mind. Upon this subject let me set down a few thoughts.

"28th December, 1844. — The nation which attracts the highest interest to its history is undoubtedly Ancient Greece. Perfectly to know that history, to discern and arrange its authentic incidents, to extract and exclude fable, to abate exaggeration, to select sagaciously and probably between alternatives of conjecture; to solve the great problem of the origin, successive growth, and complete formation of that mind and character, the causes which produced it and set it apart from all other character and mind; to deduce and apply the lessons of that history to America, — would be a vast achievement of scholarship and philosophy and statesmanship. To me, cogitante sæpenumero on what one such labor I may concentrate moments and efforts else sure to be dissipated and unproductive, this seems to be obviously my reserved task. It is large enough, and various enough to employ all my leisure, stimulate all my faculties, cultivate all my powers and tastes, and it is seasonable and applicable in the actual condition of these States. He who should perform it adequately would be not merely the best Greek scholar of this country; the best read in one brilliant chapter of the history of man; the most accomplished in one vast department of literature, art, philosophy, fact; but he would have added to his means of counselling the people on the things of their peace. He would have learned more of the uses and dangers of liberty, and the uses and dangers of union. Let me slowly, quietly begin. I seek political lessons for my country. But I am to traverse centuries before I find these lessons in the pages of Thucydides. To approach to the accomplishment of this design, it must be my only literary labor, — my only labor not professional. It may well, and it positively must, supersede all others. The investigations it will exact; the collections of authorities; the constant use of the pen; the translations, the speculations, ought to constitute an admirable exercise in reasoning; in taste; in rhetoric as well as history. They may be embodied in a series of careful essays.

“I dismiss therefore, and replace in the library, all my books, except the two or three which I read for English and Latin, — and bestow myself on this.

“The Homeric poems present to us a Greece already formed; a race speaking one tongue, distinct from the tongues of Egypt or Phœnicia, distributed into many distinct sovereignties; some of which, or all of which are allied for the prosecution of a great foreign war, under a single command. They disclose this race already in the occupation of —.

[Here a blank occurs in the MS.]

and they paint vividly, comprehensively, its whole public and private life; its religion; its industry; its arts; its language; its mind; its manners. That Greece I shall, long hereafter, carefully study and exhibit. But not yet. There is a stupendous preliminary problem. What had preceded and produced that Greece? What causes had acted on what races so as to evolve the Greece of the heroic age? who had been the actors; what had been the acts, — what had been the influences; what the succession of changes, and of advancement?

“The Greek character and mind in its perfection was so extraordinary, so unlike all that had preceded or have followed it, that it is not very strange perhaps that speculatists should look with favor on the theory of a descent from a primitive race or races, of extraordinary qualities. They have scarcely been able to comprehend how any mere national education, however varied, however plastic, of which we can learn any thing, could have formed such a character and such a mind out of common savage nature; and they have been half inclined to find in the Pelasgi of the Old World, or in the Hellenes, or in a race from the North, or in all together, the germs of the transcendent genius, and the brilliant traits which illustrate the age of Grecian glory.

“Let me begin then with the Ante Hellenic races and ages of Greece. Who — whence — what — and of what names, fortunes, diffusion, its first inhabitants?

"THE LAST SESSION, — A DAY.

"January, 1845. — Finished Johnson's Life of Sheffield. J. carelessly assigns as evidence that S. refused conversion to papacy, an anecdote which he immediately disproves. If the sentence had been finished with 'others;' and he had then said, B. even records, &c., &c., and then disproved B.'s specific statement, better.

"The progress of Milton's fame, illustrated by the changes of the later editions of one of his [Sheffield's] pieces from the earlier, is curious.

'A faultless monster, which the world ne'er saw' is good and quotable. Sine labe monstrum [of Scaliger] is the germ certainly.

"I remark 'illegality,' and 'conjunctive sovereignty.' How does Hallam express it? Is it associated sovereignty?

"Milton's 'Paradise Lost,' 1st book, 344-375. Mark the matchless grandeur and elevation of expression. 'Cope of Hell,' 'Great Sultan,' not sovereign; how much more harmonious, aiming at variety, uncommon, with a charm of orientalism. 'Rhene,' 'Danaw,' 'Beneath Gibraltar,' an epithet which makes you look down south.

'Gay religions, — full of pomp and gold.'

classical and gorgeous.

"Paper in *Ret. Rev.*¹ vol. i. p. 83, on Sir Thomas Browne's 'Urn Burial,' — great beauty and an exquisite appreciation of the peculiarities of B. The first page, devoted to show what use other, most writers have made of death and mortality, has delightful expression and fine thoughts, not enough separated and arranged and made progressive. 'Fragility' of delight is not a bewitching attribute of delight. It is an influence, however, a fact, or that which leads to a more intense estimate and greedier and fonder enjoying of, and a making most of it.

"What follows is truer, or more truly sets forth what philosophy and poetry may and do effectively derive from mortality to their representations of affection; sympathy, the human nature.

"In addition to my course, and a rule of Greek grammar,

¹ "Retrospective Review."

I read a part of 1st Psalm in Buchanan's Latin and Dupont's Greek; the latter verbose and tautologous, the former, I should think, rigorously classical and energetic. Finished with some pages of Jeremy Taylor, on life and death. Intense, exaggerated, mournful, too true. I will daily read in the English version at least six verses of the New Testament with an earnest effort to understand, imbibe, and live them. Satis, plusquam satis, sic vixisse, — sic non vixisse, — nec pulchre, — nec recte, — sine dignitate, — sine me ipsum salvum faciend. ! sine reg. — sine observ. — Dei præcept. — sine intellig. — et app. — ad me instit. — et ritus rel. Christ — vit. ist. tuæ felic. non debetur, nec promissa, nec poss. ! Ideo ut supra in vers. ang. unâ cum fin. diei stud. Sex vers. leg. et med. et orare !

“The session ended. Boston, March 10, 1845.

“To resume my ante-Homeric Greece, I have but to procure a Niebuhr and Müller in addition to books already at hand, to review the collections accumulated at Washington, and begin. But all this is to be held in strictest subordination to law and to business. It is to be relaxation and recreation strictly, yet is it to improve style, reason, taste, and habits of research.

“30th M. '45. — A succession of trials in different courts has thrown me out of many merely literary and exercitatorial purposes and duties. These I resume, and every day — not a day of trial in court — I shall investigate some subject of law, three hours at least, digesting the results.

“Translation daily is manifestly my only means of keeping up my English. This I practise in my post-prandial readings, but I fear it is not quite exacting, laborious, and stimulant enough. I have a pretty strong impression that the only sufficient task would be Demosthenes severely, exactly rendered, yet with utmost striving of words, style, melody, volume of sound, and impression. I should begin with the oration for the Crown. When? By putting my post-prandial classical readings before breakfast, following my English, I could gain an hour, or half of one, after dinner, and half an hour after breakfast at home. This will do, leaving my forenoons, afternoons, and one evening hour, for business and law. Try.

“12th April. — I have tried, and with tolerable success. I have translated the Decree of Ctesiphon; the impeachment of Æschines; and am now about to digest so much of the History of Greece as will enable me to understand the two great speeches. This really will require a pretty careful study of the age and life of Demosthenes in Plutarch, Mitford, Thirlwall, and such other helps as I can command. Contemporary authors there are none since Theopompus is perished; and I appreciate the difficulty of the search for truth. Happy if I find enough for my mere critical and rhetorical purposes."

The purpose suggested above, on devoting himself to a work on the history and culture of Greece, was one which he doubtless pretty seriously entertained. He used, sometimes, to speak to his family, half jocosely and half in earnest, of his "immortal work," and I think he did not quite abandon the plan until after Mr. Grote's history was published.

The subjects which presented themselves for the consideration of Congress during the session of 1844-45 were of considerable consequence. Foremost among them was the annexation of Texas. During the previous session, in accordance with the wishes of the President, an attempt had been made to accomplish this object by treaty. A treaty was therefore negotiated by Mr. Calhoun, Secretary of State, and Mr. Van Zandt, representative of Texas. When presented to the Senate, however, it was rejected by a very decisive vote. An attempt was now made to reach the same end by resolutions, which were introduced in the Senate by Mr. M'Duffie, and in the House by Mr. Ingersoll. The subject was not fairly reached in the Senate until the 13th of February, 1845, and after the resolutions had passed the House. The debate was conducted with great ability, and by the leading men on both sides of the chamber, by Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Walker, Mr. Woodbury, and others, on the one side, and by Mr. Choate, Mr. Dayton, Mr. Crittenden, and Mr. Berrien, to name no more, on the other. The interest in the discussion was heightened by the fact that the Senate was nearly equally divided on the subject. Mr. Choate spoke on the 18th of February for nearly three hours. There is no full report of this speech, which is said to have been of very great power.

The grounds on which he opposed the measure were mainly these two: 1st, That it was beyond the constitutional power of Congress; 2d, That even if constitutional, it was inexpedient. These points he argued at considerable length, enforcing his argument, as the report says, with "innumerable illustrations." Looking at the period before the Constitution was formed, he contended that "in framing the Constitution, when the sovereign power of the people was to be delegated, the grant was intended to be in express terms, such as the power to declare war, make peace, regulate commerce with foreign nations, levy taxes, &c. But no such power as that of admitting foreign nations into the Union was delegated, or it would have been also explicitly granted." Looking at the Constitution itself, he endeavored to show that the power to admit new States was not intended to imply the vast power of admitting foreign governments. This he denied could be done by any power but the primary, sovereign power of the people themselves, either by agreement to amend the Constitution so as to grant the express authority, or otherwise. "Until it was found," he said, "that the treaty of the last session had no chance of passing the Senate, no human being save one, no man, woman, or child, in this Union or out of this Union, was ever heard to breathe one syllable about this power in the Constitution of admitting new States being applicable to the admission of foreign nations, governments, or States. With one exception, till ten months ago, no such doctrine was ever heard, or even entertained." The exception to which he alluded was the letter of Mr. Macon to Mr. Jefferson, which Mr. Jefferson so promptly rebuked, that the insinuation was never again repeated, "till it was found necessary ten months ago by some one, — he would not say with Texas scrip in his pocket, — but certainly with Texas annexation very much at heart, who brought it forward into new life, and urged it as the only proper mode of exercising an express grant of the Constitution." This he regarded as a new and monstrous heresy on the Constitution, got up not from any well-founded faith in its orthodoxy, but for the mere purpose of carrying a measure by a bare majority of Congress, that could not be carried by a two-thirds majority of the Senate in accordance with the treaty-making power.

In conclusion, alluding to some criticism upon his own State, he said "Massachusetts asks nothing but what the Constitution has given to her, and there is nothing in the Constitution, however peculiar, however different from her views of policy, that she will seek to stir, or ask to be invaded. Keep the Constitution and the Constitution will keep you. Break into it in search of secret curiosities which you cannot find there, and there is no longer security, — no longer any thing between you and us and the unappeasable, unchained spirit of the age."

The resolution, or rather an amendment "leaving it at the discretion of the President, whether resort should be had to negotiation, or Texas 'be admitted by virtue of this act,' and become an independent State," was finally passed by a majority of two, and having again gone through the House, President Tyler signed the bill, among the last of his official acts.

A bill was also introduced at this session to admit Iowa and Florida into the Union. Though not opposed to the admission of new States, Mr. Choate strongly objected to the extraordinary method of a joint bill, making the admission of the one dependent upon that of the other. Some things in the constitution of Florida he considered to be ill-advised if not unconstitutional. When, therefore, Mr. Evans proposed as an amendment that Florida should not be admitted until those articles should be struck from her constitution which took from her General Assembly the power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves, and to pass laws preventing free negroes or other persons of color from immigrating to the State, or from being discharged from any vessel in any of the ports of the State, Mr. Choate supported it. He did it, though reluctantly, because the articles seemed to be contrary to the Federal Constitution. Admitting that Florida had the right to pass such municipal laws as her circumstances required, he wished that those who denied their constitutionality might go to the Supreme Court without being met by the adverse action of Congress. Massachusetts was even then engaged in a controversy with two other States involving the questions here brought to notice, and all that he solicited was an opportunity to have the right of the Southern States to arrest the colored citizens of the North, brought directly before the Supreme Court of the United States for its decision; a decision, whatever it were, that Massachusetts would be sure to respect.

Of all the objects, however, which came before the Senate during the session, none interested Mr. Choate more deeply than the organization of the Smithsonian Institution. The will of James Smithson, containing his munificent bequest, was dated October 23, 1826, nearly three years before his death.¹ The bequest was accepted by Congress in 1836, and the money was received by the Government of the United States on the 1st of September, 1838. The disposition of so large a fund, amounting to more than half a million of dollars, became a matter of much solicitude to all who regarded the interests of knowledge, or the honor of the country. Many were afraid, that through the recklessness of parties, it would in some way be lost. If preserved, intelligent men differed as to the use to be made of it. In the summer of 1838, by order of the President of the United States, letters were addressed to eminent persons in various parts of the country, soliciting advice. As might have been anticipated, the opinions were as diverse as the men. John Quincy Adams, who had devoted much thought to the subject, recommended that the income of the fund, for a series of years, should be devoted to establishing a National Observatory. President Wayland sketched the plan of a University. Mr. Rush proposed the collection of seeds, plants, objects of natural history, and antiquities, and, in addition, courses of lectures, which should be free to a certain number of young men from each State. Other plans were also suggested, and the subject was discussed from time to time in both branches of Congress, without, however, leading to any definite result. In December, 1844, Mr. Tappan, a Senator from Ohio, brought in a bill similar to one which he had advocated during a former session, providing for the selection of grounds for purposes of agriculture and horticulture, the erection of buildings, and the appointment of Professors and Lecturers. An Institution, he thought, would thus be established similar in plan and results to the Garden of Plants in Paris.

¹ Smithson died June 27, 1829.

Mr. Choate was so anxious for some organization that he stood ready to vote for any reasonable proposition which would command a majority, but another scheme, radically different from that proposed by the bill, seemed to him so much to be preferred, that on the 8th of January, 1845, he offered, as an amendment, what was called the Library Plan. The characteristic feature of this was a provision that a sum not less than $20,000 should be annually expended for the purchase of books and manuscripts for the formation of a Library, which for extent, completeness, and value, "should be worthy of the donor of the fund, and of this nation, and of this age." There were reasons at that time for such a disposition of the legacy, which do not to the same extent exist now. Not a library in the country then numbered more than 50,000 volumes, and the one or two which contained so many, had no funds for their large increase, or even adequate to their preservation. The bill thus amended was amply discussed, and finally passed the Senate Jan. 23, 1845. It being the short session of Congress, the subject was not reached in the House in season for a vote. Mr. Choate left the Senate in March, and of course had no further public agency in the organization. During the next session, however, a new bill, substantially the same as that proposed by Mr. Choate, was carried through the House, mainly by the exertions of Hon. George P. Marsh, then a member from Vermont. It authorized the Regents to make an appropriation not exceeding an average of $25,000 annually, for the formation of a library, composed of valuable works pertaining to all departments of human knowledge. Several other plans were urged, but all were rejected, and the bill which passed took its final shape from a series of amendments proposed by Mr. Marsh, "all with a view," as he said, "to direct the appropriation entirely to the purposes of a library." In the Senate, the bill was referred to a Select Committee, and after free discussion and the rejection of several amendments, finally passed that body precisely as it came from the House. It was approved by the President, and became a law Aug. 10, 1846.

It may be proper to state here briefly and with reference only to results, Mr. Choate's subsequent connection with an Institution in the establishment and welfare of which he had taken so deep an interest. He was elected a member of its first Board of Regents; an honor eminently due to his efforts in its behalf, and to the fact that the plan of a library, which he had initiated, had been adopted by Congress. At the first meeting of the Board, a committee was appointed, of which Mr. Choate was the chairman, to prepare a report upon the formation of a library, and in accordance with their recommendation, the Board appropriated $20,000 out of the interest of the fund, for the purchase of books and the gradual fitting up of a library. A committee was also raised to prepare extended lists of books in different departments of learning, proper to be first purchased. Notwithstanding this beginning, however, a strong opposition to the library existed among the Regents, some of whom had, from the first, favored a plan subsequently known as the "system of active operations." As a means of conciliation, it was voted, early in the next year, to divide the income equally between the two classes of objects, the Library, Museum, and Gallery of Art, on the one side, and the Publication of Transactions, Original Researches, and Lectures, on the other. This was proposed and accepted as a compromise, although by some acquiesced in with reluctance. Mr. Marsh, especially, was so convinced of its failure to meet the intent of the law, that he proposed to invoke again the action of Congress, and yielded only to repeated solicitations, and to a reluctance to disturb an arrangement, in which the public generally had no great interest, and which, it was hoped, would conciliate all parties. The friends of the original plan of Congress were, however, doomed to greater disappointment. The genius of the Institution bent to science, not to letters. Years rolled on, and the library was suffered to languish in the shade. Instead of a vigorous effort to increase it by a systematic application of appropriated funds, a proposition was made to annul the compromise itself, and leave the apportionment of the expenditures to the annual determination of the Board of Regents. A section of the law providing that "of any other moneys accruing as interest upon the fund, not appropriated, the managers may make such disposal as they shall deem best suited for promoting the purpose of the testator," was relied on as conferring the requisite authority for this change of plan.

Of this proposition Mr. Choate wrote from Boston, Feb. 4, 1854: —

"Situated so far off, I cannot comprehend the reasons on which the compromise is sought to be disturbed. It was the result of years of disagreeing opinions, and of reflections on all modes of administering the fund. The claims of the methods of publication of papers, and of the collection of books and specimens of art, were thoroughly canvassed, and respectively well understood. The necessity of reconciling opinions by concession was seen to be coercive. It was yielded to, and the matter was put, as it was thought, at rest. It has been acted on long enough to demonstrate, that if adhered to honorably and calmly and permanently, without restlessness and without ambition, except to do good and to pursue truth under and according to it, it will assuredly work out great, visible, and enduring results, in as much variety of form, satisfactory to as large a variety of opinions, as can be expected of any thing.

"For myself I should deplore any change in the distribution of the fund. I appreciate the claims of science on the Institution; and the contributions which, in the form of discovery and investigation, under its able Secretary, it is making to good knowledge. But I insist that it owes a great library to the Capital of the New World; something to be seen, — preserved, — and to grow, — into which shall be slowly, but surely and judiciously, gathered the best thoughts of all the civilizations. God forbid that we should not have reach, steadiness, and honor enough to adhere to this as one great object of the fund, solemnly proposed, and never to be lost sight of.”

He subsequently opposed this new plan before the Board, in a speech, of which there is no record, but which one of the Regents said, was “the most beautiful that ever fell from human lips;” and another, Mr. Douglas, added, “that it seemed impertinence for anybody else after it to say a word.” It did not avail. The Board was predetermined, and Mr. Choate, who had been re-elected as Regent but a short time before, at once concluded to resign his position. It was inconvenient for him to attend the meetings, and, having no longer the interest of the library to lead him there, he chose not to be even indirectly responsible for the proceedings. There were other circumstances which urged him also to the same conclusion, among which, doubtless, was his sympathy with Professor Jewett, who had been summarily deprived of his position as Librarian. He accordingly sent his resignation in the following letter: —

“TO HON. JESSE D. BRIGHT, President pro tempore of the Senate, and
HON. LINN BOYD, Speaker of the House of Representatives: —

“I take leave to communicate to the two Houses of Congress my resignation of the office of Regent of the Smithsonian Institution.

“It is due to the body which has been pleased to honor me with this trust for some years, and has recently conferred it for a new term, to say that this step is taken not from any loss of interest in the welfare of that important establishment, but in part from the inconvenience experienced in attending the meetings, and in part, also, and more immediately, from my inability to concur or acquiesce in an interpretation of the Act of Congress constituting the actual Institution and the Board of Regents, which has been adopted, and is now about to be practically carried into administration by a majority of the Board. That act, it has seemed to me, peremptorily 'directs a manner,' and devises and prescribes a plan, according to which it intends that the Institution shall accomplish the will of the donor. By the earlier law accepting the gift, Congress engaged to direct such a manner and to devise such a plan, and pledged the faith of the United States that the funds should be applied according to such plan and such manner. In fulfilment of that pledge, and in the performance of its inalienable and incommunicable duty as trustee of the charity, that body, after many years of deliberation — from which it never sought to relieve itself by devolving the work upon the discretion of others — matured its plan, and established the actual Institution to carry it out. Of this plan, the general features are sketched with great clearness and great completeness in the law. Without resorting for aid, in its interpretation, to its parliamentary history, the journals and debates, the substantial meaning seems to be palpable and unequivocal in its terms. By such aid it is rendered quite certain. A Board of Regents is created to administer it. Some discretionary powers, of course, are given to the Board in regard of details, and in regard of possible surpluses of income which may remain at any given time, while the plan of Congress is being zealously and judiciously carried into effect; but these discretionary powers are given, I think, in trust for the plan of Congress, and as auxiliary to, co-operative with, and executory of it. They were given for the sake of the plan, simply to enable the Regents the more effectually and truly to administer that very one — not to enable them to devise and administer another of their own, unauthorized in the terms of the law, incompatible with its announced objects and its full development — not alluded to in it anywhere, and which, as the journals and the debates inform us, when presented to the House under specific propositions, was rejected.

“Of this act an interpretation has now been adopted by which, it has seemed to me, these discretionary means of carrying the will of Congress into effect are transformed into means of practically disappointing that will, and of building up an institution substantially unlike that which it intended; which supersedes and displaces it, and in effect repeals the law. Differences of opinion had existed in the Board from its first meeting, in regard of the administration of the act; but they were composed by a resolution of compromise, according to which a full half of the annual income was to be eventually applied in permanence to what I deem the essential parts of the plan of Congress. That resolution of compromise is now formally rescinded, and henceforward the discretion of the Regents, and not the act of Congress, is to be the rule of appropriation; and that discretion has already declared itself for another plan than what I deem the plan of Congress. It may be added that under the same interpretation, the office and powers of secretary are fundamentally changed from those of the secretary of the law, as I read it, and are greatly enlarged.

“In this interpretation I cannot acquiesce; and with entire respect for the majority of the Board, and with much kindness and regard to all its members, I am sure that my duty requires a respectful tender of resignation. I make it accordingly, and am

Your obedient servant,

“RUFUS CHOATE.

“WASHINGTON, D.C., Jan. 13, 1855.”

The reception of this letter excited some commotion in Congress, and gave rise to sharp debates. The House of Representatives appointed a select committee, to whom it was referred, with directions to inquire into the management and expenditure of the funds of the Institution. The two letters which follow, to the chairman of the committee, will show more completely Mr. Choate's views and feelings:—

TO HON. CHARLES W. UPHAM.

“BOSTON, Feb. 2, 1855.

“HON. C. W. UPHAM, — My dear Sir: I happened to be quite sick when your letters reached me, and am only now able to go out, without being equal to any thing. It would afford me the truest pleasure to be able to transmit to the committee a few thoughts on the sense of the act of Congress. That, if read carefully, by the lights of its history, and with a mind not pre-occupied, it makes a plan which, until a new law is passed, the Regents were bound to execute heartily, — is, however, so clear, that I do not see what can be added to the bare enunciation. It happened to it just what happened to the Constitution. It was opposed because it was a Library measure, until it became a law, and then a metaphysics was applied to it to show that it was no Library measure after all. I await with great interest the proceedings of your committee; and, if my health will permit, I mean to address something, less or more, to the Hon. Chairman as such.

“I am, most truly,

“Your ob’t servant and friend,

“RUFUS CHOATE.”

TO HON. CHARLES W. UPHAM.

“BOSTON, Feb. 19, 1855.

“DEAR MR. UPHAM, — I am distressed to find that it will not be possible for me to prepare any thing for the eye of the committee. My engagements are so utterly out of proportion to my health, that I am prostrated and imbecile for all effort but the mill-horse walk of my daily tasks. It was never my purpose to do more than discuss the question of the intent of Congress. The intent of Smithson is not the problem now. It is the intent of Congress; and that is so transparent, and is so evidenced by so many distinct species of proof, that I really feel that I should insult the committee by arguing it. That Congress meant to devise a plan of its own is certain. The uniform opinion of men in Congress from the start had been that it must do so. Hence, solely, the years of delay, caused by the difficulties of devising a plan. Why not have at once made a Board, and devolved all on them? But who ever thought of such a thing? If, then, Congress would mean, and had meant, to frame a plan, what is it? Nothing, unless it is that of collections of books, specimens of art and nature, and possibly lectures. It is either these exactly, or it is just what the Regents please. But it cannot be the latter, and then it is these.

"1. These are provided for in terms; nothing else is. 2. The debates show that all things else were rejected. 3. The only difficulties are these two: 1st, It is said discretionary powers are given to the Regents. Yes; but how does good faith require these to be interpreted? Are they limited or unlimited? If the latter, then Congress has framed and preferred no plan of its own, but has committed every thing to the uncontrolled fancies of the Regents. This, if their discretionary powers are unlimited. But how absurd to say this, against an act so loaded with details, and whose history shows it carefully constructed to embody a plan of Congress! If, then, the discretionary powers are limited, how are they limited? So as to subserve and help out the plan of Congress, primarily and chiefly; and when the good of that plan may be best advanced by a little surplus here or there, they may do with that rare and exceptional case what they will. 2d, The second difficulty is, that the Regents are not directed to expend at least so much, but not above. The difficulty, as they put it, assumes that there can be no satisfactory evidence of a plan of Congress, unless by express language enacting, 'this is the plan of Congress,' or 'it is the intention of Congress, hereby, that the income shall be applied exclusively, so and so,' or, that 'whether books are cheap or dear, a certain minimum shall in every year be laid out thereon,' or some other express equivalent of language. But this is foolish. If the whole antecedent action in Congress from the first shows that Congress understands that it is to frame a plan; if the history of this act shows that everybody thought they were framing a plan; if then you find one in all its great outlines actually sketched, building, spacious rooms, provision for books and specimens, &c., &c., — constituting de facto a plan, sufficient to exhaust the income; and if you find not a trace of any other mode or scheme, how absurd to demand, in addition to all this, a section to say, 'By the way, Congress means something by all this pother; and it means that the plan it has thus portrayed is the plan it chooses to have executed.' Suppose a law, in the first section authorizing a ship to be built of a size and construction specifically adapted to the Arctic navigation, as our building is to be for books; and in a second section, an enactment that the captain should cruise not exceeding ten months in the Arctic Ocean; and in a third, that if he have any spare time to cruise, he might explore any other sea; could he go one month to the Arctic, and then say he preferred the Mediterranean, and cruise there eleven? But why not? There are no express words. But there is other evidence of legislative intent, — the build of the ship, and the solicitous provision for a particular sea, and the silence about all others, and the stupendous dissimilarity in the two adventures. If, besides, you found a Congressional history, showing that everybody understood Congress was selecting its own sea, motions made to divide the year with the Mediterranean, and rejected, it would be altogether quite the case. But I beg your pardon for these platitudes. I entreat you to do two things: 1. Vindicate the sense of the law. 2. Vindicate art, taste, learning, genius, mind, history, ethnology, morals —

“I am most anxiously and faithfully yours,

“R. CHOATE.”

It cannot be denied that Mr. Choate — author and successful defender of the library plan, as he was — suffered a great disappointment in the final disposition of the fund. He felt that it by no means met the purpose of the Congress that passed the act; and, looking to permanent and comprehensive effects, would not be likely to secure a result so conspicuous, so noble, so worthy of the nation, so free from the possibility of perversion, or so directly meeting the great want of the learned, cultivated, inquisitive, and thoughtful throughout the whole land, as if mainly or largely devoted to a library.

In the spring of 1845 Mr. Choate lost his brother-in-law, Dr. Sewall, to whom in early life he had been so much indebted for advice and assistance, and whose house in Washington had often been his home. The following letter to his relative, Mrs. Brinley, who was then in Dr. Sewall's family, was written before the news of his death had reached Boston.

TO MRS. FRANCIS BRINLEY.

“Thursday, Fast Day, 1845.

“MY DEAR COUSIN SARAH, — No one can express my obligations to you for your faithful kindness and thoughtfulness during all this great affliction at the Doctor’s. God bless you for it all. I have mourned deeply over the sad and surprising event, although I had again conceived the strongest hopes of his recovery. Give my best love to all who are alive. I wish my nephew, Thomas, would convey to his father, if living, my thanks and profound gratitude for a life of kindness to me, and would, — as he will — soothe his mother. . . . If you leave Washington, and this change happens at the Doctor’s, it is a spot blotted for ever from the earth. . . . I know not what to write, because I know not how or what or who you all are. Pray accept my love, and give it to all our dear friends. How happy for you that Miss C., so agreeable, so composed, and so sympathetic, is with you. God bless you.

“R. CHOATE.”

CHAPTER VI.

1845-1849.

Address before the Law School in Cambridge — Argues the Case of Rhode Island v. Massachusetts — Defence of Tirrell — The Oliver Smith's Will Case — Speaks in favor of General Taylor — Offer of a Professorship in the Cambridge Law School — Offer of a Seat upon the Bench — The Phillips Will Case — Journal.

ON leaving the Senate, Mr. Choate for a time bade farewell to politics, and returned without regret to the narrower sphere of the city and the courts. He had become known for his intrepid and successful management of difficult cases. These were often intrusted to him when he would gladly have avoided the responsibility, if his sense of professional duty would have allowed; but he did not feel at liberty to refuse his services when properly solicited, merely because the cause was distasteful, or the client possibly undeserving of sympathy.

In the summer of this year, 1845, he delivered an address before the Law School at Cambridge, on the "Position and Functions of the American Bar, as an element of Conservatism in the State."

This noble address is replete with political wisdom. It shows the careful student, to whom the lessons of history are living, and urgent, — the profound and philosophical observer of the causes of national prosperity or national decay, watchful and discriminating of the dangers of the State. A few pages will indicate, although partially and inadequately, the drift of thought.

“And so the dying of a nation begins in the heart. There are sentiments concerning the true idea of the State, concerning law, concerning liberty, concerning justice, so active, so mortal, that if they pervade and taint the general mind, and transpire in practical politics, the commonwealth is lost already. It was of these that the democracies of Greece, one after another, miserably died. It was not so much the spear of the great Emathian conqueror which bore the beaming forehead of Athens to the dust, as it was that diseased, universal opinion, those tumultuous and fraudulent practical politics, which came at last to supersede the constitution of Solon, and the equivalents of Pericles, which dethroned the reason of the State, shattered and dissolved its checks, balances, and securities against haste and wrong, annulled its laws, repudiated its obligations, shamed away its justice, and set up instead, for rule, the passion, ferocity, and caprice, and cupidity, and fraud of a flushed majority, cheated and guided by sycophants and demagogues, — it was this diseased public opinion and these politics, its fruits, more deadly than the gold or the phalanx of Philip, that cast her down untimely from her throne on high.

“And now, what are these sentiments and opinions from which the public mind of America is in danger, and which the studies and offices of our profession have fitted us and impose on us the duty to encounter and correct?

“In the first place, it has been supposed that there might be detected, not yet in the general mind, but in what may grow to be the general mind, a singularly inadequate idea of the State as an unchangeable, indestructible, and, speaking after the manner of men, an immortal thing. I do not refer at this moment exclusively to the temper in which the Federal Union is regarded, though that is a startling illustration of the more general and deeper sentiment, but I refer in a larger view to what some have thought the popular or common idea of the civil State itself, its sacredness, its permanence, its ends, — in the lofty phrase of Cicero, its eternity. The tendency appears to be, to regard the whole concern as an association altogether at will, and at the will of everybody. Its boundary lines, its constituent numbers, its physical, social, and constitutional identity, its polity, its law, its continuance for ages, its dissolution, — all these seem to be held in the nature of so many open questions. Whether our country — words so simple, so expressive, so sacred; which, like father, child, wife, should present an image familiar, endeared, definite to the heart — whether our country shall, in the course of the next six months, extend to the Pacific Ocean and the Gulf, or be confined to the parochial limits of the State where we live, or have no existence at all for us; where its centre of power shall be; whose statues shall be borne in its processions; whose names, what days, what incidents of glory commemorated in its anniversaries, and what symbols blaze on its flag, — in all this there is getting to be a rather growing habit of politic non-commitalism. Having learned from Rousseau and Locke, and our own revolutionary age, its theories and its acts, that the State is nothing but a contract, rests in contract, springs from contract; that government is a contrivance of human wisdom for human wants; that the civil life like the Sabbath, is made for man, not man for either; having only about seventy years ago laid hold of an arbitrary fragment of the British empire, and appropriated it to ourselves, which is all the country we ever had; having gone on enlarging, doubling, trebling, changing all this since, as a garment or a house; accustomed to encounter every day, at the polls, in the market, at the miscellaneous banquet of our Liberty everywhere, crowds of persons whom we never saw before, strangers in the country, yet just as good citizens as ourselves; with a whole continent before us, or half a one, to choose a home in; teased and made peevish by all manner of small, local jealousies; tormented by the stimulations of a revolutionary philanthropy; enterprising, speculative, itinerant, improving, ‘studious of change, and pleased with novelty’ beyond the general habit of desultory man; — it might almost seem to be growing to be our national humor to hold ourselves free at every instant, to be and do just what we please, go where we please, stay as long as we please and no longer; and that the State itself were held to be no more than an encampment of tents on the great prairie, pitched at sun-down, and struck to the sharp crack of the rifle next morning, instead of a structure, stately and eternal, in which the generations may come, one after another, to the great gift of this social life.

“On such sentiments as these, how can a towering and durable fabric be set up? To use the metaphor of Bacon, on such soil how can 'greatness be sown'? How unlike the lessons of the masters, at whose feet you are bred! The studies of our profession have taught us that the State is framed for a duration without end, — without end — till the earth and the heavens be no more. Sic constituta civitas ut eterna! In the eye and contemplation of law, its masses may die; its own corporate being can never die. If we inspect the language of its fundamental ordinance, every word expects, assumes, foretells a perpetuity, lasting as 'the great globe itself, and all which it inherit.' If we go out of that record and inquire for the designs and the hopes of its founders ab extrâ, we know that they constructed it, and bequeathed it, for the latest posterity. If we reverently rise to a conjecture of the purposes for which the Ruler of the world permitted and decreed it to be instituted, in order to discern how soon it will have performed its office and may be laid aside, we see that they reach down to the last hour of the life of the last man that shall live upon the earth; that it was designed by the Infinite Wisdom, to enable the generation who framed it, and all the generations, to perfect their social, moral, and religious nature; to do and to be good; to pursue happiness; to be fitted, by the various discipline of the social life, by obedience, by worship, for the life to come. When these ends are all answered, the State shall die! When these are answered, intereat et concidat omnis hic mundus! Until they are answered, esto, eritque perpetua!

"In the next place, it has been thought that there was developing itself in the general sentiment, and in the practical politics of the time, a tendency towards one of those great changes by which free States have oftenest perished, — a tendency to push to excess the distinctive and characteristic principles of our system, whereby, as Aristotle has said, governments usually perish, — a tendency towards transition from the republican to the democratical era, of the history and epochs of liberty.

"Essentially and generally, it would be pronounced by those who discern it, a tendency to erect the actual majority of the day into the de jure and actual government of the day. It is a tendency to regard the actual will of that majority as the law of the State. It is a tendency to regard the shortest and simplest way of collecting that will, and the promptest and most irresistible execution of it, as the true polity of liberty. It is a tendency which, pressed to its last development, would, if considerations of mere convenience or inconvenience did not hinder, do exactly this: it would assemble the whole people in a vast mass, as once they used to assemble beneath the sun of Athens; and there, when the eloquent had spoken, and the wise and the foolish had counselled, would commit the transcendent questions of war, peace, taxation, and treaties; the disposition of the fortunes and honor of the citizen and statesman; death, banishment, or the crown of gold; the making, interpreting, and administration of the law; and all the warm, precious, and multifarious interests of the social life, to the madness or the jest of the hour.

“I have not time to present what have been thought to be the proofs of the existence of this tendency; and it is needless to do so. It would be presumptuous, too, to speculate, if it has existence, on its causes and its issues. I desire to advert to certain particulars in which it may be analyzed, and through which it displays itself, for the purpose of showing that the studies, employments, and, so to say, professional politics, of the bar are essentially, perhaps available, antagonistical to it, or moderative of it.

“It is said, then, that you may remark this tendency, first, in an inclination to depreciate the uses and usurp the functions of those organic forms in which the regular, definite, and legally recognized powers of the State are embodied, — to depreciate the uses and usurp the function of written constitutions, limitations on the legislature, the distribution of government into departments, the independence of the judiciary, the forms of orderly proceeding, and all the elaborate and costly apparatus of checks and balances, by which, as I have said, we seek to secure a government of laws and not of men.

“‘The first condition’ — it is the remark of a man of great genius, who saw very far by glances into the social system, Coleridge, — ‘the first condition in order to a sound constitution of the body politic is a due proportion between the free and permeative life and energy of the State and its organized powers.’ For want of that proportion the government of Athens was shattered and dissolved. For want of that proportion the old constitutions of Solon, the reforms of Clisthenes, the sanctity of the Areopagus, the temperaments of Pericles, were burnt up in the torrent blaze of an unmitigated democracy. Every power of the State, — executive, legal, judicial — was grasped by the hundred-handed assembly of the people. The result is in her history. She became a by-word of dissension and injustice; and that was her ruin.

“I wonder how long that incomprehensible democracy would have hesitated, after the spirit of permeative liberty had got the better of the organized forms, upon our Spot Pond, and Long Pond, and Charles River water-questions. This intolerable hardship and circumlocution of applying to a legislature of three independent and co-ordinate departments, sitting under a written constitution, with an independent judiciary to hold it up to the fundamental law, — the hardship of applying to such a legislature for power to bring water into the city; this operose machinery of orders of notice, hearings before committees, adverse reports, favorable reports rejected, disagreements of the two Houses, veto of Governor, a charter saving vested rights of other people, meetings of citizens in wards to vote unawed, unwatched, every man according to his sober second thought, — how long do you think such conventionalities as these would have kept that beautiful, passionate, and self-willed Athens, standing, like the Tantalus of her own poetry, plunged in crystal lakes and gentle historical rivers up to the chin, perishing with thirst? Why, some fine, sunshiny forenoon, you would have heard the crier calling the people, one and all, to an extraordinary assembly, perhaps in the Piræus, as a pretty full expression of public opinion was desirable and no other place would hold everybody; you would have seen a stupendous mass-meeting roll itself together as clouds before all the winds; standing on the outer edges of which you could just discern a speaker or two gesticulating, catch a murmur as of waves on the pebbly beach, applause, a loud laugh at a happy hit, observe some six thousand hands lifted to vote or swear, and then the vast congregation would separate and subside, to be seen no more. And the whole record of the transaction would be made up in some half-dozen lines to this effect, — it might be in Æschines, — that in the month of —, under the archonate of —, the tribe of —, exercising the office of prytanes —, an extraordinary assembly was called to consult on the supply of water; and it appearing that some six persons of great wealth and consideration had opposed its introduction for some time past, and were moreover vehemently suspected of being no better than they should be, it was ordained that they should be fined in round sums, computed to be enough to bring in such a supply as would give every man equal to twenty-eight gallons a day; and a certain obnoxious orator having inquired what possible need there was for so much a head, Demades, the son of the Mariner, replied, that that person was the very last man in all Athens who should put that question, since the assembly must see that he at least could use it to great advantage by washing his face, hands, and robes; and thereupon the people laughed and separated.

“And now am I misled by the influence of vocation when I venture to suppose that the profession of the Bar may do somewhat — should be required to do somewhat — to preserve the true proportion of liberty to organization, — to moderate and to disarm that eternal antagonism?

“These ‘organic forms’ of our system, — are they not in some just sense committed to your professional charge and care? In this sense, and to this extent, does not your profession approach to, and blend itself with, one, and that not the least in dignity and usefulness, of the departments of statesmanship? Are you not thus statesmen while you are lawyers, and because you are lawyers? These constitutions of government by which a free people have had the virtue and the sense to restrain themselves, — these devices of profound wisdom and a deep study of man, and of the past, by which they have meant to secure the ascendancy of the just, lofty, and wise, over the fraudulent, low, and insane, in the long-run of our practical politics, — these temperaments by which justice is promoted, and by which liberty is made possible and may be made immortal, — and this jus publicum, this great written code of public law, — are they not a part, in the strictest and narrowest sense, of the appropriate science of your profession? More than for any other class or calling in the community, is it not for you to study their sense, comprehend their great uses, and explore their historical origin and illustrations, — to so hold them up as shields, that no act of legislature, no judgment of court, no executive proclamation, no order of any functionary of any description, shall transcend or misconceive them — to so hold them up before your clients and the public, as to keep them at all times living, intelligible, and appreciated in the universal mind?”

Then on the very nature of law he utters some words which it were well that all law-makers and all citizens should carefully ponder.

“It is one of the distemperatures to which an unreasoning liberty may grow, no doubt, to regard law as no more nor less than just the will — the actual and present will — of the actual majority of the nation. The majority govern. What the majority pleases, it may ordain. What it ordains is law. So much for the source of law, and so much for the nature of law. But, then, as law is nothing but the will of a major number, as that will differs from the will of yesterday, and will differ from that of to-morrow, and as all law is a restraint on natural right and personal independence, how can it gain a moment’s hold on the reverential sentiments of the heart, and the profounder convictions of the judgment? How can it impress a filial awe; how can it conciliate a filial love; how can it sustain a sentiment of veneration; how can it command a rational and animated defence? Such sentiments are not the stuff from which the immortality of a nation is to be woven! Oppose now to this the loftier philosophy which we have learned. In the language of our system, the law is not the transient and arbitrary creation of the major will, nor of any will. It is not the offspring of will at all. It is the absolute justice of the State, enlightened by the perfect reason of the State. That is law, — enlightened justice assisting the social nature to perfect itself by the social life. It is ordained, doubtless, that is, it is chosen, and is ascertained by the wisdom of man. But, then, it is the master-work of man. *Quæ est enim istorum oratio tam exquisita, quæ sit anteponeunda bene constitutæ civitati publico jure, et moribus?*¹

“By the costly and elaborate contrivances of our constitutions we have sought to attain the transcendent result of extracting and excluding haste, injustice, revenge, and folly from the place and function of giving the law, and of introducing alone the reason and justice of the wisest and the best. By the aid of time, — time which changes and tries all things; tries them, and works them pure, — we subject the law, after it is given, to the tests of old experience, to the reason and justice of successive ages and generations, to the best thoughts of the wisest and safest of reformers. And then and thus we pronounce it good. Then and thus we cannot choose but reverence, obey, and enforce it. We would grave it deep into the heart of the undying State. We would strengthen it by opinion, by manners, by private virtue, by habit, by the awful hoar of innumerable ages. All that attracts us to life, all that is charming in the perfected and adorned social nature, we wisely think or we wisely dream, we owe to the all-encircling presence of the law. Not even extravagant do we think it to hold, that the Divine approval may sanction it as not unworthy of the reason which we derive from his own nature. Not extravagant do we hold it to say, that there is thus a voice of the people which is the voice of God."

¹ Cicero de Republica, I. 2.

In January, 1846, he argued before the Supreme Court at Washington the case of the boundary between Massachusetts and Rhode Island. The latter State was the complainant, and Massachusetts had made an answer. Evidence also had been taken by the parties, so that the case was heard upon both answer and evidence. The words of the Massachusetts charter defined the part of the boundary in question as "lying within the space of three English miles on the south part of Charles River, or of any or of every part thereof;" and the State of Rhode Island insisted that these words had been misconstrued and misapplied in former adjustments and agreements about the line, and particularly that mistakes had been made as to the location of some of the ancient stations. The case disclosed various acts and proceedings between the respective governments, from the very earliest times, and thus opened a wide field of inquiry and discussion. "The case," says a correspondent, "was argued by Randolph and Whipple for Rhode Island, and Choate and Webster for Massachusetts.¹ Mr. Randolph occupied three days in referring to and reading ancient grants and documents. Mr. Choate confined himself to that branch of the argument resulting from the two following points: 1. The true interpretation of the charter. 2. The acts of 1713, 1718, &c., being acts of the State of Rhode Island of a most decisive character. But these points went to the very marrow of the case; and as illustrated, expanded, and enforced by Mr. Choate, with his remarkable diction, with his clear and searching analysis and his subtle logic, went far utterly to destroy the work of the preceding three days. Every one who heard that argument must have felt that there was something new under the sun; and that such a man as Mr. Choate had never been heard in that court before." The argument made a strong impression upon the judges. Judge Catron, it was said, was so much struck and charmed by it that it became a standing inquiry with him at the future sessions of the court, whether Choate was not coming on to argue some question. "I have heard the most eminent advocates," he said, "but he surpasses them all." It especially surprised him, as it did others, that the soil and climate of New England — sterile and harsh — should give birth to eloquence so fervid, beautiful, and convincing. Of this argument there remains no report; nor have any fragments of it been found among Mr. Choate's manuscripts.

¹ Howard's Reports, vol. 4, pp. 591-640.

In March, 1846, Mr. Choate made his celebrated defence of Albert J. Tirrell. He probably never made an argument at the bar under circumstances apparently more adverse, nor one which, from the nature of one part of the defence, and from his unlooked-for success, subjected him to so much criticism. He took the case in the natural way of business, being retained as for any other professional service. With Tirrell himself he never exchanged a word till the day of the trial.¹ The case was heard in Boston, before Justices Wilde, Dewey, and Hubbard — venerable, one of them for age, and all of them for experience and weight of character. The principal facts as developed at the trial were the following: Between four and five o'clock on Monday morning, October 27, 1845, a young woman named Maria Bickford was found dead in a house of bad repute, kept by one Joel Lawrence. Albert J. Tirrell, a person of respectable family and connections, but of vicious life, and already under indictment for adultery, was known to have been with her on the previous afternoon and late in the evening, the doors of the house having been locked for the night. He had long been a paramour of hers, and for her company had forsaken his own wife. On the morning spoken of, several inmates of the house were early roused by a cry coming apparently from the room occupied by these persons, followed by a sound as of a heavy body falling on the floor. Soon afterwards some one was heard going down stairs, making an indistinct noise as if stifled by smoke; and almost immediately those in the house were alarmed by the smell and appearance of fire. After the fire was extinguished, which was done by the help of a fireman and a neighbor, the body of Mrs. Bickford was found on the floor of the room she had occupied, and where the fire principally was, at some distance from the bed, her throat cut to the bone from ear to ear; her body much burnt; a considerable pool of blood upon the bed; a bowl upon a wash-stand in the corner of the room, with water in it, thick with blood; marks of blood upon the wash-stand, and the lamp on the mantel-piece; the bed-clothes piled up in various places in the room and in the entry, and partly consumed; a bloody razor near the body; also, some stockings, a cravat, and a cane, belonging to Tirrell. Besides this, a fire had been kindled in an adjoining room which was not occupied that night. A woman in the next house, separated from Lawrence's by a brick partition, was waked that morning by a screech as from a grown child; but on listening heard the voice of a woman; then she heard a strangling noise, and afterwards a fall, and then a louder noise.

¹ He was generally averse to personal contact with his clients in criminal cases. In this instance, I have understood that after the prisoner was in the dock, he walked to the rail and said, "Well, Sir, are you ready to make a strong push for life with me to-day?" The answer, of course, was in the affirmative. "Very well," replied Mr. C., "we will make it," and turned away to his seat. He did not speak to him again.

It was also in evidence that Tirrell had called in haste, very early on that Monday morning, at a livery-stable near Bowdoin Square, saying that "he had got into trouble; that somebody had come into his room and tried to murder him," and he wanted a vehicle and driver to take him out of town. These were furnished, and he was driven to Weymouth. He also had called between four and five o'clock at the house of one Head, in Alden Court, not far from the livery-stable, and asked for some clothes which he had left there, saying that he was going to Weymouth. The officers who went in search of him on the same day did not succeed in finding him; but some months afterwards he was arrested in New Orleans, and brought to Boston for trial. The public were exasperated by the atrocity of the deed, were generally convinced of his guilt, and confident that he would be convicted. The crime could be charged upon no one else ; and the evidence connected him with it so closely that there seemed to be no chance of escape.

Yet, in spite of the almost universal prejudgment, and of a chain of circumstantial evidence coiling about the prisoner which seemed irrefragable, his counsel, by throwing doubt upon the testimony of the government, as derived in part from witnesses of infamous character, by subtly analyzing what was indisputable, and demonstrating its consistency with a theory of innocence, by a skilful combination of evidence showing the possibility of suicide, or of murder by some other hand, and by a peculiar line of defence so singular and audacious that it seemed almost to paralyze the prosecuting officer, were able to convince the jury, and I believe the court and the bar, that he could not be legally convicted. It appeared, for the defence, that Tirrell was subject from his youth to what was called somnambulism ; and that while in this state he made strange noises — a sort of groan or screech — loud and distressing ; that he frequently rose and walked in his sleep ; sometimes uttered words evidently prompted by dreams ; and that once he pulled a companion with whom he was sleeping out of bed, stood over him and cried out, “Start that leader! start that leader, or I’ll cut his throat!” and then walked to the door as if for a knife that had been placed over the latch ; that on the morning of the asserted murder, when he went to Head’s house, he appeared so strangely as to frighten those who saw him, and Head took hold of him and shook him, when he seemed to wake up from a kind of stupor, and said, "Sam, how came I here?" It was also proved that when informed at Weymouth that he was charged with having committed the murder, he said that he would go to Boston and deliver himself up, but was dissuaded by his brother-in-law, who furnished him money to take him to Montreal. It was further proved that Mrs. Bickford, though beautiful and fascinating, was inclined to intemperance, was passionate and wicked, and often threatened to take her own life; that she was in the habit of having a razor with her for the purpose of shaving her forehead to make it high; and once had bought a dirk, and kept it concealed in her room. Physicians of the utmost respectability testified that the wound in the neck was one which could have been inflicted by the deceased herself; that extraordinary convulsive movements may be made after much of the blood has left the body, while still some remains in the head; that from the nature of the instrument, and the physical ability of the deceased, the death might have been suicide; that the prisoner appeared evidently to be a somnambulist, or sleep-walker, and that in this somnambulant state a person can dress himself, can consistently commit a homicide, set the house on fire, and run out into the street. These were the strong points on which the argument of Mr. Choate was based. He contended that no motive had been shown for the deed, on the part of the prisoner; that the evidence did not contradict the idea of suicide; that no evidence had shown that a third party had not done the deed; and that if committed by the prisoner, it must have been done while in the somnambulant state. There is no record of this extraordinary argument. An imperfect sketch is found in some of the newspapers of the day, evidently not exact and accurate, and of course conveying no adequate idea of the variety of power brought to bear on the analysis of the evidence and its application, in overthrowing the theory of the government.

Mr. Choate often said that he meant to write out the argument, the materials of which existed ; but he never carried this intention into effect, and a diligent search among his papers has failed to discover any trace of his brief. But in the imperfect notices to which we now have access, we see evidence not only of the solemn and earnest manner which the case mainly required, and which he could render so impressive, but also of that occasional playful extravagance and witty allusion with which he was accustomed to relieve the anxious attention of the jury. Speaking of a witness for the government, called out of place, and after the defence was in, he said : " Where was this tardy and belated witness that he comes here to tell us all he knows, and all he doesn't know, forty-eight hours after the evidence for the defence is closed ? Is the case so obscure that he had never heard of it ? Was he ill, or in custody ? Was he in Europe, Asia, or Africa ? Was he on the Red Sea, or the Yellow Sea, or the Black Sea, or the Mediterranean Sea ? Was he at Land's End, or John o' Groat's house ? Was he with Commissioners on our north-eastern boundary drawing and defining that much vexed boundary line ? Or was he with General Taylor and his army at Chihuahua, or wherever the fleeting south-western boundary line of our country may at this present moment be ? No, gentlemen, he was at none of these places (comparatively easy of access), but — and I would call your attention, Mr. Foreman, to the fact, and urge it upon your consideration — he was at that more remote, more inaccessible region, whence so few travellers return — Roxbury.”

In showing a possibility that the crime could have been committed by a third person, he denounced with great severity and sarcasm the reckless and depraved character of most of the persons who appeared as witnesses, and the infamous nature of the house “not always so very hermetically sealed.” In accounting for the position in which the body was found, he asserted, what the apparent diversity of testimony seemed to bear out, that all the particulars and horrors in that room on the morning of the homicide, had not been divulged, and that Lawrence himself might have snatched the body from the burning bed. So by suggestion after suggestion he threw suspicion over the theories of the government or diminished the credibility of its witnesses. In the argument for somnambulism, he produced a great impression by a quotation, “I beg leave of the court to read, as illustrative of my point of argument here, a passage from a good old book, which used to lie on the shelves of our good old fathers and mothers, and which they were wont devoutly to read. This old book is ‘Hervey’s Meditations,’ and I have borrowed it from my mother to read on this occasion. ‘Another signal instance of a Providence intent upon our welfare (says that writer) is, that we are preserved safe in the hours of slumber. . . . At these moments we lie open to innumerable perils; perils from the resistless rage of flames; perils from the insidious artifices of thieves, or the outrageous violence of robbers ; perils from the irregular workings of our own thoughts, and especially from the incursions of our spiritual enemy. . . . Will the candid reader excuse me, if I add a short story, or rather a matter of fact, suitable to the preceding remark? Two persons who had been hunting together in the day slept together the following night ; one of them was renewing his pursuit in his dream, and having run the whole circle of the chase, came at last to the fall of the stag. Upon this he cries out with determined ardor, "I'll kill him, I'll kill him," and immediately feels for the knife which he carried in his pocket. His companion happening to be awake, and observing what passed, leaped from the bed. Being secure from danger, and the moon shining bright into the room, he stood to view the event, when, to his inexpressible surprise, the infatuated sportsman gave several deadly stabs in the very place where, a moment before, the throat and the life of his friend lay. This I mention as a proof, that nothing hinders us, even from being assassins of others or murderers of ourselves, amid the mad follies of sleep, only the preventing care of our Heavenly Father. . . . Oh! the unwearied and condescending goodness of our Creator! who lulls us to our rest, by bringing on the silent shades, and plants his own ever-watchful eye as our sentinel, while we enjoy the needful repose.' "

In his exordium, alluding to the certainty that death would follow a verdict of guilty, he said, "Every juror, when he puts into the urn the verdict of 'guilty,' writes upon it also, 'Let him die.'" In the solemn and beautiful peroration, he, as it were, summed up his appeal in these words: "Under the iron law of old Rome, it was the custom to bestow a civic wreath on him who should save the life of a citizen. Do your duty this day, gentlemen, and you too may deserve the civic crown."

The verdict of the jury, after a deliberation of less than two hours, was "Not guilty," — a verdict which has been generally acquiesced in by the legal profession as the only one which the evidence would warrant, though at the commencement of the trial few could have supposed it possible. Mr. Choate suffered somewhat in the general estimation from the argument drawn from somnambulism. That, however, was a suggestion of the friends of the accused, accepted by the counsel, and employed to the best of his ability, like any other capital fact. The foreman of the jury stated that the question of somnambulism did not enter into the consideration of the jury, and had not the public been disappointed and almost shocked by the result of the trial, we should probably have heard less criticism of the methods of the advocate.

As this case must take rank among the most celebrated in our country, for the audacity of the crime, for the pervading anxiety that the criminal should not escape, as well as for the power, brilliancy, and unexpected success of the defence, it is much to be regretted that no good report of it was ever made. No description, or statement of legal points, can enable one to reproduce the scenes, or feel the power by which the jury were brought so soon to their verdict of deliverance.

Although acquitted on the charge of murder, Tirrell was still under an indictment for arson. On this charge he was tried before Judges Shaw, Wilde, and

Dewey in January, 1847. This trial, though of less celebrity than the first, was hardly less important or difficult. Nor was the ability of the defence less conspicuous. Every one noticed the hopeful and confident tone with which Mr. Choate opened his argument. He moved as if sure of success. Having thus, as by a magnetic influence, removed the pressure of doubt and apprehension, he proceeded to review the evidence, which was nearly the same as in the former trial, with the addition of one witness, who swore that she was in Lawrence's house that night and saw Tirrell going out between four and five o'clock in the morning. This new testimony, so important if true, damaged the case for the government by throwing doubt upon the credibility of the other witnesses, — Lawrence having before sworn that no one was in his house that night but those who appeared on the stand. Mr. Choate argued that there was no proof of arson at all; no proof of an intent to set the fire; it might have been done by Lawrence himself by accident; if done by Tirrell at all, it might have been done in a somnambulic state. He had no motive for the crime. "He was fascinated by the wiles of the unhappy female whose death was so awful; he loved her with the love of forty thousand brothers, though, alas! it was not as pure as it was passionate." He argued again that Mrs. Bickford might have died by her own hand. "If the jury," he said, "are governed by the clamor raised by a few without the court-house, I must look upon the prisoner as in the position of one of those unfortunates on board the ill-fated 'Atlantic.' He was tossed upon the waters, — struck out boldly and strongly in the wintry surge, was washed within reach of the ragged beach, and, with one hand upon the crag, was offering up thanksgiving for his safety, when the waves overtook him and he was swept back to death."

"There is a day, gentlemen," he said in conclusion, "when all these things will be known. When the great day has arrived and the books are opened, it will then be known. But, gentlemen, let not your decision be then declared in the face of the world, to be a judicial murder."

The charge to the jury by Chief Justice Shaw, discrediting the government witnesses on account of disreputable characters and discrepancy of testimony, was favorable to the prisoner, who was again acquitted. It was wittily said afterwards that "Tirrell existed only by the sufferance of Choate."¹

In July, 1847, Mr. Choate argued, at Northampton, the Oliver Smith's will case. Mr. Smith died a bachelor at nearly eighty years of age, leaving an estate which was inventoried at $370,000. This he disposed of by a will creating a variety of charities which many people regarded as unwise and useless. He had a number of relations who had expected generous legacies. Some of them were needy; to others he was under obligations of kindness, and all of them felt that it was right to defeat the will, if it could legally be done. There was but one point at which an attack seemed to offer any chance of success. One of the witnesses to the will had lived so secluded from society, and had conducted himself so singularly, that he was reputed to be insane. If it could be shown that he was insane at the time the will was made, he would of course be incompetent and the will would fail. But the fact that he avoided intercourse with everybody not belonging to his own family made it difficult to obtain evidence. The heirs-at-law determined, however, to appeal from the decree of the Probate Court which approved the will, on the ground that it was not attested by three competent witnesses. For the heirs appeared Mr. Choate, R. A. Chapman, and C. P. Huntington. For the executors, Daniel Webster, C. E. Forbes, and Osmyn Baker. The court-room was crowded as densely as men and women could sit and stand. The evidence was decisive that a year before the will was made, the witness was regarded by the Superintendent of the State Asylum as insane, but at the period in question, the evidence, though conflicting, was in his favor. He himself was put upon the stand, and, sustained by the presence of his powerful counsel, gained much by his appearance. There is no report of the arguments on this interesting trial, but I am able to give the impression made upon the mind of an able lawyer who was present and indirectly opposed to Mr. Choate.¹

¹ A short time after the conclusion of his second trial, Tirrell wrote to Mr. Choate and suggested that half of the fee should be returned, stating that as his innocence of the crimes charged was so obvious to two juries, his counsel had been paid too much for their conduct of such simple causes. The fee paid was, it is believed, $200!

“Though I took no active part in the trial of the ‘Smith Will Case,’ I was engaged somewhat in the antecedent preparation, and thus brought nearer than I otherwise might have been, to the great leaders on that occasion. . . . I had never till then seen or heard Mr. Choate, when opposed to Mr. Webster before the jury. It was a case, moreover, where, at the start, he must have felt how desperately the odds were against him on the merits, and how necessary it was in the presence of a thronged court-house of new hearers, and of such an antagonist, that his genius should not falter; and surely his exhaustless resource never responded more prodigally to his call. He spoke for three hours, as, it seems to me, never man spake. Mr. Webster, on the contrary, after a certain critical point in the production of the evidence was passed, felt that he had an easy case and a sure victory. I thought there was on his part rather an affectation of serenity — of deliberateness and even homeliness of address — an effort at self-suppression, perhaps, as if studying more to divert the jury by the contrasted manner of the men before them, than to rival his adversary in any of the subtle or fascinating arts of oratory. There were in fact only two or three passages in Mr. Webster's speech where he seemed to startle the bewildered twelve by a power at all proportioned to his fame. And if the verdict had been taken before the charge, the result would have been doubtful. But the dry and utterly passionless analysis of the evidence by old Judge Wilde made the jury soon to see how narrowly they had escaped finding an impulsive, if not a foolish verdict. I speak of course with the biases of a retainer against Mr. Choate's side.

¹ Hon. Charles Delano.

“You will observe that the single issue on the trial was, whether the third witness to the will was, or was not, of sufficient mental soundness at the time of attestation. This witness was a young man just out of college, — the son of a gentleman of intelligence, education, and of the highest respectability, but a noted hypochondriac, and the grandson of that chief of hypochondriacs, not less than of justices, Theophilus Parsons, of the Massachusetts Bench.

“Mr. Choate converted these incidents into one of his finest episodes. He gave us the Chief Justice in his most exalted intellectual frame; but then how ingeniously did he darken the canvas with all the horrors of that great man’s morbid delusions! Surely the jury were not to believe that a malady thus foreshadowed, when added to and aggravated by the channel of transmission could issue in any thing less than necessary and utter mental overthrow! His theory might have gained assent, had it not been that the questionable witness was himself in court. His whole demeanor and expression, however, were those of a man absorbed in melancholy; and I think Mr. Choate’s side had, from the outset, staked their expectations upon the miscarriage of this witness on the stand. In the first place, would the party setting up the will dare to call him? If not, it would be a confession of at least present incompetency. If they should, how probable that so consummate a cross-examiner would easily reach the clew to his distractions, and thus topple him from any momentary self-possession. It was in taking this timid and reluctant witness into his own hands, and bringing him to feel that he was testifying under the shelter of the great ‘Defender’ himself, that Mr. Webster figured more conspicuously than in any other part of the case. Thus borne up and through a long direct examination, he braved the cross-examination with perfect composure. This was the critical point of the case to which I have before alluded. I know I am spinning out this note to a merciless length, but my apology is, that reminiscences of Mr. Choate are among the most delightful memories of the lawyer. Few who have ever known him can dwell upon his death otherwise than as upon a personal and domestic affliction ; and I count it among the chief felicities of my life, not merely to have heard him at the Bar, but to have seen him in his office, had a glimpse of him at home among his books, and listened to him at his fireside.”

Mr. Webster and Mr. Choate were often very playful towards each other during this trial, as they usually were when engaged together in the same case. “My position,” said one of the junior counsel,¹ “happened to be between them ; and as it was the first time I had ever seen them opposed to each other, I was not a careless observer of either. Mr. Choate seemed to know Mr. Webster’s ways thoroughly ; and I was sometimes amused by the shrewd cautions he gave me. Mr. Webster laughed at him about his handwriting, telling him his notes were imitations of the antediluvian bird-tracks. While he was making his argument, Mr. Webster repeatedly called my attention in a whisper to his striking passages. He once asked me in respect to one of them, ‘How do you suppose I can answer that?’ And once when he used the word ‘abnormal,’ Mr. Webster said, ‘Didn’t I tell you he would use the word “abnormal” before he got through? He got it in college, and it came from old President Wheelock.’ . . . After the trial was over, Mr. Webster spoke very freely of Mr.

¹ Hon. Reuben A. Chapman, late Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts.

Choate, in a private conversation at our hotel, and expressed the highest admiration of him. He said he often listened to him with wonder; and that when he argued cases at Washington, the judges of the Supreme Court expressed their amazement at the brilliancy and power of his oratory, even in the discussion of dry legal points. He said they had often mentioned it to him."

It was understood that in this case the jury stood at first, ten for the will, and two against it; on the third ballot they agreed.

In the political campaign of 1848, which resulted in the election of Gen. Taylor, Mr. Choate took a prominent and willing part. In the character and life of Gen. Taylor, his modesty and integrity, his capacity in extraordinary emergencies, his courage, his unobtrusive patriotism, and his brilliant victories, there was much to awaken enthusiasm as well as to command respect. The speeches of Mr. Choate before the election are among the most effective he ever made in this style of ephemeral political oratory. With a sound substratum of judicious thought and argument, they fairly effervesce with wit and raillery.

One of these was made at Brookline. "He had been a week," writes a gentleman who went with him to the place, "preparing his oration, and was well-nigh used up. He got into the coach, his locks dripping with dissolved camphor, and complained of a raging headache. He clutched his temple with his hand, and leaned his head on my shoulder, to see if he could not, by reclining, find ease. Just as we touched the Mill Dam, the evening moon poured her level rays over the beautiful waters of the Back Bay, and filled the coach and atmosphere with dreamy light. The scene instantly revived him. He put his head out of the coach window, and was absorbed with the sweetness of the view. The sight of the still waters, moonlighted, seemed to drive away his pain, and he struck into his old rapture. In the hall where he spoke, he was in his very best mood ; both mind and body seeming to be on wings. . . . As we rode home in the soft moonlight, he amazed me with his vast power of thought. I have seen men stirred with passion ; men eloquent ; men profound and brilliant in conversation ; but in the whole course of my life I never saw a man more roused than was he. He poured out, without stopping, a torrent of conversation upon history, constitutional law, philosophy, poetry ; upon Burke, Plato, Hamilton, the future of the Union. No other word would explain his style but ‘ torrent ’ or ‘ cataract ; ’ for what he spoke in that hour would have made a small volume, — brilliant and full of philosophy and learning. And I think that I never realized so much as then the power and unapproachableness of genius ; and yet the man — though so burning up and absorbed with his subjects of conversation — was true to his gentle instincts. His daughter lay ill at home ; and in Summer Street, at a long distance from his house in Winthrop Place, he bade the coachman stop to allow him to walk to his door, so that the noise of the carriage might not disturb her ; insisting, at the same time, against my request to the contrary, that the coach should carry me home, though I lived in a different part of the city.”

Besides this, he addressed a mass meeting at Worcester, and spoke twice at Salem, — the second time on the presentation of a banner bearing on one side the inscription, "Presented to the Taylor Club by the Ladies of Salem, Oct. 17, 1848," and on the other, a representation of Gen. Taylor giving relief to a wounded Mexican, with the words "HONOR — PATRIOTISM — HUMANITY." The assembly was brilliant even for that city, and greeted him with the fervor of friends. The applause subsiding, he addressed the chairman of the Club in words of beauty which foreshadow what became afterwards the very heart of his political life.

"It has been supposed, Sir, by that better portion of this community, the ladies of Salem, that it would not be displeasing to the association of Whigs, over which you preside, to pause for an hour from the austerer duties of the time, and to be recreated by receiving at their hands an expression of that kind of sympathy which man needs most, and a tender of that kind of aid which helps him farthest, longest, and most gratefully, — the sympathy and approval of our mothers, wives, sisters, daughters, and those, all, whom most we love. Under that impression they have prepared this banner, and have requested me to present it, as from them, to you. With a request so grateful, from its nature and source, I am but too happy to comply. . . .

"I give you, from the ladies of this Salem, — the holy and beautiful city of peace, — a banner of peace! Peace has her victories, however, as well as war. I give you, then, I hope and believe, the banner of a victory of peace. The work of hands, some of which you doubtless have given away in marriage at the altar, — the work of hands, for which many altars might contend! some of which have woven the more immortal web of thought and recorded speech, making the mind of Salem as renowned as its beauty, — the work of such hands, embodying their general and warm appreciation of your exertions, and their joy in your prospects; conveying at once the assurance of triumph and the consolations of possible defeat; — expressive above all of their pure and considered moral judgments on the great cause and the Good Man! — the moral judgments of these, whose frown can disappoint the proudest aim, whose approbation prosper not less than ours; — the work of such hands, the gift of such hearts, the record of such moral sentiments, the symbol of so many sensibilities and so many hopes, you will prize it more than if woven of the tints of a summer evening sunset, inscribed and brought down to earth by viewless artists of the skies.

“Prizing it on all reasons, I think you are too much a Whig not to derive, in receiving it, a peculiar pleasure from this consideration, that it expresses the judgments of this portion of the community on the personal qualities and character of Gen. Taylor. It expresses their judgments in favor of those qualities and that character. It assures us that we are not mistaken in the man himself. It assures us that we are right in believing him just, incorrupt, humane; of large heart, as well as clear head, — whose patriotism knows neither Alleghanies nor Mississippi, nor Rocky Mountains, embracing our whole America, — from whom twenty thousand Mexicans could not wrest the flag of his country, yet whom the sight of a single Mexican soldier, wounded and athirst at his feet, melts, in a moment, to the kindness of a woman.

“I do not suppose that I enter on any delicate or debatable region of social philosophy, sure I am that I concede away nothing which I ought to assert for our sex, when I say that the collective womanhood of a people like our own seizes with matchless facility and certainty on the moral and personal peculiarities and character of marked and conspicuous men, and that we may very wisely address ourselves to her to learn if a competitor for the highest honors may boast, and has revealed, that truly noble nature that entitles him to a place among the cherished regards, a niche among the domestic religions, a seat at the old hearths, a home in the hearts of a nation.

“We talk and think of measures; of creeds in politics; of availability; of strength to carry the vote of Pennsylvania, or the vote of Mississippi. Through all this her eye seeks the moral, prudential, social, and mental character of the man himself, — and she finds it.

“All the glare and clamor of the hundred victories of Napoleon, — all the prestige of that unmatched intellect, and that fortune and that renown, more than of the children of earth — while they dazzled the senses, and paled the cheek of manhood — could not win him the love and regards of the matronage of France. The worship of Madame de Staël was the idiosyncrasy of an idolatress of genius, glory, and power, — and she paid it alone.

“But when the Father of his Country, our Washington, arrived, on his way to the seat of Government, at that bridge of Trenton, how sure and heart-prompted was the recognition, by the mothers and daughters of America, of that greatness which is in goodness, and of the daily beauty of that unequalled life. Those flowers with which they strewed his path, while they sung that ode, — that laurel and evergreen which they twined on arch and pillar for him to pass beneath, had not found the needful air and light and soil in which they had sprung with a surer affinity than these had detected and acknowledged the sublimity of the virtues, the kindness, the parental love, the justice, the honesty, the large American heart, that made his ‘fame whiter than it was brilliant.’

“I hear then, with pleasure not to be expressed, this testimony — from such a source — to the candidate of our choice. I appreciate the discernment that has contrived this device, and written this inscription. Right and fit it is, that such praise as theirs should commemorate his Honor, who has done so much to fill the measure of his country’s glory, — his Patriotism, on whose heart her love has burned in youth, in manhood, ever bright as on an altar, — his Humanity, in whose regards this cup of water, pressed to the lip of the wounded prisoner, is a sweeter memory than the earthquake voice of many campaigns of victory!

“There are three more traits of his character, three more fruits of his election, which the authors of this Gift discern and appreciate.

“They expect, first, that his will be an administration of honorable peace. The experiences of war have more than sated him of that form of duty and that source of fame. From many a bloody day and field — too many — he turns to win a victory of peace.

He seeks to set on that brow a garland — amaranthine and blameless — compared to which the laurels that a Cæsar reaps are weeds. . . .

“They expect, next, that his administration will be illustrated by the true progress of America. . . . They expect to see it co-operating, as far as it may, with the spirit of Humanity in achieving the utmost measure of good, of greatness, of amelioration, of happiness, of which philanthropy and patriotism may dare to dream. And thus they look to an administration of progress. But progress, in their view and in yours, does not consist, and is not exemplified, in adding, every three or four years, to our already imperial area, a country three times larger than all France, and leaving it a desert; but in decorating and building up what we have. Their idea of progress, therefore, and yours, embraces a twofold sentiment and a twofold exertion: first, to improve the land and water, — to bring out the material resources of America; and next, to improve the mind and heart of America; diffusing thus over her giant limbs and features the glow and grace of moral beauty — as morning spread upon the mountains. . . .

“They expect, finally, that his administration will be memorable for having strengthened and brightened the golden chain of the American Union. They expect that, under the sobriety of his patriotism, that Union will neither be sapped by the expansion of our area, until identity, nationality, and the possibility of all cohesion of the members are lost, nor rent asunder by the desperate and profligate device of geographical parties. — They and we, Sir, of that Union, deem all alike. We, too, stand by the shipping-articles and the ship the whole voyage round. We hold that no increase of our country's area, — although we hope never to see another acre added to it; no transfer and no location of our centre of national power, — although we hope never to see it leave the place where now it is; no accession of new stars on our sky — were they to come in constellations, thronging, till the firmament were in a blaze; that none of these things should have power to whisper to one of us a temptation to treason. We go for the Union to the last beat of the pulse and the last drop of blood. We know and feel that there — there — in that endeared name — beneath that charmed Flag — among those old glorious graves, in that ample and that secure renown, — that there we have garnered up our hearts — there we must either live, or bear no life. With our sisters of the Republic, less or more, we would live and we would die, — ‘one hope, one lot, one life, one glory.’”

The subsequent election of General Taylor gave to Mr. Choate the greatest delight. It seemed to him, indeed, a triumph of HONOR, PATRIOTISM, HUMANITY. On the evening when the intelligence was received that made the matter certain, he said to a friend who called to see him: “Is not this sweet? Is it not sweet? The whole country seems to me a garden to-night, from Maine to New Orleans. It is fragrant all over, and I am breathing the whole perfume.”

About this time a position as Professor of the Law School at Cambridge was urged upon Mr. Choate in a manner so sincere, so unusual, and so honorable to all parties, that I am especially glad to be permitted to present the facts in the words of one who knew them familiarly, — the late Chief Justice Shaw.

“After the reorganization of the Law School at Harvard College, by the large donation of Mr. Dane, and the appointment of Mr. Justice Story as Dane Professor, the school acquired a high reputation throughout the United States. It was regarded as an institution to which young men could be beneficially sent from every part of the country to be thoroughly trained in the general principles of jurisprudence, and the elementary doctrines of the common law, which underlie the jurisprudence of all the States. This reputation, which is believed to be well founded, was attributable, in a great measure, to the peculiar qualifications, and to the efficient services of Judge Story, in performing the duties of his professorship. It was not so much by his profound and exact knowledge of the law in all its departments, nor by his extensive knowledge of books, ancient and modern, that the students were benefited, as by his earnest and almost impetuous eloquence, the fulness and clearness of his illustrations with which he awakened the aspirations, and impressed the minds, of his youthful hearers. He also demonstrated in his own person how much may be accomplished by a man of extraordinary talent and untiring industry, — having successfully and faithfully performed the duties of his professorship, being engaged at the same time in two other departments of intellectual labor, that of Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, and author of elaborate treatises on the science and practice of law, — each of which would seem sufficient to require the exclusive attention of a very industrious man.

“Some time after the decease of Judge Story, whether immediately, or after the lapse of two or three years, I do not know, but as near as I recollect, about the year 1848, the attention of the President and Fellows of Harvard College was turned to Mr. Choate, at once an eminent jurist and an advocate conspicuous for his commanding and persuasive eloquence, whose services, if they could be obtained, would render him eminently of use in the Dane Law School. Indeed, he was too prominent a public man to be overlooked, as a candidate offering powers of surpassing fitness for such a station. But it was never supposed by the Corporation that the comparatively retired position of a College Professor, and the ordinary, though pretty liberal emoluments of such an office, could induce Mr. Choate to renounce all the honors and profits of the legal profession which rightly belonged to him as Leader of the Bar in every department of forensic eloquence. But about the time alluded to, Mr. Choate, having retired from political life, was apparently devoting himself ardently and exclusively to the profession of the law as a jurist and advocate. It was thought by the Corporation that a scheme might be arranged, if it suited his tastes and satisfied his expectations of professional eminence, which would secure to the Law School of the University the benefit of his great talents, place him conspicuously before the whole country, and afford to himself the immunities and the reputation of a great jurist and advocate.

“It was the opinion of the members of the Corporation, that in appointing instructors for an academical institution, designed to instruct young men in the science of jurisprudence, and in part to fit them for actual practice in the administration of the law in courts of justice (an opinion, I believe, which they hold in common with many who have most reflected on the means of acquiring a legal education), it is not desirable that an instructor in such institution should be wholly withdrawn from practice in courts. Law is an art as well as a science. Whilst it has its foundation in a broad and comprehensive morality, and in profound and exact science, to be adapted to actual use in controlling and regulating the concerns of social life, it must have its artistic skill which can only be acquired by habitual practice in courts of justice. A man may be a laborious student, have an inquiring and discriminating mind, and have all the advantage which a library of the best books can afford, and yet, without actual attendance on courts, and the means and facilities which practice affords, he would be little prepared either to try questions of fact, or argue questions of law. The instructor, therefore, who to some extent maintains his familiarity with actual practice, by an occasional attendance as an advocate in courts of justice, would be better prepared to train the studies and form the mental habits of young men designed for the Bar.

“No formal application was made to Mr. Choate, but a plan was informally suggested to him, with the sanction of the Corporation, and explained in conversation substantially to the following effect: According to the plan of the Law School of the College, there are two terms or sessions in the year, of about twenty weeks each, with vacations intervening of about six weeks each. The first or autumn term commences about the 1st of September, and closes near the middle of January: the spring term commences about the 1st of March, and continues to July. The exercises during term-time consist of daily lectures and recitations, conducted by the several professors, of moot courts for the discussion of questions of law, deliberative oral discussions, in the nature of legislative debates; some written exercises also, on questions and subjects proposed, make up the course of training. Instructions in these exercises were given in nearly equal proportions by three professors, of whom the Dane Professor was one. The moot courts and deliberative discussions were uniformly presided over by one of the professors.

“At the time referred to, the Supreme Court of the United States commenced their annual session the first week in December, and continued to about the middle of March. It was thought, that without any perceptible derangement of the course of instruction in the Law School, the duties of the Dane Professorship might be so modified as to enable Mr. Choate to attend the Supreme Court of the United States at Washington during their whole term. The duties of the three professors are not such as to require the attendance of each on every day of the term; nor is it essential that the different departments of the duties assigned to them respectively should be taken up in any exact order. Then by an arrangement with the other professors, the subjects especially committed to the Dane Professor, and his proportion of all other duties, might be taken up and finished in the early part of the autumn term, so that without detriment to the instruction, he might leave it several weeks before its termination, and in like manner postpone them a few weeks at the commencement of the spring term, so that with the six weeks' vacation in mid-winter, these curtailments from the two terms would equal in length of time that of the entire session of the National Supreme Court.

“ The advantages to Mr. Choate seemed obvious. When it was previously known that he might be depended on to attend at the entire term of the Supreme Court, we supposed he would receive a retainer in a large proportion of the cases which would go up from New England, and in many important causes from all the other States. The effect of this practice upon the emoluments of his profession might be anticipated. No case, we believe, whether in law, equity, or admiralty, can reach the Supreme Court of the United States until the case, that is, a statement of all the facts on which questions may arise, is reduced to writing in some form, embraced in the record.

“ He would therefore have ample opportunity, with his case before him, and with the use of the best Law Library in the country, and the assistance of a class of young men ever eager to aid in seeking and applying authorities, and proposing cases for argument, to avail himself of all the leisure desirable at his own chambers, to study his cases thoroughly, and prepare himself for his arguments. The extent to which such a practice with such means would soon add to the solid reputation of Mr. Choate, may easily be conceived, especially by those who knew the strength of his intellectual power, and the keenness of his faculty for discrimination. The advantages to the Law School contemplated by this arrangement were, that Mr. Choate would not only bring to the institution the persuasive eloquence and the profound legal learning which he then possessed, but, by an habitual practice in one of the highest tribunals in the world, a tribunal which has jurisdiction of more important public and private rights than any other, he would keep up with all the changes of the times, in jurisprudence and legislation, and bring to the service of his pupils the products of a constantly growing experience.

“ But this plan, in the judgment of the Corporation, necessarily involved Mr. Choate’s residence at Cambridge, and an entire renunciation of all jury trials, and all other practice in courts, except occasionally a law argument before the Supreme Court of the State at Boston or Cambridge, each being within a short distance of his home. It has been considered important by the Corporation that the Professors of the Law School should reside in Cambridge, to afford thereby the benefit of their aid and counsel in the small number composing the Law Faculty. In the case of Mr. Choate, it was considered quite indispensable that he should reside in Cambridge, on account of the influence which his genial manners, his habitual presence, and the force of his character would be likely to exert over the young men drawn from every part of the United States to listen to his instructions. There was another consideration leading, in Mr. Choate’s case, to the same result, which was, that the breaking off from the former scenes of his labors and triumphs, so necessary to his success in the plan proposed, would be more effectually accomplished by his establishing at once a new residence, and contracting new habits. Both considerations had great weight in inducing those who communicated with Mr. Choate, to urge his removal to Cambridge, and the fixing there of his future residence, as essential features of the arrangement.

“Mr. Choate listened attentively to these proposals and discussed them freely; he was apparently much pleased with the brilliant and somewhat attractive prospect presented to him by this overture. He did not immediately decline the offer, but proposed to take it into consideration. Some time after — perhaps a week — he informed me that he could not accede to the proposal. He did not state to me his reasons, or if he did, I do not recollect them.”

It was not far from this time, also, that Mr. Choate received from Governor Briggs the honorable offer of a seat upon the bench of the Supreme Court. It was urged upon him by some of his friends, as affording him the rest which he seemed to need. But he felt that he could hardly afford to take it, and, after due consideration, respectfully declined.

In March of this year — 1849 — he delivered before the Mercantile Library Association the closing lecture of the winter course. The first two volumes of Mr. Macaulay's brilliant history had been but recently published; and availing himself of the newly awakened interest, he chose for his subject one always fresh to himself, “Thoughts on the New-England Puritans.” A short extract, comparing the public life of that day with ours, will indicate the tone and spirit of the whole.

“In inspecting a little more closely the colonial period of 1688, than heretofore I ever had done, it has seemed to me that the life of an able, prominent, and educated man of that day in Massachusetts was a life of a great deal more dignity, interest, and enjoyment than we are apt to imagine; that it would compare quite advantageously with the life of an equally prominent, able, and educated man in Massachusetts now. We look into the upper life of Old England in 1688, stirred by the scenes — kindled and lifted up by the passions of a great action — the dethronement of a king; the crowning of a king; the vindication and settlement of English liberty; the reform of the English constitution, — parent of more reform and of progress without end, — and we are dazzled. Renown and grace are there; the glories of the Augustan age of English letters, just dawning; Newton first unrolling the system of the Universe; the school-boy dreamings of Pope and Addison; the beautiful eloquence and more beautiful public character of Somers waiting to receive that exquisite dedication of the Spectator; the serene and fair large brow of Marlborough, on which the laurels of Blenheim and Malplaquet had not yet clustered. We turn to the Colonial life of the same day, and it seems at first as if it could not have been borne for half an hour. What a time of small things, to be sure, at first it appears to be. The sweet pathos, the heroic interest of the landing at Plymouth, of the journey to Charlestown, are gone; the grander excitations of the age of Independence are not yet begun to be felt; hard living; austere manners; provincial and parochial insignificance; stupendous fabrics of witchcraft, and disputes of grace and works; little tormentings of Quakers and Antinomians; synods to build platforms, on which nothing would stand; fast days for sins which there was no possibility to commit, and thanksgivings for mercies never received; these at first sight seem to be the Massachusetts life of that day. But look a little closer. Take the instance of an educated public man of Massachusetts about the year 1688, — a governor; a magistrate; an alumnus of Harvard College, learned in the learning of his time; a foremost man, — and trace him through a day of his life. Observe the variety and dignity of his employments; the weight of his cares; the range of his train of thoughts; his resources against ennui and satiety; on what aliment his spiritual and intellectual nature could feed; appreciate his past, his present, and his future, and see if you are quite sure that a man of equal ability, prominence, and learning is as high or as happy now.

“First, last, midst, of all the elements of interest in the life of such a man was this: that it was, in a just and grand sense, a public life. He was a public man. And what sort of a public man, — what doing in that capacity? This exactly. He was, he felt himself to be — and here lay the felicity of his lot, — he was in the very act of building up a new nation where no nation was before. The work was in the very process of doing from day to day, from hour to hour. Every day it was changing its form under his eye and under his hand. Instead of being born ignominiously into an established order of things, a recognized and stable State, to the duties of mere conservation, and the rewards of mere enjoyment, his function he felt to be that rarer, more heroical, more epic — to plant, to found, to construct a new State upon the waste of earth. He felt himself to be of the conditores imperiorum. Imperial labors were his; imperial results were his. Whether the State (that grandest of the works of man — grander than the Pyramids, or Iliads, or systems of the Stars!) — whether the State should last a year or a thousand years, — whether it should be contracted within lines three miles north of the Merrimack, three miles south of the Charles, and a little east of the Hudson, or spread to the head waters of the Aroostook, and St. John, and the springs of the Merrimack among the crystal hills of New England, and to the great sea on the west; whether a Stuart and a Papist king of England should grasp its charter, or the bayonet or tomahawk of French or Indians quench its life; — whether if it outlived, as Jeremy Taylor has said, ‘the chances of a child,’ it should grow up to be one day a pious, learned, well-ordered, and law-abiding Commonwealth; a freer and more beautiful England; a less tumultuary and not less tasteful Athens; a larger and more tolerant Geneva; or a school of prophets — a garden of God — a praise — a glory; all this seemed to such a man as I have described, as he awoke in the morning, to depend appreciably and consciously on what he might do or omit to do, before he laid his head on his pillow that very night. Public life in Massachusetts that day did not consist in sending or being sent to Congress with a dozen associates, to be voted down in a body of delegates representing half of North America. Still less was it a life of leisure and epicureanism. This man of whom I speak, within the compass of a single twenty-four hours, might have to correspond with Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Plymouth Colony, and the Royal Government of New Hampshire, upon the subject of boundary lines, — the boundary lines of States, as against one another wholly independent, — a dignified and historical deliberation; to collate and to draw practical conclusions from all manner of contradictory information touching movements of Indians at Casco Bay and the Penobscot; to confer with Sir William Phipps about the raising of troops to attack Port Royal or Quebec; to instruct the agent of the Colony, who was to sail for England next morning, to watch the course of the struggle between the last of the Stuarts, the people of England, and the Prince of Orange, or to meditate his report from London; to draw up a politic, legal, and skilful address to his king's most excellent and blessed majesty, to show that we had not forfeited the life of the charter and the birthright of English souls; to take counsel on the state of the free schools, the university, and the law; to communicate with some learned judge on the composition of our decennial twelve tables of the jurisprudence of liberty; to communicate with learned divines — the ardent Mathers, father and son, and with Brattle — on the ecclesiastical well-being of the State, the aspects of Papacy and Episcopacy, the agencies of the invisible world, the crises of Congregationalism, the backslidings of faith for life, and all those wayward tendencies of opinion, which, with fear of change, perplexed the church.

“Compare with the life of such an one the life of a Massachusetts public man of this day. How crowded that was; how burthened with individual responsibility; how oppressed with large interests; how far more palpable and real the influence; how much higher and wider the topics; how far grander the cares! Why, take the highest and best Massachusetts public men of all among us. Take his Excellency. What has he to do with French at Port Royal, or Indians at Saco, or Dutch on the Hudson? How much sleep does he lose from fear that the next steamer will bring news that the Crown of England has repealed the Constitution of Massachusetts? When will he lie awake at dead of night to see Cotton Mather drawing his curtain — pale as the ghost of Banquo — to tell him that witchcraft is celebrating pale Hecate's offerings at Danvers? Where is it now — the grand, peculiar charm — that belongs ever to the era and the act, of the planting and infancy of a State? Where — where now — those tears of bearded men; the faded cheek; the throbbing heart; the brow all furrowed with imperial lines of policy and care, — that give the seed to earth, whose harvest shall be reaped when some generations are come and gone?"

During the summer of the same year, the Phillips Will Case, as it was called, was argued by him at Ipswich. It involved the disposal of nearly a million of dollars. The will was dated at Nahant, where Mr. Phillips had his residence, Oct. 9, 1847. He soon after left for Europe, and the next year, having returned, put an end to his own life in Brattleborough, Vt., June 28, 1848. It was found on examination that after giving considerable sums to his mother and sisters, a hundred thousand dollars to the Observatory in Cambridge, and several minor bequests to his friends, he left the bulk of his property to a relative, who was already prospectively very wealthy. The heirs-at-law disputed the will on the grounds—1st, of the insanity or imbecility of the testator; 2d, that an undue influence had been exercised over him; and 3d, that the will was void because executed on a Sunday. It is seldom that an array of counsel of such eminent ability is seen at once in court. For the heirs-at-law appeared W. H. Gardiner, Joel Parker, and Sidney Bartlett. For the executors, Rufus Choate, Benj. R. Curtis, and Otis P. Lord. After a searching examination of witnesses and documents, protracted through a whole week, the arguments were made by Mr. Gardiner on one side and Mr. Choate on the other. That it was one of Mr. Choate's ablest and most conclusive arguments, conceived in his best vein, and conducted with consummate skill and eloquence, is the testimony of all who were present. To those who never heard him before, it was a new revelation of the scope and power of legal eloquence. Unfortunately it perished with the breath that uttered it. Nothing remains to attest its ability but its success. The decision of the jury on every point was in favor of the will.

Soon after leaving the Senate, Mr. Choate entered upon a course of careful study for the purpose of a more thorough self-discipline. He began to translate Thucydides, Demosthenes, and Tacitus. He marked out a course of systematic reading, and resolutely rescued hours of daily labor from sleep, from society, from recreation. Under the date of October, 1845, he says, "I am reading, meditating, and translating the first of Greek historians, Thucydides. I study the Greek critically in Passow, Bloomfield, and Arnold, and the history in Mitford, Thirlwall, Wachsmuth, Hermann, &c., &c., and translate faithfully, yet with some attention to English words and construction; and my purpose is to study deeply the Greece of the age of Pericles, and all its warnings to the liberty and the anti-unionisms of my own country and time."

Several fragments of journals, and sketches of promised labor, without dates, seem referable to the years between 1845 and 1850, and may be inserted here. They show the diligent efforts at self-culture in the midst of entangling and exhausting labors.

"VACATIONS.—PRIVATE.—HINTS FOR MYSELF.

"It is plain that if I am to do aught beyond the mere drudgery of my profession, for profit of others or of myself; if I am to ripen and to produce any fruit of study, and to construct any image or memorial of my mind and thoughts, it must be done or be begun quickly. To this I have admonition in all things. High time — if not too late — it is to choose between the two alternatives — to amuse — scarcely amuse, (for how sad and ennuyant is mere desultory reading!) such moments of leisure as business leaves me, in various random reading of good books, or to gather up these moments, consolidate and mould them into something worthy of myself, which may do good where I am not known, and live when I shall have ceased to live — a thoughtful and soothing and rich printed page. Thus far — almost to the Aristotelian term of utmost mental maturity — I have squandered these moments away. They have gone — not in pleasure, nor the pursuit of gain, nor in the trivialities of society — but in desultory reading, mainly of approved authors; often, much, of the grandest of the children of Light — but reading without method and without results. No doubt taste has been improved, sentiments enlarged, language heightened, and many of the effects — inevitable, insensible, and abiding of liberal culture, impressed on the spirit. But for all this, who is better? Of all this, who sees the proofs? How selfish and how narrow the couch of these gratifications! How idle the strenuousness of daily labor!

How instantly the air will close on this arrowy path! How sad, how contemptible, that no more should be left of such a life, than of the commonplace and vacant, and satisfied, on this side and that! I have been under the influence of such thoughts, meditating the choice of the alternative. I would arrest these moments, accumulate them, transform them into days and years of remembrance! To this end, I design to compose a collection of papers which I will call vacations. These shall embody the studies and thoughts of my fitful, fragmentary leisure. They shall be most slowly and carefully written—with research of authors, with meditation, with great attention to the style—yet essay-like, various, and free as epistles. I call them vacations, to intimate that they are the fruits of moments withdrawn from the main of life's idle business, and the performances of a mind, whose chief energies are otherwise exercised. The subjects are to be so various as to include all things of which I read or think con amore, and they are to be tasks, too, for reviving, re-arranging, and increasing the acquisitions I have made. My first business is to prepare an introductory and explanatory paper for the public,—as this is for myself,—and then to settle something like a course of the subjects themselves. Such a course it will be indispensable to prescribe, nearly impossible to adhere to. Single topics are more easily indicated. The Greek orators before Lysias and Isocrates,—Demosthenes, Æschines, Thucydides, the Odyssey, Tacitus, Juvenal, Pope—supply them at once; Rhetoric, conservatism of the bar, my unpublished orations, the times, politics, reminiscences—suggest others—Cicero and Burke, Tiberius in Tacitus, and Suetonius, and De Quincey,—but why enumerate? The literature of this century, to the death of Scott or Moore—so grand, rich, and passionate.”—

[The succeeding sheets are missing. Some of these subjects he wrought into his lectures.]

“I have at last hit upon a plan for the thorough study of the history of the Constitution, which I hope may advance all my objects,—the thorough acquisition of the facts; the vivid reproduction of the eventful age; the rhetorical expression and exhibition of the whole. I shall compose a succession of speeches, supposed to have been made in Congress, in conventions, or in assemblies of the people, in the period of from 1783 to the adoption of the Constitution, in which shall be embodied the facts, the reasonings, and the whole scheme of opinions and of policy, of the time. I select a speaker and a subject; and I make his discussion, or the discussion of his antagonist, revive and paint the actual political day on which he speaks. My first subject is the resolution of April, 1783, — recommending to the States to vest in Congress the power of imposing certain duties for raising revenue to pay the debt of the war. To prepare for this debate I read Pitkin, Marshall, Life of Hamilton, and above all, Washington's Address to the People of 8 June, 1783, and that of the Committee of Congress.

“Mr. Ellsworth or Mr. Madison or Mr. Hamilton may have introduced the measure; and a review of the past, a survey of the present, a glance toward the future, would be unavoidably interwoven with the mere business-like and necessary exposition of the proposition itself.”

It is evident from the above fragment, that Mr. Choate cherished the purpose of embodying his reflections on various subjects in a series of papers. To this he sometimes jocosely referred in conversation with other members of the bar. He once told Judge Warren that he was going to write a book. “Ah,” said the Judge, “what is it to be?” — “Well,” replied Mr. Choate, “I've got as far as the title-page and a motto.” — “Where are they?” — “The subject is ‘The Lawyer's Vacation,’ the motto — I've forgotten. But I shall show that the lawyer's vacation is the space between the question put to a witness and his answer!”

The following seems to be an essay towards a title and introduction to some such work:—

"VACATIONS.

"BY A MEMBER OF THE BAR OF MASSACHUSETTS.

"Paululum itinere decedere, non intempestivis amcenitatibus, admonemur. — PLINY.

"ADVERTISEMENT.

"The vacations of the Massachusetts, and I suppose of the general American Bar, are not certain stated and considerable seasons in which a lawyer may turn his office-key, and ramble away, without reclamation or reproval, to lake and prairie, and 'beyond the diminished sea;' or resign himself, with an absolute abandonment of successive weeks, to those thoughts and studies of a higher mood, by which soul and body might be sooner and longer rested and recreated. They are, rather, divers infinitely minute particles of time, — half-hours before breakfast, or after dinner, Saturdays at evening, intervals between the going out of one client and the coming in of another; blessed, rare, fortuitous days, when no Court sits, nor Referee, nor Master in Chancery, nor Commissioner, nor Judge at Chambers, nor Legislative Committee, — these snatches and interstitial spaces, moments, literal and fleet, are our vacations.

"How difficult it is to arrest these moments, to aggregate them, to till them as it were, to make them day by day extend our knowledge, refine our tastes, accomplish our whole culture! — how much more difficult to turn them to any large account in the way of scholarship and authorship, 'sowing them,' as Jeremy Taylor has said, 'with that which shall grow up to crowns and sceptres,' — all members of the profession of the law have experienced, and all others may well understand! That they afford time enough, if wisely used, for 'the exercises and direct actions of religion,' for much domestic and social enjoyment, for many forms of tasteful amusements, for some desultory reading, and much undetected and unproductive reverie, I gratefully acknowledge. But for studies out of the law, — studies, properly so described, either recondite or elegant, and still more for the habit and the faculty of literary writing, — they are too brief and too interrupted; gifts, too often, to a spirit and a frame too much worn or depressed or occupied, to employ or appreciate them.

“It was in such moments, gathered of many years, that these papers were written. They are fruits, often, or always, ‘harsh and crude,’ of a lawyer’s vacations. They stand in need, therefore, of every degree of indulgence; and I think I could hardly have allowed myself to produce them at all, if I had not been willing that others should know that the time which I have withheld from society, from the pursuit of wealth, from pleasure, and latterly from public affairs, has not been idle or misspent; non otiosa vita; nec desidiosa occupatio.”

CHAPTER VII.

1850.

Change of Partnership — Voyage to Europe — Letters to Mrs. Choate — Journal.

IN 1849 Mr. Choate terminated his professional connection with B. F. Crowninshield, Esq. It had lasted for fifteen years, with a confidence so entire and unbroken, that during the whole time no formal division of the income of the office was ever made, nor had there arisen between them, on this account, the slightest disagreement. He now took into partnership his son-in-law, Joseph M. Bell, Esq., and removed from Court Street to 7½ Tremont Row, a quarter then nearly unoccupied by members of the profession. Here he remained till the autumn of 1856, when he again removed to more commodious rooms in a new building in Court Street.

In the summer of 1850, he gratified a long-cherished wish by a voyage to Europe. So constant had been his occupation, so unremitting his devotion to the law, hardly allowing him a week's vacation during the year, that, at last, the strain became too great, and he felt compelled to take a longer rest than would be possible at home. He sailed in the Steamship Canada on the 29th of June, in company with his brother-in-law, Hon. Joseph Bell. They visited England, Belgium, France, a part of Germany and Switzerland, and returned home in September. Fortunately, he kept a brief journal, which, with a few letters, will indicate the objects which proved most attractive to him. He was kindly received in England by those to whom he had letters, and, during the few weeks he was in the country, saw as much as possible of English life, and of interesting places.

TO MRS. CHOATE.

“JUNE 30, 1850. 12 o'clock. At Sea.

“DEAR H., — We have had a very pleasant run so far, and are to reach Halifax at night, — say six to ten. I do not suppose I have been sea-sick, but I have had that headache and sickness which usually follows a very hard trial, and have just got out of my berth, to which I had retreated ignominiously from the breakfast-table. After I get wholly over this, I hope I shall be better than ever. So far I don't regret coming, but oh! take care of every thing, — the house, — the books, — your own health and happiness. . . . To tell the truth, I am scarcely able to write more, but with best, best, best love, I go again to my berth. Mr. Bell is writing at my side, and grows better every moment. This letter I shall mail at Halifax, — where I shall not land, however, as we touch in the night. God bless you all. Farewell again.”

TO MRS. CHOATE.

“LIVERPOOL, 7th and 8th July, 1850.

“DEAR H. AND DEAR CHILDREN, — We arrived here yesterday, 7th July, Sunday morning, at about eight o'clock, and I am quite comfortably set down at the Waterloo Hotel, — a stranger in a strange land. Yesterday, Sunday, after breakfasting upon honey, delicious strawberries, &c., &c., I went to church, — St. George's, — and heard the best church service music I ever heard, and then tried to rest. To-day Mr. Bell and I have been running all over Liverpool, and to-morrow we go to London. Most of the passage over I was very sick. Two days I lay still in my berth; the rest of the time I crept about, — rather low. But the whole voyage was very pleasant and very prosperous, and, I suppose, at no period dangerous. One vast and grim iceberg we saw, — larger than the whole block of buildings composing Park Street, — and I saw the spouting of whales, but no whales themselves. The transition, yesterday, from a rocking ship and all the smells of the sea to the hotel, was sweet indeed. I don't know how I shall like England, — and how I shall stay till October. Sometimes my heart droops. But our course will be this, — to stay now a fortnight in London, then go a fortnight to the Continent, and then spend the whole of the rest of our time in England and Scotland. More of all this we shall learn to-morrow, or soon, at London. . . . My heart swells to think of you all, and of my dear, poor library. Take good care of that. Write every thing to me. . . . My heart is at home. Miss G. got along very well, — a little pale and sad. All England is in mourning for Sir R. Peel. How awful! One of my letters was to him, whom I am never to see. I have lived so much at home, that I don't know how I shall go along — or go alone. But if we all meet again, what signifies it? Write by every boat. . . . Tell the news — the news. Remember I can give you no idea by letters of all I see, but if I come home you shall hear of 'My Lord, Sir Harry and the Captain' till you are tired. Good-by, good-by. It is near three. Mr. B. and I dine at that hour. Bless you — bless you."

TO MRS. CHOATE.

"LONDON, Friday, July 12.

"DEAR H. AND DEAR CHILDREN, — We are in London you see, — at Fenton's Hotel, St. James's Street, and very pleasantly off for rooms and all things. I have not yet delivered my letters, but we have been everywhere and walked so much, and seen so much, that I am to-day almost beat out. . . . Thus far I have stopped nowhere, examined nothing, seen nobody, but just wandered, wandered everywhere, — floating on a succession of memories, reveries, dreams of London. . . . I think we shall hurry to the Continent sooner than we intended, perhaps in a week. This will depend on how our London occupations hold out. I cannot particularize, but thus far, London, England, exceed in interest all I had expected. From Liverpool across, all is a garden,—green fields, woods, cottages, as in pictures,—here and there old Gothic spires, towers, and every other picturesque and foreign-looking aspect. The country is a deep dark green; the buildings look as in engravings and pictures, and all things so strangely mixed of reality and imagination that I have not been able to satisfy myself whether I am asleep or awake. But London!—the very first afternoon after riding two hundred miles, we rushed into St. James's Park,—a large, beautiful opening,—saw Buckingham Palace, the Queen's city residence,—went to Westminster Abbey, whose bell was tolling for the death of the Duke of Cambridge,—went to the Thames and looked from Westminster Bridge towards St. Paul's, whose dome hung like a balloon in the sky. Next morning I rose at six, and before eight had seen Charing Cross,—the Strand,—Temple Bar, an arch across it on which traitors' heads were suspended or fixed,—Fleet Street, where Sam Johnson used to walk and suffer,—St. Dunstan's church, of which I think we read in the 'Fortunes of Nigel,'—and none can tell what not. Last evening I went to the opera, and heard, in the 'Tempest,' Sontag and Lablache, and, in 'Anna Bolena,' Pasta,—the most magnificent theatre, audience, music, I ever heard or saw. Yet Sontag and Pasta, especially Pasta, are past their greatest reputation. . . . I am quite well. I die, when I think how you and the girls would enjoy all. Bless you. Good-by. R. C."

TO MRS. CHOATE.

"LONDON, Friday, July 13.

"DEAR H. AND DEAR CHILDREN,—We are to start to-day for Paris and our tour of the Continent. We shall get to Paris to-morrow eve, and thence our course will be guided by circumstances. But we expect to be here again by the middle or last of August, to renew our exploration of England and Scotland. Thus far, except that I am tired to death of seeing sights and persons, and late hours, I have been very well. One day of partial sick-headache is all I have had yet. But the fatigue of a day, and of a week of mere sight-seeing is extreme, though not like that of business, —and the late hours of this city, to me, who sometimes used to lose myself as early as nine or ten, are no joke. I have not more than three times been in bed till twelve or one, and up again at seven or eight. It is now five o'clock in the morning. Expecting to come back to London so soon, I have not tried to see it all, but have found it growing daily on my hands. We attended church at the Foundling Hospital last Sunday, where some five hundred to one thousand charity children, in uniform dress, performed the responses. The organ was Handel's own, and the sight and the music, and the march of the children to their dinner were most pleasant to see and hear. I have been as much amazed at the British Museum as at any thing. It is a vast building, one part of which, divided into a great number of departments, is full of all manner of curiosities, — statuary, antiquities, specimens of natural history, every thing, — and the other is the transcendent Library. This last I have spent much time in. The catalogue alone fills two hundred or three hundred volumes. The rooms are wide, high, of the size of Faneuil Hall, almost, and lined with books to the ceiling. One single room is three hundred feet long, and full. The Temple is a most sweet spot too, — a sort of college, enclosing a beautiful large area or garden, which runs to, and along, the Thames, secluded and still in the heart of the greatest city of earth. There Nigel was, before returning to Alsatia.

“We dined at Mr. Lawrence's pleasantly, and I spent a delightful evening at Mr. Bunsen's, the Prussian minister. The house belongs to his government, and is a palace; rooms large and high. It was not a large party, — chiefly for music, which was so so, Prussian chiefly, by ladies and gentlemen of the party. I have been at Lord Ashburton's, Lord Lonsdale's, and Mr. Macaulay's, and am to go to Lord Ashburton's in Devonshire, when we come back. The deaths of the Duke of Gloucester and Sir R. Peel, and the lateness of the season, somewhat check the course of mere society; but I have been most politely received, and more than I expected gratified by the mere personnel of London. Lord Ashburton's house is a palace too, full of pictures, though all in confusion on the eve of his departure for his summer seat. The country is the grand passion of such persons. Mr. Macaulay told me they would sell any house they own in town for its money value, but their country seats nothing could take from them. . . . I wish J. would ascertain the latest day to which my causes in the S. J. C. can be postponed, and write very particularly which must come on, and at what times, doing his best to have all go over till October, if possible.

“The confession of Professor Webster has just arrived. The cause is as well known here as there. It of course cannot save him.¹ Mr. Coolidge has helped us to a capital

¹ It is understood that Mr. Choate was earnestly solicited to defend Dr. Webster, and was offered what was then considered a very liberal fee for the service. He was unwilling to undertake it, and argued with the attorneys of Professor Webster to prove that he was not the best man. I am permitted, by the courtesy of his Honor Judge Neilson, to take from the papers which he has furnished to the “Albany Law Journal” the interesting statements furnished by Edward Ellerton Pratt, Esq. (a son-in-law of Mr. Choate), and the Hon. Otis P. Lord, one of the judges of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. Mr. Pratt says:—

“Mr. Franklin Dexter, one of the leaders of the bar of New England, was greatly interested in Professor Webster’s case, believed that he was innocent, and was persistently earnest that Mr. Choate should defend him on that ground. The Hon. Charles Sumner, also holding that view, urged Mr. Choate to undertake the defence, as he expressed it, ‘in the interest of humanity,’ and was quite angry with him for refusing. At that time the testimony taken before the coroner was known; that taken by the grand jury by whom the indictment had been found was not publicly known. The question of the Professor’s guilt or innocence was the absorbing topic, and the excitement in all classes of society was intense.

“Mr. Dexter was determined to secure Mr. Choate’s services, and, after much study of the case, called upon him by appointment, one evening, to lay before him what he called its merits. Mr. Choate listened to him, as a juror might have done, for nearly three hours, and, as he afterward told me, it was one of the most vigorous and persuasive arguments he had ever heard. That estimate may well be accepted, when we remember Mr. Dexter’s admitted ability, his friendship for Professor Webster, and his belief that if Mr. Choate could be secured as counsel, the accused man might be saved.

“The argument, which had been listened to without question or interruption, having closed, Mr. Choate walked up and down his library several times, and then, pausing before Mr. Dexter, who was keenly observing him, said, ‘Brother Dexter, how do you answer this question, and this?’ I cannot state the points thus presented, but my general recollection is that those questions presented inherent servant, and was most polite and kind; so are all from whom we had any right to look for any thing. And yet if I were difficulties underlying the defence. Mr. Dexter, as if transfixed, sat musing deeply, his head bent upon his hand, for several minutes, and, finally, as if hopeless of finding an answer, and seeking relief, he rose suddenly and said, 'Brother Choate, have you read ——'s book? If not, do so, and you will find it charming.' Mr. Choate accepted his changed mood, parted from him soon after with a kindly expression of interest, and the subject was never alluded to afterward between them.

"I had these details partly from Mrs. Choate and partly from Mr. Dexter. The time which has elapsed since then is so long, nearly thirty years, that I can only give this general statement."

Judge Lord says:—

"I had a conversation with Mr. Choate on this subject. It was more than twenty years ago, and, of course, it is impossible to reproduce precisely his language, but the interview was substantially this: I said to Mr. Choate: 'Is it true that you refused to defend Professor Webster?' to which his reply was, not in direct terms, but by implication, that he did not absolutely refuse, but that they did not want him. Pausing for a while, he added: 'There was but one way to try that case. When the attorney-general was opening his case to the jury, and came to the discussion of the identity of the remains found in the furnace with those of Dr. Parkman, the prisoner's counsel should have arisen, and, begging pardon for the interruption, should have said, substantially, that in a case of this importance, of course, counsel had no right to concede any point, or make any admission, or fail to require proof, and then have added: "But we desire the attorney-general to understand, upon the question of these remains, that the struggle will not be there! But, assuming that Dr. Parkman came to his death within the laboratory on that day, we desire the government to show whether it was by visitation of God, or whether, in an attack made by the deceased upon the prisoner, the act was done in self-defence, or whether it was the result of a violent altercation." Possibly the idea of murder may be suggested, but not with more reason than apoplexy, or other form of sudden death. As the prisoner himself cannot speak, the real controversy will probably be narrowed to the alternative of justifiable homicide in self-defence, or manslaughter by reason of sudden altercation.'"¹

¹ It is said that the attorney-general was prepared, if homicide were admitted, at once to prove intent, previous purpose. The defence was, undoubtedly, very much hampered by the headstrong conduct of the prisoner himself.

asked if I have ever been as happy as I am every day and hour at home, at talk with you all, in my poor dear library, I could not truly say I have. But even home will be, I hope, the pleasanter for the journey.

“Having said this, he added: ‘But Professor Webster would not listen to any such defence as that,’ accompanying the statement with language tending to show that the proposed defence was rejected both by the accused and his friends and advisers.

“He then said that the only difficulty in that defence was to explain the subsequent conduct of Dr. Webster, and proceeded with a remarkable and subtle analysis of the motives of men, and the influences which govern their conduct, to show that the whole course of the accused after the death could be explained by a single mistake as to the expediency of disclosing what had happened instantly; that hesitation or irresolution, or the decision: ‘I will not disclose this,’ adhered to for a brief half hour, might, by the closing in of circumstances around him, have compelled all that followed. Having concealed the occurrence, he was obliged to dispose of the remains, and would do so in the manner suggested, and with the facilities afforded by his professional position. He concluded: ‘It would have been impossible to convict Dr. Webster of murder with that admission.’

“I suggested to him that the possession of his note by Dr. Webster, as paid, was an awkward fact. He said: ‘Yes, but it might seem to become a necessity after his first false step of concealment.’ He added: ‘Dr. Parkman was known to have been at the hospital. When, how soon, and under what circumstances, and to explain what statements made by him, he thought it expedient to say he had paid the note, or to obtain the possession of it, would never appear. It was simply an incident, whose force could be parried, if he could obtain credit for the position that the concealment was a sudden and impulsive afterthought which took possession of, and controlled him in all his subsequent conduct.’”

“We have in these statements,” says Judge Neilson, “the desired testimony touching Mr. Choate’s attitude in respect to that most important case. It is apparent from them that, while accepting the theory that a lawyer is at liberty to withhold his services absolutely in a criminal case, he yet did not think him bound to go into court contrary to his own conscientious convictions to assert what he does not believe to be true, or to take a line of defence which he conceives to be futile or unjust. His refusal to appear, as explained by these gentlemen, is consistent with the practice which, as a humane man and self-sacrificing counsellor, he exemplified throughout life, and is in keeping with the doctrine of an advocate’s duty as asserted by Erskine and others.”

“ Good-by, all dear ones. We go to Dover to-night, starting at one. It draws near to breakfast, and I must go to packing. Bless you all. Give my love to Mrs. B. and all inquirers. R. C.”

TO MRS. CHOATE.

“ PARIS, Thursday, 24th July.

“ DEAR H., — I was delighted to get your letter yesterday, though struck speechless to learn, at the moment of receiving it from the banker, that President Taylor is dead. I hardly credit it yet, though it is as certain as it is surprising. Better for him perhaps, but what an overthrow of others, — the cabinet, the party, and all things.

“ We got here Saturday night, and have been — I have — in a real dream ever since. Nothing yet seen is in the least degree to be compared with Paris, for every species of interest. Every spot of which you read in the history of the Revolution and the times of Napoleon, over and above all that belongs to it historically, is a thousand times more beautiful and more showy than I had dreamed. I saw the Tuileries by moonlight, Saturday evening, from the garden of the Tuileries. This garden — I should think it larger, with the Champs Elysées certainly, than a dozen of our Commons — is a delightful wood, with paths, fountains, statues, busts, at every turn, — quiet, though a million of people seemed walking in it, with soldiers here and there to keep order. It stretches along from the Tuileries to a clearing called the Place de la Concorde, an open area where are fountains, and the great Egyptian obelisk. Then you reach the Champs Elysées, also wooded, not so close or quiet, — then come to the Arch of Triumph, a prodigious structure on which are inscribed the names of Napoleon’s victories. . . . Notre Dame is a majestic old church, 500 or 1,000 years old, as grand as Westminster Abbey, — and the Madeleine a glorious new Greek Temple church. . . . We went yesterday to Versailles, the most striking spot of earth out of Rome, — one enormous palace, full of innumerable great rooms, halls, museums, full of statues and pictures. We were in the bedroom and boudoir of Marie Antoinette, and Louis XVI., not usually opened. The most striking place I have seen, of which I never had heard, is a beautiful chapel built over the spot where Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette were first privately buried. There they lay 21 years and then were removed to St. Denis, but then this chapel was built. It has two groups, — the king, an angel supporting him, and the queen, similarly supported, — in marble. I touched the place where they were buried. We start to-morrow for Brussels, Cologne, the Rhine, and Switzerland. — Best, best love to all.

R. C.

“Take care of my library, — dearer than the Bibliothèque du Roi, — though smaller!”

JOURNAL OF MR. CHOATE.

“Saturday, 29th June, 1850.

“ON BOARD THE CANADA.

“I never promised myself nor any one else to attempt a diary of any part of the journey on which I have set out, still less of the first, most unpleasant, and most unvaried, part of it, — the voyage. But these hours, too, must be arrested and put to use. These days also are each a life. ‘Let me be taught to number them then’ — lest, seeking health, I find idleness, ennui, loss of interest — more than the allotted and uncontrollable influence of time, on the faculties and the curiosity.

“These affectionate aids, too, of my wife and daughters — pen, ink, and beautiful paper — at once suggest and prescribe some use of them. Such a claim, now less than ever, would I disallow.

“So I will try to make the briefest record of the barren outward time, and try also to set myself to some daily task of profit. My first three days, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, were grasped from me by a sick-headache of the Court House, aggravated, changed, by the sickness of the sea. The first day and night and the second day till after dinner were one fearful looking-for of the inevitable consequences of my last laborious fortnight. Ship or shore, I should have had it. It came, is gone, and for the first time, to-day, I feel like myself, and to be well, I hope, for a month more.

“Meantime we have run up the New England coast, touched at Halifax, and are coming fast abreast of our last land, — Cape Race. They expect to pass it to-day at 6 P.M., and the east wind and incumbent fog announce the vicinity of the inhospitable coast and the Great Bank. I understand the passage of Cape Race is reckoned the last peril of the voyage, at this season — till we make the Irish shores. We all share the anxiety and appreciate the vigilance of the pilotage, which is on the look-out for this crisis. Under the circumstances, it infers little danger at least. Thus far, till this morning, day and night have been bright. Sun, moon, and stars have been ours, — and the wind fair and fresh. We have generally carried sail, often studding sails. The sea has been smooth too, for ocean; yet breathing ever, — life-full, playing with us, — the serene face of waves smiling on us. To-day, is some change. Wind east; — dead ahead, — a low, cold, damp fog, brooding for ever and for ever in these regions of the meeting of the warm and cold tides. On we go still, every sail furled close — eleven miles an hour. I remark our northing, in the diminished power of the clearest sunbeam and in the cool air, and our easting in the loss of my watch's time. The sun comes to the meridian an hour sooner than in Boston. We are taking our meridian lunch, while our dear friends hear their parlor and kitchen clocks strike eleven. For the rest, it is a vast sentient image of water all around. We have seen three or four sail daily, — parcel of the trade of England to her northern colonies; — and a mackerel fisherman or two; and with these exceptions, we are alone in the desert.

“Our ship is a man-of-war, for size, quiet, and discipline; the passengers a well-behaved general set; my accommodations excellent. Hæc hæctenus.

“I have come away without a book but the Bible and Prayer-Book and ‘Daily Food,’ and I sigh for the sweet luxuries of my little library μικρόν τε φίλον τε.

“Yet am I resolved not to waste this week ‘in ineptiis,’ and I mean to know more at the end of it than I know now. I will commit one morsel in the ‘Daily Food’ daily, and have to-day, that of 29th June. To this, I mean to add a page at least of French, and two pages of ‘Half-hours with Best Authors,’ with Collectanea, ut possim.

“Liverpool. — Alas! on that very Saturday evening, my real sea-sickness set in, pursued me till Thursday, then followed languor, restlessness, and all the unprofitable and unavailing resolving of such a state of the mind left to itself on board a vessel. The result is, that the rest of my voyage was lost, except so far as it has quite probably prepared me for better health and fresher sensations on shore.

“We passed Cape Race on Saturday evening in thick fog, and very close, nearer I suppose to a point of it,—the projecting termination of a cove, into which we ran, which we coasted, and out of which we had to steer by a total change of course,—nearer than we designed. To see it, for departure, was indispensable almost, and that done we steered assured and direct towards Cape Clear in Ireland. Then followed two or three days of fog and one or two more of a quite rough sea. But we have had no gale of wind, and on Friday night we entered the Irish Channel and ascended it till about 5 P.M., by science only, when we saw the first land since our departure one week before from the S. E. cape of Newfoundland. What we saw were islands on the coast of Wales, or mountains of Wales, or both. We came up toward Liverpool as far as the bar would permit, last eve, anchored or waited for tide, and came to our dock at about 8 this morning.

“On Sunday afternoon, June 30th, we were called on deck to see an iceberg. It was late in the afternoon, a cold, gross fog incumbent, a dark night at hand, the steamer urging forward at the rate of twelve miles an hour. The iceberg lay slowly floating, I suppose one-fourth of a mile off, getting astern, and was a grand and startling image certainly. It might be in some places fifty, in some one hundred feet from the water, and perhaps three hundred to five hundred yards long, looking like a section of a mountain-top severed horizontally, but ice, ice, suggesting its voyage of thousands of miles perhaps, and its growth of a thousand years, giving us to look directly on the terrible North, present to us in a form of real danger. The Captain professed no fears from such causes, and under the admirable vigilance of his command, I suppose there was not much. One day we saw porpoises, as in the Sound, and I saw twice vast sheets of water thrown up by the spouting of the whale, although himself I did not see.

“Enough. The voyage is over. Brief, prosperous, yet tedious. And now I am to address myself to the business of my journey. I have come to the Waterloo House, to a delicious breakfast, including honey, strawberries—a snug, clean room and the luxuries of purification and rest. I have traversed a street or two, enough to recognize the Old World

I am in. I am beginning to admit and feel the impression of England. The high latitude, deep green of tree and land, clouded sky, cool, damp air; the plain, massive and enduring construction of fort, dock, store, and houses, dark, large, brick or stone, instantaneously strike. Thus far it seems gloomy, heavy, yet rich, strong, deep, a product of ages for ages. Yet I have not looked at any individual specimen of antiquity, grandeur, power, or grace. I have attended service at St. George's for want of knowing where to go. The music was admirable, forming a larger part than in the American Episcopal Service, and performed divinely. The sermon was light, and the delivery cold, sing-song, on the character of David.

“And now to some plan of time and movement for England. Before breakfast I shall walk at least an hour observantly, and on returning jot down any thing worth it. This hour is for exercise, however. I mean next to read every day a passage in the Bible, a passage in the Old and in the New Testament, beginning each, and to commit my ‘Daily Food.’ Then, I must carefully look at the papers, for the purpose of thoroughly mastering the actual English and European public and daily life, and this will require jotting down, the debates, the votes, chiefly. Then I must get, say half an hour a day, for Greek and Latin and elegant English. For this purpose, I must get me an Odyssey and Crusius, and a Sallust, and some single book of poems or prose, say Wordsworth. This, lest taste should sleep and die, for which no compensations shall pay!

“For all the rest, I mean to give it heartily, variously, to what travel can teach, — men — opinions — places, — with great effort to be up to my real powers of acquiring and imparting. This journey shall not leave me where it finds me. Better, stronger, knowing more. One page of some law-book daily, I shall read. That I must select to-morrow too.

“Friday, 12th July. — I must write less, but more regularly, or the idea of a journal must be abandoned. Tuesday I came to London, a beautiful day, through a beautiful land, leaving an image, a succession of images, ineffaceable. That which strikes most is the universal cultivation, the deep, live, fresh green on all things, the hedge-fences, the cottages small and brick, the absence of barns, and the stacks of hay out of doors, the excellent station constructions, the Gothic spires and castles here and there among trees, identifying the scene and telling something of the story. The railroad was less smooth than the Lowell, at least the car ran less smoothly. Here and there women were at work in the fields. I know not how rich was the land. I saw no, or not much, waste, and the main aspect was of a nearly universal and expensive culture.

“ We passed through Tamworth, and saw at a distance a flag at half-mast from a tower. It was the day of Sir Robert Peel’s funeral, of which, however, we saw nothing. Tuesday eve, Wednesday, and yesterday I rambled, and to-day have lain still. I ran this way and that, like a boy, seeking everywhere and finding everywhere some name and place made classical by English literary or general history, and have brought off a general, vague, yet grand impression of London, with no particulars of knowledge. The parks are sweet spots, quiet and airy, but plain. Green Park, at least, was partially dotted by flocks of sheep. Buckingham Palace, name apart, does not strike much more than the Capitol or President’s house. Westminster Abbey externally is sublime. The new Parliament House will be showy.

“ I heard a cause partially opened to a committee of Lords; another partially argued to the jury in the Exchequer; and another partially argued to the Lord Commissioners. The A. G. [Attorney-general] Jervis, [Sir John Jervis,] and Mr. Cockburn, [Alexander E. Cockburn,] open respectively for and versus Pate, for striking the Queen. There was no occasion for much exertion or display, and there was nothing of either. Mr. Cockburn had the manner of Franklin Dexter before the committee. Mr. Marten seemed animated and direct in a little Exchequer jury cause. Pate would have been acquitted in Massachusetts. The English rule is,—knowledge, or want of it, that the act is wrong. The prisoner’s counsel, in my judgment, gave up his case by conceding; he feared he should fail. I thought and believed he might have saved him. The chief judge presiding, Alderson, [Sir E. H. Alderson,] offended me. He is quick, asks many questions, sought unfavorable replies, repeats what he puts down as the answer, abridged and inadequate. The whole trial smacked of a judiciary, whose members, bench and bar, expect promotion from the Crown. Their doctrine of insanity is scandalous. Their treatment of medical evidence, and of the informations of that science, scandalous.

“ One thing struck me. All seemed to admit that the prisoner was so far insane as to make whipping improper! yet that he was not so insane as not to be guilty. Suppose him tried for murder, how poor a compromise!

“The question on handwriting was ‘do you believe it to be his?’ after asking for knowledge. Opening the pleadings is useless, except to the court, and is for the court. The counsel interrogating from a brief; leads in interrogation, being very much on uncontested matter. It saves time and is not quarrelled with. The speaker is at too great a distance from the jury. Their voices are uncommonly pleasant; pronunciation odd, affected, yet impressing you as that of educated persons. Some, Mr. Humphry, Mr. Cockburn, occasionally hesitated for a word. All narrated drily; not one has in the least impressed me by point, force, language, power; still less, eloquence or dignity. The wig is deadly. The Exchequer Jury Sittings were in Guildhall as were the C. C. Pleas. Pate was tried at the Old Bailey. The rooms are small, — never all full. Mr. Byles was in one ins. cause in C. C. Pleas.

“Last eve, I heard Sontag and Lablache in La Tempeta and saw the faded Pasta. I returned late, and am sick to-day, a little. Bought Kühner’s Edition of the Tusculan Questions. Mr. Bates called and made some provision for our amusement.

“I read Bible, Prayer-book, a page of Bishop Andrews’s Prayers, a half-dozen lines of Virgil and Homer, and a page of Williams’s Law of Real Property.”

THE CONTINENT.

“July 19, Friday. — Left London for Folkestone, whence across to Boulogne — a cloudy day terminating in copious rain — through which the deep green of English landscape looked gloomy and uniform. At Folkestone, which is a few miles S. W. of Dover, just built up to be a terminus point of transit of railroad and steamboat line to France, found our — for the present — last English hotel, clean bedrooms, abundance of water, and all other appointments, and all well administered and soundly exacting.

“Saturday. — We passed in the steamboat to Boulogne, breakfasted at B. and came to Paris, arriving at six. The passage across the Channel was on a foggy, rainy morning, showing that renowned water drearily and indistinctly, and a little darkening our first experience of France. Numerous vessels, from small fishermen of both coasts to large merchant ships, were in view, however, and I recalled, with Mr. Prescott, the occasions when Roman, Saxon, Danish, and Dutch keels had ploughed it, the old intercourse of France and Scotland, the voyage of Mary, the descents of the Henrys and Edwards, and the cruise of so many great fleets, in so many and such various fortunes of England and France. Mr. P. told me of Lockhart, who interested him deeply, thinks freely, despises the Bishops, utters brilliant sarcasms, lives retired, sad, and independent. Deaths of the loved, the bad character of a living child, with other unexplained causes, are supposed to cause it. He saw at L's. the MSS. of 'Rob Roy,' the first hundred pages covered with second thoughts — then all working itself consummate by the first effort. He related sarcasms of Rogers, sneers at the Bishop of Oxford, Wilberforce — the incredible touching and altering, by which the historic sheet of Macaulay at last is brought to its perfection; — the great narrowness of all male and female Church adherents, — the mendacious reputation of Lord B., telling an audience at Harrow, his father and grandfather were educated there, every man, woman, and child knowing better. By the time we were ready to leave Boulogne the sun came out, and our ride to Paris was lighted by a sweet, glowing summer's day. I must say I was delighted with the country. Part of our way was quite on the seashore, as far as Abbeville, thence more inland, and the last three to five hours lay through whole prairies of fields ripe with wheat. 'Till now I had no conception of the wheat culture of France, nor of the affluent and happy aspect with which the wheat harvest, when nodding, yellow, over level plains, up the sides and to the tops of hills, through patches of trees, five miles to six or seven in extent on each side, for a distance of fifty miles, robes a country. Why, France, if all like this, could feed Europe. A few vineyards were interspersed here and there; chateaux in the distance and the towers of cathedrals, with men and women at work in the fields, completed the scene. Ah, how absurd, yet common, to think of Paris only as France, and the Deputies only as Paris. How English media refract and tinge. The cars were the best I ever saw, and the whole railroad administration, rapid and in all things excellent. I am come to Hôtel Canterbury. Of Paris from the station I avoided seeing much, but could not wholly lose the narrow street and vast height of houses and want of wealth in shop-windows. After dinner, at nine in the evening, by moonlight, I first saw Paris. I walked down through the Place Vendôme, looked on the column cast of cannon, towering gloomy, grim, storied, surmounted by Napoleon, recognized even so, and in three minutes stood in the Gardens, before the structure of the Tuileries. This scene, this moment, are ineffaceable for ever! Some soldiers in uniform, with muskets bayoneted, marched to and fro near the entrance. Hundreds, thousands — men, women, and children — were walking in the Garden, in paths beneath a wood, extending, so far as I could see, without limit; lights twinkled in it here and there; vases, statues, reposed all around; fountains were playing, and before me stretched the vast front of the Tuileries, the tricolor hanging motionless on its dome, the moonlight sleeping peacefully and sweetly on the scene of so much glory, so much agony — a historic interest so transcendent. I did not go to the Seine, nor seek for definite ideas of locality, or extent; but gave myself to a dream of France, ‘land of glory and love.’ Far, far to the west, I remarked an avenue extending indefinitely, — along whose sides, at what seemed an immense distance, twinkled parallel lines of lights. I did not then know that it ran to the Place de la Concorde — the Obelisk — and thence on, on, becoming the Avenue of the Champs Élysées — and so to the Arch at last. That I learned the next morning.

“22d. — It is now Monday morning. I have not been out to-day yet. But yesterday I saw and entered Notre Dame and the Madeleine — glorious specimens of diverse styles — pure Gothic and Greek. Notre Dame impresses as a mere structure, as much as Westminster Abbey. It is cruciform. At the west end rise two vast towers, lofty, and elaborately finished — telling of a thousand years. Between these you enter and are in the nave. Thence you may wander through ranges of pillars from which the pure Gothic arch is springing, mark along the sides the numerous chapels in recesses, observe the two vast circular windows of the transept, and look up to the ceiling rising as a firmament above you. No statues or tablets of the dead are here. Pictures of sacred subjects on the walls, worshippers here and there, the appointments of the Papal service, — the grand, unshared, unmodified character of a mere cathedral is on it all. The Madeleine is a beautiful Greek temple, showy and noble. The Boulevards terminate there — thence running I know not how far — a vast, broad street with thousands of both sexes walking, sitting outside of cafés, drinking coffee, wine, &c., the whole lined by miles of shops, cafés, and other places of public resort — glittering and full.

“Monday, 22d July. — This morning I am to begin a more detailed observation of Paris.”

“Basle, 2d August, Friday. — A day of rain and a headache compel or excuse my lying by till to-morrow, and so I avail myself of an undesired and unexpected opportunity to recall some of the sights that have been crowded into the last fortnight. Left Paris Friday eve, July 26, for Brussels, to which point we came to breakfast — visited Waterloo, and next morning started for Cologne where we arrived at sunset. On Monday went to Bonn and passed the afternoon and night, — making, however, an excursion to the top of Drachenfels. Thus far our journey was by rail. The next morning we embarked on the Rhine in the steamer Schiller, and ascended to Wiesbaden, arriving, by aid of a quarter or half an hour in an omnibus, at nine o'clock. On Wednesday we came by rail to Kehl opposite and four miles from Strasburg, glancing at Frankfurt, and spending three hours at Heidelberg. Yesterday we crossed to Strasburg, — visited the Cathedral, and came by rail to Basle in season for dinner at the table d'hôte. And now what from all this? I shall remember with constant interest Paris, and shall extend my acquaintance with the language, literature, and history of the strange and beautiful France. Besides what I have already recorded, I attended a sitting of the Chamber of Deputies — an assembly of good-looking men — not just then doing any thing of interest — most interesting, however, as the government, and the exponent and multifarious representation of the political and social opinions and active organ of a great nation. M. Berryer I saw, and Eugene Sue, and M. Molé. M. Guizot I saw afterwards in the steamer Schiller, going up from Bonn. He left the boat at Coblenz. Two or three deputies spoke to a most freezing inattention. They ‘got the floor’ in their seats, then went to the tribune, laid their MSS. at their side — and went to it as we lecture at Lyceums. Great animation — much gesture — a constant rising inflection at the end of periods before the final close of the sentence — an occasional look at the MSS. and pull at the tumbler of water — some pausings at the noise of inattention — this is all I could appreciate. The courts of law pleased me too. The judges in cloaks or robes of black, with capes, — quiet, thoughtful, and dignified; the advocate in a cloak and bare-headed, debating with animation, and no want of dignity — the dress and manners far better than the English bar. The silk gown or cloak is graceful and fit, and might well have been (it is too late now) among the costumes of our bar.

“ This was all I saw of the mind of France in political or executive action. The impression I brought from them was of great respect. In this I can say nothing of the opinions or wisdom of anybody. The chamber seemed full of energy, quickness, spirit, capacity. The courts grave, dignified, among forms, and in halls, of age, solemnity, and impressiveness. Great French names of jurisprudence came to my memory, and I learned to feel new regard for my own profession.

“ The rest of my time I gave to the storied spectacles of Paris. The Louvre, a part of which was closed for repairs, leaving enough to amaze one, — such a wilderness of form, color, posture, — roof, walls, pedestals, alive with old and modern art; Versailles, holding within it the history of the nation of France, tracing in picture and statue its eras, showing forth its glory, breathing and generating an intense nationality, with here and there a small room, a boudoir of Marie Antoinette, or a confessional of Louis Sixteenth, touching a softer and sadder emotion; St. Cloud, of which I saw only the delightful exterior, imperial, grand; the street to Versailles through the Bois de Boulogne; the little chapel over the first burial-place of Louis Sixteenth and Marie Antoinette, full of deepest and saddest interest; the Luxembourg, its deserted chamber of the Senate of Napoleon and the Peers of the Restoration and Louis Philippe’s dynasty, and its glorious gallery of pictures; the Royal Library in which I was disappointed after the British Museum, but where are some old curiosities and a capital statue of Voltaire, — these are of my banquet of three days. I went through the Garden of Plants too, which we should imitate and beat at Washington; the Place de Grève, the site of that guillotine; the Hôtel des Invalides; the Panthéon, disagreeable as a monument to the dead; Père-la-Chaise, which exceeded my expectations, and shows France affectionate and grateful and thoughtful to the loved and lost;

Place Bastille, sacred by its column to the Revolution of 1830, — with interest, and sufficiently.

“The cafés and café dinners are a strict Parisian fact and spectacle, — cooking, service, and appointments, artistical as a theatre. A dinner at the ‘Trois Frères’ is to be remembered. And so adieu to France. We entered on that famous soil again at Strasburg to find ‘Liberté, Egalité, Fraternité,’ graven on every national front, and to mark the quickness, courtesy, and skill with which all things are done. I made the acquaintance of but one inhabitant of Paris out of the hotel, M. Bossange, the bookseller in the Quai Voltaire, polite, kind, and honest, of whom I ordered some books.

“I have seen Paris with any feeling but that of disappointment. I feel no other at least, than that which always attends the substitution of the actual spectacle for the imaginary one which rises on the mind of every reader of an event or description, and which, by a thousand repetitions, becomes the only spectacle which can fill his mind full. I have lost the Tuileries, and Boulevards, and Champs Élysées, and Seine, and Versailles, and St. Cloud, of many years of reading and reverie, — a picture incomplete in details, inaccurate in all things, yet splendid and adequate in the eye of imagination, — and have gained a reality of ground and architecture, accurate, detailed, splendid, impressive, — and I sigh!

“One word is enough for Belgium. Everywhere and instantly you are struck with the vast level yet varied garden of agriculture, through which you ride. Every inch at first seems tilled. Wheat, rye, flax, everywhere, — a wilderness, a prairie, a flood of cultivation. You see, as in France and Germany, few people in the fields, few cottages. It seems to be tilled by night by unseen hands. I gave no time to Brussels, which every guide-book describes, but rode to Waterloo and studied that locality, — a sweet, undulating, vast wheat-field, a spot memorable and awful above all I shall see or have seen. I have now an indelible image, by the aid of which I can read anew the story of that day — the last of the battles! I retain, 1st, the short line along which the two armies were ranged, — say a mile or a mile and a half from wing to wing; 2d, the narrow space of valley between the two lines, the artillery of either posted over against that of the other a quarter or a third of a mile apart; 3d, the inconsiderable, easy ascent from the valley, up to the British ridge; 4th, the sufficiency of the ridge to shelter from the French artillery; 5th, the precise position and aspect of the shattered, pierced, and singed Hougoumont guarded from artillery by its wood, — guarded in its interior citadel by a brilliant and transcendent courage; 6th, La Haye Sainte, taken, retaken, held, on right of centre, from which nothing was reaped; 7th, the place of the terrific attack in which Picton fell, and the place of the later, final attack, now obliterated by the mound. The plan, series, — attacks on Hougoumont and La Haye Sainte, — cannonade to prepare, — charges of cavalry met by squares, charges of infantry met by any thing. The following years undoubtedly yielded richer crops of wheat than before. In some places of burial, by decay, large depressions of earth disclosed themselves.

“I am glad I did not see enough of Liege to correct ‘Quentin Durward,’ and I was glad to leave Brussels and to come upon Rhenish Prussia, and into the valley of the Rhine, all at once. Everywhere from Brussels to Cologne, on all practicable spots, wheat and rye, ripe for the sickle, everywhere the same universal culture, here and there a castle or chateau, or harnessed dog, or unintelligible conversation, reminded me where we were.

“I could have wished to stay a little at Aix-la-Chapelle, historically and actually striking; but on we were whirled; the valley of the Rhine opened, a vast plain with no river yet in sight, groaning under its wheat spread on all sides, and just before coming to the great old gates of Cologne, the river, rapid, majestic, flashed to sight. In half an hour I was in my room at the hotel, and looked down on the river flowing at my very feet within fifty yards of the house, broad and free, under his bridge of boats.

“From that moment to this my journey has been a vision of the Rhine. I have gained new images and knowledge, new materials of memory and thought. The width, rapidity, volume, tone of the river, exceed all my expectations. But the aspects of its shores from Bonn to Coblenz, and its whole valley again from Wiesbaden to Strasburg! — the scenery so diverse; plain, hill, crag, mountain, vale; the fields and patches of culture, mainly of vine, but of wheat, too, and apple, and all things, which spread and brighten to the very tops of mountains; the castellated ruins, — never wholly out of view; — these will abide for ever. The mere scenery is nowhere, except at two points, perhaps, — Coblenz and Heidelberg, — superior to the North River. But the character of the agriculture, the vine as well as wheat, its spread over every inch of practicable earth, carried as by a nature to the minutest and remotest vein of yielding earth; the history of the river, — the most eastern frontier of imperial Rome, — her encampments here and there, discernible still in the names of towns, and in innumerable works of military or fine art, — the scene of so many more recent strifes and glories; the ruins resting so grandly on so many summits, — the record, every one of them, of a thousand years, — all together give it a higher and different interest. I visited the library at Bonn, — a university to which Niebuhr and Schlegel would give fame, — of 130,000 to 180,000 volumes; the tops of Drachenfels, reminding one of the view from Holyoke over Northampton, but pervaded by this high and specific and strange historical interest; the Castle of Heidelberg, restoring you, grimly, grandly, the old feudal time, and opening from its mouldering turrets a sweet and vast view of the Necker and the valley of the Necker and the Rhine; and the Cathedral of Strasburg, where mass was performing and a glorious organ was filling that unbounded interior with the grandest and the sweetest of music, through whose pauses you heard the muttered voice of the priest, and the chanting of a choir wholly out of sight. Byron does not overstate the impression of the Rhine, nor the regrets of parting from it, nor the keen sense of how much loved and absent ones, if here, would heighten all its attractions. The points of particular interest are the Drachenfels, Coblenz, with Ehrenbreitstein, Heidelberg, the cathedral at Strasburg; but the general impression made by the whole Rhine is one of a unity, identity, entirety, and depth, never to be equalled, never to be resembled. Old Rome predominated in the vision, next the Middle Age, Church and Barons, then the age of Louis XIV., then the form of Napoleon, and the passage of the armies of modern war. The Rhine would form a grand subject of a lecture. Compare with no river. Its civilization to that of the Nile is recent and grand, — hence no river may rival.

“Our steamer was Schiller. I saw another named Goethe. I had forgotten the most glorious cathedral of Cologne, and a beautiful picture of Jews weeping at Babylon in the Museum. The choir of the cathedral is indeed a ‘vision;’ a single harmony of the boys chanting in the Strasburg affected me more than all else!

“Dogs draw little carts in Belgium. Cows are yoked and draw burthens in Prussia, Baden, Nassau. Women labor in all the fields. Vines are led over the cottages, and flowers planted almost up to the rail of the car.

“ Here at Basle our hotel stands on the side of the Rhine just as at Cologne, but here the river rushes rapid and sounding, and, till fretted and swelled by this rain, its color was a clear green. All things show we are going toward his sources, or to his cradle of mountains, and to-morrow we approach the Alps. The river passes out of view, and the mountain begins to claim its own worship. From my window I see the flag of the U. S. hung from the window of the Consulate, in mourning.¹ I have visited the cathedral, turned, without violence or iconoclasm, into a Protestant church, holding the grave of Erasmus.

“ Political life for ever is ended. Henceforth the law and literature are all. I know it must be so, and I yield and I approve. Some memorial I would leave yet, rescued from the grave of a mere professional man, some wise or beautiful or interesting page, — something of utility to America, which I love more every pulse that beats.

“ The higher charm of Europe is attributable only to her bearing on her bosom here and there some memorials of a civilization about seven or eight hundred years old. Of any visible traces of any thing earlier there is nothing. All earlier is of the ancient life, — is in books, — and may be appropriated by us, as well as by her — under God — and by proper helps. The gathering of that eight hundred years, however, collected and held here, — libraries, art, famous places, educational spectacles of architecture, picture, statue, gardening, fountains, — are rich, rich, and some of them we can never have nor use.

“ On how many European minds in a generation is felt, educationally, the influence of that large body of spectacle, specifically European, and which can never be transferred? Recollect, first, that all her books we can have among us permanently. All her history we can read and know, therefore, and all things printed. What remains? What that can never be transferred? Picture, statue, building, grounds; beyond and above, a spirit of the place; whatsoever and all which come from living in and visiting memorable places. How many in Europe are influenced, and how, by this last? The recorded history affects us as it does them. In which hemisphere would an imaginative and speculative mind most enjoy itself? In America, land of hope, liberty, — Utopia sobered, realized, to be fitted according to an idea, with occasional visits to this picture gallery and museum, occasional studies here of the objects we can't have; or here, under an inflexible realization, inequalities of condition, rank, force, property, tribute to the Past, — the Past!!!

¹ General Taylor died July 9, 1850.

“Looking to classes: 1st, The vast mass is happier and better in America, is worth more, rises higher, is freer; its standard of culture and life higher. 2. Property holders are as scarce. 3. The class of wealth, taste, social refinement, and genius, — how with them?

“Mem. The enjoyment of an American of refined tastes and a spirit of love of man is as high as that of a European of the same class. He has all but what visits will give him, and he has what no visits can give the other.

“What one human being, not of a privileged class, is better off in Europe than he would be in America? Possibly a mere scholar, or student of art, seeking learning or taste, for itself, to accomplish himself. But the question is, if in any case, high and low, the same rate of mind, and the same kind of mind, may not be as happy in America as in Europe. It must modify its aims and sources somewhat, live out of itself, seek to do good, educate others. It may acquire less, teach more; suck into its veins less nutriment, less essence, less perception of beauty, less relish of it (this I doubt), but diffuse it more.

“What is it worth to live among all that I have seen? I think access to the books and works of art is all. There is no natural beauty thus far beyond ours — and a storied country, storied of battles and blood — is that an educational influence?

“Monday, Aug. 5. — Lucerne. This then is Switzerland. It is a sweet, burning midsummer's morning at Lucerne. Under one of my windows is a little garden in which I see currants, cabbages, pear-trees, vines, healthfully growing. Before me from the other, I see the lake of Lucerne — beyond it in farthest east I see the snowy peaks of Alps — I count some dozen distinct summits on which the snow is lying, composing a range of many miles. On my extreme right ascends Mt. Pilate — splintered bare granite, and on the other Righi, high and bold, yet wooded nearly to the top. It is a scene of great beauty and interest where all 'save the heart of man' may seem divine. We left Basle at nine on Saturday morning and got to Zurich that evening at six. This ride opened no remarkable beauty or grandeur, yet possessed great interest. It was performed in a Diligence — the old Continental stage-coach. And the impression made through the whole day or until we approached Zurich, was exactly that of a ride in the coach from Hanover to the White Hills. I ascribe this to the obvious circumstances that we were already far above the sea, were ascending along the bank of a river, the Rhine, and then a branch which met us rushing full and fast from its mountain sources — that we were approaching the base of mountains of the first class in a high northern latitude. The agricultural productions (except the exotic vine), the grass, weeds moderate; wheat — clover — white weed — the construction of the valley — the occasional bends and intervals — all seem that of New England. There was less beauty than at Newbury and Bath, and I think not a richer soil, — certainly a poorer people. They assiduously accumulate manure, and women of all ages were reaping in the fields.

"Zurich is beautiful. The lake extends beautifully to the south before it. Pleasant gardens and orchards and heights lie down to it and adjoining it. And here first we saw the Alps — a vast chain. The Glaciers ranging from east to west closing the view to the south — their peaks covered with snow lay along as battlements unsupported beneath of a city of the sky out of sight. I went to the library and asked for Orelli. He died some months since. Most of his library was shown me standing by itself in the public collection — and the few I could stay to look at were excellent and recent editions of Greek and Latin classics. I obtained of his widow three printed thin quartos belonging to him — about the size of a commencement thesis — in Latin.

"All things in Zurich announce Protestantism — activity of mind. The University — the books — the learned men — the new buildings — the prosperity.

"I shall never forget the sweet sensations with which I rode the first five or ten miles from Zurich yesterday. It was Sunday. The bells of Zurich were ringing, — including that honored by the preaching of Zwingli, — and men, women, and children were dressed, and with books were going to meeting. Our way lay for some time along the shores of the lake, through gardens, orchards, and fields to the water's edge; many of them of the highest beauty. Then it left the lake to ascend the Albis. This is an excellent road, but to overcome the mountain its course is zig-zag and is practicable only for a walk of the horses. I got out and ascended on foot, crossing from one terrace of road to another by paths through pleasant woods. As I ascended, the whole valley of Zurich—the city—the lake in its whole length—the amphitheatre of country enclosing it—the glorious Alps, and at last Righi and Pilate standing like the speaker's place in a Lyceum with an audience of mountains vastly higher—rising into the peculiar pinnacle of the Alps covered with snow, ascending before them—successively evolved itself. I saw over half of Switzerland. Spread on it all was the sweet, not oppressive, unclouded summer's sunlight. A pure clear air enfolded it—the Sunday of the pastoral, sheltered, and happy world. In some such scenes the foundations of the Puritan mind and polity were laid,—scenes, beautiful by the side of Tempe and Arcady—fit as they to nurse and shelter all the kinds of liberty.

“We descended to Zug and its lake, and then coasted it to Lucerne. Last evening we visited the emblematical lion and sailed on the lake. To-day I go to the chapel of Tell. The first view of the peculiar sharp points of Alps was just from the very top of Albis on the southwest brow. There rose Righi and Pilate, and east—apart and above—a sort of range or city of the tents of an encampment in the sky. They rested on nothing and seemed architecture of heaven—pavilions—the tents of a cavalcade travelling above the earth.

“Berne, Wednesday 7th.—We left Lucerne at seven in our own hired voiture, and with one change of horses treating ourselves to two long pauses, arrived here at eight o'clock—the last two hours through a thunder shower. The way gave me much of the common and average life of Switzerland, lying through two of its great Cantons. What I saw of Lucerne disappointed me. The soil I should think cold and ungrateful and the mind of the laborer not open. Crucifixes everywhere, and all over every thing—weeds in corn and grass. Once in Berne all changes. Man does his duty. Excellent stone bridges; good fences; fewer weeds; more wheat and grass; more look of labor; better buildings; better, newer, larger houses and barns; no crucifixes; express the change.

Throughout I find a smallish, homely, race, and pursue the dream of Swiss life in vain. Yet in these valleys, on the sides of these hills, in these farm houses scattered far and near, though all is cut off from the great arterial and venous system of the world of trade and influence — though the great pulse of business and politics beats not — though life might seem to stagnate — is happiness and goodness too. Sometimes a high Swiss mind emerges, and speaking a foreign or dead tongue, — or migrating, asserts itself. Berne is full of liveliness and recency as well as eld. I have run over it before breakfast and shall again before we go.

“I saw at Berne the place of the State bears, and two of the pensioners — the high terraced ground of view — the residence of the patricians — and the Cathedral, containing, among other things, tablets to the memory of those who fell in 1798, enumerating them, — and the painted windows of Protestant satire. Our journey to Vevay had little interest, a grim horizon of cloud and a constant fall of rain wholly obscured the Alps. Freiburg is striking — its suspended bridge sublime — and it holds one of the best organs of the world. We arrived here [Vevay] at ten and I have this morning looked out on the whole beauty of this part of the lake — from Hauteville and from a point on the shore above it and towards the direction of Chillon, — and admitted its supreme interest, and its various physical and associated beauty. The day is clear and warm and still. The slightest breeze stirs the surface of the lake, light clouds curl half way up the steep shores — float — vanish — and are succeeded by others — a summer’s sun bathes a long shore and inland rising from the shore, clad thick with vines; — yonder, looking to the south-east upon the water — in that valley — sheltered by the mountain — nestling among those trees — embraced and held still in the arms of universal love is Clarens — fit, unpolluted asylum of love and philosophy; before it, on its left, is the castle of Chillon; more directly before it the mouth of the Rhone, here resting a space in his long flight from his glacier-source; far off west stretched the Lake of Geneva at peace — here and there a white sail — the home — the worship — the inspiration of Rousseau and De Staël — the shelter of liberty — the cradle of free thinking — the scene in which the character and fortunes of Puritanism were shaped and made possible — the true birthplace of the civil and religious order of the northern New World.

“ Geneva, 9th August, Friday. — The lake was smooth and bright, and our voyage of five hours pleasant and prosperous ; and we had the extraordinary fortune to witness what we are assured was the best sunset on Mont Blanc for years. Long after the sun had sunk below our earth, the whole range of the mountain was in a blaze with the descending glory. At first it was a mere reflection, from a long and high surface, of the sun’s rays. Gradually this passed into a golden and rosy hue, then all darkened except the supreme summit itself, from which the gold-light flashed, beamed, some time longer ; one bright turret of the building not made with hands, kindled from within, self-poised, or held by an unseen hand. Under our feet ran the Rhone, leaping, joyful, full, blue, to his bed in the Mediterranean. Before us is the city of thought, liberty, power, influence, the beautiful and famous Geneva. More than all in interest was the house of the father of Madame de Staël, and the home of the studies of Gibbon.

“ Paris, Aug. 18. — I went on Saturday, Aug. 10, to the nearer contemplation of Mont Blanc, at Chamouny. Most of that journey lies through Savoy, of the kingdom of Sardinia, even as far as St. Martin, and beyond somewhat, a well-constructed royal road. Within the first third, I should think of the day’s ride out from Geneva, and long before Mont Blanc again reveals himself (for you lose sight of him wholly in a mile or two out of the city), you enter a country of much such scenery as the Notch of the White Mountains. An excellent road ascends by the side of the Arve, itself a mad, eager stream, leaping from the mer de glace, and running headlong, of the color of milk mixed with clay, to the Rhone, below Geneva, on each side of which rise one after another, a succession of vast heights, some a half-mile to a mile above you, all steep, more than even perpendicular, and even hanging over you, as projecting beyond their base. These are so near, and your view so unobstructed, and they are all of a height so comprehensible and appreciable, so to speak, so little is lost by an unavailing elevation, that they make more impression than a mountain five times as high. It is exactly as in the Notch, where the grandeur instead of being enthroned remote, dim, and resting in measurement, and demanding comparisons and thoughts, is near, palpable, and exacting. Down many of these streamed rivulets of water, silver threads of hundreds, perhaps of thousands, of feet long from source to base of cliff; often totally floating off from the side of the hill and the bed in which they had begun to run, in a mere mist which fell like rain, and farther down, and to the right or left of the original flow, were condensed again into mere streams. These have no character of waterfall as you ride along, but discharge a great deal of water in a very picturesque, holiday, and wanton fashion. This kind of scenery grows bolder and wilder, and at last and suddenly at St. Martin we saw again, above it, and beyond it all, the range of Mont Blanc, covered with snow, and at first its summit covered too with clouds. Thenceforth this was ever in view, and some hours before sunset the clouds lifted themselves and vanished, and we looked till all was dark upon the unvailed summit itself. Again we had a beautiful evening sky; again, but this time directly at the foot of the mountain we stood, and watched the surviving, diminishing glory, and just as that faded from the loftiest peak, and it was night, I turned and saw the new moon opposite, within an hour of setting in the west. From all this glory, and at this elevation, my heart turned homeward, and I only wished that since dear friends could not share this here, I could be by their side, and Mont Blanc a morning's imagination only.

“My health hindered all ascensions. I lay in bed on Sunday, reading a little, dreaming more, walked to the side of one glacier, and on Monday returned to Geneva to recruit. After a day of nursing, we on Wednesday, 14th August, started for Paris, and arrived last evening. Our first three days was by post-horses and a hired carriage, and brought us to Tonnerre. The first day ended at Champagnole, and was a day of ascending and descending Jura. We passed through Coppet however, and I had the high delight of visiting the chateau and the grounds which were the home of Madame de Staël, and of looking, from a distance still, on the tomb where she is buried. The chateau could not be entered, but it is large, looks well, and beholds the lake directly before it, spread deliciously to the right and left. I walked up and down the grounds, and over a path where she habitually walked and wrote, and thought and burned with the love of fame and France,—and plucked a leaf. She helped to shape my mind, and to store and charm it. My love for her began in college, growing as I come nearer to the hour when such tongues must cease, and such knowledge vanish away. Almost in sight was Lausanne. Jura is climbed by a noble road which, if possible, grows better all the way to Tonnerre. Both sides seem cold, and wooded, not grateful to the husbandman; and, upon the whole, the country till we left the Jura at Poligny was not interesting. A French fortification is building on the line, — beggary ceased instantly, — some saw-mills to manufacture timber, — and for the rest it is a moderately good farming country.

“At Poligny a new image! The vast plain of Franche-Comté, and then of Burgundy opened before us, and for near two whole days, and a hundred miles, we rode through vast fields of excellent Indian corn, and then through the great grape region, all productive of famous wine; some rare and privileged spots, the cote du vin, productive of the most renowned wine in the world. Generally the eye turned every way on a plain. On this rose some undulations, and these grew more and more numerous as we approached the hither limit of Burgundy. And this plain, thus undulating, sometimes rising to hills, was covered all over with the two, not kindred, yet not dissimilar, and both rich, harvests of maize and vine. Peace, quiet labor, good husbandry, and an ample return, a peasantry of good-looking men and women, and well-clad children, large houses, whereof barn is part, the name and history of Burgundy, all together left an image sweet, peculiar, memorable.

“Quentin Durward, Louis XI., Philip de Comines, Charles the Bold, the whole Ducal life, the whole vast struggle of centralization, seem henceforth to have a clearer significance, and a more real inherence in locality. Dijon is full of the Ducal name and being. At Montbard, my dining-room window looked on the solitary tower-study of Buffon, a sight of deep and sad interest. At Tonnerre we took the rail, and soon the valley of the Saone and Rhone, the slope to the Mediterranean was left behind, and we came upon the tributaries of the Seine, the waters of the Cote d’Or, and of the English Channel. Two hours we gave to Fontainebleau. With a different, and in some respects less interest than Versailles, it has a charm of its own. There is the private life of French kings. St. Louis, Louis XIII., Francis I., Henry IV., Louis XV., Napoleon, — are there en famille, the home of kings. The spot of the ‘Adieux at Fontainebleau,’ near the foot of the staircase in the court, the table of the signing of the abdication; his throne, his bedroom, the dining-hall, the chapel of the two marriages (of Louis XV., and of the late Duke of Orleans, whose tomb I have just visited), the glorious Gobelins, old and new, the hall of Henry and Diana (of Poitiers), and of Francis, the gardens behind, the striking of the clock, — all are worth a sight, a hearing, a memory, a sigh.

“This approach to Paris is beautiful. The valley of the Seine, stretching as far as the sight, the vine everywhere, yet flocks of sheep, rye-fields, forests of royal chase interspersed and contrasted, and at last the dome of the Invalides, and the solemn towers of Notre Dame, — these are its general spectacle and its particular images some of them.

“To-day I have attended vespers at St. Denis, and have visited the tomb of the Duke of Orleans. They showed us the restored series of the French royal dead, and gave us the loud and low of the grandest organ; and then I saw at the chapel, which is the tomb of the Duke, such a mingling of sharp grief; parents and brothers in agony for the first-born, and the dearly loved; the son, brother, and heir-apparent, with crushed hopes; perishing dynasties; as few other spots of earth may show. If Thiers and Guizot were there, their thoughts might wander from the immediate misery to the possible results; they might reflect that not only the immediate heir, but the only loved of France of that line was dying. The organ was played just enough to show what oceans and firmaments full of harmony are there accumulated. Some drops, some rivulets, some grandest peals we heard, identifying it, and creating longings for more. The first time I have seen a Louis XI. was in that royal cemetery. He wears a little, low hat, over a face of sinister sagacity.

“Cambridge, 1st September. — Since I came to Dover (Aug.), my whole time has passed like a sweet yet exhausting dream. England never looked to any eye, not filial, so sweet as I found it from Dover to London. It was the harvest home of Kent; and the whole way was through one great field — through a thousand rather — some nodding yellow and white, waiting the sickle; some covered with the fallen and partially gathered grain; some showing a stubble — extensive — the numerous and large stacks shaped and clustered as houses in villages, embodying the yield; some green with hops, grass, turnips; everywhere glorious groves of great trees; everywhere trees standing large, hale, independent, — one vast, various, yet monotonous image of the useful, plain, rich, and scientific agriculture of England. Came to London. I saw the interior of St. Paul's, the parks; heard in some fashionable ladies' society a story or two of Brougham; heard Grisi and Mario in three operas, — Norma: another by Donizetti, comic, but a reckless squandering of delicious music on a story of a lover seeking a potion to make him loved; and finally Don Giovanni; the trio, and the solo of Mario, by far the best music I ever heard in that kind. Mario is handsome — voluptuously; his voice flexible, firm, rich as a clarionet.

“But from London what have I not seen! Twickenham; Pope's Grotto — the views through it — Richmond Hill, and its wealth of beautiful aspects; Hampton Court, so glorious in its exterior of trees, grounds, avenue, park — so disappointing within, yet leaving an impression of William III.; Kensington, known to the world as a great, useful, botanic garden; Gray's home and poetical nourishments — the churchyard, ivy tower — mouldering heaps — yew-tree — his own monument, his view of Eton — the ride to and fro — the most intensely rural England; Eton itself — the palace and the matchless prospect from the keep; Windsor forest. Old Windsor — the valley of the Thames, and all the scenes which the Augustan poetry of England loved, by which it was fed and stimulated, on which a greater than that school loved to look, and has done something to endear and to immortalize.

“When this was done, there was left to see the University — physical and mental architecture of England. I am glad I went first to Oxford. I am doubly and for ever grateful and glad, that the last great impression I shall take and hold of England is to be that conveyed by the University of Cambridge. This day, Sunday, I have passed here at Cambridge, with perhaps as keen and as various a pleasure as I ever felt, — except at home, or in a book. But I begin with Oxford. The country on the way disappointed me in the first place. The whole city and the Colleges did so, even more cruelly, in the next place. Something I ascribe to the day, — dark and cold, — but not much. The Isis does nothing for Oxford, that I could see, though some of the college walks are on its meadows. The exterior of the Colleges, so far as I saw, was not old only — that was well — but all old, only old, grim, and with a worn and neglected look, as if the theory were to keep for ever before the eye the old, old time and art and product, unwarmed, unacidulated, unenlivened by the circulation of a drop of later life. I visited, however, the dining-hall of Christ Church, and its chapel and library, with interest, yet oppressed at every step with — I know not what — of the retrograding or stationary and narrow and ungenial in opinion, in policy, in all things. The Bodleian impressed by its regal wealth and spaciousness. Altogether it seemed a place for rest, for inertness, for monastic seclusion, for a dream, and a sigh after the irrevocable past.

“This day at Cambridge has been such a contrast that I distrust myself. The country from London, in spite of heavy cloud and chill, was beautiful, — an undulating and apparently rich surface, strongly suggestive of the best of Essex and Middlesex. The impression made by the University portion of Cambridge I can scarcely analyze. The architecture is striking. The old is kept in repair; the new harmonizes, and is intrinsically beautiful, so that here seems a reconciliation of past, present, and of the promise of the future. Conservation and progress — the old, beautified, affectionately and gracefully linked to the present — an old field of new corn — the new recalling the old, filial, reverential, yet looking forward — running, running a race of hope. The new part of St. John is beautiful; all of King’s is striking, too. I attended the cathedral service in King’s Chapel, as striking as St. George’s in London, and then for a few minutes went to the University Chapel, and again to All Saints’ to see the tablet and statue of Kirke White. The courts, buildings, and grounds of Trinity are beautiful and impressive; and in my life I have never been filled by a succession of sweeter, more pathetic, more thrilling sensations than in looking from the window of Newton’s room, walking in his walks, recalling the series of precedent, contemporaneous, and subsequent companionship of great names whose minds have been trained here, and which pale and fade before his! The grounds of Trinity, St. John, St. Peter, are the finest I have seen; the two former on, and each side of, the Cam, which is bridged by each college more than once, divided and conducted around and through the gardens, so as artificially to adorn them more, and to be made safe against inundation, — the latter not reaching to the river, but even more sweet and redolent of more and more careful and tasteful and modern horticulture. I seem to find here an image of the true and the great England. Here is a profusion of wealth, accumulated and appropriated for ages, to a single and grand end, — the advancement of knowledge and the imparting of knowledge. It is embodied to the eye in a city of buildings, much of it beautiful, all of it picturesque and impressive, and in grounds shaded, quiet, fittest seats of learning and genius. Something there is of pictures; great libraries are here. Learned men, — who are only the living generation of a succession which, unbroken, goes back for centuries, and comprehends a vast proportion of the mind of the nation in all its periods, — in increasing numbers, tenant these walls, and are penetrated by these influences. A union of the old, the recent, the present, the prediction of the future, imaged in the buildings, in the grounds, by every thing, is manifested, — giving assurance and a manifestation of that marked, profound English policy, which in all things acquires but keeps, — and binds the ages and the generations by an unbroken and electric tie.”

The Journal abruptly breaks off with this heartfelt tribute, and was never resumed.

From this the travellers went to the north of England, to Edinburgh, Abbotsford, Glasgow, and through the lowlands of Scotland, and embarking at Liverpool, reached home in September.

CHAPTER VIII.

1850-1855.

Political Excitement — Union Meetings — Address on Washington, Feb. 1851 — The Case of Fairchild v. Adams — Address before the "Story Association" — Webster Meeting in Faneuil Hall, Nov. 1851 — Argues an India-Rubber Case in Trenton — Baltimore Convention, June, 1852 — Address to the Phi Beta Kappa Society, Burlington, Vt. — Journey to Quebec — Death of Mr. Webster — Letter to E. Jackson — Letter to Harvey Jewell, Esq. — Letter to Mrs. Eames — Offer of the Attorney-Generalship — Convention to revise the Constitution of Massachusetts — Eulogy on Daniel Webster, at Dartmouth College — Letter to his Daughter — Letters to Mrs. Eames — Letter to Mr. Everett — Letters to his Son — Letters to his Daughter — Address at the Dedication of the Peabody Institute, Sept. 1854 — Letters to Mr. Everett — Letter to Mrs. Eames — Accident and Illness — Letters to Mr. and Mrs. Eames.

THE state of the country in 1850 was such as to cause great anxiety among thoughtful men. The whole year was marked by a political excitement second only in intensity to that which has since produced such momentous results. The acquisition of new territory from Mexico re-opened the question of slavery. On the 7th of March, Mr. Webster made his memorable speech on "the Constitution and the Union." The law for the return of fugitive slaves excited much opposition among a portion of the people at the North, while at the South there was widespread apprehension and discontent. This feeling was exasperated in both parts of the country, by intemperate harangues, and inflammatory appeals through the newspapers. The excitement became at last so strong, that judicious and conservative men felt bound to protest against, and, if possible, allay it. Accordingly, Union meetings were held in different States, — in Alabama, Kentucky, Ohio, New York, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts, — and sound men of all parties united to deprecate the disloyal and hostile sentiments which were too frequently heard. The meeting in Boston was held in Faneuil Hall, on the 26th of November. It was opened by Hon. Benjamin R. Curtis, with an address of great compactness and power, and closed with a speech from Mr. Choate replete with profound feeling as well as broad and generous patriotism; far-sighted and wise in pointing out the dangers of the Republic, and earnest and solemn, even beyond his wont, in exhortation to avoid them.

In February, 1851, Mr. Choate delivered, in Charlestown, an address on Washington. He repeated it in Boston. It was marked by his usual fervor, and afforded him another opportunity of dwelling upon that public virtue which he feared was losing its high place and honor. An extract of a few pages will show its spirit.

“In turning now,” he said, “to some of the uses to which this great example may contribute, I should place among the first this, to which I have this moment made allusion; that is, that we may learn of it how real, how lofty, how needful, and how beautiful a virtue is patriotism.

“ It is among the strangest of all the strange things we see and hear, that there is, so early in our history, a class of moralists among us, by whom that duty, once held so sacred, which takes so permanent a place in the practical teachings of the Bible, which Christianity — as the Christian world has all but universally understood its own religion — not tolerates alone, but enjoins by all its sanctions, and over which it sheds its selectest influences, while it ennobles and limits it; which literature, art, history, the concurrent precepts of the wisest and purest of the race in all eras, have done so much to enforce and adorn and regulate, — I mean the duty of loving, with a specific and peculiar love, our own country; of preferring it to all others, into which the will of God has divided man; of guarding the integrity of its actual territory; of advancing its power, eminence, and consideration; of moulding it into a vast and indestructible whole, obeying a common will, vivified by a common life, identified by a single soul; strangest it is, I say, of all that is strange, we have moralists, sophists, rather, of the dark or purple robe, by whom this master-duty of social man is virtually and practically questioned, yea, disparaged. They deal with it as if it were an old-fashioned, and half-barbarous and vulgar and contracted animalism, rather than a virtue. This love of country of yours, they say, what is it, at last, but an immoral and unphilosophical limitation and counteraction of the godlike principle of universal Benevolence? These symbols and festal days; these processions, and martial airs, and discourses of the departed great; this endeared name of America, this charmed flag, this memorial column, these old graves, these organic forms, this boasted Constitution, this united national existence, this ample and glorious history of national progress, these dreams of national fortune, — alas! what are they but shams, baubles, playthings for the childhood of the race; nursery ballads, like the Old Testament; devices of vanity, devices of crime, smelling villainously of saltpetre; empty plausibilities; temporary and artificial expedients, say hindrances, rather, by which the great and good, of all hemispheres and all races, are kept from running into one another's embraces; and man, the abstract, ideal, and subjective conception of humanity, after having been progressively developed, all the way up, from the brain of a fish, is, in this nineteenth century, sacrificed and smothered by his accidents! Do not stoop so low as to be a Patriot. Aspire to be a Philanthropist! To reform your country, not to preserve your country, is the highest style of man, nowadays. Root and branch work of it, is the word. If she goes to pieces in the operation, why, her time had come, and there is an end of an old song. It will be only the ancient myth of the fall of man and expulsion from Paradise, — nothing but a stage of progress, — just a bursting into a new life, rather different from the old, and more of it, — that is all!!

“It would be easy to expose the emptiness, presumptuousness, and dangers of such morality; but I direct you, for a better refutation, always to the life and death of Washington. Was not that patriotism, — virtue? Was it not virtue, entitling itself — in the language of the Christian Milton — entitling itself, after this mortal change, ‘to a crown among the enthroned gods on sainted seats?’ Was that patriotism selfish or vain or bloody or contracted? Was it the less sublime because it was practical and because it was American? This making of a new nation in a new world, this devising of instrumentalities, this inspiration of a spirit, whereby millions of men, through many generations and ages, will come one after another to the great gift of social being,— shall be born and live and die in a vast brotherhood of peace,— mental and moral advancement, and reciprocation of succor and consolation, in life and death,— what attribute of grandeur, what element of supreme and transcendent beneficence and benevolence does it lack? Is it not obedience to the will of God? Does not He decree the existence of separate and independent nations on the earth? Does not the structure of the globe, its seas, mountains, deserts, varieties of heat, cold, and productions; does not the social nature of man, the grand educational necessities and intimations of his being; does not the nature of liberty; does not his universal history, from the birth of the world; do not all things reveal it, as a fundamental and original law of the race,— this distribution into several National Life? Is it not as profoundly true to-day as ever? ‘Nihil est enim illi principi Deo, qui omnem hunc mundum regit, quod quidem in terris fiat, acceptius quam concilia, cœtusque hominum jure sociati, quæ civitates appellantur.’¹

“Is not the national family as clear an appointment of nature and nature’s God as the family of the hearth? Is it not a divine ordinance, even as love of parents and love of children? Nay, is it not, after all, the only practical agency through which the most expansive

¹ Cic. De Rep. vi. 13.

love of Man can be made to tell on Man? And if so, if the end is commanded, that is, if the existence of the independent and entire State is commanded, are not the means of insuring that end commanded also? And if so, are not the traits, the deeds, the care, the valor, the spirit of nationality, the obedience to the collective will and reason as expressed through the prescribed organic form; are not all these sentiments, and all that policy, 'the great scenery, the heroic feelings, the blaze of ancient virtue, the exalted deaths,' which are directed specifically and primarily to the creation and preservation of the State, — are they not highest in the scale of things commanded? Must not 'being,' in the antithesis of Hooker, go before even 'well being'? Away then with this spurious and morbid morality of the purple robe, which erects the uses of some particular, moral, or social, or economical reform, that if not affected to-day, may be to-morrow, above the keeping of the Republic, which, once descended into the tomb of nations, shall rise not, till the heavens be no more; which dislocates impiously the fair and divinely appointed order of the duties, which thinks it savors of lettered illumination, to look down on that glorious family of virtues which holds kingdoms and commonwealths in their spheres. Give me back rather, give back to America rather, — she needs it yet, for a century, till her national being, so recent, so immature, is compacted to the consistency of pyramids, — give her back rather the faith and the philosophy of that day which prayed in every pulpit for the arms of Washington; which in the gorgeous orientalism of Robert Hall, say rather of the Scripture itself, believed that, guided and inspired by the Mighty Hand, his hosts, in the day of battle, might have their eyes opened, to behold in every plain and every valley, what the prophet beheld by the same illumination,—chariots of fire, and horses of fire; which saw in his escape from the wasting rifle-shot of the Monongahela, a prediction, and a decree of some transcendent public service, for which he was saved.

.

“ To form and uphold a State, it is not enough that our judgments believe it to be useful; the better part of our affections must feel it to be lovely. It is not enough that our arithmetic can compute its value, and find it high; our hearts must hold it priceless, above all things rich or rare, dearer than health or beauty, brighter than all the order of the stars. It does not suffice that its inhabitants should seem to you good men enough to trade with, altogether even as the rest of mankind; ties of brotherhood, memories of a common ancestry, common traditions of fame and justice, a common and undivided inheritance of rights, liberties, and renown,—these things must knit you to them with a distinctive and domestic attraction. It is not enough that a man thinks he can be an unexceptionable citizen, in the main, and unless a very unsatisfactory law passes. He must admit, into his bosom, the specific and mighty emotion of patriotism. He must love his country, his whole country, as the place of his birth or adoption, and the sphere of his largest duties; as the playground of his childhood, the land where his fathers sleep, the sepulchre of the valiant and wise, of his own blood and race departed; he must love it for the long labors that reclaimed and adorned its natural and its moral scenery; for the great traits and great virtues of which it has been the theatre ; for the institution and amelioration and progress that enrich it ; for the part it has played for the succor of the nations. A sympathy indestructible must draw him to it. It must be of power to touch his imagination. All the passions which inspire and animate in the hour of conflict must wake at her awful voice.”

.

In the earlier part of this year Mr. Choate defended his pastor, Rev. Dr. Adams, on a charge of slander. The case was peculiar and presented some interesting points for the clerical profession in general.¹

“ The action of Fairchild v. Adams was for written and verbal slander. Mr. Fairchild, while pastor of a church in South Boston, became a member of the Suffolk South Association of Ministers ; Rev. Dr. Adams being also a member. Mr. Fairchild was privately charged by one Rhoda Davidson with being the father of her illegitimate child ; and she demanded of him a considerable sum of money. He paid her a part of what she demanded, and promised to pay her further sums, and wrote her a letter which was strongly indicative of the truth of the charge. The circumstances having become known to a few persons in his society, he asked a dismissal, under a threat of exposure, and went to Exeter, N. H., where he was installed as a pastor. Having learned, soon after his settlement there, that there must be a public exposure of the affair, he attempted to commit suicide. Soon afterwards an ecclesiastical council met at Exeter, which advised that he should be dismissed from his charge, and degraded from the ministry. He was about this time indicted at Boston for adultery, but kept out of the State, and was not taken upon the warrant till after the lapse of a considerable time. He finally returned and took his trial, and was acquitted, as it was understood, because the testimony of the witness Davidson was impeached. After this acquittal he returned to his former pursuit in South Boston, and received a call to settle there. A council was convened, which advised his settlement, taking the ground that his acquittal in a criminal court should be treated by an ecclesiastical council as conclusive evidence of his innocence. From this position Dr. Adams and other members of the association always dissented, and refused to recognize him as a minister.

¹ For the following account I am indebted to Hon. R. A. Chapman, late Chief Justice of the Massachusetts Supreme Court, one of the referees before whom the case was tried.

“ Before the meeting of the council at Exeter, some discussion had taken place in respect to the standing of Mr. Fairchild in the Suffolk South Association; and it had been arranged that the association should be governed by the result of that council. Accordingly, after he had been degraded from the ministry, the association passed a vote, reciting that result, and expelling him from their body. After he had been again installed in South Boston, he requested of the association a copy of the vote by which they had expelled him. The copy was accordingly furnished him, after which he sent them a communication demanding that they should rescind the vote as a libel, and restore him to good standing as a member; and he proposed to appear before them, and offer evidence and arguments on the question of rescinding the vote, and proposed to some of the members to make inquiries of certain persons in respect to some of the accusations that had been made against him. The association gave him a hearing, and, after its close, each of the members was called upon to give an opinion, with the reasons for it. Among others Dr. Adams gave his vote in favor of a resolution adverse to the restoration of Mr. Fairchild, and stated verbally his reasons for it. He was selected as the object of a suit, because he was a man of influence, and because of some personal feelings; and the written slander consisted of the resolution that was passed, and the verbal slander of the reasons stated by Dr. Adams for believing in the guilt of Mr. Fairchild.

“The cause was heard before referees agreed on by the parties, and several very interesting questions arose on the hearing. Among them was the question to what extent should ministers and churches be influenced by the acquittal of a man charged with a crime in a civil court. Mr. Choate contended that inasmuch as the rules of evidence are different in civil and ecclesiastical tribunals; inasmuch as some things are regarded as criminal in one that may not be in the other; inasmuch as a defendant may be acquitted by the jury from mere doubt, or from collusion of the party with a witness who suffers his testimony to be broken down, or omits to disclose the whole truth, the verdict ought not ipso facto to restore the party, but should only furnish a ground of consideration for action. The debate on this point also led him to an investigation of the constitution, history, and usages of Congregational churches and associations of ministers.

“Another question was, whether associations of ministers had power to expel their members for alleged offences, without being held in an action of slander to prove to a jury that the party is guilty. On the part of Mr. Fairchild, it was contended that these bodies had no privileges in this respect beyond that of the ordinary slanderer, who utters a charge of crime against his neighbor where the matter does not concern him. On the part of Dr. Adams it was contended that the case came within the class called privileged communications; that is, when in the transaction of business or the discharge of a duty, one person has proper occasion to speak of another, and in good faith and without malice alleges that he has been guilty of a crime. In such cases he may defend himself in an action for slander by proving that he thus acted, and without proving to the jury that the accusation is true. The discussion of this question led to an investigation of the authorities to be found in the books of law in reference to the general doctrine, and also to the nature and history of associations of ministers, and their relation to the churches. My minutes of the points and authorities are pretty full; but they would give no idea of the style and manner of Mr. Choate's argument.

“The referees were of opinion that associations are privileged to inquire into the conduct of their members, and in good faith to pass votes of expulsion, stating the reasons of their proceeding, and are not responsible to legal tribunals for the accuracy of their conclusions. They were satisfied that Dr. Adams acted in good faith, and made an award in his favor, which, after argument, was sustained by the Court. The case is reported in 11 Cushing, 549.”

In May, 1851, Mr. Choate argued a cause, which, whether estimated by the interests at stake, or the signal ability of the counsel, or the subtleness of the questions at issue, would undoubtedly be considered one of the most important in which he was ever engaged. It was that generally known as the "Methodist Church Case." It was heard in New York, before the Circuit Court of the United States, Justices Nelson and Betts presiding. At the time it was, from obvious reasons, of the deepest interest to the whole Methodist world of the United States, and although it concerned property alone, yet the members and presses of the Church at the North always maintained most urgently, and apparently most truthfully, that the pecuniary gain or loss was quite inconsequential; that the real question was, whether the General Conference of Churches could lawfully act so as to destroy the entirety of the Church; that if it could divide the Church in this instance, there was no limit to the future subdivisions that might be made. It is also proper to state that the Church at the North was anxious to harmonize the existing dispute, and, it is understood, made, as they thought, a very liberal offer of compromise, which was rejected by the Southern Church.

This dispute originated in that prolific source of ill, — slavery. Various questions, growing out of the connection of the Southern Churchmen with Slavery, had, at various times, arisen in the Church, leading to a growing alienation of the two sections. Finally, at a General Conference of the then united Church, held at New York in June, 1844, a "plan of separation" was drawn up, looking to a final division of the Church, which, among other matters, provided that each section of the country should have its own Church, independent of the other; that ministers of every grade might attach themselves without blame to either Church, as they preferred; that a change of the first clause of the sixth restrictive article should be recommended so as to read: "They shall not appropriate the produce of the 'Book Concern' other than for the benefit of travelling, supernumerary, superannuated, and worn-out preachers, their wives, widows, and children, and such other purposes as a General Conference may determine;" that on the adoption of this recommendation by the Annual Conferences, the Northern Agents should deliver to the Southern Agents so much of certain property belonging to the Church as the number of travelling preachers in the Southern bore to the number of the same class in the Northern Church; that all the property of the Church within the limits of the Southern organization should be for ever free from any claim of the Church, and that the Churches, North and South, should have a right in common to use all copyrights of the New York and Cincinnati "Book Concerns" at the time of settlement.

Included in this was the large property called the "Book Concern," the proceeds of which were to be appropriated as the change in the first clause of the sixth article above stated shows, and which was originally instituted by that class which is now its beneficiaries. This "Book Concern" was vested in agents, and against them this action was brought by the Southern agents to compel a delivery of their share of the property.

The plaintiffs maintained that the resolutions of the General Conference were of binding force, and that the General Conference of the Southern Church had acted upon them in good faith, and passed resolutions declaring the expediency of separation; and that, after this action of the Southern Conference, a council of Northern Bishops met at New York, and passed resolutions ratifying the "plan" of the General Conference of 1844, regarding it as of binding obligation.

In reply to this, the defendants, admitting many of the plaintiffs' allegations, rested their defence mainly on the following propositions:—

1. That the resolutions of the General Conference of 1844, when properly understood, do not impart an unqualified assent of that body to a division of the Methodist Episcopal Church into two separate and distinct organizations or churches; that the assent thereby given was conditional and contingent, and that the conditions were not complied with, nor has the contingency happened.

2. That, if otherwise, the General Conference was not possessed of competent power and authority to assent to, or authorize the division. And,

3. That the division, therefore, which took place was a nullity, and the separate organization a wrongful withdrawal and disconnection from the membership, communion, and government of the Church, by reason of which the travelling, supernumerary, and worn-out preachers composing the separate organization, are taken out of the description of the beneficiaries of the fund.

The decision of Justice Nelson was adverse to the Northern party; and this view was subsequently maintained by the Supreme Court in Washington.

In July of this year (1851), Mr. Choate again addressed the Law School at Cambridge, or rather "The Story Association," composed of the past and present members of the School. And here, moved by the dangerous heresies which seemed to him too familiarly received in the community, the orator urged upon the profession the new duty, as he called it, of checking the spirit of disloyalty, by correcting the public judgment, — by enlightening and directing the public sense of right. "This then," he said, "is the new duty, the opus aureum, to cherish the Religion of the Law, — to win back the virtues to the service of the State, and, with Cicero and Grotius, to make loyalty to Law the fundamental principle in each good man's breast. The capital defect of the day is, not that conscience is too much worshipped, but that it is not properly limited. Its true sphere is not properly seen and circumscribed. Men think that by the mere feeling within them of a sense of right, they can test great subjects to which the philosophy of ages leads the way, and can try a grand complexity, embracing a multitude of interests and conflicting claims and duties. But these ethical politics do not train the citizen ab extra to be enlightened on these subjects.

"Morality should go to school. It should consult the builders of Empire, and learn the arts imperial by which it is preserved, ere it ventures to pronounce on the construction and laws of nations and commonwealths. For, unless the generation of Washington was in a conspiracy against their posterity, and the generation of this day, in high and judicial station, is in the same plot, the large toleration which inspires the Constitution and the Laws was not only wise, but was indispensable to forming or keeping any union, and to the prosperity of us all.

“Let the babblers against the laws contemplate Socrates in his cell about to quaff the poison which Athens presented to him. He is pleading with his disciples for the sanctity of the very law which condemns him : he refuses to escape ; and, ‘after a brief discourse on the immortality of the soul,’ he dies. Let them learn, that ere laws and constitutions can be talked about, they must at least be the subject of a special study. Their transcendental philosophy must condescend to study, not only the character, but even the temper, of a people, and this not a priori, but as it appears in the local press and public demonstrations. Then they would observe that there are three great things adverse to the permanence of our National Government, — its recency, its artificial structure, and the peculiar facilities which the State organizations afford for separation : and from this study they would learn how little they know what a work it was to found and keep the Republic and its laws. ‘Tantæ molis erat Romanam condere gentem.’

“To exercise this conservative influence, to beget a distrust of individual and unenlightened judgment, on matters of such vast import and extent, and to foster a religious reverence for the laws, is the new duty which the times demand of the legal profession.”

On the death of Hon. Levi Woodbury, one of the Judges of the United States Supreme Court, in September, 1851, it is understood that the place was offered to Mr. Choate, but he felt obliged to decline the honor.¹

¹ Hon. Peter Harvey, in his “Reminiscences of Daniel Webster,” says, “After the death of Judge Woodbury and the consequent vacancy in the United States Supreme Court, Mr. Webster [then Secretary

[LETTER TO HIS SON, RUFUS, THEN IN AMHERST COLLEGE.]

"BOSTON, 11 October, Saturday evening.

"MY DEAR SON, — I get so little time, now that J. is gone, and all the courts are sitting, to do what I should love most to do, that I have been obliged to neglect writing at the very moment when letters from home might be the most pleasant and useful to you. To-day I gain a little respite, and feel as if I must send you my love, if no more. Your letters to your mother and sisters seem to show you happy and contented, yet loving to think and hear of home. So I hope it will be through your whole college life. If now we can continue to hear that you escape all the sickness of college — remain the same true and good boy as ever — with a little more development of the love of study — good books — noble examples — and true excellence — our happiness for the present would be complete. You have been so excellently fitted, that I know you can stand high in the class, and I entreat you to resolve — not by foul means but by fair — to win such prizes as those with which E. gladdens his father's and sisters' hearts. All that I can ever do for you is — if I live (all depends on that) — to afford you the means of laying a foundation for eminence and usefulness — by scholarship. If you neglect these, all is lost. But I am sure you will not. I hope that you will from the start cultivate elocution. The power of speaking with grace and energy — the power of using aright the best words of our noble language — is itself a fortune — and a reputation — if it is associated and enriched by knowledge and sense. I would therefore give a special attention to all that is required of you in this department. But not one study prescribed by the government is to be neglected. It is a large and liberal course, and fits well for the introduction to a really solid and elegant education. Cultivate the best scholars and minds; and while you treat all men well, do not squander time on shallow, frivolous, and idle boys.

"I believe my library has received its last finish since you were here. Next to my whole family, here and elsewhere, I love it best of all things of earth, and wish I could gain of State], said, 'Mr. Choate will have the offer of this, but I do not know as he will take it. The offer is due to him as the first lawyer in New England. I shall make him the offer.'" The place was afterwards given to Hon. Benjamin R. Curtis.

more time from plaintiffs and defendants to give to its solaces, utilities, and amenities.

“ We begin to count the weeks to your first return! Be most prudent to avoid the sicknesses you speak of — and all things else that shall prevent your bringing back the bloom of body and heart which you carried away. Your mother is not very well, but sends love and cautions, as do the sisters three. Give our united love to E. and tell him we look to him for our son.

“ YOUR AFFEC. FATHER.”

[LETTER TO HIS SON RUFUS.]

“ BOSTON, 6th March, 1852.

“ MY DEAREST RUFUS, — I have been quite unwell for a fortnight — unusually so for me — and I am not sure that I am yet wholly restored. In the intervals of sharp neuralgic pains, I have been either exhausted, or very busy; and therefore, although my thoughts and heart have been very much turned towards you, I have not been able to write. The girls and your mother have given you my love — but neither they nor I can convey any idea of how much I love you; how anxious I feel for your true and best good; and how inexpressibly happy I shall be to know that you love learning; love honor, character, and virtue; and have energetically and hopefully set out on the career of usefulness and respectability. Sometimes I regret that I did not incur the expense and run the hazards of Cambridge, that we might see your pleasant face, and give you a helping hand, and a pleasant family welcome once a week. But my means are really so small — depending wholly on my health — from day to day, and the temptations, and general influences of this great school so severe — and Amherst promises so much help to studious habits, and moral dispositions, that we have plucked you as from our arms, to send you to a safer and more beautiful spot. I hope, my most dear child, all our wishes will be gratified in the result.

“ The thing I most of all, or as much as any thing, regret, is that I cannot, from day to day, go over with you the studies of the day. My college life was so exquisitely happy, that I should love to relive it in my son. The studies of Latin and Greek, Livy, Horace, Tacitus — Xenophon, Herodotus, and Thucydides especially, — had ever a charm beyond expression; and the first opening of our great English authors, Milton, Addison, Johnson, and the great writers for the Reviews, made that time of my life a brief, sweet, dream. They created tastes, and supplied sources of enjoyment, which support me to this hour—in fatigue, ill-health, and low spirits—and I must say I could not then, and cannot now, look with a particle of respect or interest on any classmate who did not relish these delicious and ennobling sources of scholarlike enjoyment and accomplishment, and resolve to be distinguished by his command of them.

“You are so infinitely better fitted for college than I was—or than almost any in your class can be—that I am sure you can lead if you will resolve to do so. Be just and generous to all. Use no arts to supplant others with the government, but by study,—persistent and habitual—give me the supreme gratification of hearing that you stand in good conduct as you did at the Latin school—and in scholarship among the foremost. Oh, think what delight you will give us all to know that the days of exhibition in your class are days your mother, sisters, and I, can attend with pride and hope!

“I have conceived so much anxiety about my health—for reasons which I hardly communicate to the family—that I seem to feel that at any moment you might be left the only support of those you love so dearly. Such an event would leave you all poor. Continue to be then, my dear son, frugal, temperate, and thoughtful. If I live, I hope you will read the law with me, and rise to its honors, but your immediate sphere of duty is college life, and through that I am sure you mean to pass with distinction and safety.

“I have sometimes given you presents. I would ‘coin my heart for drachmas’ rather than that you should want the means of a thorough education; and I now promise you, if you will bring me satisfactory evidence at the end of the term, of good conduct, and high, good scholarship, I will give you the most valuable gift which you have ever yet had, or had promised: I shall not tell you what.

“Give my love to Edward. Pray avoid all idle and all vicious companions, and cultivate the ambitious, studious, and rising—rising by merit.

“I want you to write me a full letter, telling me your daily life and studies, what you like best, and why.

“Bless you, dear son.

Your father,

“R. CHOATE.”

During the years 1851 and 1852, notwithstanding the increasing demands of his profession, Mr. Choate continued deeply interested in national politics. There were many at the North dissatisfied with the compromise measures of 1850, and alienated from Mr. Webster, on account of his speech on the 7th of March. There were others who believed those measures to be in general wise and conciliatory, and that Mr. Webster never assumed a position more dignified and patriotic, or showed a more profound sense of the demands of the whole country. The Massachusetts Whigs of this class determined to call a public meeting, in order to present to the country the name of that great statesman as a candidate for the Presidency. The convention was held on the 25th of November, 1851, and proved to be one of the largest, most respectable, and most enthusiastic gatherings of the year. It was presided over by Hon. George Ashmun; and the principal address was made by Mr. Choate. Of all the tributes to Mr. Webster, never was one more hearty, more sincere, or more stirring than that which he then delivered. His whole soul was alive with his theme. A sense of the injustice which that great statesman had suffered; of the angry and slanderous attacks made upon him by the little and malignant; of the insult which one of the boards of the city government had contrived to inflict by refusing to him — the first citizen of the State — permission to speak in Faneuil Hall; the ingratitude with which many at the North had requited his long and arduous and grand services, — all inspired the orator to a strain of fervid declamation, which swept the vast assembly with him as if but one spirit moved them all.

The early part of the year 1852 was marked by nothing of peculiar interest. In March he made a powerful argument in an India-rubber case, in Trenton, N. J. Mr. Webster was on the opposite side — one of his latest appearances in a case of great importance. Mr. Choate was said to have surpassed himself in learning, strength, and brilliancy; but of the argument, as of the great majority of speeches at the bar, absolutely nothing remains — ipsæ periere ruinae.

The Whig Convention for the nomination of a candidate for the Presidency — the last National Convention of the party — met in Baltimore on Wednesday the 16th of June, 1852. The secret history of it is yet to be written.

The place of meeting was a spacious hall. The members occupied a raised platform in the centre; spectators, from all parts of the country, sat upon benches at the sides, while the gallery was filled with ladies. Two days were spent in effecting an organization, and preparing a series of resolutions. It was considered doubtful whether a platform could be agreed upon, binding the party to the ‘compromise measures,’ as they were called. As these measures were not entirely acquiesced in by many of the Northern members, it was supposed to be the policy of some to make the nomination without a declaration of political sentiments on the question of slavery, and then to resolve that no such declaration was necessary. If this were the plan, it did not succeed. It was understood that General Scott had written to some member of the Convention assenting to these “measures,” though for some reason the letter had not been produced. The resolutions were at length read, and all eyes turned toward the seats occupied by the Massachusetts delegates. Mr. Choate presently rose; it was about half-past five o'clock on the afternoon of Friday. The thousand fans ceased to flutter, and the hall was silent with expectation. He began in a quiet manner, as he usually did, with an allusion to the general sentiment of the platform itself, and then broke into a more fervent strain of thanksgiving to God, that a sentiment urged before, many times and in many places, seemed now likely, by so near an approach to unanimity, to be adopted and promulgated by that authority, among the highest which he recognized, the National Whig Party of the United States, in General Convention assembled.

“Sir,” said he, “why should not this organ of one of the great national parties, which, pervading the country, while they divide the people, confirm the Union,—for I hold that these party organizations, wisely and morally administered, are among the most powerful instrumentalities of union,—here, now, and thus declare, that, in its judgment, the further agitation of the subject of slavery be excluded from, and forbidden in, the national politics? Why should it not declare that if agitation must continue, it shall be remitted to the forum of philanthropy, of literature, of the press, of sectional organization, of fanaticism, organized or unorganized; but that the Federal Government has in this field closed its labors and retires, leaving it to the firmness of a permanent Judiciary to execute what the Legislature has ordained?”

“Why should we not engage ourselves to the finality of the entire series of measures of compromise? Does any member of this body believe that the interests of the nation, the interests of humanity, our highest interests, our loftiest duties, require an attempt to disturb them? Was it needful to pass them? Did not a moral necessity compel it? Who now doubts this? I do not deny that some good men have done so, and now do. I am quite well aware that fanaticism has doubted it, or has affected to doubt it, to the end that it may leave itself free, unchecked by its own conscience, to asperse the motives of the authors and advocates of this scheme of peace and reconciliation, — to call in question the soundness of the ethics on which it rests, and to agitate for ever for its repeal. But the American people know, by every kind and degree of evidence by which such a truth ever can be known, that these measures, in the crisis of their time, saved this nation. I thank God for the civil courage, which, at the hazard of all things dearest in life, dared to pass and defend them, and ‘has taken no step backward.’ I rejoice that the healthy morality of the country, with an instructed conscience, void of offence toward God and man, has accepted them. Extremists denounce all compromises, ever. Alas! do they remember that such is the condition of humanity that the noblest politics are but a compromise — an approximation — a type — a shadow of good things — the buying of great blessings at great prices? Do they forget that the Union is a compromise; the Constitution — social life, — that the harmony of the universe is but the music of compromise, by which the antagonisms of the infinite Nature are composed and reconciled? Let him who doubts — if such there be — whether it were wise to pass these measures, look back and recall with what instantaneous and mighty charm they calmed the madness and anxiety of the hour! How every countenance, everywhere, brightened and elevated itself! How, in a moment, the interrupted and parted currents of fraternal feeling reunited! Sir, the people came together again, as when, in the old Roman history, the tribes descended from the mount of secession, — the great compromise of that constitution achieved, — and flowed together behind the eagle into one mighty host of reconciled races for the conquest of the world.

“ Well, if it were necessary to adopt these measures, is it not necessary to continue them? In their nature and office, are they not to be as permanent as the antagonisms to which they apply? Would any man here repeal them if he could command the numerical power? Does he see any thing but unmixed and boundless evil in the attempt to repeal them? Why not, then, declare the doctrine of their permanence? In the language of Daniel Webster, ‘ Why delay the declaration? Sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish, I am for it.’

“ Sir, let me suggest a reason or two for this formality of announcement of such a declaration in such a platform. In the first place, our predecessors of the Democratic Convention, in this hall, have made it indispensable. If we do not make it as comprehensive and as unequivocally as they have, we shall be absorbed, scattered! — absorbed by the whirlpool, — scattered by the whirlwind of the sentiment of nationality which they have had the sagacity to discern and hide under. Look at their platform, and see what a multitude of sins of omission and commission, bad policy and no policy, the mantle of national feeling is made not ungracefully to cover. And remember that you may provide a banquet as ample as you will; you may load the board with whatever of delicacy or necessity; you may declare yourselves the promoters of commerce, wheresoever, on salt water or fresh water, she demands your care; the promoters of internal improvements, — of the protection of labor, promising to the farmer of America the market of America, — of peace with all nations, entangling alliances with none, — of progress not by external aggression, but by internal development; spread your board as temptingly as you will, if the national appetite does not find there the bread and water of national life, the aliment of nationality, it will turn from your provisions in disgust.

“Again: some persons object to all such attempt to give sacredness and permanence to any policy of government, or any settlement of any thing by the people. They object to them as useless, as unphilosophical, as mischievous. The compromise measures are nothing, they say, but a law; and, although we think them a very good law, yet better turn them over to the next elections, the next Presidential canvass, the next session of Congress, to take their chance. If they are of God, of nature, of humanity, they will stand anyhow; and if not, they ought not to stand.

“I am not quite of this opinion. I know, indeed, how vain it is to seek to bind a future generation, or even a future day. I see the great stream of progress passing by, on which all things of earth are moving. I listen, awe-struck, to the voice of its rushing. Let all who have eyes to see and ears to hear, see and hear also. Still I believe something may be done at favorable junctures to shape, color, confirm even, so capricious and so mighty a thing as public opinion. This is the theory on which written constitutions are constructed. Why such toil on these, unless in the belief that you may and should seek to embody and fix an important agreement of the national mind, — may for a little space moor the ship against the stream, and insure that when she is swept from that mooring, she may not be instantly shattered, but float with some safety, and under some control, to the ocean?

“I believe, and have many times asserted and enforced the idea, that if the two great national parties would now, in this most solemn, public, authoritative manner, unite in extracting and excluding this business of the agitation of slavery from their political issues, — if they would adjudge, decree, and proclaim that this is all a capital on which a patriotic man, or body of men, may not trade; that the subject is out of the domain of politics, disposed of by the higher law of a common national consent, founded on a regard for the common good, — and that if they would go into the coming and all contests upon their proper and strict political issues, each contending with the other only for the glory of a greater participation in the compromise, much would be done to perpetuate the national peace within, which we now enjoy. Whatever the result of the canvass, and however severely it might be conducted, it would be one great jubilee of Union, in which the discordant voice of sections and fanaticism would be silenced or unheard.

“Let me trouble you with one more reason for adopting this compromise. Sir, let us put it out of our power to be tempted, in the excitement of this election, to press the claims of our candidate in one part of the country on the ground that his success will extinguish agitation, and to press the claims of the same candidate in another part of it on the ground that his success will promote agitation. As gentlemen and men of honor and honest men, let us take the utmost security against this. Who does not hang down his head in advance with shame, at the fraud and falsehood exemplified in going into one locality and crying out of the Northern side of our mouths, ‘No platform! — agitation for ever! — ours is the candidate of progress and freedom!’ And then going into another and shouting through the Southern side, ‘All right! — we are the party of compromise! — we have got no platform, to be sure, but Mr. So-and-so has got a first-rate letter in his breeches-pocket, and Mr. So-and-so is vehemently believed to have one in his, — either of them as good as half a dozen platforms.’ Pray, if you love us, put us into no such position as this. Lead us not into such temptation, and deliver us from such evil. How much better to send up the Union flag at once to each masthead, blazing with ‘Liberty and Union, now and for ever, one and inseparable,’ and go down even so!”

The effect of this speech upon the audience, who frequently interrupted him with enthusiastic applause, was indescribable. After the cheering had somewhat subsided, remarks were made by several members of the Convention, and a running conversation for some time kept up concerning the letter of General Scott, till finally one was produced and read. Mr. Botts, of Virginia, in the course of his remarks criticised Mr. Choate for an implied imputation upon General Scott, and an implied commendation of Mr. Webster. He closed by asking whether he should move the adoption of the resolutions and call for the previous question, saying, however, that he would not do so, even at the request of the entire Convention, if the gentleman from Massachusetts felt aggrieved at his remarks and desired to respond. There were loud cries for "Choate." "First," says one who was present, "by his friends of the Convention, then by his partisans on the floor, and then by the gay galleries. The chorus was immense, imperative, and determined." After some hesitancy he at last rose, and in a tone of imperial grace said, "I shall endeavor to keep within the rule laid down by the chairman. I beg to assure gentlemen that nothing in the world was further from my intention than to enter upon any eulogy of that great man, my friend of so many years, whose name is as imperishably connected with a long series of all the civil glories of his country as it is with this last and greatest of his achievements. I assure you, Sir, upon my honor, and I assure the gentleman from Virginia on my honor also, that I rose solely and simply to express, in the briefest possible terms, the convictions of myself and of many gentlemen here on the merits of the general subject itself without appreciating what possible influence the remarks I might submit would exert on the chances of this, that, or the other eminent person for receiving the nomination of the Convention."

Being interrupted here by a question from Mr. Botts, "Whether he understood the gentleman rightly as saying that he did not mean to depreciate any other candidate, when speaking of that one who was his first choice," he proceeded, "I meant to present a sound argument to the Convention, to the end that this Convention might stand committed as men of honor everywhere. I say, here and everywhere, give us that man, and you will promote peace and suppress agitation; and if you give us any other, you have no assurance at all that that agitation will be suppressed.

"I am suspected of having risen to pay a personal compliment to that great name with which I confess my heart is full to bursting, because I stand here, according to my measure, to praise and defend the great system of policy which the unanimous judgment of this Convention has approved, or is about to approve and promulgate. Ah, Sir, what a reputation that must be, — what a patriotism that must be, — what a long and brilliant series of public services that must be, when you cannot mention a measure of utility like this but every eye spontaneously turns to, and every voice spontaneously utters, that great name of DANIEL WEBSTER!

"I have done, Sir. I have no letter to present, written last week, or the week before last. Mr. Webster's position on this question dates where the peace of the country had its final consummation, on the 7th of March, 1850.

"But, Sir, I did not intend to electioneer in the slightest degree. If my friend from Virginia will recall the course of my observations, he will find that I confined myself exclusively to the defence of the measure itself. But so it is that there is some such reputation that you cannot stand up and ask for glory and blessing, and honor and power, or length of days upon America, but you seem to be electioneering for that great reputation."

The scene that followed was one of intense enthusiasm. Bouquets were thrown at the feet of the orator, and every demonstration made which could indicate homage and delight. All were amazed at the ingenuity of the speech as well as captivated by its eloquence. The platform was adopted by a vote of 227 to 66.

There was another speech made by Mr. Choate during the sitting of the Convention, at a private entertainment given by the Massachusetts members to some of those from the South-west, which is said to have produced the greatest delight and enthusiasm. The gathering was arranged with the hope that it might lead the Southerners to cast their votes for Mr. Webster. Mr. Choate had not been consulted; the heat of the weather was intense, and he had gone to bed with a sick-headache. One of his friends went to him and asked him to be present. "It is impossible," he replied, "I am too ill to hold up my head. I have not strength to say a word." He was told that he need say but little, and that it was for Mr. Webster, — his last chance of influencing the delegates in favor of that just and grand nomination. On this view of the case he immediately assented, rose and went to the table. He was too unwell to take any thing, and spoke but about fifteen minutes. I have never heard what he said; it may be imagined by those who knew his love for Mr. Webster, and his deep sense of the injustice likely to be done him; but it carried away that little audience as with a whirlwind. They seemed half beside themselves, — sprang from their seats, jumped upon the chairs and benches, broke their glasses, and acted like wild men. But the efforts of the friends of Mr. Webster were without avail. The Southern members offered to come with one hundred and six votes, when forty votes should be obtained from the North; but so firmly determined were some of the Northern delegates, that this number could not be found. The vote for Mr. Webster never exceeded thirty-two. At the fifty-third ballot Gen. Scott received the nomination.

In August, 1852, Mr. Choate addressed the Phi Beta Kappa Society of the University of Vermont, on the "Intervention of the New World in the affairs of the Old;—the Duty, the Limitations, and the Modes." It was high-toned, conservative, and wise. The subject was suggested by recent events in the East, and especially by the visit of Kossuth to this country. The oration opened with the following tribute to the eloquent Hungarian.

"To his eye who observes the present of our own country, and of the age, heedfully, — looking before and after, every day offers some incident which first awakens a vivid emotion, and then teaches some great duty. Contemplate, then, a single one of such a class of incidents; give room to the emotions it stirs; gather up the lessons of which it is full.

"On the fifth day of the last December, there came to this land a man of alien blood, of foreign and unfamiliar habit, costume, and accent; yet the most eloquent of speech, according to his mode, — the most eloquent by his history and circumstances, — the most eloquent by his mission and topics, whom the world has, for many ages, seen; and began among us a brief sojourn, — began, say rather, a brief and strange, eventful pilgrimage, which is just now concluded. Imperfect in his mastery of our tongue, — he took his first lessons in the little room over the barrack-gate of Buda, a few months before, — his only practice in it had been a few speeches to quite uncritical audiences in Southampton, in Birmingham, Manchester, and Guildhall; bred in a school of taste and general culture with which our Anglo-Saxon training has little affinity and little sympathy; the representative and impersonation, though not, I believe, the native child, of a race from the East, planted some centuries ago in Europe, but Oriental still as ever, in all but its Christianity; the pleader of a cause in which we might seem to be as little concerned as in the story of the lone Pelops or that of Troy divine, coming before us even such — that silver voice, that sad abstracted eye, before which one image seemed alone to hover, one procession to be passing, the fallen Hungary — the ‘unnamed demigods,’ her thousands of devoted sons; that earnest and full soul, laboring with one emotion, has held thousands and thousands of all degrees of susceptibility; the coldness and self-control of the East — the more spontaneous sympathies of the West — the masses in numbers without number — Women — Scholars — our greatest names in civil places — by the seashore — in banquet halls — in halls of legislation — among the memories of Bunker Hill, everywhere, he has held all, with a charm as absolute as that with which the Ancient Mariner kept back the bridal guest after the music of the marriage feast had begun.

“The tribute of tears and applaudings; the tribute of sympathy and of thoughts too deep for applaudings, too deep for tears, have attested his sway. For the first time since the transcendent genius of DEMOSTHENES strove with the downward age of Greece; or since the Prophets of Israel announced — each tone of the hymn grander, sadder than before — the successive footfalls of the approaching Assyrian beneath whose spear the Law should cease and the vision be seen no more; our ears, our hearts, have drunk the sweetest, most mournful, most awful of the words which man may ever utter, or may ever hear — the eloquence of an Expiring Nation.

“For of all this tide of speech, flowing without ebb, there was one source only. To one note only was the harp of this enchantment strung. It was an appeal not to the interests, not to the reason, not to the prudence, not to the justice, not to the instructed conscience of America and England; but to the mere emotion of sympathy for a single family of man oppressed by another — contending to be free — cloven down on the field, yet again erect; her body dead, her spirit incapable to die; the victim of treachery; the victim of power; the victim of intervention; yet breathing, sighing, lingering, dying, hoping, through all the pain, the bliss of an agony of glory! For this perishing nation — not one inhabitant of which we ever saw; on whose territory we had never set a foot; whose books we had never read; to whose ports we never traded; not belonging in an exact sense to the circle of independent States; a province rather of an Empire which alone is known to international law and to our own diplomacy; for this nation he sought pity — the intervention, the armed intervention, the material aid of pity; and if his audiences could have had their will, he would have obtained it, without mixture or measure, to his heart's content!

“When shall we be quite certain again that the lyre of Orpheus did not kindle the savage nature to a transient discourse of reason, — did not suspend the labors and charm the pains of the damned, — did not lay the keeper of the grave asleep, and win back Eurydice from the world beyond the river, to the warm, upper air?”

“And now that this pilgrimage of romance is ended, the harp hushed, the minstrel gone, let us pause a moment and attend to the lessons and gather up the uses of the unaccustomed performance.”

Immediately after this college anniversary he made a brief journey to Quebec, going along the accustomed line of travel by Montreal and the St. Lawrence, and retracing his way along the same line quite to New York. This naturally led him to the places distinguished in the earlier wars, at most of which he stopped, refreshing and verifying his knowledge, kindling anew his patriotism at every hallowed spot, from the Falls of Montmorenci, and the Plains of Abraham, to the mouth of the Hudson. The weather was delightful, and the trip altogether invigorating to both body and mind.

In the fall of this year, the country suffered a loss, the greatness of which time alone can disclose. Mr. Choate felt it not only as an irreparable public calamity, but as a personal bereavement, for which there was no remedy.

From the Baltimore Convention the friends of Mr. Webster returned with an uncontrollable feeling of disappointment and with a deep sense of wrong. But before the day of election, he, for whom they had struggled, had closed his eyes for ever upon this earth. Mr. Webster died on the 24th of October. On the 28th, the members of the Suffolk Bar presented to the United States Circuit Court, then in session, a series of resolutions expressive of their sense of the loss, and Mr. Choate with other eminent lawyers addressed the court. He spoke with entire quietness of manner, and with the deepest feeling, and his words seem to contain the germs of almost all the eulogies afterwards pronounced upon the great New England statesman.

As soon as a sense of propriety would allow, Mr. Choate received solicitations from very respectable bodies in different parts of the country, to deliver a more formal and extended eulogy. He accepted that which came first, from the Faculty and Students of Dartmouth College, influenced still more, perhaps, by his deep and truly filial affection for the place. After the announcement of this was made public, he received a letter from a gentleman in Connecticut, suggesting resemblance between Mr. Webster and some other eminent men, particularly Sir Walter Scott. The following is his answer : —

TO E. JACKSON, ESQ., Middletown, Conn.

“ BOSTON, 10th Dec. 1852.

“ DEAR SIR, — I was extremely struck and gratified by the kindness of your note to me, and by the parallel which it suggested and pursued. Scarcely any thing in literary or public biography is more curious or just. I mentioned the thought to Mr. Curtis, — Geo. T. Curtis, — on whom it made instantly the same impression. I think the patriotism of Fox was less trustworthy (having regard to his stormy ambition), and his character less balanced and dignified. He had less eloquent feeling too, and less poetical feeling, and no veneration, and his whole intellectual toil was one mighty tempestuous debate. In naturalness, warmth of heart, and prodigious general ability in political affairs and public speech, he does remind us of Mr. Webster.

“But to Scott the likeness is quite remarkable. I can add nothing to your conception of it, — but of that I shall try to profit. Mr. Curtis told me that ‘if Mr. Jackson could have heard Mr. Webster’s conversations with regard to keeping the Marshfield estate in the family, he would have been more forcibly reminded of Scott.’ Both felt the desire to be founders; neither won fortune, nor transmitted inheritances in lands. Both made deep and permanent impressions wholly useful on their time and the next; and both linked themselves — shall we say for ever? — to the fondest affections as well as reasonable regards of very intellectual races.

“I am, with great respect, your servant and friend,

“RUFUS CHOATE.”

The treatment which Mr. Webster received at the Baltimore Convention had alienated many Whigs at the North, and inclined them to vote for the Democratic electors. Mr. Choate’s position will be indicated by the following letter:—

“TO HARVEY JEWELL, Esq., President of the Young Men’s Whig Club.

“BOSTON, 30th October, 1852.

“DEAR SIR, — I certainly can have no unwillingness to repeat quite formally, what I have informally said so many times to so many of our friends.

“That I regretted very keenly our failure to place Mr. Webster in nomination, I, of course, have never disguised. So much, too, did I love him, and so much, so filially — perhaps for him so unnecessarily — desire, that in all things his feelings might be respected, his claims acknowledged, and the effect of the proceedings of the Convention on him mitigated, that, although I have ever deemed those proceedings as obliging my vote as a Whig, yet I had decided that it would not be decorous or right, having respect to those relations with him, which have been and are in their memory so dear to me, to take any active part in setting on the head of any other the honors which he had earned.

“But that the true interests of the country, as our party has ever apprehended those interests, require, in the actual circumstances, the election of the eminent person who is our regular candidate, I cannot doubt. As a Whig, still a Webster Whig, — standing at his grave and revering his memory, I think that more of his spirit, more of his maxims of government, more of his liberal conservatism, more peace, a more assiduous culture of that which we have, with no reckless grasping for that which we have not, would preside in the administration of Gen. Scott than in that of his Democratic competitor for the Presidency.

“There are good men who esteemed Mr. Webster and Mr. Clay so highly and justly, as to hope that while they lived, although out of office, their counsels would still be of power to repress the tendencies to evil, which they fear from the ascendancy of our political opponents. But now that those lights are passed and set, must we not all, and those of us with a special solicitude, who followed them with most confidence, turn to others, whose associations and ties of party, whose declared opinions, whose conduct of affairs, and whose antecedents afford the surest trust that their practical politics will be those which we have so advisedly adopted, and so long professed? With these politics, and the great party representing them, Gen. Scott is identified. His election would pledge his character and honor to seek through them, and by them, the common good and general welfare, and there is no reason to doubt that the convictions of his judgment would guide him by the same path. Certainly he is a Whig; and he has rendered the country great services, in important conjunctures, in war and peace.

“It is quite needless to say, then, that I shall vote for the regularly nominated Whig ticket of electors. He, — the best beloved, the most worthy, — is in his grave. Duty subsists, still and ever, and I am entirely persuaded that duty requires of me this vote.

“I am, respectfully, your obd't serv't,

“RUFUS CHOATE.”

The regular correspondents of Mr. Choate were few. He had not much time to give up even to that society which was most attractive. Of those to whom he wrote with the freedom of a warm and sympathizing friendship were Hon. Charles Eames and Mrs. Eames. A few of these letters have been kindly placed at my disposal.

“BOSTON, Dec. 4th, 1852.

“MY DEAR MRS. E.,— . . . You were wholly right, and not the less kind, to assume an explanation of my silence consistent with my fixed and enhancing appreciation of your friendship. . . .

“I have been here occasionally and hurriedly only, since I last wrote you; but my chief time and duties have been engaged to my mother, on the verge of a timely grave, yet sick beyond the mere inflictions of eighty years. She is living yet, and better. . . .

“Till yesterday I had nourished a secret, but great thought of just running on to Washington for four days, not to supersede, but to prepare for my January visit. Likewise, I could not go. . . .

“I am to congratulate you, and Mr. Eames, personally, on the election which he has influenced so much. May every reward he would seek be his. Choose wisely and well, and above all fix your hearts on something at home. But why should I grudge you the Fortunate Isles, the Boulevards, Damascus rose cinctured, if you wish it? Give my love to him. Wish Mr. Davis and Mr. Everett well. ‘Pray (as poor Mr. Webster said) for the peace of Jerusalem,’ and especially for your attached friend,

“RUFUS CHOATE.”

Early in 1853, Mr. Choate lost his aged and venerable mother. He always retained for her the most filial respect and affection, and although her death, at her advanced age, was not unexpected, it filled him with deep sorrow. Almost at the same time he received from Governor Clifford the offer of the Attorney-Generalship of the State. This he accepted, not for its emoluments, — which were inconsiderable, while the labor was great, — but partly because he considered it an honorable position, and in part because he was desirous of being freed from a certain class of distasteful cases which he did not feel quite at liberty to decline. The great labor in this office arose from the fact that judicial interpretation of the liquor law of 1852, popularly called the “Maine Law,” became necessary, and a large number of cases came under his charge for argument, some of them involving grave constitutional questions. To the study of these cases he devoted much time and labor. The criminal nisi prius trials he disliked; and this, together with certain mere drudgeries of office, caused him to resign his commission after holding it a little more than a year.

On the 3d of May, 1853, the third convention of the delegates of the people of Massachusetts met in Boston to revise the Constitution of the State. It is doubtful whether an abler body of men ever assembled in the State. Every county sent its best and wisest citizens. The convention continued its sessions till the 1st of August. The subjects brought into discussion were fundamental to the being and prosperity of States. In this dignified and weighty assembly Mr. Choate spoke on some of the most important questions, and never without commanding the highest respect. His speeches on the Basis of Representation, and on the Judiciary were listened to with profound interest, and will rank with the best specimens of deliberative eloquence.

During this summer, and in the midst of various distracting public and professional duties, he caught time as he could, for preparing the eulogy upon Mr. Webster. How he wrote it may be inferred from a little anecdote furnished by one who subsequently became a member of his family by marrying his youngest daughter.¹ "I returned from Europe," he says, "in 1853, and reached Boston the 7th of July. I went to Mr. Choate's house about nine o'clock that evening, and found him in his chamber reclining in bed in a half-sitting posture. On his knees rested an atlas, lying obliquely; in his left hand he held a lamp, while another was balanced on a book; in his right hand was his pen. He playfully excused himself for not shaking hands with me, saying that he feared the sharp reproaches of Mrs. C. if he should by any mischance spill the oil. On my asking him what, at that time of night, and in that singular position, he was doing, he said he was trying to get a few things together to say at Dartmouth College in relation to Mr. Webster. He had put it off so long, he said, was so hampered with work at his office, and had to give so much time to the Constitutional Convention, then in session, that he had almost made up his mind to write to the officers of the college asking to be let off. 'If I deliver it,' he added, 'it will be wholly inadequate to the theme.' He did deliver it, however, but he said to me the day before he went to Dartmouth, that any friend of his would stay away, for, although so much time was given to write it in, it was one of the most hurried things he had ever done."

With the high ideal that was before his mind, to him "much meditating" on the greatness of Mr.

¹ Edward Ellerton Pratt, Esq.

Webster, and feeling how interwoven was his life with the later history of the country, it is not surprising that he felt the insufficiency of any eulogy. Yet one would be at a loss to know where, in all the records of such eloquence, for fulness, suggestiveness, and discrimination, for richness and vitality, for beauty of language and felicity of allusion, for compactness and for amplification, to find another to equal it.

TO HIS DAUGHTER SARAH.

“Monday, August, 1853.

“DEAR SALLIE,—The accompanying letter came to me to-day, and I send it with alacrity. I wish you would study calligraphy in it, if what I see not is as well written as what I do. I got quietly home, to a cool, empty house, unvexed of mosquito, sleeping to the drowsy cricket. It lightened a little, thundered still less, and rained half an hour; but the sensation, the consciousness that the Sirian-tartarean summer is really gone — though it is sad that so much of life goes too — is delightful. Next summer will probably be one long April or October. By the way, the dream of the walnut grove and the light-house is finished. They will not sell, and the whole world is to choose from yet.¹ I see and hear nothing of nobody. I bought a capital book to-day by Bungener, called ‘Voltaire and his Times,’ fifty pages of which I have run over. He is the author of ‘Three Sermons under Louis XV.’ and is keen, bright, and just, according to my ideas, as far as I have gone. My course this week is rudely broken in upon by the vileness and vulgarity of business, and this day has been lean of good books and rich thoughts, turning chiefly on whether charcoal is an animal nuisance, and whether Dr. Manning’s will shall stand. Still, Rufus will be glad to hear I read my Æschines and Cicero and German Martial, and, as I have said, this Bungener.

“I wish you would all come home; that is, that your time had arrived. Pick up, dear daughter, health, nerves, and self-trust, and come here to make the winter of our discontent glorious summer.

“Thank your dear mother and Rufus for their letter. I hope for Minnie a neck without a crick, and a lot without a crook, if one may be so jinglesome. One of the Choates of Salem called in my absence,—if Daniel did not see a doppelgänger, in a dream,—but which, where he is, what he wants, where he goes, or how he fares, I know not. I would invite him to dine, if I knew where he was. Best love to all. Tell your mother I don't believe I shall write her for two or three days, but give her, and all, my love. I like the court-house prospect and the Bucolical cow, and verdant lawn much, as Minnie says. Good-by, all. R. C."

¹ Referring to a project of purchasing a site for building at Essex.

During this autumn, his health, which, with the exception of severe headaches, had been generally good, occasioned himself and his friends some anxiety. He alludes to it in the following letters:—

TO MRS. EAMES.

"BOSTON, Nov. 13, 1853.

"MY DEAR MRS. EAMES,— . . . I had a narrow escape from going just now to New York, and then taking a flying aim at Washington. The Doctors and I have changed all that, and resolved that instead of any such unsatisfactory splurging, I should go quietly to Washington, like a grave citizen and elderly lawyer, and make, as it were, a business of it, see my friends, try a case, go to the theatre and the levee, and all the rest of it, say in December or January. . . . I have come quite near being placed among the Emeritus Professors in the great life university,—that reserved and lamentable corps, whose 'long day is done,' and who may sleep.

"There again the Doctors and I were too much for them, and I am all right again, with injunctions to do but little, nor do that little long, at a time. Such a change of life sets me thinking, which is disagreeable, and resolving, which only paves bad places with good intentions. . . .

"I must say I think your administration— toil though it does and spin—is not yet arrayed with all the glory of Solomon, or even of the lilies of the field.

"Yours truly,

R. CHOATE.

"P. S.— Mr. Everett is rising in my telescope."

TO MRS. EAMES.

"BOSTON, Dec. 17, 1853.

"MY DEAR MRS. EAMES, — I took the liberty yesterday to address to you the first two volumes of Lord J. Russell's 'Moore,' and to ask our Little & Brown to include it in their collections for the Washington Express. Mine I have not yet received, but I promise myself that the thing will have some interest with those old people at least who began life, as I did, upon 'I Saw from the Beach,' 'Vale of Avoca,' 'Erin-go-Bragh,' and all the rest of it. Whether it will for you, I fear and doubt, yet you will agree that we have never seen and never shall see any thing like that glorious constellation of poets which illustrated the first twenty-five or thirty years of this century, and which has set to the last star. Beaming brightly and singing like a seraph, sometimes, among these lights was poor Moore. Therefore I hope the package will go safely and come regularly to hand, as the merchants' clerks do write.

"My visit to Washington recedes like any horizon. Mr. Davis has me in charge, but any time after the 10th of January, if he bids me come, I come. Please to entreat him to hasten that day, as he hopes to have his eulogy read and appreciated.

"Our winter has come frosty but kindly. Thus far, as a mere matter of cold, heat, snow, it is as good as a Washington winter. I do not say that it presents just the same aggregate and intensity of moral, social, and personal interest.

"Please give my best regards to Mr. Eames and all friends.

"Most truly yours, R. CHOATE."

The following letter to Mr. Everett (then a member of the United States Senate), with its reference to topics of great national importance, will explain itself: —

TO HON. EDWARD EVERETT.

"BOSTON, Feb. 4, 1854.

"DEAR SIR, — I have not delayed to answer your letter for want of interest in the subject, and still less from want of strong personal desire that your own course should be as fortunate as it will be conspicuous and influence. But in truth, I did not know enough of the whole ground of opinion and duty and hazards, to make my suggestions of real value, and yet, good for nothing else, they might mislead. Meantime, as far as I can possibly discern, the whole free world of the United States seems likely to demand the observance of the Missouri Compromise. I must say, that I think that a speech and a course adhering to that great adjustment, and reconciling that with the compromises of 1850, will be claimed here, and I should be amazed and grieved if this could do harm anywhere. Yet for myself, I should consult the spirit of the proceeding of 1850 and execute that, whithersoever it led. But I cannot yet see how that should demand such a measure as this of Mr. Douglas.

“The result, with me and with all here, is that we feel the deepest solicitude that you should not be drawn into a position which can impair your large prospects, and that we hope you may defeat the further extension of slavery on grounds and by reasonings that will not lose you one American heart or judgment anywhere.

“I am most truly,

“Your servant and friend,

“RUFUS CHOATE.”

A few letters here to his son, then a student in Amherst College, and to his daughter Sarah, will give us an insight into the thoughts and ways of home.

TO RUFUS CHOATE, JR.

“BOSTON Feb. 13, 1854. Monday morning, six o'clock.

“MY DEAREST SON, — I am afraid the élite of Amherst are not stirring quite so early as this, but as my writing here by my lamp does not disturb you, and as I think of you always, but with peculiar interest and love when I look round my study at this early hour, I will say a word while M. is waiting for the coach to carry him to the Portland cars.

“I have had a very fatiguing winter, contending — as the French bulletins used to say when badly beaten — ‘with various success.’ However, I have had my share of causes, and my chief grief, after S.’s sickness, has been that I have had so little time for literary readings. Euripides stands neglected on the shelf, Alcestis dying alone, and the last days of Augustus are as if Tacitus had not recorded them with his pen of steel. You are happier in having days and nights for the most delightful of all things, the studies of college. My dear son, make much of this fleeting hour, and all future exertions and acquirements will be easy. . . . To see you come out of college affectionate, true, pure, and a good scholar, to begin the law at Cambridge with hope and ambition, is the desire which more than all else gives interest to my future. . . . M. has gone. Daniel appears with the newspapers; it approaches sunrise, and I must turn to prepare for 'Gray et al. v. Coburn,' for the hour and a quarter before breakfast. Good-by."

TO HIS DAUGHTER SARAH.

"BOSTON, July 9 [1854].

"DEAREST SALLIE, — I was delighted to find your letter and mother's on my return from the broiled, though sea-girt Nantucket. I will not say that I could read a word of it, before the affectionate and craving Helen carried it off, — snatched it, as one may say, from the unsated parental jaws. But at dinner with her to-day I shall recover it interpreted.

"I am sorry the geography is a failure. Astronomy and St. Pierre — stars and harmonies of earth, I hope will enable you to support the necessary delay in finding another. Meantime the Russian war is going to end; the Turkish moons are at the full; and except Kansas and Nebraska, no spot of earth has a particle of interest adscititious, present, and transient — though all must be generally known, or 'history her ample page rich with the spoils of time,' inadequately unrolls. I much fear that we are doomed to more of Malte Brun and of the crust of the earth. I will look, however.

"I am rebuked at finding that the great treatises on Will and Sin were not written at West Stockbridge, after all. It follows, first, that so much of our ride was what Rufus calls a sell; secondly, that the most arrogant memories will fail — be nonplussed — the characters, the imagery, as Locke says, fading out of this brass and marble; and thirdly, that all external beauty of scenery is mainly created and projected from within. How still and studious looked West Stockbridge — and now what a poor, little, half-starved saw-mill of a situation it is!

‘The enchanted earth lost half its lustre;
The great magician’s dead.’

I will be confident of nothing again — ‘that’s Poz,’ as Miss Edgeworth’s story — or somebody’s, has it.

“Sallie, if it is cool in Lenox — if there is one cool spot; yea, if there is a place where by utmost effort of abstraction, you can think upon the frosty Caucasus; upon the leaves of aspen in motion; upon any mockery or mimicry of coolness and zephyrs, be glad. Our house glows like a furnace; the library seems like a stable of brazen, roasting bulls of Phalaris, tyrant of Agrigentum — of whom you read in De Quincey; and I woo sleep on three beds and a sofa in vain. All would be sick here — and I already am, or almost so.

“I hope the Astronomy engages you, and the St. Pierre. Botany and other natural history will soothe you, dear child, when the burning and suggestive words of mere literature sting as serpents. Good-by, dear fille. R. C.”

TO RUFUS CHOATE, JR.

“BOSTON, July 19, 1854.

“DEAREST SON,—I was grieved when I got home to find what an inhospitable time you had of it. If you had hinted your purpose, Helen surely would have welcomed you. I could not, for I was melting beneath the Nantucket courthouse. Next time let us know, that we may make your shortest vacation pleasant. Yesterday I ought to have been at Washington. What they have done I know not. If my friends carried an adjournment it is well. If not, the Library fuit, as the expressive perfect tense has it.

“I was very sorry that I could not stay longer in your poor little pleasant room, and seem to get more into your college intimate life. It glides away so fast, and is so delightful a portion of the whole term of life, that I should envy every day and hour. I prized mine. Yet now, as the poet says, it is my grief that I prized it no more. . . . They will rejoice to see you at Lenox, where I hope to meet you. The cool weather of the 4th continues, and seems likely to, till men call on Caucasus to bury them and done with it.”

TO RUFUS CHOATE, JR.

"BOSTON, 24 Sept. [1854.]

"MY DEAR, DEAR SON, — You were very good to write me, and if I had not been rather harder at work than ever before, I should have written sooner. I have just finished an insurance trial of some ten or eleven days, very scraggly and ticklish — though a just claim — and won it, against a very strong charge of the judge. Then came another insurance cause, where J. and I were for the office, def't, — and had the luck to get that too, in three or four hours. I had to snatch any moment to write a little address for Danvers. Altogether, therefore, I am utterly prostrated and unstrung. I would give a thousand dollars, if I could afford it, for an undisturbed rest of a week. The house is now in most perfect order. If dear mother, Sallie, Minnie, and you were here, it would be more perfect even.

TO HIS DAUGHTER SARAH.

"Sept. [1854.]

"MY DEAR SALLIE, — You were a special good girl to write me — pausing among so many grand spectacles, laughing girls, and moustached artists — if that is the French of it — and I should have written before if I had not been 'blowed.' I was 'overworked' for about twelve days, and up to yesterday morning, when I came out of the pestilential court-house to compose an address on Knowledge, for Danvers. The topic is new and the thoughts rise slowly and dubious. However, I shall go through this also — as a thief through a horse-pond — in the simile of Lord Chancellor Thurlow.

"The autumn here now outshines itself. Such skies and such unblanched green leafiness, and occasional peach and plum, I have never seen. Our grapery is, as it were, Florentine and Mantuanical; but for mere eating I have preferred such as you buy of the common dealers in the article. Lately I have given no dinners. I have in fact for ten days not dined at home, but at the restaurant. To-morrow I hope to be at home. I never saw the house so clean, lovely, still, and homelike. They have washed every thing — unless it is Cicero and Demosthenes, and it seems to me their very bronze seems sleek, fleshly, and cleansed. My books are all bound, and all up — and if mother and you were here, and Minnie, and I could rest, rest, rest, one day — one week — stock still — still as a ‘statute’ — I should be too happy.

“I have just written your mother suggesting, 1st, whether she is ever coming home; 2d, when, if ever, she is coming; 3d, what money it will take to come, to bring honey, also you, and any ‘Jew or Jewess.’

“Good-by, poor dear roe, hart, and pelican upon the mountains. I look at the picture in the dining-room daily, and wonder if you see sights so brilliant and light — then turn again to my baked apple, farina, or what not.

“Good-by, dear pet. I have had three nights to sleep in your room. All well at Helen’s. Your Vater.”

In September, 1854, Mr. Choate delivered the address at the dedication of the Peabody Institute in South Danvers. This institution was founded by the munificence of Geo. Peabody, Esq., of London, and from the first was regarded with great interest by Mr. Choate, who watched with sincere pleasure the prosperity of the town where he commenced his professional life, and which conferred upon him his first honors. The year was otherwise filled with the ordinary labors of the law.

In the mean time his friend Mr. Eames had been appointed Minister-Resident at Caraccas.

TO MR. EVERETT.

“WINTHROP PLACE, Oct. 9, 1854.

“MY DEAR SIR, — I thank you for your kind invitation, and should have the truest pleasure in accepting it, but I am so much the victim of an urgent and ignominious malice — as Mr. S. Smith might say, — that I am cruelly forbidden all such opportunity.

“You are more than kind to the Danvers affair. And really, because one is not an Academician, is he not therefore to be indulged in his occasional platitudes and commonplaces?

“I am most truly

“Your servant and friend,

“RUFUS CHOATE.”

TO MRS. EAMES.

"BOSTON, 31st Oct. 1854.

"MY DEAR MRS. EAMES, — I have been imagining through all these divine days, how supreme must be the beauty on all things about you — and have sighed for the sight of all that scene in your company again. Meanwhile the leaf falls, and the last lark will send up his note of farewell; the school-ma'am will have recovered, and the school-house will be coming alive with the various hubbub of childhood, and the time draws on when you will go, perhaps to look back from a grander Nature to that plain New England solitude which you have found, and made, so delightful — to look back homesick and with affectionate sadness. . . .

"I have seen Mr. Everett once, and had a most pleasant hour — not unmingled with pain. He looks despondingly outward; and I think his personal hopes are turning from politics and their bubble reputation. In his library, he seems to sit above all annoyance, at the centre of all reasonable felicities — a happy and great character, who may yet write his name for ever on our history.

"I hope all your little, and thrice dear children are well, and give you no alarm. They seem well, happy, and of rare goodness and interest. If it should so happen that I can by any possibility see you and Mr. Eames before you go — if go you must — I mean to do it — here — or at New Braintree, or in New York. . . .

"Yours truly,

"R. CHOATE."

Notwithstanding his labors and periodical suffering from sick-headaches, Mr. Choate's general health was good. A strong constitution and vigorous frame enabled him to endure a vast amount of work without injury. But early in 1855 he met with an accident which confined him for several months to his house and for much of the time to his room. While at Dedham during the trial of a cause, he hit his knee against the corner of a table. This brought on an inflammation of the joint, which became complicated with other ailments, to which time only could bring relief.¹ During this period of seclusion, he was not cut off from the solace of his library, nor entirely unable to study. He never more fully enjoyed the society of his friends, giving himself up freely to those whom he loved. Mr. Everett, particularly, used to visit him regularly two or three times a week, sometimes to bring a new book, sometimes to impart intelligence, not generally known, always to bring sunlight to the quiet library of the invalid. So much interested had both become in this unwonted familiarity, that on Mr. Choate's resuming his professional labors, Mr. Everett remarked to him, that, for his own sake, he could only wish one thing, namely, that he might hurt his knee again. To that friendly interest Mr. Choate alludes in one of the following letters, both bearing the same date:—

TO HON. CHARLES EAMES.

“BOSTON, 29th June, 1855.

“DEAR MR. EAMES, — I doubt if you see a brighter sun or drink a balmier air than I do to-day, but I hope you are as well as the rosy-fingered June of New England could make you. Our summer, they say, is cool and backward; but whoso desires any thing diviner than this morning may go farther and fare worse.

“I thank you and Mrs. Eames for your kind remembrances. I have had a pretty sorry spring of it; but it may be accepted for some years of indifferent health in the future. My physicians talk of change of life — renovation — rejuve-nescence and what not — hoc erat in votis certainly — but who knows what shall be on the morrow? . . .

¹ As a result of the accident, he was obliged to submit to a slight surgical operation; but so sensitive was he to physical suffering, that even this made a considerable draft upon his nervous energies. He took ether, and afterwards remarked to a friend, that “it was very pleasant till the moment of utterly surrendering consciousness, — then death itself could not have been more awful.”

“Your estate is gracious that keeps you out of hearing of our politics. Any thing more low — obscene — feculent — the manifold oceanic heavings of history have not cast up. We shall come to the worship of onions — cats — and things vermiculate. ‘Renown and grace are dead.’ ‘There’s nothing serious in mortality.’ If any wiser saw or instance, ancient or modern, occurred to me to express the enormous impossible inanity of American things, I should utter it. Bless your lot then, which gives you to volcanoes, earthquakes, feather-cinctured chiefs, and dusky sights of the tropics. I wish I was there with all my heart — that I do —

“After all, the Democratic chance is best. The whole South is Pierce’s — I think — so is the foreign vote of the North. So will be Pennsylvania, I guess. . . .

“I write to Mrs. Eames and send love to her and the babes.

“I wish you health, happiness, and treaties of immortal peace and fame. Most truly,

“Yours,

“R. CHOATE.”

HON. CHARLES EAMES, &c., &c., &c., Caraccas.

TO MRS. EAMES.

“BOSTON, 29th June, 1855.

“MY DEAR MRS. EAMES, — I have only just got abroad after a confinement of a matter of four months, and, with a hand still tremulous, though I flatter myself legible to the eye of a true friendship, I would send you my love and good wishes — chiefly and first congratulating you upon your safe arrival at that vortex of palms and earthquakes and sea-change. My — our — excellent Mr. Everett has reported with some frequency of you; and here comes a tui case, and a little letter, more tellingly assuring me that your kindness is untravelled, and that you remember and wish to be remembered from the other side of this watery wilderness of separation. . . .

“I have come out of town to-day about three miles to my daughter Bell’s — to ‘lie at large and sing the glories of the circling year’ — as Thomson, or who was he, says — but more particularly and properly to write to you. She and her husband, not expecting me, have gone into Boston; and I am alone in a little library in a garden, held, as it were, to the very breast of June. It is our summer at its best—roses—hens and chickens—green peas—honeysuckle—cocks crowing—a balmy west wind heavy with sweets. I wish, instead of the fierce and gigantic heats and growths and outlandish glory and beauty of Caraccas—whose end is to be burned—you, your children, and Mr. Eames were here—‘pastoral and pathetic’—virtuously and contentedly a smelling of this new-mown hay and walking with me—I, on two crutches—say two sticks—like the title of some beastly French novel—and talking over the old times. You see Boston through the trees, and hear now and then the whistle of invisible cars—otherwise you might fancy yourself fifty thousand globes from cities or steam. These are the places and the moments for that discourse in which is so much more of our happiness than in actualities of duty, or even in hope.

“I look forward with longing to your coming back. Come unchanged all of you—except the children, who are to be bigger, darker, and even handsomer. . . .

“I mean to go out and hear Mr. Everett on the 4th of July, at his native Dorchester. He will outdo himself, and I wish you and Mr. Eames could hear him. He has been inexpressibly kind to me in my confinement.

“I am slowly getting well—nothing remains of it all but a disabled knee, and that is slowly getting well too. . . .

“God bless you all. Write by every wind that comes this way.

“Yours most truly,

“R. CHOATE.”

CHAPTER IX.

1855-1858.

Love of the Union — Letter to the Whig Convention at Worcester, October, 1855 — Letter to Rev. Chandler Robbins — Letter to Mr. Harvey — Letter to Mr. Everett — Lecture on the Early British Poets of this Century, March, 1856 — Sir Walter Scott — Political Campaign of 1856 — Determines to support Mr. Buchanan — Letter to the Whigs of Maine — Address at Lowell — Letter to J. C. Walsh — Professional Position — His Library — Lecture on the Eloquence of Revolutionary Periods, February, 1857 — Defence of Mrs. Dalton — Oration before the Boston Democratic Club, July 4th, 1858.

OF all feelings and sentiments none were stronger in Mr. Choate's mind than the love of country. But it was the whole country, THE ONE UNDIVIDED AND INDIVISIBLE NATION that absorbed his interest. Strongly as he was attached to Massachusetts, — and no son ever loved her with a more filial devotion, — he saw the greatness of the State in the prosperity of the Union. The narrower virtue was always absorbed in the grander. The large and strong patriotism of Washington and Madison and Hamilton and Webster assumed a new intensity in his bosom. Every speech, every lecture, almost every public utterance of his during his later years, is full of this spirit. It was the side on which his sympathies touched those of the Democratic party, far from it as he ever had been, on so many points of national policy. "There are a good many things," he said in a speech at Worcester, in 1848, "that I like in the Democratic party. I like their nationality and their spirit of union, after all. I like the American feeling that pervades the masses." It was this feeling, not merely an intellectual conviction that the Union was necessary for safety and prosperity, but the nationality, the "country's majestic presence," which led him to oppose every political scheme which looked to less than the welfare of the whole. This feeling of patriotism grew stronger and stronger as he saw others apparently indifferent to it, or proposing measures which, by disregarding the interests and feelings of large States, would necessarily tend, as he thought, to make them disloyal.

From the illness of the earlier part of 1855, Mr. Choate recovered sufficiently to enter with some eagerness into the political contests of the autumn. A new party, called, from their secret organization, "Know-nothings," and subsequently claiming the name of "American," had sprung up in several States, and in Massachusetts had made unexpected inroads into both the great parties which, before, had mainly divided the people. The Whigs, however, were not inclined to give up their organization. A convention was holden in Worcester early in October. Mr. Choate was one of the delegates from Boston, and not being able to attend, sent the following letter, the concluding sentence of which has passed into one of the watchwords of patriotism.

LETTER TO THE WHIG CONVENTION AT WORCESTER, MASS.

"BOSTON, Oct. 1, 1855.

"Messrs. Peter Butler, Jr., and Bradley N. Cummings, Secretaries, &c., &c.

"GENTLEMEN, — I discover that my engagements will not allow me to attend the convention to be holden at Worcester to-morrow, and I hope that it is not too late to fill the vacancy.

"I assure the Whigs of Boston that I should have regarded it as a duty and a privilege, if it had been practicable, to serve as one of their delegates. The business which the convention meets to do gives it extraordinary attraction as well as importance.

"Whether we are dead, as reported in the newspapers, or, if not, whether we shall fall upon our own swords and die even so, will be a debate possessing the interest of novelty at least. For one, I deny the death, and object to the suicide, and should be glad to witness the indignation and laughter with which such a question will be taken.

"If there shall be in that assembly any man, who, still a Whig, or having been such, now proposes to dissolve the party, let him be fully heard and courteously answered upon his reasons. Let him declare what party we shall join. Neutrality in any sharp civil dissension is cowardly, immoral, and disreputable. To what party, then, does he recommend us? I take it for granted it will not be to the Democratic; I take it for granted, also, not the American. To what other, then? To that of fusion certainly, to the Republican, — so called, I suppose, because it is organized upon a doctrine, and aims at ends, and appeals to feelings, on which one half of the Republic, by a geographical line, is irreconcilably opposed to the other. Even to that party.

"Let him be heard on his reasons for deserting our connection and joining such an one. To me, the answer to them all, to all such as I have heard, or can imagine, seems ready and decisive.

"Suppressing entirely all that natural indignation and sense of wounded pride and grief which might be permitted in view of such a proposition to Whigs who remember their history, — the names of the good and wise men of the living and dead, that have illustrated their connection, and served their country through it, — who remember their grand and large creed of Union, the Constitution, peace with honor, nationality, the development and culture of all sources of material growth, the education of the people, the industry of the people, — suppressing the emotions which Whigs, remembering this creed and the fruits it has borne, and may yet bear, might well feel towards the tempter and the temptation, the answer to all the arguments for going into fusion is at hand. It is useless, totally, for all the objects of the fusionist, assuming them to be honest and constitutional, — useless and prejudicial to those objects; and it is fraught, moreover, with great evil. What are the objects of the fusionist? To restore the violated compromise, or, if he cannot effect that, to secure to the inhabitants, bonâ fide such, of the new territory the unforced choice of the domestic institutions which they prefer, a choice certain, in the circumstances of that country now or soon to close it against slavery for ever. These, unless he courts a general disturbance and the revelry of civil ‘battle-fields,’ are his object; and when he shall prove that fusion will send to Congress men who will labor with more zeal and more effect to these ends than such Whigs as Mr. Walley is, or as Mr. Rockwell was, — with a truer devotion to liberty — more obedient to the general sentiment and the specific exactions of the free States — with a better chance to touch the reason and heart, and win the co-operation of good men in all sections, — when he proves this, you may believe him. We know that the Whig representatives of Massachusetts in Congress do and must completely express the anti-slavery sentiment of Massachusetts, so far as they may be expressed under the Constitution. More than this we do not seek to express while there is yet a Constitution. Fusion is needless for the honest objects of the fusionist.

“But the evils of disbanding such a party as ours and substituting such a party as that! See what it fails to do. Here is a new and great political party, which is to govern, if it can, the State of Massachusetts, and to govern, if it can, the American Union. And what are its politics? It has none. Who knows them? Even on the topic of slavery, nobody knows, that I am aware of, what in certain it seeks to do, or how much or how little will content it. Loud in general demonstration, it is silent or evasive on particular details.

“But outside of the topic of slavery, what are its politics? What, in the most general outline, is its creed of national or State policy? How does it interpret the Constitution? What is its theory of State rights? What is its foreign policy? By what measures; by what school of politicians; by what laws or what subjects; by what diplomacy; how, generally, does it propose to accomplish that good, and prevent that evil, and to provide for those wants for which States are formed and government established? Does it know? Does it tell? Are its representatives to go to Congress or the Legislature, to speak and vote on slavery only? If not, on what else, and on which side of it?

“A party, a great political party, without politics, is a novelty indeed. Before the people of this country or State enable it to rule them, they will desire, I fancy, a little more information on these subjects. We all, or almost all, of the Free States who recognize the Constitution, think on slavery substantially alike. Before we make men Presidents and Governors and Senators and Judges and Diplomats, we demand to see what else besides cheap, easy, unavoidable conformity to the sectional faith on that one topic, they can show for themselves.

“We elect them not to deliver written lectures to assenting audiences of ladies and gentlemen, — to kindle the inflammable, and exasperate the angry, — but to perform the duties of practical statesmanship in the most complicated and delicate political system, and the hardest to administer in the world. Let us, at least, then, know their politics. Kept totally in the dark about these, we do know that this party of fusion is, in the truest of all senses, and the worst of all senses, a geographical party. What argument against it can we add to this? Such a party, like war, is to be made when it is necessary. If it is not necessary, it is like war, too, a tremendous and uncompensated evil. When it shall have become necessary, the eternal separation will have begun. That time, that end, is not yet. Let us not hasten, and not anticipate it, by so rash an innovation as this.

“Parties in this country heretofore have helped, not delayed, the slow and difficult growth of a consummated nationality. Our discussions have been sharp; the contest for honor and power keen; the disputes about principles and measures, hot and prolonged. But it was in our country’s majestic presence that we contended. It was from her hand that we solicited the prize. Whoever lost or won, we loved her better. Our allies were everywhere. There were no Alleghanies nor Mississippi rivers in our politics.

“Such was the felicity of our condition, that the very dissensions which rent small republics in twain, welded and compacted the vast fabric of our own. Does he who would substitute for this form of conducting our civil differences a geographical party, completely understand his own work? Does he consider how vast an educational instrumentality the party life and influence compose? Does he forget how the public opinion of a people is created, and that when created it determines their history? All party organization tends towards faction. This is its evil. But it is inseparable from free governments. To choose his political connection aright is the most delicate and difficult duty of the citizen. We have made our choice, and we abide by it. We join ourselves to no party that does not carry the flag and keep step to the music of the Union.

“I am, gentlemen, your fellow-citizen,

“RUFUS CHOATE.”

During the election contest a large meeting of the Whigs of Boston and its vicinity was held in Faneuil Hall. It was addressed, among others, by Mr. Choate, in a strain of lofty and urgent patriotism such as has seldom been heard in a State election. His mind soared to heights from which it saw not the temporary interest of a State alone, nor the success of this or that candidate for honorable office, but “the giant forms of empires” on their way to prosperity or ruin. How deeply his mind was moved is attested not only by the speech itself, but by his future action. The election was not favorable to the Whigs, nor yet to the Republicans. A letter written soon afterwards will incidentally show the means by which he solaced himself under defeat, where not the slightest personal interest was at stake, and what were still his hopes.

TO REV. CHANDLER ROBBINS.

“BOSTON, Nov. 12, 1855.

“DEAR SIR, — Absence from the city since Tuesday has prevented me from expressing my most grateful, my warmest thanks for your note. In the circumstances and feelings of the moment, it was soothing in the highest degree. On a more deliberate reading, and less on personal reasons, it has afforded even more gratification. We are the most fortunate of the nations, and owe the largest debt to humanity, with the perfect certainty of paying it, to one hundred cents on the dollar, with interest, and in the natural lifetime of the State, if we will only consent to live on, and obey the law of normal growth. And yet they would enlist what they call the moral sentiment, and incite us to immediate or certain national self-murder. I rejoice with great joy that such dis-tempered ethics are disowned of a teacher of religion, — a cultivated, humane, and just man; and that a patriotism, whose first care is for the Union, — ‘being, before even well-being,’ — is regarded of such authority as high among the larger virtues.

“I may be permitted to say, that although the details and instruments are less satisfactory than could have been wished, the election is a real victory of intense American feeling, in which even you may have pleasure. I think it leaves only two great parties, both national to the cannon’s mouth, in the field.

“Your delightful allusion to Mr. Webster excites even warmer emotions. I never think of him without recalling the fine, pathetic, unfinished sentence of Burke, in reference to Lord Keppel: ‘On that day I had a loss in Lord Keppel; but the public loss of him in this awful crisis ——!’

“Yet it shall not, I think, be the generation which saw him that shall witness the overthrow of the system to which he devoted himself with such desperate fidelity.

“I am, with the highest regard,

“Your obliged humble servant,

“RUFUS CHOATE.”

The following letters refer to a speech made at a dinner on the birthday of Mr. Webster, where Mr. Everett presided, and which Mr. Choate was prevented by illness from attending: —

TO PETER HARVEY, ESQ.

“Saturday eve.

“DEAR MR. HARVEY,—I cannot go to bed without congratulating you personally on the most brilliant success of our commemoration. Every thing is due to your energy, good judgment, and good nature. The universal voice pronounces the whole splendid.

“I wish you to thank Mrs. Harvey especially, too, for her politeness to my family, and to express the hope that she enjoyed the occasion as much as they did, and suffer as little from it. If it had pleased Providence that I could have been with you, I should have no regrets but that so delightful an occasion is also so transient. Mr. Everett outdid himself decidedly. So fresh, so genial, just, and eloquent, in the most attractive sense.

“I hope you will live, and that Mrs. Harvey will live, to celebrate this birthday one hundred times more yet, and find life still sweet.

“I am most truly yours,

“R. CHOATE.”

TO HON. EDWARD EVERETT.

“Saturday eve, Jan. 19, 1856.

“DEAR MR. EVERETT,—It signifies nothing what I say in all this din and tempest of applause; but I believe that nobody is more sincerely glad at your most signal success, and I know that nobody has read you with more delight. It was only within an hour or two that I was so well as to do this carefully, though I heard it all read early in the day. Our mighty friend himself, and even the nature that he so loved, come mended,—say rather, show clearer and nearer, like those headlands in the Homeric moonlight landscape. I most heartily thank you for presiding; it has won or confirmed many hearts; and I can never cease to regret that I could not have seen and heard what all felt to be an effort of extraordinary felicity.

“I am, very truly, your servant and friend,

“RUFUS CHOATE.”

Boston has long been noted for its popular lectures. Mr. Choate was frequently solicited to occupy an evening of the prescribed course; and, notwithstanding the pressure of other engagements, often did so. He generally availed himself of some recent noteworthy event, — civil or literary, — which served to suggest the eloquent and wise discourse. On the 13th of March, 1856, he closed the series of lectures before the Mercantile Library Association, by an address on "Our Obligations to the British Poets of the first twenty years of this Century." The theme was a favorite one, and carried him back to college days and his earlier life. The lecture was announced, for brevity and convenience, as upon Samuel Rogers, whose death had occurred a few months before, although that poet was but one among many whose life and influence were cursorily noticed.

"I appreciate quite well," he said, "that to a great many of you this once resplendent circle is a little out of the fashion. Their task is done, you say; their song hath ceased. . . . You began to read fine writing, verse and prose, at a time when other names had gained, or were gaining, the large ear of the gentle public, . . . when Eugene Aram, or Ernest Maltravers, or Vivian Grey, or the Pickwick Papers, had begun to elbow Waverley, the Antiquary, and Ivanhoe off the table; . . . after the 'last new poem' began to be more read than the matchless Fourth Canto of Childe Harold, . . . or the grand, melancholy, and immortal Platonisms and Miltonisms of the Excursion. So much the worse for yourselves!

"But if there be any in this assembly of the age of fifty or thereabout, you will hold a different theory.

You will look back not without delight, to the time, say from 1812 to 1820, when this brilliant and still young school had fairly won the general voice, — to that time when exactly as taste, fancy, the emotions, were beginning to unfold and to pronounce themselves, and to give direction to your solitary and voluntary reading, these armed flights of genius came streaming from beyond the sea, — that time when, as you came into your room from a college recitation in which you had been badly screwed in the eighth proposition on the Ellipse in Webber's Conic Sections, or in some passage of Tacitus in an edition with few notes and a corrupt text, and no translation, — you found Rob Roy, or The Astrologer, or The Antiquary, just republished and waiting your hands uncut; when, being asked if there were any thing new, the bookseller would demurely and apologetically say, 'No, nothing very particular; there was just a Fourth Canto of Childe Harold, or a little pamphlet edition of Manfred, or a thing of Rogers, the author of The Pleasures of Memory, called Human life; or Lines of Coleridge on a view of the Alps before sunrise in the vale of Chamouny, or The Excursion, or Corinne, or Germany of Madame de Staël, nothing else, I believe.' You who can remember this will sigh and say, —

"Twas a light that ne'er can shine again
On life's dull stream.'

So might you say, whatever their worth intrinsically; for to you, — to us, — read in the age of admiration, — of the first pulse of the emotions beating unwontedly, — associated with college contentions and friendships; the walk on the gleaming, Rhine-like, riverside;

the seat of rock and moss under the pine singing of Theocritus ; with all fair ideals revelling in the soul before

‘ The trumpet call of truth
Pealed on the idle dreams of youth,’ — to you they had a spell beyond their value and a place in your culture that nothing can share.”

Of them all — that constellation of brilliant writers — no one interested Mr. Choate so much as Sir Walter Scott. The whole lecture is, of necessity, somewhat desultory ; but one cannot well pass by the general tribute to Scott, and the brief defence of him from the criticism of Mr. Carlyle : —

“ And now, of all that bright circle, whom shall we say we love best? Each has his choice. Our own moods have them. But do I deceive myself in supposing, that if the collective voice of all who speak the language of England could be gathered by ballot, it would award the laurel by about a two-thirds majority to Walter Scott, — to the prose romance of Scott? Of him, no one knows where to begin or end. Consider first, to how many minds, to how many moods of mind, these pages give the pleasure for which books of elegant literature are written. To enjoy them, you need be in no specific and induced state ; you need not be gloomy, hating, pursued by a fury, a sorrow, a remorse, or chasing a pale visionary phantom of love and hope, as you must to read Byron ; you need not be smitten with a turn to mysticism and the transcendental and the Platonic, as you must be to relish a great deal of Wordsworth ; you need not feel any special passion, nor acknowledge any very pronounced vocation, for reforming school-houses and alms-houses, for shortening the hours and raising the wages of weavers' labor, for pulling down the aristocracy, the offices and Court of Chancery, and reconstructing society in general, as you must to enjoy very much even of our excellent Dickens. You need only to be a man or woman, with a love of reading and snatching your chances in the interstitial spaces of life's idle business to indulge it, and that is all. And why so? Because that genius was so healthful as well as so large and strong, because that humanity was so comprehensive, because that capacity was so universal, — that survey of life so wide and thorough, — that knowledge of man in his general nature as well as in his particular, so deep and true! Therefore it is, he gives you what Homer gives, what Shakspeare gives, — not crotchets, not deformities, not abnormal and exceptional things or states, not intensities, extravagancies, and spasms; but he gives you an apocalypse of life, from its sublimest moments to its minutest manners, such as never was communicated but by two other human imaginations. In that panorama of course, as in the mighty, complicated, and many-colored original of nature and history, there are all sorts of things, the jester, the humorist, the apparition from the dead, even as there is the clown gravedigger in Hamlet, the fool in Lear, the drunken porter in Macbeth, Thersites in the Iliad; but they are in proportion and place. The final aggregate of impression is true. You have not read that particular chapter in the great Book of Life before; but you recognize it in a moment; you learn from it. These men and women you had not known by name; you see them tried by imaginary and romantic circumstances certainly, but they reveal and illustrate and glorify the genuine humanity which you know to be such at its best ; courage, honor, love, truth, principle, duty ; tried on high places and on low ; in the hour of battle ; in the slow approach of death ; in bereavement ; in joy ; in all that varied eventful ebb and flow that makes life.

“ This is the reason, — one reason, — why so many more, in so many more moods, love him, than any other one in that splendid companionship. True it is no doubt, that even above the sound of a universal and instant popularity, there is a charm beyond. There is a twofold charm beyond. They are, first, the prose romances of a poet ; not the downright prose of Smollett, of Defoe, and of Fielding, nor the pathetic prose of Richardson, nor the brilliant and elegant prose of Edgeworth, or Hope in Anastasius. They sparkle and burn with that element, impossible to counterfeit, impossible to destroy, — a genuine poetry. Sometimes the whole novel is a poem. Who does not feel this in every page of the Bride of Lammermoor? The story is simple, its incidents are few ; yet how like a tragedy, brooded over by Destiny, it sweeps on, from that disturbed funeral of old Lord Ravenswood, — the procession interrupted — the father on the bier — the mourning child by his side, outraged under the very arches of the house of death — that deep paleness of the cheek of the young son revealing how the agony of his sorrow masters for a space the vehemence of his burning resentment, — that awful oath of revenge against the house of his future affianced bride ; — how it sweeps on, from this burial service presided over by doom, through those unutter-able agonies of two hearts, to the successive and appalling death-scenes; how every incident and appendage swells the dark and swift tide of destiny; how highly wrought — how vivid — how spontaneous in metaphor, is every scene and dialogue; to what fervor and exaltation of mind — to what keen susceptibility of emotion — to how towering and perturbed a mood of imagination, all the dramatis personæ seem elevated! In the same sense in which the Œdipus or the Agamemnon is a tragic poem, so is this; and the glorious music of the opera is scarcely passionate and mournful enough to relieve the overburdened and over-wrought heart and imagination of the reader.

“And when the whole romance is not a poem in its nature, in model, as Waverley, the Antiquary and the Astrologer and Kenilworth and Ivanhoe are not, how does the element of poetry yet blend and revel in it! In what other prose romances of any literature, in how many romances in verse, do you find pictures of scenery so bold, just, and free, — such judgment in choosing, and enthusiasm in feeling, and energy in sketching, an unequalled landscape, identified by its own incommunicable beauty and grandeur? Where else but in the finest of tragedies do you find the persons of the scene brought together and interacting in speech and figure so full of life, — the life of a real presence, — the life flashing from the eye, trembling in the tones of voice, shaking the strong man’s frame, speaking in the eloquent face? Who has sketched the single combat, the shock of ancient and modern battle, the assault, the repulse, the final storm, like him? Recall that contest with night, ocean, and tempest, in which Sir Arthur and Isabella are rescued in the Antiquary; and contrast that other also in the Antiquary, the fisherman's funeral,—the bier of the young man drowned—the passionate, natural sobs of the mother—the sullen and fierce grief of the father, shaking in its energy the bed beneath whose canopy he had hidden his face—the old grandmother, linking by a strange tie the guilt, the punishment of the proud house of Glenallan, to this agony of humble life. Over what other prose volumes do you find strewn broadcast with the prodigality of a happy nature, so much simile and metaphor,—the vocabulary,—the pearls, gems, and coral of the language,—and the thoughts of poetry?—What would you think to come, in Fielding or Smollett or Richardson or Defoe, on such a passage as this: 'It is my Leicester! It is my noble earl! It is my Dudley! Every stroke of his horse's hoof sounds like a note of lordly music!' Or this: 'Major Bridgenorth glided along this formal society with noiseless step, and a composed severity of manner resembling their own. He paused before each in succession, and apparently communicated, as he passed, the transactions of the evening, and the circumstances under which the heir of Martindale Castle was now a guest of Moultrassie Hall. Each seemed to stir at his brief detail, like a range of statues in an enchanted hall, starting into something like life as a talisman is applied to them successively.'

“I know, too, what interest and what value their historical element gives to these fictions. Like all this class of fiction in all literature, their theme is domestic life, and nature under the aspects of domestic life. But his is domestic life on which there streams the mighty influence of a great historical conjunction. That interest indescribable which attaches ever to a people and a time over which dark care, an urgent peril, a vast apprehension is brooding; a crisis of war, of revolution, of revolt, — that interest is spread on all things, the minutest incident, — the humblest sufferer, — the conversations of boors on the road or at the alehouse; every thing little or high is illustrative and representative. The pulses of a sublime national movement beat through the universal human nature of the drama. The great tides of historical and public existence flow there and ebb, and all things rise and fall on those resistless forces. The light of the castle stormed and on fire streams in through the open door of some smallest cottager; and lovers are kept asunder by a war of succession to thrones.

“ To one of his detractors, let me say one word.

“ It has pleased Mr. Thomas Carlyle to record of these novels, — ‘ The sick heart will find no healing here, the darkly struggling heart no guidance, the heroic that is in all men no divine, awakening voice.’ These be sonorous words assuredly. In one sense I am afraid that is true of any and all mere romantic literature. As disparagement of Scott it is a simple absurdity of injustice. In any adequate sense of these expressions, Homer and Shakspeare must answer, ‘ These are not mine to give.’ To heal that sickness, to pour that light on that gloom, to awaken that sleep of greatness in the soul in the highest sense, far other provision is demanded, and is given. In the old, old time, — Hebrew, Pagan, — some found it in the very voice of God; some in the visits of the angel; some in a pilgrimage to the beautiful Jerusalem; some in the message of the Prophet, till that succession had its close; some sought it rather than found it, like Socrates, like Plato, like Cicero, like Cato, in the thoughts of their own and other mighty minds turned to the direct search of truth, in the philosophy of speculation, in the philosophy of duty, in the practice of public life. To us only, and at last, is given the true light. For us only is the great Physician provided. In our ears, in theirs whose testimony we assuredly believe, the divine awakening voice has been articulately and first spoken. In this sense, what he says would be true of Homer, Shakspeare, Dante, Milton; but no more true of Scott than of Goethe or Schiller. Neither is, or gives, religion to the soul, if it is that of which he speaks. But if this is not his meaning, — and I suppose it is not, — if he means to say that by the same general treatment, by the same form of suffering humanity, by which Homer, Virgil, Dante, Shakspeare heal the sick heart, give light to the darkened eye, and guidance to blundering feet, and kindle the heroic in man to life, — if he means to say that as they have done it he has not in kind, in supreme degree, — let the millions whose hours of unrest, anguish, and fear he has charmed away, to the darkness of whose desponding he has given light, to whose sentiments of honor, duty, courage, truth, manliness, he has given help — let them gather around the Capitol and answer for themselves and him. I am afraid that that Delphic and glorious Madame de Staël knew sickness of the heart in a sense and with a depth too true only; and she had, with other consolation, the fisherman's funeral in the Antiquary read to her on her deathbed; as Charles Fox had the kindred but unequal sketches of Crabbe's Village read on his.

“And so of this complaint, that the heroic in man finds here no divine, awakening voice. If by this heroic in man he means what—assuming religious traits out of the question—we who speak the tongue of England and hold the ethics of Plato, of Cicero, of Jeremy Taylor and Edmund Burke, should understand,—religion now out of the question,—that sense of obligation, pursuing us ever, omnipresent like the Deity, ever proclaiming that the duties of life are more than life,—that principle of honor that feels a stain like a wound,—that courage that fears God and knows no other fear, that dares do all that may become a man,—truth on the lips and in the inward parts,—that love of our own native land, comprehensive and full love, the absence of which makes even the superb art-world of Goethe dreamy and epicurean,—manliness, equal to all offices of war or peace, above jealousy, above injustice,—if this is the heroic, and if by the divine awakening voice he meant that artistic and literary culture fitted to develop and train this quality, that voice is Scott's.

“I will not compare him with Carlyle's Goethe or even Schiller, or any other idol on the Olympus of his worship; that were flippant and indecorous, nor within my competence. But who and where, in any literature, in any walk of genius, has sketched a character, imagined a situation, conceived an austerity of glorified suffering, better adapted to awaken all of the heroic in man or woman, that it is fit to awaken, than Rebecca in act to leap from the dizzy verge of the parapet of the Castle to escape the Templar, or awaiting the bitterness of death in the list of Tempestowe and rejecting the championship of her admirer? — or than Jeanie Deans refusing an untruth to save her innocent sister's life and then walking to London to plead for her before the Queen, — and so pleading? — than Macbriar in that group of Covenanters in Old Mortality in presence of the Privy Council, confessing for himself, whom terror, whom torture, could not move to the betrayal of another; accepting sentence of death, after anguish unimaginable, his face radiant with joy; a trial of manhood and trust, a sublimity of trial, a manifestation of the heroic to which the self-sacrifice of a Leonidas and his three hundred was but a wild and glad revelry, — a march to the 'Dorian music of flutes and soft recorders,' — a crowning, after the holiday contention of the games, with all of glory a Greek could covet or conceive.

“I rode in the August of 1850, with a friend and kinsman, now dead, from Abbotsford to Dryburgh, from the home to the grave of Walter Scott. We asked the driver if he knew on which side of the Tweed the funeral procession, a mile in length, went down. He did not know. But what signified it? Our way lay along its south bank. On our right rose the three peaks of the cloven summit of Eildon; fair Melrose, in its gray ruin, immortal as his song; the Tweed, whose murmur came in on his ear when he was dying, were on our left; the Scotland of the Lay of the Last Minstrel, bathed in the mild harvest sunlight, was around us; and when we came within that wide inclosure at the Abbey of Dryburgh, in which they have laid him down, we could then feel how truly that deep sob, which is said to have burst in that moment from a thousand lips, was but predictive and symbolical of the mourning of mute Nature for her worshipper ; of Scotland for the crown of her glory ; of the millions of long generations for their companion and their benefactor."

The year 1856 was a year of political excitement. The Democratic party nominated Mr. Buchanan for the Presidency, and the Republicans, Col. Fremont ; still another party, composed of those who called themselves "Americans," had nominated Mr. Fillmore. Mr. Choate did not entirely sympathize with either of these parties, and for some time was in doubt what position to take. To be neutral he thought unbecoming, when great interests seemed to be at stake, nor was he willing to throw away his influence where there was no chance of success, especially where his convictions did not impel him to act. He meditated long and anxiously, taking counsel of none, because he determined to act independently. A separation from old friends, even temporarily, gave him real sorrow, yet to follow any party founded on geographical principles, or which would divide the States by a geographical line, seemed to him, not only repugnant to the counsels of Washington and the fathers of the Republic, but so unstatesmanlike and dangerous that he could not regard it with favor. A letter to Mr. Evarts, of New York, who had recently made a speech in favor of the Republican party, indicates this feeling.

To WM. M. EVARTS, Esq.

“DEAR MR. EVARTS,—I thank you for your courtesy in the transmitting of the speech. I had read it before, and for that matter, there has been nothing else in my papers since, except the proceedings in the matter of poor Hoffman. Both — the political and the eulogistic — are excellent. To say that I see my way clear to act with you were premature. Blessings are bought with a price. We may pay too high for good sentiments and desirable policy. I hate some of your associates and recognize no necessity at all for a Presidential campaign on platforms less broad than the whole area. . . .

“Most truly yours, R. CHOATE.”

The first distinct intimation that he gave of his probable political course was in a note to Mr. Everett. It was little more than a conjecture, however, hardly a declaration of a fixed purpose ; yet he was not timid in declaring his opinions when fully formed and the occasion demanded it, and in his letter to the Whigs of Maine, dated the 9th of August, he unhesitatingly affirmed his position. This letter was in answer to an urgent request from the Whig State Committee to address the people at a mass meeting in Waterville.

To E. W. FARLEY, and other gentlemen, of the Maine Whig State Central Committee.

“BOSTON, Aug. 9, 1856.

“GENTLEMEN,—Upon my return last evening, after a short absence from the city, I found your letter of the 30th ult., inviting me to take part in the proceedings of the Whigs of Maine, assembled in mass meeting.

“I appreciate most highly the honor and kindness of this invitation, and should have had true pleasure in accepting it. The Whigs of Maine composed at all times so important a division of the great national party, which, under that name, with or without official power, as a responsible administration, or as only an organized opinion, has done so much for our country, — our whole country, — and your responsibilities at this moment are so vast and peculiar, that I acknowledge an anxiety to see — not wait to hear — with what noble bearing you meet the demands of the time. If the tried legions, to whom it is committed to guard the frontier of the Union, falter now, who, anywhere, can be trusted?

“ My engagements, however, and the necessity or expediency of abstaining from all speech requiring much effort, will prevent my being with you. And yet, invited to share in your counsels, and grateful for such distinction, I cannot wholly decline to declare my own opinions on one of the duties of the Whigs, in what you well describe as ‘ the present crisis in the political affairs of the country.’ I cannot now, and need not, pause to elaborate or defend them. What I think, and what I have decided to do, permit me in the briefest and plainest expression to tell you.

“ The first duty, then, of Whigs, not merely as patriots and as citizens, — loving, with a large and equal love, our whole native land, — but as Whigs, and because we are Whigs, is to unite with some organization of our countrymen, to defeat and dissolve the new geographical party, calling itself Republican. This is our first duty. It would more exactly express my opinion to say that at this moment it is our only duty. Certainly, at least, it comprehends and suspends all others; and in my judgment, the question for each and every one of us is, not whether this candidate or that candidate would be our first choice, — not whether there is some good talk in the worst platform, and some bad talk in the best platform, — not whether this man’s ambition, or that man’s servility or boldness or fanaticism or violence, is responsible for putting the wild waters in this uproar; — but just this, — by what vote can I do most to prevent the madness of the times from working its maddest act, — the very ecstasy of its madness, — the permanent formation and the actual present triumph of a party which knows one-half of America only to hate and dread it, — from whose unconsecrated and revolutionary banner fifteen stars are erased or have fallen, — in whose national anthem the old and endeared airs of the Eutaw Springs and the King’s Mountain and Yorktown, and those, later, of New Orleans and Buena Vista and Chapultepec, breathe no more. To this duty, to this question, all others seem to me to stand for the present postponed and secondary.

“ And why ? Because, according to our creed, it is only the united America which can peacefully, gradually, safely, improve, lift up, and bless, with all social and personal and civil blessings, all the races and all the conditions which compose our vast and various family, — it is such an America, only, whose arm can guard our flag, develop our resources, extend our trade, and fill the measure of our glory ; and because, according to our convictions, the triumph of such a party puts the Union in danger. That is my reason. And for you and for me and for all of us, in whose regards the Union possesses such a value, and to whose fears it seems menaced by such a danger, it is reason enough. Believing the noble Ship of State to be within a half cable’s length of a lee shore of rock, in a gale of wind, our first business is to put her about, and crowd her off into the deep, open sea. That done, we can regulate the stowage of her lower tier of powder, and select her cruising ground, and bring her officers to court-martial at our leisure.

“ If there are any in Maine — and among the Whigs of Maine I hope there is not one — but if there are any, in whose hearts strong passions, vaulting ambition, jealousy of men or sections, unreasoning and impatient philanthropy, or whatever else have turned to hate or coldness the fraternal blood and quenched the spirit of national life at its source, — with whom the union of slave States and free States under the actual Constitution is a curse, a hindrance, a reproach, — with those of course our view of our duty and the reason of it, are a stumbling-block and foolishness. To such you can have nothing to say, and from such you can have nothing to hope. But if there are those again who love the Union as we love it, and prize it as we prize it, — who regard it as we do, not merely as a vast instrumentality for the protection of our commerce and navigation, and for achieving power, eminence, and name among the sovereigns of the earth, but as a means of improving the material lot, and elevating the moral and mental nature, and insuring the personal happiness of the millions of many distant generations, — if there are those who think thus justly of it, and yet hug the fatal delusion that, because it is good, it is necessarily immortal, that it will thrive without care, that any thing created by a man’s will is above or stronger than his will, that because the reason and virtues of our age of reason and virtue could build it, the passions and stimulations of a day of frenzy cannot pull it down ; — if such there are among you, to them address yourselves with all the earnestness and all the eloquence of men who feel that some greater interest is at stake, and some mightier cause in hearing, than ever yet tongue has pleaded or trumpet proclaimed. If such minds and hearts are reached, all is safe. But how specious and how manifold are the sophisms by which they are courted !

“ They hear, and they read much ridicule of those who fear that a geographical party does endanger the Union. But can they forget that our greatest, wisest, and most hopeful statesmen have always felt, and have all, in one form or another, left on record their own fear of such a party ? The judgments of Washington, Madison, Clay, Webster, on the dangers of the American Union — are they worth nothing to a conscientious love of it ? What they dreaded as a remote and improbable contingency — that against which they cautioned, as they thought, distant generations — that which they were so happy as to die without seeing — is upon us. And yet some men would have us go on laughing and singing, like the traveller in the satire, with his pockets empty, at a present peril, the mere apprehension of which, as a distant and bare possibility, could sadden the heart of the Father of his Country, and dictate the grave and grand warning of the Farewell Address.

“ They hear men say that such a party ought not to endanger the Union ; that, although it happened to be formed within one geographical section, and confined exclusively to it, — although its end and aim is to rally that section against the other on a question of morals, policy, and feeling, on which the two differ eternally and unappeasably, although, from the nature of its origin and objects, no man in the section outside can possibly join it, or accept office under it, without infamy at home, — although, therefore, it is a stupendous organization, practically to take power and honor, and a full share of the government, from our whole family of States, and bestow them, substantially, all upon the antagonist family, — although the doctrines of human rights, which it gathers out of the Declaration of Independence — that passionate and eloquent manifesto of a revolutionary war — and adopts as its fundamental ideas, announce to any Southern apprehension a crusade of the government against slavery, far without and beyond Kansas, — although the spirit and tendency of its electioneering appeals, as a whole, in prose and verse, the leading articles of its papers, and the speeches of its orators, are to excite contempt and hate, or fear, of one entire geographical section, and hate or dread or contempt is the natural impression it all leaves on the Northern mind and heart; yet that nobody anywhere ought to be angry, or ought to be frightened; that the majority must govern, and that the North is a majority; that it is ten to one nothing will happen; that, if worst comes to worst, the South knows it is wholly to blame, and needs the Union more than we do, and will be quiet accordingly.

“But do they who hold this language forget that the question is not what ought to endanger the Union, but what will do it? Is it man as he ought to be, or man as he is, that we must live with or live alone? In appreciating the influences which may disturb a political system, and especially one like ours, do you make no allowance for passions, for pride, for infirmity, for the burning sense of even imaginary wrong? Do you assume that all men, or all masses of men in all sections, uniformly obey reason; and uniformly wisely see and calmly seek their true interests? Where on earth is such a fool’s Paradise as that to be found? Conceding to the people of the fifteen States the ordinary and average human nature, its good and its evil, its weakness and its strength, I, for one, dare not say that the triumph of such a party ought not to be expected naturally and probably to disunite the States. With my undoubting convictions, I know that it would be folly and immorality in men to wish it. Certainly there are in all sections and in all States those who love the Union, under the actual Constitution, as Washington did, as Jay, Hamilton, and Madison did; as Jackson, as Clay, as Webster loved it. Such even is the hereditary and the habitual sentiment of the general American heart. But he has read life and books to little purpose who has not learned that ‘bosom friendships’ may be ‘to resentment soured,’ and that no hatred is so keen, deep, and precious as that.

‘And to be wroth with one we love
Doth work like madness in the brain.’

He has read the book of our history to still less purpose, who has not learned that the friendships of these States, sisters but rivals, sovereigns each, with a public life, and a body of interests, and sources of honor and shame of its own and within itself, distributed into two great opposing groups, are of all human ties most exposed to such rupture and such transformation.

“I have not time in these hasty lines, and there is no need, to speculate on the details of the modes in which the triumph of this party would do its work of evil. Its mere struggle to obtain the government, as that struggle is conducted, is mischievous to an extent incalculable. That thousands of the good men who have joined it deplore this is certain, but that does not mend the matter. I appeal to the conscience and honor of my country that if it were the aim of a great party, by every species of access to the popular mind, — by eloquence, by argument, by taunt, by sarcasm, by recrimination, by appeals to pride, shame, and natural right, — to prepare the nation for a struggle with Spain or England or Austria, it could not do its business more thoroughly. Many persons, many speakers, — many, very many, set a higher and wiser example; but the work is doing.

“If it accomplishes its objects and gives the government to the North, I turn my eyes from the consequences. To the fifteen States of the South that government will appear an alien government. It will appear worse. It will appear a hostile government. It will represent to their eye a vast region of States organized upon anti-slavery, flushed by triumph, cheered onward by the voices of the pulpit, tribune, and press; its mission to inaugurate freedom and put down the oligarchy; its constitution the glittering and sounding generalities of natural right which make up the Declaration of Independence. And then and thus is the beginning of the end.

“If a necessity could be made out for such a party we might submit to it as to other unavoidable evil, and other certain danger. But where do they find that? Where do they pretend to find it? Is it to keep slavery out of the territories? There is not one but Kansas in which slavery is possible. No man fears, no man hopes, for slavery in Utah, New Mexico, Washington, or Minnesota. A national party to give them freedom is about as needful and about as feasible as a national party to keep Maine for freedom. And Kansas! Let that abused and profaned soil have calm within its borders; deliver it over to the natural law of peaceful and spontaneous immigration; take off the ruffian hands; strike down the rifle and the bowie-knife; guard its strenuous infancy and youth till it comes of age to choose for itself, — and it will choose freedom for itself, and it will have for ever what it chooses.

“When this policy, so easy, simple, and just, is tried and fails, it will be time enough to resort to revolution. It is in part because the duty of protection to the local settler was not performed, that the Democratic party has already by the action of its great representative Convention resolved to put out of office its own administration. That lesson will not and must not be lost on anybody. The country demands that Congress, before it adjourns, give that territory peace. If it do, time will inevitably give it freedom.

“I have hastily and imperfectly expressed my opinion through the unsatisfactory forms of a letter, as to the immediate duty of Whigs. We are to do what we can to defeat and disband the geographical party. But by what specific action we can most effectually contribute to such a result is a question of more difficulty. It seems now to be settled that we present no candidate of our own. If we vote at all, then, we vote for the nominees of the American, or the nominees of the Democratic party. As between them I shall not venture to counsel the Whigs of Maine, but I deem it due to frankness and honor to say, that while I entertain a high appreciation of the character and ability of Mr. Fillmore, I do not sympathize in any degree with the objects and creed of the particular party that nominated him, and do not approve of their organization and their tactics. Practically, too, the contest in my judgment is between Mr. Buchanan and Col. Fremont. In these circumstances, I vote for Mr. Buchanan. He has large experience in public affairs; his commanding capacity is universally acknowledged; his life is without a stain. I am constrained to add that he seems at this moment, by the concurrence of circumstances, more completely than any other, to represent that sentiment of nationality, tolerant, warm, and comprehensive, — without which, without increase of which, America is no longer America; and to possess the power and I trust the disposition to restore and keep that peace, within our borders, and without, for which our hearts all yearn, which all our interests demand, through which and by which alone we may hope to grow to the true greatness of nations.

“Very respectfully,

“Your fellow-citizen,

“RUFUS CHOATE.”

This letter was no sooner published than solicitations came, almost without number, to take part in the political campaign. Committees from New York and Philadelphia urged him with an importunity which it was very difficult to resist. He determined at last to make one speech, and but one. He chose the place, Lowell, — an important manufacturing city in Middlesex County, the county which holds Bunker Hill and Lexington. An immense crowd assembled to hear him on the 28th of October. It was an unwonted and hard thing for him to leave, even for a time, those with whom he had always been politically associated, and join those whom he had always opposed. If ever one were controlled by a high sense of public duty, he certainly was in that difficult step. He sought neither honor, nor office, nor emolument; nothing but the greater safety and welfare of the country could repay him. There was a tone of deprecation in some parts of the speech which marked his deep feeling. “Certainly,” he said, “somewhat there is in the position of all of us a little trying. Ties of years which knit some of us together are broken. Cold regards are turned on us, and bitter language, and slander cruel as the grave, is ours.

‘I cannot but remember such things were,
That were most precious to me.’

You have decided, Fellow-Whigs, that you can best contribute to the grand end we all seek, by a vote for Mr. Fillmore. I, a Whig all my life, a Whig in all things, and as regards all other names, a Whig to-day, have thought I could discharge my duty most effectually by voting for Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Breckinridge; and I shall do it. The justice I am but too happy in rendering you, will you deny to me? In doing this I neither join the Democratic party, nor retract any opinion on the details of its policy, nor acquit it of its share of blame in bringing on the agitations of the hour. . . . There never was an election contest that, in denouncing the particulars of its policy, I did not admit that the characteristic of the Democratic party was this, that it had burned ever with the great master-passion this hour demands, a youthful, vehement, exultant, and progressive nationality. Through some errors, into some perils, it has been led by it; it may be so again; we may require to temper and restrain it; but to-day we need it all, we need it all! the hopes, the boasts, the pride, the universal tolerance, the gay and festive defiance of foreign dictation, the flag, the music, all the emotions, all the traits, all the energies, that have won their victories of war, and their miracles of national advancement, — the country needs them all now, to win a victory of peace. That done, I will pass again, happy and content, into that minority of conservatism in which I have passed my life.”

The meeting had assembled in the largest hall in the city, which was densely packed. It was estimated that from four to five thousand persons were present. The committee of arrangements, with the orator, could with great difficulty force their way to the platform. The meeting was soon organized, and the president had hardly begun to make a preliminary address, when a dull, heavy sound like a distant cannon was heard, and the floor evidently yielded. A general fright seemed to pervade the audience, which was assuaged only by assurances of safety, and that an examination of the supports of the building should at once be made by an experienced architect. The agitation having subsided, Mr. Choate rose and was hailed with a storm of applause, such as even he had rarely heard before. He proceeded for nearly half an hour, when again that ominous sound was heard, and the floor was felt sinking as before. Mr. Choate paused, and the fear of the crowd was partially quieted a second time by an assurance of an immediate inspection of the building, and if it should not be found safe, an adjournment to some other place. The architect who first went to examine the supports had not come back. General Butler, who was presiding, said that he would go and ascertain the condition of things, and return and report. He went, and to his horror found that several of the rods by which the floor was sustained had drawn through the timbers, that the ceiling below was opening, and that the slightest movement or demonstration of applause would be likely to bring the floor, the roof, and probably the walls, to the ground, with a destruction of life too awful to think of. Comprehending all the peril, he forced his way in again through the crowd, till he reached the platform, and then calmly addressing the audience told them that though there might be no immediate danger, as they had been interrupted twice and some were timid, it would be best quietly and without haste to leave the hall. 'This is the place of greatest danger,' he said, 'and I shall stand here till all have gone out.' The hall was at once cleared, those on the platform going last; and it is said that as they were walking out the floor again sprung for an inch or two. Not till all were safe, did they understand the imminent peril in which they had been; how near to a catastrophe, to which that of the Pemberton Mill might have been a mercy. The crowd soon forgot the danger, and were so eager for the continuance of the speech, that Mr. Choate, who had retired to the hotel, and was suffering from an incipient illness, addressed the assembled masses for some time from a platform hastily erected in front of one of the windows.

It was natural that his determination to vote for Mr. Buchanan should be regarded with sorrow by those with whom he had always been associated, and perhaps not very surprising that he should have received anonymous letters filled with abuse and threats, some of them frightful in their malignity. After the election, it was intimated to him, that any honorable position under the government, that he might desire, would be at his disposal. But he was determined to receive nothing, nor allow the remotest suspicion to attach to his motives. Some doubted the necessity or the wisdom of his course; but none who knew him distrusted the depth and sincerity of his convictions, or the immaculate purity of his patriotism. Misjudgment and censure he expected to receive, but charges of mercenary or malignant motives he could not overlook. Such having been brought to his notice as made in Maryland, he replied to his informant by the following letter:—

TO JOHN CARROLL WALSH, Harford Co., Maryland.

“BOSTON, Sept. 15, 1856.

“DEAR SIR,—Your letter informing me that Mr. Davis asserted in a public speech that the secret of my opposition to Mr. Fillmore was disappointment, created by not receiving from him an office which I sought and desired, was received a little out of time. I thank you for affording me an opportunity to answer, at the first moment of hearing it, a statement so groundless and so unjust. There is not a particle of truth in it, nor is there any thing to color or to suggest his informant's falsehood. I authorize and request you, if you attach any importance to the matter, to give it the most absolute and comprehensive denial. I never sought an office from Mr. Fillmore directly or indirectly, and never requested or authorized any other person to do so for me, and never believed for a moment, or suspected, and do not now believe or suspect, that any one has done so, or has even mentioned my name to him in connection with an office. Mr. Fillmore never had a place in his gift which I desired, or which I could have afforded to accept, even if I had thought myself competent to fill it, or for which I could, under any circumstances, have exchanged the indispensable labor of my profession. Personal complaint of Mr. Fillmore I have not the slightest reason to make; and he who thinks it worth his while to conjecture why I shall not vote for him, must accept from me, or fabricate for himself, a different explanation.

“With great regard, your servant and fellow-citizen,

“RUFUS CHOATE.”

The key to Mr. Choate's public life, especially his later life, may be found in two grand motives: the first, his strong American feeling; the second, his love of the Union. The former led him to sustain the country, its institutions, and public policy, as distinguished from those of the Old World. The latter made him as careful of the rights, as respectful to the feelings, the sentiments, the habits, of the South as of the North, of the West as of the East. He felt that sufficient time had not yet elapsed thoroughly to prove the power and virtues of the Republic, or suggest an adequate remedy for its defects. He felt that to perpetuate a government strong but liberal — considerate of every interest and oppressive of none — requires great breadth and intensity of patriotism, much forbearance of sectional ignorance and prejudice, a conciliatory and just spirit, a large prudence, and a liberal regard to wants and interests as diverse as the races which march under the one national banner, and profess allegiance to a common government, or the productions and pursuits of our various climate and soil. The State he loved, as one would love a father. The faults of the State he would not make the ground of party exultation, or parade them for universal, indiscriminate, and barren censure, but would rather shun, and if possible cure, or at least cover with a filial sorrow, — dictitans, domestica mala tristitia operienda. He shared largely the fears of the wisest and most far-sighted statesmen, but still trusted that under a magnanimous public policy, time would more completely consolidate the races and States, evils would be gradually corrected, and the spirit of nationality — deeply imbedded in the affections and interests — would rise supreme over every local ambition or sectional scheme.

Mr. Choate's position was now such as any one might envy. As a statesman, his ideas and policy had nothing narrow or sectional. They embraced the welfare of the whole country, and of every part of it. He was identified with whatever in patriotism was most generous and unselfish. In his profession he had won the love, as well as the admiration, of his brethren. He stood at the head of the New England Bar; nor was there in the country an advocate whose well-earned reputation surpassed his. Too liberal to acquire an ample fortune, he had, nevertheless, secured a competence. His family was still almost unbroken. Two of his daughters were married,¹ and lived very near him. His residence and his library had been every year growing more and more to his mind. His library had always been an object of special interest. On moving into his house in Winthrop Place, it filled a front chamber directly over the parlor. Soon overflowing, it swept away the partition between that and a small room over the front entry. Then, accumulating still more rapidly, it burst all barriers and filled the whole second story. A friend visiting him one day, asked how he contrived to gain from Mrs. Choate so large a part of the house. "Oh," said he, in a most delightfully jocular tone, "by fighting for it." It was, indeed, a charming retreat. Every wall, in all the irregularities of the room, filled with crowded bookcases, with here and there choice engravings and pictures in unoccupied places, or on frames arranged expressly to hold them; with tables, desks, luxurious chairs, and lounges, — all for use and nothing for show, though elegant, — all warm, familiar, and inviting. His library was rich in English literature and learning in all its branches, and in choice editions of the classics; well, though not amply, provided with modern foreign literature; and thoroughly stocked with all the apparatus of dictionaries, gazetteers, and maps, which a scholar constantly needs. It numbered, at the time of his death, about seven thousand volumes. His law library, it may be here stated, consisted of about three thousand volumes, and, I am informed by those familiar with it, was one of the best professional libraries in the State.

¹ His eldest daughter to Joseph M. Bell, Esq.; and his youngest to Edward Ellerton Pratt, Esq.

The next two years of Mr. Choate's life were diversified by little besides the ordinary varieties of his profession. In February, 1857, he delivered before the Mechanic Apprentices' Library Association a lecture on the "Eloquence of Revolutionary Periods," in which he dwelt specially on Demosthenes and Cicero. It is full of high thoughts, and raises one by its beauty and magnanimity. Its eloquent defence of Cicero was harshly criticised — one hardly knows why — by some who accept the later theories of Cicero's life ; but was received with rare satisfaction by the lovers of the patriotic Roman, — nearly the most eloquent of the Ancients.

In May of the same year, he made his powerful and successful defence of Mrs. Dalton. This case excited great interest from the respectability of the parties, from the circumstances which preceded the trial, as well as from the great ability of the advocates on both sides.¹ Its details, however, true or false, were such as almost of necessity to exclude it, and the argument based upon it, from full publication. Shortly after his marriage, nearly two years before, Mr. Dalton discovered what he thought an improper intimacy between his wife and a young man by the name of Sumner. As a result of this, Sumner was induced to go to the house of Mr. Coburn (who had married a sister of Mrs. Dalton), in Shawmut Avenue, where he was confronted with Mrs. Dalton, was attacked by Dalton and Coburn, beaten, and driven from the premises. He went home to Milton, where soon after he was taken sick and died. The story found its way into the newspapers, with the usual exaggerations and inaccuracies. The death of Sumner increased the popular excitement, and Dalton was arrested and imprisoned on a charge of murder. After lying in jail more than a month, the grand jury, on examining the case, indicted him for manslaughter, and for assault and battery. On the former charge he was acquitted; to the latter he pleaded guilty, and was condemned to an imprisonment of five months. Soon after going to jail on this sentence, he filed his libel for a divorce. To hear such a cause in public before a jury, was a doubtful experiment, tried then for the first time. Day after day, for nearly three weeks, the court-room had been crowded by an eager and curious multitude, watching the parties who sat within the bar by the side of their respective counsel; watching every movement of the eminent advocates as they would the players of a great game, and intently listening to the revelations of the evidence. Day by day the larger audience and the public had been both stimulated and sickened by the startling, contradictory, scandalous, and disgusting details spread wide in the newspapers. All were waiting with curiosity and interest, and some with intense anxiety, for the result of the trial, which at length drew to a close. The doors were no sooner opened on the morning when the argument was expected, than the court-room was crowded to its utmost capacity. While waiting for the judge to take his seat, much merriment was caused by a grave announcement from the Sheriff that the second jury, which had been summoned in expectation that the trial would be ended, "might have leave to withdraw." As this was at the moment when expectation was at the highest, and chairs were at a premium, and whoever had a standing-place felt that he was a fortunate man, the effect may be easily imagined.

¹ R. H. Dana, Jr., was Mr. Dalton's counsel.

Mr. Choate was punctually in his place at the appointed time; behind and near him sat his young client, attended by her mother and sister. Not far distant, and close to his counsel, his eye turned often to the great advocate, but never to her, was a fair and pleasant-looking young man, — the husband suing for a divorce from a wife charged with the most serious criminality. Immediately on the opening of the court, Mr. Choate rose, and, after briefly referring to a case or two in a law-book, commenced in a grave and quiet manner by congratulating the jury on approaching, at least, the close of a duty so severe and so painful to all. He then in a few sentences, with a felicity which has seldom been equalled, professed to be really pleading for the interests of both parties.

“It very rarely happens, indeed, gentlemen, in the trial of a civil controversy, that both parties have an equal, or, however, a vast interest, that one of them — in this case the defendant — should be clearly proved to be entitled to your verdict. Unusual as it is, such is now the view of the case that I take; such a one is the trial now before you. To both of these parties it is of supreme importance, in the view that I take of it, that you should find this young wife, erring, indiscreet, imprudent, forgetful of herself, if it be so, but innocent of the last and the greatest crime of a married woman. I say, to both parties it is important. I cannot deny, of course, that her interest in such a result is, perhaps, the greater of the two. For her, indeed, it is not too much to say that every thing is staked upon the result. I cannot, of course, hope, I cannot say, that any verdict you can render will ever enable her to recall those weeks of folly, and frivolity, and vanity, without a blush — without a tear ; I cannot desire that it should be so. But, gentlemen, whether these grave and impressive proceedings shall terminate by sending this young wife from your presence with the scarlet letter upon her brow ; whether in this her morning of life, her name shall be thus publicly stricken from the roll of virtuous women, — her whole future darkened by dishonor, and waylaid by temptation ; her companions driven from her side, herself cast out, it may be, upon common society, the sport of libertines, unassisted by public opinion, or sympathy, or self-respect, — this certainly rests with you. For her, therefore, I am surely warranted in saying, that more than her life is at stake. ‘ Whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, if there be any praise,’ all the chances that are to be left her in life for winning and holding these holy, beautiful, and needful things, rest with you. . . .

“ But is there not another person, gentlemen, interested in these proceedings with an equal, or at least a supreme, interest with the respondent, that you shall be able by your verdict to say that Helen Dalton is not guilty of the crime of adultery ; and is not that person her husband? . . . If you can here and now on this evidence acquit your consciences, and render a verdict that shall assure this husband that a jury of Suffolk — men of honor and spirit — some of them his personal friends, believe that he has been the victim of a cruel and groundless jealousy ; that they believe that he has been led by that scandal that circulates about him, that has influenced him everywhere ; that he has been made to misconceive the nature and overestimate the extent of the injury his wife has done him ; . . . if you can thus enable him to see that without dishonor he may again take her to his bosom, let me ask you if any other human being can do another so great a kindness as this ? ”

He then went on throughout the day, with a general statement and review of the evidence, so as to conciliate the jury to the theory of culpable indiscretion indeed, but of indiscretion consistent, after all, with innocence. This was the theme of all the variations of that music, — an intimacy light, transient, indiscreet, foolish, inexcusable, wrong, yet not carried to the last crime, — consistent still with devoted love for her husband, whom “ she followed, half distracted, to the jail, — hovering about that cell, — a beam of light, a dove of constant presence.” To this was added the fact that after most of these indiscretions were known to Dalton, and after the scene when Sumner was assaulted and driven from the house, he still loved, cherished, and lived with her, and wrote that series of letters from the jail “ so beautiful, so manly, one long, unbroken strain of music, the burthen of which is home, sweet home ; and you, my loved one, my fond one, — dearer and better for what has happened, — you again to fill, illumine, and bless it.”

These thoughts he never lost sight of during the long and varied statement, and the searching examination of the evidence, which followed. A part of that evidence was hard to evade. Two witnesses had sworn to a confession, or what amounted to one, on the part of Mrs. Dalton. How their evidence and characters were sifted, no one can forget who heard, nor fail to understand, who reads. They crumbled in his hand like clay. Sometimes with the gravest denunciation and sometimes with the keenest ridicule, he demonstrated the improbabilities and impossibilities of the testimony, till all felt that if there was not perjury there must be mistake. Seldom has a witness been held up in a light more irresistibly ludicrous than John H. Coburn, who had confessed to making false representations by telegraphic communications and otherwise, in order to excite the fear of Mr. Gove, the father of Mrs. Dalton, and extort from him money and clothing (as he was a clothing merchant). "He found out," said the advocate, "that Mr. Gove was extremely exercised by the attack upon his daughter, 'and,' says he, 'I will have a jacket and trousers out of this business, — I see pantaloons there; I will have a game of billiards and a suit of clothes, or I am nobody!'" The house was convulsed with laughter at the ludicrous picture. At the same time he was most careful not to carry the raillery too far. "I am bringing him up to the golden tests and standards by which the law weighs proof, or the assayer weighs gold." But it might be said that this proceeding of Coburn was only a joke. "Practise a joke under those circumstances!" said the advocate. "Is this the character of Coburn? Why, he admitted all this falsehood on the stand in such a winning, ingenuous, and loving way, — that he was a great rogue and liar, and had been everywhere, — that we were almost attracted to him. It is, therefore, fit and proper we should know that this winning confession of Coburn on the stand was not quite so voluntary after all.

This Coburn, about six days ago, was attacked by a very bad erysipelas in his foot or ankle. In my humble judgment it was an erysipelas of apprehension about coming into the court-house to testify under the eye of the court and jury. But he was attacked; and accordingly we sent a couple of eminent physicians — Drs. Dana and Durant — to see what they could do for him, and they put him through a course of warm water or composition powder, or one thing or another, till they cured the erysipelas beyond all doubt, gentlemen. They cured the patient, but they killed the witness. [Here the sheriff had to interfere to check the laughter.] So the man came upon the stand and admitted he sent this communication by telegraph, and the message from the Parker and the Tremont. He swore forty times very deliberately that he never wrote one of them, — deliberately and repeatedly over and over again, — and it was not till my friend, the Doctor here, had turned the screw about a hundred times with from forty to fifty interrogations, that he was beaten from one covert into another, until at last he was obliged to confess — although he began with most peremptorily denying it altogether — that he sent the telegraph and wrote the forged communication from the Tremont and the Parker House.”

So the stream of argument and raillery, and sarcasm and pathos, rolled on ample, unchecked, and overwhelming, for two long summer days (no one in the throng of auditors restless or weary), and drew to its close in exquisite quietness and beauty. “I leave her case, therefore,” said the advocate, as if repeating the refrain of a hymn, “upon this statement, and respectfully submit that for both their sakes you will render a verdict promptly and joyfully in favor of Helen Dalton — for both their sakes. There is a future for them both together, gentlemen, I think. But if that be not so, — if it be that this matter has proceeded so far that her husband's affections have been alienated, and that a happy life in her case has become impracticable, — yet for all that, let there be no divorce. For no levity, no vanity, no indiscretion, let there be a divorce. I bring to your minds the words of Him who spake as never man spake: 'Whosoever putteth away his wife' — for vanity, for coquetry, for levity, for flirtation — whosoever putteth away his wife for any thing short of adultery, and that established by clear, undoubted, and credible proof, — whosoever does it, 'causeth her to commit adultery.' If they may not be dismissed then, gentlemen, to live again together, for her sake and her parents' sake sustain her. Give her back to self-respect, and the assistance of that public opinion which all of us require."

One word of the last letter of the wife to the husband, and a single echoing sentence, finished this remarkable speech. " 'Wishing you much happiness and peace with much love, if you will accept it, I remain, your wife.' So may she remain until that one of them to whom it is appointed first to die shall find the peace of the grave! "

The mere reading of this argument can give but a feeble idea of its beauty and cogency to those who were so fortunate as to listen. Oftentimes, before a legal tribunal, the cause is greater than the advocate. He rises to it, and is upheld by it. But sometimes it is his province to create an interest, which the subject itself does not afford ; to enliven the dull ; to dignify the mean ; to decorate the unseemly. The body may be vile, but he arrays it in purple and crowns it with gems. This case, though with some elements of unusual character, would probably have fallen to the dreary level of similar actions, were it not lifted and enveloped in light by the genius of the advocate. It is like some of those which made Erskine and Curran famous ; and the defence shows a power not inferior to theirs. As a result of it, the jury disagreed ; the divorce was not consummated ; and it is understood (as if to make the spirit of the argument prophetic) that the parties are now living together in harmony.

The following letters need no explanation : —

TO HON. EDWARD EVERETT.

“ BOSTON, Sept. 30th, 1857.

“ MY DEAR SIR, — I was sick when your kindest gift of the Inauguration Discourse¹ was brought in, and although able to read it instantly, — for I was not dying, — it is only now that I have become able to thank you for your courtesy, and to express the exceeding delight, and, as it were, triumph, with which I have studied this most noble exposition of the good, fair, and useful of the high things of knowledge. To have said on such themes what is new and yet true, in words so exact as well as pictured and burning, and in a spirit so fresh and exulting, and yet wise, sober, and tender, was, I should have thought, almost impossible even for you. I wonder as much as I love, and am proud for you on the double tie of friendship and of country.

“ I remain, with greatest regard,

“ Your servant and friend,

“ RUFUS CHOATE.”

¹ An Address delivered at St. Louis, at the Inauguration of Washington University of the State of Missouri.

TO HON. EDWARD EVERETT.

“WINTHROP PLACE, Nov. 17th, 1857.

“MY DEAR SIR, — I was not aware of that hiatus, and I made an exchange of my 21 vols. for a set extending over a longer period, and containing 30 vols. or more. I have found no defect that I remember. I beg you to supply your immediate wants from this one, if it is not just as bad.

“There is a certain gloomy and dangerous sense in which I am ‘gratified.’ But ‘renown and grace’ — where are they? Such a series of papers as you hint at would ‘bless mankind, and rescue’ Mr. Buchanan. I entreat you to give him and all conservative men an idea of a patriot administration. Kansas must be free — suâ sponte — and the nation kept quiet and honest, yet with a certain sense of growth, nor unmindful of opportunities of glory.

“Most truly, your friend,

“R. CHOATE.”

A lecture on Jefferson, Burr, and Hamilton, which he delivered March 10th, 1858, though of necessity general and somewhat desultory, was marked by his usual breadth of delineation and brilliancy of coloring, and led him to review and re-state some of the fundamental ideas which marked the origin and progress of our government. I pass by his delineation of Jefferson, who brought to the great work of that era “the magic of style and the habit and the power of delicious dalliance with those large and fair ideas of freedom and equality, so dear to man, so irresistible in that day;” and of Burr, to whom he was just, but whom he did not love, and whose “shadow of a name” he thought it unfair to compare for a moment with either of the others; and content myself with the conclusion of his sketch of Hamilton. After referring to the progress and the changes in the public sentiment of America, by which the Confederation, largely through Hamilton's influence, melted into the Union, he proceeds : —

“ I find him [Hamilton] growing from his speech in ‘the Great Fields,’ at seventeen, in 1774, to the last number of ‘The Federalist.’ I find him everywhere in advance ; everywhere frankest of our public men. Earlier than every other, bolder than every other, he saw and he announced that the Confederation could not govern, could not consolidate, could not create the America for which we had been fighting. Sooner than every one he saw and taught that we wanted, not a league, but a government. Sooner than every one he saw that a partition of sovereignty was practicable, — that the State might retain part, the new nation acquire part ; — that the grander, more imperial — the right of war, of peace, of diplomacy, of taxation, of commerce, and rights similar and kindred — might be acquired and wielded directly by the nation, and the vast, various, and uncertain residue held by the States, which in this system were an essential part ; — that the result would be one great People — E Pluribus Unum — master of a continent, a match for a world. To him more than to all or any one besides we owe it, that the convention at Annapolis ascended above the vain, timid, and low hope of amending the old Articles, assumed the high character of a direct representation of the People of these States, and took on themselves the responsibility of giving to that People for acceptance or rejection — by conventions in their States — a form of government completely new.

“ These speculations, these aims, ruled his life from 1780 to 1789. ‘That age — all of it — is full of his power, his truth, his wisdom,' — full to running over. Single sentiments ; particular preferences, minor, and less or more characteristic ; less cherished details, — modes, stages, proofs of opinion, — of these I have said nothing, for history cares nothing. I do not maintain that he did as much in the convention at Annapolis as others to shape the actual provisions of the Constitution. I do not contend that he liked all of them very well. But soldier-like, statesman-like, sailor-like, he felt the general pulse ; he surveyed his country ; he heaved the lead at every inch of his way. His great letter to Duane in 1780 anticipates the Union and the Government in which we live. Through the press, in the Assembly of New York, in the old Congress, to some extent in the Constitutional, and to large extent in the State Convention, he was first ; he who, like Webster, never flattered the people, but served them as he did, dared to address their reason, their interests, — not their passion of progress, — in 'The Federalist.' And of the foremost and from the start he espoused that Constitution all as his, and loved, and honored, and maintained it all till he went to his untimely grave.

“I dwell on that time from 1780 to 1789 because that was our age of civil greatness. Then, first, we grew to be one. In that time our nation was born. That which went before made us independent. Our better liberty, our law, our order, our union, our credit, our commerce, our rank among the nations, our page in the great history we owe to this. Independence was the work of the higher passions. The Constitution was the slow product of wisdom. I do not deny that in that age was sown the seed of our party divisions; of our strict and our liberal Constructionists; of our Unionists and States Rights Men; of smaller Hamiltons, and smaller Jeffersons. But who now dares raise a hand against the system which illustrates that day? Who dares now to say that the Union shall not stand as they left it? Who dares now to say that the wide arch of empire ranged by them shall not span a continent? Who dares now to say that the America of that day; the America of this; the America of all time and all history, is not his own America; first, last, midst; who does not hail on that flag, streaming over land and sea, — living or dying, — the writing, bathed and blazing in light, ‘Liberty and Union, now and for ever, one and inseparable!’

“The public life of Hamilton closes with the fall of Federalism, in 1801, as a party of the nation. In his administration as first Secretary of the Treasury, in his general counsels to Washington, in his general influence on the first years of our youthful world, you see the same masterly capacity; the same devotion to the Constitution as it was written, and to the Union which it helped to grow; the same civil wisdom; the same filial love; the same American feeling; the same transparent truth which had before made him our first of statesmen. Some, all, or almost all, of the works which he did, have come under the judgment of party and of time; and on these, opinions are divided. But no man has called in question the ability which established all departments, and framed and presided over that one; which debated the constitutionality and expediency of that small first Bank; which funded our debts, restored order to our credit; which saw in us before we saw, before Smith saw, our capacity to manufacture for ourselves; which made us impartial and made us neutral while our ancient friend became a Republic, and our ancient enemy and the world were in arms for old, shaking thrones. When that argument for the Bank was read by the Judges in 1819, one of them said, that every other supporter and opponent of that measure in the age of Washington seemed a child in the grasp of a giant. In this last era his difference in all things from Jefferson became more widely pronounced; each retired from the cabinet; and in 1801 Democracy became the national politics of America.

“I have avoided, as I ought, all inquiry into the private life of Burr. I am equally reserved on that of Hamilton; although that private life fears no disclosures as a whole, and no contrasts as a whole. Yet this sketch would be imperfect more than it must be, if I did not add something which I have read, heard, or thought on the man.

“From 1781 to 1789, and again from 1795 till his death in 1804—some seventeen years—he practised the law. I hear that in that profession he was wise, safe, and just; that his fees were moderate; that his honor was without a stain; that his general ability was transcendent, and that in rank he was leader. A gentleman from this city, whose name I might give, solicited his counsel in some emergency. He admired, as all did, his knowledge of men, his ingenuity, his promptness; and tendered him a fee of one hundred dollars. ‘No, Sir,’ said Hamilton, handing him back the difference, ‘twenty dollars is very abundant.’ He was consulted by a guardian, knavish as the guardian of Demosthenes. He heard his story; developed its details; ran with him through the general wilderness of his roguery; and then, sternly as at Yorktown, — ‘Now go and make your peace with your ward, or I will hunt you as a hare for his skin.’ There was a political opponent, — oldish, delicate, and prejudiced, — who hated him and his administration of the treasury, but who lost no hour, day in and day out, at Albany, in the Errors and Supreme Court, to hear every word that he said. ‘I could never,’ said he, ‘withdraw from him half an eye. It was all one steady, flashing, deepening flow of mind.’ This I heard from a member of Congress.

“His masterpiece at the Bar was the defence of Crosswell, of ‘The Balance,’ published at Hudson, for a libel, in 1804. It is reported in Johnson’s cases. It is better reported by Chancellor Kent, who heard it; by the universal tradition, which boasts of it as of the grandest displays of the legal profession; and by the common or statute law of America, on which it is written for ever. There and then he engraved on our mind, as with a pen of steel, the doctrine, that truth from right motives, for justifiable ends, might be safely written of everybody, high or low.

“Such — so limited — is our unwritten or our better liberty.

“That argument was made to a bench of Judges. It was made to an audience of lawyers and educated men; and I have heard that tears unbidden — silence that held his breath to hear applause unrepressed — murmurs not loud, but deep — marked the magic and the power.

“He wrote out that argument at length; then tore his manuscript in fragments, and spoke as he was moved of the genius within him!

“Who surpassed him as a reasoner? You all know the calm power of ‘The Federalist.’ Do you admire any thing in that immortal work more than his transparent and quiet style; his pure English, always equal to itself; his skilful interpretation; his masterly ability with which from the nature of man, the nature of government, the lessons of history, the past and present of Europe, the uses of a head, the uses of a nation, — he demonstrated that such powers must be given, and such powers are given? Who, since the eighty-eighth number, has dared to doubt that to the judge it is given to compare the law with the Constitution, and to pronounce which is higher; and that from the judge there lies no appeal!

“What a revolution may do to force prematurely the capacity of man, we, thank God! know not. What a cross of Scotch and Huguenot blood; a birth, infancy, childhood, and boyhood beneath those tropics where the earthquake revels, which the hurricane sweeps over, which the fever wastes at noonday, over which the sun tyrannizes, whose air is full of electricity, and whose soil is of fire, — personally we know not. But I own I am struck with nothing more than the precociousness of those mighty powers, and their equal, balanced, and safe development. At seventeen, he addressed masses on non-importation in ‘the Great Fields’ of New York, with the eloquence and energy of James Otis. At eighteen, he was among our ablest and wisest in the conduct of that great controversy with the measures of a king. At twenty, he conceived our Union. At thirty-two he wrote his share of 'The Federalist.' At thirty-eight his public life was over. I doubt if Pascal, if Grotius, if Cæsar, if Napoleon, had so early in life revealed powers vaster and maturer.

"There is one memory of Hamilton to which he is entitled in his bloody grave, and by which his truest eulogy is spoken, which refutes of itself ten thousand slanders, and which blooms over him — over Hoboken — over the church where his tomb is kept, — ever fragrant and ever new. With the exception, of course, of certain political opponents, and of a competitor or two, no one knew him who did not dearly love him; no one loved him once that did not love him to the last gasp. From the moment he saw and talked with him as Captain of Artillery, from the hour after he left his military family, until he slept that long sleep at Mount Vernon, Washington held him to his heart; and when that man — greatest of earth — died, Hamilton sat down speechless in the presence of Sedgwick, pressed his hand upon his eyes, and cried as a child for a father dead. 'The tears,' said Ames, 'that flow over this fond recital will never dry up. My heart, prostrated with the remembrance of Hamilton, grows liquid as I write, and I could pour it out like water.'

"To compare the claims and deeds of Burr with those of this great man, his victim, were impious. To compare those of Hamilton, or contrast them with those of the great Philanthropist and Democrat, Thomas Jefferson, who is equal? Each in his kind was greatest; each in his kind advanced the true interests of America."

The following letter will illustrate the playful mixture of literature with business, which often characterized Mr. Choate's intercourse with friends. It occurred after a meeting on professional affairs, during which a question — forgotten, however, almost as soon as proposed, till thus again brought to mind — had arisen on the reading of a passage in Virgil.

TO GEORGE T. DAVIS, ESQ.

“BOSTON, April 20th, 1858.

“DEAR SIR, — I am glad they are beaten, as they deserve to be. Of course, no adjustment now is to be heard of. The motion is the shadow of a shade, and I guess, after actual fraud found, the bill stands, and the cancellation follows, — which leads me to say how Virgil wrote it, averno, or averni. We shall never know till we ask him in the meads of Asphodel. But Forbiger, Wagner, Heyue, Servius, after the cracker MSS., write averno. So in the more showy texts it is now. When we meet we will settle or change all that.

“Truly yours,

RUFUS CHOATE.”

In 1858 Mr. Choate accepted an invitation to deliver an oration, on the 4th of July, before the Young Men's Democratic Club. It was with the understanding, however, that no party affinities were to be recognized. He spoke for the Union, and his subject was “American Nationality — its Nature — some of its Conditions, and some of its Ethics.”¹ He was received with wild and tumultuous applause, and heard with profound interest and sympathy by the multitudes which crowded the Tremont Temple; but many were pained to perceive the marks of physical weakness and exhaustion. He spoke with difficulty, and could hardly be heard throughout the large hall. But there was an earnestness and almost solemnity in his words which sunk deep into the hearts of the audience. It was a plea for the nation, in view of a peril which he thought he foresaw, as a necessary result of rash counsels, of a false political philosophy, and of wild theories of political morality.

¹ Published in the first edition of “The Life and Works,” and also in “Addresses and Orations of Rufus Choate,” second edition, Little, Brown, & Co., 1878.

It was full of the warmest, most generous patriotism. But beyond that he endeavored to illustrate and enforce some of the essential conditions, on which every free nation, and especially one so vast, so complicated as ours, must depend. "There is a love of country," he said, "which comes uncalled for, one knows not how. It comes in with the very air, the eye, the ear, the instincts, the first taste of the mother's milk, the first beatings of the heart. The faces of brothers and sisters, and the loved father and mother, — the laugh of playmates, the old willow-tree, and well, and school-house, the bees at work in the spring, the note of the robin at evening, the lullaby, the cows coming home, the singing-book, the catechism, the visits of neighbors, the general training, — all things which make childhood happy, begin it; and then as the age of the passions and the age of the reason draw on, and love and the sense of home and security and property under law, come to life, — and as the story goes round, and as the book or the newspaper relates the less favored lots of other lands, and the public and the private sense of a man is forming and formed, there is a type of patriotism already. Thus they had imbibed it who stood that charge at Concord, and they who hung deadly on the retreat, and they who threw up the hasty and imperfect redoubt on Bunker Hill by night, set on it the blood-red provincial flag, and passed so calmly with Prescott and Putnam and Warren through the experiences of the first fire.

“But now to direct this spontaneous sentiment of hearts to the Union, to raise it high, to make it broad and deep, to instruct it, to educate it, is in some things harder, some things easier: but it may be done; it must be done.” He then proceeds to show the nature of the Constitution, and of all practicable policy, as being the result of mutual concessions for the sake of the great ends of civil government, and to meet the question whether these compromises and concessions for such an end are a virtue, and can stand the higher test of morality. The affirmative of this question he maintains from the judgment of civilization “collected from all its expression and all its exponents,” — from the highest theory of political duty, — from the opinions of wise civilians and moralists, — and farther as being the judgment of religion itself. Of other conditions and laws of our nationality, and especially of the need of an enlightened public opinion, he goes on to say: “There must then be intelligence at the foundation. But what intelligence? Not that which puffeth up, not flippancy, not smartness, not sciolism, whose fruits, whose expression are vanity, restlessness, insubordination, hate, irreverence, unbelief, incapacity to combine ideas, and great capacity to overwork a single one. Not quite this. This is that little intelligence and little learning which are dangerous. These are the characteristics, I have read, which pave the way for the downfall of States; not those on which a long glory and a long strength have towered. These, more than the General of Macedon, gave the poison to Demosthenes in the Island Temple. These, not the triumvirate alone, closed the eloquent lips of Cicero." . . . " This is not the intelligence our Constitution means, Washington meant, our country needs. It is intelligence which, however it begins, ends with belief, with humility, with obedience, with veneration, with admiration, with truth ; which recognizes and then learns and then teaches the duties of a comprehensive citizenship ; which hopes for a future on earth and beyond earth, but turns habitually, reverently, thoughtfully, to the old paths, the great men, the hallowed graves of the fathers ; . . . which reforms by preserving, serves by standing and waiting, fears God, and honors America." . . .

Then after a few words on the duty of instructing the conscience, and the hope of a better and brighter day through the quiet and peaceful influences of moral forces, he adds : " Hold fast this hope ; distrust the philanthropy, distrust the ethics which would, which must, turn it into shame. Do no evil that good may come. Perform your share, for you have a share, in the abolition of slavery ; perform your share, for you have a share, in the noble and generous strife of the Sections, — but perform it by keeping, by transmitting, a UNITED, LOVING, AND CHRISTIAN AMERICA."

This whole discussion of a confessedly difficult problem of political ethics deserves the careful and unprejudiced consideration of every student of our civil history.

He never again addressed his fellow-citizens on questions of general political interests, and his last public words may be said to have been spoken in behalf of that Union which he so warmly loved, "first, last, and always" — that one nation whose grand march across the continent, whose unrivalled increase in all the elements of power so stimulated and gratified his patriotic ambition. Whether or not his fears were wise, we may now perhaps be better able to judge than when he first uttered them.

How his words were received by those who heard him was admirably expressed by Mr. Everett at a banquet, on the same afternoon, at the Revere House. "For myself, Sir," he said, "standing aloof from public life and from all existing party organizations, I can truly say that I have never listened to an exposition of political principle with higher satisfaction. I heard the late Mr. Samuel Rogers, the venerable banker-poet of London, more than once relate that he was present on the 10th of December, 1790, when Sir Joshua Reynolds delivered the last of his discourses before the Royal Academy of Art. Edmund Burke was also one of the audience; and at the close of the lecture Mr. Rogers saw him go up to Sir Joshua, and heard him say, in the fulness of his delight, in the words of Milton: —

‘The angel ended, and in Adam’s ear
So charming left his voice, that he awhile
Thought him still speaking, still stood fixed to hear.’

When our friend concluded his superb oration this morning, I was ready, like Mr. Cruger (who stood with Burke for the representation of Bristol), ‘to say ditto to Mr. Burke.’ I was unwilling to believe that the noble strain, by turns persuasive, melting, and sublime, had ended. The music of the voice still dwelt upon my ear; the lofty train of thought elevated and braced my understanding; the generous sentiments filled my bosom with delight, as the peal of a magnificent organ, touched by the master's hand, thrills the nerves with rapture and causes even the vaulted roof to vibrate in unison. The charmed silence seemed for a while to prolong the charming strain, and it was some moments before I was willing to admit that the stops were closed and the keys hushed."

CHAPTER X.

1858-1859.

Failing Health — Speech at the Webster Festival, January, 1859 — Address at the Essex Street Church — Last Law Case — Goes to Dorchester — Occupations — Decides to go to Europe — Letter to Hon. Charles Eames — Letter to Alfred Abbott, Esq. — Sails in the Europa, Captain Leitch — Illness on Board — Lands at Halifax — Letter from Hon. George S. Hillard — Sudden Death — Proceedings of Public Bodies — Meeting of the Boston Bar — Speeches of Hon. C. G. Loring, R. H. Dana, Judge Curtis, and Judge Sprague — Meeting in Faneuil Hall — Speech of Mr. Everett — Funeral.

FOR several years Mr. Choate's health had not unfrequently excited the anxiety of his friends. They wondered how he could endure such continuous and exhausting labors; why he, whose mind was always on the stretch, who took no rest, and allowed himself no recreation but that of his library, should not at last fail, like the over-strained courser. Their fears were not groundless. The deepening lines of his countenance pallid and sallow, the frame feebler than once, the voice less strong, the whole manner less energetic, demonstrated a need of caution. He was under an engagement to address the Alumni of Dartmouth College at their triennial meeting in 1858, and had made a partial preparation; but at the last moment was obliged to give it up, and betake himself for a few idle and wearisome days to the seaside. A week or two of respite from work — it could not be called recreation — a brief visit at Essex, a few nights in Dorchester at the residence of his daughter, Mrs. Bell — gave tone again to his wonderfully elastic constitution. I saw him repeatedly during the next winter, and, notwithstanding some unfavorable symptoms, thought that for a long time I had not seen him in such exuberance of spirits. I heard him make two arguments, and could not but notice the vigorous life with which he moved. There was the same intellectual face — the same eye, black, wide open, looking straight at the jury, and at individuals of them as he addressed now one and then another, — the same unrivalled felicity of speech, — the same tremendous vehemence, a little tempered, perhaps, — the same manner of straightening and drawing himself up at an interruption, — the same playfulness and good humor, — the occasional dropping of his voice to a confidential whisper, — the confident exactness of statement, — the absolute command of every circumstance, — the instantaneous apprehension, — the lightning rapidity of thought, — the subtle, but clear and impregnable logic. This apparent vigor proved, however, to be but the last flashes of the fire whose fuel was nearly exhausted.

The friends of Mr. Webster, according to a custom which had grown into honor among them, celebrated his birthday in 1859 by a festive gathering which Mr. Choate found himself able, though but just able, to attend. With what warmth he spoke on that theme which never failed to stimulate him, those who heard will never forget. They thought he was never so eloquent.

He spoke but once more in public out of the line of his profession. The twenty-fifth anniversary of the settlement of the Rev. Dr. Adams, whose church he attended, was celebrated on the 28th of March. He could not resist the wish to bear his testimony to the opinions and character of one whom he deeply respected and loved. It was a large and interesting assemblage of clergymen and laymen, met to pay a tribute of respect to a faithful Christian minister. Mr. Choate spoke with great tenderness and depth of feeling of the many years they had been together in that society, alluding briefly, in illustration, to the great events which in the mean time had been taking place in Europe and in this country. He then spoke of the reasons — accident or inclination — which had brought them to that house as their habitual place of worship, first among which he named the love and respect of the congregation for its minister. They had marked the daily beauty of his life, his consistency, his steadiness, his affectionateness, his sincerity, — transparent to every eye, — his abilities, his moderation, his taste, his courage. They had seen him on some occasions most interesting to the feelings and which dwell the longest in the memory and the affections: at the bedside of the sick and dying, at the burial of those loved most on earth, at the baptism of their children, or when first they clasped the hands of their brides. Thus between them and him there had been woven a tie which could never be sundered, even when the silver cord itself is loosed and the golden bowl is broken.

“There is a second reason, however,” he proceeded to say, “which we may with very great propriety give for the selection which we have made, and to which we have so long adhered ; and it is, my friends, that we have attended this worship and attached ourselves to this society, because we have believed that we found here a union of a true and old religion, with a possibility and the duty of a theory of culture and of love for that in which the mental and moral nature of man may be developed and may be completely accomplished.

“ That we hold a specific religious creed is quite certain ; obtruding it on nobody, and not for a moment, of course, dreaming of defending ourselves against anybody, — in the way of our fathers, we worship God in this assembly. We believe that the sources and proof and authority of religion rest upon a written revelation, communicated by the Supreme Will to a race standing in certain specific abnormal conditions. What that Will, honestly gathered, teaches, composes the whole religious duty of man. To find out that meaning by all the aids of which a thorough and an honest scholarship may possibly avail itself, — by the study of original tongues, — by the study of the history and government and manners and customs and geography of the nations in which it was first published, — by a collation, honestly and intelligently, of one version with another version, — by the history of creeds, — by attending especially to the faith of those churches who thought they saw the light at first, and saw it when it was clearest and brightest, — by all this, we say, it is the first duty of the minister to learn the truth ; and the second duty is to impress it by persuasive speech and holy life upon the consciences and hearts of men. These things, truly and honestly interrogated, reveal a certain state of truths, and these compose our creed, and the creed of every other denomination possessing and preaching and maintaining a kindred theology. Diversities of expression there are undoubtedly; diversities of the metaphysical theories of those who hold them; more or less saliency, more or less illustration in the mode in which they are presented; but substantially we have thought they were one. We regard the unity, and we forget the diversity, in concentration of kindred substances. I think our church began with the name and in the principle of Union; and in that name, and according to that principle, we maintain it to-day.

“And now, is there any thing, my friends, in all this, which is incompatible, in any degree, with the warmest and most generous and large and liberal and general culture, with the warmest heart, with the most expansive and hopeful philanthropy, with the most tolerant, most cheerful, most charitable love of man? Do we not all of us hold that outside of this special, authoritative, written revelation, thus promulgated, collateral with it, consistent with it, the creation of the same nature, there is another system still, a mental and moral nature, which we may with great propriety expose, and which we may very wisely and fitly study and enjoy? Into that system are we forbidden to pry, lest we become, or be in danger of becoming, Atheists, Deists, Pantheists, or Dilettanti, or Epicurean? What is there to hinder us from walking — consistently with our faith and the preaching to which every Sunday we are so privileged to listen — what is there to hinder us from walking on the shore of the great ocean of general truth, and gathering up here and there one of its pebbles, and listening here and there to the music of one of its shells? What is there to hinder us from looking at that natural revelation that shall be true hereafter? What is there in all this to prevent us from trying to open, if we can open, the clasped volume of that elder, if it may be that obscurer Scripture? What is there to hinder us from studying the science of the stars, from going back with the geologist to the birthday of a real creation, and thus tracing the line through the vestiges of a real and a true creation down to that later and great period of time, when the morning stars sang together, exulting over this rising ball? What is there to hinder us, if we dare to do it, from going down with chemists and physiologists to the very chambers of existence, and trying thence to trace, if we may, the faint lines by which matter rose to vitality, and vitality welled up first to animals, and then to man? What is there to prevent us from trying to trace the footsteps of God in history, from reading his law in the policies of States, in the principles of morals, and in the science of governments, — his love in the happiness of all the families of the human race, in animals and in man, — his retributions in the judgments that are ‘abroad in all the earth’? Is there any thing to hinder us, in the faith we hold, from indulging the implanted sense of beauty in watching the last glow of the summer eve, or the first faint flush that precedes or follows the glorious rising of the morning? Because we happen to believe that a written revelation is authoritative upon every man, and that there is contained in it, distinctly and expressly, the expression of the need of reconciliation, is there any thing in all this, let me ask you, my friends, which should hinder us from trying to explore the spirit of Plato, from admiring the supremacy of mind — which is at last the inspiration of the Almighty, that gives you understanding — in such an intellect as that of Newton, — from looking at the camp-fires as they glitter on the plains of Troy, — from standing on the battlements of heaven with Milton, — from standing by the side of Macbeth, sympathizing with, or at least appreciating something of, the compunction and horror that followed the murder of his friend and host and king, — from going out with old Lear, gray hair streaming, and throat choking, and heart bursting with a sense of filial ingratitude, — from standing by the side of Othello, when he takes the life of all that he loves best in this world, ‘not for hate, but all for honor,’ — from admiring and saddening to see how the fond and deep and delicate spirit of Hamlet becomes oppressed and maddened by the terrible discovery, by the sense of duty not entirely clear, by the conflict of emotions, and by the shrinking dread of that life to come, as if he saw a hand we could not see, and heard a voice we could not hear? Certainly there can be no manner of doubt that our faith, such as you profess it and such as you hold it, will give direction in one sense to all our studies. There can be no doubt, in one sense and to a certain extent, it baptizes and holds control over those studies; certainly, also, it may be admitted, that it creates tendencies and tastes that may a little less reluctantly lead away a man from the contemplation of these subjects; but is it incompatible with them? Do you think that Agassiz, that Everett, each transcendent in his own department of genius, has become so, because he held, or did not hold, a specific faith? Because you believe the Old Testament, as well as the New, cannot you read a classic in the last and best edition, if you know how to read it? That is the great question at last, and I apprehend that the incompatibility of which we sometimes hear, has no foundation in the things that are to be compared. Did poor, rich Cowper think them incompatible, one with another, when for so many years he soothed that burning brow and stayed that fainting reason, and turned back those dark billows that threatened to overwhelm him, by his translation of the Iliad and Odyssey? What did he say of this incompatibility himself? ‘Learning has borne such fruit on all her branches, piety has found true friends in the friends of science, even prayer has flowed from lips wet with Castalian dews.’ I hold, therefore, — and I shall be excused by the friends of other denominations, now and here present, if I deliberately repeat and publicly record, — that we have attended this church, attached ourselves to this congregation, and adhere to this form of faith, because we believe it to be the old religion, the true religion, and the safest; and because, also, we have thought that there was no incompatibility between it and the largest and most generous mental culture, and the widest philanthropy, that are necessary in order to complete the moral and mental development and accomplishment of man.”

In a strain quite unusual, he then, in drawing to a close, commended and enforced the separation of party politics from the ordinary services of the pulpit.

The next day, March 29, he made his last argument before the full bench, in the case of Gage vs. Tudor. The indisposition with which he had been troubled during the winter — weakness, lassitude, and a frequently returning nausea, the causes of which were obscure, and not reached by medicines — had gradually increased and caused him more annoyance. His friends were solicitous; but he had frequently rallied from serious indisposition, and they hoped for the best. He was able still to be at his office; once more appeared before a single judge in chambers upon a question of alimony, and early in April, though really much too ill for the exertion, went, at the earnest solicitation of a junior, to look after a case in Salem. It seemed a felicity of his life that the last time he appeared in court should be at that bar where, thirty-five years before, he had commenced the practice of his profession, — the Bar of Essex County. It was a case of a contested will, of considerable interest in itself, the decision turning upon the state of health of the testator. But those who were engaged in it were struck at observing the turn given by Mr. Choate to the examination of one of the medical witnesses, when, after obtaining all the information necessary to the point in hand, he proceeded with a series of questions bearing evidently upon the nature of the disease under which he supposed himself laboring. No notice was taken of it at the time; but he subsequently alluded to it in conversation with his junior counsel, suggesting that he thought he had a disease of the heart which might at any moment prove fatal. As the cause proceeded he found himself unequal to the labor of the trial, and withdrew from it before its close, returning home on Saturday the 16th of April. He never went to his office again; and with the exception of once attending church, and going to the funeral of a daughter of a much revered friend (Hon. Jeremiah Mason), never again to any place of public assembly. Books became more than ever his solace and delight. He read as much as he was able, but more frequently listened (his daughter reading aloud), not to whole volumes or continuous discussions, but to a few pages of Bacon, a scene in Shakspeare, a few lines of Homer, a page of Wordsworth, a poem by Tennyson, and oftener still to religious works; to a parable or miracle as expounded by Dr. Trench, a Hulsean lecture by the same author, a discourse by Jeremy Taylor, or a chapter in "The Pilgrim's Progress."

His attention was now turned to a voyage to Europe as a means of alleviating his disorder. It would at any rate save him from all temptation to professional labor, and he hoped to find solace, pleasure, and health in a quiet residence of a month or two in the south of England, — his thoughts turning especially to the Isle of Wight. He accordingly secured a passage in the steamer which was to leave Boston about the middle of May. As the day drew near, however, he felt himself unequal to the voyage, and accordingly deferred his departure. The delay brought no material relief, and for the sake of greater quiet, and the purer air of the country, he went, on the 24th of May, to the residence of his son-in-law, Joseph M. Bell, Esq., in Dorchester. The month that he remained in this delightful suburban retreat was full of quiet enjoyment. His appetite good, he suffered from nothing but weakness and occasional sudden attacks of nausea. Every day he drove, sometimes into town to get books, sometimes into the country over the secluded and picturesque suburban roads about Boston, but oftener to the sea, or to some point from which he could get a view of the ocean. At home, not seeming to be very ill, he enjoyed every thing with a rare and intense delight. His love of Nature, which had rather slumbered during the toils and anxieties of an active life, revived again as he looked upon her, undisturbed by the demands of a jealous profession. He would sit for hours in the sun, or under the shade of the veranda, or a tree near the house, watching the distant city, or the smoke curling up from far-off chimney-tops, or the operations of husbandry going on all about him, or listening to favorite authors, or to music which he loved. Never had he seemed to enjoy every object with a keener relish. "What can a person do," he once said, after looking long at a beautiful landscape, "life is not long enough —." He still made some attempt at a methodical arrangement of occupations. The early hours of the day were devoted to the Bible; then came the newspapers; then whatever books he might be interested in, — from the Works of Lord Bacon to the last Review, — several different works usually being read in the course of the morning. During this time he suffered no pain, and but for weakness which rendered it a labor for him to walk the length of the yard, or to ascend the stairs, he seemed as much like himself as ever. He saw no company, not being able to endure the fatigue of conversation, or dreading interruption by the nausea. But with his family, he was never more affectionate and playful, and never entered with fuller zest into their occupations and enjoyments. In the mean time the question of the voyage recurred, and he was compelled to make a decision. It was evident that the necessity somewhat weighed upon his mind, and that it was almost equally difficult for him to determine to stay or to go. His disease was obscure ; his physicians anticipated no injury from the voyage, and hoped for some relief. Three steamers had already sailed since he first thought of going ; and it was evident, if he hoped for benefit from a summer in England, that he could not much longer delay his departure. His reluctance to revoke a decision once fairly made, — especially as that would seem to be an acknowledgment of an illness more severe and immediately threatening than his friends or, perhaps, himself had allowed, — the prospect of rest, the hope of alleviation and some enjoyment, and possibly of recruiting, — all urged him to carry out his plan. At the same time, — and this, perhaps, was the slight consideration which turned the scale, — he knew that Halifax was less than two days' sail from Boston, and that if the voyage proved disagreeable, or any way unfavorable, it was easy to cut it short and return. Preparations were accordingly made with apparent cheerfulness, though with a latent sadness and misgiving. Books were chosen, he himself making out the following list: The Bible ; Daily Food ; Luther on the Psalms ; Hengstenberg's Psalms ; Lewis's Six Days of Creation ; Owen on Mark ; The Iliad ; The Georgics (Heyne's Virgil) ; Bacon's Advancement of Learning ; Shakspeare ; Milton ; Coleridge ; Thomson ; Macaulay's History ; Anastasius ;

The Crescent and the Cross. A few farewells were said, and a few farewell notes written, breathing of more, as it now seems, than a temporary separation. The following, to the Hon. Charles Eames, of Washington, and another to Mr. Abbott, the District Attorney for Essex, were written the day before he sailed: —

“BOSTON, Tuesday, June 28, 1859.

“MY DEAR SIR, — I borrow my son’s hand to grasp yours and Mrs. Eames’s with the friendship of many years, and on the eve of a departure in search of better health. God bless you till I return, and whether I return.

“Yours very sincerely,

“R. CHOATE, JR., for RUFUS CHOATE.

“HON. CHARLES EAMES.”

“HON. A. A. ABBOTT. BOSTON, Tuesday afternoon, June 28 [1859].

“MY DEAR SIR, — It would puzzle a Philadelphia doctor to say whether I am intrinsically better than when I saw you last, but I am quite competent to pronounce for myself that I love and esteem you, and Brother Lord, and Brother Huntington, quite as much as ever, and for quite as much reason. Pray accept for yourself, and give to them all, my love, and be sure that if I live to return, it will be with unabated regard for all of you.

“I am yours most affectionately,

“RUFUS CHOATE, by R. C., JR.”

On the 29th of June, he went on board The Europa, Capt. Leitch, accompanied by the members of his family and a few friends, and immediately lay down on the sofa in his state-room. The scene was necessarily a sad one, yet he was quite calm and seemed better than he had done, retaining his natural playfulness, speaking jocosely of the smallness of his reception-room in which so many were assembled, yet, with a peculiar tenderness, wishing to keep them all near him to the last.

When his friends left him as the hour for sailing drew near, mindful of the responsibility that might seem to devolve on his medical attendants, he sent word by his daughter, Mrs. Bell, to Dr. Putnam, his physician, that "whatever might be the event, he was satisfied that every thing had been done for the best." During the voyage to Halifax he lay in his state-room still, almost like marble, and with no restlessness of body or mind, conversing but little, and suffering somewhat from sea-sickness. On Thursday a bad symptom showed itself, in the swelling of his hands. The ship's surgeon, Dr. Bry, and another physician on board, Dr. Tyler, of Brookfield, were consulted, and came to the conclusion that it was hazardous for him to proceed, as, in their opinion, the excitement attendant upon any accident, or a severe storm, might cause death at once. To the advice tendered by them and other friends on board, after a little hesitation, he assented, apparently glad of a chance of relief, he was so weary.

The letter of a fellow-passenger, Hon. George S. Hillard, describes the circumstances of the midnight landing too graphically to be omitted or forgotten in this narrative. "From the moment I first looked upon him, on the morning of the day that we sailed," says Mr. Hillard, writing from England, after hearing of his death, "I felt assured that the hand of death was on him. His berth was next to mine, and I saw him many times during the short period he remained on board. He was always lying at full length upon the sofa, and perfectly quiet, though not reading or listening to reading. This in itself, in one with so active a brain and restless an organization as his, was rather an ominous sign. In the brief moments of intercourse I had with him, the feminine sweetness and gentleness of manner which always characterized him was very marked and very touching. The determination that he should stop at Halifax was come to before dinner on the 30th, and all preparations were duly made to have him landed so soon as we should reach the port. This was not accomplished until midnight; the night was very dark, and all that we could see of the town was a mass of indistinct gloom, dotted here and there with twinkling lights. We took on board a large number of passengers, and you can well imagine the distracting hurry and confusion of such a scene; the jostling of porters and luggage, the trampling of restless feet, and all the while the escape-pipe driving one into madness with its ear-piercing hiss. Mr. Choate walked to his carriage, leaning heavily on my arm, — his son's attention being absorbed by the care of the luggage. He moved slowly and with some difficulty, taking very short steps. Two carriages had been engaged, by some misunderstanding, but, on account of the luggage, it was found convenient to retain them both. Mr. Choate was put into one of them, alone, without any incumbrance of trunk or bag, and his son with the luggage occupied the other. When the moment for driving off came, I could not bear to see him carried out into the unknown darkness unaccompanied, and I asked Capt. Leitch, who was with us, — and whose thoughtful kindness I shall never forget, — how long a time I might have to drive up to the town; and he replied, half an hour. Hearing that the inn, or boarding-house, to which we were directed, was but half a mile off, I entered the coach, sat by his side, and off we went through the silent and gloomy streets. The half-mile stretched out into a long mile, and when we had reached the house, and I had deposited Mr. Choate on a sofa in the sitting-room, the landlady appalled me by saying that she had not an unoccupied bed in the house, and could not accommodate him. Her words fell upon my heart like a blow. . . . In the mean time the inexorable moments were slipping away, and I was compelled to leave the house. I heard an airy voice calling me out of the darkness, and I could not by a moment enlarge the captain's leave. I left Mr. Choate upon the sofa, pale and exhausted, but patient and uncomplaining, his luggage in the street at the door, and his son at that midnight hour wandering about the streets of Halifax, seeking a temporary shelter for a dying father, with what result I have not yet heard. What with the sense of hurry, the irritation of this mischance, and the consciousness that I had seen my eminent friend for the last time, I drove back to the boat with a very sore heart. There are some passages in our lives which stamp themselves upon the memory with peculiar force and distinctness. Such were my midnight experiences at Halifax; if I should live to be a hundred years old, they would be as fresh before the mind's eye as they are now."

After Mr. Hillard left, a room was secured in what proved to be a very pleasant boarding-house, not far distant from the one to which he first drove. It was in the third story, and overlooked the harbor. Mr. Choate was too weak to ascend the stairs that night,¹ but slept well in a lower room, and the next morning was able to mount to his own. He immediately took to his bed, which he never again left. At the suggestion of the American Consul, Dr. Domville, surgeon on board the flag-ship of the Admiral then in command of the British fleet on the North American station, was called in, and through his prescriptions the most unfavorable symptoms were soon alleviated. From day to day he remained nearly the same, rising from his bed only to have it made, talking but little, watching — with the old, habitual love of the sea — as he could without raising his head from the pillow, the unloading of the ships, and the vessels moving in the harbor. “If a schooner or sloop goes by,” he once said, when dropping into a doze, “don’t disturb me, but if there is a square-rigged vessel, wake me up.” By night his son sat by his side till he was sound asleep, when, by his special request, he was left alone, and usually slept well. Only one night did he seem at all unlike himself, when being oppressed for breath, he seemed to imagine that people were crowding round the bed. His books were read to him: Shakspeare, (The Tempest), Bacon’s Advancement of Learning, Macaulay’s History, The Six Days of Creation, Gray’s Poem on Adversity (he selecting it), Luther on the Psalms, and more variously and constantly than all, the Bible. He talked much of home, making little plans about the best way of getting there; talked of sending for his family to come to him, but thought he should recruit so soon that it would be of no use; talked about Essex, of wanting to go down there and having a boat built for him, discussing her size and rig. He was constantly cheerful, pleasant, and hopeful, and on the 12th of July, according to Dr. Domville, appeared better than on any previous day, and was led to indulge the hope that he would shortly be sufficiently restored to make a journey homeward or elsewhere. It was otherwise ordered. The great shadow was fast sweeping over him.

¹ He was so feeble that, in going from one house to the other, he fell forward in the carriage and was not able to raise himself.

At his usual hour on that day, about five o'clock, he ate as hearty a dinner as usual, bolstered up in bed, and conversing at the same time with his natural vivacity. Shortly after he had finished, his son, who was in the room, was startled by hearing him asking for something indistinctly and in a peculiar tone; and going to him, inquired if he did not feel well. He said, No — that he felt very faint. These were the last words he ever uttered. He was raised and supported in the bed; the remedies at hand were freely applied, and the physician at once summoned. But the end was at hand. His eyes closed, opened again, but with no apparent recognition; a slight struggle passed over his frame, and consciousness was extinguished for ever. A heavy breathing alone showed that life remained. It continued till twenty minutes before two o'clock on the morning of July 13, when it ceased, and all was still.¹

Among strangers as he was, his illness had awakened a general sympathy, and prompted the kindest attentions. "All classes, from the Governor, Lord Mulgrave, down, proffered during his illness all that their several resources afforded;" and his death, so sudden and unexpected, "cast a gloom over the entire community."¹ A meeting of the Bench and Bar of the city, presided over by the venerable Chief Justice, Sir Brenton Haliburton, was immediately held in testimony of respect and sympathy. The sad tidings were at once spread by telegraph over the United States, and everywhere evoked a similar response. The press, of all parties and persuasions, and in every part of the country, was unanimous in its tribute of respect. Meetings were held in many cities and towns in many States, to give utterance to the general sorrow. Among the letters which came from various parts of the country, the following was received from President Buchanan ; —

¹ An autopsy, made after the remains had reached Boston, showed that the heart and lungs were entirely healthy. The kidneys were affected with what is known to physicians as "Bright's disease." The brain was not examined.

"WASHINGTON, 18th July, 1859.

"MY DEAR SIR, — I deeply regret the death of Mr. Choate. I consider his loss, at the present time, to be a great public misfortune. He was an unselfish patriot, — devoted to the Constitution and the Union ; and the moral influence of his precept and his example would have contributed much to restore the ancient peace and harmony among the different members of the Confederacy. In him 'the elements were so combined,' that all his acquaintances became his devoted friends. So far as I know, even party malevolence spared him. He was pure and incorruptible ; and in all our intercourse I have never known him to utter or insinuate a sentiment respecting public affairs which was not of a high tone and elevated character.

"Yours very respectfully,

"JAMES BUCHANAN."

But nowhere was there a deeper or more prevailing feeling than among the members of the Essex Bar, with whom he began and with whom he closed his labors, and in Boston, where his greatest legal triumphs were achieved. Many clergymen noticed the loss in their public discourses. The Mercantile Library Association; the Young Men's Democratic Club; the Massachusetts Historical Society; the Municipal Corporation; the Courts of the State, and of the United States; the Faculty and Alumni of Dartmouth College, where he was graduated just forty years before; the Bar of New York, and many other public bodies, met to express their sense of the loss. The Suffolk Bar at once appointed a committee to draw up and present a series of resolutions; and seldom has there been expression of sincerer or deeper grief than at the meeting which followed. His brethren of the Bar spoke with suffused eye and tremulous lip. Of the many addresses and communications, difficult as it is to discriminate between them on the score of fitness and general excellence, a few may be selected as indicative of the spirit of all.

¹ Letter from Dr. Domville.

•
FROM THE ADDRESS OF HON. CHARLES G. LORING, AT A MEETING OF THE SUFFOLK BAR.

“MR. CHAIRMAN,—I am instructed by the committee appointed at a meeting of which this is an adjournment, to present for its consideration a series of resolutions, the adoption of which they recommend as commemorative of the sense entertained by the members of the Suffolk Bar, of the afflicting event which has recently befallen them. And in discharging that duty, I crave indulgence, as one of the eldest among them, to say a few words upon the sad theme which fills our hearts, though the state of my health would forbid any elaborate attempt at adequate description of the marvellous combination of genius, learning, and ability, characteristic of our departed brother, or any fitting eulogium upon his life and character.

“Of his gifts and attainments as a lawyer and as an orator, not only this bar, but the national forum and the legislative halls of the Commonwealth, and of the United States, have been witnesses; while his scholastic efforts, on many varying occasions, have been heard and read by admiring multitudes, whose remembrance of them is still fresh and full. And if — not relying only upon our own affectionate and perhaps partial judgments — we may trust the general expression of the press throughout the land, it is no unbecoming exaggeration to say that in the death of our friend the nation has lost one of the most gifted and distinguished lawyers and orators, and one of the most refined and accomplished scholars, that have adorned its forensic, legislative, or literary annals.

“Having been for more than twenty years after Mr. Choate came to this bar, his antagonist in forensic struggles, at the least, I believe, as frequently as any other member of it, I may well be competent to bear witness to his peculiar abilities, resources, and manners in professional service. And having, in the varied experiences of nearly forty years, not infrequently encountered some of the giants of the law, whose lives and memories have contributed to render this bar illustrious throughout the land, — among whom I may include the honored names of Prescott, Mason, Hubbard, Webster, and Dexter, and others among the dead, and those of others yet with us, to share in the sorrows of this hour, — I do no injustice to the living or the dead in saying, that for the peculiar powers desirable for a lawyer and advocate, for combination of accurate memory, logical acumen, vivid imagination, profound learning in the law, exuberance of literary knowledge and command of language, united with strategic skill, I should place him at the head of all whom I have ever seen in the management of a cause at the bar.

“No one who has not been frequently his antagonist in intricate and balanced cases, can have adequate conception of his wonderful powers and resources; and especially in desperate emergencies, when his seemingly assured defeat has terminated in victory.

“His remembrance of every fact, suggestion, or implication involved in the testimony, of even the remotest admission by his adversary, — his ready knowledge and application of every principle of law called for at the moment, — his long forecast and ever watchful attention to every new phase of the case, however slight, — his incredible power of clear and brilliant illustration, — his unexampled exuberance of rich and glowing language, — his wonderfully methodic arrangement, where method would best serve him, and no less wonderful power of dislocation and confusion of forces, when method would not serve him, — his incredible ingenuity in retreating when seemingly annihilated, and the suddenness and impetuosity with which, changing front, he returned to the charge, or rallied in another and unexpected direction, — and the brilliant fancy, the peerless beauty, and fascinating glow of language and sentiment, with which, when law and facts and argument were all against him, he could raise his audience above them all as things of earth, while insensibly persuading it that the decision should rest upon considerations to be found in higher regions, and that a verdict in his favor was demanded by some transcendent equity independent of them all, at times surpassed all previous conceptions of human ability.

“In manner and deportment at the bar, as everywhere, our deceased brother was not only unexceptionable, but an eminent example of what a lawyer should be. Always dignified and graceful in his bearing towards his professional brethren, and deferential to the court, and always self-possessed in the stormiest seas, — his intensity of language being, as I ever thought, the effect of a strongly excited imagination, combined with peculiar nervous energy, rather than arising from otherwise deep emotions or excited feelings — he rarely permitted himself to indulge in personalities, and never in those of an offensive and degrading nature, the indulgence of which is ever to be deplored, as alike discreditable to the individual and the profession, of which, for the time being, every advocate should feel himself to be the public representative.

“Nor can I leave this theme without thus publicly reaffirming, what it has been my constant pleasure to say of him throughout all our long years of exasperating conflicts, that he was the best tempered and most amiable man in controversy whom I ever encountered; nor will I hesitate to add that his example has at times winged the arrow of self-reproach that it was not better followed.

“Of Mr. Choate’s power and attainments as a scholar, so conspicuous and extensive, I forbear to speak further than to say that the bar of the whole country owes to him the debt of gratitude for exhibiting an example so illustrious of the strength, dignity, and beauty which forensic discussion may draw from the fields of literature and art, with whose treasures he often adorned his arguments in rich exuberance, though never with the slightest savor of pedantry or affectation.

“ We have fought many hardly contested forensic fields, but ever met, as I trust and believe, on neutral ground, in mutual, cordial good-will — and many are the delightful hours I have passed in his society — in the enjoyment of his genial nature, fascinating exuberance of fancy and learning, and exquisite wit ; but the silver cord is loosed, the golden bowl is broken, and the wheel broken at the cistern ; and it is only left for me to lay a worthless, fading chaplet on his grave.”

Hon. George Lunt, chairman of the sub-committee of the Suffolk Bar, presented the following resolutions, prefacing them with a few remarks, in the course of which he said, —

“ Of those who have cultivated deliberative eloquence as an art, no doubt there have been others his equals, possibly in some respects his superiors. And though his style of oratory, in its composition, could scarcely be compared with any thing except the grand and lofty periods of Milton in his works of prose, yet it had many of the characteristics of Burke, whom he admired, and of another great man of our own country — Fisher Ames — whom no successor has surpassed. But at the bar, when and where was there ever one like him in the union of all things which constituted his power, and gave him that sort of magnetic influence, felt by all who approached him, and which courts, juries, and audiences so often found irresistible ? It was in this, I feel disposed to say, that Mr. Choate was the most peculiar, — that his soul imbued his thoughts and gave them life and action, — and to him more than to any man, and now with sad significance, are applicable those descriptive lines of Dryden : —

' A fiery soul that, working out its way,
Fretted the pigmy body to decay,
And o'er-informed the tenement of clay.'

For his soul became incorporated, as he spoke with his living presence, and he had enough of the spiritual element for a whole generation of ordinary members of the bar.

“ With your permission I will read the RESOLUTIONS.

“ Resolved, That the members of this bar, submissively and solemnly acknowledging the dispensation of Divine Providence, in removing by death their late eminent leader and beloved associate, the Honorable Rufus Choate, — recognize that mournful event with emotions of the profoundest sorrow, and sincerely feel that no language could adequately express their exalted estimation of his character as a lawyer, a citizen, and a man, or their affectionate respect and veneration for his memory.

“ Resolved, That the professional character of our departed brother exhibited the rarest and most admirable qualities, seldom if ever before so singularly united in the same person ; that while unrivalled in all the learning of the law, entirely familiar with the principles, the doctrines, and the philosophy of the science to which his life was devoted, and thoroughly acquainted with the minutest requirements of its practice, the manly strength and capacity of his intellect were combined with a grace, an elegance, and a brilliancy of conception and expression totally unexampled ; that while he brought to the pursuits of his profession the most extraordinary quickness and clearness of apprehension, and the best faculties of sound and solid reasoning, these incomparable powers were brightened and enriched by a facility and fertility of illustration no less remarkable, drawn from nature, art, literature, the resources of his own imagination, and the Scriptures which he so loved and revered ; and by a spontaneous flow of impassioned and matchless eloquence, which animated, instructed, and inspired reason — captivating it, yet subject to it — using the noblest language in which thought could clothe itself, varied often, and enlivened by a quaint and original felicity of expression, which cheered the gravest proceedings, while it illuminated his meaning — showing him, confessedly, among all men, the very genius of the bar ; yet with all its amplest treasuries of knowledge at his command, by the exercise of a power of application, not usually attributed to genius, and by habits of careful and laborious study, in which no man surpassed and few equalled him — manifesting a real and most earnest sympathy in every case entrusted to him, to the smallest indifferently with the largest, by a sort of resolute instinct of nature, but which always co-operated with principle, and was sustained by it — thus, always doing justice to his client, himself, and the occasion, and never found even partially unprepared — but before a single judge, with no audience, upon a question claiming little public interest, as learned, as eloquent, as choice, copious, and accurate in language, and equally as ‘fervent in business,’ as if surrounded by an admiring crowd, so often kindled by the thrilling utterance of his lips — for he was still there, doing his duty — his vigor, his fire, his zeal ever the same — so that it was the spirit of the man within which led him on, and made him true to all time and place, and thus able to turn time, occasion, circumstance, all things, to the immediate and overpowering purpose which impelled him, as few men are impelled, to do with his might whatever his hands found to do.

“ Resolved, That while looking to him constantly as one of the great lights of the profession — honoring him without reservation as its unquestioned leader, with recollections full of that enchanting eloquence which always fascinated by a freshness, a brilliancy, an ardor, and an originality peculiarly its own, and of a learning equally sound, extensive, and ready — always gathering new stores by the unceasing study and reflection of every day — our long association with him, in the kindest, most agreeable, and most friendly relations, as members of the bar, and in the ordinary intercourse of life, recalls the impression of his personal characteristics with vivid distinctness and poignancy at this moment of severe and unaffected grief; and revives him in our memory as, of all men of whom we have known, one of the most truly amiable and estimable; and with hearts overflowing with the sense of that amenity and unforced courtesy — now buried with him for ever — so graceful and uniform, since it was a part of his very nature — of that transparent tenderness of feeling peculiarly distinguishing him and an unassuming kindness of demeanor, rendered to the lowest equally with the highest in his company, — showing him humane and true to humanity in the broadest acceptation of the word, as he was profoundly interested in all which might concern a man — and though without any of the familiarity which lessens, yet equally at home with the humblest and most cultivated, and in the poorest as the grandest place; and everywhere and in all companies free from the slightest indelicacy of expression, and apparently unconscious of it by a certain innate nicety of mind — and gratefully remembering him as a true gentleman, because gentle both by nature and culture, and as the highest ornament of his profession, and an honor to his race, we cherish his memory with an affection, admiration, and respect, scarcely to be disturbed in this generation by another example of qualities and gifts so noble and extraordinary, as to make him in many singular respects — in genius, learning, and eloquence — in perfection of the reasoning powers, and taste, fancy, and imaginative faculties not often in concord with them; and in fidelity to his client and his cause never excelled — justly entitled to the reputation, likely to become still more extensive, of the marvel of his time.

“Resolved, That, while the decease of this great and excellent man is universally regarded by this community as an irreparable calamity, to be only deepened by experience, as we become more and more sensible of a vacant place so difficult worthily to fill, — the loss to the Commonwealth and the nation cannot be too keenly deplored; that as a citizen of the State and of the United Republic, his whole life evinced that wise interest in and generous devotion to public affairs, becoming his station, profession, character, and understanding, — discussing them before the people on suitable occasions, with a spirit and a power of thought and language seldom equalled — thus affording the strongest and surest pledge of an honest and unflinching patriotism, which won for him, even from those hostile to his opinions, a confidence in his political integrity seldom felt or granted to a statesman by those opposed to him; and that while the public services rendered by him in the past entitle his memory to our veneration, we may well anticipate future exigencies of the country, when to miss the invaluable aid of such an illustrious counsellor, guide, and example, will be only to renew our grief, as we look in vain for that steady and shining light now so prematurely and sadly extinguished.

“Resolved, That the members of this bar, sorrowfully and respectfully, beg leave to tender to the bereaved family of their lamented friend the most heartfelt sentiments of condole-

lence and sympathy; and feeling that the occasion rarely arises in which private grief is so deeply and justly shared by all, and peculiarly by their own profession, they ask permission to unite with the family of their departed brother, in attending his remains to their last earthly resting-place.

“Resolved, That a eulogy be pronounced at such convenient time as may be hereafter determined upon, and that Hon. Caleb Cushing be invited to deliver the same before the bar.

“Resolved, That these resolutions be presented to the Supreme Judicial Court of this Commonwealth, with a request that they be entered upon its records.”

REMARKS OF RICHARD H. DANA, JR., Esq.

“MR. CHAIRMAN, — By your courtesy, and the courtesy of this bar, which never fails, I occupy an earlier moment than I should otherwise be entitled to; for the reason, that in a few hours I shall be called upon to take a long leave of the bar and of my home. I cannot do that, Sir, — I cannot do that, without rising to say one word of what I know and feel upon this sad loss.

“The pressure which has been upon me in the last few days of my remaining here has prevented my making that kind of preparation which the example of him whom we commemorate requires of every man about to address a fit audience upon a great subject. I can only speak right on what I do feel and know.

“‘The wine of life is drawn.’ The ‘golden bowl is broken.’ The age of miracles has passed. The day of inspiration is over. The Great Conqueror, unseen and irresistible, has broken into our temple and has carried off the vessels of gold, the vessels of silver, the precious stones, the jewels, and the ivory; and, like the priests of the Temple of Jerusalem, after the invasion from Babylon, we must content ourselves, as we can, with vessels of wood and of stone and of iron.

“With such broken phrases as these, Mr. Chairman, perhaps not altogether just to the living, we endeavor to express the emotions natural to this hour of our bereavement. Talent, industry, eloquence, and learning there are still, and always will be, at the bar of Boston. But if I say that the age of miracles has passed, that the day of inspiration is over, — if I cannot realize that in this place where we now are, the cloth of gold was spread, and a banquet set fit for the gods, — I know, Sir, you will excuse it. Any one who has lived with him and now survives him will excuse it, — any one who, like the youth in Wordsworth’s ode,

• ‘by the vision splendid,
Is on his way attended,
At length . . . perceives it die away,
And fade into the light of common day.’

“Sir, I speak for myself, — I have no right to speak for others, — but I can truly say, without any exaggeration, taking for the moment a simile from that element which he loved as much as I love it, though it rose against his life at last, — that in his presence I felt like the master of a small coasting vessel, that hugs the shore, that has run up under the lee to speak a great homeward-bound Indiaman, freighted with silks and precious stones, spices and costly fabrics, with sky-sails and studding-sails spread to the breeze, with the nation’s flag at her mast-head, navigated by the mysterious science of the fixed stars, and not unprepared with weapons of defence, her decks peopled with men in strange costumes, speaking of strange climes and distant lands.

“ All loved him, especially the young. He never asserted himself, or claimed precedence, to the injury of any man’s feelings. Who ever knew him to lose temper? Who ever heard from him an unkind word? And this is all the more strange from the fact of his great sensitiveness of temperament.

“ His splendid talents as an orator need no commendation here. The world knows so much. The world knows perfectly well that juries after juries have returned their verdicts for Mr. Choate’s clients, and the Court has entered them upon the issues. The world knows how he electrified vast audiences in his more popular addresses; but, Sir, the world has not known, though it knows better now than it did, — and the testimony of those better competent than I am will teach it, — that his power here rested not merely nor chiefly upon his eloquence, but rested principally upon his philosophic and dialectic power. He was the greatest master of logic we had amongst us. No man detected a fallacy so quickly, or exposed it so felicitously as he, whether in scientific terms to the bench, or popularly to the jury; and who could play with a fallacy as he could? Ask those venerated men who compose our highest tribunal, with whom all mere rhetoric is worse than wasted when their minds are bent to the single purpose of arriving at the true results of their science, — ask them wherein lay the greatest power of Rufus Choate, and they will tell you it lay in his philosophy, his logic, and his learning.

“ He was, Sir, in two words, a unique creation. He was a strange product of New England. Benjamin Franklin, John Adams, Samuel Dexter, Daniel Webster, and Jeremiah Mason seem to be the natural products of the soil; but to me this great man always seemed as not having an origin here in New England, but as if, by the side of our wooden buildings, or by the side of our time-enduring granite, there had risen, like an exhalation, some Oriental structure, with the domes and glittering minarets of the Eastern world. Yet this beautiful fabric, so aerial, was founded upon a rock. We know he digged his foundation deep, and laid it strong and sure.

“I wished to say a word as to his wit, but time would fail me to speak of every thing. Yet, without reference to that, all I may say would be too incomplete. His wit did not raise an uproarious laugh, but created an inward and homefelt delight, and took up its abode in your memory. The casual word, the unexpected answer at the corner of the street, the remark whispered over the back of his chair while the docket was calling, you repeated to the next man you met, and he to the next, and in a few days it became the anecdote of the town. When as lawyers we met together, in tedious hours, and sought to entertain ourselves, we found we did better with anecdotes of Mr. Choate than on our own original resources.

“Besides his eloquence, his logical power, and his wit, he possessed deep and varied learning. His learning was accurate, too. He could put his hand on any Massachusetts case as quick as the judge who decided it.

“But if I were asked to name that which I regard as his characteristic, — that in which he differed from other learned, logical, and eloquent men of great eminence, — I should say it was his æsthetic nature.

“ Even under the excitement of this moment, I should not compare his mind in the point of mere force of understanding (and, indeed, he would not have tolerated such a comparison) with Daniel Webster ; and yet I think we have a right to say that, in his æsthetic nature, he possessed something to which the minds of Franklin, Adams, Dexter, Mason, and Webster, were strangers.

“ But I ask pardon of the bar. I am not desirous of making these comparisons.

“ I need not say, Sir, Rufus Choate was a great lawyer, a great jurist, a great publicist, but more than all that — and I speak of that which I know — his nature partook strongly of the poetic element. It was not something which he could put on or off, but it was born with him — I will not say died with him, but is translated with him.

“ Shakspeare was his great author. I would have defied even the Shakspeare scholar to refer to any passage of Shakspeare that Mr. Choate would not have recognized instantly. Next to Shakspeare, I think I have a right to say he thought that he owed more to Wordsworth than to any other poet. He studied him before it was the fashion, and before his high position had been vindicated.

“ Then he was, of course, a great student of Milton, and after that, I think that those poets who gained the affections of his youth, and wrote when he was young, — Byron, Scott, Coleridge, Southey, — had his affections chiefly ; though, of course, he read and valued and studied Spenser and Dryden, and, as a satirist and a maker of epigrams, Pope. This love of poetry with him was genuine and true. He read and studied always, not with a view to make ornaments for his speeches, but because his nature drew him to it. We all know he was a fine Greek and Latin scholar; was accurate; he never made a false quantity. Who ever detected him in a misquotation? He once told me he never allowed a day to go by that he did not write out a translation from some Greek or Latin author. This was one of the means by which he gained his affluence of language. Of Cicero he was a frequent student, particularly of his ethical and philosophical writings. But Greek was his favorite tongue.

“One word more, Sir. It is not so generally known, I suppose, of Mr. Choate, that, certainly during the last ten years of his life, he gave much of his thoughts to those noble and elevating problems which relate to the nature and destiny of man, to the nature of God, to the great hereafter; recognizing Sir, that great truth — so beautifully expressed in his favorite tongue — in sacred writ, Τὰ μὴ βλεπόμενα αἰώνια — things not seen are eternal. He studied not merely psychology; he knew well the great schools of philosophy; he knew well their characteristics, and read their leading men. I suspect he was the first man in this community who read Sir William Hamilton, and Mansel's work on ‘The Limits of Religious Thought;’ and I doubt if the Chairs of Harvard and Yale were more familiar with the English and German mind, and their views on these great problems, than Mr. Choate.

“ He carried his study even into technical theology. He knew its genius and spirit better than many divines. He knew in detail the great dogmas of St. Augustine ; and he studied and knew John Calvin and Luther. He knew the great principles which lie at the foundation of Catholic theology and institutions, and the theology of the Evangelical school ; and he knew and studied the rationalistic writings of the Germans, and was familiar with their theories and characteristics.

“ With all those persons whom he met and who he felt, with reasonable confidence, had sufficient elevation to value these subjects, he conversed upon them freely. But beyond this — as to his opinions, his results — I have no right to speak. I only wished to allude to a few of the more prominent of his characteristics ; and it is peculiarly gratifying to remember, at this moment, that he had the elevation of mind so to lay hold upon the greatest of all subjects.

“ I meant to have spoken of his studies of the English prose-writers, among whom Bacon and Burke had his preference. But he read them all, and loved to read them all ; from the scholastic stateliness of Milton, warring for the right of expressing thoughts for all ages, to the simplicity of Cowper’s Letters.

“ But all this is gone for us ! We are never to see him again in the places that knew him. To think that he, of all men, who loved his home so, should have died among strangers ! That he, of all men, should have died under a foreign flag ! I can go no further. I can only call upon all to bear witness now, and to the next generation, that he stood before us an example of eminence in science, in erudition, in genius, in taste, — in honor, in generosity, in humanity, — in every liberal sentiment, and every liberal accomplishment.”

ADDRESS OF HON. BENJAMIN R. CURTIS ON PRESENTING TO THE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT THE RESOLUTIONS OF THE SUFFOLK BAR. — [Sept. 20, 1859.]

“ May it please your Honor :

“ I have been directed by the bar of the County of Suffolk, to present to the Supreme Judicial Court certain resolutions adopted by them, upon the decease of their lamented and distinguished brother, Rufus Choate, and to request the Court to have these resolutions entered on record here. They were adopted at a meeting of the members of this bar, held in this place on the 19th day of July last, since which time the Supreme Judicial Court is now first in session for the business of the County of Suffolk. With the leave of the Court I will ask the clerk to read the resolutions. [The clerk read the resolutions, which have been published heretofore.]

“ This is not the occasion, nor is it devolved on me, to pronounce a eulogy on the subject of these resolutions, whose death in the midst of his brilliant and important career has made so profound an impression on his brethren of the bar and of the community at large. The Court will have noticed that by one of the resolutions I have read, other suitable provision has been made for that tribute of respect to him, and for doing justice to their sense of their own and the public loss. But the relations which Mr. Choate long sustained to this Court have been too conspicuous and too important to me to be wholly silent here respecting them.

The bench and the bar are mutually dependent on each other for that co-operation which is essential to the steady, prompt, and successful distribution of justice. Without the assistance and support of a learned, industrious, able, and honest bar, it is not too much to say that no bench in this country can sustain itself, and its most strenuous exertions can result only in a halting and uncertain course of justice. Without a learned, patient, just, and courageous bench, there will not for any long time continue to be a bar fitted for its high and difficult duties.

“When, therefore, one of their number, who for many years has exerted his great and brilliant powers in this forum, has been removed by death, we feel that in its annunciation to this Court, we make known a fact of importance to itself, and that we may be sure of its sympathy, and of its appreciation of what is indeed a common loss. You have witnessed his labors and know how strenuous, how frequent, how great, how devoted to his duty they have been. You have been instructed by his learning and relieved by his analysis of complicated controversies. You have doubtless been delighted by his eloquence and informed and interested by the fruits of his rich and liberal culture. And when his brethren of the bar come here to make known their sense of their loss, they cannot be unmindful that to you also it is a loss, not in one day to be repaired.

“We are aware that it has sometimes been thought, and by the thoughtless or inexperienced often said, that from his lips ‘With fatal sweetness elocution flowed.’ But they who have thought or said this have but an imperfect notion of the nature of our judicial controversies, or of the ability for the discovery of truth and justice which may be expected here.

“Such persons begin with the false assumption that in the complicated cases which are brought to trial here, one party is altogether right and the other altogether wrong. They are ignorant, that in nearly all cases there is truth and justice and law on both sides; that it is for the tribunal to discover how much of these belongs to each, and to balance them, and ascertain which preponderates; and that so artificial are the greater portion of our social rights, and so complex the facts on which they depend, that it is only by means of such an investigation and decision that it can be certainly known on which side the real justice is. That, consequently, it is the duty of the advocate to manifest and enforce all the elements of justice, truth, and law which exist on one side, and to take care that no false appearances of those great realities are exhibited on the other. That while the zealous discharge of this duty is consistent with the most devoted loyalty to truth and justice, it calls for the exertion of the highest attainments and powers of the lawyer and the advocate, in favor of the particular party whose interests have been intrusted to his care. And if from eloquence and learning and skill and laborious preparation and ceaseless vigilance, so pre-eminent as in Mr. Choate, there might seem to be danger that the scales might incline to the wrong side, some compensation would be made by the increased exertion to which that seeming danger would naturally incite his opponents; and I am happy to believe, what he believed, that as complete security against wrong as the nature of human institutions will permit, has always been found in the steadiness, intelligence, love of justice, and legal learning of the tribunal by which law and fact are here finally determined.

“I desire, therefore, on this occasion, and in this presence, and in behalf of my brethren of this bar, to declare our appreciation of the injustice which would be done to this great and eloquent advocate by attributing to him any want of loyalty to truth, or any deference to wrong, because he employed all his great powers and attainments, and used to the utmost his consummate skill and eloquence, in exhibiting and enforcing the comparative merits of one side of the cases in which he acted. In doing so he but did his duty. If other people did theirs, the administration of justice was secured.

“A trial in a court of justice has been fitly termed a drama in which the actors, the events, and the passions were all realities; and of the parts which the members of the legal profession play therein, it was once said, by one who, I think, should have known better, that they are brawlers for hire. I believe the charge can have no general application — certainly not to those who, within my experience, have practised at this bar, where good manners have been as common as good learning. At all events, he of whom I speak was a signal example that all lawyers are not brawlers.

“For, among other things most worthy to be remembered of him, he showed, in the most convincing manner, that forensic strife is consistent with uniform personal kindness and gentleness of demeanor; that mere smartness, or aggressive and irritating captiousness, have nothing to do with the most effective conduct of a cause ; that the business of an advocate is with the law and the evidence, and not in provoking or humbling an opponent ; that wrangling, and the irritations which spring from it, obstruct the course of justice ; and are indeed twice cursed, for they injure him who gives and him who receives.

“ I am sure I shall have the concurrence of the Court when I say, that among all Mr. Choate’s extraordinary gifts of nature and graces of art, there was nothing more remarkable than the sweetness of his temper and the courtesy of his manners, both to the bench and the bar. However eager might be the strife, however exhausting the toil, however anxious the care, — these were never lost. The recollection of them is now in all our hearts.

“ I need not repeat that I shall make no attempt to draw even an outline of the qualities and attainments and powers of this great advocate. Under any circumstances I should distrust my own ability for the work, and as I have already said, it is not expected of me here.

“ I have simply to move this Honorable Court to receive these resolutions, and direct them to be entered of record.”

In accordance with the vote of the Suffolk Bar, the resolutions were presented to the United States District Court by the District Attorney, and the following reply was made by Mr. Justice Sprague : —

“ Notwithstanding the time that has elapsed since the death of Mr. Choate, and the numerous demonstrations of respect by the bar, by judicial tribunals, deliberative bodies, and popular assemblies, still it is proper that such an event should not pass unnoticed in this court. Others have spoken fully and eloquently of his eminence and excellence in various departments; we may here at least appropriately say something of him as a lawyer and an advocate. His life was mainly devoted to the practice of his profession, and this court was the scene of many of his greatest efforts and highest achievements. I believe him to have been the most accomplished advocate that this country has produced. With extraordinary genius he united unremitting industry, devoted almost exclusively to the law, and to those literary studies which tend most directly to accomplish and perfect the orator and the advocate. The result was wonderful. His command of language was unequalled. I certainly have heard no one who approached him in the richness of his vocabulary. This wealth he used profusely, but with a discrimination, a felicity of expression, and an ease and flow, which were truly marvellous. Although to the careless or unintelligent hearer his words would sometimes seem to be in excess, yet to the attentive and cultivated every word had its appropriate place and its shade of meaning, conducing more or less to the perfection of the picture. To those who heard Mr. Choate for the first time, it would seem as though this ready outpouring of choice and expressive language must be the result of special preparation. But those who have heard him often, especially in those unforeseen emergencies which so frequently arise in the trial of causes, knew that the stream, which was so full and clear and brilliant, gushed forth from a fountain as exhaustless as Nature.

*'Rusticus expectat dum defluat amnis; at ille
Labitur, et labetur in omne volubilis ævum.'*

“But it is not to be understood by any means that Mr. Choate’s highest merit consisted in his rhetoric. That, indeed, was the most striking. But those who had most profoundly considered and mastered the subject saw that the matter of his discourse, the thought, was worthy of the drapery with which it was clothed. His mind was at once comprehensive and acute. No judicial question was too enlarged for its vision, and none too minute for its analysis. To the Court he could present arguments learned, logical, and profound, or exquisitely refined and subtle, as the occasion seemed to require. But it was in trials before a jury that he was pre-eminent. Nothing escaped his vigilance, and nothing was omitted that could contribute to a verdict for his client. His skill in the examination of witnesses was consummate. I have never seen it equalled. The character of the jury, individually and collectively, was not overlooked, and their opinions and prejudices were not only respected, but soothed and conciliated with the utmost tact and delicacy. His quickness of apprehension and untiring application of all his energies to the cause in hand gave him complete mastery of his materials. His self-possession was perfect. However suddenly the aspect of his cause might be clouded by unexpected developments, he was never disconcerted. He had wonderful fertility of resources, which were always at instant command, and seemed to multiply with the difficulties which called them forth. Whatever the course previously marked out, or however laboriously a position had been fortified, they were without hesitation abandoned the moment that a new exigency rendered it expedient to take other grounds, and the transition was often effected with such facility and adroitness that his opponent found himself assailed from a new quarter before he had suspected a change of position.

“In his arguments, not only was each topic presented in all its force, but they were all arranged with artistic skill, so as mutually to sustain and strengthen each other, and present a harmonious and imposing whole. He usually began his address to the jury with a rapid and comprehensive view of the whole trial, in which he grouped and made strikingly prominent the circumstances which would make the strongest impression of the fairness of his client and the justness of his cause; thus securing the sympathy and good wishes of the jury, while he should take them with him through that fulness of detail and that searching analysis which was sure to follow. However protracted his arguments, they were listened to throughout with eager attention. His matter, manner, and diction created such interest and pleasure in what was uttered, and such expectation of new and striking thoughts and expressions to come, that attention could not be withdrawn. With a memory stored with the choicest literature of our own and other languages, and a strong, vivid, and prolific imagination, his argument was rarely decked with flowers. It presented rather the grave and gorgeous foliage of our resplendent autumn forest, infinite in richness and variety, but from which we should hardly be willing to spare a leaf or a tint. Such was his genius, his opulence of thought, and intenseness of expression, that we involuntarily speak of him in unmeasured and unqualified terms.

“The characteristic which perhaps has been most dwelt upon by those who have spoken of Mr. Choate, was his invincible good temper. This especially endeared him, not only to his brethren of the bar, but, also, to the bench. Anxious, earnest, and even vehemence, in his advocacy, and sometimes suffering from disease, still no vicissitude or vexations of the cause, or annoyance from opponents, could infuse into his address any tinge of bitterness, or cause him for a moment to forget his habitual courtesy and kindness. He never made assaults upon opposing counsel, and if made on him, they were repelled with mildness and forbearance. If, indeed, his opponent sometimes felt the keen point of a pungent remark, it seemed rather to have slipped from an overfull quiver than to have been intentionally hurled. This abstinence was the more meritorious, because the temptation of superabundant ability was not wanting.

“We can hardly measure his power for evil if he had studied the language of offence, and turned his eloquence into the channels of vituperation. But against this perversion he was secured by his kindly nature. I am sure that it would have been to him a source of anguish to believe that he had inflicted a wound which rankled in the breast of another.

“No man was more exempt from vanity. He seemed to have no thought for himself, but only for his client and his cause. The verdict was kept steadily in view. His most brilliant efforts had no indication of self-exhibition or display. Magnificent as they were, they seemed to be almost involuntary outpourings from a fulness of thought and language that could not be repressed. From feeling, reflection, and habit, he was a supporter of law, and of that order which is the result of its regular administration. He was truly a friend of the Court, and his manner to them was invariably respectful and deferential. He took an enlightened view of their duties, and appreciated their difficulties; and received their judgments, even when adverse to his wishes, if not always with entire acquiescence, at least with candor and graceful submission. We cannot but sympathize with the bar in a bereavement which has taken from us such an associate and friend, by whom the Court has been so often enlightened and aided in their labors, and whose rare gifts contributed to make the 'light of jurisprudence gladsome.'"

On Friday, the 22d of July, a public meeting of the citizens of Boston was held in Faneuil Hall. The darkened windows, the burning gas-lights, the pillars and galleries covered with mourning drapery, the heavy festoons stretching from the centre of the ceiling to the capitals of the pillars, the quiet crowd weighed down as by a general calamity, all spoke the one language of bereavement and grief. Addresses were made by many distinguished persons, and among others, by Mr. Everett, who spoke as follows:—

ADDRESS OF MR. EVERETT.

"MR. MAYOR AND FELLOW-CITIZENS,—I obey the only call which could with propriety have drawn me at this time from my retirement, in accepting your invitation to unite with you in the melancholy duties which we are assembled to perform. While I speak, Sir, the lifeless remains of our dear departed friend are expected; it may be, have already returned to his bereaved home. We sent him forth, but a few days since, in search of health; the exquisite bodily organization over-tasked and shattered, but the master intellect still shining in unclouded strength. Anxious, but not desponding, we sent him forth, hoping that the bracing air of the ocean, which he greatly loved, the respite from labor, the change of scene, the cheerful intercourse which he was so well calculated to enjoy with congenial spirits abroad, would return him to us refreshed and renovated; but he has come back to us dust and ashes, a pilgrim already on his way to

‘The undiscovered country, from whose bourne
No traveller returns.’

“How could I refuse to bear my humble part in the tribute of respect which you are assembled to pay to the memory of such a man!—a man not only honored by me, in common with the whole country, but tenderly cherished as a faithful friend, from the morning of his days, and almost from the morning of mine,—one with whom through life I was delighted to take sweet counsel, for whom I felt an affection never chilled for a moment, during forty years since it sprung up. I knew our dear friend, Sir, from the time that he entered the Law School at Cambridge. I was associated with him as one of the Massachusetts delegation in the House of Representatives of the United States, between whom and myself there was an entire community of feeling and opinion on all questions of men and measures; and with whom, in these later years, as his near neighbor, and especially when sickness confined him at home, I have enjoyed opportunities of the most intimate social intercourse.

“Now that he is gone, Sir, I feel that one more is taken away of those most trusted and loved, and with whom I had most hoped to finish the journey; nay, Sir, one whom, in the course of nature, I should have preceded to its end, and who would have performed for me the last kindly office, which I, with drooping spirit, would fain perform for him.

“But although with a willing heart I undertake the duty you have devolved upon me, I cannot but feel how little remains to be said. It is but echoing the voice, which has been heard from every part of the country, — from the Bar, from the Press, from every Association by which it could with propriety be uttered, — to say that he stood at the head of his profession in this country.

“If, in his own or in any other part of the Union, there was his superior in any branch of legal knowledge, there was certainly no one who united, to the same extent, profound learning in the law, with a range almost boundless of miscellaneous reading, reasoning powers of the highest order, intuitive quickness of perception, a wariness and circumspection never taken by surprise, and an imagination which rose, on a bold and easy wing, to the highest heaven of invention. These powers, trained by diligent cultivation, these attainments, combined and applied with sound judgment, consummate skill, and exquisite taste, necessarily placed him at the head of the profession of his choice; where, since the death of Mr. Webster, he shone without a rival.

“With such endowments, formed at the best schools of professional education, exercised with unwearied assiduity, through a long professional life, under the spur of generous ambition, and the heavy responsibility of an ever-growing reputation to be sustained,—if possible to be raised,—he could fill no second place.

“But he did not, like most eminent jurists, content himself with the learning or the fame of his profession. He was more than most men in any profession, in the best sense of the word, a man of letters. He kept up his Academical studies in after-life. He did not think it the part either of wisdom or good taste to leave behind him at school, or at college, the noble languages of the great peoples of antiquity; but he continued through life to read the Greek and Roman classics.

“He was also familiar with the whole range of English literature; and he had a respectable acquaintance with the standard French authors. This wide and varied circle of reading not only gave a liberal expansion to his mind, in all directions, but it endowed him with a great wealth of choice but unstudied language, and enabled him to command a richness of illustration, whatever subject he had in hand, beyond most of our public speakers and writers. This taste for reading was formed in early life. While he was at the Law School at Cambridge, I was accustomed to meet him more frequently than any other person of his standing in the alcoves of the library of the University.

“As he advanced in years, and acquired the means of gratifying his taste in this respect, he formed a miscellaneous collection, probably as valuable as any other in Boston ; and he was accustomed playfully to say that every Saturday afternoon, after the labor of the week, he indulged himself in buying and bringing home a new book. Thus reading with a keen relish, as a relaxation from professional toil, and with a memory that nothing worth retaining escaped, he became a living storehouse of polite literature, out of which, with rare felicity and grace, he brought forth treasures new and old, not deeming these last the least precious.

“ Though living mainly for his profession, Mr. Choate engaged to some extent in public life, and that at an early age, as a member of the Legislature of Massachusetts, and of the National House of Representatives, and in riper years as a Senator of the United States, as the successor of Mr. Webster, whose entire confidence he enjoyed, and whose place he, if any one, was not unworthy to fill. In these different positions, he displayed consummate ability. His appearance, his silent demeanor, in either House of Congress, commanded respect. He was one of the few whose very presence in a public assembly is a call to order.

“ In the daily routine of legislation he did not take an active part. He rather shunned clerical work, and consequently avoided, as much as duty permitted, the labor of the committee-room ; but on every great question that came up while he was a member of either House of Congress, he made a great speech ; and when he had spoken, there was very little left for any one else to say on the same side of the question. I remember on one occasion, after he had been defending, on broad national grounds, the policy of affording a moderate protection to our native industry, showing that it was not merely a local but a national interest, and seeking to establish this point by a great variety of illustrations, equally novel and ingenious, a Western member, who had hitherto wholly dissented from this view of the subject, exclaimed that he 'was the most persuasive speaker he had ever heard.'

"But though abundantly able to have filled a prominent place among the distinguished active statesmen of the day, he had little fondness for political life, and no aptitude whatever for the out-doors management, — for the electioneering legerdemain, — for the wearisome correspondence with local great men, — and the heart-breaking drudgery of franking cart-loads of speeches and public documents to the four winds, — which are necessary at the present day to great success in a political career. Still less adroit was he in turning to some personal advantage whatever topic happens for the moment to attract public attention; fishing with ever freshly baited hook in the turbid waters of an ephemeral popularity. In reference to some of the arts by which political advancement is sought and obtained, he once said to me, with that well-known characteristic look, in which sadness and compassionate pleasantness were about equally mingled, 'They did not do such things in Washington's day.'

"If ever there was a truly disinterested patriot, Rufus Choate was that man. In his political career there was no shade of selfishness. Had he been willing to purchase advancement at the price often paid for it, there was never a moment, from the time he first made himself felt and known, that he could not have commanded any thing which any party could bestow. But he desired none of the rewards or honors of success. On the contrary, he not only for his individual self regarded office as a burden — an obstacle in the way of the cultivation of his professional and literary tastes — but he held, that of necessity, and in consequence of the strong tendency of our parties to assume a sectional character, conservative opinions, seeking to moderate between the extremes which agitate the country, must of necessity be in the minority ; that it was the ‘ mission ’ of men who hold such opinions, not to fill honorable and lucrative posts which are unavoidably monopolized by active leaders, but to speak prudent words on great occasions, which would command the respect, if they do not enlist the sympathies, of both the conflicting parties, and thus insensibly influence the public mind. He comprehended and accepted the position : he knew that it was one liable to be misunderstood, and sure to be misrepresented at the time ; but not less sure to be justified when the interests and passions of the day are buried, as they are now for him, beneath the clods of the valley.

“ But this ostracism, to which his conservative opinions condemned him, produced not a shade of bitterness in his feelings. His patriotism was as cheerful as it was intense. He regarded our Confederate Republic, with its wonderful adjustment of State and Federal organization — the States bearing the burden and descending to the details of local administration, the General Government moulding the whole into one grand nationality, and representing it in the family of nations — as the most wonderful phenomenon in the political history of the world.

“Too much a statesman to join the unreflecting disparagement with which other great forms of national polity are often spoken of in this country, he yet considered the oldest, the wisest, and the most successful of them, the British Constitution, as a far less wonderful political system than our Confederated Republic. The territorial extent of the country; the beautiful play into each other of its great commercial, agricultural, and manufacturing interests; the material prosperity, the advancement in arts and letters and manners, already made; the capacity for further indefinite progress in this vast theatre of action in which Providence has placed the Anglo-American race, — stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Arctic circle to the tropics, — were themes on which he dwelt as none but he could dwell; and he believed that with patience, with mutual forbearance, with a willingness to think that our brethren, however widely we may differ from them, may be as honest and patriotic as ourselves, our common country would eventually reach a height of prosperity of which the world as yet has seen no example.

“With such gifts, such attainments, and such a spirit, he placed himself, as a matter of course, not merely at the head of the jurists and advocates, but of the public speakers of the country. After listening to him at the bar, in the Senate, or upon the academic or popular platform, you felt that you had heard the best that could be heard in either place. That mastery which he displayed at the forum and in the deliberative assembly was not less conspicuous in every other form of public address.

“As happens in most cases of eminent jurists and statesmen, possessing a brilliant imagination, and able to adorn a severe course of reasoning with the charms of a glowing fancy and a sparkling style, it was sometimes said of him, as it was said before him of Burke and Erskine, of Ames and Pinkney, — that he was more of a rhetorician than a logician ; that he dealt in words and figures of speech more than in facts or arguments. These are the invidious comments by which dull or prejudiced men seek to disparage those gifts which are farthest from their own reach.

“It is, perhaps, by his discourses on academical and popular occasions that he is most extensively known in the community, as it is these which were listened to with delighted admiration by the largest audiences. He loved to treat a pure literary theme ; and he knew how to throw a magic freshness — like the cool morning dew on a cluster of purple grapes — over the most familiar topics at a patriotic celebration. Some of these occasional performances will ever be held among the brightest gems of our literature. The eulogy on Daniel Webster at Dartmouth College, in which he mingled at once all the light of his genius and all the warmth of his heart, has, within my knowledge, never been equalled among the performances of its class in this country for sympathetic appreciation of a great man, discriminating analysis of character, fertility of illustration, weight of sentiment, and a style at once chaste, nervous, and brilliant. The long sentences which have been criticised in this, as in his other performances, are like those which Dr. Channing admired and commended in Milton’s prose, — well compacted, full of meaning, fit vehicles of great thoughts.

“ But he does not deal exclusively in those ponderous sentences. There is nothing of the artificial, Johnsonian balance in his style. It is as often marked by a pregnant brevity as by a sonorous amplitude. He is sometimes satisfied, in concise, epigrammatic clauses, to skirmish with his light troops and drive in the enemy's outposts. It is only on fitting occasions, when great principles are to be vindicated and solemn truths told, when some moral or political Waterloo or Solferino is to be fought, — that he puts on the entire panoply of his gorgeous rhetoric. It is then that his majestic sentences swell to the dimensions of his thought, — that you hear afar off the awful roar of his rifled ordnance, and — when he has stormed the heights and broken the centre and trampled the squares and turned the staggering wing of his adversary, — that he sounds his imperial clarion along the whole line of battle, and moves forward with all his hosts in one overwhelming charge.

“ Our friend was, in all the personal relations of life, the most unselfish and disinterested of men. Commanding, from an early period, a valuable clientage, and rising rapidly to the summit of his profession, and to the best practice in the courts of Massachusetts, and in the Supreme Court of the United States, with no expensive tastes or habits, and a manner of life highly unostentatious and simple, advancing years overtook him with but slender provision for their decline. He reaped little but fame, where he ought to have reaped both fame and fortune. A career which in England would have been crowned with affluence, and probably with distinguished rank and office, found him at sixty chained to the treadmill of laborious practice.

“ He might, indeed, be regarded as a martyr to his profession. He gave to it his time, his strength, and neglecting due care of regular bodily exercise and occasional entire relaxation, he might be said to have given to it his life. He assumed the racking anxieties and feverish excitements of his clients. From the courts, where he argued the causes intrusted to him, with all the energy of his intellect, rousing into corresponding action an overtaken nervous system, these cares and anxieties followed him to the weariness of his midnight vigils, and the unrest of his sleepless pillow. In this way he led a long professional career, worn and harassed with other men’s cares, and sacrificed ten added years of active usefulness to the intensity with which he threw himself into the discharge of his duties in middle life.

“ There are other recollections of our friend’s career, other phases of his character, on which I would gladly dwell; but the hour has elapsed, and it is not necessary. The gentlemen who have preceded me, his professional brethren, his pastor, the press of the country, generously allowing past differences of opinion to be buried in his grave, have more than made up for any deficiency in my remarks. His work is done, — nobly, worthily, done. Never more in the temples of justice, — never more in the Senate Chamber, — never more in the crowded assembly, — never more in this consecrated hall, where he so often held listening crowds in rapt admiration, shall we catch the unearthly glance of his eye, or listen to the strange sweet music of his voice. To-morrow we shall follow him, — the pure patriot, — the consummate jurist, — the eloquent orator, — the honored citizen, — the beloved friend, to the last resting place ; and who will not feel, as we lay him there, that a brighter genius and a warmer heart are not left among living men ! ”

During this meeting, the steamboat which brought the remains from Nova Scotia came to anchor in the harbor. The next morning, Saturday, July 23, a private funeral service was held at the house of the deceased, in Winthrop Place, and the body was then taken to the Essex Street Church, where a funeral address was made by Rev. Dr. Nehemiah Adams. The service was attended by the public functionaries of the State, by the judges of the court, the members of the bar, and a large concourse of people. These ceremonies over, the body was borne, with every testimonial of respect, — the booming of minute guns, the tolling of bells, and the waving of flags hung at half-mast, — to its last resting place, under the shadows of Mount Auburn.

CHAPTER XI.

Letter from Hon. John H. Clifford — Reminiscences of Mr. Choate's Habits in his Office — Thoroughness of Preparation of Cases — Manner of Legal Study — Intercourse with the Younger Members of the Bar — Manner to the Court and the Jury — Charges and Income — Vocabulary — Wit and Humor — Anecdotes — Eloquence — Style — Note from Rev. Joseph Tracy — Memory — Quotations — Fondness for Books — Reminiscences by a Friend — Life at Home — Conversation — Religious Feeling and Belief.

It may be proper to present, in this concluding chapter, a few additional testimonials, and briefly to indicate some of the striking characteristics of Mr. Choate, for which a place could not be found in the body of the memoir without interrupting the course of the narrative.

FROM HON. JOHN H. CLIFFORD.

“NEW BEDFORD, Mass., October 26, 1860.

“MY DEAR SIR, — It gives me pleasure to comply with your request, and say an unstudied word of remembrance of my professional associate and friend.

“I do this the more readily, as I was prevented by circumstances from participating in the public manifestations of respect and sorrow, from my brethren of the bar, and other associations, with which we were connected, which followed immediately upon his death.

“In reply to your specific inquiry, respecting the selection to be made from Mr. Choate's arguments, as the most valuable for illustration of his powers and quality as an advocate, I can only say that a very inadequate and unsatisfactory impression of either can be derived from any of the meagre reports of his great efforts at the bar. To those who were familiar with his wonderful genius, his wealth of learning, his genial humor, and his unparalleled combinations of the most brilliant rhetoric with the most massive logic, the attempts that have been made to reproduce them have been painfully disproportionate to their subject; while upon others they can hardly fail to produce a belittling and disparaging impression of his great powers. I fear that, in this respect, his fame must share the melancholy fate of most great lawyers and advocates, to be taken upon trust, and as a tradition, by posterity, rather than to be verified to it by its own critical judgment of his recorded labors.

“In regard to Mr. Choate’s ‘theory of advocacy,’ there has been much ignorant and unconsidered criticism since his death, as there was, indeed, during his life. In the remarks of Judge Curtis to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, upon the presentation of the resolutions adopted by the bar at the time of Mr. Choate’s decease, there is a just and most satisfactory exposition of the true theory of advocacy. Assuming the views expressed in that admirable address to have been those entertained by Mr. Choate, as I have no doubt they were in substance, it seems to me that the flippant denunciations of what has been called the ‘unscrupulousness of his advocacy’ are the merest cant — as unsound and untenable in the view which they imply of a lawyer’s duty, as they are unjust to his memory.

“I had opportunities of observation, for many years, of the practical application by him of his views of professional obligation in this respect, both in civil and criminal cases, almost always as an adversary, though occasionally as an associate. I believe that a conscientious conviction of his duty led him, at times, to accept retainers in the latter class of cases, when the service to be performed was utterly repugnant and distasteful to him. As a striking confirmation of this opinion, I may state that, in 1853, when I vacated the office of Attorney-General, to assume the administration of the Executive Department of the government, it was intimated to me by a common friend that the place would be agreeable to Mr. Choate. I, of course, had no hesitation in promptly availing myself of this opportunity of making the conceded chief of the bar its official head. Upon tendering to him the appointment, which was unhesitatingly and gracefully accepted, I learned that one of the principal inducements, leading him to assume the post, while he was under the weightiest pressure of private practice, was the avenue of escape which it afforded him from the defence of criminal causes. Regarding the profession of his choice as an office, and not as a trade, he felt that he was not at liberty, when pressed by the friends of parties accused of crime, to refuse his services to submit their defence to the proper tribunal, merely because this department of professional labor was not agreeable to him, while the acceptance of the post of public prosecutor would give him an honorable discharge from this field of practice.

“It is rare for a person whose life, like his, had been spent almost exclusively in the practice of his profession, to secure the affectionate attachment of so large and diversified a body of friends. Much as he was devoted to books, he saw more of the various classes of men, from every one of which there were sincerer mourners over his bier than falls to the lot of most great lawyers. This arose from his varied and extensive clientage, and the broad range of his practice. An English barrister, who is confined almost exclusively to a particular circuit, and under their system of minute subdivision of labor, frequently to one class of causes, can with difficulty comprehend the life of one who, like Mr. Choate, was familiar with all the judicial tribunals of a country like ours, from the highest to the lowest, Federal and State, and with every department of the law, in all its diversified relations to ‘the business and bosoms of men.’ Still more difficult is it for him to conceive how a practitioner in such a wide field as this could be, as Mr. Choate incontestably was, facile princeps, wherever he appeared.

“The highest proof of his superiority is to be found in the united testimony of those who ‘stood nearest to him.’ And no one who witnessed the manifestations of respect for his great powers, and of affection for the man, which were exhibited by his brethren of the bar, upon receiving the sad intelligence that he was to be with them no more on earth, can doubt the sincerity with which they assigned to him the first place among this generation of American lawyers.

“For myself, I count it as one of the privileges and felicities of my professional life, that Rufus Choate was my contemporary, associate, and friend.

“I am, dear Sir, with sincere respect, truly yours,

“JOHN H. CLIFFORD.

“PROF. S. G. BROWN.”

Mr. Choate's business was almost wholly connected with cases in court. It might be said that he had no conveyancing, almost no drawing up of contracts or wills, and very rare occasions for giving written opinions. Comparatively few cases were commenced in the office. Most of his business was the result of outside retainers in cases commenced, or to be commenced, by other counsel, or in defending cases already commenced.

Of Mr. Choate's habits in his office and in the courts, a memorandum, by his son-in-law and partner, Joseph M. Bell, Esq., will afford the best possible information.

"When I went to him," says Mr. Bell, "in January, 1849, we took an office at 7½ Tremont Row, then entirely out of the range of the fraternity. His habits then were these: Regularly at nine o'clock (or, if to go into court, a trifle earlier) he came to the office, and spent the morning there. Generally his room was filled with clients. If not, he was busily engaged in preparing his cases for trial or argument; or, if no immediate necessity existed for this, a careful examination of the latest text-books and reports was made, or a course of study, already marked out, pursued. He was rarely idle for a moment, and by this I mean he was rarely without book and pen in hand. He studied pen in hand, rarely sitting down with book alone. He had an old, high, pine desk, such as were in lawyer's offices many years ago, which he specially prized. It had been used by Judge Prescott, — the father of William H. Prescott, — in Salem, and perhaps by other lawyers before him. Upon its top there was a row of pigeon-holes for papers. A tall counting-house chair, with the front legs some three inches shorter than the back ones, so as to incline the seat forward, enabled him to keep in nearly a standing position at the desk, and there, and in that position, come upon him when you might, he was to be found, pen in hand, hard at work. He was patient of interruption, beyond any man I ever met. Unless specially engaged upon matters which brooked no delay, his time and learning were at the disposal of the poorest and most ignorant. It was very rarely indeed that I heard him say to any one, 'I cannot attend to you now.' The old desk alluded to, I succeeded in getting out of his office; but one not much better took its place. If a person came into his office with a case, his invariable habit, when possible, was to converse with him pen in hand, and write down every particular bearing upon it. If the case involved doubt, as soon as the client had gone, he made, aut per se aut per alium, a strict examination of the law, of which he made a careful record. He may be said to have studied all his cases all the time. He never seemed to have one of them out of mind for an instant. If, in reading law, or any thing else, diverso intuito, any thing occurred which could be useful in any of his numerous cases, down it went upon some of the papers — Greek to the world, but clear to him. And this leads me to say that in all the apparent confusion of his papers, there was the utmost regularity, after his kind. He was a great lover of order, and strove hard for it, but there seemed to be a certain mechanical dexterity of which he was destitute. I think it would have been impossible for him to fold regularly half a dozen sheets of paper. His papers were tied together in a confused mass ; but they were all there, and he could find them. Untie and arrange them in order, and he liked it ; but the first time the parcel was re-opened by him it returned to its original condition. But this was want of manual dexterity only. He was ever striving to have his office regular and orderly, like other offices, but without effect.¹

“For a year or so after going in with him, I rarely saw him at the office in the afternoon. He was in the habit of going to the Athenæum, and other places where books were to be found. After that time, he was at the office afternoon as well as forenoon, unless occupied in the law outside. His cheerfulness was constant ; and he never appeared in greater spirits than when every thing seemed tangled and snarled beyond extrication. Little things sometimes troubled him ; real difficulties, never. He did and wanted every thing done on the instant ; and if this could not be brought about, he would often seem to lose all interest in it. I have often been astonished at his willingness to perform every one’s work. That never seemed to trouble him ; and it was a rare thing to hear him complain of others. In regard to his court engagements, he was promptitude itself. No one ever knew him a minute behind time, if by possibility he could come at all. He had a method of imparting instruction, peculiar to a race of legal giants now passed away, by short, pithy, or sarcastic and ironical sentences. You were often to determine his meaning rather by what he did not say than from what he did. I have heard him talk an hour in this way; and if one had taken in sober earnest what he said for what he meant, he would have made a slight mistake. The gravest law talk, with one who could understand him, was fun alive.

¹ He was entirely aware of this himself. Speaking once of the officer known to the English Court of Common Pleas as the Filacer, or Filazier, so called because he files those writs on which he makes out process, he playfully remarked, “There would be little use for such a person in our office.” And yet he generally could put his hand at once upon what he wanted.

“ With his vast command of language, he delighted to use some expressive slang phrase in familiar conversation. I remember one that tickled him hugely. A man in the office told him a story of some fight that he was a witness of; and after describing it graphically, said, ‘ And then the stones flew my way, and I dug.’ He never could resist the use of this last expression, and never used it without laughing heartily. And this reminds me that I rarely — I may say never — heard him laugh out loud. He would throw his head back, open his mouth wide, and draw in his breath with a deep respiratory sound, while his whole face glowed with fun.

“ He rarely left his office to pass a half-hour in another’s, except on business. He took a great many papers and periodicals at the office, but seldom read one. Sometimes they went into the fire in the original wrappers.

“ Mr. Choate’s method of preparing his cases for trial and argument depended so much upon the varying circumstances of the cases, that it is very difficult to say that he had any particular plan. But this always was his practice, when he had time for it: —

“ If for the plaintiff, a strict examination of all the pleadings, if the case had been commenced by others, was immediately made, and, so far as practicable, personal examination of the principal witnesses, — accurate study of the exact questions raised by the pleadings, and a thorough and exhaustive preparation of all the law upon those questions. This preparation completed, the papers were laid aside until the day of trial approached. At that time a thorough re-examination of the facts, law, and pleadings had to be made. He was never content until every thing which might by possibility bear upon the case had been carefully investigated, and this investigation had been brought down to the last moment before the trial.

“ If for the defence, the pleadings were first examined and reconstructed, if in his judgment necessary, and as careful an examination of the law made as in the other case.

“ In his preparation for the argument of a question of law, he could never be said to have finished it until the judgment had been entered by the court. It commenced with the knowledge that the argument was to be made; and from that time to the entry of the judgment, the case never seemed to be out of his mind; and whenever and wherever a thought appropriate to the case occurred to him, it was noted for use. It would often happen that the case was nearly reached for argument at one term of the court; every possible preparation having been made and the brief printed; yet the term would end and the case not come on. The former preparation then made but a starting point for him. At the next term a fuller brief appeared; and this might happen several times. The finished brief of the evening had to be altered and added to in the morning; and it frequently went into the hands of the court with the undried ink of his last citations. If, after argument, a case uncited then was discovered, or if a new view of it occurred to him, the court was instantly informed of it.

“ And so in the trial of a case at nisi prius. Every intermission called for a full examination of every law-book which could possibly bear upon questions already before the court, or which he purposed to bring before it. No difficulty in procuring a book which treated upon the question before him ever hindered him; it was a mere question of possibility.

“ He had a plan for the trial of every case, to which he clung from the start, and to which every thing bent. That plan often appeared late in the case, perhaps upon his filing his prayer to the court for special rulings to the jury. But that plan was at any time — no matter how much labor had been put into it — instantly thrown over, and a new one adopted, if, in his judgment, it was better. He bent the whole case to his theory of the law of it; and, if accidentally a new fact appeared which would enable him to use a clearer principle of law, the last from that moment became his case. I remember perfectly an example of his quickness and boldness in this respect. In an insurance case, we were for the plaintiff. A vessel had been insured for a year, with a warranty that she should not go north of the Okhotsk Sea. Within the year she was burned north of the limits of the Okhotsk Sea proper, but south of the extreme limits of some of that sea’s adjacent gulfs. The defendant set up that there was no loss within the limits of the policy; and numerous witnesses had been summoned by both parties, — on our side to show that by merchants the Okhotsk Sea was considered to include the bays and gulfs; on the other side, to prove the contrary. A protracted trial was expected, and every thing had been prepared. As we were walking to the court-house, he said, 'Why should we prove that we were not north of that sea? — why not let them prove that we were? What do you think of it?' — 'It seems to be the right way, certainly,' said I. 'Let us do it,—open the case on that idea.' I did so, and put on the mate to prove the burning at a certain time within the year. No cross-examination followed, and we rested our case. The other side was dumbfounded. They had expected that we should be at least two days putting in our case on the other theory, and had no witnesses at hand. They fought our plan stoutly; but the court was with us, and they were obliged to submit to a verdict in our favor. The case lasted one hour.

"In many cases I have known him to dismiss witnesses that had been summoned for proof of particular facts, because he had changed his plan, and would not require them.

"One of the most striking characteristics of Mr. Choate was the tenacity with which he persisted in trying a case once commenced, under no matter what disadvantages. If a case seemed untenable, and indeed always before suit, he was very willing to settle. Divorce cases and family disturbances, and suits between friends, he strained every nerve to adjust before they became public, and even after. But when a case was fairly before the court, he seemed absolutely to hate the idea of a compromise, and never felt the case lost so long as there was standing in court. No matter how hopeless seemed the chance of success, he would say, 'It will never do to say die,' and plunge boldly into the trial. And it was astonishing to find him so often successful where there seemed no hope. While a trial was going on in court, every word of every witness was taken down, and every legal incident noted. This was taken home, and before the court opened the next day, arranged and studied, and his argument commenced and kept along with the days of trial, often changed and re-written. He kept loose paper by him in court, on which were jotted down questions for witnesses, and ideas of all kinds connected with the case.”¹

¹ The following account is from the pen of Judge Enoch L. Fancher, contained in a letter to Judge Neilson, and published in the “Albany Law Journal,” March 17, 1877.

“I knew Mr. Choate: visited him at his residence in Boston, and spent some time in consultation with him in the Methodist Church case, which was tried in New York in May, 1851. Being one of my first cases of importance, I took pains to become acquainted with the facts, and went to Boston to engage Mr. Choate as chief counsel. After a conversation in his office, the interview was adjourned to his house, where, at four o'clock in the afternoon, I met him in his library, and he commenced a series of questions, standing at an upright desk. His hand was drawn up as high as his shoulder, and from that hour till ten o'clock at night, with the exception of about thirty minutes while we were at the tea-table, he continued his incisive questions touching the government of the Methodist Episcopal Church, its peculiar economy, and the questions involved in this case between the North and the South. He at once manifested great interest in the case; spoke with much earnestness in reference to it; said that it involved so many important questions that he felt it to be one of the greatest cases that he had ever studied. He would stop me in the middle of a sentence by holding up his hand, and, after writing what I had said, would ask me to go on from the very part of the sentence that had been broken to the end of it.

“His enthusiasm was so great, that I found it a pleasure to reveal to him all I knew of the subject under examination. During the course of the evening, a hand-organ was playing in the street under the window. He sprang to the bell, spoke to his servant, and said, ‘John, go and hire that man to go out of the street,’ at the same

As might be inferred from this, his notes were generally very ample and complete. To a student who was going to take the depositions of some witnesses where he could not be present, he said, "Take down every adjective, adverb, and interjection that the witnesses utter." His brief, too, was always full, though in addressing a jury he was entirely untrammelled, and often hardly referred to it. In addressing the court he sometimes seemed to follow his notes closely, almost as if he were repeating them, laying aside page after page as he proceeded.

In determining the theory of his case, he was never time giving him fifty cents. After this visit at Boston, he came to see me in the city of New York. We had another interview, in reference to the case, at my residence. It was wonderful to see him seize, as by intuition, the chief points of the great controversy involved in that case. It was still more wonderful to listen to his magnificent oratory, when he argued the case, bringing into view almost every fact I had repeated to him in Boston, and in my other interviews with him. The trial was in the Circuit Court of the United States, at New York. It lasted several days. During the trial Mr. Choate became unwell, and was obliged to go to his hotel, while a portion of the argument of Mr. Lord was made. He requested me to write down every word Mr. Lord said, and bring it to him. I did so, and, at the same time, found Mr. Choate sick in bed, with a physician in attendance, who was prescribing calomel, and asked Mr. Choate how large a dose he was accustomed to take. Choate replied that he did not know, but said, 'Give me the largest dose you ever gave a man in your life.' The next day he rose from his sick bed, came into court, and began the grand argument which he made in the case, which lasted during the entire day, and nearly all the following day. While he was speaking, the perspiration, like raindrops, fell from his bushy hair all over the paper on which I was writing. Taking it altogether, that was the greatest speech I ever heard. Some of the tones of his voice were more than arguments of themselves. His classical allusions, his eloquent flights, his magnificent argument and beautiful illustrations, combined to entrance the court and auditors."

satisfied until he had met every supposition that could be brought against it. But he had no love for a theory because it was his own, however great the labor it had cost him, but was perfectly ready to throw it aside for another, when that appeared better. This change of front he sometimes made in the midst of the trial, under the eye of the court, and in the face of a watchful and eager antagonist. He was never more self-possessed, nor seemed to have his entire faculties more fully at command, nor to exercise a more consummate judgment, than when in the very heat of a strongly contested case, where a mistake would have been fatal. In the preparation of a case he left nothing to chance; and his juniors sometimes found themselves urged to a fidelity and constancy of labor to which they had not been accustomed.

In his cases, it was not the magnitude of the interests involved, and certainly not the hope of fame or of pecuniary reward, that seemed to move him, so much as a certain inward impulse, a spirit and fire whose energy was untiring and resistless. The action of his mind was its own reward. He was like a blood horse. Once on the course, the nervous force was uncontrollable whether thousands were at stake or it was a mere movement for pleasure. Hence into cases of comparatively little consequence, before referees, or a commissioner, or a judge in chambers, with no audience to stimulate him, he threw the whole force and brilliancy of his powers. Nothing less would satisfy himself, however it might be with court or client.

“One of the last times I heard him,” says his honor Chief Justice Chapman, “was in a matter relating to the railroad crossings and depots in the northern part of Boston. It was before commissioners, in one of the rooms of the Boston and Maine depot, with the opposing counsel and two or three officers of railroad corporations present; and he displayed on that occasion some of the richest and most beautiful specimens of his oratory. It would have charmed a popular audience."

In intercourse with junior counsel, no one could be more unselfish and generous. He assumed their difficulties, protected them if necessary, often insisting to the client that the junior was fully equal to the case, and after the case was won yielding to him a full share of the honor.

"He was the best senior counsel," said an eminent lawyer,¹ "that ever lived. Other men almost always make you feel that you are second; he so made suggestions that you seemed to come to the knowledge of your own motion. If you came to him with a proposition which could not be sustained, instead of saying, 'That's not the law,' he would begin by asking you questions, or by making statements to which you at once assented, till he led you round to a point just the opposite of that from which you started."

"How often I think of Choate!" writes one of the most distinguished of the younger members of the bar, a few months after his death. "You do not know what a hold he had on me, or rather what a necessity of life he had become to me. When I have seen any thing peculiar in the development of human nature, of social or political systems, I have thought, 'I will tell that to Choate' — and then, — Is he indeed dead? gone — never to be seen, or heard, or conversed with again? All that wisdom and wit, — that kindness to me, as of a father or elder brother? Is it possible? I tell you, my dear friend, if I pass the rest of my life at the Boston bar, — life will be a different thing to me without Choate.”

¹ Mr. Justice Lord.

Never assuming pre-eminence, or standing upon his dignity, he was on the kindest and most familiar terms with his brethren at the bar. The morning after his letter to the Whigs of Maine appeared in the newspapers, a brother-lawyer — a Democrat — suddenly opened the door of his office, and saluted him with the question: “Well, Mr. Choate, how was it, — money down, or bond and mortgage?” No one relished such a sally more than he.

It did not disturb him to interrupt him. When you came into his office, he would turn from his papers with some joke, a cant phrase or word (such as “flabbergasted”), recreate himself by some witty speech, quiz you a little playfully, and then turn back again to his work.

During the progress of a trial, though intently watchful of all the proceedings, he was abounding in good-nature and courtesy. “If his wit and pleasantry in the court-room,” said one of the most eminent of his profession, “could be gathered up, they would be unsurpassed in all the annals of the law.” His addresses to the jury were singularly impassioned; every muscle of his frame quivered with emotion; the perspiration stood in drops even upon the hair of his head.¹ Yet he was always dignified and conciliatory, as if speaking to friends. To witnesses he was unfailingly courteous, seldom severe even with the most reluctant, but drawing from them the evidence by the skill of his examination. In cross-examining, he knew by instinct when a witness testified to what he knew, or only what he thought he knew. To the latter point he always directed his inquiries so as to bring out the exact state of the case. To the Bench he was remarkable for deference in manner, and quietness, felicity and precision in language. I happened once to go into the Supreme Court-room, when not more than a dozen persons were present, and many of them officials, but all the judges were upon the bench, and Mr. Choate was standing at a table before them, arguing a question of law. He stood erect and quiet, made no gesture except a slight movement of the right hand from the wrist, nor changed his position except when necessary to obtain a book for an authority, but spoke for more than an hour in a low, clear, musical voice, with a felicity of language, a logical precision, a succinctness of statement, a constantly expanding and advancing movement of thought, and a gentle, slightly exhilarating warmth of feeling, which I never heard equalled, and which was even more fascinating than his appeals to the jury. His motions and gestures were, as I have said, vehement, but not affected nor ungraceful. They were a part of himself, one with his style and method. The sweep of his arm, the tremulous hand, the rising and settling of his body, the dignified tread, the fascinating eye, the tone, gentle, musical, persuasive, vehement, ringing, never querulous, never bitter — all sprang from the nature of the man, spontaneous and irrepressible. Never was there a speaker less artificial.

¹ Always after speaking he was obliged to wrap himself up in two or three overcoats to prevent taking cold, and almost always after a strong effort suffered from an attack of sick-headache.

Mr. Choate's knowledge of his profession never grew more rapidly and more solidly than during the last ten years of his life. In the midst of ever-increasing labors, he found time for constant and careful study of the science of the law. On the appearance of a new volume of the Massachusetts Reports, he was accustomed to take every important case on which he had not been employed, make a full brief upon each side, draw up a judgment, and, finally, compare his work with the briefs and judgments reported. This was a settled habit for many years before he died. To say that he had a high sense of professional honor would only ascribe to him a virtue that is not rare in the American bar; yet few, perhaps, have had a clearer or more refined and delicate apprehension of the proprieties and ethics of the profession. He held an exalted idea of the office and duties of an advocate. "The order of advocates is as ancient as the office of the judge, as noble as virtue, and as necessary as justice." So wrote the great jurist of France, D'Aguesseau; and so have ever felt the wisest and most upright judges of law and equity.

During the latter part of his career, he was more reluctant to undertake doubtful criminal cases. Though accepting every clear duty of his profession, he held himself more in reserve. This was partly because of his constant and intense occupation, partly because his tastes led him to other branches of the profession, and in part, perhaps, because he had to contend against his own fame, and instinctively shrunk from annoying and vulgar criticism. When solicited to defend Dr. Webster, he argued with the friend who consulted him, that it would be really better for the accused to have other counsel.

Up to the year 1849, notwithstanding his large business, Mr. Choate had been too careless, both in charges and in collections, to realize an adequate return for his services. He seemed, indeed, to be the only person who placed a low estimate upon the value of his own labors. The client almost determined for himself what he should pay, and several cases actually occurred where the advocate rated his services so ridiculously low that the client would not be satisfied until the charges were doubled. The amount of the fee never affected Mr. Choate's willingness to take a case, or the earnestness with which he threw himself into it. It was the case, and not the reward, which stimulated his mind.¹

On first opening his office he kept no book of accounts. Being, however, at one time, apparently, struck with a sudden fit of economy, he obtained a proper book, and entered, as the first item of an orderly expenditure, the office debtor to one quart of oil, 37½ cents. The next entry was six months later, and closed the record.

He was generous to a fault. Whoever asked received. Any one, almost literally any one, could draw from him five or ten dollars; and his office was sometimes quite besieged with solicitors of charity. To some objects he gave regularly. Among these was a very worthy man, but indigent, and a confirmed invalid. "On one occasion," says the gentleman who often acted as the almoner of his bounty, "he requested me to call at his office at the earliest opportunity. After making the usual inquiries about our friend and his sufferings, and expressing his sympathy, he said: 'I believe I have been neglectful of his wants for a year or two past.' Then, with one of his nervous shudders, he seized his pen and filled out a check for fifty dollars; and he would not make the least abatement, though I assured him our friend did not stand in any present need of such a munificent donation."

¹ Mr. Horace H. Day, in a letter to the "New York Tribune," dated Feb. 11, 1875, says of Mr. Choate, "All who knew that noble man will not for one moment give the least credit to the thought that money could influence him in any question. I have employed many lawyers, but I have had but one lawyer who was wholly unselfish, and that was Rufus Choate. His memory I have occasion to cherish with more satisfaction than that of any man I ever met."

Many came to borrow of him, and almost always successfully, if he were not himself pressed for money. Of these he frequently took neither note nor obligation of any sort in return, and the transactions were frequently forgotten. When asked why he did not try to collect of his borrowers, "Ah," he replied, "many of them are cologne bottles without any stoppers."

He was, indeed, most indifferent to money; careless of keeping it, and losing, without question, thousands of dollars every year from neglecting to make any charge at all for his services. "I remember," says a gentleman who studied with him, "that one morning he came rushing into his office for $500, remarking, in his sportive way, 'My kingdom for $500; have I got it?' He went to his blue bank-book, looked at it, and said, 'Not a dollar, not a dollar,' and was going out, either to borrow or collect, when I stopped him. The old book had been filled, and the teller had given him a new one without entering in it the amount to his credit, the month not being ended when the accounts were usually balanced. I showed him the old book, and there was a balance in his favor of $1,200. He looked surprised, and said, 'Thank God.' But if the $1,200 had disappeared, he never would have been the wiser."

It could be no surprise, then, to those who knew his habit, that in his early career he accumulated very little property. For the last ten years of his life, through the care of his partner, his affairs were managed with more method, and with growing prosperity. Even then, however, when it became necessary for Mr. Choate himself to fix the scale of his remuneration, it fell about to the old standard, until his junior learned to regulate the amount of their charges by those of the eminent counsel to whom they were generally opposed.

The average annual receipts of his office for the eleven years from 1849 to 1859, inclusive, were nearly $18,000. The largest receipts were in 1852, when they amounted to more than $20,000; in 1855, when they were nearly $21,000; and 1856, when they somewhat exceeded $22,000. In only one year of the eleven did they fall below $13,000. The largest fee Mr. Choate ever received was $2,500. An equal one was given, so far as is known, on but four occasions. A fee of from $1,500 to $2,000 was more frequent; and he once received a retaining fee of $1,500. During these eleven years his engagements in actual trials, law arguments, and arguments before the legislature, amounted to a yearly average of nearly seventy.

Always free of his services, there was one which, however great or costly to himself, was always rendered without charge. I refer to his exertions in political contests. He was frequently importuned to receive compensation, as the labor was frequently most wearisome and exhaustive. But as a matter of character, and to keep himself pure from the semblance of stain, and broad and independent in his public course, he uniformly refused. He prided himself on his honor and purity in his relations to the State.

When approaching the argument of a great cause, or the delivery of an important speech, his mind was absolutely absorbed with it. The lights were left burning all night in his library; and after retiring he would frequently rise from his bed, and, without dressing, rush to his desk to note rapidly some thought which flashed across his wakeful mind. This was repeated sometimes ten or fifteen times in a night. Being once engaged in the trial of an important case in an inland county of Massachusetts, his room at the tavern happened to open into that of the opposing counsel, who, waking about two o'clock in the morning, was surprised to see a bright light gleaming under and around the loosely fitting door. Supposing that Mr. Choate, who had retired early, might have been taken suddenly ill, he entered his room, and found him dressed and standing before a small table which he had placed upon chairs, with four candles upon it, vigorously writing. Apologies and explanations at once followed, Mr. Choate saying that he was wakeful, had slept enough, and the expected contest of the morrow stimulated him to every possible preparation.

Every important and difficult cause took such possession of him that he would get no sound sleep till it was finished. His mind, to use his own illustration, became a stream that took up the cause, like a ship, and bore it on night and day till the verdict or judgment was reached. It is not surprising, then, that he came from a trial so much exhausted. Almost every considerable case was attended or followed with a severe attack of sick-headache. But his recuperative power was as wonderful as his capacity for work. A friend once asked how long it took him to recover from the wear of a heavy case, and how long to enter into a new case with full force. He said, that often three or four hours were enough to recover in, and almost always a day. As to getting into a case, he said, that the moment his eye struck a book, or legal paper, the subject lifted him, and that five minutes were sufficient to give him full power for work and command of his faculties. He was then in full sail.

Although so familiar with the courts, and always master of himself, he was often filled with a nervous agitation when approaching the argument, sometimes saying that he "should certainly break down; every man must fail at some time, and his hour had come." However deeply absorbed in the cause before him, he seemed to see every thing that was going on in the court-room. As he was once addressing a jury, a woman in a distant part of the court-room rose and went out, with some rustling of silk. Being asked afterwards if he noticed it, "Noticed it!" he said, "I thought forty battalions were moving."

With a vocabulary so rich, and a fancy so lively, it is not surprising that he sometimes gave license to his powers, and now and then "drove a substantive and six," but no one could at will be more exact, or more felicitously combine the utmost precision with the most delicious music of words. Ever alive to the ludicrous, he often dexterously caught up cant phrases, or popular terms of the day, and eviscerating them of every thing like vulgarity, forced them for a moment into his service—all redolent of the novel odors of the field, the market, or the fireside, where they had their birth,—and then dismissed them for ever.

"His wit," says one who knew him well, "was of the most delightful kind, playful and pungent, and his conversation was full of the aptest quotation, always, however, parcè detorta, so as to take off any possible tinge of pedantry, and generally with a more or less ludicrous application. He was fond of bringing out the etymology of words in his use of them, as, for example, when speaking of a disappointed candidate for an important nomination, he said, the convention "ejaculated him out at the window;" and of new and odd applications of their figurative meanings, as when he said of a very ugly artist who had produced a too faithful representation of himself, "Mr. — has painted his own portrait and it is a flagrant likeness."

His wit and humor were fresh and peculiar; seldom provoking loud laughter, but perpetually feeding the mind with delight. He never prepared nor reserved his good things for a grand occasion, and to those who knew him best was as full of surprises as to a stranger. In the little office of a justice of the peace,—in a retired room of a railroad depot, in presence of a few interested members of the corporation, — before two or three sensible, but not brilliant, referees in the hall of a country tavern, he displayed nearly the same abundance of learning, the same exuberance of language, and felicity of allusion, the same playfulness and beauty, as when he spoke before the most learned bench, or the elegant and cultivated assemblies of Boston. This might seem like a reckless expenditure of unnecessary wealth. In one sense, perhaps, it was so; yet he had a marvellous faculty of adaptation, as well as the higher power of drawing all to himself, and I doubt if anybody ever listened to him with greater delight and admiration than plain, substantial yeomen who might not be able to understand one in a hundred of his allusions. They understood quite enough to delight and convince them, as well as to afford food for much laughter, and, if they chose, for much meditation.

The sweetness of his temper so pervaded and controlled every thing that he said, that although peculiarities of character, or circumstances, or manner, or appearance, sometimes drew down the flash of his pleasantry, as the unguarded spire the lightning from the surcharged cloud, it was a harmless bolt, unless (which was very rarely the case), he was provoked by injustice or harshness to give proof of his power. Sayings of his, innumerable, have been current among the members of the bar, but I never heard of a man who felt aggrieved by any of them. His regard for Chief Justice Shaw amounted to veneration. “With what judge,” he once, in substance, said, “can you see your antagonist freely conversing, without the slightest apprehension, as you can with him?” Looking once at an engraving of Sir Matthew Hale, "A very great judge," he said, "but not greater, I think, than the Chief," as Judge Shaw was familiarly called. An eminent lawyer, engaged with him in a case, was once rising to contest what seemed an unfavorable, if not an unfair, ruling. Mr. Choate drew him back and whispered in his ear, "Let it go. Sit down. Life, liberty, and property are always safe in his hands."¹ One anecdote has been often told incorrectly, and so as to convey a wrong impression, which I am able to give in the words of an eminent lawyer, who was himself an actor in the scene. "It was in the East Cambridge court-house, at the law term. The full Bench were present; a tedious argument had been dragging its weary length along for an hour or two; the session had lasted several hours, and the Chief Justice had yielded for a moment to drowsiness, — being no more than mortal. Mr. Choate and I were sitting in the bar, being concerned in the next case. As I looked up at the Bench, the large head of the Chief Justice presented itself settled down upon his breast about as far as it could go, his eyes closed, his hair shaggy and disordered, having on a pair of large black spectacles which had slid down to the very tip of his nose, and his face seeming to have discharged, for the time, every trace of intelligence,

¹ "The Chief-Justice," says the Hon. Emory Washburn, "had a way of expressing disapproval of what seemed to him a fallacy in an argument, or a questionable mode of proceeding in a cause, which sounded very like reproof, and often gave pain to the subject of it from the manner in which it was done. Nor did Mr. Choate escape. On one occasion, after listening with respect to one of those rebukes, as he did to every thing that fell from the court, Mr. Choate turned to two or three of his brethren, who had heard it, and quietly remarked, with that expression upon his countenance which always told the mood he was in, that 'he did not suppose that any one ever thought the Chief-Justice was much of a lawyer, but that nobody could deny that he was a man of pleasant manners.'"

‘Φαίης κε ζάκοτόν τέ τιν’ ἔμμεναι, ἀφρονά τ’ αὐτως.’¹

I looked, and then looked at Mr. Choate, whose eyes had followed mine, and then said to him, ‘that notwithstanding the curious spectacle he sometimes furnished us, I could never look at the Chief Justice without reverence.’ ‘Nor can I,’ he replied. ‘When you consider for how many years, and with what strength and wisdom he has administered the law, — how steady he has kept every thing, — how much we owe to his weight of character, — I confess I regard him as the Indian does his wooden log, curiously carved; I acknowledge he’s ugly, but I bow before a superior intelligence!’ You can imagine the twinkle of the eye, and the parenthetical tone with which the ‘I acknowledge he’s ugly’ came in. I hope you will be able to get together many of Mr. Choate’s felicities; they must abound in all memories.”²

As an instance of his pleasant way of announcing what might seem to be an ordinary fact, a member of the Massachusetts bar³ writes: “While a student in

¹ Iliad III. 220.

² The following is from a letter of the Hon. Matt. H. Carpenter to Judge Neilson. “Stevenson, the sculptor,” he says, “told me that he was once engaged in carving a lion of exaggerated size; that while he was engaged on the head and mane, Mr. Choate took the liveliest interest in the work, calling every morning as he came down, and every evening on his way home, to mark its progress. Stevenson, being curious, asked Mr. Choate why that work interested him so much. ‘Why,’ said Mr. Choate, ‘that is the best likeness of Chief Justice Shaw that I ever saw.’” the office of the late Benjamin F. Hallett, of Boston, I went into the Law Library to deliver some message to him. I found him engaged in preparing his points in a cause that was then about to be heard at a law term of the Supreme Court. Mr. Choate was in the case then being heard; Mr. Hallett's being the next in order. When Mr. Choate's cause was finished, he notified Mr. Hallett — just putting his head inside the door — in these words: 'Mr. Hallett, there is nothing now between you and that justice which you seek.' The manner in which this was said was so happy, his voice so musical, that it made an impression upon my mind I shall never forget."

³ Charles P. Thompson, Esq., of Gloucester.

His pleasantry was exuberant and unfailing, in defeat as well as in victory. It was a safeguard against depression and discouragement. Under defeat especially, by some ludicrous absurdity, some witty exaggeration, some jocosely extravagant, some half-earnest, half-sportive criticism of judge or jury, — never for a moment misunderstood by those who knew him — he lightened the disappointment of others as well as himself. Receiving, one morning, a note from a gentleman engaged with him in a cause at Washington, informing him that the Court had decided against them, he at once wrote back: —

"DEAR SIR, — The Court has lost its little wits. Please let me have — 1. Our brief (for the law). 2. The defendant's brief (for the sophistry). 3. The opinion (for the foolishness), and never say die. R. C."

Coming to his office once after the Supreme Court of the State had decided an important cause against him, he threw his books and papers on the desk, and after announcing the decision to those present, went on to say: "Every judge on that bench seems to be more stupid than every other one, and if I were not afraid of losing the good opinion of the court, I would impeach the whole batch of them."¹

In 1847, Mr. Choate argued a cause before the United States Circuit Court in Boston, which involved, to a certain extent, the question of State-rights, so called, then prominent in the politics of the country. Mr. Choate's client based his claim upon some United States law or process; his opponent claiming under State authority. The eminent judge, presiding over the court, was supposed to be a probable Democratic candidate for the presidency, a prominent competitor being the Hon. Silas Wright of New York. The case was elaborately argued on both sides, and held by the court for consideration. In the mean time the news reached Boston of the sudden death of Mr. Wright. Soon after, the Court intimated that an opinion would be given on the question before it, which the counsel on both sides were of course anxious to hear. It so happened, however, that the junior associate of Mr. Choate, — Mr. D., — being accidentally detained, did not reach the court room in season, but met Mr. Choate coming down the stairs and looking very lugubrious. He at once conjectured trouble, and asked what was the decision. "Against us," said Mr. Choate, in sepulchral tones. "Dead against us: mainly on the ground of Silas Wright's death!"

He was rather fond of talking of his contemporaries, but rarely spoke of any of them otherwise than kindly and favorably, — lingering upon their merits, and passing over their failings. Occasionally, after speaking of others, he would refer to himself in the same connection. Conversing one day with a young friend about Mr. Franklin Dexter, then just deceased, he eulogized him as a most able, faithful, and conscientious prosecuting officer, who never pressed an indictment for the sake of victory, nor unless he believed that a verdict against the accused would fulfil the highest ends of justice. He then proceeded to speak in general terms of the responsibility of a public prosecutor, and of his own deep sense of this responsibility while Attorney-General. He was solemn and earnest, and left a profound impression that never while holding that office was he entirely free from anxiety that nothing should be done by him, or through his means, by which a possibly innocent prisoner should lose his legal chances of acquittal.

¹ Hon. Matt. H. Carpenter. "Albany Law Journal," March, 1877.

When talking with a client, respecting a defence, his rule was, never to ask him whether he did the act; yet he was very watchful for signs of innocence or guilt. After an interview with a person who consulted him as to a disgraceful imputation under which he was laboring, he remarked, "He did it, he sweats so."

Although one could hardly converse with Mr. Choate for five minutes without hearing some remark striking for its beauty, or novelty, or humor, yet few of these sayings have been recorded, and in most cases, where the thought has remained, the rare felicity of language which graced it has escaped the memory, and the strange, indescribable fascination of manner with which it was accompanied no one can reproduce. Any one who has a fresh recollection of the impression produced at the time by some sudden flash of his mind, will be the more reluctant to repeat what invariably loses in the process. I have been able to gather up but a few of these unpremeditated sayings. Those who knew Mr. Choate must supply for themselves the tone and manner.

The qualifications of a certain office-holder being discussed in his presence, Mr. Choate said, "Yes, Sir, you may sum them up by asserting that he is self-sufficient, all-sufficient, and insufficient."

A copy of the "Poetry of the East," by Rev. Mr. Alger, had been sent to him. Meeting the author at a party soon after, he remarked to him, "I examined your 'Poetry of the East' with a great deal of interest. The Orientals seem to be amply competent to metaphysics, wonderfully competent to poetry, scarcely competent to virtue, utterly incompetent to liberty."

For the following I am indebted to the kindness of Mr. Ticknor: "Mr. Choate was of counsel in the case of the Federal-Street Church, and I was summoned as a witness. Sitting with him in the bar, after I had been examined, my eye fell accidentally on his notes, which, you are aware, were somewhat remarkable, so far as the handwriting was concerned. It struck me, however, while I was looking at them, that they much resembled two rather long autograph letters which I preserve in my small collection of such curiosities; one by Manuel the Great of Portugal, dated in 1512, and the other by Gonzalvo de Cordova, 'the Great Captain,' written, I suppose, a little earlier, but with no date that I can make out. I could not help telling Mr. Choate that I possessed these specimens of the handwriting of two such remarkable men, who lived three hundred and fifty years ago, and that they strongly resembled his notes, as they lay on the table before us. 'Remarkable men, no doubt,' he replied instantly; 'they seem to have been much in advance of their time!'"

This, said with his peculiar suavity and droll expression, the singularity of the comparison and the grounds of praise, was like a little flash of sunlight through a cloud.

Taking an early morning walk he met Mr. Prescott, whose "Philip II." had been for some time impatiently expected. "You are out early," said the historian. "I wish," he replied, "I could say the same of you, who are keeping the whole world waiting."

A celebrated lecturer meeting him, said that he was thinking of writing a lecture on one of the ancient generals. "That is it," said Mr. Choate; "Hannibal is your man. Think of him crossing the Alps in winter, with nobody at his back but a parcel of Numidians, Moors, Niggers, riding on horses without any bridles, to set himself against that imperial Roman power!"

Attending the opera on one occasion, and being but indifferently amused by the acting and music, which he did not understand, he turned to his daughter and said, with grave formality: "Helen, interpret to me this libretto, lest I dilate with the wrong emotion!"

"He objected once to an illiterate constable's return of service, bristling all over with the word having, on the ground that it was bad. The judge remarked that, though inelegant and ungrammatical in its structure, the paper still seemed to be good in a legal sense. 'It may be so, your Honor,' replied Mr. Choate, 'but, it must be confessed, he has greatly overworked the participle.'"¹

In replying to a lawyer who had been addressing the Court in a loud and almost boisterous manner, Mr. Choate referred playfully to his "stentorian powers." To his surprise, however, the counsel took it in dud-geon, and as soon as possible rose to protest against the hostile assault. "He had not been aware of any thing in his mode of address which would justify such an epithet; he thought it unusual and undeserved," &c., &c. Going on thus, his voice uncon-

¹ Essays by E. P. Whipple, vol. ii. p. 167.

Of his "dainty and humorous use of words," with meaning a little bent to suit his purpose, or involving some laughable absurdity, examples are numerous.

Of a reputation damaged in the courts, it was, he said, "to make the best of it, sadly tenebrions."

Of an advocate, very erect and very overbearing, he spoke as stating his position with "a more than ordinary perpendicularity of assertion."

"When I had been two days on the Rhine," he said to Rev. Dr. Storrs, "I knew the whole river perfectly: couldn't have known it better if I had been drowned in it."

On one occasion, when opposed to Mr. Webster in a case before the court, "Mr. Choate had lucidly and with great emphasis, stated the law. Mr. Webster — than whom a greater master of attitude, gesture, and facial expression, never lived — turned on him the gaze of his great eye, as if in mournful, despairing remonstrance against such a sad and strange perversion. 'That is the law, may it please your Honor,' thundered Mr. Choate, catching the glance, advancing a step, and looking full in Webster's face — 'That is the law, in spite of the admonishing, the somewhat paternal look, in the eye of my illustrious friend.' And it was the law, as affirmed by the court." — Rev. Dr. R. S. STORRS, in "Albany Law Journal."

In a criminal case, a friend said to him, "Why, Mr. Choate, I hear that your client has confessed. Is that so?" "Yes," said Choate, "he's 'fessed. He 'fessed he didn't do it." sciously soon rose again to its highest key, and rung through the court-house as if he were haranguing an army; when Mr. Choate half rose, and stretching out his hand with a deprecatory gesture, said, in the blandest tones, "One word, may it please the Court; only one word, if my brother will allow. I see my mistake. I beg leave to retract what I said!" The effect was irresistible. The counsel was silent; the Court and spectators convulsed with laughter.

Of a lawyer at once pugnacious, obstinate, and dull-witted, he remarked that he seemed to be a bulldog with confused ideas. The description was comprehensive and perfect.

During the trial of Crafts, Mr. Choate was pressing the Court to make what he thought a very equitable and necessary order in relation to taking a certain deposition. The Court, finding no precedent for it, suggested that the matter be suspended till the next day, "and then," added the judge, "I will make the order, if you shall be able to furnish me with any precedent for such proceeding." "I will look, your Honor," replied Mr. Choate, in his most deferential manner, "and endeavor to find a precedent, if you require it; though it would seem to be a pity that the Court should lose the honor of being the first to establish so just a rule."

"I met him once," said a member of the New York bar,¹ "at the United States Hotel, in Boston, when he was boarding there. As we were walking up and down the hall of the house after dinner, I happened to see hanging on the wall a map of a piece of property in Quincy, and remarked that that remind me of one whom I must regard as the most remarkable man of our day (John Quincy Adams). He said, 'Yes, I think he is. We have no man as much so, and I think they have none in England. The Duke I think is less wonderful, all things considered.' I spoke of his remarkable memory, his vast knowledge, and his marvellous facility in using it, and alluded to his recent efforts in the House of Representatives at Washington, where something had been said about impeaching him, and remarked, that without waiting to assume the defensive, or say any thing for himself, he had rushed upon his accusers and well-nigh demolished them, bringing from the treasures of his memory every incident of their lives that could be useful to him, and drawing as from an armory every variety of weapons practicable for their destruction. 'Yes,' he replied, 'he has always untold treasures of facts, and they are always at his command. He has peculiar powers as an assailant, and almost always, even when attacked, gets himself into that attitude by making war upon his accuser; and he has, withal, an instinct for the jugular and the carotid artery, as unerring as that of any carnivorous animal.'"

¹ From the memorandum of Hon. Charles A. Peabody.

On one occasion Mr. Choate was engaged in a patent case where a great number of witnesses had been examined by his opponent, and he was at the same time a delegate to the Whig convention, which was to choose between several candidates for the Presidency, of whom Mr. Webster was one. In closing the case, when he came to comment on the witnesses of the opposite party, he said, "The defendant has such an array of witnesses on this point, that I hardly know where to begin with them ; but if your Honor pleases, I think I will take them up, as we shall have to do by and by in canvassing for candidates for the Presidency, alphabetically ; and hence I will do here as I should wish to do there, reverse the alphabet and begin with the W.'s." The allusion was instantly appreciated by Court, jury, and audience ; and as most of them were Massachusetts men, and friends of Mr. Webster, it came near provoking a very audible demonstration.

Mr. Choate's eloquence was of an extraordinary nature, which one who never heard him can hardly understand. It was complex, like his mind ; at once broad and subtle ; easily understood but impossible to describe ; compact with all the elements of beauty and of power ; a spell composed of all things rich and strange, to fascinate, persuade, and convince. It was not by accident that he reached such success as an advocate, but through profound study and severe training. Not to speak of that which lies at the basis of all permanent success at the bar, a thorough knowledge of the law as a science, as well as in its forms, he was remarkable for sound judgment in the preparation and management of a cause. He knew instinctively what to affirm and what to yield. He chose the point of attack or defence with consummate skill ; and if he did not succeed, it was because success was not possible. His mind moved like a flash, and an unguarded point, a flaw in an argument, an unwise theory of procedure, a charge somewhat too strong or a little beside the real purpose, were seized upon with almost absolute certainty and turned with damaging effect against his opponents. In the preparation of a case he left nothing to accident which he could fix by care and labor. In determining a theory of defence, he was endless in suggestions and hypotheses till the one was chosen which seemed impregnable, or at any rate the best that could be found. In consultation he generally looked first at his opponent's side, then at his own; stating in full force every unfavorable argument, and then endeavoring to answer them, thus playing the whole through like a game of chess. In these cases his attention was given not only to a general proposition but to all its details. A person once prosecuted the city to recover damages for injuries received by a fall in consequence of a defect in a bridge. At the first meeting for consultation with the junior counsel he spent an hour in determining exactly how one could so catch his foot in a hole as to be thrown in the way to produce the specific injury, till by means of the fender and coal-hod, with the tongs and shovel, he constructed a rude model of the dilapidated bridge, and satisfied himself of the precise manner in which the accident happened. No man was ever more courageous than he for his client. Sometimes he seemed to run prodigious risks; but he knew his ground, and when once taken, nothing would beat him from it. His plea of somnambulism in Tirrell's case subjected him to a thousand innuendoes, to the bantering of the newspapers and the ridicule of the vulgar. The jury themselves said that in coming to their verdict, they did not consider it. But in the second trial he brought it forward with just as much assurance as ever.

His knowledge of human nature was intuitive. At a glance he formed a judgment of the jurymen, and governed himself accordingly, sometimes addressing each individual according to his perception of their several characteristics, repeating and varying his arguments till every mind was reached. However forcible or strong, he never was harsh or coarse. In no orator were the elements of conviction and persuasion so beautifully blended. His conviction was persuasive; his persuasion, convincing. More truly than was said of Fox, "his intellect was all feeling, and his feeling all intellect." No jurymen was ever weary with his argument. The driest matter of fact was enlivened by some unexpected turn of humor, or unthought-of illustration. His logic never assumed technical forms, but was enveloped and carried onward in narrative and illustration.

In his arguments to a jury, his openings were natural, easy, and informal. He glided into a subject so gently that you hardly knew it. He, oftener than otherwise, began with a general statement of the whole case, making a clear and definite outline, which no one could fail to understand and remember. He then proceeded to a careful and protracted analysis of the evidence; his theory of the case, in the mean time, had been pretty broadly broached, and his propositions, perhaps, laid down, and repeated with every variety of statement which seemed necessary for his purpose. Often his theory was insinuated rather than stated, and the jury were led insensibly to form it for themselves. His skill in narrative was equal to his cogency in argument. He had a wonderful power of vivid portraiture,—of compressing an argument into a word, or phrase, or illustration.

No one could make a more clear, convincing, and effective statement ; none held all the resources of the language more absolutely at command. His power over the sympathies, by which, from the first word he uttered, you were drawn to him with a strange and inexplicable attraction, was wonderful. Court, jury, and spectators seemed fused into one mass of willing and delighted listeners. They could not help being influenced by him. Calming the hostility of his hearers by kindness, conciliating their prejudices, converting them into friends, bending their will to his in delightful harmony, he moved on with irresistible force, boiling along his course, tumultuous but beautiful, lifting them bodily, bearing all with him, and prostrating all before him. His pleasantry and wit, his grotesque exaggerations, never gross or vulgar, served to wake up a sleepy jurymen, or relieve a dry detail. They lubricated the wheels of a long train of discussion. He often put himself so far as he could, really, or jocosely yet half in earnest, into sympathy with his opponents themselves. In the Dalton case he professed at the outset that he spoke in the interest of both parties. In the case of Shaw v. The Boston and Worcester Railroad, which was contested with a good deal of feeling, coming to the close of his argument he said, turning round and facing the President of the road, " My friends, the President and Directors of the Boston and Worcester Railroad, honorable and high-minded men as I know them to be, have probably considered that they should not be justified in paying to the plaintiff the large sum of money claimed in this case without the protection of a judgment in a suit at law ; but I have no doubt, gentlemen, if you establish the liability, every one of them would lay his hand on his heart and say, 'Give her all that she asks, and God bless her!'

Mr. Choate never lost self-possession. He seemed to have the surest mastery of himself in the moment of greatest excitement. He was never beside himself with passion or anxiety, and seldom disconcerted by any accident or unexpected posture of affairs, — so very seldom indeed, that the one or two cases where he was slightly so, are pretty distinctly remembered. One instance occurred in the trial of a question of salvage. It was the case of The Missouri, an American vessel stranded on the coast of Sumatra, with specie on board. The master of the stranded vessel, one Dixey, and Pitman, the master of the vessel that came to her aid, agreed together to embezzle the greater part of the specie, and pretend that they had been robbed of it by the Malays. Mr. Choate was cross-examining Dixey very closely to get out of him the exact time and nature of the agreement. The witness said that Pitman proposed the scheme, and that he objected to it, among other reasons, as dangerous. To which, he said, Pitman made a suggestion intended to satisfy him. Mr. Choate insisted on knowing what that suggestion was. The witness was loath to give it. Mr. Choate was peremptory, and the scene became interesting. "Well," said Dixey at last, "if you must know, he said that if any trouble came of it we could have Rufus Choate to defend us, and he would get us off if we were caught with the money in our boots." It was several minutes before the Court could go on with the business. For a few moments Mr. Choate seemed uncertain how to take it. He did not relish the nature of the compliment, and yet it was a striking tribute to his fame that two men, at the antipodes, should concoct a great fraud relying upon his genius to save them; and so the opposing counsel, Mr. Dana, put it, in his argument, aptly quoting the Quæ regio in terris.

His wit, his ludicrous representations, his sublime exaggerations, were never without a purpose. They were not the result of a taste which delighted in such things as beauties or felicities, but of a desire to attract the wandering attention, to fasten a thought by a ludicrous picture, to relieve the mind of the weary jury, or to show by an illustration the absurdity of the proposition he was combating.

In an argument before a committee of the Legislature in 1860, in behalf of the petitioners for a railroad from Salem to Malden, he drew one of those pictures with which he was accustomed to amuse, but, also, much more than merely to amuse, a jury. One argument in favor of the new road was, that it would enable travellers to avoid the East Boston Ferry, and to gain in speed. In reply, the beauties of the prospect in the harbor, and the pleasure of meeting friends on the boat, were referred to, as an offset.

“The learned though somewhat fanciful gentleman,” said Mr. Choate, “has eloquently set forth the delight which must be felt by all in catching an occasional glimpse of the harbor, as they cross in the boat; as if the business people of Danvers, Lynn, or Saugus, would care to stop, or think of stopping, to gaze upon the threadbare and monotonous beauties of Boston Harbor when hurrying to transact their affairs. Unfortunately, too, for the gentleman’s case, in this respect, it so happens that these same people have compelled this company to arch their boat all over, and wall it up all round, so that nothing at all can be seen. Then the delight of meeting and shaking hands with an old friend! Conceive, gentlemen, the pastoral, touching, pathetic picture of two Salem gentlemen, who have been in the habit of seeing each other a dozen times a day for the last twenty-five years, almost rushing into each other's arms on board the ferry-boat; — WHAT TRANSPORT! We can only regret that such felicity should be so soon broken up by the necessity of running a race against time, or fighting with each other for a seat in the cars."

During the trial of Tirrell, a certain police officer who was called by the government, took occasion several times to give his opinion very flippantly and out of place on several points of the case. This was soon after the discovery of a new planet, and the appearance of several learned papers on it by Prof. Peirce, of Cambridge. In the course of Mr. Choate's argument, and when he came to review the testimony of the witness, he said, "And then, gentlemen, the witness, not content with coloring and distorting the facts, gravely and sententiously gives us his opinion on this and that point with all the assurance of an expert. I wonder what he thinks of the new planet, I am dying to know his opinion of Prof. Peirce's theory of the aberration of light touching that stranger in the heavens."

The following ludicrous exaggeration long held its place among the stories about the Court: —

In April, 1847, the Joint Commissioners of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, appointed to ascertain and establish the boundary line between the two States, made an agreement and presented it to their respective Legislatures.

Parties living in Massachusetts, whose rights were affected by this decision, petitioned the Legislature against the acceptance of the Commissioners' report. Mr. Choate appeared for these remonstrants. A portion of the boundary line was described in the agreement as follows: "Beginning," &c., &c., "thence to an angle on the easterly side of Watuppa Pond, thence across the said pond to the two rocks on the westerly side of said pond and near thereto, then westerly to the buttonwood tree in the village of Fall River," &c., &c.

In his argument, commenting on the boundary, Mr. Choate thus referred to this part of the description:—

"A boundary line between two sovereign States described by a couple of stones near a pond, and a buttonwood sapling in a village. The Commissioners might as well have defined it as starting from a blue jay, thence to a swarm of bees in hiving-time, and thence to five hundred foxes with firebrands tied to their tails!"

Mr. Choate's style was peculiar, and entirely his own. Its exuberance, its stateliness and dignity, its music and its wealth, were as fascinating as they were inimitable. One can hardly fail to recognize, even in the least characteristic of his speeches, a true nobleness, a touch of imperial grace, such as has been vouchsafed only to the supreme masters of the language. His style has sometimes been criticised by those who have forgotten that his speeches were meant for hearers rather than for readers, and that a mind of such extraordinary affluence and vigor will, of necessity, in many respects, be a law to itself. He was, however, quite aware that a style of greater simplicity and severity would be necessary for a writer; and this, probably, was one thing which prevented him from entering seriously on those literary labors which were evidently, at one time, an object of real interest.

I am glad to be able to introduce here some subtle and suggestive remarks on this subject by an observant and thoughtful critic, — Rev. Joseph Tracy.

“I do not know,” he says, “that I can describe suitably, on paper, that peculiarity of Mr. Choate’s style of which we were speaking, and which is so marked in his famous ‘long sentences.’ Many have observed that it was not wordiness. He had words and used them, in rich abundance; but if you examine even the most sounding of his long sentences, you find in them no redundant words. Each of its several members is made up of such words, and of such only, as were needed for the perfect expression of the thought.

“Nor was it in that cumulative power by which one idea, image, or argument, is piled upon another, so as to make up an overwhelming mass. He had this power in a remarkable degree; but so had many others — perhaps almost all great orators. Cicero has left some splendid examples of it.

“It was rather the result of the peculiar logical structure of his mind; for in him logic and rhetoric were not separate departments, but one living process. He instinctively strove to present an idea, a thought, in its perfect completeness, — the thought, the whole thought, and nothing but the thought; so to present it that there would be no need of adding to his statement of it, subtracting from it, or in any way modifying it, after it had once been made. He seemed to use words not exactly to convey ideas to his hearers, but rather to assist and guide their minds in the work of constructing the same ideas that were in his own. In carrying their minds through this process, he must give them, not merely the idea which had been the result of his own thinking, but its elements, their proportions, their limitations, their bearings on the results. In this process, clauses of definition, of discrimination, of limitation, were often as necessary as those of a contrary character. Any element of thought which contributed to the result only in some qualified sense must be mentioned with the proper qualification, lest there should remain a doubt whether it ought to be mentioned at all. It is in this respect that his long sentences seem to me to differ, characteristically, from the long sentences of other orators, which are merely cumulative. The practical effect was, that the hearer found himself not merely overwhelmed by the multitude of grand things that had been said, but also led, by a safe logical process, to the desired conclusion.

“How else can we account for the effect which his long sentences certainly did produce on even common minds? Could such minds, after hearing one of them, recollect and appreciate all the particulars contained in it? But few, even of educated men, who read them, can do that. The effect is produced by the logic which runs through them and does its work during the progress of the sentence, so that when the sentence is ended the conclusion is reached.

“ A remarkable example of such long sentences as I have tried to describe, is found in Mr. Choate’s remarks at the meeting of the Suffolk Bar on the death of Mr. Webster. I have often thought that studying that address, so as thoroughly to master it (and the same may be said of his Eulogy on Mr. Webster, and other elaborate performances), would be a good exercise for a theological student, about to enter on the study of Paul’s Epistles, where he will find many long sentences which seem to be made long on the same principle, and as a result of the same logical instincts. Paul’s parentheses, like those of Choate, are put in, that the reader, when he arrives at the end of a sentence, may have constructed in his own mind exactly the right idea, with all the limitations, qualifications, and appurtenances which are essential to its identity and completeness.”

Mr. Choate’s memory was exact and tenacious. He could generally repeat considerable portions of what he had recently read ; was always ready with an apt quotation, and able to correct those who made a wrong one. An interesting illustration of this occurred during the trial of William Wyman, in 1843, for embezzling the funds of the Phoenix Bank. An array of counsel was assembled such as is rarely seen, and the court-house was crowded with intensely interested spectators. “ In the course of the trial, and in a most exciting passage, when all the counsel appeared to be intent upon the case and nothing else, Mr. Webster wrote on a slip of paper a favorite couplet of Pope, and passed it to Mr. Choate,

‘Lo where Mæotis sleeps, and softly flows
The freezing Tanais through a waste of snows.’

Mr. Choate wrote at the bottom ‘wrong.’

‘Lo where Mæotis sleeps, and hardly flows
The freezing Tanais through a waste of snows.’

Mr. Webster rejoined, ‘right,’ and offered a wager. A messenger was despatched for Pope, when it appeared that Mr. Choate was right. Mr. Webster gravely wrote on the copy of Pope, ‘spurious edition,’ and the subject was dropped. All this while the spectators were in the full belief that the learned counsel were in earnest consultation on some difficult point of law.”¹

The profound admiration which Mr. Choate felt for Mr. Webster was sincerely reciprocated. During this trial some ladies said to Mr. Webster that they longed for the arguments to come on, as they wished to hear him. To which he replied to the effect that he was a matter-of-fact old man, and that if he ever had the power of interesting, it had gone. He then spoke with great warmth and earnestness of Mr. Choate, characterizing him as the genius of the American bar. He afterwards spoke of Pinkney, and said that Choate was the only American lawyer who had equalled him, both as a lawyer and an advocate, and that he surpassed him. “In the past,” said Mr. Webster, “the question was asked of a rising lawyer, ‘how near Pinkney is he?’ In the future it will be, how near Choate? As a mere dry lawyer, he is equal to himself as an advocate, and what more can be said?”

¹ Law Reporter, January, 1844.

One will not unfrequently notice in Mr. Choate's speeches and writings, as they might have in his conversation, fragmentary quotations,—half-lines of poetry,—a single catchword of a wise maxim,—a partially translated proverb,—which harmonized with his thought, but which to those familiar with them were suggestive of much more than was said. An instance of his readiness in felicitous quotation is given by Mr. Parker in his "Reminiscences," which I am permitted to extract.

"In the winter of 1850, a large party was given in Washington, and many illustrious personages were present, who have since, like Mr. Choate, gone down to the grave amid the tears of their countrymen. The Senate, at that time worthy of the name, was well represented on this occasion of festivity, and the play and airy vivacity of the conversation, with 'the cups which cheer but not inebriate,' relaxed at intervals even senatorial dignity. During the evening the subject of 'Young America' was introduced,—his waywardness, his extravagance, his ignorance, and presumption. Mr. Webster observed, that he hoped the youth would soon come to his senses, and atone, by the correctness of his deportment, for his juvenile dissipation. At the same time, he added, that, in his opinion, the only efficient remedy for the vice and folly of the lad would be found in early religious training, and stricter parental restraint. Mr. Choate declared, that he did not view the hare-brained youth in the same light with his illustrious friend; that every age and every country had, if not their 'Young America,' at least something worse. The character of Trajan, the best and purest of Roman emperors, said he, was unable, with all its virtue and splendor, to check the 'Young Italy' of that day. Our lads would seem to have sat for the picture which has been drawn of the Roman youths, by the hand of one who seldom colored too highly. 'Statim sapiunt, statim sciunt omnia; neminem verentur, imitantur neminem, atque ipsi sibi exempla sunt,' which, translated, reads thus: 'From their cradles they know all things, — they understand all things, — they have no regard for any person whatever, high or low, rich or poor, religious or otherwise, — and are themselves the only examples which they are disposed to follow.' Mr. Benton thought the quotation too happy to be genuine, and demanded the author. Mr. Choate, with the utmost good humor, replied, that his legal habits had taught him the importance of citing no case without being able to give his authorities; he called for the younger Pliny, and triumphantly showed the passage, amid the admiration of that brilliant assembly, in the 23d letter of the 8th book. Our informant remarks, that the history of literature, perhaps, cannot show an equally felicitous quotation."

His fondness for books was a striking characteristic. The heart of his home was his library. Hither he retreated from the distractions of business, and the disappointments of politics, to discourse with the great spirits of other times; yielding with unflinching delight to the lofty stimulus of great minds, and communing with them as with friends. He reposed among his books. He bought them freely, generally for use, though in some departments, and with some favorite authors, he allowed free scope to his tastes, and adorned his shelves with choice editions. In a city he gravitated toward a bookstore or a public library, as if by a fixed and unvarying law of nature. During the earlier years of his residence in Boston, when professional occupation allowed him leisure, he was often found in Burnham's Antiquarian Bookstore, poring over the heterogeneous treasures of that immense depository.

Shortly after his death there appeared in the "New York Times" a communication from a well-known dealer in old and rare books,¹ which merits preservation, as a simple, unvarnished statement of the truth.

"RUFUS CHOATE'S LOVE FOR BOOKS.

"The death of this illustrious man brings to my mind certain reminiscences of him, which I think worthy of keeping in remembrance.

"About ten years ago, when on a visit, or passing through this city, Mr. Choate called at my store, about ten o'clock, A.M., and introduced himself as a lover of books and an occasional buyer, and then desired to be shown where the Metaphysics, and the Greek and Roman Classics, stood. He immediately commenced his researches, with great apparent eagerness; nor did he quit his toil till he was compelled to do so by the store being shut up, thus having been over nine hours on a stretch, without food or drink. He remarked that 'he had quite exhausted himself, mentally as well as bodily.' He had been greatly interested, as well as excited, at what he had seen; 'for,' continued he, 'I have discovered many books that I have never seen before, and seen those that I had never heard of; but, above all, I have been more than overjoyed at discovering, in your collection, a copy of the Greek bishop's¹ famous commentary on the writings of Homer, in seven volumes, quarto, a work that I have long had an intense desire to possess.' He afterwards purchased the precious volumes. I had the seven volumes bound in three, in handsome and appropriate style. These works no doubt still grace his library. W. G."

¹ William Gowans.

To the last he was studious of letters, full of sympathy with literary men and their works, and especially fond of the classics, and of imaginative literature. During the most busy period of his professional labor he managed to secure at least an hour every day — rescued from sleep, or society, or recreation — for Greek or Latin, or some other favorite study. He sometimes, at the commencement of a college term, would mark out his course of study by the curriculum as laid down in the catalogue, and thus keep on pari passu with one or two of the classes. He was indifferent to ordinary amusements, had no love for horses, or field sports; and seemed hardly to desire any other rest than that which came from a change of intellectual action. In the later years of his life he undertook the study of German with one of his daughters, learning the grammar during his morning walks, and reciting at table.

If the question were asked, to what pursuits Mr.

¹ Eustathius (Archbishop of Thessalonica) was born in the twelfth century at Constantinople. He was the author of the well-known voluminous commentary on Homer, written in the same language as the Iliad. His commentaries were first printed at Rome, 1550, in two volumes folio. Besides these commentaries, he was the author of several other critical works.

Choate's tastes, unobstructed, would have led him, I am inclined to think the answer would be — to letters rather than to the law.¹ Books were his passion. His heart was in with philosophers, historians, and poets; and had his fortune allowed, he would have endeavored to take rank with them, — to illustrate, perhaps, some great period of history with a work worthy of the best learning and the widest culture; or to unfold the sound and deep principles of a true political philosophy. He might not, indeed, have avoided, but rather have sought, public life; for he felt its fascinations, and fairly estimated its grand opportunities. His ambition might have been to move in the sphere of Burke (of whom he sometimes reminds one) or Macaulay, rather than that of Erskine or Eldon.

“The world of thought, the world of dreams.”

¹ In illustration not only of his love of letters, but of the remark which he himself once made that he “often found a single winged word as suggestive as the most germinant thought,” Mr. E. B. Gillett writes in a letter to Judge Neilson: “I called upon Mr. Choate when he was confined to his house by a lame knee. . . . On one occasion I found him before his table, turning the leaves of Macaulay's History. I inquired if he was revising the judgments recently expressed in his lecture upon that subject. He replied no; that he was reading Cowley's Poems, which always greatly interested him; that he had just discovered in the volume an expression similar to that found in the first book of ‘Paradise Lost,’ — ‘The height of this great argument,’ which he thought a fine and extraordinary phrase. He had thereupon begged his wife, ‘the gracious purveyor to his infirmities,’ to hand down Macaulay to him, that he might detect whether Milton had ‘hooked’ from Cowley, or Cowley from Milton. ‘But,’ said he, ‘Cowley has got him. It is however only the equitable thing. Milton had a right to forage the whole intellectual world in the way of reprisal, for his disjecta membra are scattered thick through all literature.’”

Hence, though bringing to the Law marvellous aptitude, wonderful diligence, and entire self-devotion, sacrificing, as some thought, in the sharp contests of the bar, powers which might better have graced another and higher sphere, — he was never a mere lawyer. And yet, so absorbed was he in his profession, — it was a necessity, and at least a second love, — that with the exception of a few columns in the newspapers, a brief article in the “North American Review,” a few speeches and orations, I know not that he fully prepared any thing for the press.

He cared nothing for money; little, too little perhaps, for society, beyond his own immediate friends; and less than any able and brilliant man I ever knew, or almost ever heard of, for fame; but study, books, intellectual labor and achievements, poetry, truth — these were controlling elements of his life. However prostrated or worn, a new intellectual stimulus would raise him in an instant. “One day,” says a former student of his,¹ “he came into the office tired and sick; the great lines of his face yellow and deep; his eyes full of a blaze of light, yet heavy and drooping. Throwing himself exhausted on the sofa, he exclaimed, ‘The law — to be a good lawyer is no more than to be a good carpenter. It is knack, — simply running a machine.’ Soon after a man came in with a splendid edition of Sir William Hamilton’s ‘Reid,’ fresh from London. He was changed in a moment. Springing from the sofa, he glanced admiringly over the philosophy, saying, ‘Here’s food; now I will go home and feast. There’s true poetry in these metaphysicians.' And so he went off to refresh himself with that light reading."¹

¹ Rev. J. M. Marsters, to whom I am indebted for many interesting particulars.

The following recollections of Mr. Choate are from a gentleman who saw him frequently and familiarly:—

“DEAR SIR,—The principal reason for my neglect to send you any reminiscences of Mr. Choate is, that when I have tried to put them into shape, they have seemed too meagre and insignificant to be worth your notice. Indeed, I think that the recollections of his daily life, retained by any one who saw him familiarly ‘in his habit as he lived,’ are extremely difficult of development in words. Every thing which

¹ Speaking of his love of books, Mr. Gillett says that, being in Mr. Choate’s library, he noticed one shelf filled with different editions of the Greek Testament, some in elegant modern binding, and others in old vellum. Alluding to this, Mr. Choate replied, “You recall a visit I once received in my rooms from Mr. Webster, when I was Senator in Washington. . . .

“I saw Mr. Webster’s wonderful black eyes peering over my books, as if in search, and asked him what he would please to have. He turned to me with one of his smiles, such as never transfigured the face of any other man or woman, and said: ‘I observe, brother Choate, that you are true to your instincts in Washington as at home; seven editions of the Greek Testament, but not a copy of the Constitution.’”

The Rev. Dr. Storrs, in a letter to Judge Neilson, says with as much truth as beauty: “He was a scholar by instinct, and by the determining force of his nature. All forms of high intellectual activity had charm and reward for his sympathetic and splendid intelligence. He especially delighted, however, in history, philosophy, eloquence, and the immense riches of the ancient literature. His library was peopled to him with living minds. The critical and august procedures in history were as evident to him as processions in the streets. No solemn and majestic voice had spoken, from the Athenian bema, in Roman forum, in English Parliament, whose tones, even whose vital words, did not still echo in his ear.”

he said produced an impression on the hearer ; but an attempt to repeat the saying, and reproduce the impression on one who did not know him, results in failure. The flavor is gone. It proceeded from the time, the occasion, the manner, the tone, the personal magnetism of the man. There were some subjects on which Mr. Choate always liked to talk, — about his contemporaries, or on his favorite classics, or to young men about their studies, or the best preparation for practical success, or the true ends and aims of life, and the ways and means of civil and professional activity and usefulness.

“ I used, when I knew Mr. Choate to be at leisure and alone, to stroll from my room into his, and start some topic. He would at once enter into it with all interest, and as if that were the very subject he had been studying most carefully and recently. You may imagine, I was always inclined to hear rather than to be heard. Still, his remarks were always suggestive of answers ; and it was easier to talk with him — really to converse, not merely to listen — than with any man of note whom it has been my fortune to meet. He did not lecture nor preach. Frequently he drew out the knowledge or opinions of the person conversing with him, — whether young or old, learned or otherwise, — by direct questions ; and in such cases he always seemed to be actually seeking information, — not attempting to find out, like a tutor at a recitation, how much the catechised individual knew. I always felt, after spending ten minutes with him, as if I had been not only stocked with fresh stores, but developed, — quite as much educated as instructed. Then, what he said was so stimulant and encouraging.

One always went away, not depressed by the sense of his own inferiority, but determined to know more about what he had been talking of, and confident that he had been put in the right way to learn more.

“ Nothing pleased his young friends so much as the deference with which he received what they had to say. I remember his once asking what I thought of a point which he was about to argue to the Bench, and about which I had very imperfect ideas. I made some sort of vague reply ; but was agreeably surprised, shortly afterwards, by hearing my exact words introduced to the full Court in an abundance of good company, and in a connection which gave them some significance. The junior associate in a case could not whisper to him in the middle of an argument without his saying to judge or jury, ‘ My learned brother has just suggested to me, ’ — and the suggestion, or something like it, would come forth, freed from error and crudity, illustrated, and made telling.

“ His serious conversation was always exact and terse in expression, and he disliked any looseness in that respect in others. He asked me once what the judge had charged the jury in a certain case. I answered — ‘ That they must find the fact thus and so, ’ — meaning that they were charged, unless they found it so, not to bring in a verdict for the plaintiff. He replied very quickly, ‘ I suppose he told them to find it as it was really, didn’t he ? ’ In grammar and pronunciation he was precise even in his peculiarities ; and any error he would reprove by introducing the same into his next sentence with — ‘ as you call it. ’ yet his quaintness was perhaps his most distinguishing characteristic to those with whom he was intimate. They remember him asking after his only granddaughter with 'How is the boy?' — or coming into a room with a question or a remark wholly incongruous with the time and the surroundings; — or interspersing the business of a trial with all sorts of ludicrous remark and by-play, audible and visible only to those just around him in the bar; — or speaking of a husband, from whom he had just obtained a settlement for his client, an injured but not very amiable wife, as a sinner, and adding, 'Mrs. — is a sinner, too,' — then immediately correcting himself with 'No, Sir, she is not a sinner, for she is our client, but she is certainly a very disagreeable saint;' — or ingeniously harassing a nervous legal opponent, in private consultation upon a compromise, until he rushed from the room in distraction, and then quietly finishing the sentence to the nervous gentleman's associate, as if it had been originally addressed to him, and his friend's departure had not been noticed. All these things, amusing and puzzling when seen as well as heard, are flat and stale in the mere relation.

“ Mr. Choate’s playful conversation it seems impossible to put into a book, and retain the sparkle. And

"I have mentioned how much Mr. Choate liked to talk upon the classics. His reputation as a classical scholar was, as you know, very high, and I think deservedly so. He had all the qualifications, except time, for fine scholarship in this department, — an ardent love of the subject, a fondness for the general study of language, a vast and accurate memory, and great assiduity and minuteness in investigation. You know how rich his library was in classical works; and I always used to see upon his office-table the German periodical catalogues of new editions and philological publications. I do not suppose that he equalled the linguists of the universities in thoroughness and precision of learning. This was not compatible with the variety and pressure of his other pursuits. But during the few minutes which he daily bestowed upon Latin and Greek, he studied rather than read, spending the time upon one sentence, not upon several pages. With half-a-dozen editions of his authors open before him, and all the standard lexicons and grammars at hand, he referred to each in turn, and compared and digested their various authority and opinion. I imagine he always translated (not contenting himself with the idea in its original dress) for the sake of greater precision of conception, and also of practice in idiomatic English. You will notice in his written translations how he strives to find a phrase which will sound as familiar to an English ear, as the original to that of a Greek or Roman. When he uses an ancient idiom, in translation or original composition, it seems intentional, and as if he thought it would bear transplanting.

“In his scholarship, as in other things, he was anxious to be accurate, and spared no pains in investigating a disputed point. In this, as in law, the merest novice could put him upon inquiry, by doubting his opinion. He was not positive at the outset, but set himself to studying at once; and when he had finally reviewed his position no one could stir him from his final conclusion. I remember once showing him a new Quintilian which I had bought. He opened it, and began translating aloud. Disagreeing with his translation of some technical word,

I called his attention to it. He heard what I had to say, and said little in return. The next day he came armed with authorities, and challenged me to support my position. I found some authorities on my side; but I think he did not let me rest for weeks, nor until we had between us brought every thing in the books to bear upon the question. The result was, that I was convinced he was right at first.

“Nothing pleased him more than to bring his classics to bear upon his daily pursuits. He quoted Latin and Greek to juries, sometimes much to their astonishment. He wished to be such a legal orator as Demosthenes and Cicero. He used to say that if he desired to form a nisi-prius lawyer, he should make him, above all, study Quintilian. He delighted in Thucydides as illustrating the great question of confederation or disunion between small republics. These authors, and Homer and Horace for relaxation, and Tacitus for comparison with Thucydides as a philosophical historian, were his favorite and principal classical reading.

“Greek history was a constant study with him. I have no doubt that at one time he meditated a work upon it, and sketched some plans and collected some materials. He was always enthusiastic upon this subject. I shall never forget the animation with which, finding his son, Rufus, and myself reading the part of Herodotus preceding the first Persian war, he broke out with, ‘You are just seeing the curtain rising on the great drama.’

“Mr. Choate’s activity was, as you know, perfectly restless. He could not endure any thing that seemed like trifling with time. Formal dinner-parties, unless they were also feasts of reason, he studiously eschewed. The mere conventionalities of society bored him.

“Unceasing as was his labor, he was, nevertheless, a great procrastinator. He could not prepare his cases for trial weeks and months in advance, as is the habit of some of our lawyers. He said to me once, ‘I cannot get up the interest until the struggle is close at hand; then I think of nothing else till it is over.’ He has sometimes been known not to have put a word of an oration on paper, at a time when the day of delivery was so near that an ordinary man would have thought the interval even too short for mere revision and correction. But he was seldom caught actually unprepared. The activity of the short period of preparation was intense; and as at some time or other in his life he had studied almost every thing, and as he never forgot any thing that he once knew, his amount and range of acquisition gave him a reserved force for every emergency, which could be brought into instant use. Moreover, his grasp of a subject was so immediate, that he did as much in a moment as another could in a day. He would sometimes be retained in a cause just going to trial, and before his junior had finished his opening, Mr. Choate would seem to know more about that case than any other man in the court-room. His mental rapidity showed itself in every thing. It was wonderful to see him run through the leaves of a series of digests, and strike at a glance upon what would most strongly avail him, and reject the weak or irrelevant. So in all his reading he distilled the spirit (if there was any) instantly from any dilution.”

I shall venture to give here a few familiar reminiscences of Mr. Choate's home-life, exactly as they were written by a daughter, for the amusement of one of his grandchildren, without thought of their serving any other purpose.

“Whoever had seen your grandpapa with any of us children would have soon found that with all his study and hard work, he always had time to make home happy, and romped and played with us to our hearts' content, — laughed at our dolls and cats, read our compositions, heard our lessons, and when a leisure evening came would join us in our games of Royal Goose, and Loto, which was his especial favorite. I am afraid because, for some unknown reason, he always got the candy in the pool! . . . But we thought the best game of all with him was tag, and that always came off just after dinner, before he went back to his office. There never could be again such a noise as we made, and your poor grandmamma would have to shut her ears and hide herself from the tumult. We always ended by rushing after him, sometimes far into the street, and would not give up until he allowed himself to be tagged the last. But although he was so frolicsome and bubbling up with fun when with us alone, he would change wholly if any ‘outsider’ by any chance were with us. If one of our playmates came in during our game of tag, he at once stopped the game, took his green bag and was off.

“And he was just as fond of playing with you as he ever was with us; and when you were brought into the city from Dorchester and were the centre of an admiring group of uncles and aunts, grandpapa would dart in and catch you up and run with you in his arms to the library, and then he would lock the door so as to have you all to himself, and sometimes we would peep in and see him lying on the floor to let you have a free pull at his curls, or he would show you pictures, or chase you about the room ; until having expended from half an hour to an hour in this way he would return you to me, saying he didn't think much of you any way, and couldn't for his life see what there was about you that attracted people ; that he'd had you in the library for an hour, and there was nothing satisfactory about you.

“ He used to love to have us sing to him, and there was hardly a day when he did not steal a little time to hear some of his favorites, and never a Sunday evening passed without our singing, all together, the hymns and chants he loved so well. I can hear him now calling for one after another, and for the last, ‘ Now, children, let us have China : sing up loud and clear.’ — And such good times we used to have at dinner with him, and how with all the fun he would try to teach us something, and often he would call out, ‘ Not a child at this table, I suppose, can tell me where this line comes from ; ’ and then he would repeat it, and perhaps one of us would be fortunate enough to know, and if all did, which sometimes happened, you can imagine what a noise we made, calling it out all together. It did not trouble him at all when we would talk and discuss among ourselves, and he would take an interest in each one's particular views from oldest to youngest.

“ He wanted us to like books, and always gave them to us for our Christmas and birthday presents, and he made these come round pretty often too. I remember feeling something hard under my pillow one night, and took out a book, which proved to be a beautiful English edition of Miss Edgeworth's Moral Tales, bound in purple morocco! How often he used to say to us, 'Be good children; be accurate and honest, and love your books.'

"He was always so sympathizing and generous when any one was in trouble or difficulty, and would never fail to help them if they applied to him, and sometimes he helped the wrong one. We used to laugh at him a great deal whenever he was imposed upon. Once, especially, I remember, when we were all seated at the dinner-table, the servant handed him a card upon which was written a gentleman's name, with his title 'Chief Justice of Arkansas.' So grandpapa left the table and went into the library where the gentleman was waiting, and after being absent a short time returned, and told us that the Chief Justice seemed very glad to meet him again, and said he remembered seeing him very often in Washington. I shall never forget how troubled an expression he had when he said to grandmamma, 'Helen, I was mortified that I had quite forgotten him;' and then he went on to say that the Chief Justice had been very unfortunate in losing his money, and as he was quite a stranger he had no one to call upon, and apologized over and over again for the liberty he was taking, which your grandpapa wouldn't listen to at all, and assured him that it was a pleasure to assist him. So the Chief Justice retired with renewed thanks, promising to repay just as soon as he should hear from his friends, which would be in a day or two. But days and months and years rolled away, and the gentleman quite forgot his promises, or else never heard from his friends, which is quite sad to think of. In the mean time we were never tired of asking him, 'Have you heard lately from your friend the Chief Justice of Arkansas?'

"Whenever he went away from home, which he often had to do, he would send us such nice letters; and he tried to print them for us, as his writing was just a little bit hard to read. Many wiser heads than ours would have puzzled long even over his printing, but in the great red seal of the letter we would almost always find a silver quarter of a dollar, which seemed a fortune to us.

"He never was too weary, or busy, or sick, to have us near him; and one of the earliest memories I have is that of seeing him at his high desk, where he always wrote standing, with my little three-year-old sister, whom you never saw, sitting on his shoulder playing with his curls, her golden hair floating about her face and his.

"We children used to have very fierce wordy warfare with our playmates as to the merits of our respective parents; and I well remember that one little girl (whom I'm afraid I quite hated for it) convincingly showed her father to be taller and stronger, and that he had more hair, and longer whiskers, and more of all the other virtues, than your grandpapa, when I brought the dispute to a triumphant conclusion by declaring that my father could repeat the story of The House that Jack Built quicker than her father could, which she was unable to deny, because her father had never told it to her at all, and so, all comparison being out of the question, — since my father could do something well which her father never had done in any way, — I remained the victor.

“ When your grandmamma went away on a visit, the amusing of us children and keeping us happy was grandpapa’s work. And pretty hard work it must sometimes have been, for we would insist on his writing stories and songs ; and on one occasion he kept us very merry the whole evening till bed-time, by writing a parody on Wordsworth’s ‘ Pet Lamb,’ writing a verse when we had got to be unusually turbulent, and thus stilling the tempest of noise during the time we took to read and learn it. We all thought that he had unlimited powers, and that Scott was poor compared with the stories which he composed. I should really like very much to read one of them now, and see what it was that so fascinated us.

“ He was very particular as to the books we read, and it used to seem to me as though almost every novel I could lay my hands upon had a ‘ bad tone ’ to it. Our staples were Scott, Barbauld, and Edgeworth. He always lured us to read poetry, especially the Bible, Shakspeare, Cowper, and Wordsworth. He always contrived to give us the idea, that when a boy he was very fond of these mature writers, but once confessed that he perfectly well remembered his thrill of pleasure upon taking up a novel which began with ‘ “ Villain, beware,” exclaimed a voice ’ ! When we were older we read and were very fond of Tennyson, and Mr. and Mrs. Browning, whom he, to vex us, and pretending not to know, would always call the Brownriggs. He would gently stimulate our enthusiasm by denying their merits, and making us find out and express in language the reason for the faith that was in us ; and then, after a hard contest, he would always give in and say, ' Well, well, there is something in these Brownriggs, after all,' and adding ' in poetry there are many mansions.' Then he would make us read again such passages as had struck him. He always, or almost always, realized such lines by applying them to some action or some person ; as, for example, he stopped me at Mr. Browning's lines,

' Lived in his mild and magnificent eye,
Learned his great language, caught his clear accents,
Made him our pattern to live and to die.'

and say, ' What a picture of Mr. Webster that is !' To the last day of his life he teased us in a good-natured way, and we teased back again ; but my remembrance is that he almost always came off victor. On one occasion your Aunt Helen had sat up quite late in the evening to finish a composition, which she handed to him the next morning for correction and criticism, saying she was so wearied in writing it that she had slept after it for twelve hours. He read it carefully, and handed it to her, saying, with great gravity, ' I don't wonder at your long sleep after such an effort : history has but one parallel, the sleep of the elder Pitt after one of his great speeches.'

“ He worked more continuously than any one I have ever seen, so that, finally incessant labor got to be a necessity. Nothing in the shape of pleasure would induce him to be away from his library for more than a day or two at a time ; and when we wanted him, when quite ill, to pass a week with us in the middle of the summer at the seashore, he said ' A week ! why in forty-eight hours the only question left would be, Where is the highest rock and the deepest water? ”

One cannot help seeing from these pictures for a child that Mr. Choate's life at home was the most hearty, cheerful, and affectionate that could be imagined. He was kind, familiar, and playful with his children, full of jocoseness, sensitive, and with a feminine susceptibility and tact. When his daughters, from out of town, came into the house, if he were in his library, unless they came to see him at once, he would generally walk to the head of the stairs, and call their attention for a moment to himself, by uttering some jocose remark, or a familiar quotation, a little changed to suit his purpose, such as “Did Ossian hear a voice?” then, after exchanging a few words, would retreat to his work.

This same affectionateness of nature, as of a woman, was warmly manifested towards all his relatives. His mother was tenderly revered and loved, and he never failed to minister in all possible ways to her comfort. On her death, though not unexpected, since she had attained the advanced age of more than eighty, he wrote to his brother, “I am stricken with this news, as if I had not known it was so inevitable and so near. Dear, dear mother, — the best of human beings, the humblest, most patient, truest to every duty of her lot. My heart bleeds that I could not have seen her again.”

He was very fond of music, especially sacred music. Every Sunday evening, after tea, he would gather his children around the piano, and occasionally joining, have them sing to him the old psalm-tunes and chants. In his last illness, when at Dorchester, his children would sing to him almost every night. It was not thought of till he had been there for a week or two, but one evening they all sang at his request, and he slept much better after it than he had done for a long time. Every night after that the concert was repeated. He loved martial, stirring music, too. "The Marseillaise," and "God save the Emperor," and all national airs, were favorites. A Turkish march (so called) always pleased him, because, under its little spell, he saw "The Turkish moons wandering in disarray." It always troubled him that there was no Italian national air. His imagination gave life to whatever he read, and he instinctively realized the pictures of poets and the narratives of historians. Reading Campbell's "Battle of the Baltic," he remarked on the line, how vividly it brought to one's mind the peaceful, calm proximity of the city, — the water's unruffled surface, — the piers crowded with anxious faces to witness the great sea-fight, as the sound of the bells of Copenhagen came over the waters.

"It was ten of April morn by the chime,"

One of his daughters said to him, that "The Soldier's Dream" was a sad thing to her, owing to the uncertainty whether the dream was ever realized. He said his understanding of it was, that "Thrice ere the morning I dreamt it again" signified that it came to pass, referring in proof to some popular belief in a dream thrice dreamed before morning coming true.

He often read aloud passages from the newspapers

which interested him, interspersing them with remarks or familiar quotations. At the time of Louis Philippe's flight, he read the account at table, uttering after every few sentences, as if it were in the paper, "What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue!" So, after the death of Nicholas he read it aloud, adding in the same tone a verse of the Psalms: "I have said ye are gods, but ye shall die like men and perish like one of the princes."

He had more than a feminine sensitiveness to physical suffering. From this, some presumed to doubt his courage, though I know not with what reason. His moral courage, certainly, could not be questioned. He was bold enough for his clients, and his independence in forming and maintaining his political creed was thought by some of his friends to be carried even to an extreme.

It seemed as if nobody was ever so gentle and sweet-hearted and tender of others as he. And when we consider the constant provocations of his profession, — his natural excitability, — the ardor with which he threw himself into a case, — the vigor and tenacity of purpose with which he fought his battles, — as well as his extreme sensitiveness to sharp and unkind words, — it seems little less than a miracle. "He lavished his good nature," it was truly said, "upon all around him, — in the court and the office, — upon students, witnesses, servants, strangers." He was so reluctant to inflict pain that he would long endure an annoyance, — as of a troublesome and pertinacious visitor, — or put himself to considerable inconvenience in escaping from it, rather than to wound the feelings of another by a suggestion.

Though sometimes ruffled, he “Carried anger as the flint bears fire,

Which, much enforced, shows a hasty spark,
And straight is cold again.”

He never spoke ill of the absent, nor would suffer others to do so in his presence. He was affectionate, obliging, desirous to make every one about him happy, — with strong sympathy for any one in trouble. Hence it was almost impossible for him to refuse a client in distress who strongly desired his aid.

Dr. Adams, in his Funeral Address, tells a characteristic little anecdote. “He had not walked far, one morning a few years ago, he said, and gave as a reason, that his attention was taken by a company of those large creeping things which lie on their backs in the paths as soon as the light strikes them. ‘But of what use was it for you to help them over with your cane, knowing that they would become supine again?’— ‘I gave them a fair start in life,’ he said, ‘and my responsibility was at an end.’ He probably helped to place more people on their feet than otherwise; and no one has enjoyed it more than he.”

Though friendly with all, he had few or no intimates. He did not, as has been said, permit himself to indulge freely in what is called “society,” finding the draught too much upon his leisure and his strength; yet few received or conferred more pleasure in the unrestrained freedom of conversation.

“Mr. Choate’s conversational power,” says Chief Justice Chapman, “was scarcely less remarkable than his forensic power. It was by no means limited to the subject of oratory. Indeed, so far as my acquaintance with him is concerned, he never made that a prominent topic of conversation ; but I recollect one of his conversations on eloquence. He was talking of Burke's speeches, of which he was known to be a great admirer, and remarked to a friend of mine who was extolling Burke above all other men, that he thought on the whole that the most eloquent and mellifluous talk that was ever put together in the English language was the speech of Mr. Standfast in the river. I went home and read the speech soon afterwards, and I confess I appreciated John Bunyan's eloquence as I never had done before.

“ But it never occurred to me that Mr. Choate had any conversational hobby of any kind. He was interested in all current topics, — political, social, moral, or religious, — and there seemed to be nothing in literature, history, philosophy, or jurisprudence, that he did not know ; and in his private conversation I always thought he was very frank. When I called on him, whether alone or with a friend, I generally found him standing at his desk, pen in hand. The moment he left it, he turned with freshness to whatever topic came up ; generally throwing himself upon his lounge, and entering into general conversation, or the details of a new case, as if it were a recreation. He was remarkably original and brilliant in his badinage ; and I have thought he was rather fond of saying in playfulness what he would not have said seriously, and what it would be unjust towards him to repeat — though he never transcended the limits of delicacy and good taste. On a few occasions his conversation turned on religious faith and doctrines. I have never met with a layman whom I thought to be more familiar with theological science than he. I am sure he understood the points on which the debates of the present day turn, and the arguments by which controverted doctrines are supported. I think he was a thorough believer in the doctrines preached by his pastor, Rev. Dr. Adams. He was an admirer of Edwards, and on one occasion he spoke familiarly of his 'History of Redemption' and his 'Treatise on the Will.' He had at his tongue's end a refutation of Pantheism, and talked freely of its logical and moral bearings. Yet, while he seemed to be master of all the subtleties of polemic debates, he never seemed inclined to controversy; and I can readily believe that he would gracefully and skilfully turn the subject aside when in conversation with a gentleman holding theological opinions widely different from his own. . . .

"Among other things I have heard him express a high opinion of the ecclesiastical organization and theological system of the old Puritans, as having contributed largely to stamp upon New England character the best of its peculiar features."

It is undoubtedly true that among his many studies he had not neglected a somewhat critical examination of the Holy Scriptures. He was quite familiar with the arguments for the genuineness and authenticity of the various books, even to the minor Epistles of Paul; and not many clergymen probably could readily bring up such an array of learning on this subject as he had at perfect command.

Mr. Choate's handwriting was famous for obscurity. It was impossible for one not familiar with it to decipher its intricacies, and in his rapid notes, with abbreviations viations and unfinished words, for any one but himself to determine the meaning; and even he, when the subject was forgotten, sometimes was at a loss. And yet, when closely examined, it will be seen not to be a careless or stiff or angular scrawl; each letter is governed by a law and seems striving to conform to the normal type; and it has been observed, by one much accustomed to criticise penmanship, the lines have certain flowing, easy, and graceful curves, which give a kind of artistic beauty.

“Mr. Sprague (now Judge Sprague) and I,” wrote a distinguished member of the Boston bar, Hon. C. G. Loring, “were trying a case against Mr. Choate. Coming into the Court one morning we found a sheet of paper with his scrawls upon it, and I tried to read it, and as I thought made it out. I handed it to S., and after some difficulty he read it, but quite differently. Mr. C. P. Curtis coming along I handed it to him, and he read it, but unlike both of us. Choate entering, I said to him, ‘What in the world is this which we can’t make out?’ ‘Why,’ said he, ‘what’s the trouble? That’s as plain as Roman print;’ and proceeded to read it differently from us all.”

Mr. Choate was a little more than six feet in height; his frame robust, strong, and erect; his walk rapid, yet easy and graceful, and with a force, too, that seemed to bear onward not only himself but all about him; his head was covered with a profusion of black curling hair, to the last with but a slight sprinkle of gray; his eye was dark, large, and, when quiet, with an introverted, meditative look, or an expression dreamy and rapt, as of one who saw afar off what you could not see ;¹ his smile was fascinating, and his whole manner marked with peculiar and inimitable grace. "He gave you a chair," said Rev. Dr. Adams in his Funeral Address, "as no one else would do it. He persuaded you at his table to receive something from him in a way that nothing so gross as language can describe. He treated every man as though he were a gentleman ; and he treated every gentleman almost as he would a lady." His whole appearance was distinguished ; and though he always, with instinctive modesty, avoided notice, he never failed to attract it even among strangers.

With the exception of the time when he suffered from the accident to his knee, he was never seriously ill ; but during his whole life he was subject to frequent and severe headaches, which for the time quite disabled him. His nervous system was always in a state of excitement ; his brain was never at rest, — the perfervidum ingenium allowing him no quiet. Liberal of work, impatient of repose, intense in action, sparing of recreation, — the wonder is that his powers had not earlier given way, perhaps with a sudden crash, or with a longer, more wearisome, more mournful descent to the dark valley. For many years before his death, his countenance was haggard, and the lines became deeper and deeper with age. A vague rumor began to assume consistency, that he indulged in the use of opium. The conjecture was entirely false. His physicians have given me their direct testimony on this point. A Dover's powder would at any time put him to sleep. If farther proof were needed, we have it in his never-ceasing labors, in the constant command of his faculties, early and late, which failed only with his life, and in his own positive denial of the truth of the injurious report. He was temperate, and almost abstemious in eating and drinking; rarely indulging in stimulants, and never using them in excess.

¹ When aroused or interested, his eye gleamed and was very powerful. A woman, who had some reputation as a fortune-teller, once came to consult him. She had not proceeded far in her story before she suddenly broke off with the exclamation, "Take them eyes off of me, Mr. Choate, take them witch eyes off of me, or I can't go on."

During the latter years of Mr. Choate's life, his mind, never indifferent to religious subjects, was inclined more than ever to the consideration of man's nature and destiny, his moral duties, and his relations to God. He had an implicit faith in the Christian religion; and felt a confidence so sure in that form of it which he had been early taught, that he did not care to disturb his belief by rash and objectless speculation. He regarded the ancient symbols, especially as held by the Fathers of New England, with profound respect and acquiescence. He felt the need of some creed or formula of religious belief which should hold the mind firm and unwavering amidst the vagaries and fluctuations of human opinions; and a serious deviation from the old and established ways was fraught with he knew not how much error.

He retained also an instinctive regard for the old habits and practices of his father's house. Though extremely indulgent, he preferred to have his children at home and quiet on a Saturday evening, and engaged in thoughtful and serious employments. When prayers were read in the family, he was particular that all should be present. Though never making a public profession of religious faith, he often expressed satisfaction when others did so, and showed beyond mistake, in many ways, his respect and veneration for a truly religious character. His religious reading, not only of speculative and philosophical, but of practical works, was quite general, and for many of his later years, constant and habitual. Unlike many men of eminence, he was specially averse to conversing about himself. There was a sacred chamber in his soul which he opened only to a few of his most intimate friends, and hardly to them. There he must be safe from the intrusion, even of those who might have some claim to enter. In personal intercourse, up to a certain point, he seemed without reserve, as he really was; beyond it, the most astute diplomatist could not be more impenetrable or elusive. This was not the result of calculation or of will, but instinctive,—a part of his idiosyncrasy. It was surprising, and almost wonderful, with what ease and certainty he repelled an attempt to penetrate the sanctuary of his feelings, and yet with such gentleness that the intruder at first hardly perceived it, and only discovered on reflection that he had not succeeded. He seldom asked advice, or depended on the judgment of others, in determining his own course of action. If this was true with relation to social or public life, it was more emphatically true of his religious faith. His personal belief and hopes you must infer from what he was, from the affections and sentiments which he habitually expressed, from the serious tenor of his life, and from his rare and casual conversations with the few who were most in sympathy with him. To those with whom he disagreed he was always courteous and deferential, and might sometimes even appear indifferent as to theological opinions; but a discussion with such was impossible. The faith of his father and mother was his to the last, and perhaps more decidedly at the last than ever before.

He left us still in the prime and vigor of his days, at an age when many retire from the heated strifes of the summer of life to a serener autumn. But it is doubtful whether he could have been contented without labor, and whether he would not of necessity have continued at his post till mind or body gave way. He was spared longer than many whose names will always be cherished,—longer than James Otis, longer than Fisher Ames, longer than Alexander Hamilton, or William Pinkney, or Samuel Dexter, or Justice Talfourd. He died in the fulness of his fame, having won the universal respect and love of his contemporaries. He died before his patriotic fears were in any measure realized; the country which he so profoundly loved still united; no treason consummated; no crime against the fairest hopes of the world actually committed; no rash counsels carried over into desperate act; no stripe polluted or erased, no star blotted out, from the flag which to the last was his joy and pride.

APPENDIX.

SINCE the first edition of the Life of Mr. Choate was published, three members of his family, each of whom had rendered some special service in the preparation of it, have passed away. First of these was Mrs. Choate. She was the daughter of the Hon. Mills Olcott, of Hanover, N. H., for many years a prominent member of the New Hampshire Bar, a gentleman of great weight of character and influence, distinguished for intelligence, sagacity, and wisdom in counsel, and early taking a prominent part in enterprises tending to develop the resources of the State. He was remarkable also for richness of humor, for urbanity and gentle courtesy, which rendered his society extremely attractive. His acquaintance with persons of distinction, both in and out of the State, was large, and his house was the seat of constant and genial hospitality.

The native gentleness and refinement of Mrs. Choate's mind, encouraged and developed under the influences of such a home, were carried with her through life. Her uniform self-control, serenity, and repose, diffused a beautiful quietness and peace all around her, and served sometimes to conceal, except from those who knew her intimately, the quick insight and sound judgment which gave weight and balance to her mind. Added to this was a transparent sincerity and singular pureness and disinterestedness, unaffected by change of scene or circumstance, by prosperity or sorrow, which won the confidence and respect as well as the love of all who knew her. Underlying all, was her religious faith and hope, early assumed, simple and undoubting though unobtrusive, covering her with a singular grace and beauty of character, and perpetually shedding its happy influence over her household. It is surprising what security and strength such a character unconsciously imparts to all who come within its sphere. "Always firm," it was truly said of her, "always serene, she was the sheet-anchor of strength and hope to all who clung to her for happiness and courage through life." None felt the blessing of this more than her husband, whose immense nervous force, and constant and harassing labors needed the repose of such a home, and to rest, sometimes, upon the quiet and inwardly sustained strength of such a pure spirit.

She died suddenly, after a brief illness, on the 8th of December, 1864.

Rufus Choate, Jr., the only son, for whom his father had such hopes, after graduating with honor at Amherst College, studied the law and entered upon its practice in Boston. On the outbreak of the war he enlisted in the Massachusetts Second, and followed its fortunes, till a painful neuralgic affection, from which he never fully recovered, compelled him to return home. In the earlier skirmishes and battles, and in the still more trying marches and disheartening delays, he failed in no duty. He was in the fight at Cedar Mountain; and, though in the thickest of it, was one of the few who escaped unharmed. "All our officers," says a correspondent of the "New York Evening Post," in speaking of this battle, "behaved nobly. Those who ought to have stayed away wouldn't. Goodwin, Cary, Choate, and Stephen Perkins were all quite ill, but would not stay away from the fight. Choate is the only one of the four not killed. Goodwin could not keep up with the regiment; but I saw him toiling up the hill some distance behind, with the assistance of his servant. He had hardly reached the front when he was killed. It was splendid to see those sick fellows walk right up into that shower of bullets, as if it were so much rain.

“Yesterday I went over the battle-field with the General. The first man I recognized was Cary. He was lying on his back, with his head on a piece of wood. He looked calm and peaceful, as if he were merely asleep. His face was beautiful, and I could have stood and looked at it a long while. Next we found Captain Williams, then Goodwin, Abbott, and Perkins. They had probably been killed almost instantly, while Cary lived until 2 P. M. of the day after the fight. His first sergeant was shot in the leg, and lay by him all the time. He says he was very quiet, spoke little, and didn't seem to suffer. We found a dipper of water, which some rebel soldier had brought. They took every thing from him after he died, but returned a ring and locket with his wife's miniature to the sergeant.

“All these five were superior men. Every one in the regiment was their friend. It was a sad day to us when they were brought in dead, and they cannot be replaced. It is hard to believe that we shall never see them again, after having been continually together more than a year. I don't remember a single quarrel of any importance among our officers during all that time.”

Mr. Choate, who had been advanced to a Captaincy, was at last obliged by repeated attacks of suffering, which entirely disabled him, to resign his hardly won commission and leave the army. He never recovered his full strength; but after a lingering and very trying illness, died on the 15th of January, 1866.

Major Joseph M. Bell married the eldest daughter of Mr. Choate, and was for many years his partner in business. He was the son of the Hon. Joseph Bell, for a long time one of the most distinguished lawyers in New Hampshire, and for the latter part of his life a resident of Boston. Major Bell was graduated with honor at Dartmouth College, and afterwards studied his profession in Boston. Of quite a different temperament and nature from Mr. Choate, it was well said, that "his thorough mastery of the law, sure discrimination, and comprehensive grasp of mind were of the utmost value to that great man in preparing and shaping his cases before the full court," while his exact method and habits of business were of great service in keeping the complicated affairs of the office free from confusion, and moving in regular order.

Although by education and conviction a Whig, he had voted for Mr. Buchanan; but when the first sound of the guns from Fort Sumter reached the North, he felt that the constitutional doctrines of Webster must be defended at all hazards, and he at once prepared to enter the service. When General Butler went to New Orleans, Mr. Bell was selected as a member of his staff, and soon came to occupy a very prominent position. His knowledge of law, his power of adapting himself to new and unexpected emergencies, his absolute integrity, his decision of character, and independence made him invaluable as a counsellor and judicial officer; and he was almost immediately promoted to the responsible position of Provost Judge, which then included the most important judicial functions of the State.

"Before the war the administration of justice in New Orleans had cost over $100,000 a year. For the pay of a Major of Cavalry, Mr. Bell, during General Butler's stay there, administered justice, civil and military, with such ability and fairness that he left with the highest respect of the ablest lawyers of the city who had practised before him. When he first held his court, they asked him, to test his quality, under what code he proposed to practise. His answer was, 'Mainly under natural law and general orders.' Questions of all kinds, many of them novel and of large importance, especially those affecting the rights of person and property of freedmen, rebels, and aliens, he met with that vigor, directness, grasp, and comprehensiveness which characterize only first-class faculty. His mind was always most at home in discussing complicated cases in the light of prime governing principles."¹

When General Butler was transferred to Virginia, Major Bell went with him; and it was while presiding over an important trial at Norfolk, that he was struck with a partial paralysis. He was able after a while to return home, but his health was shattered. He remained an invalid till his death, Sept. 10, 1868.

Hon. David Choate, the oldest son of David and Miriam (Foster) Choate, was born in Essex, Nov. 29, 1796, and died there Dec. 17, 1872, at the age of seventy-six. In many respects he possessed the characteristics of his brother Rufus. "In his early years," to quote from a sketch by Prof. E. P. Crowell, "he began to give evidence of the same marvellous memory, and to exhibit the same playful humor, the same imagination, the same clearness and force of reasoning, and the same affluence of language, that, with larger opportunities for culture, gave his brilliant brother such eminence in a wider sphere." During his whole life, he was an admirable example of what an American citizen should be. He was a lover of sound learning; directly interested in education; for twenty-seven years the master of a school which by energy and personal effort he raised to the highest rank; a trustee of Dummer Academy for ten years; one of the founders of the Essex County Teachers' Association; an intelligent and active member of the County Agricultural Society, to the affairs of which he gave much attention; early a justice of the peace, and in 1858 appointed a trial justice, in which last capacity many important questions came before him for decision, his steadfast and constant influence for good was widely felt from early manhood till his honored old age. As a magistrate, his decisions were rarely appealed from, and still more rarely, if indeed ever, was one of his decisions reversed. At different times he was a member of both Houses of the Legislature, always commanding respect for intelligence and sound judgment. His rhetorical ability was of no mean order, and was frequently put to use in the service of the town, and also in lectures and addresses. He was an earnest and unfailing supporter of every thing conducive of the public welfare, whether in the sphere of industrial activities, or of intelligence, morality, and virtue. For almost fifty years an office-bearer in the church, for about forty years the superintendent of its Sabbath school, he was always a careful and earnest student of the truth. He was cheerful and happy in a long life of usefulness and beneficence, and died beloved and greatly respected by all who knew him. "The place of his burial is marked by a monument erected by the Sabbath school to which he had given so large a part of his life, and which sought thereby to embody in visible form and enduring material their mingled reverence and affection for his memory."

¹ From an article in the "Boston Advertiser," bearing the signature (W.) of a well-known and discriminating writer.

INDEX.

- ABBOTT, ALFRED A., Letter to, 370.
- ADAMS, FAIRCHILD v., Case of, 256.
- ADAMS, J. Q., 446.
- ADAMS, Rev. Dr. N., 360, 450.
- ALGER, Rev. W. R., 442.
- Baltimore*, Whig Convention at, 269.
- Bar of Essex*, 41; Meeting of the, 376.
- Bar of Suffolk*, Meeting of the, 377.
- BRIGHT, JESSE D., Letter to, 158.
- BRINLEY, Mrs., Letter to, 164.
- British Poets of the 19th Century*, Lecture on the, 309.
- BUCHANAN, JAMES, Letter from, 376.
- BUSH, Rev. GEORGE, Letters to, 58, 59, 63, 109.
- Cherokees*, Mission to the, 61.
- CHOATE, DAVID, Father of Rufus Choate, 2.
- CHOATE, DAVID, Brother of Rufus, his Account of Rufus's Boyhood, 5, 6.
- CHOATE, MIRIAM, Mother of Rufus, 3.
- CHOATE, RUFUS. His Birth, 1; Ancestry and Boyhood, 2; College Life, 11; Choice of a Profession, 15; Is Tutor at Dartmouth College, 24; Enters Law School at Cambridge, 29; Goes to Washington to study with Mr. Wirt, 29; Death of his Brother, Washington Choate, 32; Returns to Essex, 32; Testimony of Mr. Wirt, 32; Admission to the Bar, 33; Opens an Office in South Danvers, 33; Letter to Mr. Marsh, 34; Marriage, 35; Removal to Salem, 37; The Essex Bar, 39; Counsel in the Knapp Case, 45; His Studies, 46; Letter to President Marsh, 48; Nominated as Representative to Congress, 49; Is elected, 51; Letter to President James Marsh, 53; Enters Congress, 54; Speeches on Revolutionary Pensions and on the Tariff, 55; Letter to Dr. Andrew Nichols, 57; Letters to Professor George Bush, 58, 59; Georgia and the Missions to the Indians, 61; Letter to Professor Bush, 62; Re-elected to Congress, 64; Speech on the Removal of the Deposits, 64; Resigns his Seat, 66; Removes to Boston, 66; Lectures on the Waverley Novels and on the Romance of the Sea, 66; Death of his youngest Child, 68; His Professional Advancement, 71; Letters to Richard S. Storrs, Jr., 72, 73; Chosen Senator in place of Mr. Webster, 74; Death of General Harrison, 74; Eulogy on General Harrison, 74; Speech on the McLeod Case, 75; The Fiscal Bank Bill, 76; Collision with Mr. Clay, 76, 84; Nomination of Mr. Everett as Minister to England, 85; Letter to Mr. Sumner, 87; Letters to his Son, 88, 89; Speech on providing Remedial Justice in the United States Courts, 90; Letters to Mr. Sumner and Mr. Hillard, 93, 94;

The North-Eastern Boundary Question, 95; Journal, 97; Address in New York, 106; Letter to Professor Bush, 109; Letters to Mr. Sumner, 110, 111, 112; Letter to his Daughters, 112; Debate on the Tariff, 120; Reply to Mr. McDuffie, 124; Congress Adjourned, 130; Journal, 131; Political Contest of 1844, 141; Speaks for Mr. Clay, 141; Fragmentary Journal, 142; Meeting of Congress, 149; Speech against the Annexation of Texas, 150; Admission of Iowa and Florida, 152; Establishment of the Smithsonian Institution, 153; Library Plan, 154; Resignation of his position as Regent, 158; Letter to Hon. Jesse D. Bright, 158; Letters to Hon. Charles W. Upham, 160, 161; Illness and Death of Dr. Sewall, 163; Letter to Mrs. Francis Brinley, 164; Address before the Law School in Cambridge, 165; Case of Rhode Island Boundary, 173; Defence of Tirrell, 174; The Smith Will Case, 184; Speaks in favor of General Taylor, 189; Offer of a Professorship in the Cambridge Law School, 196; Offer of a Seat upon the Bench, 203; Lecture on the Puritans, 203; The Phillips' Will Case, 208; Fragmentary Journal, 210; Change of Partnership, 215; Voyage to Europe, 215; Letters to Mrs. Choate, 216, 217, 218, 223; Journal, 224; Union Meetings, 250; Address on Washington, 250; The Case of Fairchild v. Adams, 256; Methodist Church Case, 260; Address before the Story Association, 263; Letters to his Son, 265, 266; Webster Meeting in Faneuil Hall, 268; India Rubber Case Argued, 269; Baltimore Convention, 269; Address to the Phi-Beta Kappa Society in Burlington, Vt., 279; Journey to Quebec, 282; Death of

Mr. Webster, 283; Letter to E. Jackson, Esq., 283; Letter to Harvey Jewell, Esq., 284; Letters to Mrs. Eames, 286, 290, 291, 297, 299; Offer of the Attorney-Generalship, 286; Convention to revise the Constitution of Massachusetts, 287; Eulogy on Daniel Webster at Dartmouth College, 288; Letter to Mr. Everett, 291; Letters to his Son, 292, 294, 295; Letters to his Daughter, 289, 293, 295; Address at the Dedication of the Peabody Institute at Danvers, 296; Letter to Mr. Everett, 296; Accident and Illness, 297; Letter to Mr. Eames, 298; Letter to the Whig Convention at Worcester, 303; Speaks at Faneuil Hall, 306; Letter to Rev. Chandler Robbins, 307; Lecture on the Early British Poets of this Century, 309; Letters to Mr. Everett, 308, 343, 344; Sir Walter Scott, 311; Letter to Hon. William M. Evarts, 321; Political Campaign of 1856, 320; Determines to support Mr. Buchanan, 321; Letter to the Whigs of Maine, 321; Address at Lowell, 328; Letter to J. C. Walsh, 331; His Library, 334; Lecture on the Eloquence of Revolutionary Periods, 335; Defence of Mrs. Dalton, 335; Lecture on Jefferson, Burr, and Hamilton, 344; Oration before the Boston Democratic Club, July, 1858, 352; Letter to Hon. George T. Davis, 352; Failing Health, 358; Speech at the Webster Festival, 1859, 359; Address at the Essex Street Church, 359; His last Law Case, 366; Goes to Dorchester, 367; Decides to go to Europe, 369; Letter to Hon. Charles Eames, 370; Letter to Hon. A. A. Abbott, 370; Embarks for Europe, 370; Illness on Board, 371; Lands at Halifax, 372; Letter from Hon. George S. Hillard, 371; Sudden Death, 375; Proceedings

- of Public Bodies at Halifax, 375; Meeting of the Essex and Suffolk Bars, 376; Speeches of Hon. C. G. Loring, R. H. Dana, Jr., Judge Curtis, and Judge Sprague, 377; Meeting in Faneuil Hall, 401; Address of Mr. Everett, 401; Letter from Hon. J. H. Clifford, 413; Habits in his Office, 416; Method of Preparation of Cases, 419; Manner of Legal Study, 417; Intercourse with the Younger Members of the Bar, 426; Manner to the Jury, 427; Manner to the Court, 428; Charges and Income, 430; Vocabulary, 434; Wit and Humor, 435; Conversations and Anecdotes, 441; Eloquence, 447; Power over an Audience, 449; Exaggerations, 450; Style, 454; Letter from Rev. Joseph Tracy, 455; Memory, 457; Quotations, 459; Fondness for Books, 460; Scholarship, 462; Favorite Pursuits, 463; Conversation, 466; Home Life, 472; Fondness for Music, 478; Gentleness, 480; Conversational Power, 481; Handwriting, 483; Appearance, 484; General Health, 485; Feelings upon Religious Subjects, 486; Death, 488.
- CHOATE, RUFUS, Jr., Letters to, 88, 89, 265, 266, 292, 294, 295.
- CHOATE, SARAH B., Letters to, 289, 293, 295.
- CHOATE, WASHINGTON, Death of, 31.
- CLAY, HENRY, Mr. Choate's collision with, 76, 84.
- CLIFFORD, J. H., Letter from, 413.
- Constitution of Massachusetts*, Convention to revise the, 287.
- Convention of Whigs at Baltimore*, 269.
- Convention to Revise the Constitution of Massachusetts*, 287.
- CROWNINSHIELD, BENJAMIN W., 50.
- CURTIS, B. R., Address of, 392.
- DALTON, Mrs., Defence of, 335.
- DANA, R. H., Jr., Address of, 385.
- DAVIS, GEORGE T., Letter to, 352.
- Declaration of Independence, The*, Glittering Generalities of, 326.
- Democratic Club*, Oration before the, 352.
- EAMES, CHARLES, 298, 370.
- EAMES, Mrs., Letters to, 286, 290, 291, 297, 299.
- Eloquence of Revolutionary Periods*, 335.
- Essex Street Church*, Address at, 359.
- EVARTS, WILLIAM M., Letter to, 321.
- EVERETT, EDWARD, Nomination of, as Minister to England, 85; Letters to, 291, 296, 308, 343, 344; Address of, at Faneuil Hall, on the Death of Mr. Choate, 401.
- FAIRCHILD v. ADAMS, Case of, 256.
- Faneuil Hall*, Meeting in, 401.
- Faneuil Hall*, Speech at, 306.
- Fiscal Bank Bill*, Speech on the, 77.
- Florida*, Admission of, into the Union, 152.
- HARDIN, BENJAMIN, 65.
- HARRISON, President, Inauguration and Death of, 74; Eulogy on, 74.
- HILLARD, GEORGE S., Letter from, 370; Letter to, 94.
- HUNTINGTON, ASAHEL, Letter of, 38.
- Independence*. See Declaration.
- India Rubber Case*, 269.
- Iowa*, Admission of, into the Union, 152.
- Ipswich*, Address at, 66.
- JACKSON, E., Letter to, 283.
- JEWELL, HARVEY, Letter to, 284.
- KNAPP, J. F., Trial of, 45.
- KOSSUTH, 279.
- Law School Cambridge*, Address delivered before, 165; Offer of a Professorship in, 196.

- LORING, C. G., Address of, 377.
Lowell, Speech at, 328.
 LUNT, GEORGE, 381.
- MARSTERS, REV. J. M., 464.
 MARSH, REV. DR. JAMES, Letters to, 34, 48, 53.
 McDUFFIE, MR., Answer to, 124.
 McLEOD, ALEXANDER, Case of, 75.
- New England Society of New York*, Address before, 106.
 NICHOLS, DR. ANDREW, Letter to, 57.
North-Eastern Boundary Question, 95.
- OLCOTT MILLS, 35.
 OLIVER, STEPHEN, Letter from, 49.
Oregon Question, The, Speeches upon, 96, 114.
- Peabody Institute*, Address at the Dedication of, 296.
Pensions, Revolutionary, Speech on, 55.
 PERLEY, Chief Justice, Eulogy by, 18.
Phi Beta Kappa Society of the University of Vermont, Address before the, 279.
Phillips's Will Case, 203.
Poland, Lecture on, 66.
Puritans of New England, their Character, 203.
- Remedial Justice*, Speech on the providing further, in the Courts of the United States, 90.
Rhode Island Boundary Case, 173.
 ROBBINS, REV. CHANDLER, Letter to, 307.
- SCOTT, WALTER, His Genius, 311.
Sea, Romance of the, Lecture on, 66.
- SEWALL, DR., Death of, 163.
 SHAW, Chief Justice, Letter of, 37.
 SMITH, OLIVER, Will Case of, 184.
Smithsonian Institution, The, 153.
 SPRAGUE, Judge, Address of, 396.
 STORRS, RICHARD S., JR., Letters to, 72, 73.
Story Association, Address before the, 263.
 SUMNER, CHARLES, Letters to, 87, 93, 110, 111, 112.
- Tariffs*, Speeches upon the, 55, 120.
 TAYLOR, General, Election of, as President, 189, 196.
Texas, The Annexation of, 149.
 TICKNOR, GEORGE, 442.
 TIRRELL, ALBERT J., Defence of, 174.
 TRACY, E. C., Testimony of, 13.
 TRACY, REV. JOSEPH, Letter from, 455.
 TYLER, Vice-President, assumes Duties of the Presidency, 74.
- UPHAM, CHARLES W., Letters to, 160, 161.
- WALSH, J. C., Letter to, 331.
 WASHINGTON, Address on, 250.
Waverley Novels, Lecture on, 36, 66.
- WEBSTER, DANIEL, Appointed Secretary of State, 74; Meeting in Faneuil Hall in Honor of, 268; Death of, 283.
Whig Convention at Baltimore, 269.
Whigs of Maine, Letter to, 321.
Whigs, Convention of, at Worcester, 302.
- WHIPPLE, E. P., 444.
 WINSLOW, REV. HURBARD, 69; Letter to, 69.
 WIRT, HON. WILLIAM, Testimony of, 32.

