BXC (Rabelais) (2)

THE LIFE OF RABELAIS.

HAD Rabelais, like Cardan, Scaliger, Thuanus, and other learned men, given us the history of his life, employed, as it was, wholly in mirth, and penned by so uncommon a hand, it must needs have pleased not only more than the most diverting works of others, but even more than his own unparalleled chronicle.

But, by a cruel fatality, most of those whose works perpetuate the lives of others, neglect to eternise their own by such a method; and, instead of painting themselves and their most memorable actions, only strive to be known by the pictures of strangers which they have drawn: some of them, perhaps, flatter themselves with the examples of a small number of happy men, the picture of whose lives and persons have been consecrated to posterity by pencils equal to those with which they had redeemed others from oblivion: but, as few prove kinder to us than ourselves, those who expect to be excepted out of that rule, after their deaths, may be assured, that if, by chance, some of their able survivors bestow one short minute to give, en passant, an imperfect idea of their resemblance, ten ill hands, rudely attempting to do the same, while they faintly hit one lineament, will miscarry on the rest, and thus ignorantly or maliciously ridicule what they pretend to represent.

It is true the ancient philosophers have had their Laertius; and the heroes, their contemporaries, their Plutarch: but now that history seems almost lost in disorderly memoirs, its primitive chaos, great warriors are as unlikely to find good historians as famous authors.

Thus Rabelais, that greater Lucian of France, has been even worse used than him of Greece; for though we know the old only by his writings, yet few fabulous stories wrong his memory, while that of Rabelais is so much abused by unkind Fame, that to know him, it were perhaps better only to seek this modern Lucian, as we do the old, in the pictures which he has drawn of others, than in those which his careless or malicious painters have given us of him.

However, you have here the best account I could get of him: neither was it without much difficulty that, out of the ruins of time, in a kingdom where it is not easy to find many books and persons that can inform us of this author, I could get together what follows; principally if we consider how little is to be found in the late French editions of his works.

FRANCIS RABELAIS was born about the year 1483, at Chinon, a very ancient little town, situate near the place where the river Vienne loses itself into the Loire, in the province of Touraine, in France. His father, Thomas Rabelais, was an apothecary of that town, and possessed an estate called La Deviniere; near which place, having first sent his son Francis to be educated by the monks of the abbey of Seville, and finding that he did not improve, he removed him to the university of Angers, where he studied some time at a convent called La Baumette, but without any considerable success. There he became acquainted with Messieurs du Bellay, one of whom was afterwards cardinal: and it is said that Rabelais, having committed some misdemeanour, was there very severely used.

A famous author writes that he was bred up in a convent of Franciscan friars, in the Lower Poitou, and was received into their order. Which convent can be no other than that of Fontenay-le-Comte, in the said province, where he proved a great proficient in learning; insomuch that, of the friars, some envied him, some, through ignorance, thought him a conjuror, and, in short, all hated and misused him, because he studied Greek, the beauties of which tongue they could not relish; its novelty making them esteem it not only barbarous, but antichristian. This we partly observe by a letter which Budæus, the most learned man of his age in that tongue, wrote to a friend of Rabelais, wherein he highly praises him, particularly for his excellent knowledge of that tongue, and exclaims against the stupidity and ingratitude of those friars.

Such a misfortune befel Erasmus; as also the learned Rabanus Maurus Magnentius, Abbot of Fulda and Archbishop of Mentz: for having, while he resided with them in his abbey, composed some excellent poems in verse, they only served to expose him to the hatred of his monks, who accused him of applying himself too much to spiritual things, and too little to the increase of the temporal, to the loss, as they thought, of the monastery; so that about the year 842 he was forced to fly to Lewis, King of Germany, his protector; where his monks, who had soon found their error and their loss in the absence of so excellent an abbot, came to beg his pardon, and prayed him to resume the administration of the abbey, which, however, he resolutely declined.

Thus Rabelais, hating the ignorance and baseness of the Cordeliers, was desirous enough to leave them, being but too much prompted to it by several persons of eminent quality, who were extremely delighted with his learning and facetious conversation.

A monk relates that he was put in pace, that is between four walls, with bread and water, in the said convent, for some unlucky action; and was redeemed out of it by the learned Andrew Tiraqueau, then lieutenant-general (that is, chief judge) of the bailiwick of Fontenay-le-Comte; and, by tradition, it is said in that town, that, on a day when the country people used to resort to the convent church to address their prayers, and pay their offerings, to the image of St Francis, which stood in a place somewhat dark near the porch, Rabelais, to ridicule their superstition, privately removed the saint's image, and placed himself in its room, having first disguised himself: but at last, too much pleased with the awkward worship which was paid him, he could not forbear laughing, and made some motion; which being observed by his gaping staring worshippers, they cried out, "A miracle! my good lord St Francis moves!" Upon which an old crafty knave of a friar, who knew stone and the virtue of St Francis too well to expect this should be true, drawing near, scared our sham-saint out of his hole; and, having caused him to be seized, the rest of the fraternity, with their knotty cords on his bare back, soon made him know he was not made of stone, and wish he had been as hard as the image, or senseless as was the saint; nay turned into the very image of which he lately was the representation.

At last, by the intercession of friends, of which Geoffrey d'Estissac, Bishop of Maillezais, is said to have been one, he obtained Pope Clement VII.'s permission to leave the beggarly fellowship of St Francis for the wealthy and more easy order of St Benedict, and was entertained in that bishop's chapter, that is, the Abbey of Maillezais. But his mercurial temper prevailing after he had lived some time there, he also left it; and laying down the regular habit, to take that which is worn by secular priests, he rambled up and down awhile, till at last he fixed at Montpellier, took all his degrees as a physician in that university, and practised physic with reputation. And by his epistle before the translation of the Aphorisms of Hippocrates, and some works of Galen, which he published and dedicated to the Bishop of Maillezais, in 1532, he tells him that he publicly read physic in that university to a numerous auditory.

It is vulgarly said that Rabelais having published some physical tract, which did not sell, upon the disappointed bookseller's complaint to him, told him, that since the world did not know how to value a good book they would undoubtedly like a bad one, and that accordingly he would write something that would make him large amends; upon which he composed his Gargantua and Pantagruel, by which the bookseller got an estate. But either this is an error, or Rabelais must have been more imposed on than our Sir Walter Raleigh was by his selfish stationer; since the above-mentioned translation, which was printed by the famous Gryphius of Lyons, at first, in 1532, was reprinted many times since, particularly in 1543, of which date I have an edition of it; which was undoubtedly before Rabelais began to write his Gargantua; and none ever mentioned any other tract of physic by him; and also when he speaks of his Annotations on the Aphorisms of Hippocrates, he says that Gryphius importuned him very much to consent that they might be printed.

We do not know how he came to leave Montpellier, though probably he was sent by its university to solicit for them at court, and then was invited to stay at Paris, of which John du Bellay, his friend, afterwards cardinal, was not only bishop, but governor; at least, it is certain he attended him in his embassy to Pope Paul III., though I believe that the chief occasion of his going to Rome was to put a stop to the ecclesiastical censures fulminated against him for leaving his convent; and it is thought the Bishop of Maillezais abetted that desertion, and encouraged him in his studies at Montpellier, which perhaps made Rabelais afterwards dedicate to him, and own then that he owed all things to him.

It is likely our doctor had then a prospect of the benefices with which he soon afterwards was gratified by that cardinal; and for that reason was glad to be eased of the censures under which he lay, which made him incapable of enjoying anything. The Bishop of Montpellier himself was a Protestant, and might have kept always his bishopric, had he written as mystically as Rabelais. The Cardinal Chatillon also was not only a Protestant, but married, as well as John de Montluc, Bishop of Valence; yet, as well as many others, in those times, who were against the errors of the Church of Rome in their hearts, they had benefices in it, and favoured the Reformation, perhaps more than those who openly professed it. So Rabelais seems to me to have passed into Italy only in the quality of a penitent monk, being first obliged to submit to his abbot, and the orders of the convent which he had left many years; else, had he been then physician to Cardinal du Bellay, then ambassador to the pope, he would not have recommended himself to the alms of his superior, the Bishop of Maillezais, as he does in his letters to that prelate; to whom he writes, that the last money which he had remitted to him was almost gone; "though," says he, "I have put none of it to an ill use." Neither would he have added, that he used constantly to eat either with Cardinal du Bellay, or the Bishop of Mascon, who had succeeded him in the embassy (doubtless upon the other's promotion to the rank of cardinal), but that much money was spent in despatches, clothes, and chamber rent; which shows also, that though he, as a friend, did eat with one of those two, yet he paid for his lodging elsewhere. By these letters, which Messieurs de St Marthe, gentlemen famous for learning, have not disdained to publish with their learned and curious observations, of ten times their length, we see that Rabelais held also a private correspondence in characters with the Bishop of Maillezais, to whom they are directed, and that the bishop was far from being bigoted to Popery. We also know by them that Rabelais obtained his absolution of Pope Paul III., the 17th of January 1536, whereby he had leave given him to return to Maillezais, and to practise physic, either at Rome or elsewhere; that is, without any gain and only by charity. We also find that he had gained the esteem of Cardinal de Genutiis, accounted the ornament of the college, and Cardinal Simonetta, eminent for virtue, and other worthy prelates, besides Cardinal du Bellay, and the Bishop of Mascon, who procured him his bulls gratis, and had even offered him to make use of their king's name, had it been needful.

It is reported that Bishop du Bellay, as King Francis I.'s ambassador when he had audience of Paul III., having kissed that pope's slipper, which ceremony is by some called adoration, all the rest of his retinue did the same, if we except Rabelais, who, fixed as the pillar against which he leaned, said, that if the ambassador, who was a very great lord in France, was unworthy to kiss the pope's foot, they might even let down his holiness's breeches and wash his a—, and then he might presume to kiss something about him.

Another time, that cardinal having brought him with the rest of his retinue to the same pope, that they might beg some favour of his holiness, Rabelais, being bid to make his demand, only begged that his holiness would be pleased to excommunicate him.

So strange a request having caused much surprise, he was ordered to say why he made it. Then addressing himself to that pope, who was doubtless a great man, and had nothing of the moroseness of many others: "May it please your holiness," said he, "I am a Frenchman, of a little town called Chinon, whose inhabitants are thought somewhat too subject to be thrown into a sort of unpleasant bonfires; and, indeed, a good number of honest men, and, amongst the rest, some of my relations, have been fairly burned there already. Now, would your holiness but excommunicate me, I should be sure never to burn. My reason is, that, passing through the Tarantese, where the cold was very great, in the way to this city, with my Lord Cardinal du Bellay, having reached a little hut, where an old woman lived, we prayed her to make a fire to warm us ; but she burned all the straw of her bed to kindle a faggot, yet could not make it burn ; so that at last, after many imprecations, she cried, ‘ Without doubt, this faggot was excommunicated by the pope’s own mouth, since it will not burn.’ In short, we were obliged to go on without warming ourselves. Now, if it pleased your holiness but to excommunicate me thus, I might go safely to my country.” By this he not only, in a jesting manner, exposed the Roman clergy’s persecuting temper, but seemed to allude to the inefficacy of the former pope’s excommunications in England, and chiefly in Germany, where they only served to warn our Henry VIII., and, on the other side, the Lutherans, to secure themselves against the attempts of their enemies.

He, that would not spare the pope to his face, was doubtless not less liberal of his biting jokes to others ; inso-much that he was obliged to leave Rome without much preparation ; not thinking himself safe among the Italians, who, of all men, love and forgive raillery the least, when they are the subject of it.

So being come as far as Lyons, on his way to Paris, very indifferently accoutred, and no money to proceed, whether he had been robbed, or had spent all his stock, he, who had a peculiar love for ease and good eating, and no less zeal for good drinking, found himself in dismal circumstances. So he had recourse to a stratagem which might have been of dangerous consequence to one less known than Rabelais.

Being lodged at the Tower and Angel, a famous inn in that city, he took some of the ashes in the chimney, and having wrapped them up in several little papers, on one of them he writ “ poison to kill the king ;” in another, “ poison to kill the queen ;” in a third, “ poison to kill the Duke of Orleans ;” and having on the Change met a young merchant, told him, that being skilled in physiognomy, he plainly saw that he had a great desire to get an estate easily ; therefore, if he would come to his inn, he would put him in a way to gain a hundred thousand crowns. The greedy merchant was very ready. So, when he had treated our doctor, he came to the main point ; that is, how to get the hundred thousand crowns. Then Rabelais, after the other bottle or two, pretending a great deal of caution, at last showed him the papers of powder, and proposed to him to make use of them according to their superscriptions, which the other promised, and they appointed to meet the next day, to take measures about it; but the too credulous, though honest trader, immediately ran to a judge, who having heard the information, presently sent to secure Rabelais, the dauphin having been poisoned some time before: so the doctor with his powder was seized, and being examined by the judge, gave no answer to the accusation, save that he told the young merchant that he had never thought him fit to keep a secret, and only desired them to secure what was in the papers, and send him to the king, for he had strange things to say to him.

Accordingly he is carefully sent to Paris, and handsomely treated by the way on free cost, as are all the king's prisoners; and being come to Paris, was immediately brought before the king, who knowing him, asked him what he had done to be brought in that condition, and where he had left the Cardinal du Bellay. Upon this the judge made his report, showed the bills with the powder, and the informations which he had drawn. Rabelais, on his side, told his case, took some of all the powders before the king; which being found to be only harmless wood ashes, pleaded for Rabelais so effectually that the business ended in mirth, and the poor judge was only laughed at for his pains.

Though this story be printed before in many editions of Rabelais, somewhat otherwise than I here give it, I would not any more be answerable for its truth than for that of many others which tradition ascribes to him. When a man has once been very famous for jests and merry adventures, he is made to adopt all the jests that want a father, and many times such as are unworthy of him. For this reason I will omit many stories which some indeed relate of Rabelais, but which few can assure or believe to be true. Yet, since the witty sayings, merry triflings, and the accounts of the indifferent actions of great men have found not only their historians but their readers, from Tully's puns to the false witticisms, insipid drolling, and empty insignificant remarks, that make up the greatest part of the Scaligeriana, and some others of those unequal collections of weeds and flowers whose titles end in ana, we may with greater reason relate the jests of Rabelais, whose life as well as his writings have been thought a continual jest ; and this would not seem to be the life of Rabelais did not some comical stories make a part of it.

Neither were his jests sometimes less productive of good than the deep earnest of others. Of which the university of Montpellier furnishes us with an instance : none being admitted to the degree of doctor of physic there who has not first put on the gown and cap of Dr Rabelais, which are preserved in the castle of Morac in that city. The cause of this uncommon veneration for the memory of that learned man is said to be this :

Some scholars having occasioned an extraordinary disorder in that city, Anthony Duprat, Cardinal-archbishop of Sens, then Lord Chancellor of France, upon complaint made of it, caused the university to be deprived of part of its privileges. Upon this, none was thought fitter to be sent to Paris to solicit their restitution than our doctor, who by his wit, learning, and eloquence, as also by the friends which they had purchased him at court, seemed capable to obtain anything. When he came to Paris about it, the difficulty lay in gaining audience of the chancellor, who was so incensed that he refused to hear anything in behalf of the university of Montpellier. So Rabelais, having vainly tried to be admitted, at last put on his red gown and doctor's cap (some say a green gown and a long grey beard), and thus accoutred, came to the chancellor's palace, on St Austin's key ; but the porter and some other servants mistook him for a madman : so Rabelais having, in a peremptory tone, been asked there who he was, let his impertinent querist know that he was the gentleman who usually had the honour to flay bull-calves ; and that, if he had a mind to be first flayed, he had best make haste and strip immediately. Then being asked some other questions, he answered in Latin, which the other understanding not, one of the chancellor's officers that could speak that tongue was brought, who addressing himself to our doctor in Latin, was answered by him in Greek, which the other understanding as little as the first did Latin, a third was fetched who could speak Greek ; but he no sooner spoke in that language to Rabelais, but was answered by him in Hebrew ; and one who understood Hebrew being with much difficulty procured, Rabelais spoke to him in Syriac: thus having exhausted all the learning of the family, the chancellor, who was told that there was a merry fool at his gate who had outdone every one, not only in languages, but in smartness of repartees, ordered him to be brought in. It was a little before dinner. Then Rabelais, shifting the farcical scene into one more serious, addressed himself to the chancellor with much respect, and having first made his excuse for his forced buffoonery, in a most eloquent and learned speech so effectually pleaded the cause of his university, that the chancellor at once, ravished and persuaded, not only promised the restitution of the abolished privileges, but made the doctor sit down at table with him, as a particular mark of his esteem.

Much about that time, hearing with what facility, for the sake of a small sum of money, the faculty of Orange (some say Orleans) admitted ignorant pretenders as doctors of physic, not only without examining, but even without seeing them, Rabelais sent the usual fees, and had one received doctor there unseen, by the name of Doctor Johannes Caballus, and let the wise professors and the world know afterwards what a worthy member they had admitted into their body, since that very doctor was his horse Jack; or, as some say, his mule: for if there are various lections, there may well be also various traditions of the same passage.

Though I know that it as little becomes a correct historian to launch into large digressions, as to advance things without good authorities, I cannot forbear mentioning something very particular concerning that very numerical doctor, I mean Johannes Caballus: and that I may not be thought to relate stories without authorities, I will make bold to quote that of a book written stylo maxime Rabelæano, viz., "Le moyen de parvenir;" I remember to have read the story in a less apocryphal author, but time hath blotted his name out of my memory.

Rabelais being at Paris, and more careful of himself than of his mule, had trusted it to the care of the printer's men, desiring them at least not to let it want water. But he having perhaps forgot to make them drink, they also easily, though uncharitably, forgot the poor brute. At three days' end the creature having drunk as little water as its master, a young unlucky boy took a fancy to get on its back, even like the miller's daughter, without a saddle; another truant scholar begged to get behind him, so did a third, and eke a fourth. Thus these four being mounted like Aymond's four sons a horseback on a mule, without bridle or halter, the real and living emblem of folly, the grave animal walked leisurely down St James's Street, till it came near a church, towards which it moved, drawn by the magnetic virtue of the water, which it smelt at a considerable distance, in the holy water-pot, which is always near the porch. And in vain our four riders kicked and called; in spite of them the headstrong thirsty beast made up to the holy element; and though the church was almost full of people, it being Sunday and sermon-time, notwithstanding all opposition, the bold monster dipped its saucy snout in the sanctified cistern. The people that were near it were not a little amazed at the impudence of that sacrilegious animal, deservedly cursed with sterility, though it were but for this one crime; many took him for a spectrum that bore some souls, formerly heretical, but now penitent, that came to seek the sweet refrigeratory of the saints, out of the more than hellish flames of purgatory. So the unconcerned mule took a swinging draught of holy liquor, yet did not like it so well, there being always salt in it, as to take a second dose; but having somewhat allayed its raging thirst, modestly withdrew, with her two brace of youngsters. However, the thing did not end thus; for the brute was seized, and Rabelais, being thought none of the greatest admirers of the Romish fopperies, was shrewdly suspected of having laid the design of that scandalous adventure. Nor was the rude four-legged Johannes Caballus released out of the pound till its master had dearly paid for its drink.

As he ridiculed the superstition of priests, he also was extremely free in his reflections on the monks, and truly he knew them too well to love and esteem them; he is said not to have been able to refrain his satirical temper even while he was reading public service; and instead of Qui mœchantur cum illâ, as the vulgate has it, to have said aloud Qui monachantur cum illâ.

It is also said, that as he was kneeling once at church, before the statue of King Charles VIII., a monk came and said to him, that doubtless he mistook that king's statue for that of some saint ; but Rabelais immediately replied, " I am not so much a monk (blockhead, I mean) as thou thinkest me ; nor yet so blind as not to know that I kneel before the representation of King Charles VIII., for whose soul I was praying, because he brought the pox out of Naples into this kingdom, by which means I and other physicians have been considerable gainers."

Several physicians being once assembled to consult about an hypochondriac humour which confined Cardinal du Bellay to his bed, they at last resolved that an aperitive (opening) decoction should be prepared, to be frequently taken with some syrup by the patient. Now Rabelais, who was his physician, perhaps not being of their opinion, while the rest of our learned doctors were still discoursing in their scientific jargon, to deserve the large fee, caused a fire to be made in the yard, and on it to be set a kettle full of water into which he had put as many keys as he could get ; and while he was very busy in stirring them about with a stick, the doctors coming down, saw him, and asked what he was doing. " Following your directions," replied he. " How, in the name of Galen ?" cried one of them. " You are for something that may be very aperitive," returned Rabelais, " and by Hippocrates, I think you will own that nothing can be more aperitive than keys, unless you would have me send to the arsenal for some pieces of cannon." This odd fancy, being immediately related to the sick cardinal, set him into such a fit of laughing, that it helped more to cure him than the prescription ; and what made the jest the more pertinent was, that keys are made of iron and steel, which with water are the chief ingredients in chalybeate medicines.

Hearing that the grave John Calvin, somewhat prejudiced against him for his biting jokes, had played on his name by the way of anagram ; saying "Rabelæsius, Rabie læsus," Anglicé " mad man ;" he, with an admirable presence of mind, immediately returned the compliment in the same kind, saying, "Calvin Jan Cul," Anglicé " Jack Arse," adding that there was anagram for anagram, and that a studied trifle only deserved to be paid back with one worse extempore.

Thus while, like Democritus, he made himself merry with the impertinences of mankind, nothing was able to allay his mirth, unless it were the thought of a reckoning, at the time that he paid it ; then, indeed, he was thought somewhat serious, though probably it was partly that those who were to receive it might not impose on him and the company, and because he generally found his purse not over full. However, the time of paying a shot in a tavern among good fellows, or Pantagruelists, is still called, in France, le quart d'heure de Rabelais ; that is, Rabelais's quarter of an hour (when a man is uneasy or melancholy).

Yet his enemies, the monks, and some others, tell us, that he seemed much less concerned when he paid the grand shot of life, than when he discharged a small tavern reckoning ; for they say that he faced death with an unconcerned and careless countenance ; and, in short, that he died just as he had lived. They relate the thing thus :

Rabelais being very sick, Cardinal du Bellay sent his page to him, to have an account of his condition ; his answer was, "Tell my lord in what circumstances thou findest me ; I am just going to leap into the dark. He is up in the cock-loft, bid him keep where he is. As for thee, thou'lt always be a fool : let down the curtain, the farce is done." A little before this he called for his domino (so some in France call a sort of hood which certain ecclesiastics wear), saying, put me on my domino, for I am cold : besides, I will die in it, for Beati qui in Domino moriuntur. An author, who styles Rabelais a man of excellent learning, writs, that he being importuned by some to sign a will, whereby they had made him bestow on them legacies that exceeded his ability, he, to be no more disturbed, complied at last with their desires ; but when they came to ask him where they should find a fund answerable to what he gave ; "As for that," replied he, "you must do like the spaniel, look about and search ;" then, adds that author, having said, "Draw the curtain, the farce is over," he died. Likewise a monk not only tells us that he ended his life with that jest, but that he left a paper sealed up, wherein were found three articles as his last will, "I owe much ; I have nothing ; I give the rest to the poor."

The last story, or that before it, must undoubtedly be false ; and perhaps both are so, as well as the message by the page : though Friegius relates also, that Rabelais said, when he was dying, "Draw the curtain," etc. But if he said so, many great men have said much the same. Thus Augustus, near his death, asked his friends whether he had not very well acted the farce of life? And Demonax, one of the best philosophers, when he saw that he could not, by reason of his great age, live any longer without being a burthen to others as well as to himself, said to those that were near him what the herald used to say when the public games were ended,—“You may withdraw, the show is over,” and refusing to eat, kept his usual gaiety to the last, and set himself at ease.

I waive many other stories concerning Rabelais, which seem as inconsistent and fabulous as the legends of Symeon the Metaphrast, St Xavier's miracles, or the traditions of the monks, our witty satirist's irreconcilable enemies. We ought not easily to believe that he, who even in the most licentious places of his merry compositions, is thought by the judicious to have generally a design to expose villainy, and in the places that are graver, as also in his letters, displays all the moderation and judgment of a good man; we ought not, I say, to believe that such a man, in his seventieth year, could have abandoned himself to those excesses; being curate of a large parish near Paris, prebendary of St Maur des fosses, in that city, and honoured and loved by many persons equally eminent for virtue, learning, and quality.

It was by a person, who, with those three advantages, was also a great statesman, and a very good Latin poet; I mean John, Cardinal du Bellay, Bishop of Paris, who knew Rabelais from his youth, that he was taken from the profession of physic, to be employed by that prelate in his most secret negotiations; it was he that knew him best, yet he thought him not unworthy of being one of the prebendaries of a famous chapter in a metropolis, and curate of Meudon in his diocese.

It was, some say, in that pleasant retreat that he composed his Gargantua and Pantagruel; though more probably it was at that house called Deviniere, already mentioned, and that the neighbouring abbey of Seville, whose monks lived not then according to the austerity of their rule, is partly the subject of it, which causes him, they say, to make so often mention of the monks, the staff of the cross, and the vineyard of Seville; as also of Basché, Lérné, Panzoust, etc., which are places near that abbey.

The freedom which Rabelais has used in this work could not but raise it many enemies: which caused him to give an account in his dedicatory epistle of the fourth book, to Odet, Cardinal of Chatillon, his friend, of the motive that induced him to write the three former books. There he tells him, that though his lordship knew how much he was daily importuned to continue it by several great persons, who alleged that many who languished through grief or sickness reading it, had received extraordinary ease and comfort; yet the calumnies of a sort of uncharitable men, who said it was full of heresies, though they could not show any there, without perverting the sense, had so far conquered his patience, that he had resolved to write no more on that subject. But that his lordship having told him that King Francis had found the reports of his enemies to be unjust, as well as King Henry II., then reigning; who, therefore, had granted to that cardinal his privilege and particular protection for the author of those mythologies: now, without any fear, under so glorious and powerful a patronage, he securely presumed to write on.

And indeed it is observable that in the book to which that epistle is prefixed, he has more freely than in the rest exposed the monks, priests, pope, decretals, Council of Trent, then sitting, etc.

That epistle is dated the 28th of January 1552, and some write that he died in 1553. By the following epigram, printed before his last book, Rabelais seems to have been dead before it was published:

“Rabelais est il mort? Voici encore un livre!
Non, sa meilleure part a repris ses esprits,
Pour nous faire present de l'un de ses ecrits
Qui le rend entre nous immortel et fait vivre.”

Nature quite.

The signature seems to be an anagram of Jean Turquet, father of the historian Louis Mayerin Turquet.

This satirical work employed our Rabelais only at his spare hours; for he tells us that he spent no time in composing it, but that which he usually allowed himself for eating; yet it has deserved the commendations of the best of serious writers; and particularly of the great Thuanus, whose approbation alone is a panegyric. And if we have not many other serious tracts by its author, the private

THE LIFE OF GARGANTUA AND OF PANTAGRUEL.

THE AUTHOR'S PROLOGUE TO THE FIRST BOOK.

TO THE READERS.

Good friends, my readers, who peruse this book,
Be not offended, whilst on it you look :
Denude yourselves of all deprav'd affection,
For it contains no badness nor infection :
'Tis true that it brings forth to you no birth
Of any value, but in point of mirth ;
Thinking therefore how sorrow might your mind
Consume, I could no apter subject find ;
One inch of joy surmounts of grief a span ;
Because to laugh is proper to the man.

Most noble and illustrious drinkers, and you, ye most precious pockified blades (for to you, and no others, are my works dedicated), Alcibiades, in that dialogue of Plato's entitled "The Banquet," in praising his preceptor, Socrates (beyond question the prince of philosophers), amongst other things, said he resembled the Seleni.* Seleni were formerly small boxes, such as we now see exposed in apothecary shops, which were painted on the top with toyish and comic figures—harpies, satyrs, bridled geese, horned hares, saddled ducks, flying goats, thiller harts, and other counterfeited pictures ad libitum, in order to excite every one to laughter; which Silenus, the master of good Bacchus, was himself accustomed to indulge in; but within these boxes there were preserved fine drugs, such as balm, ambergris, amanon, musk, civet, precious stones, and other costly articles. Just such an object was Socrates said to be, because, in looking at him exteriorly, and estimating him by his physiognomy, you would not have given the peel of an onion for him, his body was so misshapen, and his bearing was so ridiculous. A nose sharp pointed, he glared like a bull, and had the facial expression of a fool; simple in his demeanour, rustic in his dress, poor in this world's goods, unfortunate in his wives, and inept in all offices as touching the republic; always laughing, always drinking as much as was good for one, always gabbling, and always concealing his divine knowledge. But on opening this box there was to be found within a heavenly and an inestimable drug, a superhuman understanding, marvellous virtues, invincible courage, inimitable sobriety, absolute contentment, perfect assurance, and an incredible contempt for everything for which human beings watch, run, travel, sail, and fight.

To what end, think ye, does this preamble and little flourish of trumpets tend? For such of you, my good disciples, and some other fools of leisure, in reading the quaint titles of any works of our invention, such as Gargantua, Pantagruel, Arsepots, The Dignity of Codpieces, of Peas and Bacon, with commentary, are too apt to conclude that the inside contains nothing but jest, mockeries, suggestive discourse, and wanton falsehoods. Regarding only the exterior mark (that is, the title), and without investigating further, you commonly receive it with sneers and derision. But by such levity you demonstrate your unfitness for judging the works of men. Still, you aver at the same time that it is not the habit which makes the monk, and there are those arrayed in the monachal habit who inwardly are nothing less than the monk. In like manner, there are those who wear the Spanish cloak who have by no means the courage characteristic of the Spaniard. This is why you must open the book and carefully consider that which is therein discussed. It is then you discover that the drug contained within is of much greater worth than the box indicated; in other words, that the matters treated therein are not so frivolous as the title on the outside would imply.

Or, put the case in the literal sense, that you find subjects pleasing enough and corresponding perfectly with the title, yet you must oftentimes stop there, as if at the voice of the sirens. Or, in a higher sense, you interpret by accident that which you intended in the gaiety of your heart to avouch. Have you ever picked a lock for a bottle of wine? Dog that you are! do you remember the face you put on? But did you ever encounter a dog with a marrow bone? He is, according to Plato, lib. 2, de Rep., the beast of all others the most philosophic. If you have seen him, you may have casually remarked with what devotion he watches it, with what care he guards it, with what fervour he holds it, with what prudence he gobbles it, with what affection he breaks it, and with what diligence he sucks it. What induces him to do this? What is the hope of his anxiety? What indeed does he expect? Nothing more than a little marrow. True it is that this little is more delicious than a great quantity of other things, inasmuch as the marrow is aliment brought to perfection by nature, vide Galen 3, facult. nat. and 11 de usu partium.

Taking a pattern from this dog, it becomes you, to be wise, to smell, to feel, and to esteem these beautiful books of high conceptions, easy to pursue, but difficult to face; then, by careful reading and frequent meditation, to break the bone and to suck the substantial marrow. That is what I mean by these Pythagorean symbols, with the certain hope that you may be prudent and valiant in the reading of them; for in so doing you will find another taste and doctrine more abstruse, which will discover to you the most exalted sacraments and horrific mysteries, not only that which concerns our religion, but also in the political state and the economy of life.

Do you, upon your conscience, believe that Homer, in writing the "Iliad" and the "Odyssey," ever thought of the allegories which were squeezed out of him by Plutarch, Heraclides Ponticus, Eustathius, and Cornutus, and which from them Politian in turn filched? If you believe it, do not, with either feet or hands, touch my opinion, which holds the latter to have been as little dreamed of by Homer as Ovid, in his "Metamorphoses," dreamt of the Gospel Sacraments; which a wolf-gut friar and true bacon-picker would have undertaken to demonstrate, if by chance he had encountered people as foolish as himself, and (as the proverb says) "a lid worthy of such a kettle."

If you do believe it, what is the reason you do not the same to these new and merry chronicles of mine? Although in dictating them I thought no more of you, who peradventure may have been drinking like myself. For in the composition of this lordly book I neither lost nor employed any more nor another time than that which was appointed in which to take bodily nourishment, namely, in eating and drinking. Moreover, this is the fittest hour for writing upon these exalted matters and profound sciences.

This latter was indeed well known to Homer, the paragon of all philologists, and to Ennius, the father of Latin poets, as Horace designates him, although a certain jobbernob alleged that his verses smelled more of the wine than of the oil.

Thus much has a startup said of my books ; but a dump for him. The odour of the wine, oh, how much more tasty, laughing, and agreeable ! how much more celestial and delicious than oil ! And taking as much glory when it is said of me that I have expended more on wine than oil, as did Demosthenes when it was said of him that he expended more on oil than he did on wine, to me it is but an honour and a glory to be called and reputed a "bon gaultier" and a boon companion : under that name I am welcomed in all choice gatherings of the Pantagruelists. A surly snob made it a reproach to Demosthenes that his Orations smelt like the rind of a turd and of a putrid oil can.

Nevertheless let all my actions and sayings be interpreted in the most literal sense : let the cheese-like brain which feeds you with these choice idle stories be held in reverence, and do your utmost to render me always merry.

Now, my lads, be jolly, and gaily read the whole, to ease your hearts and to supple your reins. But listen, you dolts, let the ulcer run ; drink to me for a similar favour ; I pledge you, all at once.

CHAPTER I.

Of the Genealogy and Antiquity of Gargantua.

I MUST refer you to the great Chronicle of Pantagruel to discover whence has come to us the genealogy and antiquity of Gargantua. Therein you may understand more at large how the giants were born into the world, and how from them in a direct line issued Gargantua, the father of Pantagruel ; and do not be offended if, for the present, I delay doing it. Nevertheless the subject is one that the more it is borne in mind the more it will please your lordships ; but you have the authority of Plato in Philebo, and Gorgius, and of Flaccus, who says that there are some things (such as these undoubtedly are) which become more delectable in proportion to the frequency they are repeated.

Would to God every person, since the ark of Noah until this age, was as certain of his genealogy. I believe that many are to-day emperors, kings, dukes, princes, and popes on the earth who are descended from porters of old rubbish, and from wood-splitters. So, contrariwise, many are in poorhouses, mendicants, outcasts, and wretches, who are descended of the blood and lineage of great kings and emperors : the result of grand revolutions of kingdoms and empires—from the Assyrians to the Medes, from the Medes to the Persians, from the Persians to the Macedonians, from the Macedonians to the Romans, from the Romans to the Greeks, from the Greeks to the French.

And to give you to understand something of myself who speak, I believe that I am descended from some rich king or prince of former times. For never was there man who has had a greater desire to be a king, and to be rich, than I have ; so as to make good cheer, do nothing, care for nothing, and to enrich my friends, and all honest and enlightened men. But in this I comfort myself that I shall be happy in the other world ; yea, and greater than at this moment I dare wish for. As for you, comfort yourself in distress with similar or better thoughts, and drink freely when you can.

To return to our moutons. I maintain that, by the sovereign gift of heaven, the genealogy and the antiquity of Gargantua have been preserved to us more complete than any other, except it be that of the Messiah, of whom I do not speak, for this does not belong to me, for the devils (which are the calumniators and capharts) would oppose me. This record was found by John Andrew in a meadow which he had near the arch Gualeau, under the shade of the olive-trees, on your way to Narsay. The same when having a ditch dug, the labourers struck with their mattocks a great tomb of brass, of immeasurable length ; so long was it, that they never discovered the end thereof, because that it narrowed too far into the sluices of Vienne. On opening this tomb at a certain spot, which was sealed on the top with the rim of a goblet, there was exhibited a circular writing in Etrurian characters, hic bibitur, they found nine flagons, arranged in the order that skittles were wont to be placed in Gascony. The one which stood in the middle covered a big, fat, great, grey, pretty, small, musty pamphlet which smelled stronger, but not sweeter, than roses.

In this pamphlet, the said genealogy was found written out at length, in a chancery hand, but the material was neither paper, nor parchment, nor wax, but elm bark, yet so obliterated by the finger of time that three letters together were scarcely to be discerned.

I, though unworthy, was sent for thence, and, with the assistance of spectacles, which are used in the art of deciphering dim characters, as taught by Aristotle, translated it, as you may see in Pantagruelising, that is to say, in drinking heartily, and in reading the horrific acts of Pantagruel. At the end of the pamphlet was a short treatise entitled "The Fanfreluches Antidotes." The rats and moths, or (that I may not lie) other malignant beasts, had nibbled away the commencement; the remainder I herewith subjoin, in token of the reverence I bear for antiquity.

CHAPTER II.

The Antidoted Fanfreluches : or, a Galimatia of extravagant conceits found in an ancient Monument.

No sooner did the Cymbrians' overcomer
 Pass through the air to shun the dew of summer,
 But at his coming straight great tubs were fill'd,
 With pure fresh butter down in showers distill'd :
 Wherewith when water'd was his grandam heigh,
 Aloud he cried, fish it, sir, I pray ;
 Because his beard is almost all bewray'd ;
 Or, that he would hold to'm a scale he pray'd.

To lick his slipper, some told was much better,
 Than to gain pardons, and the merit greater.
 In th'interim a crafty chuff approaches,
 From the depth issued, where they fish for roaches ;
 Who said, Good sirs, some of them let us save,
 The eel is here, and in this hollow cave
 You'll find, if that our looks on it demur,
 A great waste in the bottom of his fur.

To read this chapter when he did begin,
 Nothing but a calf's horns were found therein ;
 I feel, quoth he, the mitre which doth hold
 My head so chill, it makes my brain take cold.
 Being with the perfume of a turnip warm'd,
 To stay by chimney hearths himself he arm'd,
 Provided that a new thill-horse they made
 Of every person of a hair-brain'd head.

They talked of the bunghole of Saint Knowles,
 Of Gilbathar and thousand other holes,
 If they might be reduc'd t' a scarry stuff,
 Such as might not be subject to the cough :
 Since ev'ry man unseemly did it find,
 To see them gaping thus at ev'ry wind :
 For, if perhaps they handsomely were clos'd,
 For pledges they to men might be expos'd.

In this arrest by Hercules the raven
Was flayed at her [his] return from Lybia haven.
Why am not I, said Minos, there invited ?
Unless it be myself, not one's omitted :
And then it is their mind, I do no more
Of frogs and oysters send them any store :
In case they spare my life and prove but civil,
I give their sale of distaffs to the devil.

To quell him comes Q. B. who limping frets
At the safe pass of trixy crackarets ;
The boulter, the grand Cyclops' cousin, those Did massacre, whilst each one wip'd his nose :
Few ingles in this fallow ground are bred,
But on a tanner's mill are winnowed.
Run thither all of you, th' alarms sound clear,
You shall have more than you had the last year.

Short while thereafter was the bird of Jove
Resolv'd to speak, though dismal it should prove ,
Yet was afraid, when he saw them in ire,
They should o'erthrow quite flat, down dead, th' empire.
He rather chus'd the fire from heaven to steal,
To boats where were red-herrings put to sale ;
Than to be calm 'gainst those who strive to brave us,
And to the Massorets fond words enslave us.

All this at last concluded gallantly,
In spite of Até and her hern-like thigh,
Who, sitting, saw Penthesilea ta'en,
In her old age, for a cresse-selling quean.
Each one cried out, thou filthy collier toad,
Doth it become thee to be found abroad ?
Thou hast the Roman standard filch'd away,
Which they in rags of parchment did display.

Juno was born, who under the rainbow,
Was a bird-catching with her duck below !
When her with such a grievous trick they plyed,
That she had almost been bethwacked by it.
The bargain was, that, of that throat-full, she Should of Proserpina have two eggs free ;
And if that she thereafter should be found,
She to a hawthorn hill should be fast bound.

Seven months thereafter lacking twenty-two,
He, that of old did Carthage town undo,
Did bravely midst them all himself advance,
Requiring of them his inheritance ;

Although they justly made up the division,
 According to the shoe-welt-laws decision,
 By distributing store of brews and beef
 To these poor fellows that did pen the brief.

CHAPTER III.

GRANGOUSIER was a clever joker in his time, as fond of drinking neat as any man that then lived, and enjoyed eating salt meat. To this end, he ordinarily kept a good supply of Mayence and Bayonne hams, with store of smoked beef tongues, abundance of chitterlings in the season, and salted beef and mustard. He was stocked with botargos (the roe of fish preserved in oil) provisioned with sausages, but not Bolognia onès (for he was afraid of the Lombard Baccone-poisoned sausages), but of Bigorre, Lougaulnay, Brene, and Bouargue. In his virile years he married Gargamelle, the daughter of the king of Parpaillos, a beautiful wench with a good bust. And these two performed often the "beast with two backs," and joyously rubbed their bacons together. She at length conceived a fair son whom she carried until the eleventh month.

For so long, and even longer, may women carry in their belly, especially when it contains some masterpiece, and a being who is destined to show great prowess in his time. Like, as Homer says, the infant (Cycnus) which Neptune begat by the Nymph, was born the year after conception, that is to say, after twelve months: for (according to Aulus Gellius, lib. 3) this duration of time was essential to the majesty of Neptune, in order that the child might attain perfection of form. For a similar reason Jupiter made the night which he slept with Alemena last for forty-eight hours. In less time he could hardly have forged Hercules, who cleared the world of monsters and of tyrants.

The ancient Pantagruelists have confirmed what I now say, and declared it is not only possible, but also held as legitimate the infant born of a woman the eleventh month after the death of her husband. Hippocrates, lib. de alimento; Plinius, lib. 7, cap. 5; Plautus in his "Cistellaria," Marcus Varro in his "Satyre," ascribed the Testament, alleging to this purpose the authority of Aristotle. Censorinus, lib. de die natali; Aristotle, lib. 7, cap. 3 and 4 of natura animatum; Gellius, lib. 3, cap. 16; Servius in his exposition upon this verse of Vigil's "Eclogues," Matri longa decem, etc., and a thousand other fools, whose numbers have been increased by the lawyers ff. de suis, and legit. I. intestato paragrapho. fin., and in Auth. de restitut. et ea quæ parit in xi. mense. In addition, they have besmeared it with their Robidilardick law. Gallus, ff. de lib. et posthum. et l. septimo ff. de stat. homin., and some other laws that I dare not for the present name.

By means of these laws, respectable women who are widows may play freely at the close buttock game with all their might whenever they please, for the two months after the decease of their husbands. I beg you, therefore, you jolly chums of mine, that if you find any of these women who will repay me for the trouble of undoing my codpiece point, mount her, and bring her to me. For if in the third month they become pregnant, the progeny will be the heirs of the dead husbands. And when you discover that she is pregnant, come weal, come woe, thrust boldly out, inasmuch as the paunch is full.

In like manner, Julia, the daughter of Octavian, never abandoned herself to her tambourine players until she had become pregnant, just as a ship does not receive her pilot until she has been ballasted and laden.

And if any person should blame them for their rata-conniculation as well as for their lechery, on the ground that beasts do not suffer the males to approach them when they are with young, they will answer that the latter are beasts, but that they are women who understand perfectly the beautiful and delicious niceties pertaining to superfetation; as Populia formerly answered, according to the account of Macrobius, lib. 2, Saturnal. "If the devil would not have them get with child, he must put a strong hoop on the spigot, and stop up the bung-hole."

CHAPTER IV.

How Gargamelle, being great with Child, did eat a huge deal of Tripes.

THIS is the occasion and the manner in which Gargamelle brought forth her child. And if you do not believe it, may your bum-gut fall out! Her burden escaped her on the afternoon of the third day of February, in consequence of her having eaten too much godebellios. Godebellios are the fat tripes of Coiros. Coiros are oxen fattened at the stall and guimo meadows. Guimo meadows are meadows which are mowed twice a year. Of these fat beeves they had killed 360,714 to be salted at Shrove-tide, so that at the beginning of spring they might have piles of seasoned beef wherewith to flavour their mouths on commencing their meals, and the better to enjoy their wine.

As you have heard, tripes were abundant, and so delicious were they that every one licked one's fingers. But, as the devil would have it, in spite of everything, they could not for long preserve their relish: for they might have stunk, and that would have been indecorous. It was hence concluded to swallow them, rump and stump. In order to this, they invited all the citizens of Lainais, Suillé, Roche Clermaud, Vaugaudry, without omitting the Coudray Monpensier, the Gué de Véde, and others their neighbours, all good drinkers, jolly fellows, and fine players at ninepins. The good man Grangousier delighted in the idea, and commanded that the bason of each should be kept filled. At times, however, he told his wife, in view of her time being near, to eat sparingly, because these tripes were not commendable food. "They," said he to her, "have such a liking for ordure that they would even eat the bag." Notwithstanding these remonstrances, she eat sixteen quarters, two bushels, three pecks, and a pipkin full. Oh the fair fecality with which she stuffed herself.

After dinner they all went pell-mell to the willow grove, and there upon the green grass they danced to the sound of the joyous flagelotte and sweet bagpipes so merrily that it was a heavenly sight to witness their delight.

CHAPTER V.

The Drinking Bout.

THEY then discussed the victuals in due form. Next flagons began to go, hams to trot, goblets to fly, glasses to tingle. Draw, reach, fill, drink up, mix. Drink to me without water, just as I do; whip off this glass gallantly; reach hither my claret, a weeping glass. A truce to thirst. Ha! false fever, will thou not be gone? Upon my faith, godmother, I cannot enter the burette. You have caught a cold, my friend! Aye, aye! by the paunch of Saint Quenet, let us take of drink. I never drink except at my stated hours, like the pope's mule. I only drink in my breviary,* like a good father guardian. Which was first, thirst or drink? Thirst; for who in years of innocence would drink without being athirst? Drink; for privatio presuppœnit habitum. I am learned: Facundi calices quem non facere desertum. We poor innocents only drink too much without being thirsty. No, I am a sinner without thirst, and never drink except for the present and the future. I never deign to drink. I drink for the thirst to come. I drink eternally. This is to me an eternity of thirst, and a drinking for eternity. Let us sing, let us drink; a motette; let us tune up. Where is my funnel? What! I drink only as if by attorney. Do you wet yourselves to dry, or dry yourselves to wet? I do not understand the theoretic. As to practice, it assists me somewhat. Phew! I wet, I humect, I drink, and all in fear of dying. Drink always, and you shall never die. If I do not drink, I am dry, and I perceive death. My soul takes flight to some frog marsh. In a dry place the soul never dwells. Butlers, O creators of new forms, make of me a non-drinker a drinker. Eternity of sprinkling, bedew me through my parched bowels. He drinks nothingness who does not feel the pleasure of it. This enters into my veins—the urinal vessels shall have none of it. I should like to wash the tripes of the calf which I apparelled this morning. I have pretty well ballasted my stomach. If the paper of my bills could drink as well as I do, my creditors would not want for wine when they come to present their claims. This hand of yours spoils your nose. Oh, how many others shall enter here before this goes out. To drink with so little gusto will rupture your bowels. This is called flagonal dissimulation. What is the difference between a bottle and a flagon? It is great, for the bottle is estopped with a stopper, and a flagon with a vice. Beautiful! Our fathers liked to drink, and emptied their pots. This is well cocked, well sung, let us drink. Will you send nothing to the river? here is somebody going to wash the tripes. I drink no more than a sponge. I drink like a templar; and I tanquam sponsus; and my sicut terra sine aqua. A synonym for bacon. It is the compulsory of drinkers; it is the frame in which they are set. By the pulley wine is let down into cellars, by bacon into the stomach. Now, boys, some drink, some drink! There is no charge. Respice personam, pone pro duo: bus non est in usu. If I could mount as well as I can swallow down, I should already have been high in the air.

Thus became Tom-Toss-pot rich,
 Thus went in the tailor's stitch,
 Thus did Bacchus conquer Inde,
 Thus philosophy Melinde.

A little rain allays a great storm of wind; long tipping breaks the thunder. But if my member emitted such urine, would you not gladly suck the udder? But to return. Page, fill up: let no one steal my turn. Sup, Guillot, there is still something in the pot. I protest against calling it thirst, this is an abuse. Page, sue out my appeal in form. This is de rigueur

Hitherto I wished to drink out all, now I leave nothing. Let us not be in too great a hurry, let us carry all before us.

Here are a few tripes, excellent godebellios of the fallow ox, with the black streak.

For God's sake let us lash them soundly, yet thriftily. Drink, or I will— No, no, drink I beg of you. Sparrows will not eat unless you bob their tails. I do not drink except when some one flatters me. The concavities of my body are like another hell in point of capacity.

Lagona edatera (boon companion), there is not a concavity in my whole body which this wine does not ferret out my thirst. Oh, this will bang it soundly ! this will banish it wholly ! Let us blow our horns to the sound of flagons and bottles, so that he who may have lost his thirst may not come hither to seek for it. Long clysters of drinking are to be voided without doors. The great God made the planets ; and we make the platters neat. I have the word of God in my mouth : Sitio. The stone called asbestos is not more unquenchable than the thirst of my paternity. Appetite comes by eating, said Ageston ; but thirst disappears by drinking. What is the remedy against thirst ? It is the contrary of which is used for the bite of a mad dog. If you always run after the dog, it will never bite you. Drink always before you are thirsty, and you shall never become so. There I have you. I awake you. Eternal butler, succour us all ! Argus had a hundred eyes for his sight. A butler, like Briareus, would require a hundred hands to pour out indefatigably. Hey ! let us moisten ! we can dry afterwards. Some white wine ! Pour out all, pour out, in the name of Lucifer. Pour out here, all bumpers. My tongue peels. Lans tringue (boon companion), to thee, countrymen, cheerily, cheerily. La, la, la ! that has been gulped down. O lachryma Christi ! it is from the grapes of Suillé ; it is wine from the pineapple. Oh, the beautiful white wine ! and, upon my soul, it is only taffatas wine. Hin, him, it is of one ear, well-wrought, and of good wool. Courage, companions. In this game we will not be bested, for I have got one trick. Ex hoc in hoc. There is no enchantment ; each of you has seen it. I am now a journeyman. A brum, brum : I am presbyter Macé.* Oh the drinkers ! Oh the thirsty ! Page, my good friend, fill up here and crown the wine, I pray you. To the cardinal. Naturæ abhorret vacuum. Would you say that a fly could drink up this ? A la mode de Bretagne. Neat, neat, to the dregs. Gulp it down : it is ambrosia.

CHAPTER VI.

How Gargantua was born in a strange manner.

WHILST holding this discourse on drinking, Gargamelle was taken a little unwell in her lower parts. Grangousier got up from the grass, and began to comfort her honestly, thinking she was taken in travail, and told her it would be best to sit down on the sward under the willow, and that, in fact, she had completed her time, therefore she should summon up fresh courage at the anticipated advent of her baby, and that though the pain would be somewhat grievous to her, it would not be of long duration, while the joy that would succeed would speedily compensate for her sufferings, in such sort that she would soon forget it.

"I shall prove it to you," said he. "Our Saviour has said, in John's Gospel, xvi., 'Woman in the hour of her travail will have anguish, but when she has disburthened, she remembers no more her anguish.'" "Ha," said she, "you speak well, and take much delight in quoting from the Gospels, to suit your purpose, and in telling me about the life of Saint Margaret, or some other hypocrite."

"Pluck up sheep's courage," said he: "make haste about this boy, and we will immediately set to work to make another." "Ha!" said she, "it is easy for you to speak so, you that are men; would to God I could hurry matters on, so as to please you. But would to God that you had it cut off." "What!" exclaimed Grangousier. "Ha," said she; "you are a clever man; you understand what I mean." "Mymember?" said he. "By the blood of the goat,* if such appear good to you, bring hither a knife!" "Ha!" said she, "the Lord forbid; and may God pardon me, for I did not say this from the heart; and as to what I did say, do not harm it in any way. But I shall, God helping me, have enough of business on hand to-day, and all through your member, which you would so readily part with."

"Courage, courage," said he. "Take no heed of the matter; let the four foremost oxen do the work.† I will go and have another bumper. If you meanwhile should fall ill, I will be near at hand; only whistle with your fist and I shall return to you."

A little while after she commenced to groan, to lament, and to cry. Suddenly a crowd of midwives came running towards her. The latter on groping her below found some filthy stuff, which had a very bad odour; this they took to be the child, but it was her fundament, which had slipped out with the mollification of her straight entrail, which is called the bum-gut, all on account of eating too many tripes, as has been above stated.

* A Gascon oath.

† A locution in regard to labour in Poitou.

Then an old hag amongst the women, who had the reputation of being a great doctress, who was from Brisepaille, near to Genou,* threescore years before, made her so powerful an astringent that all her larris were so much oppilated and contracted that one could hardly have enlarged them with one's teeth, which is a horrible thing to think of. Even the devil himself, at the mass of Saint Martin, in writing the chit-chat of two gay women, had as much to do as he could to lengthen the parchment with his teeth. In consequence of this mishap, the cotyledons of her matrix became so relaxed that the child bounded up through them, and entering into the hollow vein, and climbing through the diaphragm even beyond the shoulders, thence taking its way to the left side, it issued through the left ear. As soon as he was born, he did not cry as other babes do, "Mies, mies, mies," but in so loud a voice exclaimed, "Drink, drink, drink," as if it were inviting every one to drink, that it was heard at once in both the countries of Beauce and of Bibararois. I have a misgiving that you do not absolutely believe in his strange nativity. Whether you do or not is to me a matter of indifference; but an honest man, and a man of good sense, believes always what is told to him, and what he finds written. Has not Solomon said in Proverbs, xiv., Innocens credit omni verbo, etc.? And Saint Paul, in 1 Cor. xiii., Charitas omnia credit? Why can you not believe it? Because, say you, it has no appearance of probability. I tell you that, if for no other reason, you ought to accept it in good faith. For the Sorbonnists say that faith is the evidence of things not seen.

Is it contrary to our laws, our faith, our reason,—opposed to the Holy Scriptures? For my part, I do not find anything written in the Holy Bible in contradiction to this. But if it had been the will of God that such a thing should be, would you say that he could not easily have accomplished it? Ha, for goodness sake, never emberlucock your spirits with these vain thoughts. For it says unto you that there is nothing impossible with God. If he willed it, all women in the future should bring forth their children through the ear. Was not Bacchus engendered through the thigh of Jupiter? Did not Roquetaillade come out of his mother's heel, and Crochmoush from the slipper of his nurse? Was not Minerva born of the brain even through the ear of Jove? Adonis from the bark of a myrrh tree? Castor and Pollux from the yoke of an egg which was laid and hatched by Leda? But you will even be more amazed and astonished if I should now present you with that chapter of Plinius in which he speaks of births strange and contrary to nature. Nevertheless, I am not so audacious a liar as he was. Read the seventh book of his "Natural History," chap. 3, and trouble me no more regarding this matter.

was set a great emerald as big as an orange; for, as says Orpheus, lib. de lapidibus, and Pliny, lib. ultimo, it has an erective virtue, and is comforting to the natural member. The ject of his codpiece was the length of a yard, and bagging out with the blue damask lining, after the manner of his breeches: but had you seen the fair embroidery of the small needlework purl, and the curiously interlaced knots, by the goldsmith's art, set out and trimmed with rich diamonds, precious rubies, fine turquoises, costly emeralds, and Persian pearls, you would have compared it to a fair cornucopia, such as you see in antics, or as Rhea gave to the two nymphs Adrastea and Ida, the nurses of Jupiter.

It was gallant, succulent, droppy, sappy, always flourishing, always fructifying, full of juice, full of flower, full of fruit, full of all manner of delight. I declare to God it would have done you good to see it: but I will tell you more of it in the book which I have devoted to The Dignity of Codpieces. One thing I will tell you, that as it was both long and large, so was it well furnished and provided within, in no wise resembling the hypocritical codpieces of a lot of fond wooers, which are stuffed only with wind, to the great prejudice of the female sex.

For his shoes were taken up four hundred and six ells of blue crimson velvet, and were very neatly cut by parallel lines, joined in uniform cylinders. For the soling of them were employed eleven hundred hides of brown cows, shapen like the tail of a keeling.

For his coat were taken up eighteen hundred ells of blue velvet, dyed in grain, embroidered in its borders with fair vignettes, in the middle decked with silver purl, intermixed with ridges of gold, and with wealth of pearls: thus denoting that in his time he would prove an especial good fellow.

His girdle was made of three hundred ells and a half of silken serge, half white and half blue, or I am badly informed. His sword was not of Valentia, nor his dagger of Saragossa; for his father could not endure these Hidalgos borrachos maranisados como diablos; but he had a pretty sword made of wood, and the dagger of boiled leather, as well painted and gilded as one could wish.

His purse was made of the cod of an elephant, which was given him by Her Pracontal, proconsul of Lybia.

For his gown were taken up nine thousand six hundred ells, less two-thirds, of blue velvet, as before, all so diagonally purled with gold that by true perspective issued thence an unnamed colour, like as you see in the necks of turtle-doves or turkey-cocks, which wonderfully gladdens the eyes of the beholders.

For his cap were taken up three hundred two ells and a quarter of white velvet, and was in form wide and round, suited to his head; for his father said that the caps of the Marrabaise fashion, made like the cover of a pasty, would one day bring a mischief on those that wore them. For his plume he wore a bright, large blue feather, plucked from an Onocrotal of the country of Hircania the Wild, very prettily hanging down over his right ear. For the jewel or brooch which he carried in his cap, he had in a cake of gold, weighing threescore and eight marks, a fair piece of enamelled work, wherein were portrayed a man's body with two heads, looking towards one another; four arms, four feet, two arses, such as Plato, in Symposio, says was the mystical beginning of man's nature; and about it was written in Ionic letters, Ἀγάπη οὐ ζητεῖτὰ ἑαυτῆς (Charity seeketh not her own).

To wear about his neck he had a gold chain weighing twenty-five thousand and sixty-three marks of gold, the link being made in the form of great berries, amongst which were interwoven green jaspers, engraven and cut dragon-like, all encircled with beams and sparks, as King Nicepsos was wont of old to wear them. It reached down to the very bust of the rising of his belly, by which all his life long he reaped great benefit. For his gloves it took sixteen otters' skins, and three of Lougarous, or men-eating wolves, for the bordering of them; and of this stuff were they made by the appointment of the Cabalists of Sanlouand. For his rings (which his father would have him to wear, to renew the ancient mark of nobility) he had on the forefinger of his left hand a carbuncle as big as an ostrich's egg, enchased very daintily in gold of seraph fineness. Upon the middle finger of the same hand he had a ring made from four blended metals, of the strongest fashion that ever was seen, so that the steel did not crush against the gold, nor the silver crush the copper. The whole was made by Captain Chappuys, and Alcofribas, his trusty henchman. On the medial finger of his right hand he had a ring made in the form of a spiral, wherein was set a perfect baleau ruby, a pointed diamond, and a poison emerald of inestimable value. For Hans-carvel, the King of Melinda's jeweller, valued them at threescore and nine millions eight hundred ninety-four thousand and eight fleeces of wool: at as much did the Jews of Augsburg estimate them.

CHAPTER IX.

The Colours and Liveries of Gargantua.

GARGANTUA'S colours were white and blue, as you have above read. By this his father would give us to understand that his son was to him a heavenly joy ; for the white signified gladness, pleasure, delight, and rejoicing ; and the blue celestial things. I know quite well that in reading these words you will laugh at the old toper, and hold this exposition of colours to be very extravagant, and abhorrent : and will say that white signifies faith, and blue constancy. But, without moving, vexing, heating, or putting you in a chafe (for the weather is dangerous) answer me if it seems good to you. I shall employ no other compulsory way of arguing towards you, or any else ; only I will say a word or two of my bottle.

Who goads you ? Who hurts you ? Who told you that white signifies faith, and blue constancy ? A paltry old book, say you, which is sold by the hawking pedlars and ballad-mongers, under the title, "The Blazon of Colours." Who made it ? Whoever it was, he acted prudently in that he did not put his name to it. But, for the rest, I know not what I should rather admire in him,—his presumption or his folly ; his presumption, inasmuch as he without reason, without cause, or without any appearance of truth, should dare to prescribe by private authority what things should be connoted by the colour. This is the custom of tyrants who will arbitrate their authority instead of equity ; but not of the wise and learned, who, with manifest reason, satisfy their readers ; his stupidity, inasmuch as he estimates that, without any other demonstration or sufficient argument, the world would submit to be ruled by ridiculous impositions of their devices. In fact (according to the Proverb, To shitten tails, turd never fails) he has found some simple ninny in the times of high bonnets, who gave some trust to his writings, and according to whom they shaped their apophthegms and mottoes, trapped and caparisoned their mules and sumpter-horses, apparelled their pages, quartered their breeches, bordered their gloves, fringed their bed-curtains, painted their ensigns, and composed songs ; and what is worse, practised impostures and played base tricks clandestinely amongst the chastest matrons.

In the like darkness and ignorance are wrapped up these vain-glorious courtiers and name-transposers who wishing in their devices to signify hope, have portrayed a sphere : birds' pens for pains : L'Ancholie for melancholy : a horned moon to show the increasing of one's fortune : a broken bench to signify bankrupt : yea, and a corslet for, non dur habet, non durabit, it shall not last : a bed without a curtain for a licentious person, which are equivocal so inept and so witless, so clownish and barbarous, that a fox's tail should be pinned at his back, and a fool's cap be given to every one that should henceforth offer, after the restitution of learning, to make use of any such fopperies in France.

For the same reasons (if reasons I should call them, and not rather ravings) might I cause paint a pannier to signify that I am in pain; a mustard-pot that my heart tarries much for it; one pissing upwards for a bishop; the bottom of a pair of breeches for a vessel full of farthings (fart-hings); and a codpiece for the tail of a cod-fish; and a dog's turd for the dainty turret wherein lies the love of my sweetheart.

Far otherwise were the sages of Egypt wont to do when they wrote by letters, which they called hieroglyphics—which none understood who were not skilled in the virtue, property, and nature of the things represented by them. Of which Orus Apollo has in Greek composed two books, while Polyphilus, in his "Dream of Love," has gone greater lengths. In France you have a taste of them in the device of my Lord Admiral, which was carried before that time by Octavian Augustus. But my little skiff will sail no further amongst these unpleasant gulfs and shoals, I will hence return to the port from whence I came. I hope one day, however, to write more at large of these things, and to show, both by philosophical arguments and authorities, received and approved of by all antiquity, what and how many colours are in Nature, and what may be signified by each of them, if so be that God save the mould of my cap, which is my wine-pot, as my grandam used to say.

CHAPTER X.

Of that which is signified by the Colours White and Blue.

THE white then signifies joy, solace, and gladness; and that not wrongly, but upon right and just grounds. This you may readily verify, if, laying aside all prejudices, you will give ear to what I am about to expound to you.

Aristotle says that, supposing two things, contrary in their kind, such as good and evil, virtue and vice, heat and cold, white and black, pleasure and pain, joy and grief, and so of others, if you couple them in such manner that the contrary of one kind may agree in reason with the contrary of the other, it must follow as a consequence that the other contrary must represent the residue. For example, virtue and vice are contrary in one kind, so also are good and evil. If, then, one of the contraries of the first kind be consonant to one of those of the second, as virtue and goodness (for it is certain that virtue is good) so shall the other two contraries (which are evil and vice) have the same connection, for vice is evil.

This logical rule being understood, take these two contraries, joy and sadness; then these two, white and black, for they are physically contraries. If so be then that black signifies grief, for the same reason should white signify joy. Nor is this signification instituted by human imposition, but is received by the universal consent of the whole world, which philosophers call jus gentium, universal law, applicable to all countries whatsoever.

As you know quite well that all peoples and all nations (except the ancient Syracusans, and certain Argives, who had cross and thwarting souls and languages), when they mean to demonstrate their sorrow, go in black, and all mourning is done with black. This universal consent is not without some argument and reason in Nature which every man may by himself very easily comprehend, without the instruction of any; this is what we call the Law of Nature. Hence white, by virtue of some natural instinct, is regarded by the world to imply joy, gladness, mirth, pleasure, and delectation.

In times past the Thracians and Cretians indicated their propitious and fortunate days by white stones; their dismal and unfortunate ones by black. Is not the night mournful, sad, and melancholic? It is black and obscure by the privation of light. Does not the light comfort all Nature? and it is white more than anything else which effects this. In proof of the latter, I could direct you to the Book of Laurentius Valla against Bartolus, but a gospel testimony must suffice: St Matt. xvii., it is said that at the transfiguration of our Lord, Vestimenta ejus facta sunt alba sicut lux, his apparel was made white like the light. By this luminous whiteness he gave his three apostles to understand the idea and figure of the eternal joys, for by the light are all men made glad. You have no doubt heard of the old woman who, although she had not a tooth in her head, was wont to say bona lux. And Tobit, chap. v., after he had lost his sight, when Raphael saluted him, answered, "What joy can I have, who cannot see the light of heaven?" In such colour did the angels testify the joy of the whole world at the resurrection of our Saviour, John xx., and at his ascension, Acts i. In a similar colour did St John the Evangelist, Apoc. iv., 7, "See the faithful clothed in the heavenly and blessed Jerusalem."

Read ancient story, both Greek and Latin, and there you will find that the town of Alba (the first patron of Rome) was founded, and so named, by reason of a white sow that was seen there. You shall likewise find in those stories that when any man had vanquished his enemies, it was, by the decree of the senate, to enter Rome triumphantly, he rode in a chariot drawn by white horses: White, in the Ovatian Triumph, was also the custom; for by no sign or colour would they so significantly express the joy of their coming as by the white. You shall also find how Pericles, the general of the Athenians, would needs have that part of his army unto whose lot befel the white beans, to spend the whole day in mirth, pleasure, and ease, whilst the rest were engaged in battle. A thousand other examples and places apropos I could allege to this purpose, but this is not the place for it.

By means of this knowledge you may solve one problem, which Alexander Aphrodiseus has declared to be unanswerable: Why the lion who, with his simple cry and roaring, affrights all beasts, stands in dread and awe of only a white cock. For (as Proclus says, "Libro de sacrificio and magia"), it is because the presence or the virtue of the sun, which is the organ and source of all terrestrial and siderial light, symbolises and agrees more with a white cock, both as regards colour, and his property and specific species, than with a lion. He saith further, that devils have been often seen in the shape of lions, which, at the sight of a white cock, have presently disappeared. This is the reason why the Galli (so are the Frenchmen called, because they are naturally white as milk, which the Greeks call Gala) delight to wear in their caps white feathers; for by nature they are merry, candid, gracious, and well-disposed; and for their symbol and arms have the whitest flower of any, the lily.

If you ask why Nature, by the colour white, would have us understand joy and gladness, I answer that the analogy and conformity is thus: Since white doth outwardly disperse and scatter the rays of the sight, whereby the optic spirits are manifestly dissolved (according to the opinion of Aristotle, in his "Problems and Perspective Treatises"), so you may likewise perceive by experience, when you pass over mountains covered with snow, you will complain that you cannot see well; which Xenophon writes happened to his men, whilst Galen also lucidly explains, lib. 10, de usu partium: Just so the heart with excessive joy is inwardly dilated, and suffers a manifest resolution of the vital spirits: which may go so far on, that it may thereby be deprived of its nourishment, and, by consequence, of life itself, by this pericharie, or extremity of gladness; Galen says further, lib. 12, method. lib. 5, de locis affectis, et lib. 2, de symptomatum causis. And as it has come to pass in former times (bear witness Marcus Tullius, lib. 1, Quæst. Tuscul., Verrius, Aristotle, Livius, in his relation of the battle of Cannæ, Plinius, lib. 7, cap. 32 et 34, A. Gellius, lib. 3, cap. 15, and many other writers) of Diagoras, the Rhodian, Chilon, Sophocles, Dionysius, the Tyrant of Sicily, Philippides, Philemon, Polycrates, Philipion, M. Juventi, and others, who died with joy. And as Avican relates in 2 Canon. et lib. de virib. cordis, of the saffron, that it does so rejoice the heart, that if you take of it excessively, it will, by an excessive resolution and dilatation, deprive it altogether of life. Here peruse Alex. Aphrodiseus, lib. 1, probl. cap. 19, and that for a cause: But what? it seems I have entered further into this point than I intended at the first. Here, therefore, will I strike sail, referring the rest to that book of mine which treats exhaustively of this matter. Meanwhile, in a word, I will tell you that blue certainly signifies heaven and heavenly things, by the very same tokens and symbols that white signifies joy and pleasure.

CHAPTER XI.

Of the Adolescence of Gargantua.

GARGANTUA, from three until five years of age, was brought up and instructed in all convenient discipline, by the commandment of his father. He spent that time like the other little children of the country; that is, in drinking, eating, and sleeping; in eating, sleeping, and drinking; and in sleeping, drinking, and eating.

He was continually wallowing, and rolling up and down in the mire and dirt; he sullied his nose; he smutted his face; he trod down his shoes in the heel, lay with his mouth open to catch gnats, and delighted to run after the butterflies, the empire whereof belonged to his father. He pissed in his shoes, messed his shirt, and wiped his nose on his sleeve; he let his snot and snivel fall in his pottage, and dabbled, paddled, and slabbered everywhere. He would drink in his slipper, and ordinarily rub his belly against a pannier: he would pick his teeth with a wooden shoe, wipe his breech with his finger, wash his hands in his broth, and comb his head with a broken ladle. He would sit down betwixt two stools, with his back to the ground; would cover himself with a wet sack, drink and eat his pottage, gnaw the bone he could not swallow, eat his cake without bread, bite laughing, and laugh biting, spit in the dish, fart in his fist, piss against the wind, and hide himself in the water for fear of rain: he would strike before the iron was hot, would blow in the dust till it filled his eyes; be often in the dumps: he would flay the fox, say the Apes Paternoster, would run at mutton, and turn the hogs to the hay: he would beat the dogs before the lion; put the plough before the oxen, and claw where it did not itch. He would leap before he looked; at Midsummer Moon spend his Michaelmas Rent, and take misreckoning for good payment. By gripping all, would hold fast nothing; and always eat his white bread first: he shooed the geese, tickled himself to make himself laugh, was cook-ruffian in he kitchen, would sing Magnificat at Matins, and found it was an enemy of God, would turn to account : he would eat cabbage, and shite cauliflowers ; catch fish in a dish of milk, and make them all cripples : he would tear the paper, rase the records, then trust his heels for his security : he would pull at the kids' leather, or vomit up his dinner, then reckon without his host : he would beat the bushes without catching the birds ; thought the moon was made of green cheese, and that everything was gold that glitters. He would sooner go to the mill than to the mass ; took a bit in the morning to be better than nothing all day ; would eat his cake and have his cake ; and was better fed than taught ; he always looked a gift horse in the mouth ; would tell a tale of a tub ; throw the helm after the hatchet ; when the steed was stolen would shut the stable-door, and bring his hogs to a fair market : by robbing Peter he paid Paul ; he kept the moon from wolves, and was ready to catch larks if ever the heavens should fall ; he made of necessity virtue ; of such bread such pottage ; and cared as little for the peeled as for the shaven : every morning he did cast up his gorge ; his father's little dogs eat out of the dish with him, and he with them. He would bite their ears, and they would scratch his nose ; would blow in their arses, and they would lick his chops.

But listen, good fellows, may the spigot all betake you and whirl round your brain, if now ye do not give ear : this little lecher was always groping his nurses and governesses upside down, arsiversy, topsiturvy, Harribourrquet, with a Yacco haic, hayck gio, handling them very rudely in jumbling and tumbling them to keep them going ; for he had already began to exercise Nature's implements and put his codpiece in practice ; which codpiece his governesses did every day deck up and adorn with fair nosegays, curious ornaments, sweet flowers, and fine silken tufts, and very pleasantly would pass their time in taking, you know what, between their fingers, and dandling it until it did revive and assume the form and rigidity of a street magdaleon, which is a hard rolled up salve spread upon leather. Seeing this they would burst out laughing, as if the sport pleased them. One of them would call it her pillicock, her fiddle-diddle, her staff of love, her tickle-gizzard, her gentle-titler. Another, her sugar-plum, her kingo, her old rowley, her touch-tripe, her flap-dowdle. Another again, her branch of coral, her placket-racket, her Cyprian sceptre, her tit-bit, her bob-lady. And some of the other women would give these names—my Roger, my cockatoo, my nimble-wimble, bush-beater, claw-buttock, eves-dropper, pick-lock, pioneer, bully-ruffin, smell-smock, trouble-gusset, my lusty live sausage, my crimson chitterlin, rump-splitter, shove-devil, downright to it, stiff and stout, in and to, at her again, my cony-borrow-ferrit, wily-beguiley, my pretty rogue. "It belongs to me," said one ; "It is mine," said the other ; "What," quoth the third, "shall I have no share in it ?

By my faith I will cut it off then." "Ha! to cut it off," said the other, "would hurt him. Madam, do you cut off little children's things? Were his cut off, he would be then master without a tail." And that he might play and sport himself, like the other little children of the country, they made him a whirlygig of the wings of the windmill of Myrebalais.

CHAPTER XII.

Of Gargantua's Wooden Horses.

IN order that he might be all his lifetime a good rider, they made him a splendid great horse of wood, which he made leap, curvet, yerk out behind, and skip forwards all at a time, to pace, trot, rack, gallop, amble, to play the hobby, the hackney-gelding, go the gait of the camel, and of the wild ass: he made him also change his colour, as the monks of Coultibo, according to the variety of their holidays, use to do their cloths, from bay to brown, sorrel, dapple-grey, mouse-dun, deer-colour, roan, cow-colour, gingioline, skued-colour, pie-balled, and the colour of the savage elk.

Out of a huge big post he made himself a hunting nag; and another for daily service of the beam of a wine-press: out of a great oak he made up a mule, with housing for his chamber. Besides these, he had ten or twelve spare horses, and seven horses for post; and all these were lodged in his own chamber, close by his bedside. One day the lord of Breadinbag came to visit Gargantua's father, in great bravery, and with a gallant train; and at the same time, to see him, came likewise the Duke of Friemeale, and the Earl of Wetgullet. The house, for so many guests at once, was certainly somewhat narrow, especially the stables. Whereupon the stewards and gentlemen of horse to the Lord Breadinbag (to know if there were any other empty stables in the house) came to Gargantua, then a young lad, and privately inquired of him where the stables of the great horses were, thinking that children would be ready to tell all. He led them up the great staircase of the castle, passing through the second hall into a broad great gallery, by which they entered into a large tower, and as they were going up at another pair of stairs, said the gentleman of horse to the steward, "This child deceives us, for the stables are never on the top of the house." "You may be mistaken," said the steward, "for I know some places at Lyons, at the Basmette, at Chaisnon and elsewhere, which have their stables at the very tops of the houses, so it may be that behind the houses there is a way to come to this ascent; but I will question him further."

Then said he to Gargantua, "My pretty little boy, whither do you lead us?" "To the stable," said he, "of my great horses; we have almost come to it, we have but these stairs to go up." Then, leading them along another great hall, he brought them into his chamber, and opening the door, said to them, "This is the stable that you asked for; this is my jennet, this is my gelding, this is my courser, and this is my pad;" and began to lay on them with a great cudgel. "I will bestow upon you," said he, "this Frizeland horse, I had him from Frankfort, yet I will give him to you; for he is a pretty little nag, and will go very well; with a cast of gosehawks, half a dozen spaniels, and a brace of greyhounds; thus are you king of the hares and partridges for all this winter." "By St John," said they, "now we are paid out, what monkeys!" "Hold, hold, gentlemen," said he, "you must show your tails ere you pass for monkeys." Judge you now whether they had most cause either to hide their heads for shame, or to laugh for company. As they were going down again thus amazed, he asked them, "Will you have a whim-wham?" "What is that?" said they. "It is," said he, "five turds to make you a muzzle." "To-day," said the steward, "though we happen to be roasted, we shall not be burnt, for we are pretty well grupp'd and larded, in my opinion. Oh, my jolly dapper boy, you have given us a gudgeon; I hope to see you pope before I die." "I think so," said he, "myself, and then shall you be a puppy, and this gentle Popinjeay a perfect pupelard, that is, dissembler." "Well, well," said the gentleman of the horse. "But," said Gargantua, "guess how many stitches there are in my mother's smock?" "Sixteen," quoth the gentleman. "You do not speak gospel," said Gargantua, "for there is sent before, and sent behind,* and you did reckon them ill, considering the two under holes." "When?" said the harbinger. "Even then," said Gargantua, "when they made a faucet of your nose to draw off a hogshead of ordure, and of your throat a funnel, in order to put it into another vessel, because the bottom of the old one was out." "Cocksbod," said the steward, "we have met with a prater. Farewell, master tatler; God keep you from evil, your mouth is so mellow.

Descending thus in great haste, under the arch of the stairs, they let fall the great staff he had put into their hands, whereupon Gargantua said, "Devil take you, but you are bad horsemen, that suffer your bilder to fail you, when you need him most. If you were to go hence to Chausas, whether would you ride on a goose, or lead a sow in a leash?" "I had rather drink," said the harbinger. With this they entered into the lower hall, where the company was, and, relating to them this new story, made them laugh confusedly, like the buzzing of flies.

CHAPTER XIII.

How Grangousier discovered the Wonderful Understanding of Gargantua by the invention of a Torch-cul.

TOWARDS the end of the fifth year, Grangousier, returning from the conquest of the Canarians, went to visit his son Gargantua; and there he was filled with joy, as such a father might be on seeing such a child as his. And whilst he kissed and embraced him, he asked him many childish questions about divers matters. He drank very freely with him, and with his governesses, of whom he asked in great earnest, among other things, whether they had been careful to keep him clean and sweet? To this Gargantua answered, that he had given himself such orders that in all the country there was not to be found a cleanlier boy than he. "How comes that?" said Grangousier. "I have," answered Gargantua, "by a long and curious experience, invented means for wiping my bum, which are the most lordly, the most excellent, and the most convenient that ever was seen." "What is it?" said Grangousier. "I will tell you presently," said Gargantua. "Once I did wipe myself with a gentlewoman's velvet mask, and found it to be good; for the softness of the silk was very voluptuous to my fundament. At another time I did the same with one of their hoods, with similar results. At another time, with a lady's neckerchief. Then with some ear-pieces of hers, made of crimson satin; but there was such a number of golden spangles in them (turdy round things, a pox take them) that they peeled all the skin off my ultimatum. Now I wish St Antony's fire may burn the bum-gut of the goldsmith that made them, and of her that wore them! This hurt I cured by wiping myself with a page's cap, garnished with a feather a la Swiss.

"Afterwards, in dunging behind a bush, I found a March-cat, and with it wiped my breech, but her claws were so sharp that they scratched and exulcerated all my peritoneum. I recovered of this the next morning, by wiping myself with my mother's gloves, which had a most excellent perfume and scent of the Arabian gum. Next I wiped with sage, with fennel, with anet, with marjoram, with roses, with gourd leaves, with beets, with colewort, with leaves of the vine-tree, with mallows, woolblade (which is a tail-scarlet), with lettuce, and with spinage leaves. All this did very great good to my leg. Then with wild mercury, with pursley, with nettles, with comfrey; but that gave me the bloody flux of Lombardy, which I healed by wiping with my codpiece. Then I wiped my tail in the sheets, in the coverlid, in the curtains, with a cushion, with arras hangings, with a green carpet, with a table-cloth, with a napkin, with a handkerchief, with a combing-cloth, in all which I found more pleasure than do the mangy dogs when you rub them." "Yea, but," said Grangousier, "which torch-cul did you find to be the best?" "I was coming to that," said Gargantua, "and by-and-by you shall hear the tu autem. I wiped myself with hay, with straw, with thatch-rushes, with flax, with wool, with paper; but,

Who his foul tail with paper wipes,
Shall at his ballocks leave some chips."

"What," said Grangousier, "my little rogue, have you been at the wine-pot, that you do rhyme already?" "Yes, yes, my lord and king," answered Gargantua, "I can rhyme out of measure; I rhyme so much that I rhyme until I become hoarse with rheum. Hark what our privy says to the skiters:—

‘Shittard Sguittard
Crackard Turdous,
Thy bung
Hath flung
Some dung
On us.
Filthard
Cackard Stinkard,
St Anthony fire thy arse-bone,
If thy Ditty
Toby
Thou do not wipe ere thou be gone.’

Will you have any more of it?" "Yes, yes," answered Grangousier. Then said Gargantua—

“ ‘A ROUNDELAY.

In shiting, yesterday, I did know
The tax I to my arse did owe :
The smell was such came from that slunk
That I was with it all bestunk :
O had but then some brave Signor
Brought her to me I waited for,
In shiting :
I would have cleft her water-gap,
And join'd it close to my flip-flap ;
While she had with her fingers guarded
My foul nockandrow, all bemedded
In shiting.’

Now say that I can do nothing. By the merdi, they are not of my making, but I heard them of this good old grandam, that you see here, and ever since have retained them in the tablets of my memory."

"Let us return to our purpose," said Grangousier. "What," said Gargantua, "to skite?" "No," said Grangousier, "but to wipe our ultimatums." "But," said Gargantua, "will you not be content to pay a puncheon of Breton wine if I do not blank and gravel you in this matter, and put you to a non plus?" "Yes, truly," said Grangousier.

"There is no need of wiping one's fundament," said Gargantua "except when it is foul; foul it cannot be, unless one have been a skiting; skite then we must before we wipe our ultimatums. "Oh but you are a pretty little waggish boy," said Grangousier; "what an excellent wit you have! I will make you very shortly proceed doctor at the Sorbonne, by God, for thou hast more wit than age. Now, I prithee, go on in this bum-fodder discourse; and, by my beard I swear, for one puncheon you shall have threescore pipes, I mean of the good Breton wine, not that which grows in Britain, but in the good country of Verron." "Afterwards I wiped my bum," said Gargantua, "with a kerchief, with a pillow, with a pantoufle, with a pouch, with a pannier, but that was a wicked and unpleasant wipe-breech; then with a hat: of hats, note that some are shorn, and others shaggy, some velveteed, others covered with taffeties, and others with satin. The best of all these is the shaggy hat, for it makes a very neat abstertion of the fecal matter.

"I further wiped my tail with a hen, with a cock, with a pullet, with a calf's skin, with a hare, with a pigeon, with a cormorant, with an attorney's bag, with a montero, with a coif, with a falconer's lure. But to conclude, I say and maintain, that of all torch-culs, arse-wisps, bum-fodders, tail-napkins, bung-hole-cleansers, and wipe-breeches, there is none in the world comparable to the neck of a goose, that is well downed, if you hold her head betwixt your legs: and believe me, therein upon mine honour, for you will thereby feel in your ultimatum a most wonderful pleasure, both as regard the softness of the said down, and the temperate heat of the goose; which is easily communicated to the bum-gut and the rest of the intestines, to such an extent as to come even to the regions of the heart and brains. And think not that the felicity of the heroes and demigods, in the Elysian fields, consisted either in their Asphodele, Ambrosia, or Nectar, as our old women here use to say; but in this (according to my judgment) that they wipe their bums with the neck of a goose, holding her head betwixt their legs and such is the opinion of Master John of Scotland."

CHAPTER XIV.

How Gargantua was initiated by a Theologian into Latin.

HAVING heard this discourse, the good man Grangousier was ravished with admiration, considering the lofty sense and marvellous understanding of his son Gargantua, and said to his governesses : " Philip, King of Macedon, knew the great wit of his son Alexander, by his skilful managing of a horse ; for his horse Bucephalus was so fierce and unruly, that none dare venture to ride him, seeing that he had given his riders such devilish falls, breaking the neck of this man, the other man's leg, braining one, and cracking another's jaw-bone. Alexander having learned this, considered, one day in the Hippodrome (which was a place appointed for the breaking and managing of great horses), he perceived that the fury of the horse proceeded merely from the fear he had of his own shadow ; getting on his back, he galloped him against the sun, so that the shadow fell behind, and by that means tamed the horse, and made him obedient to his hand. His father, perceiving his marvellous capacity and divine insight, caused him to be most carefully instructed by Aristotle, who at that time was renowned above all the philosophers of Greece. In like manner, I tell you, that by this only discourse, which now I have here had before you with my son Gargantua, I know that his understanding doth participate of some divinity ; and that if he be well taught, and have that education which is fitting, he will attain to a supreme degree of wisdom. I will therefore commit him to some learned man, to have him educated according to his capacity, and will spare no cost."

In fact they appointed him a great doctor of theology called Master Tubal Holofernes, who taught him his alphabet so well, that he could say it by heart backwards ; at this time he was about five years and three months.

He then read to him Donat, Le Facet, Thepsolet, and Alanus in Parabolis. He was now about thirteen years six months and two weeks old. But remark, that in the meantime he learned to write in Gothic characters, and that he wrote all his books—for the art of printing was not then in use, and did ordinarily carry a great pen and ink-horn, weighing above seven thousand quintals (about 700,000 lbs. weight) the pen-case whereof was as big and as long as the great pillar of Enay ; and the horn was hung to it in great iron chains, it being of the wideness to hold a ton of merchandise.

After that there was read to him the Book de Modis Significandi, with the Commentaries of Hurtbise, of Fasquin, of Tropditeux, of Gaulhault, of John Calf, of Billonio, of Berlinguandus, and a host of others ; and at this he spent more than eighteen years and eleven months, and was so well versed in them, that to try masteries in school disputes with his co-disciples, he would recite it by heart, backwards; and did sometimes prove on his fingers' ends to his mother, quod de Modis Significandi non erat Scientia. Then was read to him the Compost, on which he spent sixteen years and two months. And at that very time, which was in the year 1420, his said Præceptor died of the pox.

Fourteen hundred and twenty was the year,
When from pox his tutor did disappear.

Afterwards he got an old wheezing fellow to teach him, named Master Jobelin Bridé, who read unto him Hugutio, Hebrard, Grecism, the Doctrinal, the Pars, the Quid est, the Supplementum, Marmotretus, de Moribus in Mensa Servandis, Seneca de quatuor Virtutibus Cardinalibus, Passaventus cum Commento; and Dormi Securè, for the holidays, and other such like stuff; by reading these, he became as wise as any we ever since baked in an oven; that is no better than the first day.

CHAPTER XV.

How Gargantua was put under other Pedagogues.

His father perceiving at last that indeed he studied hard, and that although he spent all his time in it, yet he profited nothing; and which is worse, grew thereby a fool, a sot, a dolt, and blockhead. He made a heavy complaint to Don Philip of Marays, viceroy of Papefigosse, and found it were better for his son to learn nothing at all, than to be taught such like books, under such schoolmasters, inasmuch as their knowledge was nothing but brutishness, and their wisdom foppery, serving only to bastardise good and noble spirits, and to corrupt the whole flower of youth. "That it is so, take," said he, "any young boy of this time who has only studied two years; if he has not a better judgment, a better discourse, and that expressed in better terms than your son, with a completer carriage and civility to all manner of persons, account me for ever hereafter nothing but a bacon-slicer of Brene." That is, a worthless fellow. This pleased Grangousier well, and he commanded that it should be done.

At night, while supping, the said Don Philip brought in a young page of his, of Ville-gouges, called Eudemon, so neat, so trim, so handsome in his apparel, so spruce, with his hair in so good order, and so sweet and comely in his behaviour, that he had the resemblance of a little angel more than of a human creature. Then he said to Grangousier, "Do you see this young boy? He is not as yet full twelve years old: let us try, if it seem good to you, what difference there is betwixt the knowledge of the dunces Mateologian of old time and the young lads that are now." The thing pleased Grangousier, and he commanded the page to begin. Then Eudemon, asking leave of the viceroy, his master, so to do, with his cap in his hand, a clear and open countenance, beautiful and ruddy lips, his eyes steady, and his looks fixed upon Gargantua, with a youthful modesty, standing up straight on his feet, began to commend him, first for his virtue and good manners; secondly, for his knowledge; thirdly, for his nobility; fourthly, for his bodily accomplishments; and, in the fifth place, most sweetly exhorted him to reverence his father with all due obedience, who was so careful to have him well brought up; in the end, he prayed him that he would vouchsafe to admit of him amongst the least of his servants; for other favour at that time desired he none of Heaven, but that he might do him some grateful and acceptable service. All this was delivered by him with such proper gestures, such distinct pronounciation, in so pleasant a voice, in such exquisite fine terms, and so good Latin, that he seemed rather a Gracchus, a Cicero, an Æmilius of the time past, than a youth of this age. But all the face that Gargantua put on was to fall to crying like a cow, and to cast down his face, hiding it with his cap, nor could they possibly draw one word from him, no more than a fart from a dead ass.

His father was so grievously vexed at this that he would have killed Master Jobelin, but the said Don Philip withheld him from his purpose by fair persuasions, so that at length he pacified his wrath. Then Grangousier commanded that he should be paid his wages, that they should make him drink like a priest, and then give him to go to all the devils in hell. "At least," said he "to-day, shall it not cost him much to his host if by chance he should die gorged like an Englishman." Master Jobelin being gone out of the house, Grangousier consulted with the viceroy what schoolmaster they should choose for him, and it was betwixt them resolved that Ponocrates, the tutor of Eudemon, should have the charge, and that they should go all together to Paris, to know what was the study of the young men of France at that time.

CHAPTER XVI.

How Gargantua was sent to Paris, and of the Huge Mare that he rode on; and how she destroyed the Ox-flies of the Beauce.

IN the same season, Fayolles, the fourth king of Numidia, sent out of the country of Africa, to Grangousier, the most hideously great mare that ever was seen, and of the strangest form; for you know well enough how it is said that Africa always is productive of some new thing. She was as big as six elephants, and had her feet cloven into fingers like Julius Cæsar's horse, with slouch-hanging ears, like the goats in Languedoc, and a little horn on her buttock. She was of a burnt-sorrel hue, with a little mixture of dapple-grey spots; but, above all, she had a horrible tail; for it was almost every whit as great as the steeple of Saint Mark beside Langes, and squared as that is, with tufts and hair-pleats, wrought within one another, just as the beards are upon the ears of corn.

If you wonder at this, wonder rather at the tails of the Scythian rams, which weighed above thirty pounds each, and of the Surian sheep, which need (if Tenaud says true) a little cart at their heels, to bear up their tail, it is so long and heavy. Your country wenches have no such tails as this. She was brought by sea in three carricks and a brigantine to the harbour of Olone in Thalmondois. When Grangousier saw her, "Here is," said he, "an animal fit to carry my son to Paris. So now, in the name of God, all will be well; he will in time be a great scholar: if it were not for dunces, we should all be doctors." The next morning (after they had drunk, you must understand), they took their journey; Gargantua, his pedagogue Ponocrates, and their equipage, and with them Eudemon, the young page; and because the weather was fair and temperate, his father caused to be made for him a pair of dun boots; Babin calls them buskins. Thus did they merrily pass their time in travelling on the highway, always making good cheer, and were very jolly till they came a little above Orleans. Near this place there was a forest of five and thirty leagues long, and seventeen in breadth, or thereabouts. This forest was most horribly fertile and copious in doerflies and wasps; so that to such an extent that it was a very purgatory for the poor mares, asses, and horses. But Gargantua's mare did avenge herself handsomely of all the outrages therein committed upon beasts of her quality, and that by a trick of which they had no suspicion; for, as soon as ever they were entered into the said forest, and the wasps had given the assault, she drew out her tail, and therewith skirmishing, did so sweep them, that she overthrew all the wood along and athwart, here and there, this way and that way, longwise and sidewise, over and under, and felled everywhere the wood with as much ease as a mower doth the grass, that never since has there been there either wood or wasp; for all the country was thereby reduced to a plain champaign field — which Gargantua took great pleasure to behold, and said to his company only this: "Je trouve beau ce," I find this pretty. That country henceforth has been ever called Beauce. But all the breakfast the mare got that day was but a little yawning and gaping, in memory of which, the gentlemen of Beauce do, to this day, break their fast with gaping, which they find to be very good, and only spit the better for it. At last they came to Paris, where Gargantua refreshed himself two or three days, making very merry with his folks, and inquiring what men of learning there were then in the city, and what wine was drunk.

CHAPTER XVII.

How Gargantua paid his Beverage to the Parisians, and how he took away the Great Bells of Nôtre Dame.

A FEW days after that they had refreshed themselves, he went to see the city, and was beheld of everybody with great admiration. For the people of Paris are such fools, such puppies, and idiots, that a juggler, a carrier of indulgencies, a sumpter-horse, a mule with his bells, a blind fiddler in the middle of a cross lane, will draw a greater crowd of people together than an evangelical preacher. And they pressed so hard upon him that he was constrained to rest himself upon the steeple of Nôtre Dame. Seeing so many about him, he said with a loud voice, "I believe that these buzzards will have me to pay them here my welcome hither, and my beverage. It is but right. I will now give them their wine, but it shall only be in sport." Then he good-naturedly untied his goodly codpiece, and lugging out his mental into the open air, he so bitterly all-to-be-pissed them, that he drowned two hundred and sixty thousand four hundred and eighteen, besides women and little children.

There were some, nevertheless, who escaped this piss-flood by mere speed of foot; but when they were at the higher end of the university, sweating, coughing, spitting, and out of breath, they began to swear and to curse; par ris, carimari, carimara; golyndoly, golyndolo; "by the holy mother, we are washed par ris," from whence that city hath been ever since called Paris; whose name formerly was Leucotia (as Strabo testifieth, lib.

quarto), from Greek word λευκοτης, whiteness, because of the white thighs of the ladies of that place. And forasmuch as at this imposition of a new name, all the people that were there swore, every one by the saints of his parish, the Parisians, who are patched up of all nations and of all countries, are by nature good jurors and good jurists; for which reason Joanninus de Barrauco, libro de copiositate reverentiarum, thinks that they are called Parisians from the Greek word παρρησια, which signifies bold speakers.

This done, he considered the great bells which were in the said steeple, and made them ring very harmoniously. Whilst he was so doing, it came into his mind that they would serve very well for tingling tantans to hang about his mare's neck, when she should be sent back to his father loaded with Brie cheese and fresh herring; and, indeed, he forthwith carried them to his lodging.

In the meanwhile there came a master beggar of the friars of St Anthony, for some hogs' purtenance; who, that he might be heard afar off, and to make the bacon shake in the very chimneys, had a mind to filch away the bells privily. Nevertheless, he left them behind him very honestly, not that they were too hot, but that they were somewhat too heavy for his carriage. This was not he of Bourg, for he was too good a friend of mine.

The whole city was up in arms, they being (as you know, upon any slight occasion) so ready to uproars and insurrections, that foreign nations wonder at the patience of the kings of France, who do not, by good justice, restrain them from such tumultuous courses, seeing the manifold inconveniences which thence arise from day to day. Would to God I knew the shop wherein are forged these divisions and factious combinations, that I might bring them to light in the confraternities of my parish. Believe for a truth, that the place wherein the people (gathered together) were thus sulfured, moiled, and bepissed, was called Nesle, where then was (but now is no more) the oracle of Lucetia. Thereupon was the case proposed, and the inconvenience showed of carrying away the bells. After they had argued pro and con, it was concluded in Baralipton that they should send the oldest and most sufficient of the faculty unto Gargantua, to signify to him the great and horrible prejudice they should sustain by the want of those bells: and notwithstanding the good reasons given by some of the university, why this charge was fitter for an orator than a sophister, there was chosen for this purpose our master Janotus de Bragmardo.

CHAPTER XVIII.

How Janotus de Bragmardo was sent to Gargantua to recover the Great Bells.

MASTER JANOTUS, with his hair cut round as a dish, decked in his theological Liripoop, and having sufficiently antidoted his stomach with bread and holy water of the cellar, betook himself to the lodging of Gargantua, driving before him three red-muzzled beadles, and dragging after him five or six artless masters, all thoroughly bedraggled with the mire of the streets. At their entry, Ponocrates met them, who was afraid, seeing them so disguised, and thought they had been some maskers out of their wits; which moved him to inquire of one of the said artless masters of the company, what this mummerly meant? It was answered him, that they desired to have their bells restored to them. As soon as Ponocrates heard that, he ran in all haste to carry the news unto Gargantua, that he might be ready to answer them, and speedily resolve what was to be done. Gargantua, being warned hereof, called apart his preceptor Ponocrates, Philotimus, steward of his house, Gymnastes his esquire, and Eudemon, and summarily conferred with them, both of what he should do, and what answer he should give. They were all of opinion that they should bring them to the can-office, and there make them drink like roysters, and line their paunches soundly. And that this cougher might not be puffed up with vainglory, by thinking the bells were restored at his request, they sent, whilst he was plying the pot, for the mayor of the town, the rector of the faculty, and the vicar of the church, unto whom they resolved to deliver the bells before the priest had delivered his commission. After that, in their hearing, he should make his fine harangue, which was done, and they being come, the sophister was brought into a full hall, and began as followeth, in coughing.

CHAPTER XIX.

‘HEM, hem, gudday, sir, gudday et vobis, my masters. It were but reason that you should restore to us our bells: for we have great need of them. Hem, hem, aih fu hash, we have oftentimes heretofore refused good money for them of those of London in Cahors, yea and of those of Bordeaux in Brie, who would have bought them for the substantifick quality of the elementary complexion, which is intronificated in the terrestreity of their quidditative nature, to extraneise the blasting mists and whirlwinds upon our vines; indeed not ours, but these round about us. For if we lose the liquor of the grape, we lose all, both sense and law. If you restore them to us at my request, I shall gain by it six baskets full of sausages, and a fine pair of breeches, which will do my legs a great deal of good, or else they will not keep their promise to me. Ho, by gob, Domine, a pair of breeches is good, et vir sapiens non abhorrebit eam. Ha, ha, a pair of breeches is not so easily got; I have experience of it myself. Consider Domine, I have been these eighteen days in metagrabolising (studying) this brave speech. Reddite quæ sunt Cæsaris Cæsari: et quæ sunt Dei, Deo. Ibi jacet lepus. By my faith, Domine, if you will sup with me in Cameris, by cox body, charitatis nos faciemus bonum cherubinum; ego occidit unum porcum et ego habet bonum vino: but of good wine we cannot make bad Latin. Well, De parte Dei date nobis bellas nostras. Hold, I give you in the name of the faculty, a Sermones de Utino, that utinum you would give us our bells. Vultis etiam pardonos? Per diem vos habebitis, et nihil payabitis.

“O, Sir Domine, Bellagivaminor nobis; verily est bonum urbis. They are useful to everybody. If they fit your mare well, so do they do our faculty, Quæ comparata est jumentis insipientibus, et similis facta est eis, Psalmo nescio quo. Yet did I quote it in my note-book; et est unum bonum Achilles, a good defending argument, hem, hem, hem, haickhash; for I prove unto you that you should give me them. Ego sic argumentor. Omnis bella (clocha) bellabilis in Bellerio bellando, bellans bellativo, bellare facit, bellabiliter bellantes. Parisius habet bellas; ergo gluc. Ha, ha, ha, this is spoken to some purpose; it is in Tertio Primæ, in Darii, or elsewhere. By my soul, I have seen the time that I could play the devil in arguing, but now I am much failed; and henceforward want nothing but good wine, a good bed, my back to the fire, my belly to the table, and a good deep dish.

“Hei Domine, I beseech you, in nomine Patris, Filii et Spiritus Sancti, Amen, to restore unto us our bells; and God keep you from evil, and our lady from health. Qui vivit et regnat per omnia secula seculorum, Amen. Hem, hashchehhawk sash qzrchrem-hemhash (coughing). Verum enim vero, quandoquidem, dubio procul, ædepol, quoniam, ità certè, meus Deus Filius. A town without bells is like a blind man without a staff, an ass without a crupper, and a cow without cymbals; therefore, be assured, until you have restored them unto us, we will never leave crying after you, like a blind man that hath lost his staff braying like an ass without a crupper, and making a noise like a cow without cymbals. A certain Latinisator, dwelling near the hospital, said once, producing the authority of one Taponus, I lie, it was Pontanus, the secular poet, who wished those bells had been made of feathers, and the clapper a fox-tail, to the end they might have begot a chronicle in the bowels of his brain, when he was about the composing of his carmini-formal lines. But Nac petetin petetac, tic, torche Lorgne, more the deponent saith not. He was declared an heretic. We make them as of wax. Valete et plaudite, Calepinus recensui."

CHAPTER XX.

How the Theologian carried away his Cloth, and how he had a Suit in Law against the other Masters.

THE theologian had no sooner ended, but Ponocrates and Eudemon burst out laughing so heartily, that they had almost split with it, and rendered up their souls to God just as Crassus did, seeing a lubberly ass eat thistles; and as Philemon, who, seeing an ass eat those figs which were provided for his own dinner, died with force of laughing. Together with them Master Janotus fell a laughing too as hard as he could, in which mood of laughing they continued so long that their eyes did water by the vehement concussion of the substance of the brain, by which these lachrymal humidities, being pressed out, glided through the optic nerves; and so to the full represented Democritus Heraclitising, and Heraclitus Democritising.

When they had done laughing, Gargantua consulted with the chief prime of his retinue what should be done. Ponocrates was of opinion that they should make this fair orator drink again; and seeing he had given them more enjoyment, and made them laugh more than a natural fool could have done, that they should give him ten baskets full of sausages, mentioned in his jolly harangue, with a pair of breeches, three hundred great billets for the fire, five-and-twenty hogsheads of wine, a good large down bed, and a deep capacious dish, which he said were necessary for his old age. All this was done as they had suggested; only Gargantua doubting that they could not quickly find out breeches fit for his wearing, because he knew not what fashion would best become the said orator, whether the martingale fashion, wherein is a sponge-hole with a draw-bridge, for the more easy caguing; or the fashion of the mariners, for the greater solace and comfort of his kidneys; or that of the Switzers, which keeps warm the belly-tabret; or round breeches with straight cannons, having in the seat a piece like a cod's tail; all which considered, for fear of over-heating his reins, he caused to be given him seven ells of white cloth for the linings. The wood was carried by the porters, the masters of arts carried the sausages and the dishes (dish), and Master Janotus himself would carry the cloth. One of the said masters called Jousse Bandouille showed him that it was not seemly nor decent for one of his degree and quality to do so, and that therefore he should deliver it to one of them. "Ha," said Janotus, "blockhead, blockhead, thou dost not conclude in modo et figura; for lo, to this end serve the Suppositions et Parva Logicalia. Pannus pro quo supponit?" "Confusè," said Bandouille, "et distributivè." "I do not ask thee," said Janotus; "blockhead, quomodo supponit, but pro quo? It is blockhead, pro tibiis meis, and therefore I will carry it, Egomet, sicut suppositum portat appositum;" so did he carry it away very close and covertly, as Patelin the buffoon did his cloth. The best was, that when this cougher, in a full assembly held at the Mathurins, had with great confidence demanded his breeches and sausages, and that they were flatly denied him, because he had them of Gargantua, according to the informations thereupon taken; he showed them that this was gratis, and out of pure liberality, by which they were not in any sort quit of their promises. Notwithstanding this, it was answered him, that he should be content with reason, without expectation of any other bribe there. "Reason?" said Janotus. "We use none of it here. Unlucky traitors, you are not worth the hanging. The earth bears not more arrant villains than you are. I know it well enough; halt not before the lame. I have practised wickedness with you. By God's rattle, I will inform the king of the enormous abuses that are forged here, and carried on underhand by you, and let me be a leper if he do not burn you alive like bougres, traitors, heretics, and seducers, enemies to God and virtue."

At these words they framed articles against him; he on the other side gave them notice to appear. In fine, the process was retained by the court, and there it is still. The magisters hereupon made a vow never to cleanse themselves again. Master Janotus, with his adherents, vowed never to blow their noses until judgment was given by a definitive sentence.

By reason of those vows they continue dirty and snotty to this day; for the court hath not yet fully looked into all the proceedings. Judgment is not like to be declared till the next Greek calends; that is to say, never. So you find that they do more than Nature, and contrary to their own articles. The Articles of Paris declare that to God alone belongs infinity. Nature produces nothing that is immortal, for she puts an end and period to all things produced by her, Omnia orta cadunt, etc.

But these thick-mist swallows make the suits in law, depending upon them, both infinite and immortal. In so doing they have given occasion to, and verified the saying of Chilo the Lacedæmonian, consecrated at Delphos: That misery goes along with lawsuits, and suitors are miserable; for sooner shall they attain to the end of their lives than to alleged rights.

CHAPTER XXI.

The Study and Dietary of Gargantua, according to the Discipline of his Sorbonne Professors.

HAVING spent the first day thus, and the bells being put up again in their own place, the citizens of Paris, in acknowledgment of this courtesy, offered to maintain and feed his mare as long as he pleased. Gargantua took this in good part, and she was sent to graze in the forest of Biere. I think she is no longer there. This done, he submitted with all his heart his study to the discretion of Ponocrates. But the latter, at the commencement, appointed that he should do as he was accustomed, to the end it might be understood by what means, in so long time, his old masters had made him such a sot, ninny, and ignoramus. He disposed his time therefore in such fashion that ordinarily he awoke betwixt eight or nine o'clock, whether it was day or night; for so had his ancient governors ordained, alleging that which David said: Vanum est vobis ante lucem surgere. Then did he tumble and toss, and wallow in the bed some time, the better to stir up and rouse his animal spirits; and having apparelled himself according to the season, yet he would gladly have worn a great long gown of thick frieze, furred with fox skins. Afterwards he combed his head with a comb de al-main, which is the four fingers and the thumb; for his preceptors had said that to comb himself otherways, to wash and make himself neat, was to lose time in this world. Then he dinged, pissed, spued, belched, cracked, yawned, spitted, coughed, hawked, sneezed, and snotted himself like an archdeacon; * and to fortify himself against the fog and bad air, he took some good fried tripes, fair rashers on the coals, good gammons of bacon, store of good minced meat, and a great deal of sippet-brewis, made up of the fat of the beef-pot, laid upon bread, cheese, and chopped parsley strewed together. Ponocrates showed him that he ought not to eat so soon after rising out of his bed, unless he had performed some exercise beforehand. Gargantua answered, "What! have not I sufficiently well exercised myself? I have rolled myself six or seven turns in my bed, before I rose; is not that enough? Pope Alexander did so,* by the advice of a Jew, his physician, and lived till his dying day, in despite of his enemies. My first masters have used me to it, saying, that to eat breakfast made a good memory; in order to this, they drank first. I am very well after it, and only dine the better. And Master Tubal (who was the first licentiate at Paris) told me that it was not enough to run apace, but to set forth betimes; so the total welfare of our humanity doth not depend upon drinking, switter-swatter like ducks, but in being at it early in the morning; Unde versus,

"Lever matin n'est point bonheur, Boire matin est le meilleur."

"To rise betimes is no good hour,
To drink betimes is better sure."

After he had breakfasted well he went to church, and they carried to him, in a great basket, a huge thick-covered breviary, weighing, what in grease, clasps, parchment, and cover, little more or less than eleven hundred and six pounds. There he heard six-and-twenty or thirty masses. And there came to the same place his matin-mumbler, muffled up about the chin, like a hoop, and his breath pretty well antidoted with the vine-tree syrup. With him he mumbled all his kiriels, which he so curiously thumbed and fingered, that there fell not so much as one bead of them to the ground. In departing from the church, they brought him, upon a dray drawn with oxen, a confused heap of patinotres of Saint Claude, every one of the bigness of a hat-block; and sauntering along through the cloisters, galleries, or garden, he riddled over more of them than sixteen hermits would have done. He then studied some paltry half-hour, with his eyes fixed upon his book; but, as the comedy has it, his soul was in the kitchen. Pissing then a whole potfull, he sat down at table; and being naturally phlegmatic, he began his meal with some dozens of hams, dried neats' tongues, botargos, sausages, and such other forerunners of wine. Meanwhile, four of his folks did cast into his mouth, one after another continually, mustard by the shovelful. Then he drank a horrible draught of white wine for the comfort of his kidneys. Next he ate, according to the season, meat agreeable to his appetite; and then left off eating when his belly was like to burst. In drinking, he had in that neither end nor rule; for he was wont to say that the limits and bounds of drinking were, that a man might drink till the lining of his shoes had swelled up half a foot high.

* Pope Alexander did so. This must be meant of Pope Alexander V., a great crammer, and as great a guzzler, says his historian, Theodoric de Niem (l. 2, c. 33). This pontiff, being unable to sit up (he was grown so corpulent and heavy), Marsilius of Parma, his physician, prescribed him a wench to frisk and gambol it together a-bed now and then by way of exercise, and in this posture the holy father was one day surprised by company, who unexpectedly came to see him.

The Games of Gargantua.

THEN, with a puckered-up face, mumbling over some scraps of a grace, he washed his hands in fresh wine, picked his teeth with the foot of a hog, and talked merrily with the people. Then, the carpet being spread, they brought plenty of cards, many dice, with great store and abundance of checkers and chess-boards.

There he played,

 At the larks.
 At filipping.

After he had played, shuffled, clogged, and thrown away his time, it was thought fit to drink a little; this was, every man eleven bumpers; and afterwards make much of himself, and stretch upon a fair bench, or a good large bed, and there sleep for two or three hours together, without thinking or speaking any hurt. When awakened, he would shake his ears a little, and then they brought him fresh wine, and he drank better than ever. Ponocrates remonstrated that it was an ill diet to drink after sleeping. "It is," answered Gargantua, "the very life of the Fathers. For naturally I sleep well salted, and sleep to me is worth so many gammons."

Then he began to study a little, and out came the patenotres; which the more formally to dispatch, he mounted an old mule, which had served nine kings; and so mumbling with his mouth, nodding and doddling his head, would go and see a coney ferreted or caught in a ginne. At his return he went into the kitchen, to know what roast meat was on the spit. He supped very well, upon my conscience, and heartily invited some of his neighbours that were good drinkers, with whom, carousing merrily, they told stories of all sorts, from the old to the new. Among others, he had for domestics the Lord of Fouille, of Grouville, of Griviot, and of Marigny. After supper, were brought into the room, the fair wooden gospels, and the books of the four kings; that is to say, the tables and cards, with a deal of cockalls, mumblety-pegs, and wheels of fortune; or else they went to see the wenches thereabouts with their wakes, collations, and after collations, then to sleep without control till eight o'clock the next morning.

CHAPTER XXIII.

How Gargantua was instructed by Ponocrates, and in such sort disciplined, that he lost not one Hour of the Day.

WHEN Ponocrates became acquainted with Gargantua's vicious manner of living, he resolved upon another method of initiating him into letters; but for a while bore with him, considering that Nature cannot endure a sudden change without great violence. Therefore, to begin his work the better, he requested a learned physician of that time, called Master Theodore, seriously to consider if it were possible to bring Gargantua unto a better course. The said physician purged him canonically with Anticyrian hellebore, by which medicine he cleansed all that foulness and perverse habit of his brain. By this means, also, Ponocrates made him forget all that he had learned under his former preceptors, as Timotheus did to his scholars who had been instructed under other musicians. To do this the better, he was introduced into the company of learned men, which stirred in him an emulation and desire to whet his wit and improve his parts, so that the world might have a value for him. Afterwards he adopted such a course, that he lost not one hour in the day, but employed all his time in learning and honest knowledge. Gargantua awaked about four o'clock in the morning. Whilst they were rubbing him, there was read to him some pages of the Holy Scripture, aloud and clearly, with a pronounciation becoming the matter ; and for this was appointed a young page, born in Basché, named Anagnostes. According to the purpose and argument of that lesson, he oftentimes gave himself to worship, adore, pray, and to supplicate the good God, whose word did show his majesty and marvellous judgment. He then went to the secret places to make excretion of his natural digestions. There his master repeated what had been read, expounding unto him the most obscure and difficult points. On returning, they considered the face of the sky, if it were such as they had observed it the evening preceding, and into what signs the sun was entering, as also the moon for that day. This done, he was apparelled, combed, curled, trimmed, and perfumed, during which time they repeated to him the lessons of the day before. He himself said them by heart, and upon them would ground some practical cases concerning the human state, which he would meditate on sometimes for two or three hours, but ordinarily they ceased as soon as he was fully clothed. Then for three good hours he had a lecture read unto him. This done, they went forth, still conferring on the substance of the lecture, either unto a field near the University, called the Brack, or into the meadows, where they played at the ball, tennis, and at the pile trigone, most gallantly exercising their bodies, as before they had done their minds. All their play was at pleasure, for they left off when they pleased, and that was commonly when they did sweat all over, or were otherwise weary. They were then well wiped and rubbed, changed their shirts, and walking leisurely, went to see if dinner was ready. Whilst they waited for that, they clearly and eloquently pronounced some of the sentences they had retained of the lecture. Meantime Master Appetite came, and then they very orderly sat down at table. At the beginning of the meal, there was read some pleasant history of the warlike actions of former times, until he had taken a glass of wine. Then, if they thought good, they continued reading, or began to discourse merrily together, speaking first of the virtue, propriety, efficacy, and nature of all that was served up at the table : of bread, of wine, of water, of salt, of fleshes, fishes, fruits, herbs, roots, and of their dressing ; by this means he learned, in a little time, all the passages bearing on this to be found in Pliny, Athenæus, Dioscorides, Julius Pollux, Galen, Porphyry, Oppian, Polybius, Heliodorus, Aristotle, Elian, and others. They repeated these things many times, and to be more certain they caused the very books to be brought to the table. And so perfectly did he retain in his memory the things above said, that in those days there was not a physician that knew half so much as he. Afterwards they conferred on the lessons read in the morning, and ending their repast with some conserve or marmalade, he picked his teeth with mastic tooth-pickers, washed his hands and eyes with fair fresh water, and gave thanks to God in some neat hymn made in the praise of the divine bounty and munificence. This done, they brought in cards, not to play, but to learn a thousand pretty tricks and new inventions, which were all based upon arithmetic. By this means he fell in love with that science, and every day after dinner and supper he passed his time in it as pleasantly as he was wont to do at cards and dice; so that at last he understood so well both the theory and practical part thereof, that Tunstal, the Englishman, who had written very largely on that subject, confessed in good truth, that, in comparison of him, he understood no more High Dutch.

And not only in that, but in the other mathematical sciences, such as geometry, astronomy, and music. In waiting on the concoction, and attending the digestion of his food, they made a thousand pretty instruments and geometrical figures, and did in some measure practise the astronomical canons.

After this they recreated themselves with singing, in four or five parts, or upon a set theme or random motif, as it best pleased them; in matter of musical instruments he learned to play the lute, the virginals, the harp, the all-man flute with nine holes, the viol, and the sackbut. This hour thus spent, and digestion finished, he purged his body of natural excrements; then betook himself to his principal study for three hours together or more, as well to repeat his morning lectures as to proceed in the book he had in hand, as also to write neatly, to draw and form the antique and Roman letters. This done they went abroad, accompanied by a young gentleman of Tourain, named the Esquire Gymnast, who taught him the art of riding. Changing then his clothes, he rode a Naples courser, a Dutch roussin, a Spanish gennet, a barbed or trapped steed, then a light fleet horse, to whom he gave a hundred carieres, made him go the high leaps, bounding in the air, free the ditch with a skip, leap over a stile or pale, turn short in a ring, both to the right and left. There he broke not his lance. It is the greatest foolery in the world to say I have broken ten lances at tilt or in fight. A carpenter can do as much. But it is a glorious and praiseworthy action to overthrow ten enemies by breaking one lance. Therefore with a sharp, stiff, strong, and well-steeled lance would he usually force up a door, pierce a harness, beat down a tree, carry away the ring, lift up a cuirassier saddle, with the mail coat and gauntlet. All this he did in complete armour from head to foot. As for the prancing flourishes, and smacking poppisms, for the better cherishing of the horse commonly used in riding, none did them better than he. The great vaulter of Ferrara was but an ape compared to him. He was singularly skilful in leaping nimbly from one horse to another, without putting foot to ground, and these horses were called desultories; he could likewise, from either side, with a lance in his hand, leap on horseback without stirrups, and rule the horse at his pleasure, without a bridle, for such things are useful in military engagements. Another day he exercised the battle-axe, which he so dexterously wielded both in the nimble, strong, and smooth management of that weapon, and in all the feats practisable by it, that he passed knight of arms in the field, and at all essays.

He then tossed the pike, played with the two-handed sword, with the back sword, with the Spanish tuck, the dagger, poniard, armed or unarmed, with a buckler, with a cloak, with a target.

Next he would hunt the hart, the roe-buck, the bear, the fallow deer, the wild boar, the hare, the pheasant, the partridge, and the bustard. He played at the balloon, and made it bound in the air, both with fist and foot. He wrestled, ran, jumped, not at three steps and a leap, nor at the hare's leap, nor yet at the almanes; "for," said Gymnast, "these jumps are for the wars altogether unprofitable, and of no use;" but at one leap he would skip over a ditch, spring over a hedge, mount six paces upon a wall, ramp and grapple after this fashion up against a window of the full height of a lance. He did swim in deep waters on his belly, on his back, sideways, with all his body, with his feet only, with one hand in the air, wherein he held a book, crossing thus the breadth of the river Seine without wetting it, and dragged along his cloak with his teeth, as did Julius Cæsar; then, with the help of one hand, he entered forcibly into a boat, whence he cast himself again headlong into the water, sounded the depths, hollowed the rocks, and plunged into the pits and gulfs. Then he turned the boat about, governed it, led it swiftly or slowly with the stream and against the stream, stopped it in its course, guided it with one hand, and with the other laid hard about him with a huge great oar, hoisted the sail, lied up along the mast by the shrouds, ran upon the edge of the decks, set the compass in order, tackled the bow-lines, and steered the helm. Coming out of the water, he ran furiously up against a hill, and with the same alacrity and swiftness ran down again; he climbed up trees like a cat, and leaped from one to the other like a squirrel; he pulled down the great boughs and branches like another Milo; then with two sharp, well steeled daggers, and two tried bodkins, he would run up by the wall to the very top of a house like a rat ; then suddenly come down from the top to the bottom, with such an even composition of members that by the fall he would feel no harm.

He cast the dart, threw the bar, put the stone, practised the javelin, the boar-spear or partisan, and the halbert ; he broke the strongest bows in drawing, bended against his breast the greatest cross-bows of steel, took his aim by the eye with the hand-gun, and shot well, traversed, and planted the cannon, shot at butt-marks, at the paggay from below upwards, from above downwards, then before him, sideways, and behind him, like the Parthians. They tied a cable rope to the top of a high tower, by one end of which, hanging near the ground, he wrought himself with his hands to the very top ; then upon the same track came down so sturdily and firm, that they could not, on a plain meadow, have run with more assurance. They set up a great pole, fixed upon two trees. There he would hang by his hands, and with them alone, his feet touching at nothing, would go back and fore along the aforesaid rope, with so great swiftness that hardly could one overtake him with running. And then, to exercise his breast and lungs, he would shout like all the devils in hell. I heard him once call Eudemon, from St Victor's gate to Montmertre ; Stentor had never such a voice at the siege of Troy. Then, for the strengthening of his nerves or sinews, they made him two great sows of lead, each of them weighing eight thousand and seven hundred kintals, which they called alteres ; those he took up from the ground, in each hand one, then lifted them up over his head, and held them without stirring, three-quarters of an hour or more, which was an inimitable force. He fought at barriers with the stoutest and most vigorous champions ; and when it came to the cope, he stood so sturdily on his feet that he abandoned himself to the strongest, in case they could remove him from his place, as Milo was wont to do of old ; in whose imitation likewise he held a pomegranate in his hand, to give it unto him that could take it from him. The time being thus bestowed, and himself rubbed, cleansed, wiped, and refreshed with other cloths, he returned fair and softly, and passing through certain meadows, or other grassy places, beheld the trees and plants, comparing them with what is written of them in the books of the ancients, such as Theophrast, Dioscorides, Marinus, Pliny, Nicander, Macer, and Galen, and carried home to the house great handfuls of them, whereof a young page, called Rhizotomos, had charge ; together with little mattocks, pick-axes, grubbing hooks, cabbies, pruning knives, and other instruments requisite for gardening.

Arrived at their lodging, whilst supper was making ready, they repeated certain passages of that which had been read, and then sat down at table. Here remark that his dinner was sober and thrifty, for he did then eat only to prevent the gnawings of his stomach, but his supper was copious and large, for he took then as much as was fit to maintain and nourish him ; which, indeed, is the true diet prescribed by the art of good and sound physic ; although a rabble of logger-headed physicians, nuzzled in the brabbling shop of Sorbonne, counsel the contrary. During that repast was continued the lesson read at dinner, as long as they thought good ; the rest was spent in good discourse, learned and profitable. After they had given thanks, he set himself to sing, and play upon harmonious instruments, or otherwise passed his time at some pretty sports, made with cards or dice, or in practising the feats of legerdemain with cups and balls. There they stayed some nights in frolicking thus, and making themselves merry till it was time to go to bed ; and on other nights they would go make visits unto learned men, or to such as had been travellers in strange and remote countries. When it was full night, before they retired themselves, they went unto the most open place of the house, to see the face of the sky, and there beheld the comets, if any were, as likewise the figures, situations, aspects, opposition, and conjunctions of both fixed stars and planets.

Then with his master did he briefly recapitulate, after the manner of the Pythagoreans, that which he had read, seen, learned, done, and understood, in the whole course of that day. Then they prayed unto God the Creator, in falling down before him, and strengthening their faith towards him, and glorifying him for his matchless bounty ; and giving thanks to him for the time that was past, they recommended themselves to his divine clemency for the future, which done they went to bed, and betook themselves to their repose.

CHAPTER XXIV.

How Gargantua employed his Time in Rainy Weather.

If it happened that the weather was cloudy, rainy, and inclement, all the forenoon was employed according to custom, with this difference only, that they had a good clear fire lighted, to correct the inclemency of the air ; but, after dinner, instead of their wonted exercitations, they remained within doors, and by way of Apothérapie, they amused themselves in the bottling of hay, in the cleaving and sawing of wood, and in threshing sheaves of corn at the barn. Then they studied the art of painting or sculpture, or brought into use the antique play of Tables, as Leonicus has written it, and as our good friend Lascaris plays at it.

In playing, they examined the passages of ancient authors, wherein the said play is mentioned, or any metaphor drawn from it. Similarly they went to see the working of metals, or the casting of great ordnance; how the lapidaries worked, as also the goldsmiths, and cutters of precious stones: nor did they omit to visit the alchymists, money-coiners, upholsterers, weavers, velvet-workers, watchmakers, looking-glass framers, printers, organists, dyers, and other such kind of artificers, and everywhere giving them somewhat to drink, learned and considered the industry and invention of the trade.

They went also to hear the public lectures, the solemn commencements, the repetitions, the declamations, the pleadings of the lawyers, and sermons of evangelical preachers.

He went through the halls and places appointed for fencing, and there tried against the masters themselves all weapons, and showed them by experience that he knew as much in it as (yea more than) they. And, instead of rustivating, they visited the shops of druggists, herbalists, and apothecaries, and carefully considered the fruits, roots, leaves, gums, seeds, the grease and ointments of some foreign parts, as also how they did adulterate them. He went to see the jugglers, tumblers, mountebanks, and considered their cunning, their shifts, their somersaults, and smooth tongue, especially of those of Chauny in Picardy, who are naturally great praters, and skilful concocters of fibs, in matter of green apes.

Returning home, they eat supper more soberly than at other times, and meats more desiccative and extenuating; to the end, that the intemperate moisture of the air, communicated to the body by a necessary confinity, might by this means be corrected; and that they might not receive any inconvenience for want of their ordinary bodily exercise.

Thus was Gargantua governed, and kept on in this course from day to day, and profited, as you understand such a young man of his age and good sense, so kept to his exercise. This, although at the beginning it seemed difficult, became a little after so sweet, so easy, and so delightful, that it seemed rather the recreation of a king than the study of a scholar. Nevertheless, Ponocrates, to divert him from this vehement intension of the spirits, thought fit, once in a month, upon some fair and clear day, to go out in the city betimes in the morning, either towards Gentilly or Boulogne, or to Montrouge, or Charenton bridge, or to Vanves, or St Clou, and there spend all the day long in making the greatest cheer that could be devised, sporting, making merry, drinking a certain quantity, playing, singing, dancing, tumbling in some fair meadow, unnestling of sparrows, taking of quails, and fishing for frogs and crabs.

But, although that day was passed without books or lecture, it was not spent without profit; for in the meadows they usually repeated from memory certain pleasant verses of Virgil's "Agriculture," of Hesiod, and of Politian's "Husbandry;" would broach some witty Latin epigrams, then immediately turn them into roundelays and songs in the French language. In their feasting they would sometimes separate the water from the wine that was therewith mixed, as Cato teacheth de re rustica, and Pliny, with an ivy cup, would wash the wine in a bason full of water, then take it out again with a funnel as pure as ever. They made the water go from one glass to another, and contrived a thousand little automatory engines, that is to say, moving of themselves.

CHAPTER XXV.

How there was Great Strife and Debate raised betwixt the Cake-bakers of Lerné, and those of Gargantua's Country, whereupon were waged Great Wars.

AT that time, which was the season of vintage, at the beginning of autumn, the country shepherds were set to keep the vines, and to hinder the starlings from eating up the grapes. It happened that cake-bakers of Lerné passed along the broad highway, driving unto the city ten or twelve horses loaded with cakes. The said shepherds courteously entreated them to give them some for their money, at the market price. For here it is to be remarked that it is a celestial food to eat for breakfast, hot fresh cakes with grapes, especially the frail clusters, the great red grapes, muscadine, the verjuice grape, and the luskard, for those that are costive; because it will make them gush out, and squirt the length of a hunter's staff, like the very tap of a barrel; and often meaning to let a squib, they consihite themselves, whereupon they are commonly called the vintage squibers.

The cake-bakers were not inclined to grant their request; but, which was worse, insulted them most outrageously, calling them prating gabblers, lickorous gluttons, freckled bitters, mangy rascals, shite-a-bed scoundrels, drunken roysters, sly knaves, drowsy loiterers, slapsauce fellows, slabberdegullion druggels, lubbardly louts, cousening foxes, ruffian rogues, paltry customers, sycophant varlets, drawlatch hoydons, flouting milk-sops, jeering companions, staring clowns, forlorn snakes, ninny lobcocks, scurvy sneaksbies, fondling fips, base loons, saucy coxcombs, idle lusks, scoffing braggards, noddy meacocks, blockish grutnols, doddipol joltheads, jobbermol goosecaps, foolish loggerheads, slutch calf-lollies, grout-head gnatsnappers, lob-dotterels, gaping changelings, codshead loobies, woodcock slangams, ninny-hammer flycatchers, noddipeak simpletons, turgy gut, shitten shepherds, and other such defamatory epithets, saying further, that it was not for them to eat of these dainty cakes, but might very well content themselves with the coarse unraunged bread, or to eat of the great brown household loaf. At this, Forgier (an honest fellow of his person, and a notable springall) made answer calmly, "How long is it since you have got horns, that you are become so proud? Indeed, formerly, you were wont to give us some freely, and will you not now let us have some for our money? This is not the part of good neighbours, neither do we serve you thus when you come hither to buy our good corn, whereof you make your cakes and buns. Besides that, we should have given you to the bargain some of our grapes, but, by my shit, you may chance to repent it, and possibly have need of us another time, when we shall use you after the like manner, and therefore remember it."

Then Marquet, a prime man in the confraternity of the cake-bakers, said unto him, "Yea, sir, thou art pretty well crest-risen this morning, thou didst eat yesternight too much millet and bolymong; come hither, sirrah, I will give thee some cakes." Whereupon Forgier, dreading no harm, in all simplicity went towards him, and drew a sixpence out of his leather satchel, thinking that Marquet would have sold him some of his cakes; but instead of cakes, he gave him such a rude lash with his whip athwart his legs, that the marks remained; then would have fled away, but Forgier cried out as loud as he could, "Oh! murder, murder, help, help, help, help!" and in the meantime threw a great cudgel after him, which he carried under his arm, wherewith he hit him in the coronal joint of his head, upon the crotophic artery of the right side thereof, so forcibly that Marquet fell down from his mare, more like a dead than a living man.

Meanwhile, the farmers and country swains that were watching their walnuts near to that place, came running with their great poles and long staves, and laid on these cake-bakers as if they had been threshing green rye. The other shepherds and shepherdesses, hearing the lamentable shout of Forgier, came with their slings and slackies following them, and throwing great stones at them, as thick as hail. Finally, these overtook them, and wrested from them about four or five dozen of their cakes. Nevertheless, they paid for them the ordinary price, and gave them, over and above, one hundred eggs and three baskets full of mulberries. Then the cake-bakers helped to get Marquet mounted upon his mare again, who was most severely wounded; and forthwith they returned to Lerné, changing the resolution they had to go to Pareille, threatening very sharp and blusteringly the cowherds, shepherds, and farmers of Seville and Sinays. This done, the shepherds and shepherdesses made merry with these cakes and fine grapes, and disported themselves together at the sound of the pretty small pipe, scoffing and laughing at those vain-glorious cake-bakers, who had that day met with mischief for want of crossing themselves with a good hand in the morning. Nor did they forget to apply to Forgier's leg some fair great, red, and medicinal grapes, and so handsomely did they dress it and bind it up that it was quickly cured.

CHAPTER XXVI.

How the Inhabitants of Lerné, by the Commandment of Picrochole their King, assaulted the Shepherds of Gargantua unexpectedly and on a sudden.

THE cake-bakers having returned to Lerné, went, before they either did eat or drink, to the Capitol, and there, before their king, called Picrochole, the third of that name, made their complaint, showing their panniers broken, their caps all crumpled, their coats torn, their cakes taken away, but, above all, Marquet severely wounded, saying that all that mischief was done by the shepherds and herdsmen of Grangousier, near the great highway beyond Seville.

Picrochole grew incontinently angry and furious; and, without asking any farther, what, how, why, or wherefore, commanded the Ban and Arrier Ban to be sounded throughout all his country, that all his vassals, of what condition soever, should, upon pain of the halter, come in the best arms they could to the great place before the castle, at high noon; and, the better to expedite his design, he caused the drum to beat about the town. Whilst his dinner was getting ready, he went himself to see his artillery mounted upon the carriages, to display his colours, and to set up the great royal standard, and wains loaded with store of ammunition both for the field and for the belly, arms and victuals. At dinner he despatched his commissions, and by his express edict my lord Shagrag was appointed to command the vanguard, wherein were numbered sixteen thousand and fourteen arquebusiers, together with thirty thousand and eleven volunteers. The great Touquedillon, master of the horse, had the charge of the ordnance, wherein were reckoned nine hundred and fourteen of brass, in cannons, double-cannons, basilisks, serpentines, culverins, bombardes, falcons, passevolans, spiroles, and other sort of great guns. The rear-guard was committed to the Duke of Scrapegood. In the main battle was the king and the princes of his kingdom. Thus being hastily equipped, before they would set forward, they sent three hundred light horsemen, under the conduct of Captain Swillwind, to discover the country, clear the avenues, and see whether there was any ambush laid for them. But after they had made diligent search, they found all the land round about in peace and quiet, without any meeting or convention at all. Picrochole understanding this, commanded that every one should march speedily under his colours. Then in all disorder, without keeping either rank or file, they took the fields pell mell, wasting, spoiling, destroying, and making havoc of all wherever they went, not sparing poor nor rich, privileged nor unprivileged places, church or laity; drove away oxen and cows, bulls, calves, heifers, wethers, ewes, lambs, goats, kids, hens, capons, chickens, geese, ganders, goslings, hogs, swine, pigs, and the like; beating down the walnuts, plucking the grapes, tearing the hedges, shaking the fruit-trees, and committing such monstrous abuses, that the like was never heard of. Nevertheless, they met with none to resist them, for every one submitted to their mercy; beseeching them that they might be dealt with courteously, in regard that they had always carried themselves as became good and loving neighbours, and that they had never been guilty of any wrong or outrage done upon them, to be thus suddenly surprised, troubled, and disquieted; and that, if they would not desist, God would punish them very shortly. To which expostulations and remonstrances no other answer was made, but that they would teach them a lesson for eating cakes.

CHAPTER XXVII.

How a Monk of Seville saved the Close of the Abbey from being ravaged by the Enemy.

So much they did, and they went on pillaging and stealing, until at length they came to Seville, where they robbed both men and women, and took all they could seize. Nothing was either too hot or too heavy for them. Although the plague was there in the greater part of all the houses, they nevertheless entered everywhere; plundered and carried away all that was within and yet not one of them took any hurt, which is a most wonderful fact. Notwithstanding the curates, vicars, preachers, physicians, chirurgeons, and apothecaries who went to visit, to dress, to cure, to heal, to preach unto, and admonish those that were sick, were all dead of the infection, yet these devilish robbers and murderers caught nò harm at all. Whence comes this to pass (my masters), I beseech you think upon it?

The town being thus pillaged, they went to the abbey, with a horrible noise and tumult, but they found it shut and made fast against them; whereupon the body of the army marched forward towards a ford, called Sue de Vede, except seven companies of foot, and two hundred lancers, who, staying there, broke down the walls of the close, in order to spoil and make havoc of all the vines and vintage within that place. The poor devils of monks knew not in that extremity to which of all their saints they should vow themselves; nevertheless, at all adventures, they rang the bells ad capitulum capitulantes. There it was decreed that they should make a fair procession, supplied with good lectures, prayers, and litanies, contra hostium insidias, and jolly responses pro pace.

There was at that time in the abbey a claustral monk, called Friar John de Entoumeures, young, gallant, frisky, lusty, nimble, quick, active, bold, adventurous, resolute, tall, lean, wide-mouthed, long-nosed, a rare numbler of matins, unbridler of masses, and runner over of vigils; and, to conclude summarily, in a word, a right monk, if ever there was one since the monking world monked a monkery; moreover, a clerk, even to the teeth, in matter of breviary.

This monk, hearing the noise that the enemy made within the enclosure of the vineyard, went out to see what they were doing, and perceiving that they were cutting and gathering the grapes, upon which they depended for all their next year's wine, returned unto the choir of the church, where the other monks were, all amazed and astonished like so many bell-melters, whom, when he heard sing, im, pim, pe, ne, ne, ne, ne, nede, tum ne, num, num, ini, i, mi, co, o, no, o, o, neno ne, no, no, no, rum, nenum, num. "This is," said he, "bien chié chanté, well shit, well sung. By the virtue of God, why do you not sing panniers farewell, vintage is done? The devil snatch me, if they be not already within the middle of our close, and cut so well, both vines and grapes, that, by God's body, there will not be found for these four years to come so much as a gleaning in it. By the belly of Saint James, what shall we (poor devils) drink the while? Lord God! da mihi potum."

Then said the prior of the convent, "What should this drunken fellow do here? Let him be carried to prison for troubling the divine service." "Nay," said the monk, "the wine service? Let us behave ourselves, that it be not troubled; for you yourself, my lord prior, love to drink of the best, and so doth every honest man. Never yet did a man of worth dislike good wine; it is a monastical apophthegm. But these responses that you chant here, by God, are not in season. Wherefore is it that our devotions were instituted to be short in the time of harvest and vintage, and long in the advent and all the winter?"

"The late friar Messepelosse, of good memory, a true, zealous man (or the devil take me) of our religion, told me, and I remember it well, how the reason was, that in this season we might press and make the wine, and in the winter whiff it up. Hark you, my masters, you that love the wine, God's body, follow me, for Saint Anthony burn me as freely as a faggot if they taste one drop of the liquor, that will not now come and fight in defence of the vine. God's belly, the goods of the church! Ha! no, no. What the devil would have Saint Thomas of England died for them: if I die, shall not I be a saint likewise? Yet will not I die for all this, for I shall have it otherwise."

Saying this, he threw off his great habit, and laid hold upon the staff of the cross, which was made of the heart of a sorb-apple-tree, it being of the length of a lance, round, of a full gripe, and a little powdered with flower de luces, almost all defaced and worn out. Thus went he out in a fair long-skirted jacket, putting his frock scarfways athwart his breast, and with his staff of the cross laid on so lustily upon his enemies, who, without any order, or ensign, or trumpet, or drum, were busied in gathering the grapes of the vineyard; for the cornets, guidons, and ensign-bearers had laid down their standards, banners, and colours, by the wall-sides; the drummers had knocked out the heads of their drums on one end, to fill them with grapes; the trumpeters were loaded with great bundles of bunches, and huge knots of clusters. In sum, every one of them was out of array, and all in disorder. He fell, therefore, upon them so rudely, without crying gare, or beware, that he overthrew them like hogs, tumbled them over like swine, striking athwart and alongst, and by one means or other laid so about him, after the old fashion of fencing, that in some cases he beat out their brains, in others he crushed their arms, battered their legs, and bewhacked their sides till their ribs cracked with it; to others again, he unjointed the spondyles of the neck, disfigured their chaps, gashed their faces, made their cheeks hang flapping over their chins, and so swunged and belamed them, that they fell down before him like hay before a mower; to others he spoiled the frame of their kidneys, marred their backs, broke their thigh-bones, pushed in their noses, poached out their eyes, cleft their mandibules, tore their jaws, dashed their teeth into their throat, shook asunder their shoulder-blades, sphacelated their shins, mortified their shanks, inflamed their ankles, heaved off of the hinges their ishies, their sciatica or hip-gout, dislocated the joints of their knees, squattered into pieces the boughs or pestles of their thighs, and so thumped, mauled, and belaboured them everywhere, that never was corn so thick and threefold threshed upon by ploughmen's flails as were the pitifully disjointed members of their mangled bodies, under the merciless baton of the cross.

If any thought to hide himself amongst the thickest of the vines, he laid him squat as a flounder, bruised the ridge of his back, and dashed his reins like a dog. If any thought by his flight to escape, he made his head to fly in pieces by the lamb-doidal commissure. If any one did scramble up into a tree, thinking there to be safe, he rent up his perinee, and impaled him in at the fundament. If any one of his old acquaintance happened to cry out, "Ha, Friar John, my friend; Friar John, quarter, quarter, I yield myself to you; to you I render myself,"—"So thou shalt," said he "per force, and thy soul to all the devils in hell," then suddenly gave him dronos. If any was so rash and full of temerity as to resist him to his face, then it was he did show the strength of his muscles; for without more ado he did transpierce him, by running him at the breast through the mediatestine and the heart. Others, again, he so quashed and bebumped that, with a sound bounce under the hollow of their short ribs, he overturned their stomachs, so that they died immediately. To some, with a smart souse on the epigaster, he would make their midriff swag; then redoubling the blow, gave them such a home push on the navel, that he made their puddings gush out. To others, through their ballocks he pierced their bum-gut, and left not bowel, tripe, nor entrail in their body that had not felt the impetuosity, fierceness, and fury of his violence. Believe that it was the most horrible spectacle that ever one saw. Some cried unto Saint Barbe, others to Saint George. "O, the holy Lady Nytouch," said one, "the good sanctess;" "O, our Lady of Succours," said another, "help, help!" Others cried, "Our Lady of Cunaut, of Loretta, of good tidings, on the other side of the water of Saint Mary-over." Some vowed a pilgrimage to Saint James, and others to the holy handkerchief at Chamberry, which three months after that burnt so well in the fire that they could not get one thread of it saved; others sent up their vows to Saint Cadouin, others to Saint John d'Angelie, and to Saint Eutropius of Xantes; others, again, invoked Saint Mesmes of Chinon, Saint Martin of Candes, Saint Cloud of Sinays, the holy relics of Laurezay, with a thousand other petty little saints and santrels. Some died without speaking, others spoke without dying; some died in speaking, others spoke in dying. Others shouted aloud, "Confession, confession, confiteor, miserere, in manus." So great was the cry of the wounded, that the prior of the abbey with all his monks came forth, who, when they saw these poor wretches so slain amongst the vines, and wounded to death, confessed some of them. But whilst the priests were busy in confessing them, the little monkies ran all to the place where Friar John was, and asked him in what way he would be pleased to require their assistance.

To which he answered, that they should cut the throats of those he had thrown down upon the ground. They presently, leaving their outer habits and cowls upon the rails, began to throttle and make an end of those whom he had already crushed. Can you tell with what instruments they did it? With fair gullicks, which are little hulched-back demi-knives, wherewith the little boys in our country cut ripe walnuts in two.

Meanwhile Friar John, with his formidable staff of the cross, got to the breach which the enemies had made, and there stood to snatch up those that endeavoured to escape. Some of the monkitos carried the standards, banners, ensigns, guidons, and colours, into their cells and chambers, to make garters of them; but when those that had been shriven would have gone out at the gap of the said breach, the sturdy monk quashed and felled them down with blows, saying, "These men have had confession, and are penitent souls; they have got their absolution, and gained pardon; they go into Paradise as straight as a sickle, or as the way is to Faye."

Thus by his prowess and valour were discomfited all those of the army that entered into the close of the abbey, unto the number of thirteen thousand six hundred twenty and two, besides the women and little children, which is always to be understood. Never did Maugis the hermit bear himself more valiantly with his pilgrim's staff against the Saracens, of whom it is written in the Acts of the four sons of Haymon, than did this monk against his enemies with the staff of the cross.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

How Picrochole took by Assault the Rock Clermond, and of Grangousier's unwillingness and aversion to undertake War.

WHILST the monk thus skirmished, as we have said, against those which were entered within the close, Picrochole in great haste passed the ford Vede with all his soldiery, and assailed the rock Clermond, where there was made him no resistance; and because it was already night, he resolved to quarter himself and his army in that town, and to refresh himself of his pugnative choler. In the morning, he stormed and took the bulwarks and castle, which afterwards he fortified with rampiers, and furnished with all ammunition requisite, intending to make his retreat there, if he should happen to be elsewhere worsted ; for it was a strong place both by art and nature, because of its situation.

Let us leave them there, and return to our good Gargantua, who is at Paris, very earnest at the study of good letters and athletical exercitations, and to the good old man Grangousier, his father, who, after supper, warms his ballocks by a good, clear, great fire, and, whilst his chestnuts are a roasting, is very serious in drawing scratches on the hearth with a stick burned at one end, wherewith they stir up the fire, telling to his wife and the rest of the family pleasant old stories and tales of former times.

One of the shepherds who kept the vines, named Pillot, came towards him, and related fully the enormous abuses which were committed, and the excessive spoil that was made by Picrochole, King of Lerné, upon his lands and territories, and how he had pillaged, wasted, and ravaged all the country, except the enclosure at Seville, which Friar John de Entoumeures, to his great honour, had preserved, and that at the same time the said king was in the rock Clermond, and there, with great industry, was strengthening himself and his whole army. "Halas, halas, alas," said Grangousier, "what is this, good people? Do I dream, or is it true what they tell me? Picrochole, my ancient friend, of my own kindred and alliance, comes he to invade me? What moves him? What provokes him? What sets him on? What drives him to it? Who hath given him this counsel? Ho; ho, ho, ho, ho, my God, my Saviour, aid me, inspire me, and advise me what shall I do. I protest, I swear before thee, so be thou favourable to me, if ever I did him or his subjects any damage or displeasure, or committed any the least robbery in his country ; but, on the contrary, I have succoured and succoured him with men, money, friendship, and counsel upon any occasion wherein I could be serviceable to him ; that he hath therefore at this time so outraged and wronged me, cannot be but by the malevolent and wicked spirit. Good God, thou knowest my courage, for nothing can be hidden from thee. If perhaps he be grown mad, and that thou hast sent him hither to me for the re-establishment of his brain, grant me power and wisdom to bring him to the yoke of thy holy will by good discipline. Ho, ho, ho, ho, my good people, my friends, and my faithful servants, must I hinder you from helping me? Alas! my old age required henceforward only rest, and all my life I have laboured for nothing so much as peace. But now I must, I see it well, load with arms my poor, weary and feeble shoulders, and take in my trembling hand the lance and horseman's mace, to succour and protect my poor subjects. Reason will have it so ; for by their labour am I maintained, and with their sweat am I nourished, I, my children, and my family. This notwithstanding, I will not undertake war until I have first tried all the ways and means of peace ; upon that I am resolved."

Then he assembled his council, and proposed the matter, such as it was. It was concluded that they should send some discreet man unto Picrochole, to know why he had thus suddenly broken the peace, and invaded those lands to which he had no right nor title. Furthermore, that they should send for Gargantua and his men, for the preservation of the country, and defence thereof, now at need. All this pleased Grangousier, and he commanded that so it should be done. Presently, therefore, he sent Basque, his lackey, to fetch Gargantua with all diligence. He wrote to him as followeth.

CHAPTER XXIX.

The Tenor of the Letter which Grangousier wrote to Gargantua.

"THE fervency of thy studies did require that I should not in a long time recall thee from that philosophical rest thou now enjoyest, if the confidence reposed in our friends and ancient confederates had not at the present moment disappointed the assurances of my old age. But since such is my fatal destiny, that I should be now disquieted by those in whom I trusted most, I am forced to recall thee to defend the people and goods, which, by the right of nature, belong unto thee. For even as arms are weak abroad if there be not counsel at home, so is that study vain, and counsel unprofitable, which, in a due and convenient time, is not by virtue executed and put in effect. My intention is not to provoke, but appease ; not to assail, but to defend ; not to conquer, but to preserve my faithful subjects and hereditary dominions, into which Picrochole has entered in a hostile manner, without any cause or occasion, and from day to day so pursueth his furious enterprise, that is intolerable to freeborn spirits.

"I have endeavoured to moderate his tyrannical choler, offering him all that which I thought might give him satisfaction ; and oftentimes have I sent lovingly unto him, in order to understand wherein, by whom, and how he found himself to be wronged ; but I could obtain no other answer than that of a mere defiance, and that in my lands he pretended only to the right of a civil correspondency and good behaviour. By this I knew that the eternal God hath given him over to the disposeure of his own free will and his natural passions, which cannot choose but be wicked, if by divine grace it be not continually guided ; and, to contain him within his duty, and bring him to know himself, hath sent him hither to me by a grievous token. However, my beloved son, as soon as thou canst, upon sight of these letters, repair hither with all diligence, to succour, not me so much (which, nevertheless, by natural piety thou oughtest to do) as thine own people, which by reason thou oughtest to save and preserve. The exploit shall be done with as little effusion of blood as is possible ; and, if possible, by means more expedient, by policy and stratagems of war, we will save all the souls, and send them home merry unto their own houses. My dearest son, the peace of Jesus Christ our Redeemer be with thee. Salute Ponocrates, Gymnastes, and Eudemon for me.

Thy father,

GRANGOUSIER.”

CHAPTER XXX.

How Ulrich Gallet was sent unto Picrochole.

THE letter being dictated and signed, Grangousier ordained that Ulrich Gallet, master of the requests, a man wise and discreet, of whose prudence and sound judgment he had made trial in several difficult and debateful matters, to go unto Picrochole, to show what had been resolved amongst them. In that very hour the good man Gallet departed, and having passed the ford, asked the miller in what condition Picrochole was, who answered, “That his soldiers had left neither cock nor hen ; that they had retired and shut up into the rock Clermond, and that he would not advise him to go any further, for fear of the scouts, because they were savagely furious.” This he readily believed, and therefore lodged that night with the miller.

On the morrow he went with a trumpeter to the gate of the castle, and required of the guards whether he might be admitted to speak to the king, of somewhat to his profit. These words being told unto the king, he would by no means consent that they should open the gate ; but, mounting the top of the bulwark, said unto the ambassador, “What is the news ? What have you to say ?” Then the ambassador began to speak as followeth.

CHAPTER XXXI.

The Harangue made by Gallet to Picrochole.

“THERE cannot arise amongst men a juster cause of grief than when they receive hurt and damage, where they may rightly expect favour and goodwill; and not without cause (though without reason) have many, after they had fallen into such a calamitous accident, esteemed this indignity less supportable than the loss of their own lives, insomuch that, if they could not by force of arms, or by other means, correct it, they have deprived themselves of this light.

“It is, then, no wonder that King Grangousier, my master, should be full of high displeasure, and much disquieted in mind, upon thy outrageous and hostile coming. But it would be a marvel if he were not sensible of, and moved unheard by, the abuses and injuries perpetrated by thee and thine upon those of his country, towards whom there hath been no example of inhumanity omitted. This in itself is to him so grievous for the cordial affection wherewith he hath always cherished his subjects, that more it cannot be to any mortal man. Yet in this said human apprehension is it to him the more grievous that these wrongs and sad offences have been committed by thee and thine, who, time out of mind, from all antiquity, thou and thy predecessors, have been in a continual league and amity with him and all his ancestors, which, even until this time, you have, as sacred, together inviolably preserved, kept, and maintained: so well, indeed, that not he and his only, but the very barbarous nations, the Poictevins, Bretons, Manceaux, and those that dwell beyond the isles of the Canaries, and Isabella, have esteemed it as easy to demolish the firmament, and to set up depths above the clouds, as to make a breach in your alliance; and so much have been afraid of it in their enterprises, that they have never dared to provoke, incense, or endamage the one for fear of the other.

“And more. This sacred league hath so filled the world, that there are few nations at this day inhabiting all the continent and isles of the ocean which have not ambitiously aspired to be received into it, upon your own covenants and conditions, holding your joint confederacy in as high esteem as their own territories and dominions. Insomuch that, from the memory of man, there hath not been either prince or league so wild and proud that durst have offered to invade, I say, not your countries, but not so much as those of your confederates. And if by rash counsel they have attempted any new design against them, as soon as they heard the name and title of your alliance, they have suddenly desisted from their enterprises. What rage and madness, therefore, doth now incite thee, all old alliance infringed, all amity trod under foot, and all right violated, thus in a hostile manner to invade his country, without having been by him or his in anything prejudiced, wronged, or provoked? Where is faith? Where is law? Where is reason? Where is humanity? Where is the fear of God? Dost thou think that these outrages are hidden from the eternal spirits, and the Supreme God, who is the just rewarder of all our undertakings? If thou so think, thou deceivest thyself; for all things shall come to pass according to His will.

“Is it thy fatal destiny, or the influence of the stars, that would put an end to thy ease and repose? Yet all things have their end and period. And when they have reached the superlative point, they tumble to ruin; for they cannot long remain in that state. This is the conclusion and end of those who cannot, by reason and temperance, moderate their fortunes and prosperities.

But, if it be predestinated that thy happiness and ease has come to an end, must it needs be by wronging my king—him by whom thou wert established? If thy house must come to ruin, should it, therefore, in its fall, crush the heels of him that set it up? The matter is so unreasonable, and so abhorrent to common sense, that hardly can it be conceived by human understanding; and it is altogether incredible unto strangers, till, by the certain and undoubted effects thereof, it be made apparent that nothing is either sacred or holy to those who, having emancipated themselves from God and reason, do merely follow their own perverse affections.

“If any wrong had been done by us to thy subjects and dominions; if we had favoured those who bear thee ill-will; if we had not assisted thee in thy need; if thy name and reputation had been wounded by us; or (to speak more truly) if the calumniating spirit, tempting to induce thee to evil, had, by false illusions and deceitful fantasies, put into thy conceit the impression of a thought that we had done unto thee anything unworthy of our ancient correspondence and friendship, thou oughtest first to have inquired out the truth, and afterwards, by a seasonable warning, to admonish us thereof; and we should have so satisfied thee, according to thine own heart's desire, that thou shouldest have had occasion to be contented. But, O Eternal God, what is thy enterprise? Wouldest thou, like a perfidious tyrant, thus spoil and dissipate my master's kingdom? Hast thou found him so silly and ignorant that he would not; or so destitute of men and money, of counsel, and skill in military discipline, that he cannot withstand thy iniquitous assaults?

“March hence presently, and to-morrow, some time of the day, retire unto thine own country, without doing any kind of violence or disorderly act by the way. And pay a thousand besans of gold for the depredations thou hast done in his country : the half thou shalt pay to-morrow, and the other half at the ides of May next coming ; meantime leave with us, for hostages, the Dukes of Turnebank, Lowbuttock, and Smalltrash, together with the Prince of Itches, and Viscount Snatchbit."

CHAPTER XXXII.

How Grangousier, to buy Peace, caused the Cakes to be restored.

THE good man Gallet held his peace to this ; but Picrochole to all his discourse answered nothing but "Come and fetch them, come and fetch them ; they have ballocks fair and soft ; they will knead some cakes for you." Then he returned to Grangousier, whom he found upon his knees, bare-headed, crouching in a little corner of his cabinet, praying unto God that he would assuage the choler of Picrochole, and bring him to reason without proceeding by force. When he saw the good man return, he asked him, "Ha, my friend, my friend, what news do you bring me ?" "There is no remedy," said Gallet ; "the man is quite out of his wits, and has forsaken of God." "But, you see," said Grangousier, "my friend, what cause doth he allege for his outrages ?" "He did not show me any cause at all," said Gallet, "unless that, in a great anger, he said something about cakes. I cannot tell whether they have done any wrong to his cake-bakers." "I will," said Grangousier, "know the matter thoroughly before I resolve upon what is to be done further." Then sent he to learn concerning that business, and found it was true that some of his men had taken violently some cakes from Picrochole's people, and that Marquet had received a blow on the head ; that, nevertheless, all was well paid ; that the said Marquet had first hurt Forgier with a stroke of his whip across the legs. It therefore seemed good to his whole counsel that he should defend himself with all his might.

"Notwithstanding all this," Grangousier said, "seeing the question is only about a few cakes, I will endeavour to satisfy him ; for I am very unwilling to wage war against him." He inquired then what quantity of cakes they had taken away, and, learning that it was but some four or five dozen, he commanded five cart-loads of them to be baked that same night, and that there should be one full of cakes made with fine butter, fine yolks of eggs, fine saffron, and fine spice, to be bestowed upon Marquet ; to the latter, likewise, he directed to be given seven hundred thousand and three crowns, to repair his losses, and to satisfy the chirurgion who had dressed his wound; furthermore, he settled upon him and his, for ever, in freehold, the apple-orchard called La Pomardiere. Moreover, he entrusted Gallet with the conveyance and passing of all this. The latter, by the way, made his men gather near the willow trees great store of boughs, canes, and reeds, wherewith all the carriers were enjoined to garnish and deck their carts, and each of them his whip. He himself did the same, thereby to give all men to understand that they demanded but peace, and that they came to buy it.

When they reached the gate, they required to speak with Picrochole, from Grangousier. Picrochole would not so much as let them in, nor go to speak with them; he sent them word that he was busy, and that they should deliver their mind to Captain Touquedillon, who was then planting a piece of ordnance upon the wall. Then said the good man unto him, "My lord, to ease you of all this labour, and to take away all excuses why you may not return unto our former alliance, we now restore unto you the cakes which gave rise to the quarrel. Five dozen of these did our people take away; they were well paid for: we love peace so well that we restore unto you five cart-loads; this cart here is for Marquet, who doth most complain. Besides, to content him entirely, here are seven hundred thousand and three crowns, which I deliver to him; and for the losses he may pretend to have sustained, I resign for ever the farm of the Pomardiere, to be possessed in fee simple by him and his for ever, without the payment of any duty, or acknowledgment of homage, fealty, fine, or service whatsoever; and here is the deed of conveyance; and, for God's sake, let us live henceforward in peace; and go you home merrily into your own country from this place, where you have no right at all, as yourselves must needs confess, and let us be good friends as before."

Touquedillon related all this to Picrochole, and more and more exasperated his courage, saying to him: "These clowns are afraid to some purpose. By God, Grangousier, the poor drinker beshites himself for fear; he is not skilled in warfare, nor hath he any stomach for it; he knows better how to empty the flagons. I am of opinion that we should send back the carts and the money; and for the rest, that very speedily we fortify ourselves here, then prosecute our fortune. What! do they think they have to do with a Ninniewhoop, to feed you thus with cakes? Their design is evident. The good usage and great familiarity which you have heretofore had with them hath made you contemptible in their eyes; ungrateful crew, you return evil for good."

"Sa, sa, sa," said Picrochole, "by Saint James, you are right, do as you say." "One thing I will advise you," said Touquedillon. "Here we are badly victualled, and very slen-derly provided with stores for the mouth. If Grangousier should come to besiege us, I will go presently and pluck out of all your soldiers' heads and mine own all the teeth, except three to each of us, and with them alone we should make an end of our provision but too soon." "We shall have," said Picrochole, "only too much sustenance and feeding stuff. Came we hither to eat or to fight?" "To fight, indeed," said Touquedillon; "yet from the paunch comes the dance, and where famine rules force is exiled."

"Leave off your prating," said Picrochole, "and forthwith seize upon what they have brought." Then he took the money and cakes, oxen and carts, and sent away the messengers, without speaking a word, only that they would come no more so near, for a reason that would be told them the morrow after. Thus, without doing anything, they returned to Grangousier, and related the whole matter, adding that there was no hope left to draw them to peace but by sharp and fierce wars.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

How certain Ministers of Picrochole, through Hair-brained Counsel, put him in Extreme Danger.

THE carts being unloaded, there came before Picrochole the Duke of Small-trash, the Earl Swashbuckler, and Captain Durtaile, who said unto him, "Sir, this day we make you the happiest, the most chivalrous prince that ever was since the death of Alexander of Macedonia." "Be covered, be covered," said Picrochole. "Cry you mercy, sire," said they, "we do but our duty. The matter is thus. You shall leave some captain here to take the charge of this garrison, with a small party for the keeping of the place, which, besides its natural strength, is made stronger by the rampiers and fortresses of your devising. Your army you are to divide into two, as you know very well how to do. One part shall fall upon Grangousier and his forces. In this way he shall be easily, at the first shock, more than routed. Then you shall recover money by heaps, for the clown has enough of it. Clown, we call him, because a noble prince has never a penny. To hoard up treasure is the part of a clown.

"The other part of the army, in the meantime, shall draw towards Onys, Xaintonge, Angoumois, and Gascony, and meet at Perigourt, Medos, and Elanes. Without resistance, you will take towns, castles, and forts. Then march on to Bayonne, Saint John de Luz, Fuentarabia, where you shall seize upon all the ships, and, coasting along Gallicia and Portugal, shall pillage all the maritime places, even unto Lisbon, where you shall be supplied with all necessaries befitting a conqueror. By copsodi ! Spain will yield, for they are but a race of loobies. Then you shall pass the Straits of Gibraltar, where you shall erect two pillars more stately than those of Hercules, in order to perpetuate the memory of your name ; and you shall name the narrow entrance there the Picrochonical Sea.

“ Having passed the Picrochonical Sea, Barbarossa shall yield himself your slave.” “ I will,” said Picrochole, “ give him fair quarter.” “ Of course,” said they, “ provided that he consent to be christened. And you shall conquer the kingdoms of Tunis, of Hippos, Algiers, Bomine, Corode, yea, all Barbary. Passing on, there will fall into your hands Majorca, Minorca, Sardinia, Corsica, with the other islands of the Ligustick and Balcarian Seas. Coasting along on the left hand, you shall subdue all Gallia, Narbonensis, Provence, the Allobrogians, Genoa, Florence, Lucca, and then by God seize Rome. Our poor Monsieur the Pope dies already for fear.” “ By my faith,” said Picrochole, “ I will not then kiss his slipper.”

“ Italy taken, behold Naples, Calabria, Apulia and Sicily, all ransacked, and Malta too. I wish those jovial quondam knights of Rhodes would only come to resist you, that we might see their urine.” “ I would,” said Picrochole, “ very willingly go to Loretta.” “ No, no,” said they, “ we shall take it on our return. Thence we will sail eastwards, and take Candia, Cyprus, Rhodes, and the Cyclade Island, and set upon the Morea. It is ours, by Saint Trenian, the Lord preserve Jerusalem ; for the great Soldan is not comparable to you in power.” “ I will then,” said he, “ cause Solomon’s Temple to be rebuilt.” “ No,” said they, “ not yet ; have a little patience ; never be too rash in your enterprises.

“ Can you tell what Octavian Augustus said, Festina lenté (make haste slowly). It is requisite that you first have the Asia Minor, Carra, Lycia, Pamphylia, Cilicia, Lydia, Phrygia, Mysia, Bithynia, Cara, Zia, Satalia, Samagaria, Castamena, Luga, Sanasta, even unto Euphrates.” “ Shall we see,” said Picrochole, “ Babylon and Mount Sinai ?” “ There is no need,” said they, “ at this time. Have we not hurried up and down, travelled and toiled enough, in having sailed and passed over the Hircanian Sea, marched along the two Armenias and the three Arabias ?” “ By my faith,” said he, “ we have played the fools, and are undone. Ha, poor souls !” “ What’s the matter ?” said they. “ What shall we have,” said he, “ to drink in these deserts ? for Julian Augustus, with his whole army, died there for thirst, as they say.” “ We have already,” said they, “ taken precautions against that. In the Syriac Sea, you have nine thousand and fourteen great ships laden with the best wines in the world ; they are arrived at Port-Joppa ; there you shall find two and twenty thousand camels, and sixteen hundred elephants, which you shall find at one hunting about Sigelmes, when you enter into Lybia ; and, besides, you will have all the Mecca caravan. Will they not furnish you sufficiently with wine ?” “ Yes ; but,” said he, “ we shall not drink it fresh.” “ That,” said they, “ is for a little fish ; but a mighty man, a pretender, one that aspires to the monarchy of the world, cannot always have his ease. God be praised that you and your men are come safe and sound to the banks of the River Tigris.”

“ But,” said he, “ what will that part of our army do, meanwhile which shall overthrow that worthy swill-pot Grangousier ?” “ They will not be idle,” said they ; “ we shall meet with them by-and-by. They shall have won you Brittany, Normandy, Flanders, Hainault, Brabant, Artois, Holland, Zealand ; they have passed the Rhine, over the bellies of the Switzers and Lanskennets, and a party of them has subdued Luxemburg, Lorraine, Champaign, and Savoy, even to Lyons, in which place they have met with your forces returning from the naval conquests of the Mediterranean Sea ; and have rallied again in Bohemia, after they had plundered and sacked Suevia, Wittemberg, Bavaria, Austria, Moravia, and Styria. Then they set fiercely together upon Lubeck, Norway, Swedeland, Rie, Denmark, Guitland, Greenland, the Sterlins, even unto the Frozen Sea. This done, they conquered the Isles of Orkney, and subdued Scotland, England, and Ireland. From there, sailing through the Sandy Sea, and by the Sarmates, they have vanquished and overcome Prussia, Poland, Lithuania, Russia, Wallachia, Transylvania, Hungaria, Bulgaria, Turkieland, and are now at Constantinople.” “ Come,” said Picrochole, “ let us go join them quickly ; for I will be emperor of Trebezonde also. Shall we not kill all these Turk and Mahometan dogs ?” “ What the devil should we do else ?” said they ; “ and you shall give their goods and lands to such as shall have served you honestly.” “ Reason,” said he, “ will have it so ; that is but just. I give unto you Caramania, Suria, of all Palestine.” “ Ah, sir,” said they, “ it is your goodness : grammercy, God grant you may always prosper.”

There was present at the time an old gentleman, well experienced in the wars—a stern soldier named Echephron, who had been in many great hazards, and who, hearing this discourse, said, “ I do verily doubt that all this enterprise will be like the tale of the pitcher full of milk, wherewith a shoemaker made himself rich in conceit ; but, when the pitcher was broken, he had not whereupon to dine. What do you pretend by these large conquests. What shall be the end of such labours and crosses ?” “ Thus it shall be,” said Picrochole, “ that when we return, we shall sit down, rest, and be merry.” “ But,” said

Echephron, "if by chance you should never come back, for the voyage is long and dangerous, were it not better for us to take our rest now than unnecessarily to expose ourselves to so many dangers?" "Oh," said Swashbuckler, "by God, here is a good dotard; come, let us go hide ourselves in the corner of a chimney, and there spend the whole time of our life amongst ladies, in threading pearls, or spinning, like Sardanapalus. 'He that nothing ventures hath neither horse nor mule,' said Solomon." "He who adventureth too much," said Echephron, "loseth both horse and mule," as Malchon answered." "Enough," said Picrochole, "go forward; I fear nothing but that these devilish legions of Grangousier, whilst we are in Mesopotamia, will come on our backs, and charge upon our rear; what remedy then?" "A very good one," said Durtaille; "send a pretty round commission to the Muscovites, and they will bring instantly into the field four hundred and fifty thousand choice fighting men to aid you. Oh, that you would but make me your lieutenant-general, how I should truss up the rogues with discipline! I fret, I charge, I strike, I take, I kill, I slay, I play the devil." "On, on," said Picrochole; "let us make all possible haste, and let him that loves me, follow me."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

How Gargantua left the City of Paris, to succour his Country, and how Gymnast encountered the Enemy.

IN the selfsame hour, Gargantua, who had suddenly left Paris after he had read his father's letters, riding upon his great mare, had already passed the Nunnery bridge. Ponocrates, Gymnast, and Eudemon, in order to follow him, took post-horses; the rest of his train came after by even journeys, bringing with them all his books and philosophical instruments. As soon as he had alighted at Parillé, he was informed by a farmer of Gouget how Picrochole had fortified himself within the rock Clermond, and had sent Captain Tripet with a great army to seize the wood of Vede and Vaugaudry; and that they had already plundered the whole country, not leaving cock or hen, even as far as the wine-press of Billard; and that it was strange and difficult to believe what ravages they had committed over all the land. This so affrighted Gargantua, that he knew not what to say, nor what to do. But Ponocrates persuaded him to go unto the lord of Vauguyon, who at all times had been their friend and confederate, and that by him they should be better advised in their business. This they did immediately, and found him very willing to assist them. He was of opinion that they should send some one of the company to spy out the country ; to learn in what condition and posture the enemy was, that they might take counsel, and so act as befitted the present emergency. Gymnast offered to go ; whereupon it was concluded that, for his safety, and the expedition, he should have with him some one that knew the ways, avenues, turnings, windings, and rivers thereabout. Thereupon he and Prelingot, gentlemen of Vauguyon's horse, set out. They scouted and espied on all sides without any fear. In the meantime, Gargantua took a little refreshment, ate somewhat himself, as did those that were with him, and caused to give to his mare a picotine of oats, that is, threescore and fourteen quarters and three bushels.

Gymnast and his companion rode so long that at last they met with the enemy's forces, all scattered and out of order, plundering, stealing, robbing, and pillaging all they could lay hands on ; and, as far off as they could perceive him, they ran thronging upon the back of one another in all haste towards him, to unload him of his money, and untruss his port-mantles. Then cried he out unto them, " My Masters, I am a poor devil, I desire you to spare me, I have yet one crown left ; come, we must drink it, for it is aurum potabile, and this horse here shall be sold to pay my welcome ; afterwards take me for one of your own, for never yet was there any man that knew better how to take, lard, roast, and dress, yea, by God, to tear asunder and devour a hen, than I can. As for my beverage, I drink to all good fellows." With that he unscrewed his leather bottle, and, without putting in his nose, drank very handsomely. The rogues looked upon him, and opened their throats a foot wide, and put out their tongues like greyhounds, in hopes to drink after him. But Captain Tripet, in the very nick of time, came running up to him to see who it was. To him Gymnast offered his bottle, saying, " Hold, captain, drink boldly and spare not. I have been thy taster ; it is wine of La Fay Monjau." " What," says Tripet, " this fellow gibes and flouts us ; who art thou ?" said Tripet. " I am," said Gymnast, "a poor devil." " Ha," said Tripet, " seeing thou art a poor devil, it is reason that thou shouldst be permitted to go whithersoever thou wilt, for all poor devils pass everywhere without toll or tax ; but it is not the custom of poor devils to be so well mounted, therefore, sir devil, come down, and let me have your horse ; and if he do not carry me well, you, master devil, must do it, for I much prefer that such a devil as you should carry me away."

CHAPTER XXXV.

How Gymnast very nimbly killed Captain Tripet and others of Picrochole's Men.

HEARING these words, some amongst them began to be afraid, and blessed themselves with both hands, thinking, indeed, that he had been a devil disguised; insomuch that one of them, named Good John, captain of the trained bands, took his psalter out of his codpiece, and cried out aloud, "Hagios ho Theos (O mighty Holy One), if thou be of God, speak; if thou be of the other spirit, get thee hence, and be going." Yet he went not away; which words being heard by all the soldiers that were there, divers of them being a little inwardly terrified, departed from the place. All this did Gymnast carefully remark and consider, and therefore making as if he would have alighted from off his horse, as he was poising himself on the mounting side, he most nimbly, with his short sword by his thigh, shifting his feet in the stirrup, performed the stirrup-leather feat, whereby, after the inclining of his body downwards, he forthwith launched himself aloft in the air, and placed both his feet together on the saddle, standing upright, with his back turned towards the horse's head. "Now," said he, "my case goes backward." Then suddenly, in the very same posture wherein he was, he fetched a gambol upon one foot, and, turning to the left hand, failed not to carry his body perfectly round, just into its former position, without missing one jot. "Ha," said Tripet, "I will not do that at this time," and not without cause. "Well," said Gymnast, "I have failed, I will undo this leap;" then, with a marvellous strength and agility, turning towards the right hand, he performed another frisking gambol as before; which done, he set his right thumb upon the hind bow of the saddle, raised himself up, and sprung in the air, poising and upholding his whole body upon the muscle and nerve of the said thumb, and so turned and whirled himself about three times. At the fourth, reversing his body, and turning upside down, and foreside back, without touching anything, he brought himself betwixt the horse's two ears, springing with all his body into the air, upon the thumb of his left hand, and in that posture, turning like a windmill, did most actively do that trick which is called the millers' pass. After this, clapping his right hand flat upon the middle of the saddle, he gave himself such a jerking swing, that he thereby seated himself upon the crupper, after the manner of gentlewomen.

This done, he easily passed his right leg over the saddle, and placed himself like one that rides in croup. "But," said he, "it were better for me to get into the saddle;" then putting the thumbs of both hands upon the crupper before him, and thereupon leaning himself, as upon the only supports of his body, he incontinently turned heels over head in the air, and straightway found himself betwixt the bow of the saddle, in a good seat. Then, with a somersault, springing into the air again, he alighted to stand with both his feet close together upon the saddle, and there made above an hundred frisks, turns, and demi-pommads, with his arms held out across, and, in so doing, cried out aloud, "I rage, I rage, devils, I am stark mad; devils, I am mad; hold me, devils, hold me; hold, devils, hold, hold!"

Whilst he was thus vaulting, the rogues in great astonishment, said to one another, "By God, he is a goblin or a devil thus disguised; ab hoste maligno libera nos, domine," and ran away as in a total rout, looking now and then behind them like a dog which was running away with a pudding.

Then Gymnast, seeing his advantage, alighted from his horse, drew his sword, and laid on heavy blows upon the thickest and highest-crested amongst them, and overthrew them in great heaps, hurt, wounded, and bruised, being resisted by nobody, they thinking he had been a starved devil, as well in regard to his wonderful feats in vaulting, which they had seen, as for the talk Tripet had with him, calling him poor devil. Only Tripet would have traitorously cleft his head with his fanchion; but he was well armed, and did not feel the blow, only the weight of the stroke; whereupon, turning suddenly about, he gave Tripet a home-thrust, and, upon the back of that, whilst he was about to ward his head from a slash, he ran him in at the breast with a hit, which at once cut his stomach, the colon, and the half of his liver, whereupon he fell to the ground; and, in falling, there gushed forth above four pottles of pottage, and his soul mingled with the pottage.

This done, Gymnast discreetly withdrew himself, considering that a case of great adventure and hazard should not be pursued to its utmost; and that it becomes all cavaliers modestly to use their good fortune, without troubling or pursuing it too far. And, mounting horse, he gave him the spur, taking the right way unto Vauguyon, and Prelingot with him.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

How Gargantua demolished the Castle of Vede, and how they passed the Ford.

HAVING returned, he related the estate and condition in which they had found the enemy, and the stratagem which he alone had used against all the multitude; affirming that they were but rascally rogues, plunderers, thieves, and robbers, ignorant of all military discipline; and that they might boldly set forward, it being an easy matter to fell and strike them down like beasts. Then Gargantua mounted his great mare, accompanied, as we have said before, and finding in his way a high and great tree (which commonly was called Saint Martin's tree, because heretofore Saint Martin planted a pilgrim's staff there, which grew to that height and greatness), said, "This is what I lacked; this tree shall serve me both for a staff and lance." With that he pulled it up easily, plucked off the boughs, and trimmed it at his pleasure. In the meantime his mare made water to ease her belly, but it was in such abundance that it did overflow the country seven leagues, and all the flood ran glib away towards the ford of Vede, wherewith the water was so swollen that all the forces the enemy had there were with great horror drowned, except some who had taken the way on the left hand towards the hills. Gargantua, on reaching the wood of Vede, was informed by Eudemon that there was some remainder of the enemy within the castle; which to make sure of, Gargantua cried out as loud as he was able, "Are you there, or are you not there? If you be there, be there no more; and if you be not there, I have no more to say." But a ruffian gunner at the portcullis let fly a cannon-ball at him, and hit him most furiously on the right temple of his head, yet did him no more hurt than if he had but cast a grape-stone at him. "What is this?" said Gargantua. "Do you throw at us grape-stones? The vintage shall cost you dear," thinking indeed that the bullet had been the stone of a grape.

Those who were within the castle, till now busy at the pillage, when they heard this noise, ran to the towers and fortresses, whence they shot at him above nine thousand and five and twenty falcon-shot and harbuscades, aiming all at his head; and so thick did they shoot at him, that he cried out, "Ponocrates, my friend, these flies are like to put out mine eyes; give me a branch of those willow trees to drive them away," thinking that the bullets and stones shot out of the great ordnance had been but dun-flies. Ponocrates looked and saw there were no flies, but great shot which they had shot from the castle. Then was it that he rushed with his great tree against the castle, and with mighty blows overthrew both towers and fortresses, and laid all level with the ground, by which means all that were within were slain and broken in pieces.

Going thence, they came to the bridge at the mill, where they found all the ford covered with dead bodies, so thick that they had choked up the mill, and stopped the current of its water; and these were those that were destroyed in the urinal deluge of the mare. There they were at a stand, consulting how they might pass without hindrance from these dead carcasses. But Gymnast said, "If the devils have passed there, I will pass safely enough." "The devils have passed there," said Eudemon, "to carry away the damned souls." "By Saint Rhenian," said Ponocrates, "then by necessary consequence he shall pass there." "Yes, yes," said Gymnast, "or I shall stick in the way. Then, putting spurs to his horse, he passed through freely, his horse not fearing, nor being at all affrighted at the sight of the dead bodies; for he had accustomed him, according to the doctrine of Ælian, not to fear armour, nor the carcasses of dead men; and that not by killing men, as Diomedes did the Thracians, or as Ulysses did in throwing the corpse of his enemies at his horse's feet, as Homer saith, but by putting a Jack-a-lent amongst his hay, and making him go over it ordinarily when he gave him his oats.

The other three followed him very close, except Eudemon only, whose horse's far fore-foot sunk up to the knee in the paunch of a great fat chuff, who lay there upon his back drowned, and could not get it out. There was he pestered, until Gargantua, with the end of his staff, thrust down the rest of the villain's tripe into the water, whilst the horse pulled out his foot. Here is a singular fact in hippiatry. The said horse was thoroughly cured of a ringbone which he had in that foot by this touch of the burst guts of that great looby.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

PASSING the river of Vede, they came very shortly after to Grangousier's castle, who eagerly waited for them. At their coming there was such hugging and embracing that never was seen a more joyful company; for supplementum, supplementi chronicorum says that Gargamelle died there and then with joy. For my part, I truly cannot tell, neither do I care very much for her, nor for anybody else. The truth was that Gargantua, in shifting his clothes and combing his head with a comb nine hundred feet long, and the teeth all tusks of elephants, whole and entire, he made fall at every rake above seven balls that stuck in his hair at the razing of the castle at the wood of Vede. His father Grangousier seeing this, thought that they had been lice, and said unto him, "What, my dear son, hast thou brought us thus far some short-winged hawks of the college of Montague? I did not mean that thou shouldest reside there." Then answered Ponocrates, "My sovereign lord, think not that I have placed him in that lousy college, which they call Montague; I had rather have put him amongst the grave-diggers of Saint Innocent, so enormous is the cruelty and villainy that I have known there; for the galley-slaves are far better used amongst the Moors and Tartars, the murderers in the criminal dungeons, yea, the very dogs in your house, than are poor wretched students in the aforesaid college. And were I King of Paris, the devil take me if I would not set it on fire, and burn both principal and regents, for suffering this inhumanity to be practised before their eyes." Then, taking up one of these bullets, he said, "These are cannon-shot, which your son Gargantua hath lately received by the treachery of your enemies, as he was passing before the wood of Vede.

"But they have been so rewarded that they are all destroyed in the ruin of the castle, as were the Philistines by the policy of Samson, and those whom the tower of Siloam slew, as it is written, Luke xiii. My opinion is, that we pursue them whilst the luck is on our side, for Occasion hath all her hair on her forehead; when she is past, you may not recall her; she is bald in the hind part of her head, and never returneth again." "Truly," said Grangousier, "it shall not be at this time, for I will make you a feast this night, and bid you welcome."

This said, they made ready supper, and, over and above his daily fare, there were roasted sixteen oxen, three heifers, two and thirty calves, threescore and three fat kids, fourscore and fifteen wethers, three hundred barrow pigs soused in sweet wine, eleven score partridges, seven hundred snipes and woodcocks, four hundred London and Cornwall capons, six thousand pullets, and as many pigeons, six hundred stuffed hens, fourteen hundred leverets, three hundred and three buzzards, and one thousand and seven hundred cockerels. As for venison, they could not so readily procure it, only eleven wild boars, which the Abbot of Turpenay sent, and eighteen fallow deer, which the Lord of Grammont bestowed; together with seven score pheasants, which were sent by the Lord of Essars, and some dozens of quests, cushots, ring-doves, and woodculvers; river fowl, teals and awteals, bitterns, courtes, plovers, Francolins, briganders, tyrasons, young lapwings, tame ducks, shovelers, woodlanders, herons, moor-hens, criels, storks, canepetiers, oranges, flamans, which are phænicopters, terrigoles, turkeys, arbens, coots, solingeese, curlews, termagants, and water-wagtails, with a great supply of cream, curds, and fresh cheese, and store of soup, pottages, and brewis, with variety. Without doubt there was meat enough, and it was handsomely dressed by Snap-sauce, Hotch-pot, and Braverjuice, Grangousier's cooks. Jenken, Trudge-a-pace, and Clean-glass, were very careful to fill up their glasses.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

How Gargantua did eat up Six Pilgrims in a Salad.

IT is now necessary that we relate what happened unto six pilgrims, who came from Sebastian near to Nantes, and who, for shelter that night, being afraid of the enemy, had hid themselves in the garden upon the chicheling pease, among the cabbages and lettuces. Gargantua, finding himself somewhat dry, asked whether they could get any lettuce to make him a salad; and hearing that there were in garden the greatest and fairest in the country (for they were as tall as plum trees or as walnut trees), he went thither himself, and brought in his hand what he thought good, and withal carried away the six pilgrims, who were in so great fear they did not dare to speak nor cough.

Washing them, therefore, first at the fountain, the pilgrims said one to another softly, "What shall we do? We are almost drowned here amongst these lettuces. Shall we speak? But if we speak, he will kill us for spies." As they were thus deliberating what to do, Gargantua put them with the lettuce into a platter of the house as large as the huge tun of the Cistertians, which being done up with oil, vinegar, and salt, he eat them up, to refresh himself a little before supper, and had already swallowed up five of the pilgrims, the sixth being in the platter, totally hid under a lettuce, except his staff that appeared, and nothing else. Grangousier seeing this, said to Gargantua, "I think that is the horn of a shell snail, do not eat it." "Why not?" said Gargantua; "they are good all this month," which he had no sooner said, than drawing up the staff, and therewith taking up the pilgrim, he eat him without much ado, then drank a terrible draught of excellent white wine, and expected supper to be brought up.

The pilgrims, thus devoured, made shift to save themselves as well as they could, by withdrawing their bodies out of the reach of his teeth, but could not help thinking they had been put in the lowest dungeon of a prison. And when Gargantua whiffed the great draught, they thought they would have been drowned in his mouth, and the flood of wine almost carried them away in the gulf of his stomach. Nevertheless, skipping with their staves, as Saint Michael's palmers used to do, they sheltered themselves from the danger of that inundation under the banks of his teeth. But one of them by chance, groping or sounding the country with his staff, to try whether they were in safety or no, struck hard against the cleft of a hollow tooth, and hit the mandibulary sinew or nerve of the jaw, which put Gargantua to very great pain, so that he began to cry for the rage that he felt. To ease himself, therefore, of his smarting ache, he called for his tooth-picker, and, rubbing towards a young walnut tree, unvested my gentlemen pilgrims. He caught one by the legs, another by the scrip, another by the pocket, another by the scarf, another by the band of the breeches, and the poor fellow that had hurt him with the staff, he hooked him by the codpiece, which snatch nevertheless did him a great deal of good, for it broke upon him a pocky botch he had in the groin, which grievously tormented him ever since they were past Ancenis. The pilgrims, thus dislodged, ran across the plain at a pretty fast pace, and the pain ceased, even just at the time when by Eudemon he was called to supper, for all was ready. "I will go, then," said he, "and piss away my misfortune," which he did in such copious measure that, the urine taking away the feet from the pilgrims, they were carried along with the stream unto the bank of a tuft of trees; upon which, as soon as they had taken footing, and having for their self-preservation run a little out of the road, they on a sudden fell all six, except Fourniller, into a trap that had been made to take wolves by a train; out of which they escaped nevertheless by the industry of the said Fourniller, who broke all the snares and ropes. They lay all the rest of that night in a lodge near Coudry, where they were comforted in their miseries by the gracious words of one of their company, called Sweertogo, who showed them that this adventure had been foretold by the prophet David in the Psalms. "Quum exurgerent homines in nos, fortè vivos deglutissent nos; when we were eaten in the salad, with salt, oil, and vinegar. Quum irasceretur furor eorum in nos, forsitan aqua absorbuisset nos; when he drank the great draught. Torrentem pertransiuit anima nostra; when the stream of his water carried us to the thicket. Forsitan pertransisset anima nostra aquam intolerabilem; that is, the water of his urine, the flood whereof cutting our way, took our feet from us. Benedictus dominus qui non dedit nos in captionem dentibus eorum: anima nostra sicut passer erepta est de laqueo venantium; when we fell in the trap. Laqueus contritus est, by Fourniller. Et nos liberati sumus. Adjutorium nostrum, etc."

CHAPTER XXXIX.

How the Monk was feasted by Gargantua, and of the Jovial Discourse they had at Supper.

WHEN Gargantua was at table, and a few morsels had been devoured, Grangousier began to relate the source and cause of the war which had broken out between him and Picrochole, and to tell how Friar John of des Entoumeures, the Funnel, had triumphed at the defence of the close of the abbey, and extolled him for his valour above Camillus, Scipio, Pompey, Cæsar, and Themistocles. Gargantua then desired that the friar might be immediately sent for, to the end that with him they might consult of what was to be done. By joint consent the maître d'hôtel went for him, and brought him along merrily, with his staff of the cross upon Grangousier's mule. When he had come, a thousand huggings, a thousand embracements, a thousand good-days were given. "Ha, Friar John, my friend, Friar John, my brave cousin, Friar John, from the devil, let me clip thee about the neck; let me have thee in my arms; I must gripe thee, my heart, my ballocks, till thy back crack;" and Friar John, the gladdest man in the world, never was man made more welcome, never was any more courteously and graciously received.

"Come, come," said Gargantua, "a stool here close by me at this end." "With all my heart," said the monk, "seeing you will have it so." "Some water, page; fill, my boy, fill, it is to refresh my liver." "Give me some, child, to gargle my throat withal. Depositâ cappâ," said Gymnast; "let us pull off this frock." "Ho, by God, gentlemen," said the monk, "there is a chapter in Statutis Ordinis which opposeth my laying it down." "Pish," said Gymnast, "a fig for your chapter. This frock breaks both your shoulders; put it off." "My friend," said the monk, "let me alone with it, for, by God, I'll drink the better with it; it makes all my body jocund: if I should lay it aside, the waggish pages would cut to themselves garters out of it, as I was once served at Coulaines; and, what is worse, I should lose my appetite, but if in this habit I sit down at table, I will drink, by God, both to thee and thy horse, and so courage, frolic. God save the company, I have already supped, yet I will eat never a whit the less for that, for I have a paved stomach; as hollow as Saint Benet's boots, always open like a lawyer's pouch. Of all fishes but the tench, take the wing of a partridge, or the thigh of a nun: doth not he die like a good fellow that dies with a stiff sugar-stick? Our prior loves exceedingly the white of a capon." "In that," said Gymnast, "he does not resemble the foxes; for of the capons, hens, and pullets which they carry away, they never eat the white." "Why?" said the monk. "Because," said Gymnast, "they have no cooks to dress them, and if they be not properly made ready, they remain red and not white; the redness of meats being a token that they have not enough of the fire, except the shrimps, lobsters, crabs, and crayfishes, which are cardinalised with boiling." "By the God bayard," said the monk, "the porter of our abbey then has not his head well-boiled, for his eyes are as red as a mazer made of an alder tree. The thigh of this leveret is good for those that have the gout. Some natural philosophy; ha, ha, what is the reason that the thighs of a gentlewoman are always fresh and cool?" "This problem," said Gargantua, is neither in Aristotle, in Alexander Aphrodiseus, nor in Plutarch." "There are three causes," said the monk, "by which that place is naturally refreshed. First, because the water runs all along it. Second, because it is a shady place, obscure and dark, upon which the sun never shines. And thirdly, because it is continually blown upon by the winds of the hole arstic, by the smoke from the back-door, and flipflat of the cod-piece. And lusty my lads. Page, some liquor; so crack, crack, crack. Oh what a good God have we, that gives us this excellent juice. I call him to witness, if I had been in the time of Jesus Christ, I would have kept him from being taken by the Jews in the garden of Olivet. Again, the devil fail me, if I should have failed to cut off the hams of these gentlemen apostles who ran away so basely after they had so well supped, and left their good master in the lurch. I hate that man worse than poison that offers to run away when he should fight. Oh that I were but King of France for fourscore or an hundred years! By God! I should whip like curtailed dogs these run-aways of Pavia. A plague take them, why did they not choose rather to die there than to leave their good prince in that pinch and necessity? Is it not better and more honourable to perish in fighting valiantly, than to live in disgrace by cowardly running away? We are not like to eat any great store of goslings this year, therefore, friend, reach me some of that roasted pig there.

"The devil, is there no more must? No more sweet wine? Germinavit radix jesse. I renounce my life, I die for thirst. This wine is none of the worst; what wine drank you at Paris? I give myself to the devil, if I did not keep open house at Paris for all comers for six months together. Do you know Friar Claude of the High Kilderkins? Oh the good fellow that he is! But what fly hath stung him of late, he is become so hard a student? For my part, I study not at all. In our abbey we never study, for fear of the mumps. Our late abbot was wont to say that it is a monstrous thing to see a learned monk; by God, master, my friend, magis, magnos, clericos, non sunt, magis magnos sapientes. You never saw so many hares as there are this year. I could not anywhere come by a goshawk, nor tassel of falcon; my lord Beloniere promised me a hawk, but he wrote to me not long ago that he had become pursy. The partridges will so multiply henceforth, that they will nearly eat up our ears; I take no delight in the stalking-horse, for I catch such cold, that I am like to founder at that sport; if I do not run, toil, travel, and trot about, I am not well at ease. True it is, that in leaping over hedges and bushes my frock leaves always some of its wool behind it. I have recovered a dainty greyhound; I will send him to the devil if he suffer a hare to escape him. A groom was leading him to my lord Hunt-little, and I robbed him of him; did I ill?" "No, Friar John," said Gymnast, "no, by all the devils that are, no." "So," said the monk, "do I attest these same devils so long as they last. Virtue God, what could that gouty limpard have done with so fine a dog? By the body of God, he is better pleased when one presents him with a good yoke of oxen." "How now," said Ponocrates, "you swear, Friar John." "It is only," said the monk, "but to grace and adorn my speech; they are colours of a Ciceronian rhetoric."

CHAPTER XL.

Why Monks are the Outcasts of the World, and wherefore some have Bigger Noses than others.

"By the faith of a Christian," said Eudemon, "I am ecstatic when I consider what an honest fellow this monk is, for he makes us all merry. How is it, then, that they exclude the monks from all good companies, calling them feast-troublers, as the bees drive away the drones from their hives? Ignavum fucos, pecus, said Maro, à præsepibus arcent." "Hereunto," answered Gargantua, "there is nothing so true as that the frock and cowl draw to them the opprobries, injuries, and maledictions of the world, just as the wind called Cecias attracts the clouds; the peremptory reason is because they eat the ordure of the world, that is to say, they feed upon the sins of the people; and, like dung-chewers, they are cast into the privies ; that is, the convents and abbeys, separated from civil conversation, as the privies and retreats of a house are. But if you conceive how an ape in a family is always mocked, and provokingly incensed, you shall easily apprehend how monks are shunned of all men, both young and old : the ape keeps not the house as a dog does ; he draws not in the plough as the ox ; he yields neither milk nor wool as the sheep ; he carries no burthen as a horse does. That which he does is only to conshit, spoil, and defile all, which is the cause wherefore he hath of all men mocks, frumperies, and bastinadoes.

“ After the same manner a monk (I mean those little, idle, lazy monks) does not labour and work as do the peasant and artificer, does not ward and defend the country as does the man of war, cure not the sick and diseased as the physician does, does neither preach nor teach as do the evangelical doctors and schoolmasters, does not import commodities and things necessary for the commonwealth as the merchant does ; therefore is it that by and of all men they are hooted at, hated, and abhorred.” “ Yea, but,” said Grangousier, “ they pray to God for us.” “ Nothing less,” answered Gargantua ; “ true it is, with a tingle tangle, jangling of bells, they trouble and disquiet all their neighbours about them.” “ Right,” said the monk, “ a mass, a matin, a vesper well rung is half said.” “ They mumble out great store of legends and psalms, by them not at all understood, they say many patenôtres, interlarded with ave maries, without thinking upon, or apprehending the meaning of what it is they say, which truly I call mocking of God, and not prayers. But so help them God, as they pray for us, and not for being afraid to lose their victuals, their manchets, and good fat pottage. All true Christians, of all estates and conditions, in all places and at all times, send up their prayers to God, and the spirit prays and intercedes for them, and God is gracious to them. Now such a one is our good Friar John, therefore every man desires to have him in his company. He is no bigot, he is not for division ; he is an honest heart, plain, resolute, good fellow ; he travels, he labours, he defends the oppressed, comforts the afflicted, helps the needy, and keeps the close of the abbey.” “ I do,” said the monk, “ a great deal more than that ; for whilst we are dispatching our matins and anniversaries in the choir, I make withal some cross-bow strings, polish glass bottles and boulds ; I twist lines, and weave pursenets, wherein to catch conies. I am never idle ; but hola, fill, fill, some drink, some drink ; here, bring the fruit ; these chestnuts are of the wood of Estrox, and, with good new wine, will make you a composer of bum-sonnets. You are not well liquored ; by God, I drink at all fords like a proctor’s horse.” “ Friar John,” said Gymnast, “ take away the snot that hangs at your nose.” “ Ha, ha,” said the monk, “ am I not in danger of drowning, seeing I am in water even to the nose ?” “ No, no,

"Oh, my friend, he that hath winter boots made of such leather, may boldly fish for oysters, for they will never take water." "What is the cause," said Gargantua, "that Friar John hath such a goodly nose?" "Because," said Grangousier, "that God would have it so, who frameth us in such form, and for such end, as is most agreeable to his divine will, even as a potter fashioneth his vessels." "Because," said Ponocrates, "he came with the first to the fair of noses, and therefore made choice of the fairest and the greatest." "Pish," said the monk, "that is not the reason of it; but according to the true monastical philosophy, it is because my nurse had soft teats, by virtue whereof, whilst she gave me suck, my nose did sink in, as in so much butter. The hard breasts of nurses make children short nosed. But, hey dey, ad formam nasi cognoscitur ad te levavi. I am for no sweet stuff with my tipple, boy: Item, rather some toasts."

CHAPTER XLI.

How the Monk made Gargantua sleep, and of his Hours and Breviaries.

SUPPER ended, they consulted on the business in hand, and concluded that about midnight they should fall unawares upon the enemy, to know what manner of watch and ward they kept; and that they should meanwhile take a little rest, the better to refresh themselves. But Gargantua could not sleep, no matter on which side soever he turned himself. The monk said to him, "I never sleep soundly but when I am at sermon or prayers. Let us begin, you and I, the seven penitential psalms, to try whether you shall not quickly fall asleep." The conceit pleased Gargantua very well, and beginning the first of these psalms, as soon as they came to beati quorum they both fell asleep. But the monk for his being formerly accustomed to the hour of claustral matins, failed not to awake before midnight. Having awaked, he awoke all the rest, by singing aloud, and with a full clear voice, the song—

"Awake, O Reinian, awake, Awake, O Reinian, ho:
Get up, you no more sleep must take,
Get up, for we must go."

When they were all roused and up, he said, "My masters, it is a usual saying, that we begin matins with coughing, and supper with drinking; let us now, in doing the contrary, begins our matins with drinking, and at night, before supper, we shall cough as hard as we can." "What!" said Gargantua, "to drink so soon after sleep, this is not to live by the rule of physicians; for you ought first to scour and cleanse your stomach of superfluities and excrements." "That is," said the monk, "good medicine; a hundred devils leap into my body if there be not more old drunkards than old physicians. I have made this paction and covenant with my appetite, that it always lies down and goes to bed with me, for of that I take very good care, and then it also rises with me the next morning. Tend your cures as much as you will, I will get me to my tiring." "What tiring do you mean?" said Gargantua. "My breviary," said the monk, "for just as the falconers, before they feed their hawks, do make them tire at a hen's leg, to purge their brains of phlegm, and sharpen them to a good appetite; so, by taking this jolly little breviary in the morning, I scour all my lungs, and find myself ready to drink."

"After what manner," said Gargantua, "do you say these fair hours of yours?" "After the manner of Fecan," said the monk, "by three psalms and three lessons, or nothing all, he that will. I never tie myself to hours. The hours are made for the man, and not the man for the hours; therefore is it that I make my prayers in fashion of stirrup-leathers—I shorten or lengthen them when I think good. Brevis oratio penetrat cœlos, et longa potatio evacuat scyphos." "Where is that written?" "By my faith," said Ponocrates, "I cannot tell, my pillicock, but thou art worth gold." "Like you, sir," said the monk. "But venite, apotemus."

Then they made ready rashers on the coals in abundance, and good fat brews with sippets, and the monk drank at pleasure. Some kept him company, and did as he did; others let it alone. Afterwards every man began to arm and equip himself for battle, and they armed the monk against his will, for he desired no other armour for back and breast but his frock, nor any other weapon in his hand but the staff of the cross; yet, as they desired it, he armed cap-à-pie, and mounted one of the best horses in the kingdom, with a good slashing sabre by his side. Beside him were Gargantua, Ponocrates, Gymnast, Eudemon, and five-and-twenty more of the most resolute and adventurous of Grangousier's house, all armed at proof, with their lances in their hands, mounted like Saint George, each having an arquebuse in his crupper.

CHAPTER XLII.

How the Monk encouraged his Fellow Champions, and how He hanged upon a Tree.

THUS went forth those valiant champions on their adventure, fully resolved to know what enterprise they should undertake, and what to be aware of in the day of the great and horrible battle. And the monk encouraged them, saying, "My children, do not fear nor doubt, I will conduct you safely. God and Saint Benedict be with us. If I had strength corresponding to my courage, by 'sdeath I would plume them for you like ducks. I fear nothing but the great ordnance; yet I know a prayer, which the sub-sexton of our abbey taught me, that will preserve a man from the violence of guns and all manner of fire-engines; but it will do me no good, because I do not believe it. However, my staff of the cross will fence the devil. By God, whoever is a duck amongst you, I give myself to the devil, if I do not make a monk of him in my stead, and swaddle him within my frock, the strongest medicine for cowardice amongst men.

"Did you never hear of the greyhound of my lord Meurles, which was not worth a straw in the fields? He put a frock about his neck; by the body of God, there was neither hare nor fox that could escape him; and, what is more, he lined all the bitches in the country, though before that he was feeble-reined, and ex frigidis et maleficiates (impotent)."

The monk uttering these words in anger as he passed under a walnut tree, in his way towards the causey, he broached the vizor of his helmet on the stump of a great branch of the tree; nevertheless, he set his spurs so fiercely to the horse, who was full of mettle, and sensitive to the spur, that he bounded forwards, and the monk, going about to ungrapple his vizor, let go his hold of the bridle, and so hung by his hand upon the bough, whilst his horse stole away from under him. By this means was the monk left hanging on the walnut tree, and crying for help: "Murder! murder!" and swearing also that he was betrayed. Eudemon perceived him first, and calling Gargantua, said, "Sir, come and see Absalom hanging." Gargantua being come, considered the countenance of the monk, and in what posture he hanged; wherefore he said to Eudemon, "You were mistaken in comparing him to Absalom, for Absalom hung by his hair, but this shaveling monk hangeth by the ears." "Help me," said the monk, "in the devil's name; is this a time for you to flout? You seem to me the secretalist preachers, who say, 'that whosoever shall see his neighbour in danger of death, ought upon pain of trisulk (three pointed thunder) excommunication, rather to admonish him to make confession, and put his conscience in the state of grace, than to help him.' And, therefore, when I shall see them fallen into a river, and ready to be drowned, instead of lending them my hand and pulling them out, I shall make them a fine long sermon, de contemptu mundi, et fuga seculi, and when they are stark dead, then go to fish for them." "Be quiet," said Gymnast, "and stir not, my minion. I am now coming to unhang thee, for thou art a pretty little gentle Monachus: Monachus in clauastro non valet ova duo; sed quando est extra bene valet triginta. I have seen above five hundred hanged, but I never saw any hang with so good a grace; truly, if I had so good a one, I would willingly hang thus all my lifetime." "What!" said the monk; "have you almost done preaching? Help me, in the name of God, seeing you will not in the name of the other spirit, or, by the habit which I wear, you shall repent it. Tempore et loco prelibatis."

Then Gymnast alighted from his horse, and climbing up the walnut tree, lifted up the monk with one hand, by the gushets of his armour under the armpits, and with the other undid his vizor from the stump of the broken branch; which done, he let him fall to the ground, and himself after. As soon as the monk was down, he put off all his armour, and threw away one piece after another about the field, and seizing again his staff of the cross, remounted his horse, which Eudemon had caught in his running away. Thus they set out merrily, keeping to the highway.

CHAPTER XLIII.

How the Scouts and Fore-Party of Picrochole were met with by Gargantua, and how the Monk slew Captain Drawforth, and then was taken Prisoner by his Enemies.

PICROCHOLE, at the relation of those who had escaped out of the broil wherein Tripet was untriped, grew very angry that the devils should have so run upon his men, and held all that night a council, at which Rashcalf and Touchefaucet averred that his power was such that he was able to defeat all the devils of hell, if they encountered them. This Picrochole did not fully believe, though he doubted not much of it.

Therefore sent he, under the command and conduct of the Captain Drawforth, for the purpose of discovering the country, the number of sixteen hundred horsemen, all well mounted upon light horses for skirmish, and thoroughly besprinkled with holy water; and every one had for their field mark a star in his scarf, to serve at all adventures, in case they should happen to encounter devils; that by the virtue, as well of that Gregorian water, as of the stars, they might make the devils disappear and vanish.

Thus they made an excursion into the country, until they came near to Vauguyon, and to the hospital, but could never find anybody to speak to; whereupon they returned a little back, and by chance, in a shepherd's cottage near to Coudray, they found five pilgrims; these they carried away, bound and manacled as if they had been spies, despite all the exclamations, adjurations, and requests that they could make. Being descended towards Seville, they were heard by Gargantua, who said then unto those that were with him, "Comrades and fellow-soldiers, we must here have an encounter, and they are in number ten times more than we: shall we charge them or no?" "What a devil," said the monk, "shall we do else? Do you esteem men by their number, rather than by their valour and prowess?" With this he cried out, "Charge! devils, charge!" When the enemies heard this, they thought certainly that they had been very devils, and began, all of them, to run away as hard as they could, Drawforth only excepted, who immediately settled his lance on its rest, and therewith hit the monk with all his force on the very middle of his breast; but coming against his horrific frock, the point of the iron, being with the blow either broke off or blunted, it was in matter of execution as if you had struck against an anvil with a little wax-candle. Then the monk, with his staff of the cross, gave him such a sturdy thump and whirret betwixt his neck and shoulders, upon the acromion bone, that he made him lose both sense and motion, and fall down stone dead at his horse's feet. And seeing the stole which he wore on his scarf, he said unto Gargantua, "These men are but priests, which is but the beginning of a monk. By Saint John, I am a perfect monk; I will kill them like flies." Then he ran after them at a swift gallop, till he overtook the rear, and felled them down like rye, striking athwart and alongst, and every way. Gymnast presently asked Gargantua if they should pursue them. To whom Gargantua answered, "By no means; for, according to right military discipline, you must never drive your enemy unto despair. Such a strait doth but multiply his force, and increase his courage, which was before broken and cast down. Neither is there any better help for men that are out of heart, toiled, and spent, than to hope for no favour at all. How many victories have been taken out of the hands of the victors by the vanquished, when they would not rest satisfied with reason, but attempt to put all to the sword, and totally to destroy all their enemies, without leaving so much as one to carry home the news of the defeat of his fellows.

Open, therefore, unto your enemies all the gates and ways, and make to them a bridge of silver rather than fail, that you may be rid of them." "Yea, but," said Gymnast, "they have the monk." "Have they the monk?" said Gargantua; "upon mine honour, then, it will prove to their cost. But to prevent all dangers, let us not yet retreat, but halt here quietly, for I think I do already understand the policy of our enemies; they are truly more directed by chance and mere fortune than by good advice and counsel." Meanwhile, whilst these made a halt under the walnut trees, the monk continued his chase, charging all he overtook, and giving quarter to none, until he met with a trooper, who carried behind him one of the poor pilgrims, and there would have rifled him. The pilgrim, in hope of relief at the sight of the monk, cried out, "Ha, my lord prior, my good friend, my lord prior, save me! I beseech you, save me!" These words being heard by those that rode in the van, they instantly faced about, and seeing there was nobody but the monk that made this great havoc and slaughter among them, they loaded him with blows as thick as they used to do an ass with wood. But of all this he felt nothing, especially when they struck upon his frock, his skin was so hard. Then they committed him to two of the marshal's men to keep, and looking about, saw nobody coming against them, whereupon they thought that Gargantua and his party had fled. Then it was that they rode as hard as they could towards the walnut trees to meet with them, and left the monk there all alone, with his two foresaid men to guard him. Gargantua heard the noise and neighing of the horses, and said to his men, "Comrades, I hear the track and beating of the enemies' horse feet, and withal perceive that some of them come in a troop and full tilt against us; let us rally and close here, then set forward in order; and by this means we shall be able to receive their charge, to their loss and to our honour."

CHAPTER XLIV.

How the Monk rid Himself of His Keepers, and how Picrochole's Forlorn Hope was defeated.

THE monk, seeing them depart thus in disorder, conjectured that they had gone to charge Gargantua and those that were with him, and was wonderfully grieved that he could not succour them. Then he considered the countenance of the two keepers in whose custody he was, who would have willingly run after the troops to get some booty and plunder, and were always looking towards the valley towards which they were going. Farther, he sylogised, saying, "These men are badly skilled in matters of war, for they have not required my parole; neither have they taken my sword from me." Suddenly he drew his long sword, wherewith he gave the keeper which held him on the right side such a sound slash, that he cut clean through the jugular veins and the sphagitid arteries of the neck, with the gargareon, even unto the two adenes, and redoubling the blow, he opened the spinal marrow between the second and the third vertebræ; there fell down that keeper stark dead to the ground. Then the monk, reining his horse to the left, ran upon the other, who seeing his fellow dead, and the monk to have the advantage of him, cried with a loud voice, "Ah, my lord prior, quarter; I yield, my lord prior, quarter, quarter; my good friend, my lord prior." And the monk cried likewise, "My lord posterior, my friend, my lord posterior, you shall have it upon your posteriorums." "Ha," said the keeper, "my lord prior, my dear lord prior, I pray God make you an abbot." "By the habit," said the monk, "which I wear, I will here make you a cardinal. What do you use to pay ransoms to religious men; you shall have now a red hat of my giving." And the fellow cried, "Ha, my lord prior, my lord prior, my lord abbot that shall be, my lord cardinal, my lord All. Ha, ha, hes, no, my lord prior, my good little lord prior, I yield, render, and deliver myself up to you." "And I deliver thee," said the monk, "to all the devils in hell;" then at one stroke he struck off his head, cutting his scalp upon the temple bones and lifting up the two, *brigmati*s, together with the sagittal commissure, as also a great part of the coronal bone; by which terrible blow likewise he cut the two meninges, and made a deep wound in the two posterior ventricles of the brain, so that the cranium remained hanging upon his shoulders by the skin of the pericranium behind, in form of a doctor's bonnet, black without and red within. Thus fell he down also to the ground stark dead.

And presently the monk gave his horse the spur, and kept the way that the enemy held, who had met with Gargantua and his companions in the broad highway, and were so diminished of their number, for the enormous slaughter that Gargantua had made with his great tree amongst them, as also Gymnast, Ponocrates, Eudemon, and the rest, that they began to retreat disorderly, and in great haste, as men altogether affrighted, and troubled in both sense and understanding; and as if they had seen the very proper species and form of death before their eyes; or, rather, as when you see an ass with a gad-fly under his tail, or fly that stings him, run hither and thither, without keeping any path or way, throwing down his load to the ground, breaking his bridle and reins, and taking no breath nor rest, and no man can tell what ails him, for they see not anything touch him. So fled these people, destitute of wit, without having any cause of flying, only pursued by a panic terror, which in their minds they had conceived. The monk perceiving that their whole intent was to betake themselves to their heels, alighted from his horse, and got upon a big large rock, which was in the way, and with his great brackmard sword, laid such load upon those runaways, and with main strength fetching a compass with his arm, without feigning or sparing, slew and overthrew so many, that his sword broke in two pieces. Then thought he within himself that he had slain and killed sufficiently, and that the rest should escape to carry news. Therefore he took up a battle-axe of those that lay there dead, and got upon the rock again, passing his time to see the enemy thus flying, and to tumble himself amongst the dead bodies, only that he suffered none to carry pike, sword, lance, nor gun with him; and those who carried the pilgrims bound, he made to alight, and gave their horses unto the said pilgrims, keeping them there with him under the hedge, and also Touchefaucet, who was then his prisoner.

CHAPTER XLV.

How the Monk carried the Pilgrims, and of the Good Words that Grangousier gave them.

THIS skirmish ended, Gargantua retreated with his men, excepting the monk, and about the dawning of the day they came to Grangousier, who in his bed was praying unto God for their safety and victory. Seeing them all safe and sound, he embraced them lovingly, and asked what was become of the monk. Gargantua answered him, "That without doubt the enemies had the monk." "Then they have mischief and ill-luck," said Grangousier, which was very true. Hence it is a common proverb to this day, To give a man the monk. He commanded a good breakfast to be provided for their refreshment. When all was ready, they called Gargantua, but he was so aggrieved that the monk had not been heard of, that he would neither eat nor drink. In the meanwhile the monk comes, and from the gate of the outer court cries out aloud, "Fresh wine, fresh wine, Gymnast, my friend." Gymnast went out and saw that it was Friar John, who brought with him five pilgrims, and Touchefaucet, prisoners. Thereupon Gargantua likewise went forth to meet him, and all of them made him the best welcome they possibly could, and brought him before Grangousier, who asked him about all his adventures. The monk told him all, both how he was taken, how he rid himself of his keepers, and of the slaughter he had made by the way, and how he had rescued the pilgrims, and brought along with him Captain Touchefaucet. Then they did all together fall to banqueting most merrily. In the meantime Grangousier asked the pilgrims what countrymen they were, whence they came, and whither they went. Sweertogo, in the name of the rest, answered, "My sovereign lord, I am of Saint Genou, in Berry; this man is of Paluau, this other is of Onzay, this of Argy, and this man of Villebrenin. We came from Saint Sebastian near Nantes, and are now returning, as best we may, by easy journeys." "Yea, but," said Grangousier, "what went you to do at Saint Sebastian?" "We went," said Sweertogo, "to offer up unto that saint our vows against the plague." "Ah, poor men," said Grangousier, "do you think that the plague comes from Saint Sebastian?" "Yes, truly," answered Sweertogo, "our preachers tell us so, indeed." "But is it so?" said Grangousier; "do the false prophets teach you such abuses? Do they thus blaspheme the saints and holy men of God, as to make them like unto the devils, who do nothing but hurt to mankind? As Homer writes that the plague was sent into the camp of the Greeks by Apollo, and as the poets feign a great rabble of vejoves and mischievous gods, so did a certain old hypocrite preach, at Sinay, that Saint Anthony sent the fire into men's legs; that Saint Eutropius made men hydropic; Saint Gildas, fools; and that Saint Genou made them goutish. But I punished him so exemplarily, though he called me heretic for it, that since that time no such hypocritical rogue durst set his foot within my territories; and truly I wonder that your king should suffer them, in their sermons, to publish such scandalous doctrine in his dominions. For they deserve to be chastised with greater severity than those who, by magical art, or any other device, have brought the pestilence into a country. The pest kills but the bodies, but such abominable impostors do poison our very souls." As he spake these words, in came the monk, very resolute, and asked them, "Whence are you, you poor wretches?" "Of Saint Genou," said they. "And how," said the monk, "does the Abbot Galligut, that good drinker? and the monks, what cheer make they? By God's body, they will have a fling at your wives, whilst you are roaming about." "Hin, hen," said Sweertogo, "I am not afraid of mine; for he that shall see her by day, will never break his neck to come to her in the night-time." "Yea, marry," said the monk, "now you have hit it; let her be as ugly as ever was Proserpina, she will not escape, if there dwell any monks near her. For a good carpenter will make use of any kind of timber. Let me be peppered with the pox if you find not all your wives with child at your return ; for the very shadow of the steeple of an abbey is prolific." "It is," said Gargantua, "like the water of Nilus, in Egypt, if you believe Strabo and Pliny, lib. v. cap. 3. What virtue will there be then, said the monk, in their bullets of concupiscence, their habits, and their bodies?"

"Then," said Grangousier, "go your ways, poor men, in the name of God the Creator, to whom I pray to guide you perpetually ; and henceforward, be not so ready to undertake these idle and unprofitable journeys. Look to your families, labour every man in his vocation, instruct your children, and live as the good apostle Saint Paul directs you. In doing which, God, his angels and saints, will guard and protect you, and no evil or plague at any time shall befall you." Then Gargantua led them into the hall to take their refection ; but the pilgrims did nothing but sigh, and said to Gargantua, "Oh, how happy is that land which has such a man for their Lord ? We have been more edified and instructed by the talk which he has had with us than by all the sermons that ever were preached in our town." "This is," said Gargantua, "that which Plato says lib. v. De Republ., that those commonwealths are happy whose rulers philosophise, and whose philosophers rule." Then caused he their wallets to be filled with victuals and their bottles with wine, and gave unto each of them a horse to ease him on his way, together with some pence to live upon.

CHAPTER XLVI.

TOUCHEFAUCET was presented to Grangousier, and examined by him upon the enterprize and attempt of Picrochole, what it was he could aim at, by this tumultuary invasion. He answered, that his end and purpose was to conquer all the country, if he could, for the injury done to his cake-bakers. "It is too great an undertaking," said Grangousier, "and, as the proverb is, 'He that gripes too much, holds fast but little.' The time is not now as formerly to conquer kingdoms, to the loss of our nearest Christian brother. This imitation of the ancient Herculeses, Alexanders, Hannibals, Scipios, Cæsars, and other such heroes, is altogether contrary to the profession of the gospel of Christ, by which we are commanded to preserve, keep, rule, and govern every man his own country and lands, and not in a hostile manner to invade others; and that which heretofore the Saracens and Barbarians called prowess, we do now call robbery and wickedness. It would have been more commendable in him to have confined himself within the bounds of his own territories, royally governing them, than to insult and domineer in mine, pillaging and plundering everywhere, for, by ruling his own with discretion, he might have increased his greatness; but by robbing me, he cannot escape destruction. Go your ways, in the name of God; do what is righteous; show your king what is amiss, and never counsel him with regard to your own particular profit; for with the public will also be swallowed up the private. As for your ransom, I do freely remit it to you, and will that your arms and horse be restored to you; so should good neighbours do, and ancient friends, seeing this our difference is not properly war.

“As Plato, lib. v. De Republ., would not have it called war, but sedition, not even when the Greeks took up arms against one another; therefore, when such evils should arise, his advice was to behave themselves with all discretion and modesty. Although you call it war, it is but superficial; it enters not into the inmost recesses of our hearts, for neither of us has been wronged in his honour, nor is there any question about us in the main, but only how to redress, by-the-bye, some petty faults committed by our men—I mean both yours and ours—which, although you knew, you ought to let pass; for these quarrelsome persons deserve rather to be contemned than mentioned, especially when I offered them satisfaction proportioned to the wrong done.

“God shall be the just judge of our variances, whom I beseech, by death, rather to take me out of this life, and to permit my goods to perish, and be destroyed before mine eyes, than that by me or mine he should in any sort be wronged.”

Having uttered these words, he called the monk, and before them all spoke thus unto him: “Friar John, my good friend, is it you that took prisoner the Captain Touchefaucet here present?” “Sir,” said the monk, “seeing himself is here, and that he is of the years of discretion, I had rather you should know it by his confession than by any words of mine.” Then said Touchefaucet: “My sovereign lord, it is he, indeed, that took me; and I do, therefore, most freely yield myself his prisoner.” “Have you put him to any ransom?” said Grangousier to the monk. “No,” said the monk, “of that I take no care.” “How much would you have for having taken him?” “Nothing, nothing,” said the monk; “I am not swayed by that, nor do I regard it.” Then Grangousier commanded that, in presence of Touchefaucet, should be delivered to the monk, for taking him, the sum of threescore and two thousand saluts [in English money £15,500], which was done, whilst they gave a banquet to the said Touchefaucet; of whom Grangousier asked if he would stay with him, or choose rather to return to his king. Touchefaucet answered that he was content to take whatever course he would advise him to. Then said Grangousier, "Return unto your king; and God be with you." Then he gave him an excellent sword, a Vienne blade, with a golden scabbard, wrought with vine-branch like flourishes, of fine goldsmith's work, and a collar of gold, weighing seven hundred and two thousand marks, garnished with precious stones of the finest sorts, valued at a hundred and sixty thousand ducats, and ten thousand crowns more as an honourable present.

After this Touchefaucet got to his horse, and Gargantua, for his safety, allowed him the guard of thirty men-at-arms and sixscore archers to attend him, under the conduct of Gymnast, to bring him even unto the gate of the rock Clermond, if there were need. As soon as he was gone, the monk restored unto Grangousier the threescore and two thousand saluts which he had received, saying, "Sir, it is not as yet the time for you to give such gifts. Stay till this war be at an end, for none can tell what accidents may occur; and war begun without good provision of money beforehand is but as a blast that will quickly pass away: Coin is the sinews of war." "Well then," said Grangousier, "at the end I will content you by some honest recompence and all those who shall do me good service."

CHAPTER XLVII.

How Grangousier sent for his Legions, and how Touchefaucet slew Rashcalf, and was afterwards executed by the Command of Picrochole.

IN these same days, those of Besse, of the old market, of the bourg Saint James, of the Draggage, of Parillé, of the Rivers, of the rocks Saint Pol, of the Vaubreton, of Pautillé, of the Brahemont, of Clainbridge, of Cravant, of Grandmont, of the town at the Badgerholes, of Huymes, of Segré, of Hesse, of Saint Livant, of Panzoust, of the Celdraux, of Vernon, of Coulaines, of Chose, of Varenes, of Bourgueil, of the Bouchard Claud, of the Croulay, of Narsie, of Cande, of Monsoreau, and other bordering places, sent ambassadors to Grangousier to tell him that they had been told of the great wrongs which Picrochole had done him; and in regard to their ancient confederacy, offered him what assistance they could afford, both in men, money, victuals, ammunition, and other necessaries of war. The money which, by the joint agreement of them all, was sent unto him, amounted to six score and fourteen millions two crowns and a half of pure gold.

His forces consisted of fifteen thousand cuirassiers, two and thirty thousand light horsemen, fourscore and nine thousand dragoons, and a hundred and forty thousand volunteer adventurers. These had with them eleven thousand and two hundred cannons, double cannons, basilisks, and spiroles. Of pioneers they had seven and forty thousand, all victualled and paid for six months and four days in advance; which offer Gargantua did not altogether refuse, nor wholly accept, but giving them hearty thanks, said that he would compound and order the war such that there should not be found great need to put so many honest men to trouble in the managing of it; and, therefore, was content at that time to give orders only for bringing along the legions, which he maintained at his ordinary garrison towns of the Deviniere, Chavignie, of Gravot, and of Quinquenais, amounting to the number of two thousand cuirassiers, three-score and six thousand foot soldiers, and six and twenty thousand dragoons, attended by two hundred pieces of great ordnance, two and twenty thousand pioneers, and six thousand light horsemen, all drawn up in troops, so well fitted out and accommodated with their commissaries, sutlers, farriers, harness-makers, and other such like necessary members in a military camp, so fully instructed in the art of warfare, so perfectly knowing and following their colours, so ready to hear and obey their captains, so nimble to run, so strong at charging, so prudent in their adventures, and in every way so well disciplined, that they seemed rather to be a concert of organ-pipes, or mutual concord of the wheels of a clock, than an infantry and cavalry, or army of soldiers.

Toucheaucet, on his return, presented himself before Picrochole, and related to him all that he had done and seen, and at last endeavoured to persuade him, with strong and forcible arguments, to capitulate, and make an agreement with Grangousier, whom he found to be the honestest man in the world; further, that it was neither right nor reason thus to trouble his neighbours, from whom they never received anything but good; and, in regard to the main point, that they should never be able to carry through that war, but to their great damage and mischief; for the forces of Picrochole were not so considerable but that Grangousier could easily overthrow them. He had not well done speaking when Rashcalf said aloud: "Unhappy is that prince who is served by such men who are so easily corrupted as I know Toucheaucet is; for I see his courage so changed, that he would have willingly joined with our enemies to fight against us, and betray us, if they would have received him; but as virtue is of all, both friends and foes, praised and esteemed, so is wickedness soon known and suspected; and although it happen that the enemies do make use thereof for their profit, yet have they always the wicked and the traitors in abomination.

At these words Touchefaucet, being impatient, drew out his sword, and therewith ran Rashcalf through the body, a little under the nipple of his left side, whereof he died presently, and, pulling back his sword out of his body, said boldly, "So let him perish that shall a faithful servant blame." Picrochole suddenly grew furious, and seeing Touchefaucet's new sword and his scabbard, so richly diapered with flourishes of most excellent workmanship, said, "Did they give thee this weapon so feloniously therewith to kill before my face my so good friend Rashcalf?"

Then immediately he commanded his guard to hew him in pieces, which was instantly done, and so cruelly that the chamber was all dyed with blood. Afterwards he commanded the corpse of Rashcalf to be honourably buried, and that of Touchefaucet to be cast over the wall into the ditch.

The news of these excessive violences was quickly spread through the army; whereupon many began to murmur against Picrochole, insomuch that Pinchpenny said to him, "My sovereign lord, I know not what the issue of this enterprise will be. I see your men much dejected, and not very determined in their minds, by considering that we are here very ill-provided with victuals, and that our number is already much diminished by three or four sallies. Furthermore, great supplies and recruits come daily in to your enemies; but we so moulder away, that if we be once besieged, I do not see how we can escape total destruction." "Tush, pish," said Picrochole; "you are like the Melun eels, you cry before they come to you. Let them come, let them only come."

CHAPTER XLVIII.

How Gargantua set upon Picrochole, within the rock Clermond, and utterly defeated the Army of the said Picrochole.

GARGANTUA had charge of the whole army; his father Grangousier stayed in his castle. Encouraging them with good words, he promised great rewards unto those that should do any act of prowess. When they had gained the ford of Vede, boats and bridges being speedily made, they passed over in a trice. Then, considering the situation of the town, which was on a high and commanding place, Gargantua thought fit to call his council, and pass that night in deliberation upon what was to be done. But Gymnast said to him, "My sovereign lord, such is the nature and complexion of the French that they are worth nothing but at the first push. At such times they are more fierce than devils; but if they be retarded, they are more faint than women. I advise you that, after your men have taken breath, and some refection, you give order for a resolute assault."

The advice was found very good. In order to put it into effect, he brought forth his army into the plain field, and placed the reserves on the skirt or rising of a little hill. The monk took with him six companies of foot, and two hundred horsemen, well armed, and with great diligence crossed the marsh, and valiantly got up to the top of the green hillock, even to the highway which leads to Londun. Meanwhile the assault was begun; Picrochole's men could not tell well which was best, to issue out and receive the assailants, or keep within the town and not stir. But there sallied forth furiously the cavalry of his guard, who were forthwith received and royally entertained with great cannon-shot, that fell upon them like hail from the high grounds on which the artillery was planted. The Gargantuists betook themselves unto the valleys, to give the ordnance leave to play and range with the larger scope, Those of the town defended themselves as well as they could, but their shot passed over without doing any hurt. Some of Picrochole's men, that had escaped our artillery, set most fiercely upon our soldiers, but did little execution, for they were all let in betwixt the files, and there knocked down to the ground; which their fellow-soldiers seeing, they would have retreated, but the monk having seized upon the pass by which they were to return, they ran away, and fled in all the disorder and confusion that could be imagined. Some would have pursued them, and given them chase; but the monk withheld them, fearing that in their pursuit the pursuers might lose their ranks, and so give occasion to the besieged to sally out of the town upon them; then staying there some time, and none coming against him, he sent the Duke Phrontist to advise Gargantua to advance towards the hill upon the left hand, to hinder Picrochole's retreat at that gate. This Gargantua did with all expedition, and sent thither four brigades, under the conduct of Sebaste, which had no sooner reached the top of the hill than they met Picrochole in the teeth, and those that were with him scattered.

Then they charged them stoutly; yet they were much indamaged by those that were upon the walls, who galled them with all manner of shot, both from the great ordnance, small guns, and bows. Perceiving this, Gargantua went with a strong party to their relief, and with his artillery began to thunder so terribly upon that canton of the wall, and so long, that all the strength within the town, to maintain and fill up the breach, was drawn thither. The monk seeing that quarter which he kept besieged void of men and competent guards, and in a manner altogether naked and abandoned, did most magnanimously, on a sudden, lead up his men towards the fort, and never left it till he had got up upon it, knowing that such as come to the reserve, in a conflict, bring with them always more fear and terror than those that deal about them with their hands in the fight. Nevertheless, he gave no alarm till all his soldiers had got within the wall, except the two hundred horseman, whom he left without as a reserve.

Then he gave a most horrible shout, and those that were with him ; and, immediately, without resistance, putting to the edge of the sword the guard that was at that gate, they opened it to the horsemen, with whom they ran most furiously towards the east gate, where all the hurly-burly was, and coming close upon them in the rear, overthrew all their forces.

The besieged, seeing that the Gargantuists had seized the town, and that they were like to be secure in no corner of it, submitted themselves to the mercy of the monk, and asked for quarter, which the monk very nobly granted them, yet made them lay down their arms. Then, shutting them up within churches, he gave orders to seize upon all the staves of the crosses, and placed men at the doors to keep them from coming forth. Then opening the east gate, he issued out to succour and assist Gargantua. But Picrochole, thinking it was some relief coming to him from the town, ventured to advance more than before, and was upon the giving of a most desperate home charge, when Gargantua cried out, "Ha, Friar John, my friend, Friar John, you are come at the nick of time." This unexpected accident so affrighted Picrochole and his men, that, giving up all for lost, they betook themselves to their heels, and fled in all directions. Gargantua chased them till they came near to Vaugaudry, killing and slaying all the way ; he then sounded the retreat.

CHAPTER XLIX.

How Picrochole, in His Flight, fell into Great Misfortunes, and what Gargantua did after the Battle.

PICROCHOLE, thus in despair, fled towards the Bouchard island, and, on the way to Rivere, his horse stumbled and fell, whereat he was so incensed that he with his sword, without more ado, killed him in his anger. Then, not finding any other whereon to remount, he was about to mount an ass at the mill that was thereby; but the miller's men so basted his bones, and so soundly bewhacked him, that they made him both black and blue; then, stripping him of all his clothes, they gave him a scurvy old canvas jacket wherewith to cover his nakedness. Thus went along this poor choleric wretch, who, passing the water at Porthuaux, and relating his disaster, was foretold by an old Lourpidon hag that his kingdom should be restored to him at the coming of the cocklicranes. What has since become of him we cannot tell. I was told, however, that he is now a porter at Lyons, as testy and choleric as ever, and always, with great lamentation, inquiring of all strangers of the coming of the cocklicranes, expecting assuredly, according to the old woman's prophecy, that at their coming he shall be re-established in his kingdom.

The first thing Gargantua did, after his return into the town, was to call the muster-roll of his men, which done, he found that there were very few either killed or wounded, only some few foot of Captain Tolmere's company, and Ponocrates, who was shot with a musket-ball through the doublet. Then he caused them all, at their several posts, to take a little refreshment, and gave order to the treasurers and commissaries of the army to pay for and defray that repast, and that there should be no outrage at all, nor abuse committed in the town, seeing it was his own. He furthermore commanded that, immediately after the soldiers had done with eating and drinking, they should be drawn up on the piazza before the castle, there to receive six months' pay. This was done. Then he had brought before him, in the said place, all those that remained of Picrochole's party; unto whom, in the presence of the princes, nobles, and officers of his court and army, he spoke as follows.

CHAPTER L

Gargantua's Speech to the Vanquished.

“OUR fathers, forefathers, and ancestors, in all times, have been of this nature and disposition, that, upon the winning of a battle, they have chosen rather, for a sign and memorial of their triumphs and victories, to erect trophies and monuments in the hearts of the vanquished by clemency, than by architecture, in the lands which they had conquered. For they did hold in greater estimation the lively remembrance of men purchased by liberality, than the dumb inscription of arches, pillars, and pyramids, subject to the injury of storms and tempests, and to the envy of every one.

“You may well call to mind the courtesy which was used by them towards the Bretons, in the battle of Saint Aubin of Cormier, and at the demolishing of Partenay. You have heard, and hearing have admired, their gentle comportment towards those at the barriers of Spaniola, when they had plundered, wasted, and ransacked the maritime borders of Olone and Talmondois. All this hemisphere was filled with the praises and congratulations which yourselves and your fathers made when Alpharbal, King of Canarre, not satisfied with his own fortunes, most furiously invaded the Land of Onyx, and with cruel piracies molest all the Armoric Islands and regions of Brittany. Yet was he, in a naval battle, justly taken and vanquished by my father, whom God preserve and protect. But what? In the case of other kings and emperors, yea, those who entitle themselves Catholics, would have dealt roughly with him, kept him a close prisoner, and put him to an extreme high ransom: he entreated him very courteously, lodged him kindly with himself in his own palace, and, out of his incredible mildness and gentle disposition, sent him back with a safe conduct, laden with gifts, with favours, with all offices of friendship.

“What then happened? Having returned into his country, he made assemble all the princes and states of his kingdom, and showed them the humanity which he had found in us, and therefore wished them to take such course, by way of compensation therein, as that the whole world might be edified by the example, as well of their honest graciousness to us as of our gracious honesty towards them. It was decreed by an unanimous consent that they should offer up entirely their lands, dominions, and kingdoms, to be disposed of by us according to our pleasure. Alpharbal, in his own person, suddenly returned with nine thousand and thirty-eight great ships of burden, bringing with him the treasures not only of his house and royal lineage, but almost of the whole country beside. Then embarking to set sail with a west-north-east wind, every one, in heaps, did cast into the ship gold, silver, rings, jewels, spices, drugs, and aromatical perfumes, parrots, pelicans, monkeys, civet-cats, black-spotted weasels, porcupines, etc. He was accounted no good mother's son that did not cast in all the precious things he had.

“Having arrived, he would have kissed the feet of my father; that action was esteemed unworthy, and was not permitted; but he was most cordially embraced: he offered his presents—they were not received, because they were too excessive: he yielded himself voluntarily a servant and vassal, together with his whole posterity—this was not accepted of, because it seemed not equitable: he ceded, by virtue of the decree of his states, his whole countries and kingdoms to him, offering the deed and conveyance, signed, sealed, and ratified by all those that were concerned in it—this was altogether refused, and the parchments cast into the fire. In the end, this free goodwill and simplicity of the Canarrines wrought such tenderness in my father's heart, that he could not abstain from shedding tears, and wept most profusely; and by choice words, very congruously adapted, strove in what he could to diminish the estimation of the good offices which he had done them, saying, that any courtesy he had conferred upon them was not worth a button, and what favour soever he had showed them, he was bound to do it. But so much the more did Alpharbal thereof insist.

“What was the issue? Whereas for his ransom, in the greatest extremity of rigour and most tyrannical dealing, could not have been exacted above twenty times a hundred thousand crowns, and his eldest sons detained as hostages till that sum had been paid, they made themselves perpetual tributaries, and obliged to give us every year two millions of gold, at four-and-twenty carats fine. The first year we received the whole sum of two millions; the second year, of their own accord, they paid freely to us three and twenty hundred thousand crowns; the third year, six and twenty hundred thousand; the fourth year, three millions, and do so increase it always out of their own goodwill, that we shall be constrained to forbid them to bring us any more. This is the nature of gratitude and true thankfulness; for time, which gnaws and diminishes all things else, augments and increases benefits, because a noble action of liberality done to a man of reason doth grow continually by his generous thinking of it and remembering it. Not being willing, therefore, any way to degenerate from the hereditary mildness and clemency of my parents, I do now forgive you, set you at liberty, and every way make you as frank and free as ever you were before.

“Moreover, at your going out of the gate, you shall have every one of you three months' pay, to take you home unto your houses and families, and shall have a safe convoy of six hundred curiassiers, and eight thousand foot, under the conduct of Alexander, esquire of my body, that the peasants of the country may not do you any injury. God be with you. I am sorry from my heart that Picrochole is not here, for I would have given him to understand that this war was undertaken against my will, and without any hope to increase either goods or renown; but seeing he is lost, and that no man can tell where, nor how he went away, it is my will that this kingdom remain entire to his son, who, because he is too young, he not being yet full five years old, shall be brought up and instructed by the ancient princes and learned men of the kingdom. And because a realm thus desolate may easily come to ruin, if the covetousness and avarice of those who, by their places, are obliged to administer justice in it, be not curbed and restrained, I ordain, and will have it so, that Ponocrates be overseer and superintendent above all his governors, with whatever power and authority is requisite thereto, and that he be continually with the child, until he find him able and capable to rule and govern by himself.

“I consider that a too feeble and dissolute facility in pardoning evil-doers giveth them occasion to commit wickedness afterward more readily : upon this pernicious confidence of receiving favour, I consider that Moses, the meekest man that was in his time on the earth, did severely punish the mutinous and seditious people of Israel. I consider, likewise, that Julius Cæsar, who was so gracious an emperor that Cicero said of him, ‘that his fortune had nothing more excellent than that he could, and his virtue nothing better than that he would, always save and pardon every man.’ He, notwithstanding all this, did in certain places most rigorously punish the authors of rebellion.

“After the example of these good men, it is my will and pleasure that you deliver unto me, before you depart hence, first, that fine fellow Marquet, who was the prime origin and groundwork of this war, by his vain presumption and overweening conceit ; secondly, his fellow cake-bakers, who neglected to check and reprehend his idle hair-brained humour in the proper time, and lastly, all the counsellors, captains, officers, and domestics of Picrochole, who had been incendiaries or fomenters of the war, by provoking, praising, or counselling him to come out of his limits thus to trouble us.”

CHAPTER LI.

How the Victorious Gargantuists, were recompensed after the Battle.

WHEN Gargantua had finished his speech, the seditious men whom he had required were delivered up unto him, except Swashbuckler, Durtaille, and Smaltrash, who ran away six hours before the battle, one of them as far as to the neck of Laniel at one course, another to the valley of Vire, and the third even unto Logroine, without looking back or taking breath by the way ; and two of the cake-bakers, who were slain in the fight. Gargantua did them no other hurt except that he appointed them to pull at the presses of his printing-house, which he had newly set up. Then those who died there he caused to be honourably buried in Blacksoille valley and Burnhag-field, and gave order that the wounded should be dressed and taken care of in his great hospital or osocome. After this, considering the great prejudice done to the town and its inhabitants, he reimbursed their charges, and repaired all the losses that, by their confession upon oath, could appear they had sustained; and for their better defence and security in times to come, against all sudden uproars and invasions, he commanded a strong citadel to be built there, with a sufficient garrison to maintain it. At his departure he very graciously thanked all the soldiers of the brigades that had been at this overthrow, and sent them back to their winter quarters in their several stations and garrisons—the Decumane legion only excepted, whom in the field on that day he saw do some great exploit, and their captains also, whom he brought along with himself unto Grangousier.

At the sight and coming of them, the good man was so joyful that it is not possible fully to describe it. He made them a feast, the most magnificent, plentiful, and delicious that ever was seen since the time of King Asuerus. On rising from the table, he distributed amongst them his whole cupboard of plate, which weighed eight hundred thousand and fourteen besants of gold, in great antique vessels, huge pots, large basons, big tasses, cups, goblets, candlesticks, comfit-boxes, and other such plate, all of pure massive gold, besides the precious stones, enamelling, and workmanship, which by all men's estimation was more worth than the matter of the gold. Then unto every one of them out of his coffers caused he to be given the sum of twelve hundred thousand crowns ready money. And farther, he gave to each of them, for ever and in perpetuity (unless he should happen to die without heirs), such castles and neighbouring lands of his as were most commodious for them. To Ponocrates he gave the rock Clermond; to Gymnast, the Coudray; to Eudemon, Monpensier; Rivau, to Tolmere; to Ithiboll, Monsaureau; to Acamas, Cande; Varennes, to Chironacte; Gravot, to Sebaste; Quinquenais, to Alexander; Legre, to Sophrone; and so of his other places.

CHAPTER LII.

How Gargantua caused to be built for the Monk the Abbey of Theleme.

THERE remained alone the monk to provide for, whom Gargantua would have made abbot of Seville, but he refused it. He would have given him the abbey of Bourgueil, or of Saint Florent, which was better, or both if it pleased him. But the monk gave him a very peremptory answer, that he would never take upon him the charge or government of monks. "For how shall I be able," said he, "to rule over others, that have not power and command over myself? If you think I have done you, or may hereafter do you any acceptable service, give me leave me to found an abbey after my own mind and fancy." The idea pleased Gargantua very well, who thereupon offered him all the country of Theleme by the river of Loire, till within two leagues of the great forest of Porthuaut. The monk then requested Gargantua to institute his religious order contrary to all others.

"First, then," said Gargantua, "you must not build a wall about your convent, for all other abbeys are strongly walled and mured about." "See," said the monk, "and without cause, where there is mur before and mur behind, there is store of mur-mur, envy, and mutual conspiracy. Moreover, seeing there are certain convents in the world whereof the custom is, if any women come—I mean chaste and honest women—they immediately sweep the ground which they have trod upon." Therefore it was ordained that if any man or woman entered into religious orders should by chance come within this new abbey, all the rooms should be thoroughly washed and cleansed through which they had passed; and because in all other monasteries and nunneries all is compassed, limited, and regulated by hours, it was decreed that in this new structure there should be neither clock nor dial, but that according to the opportunities and circumstances all their hours should be disposed of. "For," said Gargantua, "the greatest loss of time that I know is to count the hours. What good comes of it? Nor can there be any greater dotage in the world than for one to guide and direct his courses by the sound of a bell, and not by his own judgment and discretion.

Item, because at that time they put no women into nunneries, but such as were either purblind, blinkards, lame, crooked, ill-favoured, misshapen, fools, senseless, spoiled, or corrupt; nor encloistered any men but those that were either sickly, subject to defluxions, ill-bred louts, simple sots, or peevish trouble-houses. "But to the purpose," said the monk; "a woman that is neither fair nor good, to what use serves she?" "To make a nun of," said Gargantua. "Yea," said the monk, "and to make shirts and smocks." Therefore was it ordained that into this religious order should be admitted no women that were not fair, well featured, and of a sweet disposition; nor men that were not comely, personable, and well-conditioned.

Item, because in the convents of women men come not but underhand, privily, and by stealth, it was therefore enacted that in this house there shall be no women in case there be not men, nor men in case there be not women.

Item, because both men and women that are received into religious orders, after the expiry of their novitiate or probation year, were constrained and forced perpetually to stay there all the days of their life, it was therefore ordered that all whatever, men or women, admitted within this abbey should have full leave to depart with peace and contentment whensoever it should seem good to them so to do.

Item, because the religious men and women did ordinarily make three vows, to wit, those of chastity, poverty, and obedience, it was therefore constituted and appointed that in this convent they might be honourably married, that they might be rich, and live at liberty. In regard to the legitimate time of the persons to be initiated, and years under and above which they were not capable of reception, the women were to be admitted from ten till fifteen, and the men from twelve to eighteen.

CHAPTER LIII.

How the Abbey of the Thelemites was built and endowed.

FOR the fabric and furniture of the abbey, Gargantua caused to be delivered out, in ready money, seven and twenty hundred thousand eight hundred and one and thirty of those golden rams of Berrie;* and for every year, until the whole work was completed, he allotted three score and nine thousand crowns of the sun, and as many of the seven stars, to be charged all upon the receipt of the custom. For the foundation and maintenance thereof, he settled a perpetual fee-farm rent of three and twenty hundred threescore and nine thousand five hundred and fourteen rose nobles, exempt from all homage, fealty, service, or burden whatsoever, and payable every year at the gate of the abbey; and of this, by letters patent, passed a very good grant. The architecture was in a figure hexagonal, and in such a fashion that in every one of the six corners there was built a great round tower of threescore feet in diameter, and were all of a like form and size. Upon the north side ran along the river of Loire, on the bank whereof was situated the tower called Arctic. Going towards the east, there was another, called Calær; the next following, Anatole; the next, Mesembrine; the next, Hesperia; and the last, Criere. Every tower was distant from the other the space of three hundred and twelve paces. The whole edifice was everywhere six storeys high, reckoning the cellars underground for one. The second was arched after the fashion of a basket-handle. The rest were cieled with pure wainscoat, flourished with Flanders fretwork, in the form of the foot of a lamp, and covered above with fine slates, with an indorsement of lead, carrying the antique figures of little puppets, and animals of all sorts notably well suited to one another, and gilt, together with the gutters, which, jetting without the walls, from betwixt the cross bars, in a diagonal figure, painted with gold and azure, reached to the very ground, where they ended into great conduit pipes, which carried away unto the river from under the house.

This same building was a hundred times more sumptuous and magnificent than ever was Bonnavet, Chambourg, or Chantilly; for there were in it nine thousand three hundred and two and thirty chambers, every one whereof had a withdrawing-room, a handsome closet, a wardrobe, an oratory, and neat passage leading into a great and spacious hall. Between every tower, in the midst of the said body of building, there was a pair of winding stairs, whereof the steps were part of porphyry, part of Numidian stone, and part of serpentine marble; each of those steps being two and twenty feet in length, and three fingers thick, and the just number of twelve betwixt every rest or landing-place. In every resting-place were two fair antique arches, where the light came in; and by those they went into a cabinet, made even with and of the breadth of the said winding and the re-ascending, above the roofs of the house, ending conically in a pavilion. By that winding they entered on every side into a great hall, and from the halls into the chambers.

From the Arctic tower unto the Criere were the fair, great libraries, in Greek, Latin, Hebrew, French, Italian, and Spanish, respectively distributed in their several cantons, according to the diversity of these languages. In the midst there was a wonderful winding stair, the entry whereof was without the house, in a vault or arch six fathoms broad. It was made in such symmetry and largeness that six men-at-arms, with their lances in their rests, might together in a breast ride all up to the very top of all the palace.

From the tower Anatole to the Mesembrine were spacious galleries, all coloured over and painted with the ancient prowesses, histories, and descriptions of the world. In the midst thereof there was likewise such another ascent and gate as we said there was on the river side. Upon that gate was written in great antique letters that which followeth.

CHAPTER LIV.

The Inscription set upon the Great Gate of Theleme.

“ HERE enter not hypocrites and bigots,
 Vile snivelling monkeys, scullions, and base sots,
 Paltry cockatoo owls, worse than the Huns
 Or Ostrogots ; forerunners of baboons :
 Curs'd snakes, dissembling varlets, seeming saints,
 Slipshop caffards, beggars pretending wants ;
 Fomentors of divisions and debates,
 Elsewhere, not here, make sale of your deceits.
     Your filthy trumperies,
     Stuff'd with pernicious lies (Not worth a bubble),
     Would only trouble
 Our earthly Paradise :
 Your filthy trumperies.

“ Here enter not attorneys, barristers,
 Nor bridle-champing law practitioners :
 Clerks, commissaries, scribes, nor pharisees,
 Wilful disturbers of the people's ease,
 Judges, destroyers, with an unjust breath,
 That, like dogs, worry honest men to death.
 We want not your demurrers, nor your pleas ;
 So at the gibbet go and seek your fees.
 We are not for attendance or delays,
 But would with ease and quiet pass our days.
     Law-suits, debates, and wrangling
     Hence are exil'd, and jangling.
     Here we are very Frolic and merry,
     And free from all entangling
     Law-suits, debates, and wrangling.

“ Here enter not base pinching usurers,
 Pelf-lickers, everlasting gatherers ;

Gold-graspers, coin-grippers, gulpers of mists,
 With harpy-gripping claws, who, tho' your chests Vast sums of money should to you afford,
 Would nevertheless add more unto the hoard,
 And yet not be content ; ye cluntch-fist dastards,
 Insatiable friends, and Pluto's bastards,
 Greedy devourers, chichy, sneak-bill rogues,
 Hell-mastiffs gnaw your bones, you rav'nous dogs.

You beastly-looking fellows,
 Reason doth plainly tell us,
 That we should not
 To you allot
 Room here, but at the gallows,
 You beastly-looking fellows.

“ Here enter not unsociable wight,
 Humorsome churl, by day, nor yet by night.
 No grumbling awf, none of the sharpening trade,
 No huff-cap squire, or brother of the blade.
 A Tartar bred, or in Alsatia wars,
 The ruffian comes not hither with his bears.
 Elsewhere for shelter scour, ye bully-rocks,
 And rogues that rot with infamy and pox.

Grace, honour, praise, delight,
 Here sojourn day and night ;
 Sound bodies, lin'd
 With a good mind,
 Do here pursue with might
 Grace, honour, praise, delight.

“ Here enter you, and welcome from our hearts,
 All noble sparks, endow'd with gallant parts.
 This is the glorious place which nobly shall Afford sufficient to content you all ;
 Were you a thousand, here you shall not want
 For anything ; for what you ask, we grant.
 The brave, the witty, here we entertain,
 And, in a word, all worthy gentlemen.

Men of heroic breasts
 Shall taste here of the feasts,
 Both privily
 And civilly.
 All you are welcome guests,
 Men of heroic breasts.

“ Here enter you, pure, honest, faithful, true, Expounders of the Scriptures, old and new ;

Whose glosses do not the plain truth disguise,
 And with false light distract or blind our eyes.
 Here shall we find a safe and warm retreat,
 When Error beats about and spreads her net.
 Strange doctrines here must neither reap nor sow,
 But Faith and Charity together grow.
 In short, confounded be their first device,
 Who are the holy Scriptures' enemies.

Here in the holy word
 Trust all, with one accord ;
 It will soon help afford :
 Tho' you be knight or lord,
 You may find shield and sword
 Here in the holy word.

“Here enter ladies all, of high degree,
 Of goodly shape, of humour gay and free ;
 Of lovely looks, of sprightly flesh and blood :
 Here take, here choose, here settle your abode.
 The gent, the brisk, the fair, whoever comes,
 With eyes that sparkle, or whose beauty blooms
 This bower is fashion'd by a gentle knight,
 Ladies, for you, and innocent delight.

This is design'd a place
 For every charming grace ;
 The witty and the fair
 Hither may all repair ;
 For every lovely face
 This is design'd a place.”

CHAPTER LV.

What Manner of Dwelling the Thelemites had.

IN the middle of the lower court there was a magnificent fountain of fair alabaster. Upon the top thereof stood the three Graces, with their cornucopias, and jetted out the water at their breasts, mouth, ears, eyes, and other open passages of the body. The inside of the buildings in this lower court stood upon great pillars of cassydony stone and porphyry marble, made archways after a goodly antique fashion. Within those were spacious galleries, long and large, adorned with curious pictures, the horns of bucks and unicorns ; with rhinoceroses, water-horses called hippopotames, the teeth and tusks of elephants, and other things well worth the beholding. The lodging of the ladies took up all from the tower Arctic unto the gate Mesembrine. The men possessed the rest. Before the said lodging of the ladies, that they might have their recreation between the two first towers, on the outside were placed the tiltyard, the theatre, and natatory with most admirable baths, in three stages, situated above one another, well furnished with all necessary accommodations and store of myrtle water.

Close to the river side was a fine, pleasant garden, and in the midst of that a labyrinth. Between the two other towers were the courts for tennis and the balloon. Towards the tower Criere stood the orchard, full of all fruit trees, set and ranged in a quincuncial order. At the end of that was the great park, abounding with all sorts of venison. Betwixt the third couple of towers were the butts and marks for shooting with a snap-work gun, an ordinary bow for common archery, or with a cross-bow. The office-houses were without the tower Hesperia, of one storey high. The stables were beyond the offices, and before them stood the falconry, managed by ostridge-keepers and falconers very expert in the art. And it was yearly supplied and furnished by the Candians, Venetians, and Sarmates with all sorts of most excellent hawks, eagles, gerfalcons, goose-hawks, sacres, laniers, falcons, spar-hawks, marlins, and all other kinds of them, so gentle and perfectly well manned that, flying of themselves sometimes from the castle, for their own disport, they would not fail to catch whatever they encountered. The venery, where the beagles and hounds were kept, was a little farther off, drawing towards the park.

All the halls, chambers, and cabinets were richly hung with tapestry and hangings of divers sorts, according to the variety of the seasons of the year. All the pavements and floors were covered with green cloth; the beds were all embroidered. In every withdrawing-room there was a looking-glass of pure crystal, set in a frame of fine gold, garnished all about with pearls, and was of such greatness that it would represent to the full the whole lineaments and proportion of the person that stood before it. At the going out of the halls which belong to the ladies' lodgings, were the perfumers and trimmers, through whose hands the gallants passed when they were to visit the ladies. Those sweet artificers did every morning furnish the ladies' chambers with the spirit of roses, orange-flower water, and angelica, and to each of them gave a little precious casket vapouring forth the most odoriferous exhalations of the choicest aromatical scents.

CHAPTER LVI.

THE ladies at the foundation of this order were apparelled after their own pleasure and liking ; but since that, of their own accord and free will, they have reformed themselves. Their accoutrements were in manner as follows : they wore stockings of scarlet, crimson, or engrained purple die, which reached just three inches above the knee, having a list beautified with exquisite embroideries and rare incisions of the cutter's art ; their garters were of the colour of their bracelets, and circled the knee a little, both over and under ; their shoes, pumps, and slippers, were either of red, violet, or crimson velvet, pinked and jagged like lobsters' wadles.

Next to their smock they put on the pretty kirtle or vasquin of pure silk camblet ; above that went the taffety or tabby vardingale, of white, red, tawny, grey, or of any other colour ; above this taffety petticoat they had another of cloth, or tissue, or brocade, embroidered with fine gold, and interlaced with needle-work ; or as they thought good, and according to the temperature and disposition of the weather, had then upper coats of satin, damask, or velvet, and those either orange, tawny, green, ash-coloured, blue, yellow, bright red, crimson, or white, and so forth ; or had them of cloth of gold, cloth of silver, or some other choice stuff, enriched with purple, or embroidered according to the dignity of the festival days and times wherein they wore them.

Their gowns, being still correspondent to the season, were either of cloth of gold, frizzled with a silver-raised work ; of red satin, covered with gold purple ; of tabby or taffety, white, blue, black, tawny, etc., of silk serge, silk camblet, velvet, cloth of silver, silver tissue, cloth of gold, gold wire, figured velvet, or figured satin, tinselled and overcast with golden threads in divers variously purfled draughts.

In summer, some days, instead of gowns, they wore light handsome mantles, made either of the stuff of the aforesaid attire, or like Moresco rugs, of violet velvet frizzled, with a raised work of gold upon silver purl ; or with a knotted cord work of gold embroidery, everywhere garnished with little Indian pearls. They always carried a fair pannache or plume of feathers of the colour of their muff, bravely adorned and tricked out with glistening spangles of gold. In the winter time they had their taffety gowns of all colours, as above named, and those lined with the rich furrings of hind-wolves or speckled lynxes, black-spotted weasels, martlet skins of Calabria, sables, and other costly furs of inestimable value. Their beads, rings, bracelets, collars, carcanets, and neck chains were all of precious stones, such as carbuncles, rubies, balaus, diamonds, sapphires, emeralds, turquoises, garnets, agates, berilles, and excellent margarites. Their head-dressing also varied with the season of the year, according to which they decked themselves. In winter it was of the French fashion; in the spring, of the Spanish; in summer, of the fashion of Tuscany, except only upon the holidays and Sundays, at which time they were accoutred in the French mode, because they accounted it more honourable, and better befitting the garb of a matronal pudicity.

The men were apparelled after their fashion. Their stockings were of tamine or of cloth serge, of white, black, scarlet, or some other engrained colour. Their breeches were of velvet, of the same colour with their stockings, or very near, embroidered and cut according to their fancy. Their doublet was of cloth of gold, of cloth of silver, of velvet, satin, damask, taffeties, etc., of the same colours, cut, embroidered, and suitably trimmed up in perfection. The points were of silk of the same colours; the tags were of gold well enamelled. Their coats and jerkins were of cloth of gold, cloth of silver, gold tissue, or velvet embroidered, as they thought fit. Their gowns were every whit as costly as those of the ladies. Their girdles were of silk, of the colour of their doublets. Every one had a gallant sword by his side, the hilt and handle whereof were gilt, and the scabbard of velvet of the colour of his breeches, with a chape of gold and pure goldsmith's work. The dagger was of the same. Their caps or bonnets were of black velvet, adorned with jewels and buttons of gold; upon that they wore a white plume, most prettily and minion-like parted by so many rows of gold spangles, at the end whereof hung dangling, in a more sparkling resplendency, fair rubies, emeralds, diamonds, etc.; but there was such a sympathy betwixt the gallants and the ladies that every day they were apparelled in the same livery; and that they might not miss, there were certain gentlemen appointed to tell the youths every morning what vestments the ladies would on that day wear, for all was done according to the pleasure of the ladies. In these so handsome clothes and habiliments so rich, think not that either one or the other of either sex did waste any time at all, for the masters of the wardrobes had all their raiments and apparels so ready for every morning, and the chamber ladies were so well skilled, that in a trice they would be dressed and completely in their clothes from head to foot. And to have those accoutrements with the more conveniency, there was about the wood of Theleme a row of houses of the extent of half a league, very neat and cleanly, wherein dwelt the goldsmiths, lapidaries, jewellers, embroiderers, tailors, gold-drawers, velvet-weavers, tapestry-makers, and upholsterers, who wrought there every one in his own trade, and all for the aforesaid jolly friars and nuns of the new stamp. They were furnished with matter and stuff from the hands of the Lord Nausiclete, who every year brought them seven ships from the Perlas and Cannibal islands, laden with ingots of gold, with raw silk, with pearls, and precious stones. And if any unions (pearls) began to grow old, and lose somewhat of their natural whiteness and lustre, those by their art did renew, by tendering them to eat to some pretty cocks, as they use to give casting unto hawks.

CHAPTER LVII.

How the Thelemites were governed, and of their Manner of Living.

ALL their life was spent not in laws, statutes, or rules, but according to their own free will and pleasure. They rose out of their beds when they thought good; they did eat, drink, labour, sleep, when they had a mind to it and were disposed for it. None did awake them, none did offer to constrain them to eat, drink, nor do any other thing, for so had Gargantua established it. In all their rule and strictest tie of their order there was but this one clause to be observed :

DO WHAT THOU WILT.

Because men that are free, well-born, well-bred, and conversant in honest companies, have naturally an instinct and spur that prompteth them unto virtuous actions, and withdraws them from vice, which is called honour. Those same men, when by base subjection and constraint they are brought under and kept down, turn aside from that noble disposition, by which they formerly were inclined to virtue, to shake off that bond of servitude, wherein they are so tyrannously enslaved; for it is agreeable to the nature of man to long after things forbidden, and to desire what is denied us. By this liberty they entered into a very laudable emulation to do all of them what they saw did please one. If any of the gallants or ladies should say, "Let us drink," they would all drink. If any one of them said, "Let us play," they all played. If one said, "Let us go a walking into the fields," they went all. If it were to go a hawking, or a hunting, the ladies mounted upon dainty well-paced nags, seated in a stately palfrey saddle, carried on their lovely fists, miniardly begloved every one of them, either a sparhawk, or a laneret, or a marlin, and the young gallants carried the other kinds of hawks. So nobly were they taught, that there was neither he nor she amongst them but could read, write, sing, play upon several musical instruments, speak five or six several languages, and compose in them all very quaintly, both in verse and prose. Never were seen so valiant knights, so noble and worthy, so dexterous and skilful both on foot and horseback, more brisk and lively, more nimble and quick, or better handling all manner of weapons, than were there. Never were seen ladies so proper and handsome, so miniard and dainty, less froward, or more ready with their hand, and with their needle, in every honest and free action belonging to that sex, than were there. For this reason, when the time came that any man of the said abbey, either at the request of his parents, or for some other cause, had a mind to go out of it, he carried along with him one of the ladies, namely her whom he had before that chosen for his mistress, and they were married together. And if they had formerly in Theleme lived in good devotion and amity, they did continue therein, and increase it to a greater height in their state of matrimony, and did entertain that mutual love till the very last day of their life, in no less vigour and fervency than at the very day of their wedding. Here must I not forget to set down unto you a riddle which was found under the ground, as they were laying the foundation of the abbey, engraven on a copperplate, and it was thus as followeth.

CHAPTER LVIII.

A Prophetical Riddle.

POOR mortals who wait for a happy day,
 Cheer up your hearts, and hear what I shall say,
 If it be lawful firmly to believe,
 That the celestial body can us give
 Wisdom to judge of things that are not yet,
 Or if from heaven such wisdom we may get,
 As may with confidence make us discourse
 Of years to come, their destiny and course ;
 I to my hearer give to understand,
 That this next winter, tho' it be at hand,
 Yea, and before, there shall appear a race
 Of men, who, loath to sit still in one place,
 Shall boldly go before all people's eyes
Suborning men of divers qualities,

To draw them unto covenants and sides,
 In such a manner, that whate'er betides,
 They'll move you, if you give them ear (no doubt)
 With both your friends and kindred to fall out.

They make a vassal to withstand his lord,
 And children their own parents; in a word,
 All reverences shall then be banished,
 No true respect to others shall be had.

They'll say that every man should have his turn,
 Both in his going forth and his return;
 And hereupon there shall arise such woes,
 Such jarring, and confused to's and fro's;
 That never were in history such coyles,
 Set down as yet, such tumults and garboyles;
 Then shall you many gallant men see by Valour stirr'd up, and youthful fervency;
 Who, trusting too much in their hopeful time,
 Live but a while, and perish in their prime;
 Neither shall any who this course shall run
 Leave off the race which he hath once begun;
 Till they the heavens with noise by their contention
 Have fill'd, and with their steps the earth's dimension
 Then those shall have no less authority,
 That have no faith, than those that will not lie;
 For then shall all be govern'd by a rude,
 Base, ignorant, and foolish multitude;
 The veriest lout of all shall be their judge,
 O, horrible and dangerous deluge!
Deluge I call it, and that for good reason,
 For this shall be omitted in no season;
 Nor shall the earth of this foul stir be free,
 Till suddenly you in great store shall see,
 The waters issue out, with whose streams the Most moderate of all shall moisten'd be;
 And justly too, because they did not spare
 The flocks of beasts that innocentest are;
 But did their sinews; and their bowels take,
 Not to the gods a sacrifice to make;
 But usually to serve themselves for sport,
 And now consider, I do you exhort.

In such commotions so continual,
 What rest can take the globe terrestrial?

Most happy then are they, that can it hold,
 And use it carefully as precious gold,
 By keeping it in gaol, whence it shall have No help but him, who being to it gave:
 And to increase his mournful accident
 The sun, before it set in th' occident,

Shall cease to dart upon it any light
 More than in an eclipse, or in the night :
 So that at once its favour shall be gone,
 And liberty with it be left alone :
 And yet, before it come to ruin thus,
 Its quaking shall be as impetuous
 As Ætna's was, when Titan's sons lay under,
 And yield, when lost, a fearful sound like thunder.
 Inarimé did not more quickly move,
 When Typhæus did the vast, huge hills remove ;
 And for despite, into the sea them threw.

Thus shall it, then, be lost by ways not few,
 And changed suddenly, when those, that have it,
 To other men that after come shall leave it.
 Then shall it be high time to cease from this
 So long, so great, so tedious exercise ;
 For the great waters now foretold by me,
 Will make each think where his retreat shall be ;
 And yet before that they be clean dispersed,
 You may behold in the air, where nought was erst,
 The burning heat of a great flame to rise,
Lick up the water, and the enterprise.

It resteth after these things to declare
 That those shall sit content, who chosen are ;
 With all good things, and with celestial manne
 And richly recompensed every man ;
 The other at the last all stripp'd shall be,
 That after this great work all men may see,
 How each shall have his due, this is their lot,
 O, he is worthy praise that shrinketh not.

No sooner was this enigmatical monument read over, but Gargantua, fetching a deep sigh, said unto those that stood by, "It is not now only (I perceive) that people called to the faith of the gospel, and convinced with the certainty of evangelical truths, are persecuted ; but happy is that man that shall not be scandalised, but shall always continue to the end in aiming at that mark which God by his dear Son hath set before us, without being distracted or diverted by his carnal affections and depraved nature."

The monk then said, "What do you think in your conscience is meant and signified by this riddle?" "What?" said Gargantua ; "the process and carrying on of the divine truth." "By Saint Goderan," said the monk, "that is not my exposition ; it is the style of the prophet Merlin ; make upon it as many grave allegories and glosses as you will, and dote upon it, you and the rest of the world, as long as you please ; for my part, I can conceive no other meaning in it but a description of a set at tennis, in dark and obscure terms.

“The suborners of men are the makers of matches, which are commonly friends. After the two chases are made, he that has the upper end of the tennis court goeth out, and the other cometh in. They believe the first that saith the ball was over or under the line. The waters are the heats that the players take till they sweat again. The cords of the rackets are made of the guts of sheep or goats. The globe terrestrial is the tennis ball. After playing, when the game is done, they refresh themselves before a clear fire, and change their shirts; then very willingly they make all good cheer, but most merrily those that have gained; and so farewell.”

THE AUTHOR'S PROLOGUE.

Most illustrious and most valorous champions, gentlemen, and others, who willingly give yourselves up to pretty conceits and chaste sallies of wit, you have erewhile seen, read, and understood the great and estimable Chronicles of the huge giant Gargantua, and, like upright men, have believed them all as true as the Bible text or the Holy Gospel, and have very often passed your time with honourable ladies and gentlewomen, telling them plausible long stories when you had nothing else to say, for which you are worthy of great praise and eternal memory. And I do heartily wish that every man would lay aside his especial vocation, forsake his profession or calling, and throw all affairs concerning himself into oblivion, to attend to this wholly, without distracting or troubling his mind with anything else, until he have learned them by heart; to the end that if by chance the art of printing should cease, or in case that in time to come all books should perish, every man might be able to teach them to his children, and give them over from hand to hand, to his successors and survivors, as an oral tradition; for there is in it more profit than a rabble of great pocky loggerheads can discern, who understand far less about these little merriments than did Raclet * about the Institute (of Justinian).

Of great and mighty lords, I have known not a few: men who, in going to hunt great beasts, or to hawk after wild ducks, if it chanced that the beast did not encounter the blinks, or that the hawk did but hover when perceiving the prey, by force of flight, had gained on her, have been much vexed, as you can well understand; these men, so that they might not take cold, I have known to seek refuge and comfort in relating the inestimable deeds of the said Gargantua. Others are in the world (these are no idle stories) who, being troubled with the toothache, and having spent their goods upon physicians, without receiving any ease of their pain, have found no more ready remedy than to put the said Chronicles betwixt two pieces of linen cloth, made somewhat hot, and apply them to the place that smarted, synapsing them with a little powder of projection, otherwise called doribus.

But what shall I say of those poor poxed and the gouty creatures? Oh how often have we seen them, as soon as they were anointed and thoroughly greased, till their faces did glister like the keyhole of a powdering tub, their teeth dance like the jacks of a pair of little virginals when they are played upon, and that they foamed from their very throats like a boar which the mongrel mastiff-hounds have driven in and overthrown amongst the toils—what did they then? All their consolation was to have a few pages of the said book read to them. And we have seen those who have given themselves up to a hundred puncheons of old-devils, in case that they did not feel a manifest ease and assuagement of pain at the hearing of the said book read, even when they were kept in a purgatory of torment; no more nor less than women in travail use to find their sorrow abated when the life of Saint Margarite is read unto them.

Is this nothing? Find me a book in any language, in any faculty or science whatsoever, that has such virtues, properties, and prerogatives, and I will pay you a quart of tripes. No, my masters, no. It is peerless, incomparable, and matchless; and this am I resolved to maintain even unto the everlasting fire. And those that will pertinaciously hold the contrary opinion, let them be accounted abusers, predestinators, impostors, and false guides. It is very true that there are found in some stately books certain occult and hid properties; of which number are to be reckoned "Whippot," "Orlando Furioso," "Robert the Devil," "Fierabras," "William without Fear," "Huon of Bourdeaux," "Monteville," and "Matabrune," but they are not comparable to the one we speak of. The world, too, well knows by infallible experience the great emolument and utility which it has received by the said latter Gargantuine Chronicle; for the printers have sold more of these in two months than there will be bought of Bibles in nine years.

I therefore, your humble slave, being willing to increase your solace and recreation, do offer you for a present another book of the same stamp, only that it is a little more reasonable and worthy of credence than the other was. For think not, if you would not wilfully err against your knowledge, I speak of it as the Jews do of the Law. I was not born under such a planet, neither did it ever befall me to lie, or affirm a thing for true that was not. I speak of it like a frolicsome Onocrotarie (buzzard), I should say Crotenotary of the martyrised lovers, and Croquenotarie of love. Quod vidimus testamur. It is of the horrible feats and prowesses of Pantagruel, whose menial servant I have been since I was a page, till this hour, that by his leave I am permitted to visit my cow-country, in order to discover if any of my kindred be alive there. However, to make an end of this Prologue, just as I give myself to an hundred thousand panniers-full of fair devils, body and soul, tripes and guts, in case that I lie so much as one single word in this whole history; after the like manner, St Anthony's fire burn you, Mahoom's disease whirl you, the squinance with a stitch in your side, and the wolf in your stomach truss you, the bloody flux seize upon you, the cursed sharp inflammations of wild fire, as slender and thin as cow's hair strengthened with quicksilver, enter into your fundament, and, like those of Sodom and Gomorrhah, may you fall into sulphur, fire, and bottomless pits, in case you do not firmly believe all that I shall relate unto you in this present Chronicle.

CHAPTER I.

Of the Original and Antiquity of the Great Pantagruel.

It will not be altogether fruitless, seeing that we are at leisure, to put you in mind of the source and origin whence we have derived the good Pantagruel. For I see that all good historiographers have thus treated their chronicles, not only the Greeks, the Arabians, and Ethiopians, but also the authors of the Holy Scripture, like Messieurs Saint Luke and Saint Matthew. It will therefore be fitting to remark that at the beginning of the world—I speak of a long time, it is above forty quarantains, or forty times forty nights, according to the supputation of the ancient Druids—a little after that Abel was killed by his brother Cain, the earth, imbrued with the blood of the just, was on a certain year so exceeding fertile in all those fruits which it usually produces to us, and especially in medlars, that ever since, throughout all ages, it has been called the year of the great medlars; for three of them did fill a bushel. In it the calends were found by the Grecian almanacs. There was that year nothing of the month of March in the time of Lent, and the middle of August was in May. In the month of October, as I take it, or at least September, that I may not err, for I will carefully take heed of that, was the week so famous in the Annals, which they call the week of the three Thursdays; for it had three of them by means of their irregular leap-years, called bissextiles, occasioned by the sun's having tripped and stumbled a little towards the left hand, like a debtor afraid of serjeants coming right upon him to arrest him; and the moon varied from her course above five fathom, and there was manifestly seen the motion of trepidation in the firmament of the fixed stars, called Aplanes, so that the middle Pleiade, leaving her fellows, declined towards the equinoctial, and the star named Spica left the constellation of the Virgin to withdraw herself towards the Balance, known by the name of Libra; which are cases very terrible, and matters so hard and difficult, that astrologians cannot set their teeth in them; and indeed their teeth had been pretty long if they could have reached thither.

However, account it for a truth, that everybody did most heartily eat of those medlars, for they were fair to the eye, and to the taste delicious, but even as Noah, that holy man to whom we are so much beholden, bound, and obliged, for having planted for us the vine, whence we have that nectarian, delicious, precious, heavenly, joyful, and deific liquor, which they call piot* or tiplage, was deceived in the drinking of it, for he was ignorant of the great virtue and power thereof; so likewise the men and women of that time delighted much in the eating of that fair, great fruit, but divers accidents did ensue thereupon; for there fell upon them all in their bodies a most terrible swelling, but not upon all in the same place, for some were swollen in the belly, and their belly became oval-shaped, like a great tun; of whom it is written Ventrem omnipotentem; who were all very honest men and merry blades. And of this race came Saint Fatgulch and Shrove-Tuesday.

Others did swell at the shoulders, and so knobby did they become, that they were therefore called Montifiers, which is as much as to say Hill-carriers, of whom you see some yet in the world, of divers sexes and degrees. Of this race came Æsop, some of whose excellent words and deeds you have in writing.

Some other puffs did swell in length by the member, which they call the labourer of nature, in such sort that it grew marvellously long, fat, great, lusty, stirring, and crest-risen, in the antique fashion, so much so indeed that it served as a girdle, which might be wound five or six times about their waist; but if the aforesaid member happened to be in full sail, bunt fair before the wind, then to have seen those strouting champions you would have taken them for men that had their lances settled on their rest, to run at the ring, or to tilt quintain. Of these, believe me, the race is utterly lost, and quite extinct, as the women say; for they do lament continually that there are none extant now of these great, etc. You know the rest of the song.

Others did grow in matter of ballocks so enormously that three of them would fill a sack. From them are descended the ballocks of Lorraine, which never dwell in cod-pieces, but fall down to the bottom of the breeches. Others grew in the legs, and to see them you would have said they had been cranes, or the reddish-long-billed-stork-like-scrank-legged sea-fowls, called flamans, or else men walking upon stilts. The little schoolboys called these leg-grown slangams iambics, in allusion to the French word jambe, which signifieth a leg. In others, their nose did grow so, that it seemed to be the beak of a limbeck, in every part most variously diapered with the twinkling sparkles of crimson-blisters budding forth, and purpled with pimples all enamelled with thick-set wheals of a sanguine colour, bordered with gules; and such have you seen the prebend Panzoult, and Woodenfoot the physician of Angiers. Of which race there were few that liked the pitsane, but all of them were perfect lovers of the pure Septembral juice. Naso and Ovid* had their extraction thence, and all those of whom it is written, Ne reminiscaris. Others grew in ears, which they had so big that one of them would have made a doublet, a pair of breeches, and a jacket, whilst with the other they might have covered themselves as with a Spanish cloak; and they say that in Bourbonnois† this race remaineth yet. Others grew in length of body, and of those came the giants, and of them Pantagruel.

I know that when reading this passage you will doubt within yourselves, and that not without a very good reason, which is this,—how is it possible that this relation can be true, seeing at the time of the flood all the world was destroyed, except Noah and seven persons more with him in the ark, into whose number Hurtali is not admitted? Doubtless the question is pertinent, but the answer shall satisfy you, or my wit is not rightly caulked. And because I was not to tell you anything of that time of my own fancy, I will bring unto you the authority of the Massorets, interpreters of the holy Hebrew scriptures, who affirm that verily the said Hurtali* was not within the ark of Noah, neither could he get in, for he was too big, but he sat astride upon it, with one leg on the one side, and another on the other, as little children use to do on their wooden horses, or as the great bull of Berne, which was killed at Marinian, did ride for his hackney the great murdering stone-thrower called the Canon-pevier, a pretty beast, of a fair and pleasant amble without all question. In that posture, he, after God, saved the said ark from danger, for with his legs he gave it the impulsion that was needful, and with his foot turned it whither he pleased, as a ship answereth her rudder. Those that were within sent him up victuals in abundance by a chimney, as people very thankfully acknowledged the good he did them. And sometimes they did talk together as Icaromenippus did to Jupiter, according to the report of Lucian. Have you understood all this well? Drink then one good draught without water, for if you believe it not—no truly do I not, nor I quoth she.†

* Hurtali. Menage has observed, in the margin of his Rabelais, that the rabbins say this, not of Hurtali, but of Og, King of Basan. See Le Pelletier, c. 25 of his "Noah's" Ark.

† Quoth she. It means, Nor I neither, a very ancient expression in some parts of France.

CHAPTER II.

Of the Nativity of the redoubted Pantagruel.

GARGANTUA at the age of four hundred fourscore forty and four years begat his son Pantagruel, by his wife named Badebec, daughter to the king of the Amaurots in Utopia, who died in child-birth; for he was so wonderfully great and lumpish that he could not possibly come forth into the light of the world without thus suffocating his mother. But that we may fully understand the cause and reason of his name which was given him at baptism, remark that in that year there was so great drought over all the country of Africa that there passed thirty and six months, three weeks, four days, thirteen hours, and a little more without rain, but with a heat so vehement that the whole earth was parched by it.

It was not more dried up in the days of Elijah than at that time. There was not a tree to be seen that had either leaf or bloom upon it. The grass was without verdure, the rivers were drained, the fountains dried up, the poor fishes abandoned by their proper element, wandering and crying upon the ground most horribly. The birds fell down from the air for want of moisture.

The wolves, foxes, harts, wild-boars, fallow-deer, hares, coneyes, weasels, brocks, badgers, and other such beasts, were found dead in the fields with their mouths open.

In respect of men, there was great suffering; you should have seen them put out their tongues like hares which have been run six hours. Many threw themselves into the wells; others entered within a cow's belly to be in the shade: those Homer calls Alibants.

All the country was dead, and it was most lamentable to see the labour of mortals in defending themselves against this horrific drought. They had work enough to do to save the holy water in the churches from being wasted; but there was such order taken by the counsel of my lords the cardinals, and of our holy father; that none did dare to take above one lick. Yet when any one came into the church, you should have seen above twenty poor thirsty fellows hang upon him that was the distributor of the water, and that with a wide open throat, gaping for some little drop, like the rich bad man in Luke, that might fall by, lest anything should be lost. Oh how fortunate was he in that year who had a cool well-plenished cellar!

The philosopher reports in moving the question,—Wherefore is it that the sea-water is salt?—that at the time when Phœbus gave the government of his resplendent chariot to his son Phæton, the said Phæton, unskilful in the art, and not knowing how to keep the ecliptic line betwixt the two tropics of the latitude of the sun's course, strayed out of his way, and came so near the earth that he dried up all the countries that were under it, burning a great part of the heavens, which the philosophers call the via lactea, and the huff-snuffs* called the way of Saint James, although the most high-crested poets affirm that to be the place where Juno's milk fell when she gave suck to Hercules. The earth at that time was so excessively heated that it fell into an enormous sweat, yea such a one as made it sweat out the sea, which is therefore salt, because all sweat is salt; and this you cannot but confess to be true, if you will taste of your own, or of those that have the pox, when they are put into sweating, it is all one to me.

Just such another case fell out this same year. On a certain Friday, when the whole people were bent upon their devotions, and had made goodly processions, with store of litanies, and fair preachings, and beseechings of God Almighty to look down with his eye of mercy upon their miserable condition, there was even then visibly seen issue out of the ground great drops of water, such as fall from a puff-bagged man in a top sweat. Then the poor hoydens began to rejoice, as if it had been a thing very profitable unto them; for some said that there was not one drop of moisture in the air whence they might have any rain, and that the earth did supply the default of that. Other learned men said that it was a shower of the Antipodes, as Seneca saith in his fourth book. Questionum naturalium, speaking of the source and origin of the river Nile; but they were deceived, for, the procession being ended, when every one went about to gather of this dew, and to drink of it with full bowls, they found that it was nothing but pickle, more brackish and more salt than the saltest water of the sea.

And because Pantagruel was born in that very day, his father gave him that name; for Panta in Greek is as much as to say all, and Gruel in the Hagarene language doth signify thirsty; inferring thereby, that at his birth the whole world was thirsty, as likewise foreseeing that he would be some day supreme lord and sovereign of the thirsty, which was shown to him at that very same hour by a more evident sign. For when his mother Badebec was bringing him forth, and while the midwives waited to receive him, there came first out of her belly threescore and eight tregeneers, that is, salt-sellers, every one of them leading in a halter a mule heavy laden with salt; after whom issued forth nine dromedaries, with great loads of hams and dried neats' tongues on their backs. Then followed seven camels loaded with chitterlings, hogs' puddings, and sausages. After them came out five great wains, full of leeks, garlic, onions, and chibots, drawn with five-and-thirty strong cart-horses, which was six for every one besides the thiller. At the sight hereof the midwives were much amazed ; yet some of them said, "Lo, here is good provision, and, indeed, we need it ; for we drink but lazily, as if our tongues walked on crutches, and not lustily like Lansman Dutches. Truly this is a good sign, there is nothing here but what is fit for us, these are the spurs of wine."

As they were tattling thus together after their accustomed manner, behold out comes Pantagrue all hairy like a bear, whereupon one of them, inspired with a prophetic spirit, said, "He is born with all his hair ; he will undoubtedly do wonderful things ; and, if he live, he shall have age."

CHAPTER III.

*Of the Grief wherewith Gargantua was moved at the Decease

WHEN Pantagrue was born, there was none more astonished than his father Gargantua ; for, on the one hand, seeing his wife Badebec dead, and, on the other, his son Pantagrue born, so fair and so great, he knew not what to say, nor what to do. And which troubled his brain was to know whether he should cry for the death of his wife, or laugh for the joy of his son. He was hinc hinc choked with sophistical arguments, for he framed them very well in modo et figura, but he could not resolve them ; and by this means remained entangled, like a mouse caught in a trap, or a kite snared in a gin.

"Shall I weep?" said he. "Yes, for why? My so good wife is dead, who was the most this, the most that, that was ever in the world. Never shall I see her, never shall I find such another ; it is unto me an irretrievable loss ! Oh my God, what have I done to thee that thou shouldst thus punish me? Why didst thou not take me away before her? For me to live without her is but to languish. Ah, Badebec, my love, my minion, my little coney—yet it had in circumference full six acres, three rods, five poles, four yards, two feet, one inch and a half of good woodland measure—my tender peggy, my cod-piece darling, my bob and hit, my slipshoe-lovie, never shall I see thee ! Ah, poor Pantagrue, thou hast lost thy good mother, thy sweet nurse, thy well-beloved lady ! Oh false death, how injurious and despiteful hast thou been to me ! How malicious and outrageous have I found thee in taking her from me, my well-beloved wife, to whom immortality did of right belong !

With these words he did cry like a cow; but on a sudden fell a laughing like a calf, when Pantagruel came into his mind. "Ha, my little son," said he, my "childilolly, fellifondy, dandlichucky, my ballocky, my pretty rogue! Oh how jolly thou art, and how much I am bound to my gracious God, that hath been pleased to bestow on me a son, so fair, so spritful, so lively, so smiling, so pleasant, and so gentle! Ho, ho, ho, ho, how glad I am! Let us drink, ho, and put away melancholy! Bring of the best, rinse the glasses, lay the cloth, drive out these dogs, blow this fire, light candles, shut that door there, cut this bread in sippets for brewis, send away these poor folks in giving them what they ask, hold my gown. I will strip myself into my doublet (en cuerpo), to make the gossips merry, and keep them company."

As he spake this, he heard the litanies and the mementos of the priests that carried his wife to be buried, upon which he left the good purpose he was in, and was suddenly ravished another way, saying, "Lord God, must I again contrist myself? This grieves me. I am no longer young, I grow old, the weather is dangerous; I may perhaps take an ague, then shall I be foiled, if not quite undone. By the faith of a gentleman,* it were better to cry less, and drink more. My wife is dead, well, by God (da jurandi) I shall not raise her again by my crying: she is well, she is in Paradise, at least, if she be no higher; she prays to God for us, she is happy, she is above the sense of our miseries, nor can our calamities reach her. What though she be dead, must not we also die? The same debt which she hath paid, hangs over our heads; nature will require it of us, and we must all of us some day taste of the same sauce. Let her pass, then, and the Lord preserve the survivors; for I must now cast about how to get another wife.

"But I will tell you what you shall do," said he to the midwives. "Go you to my wife's interment, and I will the while rock my son; for I find myself somewhat distempered, and should otherwise be in danger of falling sick; † but drink one draught first, you will be the better for it, believe me, upon mine honour." They at his request went to her funeral obsequies. In the meanwhile, poor Gargantua, staying at home, and willing to have somewhat in remembrance of her to be engraven upon her tomb, made this epitaph, in the manner as followeth.

† And in danger of falling sick. Read, and should be in danger of falling sick: je serois, etc. For the author alludes to the kings of France never being present at any funeral, no, not of their nearest relations, because they are made to believe the air of the vaults would be prejudicial to their health. And, therefore, it is observed they never enter Saint Denis but with their feet foremost. Saint Denis is a little town near Paris, where there is an abbey and church, famous for the sepulture of the kings of France and all that royal family.

Dead is the noble Badebec,
Who had a face like a rebec ;
A Spanish body, and a belly
Of Switzerland ; she died, I tell ye,
In child-birth. Pray to God, that her
He pardon wherein she did err.
Here lies her body, which did live
Free from all vice, as I believe,
And did decease at my bedside,
The year and day in which she died.

CHAPTER IV.

Of the Infancy of Pantagruel.

I FIND by the ancient historiographers and poets that divers have been born in this world after very strange manners, which would be too long to repeat: read therefore the seventh book of Pliny, if you have so much leisure. Yet have you never heard of any so wonderful as that of Pantagruel; for it is a very difficult matter to believe how, in the little time he was in his mother's belly, he grew both in body and strength. That which Hercules did was nothing, when in his cradle he slew two serpents, for those serpents were but little and weak, but Pantagruel, being yet in the cradle, did things more to be amazed at. I pass by here the relation of how at every one of his meals he supped up the milk of four thousand six hundred cows, and how, to make him a skillet to boil his milk in, there were set to work all the brasiers of Saumure in Anjou, of Villedieu in Normandy, and of Bramont in Lorraine. And they served in this whitepot-meal to him in a huge great bell, which is yet to be seen in the city of Bourges in Berry, near the palace; but his teeth were already so well grown, and so strengthened by exercise, that of the said bell he bit off a great morsel, as very plainly doth appear to this hour.

One morning, when they would have made him suck one of his cows—for he never had any other nurse, as the history tells us—he got one of his arms loose from the swaddling-bands, wherewith he was kept fast in the cradle, laid hold on the said cow under the left fore ham, and grasping her to him, ate up her udder and half of her paunch, with the liver and the kidneys, and had devoured all up if she had not cried out most horribly, as if the wolves had held her by the legs, at which noise company came in, and took away the said cow from Pantagruel. Yet, in doing this, the quarter whereby he caught her was left in his hand, of which quarter he gulped up the flesh in a trice, even with as much ease as you would eat a sausage, and that so greedily with desire of more, that, when they would have taken away the bone from him, he swallowed it down whole, as a cormorant would do a little fish ; and afterwards began fumblingly to say, "Good, good, good"—for he could not yet speak plain—giving them to understand that he had found it very good, and that he wanted more. When they who attended him saw this, they bound him with great cable-ropes, like those that are made at Tain, for the carriage of salt to Lyons : or such as those are whereby the great French ship ride at anchor in the road of Newhaven in Normandy. But one day a great bear, which his father had bred, got loose, came towards him, began to lick his face, for his nurses had not thoroughly wiped his chaps, at which unexpected approach being on a sudden offended, he as lightly rid himself of those great cables, as Samson did of the hawser ropes wherewith the Philistines had tied him, and, by your leave, takes up my lord the bear, and tears him in pieces like a pullet, which served him for a gorgeful, or good warm bit for that meal.

Gargantua, fearful lest the child should hurt himself, caused four great chains of iron to be made to bind him, and so many strong wooden arches unto his cradle, most firmly stocked and morticed in huge frames. Of those chains you have got one at Rochelle, which they draw up at night betwixt the two great towers of the haven. Another is at Lyons, a third at Angiers, and the fourth was carried away by the devils to bind Lucifer, who broke his chains in those days, by reason of a cholic that did extraordinarily torment him, taken with eating a serjeant's soul fried for his breakfast. And therefore you may believe that which Nicholas de Lyra saith upon that place of the Psalter, where it is written, Et Og regem Basan, that the said Og, being yet little, was so strong and robustious, that they were fain to bind him with chains of iron in his cradle. Thus continued Pantagruel for a while very calm and quiet, for he was not able so easily to break those chains, especially having no room in the cradle to give a swing with his arms. But see what happened once upon a great holiday that his father Gargantua made a sumptuous banquet to all the princes of his court. I am apt to believe that the menial officers of the house were so busy in waiting at the feast, that nobody took care of poor Pantagruel, who was left à recolorum, behind-hand, all alone. What did he? Hark what he did, good people. He essayed to break the chains of the cradle with his arms, but could not, for they were too strong for him. Then did he keep with his feet stamping so long, that at last he beat out the lower end of his cradle, which notwithstanding was made of a great post five feet in square ; and, as soon as he had gotten out his feet, he slid down as well as he could till he had got his soles to the ground, and then with a mighty force he rose up, carrying his cradle upon his back, bound to him like a tortoise that crawls up against a wall ; and to have seen him you would have thought it had been a great carrick of five hundred ton upon one end. In this manner he entered into the great hall where they were banqueting, which did much affright the company ; yet because his arms were tied in, he could not reach anything to eat, but with great pain stooped now and then a little, to take with the whole flat of his tongue some good lick, good bit, or morsel. When his father saw this, he knew well enough that they had left him without giving him anything to eat, and therefore commanded that he should be loosed from the said chains, by the counsel of the princes and lords there present. Besides that, also, the physicians of Gargantua said, that if they did thus keep him in his cradle, he would be all his lifetime subject to the stone. When he was unchained, they made him to sit down, where, after he had fed very well, he took his cradle, and broke it into more than five hundred thousand pieces with one blow of his fist, that he struck in the midst of it, swearing that he would never come into it again.

CHAPTER V.

Of the Acts of the Noble Pantagruel in his Youthful Age.

THUS grew Pantagruel from day to day, and to every one's eye waxed more and more in all his dimensions, which made his father to rejoice by a natural affection. And whilst he was yet little, he caused to be made for him a pretty cross-bow to shoot at small birds, which now they call the great cross-bow at Chantelle. He sent him next to the school to learn, and to spend his youth. He came to Poitiers to study, where he profited much. While there he saw that the scholars were oftentimes at leisure, and knew not how to bestow their time, and he took compassion on them. One day he took from a large rock, called there Passelourdin, a huge stone, of about twelve fathom square, and fourteen hands thick, and with great ease set it upon four pillars in the midst of a field ; to the end that the said scholars, when they had nothing else to do, might pass their time in getting up on that stone, and feasting with store of hams, pasties, and flagons, as well as carving their names upon it with a knife ; in token of which deed the stone is called till this hour the lifted stone.* In remembrance hereof there is none entered into the matricular book of the said university, or accounted capable of taking any degree therein, till he have first drunk in the Caballine fountain of Croustelles, passed at Passelourdin,† and got up upon the raised stone.

Afterwards, reading the beautiful Chronicles of his Ancestors, he found that Geoffrey of Lusignan, called Geoffrey with the great tooth, grandfather to the cousin-in-law of the eldest sister of the aunt of the son-in-law of the uncle of the good daughter of his stepmother, was interred at Maillezais; therefore one day he took campos (which is a little vacation from study to play a while), that he might give him a visit as unto an honest man. Going from Poitiers with some of his companions, they passed by Leguge, visiting the noble Abbot Ardillon; then by Lusignan, by Sansay, by Celles, by Colonges, by Fontenay Le Comte, saluting the learned Tiraqueau, and thence arrived at Maillezais, where he went to see the sepulchre of the said Geoffrey with the great tooth. This made him somewhat afraid, for on looking upon the picture, its lively draughts set forth the representation of a man in extreme fury, drawing his great Malchus falchon half-way out of his scabbard. When he demanded to know the reason, the canons of the place told him that there was no other cause of it, but that Pictoribus atque poetis, etc., that is to say, that painters and poets have liberty to paint and devise what they list after. But he was not satisfied with their answer, and said, "He is not thus painted without a cause, and I suspect‡ that at his death there was some wrong done him, of which he requires his kindred to take revenge. I will inquire further into it, and then do what shall be reasonable."

Then he returned not to Poitiers, but would take a view of the other universities of France. Going to Rochelle, he took shipping and arrived at Bordeaux, where he found no great exercise, except it were some mariners and lightermen wrestling on the quay. Thence he came to Toulouse, where he learned to dance very well, and to play with the two-handed sword, as the fashion of the scholars of the said university is to bestir themselves in games; but he did not stay long there, when he saw that they caused their regents to be burnt alive, like red herrings, saying, "Now God forbid that I should die this death!

* The lifted stone. This stone, said to be sixty feet round, stands near Poitiers, on five other stones, all fixed there in 1478, as a monument of the fair which is held in October, in the old market-place of Poitiers.

† Passelourdin. In English, the booby-pass.

‡ And I suspect. Jeffrey, surnamed with the great tooth, had caused the abbey of Maillezais to be burned in 1232, but the court of Rome not only obliged him to rebuild it, but to endow it to the amount of 3,000 livres and upwards. For this reason he is buried there as the second founder; and perhaps it was for the above reason that his effigies represent him, as it were, enraged at the wrong he thought done him.

for I am by nature sufficiently dry already, without heating myself any further."

He went then to Montpellier, where he met with the good wines of Mirevaux, and jovial company, and thought to set himself to the study of physic; but he considered that that calling was too troublesome and melancholic, and that physicians did smell of glisters like old devils. Therefore he resolved he would study the laws; but seeing that there were but three scould and one bald-pated legist in that place, he departed thence. In his way he made the bridge of Guard, and the amphitheatre of Nismes, in less than three hours, which nevertheless seems to be a more divine than human feat. He came next to Avignon, where he was not more than three days until he fell in love; for the women there take great delight in playing at the close-buttock game, because it is Papal ground.* His tutor and pedagogue Epistemon perceiv'ing this, he drew him out of that place, and brought him to Valence in the Dauphiny, where he saw no great matter of recreation, only that the lubbards of the town did beat the scholars, which so incensed him, that upon a certain Sunday, the people being at their public dancing in the streets, and one of the scholars offering to put himself into the ring to partake of that sport, the foresaid lubberly fellows would not permit him the admittance into their society. He took the scholar's part, and so belaboured the former with blows, that he drove them all before him, even to the brink of the river Rhone, and would have there have drowned them, but that they did squat to the ground like moles, and there lay close a full half league under the river. The hole† is to be seen there yet.

Thence he departed, and came to Angiers, where he found himself comfortably situated, and would have continued some space, but that the plague drove them away. From there he came to Bourges, where he studied a good long time, and profited very much in the faculty of the laws, and would sometimes say, that the books of the civil law were like unto a wonderfully precious, royal, and triumphant robe of gold, edged with dirt; for in the world are no better books to be seen, more ornate, nor more eloquent, than the texts of the Pandects; but the bordering of them, that is to say, the gloss of Accursius, is so scurvy, vile, base, and unsavoury, that it is nothing but filthiness and villainy.

Going from Bourges, he came to Orleans, where he found a number of swaggering scholars‡ that made him great entertainment at his coming, and with whom he learned to play at tennis so well, that he became a master at that game. The students of the said place make a prime exercise of it; and sometimes they carried him unto Cupid's house of commerce (in that city termed islands, because of their being most ordinarily environed with other houses, and not contiguous to any), there to recreate his person at the sport of poussevant, which the wenches of London call the ferkers in and in. As to splitting his head with over much study, he had an especial care not to do it, for fear of spoiling his eyes; for it was told him by one of his teachers, there called regents, that the pain of the eyes was the most hurtful thing of any to the sight. Hence, when he one day was made a licentiate, or graduate in law, one of the scholars of his acquaintance, who had not much more of learning than his burden, though instead of that he could dance very well, and play at tennis, made the blazon and device of the licentiaties in the said university, saying,—

* Because it is Papal ground. Swarming with monks and priests, who, for a very moderate tax, have obtained for the courtesans full liberty to follow their trade.

† The hole, etc. This hole, beginning at the abbey of Saint Peter, goes a good way under the Rhone.

‡ Swaggering scholars. It should be rake-hell and skim the devil scholars, for that is the meaning of the word rust e (whence we have our word roister).

So you have in your hand a racket,
 A tennis-ball in your cod-placket,
 A Pandect law in your cap's tippet,
 And that you have the skill to trip it
 In a low dance, you will be allowed
 The grant of the licentiate's hood.

CHAPTER VI.

*How Pantagruel met with a Limosin, who affected to speak in

UPON a certain day, I know not when, Pantagruel was walking after supper with some of his fellow-students without that gate of the city through which we enter on the road to Paris, when he encountered a young, spruce-like scholar who was coming upon the same way, and, after they had saluted one another, asked him thus: "My friend, whence comest thou now?" The scholar answered him: "From alme, inclyte and celebrate academy, which is vocitated Lutetia." "What is the meaning of this?" said Pantagruel to one of his men. "It is," answered he, "from Paris." "Thou comest from Paris, then?" said Pantagruel, "and how do you spend your time there, you my masters the students of Paris?" The scholar answered: "We transfretate the Sequane at dilucul and crepuscul; we deambulate by the compites and quadrives of the urb; we despumate the Latial verbocination; and, like verisimilarity amorabons, we captat the benevolence of the omnijugal, omniform, and omnigenal foemine sex. Upon certain diecules we invisat the lupanares, and in a venerian ecstasy inculcate our veretres into the penitissime recesses of the pudends of these amicabilest meretricules. Then do we cauponisate in the meritory taberns of the Pineapple, the Castle, the Magdalene, and the Mule, goodly vervecine spatules perforaminated with petrocile. And if by fortune there be rarity, or penury of pecune in our marsupies, and that they be exhausted of ferruginean metal, for the shot we demit our codices, and oppignerat our vestiments, whilst we prestolate the coming of the Tabellaries from the penates and patriotic lares." To which Pantagrue answered: "What devilish language is this? By God, I think thou art some kind of heretic." "My lord, no," said the scholar; "for libentissimally, as soon as it illucesceth any minutule slice of the day, I demigrate into one of these so well architected minsters, and, there irrorating myself with fair lustral water, I mumble off little parcels of some missic precatation of our sacrificuls, and, submurmuring my horary precules, I elave and absterge my anime from its nocturnal iniquinations. I revere the olympicols. I latrially venere the supernal astripotent. I dilige and redame my proxims. I observe the decalogical precepts, and, according to the facultatule of my vires, I do not discede from them one late unguicule. Nevertheless it is veriform, that because Mammona doth not supergurgitate anything in my loculs, that I am somewhat rare and lent to supererogate the elemosynes to those egeants, that hostially queritate their stipe."

"Prut, tut," said Pantagrue, "what doth this fool mean to say? I think he is upon the forging of some diabolical tongue, and that enchanter-like he would charm us." To whom one of his men said: "Without doubt, sir, this fellow would counterfeit the language of the Parisians, but he doth only flay the Latin, imagining by so doing that he doth highly Pindarise it in most eloquent terms, and strongly conceiteth himself to be therefore a great orator in the French, because he disdaineth the common manner of speaking." To which Pantagrue said: "It is true." The scholar answered: "My worshipful lord, my genie is not apt nate to that which this flagitious nebulon saith, to excoriate the cuticle of our vernacular Gallic, but viceversally I gnave opere, and by veles and rames enite to locupletate it with the Latinicome redundance." "By God," said Pantagrue, "I will teach you to speak. But first come hither, and tell me whence thou art?" To this the scholar answered: "The primeval origin of my aves and ataves was indigenary of the Lemovick regions, where requiesceth the corpor of the hagiostat Saint Martial." "I understand thee very well," said Pantagrue. "When all comes to all, thou art a Limosin, and thou wilt here by thy affected speech counterfeit the Parisians. Well now, come hither, I must show thee a new trick, and handsomely give thee the combfeat." With this he took him by the throat, saying to him, "Thou flayest the Latin—by Saint John, I will make thee flay the fox, for I will now flay thee alive." Then began the poor Limosin to cry, "Haw, gwid maaster, haw, laord, my halp and Saint Marshaw, haw, I'm worried. Haw, my thropple, the bean of my cragg is bruck! Haw, for Guad's seck, lawt my lean, maaster; waw, waw, waw!" "Now," said Pantagruel, "thou speakest naturally, and so let him go." The poor Limosin had totally bewrayed and thoroughly conshit his breeches, which were not deep and large enough, but round strait cannioned gregs, having in the seat a piece like a keeling's tail, and therefore in French called de chausses à queue de merlus.* "Then," said Pantagruel, "Saint Alipantin, what civette! Fie! to the devil with this turnip-eater—how he stinks!—and so let him go." But this hug of Pantagruel's was such a terror to him all the days of his life, and took such deep impression on his fancy, that very often, distracted with sudden affright, he would startle and say that Pantagruel held him by the neck. Besides that, it procured him a continual drought and desire to drink, so that after some few years he died of the death Roland, in plain terms called thirst, a work of divine vengeance, showing us that which saith the philosopher, and Aulus Gellius, that it becomes us to speak according to the common language; and that we should, as said Octavian Augustus, strive to shun all strange and unknown words with as much heedfulness and circumspection as pilots of ships use to avoid the rocks and banks in the sea.

CHAPTER VII.

How Pantagruel came to Paris, and of the Choice Books of the Library of Saint Victor.

AFTER that Pantagruel had studied very well at Orleans, he resolved to see the great University at Paris; but before his departure, he was informed that there was a huge bell at Saint Anian, in the said town of Orleans, under the ground, which had been there above two hundred and fourteen years, for it was so great that they could not get it so much as above the ground, although they had used all the means that are found in Vitruvius de Architectura, Albertus de Re Ædificatoria, Euclid, Theon, Archimedes, and Hero de Ingeniis. Wherefore, condescending to the humble request of the citizens and inhabitants of the said town, he determined to remove it to the tower that was erected for it. When he came to the place where it was, he lifted it out of the ground with his little finger, as easily as you would have done a hawk's bell, or bell-weather's tingle tangle; but, before he would carry it to the foresaid tower or steeple, he must needs make some music with it about the town, and ring it along all the streets, as he carried it in his hand, wherewith all the people were very glad. But there happened one great inconvenience, for when carrying it and ringing it about the streets, all the good Orleans wine turned instantly, waxed flat, and was spoiled, which nobody there perceived till the night following; for every man found himself so altered, and a-dry with drinking these flat wines, that they did nothing but spit, and that as white as Maltha cotton, saying, "We have got the Pantagruel, and our very throats are salted."

After this he came to Paris with his retinue. At his entry every one came out to see him—as you know well enough, the people of Paris are sottish by nature,* by B flat and B sharp—and beheld him with great astonishment, mixed with no less fear, that he would carry away the palace† into some other country à remotis, as his father formerly had done the great peal of bells at our Lady's church, to tie about his mare's neck. Now after he had stayed there some time, and studied very well in all the seven liberal arts, he said it was a good town to live in, but not in which to die; for that the grave-digging rogues of Saint Innocent used in frosty nights to warm their bums with dead men's bones. During his residence there he found the library of Saint Victor, a very stately and magnificent one, especially in some books which were there, of which follows the Repertory and Catalogue, Et primò,

The two-horse tumbril of Salvation.

The Codpiece of the Law.‡

The Slippers or Pantofles of the Decretals.§

The Pomegranate of Vice.

† The Palace. Le Palais. This word means the Courts of Judicature that is, the Parliament.

‡ The codpieces of the law. Bragueta juris. No such title of a real book; the author only quibbles upon the double meaning of the French word droit (in Latin, jus), droit signifying both rectitude and erection.

§ The slippers or pantofles, etc. Pantofles decretorum. This book is thus intituled, as well because the popes, by virtue of their ordinances, commonly called decretals, have made themselves so highly revered, that all who approach them must kiss their slipper, as also because the doctors made so by decree (or ordinance) generally go abroad in their slippers.

† Blockheadodus, de vitâ et honestate bragadochiorum. It is in the original Lourdaudus de vitâ et honestate bragarderum. Formerly in France a man was called a braggard that flauntingly dressed, from the word bragues, short and close linen breeches worn next to the thighs, as drawers or under slops are worn now by some. The fashion of these ancient bragues being laid aside, together with braguettes (codpieces), as indecent, because both one and the other did too visibly mark out the place and shape of the parts that ought to be nameless, a man must be very unmannerly and rude to continue to justify the use of them.

‡ The cymbals of the ladies The irregular, wanton life of some ladies of quality.

§ The dungers' martingale. Before, in l. 1, c. 20, it is said, all was done as they did appoint, only Gargantua doubted that they could not quickly find out breeches fit for his wearing (Janotus'), because he knew not what fashion would best become the said orator, whether the martingale fashion, wherein is a sponge-hole, with a drawbridge for the fundament, in order to dung the more easily; or the fashion of the mariners, etc.

|| The morris-dance of the heretics. La morisque de hereticques The morris (rectius, moorish) dance of the heretics, means neither more nor less than the punishment of the halter, which, in Rabelais's time, was particularly appropriated to the Lutherans, who, after two or three jerks, were let fall into a fire kindled at the foot of the gibbet.

CHAPTER VIII.

How Pantagruel, being at Paris, received Letters from His Father Gargantua, and the Copy of Them.

PANTAGRUEL studied very hard, as you may well conceive, and profited accordingly; for he had an excellent understanding, and notable wit, together with a capacity in memory, equal to the measure of twelve oil budgets, or butts of olives. And, as he was there abiding one day, he received a letter from his father, in manner as followeth :—

“Most dear Son,—Amongst the gifts, graces, and prerogatives with which the sovereign plasmator God Almighty hath endowed and adorned human nature at the beginning, that seems to me most singular and excellent by which we may in a mortal estate attain to a kind of immortality, and in the course of this transitory life perpetuate our name and seed, which is done by a progeny issued from us in the lawful bonds of matrimony. Whereby that in some measure is restored unto us which was taken from us by the sin of our first parents, to whom it was said that, because they had not obeyed the commandment of God their Creator, they should die; and by death should be brought to nought that so stately frame and plasmature, wherein the man at first had been created.

“But by this means of seminal propagation there continueth in the children what was lost in the parents; and in the grandchildren that which perished in their fathers, and so successively until the day of the last judgment, when Jesus Christ shall have rendered up to God the Father his kingdom in a peaceable condition, out of all danger and contamination of sin: for then shall cease all generations and corruptions, and the elements leave off their continual transmutations, seeing the so much desired peace shall be attained unto and enjoyed, and that all things shall be brought to their end and period. And, therefore, not without just and reasonable cause, do I give thanks to God, my Saviour and Preserver, for that he hath enabled me to see my bald old age reflourish in thy youth; for when, at his good pleasure, who rules and governs all things, my soul shall leave this mortal habitation, I shall not account myself wholly to die, but to pass from one place unto another, considering that, in and by thee, I continue in my visible image living in the world, visiting and conversing with people of honour, and other my good friends, as I was wont to do. Which conversation of mine, although it was not without sin (because we are all of us trespassers, and therefore ought continually to beseech his divine majesty to blot our transgressions out of his memory), yet was it by the help and grace of God, without all manner of reproach before men.

“Wherefore, if those qualities of the mind but shine in thee, wherewith I am endowed, as in thee remaineth the perfect image of my body, thou wilt be esteemed by all men to be the perfect guardian and treasure of the immortality of our name. But, if otherwise, I shall truly take but small pleasure to see it, considering that the lesser part of me, which is the body, would abide in thee, and the best, to wit, that which is the soul, and by which our name continues blessed amongst men, would be degenerate and abastardised. This I do not speak out of any distrust that I have of thy virtue, which I have heretofore already tried, but to encourage thee yet more earnestly to proceed from good to better. And that which I now write unto thee is not so much that thou shouldest live in this virtuous course, as that thou shouldest rejoice in so living and having lived, and cheer up thyself with the like resolution in time to come; to the prosecution and accomplishment of which enterprise and generous undertaking thou mayest easily remember how that I have spared nothing, but have so helped thee as if I had no other treasure in this world, but to see thee once in my life completely well bred and accomplished, as well in virtue, honesty, and valour, as in all liberal knowledge and civility, and so to leave thee after my death as a mirror representing the person of me thy father, and if not so excellent, and such indeed as I do wish thee, yet such in my desire.

“But although my deceased father of happy memory, Grangousier, had bent his best endeavours to make me profit in all perfection and political knowledge, and that my labour and study was fully correspondent to, yea, went beyond his desire, nevertheless, as thou mayest well understand, the time then was not so proper and fit for learning as it is at present, neither had I plenty of such good masters as thou hast had. For that time was darksome, obscured with clouds of ignorance, and savouring a little of the infelicity and calamity of the Goths, who had, wherever they set footing, destroyed all good literature, which in my age hath by the divine goodness been restored unto its former light and dignity, and that with such amendment and increase of knowledge, that now hardly should I be admitted unto the first form of the little grammar-school boys. I say, I, who in my youthful days was, and that justly, reputed the most learned of that age. Which I do not speak in vain boasting, although I might lawfully do it in writing unto thee—in verification whereof thou hast the authority of Marcus Tullius in his book of old age, and the sentence of Plutarch, in the book intituled, How a man may praise himself without envy—but to give thee an emulous encouragement to strive yet further.

“Now it is that the minds of men are qualified with all manner of discipline, and the old sciences revived, which for many ages were extinct. Now it is that the learned languages are to their pristine purity restored, viz., Greek, without which a man may be ashamed to account himself a scholar, Hebrew, Arabic, Chaldæan, and Latin. Printing likewise is now in use, so elegant and so correct, that better cannot be imagined, although it was found out but in my time by divine inspiration, as by a diabolical suggestion on the other side was the invention of ordnance. All the world is full of knowing men, of most learned schoolmasters, and vast libraries; and it appears to me as a truth that neither in Plato's time, nor Cicero's, nor Papinian's, there was ever such conveniency for studying as we see at this day there is. Nor must any adventure henceforward to come in public, or present himself in company, that hath not been pretty well polished in the shop of Minerva. I see robbers, hangman, freebooters, tapsters, ostlers, and such like, of the very rubbish of the people, more learned now than the doctors and preachers were in my time.

“What shall I say? The very woman and children have aspired to this praise and celestial manna of good learning. Yet so it is that, at the age I am now of, I have been constrained to learn the Greek tongue—which I contemned not like Cato, but had not the leisure in my younger years to attend the study of it—and I take much delight in the reading of Plutarch's Morals, and pleasant Dialogues of Plato, the Monuments of Pausanias, and the Antiquities of Athenæus, in waiting on the hour wherein God my Creator shall call me, and command me to depart from this earth and transitory pilgrimage. Wherefore, my son, I admonish thee to employ thy youth to profit as well as thou canst, both in thy studies and in virtue. Thou art at Paris, where the laudable examples of many brave men may stir up thy mind to gallant actions, and hast likewise for thy tutor and pedagogue the learned Epistemon, who by his lively and vocal documents may instruct thee in the arts and sciences.

“I intend, and will have it so, that thou learn the languages perfectly; first of all, the Greek, as Quintilian will have it; secondly, the Latin; and then the Hebrew, for the Holy Scripture's sake; and then the Chaldee and Arabic likewise; and that thou frame thy style in Greek in imitation of Plato, and for the Latin, after Cicero. Let there be no history which thou shalt not have ready in thy memory: unto the prosecuting of which design, books of cosmography will be very conducible, and help thee much. Of the liberal arts of geometry, arithmetic, and music, I gave thee some taste when thou wert yet little, and not above five or six years old. Proceed further in them, and learn the remainder if thou canst. As for astromony, study all the rules thereof. Let pass, nevertheless, the divining and judicial astrology, and the art of Lullius, as being nothing else but plain abuses and vanities. As for the civil law, of that I would have thee to know the texts by heart, and then to confer them with philosophy.

“Now, in matter of the knowledge of the works of nature, I would have thee to study that exactly; that so there be no sea, river, nor fountain, of which thou dost not know the fishes; all the fowls of the air; all the several kinds of shrubs and trees, whether in forest or orchards; all the sorts of herbs and flowers that grow upon the ground; all the various metals that are hid within the bowels of the earth; together with all the diversity of precious stones that are to be seen in the orient and south parts of the world. Let nothing of all these be hidden from thee. Then fail not most carefully to peruse the books of the Greek, Arabian, and Latin physicians, not despising the Talmudists and Cabalists; and by frequent anatomies get thee the perfect knowledge of that other world, called the microcosm, which is man. And at some of the hours of the day apply the mind to the study of the Holy Scriptures; first, in Greek, the New Testament, with the Epistles of the Apostles; and then the Old Testament, in Hebrew. In brief, let me see thee an abyss and bottomless pit of knowledge: for from henceforward, as thou growest great and becomest a man, thou must part from this tranquillity and rest of study, thou must learn chivalry, warfare, and the exercises of the field, the better thereby to defend my house and our friends, and to succour and protect them at all their needs against the invasion and assaults of evildoers.

“Furthermore, I will that very shortly thou try how much thou hast profited, which thou canst not better do than by maintaining publicly theses and conclusions in all arts, against all persons whatsoever, and by haunting the company of learned men, both at Paris and elsewhere. But because, as the wise man Solomon saith, Wisdom entereth not into a malicious mind, and that knowledge without conscience is but the ruin of the soul, it behoveth thee to serve, to love, to fear God, and on him to cast all thy thoughts and all thy hope, and, by faith formed in charity, to cleave unto him, so that thou mayst never be separated from him by thy sins. Suspect the abuses of the world. Set not thy heart upon vanity, for this life is transitory, but the Word of the Lord endureth for ever. Be serviceable to all thy neighbours, and love them as thyself. Reverence thy preceptors; shun the conversation of those whom thou desirest not to resemble; and receive not in vain the graces which God hath bestowed upon thee. And, when thou shalt see that thou hast attained to all the knowledge that is to be acquired in that part, return unto me, that I may see thee, and give thee my blessing before I die. My son, the peace and grace of our Lord be with thee, Amen.

“Thy father, GARGANTUA.

“From Utopia, the 17th day of the month of March.”

This letter being received and read, Pantagruel plucked up his heart, took a fresh courage to him, and was inflamed with a desire to profit in his studies more than ever, so that if you had seen him, how he took pains, and how he advanced in learning, you would have said that the vivacity of his spirit amidst the books was like a great fire amongst dry wood, so active it was, vigorous, and indefatigable.

CHAPTER IX.

How Pantagruel found Panurge, whom He loved all His Lifetime.

ONE day as Pantagruel was taking a walk without the city, towards Saint Anthony's abbey, discoursing and philosophating with his own servants, and some other scholars, he met with a young man of very comely stature, and surpassing handsome in all the lineaments of his body, but in several parts thereof most pitifully wounded; in such bad equipage in matter of his apparel, which was but tatters and rags, and every way so far out of order, that he seemed to have been a-fighting with mastiff dogs, from whose fury he had made an escape, or, to say better, he looked, in the condition wherein he then was, like an apple-gatherer of the country of Perche.

As far off as Pantagruel saw him, he said to those that stood by, "Do you see that man there, who is a coming hither upon the road from Charenton bridge? By my faith, he is only poor in fortune; for I may assure you that, by his physiognomy, it appeareth that nature hath extracted him from some rich and noble race, and that too much curiosity hath thrown him upon adventures, which possibly have reduced him to this indigence, want, and penury." Now as he was just amongst them, Pantagruel said unto him, "Let me entreat you, friend, that you may be pleased to stop here a little, and answer me to that which I shall ask you, and I am confident you will not think your time ill bestowed; for I have an extreme desire, according to my ability, to give you some supply in this distress, wherein I see you are, because I do very much commiserate your case, which truly moves me to great pity. Therefore, my friend, tell me who you are? Whence you come? Whither you go? What you desire? And what your name is?" The companion answered him in the German tongue, thus:

"Junker, Gott geb euch glück und heil zuvor. Lieber Junker, ich lasz euch wissen, das da ihr mich von fragt, ist ein arm und erbärmlich Ding, und wer viel darvon zu sagen, welches euch verdrüssig zu hören, und mir zu erzelen wer, wiewol die Poeten und Oratorn vorzeiten haben gesagt in ihren Sprüchen und Sentenzen, das die gedechtnus des elends und armuths vorlängst erlitten ist eine grosse lust." "My friend," said Pantagruel, "I have no skill in that gibberish of yours; therefore, if you would have us to understand you, speak to us in some other language." Then did the droll answer him thus:

"Albarildim gotfano dechmin brin alabo dordio falbroth ringuam albaras. Nin portzadikin almucatin milko prin alelmin en thoth dalheben ensouim: kuthim al dum alkatim

"I believe," said Epistemon, "that this is the language of the Antipodes, and such a hard one that the devil himself knows not what to make of it." "Then," said Pantagrue, "gossip, I know not if the walls do comprehend the meaning of your words, but none of us here doth so much as understand one syllable of them." Then said my blade again :

"Signor mio, voi vedete per essemplio, che la cornamusa non suona mai, s'ella non ha il ventre pieno. Così io parimente non vi saprei contare le mie fortune, se prima il tribulato ventre non ha la solita refettione. Al quale è avviso che le mani et li denti habbiano perso il loro ordine naturale et del tutto annichilati." To which Epistemon answered, "As much of the one as of the other, and nothing of either." Then said Panurge :

"Lord, if you be so virtuous of intelligence, as you be naturally releaved to the body, you should have pity of me. For nature hath made us equal, but fortune hath some exalted, and others deprived; nevertheless is virtue often deprived, and the virtuous men depised; for before the last end none is good." "Yet less," said Pantagrue. Then said my jolly Panurge :

"Jona andie guaussa goussy etan beharda er remedio beharde versela ysser landa. Anbat es otay y es nausu ey nessassust gourray proposian ordine den. "Are you there," said Eudemon, "Genicoa?" To this said Carpalim, "Saint Trinian's * rammer unstitch your bum, for I had almost understood it." Then answered Panurge :

"Do you speak Christian," said Epistemon, "or the buffoon language, otherwise called Pate-linois?" "Nay, it is the puzlatory tongue," said another, "which some call Lanternois." Then said Panurge :

"Señor, de tanto hablar yo soy cansado, por que yo suplico a vuestra reverentia que mire a los preceptos evangelicos, para que ellos movan vuestra reverentia a lo que es de conscientia; y si ellos non bastaren, para mover vuestra reverentia a piedad, yo suplico que mire a la piedad natural, la qual yo creo que le movera como es de razon : y con esso non digo mas." "Truly, my friend," said Pantagrue, "I doubt not but you can speak divers languages ; but tell us that which you would have us to do for you in some tongue which you conceive we may understand." Then said the companion :

"Min Herre, endog ieg med ingen tunge talede, ligesom bærn, oc uskellige creatuure : Mine klædebon oc mit legoms magerhed uduiser alligeuel klarlig huad ting mig best behof gioris, som er sandelig mad oc dricke : Huorfor forbarme dig ofuer mig, oc befal at giue mig noguet, af huilcket ieg kand slyre min giændis mage, ligeruiis som mand Cerbero en suppe forsetter : Saa skalt du lefue længe oc lykksalig." "I think really," said Eusthenes, "that the Goths spoke thus of old, and that, if it pleased God, we would all of us speak so with our tails." Then said Panurge :

"Adon, scalom lecha : im ischar harob hal hebdeca bimeherah thinen li kïkar lehem : chanchat ub laah al Adonai cho nen ral." To which answered Epistemon : "At this time have I understood him very well ; for it is the Hebrew tongue most rhetorically pronounced." Then again said the gallant :

Hast thou dwelt any while in Greece." Then said the droll again :

"Agonou dont oussys vous dedagnez algarou : nou den farou zamist vous mariston ulbrou, fousques voubrol tant bredaguez moupregon den goulhoust, daguez daguez non cropys fost pardonnolist nougrou. "Methinks I understand him," said Pantagrue ; "for either it is the language of my country of Utopia, or scunds very like it." And as he was about to have begun some argument, the companion said :

"Jam toties vos per sacra, perque deos deasque omneis obtestatus sum, ut si qua vos pietas permovet, egestatem meam solaremini, nec hilum proficio clamans et ejulans. Sinite, quæso, sinite, viri impii, quo me fata vocant abire; nec ultra vanis vestris interpellationibus obtundatis, memores veteris illius adagii, quo venter famelicus auriculis carere dicitur." "Well, my friend," said Pantagruel, "but cannot you speak French?" "That I can do, sir, very well," said the companion, "God be thanked. It is my natural language and mother tongue; for I was born and bred in my younger years in the garden of France, to wit, Touraine." "Then," said Pantagruel, "tell us what is your name, and from whence you are come; for, by my faith, I have already stamped in my mind such a deep impression of love towards you, that, if you will condescend unto my will, you shall not depart out of my company, and you and I shall make up another couple of friends, such as Æneas and Achates were." "Sir," said the companion, "my true and proper Christian name is Panurge, and now I come out of Turkey, to which country I was carried away prisoner at that time when they went to Metelin with a mischief. And willingly would I relate unto you my fortunes, which are more wonderful than those of Ulysses were; but, seeing that it pleaseth you to retain me with you, I most heartily accept of the offer, protesting never to leave you, should you go to all the devils in hell. We shall have therefore more leisure at another time, and a fitter opportunity, wherein to report them; for at this present I am in a very urgent necessity to feed, my teeth are sharp, my belly empty, my throat dry, and my stomach fierce and burning, all is ready. If you will but set me to work, it will be as good as a balsamum for sore eyes to see me gulch and raven it. For God's sake, give order for it." Then Pantagruel commanded that they should carry him home, and provide him good store of victuals; which being done, he ate very well that evening, and, capon-like, went early to bed, then slept until dinner time the next day, so that he made but three steps and one leap from the bed to the board.

CHAPTER X.

How Pantagruel equitably decided a Controversy, which was wonderfully obscure and difficult: whereby He was reputed to have a most admirable Judgment.

PANTAGRUEL, very well remembering his father's letter and admonitions, would one day make trial of his knowledge. Thereupon in all the Carrefours, that is, throughout all the four quarters, streets, and corners of the city, he set up Conclusions, to the number of nine thousand seven hundred and sixty-four, in all manner of learning, touching in them the hardest doubts that are in any science. And first of all, in the Fodder Street, he held dispute against all the regents or fellows of colleges, artists or masters of arts, and orators, and did so gallantly that he overthrew them, and set them all upon their tails. He went afterwards to the Sorbonne, where he maintained argument against all the theologians or divines for the space of six weeks, from four o'clock in the morning until six in the evening, except an interval of two hours to refresh themselves and take their repast. And at this were present the greatest part of the lords of the court, the masters of requests, presidents, counsellors, those of the accompts, secretaries, advocates, and others, as also the sheriffs of the said town, with the physicians and professors of the canon law. Amongst which, it is to be remarked, that the greatest part were stubborn jades, and in their opinions obstinate; but he took such course with them that, for all their ergoes and fallacies, he put their backs to the wall, gravelled them in the deepest questions, and made it visibly appear to the world that, compared to him, they were but monkeys, and a knot of muffled calves. Whereupon every body began to keep a bustling noise, and talk of his so marvellous knowledge, through all degrees of persons in both sexes, even to the very laundresses, brokers, roastmeat-sellers, penknife-makers, and others, who, when he passed along in the street, would say, "This is he!" In which he took delight, as Demosthenes the prince of Greek orators did, when an old crouching wife, pointing at him with her fingers, said, "That is the man."

Now at this very same time there was a process or suit in law depending in court between two great lords, of which one was called my Lord Kissbreech, plaintiff, of one side, and the other my Lord Suckfist, defendant, of the other; whose controversy was so high and difficult in law, that the court of parliament could make nothing of it. And, therefore, by the commandment of the king, there were assembled four of the greatest and most learned of all the parliaments of France, together with the great counsel, and all the principal regents of the universities, not only of France, but of England also, and Italy, such as Jason, Philippus Decius, Petrus de Petronibus, and a rabble of other old Rabbinitists; who being thus met together, after they had thereupon consulted for the space of six and forty weeks, finding that they could not fasten their teeth in it, nor with such clearness understand the case, as that they might in any manner of way be able to right it, or to take up the difference betwixt the two aforesaid parties, it did so grievously vex them that they most villainously conshit themselves for shame. In this great extremity one amongst them named Du Douhet, the learnedest of all, and more expert and prudent than any of the rest, whilst one day they were thus at their wit's end, all-to-be-dunced and philogrobolised in their brains, said unto them, "We have been here, my masters, a good long space, without doing anything else than trifle away both our time and money, and can nevertheless find neither brim nor bottom in this matter, for the more we study about it, the less we understand therein, which is a great shame and disgrace to us, and a heavy burden to our consciences, yea, such that in my opinion we shall not rid ourselves of it without dishonour, unless we take some other course; for we do nothing but doat in our consultations.

"See, therefore, what I have thought upon. You have heard much talking of that worthy personage named Master Pantagruel, who hath been found to be learned above the capacity of this present age, by the proofs he gave in those great disputations which he held publicly against all men. My opinion is, that we end for him, to confer with him about this business; for never any man will compass the bringing of it to an end if he do it not."

Hereunto all the counsellors and doctors willingly agreed, and, according to that their result, having instantly sent for him, they entreated him to be pleased to canvass the process, and sift it thoroughly, that, after a deep search and narrow examination of all the points thereof, he might forthwith make the report unto them, such as he shall think good in true and legal knowledge. To this effect they delivered into his hands the bags wherein were the writs and pancarts concerning that suit, which for bulk and weight were almost enough to load four great couillard or stoned asses. But Pantagruel said unto them, "Are the two lords, between whom this debate and process is, yet living?" It was answered him, "Yes." "To what a devil, then," said he, "serve so many paltry heaps and bundles of papers and copies which you give me? Is it not better to hear their controversy from their own mouths, whilst they are face to face before us, than to read these vile fopperies, which are nothing but trumperies, deceits, diabolical cozenages of Cepola, pernicious slights and subversious of equity? For I am sure that you, and all those through whose hands this process hath past, have by your devices added what you could to it pro et contra, in such sort that, although their difference perhaps was clear and easy enough to determine at first, you have obscured it, and made it more intricate, by the frivolous, sottish, unreasonable and foolish reasons and opinions of Accursius, Baldus, Bartolus, de Castro, de Imola, Hippolytus, Panormo, Bertachin, Alexander, Curtius, and those other old mastiffs, who never understood the least law of the Pandects, they being but mere blockheads and great tithe-calves, ignorant of all that which was needful for the understanding of the laws; for, as it is most certain, they had not the knowledge either of the Greek or Latin tongue, but only of the Gothic and Barbarian. The laws, nevertheless, were first taken from the Greeks, according to the testimony of Ulpian, L. poster, de origine juris, which we likewise may perceive by that all the laws are full of Greek words and sentences. And then we find that they are reduced into a Latin style, the most elegant and ornate that whole language is able to afford, without excepting that of any that ever wrote therein, nay, not of Sallust, Varro, Cicero, Seneca, Titus Livius, nor Quintilian. How, then, could these old dotards be able to understand aright the text of the laws, who never in their time had looked upon a good Latin book, as doth evidently enough appear by the rudeness of their style, which is fitter for a chimney-sweeper, or for a cook or a scullion, than for a jurisconsult and doctor in the laws?

“Furthermore, seeing the laws are excerpted out of the middle of moral and natural philosophy, how should these fools have understood it, that have, by God, studied less in philosophy than my mule? In respect of human learning, and the knowledge of antiquities and history, they were truly laden with those faculties as a toad is with feathers. And yet of all this the laws are so full that without it they cannot be understood, as I intend more fully to show unto you in a peculiar treatise which on that purpose I am about to publish. Therefore, if you will that I make any meddling in this process, first cause all these papers to be burned; secondly, make the two gentlemen come personally before me; and afterwards, when I shall have heard them, I will tell you my opinion freely, without any feignedness or dissimulation whatsoever.”

Some amongst them did contradict this motion, as you know that in all companies there are more fools than wise men, and that the greater part always surmounts the better, as saith Titus Livius in speaking of the Carthaginians. But the aforesaid Du Douhet held the contrary opinion, maintaining that Pantagruel had said well, and what was right, in affirming that these records, bills of inquests, replies, rejoinders, exceptions, depositions, and other such diableries of truth-entangling writs, were but engines wherewith to overthrow justice, and unnecessarily to prolong such suits as did depend before them; and that, therefore, the devil would carry them all away to hell if they did not take another course, and proceeded not in times coming according to the prescripts of evangelical and philosophical equity. In fine, all the papers were burned, and the two gentlemen summoned and personally convented. At whose appearance before the court, Pantagruel said unto them, “Are you they who have this great difference betwixt you?” “Yes, my lord,” said they. “Which of you,” said Pantagruel, “is the plaintiff?” “It is I,” said my Lord Kissbreech. “Go to, then, my friend,' said he, "and relate your matter unto me from point to point, according to the real truth, or else, by cock's body, if I find you to lie so much as in one word, I will make you shorter by the head, and take it from off your shoulders, to show others, by your example, that in justice and judgment men ought to speak nothing but the truth. Therefore take heed you do not add nor impair anything in the narration of your case. Begin."

CHAPTER XI.

How the Lords of Kissbreech and Suckfist did plead before Pantagruel without an Attorney.

THEN began Kissbreech in manner as followeth: "My lord, it is true that a good woman of my house carried eggs to the market to sell." "Be covered, Kissbreech," said Pantagruel. "Thanks to you, my lord," said the Lord Kissbreech; "but to the purpose. There passed betwixt the two tropics the sum of three pence towards the zenith and a halfpenny, forasmuch as the Riphæan mountains had been that year oppressed with a great sterility of counterfeit gudgeons, and shows without substance, by means of the babbling tattle and fond fibs seditiously raised between the gibble-gabblers and Accursian gibberish-mongers, for the rebellion of the Switzers, who had assembled themselves to the full number of the bum-bees, and myrmidons, to go a-handsel-getting on the first day of the new year, at that very time when they give brewis to the oxen, and deliver the key of the coals to the country-girls, for serving in of the oats to the dogs. All the night long they did nothing else, keeping their hands still upon the pot, but dispatch bulls a-foot, and bulls a-horseback, to stop the boats; for the tailors and seamsters would have made of the stolen shreds and clippings a goodly sagbut to cover the face of the ocean, which then was great with child of a potful of cabbage, according to the opinion of the hay-bundle-makers. But the physicians said that by the urine they could discern no manifest sign of the bustard's pace, nor how to eat double-tongued mattocks with mustard, unless the lords and gentlemen of the court should be pleased to give by b. mol. express command to the pox, not to run about any longer, in gleaning up of coppersmiths and tinkers; for the jobberolls had already a pretty good beginning in their dance of the British jig, called the estrindore, to a perfect diapason, with one foot in the fire, and their head in the middle, as good man Ragot was wont to say.

'Ha, my masters, God moderates all things, and disposeth of them at his pleasure, so that against unlucky fortune a carter broke his frisking whip, which was all the wind instrument he had. This was done at his return from a little paltry town, even then when Master Antitus of Cresseplots was licentiated, and had passed his degrees in all dullery and blockishness, according to this sentence of the canonists, Beati dunces, quoniam ipsi stumblaverunt. But that which makes Lent to be so high, by Saint Fiacre of Bry, is for nothing else but that Pentecost never comes but to my cost; yet, on afore there, ho! a little rain stills a great wind; and we must think so, seeing that the serjeant hath propounded the matter so far above my reach, that the clerks and secondaries could not with the benefit thereof lick their fingers, feathered with ganders, so orbicularly as they were wont in other things to do. And we do manifestly see that every one acknowledgeth himself to be in the error wherewith another hath been charged, reserving only those cases whereby we are obliged to take an ocular inspection in a perspective glass of these things, towards the place in the chimney, where hangeth the sign of the wine of forty girths, which have been always counted very necessary for the number of twenty pannels and pack-saddles of the bankrupt protectionaries of five years' respite. Howsoever, at least, he that would not let fly the fowl before the cheesecakes, ought in law to have discovered his reason why not, for the memory is often lost in the wayward shoeing. Well, God keep Theobal Mitain from all danger." "Then," said Pantagruel, "hold there! Ho, my friend, soft and fair, speak at leisure, and soberly, without putting yourself in choler. I understand the case—go on." "Now then, my lord," said Kissbreech, "the foresaid good woman, saying her gaudez and audi nos, could not cover herself with a treacherous back-blow, ascending by the wounds and passions of the privileges of the universities, unless by the virtue of a warming-pan she had angelically fomented every part of her body, in covering them with a hedge of garden-beds; then, giving in a swift unavoidable thrust very near to the place where they sell the old rags, whereof the painters of Flanders make great use, when they are about neatly to clap on shoes on grasshoppers, locusts, cigals, and suchlike fly-fowls, so strange to us, that I am wonderfully astonished why the world doth not lay, seeing it is so good to hatch."

Here the Lord of Suckfist would have interrupted him and spoken somewhat, whereupon Pantagruel said unto him, "Saint! by Saint Anthony's belly, doth it become thee to speak without command? I sweat here with the extremity of labour and exceeding toil I take to understand the proceeding of your mutual difference, and yet thou comest to trouble and disquiet me. Peace, in the devil's name, peace. Thou shalt be permitted to speak thy bellyful when this man hath done, and no sooner. Go on," said he to Kissbreech, "speak calmly, and do not overheat yourself with too much haste.

"In perceiving, then," said Kissbreech, "that the pragmatistical sanction did make no mention of it, and that the holy Pope to every one gave liberty to fart at his own ease, if that the blankets had no streaks, wherein the liars were to be crossed with a ruffian-like crew, and the rainbow being newly sharpened at Milan to bring forth larks, gave his full consent that the good woman should tread down the heel of the hip-gut pangs, by virtue of a solemn protestation put in by the little testicated or codsted fishes, which, to tell the truth, were at that time very necessary for understanding the syntax and construction of old boots. Therefore John Calf, her cousin gervais once removed, with a log, from the woodstalk, very seriously advised her not to put herself into the hazard of quagswagging in the lee, to be scoured with a bunch of linen clothes, till first she had kindled the paper. This counsel she laid hold on, because he desired her to take nothing, and throw out, for Non de ponte vadit, qui cum sapientia cadit. Matters thus standing, seeing the masters of the chamber of accompts, or members of that committee, did not fully agree amongst themselves in casting up the number of the Almany whistles, whereof were framed those Spectacles for Princes, which have been lately printed at Antwerp, I must needs think that it makes a bad return of the writ, and that the adverse party is not to be believed in sacer verbo dotis. For that having a great desire to obey the pleasure of the king, I armed myself from toe to top with belly furniture, of the soles of good vension-pasties, to go see how my grape-gatherers and vintagers had pinked and cut full of small holes their high coped-caps, to lecher it the better, and play at in and in. And indeed the time was very dangerous in coming from the fair, in<sup>o</sup> so far that many trained bow-men were cast at the muster, and quite rejected, although the chimney-tops were high enough, according to the proportion of the windgalls in the legs of horses, or of the malanders, which in the esteem of expert farriers is no better disease, or else the story of Ronypatifam, or Lamibaudichon, interpreted by some to be the tale of a tub, or of a roasted horse, savours of apocrypha, and is not an authentic history. And by this means there was that year great abundance, throughout all the country of Artois, of tawny buzzing beetles, to the no small profit of the gentlemen-great-stick-faggot-carriers, when they did eat without disdaining the cocklicranes, till their belly was like to crack with it again. As for my own part, such is my Christian charity towards my neighbours, that I could wish from my heart every one as good a voice, it would make us play the better at the tennis and the balloon. And truly, my lord, to express the real truth without dissimulation, I cannot but say that those petty subtile devices, which are found out in the etymologising of pattens, would descend more easily into the river of Seine, to serve for ever at the millers' bridge upon the said water, as it was heretofore decreed by the King of the Canarians, according to the sentence or judgment given thereupon, which is to be seen in the registry and records within the clerk's office of this house.

"And therefore, my lord, I most humbly require, that by your lordship there may be said and declared upon the case what is reasonable, with costs, damages, and interest. "Then said Pantagruel, "My friend, is this all you have to say?" Kissbreech answered, "Yes, my lord, for I have told you all the tu autem, and have not varied at all, upon mine honour, in so much as one single word." "You then," said Pantagruel, "my Lord of Suckfist, say what you will, and be brief, and without omitting, nevertheless, anything that may serve to the purpose."

CHAPTER XII.

How the Lord of Suckfist pleaded before Pantagruel.

THEN began the Lord Suckfist in manner as followeth: "My lord, and you my masters, if the iniquity of men were as easily seen in categorical judgment as we can discern flies in a milk-pot, the world's four oxen had not been so eaten up with rats, nor had so many ears upon the earth been nibbled away so scurvily. For although all that my adversary hath spoken be of a very soft and downy truth, insomuch as concerns the letter and history of the factum, yet nevertheless the crafty slights, cunning subtilties, sly cozenages, and little troubling entanglements, are hid under the rose-pot, the common cloak and cover of all fraudulent deceits.

"Should I endure that, when I am eating my pottage equal with the best, and that without either thinking or speaking any manner of ill, they rudely come to vex, trouble, and perplex my brains with that antique proverb, which saith,

'He that will in his pottage drink,
When he is dead shall not see one wink.'

And, good lady, how many great captains have we seen in the day of battle, when in open field the sacrament was distributed in luncheons of the sanctified bread of the confraternity, the more honestly to nod their heads, play on the lute, and crack with their tails, to make pretty little platform leaps, in keeping level by the ground? But now the world is unshackled from the corners of the packs of Leicester. One flies out lewdly and becomes debauched, another, likewise, five, four, and two, and that at such random that, if the court take not some course therein, it will make as bad a season in matter of gleaning this year as ever it made, or it will make goblets. If any poor creature go to the stoves to illuminate his muzzle with a cowshard, or to buy winter-boots, and that the serjeants passing by, or those of the watch, happen to receive the decoction of a clyster, or the fecal matter of a close-stool, upon their rustling-wrangling-clutter-keeping masterships, should any because of that make bold to clip the shillings and testers, and fry the wooden dishes? Sometimes, when we think one thing, God does another; and when the sun is wholly set, all beasts are in the shade. Let me never be believed again, if I do not gallantly prove it by several people that have seen the light of the day.

“In the year thirty and six, buying a Dutch curtail, which was a middle-sized horse, both high and short, of a wool good enough, and dyed in grain, as the goldsmiths assured me, although the notary put an etc. in it, I told really, that I was not a clerk of so much learning as to snatch at the moon with my teeth; but, as for the butter-firkin, where Vulcanian deeds and evidences were sealed, the rumour was, and the report thereof went current, that salt-beef will make one find the way to the wine without a candle, though it were hid in the bottom of a collier’s sack, and that with his drawers on he were mounted on a barbed horse furnished with a fronstal, and such arms, thighs, and leg-pieces as are requisite for the well frying and broiling of a swaggering sauciness. Here is a sheep’s head, and it is well they make a proverb of this, that it is good to see black cows in burnt wood, when one attains to the enjoyment of his love. I had a consultation upon this point with my masters the clerks, who for resolution concluded in frise-somorum, that there is nothing like to mowing in the summer, and sweeping clean away in water, well garnished with paper, ink, pens, and penknives of Lyons upon the river of Rhone; dolopym dolop of, tarabin tarabis, tut, prut, pish: for, incontinently after that armour begins to smell of garlick, the rust will go near to eat the liver, not of him that wears it; and then do they nothing else but withstand others courses, and wry-neckedly set up their bristles against one another, in lightly passing over their afternoon’s sleep; and this is that which maketh salt so dear. My lords, believe not when the said good woman had with bird-lime caught the shovelar fowl, the better before a serjeant’s witness to deliver the younger son’s portion to him, that the sheep’s pluck or hog’s haslet did lodge and shrink back in the usurer’s purses, or tha, there could be anything better to preserve one from the cannibals, than to take a rope of onions, knit with three hundred turnips, and a little of a calf's chaldern of the best alloy that the alchemists have provided, and that they daub and do over with clay, as also calcinate and burn to dust these pantofles, muff in muff out, mouflin mouflard, with the fine sauce of the juice of the rabble rout, whilst they hide themselves in some petty moldwharp-hole, saving always the little slices of bacon. Now, if the dice will not favour you with any other throw but ambes-ace, and the chance of three at the great end, mark well the ace, then take me your dame, settle her in a corner of the bed, and whisk me her up drille trille, there, there, troureloura la la; which when you have done, take a hearty draught of the best, despicando grenovillibus, in despite of the frogs, whose fair coarse bebuskined stockings shall be set apart for the little green geese, or mued goslings, which, fattened in a coop, take delight to sport themselves at the wag-tail game, waiting for the beating of the metal, and heating of the wax by the slaving drivellers of consolation.

“Very true it is that the four oxen which are in debate, and whereof mention was made, were somewhat short in memory. Nevertheless, to understand the game aright, they feared neither the cormorant nor mallard of Savoy, which put the good people of my country in great hope that their children some time should become very skilful in algorism. Therefore is it, that by a law rubric and special sentence thereof, that we cannot fail to take the wolf, if we make our hedges higher than the wind-mill, whereof somewhat was spoken by the plaintiff. But the great devil did envy it, and by that means put the High Dutch far behind, who played the devils in swilling down and tipping at the good liquor, trink, meen herr, trink, trink, by two of my table men in the corner-point I have gained the lurch. For it is not probable, nor is there any appearance of truth in this saying, that at Paris upon a little bridge the hen is proportionable, and were they as copped and high-crested as marish whoops, if veritably they did not sacrifice the printer's puppet-balls at Moreb, with a new edge set upon them by text letters, or those of a swift-writing hand, it is all one to me, so that the head-band of the book breed not moths or worms in it. And put the case, that at the coupling together of the buck-hounds, the little puppies should have waxed proud, before the notary could have given an account of the serving of his writ by the cabalistic art, it will necessarily follow, under correction of the better judgment of the court, that six acres of meadow ground of the greatest breadth will make three butts of fine ink, without paying ready money; considering that, at the funeral of King Charles, we might have had the fathom in open market for one and two, that is, deuce ace. This I may affirm with a safe conscience, upon my oath of wool.

“And I see ordinarily in all good bag-pipes, that, when they go to the counterfeiting of the chirping of small birds, by swinging a broom three times about a chimney, and putting his name upon record, they do nothing but bend a cross-bow backwards, and wind a horn, if perhaps it be too hot, and that, by making it fast to a rope he was to draw, immediately after the sight of the letters, the cows were restored to him. Such another sentence after the homeliest manner was pronounced in the seventeenth year because of the bad government of Louzefougarouse, whereunto it may please the court to have regard. I desire to be rightly understood; for truly, I say not, but that in all equity, and with an upright conscience, those may very well be dispossessed who drink holy water, as one would do a weaver’s shuttle, whereof suppositories are made to those that will not resign, but on the terms of ell and tell, and giving of one thing for another. Tunc, my lords, quid juris pro minoribus? For the common custom of the Salic law is such, that the first incendiary or fire-brand of sedition, that flays the cow, and wipes his nose in a full concert of music, without blowing in the cobbler’s stitches, should in the time of the night-mare sublimate the penury of his member by moss gathered when people are like to founder themselves at the mass at midnight, to give the estrapade to these white wines of Anjou, that do gambetta, neck to neck, after the fashion of Brittany, concluding as before with costs, damages, and interests.”

After that the Lord of Suckfist had ended, Pantagruel said to the Lord of Kissbreech, “My friend, have you a mind to make any reply to what is said?” “No, my lord,” answered Kissbreech; “for I have spoke all I intended, and nothing but the truth. Therefore, put an end, for God’s sake, to our difference, for we are here at great charge.”

CHAPTER XIII.

How Pantagruel gave Judgment upon the difference of the Two Lords.

THEN Pantagruel, rising up, assembled all the presidents, counsellors, and doctors that were there, and said unto them: ‘Come now, my masters, you have heard, viva vocis oraculo, the controversy that is in question. What do you think of it?’

They answered him : “ We have indeed heard it, but have not understood the devil so much as one circumstance of the case ; and therefore we beseech you, unâ voce, and in courtesy request you, that you would give sentence as you think good, and, ex nunc prout ex tunc, we are satisfied with it, and do ratify it with our full consents.” “ Well, my masters,” said Pantagrue, “ seeing you are so well pleased, I will do it ; but I do not truly find the case so difficult as you make it. Your paragraph Caton, the law Frater, the law Gallus, the law Quinque pedum, the law Vinum, the law Si Dominus, the law Mater, the law Mulier bona, the law Si quis, the law Pomponius, the law Fundi, the law Emptor, the law Prætor, the law Venditor, and a great many others, are far more intricate in my opinion.” After he had spoke this, he walked a turn or two about the hall, plodding very profoundly, as one may think ; for he did groan like an ass whilst they girth him too hard, with the very intensiveness of considering how he was bound in conscience to do right to both parties, without varying or accepting of persons. Then he returned, sat down, and began to pronounce sentence as followeth :—

“ Having seen, heard, calculated, and well-considered of the difference between the Lords of Kissbreech and Suckfist, the court saith unto them, that in regard of the sudden quaking, shivering, and hoariness of the flickermouse, bravely declining from the estival solstice, to attempt by private means the surprisal of toyish trifles in those, who are a little unwell for having taken a draught too much, through the lewd demeanour and vexation of the beetles, that inhabit the diarodal climate of an hypocritical ape on horseback, bending a cross-bow backwards, the plaintiff truly had just cause to calfet, or with oakum, to stop the chinks of the galleon, which the good woman blew up with wind, having one foot shod and the other bare, reimbursing and restoring to him, low and stiff in his conscience, as many bladder-nuts and wild pistachios as there is of hair in eighteen cows, with as much for the embroiderer, and so much for that. He is likewise declared innocent of the case privileged from the Knapdardies, into the danger whereof it was thought he had incurred ; because he could not jocundly, and with fullness of freedom, untruss and dung, by the decision of a pair of gloves perfumed with the scent of bum-gunshot, at the walnut tree taper, as is usual in his country of Mirebalais. Slacking, therefore, the top-sail, and letting go the boulin with the brazen bullets, wherewith the mariners did by way of protestation bake in paste-meat, great store of pulse interquilted with the dormouse, whose hawk-bells were made with a puntinaria, after the manner of Hungary or Flanders lace, and which his brother-in-law carried in a pannier, lying near to three chevrons or bordered gules, whilst he was clean out of heart, drooping and crestfallen by the too narrow sifting, canvassing, and curious examining of the matter, in the angularly dog-hole of nasty scoundrels, from whence we shoot at the vermiformal popinjay with the flap made of a foptail.

“But in that he chargeth the defendant, that he was a botcher, cheese-eater, and trimmer of man’s flesh embalmed, which in the arsiversy swagfall tumble was not found true, as by the defendant was very well discussed.

“The court, therefore, doth condemn and amerce him in three porringers of curds, well cemented and closed together, shining like pearls, and cod-pieced after the fashion of the country, to be paid unto the said defendant about the middle of August in May. But, on the other part, the defendant shall be bound to furnish him with hay and stubble, stopping the caltrops of his throat, troubled and impulregafised, with gabardines garbled shufflingly, and friends as before, without costs and for cause.”

Which sentence being pronounced, the two parties departed, both contented with the decree, which was a thing almost incredible. For it never came to pass since the great rain, nor shall the like occur in thirteen jubilees hereafter, that two parties, contradictorily contending in judgment, be equally satisfied and well pleased with the definitive sentence. As for the counsellors, and other doctors in the law, that were there present, they were all so ravished with admiration at the more than human wisdom of Pantagruel, which they did most clearly perceive to be in him, by his so accurate decision of this so difficult and thorny cause, that their spirits, with the extremity of the rapture, being elevated above the pitch of actuating the organs of the body, they fell into a trance and sudden ecstasy, wherein they stayed for the space of three long hours, and had been so as yet in that condition had not some good people fetched store of vinegar and rosewater to bring them again unto their former sense and understanding, for the which God be praised everywhere. And so be it.

CHAPTER XIV.

*How Panurge* related the manner how He escaped out of the Hands of the Turks.*

THE great wit and judgment of Pantagruel was immediately after this made known unto all the world by setting forth his * How Panurge related, etc. All Rabelais’s personages are phantasmagoric allegories, but Panurge above all. He is throughout the πανουργία,—the wisdom that is, the cunning of the human animal,—the understanding, as the faculty of means to purposes without ultimate ends, in the most comprehensive sense, and including art, sensuous fancy, and all the passions of the understanding.

praises in print, and putting upon record this late wonderful proof he hath given thereof amongst the Rolls of the Crown and Registers of the Palace, in such sort that everybody began to say that Solomon, who by a probable guess only, without any further certainty, caused the child to be delivered to its own mother, showed never in his time such a masterpiece of wisdom as the good Pantagrue hath done. Happy are we, therefore, that have him in our country. And, indeed, they would have made him thereupon master of the requests, and president in the court; but he refused all, very graciously thanking them for their offer. "For," said he, "there is too much slavery in these offices, and very hardly can they be saved that do exercise them, considering the great corruption that is amongst men. Which makes me believe, if the empty seats of angels be not filled with other kind of people than those, we shall not have the final judgment these seven thousand sixty and seven jubilees yet to come, and so Cusanus will be deceived in his conjecture. Remember that I have told you of it, and given you fair advertisement in time and place convenient.

"But if you have any hogsheads of good wine, I willingly will accept of a present of that." Which they very heartily did do, in sending him of the best that was in the city, and he drank reasonably well, but poor Panurge bibbed and bowsed of it most villainously, for he was as dry as a red-herring, as lean as a rake, and, like a poor, lank, slender cat, walked gingerly, as if he had trod upon eggs. So that by some one being admonished, in the midst of his draught of a large deep bowl, full of excellent claret, with these words: "Fair and softly, gossip, you suck as if you were mad." "I give thee to the devil," said he, "thou hast not found here thy little tipling sippers of Paris, that drink no more than the little bird called a spink or chaffinch, and never take in their beak full of liquor till they be bobbed on the tails after the manner of the sparrows. Oh companion, if I could mount up as well as I can get down, I had been long ere this above the sphere of the moon with Empedocles. But I cannot tell what a devil this means. This wine is so good and delicious, that the more I think thereof, the more I am athirst. I believe that the shadow of my master Pantagrue engendereth the altered and thirsty men, as the moon doth the catarrhs and defluxions." At which word the company began to laugh, which Pantagrue perceiving, said, "Panurge, what is that which moves you to laugh so?" "Sir," said he, "I was telling them that these devilish Turks are very unhappy, in that they never drink one drop of wine, and that though there were no other harm in all Mahomet's Alcoran, yet for this one base point of abstinence from wine, which therein is commanded, I would not submit myself unto their law." "But now tell me," said Pantagrue, “how you escaped out of their hands?” “By God, sir,” said Panurge, “I will not lie to you in one word.

“The rascally Turks had broached me upon a spit, all larded like a rabbit, for I was so dry and meagre that, otherwise, of my flesh they would have made but very bad meat, and in this manner began to roast me alive. As they were thus roasting me, I recommended myself unto the divine grace, having in my mind the good Saint Lawrence, and always hoped in God that he would deliver me out of this torment. Which came to pass, and that very strangely. For as I did commit myself with all my heart unto God, crying, ‘Lord God, help me! Lord God, save me! Lord God, take me out of this pain and hellish torture, wherein these traitorous dogs detain me for my sincerity in the maintenance of thy law!’ the roaster or turn-spit fell asleep by the divine will, or else by the virtue of some good Mercury, who cunningly brought Argus into a sleep for all his hundred eyes. When I saw that he did no longer turn me in roasting, I looked upon him, and perceived that he was fast asleep. Then I took up in my teeth a fire-brand, by the end where it was not burned, and cast it into the lap of my roaster, and another did I throw as well as I could under a field-couch that was placed near to the chimney, wherein was the straw-bed of my master turn-spit. Presently the fire took hold in the straw, and from the straw to the bed, and from the bed to the loft, which was planked and ceiled with fir, after the fashion of the foot of a lamp. But the best was that the fire which I had cast into the lap of my poultry roaster burned all his groin, and was beginning to seize upon his cullions, when he became sensible of the danger, for his smelling was not so bad, but that he felt it sooner than he could have seen daylight. Then suddenly getting up, and in a great amazement running to the window, he cried out to the streets, as high as he could, ‘Dal baroth, dal baroth, dal baroth,’ which is as much as to say, ‘Fire, fire, fire.’ Incontinently turning about, he came straight towards me, to throw me quite into the fire, and to that effect had already cut the ropes wherewith my hands were tied, and was undoing the cords from off my feet, when the master of the house, hearing him cry fire, and smelling the smoke from the very street, where he was walking with some other bashaws and mustaphas, ran with all the speed he had to save what he could, and to carry away his jewels. Yet such was his rage, before he could well resolve how to go about it, that he caught the broach whereon I was spitted, and therewith killed my roaster stark dead, of which wound he died there for want of regimen or otherwise; for he ran him in with the spit a little above the navel, towards the right flank, till he pierced the third lappet of his liver, and, the blow slanting upwards from the midriff or diaphragm, through which it had made penetration, the spit passed athwart the pericardium, or capsula of his heart, and came out above at his shoulders, betwixt the spondyls or turning joints of the chine of the back, and the left homoplat, which we call the shoulder-blade.

“True it is, for I will not lie, that, in drawing the spit out of my body, I fell to the ground near unto the andirons, and so by the fall took some hurt, which indeed had been greater but that the lardons, or little slices of bacon wherewith I was stuck, kept off the blow. My bashaw then seeing the case to be desperate, his house burnt without remission, and all his goods lost, gave himself over unto all the devils in hell, calling upon some of them by their names, Grilgoth, Astaroth, Rappalus, and Gribouillis, nine several times. Which when I saw, I had above five-penny-worth of fear, dreading that the devils would come even then to carry away this fool, and, seeing me so near him, would perhaps snatch me up too. I am already, thought I, half-roasted, and my lardons will be the cause of my mischief; for these devils are very liquorous of lardons, according to the authority which you have of the philosopher Jamblicus, and Murmault, in the Apology of Bossutis, adulterated pro magistris nostros. But for my better security I made the sign of the cross, crying, Hagios, athamatos, ho theos, and none came. At which my rogue bashaw, being very much aggrieved, would, in transpiercing his heart with my spit, have killed himself, and to that purpose had set it against his breast, but it could not enter, because it was not sharp enough. Whereupon I, perceiving that he was not like to work upon his body the effect which he intended, although he did not spare all the force he had to thrust it forward, came up to him and said, ‘Master Bugrino, thou dost here but trifle away thy time, or rashly lose it, for thou wilt never kill thyself as thou doest. Well, thou mayest hurt or bruise somewhat within thee, so as to make thee languish all thy lifetime most pitfully amongst the hands of the chirurgeons; but, if thou wilt be counselled by me, I will kill thee clear outright, so that thou shalt not so much as feel it, and trust me, for I have killed a great many others, who have found themselves very well after it.’ ‘Ha, my friend,’ said he, ‘I prithee do so, and for thy pains I give thee my budget; take, here it is, there are six hundred seraphs in it, and some fine diamonds and most excellent rubies.’” “And where are they?” said Epistemon. “By Saint John,” said Panurge, “they are a good way hence, if they always keep going. But where is the last year’s snow? This was the greatest care that Villon the Parisian poet took.” “Make an end,” said Pantagruel, “that we may know how thou didst dress thy bashaw.” “By the faith of an honest man,” said Panurge, “I do not lie in one word. I swaddled him in a scurvy swatchel binding which I found lying there half-burnt, and with my cords tied him royster-like both hand and foot, in such sort that he was not able to wince, then passed my spit through his throat, and hanged him thereon, fastening the end thereof at two great hooks or cramp-irons upon which they did hang their halberds; and then, kindling a fair fire under him, did flame you up my Milourt, as they use to do dry herrings in a chimney. With this, taking his budget, and a little javelin that was upon the aforesaid hooks, I ran away a fair gallop-rake, and God he knows how I did smell my shoulder of mutton.

“When I came down into the street, I found everybody came to put out the fire with store of water, and seeing me so half-roasted, they did naturally pity my case, and threw all their water upon me, which, by a most joyful refreshing of me, did me very much good. Then did they present me with some victuals, but I could not eat much, because they gave me nothing to drink but water, after their fashion. Other hurt they did me none, only one little villainous Turkey knob-breasted rogue came thieftiously to snatch away some of my lardons, but I gave him such a sturdy thump and sound rap on the fingers with all the weight of my javelin, that he came no more the second time. Shortly after this there came towards me a pretty young Corinthian wench, who brought me a box full of conserves, of round Mirabolan plums, called emblicks, and looked upon my poor robin with an eye of great compassion, as it was fleabitten and pinked with the sparkles of the fire from whence it came, for it reached no farther in length, believe me, than my knees. But note that this roasting cured me entirely of a sciatica, whereunto I had been subject above seven years before, upon that side which my roaster, by falling asleep, suffered to be burned.

“Now, whilst they were busy about me, the fire triumphed, never ask how. For it took hold on above two thousand houses, which one of them espying, cried out, saying, ‘By Mahoom’s belly, all the city is on fire, and we do nevertheless stand gazing here, without offering to make any relief.’ Upon this every one ran to save his own; for my part, I took my way towards the gate. When I was got upon the knap of a little hillock not far off, I turned me about as did Lot’s wife, and, looking back, saw all the city burning in a fair fire, whereat I was so glad that I had almost beshit myself for joy. But God punished me well for it.” “How?” said Pantagruel. “Thus,” said Panurge; “for when with pleasure I beheld this jolly fire, jesting with myself, and saying, ‘Ha! poor flies, ha! poor mice, you will have a bad winter of it this year, the fire is in your reeks, it is in your bed-straw,’ out came more than six, yea more than thirteen hundred and eleven dogs, great and small, altogether out of the town, flying away from the fire. At the first approach they ran all upon me, being carried on by the scent of my lecherous half-roasted flesh, and had even then devoured me in a trice, if my good angel had not well inspired me with the instruction of a remedy very sovereign against the toothache." "And wherefore," said Pantagruel, "wert thou afraid of the toothache or pain of the teeth? Wert thou not cured of thy rheums?" "By Palm Sunday," said Panurge, "is there any greater pain of the teeth than when the dogs have you by the legs? But on a sudden, as my good angel directed me, I thought upon my lardons, and threw them into the midst of the field amongst them. Then did the dogs run, and fight with one another at fair teeth which should have the lardons. By this means they left me, and I left them also bustling with and hairing one another. Thus did I escape frolic and lively, grammercy roastmeat and cookery."

CHAPTER XV.

How Panurge showed a very New Way to Build the Walls of Paris.

PANTAGRUEL one day, to refresh himself of his study, went a walking towards Saint Marcel's suburbs, to see the extravagancy of the Gobeline building, and to taste of their spiced bread. Panurge was with him, having always a flagon under his gown, and a good slice of gammon of bacon; for without this he never went, saying that it was as a yeoman of the guard to him, to preserve his body from harm. Other sword carried he none; and when Pantagruel would have given him one, he answered that he needed none, for that it would but heat his milt. "Yea, but," said Epistemon, "if thou shouldst be set upon, how wouldst thou defend thyself?" "With great brodkin blows," answered he, "provided thrusts were forbidden." At their return, Panurge considered the walls of the city of Paris, and in derision said to Pantagruel, "See what fair walls are here! Oh how strong they are, and well fitted to keep geese in a mew or coop to fatten them. By my beard, they are competently scurvy for such a city as this is; for a cow with one fart would go near to overthrow above six fathoms of them." "Oh, my friend," said Pantagruel, "dost thou know what Agesilaus said when he was asked why the great city of Lacedemon was not enclosed with walls? 'Lo here,' said he, 'the walls of the city!' in showing them the inhabitants and citizens thereof, so strong, so well-armed, so expert in military discipline; signifying thereby that there is no wall but of bones, and that towns and cities cannot have a surer wall, nor better fortification, than the prowess and virtue of the citizens and inhabitants. So is this city so strong, by the great number of warlike people that are in it, that they care not for making any other walls. Besides, whosoever would go about to wall it, as Strasburg, Orleans, or Ferrara, would find it almost impossible, the cost and charges would be so excessive." "Yea, but," said Panurge, "it is good, nevertheless, to have an outside of stone when we are invaded by our enemies, were it but to ask, Who is below there? As for the enormous expense which you say would be needful for undertaking the great work of walling this city about, if the gentlemen of the town will be pleased to give me a good rough cup of wine, I will show them a pretty, strange, and new way how they may build them good cheap." "How?" said Pantagruel. "Do not speak of it, then," answered Panurge, "and I will tell it you. I see that the sine quo nons, callibistris, or contrapunctums of the women of this country are cheaper than stones. Of them should the walls be built, ranging them in good symmetry by the rules of architecture, and placing the largest in the first ranks, then sloping downwards ridgeways, like the back of an ass. The middle-sized ones must be ranked next, and last of all the least and smallest. This done, there must be a fine little interlacing of them, like points of diamonds, as is to be seen in the great tower of Bourges, with a like number of the nudinnudos, nilnisistandos, and stiff bracmards that dwell in amongst the claustral codpieces. What devil were able to overthrow such walls? There is no metal like it to resist blows, insofar that, if culverin-shot should come to graze upon it, you would incontinently see distil from thence the blessed fruit of the great pox as small as rain. Beware, in the name of the devils, and hold off. Furthermore, no thunderbolt or lightning would fall upon it. For why? They are all either blessed or consecrated. I see but one inconveniency in it." "Ho, ho! ha, ha, ha!" said Pantagruel, "and what is that?" "It is that the flies would be so liquorish of them that you would wonder, and they would quickly gather there together, and there leave their ordure and excretions, and so all the work would be spoiled. But see how that might be remedied; they must be wiped and made rid of the flies with fair fox-tails, or good great viedazes, which are ass-pizzles of Provence. And to this purpose I will tell you, as we go to supper, a brave example set down by Frater Lubinus, Libro de comptationibus mendicantium.

"In the time that the beasts did speak, which is not yet three days since, a poor lion, walking through the forest of Bieure, and saying his own little private devotions, passed under a tree where there was a roguish collier gotten up to cut down wood, who, seeing the lion, cast his hatchet at him, and wounded him enormously in one of his legs, whereupon the lion halting, he so long toiled and turmoiled himself in roaming up and down the forest to find help, that at last he met with a carpenter, who willingly looked upon his wound, cleansed it as well as he could, and filled it with moss, telling him that he must wipe his wound well, that the flies might not do their excrements in it, whilst he should go search for some yarrow or millefoil, commonly called the carpenter's herb. The lion being thus healed, walked along in the forest; at what time a sempiternous crone and old hag was picking up and gathering some sticks in the said forest, who seeing the lion coming towards her, for fear fell down backwards, in such sort that the wind blew up her gown, coats, and smock, even as far as above her shoulders. Which the lion perceiving, for pity ran to see whether she had taken any hurt by the fall; thereupon, considering her how do you call it, said, 'Oh, poor woman, who hath thus wounded thee?' Which words, when he had thus spoken, he espied a fox, whom he called to come to him, saying, 'Gossip Reynard, ha, hither, hither, and for cause!' When the fox was come, he said unto him, 'My gossip and friend, they have hurt this good woman here between the legs most villainously, and there is a manifest solution of continuity. See how great a wound it is, even from the tail up to the navel, in measure four, nay full five handfuls and a-half. This is the blow of an hatchet, I doubt me, it is an old wound; and therefore that the flies may not get into it, wipe it lustily well and hard, I prithee, both within and without; thou hast a good tail, and long. Wipe, my friend, wipe, I beseech thee, and in the meanwhile I will go get some moss to put into it; for thus ought we to succour and help one another. Wipe it hard, thus, my friend; wipe it well, for this wound must be often wiped, otherwise the party cannot be at ease. Go to, wipe well, my little gossip, wipe. God hath furnished thee with a tail, thou hast a long one, and of a bigness proportionable, wipe hard, and be not weary. A good wiper, who, in wiping continually, wipeth with his wipard, by wasps shall never be wounded. Wipe, my pretty minion, wipe, my little bully, I will not stay long.' Then went he to get store of moss; and, when he was a little way off, he cried out in speaking to the fox thus, 'Wipe well still, gossip, wipe, and let it never grieve thee to wipe well, my little gossip. I will put thee into service to be wiper to Don Pedro de Castille; wipe, only wipe, and no more. The poor fox wiped as hard as he could, here and there, within and without; but the false old trot did so fizzle and foist, that she stunk like a hundred devils, which put the poor fox to a great deal of ill-ease, for he knew not to what side to turn himself to escape the unsavoury perfume of this old woman's postern blasts. And whilst to that effect he was shifting hither and thither, without knowing how to shun the annoyance of those unwholesome gusts, he saw that, behind, there was yet another hole, not so great as that which he did wipe, out of which came this filthy and infectious air. The lion at last returned, bringing with him of moss more than eighteen packs would hold, and began to put into the wound with a staff which he had provided for that purpose, and had already put in full sixteen packs and a-half, at which he was amazed. 'What a devil,' said he, 'this wound is very deep, it would hold above two cart loads of moss.' The fox perceiving this, said unto the lion, 'Oh, gossip lion, my friend, I pray thee, do not put in all thy moss there; keep somewhat, for there is here another little hole, that stinks like five hundred devils; I am almost choked with the smell thereof, it is so pestiferous and impoisoning.'

"Thus must these walls be kept from the flies, and wages allowed to some for wiping of them." "Then," said Pantagruel, "how dost thou know that the privy parts of women are at such a cheap rate? For in this city there are many virtuous, honest, and chaste women besides the maids." "Et ubi drenus?" said Panurge. "I will give you my opinion of it, and that upon certain and assured knowledge. I do not brag that I have bum-basted four hundred and seventeen since I came into this city, though it be but nine days ago; but this very morning I met with a good fellow who in a wallet, such as Æsop's was, carried two little girls, of two or three years old at the most, one before, and the other behind. He demanded alms of me, but I made him answer that I had more cods than pence. Afterwards I asked him, 'Good man, these two girls, are they maids?' 'Brother,' said he, 'I have carried them thus these two years, and in regard of her that is before, whom I see continually, in my opinion she is a virgin; nevertheless, I will not put my finger in the fire for it; as for her that is behind, doubtless I can say nothing.'

"Indeed," said Pantagruel, "thou art a gentle companion; I will have thee to be apparelled in my livery." And therefore caused him to be clothed most gallantly according to the fashion that then was, only that Panurge would have the codpiece of his breeches three feet long, and in shape square, not round; which was done, and was well worth the seeing. Oftentimes was he wont to say that the world had not yet known the emolument and utility that is in wearing great codpieces; but time would one day teach it them, as all things have been invented in time. "God keep from hurt," said he, "the good fellow whose long cod-piece or braguet hath saved his life! God keep from hurt him whose long braguet hath been worth to him in one day one hundred threescore thousand and nine crowns! God keep from hurt him who by his long braguet hath saved a whole city from famine! And, by God, I will make a book of the commodity of long braguets when I shall have more leisure." And indeed he composed a fair great book with figures; but it is not printed as yet that I know of.

CHAPTER XVI.

Of the Qualities and Conditions of Panurge.

PANURGE was of a middle stature, not too high nor too low, and had somewhat an aquiline nose, made like the handle of a razor. He was at that time five and thirty years old, or thereabouts, fine to gild like a leaden dagger—for he was a notable cheater and coney-catcher. He was a very gallant and proper man of his person, only that he was a little lecherous, and naturally subject to a kind of disease which at that time they called lack of money—it is an incomparable grief, yet, notwithstanding, he had threescore and three tricks to come by it at his need, of which the most honourable and most ordinary was in manner of thieving, secret purloining, and filching, for he was a wicked, lewd rogue, a cozener, drinker, roysterer, rover, and a very dissolute and debauched fellow, if there were any in Paris; otherwise, and in all matters else, the best and most virtuous man in the world; and he was still contriving some plot and devising mischief against the serjeants and the watch.

At one time he assembled three or four especial good hackers and roaring boys; made them in the evening drink like Templars, afterwards led them till they came under Saint Genevieve, or about the college of Navarre, and, at the hour that the watch was coming up that way, which he knew by putting his sword upon the pavement, and his ear by it, and, when he heard his sword shake, it was an infallible sign that the watch was near at that instant; then he and his companions took a tumbrel or dung-cart, and gave it the brangle, hurling it with all their force down the hill, and so overthrew all the poor watchmen like pigs, and then ran away upon the other side; for in less than two days he knew all the streets, lanes, and turnings in Paris as well as his Deus det.

At another time he laid in some fair place where the said watch was to pass a train of gunpowder, and, at the very instant that they went along, set fire to it, and then made himself sport to see what good grace they had in running away, thinking that Saint Anthony's fire had caught them by the legs. As for the poor masters of arts, he did prosecute them above all others. When he encountered with any of them upon the street he would never fail to put some trick or other upon them, sometimes putting the bit of a fried turd in their graduate hoods, at other times pinning on little fox-tails or hare-ears behind them, or some such other roguish prank. One day that they were appointed all to meet in the Fodder Street (Sorbonne), he made a Borbonnesa tart, or filthy and slovenly compound made of store of garlic, of assafoetida, of castoreum, or dog's turds very warm, which he steeped, tempered, and liquified in the corrupt matter of pocky boils and pestiferous botches, and, very early in the morning, therewith anointed all the pavement, in such sort that the devil could not have endured it, which made all these good people there to lay up their gorges, and vomit what was upon their stomachs before all the world, as if they had flayed the fox; and ten or twelve of them died of the plague, fourteen became lepers, eighteen grew lousy, and above seven and twenty had the pox, but he did not care a button for it. He commonly carried a whip under his gown, wherewith he whipped without remission the pages whom he found carrying wine to their masters, to make them mend their pace. In his coat he had about six and twenty little fobs and pockets always full; one with some lead-water, and a little knife as sharp as a glover's needle, wherewith he used to cut purses; another with some kind of bitter stuff, which he threw into the eyes of those he met; another with clotburs, penned with little geese or capons' feathers, which he cast upon the gowns and caps of honest people, and often made them fair horns, which they wore about all the city, sometimes all their life. Very often, also, upon the women's French hoods would he stick in the hind-part somewhat made in the shape of a man's member. In another, he had a great many little horns full of fleas and lice, which he borrowed from the beggars of Saint Innocent, and cast them with small canes or quills to write with into the necks of the daintiest gentlewomen that he could find, yea, even in the church; for he never seated himself above in the choir, but always sat in the body of the church, amongst the women, both at mass, at vespers, and at sermon. In another he used to have good store of hooks and buckles, wherewith he would couple men and women together that sat in company close to one another, but especially those that wore gowns of crimson taffeties, that, when they were about to go away, they might rend all their gowns. In another he had a squib furnished with tinder, matches, stones to strike fire, and all other tackling necessary for it. In another two or three burning glasses, wherewith he made both men and women sometimes mad, and in the church put them quite out of countenance; for he said that there was but an antistrophe, or little more difference than of a literal inversion, between a woman, folle a la messe and molle a la fesse; that is, foolish at the mass, and of a pliant buttock.

In another he had a good deal of needles and thread, where-with he did a thousand little devilish pranks. One time, at the entry of the palace unto the great hall, where a certain grey friar or cordelier was to say mass to the counsellors, he did help to apparel him and put on his vestments; but in the accoutring of him he sewed on his alb, surplice or stole, to his gown and shirt, and then withdrew himself when the said lords of the court or counsellors came to hear the said mass. But when it came to the Ite, missa est, that the poor frater would have laid by his stole or surplice, as the fashion then was, he plucked off withal both his frock and shirt, which were well sewed together, and thereby stripping himself up to the very shoulders, showed his bel vedere to all the world, together with his Don Cypriano, which was no small one, as you may imagine. And the friar still kept hauling, but so much the more did he discover himself, and lay open his back-parts, till one of the lords of the court said, "How now, what's the matter? Will this fair father make us here an offering of his tail to kiss it? Nay, Saint Anthony's fire kiss it for us!" From henceforth it was ordained that the poor fathers should never disrobe themselves any more before the world, but in their vestry-room, or sextry, as they call it; especially in the presence of women, lest it should tempt them to the sin of longing and inordinate desire. The people then asked why it was the friars had so long and large genitories. The said Panurge resolved the problem very neatly, saying, "That which makes asses to have such great ears is, that their dams did put no biggins on their heads, as d'Alliaco mentioneth in his suppositions. By the like reason, that which makes the genitories or generation-tools of those fair fraters so long is, for that they wear no bottomed breeches, and therefore their jolly member, having no impediment, hangeth dangling at liberty, as far as it can reach, with a wiggle-waggle down to their knees, as women carry their paternoster beads. And the cause wherefore they have it so correspondingly great is, that in this constant wig-wagging the humours of the body descend into the said member. For, according to the legists, agitation and continual motion is cause of attraction."

Item, he had another pocket full of itching powder, called stone-alum whereof he would cast some into the backs of those women whom he judged to be most beautiful and stately, which did so ticklishly gall them, that some would strip themselves in the open view of the world, and others dance like a cock upon hot embers, or a drumstick on a tabour. Others, again, ran about the streets, and he would run after them. To such as were in the stripping vein, he would very civilly come to offer his attendance, and cover them with his cloak, like a courteous and very gracious man.

Item, in another he had a little leather bottle full of old oil, wherewith, when he saw any man or woman in a rich new handsome suit, he would grease, smutch, and spoil all the best parts of it, under colour and pretence of touching them, saying, "This is good cloth, this is good satin, good taffeties. Madam, God give you all that your noble heart desireth ! You have a new suit, pretty sir ; and you a new gown, sweet mistress. God give you joy of it, and maintain you in all prosperity !" And with this would lay his hand upon their shoulder, at which touch such a villainous spot was left behind, so enormously engraven to perpetuity in the very soul, body, and reputation, that the devil himself could never have taken it away. Then upon his departing he would say, "Madam, take heed you do not fall, for there is a filthy great hole before you, whereinto if you put your foot you will quite spoil yourself."

Another he had all full of euphorbium, very finely pulverised. In that powder did he lay a fair handkerchief, curiously wrought, which he had stolen from a pretty seamstress of the palace, in taking away a louse from off her bosom, which he had put there himself, and, when he came into the company of some good ladies, he would trifle them into a discourse of some fine workmanship of bone-lace, and then immediately put his hand into their bosom, asking them, "And this work, is it of Flanders, or of Hainault?" and then drew out his handkerchief, and said, "Hold, hold, hold ! look what work here is ; it is of Foutignan or of Fontarabia," and shaking it hard at their nose, made them sneeze for four hours without ceasing. In the meanwhile he would fart like a horse, and the women would laugh and say, "How now, do you fart, Panurge?" "No, no, madam," said he, "I do but tune my tail to the plain song of the music which you make with your nose." In another he had a picklock, a pelican, a cramp-iron, a crook, and some other iron tools, wherewith there was no door nor coffer which he could not pick open. He had another full of little cups, wherewith he played very artificially, for he had his fingers made to his hand, like those of Minerva or Arachne, and had heretofore cried "treacle." And when he changed a teston, cardecu, or any other piece of money, the changer had been more subtle than a fox if Panurge had not at every time made five or six sols (that is, some six or seven pence) vanish away invisibly, openly and manifestly, without making any hurt or lesion, whereof the changer should have felt nothing but the wind.

CHAPTER XVII.

How Panurge gained the Pardons, and married the Old Women, and of the Suit in Law which He had at Paris.

ONE day I found Panurge very much out of countenance, melancholic, and silent, which made me suspect that he had no money, whereupon I said unto him, "Panurge, you are sick, as I do very well perceive by your physiognomy, and I know the disease. You have a flux in your purse; but take no care. I have yet sevenpence half-penny, that never saw father nor mother, which shall not be wanting, no more than the pox, in your necessity." Whereunto he answered me, "Well, well—for money, one day I shall have but too much; for I have a philosopher's stone, which attracts money out of men's purses, as the adamant doth iron. But will you go with me to gain the pardons?" said he. "By my faith," said I, "I am no great pardon-taker in this world—if I shall be any such in the other, I cannot tell; yet let us go, in God's name, it is but one farthing more or less." "But," said he, "lend me then a farthing upon interest." "No, no," said I, "I will give it you freely, and from my heart." "Grates vobis dominos," said he.

So we went along, beginning at Saint Gervase, and I got the pardons at the first box only, for in those matters very little contenteth me. Then did I say my suffrages, and the prayers of Saint Brigid; but he gained them at all the boxes, and always gave money to every one of the pardoners. From thence we went to our Lady's church, to Saint John's, to Saint Anthony's, and so to the other churches, where there was a bank of pardons. For my part, I gained no more of them; but he at all the boxes kissed the relics, and gave at every one. To be brief, when we were returned, he brought me to drink at the castle tavern, and there he showed me ten or twelve of his little bags full of money, at which I blessed myself, and made the sign of the cross, saying, "Where have you recovered so much money in so little time?" Unto which he answered me, that he had taken it out of the basins of the pardons. "For in giving them the first farthing," said he, "I put it in with such sleight of hand, and so dexterously, that it appeared to be a threepence, thus with one hand I took threepence, ninepence, or sixpence at the least, and with the other as much, and so through all the churches where we have been." "Yea, but," said I, "you damn yourself like a snake, and are withal a thief and sacrilegious person." "True," said he, "in your opinion, but I am not of that mind; for the pardoners do give me it, when they say unto me, in presenting the relics to kiss, 'Centuplum accipies,' that is, that for one penny I should take a hundred; for accipies is spoken according to the manner of the Hebrews, who use the future tense instead of the imperative, as you have in the law, Diliges Dominum; that is, Dilige. Even so, when the pardon-bearer says to me, 'Centuplum accipies,' his meaning is Centuplum accipe; and so doth Rabbi Kimy and Rabbi Aben Ezra expound it, and all the Massorets, et ibi Bartholus. Moreover, Pope Sixtus gave me fifteen hundred francs of yearly pension, which in English money is a hundred and fifty pounds, upon his ecclesiastical revenues and treasure, for having cured him of a cankerous botch, which did so torment him that he thought to have been a cripple by it all his life. Thus I do pay myself at my own hand, for otherwise I get nothing, upon the said ecclesiastical treasure. Ho, my friend," said he, "if thou didst know what advantage I made, and how well I feathered my nest, by the Pope's bull of the crusade, thou wouldest wonder exceedingly. It was worth to me above six thousand florins; in English coin, six hundred pounds." "And what a devil is become of them?" said I; "for of that money thou hast not one half-penny." "They returned from whence they came," said he; "they did no more but change their master."

"But I employed at least three thousand of them, that is, three hundred pounds English, in marrying—not young virgins, for they find but too many husbands, but great old sempiternous trots, which had not so much as one tooth in their heads; and that out of the consideration I had that these good old women had very well spent the time of their youth in playing at the close-buttock game to all comers, serving the foremost first, till no man would have any more dealing with them.

"And, by God, I will have their skincoat shaken once yet before they die. By this means, to one I gave a hundred florins, to another sixscore, to another three hundred, according to that they were infamous, detestable, and abominable. For by how much the more honourable and execrable they were, so much the more must I needs have given them, otherwise the devil would not have jum'd them. Presently I went to some great and fat wood-porter, or such like, and did myself make the match. But, before I did show him the old hags, I made a fair muster to him of the crowns, saying, 'Good fellow, see what I will give thee if thou wilt but condescend to duffle, dinfre-daille, or lecher it one good bout.' Then began the poor rogues to gape like old mules, and I caused to be provided for them a banquet, with drink of the best, and store of spiceries, to put the old women in rut and heat of lust. To be short, they occupied all like good souls; only, to those that were horribly ugly and ill-favoured, I caused their head to be put within a bag to hide their face.

“Besides all this, I have lost a great deal in suits of law.” “And what law-suits couldest thou have?” said I; “thou hast neither house nor lands.” “My friend,” said he, “the gentlewomen of this city had found out, by the instigation of the devil of hell, a manner of high-mounted bands and neckerchiefs for women, which did so closely cover their bosoms that men could no more put their hands under. For they had put the slit behind, and those neckcloths were wholly shut before, whereat the poor, sad, contemplative lovers were much discontented. Upon a fair Tuesday, I presented a petition to the court, making myself a party against the said gentlewomen, and showing the great interest that I pretended therein, protesting that, by the same reason, I would cause the codpiece of my breeches to be sewed behind if the court would not take order for it. In sum, the gentlewomen put in their defences, showed the grounds they went upon, and constituted their attorney for the prosecuting of the cause. But I pursued them so vigorously that, by a sentence of the court, it was decreed those high neckcloths should be no longer worn if they were not a little cleft and open before; but it cost me a good sum of money. I had another very filthy and beastly process against the dung-farmer called Master Fifi, and his deputies, that they should no more read privily the pipe, puncheon, nor quart of sentences, but in fair, full day, and that in the Fodder schools, in face of the Arrian sophisters, where I was ordained to pay the charges, by reason of some clause mistaken in the relation of the serjeant. Another time I framed a complaint to the court against the mules of the presidents, counsellors, and others, tending to this purpose, that when, in the lower court of the palace they left them to champ on their bridles, some bibs were made for them by the counsellors’ wives, that with their drivelling they might not spoil the pavement; to the end that the pages of the palace might play upon it with their dice, or at the game of coxbody, at their own ease, without spoiling their breeches at the knees. And for this I had a fair decree; but it cost me dear. Now reckon up what expense I was at in little banquets, which from day to day I made to the pages of the palace.” “And to what end?” said I. “My friend,” said he “thou hast no pastime at all in this world. I have more than the king, and if thou wilt join thyself with me, we will do the devil together.” “No, no,” said I, “by Saint Adauras, that will I not, for thou wilt be hanged one time or other.” “And thou,” said he, “wilt be interred some time or other. Now, which is most honourable, the air or the earth? Ho, grosse pecore!

“Whilst the pages are at their banqueting, I keep their mules, and to some one I cut the stirrup-leather of the mounting side, till it hung by a thin strap or thread, that when the great puff-guts of the counsellor or some other hath taken his swing to get up, he may fall flat on his side like a porker, and so furnish the spectators with more than a hundred francs' worth of laughter. But I laugh yet further to think how at his home-coming the master-page is to be whipped like green rye, which makes me not to repent what I have bestowed in feasting them." In brief, he had, as I said before, threescore and three ways to acquire money, but he had two hundred and fourteen to spend it, besides his drinking.

CHAPTER XVIII.

How a Great Scholar of England would have argued against Pantagruel, and was overcome by Panurge.

IN that same time a certain learned man, named Thaumast, hearing the fame and renown of Pantagruel's incomparable knowledge, came out of his own country of England with an intent only to see him, to try thereby, and prove, whether his knowledge in effect was so great as it was reported to be. In this resolution, being arrived at Paris, he went forthwith unto the house of the said Pantagruel, who was lodged in the palace of Saint Denys, and was then walking in the garden thereof with Panurge, philosophising after the fashion of the Peripatetics. At his first entrance he startled, and was almost out of his wits for fear, seeing him so great, and so tall. Then did he salute him courteously, as the manner is, and said unto him, "Very true it is, saith Plato, the prince of philosophers, that if the image and knowledge of wisdom were corporeal and visible to the eyes of mortals, it would stir up all the world to admire her. Which we may the rather believe, that the very bare report thereof, scattered in the air, if it happen to be received into the ears of men, who, for being studious, and lovers of virtuous things, are called philosophers, doth not suffer them to sleep nor rest in quiet, but so pricketh them up, and sets them on fire, to run unto the place where the person is, in whom the said knowledge is said to have built her temple, and uttered her oracles. As it was manifestly shown unto us in the Queen of Sheba, who came from the utmost borders of the East and Persian Sea to see the order of Solomon's house, and to hear his wisdom; in Anarcharsis, who came out of Scythia, even unto Athens, to see Solon; in Pythagoras, who travelled far to visit the memphitical vaticinators; in Plato, who went a great way off to see the magicians of Egypt, and Architas of Tarentum ; in Apollonius Tyaneus, who went as far as unto Mount Caucasus, passed along the Scythians, the Masagetes, the Indians, and sailed over the great river Phison, even to the Brachmans, to see Hiarchas ; as likewise unto Babylon, Chaldea, Media, Assyria, Parthia, Syria, Phœnicia, Arabia, Palestina, and Alexandria, even unto Æthiopia, to see the Gymnosophists. The like example have we of Titus Livius, whom to see and hear divers studious persons came to Rome, from the confines of France and Spain. I dare not reckon myself in the number of those so excellent persons, but well would be called studious, and a lover, not only of learning, but of learned men also. And, indeed, having heard the report of your so inestimable knowledge, I have left my country, my friends, my kindred, my house, and am come thus far, valuing as nothing the length of the way, the tediousness of the sea, nor strangeness of the land, and that only to see you, and to confer with you about some passages in philosophy, of geomancy, and of the cabalistic art, whereof I am doubtful, and cannot satisfy my mind ; which if you can resolve, I yield myself unto you for a slave henceforward, together with all my posterity ; for other gift have I none that I can esteem a recompense sufficient for so great a favour. I will reduce them into writing, and tomorrow publish them to all the learned men in the city, that we may dispute publicly before them.

“But see in what manner I mean that we shall dispute. I will not argue pro et contra, as do the sottish sophisters of this town and other places. Likewise I will not dispute after the manner of the academics by declamation ; nor yet by numbers, as Pythagoras was wont to do, and as Picus de la Mirandula did of late at Rome. But I will dispute by signs only, without speaking, for the matters are so abstruse, hard, and arduous, that words proceeding from the mouth of man will never be sufficient for unfolding of them to my liking. May it, therefore, please your magnificence to be there ; it shall be at the great hall of Navarre, at seven o'clock in the morning.” When he had spoke these words, Pantagrue very honourably said unto him, “Sir, of the graces that God hath bestowed upon me, I would not deny to communicate unto any man to my power. For whatever comes from him is good, and his pleasure is that it should be increased, when we come amongst men worthy and fit to receive this celestial manna of honest literature. In which number, because that in this time, as I do already very plainly perceive, thou holdest the first rank, I give thee notice that at all hours thou shalt find me ready to condescend to every one of thy requests, according to my poor ability ; although I ought rather to learn of thee, than thou of me. But, as thou hast protested, we will confer of thy doubts together, and will seek out the resolution, even unto the bottom of that undrainable well where Heraclitus says the truth lies hidden. And I do highly commend the manner of arguing which thou hast proposed, to wit, by signs without speaking; for by this means thou and I shall understand one another well enough, and yet shall be free from that clapping of hands which these blockish sophisters make when any of the arguers hath gotten the better of the argument. Now, to-morrow, I will not fail to meet thee at the place and hour that thou hast appointed; but let me entreat thee that there be not any strife or uproar between us, and that we seek not the honour and applause of men, but the truth only." To which Thaumast answered, "The Lord God maintain you in his favour and grace, and, instead of my thankfulness to you, pour down his blessings upon you, for that your highness and magnificent greatness hath not disdained to descend to the grant of the request of my poor baseness. So farewell till to-morrow!" "Farewell," said Pantagruel.

Gentlemen, you that read this present discourse, think not that ever men were more elevated and transported in their thoughts than all this night were both Thaumast and Pantagruel; for the said Thaumast said to the keeper of the house of Cluny, where he was lodged, that in all his life he had never known himself so dry as he was that night. "I think," said he, "that Pantagruel held me by the throat. Give order, I pray you, that we may have some drink, and see that some fresh water be brought to us to gargle my palate." On the other side, Pantagruel stretched his wits as high as he could, entering into very deep and serious meditations, and did nothing all that night but dote upon him, and turn over the book of Bèda, De Numeris et signis; Plotin's book, De Inenarrabilibus; the book of Proclus, De Magia; the book of Artemidorus, περὶ Ὀνειροκριτικῶν; of Anaxagoras, περὶ Σημείων; Dinarius, περὶ Ἀφαιτῶν; the books of Philistion; Hipponax, περὶ Ἀνεκφωρητῶν, and a rabble of others, so long that Panurge said unto him:

"My lord, leave all these thoughts and go to bed; for I perceive your spirits to be so troubled by a too intensive bending of them, that you may easily fall into some quotidian fever with this so excessive thinking and plodding. But having first drunk five and twenty or thirty good draughts, retire yourself, and sleep your fill, for in the morning I will argue against and answer my master the Englishman, and, if I drive him not ad metam non loqui, then call me knave. Yea," but said he, "my friend Panurge, he is marvellously learned, how wilt thou be able to answer him?" "Very well," answered Panurge; "I pray you talk no more of it, but let me alone. Is any man so learned as the devils are?" "No, indeed," said Pantagruel, "without God's especial grace." "Yet for all that," said Panurge, I have argued against them, gravelled and blanked them in disputation, and laid them so squat upon their tails, that I made them look like monkeys. Therefore, be assured, that to-morrow I will make this vainglorious Englishman to skite vinegar* before all the world." So Panurge spent the night with tipping amongst the pages, and played away all the points of his breeches at primus et secundus, and at peck point, in French, called La Vergette. Yet, when the appointed time was come, he failed not to conduct his master Pantagruel to the appointed place, unto which, believe me, there was neither great nor small in Paris but came, thinking with themselves that this devilish Pantagruel, who had overthrown and vanquished in dispute all these doting fresh-water sophisters, would now get full payment and be tickled to some purpose. For this Englishman is a terrible bustler, and horrible coil-keeper. We will see who will be the conqueror, for he never met with his match before.

Thus all being assembled, Thaumast stayed for them; and then, when Pantagruel and Panurge came into the hall, all the schoolboys, professors of arts, senior sophisters, and bachelors, began to clap their hands, as their scurvy custom is. But Pantagruel cried out with a loud voice, as if it had been the sound of a double cannon, saying, "Peace, with a devil to you, peace! By God, you rogues, if you trouble me here, I will cut off the heads of every one of you." At which words they remained all daunted and astonished like so many ducks, and durst not so much as cough, although they had swallowed fifteen pounds of feathers. Withal they grew so dry with this only voice, that they laid out their tongues a full half-foot beyond their mouths, as if Pantagruel had salted all their throats. Then began Panurge to speak, saying to the Englishman, "Sir, are you come hither to dispute contentiously in those propositions you have set down, or otherwise but to learn and know the truth?" To which answered Thaumast, "Sir, no other thing brought me hither but the great desire I had to learn, and to know that of which I have doubted all my life long, and have neither found book nor man able to content me in the resolution of those doubts which I have proposed. And as for disputing contentiously, I will not do it, for it is too base a thing, and therefore leave it to those sottish sophisters who in their disputes do not search for the truth, but for contradiction.

* Skite or shite vinegar. In the next succeeding chapter, Thaumast, with great toil and vexation of spirit rose up, but in rising let a great baker's fart, for the bran came after. (We say a brewer's fart, grains and all), and pissing withal very strong vinegar, stunk like all the devils in hell. To shite vinegar, piss vinegar, is to be forced to do all in one's breeches. These two fecal substances, i.e., the solids and the fluids being mixed together, are called vinegar, because they bear some similitude to vinegar, when jumbled with that thick, muddy sediment, which is as it were the mother of it.

only and debate." "Then," said Panurge, "if I, who am but a mean and inconsiderable disciple of my master, my lord Pantagruel, content and satisfy you in all and everything, it were a thing below my said master, wherewith to trouble him. Therefore is it fitter that he be chairman, and sit as a judge and moderator of our discourse and purpose, and give you satisfaction in many things, wherein perhaps I shall be wanting in your expectation." "Truly," said Thaumast, "it is very well said. Begin then." Now you must note that Panurge had set at the end of his long codpiece a pretty tuft of red silk, as also of white, green, and blue, and within it had put a fair orange.*

CHAPTER XIX.

How Panurge put to a nonplus the Englishman that argued by Signs.

EVERYBODY then taking heed, and hearkening with great silence, the Englishman lifted up on high into the air his two hands severally, clenching in all the tops of his fingers together, after the manner which, à la Chinonnesse, they call the hen's arse, and struck the one hand on the other by the nails four several times. Then he, opening them, struck the one with the flat of the other, till it yielded a clashing noise, and that only once. Again, in joining them as before, he struck twice, and afterwards four times in opening them. Then did he lay them joined, and extended the one towards the other, as if he had been devoutly to send up his prayers unto God. Panurge suddenly lifted up in the air his right hand, and put the thumb thereof into the nostril of the same side, holding his four fingers straight out, and closed orderly in a parallel line to the point of his nose, shutting the left eye wholly, and making the other wink with a profound depression of the eyebrows and eyelids. Then lifted he up his left hand, with hard wringing, and stretching forth his four fingers, and elevating his thumb, which he held in a line directly correspondent to the situation of his right hand, with the distance of a cubit and a half between them. This done, in the same form he abased towards the ground both the one and the other hand. Lastly, he held them in the midst, as aiming right at the Englishman's nose. "And if Mercury," said the Englishman. There Panurge interrupted him, and said, "You have spoken, mask."

* And within it had put a fair orange. Designed for some lady. Such was the gallantry of the French at that time, and so continued almost to the end of the sixteenth century. Louis Guyon, l. 2, c. 6, of his various readings, where he speaks of the manner how the French dressed in those days: Their breeches were so close; there could be no pockets made in them; but instead thereof they had a swinging codpiece, with two wings on each side, which they fastened with points, on either side one; and within this large space, which was between the said two points, shirt and codpiece, they put their handkerchiefs, an apple, an orange, or other fruit, as also their purse, etc., and it was not at all uncivil, when they were at table, to make a present of the fruit which they had for some time kept in their codpiece, any more than it is now-a-days to offer fruit out of one's pockets.

Then made the Englishman this sign. His left hand all open he lifted up into the air, then instantly shut into his fist the four fingers thereof, and his thumb extended at length he placed upon the gristle of his nose. Presently after he lifted up his right hand all open, and all open abased and bent it downwards, putting the thumb thereof in the very place where the little finger of the left hand did close in the fist, and the four right hand fingers he softly moved in the air. Then contrarily he did with the right hand what he had done with the left, and with the left what he had done with the right.

Panurge, being not a whit amazed at this, drew out into the air his trismegist codpiece with the left hand, and with his right drew forth a truncheon of a white ox-rib, and two pieces of wood of a like form, one of black ebony, and the other of incarnation Brazil, and put them betwixt the fingers of that hand in good symmetry; then knocking them together, made such a noise as the lepers of Britanny use to do with their clapping clickets, yet better resounding, and far more harmonious, and with his tongue contracted in his mouth did very merrily warble it, always looking fixedly upon the Englishman. The divines, physicians, and chirurgeons that were there thought that by this sign he would have inferred that the Englishman was a leper. The counsellors, lawyers, and decretalists conceived that, by doing this, he would have concluded some kind of mortal felicity to consist in leprosy, as the lord maintained heretofore.

The Englishman for all this was nothing daunted, but, holding up his two hands in the air, kept them in such form that he closed the three master-fingers in his fist, and passing his thumbs through his indicial, or foremost and middle fingers, his auricular or little fingers remained extended and stretched out, and so presented he them to Panurge. Then he joined them, so that the right thumb touched the left, and the left little finger touched the right. Hereat Panurge, without speaking one word lifted up his hands and made this sign.

He put the nail of the forefinger of his left hand to the nail of the thumb of the same, making in the middle of the distance, as it were, a buckle, and of his right hand shut up all the fingers into his fist, except the forefinger, which he often thrust in and out through the said two others of the left hand. Then stretched he out the forefinger and middle finger, or medial, of his right hand, holding them asunder as much as he could, and thrusting them towards Thaumast. Then did he put the thumb of his left hand upon the corner of his left eye, stretching out all his hand like the wing of a bird or the fin of a fish, and, moving it very daintily this way and that way, he did as much with his right hand upon the corner of his right eye. Thaumast began then to wax somewhat pale, and to tremble, and made him this sign.

With the middle finger of his right hand he struck against the muscle of the palm or pulp which is under the thumb. Then put he the forefinger of the right hand in the like buckle of the left, but he put it under and not over, as Panurge did. Then Panurge knocked one hand against another, and blowed in his palm, and put again the forefinger of his right hand into the overture or mouth of the left, pulling it often in and out. Then held he out his chin, most intently looking upon Thaumast. The people there who understood nothing in the other signs, knew very well that therein he demanded, without speaking a word to Thaumast, What do you mean by that? In effect Thaumast then began to sweat great drops, and seemed to all the spectators a man strangely ravished in high contemplation. Then he bethought himself, and put all the nails of his left hand against those of his right, opening his fingers as if they had been semicircles, and with this sign lifted up his hands as high as he could. Whereupon Panurge presently put the thumb of his right hand under his jaws, and the little finger thereof in the mouth of the left hand, and in this posture made his teeth to sound very melodiously, the upper against the lower. With this Thaumast, with great toil and vexation of spirit, rose up, but in rising he let a great baker's fart, for the bran came after, and pissing withal very strong vinegar, stunk like all the devils in hell. The company began to stop their noses, for he had conskited himself with mere anguish and perplexity. Then lifted he up his right hand, clenching it in such sort that he brought the ends of all his fingers to meet together, and his left hand he laid flat upon his breast. Whereat Panurge drew out his long codpiece with his tuft, and stretched it forth a cubit and a-half, holding it in the air with his right hand, and with his left took out his orange, and, casting it up into the air seven times, at the eighth he hid it in the fist of his right hand, holding it steadily up on high, and then began to shake his fair codpiece, showing it to Thaumast.

After that Thaumast began to puff up his two cheeks like a player on a bagpipe, and blew as if he had been to puff up a pig's bladder. Whereupon Panurge put one finger of his left hand in his nockandrow, by some called Saint Patrick's hole, and with his mouth sucked in the air, in such a manner as when one eats oysters in the shell, or when we sup up our broth. This done, he opened his mouth somewhat, and struck his right hand flat upon it, making therewith a great and a deep sound, as if it came from the superficies of the midriff, through the trachean artery or pipe of the lungs; and this he did for sixteen times; but Thaumast did always keep blowing like a goose. Then Panurge put the forefinger of his right hand into his mouth, pressing it very hard to the muscles thereof; then he drew it out, and withal made a great noise, as when little boys shoot pellets out of the pot-cannons made of the hollow sticks of the branch of an elder tree, and he did it nine times.

Then Thaumast cried out, "Ha, my masters, a great secret." With this he put in his hand up to the elbow, then drew out a dagger that he had, holding it by the point downwards. Whereat Panurge took his long codpiece, and shook it as hard as he could against his thighs, then put his two hands entwined in manner of a comb upon his head, laying out his tongue as far as he was able, and turning his eyes in his head, like a goat that is ready to die. "Ha, I understand," said Thaumast. "But what?" making such a sign that he put the haft of his dagger against his breast, and upon the point thereof the flat of his hand, turning in a little the ends of his fingers. Whereat Panurge held down his head on the left side, and put his middle finger into his right ear, holding up his thumb bolt upright. Then he crossed his two arms upon his breast, and coughed five times, and at the fifth time he struck his right foot against the ground. Then he lifted up his left arm, and closing all his fingers into his fist, held his thumb against his forehead, striking with his right hand six times against his breast. But Thaumast, as not content therewith, put the thumb of his left hand upon the top of his nose, shutting the rest of his said hand, whereupon Panurge set his two master-fingers upon each side of his mouth, drawing it as much as he was able, and widening it so that he showed all his teeth, and with his two thumbs plucked down his two eyelids very low, making therewith a very ill-favoured countenance, as it seemed to the company.

CHAPTER XX.

How Thaumast relateth the Virtues and Knowledge of Panurge.

THEN Thaumast rose up, and putting off his cap, did very kindly thank the said Panurge, and with a loud voice said unto all the people that were there, "My lords, gentlemen, and others, at this time may I to some good purpose speak that evangelical word, Et ecce plus quàm Salomon hic! You have here in your presence an incomparable treasure, that is, my lord Pantagruel, whose great renown hath brought me hither, out of the very heart of England, to confer with him about the insoluble problems, both in magic, alchemy, the cabala, geomancy, astrology, and philosophy, which I had in my mind. But at present I am angry even with fame itself, which I think was envious to him, for that it did not declare the thousandth part of the worth that indeed is in him. You have seen how his disciple only hath satisfied me, and hath told me more then I asked of him. Besides, he hath opened unto me and resolved other inestimable doubts wherein I can assure you he hath to me discovered the very true well, fountain, and abyss of the encyclopædia of learning; yea, in such a sort that I did not think I should ever have found a man that could have made his skill appear in so much as the first elements of that concerning which we disputed by sign, without speaking either word or half word. But, in fine, I will reduce into writing that which we have said and concluded, that the world may not take them to be fooleries, and will thereafter cause them to be printed, that every one may learn as I have done. Judge, then, what the master had been able to say, seeing the disciple hath done so valiantly; Non est discipulus super magistrum. Howsoever, God be praised, and I do very humbly thank you, for the honour that you have done us at this act. God reward you for it eternally! The like thanks gave Pantagruel to all the company, and going from thence, he carried Thaumast to dinner with him: and believe that they drank as much as their skins could hold, or, as the phrase is, with unbuttoned bellies (for in that age they made fast their bellies with buttons,* as we do now the collars of our doublets or jerkins), even till they neither knew where they were, nor whence they came. Blessed Lady, how they did carouse it, and pluck, as we say, at the kid's leather: and flagons to trot, and they to toot. "Draw, give, page, some wine here, reach hither, fill with a devil, so!" There was not one but did drink five and twenty or thirty pipes. Can you tell how? Even sicut terra sine aqua; for the weather was hot, and, besides that, they were very dry. In matter of the exposition of the propositions set down by Thaumast, and the signification of the signs which they used in their disputation, I would have set them down for you, according to their own relation, but I have been told that Thaumast made a great book of it, imprinted at * They made fast their bellies with buttons, etc. Rabelais means your fair, round, gut-strutting bellies, anciently cased in doublets long enough to reach to their oin.

London, wherein he hath set down all, without omitting anything, and, therefore, at this time I do pass by it.

CHAPTER XXI.

How Panurge was in Love with a Lady of Paris.

PANURGE began to be in great reputation in the city of Paris by means of this disputation, wherein he prevailed against the Englishman, and from thenceforth made his codpiece to be very useful to him. To which effect he had it pinked with pretty little embroideries after the Romanesca fashion. And the world did praise him publicly, in so far that there was a song made of him, which little children did use to sing when they were to fetch mustard. He was withal made welcome in all companies of ladies and gentlewomen, so that at last he became presumptuous, and went about to bring to his lure one of the greatest ladies in the city. And, indeed, leaving a rabble of long prologues and protestations which ordinarily these dolent contemplative lent-lovers make who never meddle with the flesh, one day he said unto her, "Madam, it would be a very great benefit to the commonwealth, delightful to you, honourable to your progeny, and necessary for me, that I cover you for the propagating of my race; and, believe it, for experience will teach it you." The lady at this word thrust him back above a hundred leagues, saying, "You mischievous fool, is it for you to talk thus unto me? Whom do you think you have in hand? Begone, never to come in my sight again; for, if one thing were not, I would have your legs and arms cut off." "Well," said he, "that were all one to me, to want both legs and arms, provided you and I had but one merry bout together at the brangle-buttock game; for here within is (in showing her his long codpiece) Master John Thursday, who will play you such an antic that you shall feel the sweetness thereof even to the very marrow of your bones. He is a gallant, and doth so well know how to find out all the corners, creeks, and ingrained inmates in your carnal trap, that after him there needs no broom, he'll sweep so well before, and leave nothing to his followers to work upon. Whereunto the lady answered, "Go, villain, go. If you speak to me one such word more, I will cry out, and make you to be knocked down with blows." "Ha," said he, "you are not so bad as you say—no, or else I am deceived in your physiognomy. For sooner shall the earth mount up into the heavens, and the highest heavens descend into the hells, and all the course of nature be quite perverted, than that, in so great beauty and neatness as in you is, there should be one drop of gall or malice. They say, indeed, that hardly shall a man ever see a fair woman that is not also stubborn. Yet that is spoke only of those vulgar beauties; but yours is so excellent, so singular, and so heavenly, that I believe nature hath given it you as a paragon and masterpiece of her art, to make us know what she can do when she will employ all her skill and all her power. There is nothing in you but honey, but sugar, but a sweet and celestial manna. To you it was to whom Paris ought to have adjudged the golden apple, not to Venus, no, nor to Juno, nor to Minerva, for never was there so much magnificence in Juno, so much wisdom in Minerva, nor so much comeliness in Venus as there is in you. Oh heavenly gods and goddesses! How happy shall that man be to whom you will grant the favour to embrace her, to kiss her, and to rub his bacon with hers! By God, that shall be I, I know it well; for she loves me already her belly full, I am sure of it; and so was I predestinated to it by the fairies. And, therefore, that we lose no time, put on, thrust out your gammons!"—and would have embraced her, but she made as if she would put out her head at the window to call her neighbours for help. Then Panurge on a sudden ran out, and, in his running away, said, "Madam, stay here till I come again; I will go call them myself, do not you take so much pains." Thus went he away, not much caring for the repulse he had got, nor made he any whit the worse cheer for it. The next day he came to the church at the time she went to mass. At the door he gave her some of the holy water, bowing himself very low before her. Afterwards he kneeled down by her very familiarly, and said unto her, "Madam, know that I am so amorous of you that I can neither piss nor dung for love. I do not know, lady, what you mean, but if I should take any hurt by it, how much you would be to blame!" "Go," said she, "go, I do not care; let me alone to say my prayers." "Ay, but," said he, "equivocate upon this: a Beaumont le viconte." "I cannot," said she. "It is," said he, "a beau con le vit mont. And upon this, pray to God to give you that which your noble heart desireth, and I pray you give me these patenotres." "Take them," said she, "and trouble me no longer." This done, she would have taken off her patenotres, which were made of a kind of yellow stone called Cestrin, and adorned with great spots of gold, but Panurge nimbly drew out one of his knives, wherewith he cut them off very handsomely, and while he was going away to carry them to the brokers, he said to her, "Will you have my knife?"

“No, no,” said she. “But,” said he, “to the purpose. I am at your commandment, body and goods, tripes and bowels.”

In the meantime the lady was not very well content with the want of her patenotres, for they were one of her implements to keep her countenance by in the church; then thought with herself, “This bold, flouting roister is some giddy, fantastical, light-headed fool of a strange country. I shall never recover my patenotres again. What will my husband say? He will no doubt be angry with me. But I will tell him that a thief hath cut them off from my hands in the church, which he will easily believe, seeing the end of the riband left at my girdle.” After dinner Panurge went to see her, carrying in his sleeve a great purse full of palace-crowns, called counters, and began to say unto her, “Which of us two loveth the other best, you me, or I you?” Whereunto she answered, “As for me, I do not hate you; for, as God commands, I love all the world.” “But to the purpose,” said he; “are you not in love with me?” “I have,” said she, “told you so many times already that you should talk so no more to me, and, if you speak of it again, I will teach you that I am not one to be talked unto dishonestly. Get you hence packing, and deliver me my patenotres, that my husband may not ask me for them.”

“How now, madam,” said he, “your patenotres? Nay, by mine oath, I will not do so, but will give you others. Had you rather have them of gold well enamelled in great round knobs, or after the manner of love-knots, or, otherwise, all massive, like great ingots, or, if you had rather have them of ebony, of jacinth, or of grained gold, with the marks of fine torquoises, or fair topazes, marked with fine sapphires, or of baleu rubies, with great marks of diamonds of eight and twenty squares? No, no, all this is too little. I know a fair bracelet of fine emeralds, marked with spotted ambergris, and at the buckle a Persian pearl as big as an orange. It will not cost above five and twenty thousand ducats. I will make you a present of it, for I have ready coin enough;” and withal he made a noise with his counters as if they had been French crowns.

“Will you have a piece of velvet, either of the violet colour or of crimson dyed in grain, or a piece of broached or crimson satin? Will you have chains, gold, tablets, rings? You need no more but say yes—so far as fifty thousand ducats may reach, it is but as nothing to me.” By the virtue of which words he made the water come in her mouth; but she said unto him, “No, I thank you; I will have nothing of you.” “By God,” said he, “but I will have somewhat of you; yet shall it be that which shall cost you nothing, neither shall you have a jot the less when you have given it. Hold” (showing his long codpiece) “this is Master John Goodfellow, that asks for lodging;” and with that would have embraced her, but she began to cry out, yet not very loud. Then Panurge put off his counterfeit garb, changed his false visage, and said unto her, "You will not, then, otherwise let me do a little? A turd for you! You do not deserve so much good, nor so much honour; but, by God, I will make the dogs ride you!" and with this he ran away as fast as he could, for fear of blows, whereof he was naturally fearful.

CHAPTER XXII.

How Panurge served a Parisian Lady a Trick that pleased Her not very well.

Now you must note that the next day was the great festival of Corpus Christi, called the Sacre, wherein all women put on their best apparel, and on that day the said lady was clothed in a rich gown of crimson satin, under which she wore a very costly white velvet petticoat.

The day of the eve, called the vigil, Panurge searched so long of one side and another that he found a hot or salt bitch, which, when he had tied her with his girdle, he led to his chamber, and fed her very well all that day and night. In the morning thereafter he killed her, and took that part of her which the Greek geomancers know, and cut it into several pieces as small as he could. Then carrying it away as close as might be, he went to the place where the lady was to come along, to follow the procession, as the custom is upon the said holy day; and when she came in, Panurge sprinkled some holy water on her, saluting her very courteously. Then a little while after she had said her petty devotions, he sat down close by her upon the same bench, and gave her this roundelay, in writing, in manner as followeth:—

"A ROUNDELAY.

"For this one time, that I to you my love Discovered, you did too cruel prove,
 To send me packing, hopeless, and so soon,
 Who never any wrong to you had done,
 In any kind of action, word, or thought;
 So that, if my suit lik'd you not, you ought
 T' have spoke more civilly, and to this sense,
 My friend be pleased to depart from hence,
 For this one time.

“What hurt do I, to wish you to remark
With favour and compassion, how a spark
Of your great beauty hath inflam'd my heart
With deep affection, and that, for my part,
I only ask that you with me would dance
The brangle gay in feats of dalliance,
For this one time.”

And as she was opening this paper to see what it was, Panurge very promptly and lightly scattered the drug that he had upon her in divers places,* but especially in the plaits of her sleeves and of her gown. Then said he unto her, “Madam, the poor lovers are not always at ease. As for me, I hope that those heavy nights, those pains and troubles, which I suffer for love of you shall be deduction to me of so much pain in purgatory; yet, at the least, pray to God to give me patience in my misery.” Panurge had no sooner spoke this but all the dogs that were in the church came running to this lady with the smell of the drugs that he had strewed upon her, both small and great, big and little, all came, laying out their member, smelling to her, and pissing everywhere upon her, it was the greatest villainy † in the world. Panurge made the fashion of driving them away; then took his leave of her, and withdrew himself into some chapel or oratory of the said church, to see the sport; for these villainous dogs did compass all her habiliments, and left none of her attire unbesprinkled with their staling, insomuch that a tall greyhound pissed upon her head, others in her sleeves, others on her crupper-piece, and the little ones pissed upon her pattens; so that all the women that were round about her had much ado to save her. Whereat Panurge very heartily laughing, he said to one of the lords of the city, “I believe that same lady is hot, or else that some greyhound hath covered her lately.” And when he saw that all the dogs were flocking about her, yarring at the retardment of their access to her, and every way keeping such a coil with her, as they were wont to do about a proud or salt bitch, he forthwith departed from thence, and went to call Pantagruel, not forgetting in his way along all the streets through which he went, where he found any dogs, to give them a bang with his foot, saying, “Will you not go with your fellows to the wedding? Away, hence, avaunt, avaunt, with a devil, avaunt!” And, being come home, he said to Pantagruel, “Master, I pray you, come and see all the dogs of the country, how they are assembled about a lady, the fairest in the city, and would duffle and line her.” Whereunto Pantagruel

* Upon her in divers places. Had she perceived him serving her so, she would have taken it for a piece of gallantry only in a lover; the ladies in these days using such perfume, and suffering themselves to be perfumed, it is likely, by their sparks willingly condescended, and saw the mystery, which he found very pretty and strange. But the best was at the procession, in which were seen above six hundred thousand and fourteen dogs about her, which did very much trouble and molest her, and whithersoever she passed, those dogs that came afresh, tracing her footsteps, followed her at her heels, and pissed in the way wherever her gown had touched. All the world stood gazing at this spectacle, considering the countenance of those dogs, who, leaping up, got about her neck, and spoiled all her gorgeous accoutrements, for the which she could find no remedy but to retire unto her house, which was a palace. Thither she went, and the dogs after her; she ran to hide herself, but the chambermaids could not abstain from laughing. When she was entered into the house, and had shut the door upon herself, all the dogs came running, of half a league round, and did so well bepiss the gate of her house, that there they made a stream with their urine wherein a duck might have very well swam, and it is the same current that now runs at Saint Victor, in which Gobelin dyeth scarlet, by the specificall virtue of these piss-dogs, as our master Doribus did heretofore preach publicly. So may God help you, a mill would have ground corn with it. Yet not so much as those of Basacle at Toulouse.

CHAPTER XXIII.

How Pantagruel departed from Paris, hearing News that the Dipsodes had invaded the Land of the Amaurots; and the Cause wherefore the Leagues are so short in France.

A LITTLE while after Pantagruel heard news that his father Gargantua had been translated into the Land of the Fairies by Morgue, as heretofore were Ogier and Arthur; as also that the report of the translation being spread abroad that the Dipsodes had issued out beyond their borders, with inroads had wasted a great part of Utopia, and at that very time had besieged the great city of the Amaurots. Whereupon, departing from Paris, without bidding any man farewell, for the business required diligence, he came to Rouen.

Now Pantagruel, in his journey, seeing that the leagues of that little territory about Paris called France were very short, in regard of those of other countries, demanded the cause and reason of it from Panurge, who told him a story which Marotus of the Lac, monachus, set down in the Acts of the Kings of Canarre, saying, that in old times countries were not distinguished into leagues, miles, furlongs, nor parasanges, until that King Pharamond divided them, which was done in manner as followeth: The said king chose at Paris a hundred fair, gallant, lusty, brisk young men, all resolute and bold adventurers in Cupid's duels, together with a hundred comely, pretty, handsome, lovely, and well-complexioned wenches of Picardy; all of which he caused to be well entertained and highly fed for the space of eight days. Then, having called for them, he delivered to every one of the young men his wench, with store of money to defray their charges, and this injunction besides, to go unto divers places here and there. And wheresoever they should biscot and thrum their wenches, that they setting a stone there, it should be counted for a league. Thus went away those brave fellows and sprightly blades most merrily, and because they were fresh, and had been at rest, they very often jummed and franfreuchled at almost every field's end, and this is the cause why the leagues about Paris are so short. But when they had gone a great way, and were now as weary as poor devils, all the oil in their lamps being almost spent, they did not chink and duffle so often, but contented themselves (I mean for the men's part) with one scurvy, paltry bout in a day, and this is that which makes the leagues in Brittany, Delanes, Germany, and other more remote countries so long. Other men give other reasons for it, but this seems to me of all others the best. To which Pantagruel willingly adhered. Parting from Rouen, they arrived at Honfleur, where they took shipping, Pantagruel, Panurge, Epistemon, Eusthenes, and Carpalim.

In which place, waiting for a favourable wind, and caulking their ship, he received from a lady of Paris, whom he had formerly kept and entertained a good long time, a letter directed on the outside thus:—"To the best beloved of the fair women, and least loyal of the valiant men.

CHAPTER XXIV.

A Letter which a Messenger brought to Pantagruel from a Lady of Paris, together with the exposition of a Poesy written in a Gold Ring.

WHEN Pantagruel had read the superscription, he was much amazed, and therefore demanded of the said messenger the name of her that had sent it. Then opened he the letter, and found nothing written in it, nor otherwise enclosed, but only a gold ring, with a square table-diamond. Wondering at this, he called Panurge to him, and showed him the case. Whereupon Panurge told him that the leaf of paper was written upon, but with such cunning and artifice that no man could see the writing at the first sight. Therefore, to find it out, he set it by the fire to see if it was made with sal ammoniac soaked in water. Then put he it into the water, to see if the letter was written with the juice of tithymalle. After that he held it up against the candle, to see if it was written with the juice of white onions.

Then he rubbed one part of it with the oil of nuts, to see if it were written with the lee of a fig-tree, and another part of it with the milk of a woman giving suck to her eldest daughter, to see if it was written with the blood of red toads or green earth frogs. Afterwards he rubbed one corner with the ashes of a swallow's nest, to see if it were not written with the dew that is found within the herb alcakengy, called the winter cherry. He rubbed, after that, one end with ear-wax, to see if it were not written with the gall of a raven. Then did he dip it into vinegar, to try if it was not written with the juice of the garden spurge. After that he greased it with the fat of a bat or flittermouse, to see if it was not written with the sperm of a whale, which some call ambergris. Then put it very fairly into a basin full of fresh water, and forthwith took it out, to see whether it was written with stone-alum. But after all experiments, when he perceived that he could find out nothing, he called the messenger, and asked him, "Good fellow, the lady that sent thee hither, did she not give thee a staff to bring with thee?" thinking that it had been according to the conceit whereof Aulus Gellius maketh mention. And the messenger answered him, "No, sir." Then Panurge would have caused his head to be shaven, to see whether the lady had written upon his bald pate, with the hard lye whereof soap is made, that which she meant; but, perceiving that his hair was very long, he forbore, considering that it could not have grown to so great a length in so short a time.

Then he said to Pantagruel, "Master, by the virtue of God, I cannot tell what to do or to say in it. For, to know whether there be anything written upon this or no, I have made use of a good part of that which Master Francisco di Nianto, the Tuscan, sets down, who had written the manner of reading letters that do not appear; that which Zoroaster published, Peri Grammaton acriton; and Calphurnius Bassus, De Literis illegibilibus. But I can see nothing, nor do I believe that there is anything else in it than the ring. Let us therefore look upon it." Which when they had done, they found this in Hebrew written within, Lama sabachthani; whereupon they called Epistemon, and asked him what that meant. To which he answered, that they were Hebrew words, signifying, "Wherefore hast thou forsaken me?" Upon that Panurge suddenly replied, "I know the mystery. Do you see this diamond? It is a false one. This, then, is the exposition of that which the lady means, Diamant faux, that is, false lover, why hast thou forsaken me?" Which interpretation Pantagruel presently understood, and withal remembering that at his departure he had not bid the lady farewell, he was very sorry, and would fain have returned to Paris, to make his peace with her. But Epistemon put him in mind of Æneas's departure from Dido, and the saying of Heraclitus of Tarentum, "That, the ship being at anchor, when need requireth, we must cut the cable rather than lose time about untying of it," and that he should lay aside all other thoughts, to succour the city of his nativity, which was then in danger. And, indeed, within an hour after that, the wind arose at the north-north-west, wherewith they hoisted sail, and put out, even into the main sea, so that within few days, passing by Porto Sancto, and by the Madeiras, they went ashore in the Canary Islands. Parting from thence, they passed by Capobianco, by Senega, by Capo-verde, by Gambra, by Sagres, by Melli, by the Cap di Buona Speranza, and set ashore again in the kingdom of Melinda. Parting from thence, they sailed away with a tramontane or northerly wind, passing by Meden, by Uti, by Uden, by Gelasem, by the Isles of the Fairies, and along the kingdom of Achory, till at last they arrived at the port of Utopia, distant from the city of the Amaurots three leagues and somewhat more.

When they were ashore, and pretty well refreshed, Pantagruel said, "Gentlemen, the city is not far from hence, therefore were it not amiss, before we set forward, to advise well what is to be done, that we be not like the Athenians, who never took counsel until after the fact. Are you resolved to live and die with me?" "Yes, sir," said they all; "and be as confident of us as of your own fingers." "Well," said he, "there is but one thing that keeps my mind in great doubt and suspense, which is this, that I know not in what order nor of what number the enemy is that layeth siege to the city; for, if I were certain of that, I should go forward, and set on with the better assurance. Let us therefore consult together, and bethink ourselves by what means we may come to this intelligence." Whereunto they all said, "Let us go thither and see, and stay you here for us; for this very day, without further respite, do we make account to bring you a certain report thereof."

"Myself," said Panurge, "will undertake to enter into their camp, within the very midst of their guards, unespied by their watch, and merrily feast and lecher it at their cost, without being known of any, to see the artillery and the tents of all the captains, and thrust myself in, with a grave and magnific carriage, amongst all their troops and companies, without being discovered. The devil would not be able to peck me out with all his circumventions, for I am of the race of Zopyrus."

“And I,” said Epistemon, “know all the plots and stratagems of the valiant captains and warlike champions of former ages, together with all the tricks and subtleties of the art of war. I will go, and, though I be detected and revealed, I will escape, by making them believe of you whatever I please, for I am of the race of Sinon.”

“I,” said Eusthenes, “will enter and set upon them in their trenches, in spite of their sentries and all their guards; for I will tread upon their bellies, and break their legs and arms, yea, though they were every bit as strong as the devil himself, for I am of the race of Hercules.”

“And I,” said Carpalian, “will get in there if the birds can enter, for I am so nimble of body, and light withal, that I shall have leaped over their trenches, and ran clean through all their camp, before that they perceive me; neither do I fear shot, nor arrow, nor horse, how swift soever, were he the Pegasus of Perseus or Pacolet, being assured that I shall be able to make a safe and sound escape before them all, without any hurt. I will undertake to walk upon the ears of corn, or grass in the meadows, without making either of them do so much as bow under me, for I am of the race of Camilla the Amazon.”

CHAPTER XXV.

How Panurge, Carpalim, Eusthenes, and Epistemon, the Gentlemen Attendants of Pantagrue, vanquished and discomfited Six hundred and threescore Horsemen very cunningly.

As he was speaking this, they perceived six hundred and threescore light horsemen, gallantly mounted, who made an outride thither, to see what ship it was that was newly arrived in the harbour, and came in a full gallop to take them if they had been able. Then said Pantagrue, “My lads, retire yourselves into the ship, here are some of our enemies coming apace, but I will kill them here before you like beasts, although they were ten times so many; in the meantime, withdraw yourselves, and take your sport at it.” Then answered Panurge, “No, sir, there is no reason that you should do so, but, on the contrary, retire you unto the ship, both you and the rest, for I will alone here discomfit them; but we must not linger, come, set forward.” Whereunto the others said, “It is well advised, sir; withdraw yourself, and we will help Panurge here, so shall you know what we are able to do.” Then said Pantagrue, “Well, I am content, but, if that you be too weak, I will not fail to come to your assistance." With this Panurge took two great cables of the ship, and tied them to the kempstock or capstan, which was on the deck towards the hatches, and fastened them in the ground, making a long circuit, the one further off, the other within that. Then said he to Epistemon, "Go aboard the ship, and, when I give you a call, turn about the capstan upon the orlop diligently, drawing unto you the two cable ropes;" and said to Eusthenes and to Carpalim, "My bullies, stay you here, and offer yourselves freely to your enemies. Do as they bid you, and make as if you would yield unto them, but take heed that you come not within the compass of the ropes; be sure to keep yourselves free of them." And presently he went aboard the ship, and took a bundle of straw, and a barrel of gunpowder, strewed it round about the compass of the cords, and stood by with a brand of fire or match lighted in his hand. Presently came the horsemen with great fury, and the foremost ran almost home to the ship, and, by reason of the slipperiness of the bank, they fell, they and their horses, to the number of four and forty; which the rest seeing, came on, thinking that resistance had been made them at their arrival. But Panurge said unto them, "My masters, I believe that you have hurt yourselves; I pray you pardon us, for it is not our fault, but the slipperiness of the sea-water, that is always unctuous; we submit ourselves to your good pleasure." So said likewise his two other fellows, and Epistemon, that was upon the deck. In the meantime Panurge withdrew himself, and seeing that they were all within the compass of the cables, and that his two companions were retired, making room for all those horses which came in a crowd, thronging upon the neck of one another to see the ship; and such as were in it cried out on a sudden to Epistemon, "Draw, draw." Then began Epistemon to wind about the capstan, by doing whereof the two cables so entangled and impestered the legs of the horses, that they were all of them thrown down to the ground easily, together with their riders. But they seeing that, drew their swords, and would have cut them; whereupon Panurge set fire to the train, and there burnt them all up like damned souls, both men and horses, not one escaping save one alone, who being mounted on a fleet Turkey courser, by mere speed in flight, got himself out of the circle of the ropes. But when Carpalim perceived him, he ran after him with such nimbleness and celerity that he overtook him in less than a hundred paces; then leaping close behind him upon the crupper of his horse, clasped him in his arms, and brought him back to the ship.

This exploit being ended, Pantagruel was very jovial, and wondrously commended the industry of these gentlemen, whom he called his fellow-soldiers, and made them refresh themselves, and feed well and merrily upon the seashore, and drink heartily with their bellies upon the ground, and their prisoner with them, whom they admitted to that familiarity; only that the poor devil was somewhat afraid that Pantagruel would have eaten him up whole, which, considering the wideness of his mouth, and capacity of his throat, was no great matter for him to have done; for he could have done it as easily as you would eat a small comfit, he showing no more in his throat than would a grain of millet seed in the mouth of an ass.

CHAPTER XXVI.

How Pantagruel and His Company were weary in eating still Salt Meats; and how Carpalim went a hunting to have some Venison.

THUS, as they talked and chatted together, Carpalim said, "And by the bell of Saint Quenet, shall we never eat any venison? This salt meat makes me horribly dry. I will go and fetch you a quarter of one of those horses which we have burned; it is well roasted already." As he was rising up to go about it, he perceived under the side of a wood a fair, great roe-buck, which came out of his fort, as I conceive, at the sight of Panurge's fire. Him did he pursue and run after with as much vigour and swiftness as if it had been a bolt out of a cross-bow, and caught him in a moment; and whilst he was in his course, he with his hands took in the air four great bustards, seven bitterns, six and twenty grey partridges, two and thirty red-legged ones, sixteen pheasants, nine woodcocks, nineteen herons, two and thirty cushats and ring-doves; and with his feet killed ten or twelve leverets and rabbits, which were then at relief, and pretty big withal; eighteen rails in a knot together, with fifteen young wild boars, two little beavers, and three great foxes. So, striking the kid with his falchion athwart the head, he killed him, and, bearing him on his back, he in his return took up his hares, rails, and young wild boars, and, as far off as he could be heard, cried out and said, "Panurge, my friend, vinegar, vinegar!" Then the good Pantagruel, thinking he had fainted, commanded them to provide him some vinegar; but Panurge knew well that there was some good prey in hands, and forthwith showed unto noble Pantagruel how he was bearing upon his back a fair roe-buck, and all his girdle bordered with hares. Then immediately did Epistemon make, in the name of the nine muses, nine antique wooden spits; Eusthenes did help to flay, and Panurge placed two great cuir-assier saddles, in such sort that they served for andirons, and, making their prisoner to be their cook, they roasted their venison by the fire wherein the horsemen were burned; and, making great cheer with a good deal of vinegar, the devil a one of them did forbear from his victuals—it was a triumphant and incomparable spectacle to see how they ravened and devoured. Then said Pantagrue, “Would to God every one of you had two pairs of little anthem or sacring bells hanging at your chin, and that I had at mine the great clocks of Rennes, of Poitiers, of Tours, and of Cambray, to see what a peal they would ring with the wagging of our chaps.” “But,” said Panurge, “it were better we thought a little upon our business, and by what means we might get the upper hand of our enemies.” “That is well remembered,” said Pantagrue. Therefore spoke he thus to the prisoner, “My friend, tell us here the truth, and do not lie to us at all, if thou wouldest not be flayed alive, for it is I that eat the little children. Relate unto us at full the order, the number and the strength of the army.” To which the prisoner answered, “Sir, know for a truth that in the army there are three hundred giants, all armed with armour of proof, and wonderful great; nevertheless, not fully so great as you, except one that is their head, named Loupgarou, who is armed from head to foot with cycloplal anvils. Furthermore, one hundred threescore and three thousand foot, all armed with the skins of hobgoblins, strong and valiant men; eleven thousand four hundred men at arms or cuirassiers; three thousand six hundred double cannons, and arquebusiers without number; fourscore and fourteen thousand pioneers; one hundred and fifty thousand whores, fair like goddesses—(“That is for me,” said Panurge)—whereof some are Amazons, some Lionnoises, others Parisiennes, Taurangelles, Angevines, Poictevines, Normands, and High Dutch—there are of them of all countries and all languages.”

“Yea, but,” said Pantagrue, “is the king there?” “Yes, sir,” said the prisoner; “he is there in person, and we call him Anarchus, King of the Dipsodes, which is as much as to say thirsty people, for you never saw men more thirsty, nor more willing to drink; and his tent is guarded by the giants.” It is enough,” said Pantagrue. “Come, brave boys, are you resolved to go with me?” To which Panurge answered, “God confound him that leaves you! I have already bethought myself how I will kill them all like pigs, and so that the devil one leg of them shall escape.* But I am somewhat troubled about one thing.” “And what is that?” said Pantagrue. “It is,” said Panurge, “how I shall be able to set forward to the justling and brag-mardising of all the whores that be there this afternoon, in such sort that there escape not one unbumped by me, breasted and jummed after the ordinary fashion of man and woman in the Venetian conflict." "Ha, ha, ha," said Pantagruel.

And Carpalim said, "The devil take these sink-holes if, by God, I do not bumbast some one of them." Then said Eusthenes, "What, shall not I have any, whose spaces, since we came from Rouen, were never so well wound up, as that my needle could mount to ten or eleven o'clock, till now that I have it hard, stiff, and strong, like a hundred devils?" "Truly," said Panurge, "thou shalt have of the fattest, and of those that are most plump and in the best case."

"How now," said Epistemon, "every one shall ride, and I must lead the ass? The devil take him that will do so! We will make use of the right of war, Qui potest capere, capiat." "No, no," said Panurge, "but tie thine ass to a crook, and ride as the world doth." And the good Pantagruel laughed at all this, and said unto them, "You reckon without your host. I am much afraid that, before it be night, I shall see you in such taking that you will have no great stomach to ride, but more like to be rode upon with sound blows of pike and lance." "Baste," said Epistemon, "enough of that! I will not fail to bring them to you, either to roast or boil, to fry or put in paste. They are not so many in number as were in the army of Xerxes, for he had thirty hundred thousand fighting men, if you will believe Herodotus and Trogus Pompeius, and yet Themistocles with a few men overthrew them all. For God's sake, take you no care for that." "Cobsminky, cobsminky," said Panurge, "my codpiece alone shall suffice to overthrow all the men; and my Saint Sweep-hole, that dwells within it, shall lay all the women squat upon their backs. Up then, my lads," said Pantagruel, "and let us march along."

CHAPTER XXVII.

How Pantagruel set up one Trophy in Memorial of their Valour, and Panurge another in Remembrance of the Hares; how Pantagruel likewise with His Farts begat Little Men, and with His Fisks Little Women; and how Panurge broke a Great Staff over Two Glasses.

"BEFORE we depart hence," said Pantagruel, "in remembrance of the exploit that you have now performed, I will in this place erect a fair trophy." Then every man amongst them, with a fair joy, and fine little country songs, set up a huge big post, whereunto they hanged a great cuirassier saddle, the fronstal of a barbed horse, bridle-bosses, bully-pieces for the knees, stirrup-leathers, spurs, stirrups, a coat of mail, a corslet tempered with steel, a battle-axe, a strong, short, and sharp horseman's sword, a gauntlet, a horseman's mace, gusset-armour for the arm-pits, leg-harness, and a gorget, with all other furniture needful for the decoration of a triumphant arch, in sign of a trophy. And then Pantagruel, for an eternal memorial, wrote this victorial Ditton, as followeth:—

“ Here was the prowess made apparent of Four brave and valiant champions of proof,
Who, without any arms but wit, at once,
Like Fabius, or the two Scipions,
Burnt in a fire six hundred and threescore
Crablice, strong rogues ne'er vanquished before.
By this each King may learn, Rook, Pawn, and Knight,
That slight is much more prevalent than might.

For Victory,
As all men see,
Hangs on the ditty
Of that committee,
Where the great God
Hath his abode.

“ Nor doth he to it strong and great men give,
But to his elect, as we must believe ;
Therefore shall he obtain wealth and esteem
Who through faith doth put his trust in him.”

Whilst Pantagruel was writing these foresaid verses, Panurge halved and fixed upon a great stake the horns of a roe-buck, together with the skin and the right forefoot thereof,* the ears of three leverets, the chine of a cony, the jaws of a hare, the wings of two bustards, the feet of four quest-doves, a bottle or borracho full of vinegar, a horn wherein to put salt, a wooden spit, a larding stick, a scurvy kettle full of holes, a dripping pan to make sauce in, an earthen salt-cellar, and a goblet of Beauvois.* Then in imitation of Pantagruel's verses and trophy, wrote that which followeth:—

* The right forefoot thereof. It should be the two forelegs thereof, for that is the true construction of “les pieds droitz du vant du chevreuil.” To prove which, thus says M. Duchat: “Droit, from the Latin directus, does not here signify the dexter of the Latins, but the rectilinear figure of the foot conjoined with, and holding by, the leg of that creature.” “Et leurs pieds estoient pieds droits,” and their feet were straight feet, we read in Ezekiel's vision, ch. 1, v. 7, upon which word Calvin has this note: “Quantum attinet ad rectitudinem, ego refero non tantum ad pedes, sed ad ipsa crura. Perinde est igitur ac si dixisset (propheta) stetisse animalia illa quemadmodum solent homines” In which he has been followed by Mess. des Marais. Pedes recti, says the Latin Bible in that place, which means their legs stood upright like a man's when he is standing. One of these forelegs of a stag that's killed in hunting is always in France presented to the chief man of the company.

“ Here four brave toppers sitting on their bums,
 With flagons, nobler noise than drums,
 Carous'd it, bous'd it, toss'd the liquor,
 Each seem'd a Bacchus-priest, or vicar:
 Hares, coneys, bustards, pigs were brought 'em,
 With jugs and pipkins strew'd about 'em;
 For trophy-spoils to each good fellow,
 That is hereafter to be mellow.

In every creed,
 'Tis on all hands agreed,
 And plainly confessed;
 When the weather is hot,
 That we stick to the pot,
 And drink o' the best.

“ First note, that in your bill of fare,
 Sauce be provided for the rare.
 But vinegar the most extol;
 'Tis of an hare the very soul.”

Then said Pantagruel, “Come, my lads, let us be gone, we have stayed here too long about our victuals; for very seldom doth it fall out that the greatest eaters do the most martial exploits. There is no shadow like that of flying colours, no smoke like that of horses, no clattering like that of armour.” At this Epistemon began to smile, and said, “There is no shadow like that of the kitchen, no smoke like that of pasties, and no clattering like that of goblets.” Unto which answered Panurge, “There is no shadow like that of curtains, no smoke like that of women's breasts, and no clattering like that of ballocks.” Then forthwith rising up, he gave a fart, a leap, and a whistle, and most joyfully cried out aloud, “Ever live Pantagruel!” When Pantagruel saw that, he would have done as much; but with the fart that he let, the earth trembled nine leagues about, wherewith and with the corrupted air he begot above three and fifty thousand little men, ill-favoured dwarfs, and with one fig that he let, he made as many little women, crouching down, as you shall see in divers places, which never grow but like cows' tails, downwards, or, like the Limosin radishes, round. “How now,” said Panurge, “are your farts so fertile and fruitful? By God, here be brave farted men and figued women, let them be married together, they will beget fine hornets and dorflies." So did Pantagrue, and called them pigmies. Those he sent to live in an island thereby, where since that time they are increased mightily. But the cranes make war with them continually, against which they do most courageously defend themselves; for these little ends of men and dandiprats (whom in Scotland they call whiphandles and knots of a tar-barrel) are commonly very testy and choleric: the physical reason whereof is, because their heart is near their turd.

At this same time Panurge took two drinking-glasses that were there, both of one bigness, and filled them with water up to the brim, and set one of them upon one stool, and the other upon another, placing them about five feet from one another. Then he took the staff of a javelin, about five feet and a-half long, and put it upon the two glasses, so that the two ends of the staff did come just to the brims of the glasses. This done, he took a great stake or billet of wood, and said to Pantagrue and to the rest, "My masters, behold how easily we shall have the victory over our enemies; for, just as I shall break this staff here upon these glasses, without either breaking or crazing of them, nay, which is more, without spilling one drop of the water that is within them, even so shall we break the heads of our Dipsodes, without receiving any of us any wound or loss in our person or goods. But, that you may not think there is any witchcraft in this, hold," said he to Eusthenes, "strike upon the midst as hard as thou canst with this log." Eusthenes did so, and the staff broke in two pieces, and not one drop of water fell out of the glasses. "Then," said he, "I know a great many such other tricks, let us now therefore march boldly and with assurance."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

How Pantagrue got the Victory very strangely over the Dipsodes and the Giants.

AFTER all this talk, Pantagrue took the prisoner to him, and sent him away, saying, "Go thou unto thy king in his camp, and tell him tidings of what thou hast seen, and let him resolve to feast me to-morrow about noon; for as soon as my galleys shall come, which will be to-morrow at furthest, I will prove unto him, by eighteen hundred thousand fighting men and seven thousand giants, all of them greater than I am, that he hath done foolishly, and against reason, thus to invade my country." Wherein Pantagrue feigned that he had an army at sea. But the prisoner answered that he would yield himself to be his slave, and that he was content never to return to his own people, but rather with Pantagruel to fight against them, and for God's sake besought him that he might be permitted so to do. Whereunto Pantagruel would not give consent, but commanded him to depart thence speedily and begone, as he had told him, and to that effect gave him a box full of euphorbium, together with some grains of the black cameleon thistle, steeped into aqua vitæ, and made up into the condiment of a wet sucket, commanding him to carry it to his king, and say unto him, that if he were able to eat one ounce of that without drinking after it, he might then be able to resist him without any fear or apprehension of danger.

The prisoner then besought him with joined hands that in the hour of the battle he would have compassion upon him. Whereat Pantagruel said unto him, "After that thou hast delivered all unto the king, put thy whole confidence in God, and he will not forsake thee; because, although for my part I be mighty, as thou mayest see, and have an infinite number of men in arms, I do nevertheless trust neither in my force nor in mine industry, but all my confidence is in God my protector, who doth never forsake those that in him do put their trust and confidence." This done, the prisoner requested him that he would be contented with some reasonable composition for his ransom. To which Pantagruel answered, that his end was not to rob nor ransom men, but to enrich them, and reduce them to total liberty. "Go thy way," said he, "in the peace of the living God, and never follow evil company, lest some mischief befall thee." The prisoner being gone, Pantagruel said to his men, "Gentlemen, I have made this prisoner believe that we have an army at sea, as also that we will not assault them till to-morrow at noon, to the end that they, doubting of the great arrival of our men, may spend this night in providing and strengthening themselves, but in the meantime my intention is, that we charge them about the hour of the first sleep."

Let us leave Pantagruel here with his apostles, and speak of King Anarchus and his army. When the prisoner was come, he went unto the king, and told him how there was a great giant come, called Pantagruel, who had overthrown, and made to be cruelly roasted, all the six hundred and nine and fifty horsemen, and he alone escaped to bring the news. Besides that, he was charged by the said giant to tell him that the next day, about noon, he must make a dinner ready for him, for at that hour he was resolved to set upon him. Then did he give him that box wherein were those comfitures. But, as soon as he had swallowed down one spoonful of them, he was taken with such a heat in the throat, together with an ulceration in the flap of the top of the windpipe, that his tongue peeled with it, in such sort that, for all they could do unto him, he found no ease at all but by drinking only without cessation; for as soon as ever he took the goblet from his head, his tongue was on fire, and therefore they did nothing but still pour in wine into his throat with a funnel. Which when his captains, bashaws, and guard of his body did see, they tasted of the same drugs, to try whether they were so thirst-procuring and alterative or no. But it so befell them as it had done their king, and they plied the flagon so well that the noise ran throughout all the camp how the prisoner was returned; that the next day they were to have an assault; that the king and his captains did already prepare themselves for it, together with his guards, and that with carousing lustily and quaffing as hard as they could. Every man, therefore, in the army began to tittle, ply the pot, swill, and guzzle it as fast as they could. In sum, they drunk so much, and so long, that they fell asleep like pigs, all out of order, throughout the whole camp.

Let us now return to the good Pantagrue, and relate how he carried himself in this business. Departing from the place of the trophies, he took the mast of their ship in his hand like a pilgrim's staff, and put within the top of it two hundred and seven and thirty puncheons of white wine of Anjou, the rest was of Rouen, and tied up to his girdle the bark all full of salt, as easily as the Lanskennets carry their little panniers, and so set onward on his way with his fellow-soldiers. When he was come near to the enemies' camp, Panurge said unto him, "Sir, if you would do well, let down this white wine of Anjou from the scuttle of the mast of the ship, that we may all drink thereof, like Bretons."

Hereunto Pantagrue very willingly consented, and they drank so neat that there was not so much as one poor drop left of two hundred and seven and thirty puncheons, except one borracho or leathern bottle of Tours, which Panurge filled for himself, for he called that his vade mecum, and some scurvy lees of wine in the bottom, which served him instead of vinegar. After they had whittled and curried the can pretty handsomely, Panurge gave Pantagrue to eat some devilish drugs, compounded of lithotripton, which is a stone-dissolving ingredient, nephrocatacticon, that purgeth the reins, the marmalade of quinces, called codiniac, a confection of cantharides, which are green flies breeding on the tops of olive-trees, and other kinds of diuretic or piss-procuring simples. This done, Pantagrue said to Carpallim, "Go into the city, scrambling like a cat up against the wall, as you can well do, and tell them that now presently they come out and charge their enemies as rudely as they can, and, having said so, come down, taking a lighted torch with you, wherewith you shall set on fire all the tents and pavilions in the camp, then cry as loud as you are able with your great voice, and then come away from thence." "Yea, but," said Carpalim, "were it not good to cloy all their ordnance?" "No, no," said Pantagruel, "only blow up all their powder." Carpalim, obeying him, departed suddenly, and did as he was appointed by Pantagruel, and all the combatants came forth that were in the city, and, when he had set fire in the tents and pavilions, he passed so lightly through them, and so highly and profoundly did they snort and sleep, that they never perceived him. He came to the place where there artillery was, and set their munition on fire. But here was the danger. The fire was so sudden that poor Carpalim had almost been burnt; and had it not been for his wonderful agility, he had been fried like a roasting-pig. But he departed away so speedily that a bolt or arrow out of a cross-bow could not have had a swifter motion. When he was clear of their trenches, he shouted aloud, and cried out so dreadfully, and with such amazement to the hearers, that it seemed all the devils of hell had been let loose. At which noise the enemies awaked, but can you tell how? Even no less astonished than are monks at the ringing of the first peal to matins, which in Lussonois is called rub-ballock.

In the meantime Pantagruel began to sow the salt that he had in his bark, and, because they slept with an open gaping mouth, he filled all their throats with it, so that these poor wretches were by it made to cough like foxes, crying, "Ha, Pantagruel, how thou addest greater heat to the fire-brand that is in us!" Suddenly Pantagruel had will to piss, by means of the drugs which Panurge had given him, and pissed amidst the camp so well and so copiously that he drowned them all, and there was a particular deluge, ten leagues round about, of such considerable depth that the history saith, if his father's great mare had been there, and pissed likewise, it would undoubtedly have been a more enormous deluge than that of Deucalion; for she did never piss but she made a river greater than is either the Rhone or the Danube. Which those that were come out of the city seeing, said, "They are all cruelly slain; see how the blood runs along." But they were deceived in thinking Pantagruel's urine had been the blood of their enemies; for they could not see but by the light of the fire of the pavilions and some small light of the moon.

The enemies, after that they were awaked, seeing on one side the fire in the camp, and on the other the inundation of the urinal deluge, could not tell what to say, nor what to think. Some said that it was the end of the world, and the final judgment, which ought to be by fire. Others again thought that the sea-gods, Neptune, Proteus, Triton, and the rest of them, did persecute them, for that indeed they found it to be like seawater and salt.

Oh, who were able now condignly to relate how Pantagruel did demean himself against the three hundred giants! Oh, my Muse, my Calliope, my Thalia, inspire me at this time, restore unto me my spirits; for this is the logical bridge of asses! Here is the pitfall, here is the difficulty, to have ability enough to express the horrible battle that was fought. Ah, would to God that I had now a bottle of the best wine that ever those drank who shall read this so veridical history.

CHAPTER XXIX.

How Pantagruel discomfited the Three Hundred Giants armed with Freestone, and Loupgarou their Captain.

THE giants seeing all their camp drowned, carried away their King Anarchus upon their backs as well as they could, out of the fort, as Æneas did his father Anchises, in the time of the conflagration of Troy. When Panurge perceived them, he said to Pantagruel, "Sir, yonder are the giants coming forth against you, lay on them with your mast gallantly like an old fencer; for now is the time that you must show yourself a brave man and an honest. And for our part we will not fail you. I myself will kill to you a good many boldly enough; for why, David killed Goliath very easily, and then this great lecher Eusthenes, who is stronger than four oxen, will not spare himself. Be of good courage, therefore, and valiant; charge amongst them with point and edge, and by all manner of means." "Well," said Pantagruel, "of courage I have more than for fifty francs, but let us be wise, for Hercules first never undertook against two." "That is well cacked, well scummered," said Panurge; "do you compare yourself with Hercules? You have, by God, more strength in your teeth, and more scent in your bum, than ever Hercules had in all his body and soul. So much is a man worth as he esteems himself." Whilst they spake these words, behold Loupgarou was come with all his giants, who, seeing Pantagruel in a manner alone, was carried away with temerity and presumption for hopes that he had to kill the good man. Whereupon he said to his companions the giants, "You wenchers of the low country,* by Mahoom,† if any of you undertake to fight against * You wenchers of the low country, etc. In contradistinction to the gentry and nobility, who live in strong buildings situated on high places.

† By Mahoom. By Mahomet. This oath, which in our old romances is used by the Saracens, is still very frequent in the mouths of the Languedocians, in things which they would not be understood to affirm seriously.

these men here, I will put you cruelly to death. It is my will that you let me fight single. In the meantime you shall have good sport to look upon us."

Then all the other giants retired with their king to the place where the flagons stood, and Panurge, and his comrades with them, who counterfeited those that have had the pox, for he writhed about his mouth, shrunk up his fingers, and with a harsh and hoarse voice said unto them, "I forsake—od, fellow-soldiers, if I would have it to be believed that we make any war at all. Give us somewhat to eat with you, while our masters fight against one another." To this the king and giants jointly condescended, and accordingly made them to banquet with them. In the meantime Panurge told them the follies of Turpin, the examples of Saint Nicholas,* and the tale of a tub. Loupgarou then set forward towards Pantagrue, with a mace all of steel, and that of the best sort, weighing nine thousand seven hundred quintals, and two quarterons, at the end whereof were thirteen pointed diamonds, the least whereof was as big as the greatest bell of our Lady's church at Paris—there might want, perhaps, the thickness of a nail, or at most, that I may not lie, of the back of those knives which they call cut-lugs or ear-cutters, but for a little off or on, more or less, it is no matter—and it was enchanted in such sort that it could never break, but, contrarily, all that it did touch did break immediately. Thus, then, as he approached with great fierceness and pride of heart, Pantagrue, casting up his eyes to heaven, recommended himself to God with all his soul, making such a vow as follows:—

"Oh, thou Lord God, who hast always been my protector and my Saviour, thou seest the distress wherein I am at this time. Nothing brings me hither but a natural zeal, which thou hast permitted unto mortals, to keep and defend themselves, their wives and children, country and family, in case thy own proper cause were not in question, which is the faith; for in such a business thou wilt have no coadjutors, only a catholic confession and service of thy word, and hast forbidden us all arming and defence. For thou art the Almighty, who in thine own cause, and where thine own business is taken in hand, canst defend it far beyond all that we can conceive, thou who hast thousand thousands of hundreds of millions of legions of angels, the least of which is able to kill all mortal men, and turn about the heavens and earth at his pleasure, as heretofore it very plainly appeared in the army of Sennacherib. If it may please thee, therefore, at this time to assist me, as my whole trust and confidence is in thee alone, I vow unto thee, that in all countries whatsoever wherein I shall have any power or authority, whether in this of Utopia or elsewhere, I will cause thy holy gospel to be purely, simply, and entirely preached, so that the abuses of a rabble of hypocrites and false prophets, who by human constitutions and depraved inventions have impoisoned all the world, shall be quite exterminated from about me."

This vow was no sooner made, but there was heard a voice from heaven, saying, Hoc fac et vinces: that is to say, "Do this, and thou shalt overcome." Then Pantagruel seeing that Loup-garou, with his mouth wide open, was drawing near to him, went against him boldly, and cried out as loud as he was able, "Thou diest, villain,* thou diest!" purposing by his horrible cry to make him afraid, according to the discipline of the Lacedæmonians. Withal he immediately cast at him out of his bark, which he wore at his girdle, eighteen cags and four bushels of salt, wherewith he filled both his mouth, throat, nose, and eyes. At this Loup-garou was so highly incensed that, most fiercely setting upon him, he thought even then with a blow of his mace to have beat out his brains. But Pantagruel was very nimble, and had always a quick foot and a quick eye, and, therefore, with his left foot did he step back one pace, yet not so nimbly but that the blow, falling upon the bark, broke it in four thousand four score and six pieces, and threw all the rest of the salt about the ground. Pantagruel, seeing that, most gallantly displayed the vigour of his arms, and according to the art of the axe, gave him with the great end of his mast a home-thrust a little above the breast; then, bringing along the blow to the left side, with a slash struck him between the neck and shoulders. After that, advancing his right foot, he gave him a push upon the couillons with the upper end of his said mast, wherewith breaking the scuttle on the top thereof, he spilt three or four puncheons of wine that were left therein.

Upon that Loup-garou thought that he had pierced his bladder, and that the wine that came forth had been his urine. Pantagruel, being not content with this, would have doubled it by a side-blow; but Loup-garou, lifting up his mace, advanced one step upon him, and with all his force would have dashed it upon Pantagruel, wherein, to speak the truth, he so sprightly carried himself that, if God had not succoured the good Pantagruel, he had been cloven from the top of his head to the bottom of his milt. But the blow glanced to the right side, by the brisk nimbleness of Pantagruel, and his mace sank into the ground above threescore and thirteen feet, through a huge rock, out of which the fire did issue greater than nine thousand and six tons. Pantagruel, seeing him busy about plucking out his mace, which stuck in the ground between the rocks, ran upon him, and would have clean cut off his head, if by mischance his mast had not touched a little against the stock of Loupgarou's mace, which was enchanted, as we have said before. By this means his mast broke off about three handfuls above his hand, whereat he stood amazed like a bell-founder, and cried out, "Ah, Panurge, where art thou?" Panurge, seeing that, said to the king and the giants, "By God, they will hurt one another if they be not parted." But the giants were as merry as if they had been at a wedding. Then Carpalim would have risen from thence to help his master; but one of the giants said unto him, "By Golfarin, the nephew of Mahoom, if thou stir hence, I will put thee in the bottom of my breeches instead of a suppository, which cannot choose but do me good. For in my belly I am very costive, and cannot well cagar without gnashing my teeth and making many filthy faces." Then Pantagruel, thus destitute of a staff, took up the end of his mast, striking athwart and alongst upon the giant, but he did him no more hurt than you would do with a fillip upon a smith's anvil. In the meantime Loupgarou was drawing his mace out of the ground, and, having already plucked it out, was ready therewith to have struck Pantagruel, who being very quick in turning, avoided all his blows, in taking only the defensive part in hand, until on a sudden he saw that Loupgarou did threaten him with these words, saying, "Now, villain, will not I fail to chop thee as small as minced meat, and keep thee henceforth from ever making any more poor men athirst!" Then, without any more ado, Pantagruel struck him such a blow with his foot against the belly that he made him fall backwards, his heels over his head, and dragged him thus along at flay-buttock above a flight-shot. Then Loupgarou cried out, bleeding at the throat, "Mahoom, Mahoom, Mahoom," at which noise all the giants arose to succour him. But Panurge said unto them, "Gentlemen, do not go, if you will believe me; for our master is mad, and strikes athwart and alongst, he cares not where; he will do you a mischief." But the giants made no account of it, seeing that Pantagruel had never a staff.

And when Pantagruel saw those giants approach very near unto him, he took Loupgarou by the two feet, and lifted up his body like a pike in the air, wherewith, it being harnished with anvils, he laid such heavy load amongst those giants armed with freestone, that, striking them down as a mason doth little knobs of stones, there was not one of them that stood before him whom he threw not flat to the ground. And by the breaking of this stony armour there was made such a horrible rumble as put me in mind of the butter-tower of Saint Stephen's at Bourges when it melted before the sun. Panurge, with Carpalim and Eusthenes, did cut in the meantime the throats of those that were struck down, in such sort that there escaped not one. Pantagrue, to any man's sight, was like a mower, who with his scythe, which was Loupgarou, cut down the meadow-grass, to wit, the giants; but, with this fencing of Pantagrue's, Loupgarou lost his head, which happened when Pantagrue struck down one whose name was Riflandouille or Pudding-plunderer, who was armed cap-à-pie with Grison stones, one chip whereof splintering abroad cut off Epistemon's neck clean and fair. For otherwise the most part of them were but lightly armed with a kind of sandy brittle stone, and the rest with slates. At last, when he saw that they were all dead, he threw the body of Loupgarou, as hard as he could, against the city, where falling like a frog upon his belly, in the great piazza thereof, he with the said fall killed a singed he-cat, a wet she-cat, a farting duck, and a bridled goose.

CHAPTER XXX.

How Epistemon, who had his Head cut off, was finely healed by Panurge, and of the News which He brought from the Devils, and of the Damned People in Hell.

THIS gigantal victory being ended, Pantagrue withdrew himself to the place of the flagons, and called for Panurge and the rest, who came unto him safe and sound, except Eusthenes, whom one of the giants had scratched a little in the face whilst he was about the cutting of his throat, and Epistemon, who appeared not at all. Whereat Pantagrue was so aggrieved that he would have killed himself. But Panurge said unto him, "Nay, sir, stay a while, and we will search for him amongst the dead, and find out the truth of all." Thus, as they went seeking after him, they found him stark dead, with his head between his arms, all bloody. Then Eusthenes cried out, "Ah, cruel death! hast thou taken from me the perfectest amongst men?" At which words Pantagrue rose up with the greatest grief that ever any man did see, and said to Panurge, "Ha, my friend, the prophesy of your two glasses and the javelin staff was a great deal too deceitful." But Panurge answered, "My dear bullies all, weep not one drop more, for, he being yet all hot, I will make him as sound as ever he was." In saying this, he took the head and held it warm foreagainst his codpiece, that the wind might not enter into it. Eusthenes and Carpalim carried the body to the place where they had banqueted, not out of any hope that ever he would recover, but that Pantagrue might see it.

Nevertheless Panurge gave him very good comfort, saying, "If I do not heal him, I will be content to lose my head, which is a fool's wager. Leave off, therefore, crying, and help me." Then cleansed he his neck very well with pure white wine, and, after that, took his head, and into it synapised some powder of diamerdis, which he always carried about him in one of his bags. Afterwards he anointed it with I know not what ointment, and set it on very just, vein against vein, sinew against sinew, and spondyl against spondyl, that he might not be wry-necked—for such people he mortally hated. This done, he gave it round about some fifteen or sixteen stitches with a needle, that it might not fall off again, then on all sides, and everywhere, he put a little ointment on it, which he called resuscitative.

Suddenly Epistemon began to breathe, then opened his eyes, yawned, sneezed, and afterwards let a great household fart. Whereupon Panurge said, "Now, certainly, he is healed," and therefore gave him to drink a large full glass of strong white wine, with a sugared toast. In this fashion was Epistemon finely healed, only that he was somewhat hoarse for above three weeks together, and had a dry cough of which he could not be rid but by the force of continual drinking. And now he began to speak, and said that he had seen the devil, had spoken with Lucifer familiarly, and had been very merry in hell, and in the Elysian fields, affirming very seriously before them all that the devils were boon companions and merry fellows. But, in respect of the damned, he said he was very sorry that Panurge had so soon called him back into this world again; for, said he, "I took wonderful delight to see them." "How so?" said Pantagruel. "Because they do not use them there," said Epistemon, "so badly as you think they do. Their estate and condition of living is but only changed after a very strange manner; for I saw Alexander the Great there, mending and patching on clouts upon old breeches and stockings, and thus got a very poor living.

Xerxes was a crier of mustard.

Romulus, a salter and patcher of pattens.

Numa, a nailsmith.

Tarquin, a porter.

Piso, a clownish swain.

Sylla, a ferryman.

Cyrus, a cowherd.

Themistocles, a glass maker.

Epaminondas, a maker of mirrors or looking-glasses.

Brutus and Cassius, surveyors or measurers of land.

Demosthenes, a vine dresser.

Cicero, a fire kindler.

Fabius, a threader of beads.

Artaxerxes, a rope maker.

Æneas, a miller.

Achilles was a scald-pated maker of hay bundles.

Agamemnon, a lick-box.

Ulysses, a hay mower.

Nestor, a deer keeper or forester.

Darius, a gold finder, or jakes farmer.

Ancus Martius, a ship trimmer.

Camillus, a foot post.

Marcellus, a sheller of beans.

Drusus, a taker of money at the doors of playhouses.

Scipio Africanus, a crier of lee in a wooden slipper.

Asdrubal, a lantern maker.

Hannibal, a kettle maker and seller of egg-shells.

Priamus, a seller of old clouts.

Lancelot of the Lake was a flayer of dead horses.

All the Knights of the Round Table were poor day-labourers, employed to row over the rivers of Cocytus, Phlegeton, Styx, Acheron, and Lethe, when my lords the devils had a mind to recreate themselves upon the water, as in the like occasion are hired the boatmen at Lyons, the gondoliers of Venice, and oars of London. But with this difference, that these poor knights have only for their fare a bob or flirt on the nose, and, in the evening, a morsel of coarse mouldy bread.

Trajan was fisher of frogs.

Antoninus, a lackey.

Commodus, a bagpiper.

Pertinax, a peeler of walnuts.

Lucullus, a maker of rattles and hawks' bells.

Justinian, a pedlar.

Hector, a snap-sauce scullion.

Paris was a poor beggar.

Cambyses, a mule driver.

Nero, a base, blind fiddler, or player on that instrument which is called a windbroach. Fierabras was his serving-man, who did him a thousand mischievous tricks, and would make him eat of the brown bread, and drink of the turned wine, when himself did both eat and drink of the best.

Julius Cæsar and Pompey were boatwrights and tighters of ships.

Valentine and Orson did serve in the stoves of hell, and were sweat-rubbers in hot houses.

Giglan and Gawain were poor swineherds.

Geoffrey with the great tooth was a tinder maker and seller of matches.

Godfrey de Bullion, a hood maker.

Jason was a bracelet maker.

Don Pietro de Castille, a carrier of indulgences.

Morgante, a beer brewer.

Huon of Bordeaux, a hooper of barrels.

Pyrrhus, a kitchen scullion.

Antiochus, a chimney sweeper.

Octavian, a scraper of parchment.

Nerva, a mariner.

Pope Julius was a crier of pudding pies, but he left off wearing there his great buggery beard.

John of Paris was a greaser of boots.

Arthur of Britain, an ungreaser of caps.

Perce-Forest, a carrier of fagots.

Pope Boniface the Eighth, a scummer of pots.

Pope Nicholas the Third, a maker of paper.

Pope Alexander, a ratcatcher.

Pope Sixtus, an anointer of those that have the pox.

"What," said Pantagruel, "have they the pox there too?"

"Surely," said Epistemon, "I never saw so many; there are there, I think, above a hundred millions; for believe that those who have not had the pox in this world, must have it in the other."

"Cotsbody," said Panurge, "then I am free; for I have been as far as the hole of Gibraltar, reached unto the outmost bounds of Hercules, and gathered of the ripest."

"Ogier the Dane was a furbisher of armour.

The King Tigranes, a mender of thatched houses.

Galien Restored, a taker of moldwarps.

The four sons of Aymon were all tooth-drawers.

Pope Calixtus was a barber of a woman's sine quo non.

Pope Urban, a bacon picker.

Melusina was a kitchen drudge wench.

Matabrune, a laundress.

Cleopatra, a crier of onions.

Helen, a broker for chamber maids.

Semiramis, the beggars' lice killer.

Dido did sell mushrooms.

Penthesilea sold cresses.

Lucretia was an alehouse keeper.

Hortensia, a spinstress.

Livia, a grater of verdigris.

After this manner those that had been great lords and ladies here got but a poor, scurvy, wretched living there below. And, on the contrary, the philosophers and others, who in this world had been altogether indigent and wanting, were great lords there in their turn. I saw Diogenes there strut it out most pompously, and in great magnificence, with a rich purple gown on him, and a golden sceptre in his right hand. And, which is more, he would now and then make Alexander the Great mad, so enormously would he abuse him when he had not well patched his breeches; for he used to pay his skin with sound bastinadoes. I saw Epictetus there, most gallantly apparelled after the French fashion, sitting under a pleasant arbour, with store of handsome gentlewomen, frolicing, drinking, dancing, and making good cheer, with abundance of crowns of the sun. Above the lattice were written these verses for his device:—

‘To leap and dance, to sport and play,
And drink good wine, both white and brown,
Or nothing else do all the day
But tell bags full of many a crown.’

“When he saw me, he invited me to drink with him very courteously, and I being willing to be entreated, we tiddled and chopined together most theologically. In the meantime came Cyrus to beg one farthing of him for the honour of Mercury, therewith to buy a few onions for his supper. ‘No, no,’ said Epictetus, ‘I do not use in my almsgiving to bestow farthings. Hold, thou varlet, there’s a crown for thee; be an honest man.’ Cyrus was exceeding glad to have met with such a booty; but the other poor rogues, the kings that are there below, as Alexander, Darius, and others, stole it away from him by night. I saw Pathelin, the treasurer of Rhadamanthus, who, in cheapening the pudding-pies that Pope Julius cried, asked him now much a dozen. ‘Three blanks,’ said the Pope. ‘Nay,’ said Pathelin, ‘three blows with a cudgel. Lay them down here, you rascal, and go fetch more.’ The poor pope went away weeping, who, when he came to his master the pie maker, told him that they had taken away his pudding-pies. Whereupon his master gave him such a sound lash with an eel-skin that his own would have been worth nothing to make bagpipe bags of. I saw Master John le Maire there personate the pope, in such fashion that he made all the poor kings and popes of this world kiss his feet; and, taking great state upon him, gave them his benediction, saying, ‘Get the pardons, rogues, get the pardons, they are good and cheap. I absolve you of bread and pottage, and dispense with you to be never good for anything.’ Then, calling Caillet and Triboulet to him, he spake these words, ‘My orders the cardinals, despatch their bulls, to wit, to each of them a blow with a cudgel upon the reins.’ Which, accordingly, was forthwith performed. I heard Master Francis Villon ask Xerxes, ‘How much the mess of mustard?’ ‘A farthing,’ said Xerxes. To which the said Villon answered, ‘The pox take thee for a villain! As much of square-eared wheat is not worth half that price, and now thou offerest to enhance the price of victuals.’ With this he pissed in his pot, as the mustard makers of Paris used to do. I saw the trained bowman of the bathing tub, known by the name of the Franc archer de Bagnolet, who, being one of the trustees of the Inquisition, when he saw Perce-Forrest making water against a wall, on which was painted the fire of Saint Anthony, declared him heretic, and would have caused him to be burnt alive, had it not been for Morgante, who, for his proficiat and other small fees, gave him nine tuns of beer."

"Well," said Pantagruel, "reserve all these fair stories for another time, only tell us how the usurers are there handled." "I saw them," said Epistemon, "all very busily employed in seeking of rusty pins and old nails in the kennels of the streets, as you see poor wretched rogues do in this world. But the quintal or hundred-weight of this old iron ware is there valued but at the price of a cantle of bread, and yet they have but a very bad despatch and riddance in the sale of it. Thus the poor misers are sometimes three whole weeks without eating one morsel or crumb of bread, and yet work both day and night, looking for the fair to come. Nevertheless, of all this labour, toil, and misery, they reckon nothing, so cursedly active they are in the prosecution of that their base calling, in hopes, at the end of the year, to earn some scurvy penny by it."

"Come," said Pantagruel, "let us now make ourselves merry one bout, and drink, my lads, I beseech you, for it is very good drinking all this month." Then did they uncase their flagons by heaps and dozens, and with their leaguer provision made excellent good cheer. But the poor King Anarchus could not all this while settle himself towards any fit of mirth; whereupon Panurge said, "Of what trade shall we make my lord the king here, that he may be skilful in the art when he goes thither to sojourn amongst all the devils of hell?" "Indeed," said Pantagruel, "that was well advised of thee. Do with him what thou wilt, I give him to thee." "Grammercy," said Panurge, "the present is not to be refused, and I love it from you."

CHAPTER XXXI.

How Pantagruel entered into the City of the Amaurots, and how Panurge married King Anarchus to an old lantern-carrying Hag, and made him a Crier of Green Sauce.

AFTER this wonderful victory, Pantagruel sent Carpalim unto the city of the Amaurots, to declare and signify unto them how the King Anarchus was taken prisoner, and all the enemies of the city overthrown. Which news when they heard, all the inhabitants of the city came forth to meet him in good order, and with a great triumphant pomp, conducting him with a heavenly joy into the city, where innumerable bonfires were kindled through all the parts thereof, and fair round tables, which were furnished with store of good victuals, set out in the middle of the streets. This was a renewing of the golden age in the time of Saturn, so good was the cheer which then they made.

But Pantagrue, having assembled the whole senate and common council-men of the town, said, "My masters, we must now strike the iron whilst it is hot. It is, therefore, my will that, before we frolic it any longer, we advise how to assault and take the whole kingdom of the Dipsodes. To which effect, let those that will go with me to provide themselves against to-morrow after drinking, for then will I begin to march. Not that I need any more men than I have to help me to conquer it, for I could make it as sure that way as if I had it already, but I see this city is so full of inhabitants that they can scarce turn into the streets. I will, therefore, carry them as a colony into Dipsody, and will give them all that country, which is fair, wealthy, fruitful, and pleasant above all other countries in the world, as many of you can tell who have been there heretofore. Every one of you, therefore, that will go along, let him provide himself as I have said." This counsel and resolution being published in the city, the next morning there assembled in the piazza before the palace to the number of eighteen hundred fifty-six thousand and eleven, besides women and little children. Thus began they to march straight into Dipsody, in such good order as did the people of Israel when they departed out of Egypt to pass over the Red Sea.

But, before we proceed any further in this purpose, I will tell you how Panurge handled his prisoner the King Anarchus; for, having remembered that which Epistemon had related, how the kings and rich men in this world were used in the Elysian fields, and how they got their living there by base and ignoble trades, he, therefore, one day apparelled his king in a pretty little canvas doublet, all jagged and pinked like the tippet of a light horseman's cap, together with a pair of large mariner's breeches and stockings without shoes,—“For,” said he, “they would but spoil his sight,”—and a little peach-coloured bonnet, with a great capon's feather in it—I lie, for I think he had two—and a very handsome girdle of a sky colour and green (in French called pers et vert), saying that such a livery did become him well, for that he had always been perverse, and in this plight bringing him before Pantagrue, said unto him, “Do you know this roister?” “No, indeed,” said Pantagrue. “It is,” said Panurge, “my lord the king of the three batches, or threadbare sovereign. I intend to make him an honest man. These devilish kings which we have here are but as so many calves, they know nothing, and are good for nothing but to do a thousand mischiefs to their poor subjects, and to trouble all the world with war for their unjust and detestable pleasure. I will put him to a trade, and make him a crier of green sauce. Go to, begin and cry, Do you lack any green sauce?" and the poor devil cried. "That is too low," said Panurge, then took him by the ear, saying "Sing higher in ge, sol, re, ut. So, so, poor devil, thou hast a good throat; thou wert never so happy as to be no longer king." And Pantagruel made himself merry with all this; for I dare boldly say that he was the best little gaffer that was to be seen between this and the end of a staff. Thus was Anarchus made a good crier of green sauce. Two days thereafter, Panurge married him with an old lantern-carrying hag, and he himself made the wedding with fine sheep's-heads, brave haslets with mustard, gallant salligots with garlic, of which he sent five horse-loads unto Pantagruel, which he ate up all, he found them so appetising. And for their drink they had a kind of small well-watered wine, and some fine sorb-apple cider. And to make them dance, he hired a blind man, that made music to them with a wind-broach.

After dinner he led them to the palace, and showed them to Pantagruel, and said, pointing to the married woman, "You need not fear that she will crack." "Why?" said Pantagruel. "Because," said Panurge, "she is well slit and broke up already." "What do you mean by that?" said Pantagruel. "Do not you see," said Panurge, "that the chestnuts which are roasted in the fire, if they be whole, they crack as if they were mad; and, to keep them from cracking, they make an incision in them, and slit them. So this new bride is in her lower parts well slit before, and therefore, will not crack behind."

Pantagruel gave them a little lodge near the lower street, and a mortar of stone wherein to bray and pound their sauce, and in this manner did they do their little business, he being as pretty a crier of green sauce as ever was seen in the country of Utopia. But I have been told since that his wife doth beat him like plaster, and the poor sot dares not defend himself, he is so simple.

CHAPTER XXXII.

How Pantagruel with His Tongue covered a whole Army, and what the Author saw in his Mouth.

THUS as Pantagruel with all his army had entered into the country of the Dipsodes, every one was glad of it, and incontinently rendered themselves unto him, bringing him out of their own good wills the keys of all the cities where he went, the Almirods only excepted, who, being resolved to hold out against him, made answer to his heralds that they would not yield but upon very honourable and good conditions.

"What," said Pantagruel, "do they ask any better terms than the hand at the pot and the glass in their fist? Come, let us go sack them, and put them all to the sword." Then did they put themselves in good order, as being fully determined to give an assault, but by the way, passing through a large field, they were overtaken with a great shower of rain, whereat they began to shiver and tremble, to crowd, press, and thrust close to one another. When Pantagruel saw that, he made their captains tell them that it was nothing, and that he saw well above the clouds that it would be nothing but a little dew; but, howsoever, that they should put themselves in order, and he would cover them. Then did they put themselves in a close order, and stood as near to each other as they could, and Pantagruel drew out his tongue only half-ways, and covered them all, as a hen doth her chickens. In the meantime I, who relate to you these so veritable stories, hid myself under a burdock-leaf, which was not much less in largeness than the arch of the bridge of Montrible; but, when I saw them thus covered, I went towards them to shelter myself likewise; which I could not do, for that they were so, as the saying is, At the yard's end there is no cloth left. Then, as well as I could, I got upon it, and went along full two leagues upon his tongue, and so long marched that at last I came into his mouth. But, oh gods and goddesses, what did I see there! Jupiter confound me with his trisulc lightning if I lie! I walked there as they do in Sophie, at Constantinople, and saw there great rocks, like the mountains in Denmark—I believe that those were his teeth. I saw also fair meadows, large forests, great and strong cities, not a jot less than Lyons or Poitiers. The first man I met there was a good, honest fellow planting coleworts, whereat being very much amazed, I asked him, "My friend, what dost thou make here?" "I plant coleworts," said he. "But how, and wherewith?" said I. "Ha, sir," said he, "every one cannot have his ballocks as heavy as a mortar, neither can we be all rich. Thus do I get my poor living, and carry them to the market to sell in the city, which is here behind." "Jesus!" said I, "is there here a new world?" "Sure," said he, "it is never a jot new, but it is commonly reported that, without this, there is an earth, whereof the inhabitants enjoy the light of a sun and moon, and that it is full of, and replenished with, very good commodities; but yet this is more ancient than that." "Yea, but," said I, "my friend, what is the name of that city whither thou carriest thy coleworts to sell?" "It is called Aspharage," said he, "and all the indwellers are Christians, very honest men, and will make you good cheer." To be brief, I resolved to go thither. Now in my way I met with a fellow that was lying in wait to catch pigeons, of whom I asked, "My friend, from whence come these pigeons?" "Sir," said he, "they come from the other world." Then I thought that when Pantagruel yawned the pigeons went into his mouth in whole flocks, thinking that it had been a pigeon-house.

Then I went into the city, which I found fair, very strong, and seated in a good air; but at my entry the guard demanded of me my pass or ticket. Whereat I was much astonished, and asked them, "My masters, is there any danger of the plague here?" "O Lord," said they, "they die hard by here so fast that the cart runs about the streets." "Good God," said I, "and where?" Whereunto they answered that it was in Larynx and Pharynx, which are too great cities, such as Rouen and Nantes, rich and of great trading. And the cause of the plague was by a stinking and infectious exhalation, which lately vapoured out of the abismes, whereof there have died above two and twenty hundred and threescore thousand and sixteen persons within this sevensnight." Then I considered, calculated, and found that it was an unsavoury breathing which came out of Pantagruel's stomach when he did eat so much garlic, as we have aforesaid.

Parting from thence, I passed amongst the rocks, which were his teeth, and never left walking till I got up on one of them; and there I found the pleasantest places in the world, great large tennis-courts, fair galleries, sweet meadows, store of vines, and an infinite number of banqueting summer outhouses in the fields, after the Italian fashion, full of pleasure and delight, where I stayed full four months, and never made better cheer in my life as then. After that I went down by the hinder teeth to come to the chaps. But in the way I was robbed by thieves in a great forest that is in the territory towards the ears. Then, after a little further travelling, I fell upon a pretty petty village—truly I have forgot the name of it—where I was yet merrier than ever, and got some certain money to live by. Can you tell how? By sleeping. For there they hire men by the day to sleep, and they get by it sixpence a day; but they that can snore hard get at least ninepence. How I had been robbed in the valley, I informed the senators, who told me that, in very truth, the people of that side were bad livers, and naturally thievish, whereby I perceived well, that as we have with us the countries Cisalpine and Transalpine, that is, be-hither and beyond the mountains, so have they there the countries Cidentine and Trarentine, that is, be-hither and beyond the teeth. But it is far better living on this side, and the air is purer. There I began to think that it is very true, which is commonly said, that one half of the world knoweth not how the other half liveth; seeing none before myself had ever written of that country, wherein are above five and twenty kingdoms inhabited, besides deserts, and a great arm of the sea. Concerning which I have composed a great book, entitled "The History of the Gorgians," because they dwell in the gorge of my master Pantagruel.

At last I was willing to return, and passing by his beard, I cast myself upon his shoulders, and from thence slid down to the ground, and fell before him. As soon as I was perceived by him, he asked me, "Whence comest thou, Alcofribas?" I answered him, "Out of your mouth, my lord!" "And how long hast thou been there?" said he. "Since the time," said I, "that you went against the Almirods." "That is about six months ago," said he. "And wherewith didst thou live? What didst thou drink?" I answered, "My lord, of the same that you did, and of the daintiest morsels that passed through your throat I took toll." "Yea, but," said he, "where didst thou shite?" "In your throat, my lord," said I. "Ha, ha, thou art a merry fellow," said he. "We have with the help of God conquered all the land of the Dipsodes; I will give thee the Chastelleine or Lairdship of Salmigondin. Grammercy, my lord," said I, "you gratify me beyond all that I have deserved of you."

CHAPTER XXXIII.

How Pantagruel became Sick, and the manner how He was Recovered.

AWHILE after this the good Pantagruel fell sick, and had such an obstruction in his stomach that he could neither eat nor drink; and, because mischief seldom comes alone, a hot piss seized on him, which tormented him more than you would believe. His physicians nevertheless helped him very well, and with store of lenitives and diuretic drugs made him piss away his pain. His urine was so hot, that since that time it is not yet cold, and you have of it in divers places of France, according to the course that it took, and they are called the hot baths, as

And I wonder much at a rabble of foolish philosophers and physicians, who spend their time in disputing whence the heat of the said waters cometh, whether it be by reason of borax, or sulphur, or alum, or saltpetre that is within the mine. For they do nothing but dote, and better were it for them to rub their arse against a thistle than to waste away their time in thus disputing of that whereof they know not the original; for the resolution is easy, neither need we to inquire any further than that the said baths came by a hot piss of the good Pantagruel.

Now to tell you after what manner he was cured of his principal disease, I let pass how for a minorative, or gentle potion, he took four hundred pounds weight of colophoniac scammony, six score and eighteen cart-loads of cassia, and eleven thousand and nine hundred pounds weight of rhubarb, besides other confused jumbings of sundry drugs. You must understand that by the advice of the physicians it was ordained that what did offend his stomach should be taken away; and, therefore, they made seventeen great balls of copper, each whereof was bigger than that which is to be seen on the top of Saint Peter's needle at Rome, and in such sort that they did open in the midst, and shut with a spring. Into one of them entered one of his men, carrying a lantern and a torch lighted, and so Pantagruel swallowed him down like a little pill. Into seven others went seven country fellows, having every one of them a shovel on his neck. Into nine others entered nine wood-carriers, having each of them a basket hung at his neck, and so were they swallowed down like pills. When they were in his stomach, every one undid his spring, and came out of their cabins. The first whereof was he that carried the lantern, and so they fell more than half a league into a most horrible gulf, more stinking and infectious than ever was Mephitis, or the marshes of the Camerina, or the abominably unsavoury lake of Sorbonne, whereof Strabo maketh mention. And had it not been that they had very well antidoted their stomach, heart, and wine-pot, which is called the noddle, they had been altogether suffocated and choked with these detestable vapours. Oh what a perfume! Oh what an evaporation wherewith to bewray the masks or mufflers of young mangy queans. After that, with groping and smelling, they came near to the fecal matter and the corrupted humours. Finally, they found a montjoy or heap of ordure and filth. Then fell the pioneers to work to dig it up, and the rest with their shovels filled the baskets; and, when all was cleansed, every one retired himself into his ball.

This done, Pantagruel, enforcing himself to a vomit very easily, brought them out, and they made no more show in his mouth than a fart in yours. But when they came merrily out of their pills, I thought upon the Grecians coming out of the Trojan horse. By this means was he healed and brought into his former state and convalescence; and of these brazen pills, or rather copper balls, you have one at Orleans, upon the steeple of the Holy Cross Church.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

The Conclusion of this Present Book, and the Excuse of the Author.

Now, my masters, you have heard a beginning of the horrific history of my lord and master Pantagruel. Here will I make an end of the first book. My head aches a little, and I perceive that the registers of my brain are somewhat jumbled and disordered with the septembral juice. You shall have the rest of the history at Frankfort mart next coming, and there shall you see how Panurge was married and made a cuckold within a month after his wedding; how Pantagruel found out the philosopher's stone, the manner how he found it, and the way how to use it; how he passed over the Caspian Mountains; and how he sailed through the Atlantic Sea, defeated the Cannibals, and conquered the Isles of Pearls; how he married the daughter of the King of India, called Presthan; how he fought against the devil, and burnt up five chambers of hell, ransacked the great black chamber, threw Proserpina into the fire, broke five teeth to Lucifer, and the horn that was in his arse; how he visited the regions of the moon, to know whether indeed the moon were not entire and whole, or if the women had three-quarters of it in their heads; and a thousand other little merriments all veritable. These are brave things truly. Good-night, gentlemen. Perdonate mi, and think not so much upon my faults that you forget your own.

If you say to me, master, it would seem that you were not very wise in writing to us these flimflam stories and pleasant fooleries, I answer you that you are not much wiser to spend your time in reading them. Nevertheless, if you read them to make yourselves merry, as in manner of pastime I wrote them, you and I both are far more worthy of pardon than a great rabble of squint-minded fellows, dissembling and counterfeit saints, demure lookers, hypocrites, pretended zealots, tough friars, buskin monks, and other such sects of men who disguise themselves like maskers to deceive the world. For, whilst they give the common people to understand that they are busied about nothing but contemplation and devotion in fastings, and maceration of their sensuality—and that only to sustain and alimant the small frailty of their humanity—it is so far otherwise, that, on the contrary, God knows what cheer they make; Et curios simulant, sed Bacchanalia vivunt. You may read it in great letters in the colouring of their red snouts, and gulching bellies as big as a tun, unless it be when they perfume themselves with sulphur. As for their study, it is wholly taken up in reading of Pantagruellin books, not so much to pass the time merrily as to hurt some one or other mischievously, to wit, in articling, sole articling, wry-neckifying, buttock-stirring, ballocking, and diaboliculating, that is, calumniating. Wherein they are like unto the poor rogues of a village that are busy in stirring up and scraping in the ordure and filth of little children, in the season of cherries and of guinds, and that only to find the kernels that they may sell them to the druggists to make thereof pomander oil. Fly from these men, abhor and hate them as much as I do, and upon my faith you will find yourselves the better for it. And if you desire to be good Pantagruellists, that is to say, to live in peace, joy, health, making yourselves always merry, never trust those men who always peep out at one hole.

TREATING OF THE HEROIC DEEDS AND SAYINGS OF THE GOOD PANTAGRUEL.

FRANCIS RABELAIS

TO THE SPIRIT OF THE QUEEN OF NAVARRE.

ABSTRACTED soul, ravish'd with ecstasies,
Gone back, and now familiar in the skies,
Thy former host, thy body, leaving quite,
Which to obey thee always took delight,—
Obsequious, ready,—now from motion free,
Senseless, and, as it were in apathy,
Would'st thou not issue forth, for a short space,
From that divine, eternal heavenly place,
To see the third part. in this earthy cell,
Of the brave acts of good Pantagruel?

THE AUTHOR'S PROLOGUE.

Most illustrious drinkers, and you most precious gouty gentlemen, did you ever see Diogenes the cynic philosopher? If you have seen him, you had not lost your eyesight, or I am truly out of my understanding and logical sense. It is a beautiful thing to see the clearness of (wine, gold) the sun. I'll be judged by the blind-born, so greatly renowned in the sacred Scriptures, who having at his choice to ask whatever he would from him who is Almighty, and whose word in an instant is effectually performed, asking nothing else but that he might see. Item, you are not young, which is a competent quality for you to philosophise more than physically on wine (en vin), not in vain (en vain), and henceforwards to be of the Bacchic Council; to the end that opining there, you may give your opinion faithfully of the substance, colour, excellent odour, eminency, propriety, faculty, virtue, and effectual dignity of the said blessed and desired liquor.

If you have not seen him, as I am easily induced to believe that you have not, at least you have heard tell of him. For through the air, and the whole extent of this hemisphere of the heavens, have his report and fame, even until this present time, remained very memorable and renowned. And hence all of you are derived from the Phrygian blood, if I be not deceived. If you have not so many crowns as Midas had, yet have you something, I know not what, of him, which the Persians of old esteemed more in all their otacusts, and which was more desired by the Emperor Antoninus, and gave occasion thereafter to the Basilisco at Rohan to be surnamed Goodly Ears. If you have not heard of him, I will presently tell you a story to make you relish your wine. Drink then—so, to the purpose. Hearken whilst I give you notice, to the end that you may not, like infidels, by your simplicity, be abused, that in his time he was a rare philosopher, and the most cheerful of a thousand. If he had some imperfections, so have you, so have we; for there is nothing, but God, that is perfect. Yet so it was that by Alexander the Great (although he had Aristotle for his instructor and domestic) he was held in such estimation that Alexander wished, if he had not been Alexander, to have been Diogenes the Sinopian.

When Philip, King of Macedon, undertook the siege and ruin of Corinth, the Corinthians having received certain intelligence by their spies that he with a numerous army in battle array was coming against them, were all of them, not without cause, most terribly afraid, and therefore were not neglectful of their duty in doing their best to put themselves in a fit posture to resist his approach, and defend their own city. Some from the fields brought into the fortified places their moveables, cattle, corn, wine, fruit, victuals, and other necessary provision. Others fortified and entrenched their walls, set up little fortresses, bastions, squared ravelins, digged trenches, cleansed countermines, fenced themselves with gabions, contrived platforms, emptied casemates, barricaded the false brays, erected the cavaliers, repaired the contrescarpes, plaistered the courtines, lengthened ravelins, stopped parapets, mortaised barbicans, new-pointed he portcullises, fastened the henses, sarasinesks, and cataracts, placed their sentries, and doubled their patrol. Every one did watch and ward, and none was exempted from carrying the basket. Some polished corselets, varnished backs and breasts, cleaned the headpieces, mail-coats, brigandines, salades, helmets, morions, jacks, gushets, gorgets, hoguines, brassars and cuissards, corselets, haubergeons, shields, bucklers, targets, greves, gauntlets, and spurs. Others made ready bows, slings, cross-bows, pellets, catapults, migraines or fire-balls, fire-brands, balists, scorpions, and other such warlike engines, expugnatory and destructive to the helepolides. They sharpened and prepared spears, staves, pikes, brown bills, halberts, long hooks, lances, zagayes, quarter-staves, eel-spears, partisans, troutstaves, clubs, battles-axes, darts, dartlets, glaves, javelins, javelots, and truncheons. They set edges upon scimitars, cutlasses, badelaire, back-swords, rucks, rapiers, bayonets, arrow-heads, dags, daggers, mandousians, poniards, whynyards, knives, skenes, sables, chippin knives, and mailons.

Every man exercised his weapon, every man scoured off the rust from his natural hanger; nor was there a woman amongst them, though never so reserved or old, who made not her harness to be well furbished, as you know the Corinthian women of old were reputed very courageous combatants.

Diogenes seeing them all so hard at work, and himself not employed by the magistrates in any business whatsoever, did very seriously, for many days together, without speaking one word, consider and contemplate the countenances of his fellow-citizens. On a sudden, as if he had been roused up and inspired by a martial spirit, he girded his cloak scarf-wise about his left arm, tucked up his sleeves to the elbow, trussed himself like a clown gathering apples, and giving to one of his old acquaintance his wallet, books, and opistographs, away went he out of town towards a little hill or promontory of Corinth called Craneum, and there on the strand, a pretty level place, did he roll his jolly tub, which served him for a house to shelter him from the injuries of the weather; there, in great vehemency of spirit, did he turn it, veer it, wheel it, frisk it, jumble it, shuffle it, huddle it, tumble it, hurry it, jolt it, justle it, overthrow it, invert it, subvert it, overturn it, beat it, thwack it, bump it, batter it, knock it, thrust it, push it, jerk it, shock it, hake it, toss it, throw it, overthrow it, upside down, topsiturvy, rursiversy, tread it, trample it, stamp it, tap it, ting it, ring it, tingle it, towl it, sound it, resound it, stop it, shut it, unbung it, lose it, unstopple it. And then again in a mighty bustle he randied it, slubbered it, hacked it, whittled it, wayed it, darted it, hurled it, staggered it, reeled it, swunged it, brangled it, ottered it, lifted it, heaved it, transformed it, transfigured it, ransposed it, transplaced it, reared it, raised it, hoised it washed it, dighted it, cleansed it, rinsed it, nailed it, settled it, fastened it, shackled it, fettered it, levelled it, blocked it, tugged it, tewed it, carried it, bedashed it, bewrayed it, parched it, mounted it, broached it, nicked it, notched it, bespattered it, decked it, adorned it, trimmed it, garnished it, gaged it, furnished it, bored it, pierced it, trapped it, rumbled it, slid it down the hill, and precipitated it from the very height of the Craneum; then from the foot to the top (like another Sisyphus with his stone) bore it up again, and every way so banged it and belaboured it that it was ten thousand to one he had not struck the bottom of it out.

One of his friends seeing all this, asked him why he did so toil his body, perplex his spirit, and torment his tub, and the philosopher's answer was, "That, not being employed in any other office by the Republic, he thought it expedient to thunder and storm it so tempestuously upon his tub that, amongst a people so fervently busy and earnest at work, he alone might not seem a loitering slug and lazy fellow." To the same purpose may I say of myself,

Though I be rid from fear,
I am not void of care.

For perceiving no account to be made of me towards the discharge of a trust of any great moment, and considering that through all the parts of this most noble kingdom of France, both on this and on the other side of the mountains, every one is most diligently exercised and busied—some in the fortifying of their own native country, for its defence, others in the repulsing of their enemies by an offensive war—and all this with a policy so excellent, and such admirable order, so manifestly profitable for the future, whereby France shall have its frontiers most magnifically enlarged, and the French assured of a long and well-grounded peace, that very little withholds me from the opinion of good Heraclitus, which affirms war to be the father of all good things; and therefore do I believe that war is in Latin called Bellum, and not by antiphrasis, as some patchers of old rusty Latin would have us to think, because in war there is little beauty to be seen; but absolutely and simply, for that in war appears all that is good and graceful, and that by the wars is purged out all manner of wickedness and deformity. For proof whereof the wise and pacific Solomon could no better represent the unspeakable perfection of the divine wisdom than by comparing it to the due disposal and ranking of an army in battle array, well provided and ordered.

Therefore, by reason of my weakness and inability, being reputed by my compatriots unfit for the offensive part of warfare; and, on the other side, being no way employed in matter of the defensive, although it had been but to carry burdens, fill ditches, or break clods, either of which had been to me indifferent, I held it not a little disgraceful to be only an idle spectator of so many valorous, eloquent, and warlike persons, who in the view and sight of all Europe act this notable interlude or tragi-comedy, and not exert myself, and contribute thereto this nothing, my all, which remained for me to do. In my opinion, little honour is due to such as are mere lookers on, liberal of their eyes, and of their strength parsimonious; who conceal their crowns, and hide their silver; scratching their head with one finger like grumbling puppies, gaping at the flies like tithe calves, clapping down their ears like Arcadian asses at the melody of musicians, who with their very countenances in the depth of silence express their consent to the prosopopeia. Having made this choice and election, it seemed to me that my exercise therein would be neither unprofitable nor troublesome to any, whilst I should thus set agoing my Diogenical tub, which is all that is left me safe from the shipwreck of my former misfortunes.

At this dingle dangle wagging of my tub, what would you have me do? By the Virgin that tucks up her sleeve, I know not as yet. Stay a little till I suck up a draught of this bottle; it is my true and only Helicon; it is my Caballine Fountain; it is my sole enthusiasm. Drinking thus, I meditate, discourse, resolve, and conclude. After that the epilogue is made, I laugh, I write, I compose, and drink again. Ennius drinking wrote, and writing drank. Æschylus, if Plutarch in his Symposiacs merit any faith, drank composing, and drinking composed. Homer never wrote fasting, and Cato never wrote till after he had drank. These passages I have brought before you, to the end that you may not say that I live without the example of men well praised, and better prized. It is good and fresh enough, even as if you would say it is entering upon the second degree. God, the good God of Sabaoth, that is to say, the God of armies, be praised for it eternally! If you after the same manner would take one great draught, or two little ones, whilst you have your gown about you, I truly find no kind of inconvenience in it, provided you send up to God for all some small scantling of thanks.

Since then my luck or destiny is such as you have heard—for it is not for everybody to go to Corinth—I am fully resolved to be so little idle and unprofitable, that I will set myself to serve the one and the other sort of people. Amongst the diggers, pioneers, and rampart builders, I will do as did Neptune and Apollo at Troy under Laomedon, or as did Renault of Montauban in his latter days; I will serve the masons, I will set on the pot to boil for the bricklayers; and whilst the minced meat is making ready at the sound of my small pipe, I will measure the muzzle of the musing dotards. Thus did

For the use of the warriors I am about to tap a new barrel to give them a taste (which by two former volumes of mine, if by the deceitfulness and falsehood of printers they had not been jumbled, marred, and spoiled, you would have very well relished), and draw for them, of the growth of our own trippery pastimes, a third part of a gallon, and consequently a jolly, cheerful quart of Pantagruellic sentences, which you may lawfully call, if you please, Diogenical; and shall have me, seeing I cannot be their fellow-soldier, for their faithful butler, refreshing and cheering, according to my little power, their return from the alarms of the enemy; as also for an indefatigable extoller of their martial exploits and glorious achievements. I shall not fail therein, par lapathium acutum de Dieu; if Mars fail not in Lent, which the cunning lecher, I warrant you, will be loth to do.

I remember, nevertheless, to have read that Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, one day, amongst the many spoils and booties which by his victories he had acquired, presenting to the Egyptians, in the open view of the people, a Bactrian camel, all black, and a party-coloured slave, in such sort as that the one-half of his body was black, and the other white, not in partition of breadth by the diaphragm, as was that woman consecrated to the Indian Venus whom the Tyanean philosopher did see between the River Hydaspes and Mount Caucasus, but in a perpendicular dimension of altitude; which were things never before then seen in Egypt. He expected by the show of these novelties to win the love of the people. But what happened? At the production of the camel they were all affrighted, and offended at the sight of the party-coloured man—some scoffed at him as a detestable monster brought forth by the error of nature—in a word, of the hope which he had to please these Egyptians, and by such means to increase the affection which they naturally bore him, he was altogether frustrated and disappointed; understanding fully by their bearing that they took more pleasure and delight in things that were proper, handsome, and perfect, than in misshapen, monstrous, and ridiculous creatures. From this time he had both the slave and the camel in such dislike that very shortly thereafter, either through negligence, or for want of ordinary sustenance, they both tipped over the perch.

This example puts me in a suspense between hope and fear, misdoubting that, for the contentment which I aim at, I will but reap what shall be most distasteful to me; my cake will be dough, and for my Venus I shall have but some deformed puppy; * instead of serving them, I shall but vex them, and offend them whom I purpose to exhilarate; resembling, in this dubious adventure, Euclion's cock, so renowned by Plautus in his Pot, and by Ausonius in his Griphon, and by divers others; which cock, for having by his scraping discovered a treasure, had his hide well curried. In any case I arouse no anger by it, though formerly such things fell out, and the like may occur again. Yet, by Hercules, it will not. So I perceive in them all one and the same specific form, and the like individual proprieties, which our ancestors called Pantagruellism; by virtue whereof they will bear with anything that flows from a good, free, and loyal heart. I have seen them ordinarily take goodwill in part of payment, and remain satisfied therewith, when one was not able to do better. Having disposed of this point, I return to my barrel.

Up, my lads, to this wine, spare it not! Drink, boys, and trowl it off at full bowls! If you do not think it good, let it alone. I am not like those officious and importunate sots who, by force, outrage, and violence, constrain an easy, good-natured fellow to whiffle, quaff, carouse, and what is worse. All honest tipplers, all honest gouty men, all such as are a-dry, coming to this little barrel of mine, need not drink thereof if it please them not; but if they have a mind to it, and the wine prove agreeable to the tastes of their worshipful worships, let them drink frankly, freely, and boldly, without paying anything, and welcome. This is my decree, my statute, and ordinance. And let none fear there shall be any want of wine, as at the marriage of Cana in Galilee; for in proportion to the quantity you shall draw out at the faucet, so much shall I tun in at the bung. Thus shall the barrel remain inexhaustible; it has a lively spring and perpetual current. Such was the beverage contained within the cup of Tantalus, which was figuratively represented amongst the Brachman sages. Such was in Iberia the mountain of salt, so highly written of by Cato. Such was the branch of gold consecrated to the subterranean goddess, which Virgil treats of so sublimely. It is a true cornucopia of merriment and raillery. If at any time it seem to you to be emptied to the very lees, yet it shall not for all that be drawn wholly dry. Good hope remains there at the bottom, as in Pandora's box, and not despair, as in the leaky tubs of the Danaids. Remark well what I have said, and what manner of people they be whom I do invite; for, to the end that none be deceived, I, in imitation of Lucilius, who did protest that he wrote only to his own Tarentines and Cousentines, have not pierced this vessel for any else but you honest men, who are drinkers of the first edition, and gouty blades of the highest degree. The great dorophages,* bribemongers,† have on their hands occupation enough, and enough on the hooks for their venison. There may they follow their prey; here is no garbage for them. You pettifoggers, garblers, and masters of chicanery, speak not to me, I beseech you, in the name of and for the reverence you bear to the four hips that engendered you, and to the quickening peg which at that time conjoined them. As for hypocrites, much less; although they were all of them unsound in body, pockified, scurvy, furnished with unquenchable thirst, and unsatiable eating. And wherefore? Because, indeed, they are not of good, but of evil, and of that evil from which we daily pray to God to deliver us. And albeit we see them sometimes counterfeit devotion, yet never did old ape make pretty moppet. Hence, mastiffs,* dogs in a doublet, get you behind, aloof, villains, out of my sunshine; curs, to the devil! Do you jog hither, wagging your tails,† to pant at my wine, and bepiss my barrel? Look, here is the cudgel which Diogenes, in his last will, ordained to be set by him after his death, for beating away, crushing the reins, and breaking the backs of these bustuary hobgoblins and Cerberian hell-hounds. Pack you hence, therefore, you hypocrites, to your sheep, dogs; get you gone, you dissemblers, to the devil! Hey! What! are you there yet? I renounce my part of Papimanie, if I snap you, Grr, Grrr, Grrrrrr. Avaunt, avaunt! Will you not be gone? May you never shit till you be soundly lashed with stirrup leather, never piss but by the strappado, nor be otherwise warmed than by the bastinado.

CHAPTER I.

How Pantagrue! transported a Colony of Utopians into Dipsody.

PANTAGRUEL having wholly subdued the land of Dipsody, transported thereunto a colony of Utopians to the number of 9,876,543,210 men, besides the women and little children, artificers of all trades, and professors of all sciences, to people, cultivate, and improve that country, which otherwise was ill inhabited, and the greatest part of which was but a mere desert and wilderness; and he did transport them not so much for the excessive multitude of men and women, which were in Utopia multiplied, for number, like grasshoppers upon the face of the land. You understand well enough, nor is it needful, further, to explain it to you that the Utopian men had so rank and fruitful genitories, and that the Utopian women carried matrixes so ample, so gluttonous, so tenaciously retentive, and so architectonically cellulated, that at the end of every ninth month seven children at the least, what male, what female, were brought forth by every married woman, in imitation of the people of Israel in Egypt, if Anthony de Lyra be to be trusted. Nor yet was this transplantation made so much for the fertility of the soil, the wholesomeness of the air, or commodity of the country of Dipsody, as to retain that rebellious people within the bounds of their duty and obedience, by this new transport of his ancient and most faithful subjects, who, from all time out of mind, never knew, acknowledged, owned, or served any other sovereign lord but him; and who likewise, from the very instant of their birth, as soon as they were entered into this world, had, with the milk of their mothers and nurses, sucked in the sweetness, humanity, and mildness of his government, to which they were all of them so nourished and habituated that there was nothing surer than that they would sooner abandon their lives than swerve from this singular and primitive obedience naturally due to their prince, whithersoever they should be dispersed or removed.

* The author retorts upon those who called him cynic, or Diogenes the second.

† Here Rabelais has a fling at certain monks, who, unable to resist the sweet temptation of reading over and over again the most lascivious parts of his romance, were yet the most violent railers against the author and his performance.

And not only should they, and their children successively descending from their blood, be such, but also would keep and maintain in this same fealty and obsequious observance all the nations lately annexed to his empire; which so truly came to pass that therein he was not disappointed of his intent. For if the Utopians were, before their transplantation thither, dutiful and faithful subjects, the Dipsodes, after some few days' conversing with them, were every whit as, if not more, loyal than they, and that by virtue of I know not what natural fervency incident to all human creatures at the beginning of any labour wherein they take delight: solemnly attesting the heavens and supreme intelligences of their being only sorry that no sooner had they learned of the great renown of the good Pantagruel.

Remark therefore here, honest drinkers, that the manner of preserving and retaining countries newly conquered in obedience, is not, as hath been the erroneous opinion of some tyrannical spirits, to their own detriment and dishonour, to pillage, plunder, force, spoil, trouble, oppress, vex, disquiet, ruin, and destroy the people, ruling, governing, and keeping them in awe with rods of iron, and, in a word, eating and devouring them, after the fashion that Homer calls an unjust and wicked king, Δημύβορον, that is to say, a devourer of his people.

I will not quote you in proof of this the testimony of ancient writers. It shall suffice to put you in mind of what your fathers have seen of it, and yourselves too, if you be not very babes. New-born, they must be given suck to, rocked in a cradle, and dandled. Trees newly planted must be supported, underpropped, strengthened, and defended against all tempests, mischiefs, injuries, and calamities. And one lately saved from a long and dangerous sickness, and new upon his recovery, must be forborn, spared, and cherished, in such sort that they may harbour in their own breasts this opinion, that there is not in the world a king or prince who does not desire fewer enemies and more friends. Thus Osiris, the great king of the Egyptians, conquered almost the whole earth, not so much by force of arms, as by easing the people of their troubles, teaching them how to live well, and honestly giving them good laws, and using them with all possible affability, courtesy, gentleness, and liberality. Therefore was he by all men deservedly entitled "The Great King Euergetes," that is to say, benefactor, which style he obtained by virtue of the command of Jupiter to one Pamyla.

And in effect, Hesiod, in his Hierarchy, placed the good demons (call them angels if you will, or Genii) as intercessors and mediators betwixt the gods and men, they being of a degree inferior to the gods, but superior to men. And for that through their hands the riches and benefits we get from heaven are dealt to us, and that they are continually doing us good, and still protecting us from evil, he saith that they exercise the offices of kings; because to do always good, and never ill, is an act most singularly royal.

Just such another was the emperor of the universè, Alexander the Macedonian. After this manner was Hercules sovereign possessor of the whole continent, relieving men from monstrous oppressions, exactions, and tyrannies, governing them with discretion, maintaining them in equity and justice, instructing them with seasonable policies and wholesome laws, convenient for and suitable to the soil, climate, and disposition of the country, supplying what was wanting, abating what was superfluous, and pardoning all that was past, with a sempiternal forgetfulness of all preceding offences; as was the amnesty of the Athenians, when by the prowess, valour, and industry of Thrasybulus the tyrants were exterminated; afterwards at Rome, as set forth by Cicero, and renewed under the Emperor Aurelian. These are the philtres, allurements, iynges,* inveiglements, baits, and enticements of love, by which means that may be peaceably retained which was painfully acquired. Nor can a conqueror reign more happily, whether he be a monarch, emperor, king, prince, or philosopher, than by making his justice to second his valour. His valour shows itself in victory and conquest; his justice will appear in the goodwill and affection of the people, when he makes laws, publishes ordinances, establishes religion, and does what is right to every one, as the noble poet Virgil writes of Octavian Augustus.

* Is the bird we call wagtail.

“Victorque volentes Per populos dat jura.”

Therefore is it that Homer in his Iliad calls a good prince and great king Κοσμήτορα λαῶν, that is, the ornament of the people.*

Such was the consideration of Numa Pompilius, the second king of the Romans, a just politician and wise philosopher, when he ordained that to the god Terminus, on the day of his festival called Terminales, nothing should be sacrificed that had died; teaching us thereby that the bounds, limits, and frontiers of kingdoms should be guarded, and preserved in peace, amity, and meekness, without polluting our hands with blood and robbery. Who does otherwise shall not only lose what he has gained, but also be loaded with this scandal and reproach, that he is an unjust and wicked purchaser, and his acquests perish with him; Juxta illud, male parta, male dilabuntur. And although during his whole lifetime he should have peaceable possession thereof, yet, if what has been so acquired moulder away in the hands of his heirs, the same opprobriousness, scandal, and imputation will be charged upon the defunct, and his memory remain accursed for his unjust and unwarrantable conquest; Juxta illud, de male quæsitis vix gaudet tertius hæres.

Remark, likewise, gentlemen, you gouty feoffees, in this main point worthy of your observation, how by these means Pantagruel of one angel made two, which was a contingency opposite to the council of Charlemaine, who made two devils out of one, when he transplanted the Saxons into Flanders, and the Flemings into Saxony. For, not being able to keep in such subjection the Saxons, whose dominions he had joined to the empire, but that ever and anon they would break forth into open rebellion, if he should casually be drawn into Spain, or other remote kingdoms, he caused them to be brought to his own country of Flanders, the inhabitants of which did naturally obey him, and transported the Hainaults and Flemings, his ancient loving subjects, into Saxony, not mistrusting their loyalty now that they were transplanted into a strange land. But it happened that the Saxons persisted in their rebellion and primitive obstinacy; and the Flemings dwelling in Saxony imbibed the stubborn manners and conditions of the Saxons.

* The ornament of the people. Rabelais here speaks Plutarch's sentiment. But the learned Scaliger is of another mind as to the meaning of the word κοσμήτωρ. He says it signifies gubernator, not ornator, the same as ἀρμοστής, both a judge and a general “κοσμεῖν enim et ἀρμύζειν verba sunt Politica, quæ administrare remp. (non autem ornare) propriè significabant ut apud.” Hom. Iliad, l. Ατρείδα δι μάλις α δύο κοσμήτορε λαῶν.

CHAPTER II.

How Panurge was made Squire of Salmygondin in Dipsody, and did waste His Revenue before it came in.

WHILST Pantagrue was giving order for the government of all Dipsody, he assigned to Panurge the Lairdship of Salmygondin, which was yearly worth 6,789,106,789 rials of certain rent, besides the uncertain revenue of the locusts and periwinkles, amounting, one year with another, to the value of 2,435,768, or 2,435,769 French crowns of Berry. Sometimes it did amount to 1,234,554,321 seraphs, when it was a good year, and that locusts and periwinkles were in request; but that was not every year.

Now his worship, the new squire, husbanded this his estate so providently and prudently that in less than fourteen days he wasted and dilapidated all the certain and uncertain revenue of his patrimony for three whole years. Yet he did not properly dilapidate it, as you might say, in the founding of monasteries, building of churches, erecting of colleges, and setting up of hospitals, or casting his bacon fitches to the dogs; but spent it in a thousand little banquets and jolly collations, keeping open house for all comers and goers; yea, to all good fellows, young girls, and pretty wenches; felling timber, burning the great logs for the sale of the ashes, borrowing money beforehand, buying dear, selling cheap, and eating his corn, as it were, whilst it was but grass.

Pantagrue, being warned of his lavishness, was in good sooth no way offended at the matter, neither angry nor sorry; for I once told you, and again tell it you, that he was the best little great goodman that ever girded a sword to his side. He took all things in good part, and interpreted every action in the best sense. He never vexed nor disquieted himself with the least pretence of dislike to anything, because he knew that he must have most grossly abandoned the divine mansion of reason if he had permitted his mind to be never so little grieved, afflicted, or altered at any occasion whatsoever. For all the goods that the heaven covers, and that the earth contains, in all their dimensions of height, depth, breadth, and length, are not of so much worth as that we should for them disturb or disorder our affections, trouble or perplex our senses or spirits.

He only drew Panurge aside, and then, making to him a sweet remonstrance and mild admonition, very gently represented before him in strong arguments that, if he should continue in such an unthrifty course of living, and not become a better mesnagier, it would prove altogether impossible for him, or at least hugely difficult at any time, to make him rich. "Rich!" answered Panurge. "Have you fixed your thoughts there? Have you undertaken the task to enrich me in this world? Set your mind to live merrily, in the name of God and good folks; let no other cark nor care be harboured within the sacro-sanctified domicile of your celestial brain. May the calmness and tranquillity thereof be never incommoded with or overshadowed by any frowning clouds of sullen imaginations and displeasing annoyance. For if you live joyful, merry, jocund, and glad, I cannot be but rich enough. Everybody cries up thrift, thrift, and good husbandry. But many speak of Robin Hood that never shot in his bow, and talk of that virtue of mesnagery who know not what belongs to it. It is by me that they must be advised. From me, therefore, take this warning and information, that what is imputed to me for a vice has been done in imitation of the university and parliament of Paris, places in which are to be found the true spring and source of the lively idea of Pantheology, and all manner of justice. Let him be counted a heretic that doubts thereof, and does not firmly believe it. Yet they in one day eat up their bishop, or the revenue of the bishopric—is it not all one?—for a whole year, yea, sometimes for two. This is done on the day he makes his entry and is installed. Nor is there any room for excuse; for he cannot avoid it, unless he would be hooted at and stoned for his parsimony.

“It has been also esteemed an act flowing from the habit of the four cardinal virtues. Of prudence in borrowing money beforehand; for none knows what may fall out. Who is able to tell if the world shall last yet three years? But although it should continue longer, is there any man so foolish as to have the confidence to promise himself three years.

‘What fool so confident to say
That he shall live one other day?’

“Of commutative justice, in buying dear, I say upon trust, and selling goods cheap, that is, for ready money. What does Cato say in his Book of Husbandry to this purpose? The father of a family, says he, must be a perpetual seller; by which means it is impossible but that at last he shall become rich, if he possess vendible ware enough always ready for sale.

“Of distributive justice it partakes in giving entertainment to good—remark, good—and gentle fellows whom fortune had shipwrecked, like Ulysses, upon the rock of a hungry stomach, with provision of sustenance; and likewise to good and young—remark, good and young—wenches. For, according to the sentence of Hippocrates, youth is impatient of hunger, chiefly if it be vigorous, lively, frolicsome, brisk, stirring, and bouncing. Which wanton maidens willingly and heartily devote themselves to the pleasure of honest men; and are insofar both Platonic and Ciceronian,* that they do acknowledge their being born into this world not to be for themselves alone, but that in their proper persons their country may claim one share, and their friends another.

“The virtue of fortitude appears therein, by the cutting down and overthrowing of the great trees, like a second Milo making havoc of the dark forest, which did serve only to furnish dens, caves, and shelter to wolves, wild boars, and foxes, and afford receptacles, withdrawing corners, and refuges to robbers, thieves, and murderers, lurking holes and skulking places for cut-throat assassins, secret obscure shops for coiners of false money, and safe retreats for heretics; laying woods even and level with the plain champaign fields and pleasant heathy ground, at the sound of the hautboys and bagpipes playing reeks with the high and stately timber, and preparing seats and benches for the eve of the dreadful day of judgment.

“I gave thereby proof of my temperance in eating my corn whilst it was but grass, like a hermit feeding upon sallets and roots, that, so affranchising myself from the yoke of sensual appetites, to the utter disclaiming of their sovereignty, I might the better reserve somewhat in store for the relief of the lame, blind, cripple, maimed, needy, poor, and wanting wretches.

“In taking this course I save the expense of the weed-grubbers, who gain money; of the reapers in harvest-time, who drink lustily, and without water; of gleaners, who will expect their cakes and bannocks; of threshers, who leave no garlic, scallions, leeks, nor onions in our gardens, by the authority of Thestylis in Virgil; and of the millers, who are generally thieves; and of the bakers, who are little better. Is this small saving or frugality? Besides the mischief and damage of the field-mice, the decay of barns, and the destruction usually made by weasels and other vermin.

“Of corn in the blade,† you may make good green sauce, of a light concoction and easy digestion, which recreates the brain, and exhilarates the animal spirits, rejoices the sight, opens the appetite, delights the taste, comforts the heart, tickles the tongue, cheers the countenance, striking a fresh and lively colour, strengthening the muscles, tempers the blood, disburdens the midriff, refreshes the liver, disobstructs the spleen, eases the kidneys, supplies the reins, quickens the joints of the back, cleanses the urine conduits, dilates the spermatic vessels, shortens the cremasters, purges the bladder, puffs up the genitories, corrects the prepuce, hardens the nuts, and rectifies the member. It will make you have a current belly to trot, fart, dung, piss, sneeze, cough, spit, belch, spew, yawn, snuff, blow, breathe, snort, sweat, and set taut your Robin, with a thousand other rare advantages." "I understand you very well," says Pantagruel; "you would thereby infer that those of a mean spirit and shallow capacity have not the skill to spend much in a short time. You are not the first in whose conceit that heresy has entered. Nero maintained it, and above all mortals admired most his uncle Caius Caligula for having, in a few days, by a most wonderfully pregnant invention, totally spent all the goods and patrimony which Tiberius had left him."

"But, instead of observing the sumptuous supper-curbing laws of the Romans—to wit, the Orchia, the Faunia, the Didia, the Licinia, the Cornelia, the Lepidiana, the Antia, and of the Corinthians—by the which they were inhibited, under pain of great punishment, not to spend more in one year than their annual revenue did amount to, you have offered up the oblation of Protervia, which was with the Romans such a sacrifice as the paschal lamb was amongst the Jews, wherein all that was eatable was to be eaten, and the remainder to be thrown into the fire, without reserving anything for the next day. I may very justly say of you, as Cato did of Albidius, who after that he had by a most extravagant expense wasted all the means and possessions he had to one only house, he fairly set it on fire, that he might the better say, Consummatum est. Even just as since his time Saint Thomas Aquinas did, when he had eaten up the whole lamprey, although there was no necessity in it."

CHAPTER III.

How Panurge praises Debtors and Borrowers.

"But," inquires Pantagruel, "when will you be out of debt?" "At the next ensuing term of the Greek calends," answered Panurge, "when all the world shall be content, and that it be your fate to become your own heir. The Lord forbid that I should be out of debt, as if, indeed, I could not be trusted. Who leaves not some leaven over night will hardly have paste the next morning.

"Be still indebted to somebody or other, that there may be somebody always to pray for you; that the giver of all good things may grant unto you a blessed, long, and prosperous life; fearing, if fortune should deal crossly with you, that it might be his chance to come short of being paid by you, he will always speak good of you in every company, ever and anon purchase new creditors unto you; to the end that, through their means, you may make a shift by borrowing from Peter to pay Paul, and with other folk's earth fill up his ditch. When of old, in the regions of the Gauls, by the institution of the Druids, the servants, slaves, and bondsmen were burned quick at the funerals and obsequies of their lords and masters, had not they fear enough, think you, that their lords and masters should die? For, perforce, they were to die with them for company. Did not they incessantly send up their supplications to their great god Mercury, as likewise unto Dis, the Father of Wealth, to lengthen out their days, and preserve them long in health? Were not they very careful to entertain them well, punctually to look unto them, and to attend them faithfully and circumspectly? For, by those means, were they to live together at least until the hour of death. Believe me, your creditors, with a more fervent devotion, will beseech Almighty God to prolong your life, they being of nothing more afraid than that you should die; for that they are more concerned for the sleeve than the arm, and love silver better than their own lives. As it evidently appeared by the usurers of Landerousse, who not long since hanged themselves because the price of corn and wines had fallen by the return of a generous season." To this Pantagruel answering nothing, Panurge continued his discourse, saying, "Truly, and in good sooth, sir, when I ponder my destiny aright, and think well upon it, you put me shrewdly to my plunges, and have me at bay in twitting me with the reproach of my debts and creditors. And yet did I, in this only respect and consideration of being a debtor, esteem myself worshipful, reverend, and formidable. For against the opinion of most philosophers that of nothing arises nothing, yet, without having bottomed on so much as that which is called the First Matter, did I out of nothing become such a maker and creator that I have created—what?—a gay number of fair and jolly creditors. Nay, creditors, I will maintain it, even to the very fire itself exclusively, are fair and goodly creatures. Who lends nothing is an ugly and wicked creature, and an accursed imp of the infernal Old Nick. And there is made—what? Debts. A thing most precious and dainty, of great use and antiquity. Debts, I say, surmounting the number of syllables which may result from the combinations of all the consonants with each of the vowels heretofore projected, reckoned, and calculated by the noble Xenocrates. To judge of the perfection of debtors by the number of their creditors is the readiest way for entering into the mysteries of practical arithmetic.

"You can hardly imagine how glad I am when every morning I perceive myself environed and surrounded with brigades of creditors, humble, fawning, and full of their reverences. And whilst I remark that, as I look more favourably upon, and give a more cheerful countenance to one than to another, the fellow thereupon entertains a conceit that he shall be the first despatched, and the foremost in the date of payment; and he values my smiles at the rate of ready money. It seems unto me that I then act and personate the god of the Passion of Saumure, accompanied with his angels and cherubims.

“These are my flatterers, my soothers, my claw-backs, my smoothers, my parasites, my saluters, my givers of good-morrrows, and perpetual orators; which makes me verily think that the supremest height of heroic virtue described by Hesiod consists in being a debtor, wherein I held the first degree in my commencement. Which dignity, though all human creatures seem to aim at and aspire thereto, few, nevertheless, because of the difficulties in the way, and encumbrances of hard passages, are able to reach it; as is easily perceivable by the ardent desire and vehement longing harboured in the breast of every one to be still creating more debts and new creditors.

“Yet it does not lie in the power of every one to be a debtor. To acquire creditors is not at the disposal of each man’s arbitrament. You nevertheless would deprive me of this sublime felicity. You ask me when I will be out of debt. Well, to go yet further on, and possibly worse in your conceit, may Saint Bablin, the good saint, snatch me if I have not all my lifetime held debt to be as an union or conjunction of the heavens with the earth, and the whole cement whereby the race of mankind is kept together; yea, of such virtue and efficacy that, I say, the whole progeny of Adam would very suddenly perish without it. Therefore, perhaps, I do not think amiss when I repute it to be the great soul of the universe, which, according to the opinion of the Academics, vivifies all manner of things. In confirmation whereof, that you may the better believe it to be so, represent to yourself, without any prejudice of spirit, in a clear and serene fancy, the idea and form of some other world than this; take, if you please, and lay hold on the thirtieth of those which the philosopher Metrodorus enumerated, wherein it is to be supposed there is no debtor or creditor, that is to say, a world without debts.

“There amongst the planets will be no regular course, all will be in disorder. Jupiter, reckoning himself to be nothing indebted unto Saturn, will go near to detrude him out of his sphere, and with the Homeric chain will be like to hang up the Intelligencies, Gods, Heavens, Demons, Heroes, Devils, Earth, and Sea, together with the other elements. Saturn no doubt combining with Mars, will reduce that so disturbed world into a chaos of confusion.

“Mercury, then, would be no more subjected to the other planets; he would scorn to be any longer their Camillus, as he was of old termed in the Hetrurian tongue. For it is to be imagined that he is no way a debtor to them.

“Venus will be no more venerable, because she shall have lent nothing. The moon will remain bloody and obscure. For to what end should the sun impart unto her any of his light? He owed her nothing. Nor yet will the sun shine upon the earth, nor the stars send down any good influence, because the terrestrial globe has desisted from sending up their wonted nourishment by vapours and exhalations, wherewith Heraclitus said, the Stoics proved, Cicero maintained, they were cherished and alimeted. There would likewise be in such a world no manner of symbolisation, alteration, nor transmutation amongst the elements; for the one will not esteem itself obliged to the other, as having borrowed nothing at all from it. Earth, then, will not become water, water will not be changed into air; of air will be made no fire, and fire will afford no heat unto the earth; the earth will produce nothing but monsters, Titans, giants; no rain will descend upon it, nor light shine thereon; no wind will blow there; nor will there be in it any summer or harvest. Lucifer will break loose, and issuing forth of the depths of hell, accompanied by his furies, fiends, and horned devils, will go about to unnestle and drive out of heaven all the gods, as well of the greater as of the lesser nations. Such a world, without lending, will be no better than a dog-kennel, a place of contention and wrangling, more unruly and irregular than that of the rector of Paris; a devil of an hurly-burly, and more disordered confusion than that of the plagues of Dotiay. Men will not then salute one another; it will be but lost labour to expect aid or succour from any, or to cry fire, water, murder, for none will put to their helping hand. Why? He lent no money, there is nothing due to him. Nobody is concerned in his burning, in his shipwreck, in his ruin, or in his death; and that because he hitherto had lent nothing, and would never thereafter have lent anything. In short, Faith, Hope, and Charity, would be quite banished from such a world, for men are born to relieve and assist one another; and in their stead should succeed and be introduced Defiance, Disdain, and Rancour, with the most execrable troop of all evils, all imprecations, and all miseries. Whereupon you will think, and that not amiss, that Pandora had there spilt her unlucky bottle. Men unto men will be wolves, hobthrushers, and goblins (as were Lycaon, Bellerophon, Nebuchodnosor), plunderers, highway robbers, cut-throats, rapparees, murderers, poisoners, assassigators, lewd, wicked, malevolent, pernicious haters, set against everybody, like to Ismael, Metabus, or Timon the Athenian, who for that cause was named Misanthropos; in such sort that it would prove much more easy in nature to have fish entertained in the air, and bullocks fed in the bottom of the ocean, than to support or tolerate a rascally rabble of people that will not lend. These fellows, I vow, do I hate with a perfect hatred; and if, conform to the pattern of this grievous, peevish, and perverse world, which lends nothing, you figure and liken the little world, which is man, you will find in him a terrible justling, coyle, and clutter. The head will not lend the sight of his eyes to guide the feet and hands; the legs will refuse to bear up the body; the hands will leave off working any more for the rest of the members; the heart will be weary of its continual motion for the beating of the pulse, and will no longer lend his assistance; the lungs will withdraw the use of their bellows; the liver will resist from spreading any more blood through the veins, for the good of the whole; the bladder will not be indebted to the kidneys, so that the urine thereby will be totally stopped. The brains, in the interim, considering this unnatural course, will fall into a raving dotage, and withhold all feeling from the sinews, and motion from the muscles. Briefly, in such a world, without order and array, owing nothing, lending nothing, and borrowing nothing, you would see a more dangerous conspiracy than that which Æsop set forth in his Apologue. Such a world will perish undoubtedly; and not only perish, but perish very quickly. Were it Æsculapius himself, his body would immediately rot, and the chafing soul, full of indignation, take its flight to all the devils in hell after my money."

CHAPTER IV.

Continuation of the Discourse of Panurge in praise of Borrowers and Lenders.

"ON the contrary, be pleased to represent to your fancy another world, wherein every one lends and every one owes—all are debtors, and all creditors. Oh, how great will that harmony be which shall thereby result from the regular motions of the heavens! Methinks I hear it every whit as well as ever Plato did. What sympathy will there be amongst the elements! Oh, how delectable then unto nature will be her own works and productions! Whilst Ceres appears laden with corn, Bacchus with wines, Flora with flowers, Pomona with fruits, and Juno fair, in a clear air, wholesome and pleasant. I lose myself in this high contemplation.

"Then will be found among the race of mankind peace, love, benevolence, fidelity, tranquillity, rest, banquets, feastings, joy, gladness, gold, silver, small money, chains, rings, with other ware and chaffer of that nature, to trot from hand to hand. No suits at laws, no wars, no strife, debate, nor wrangling; none will be there an usurer, none will be there a pinch-penny, a scrape-good wretch, or churlish hard-hearted refuser. Good

God! will not this be the golden age in the reign of Saturn; the true idea of the Olympic regions, wherein all other virtues ceasing, charity alone ruleth, governeth, domineereth, and triumpheth? All will be fair and goodly people there, all just and virtuous.

“Oh, happy world! Oh, people of that world most happy! Yea, thrice and four times blessed is that people! I think, in very deed, that I am amongst them, and swear to you, by my good forsooth, that if this glorious aforesaid world had a pope, abounding with cardinals, that so he might have the association of a sacred college, in the space of very few years you should be sure to see the saints much thicker in the roll, more numerous, wonder-working, and miraculous, more services, more vows, more staves and wax-candles, than are all those in the nine bishoprics of Brittany, Saint Yves only excepted. Consider, sir, I pray you, how the noble Patelin, having a mind to deify, and extol even to the third heaven, the father of William Josseaume, said no more but this, ‘And he did lend his goods to those who were desirous of them.’

“Oh, the fine saying! Now let our microcosm be fancied conform to this model in all its members; lending, borrowing, and owing, that is to say, according to its own nature. For nature hath not to any other end created man, but to owe, borrow, and lend; no greater is the harmony amongst the heavenly spheres than that which shall be found in its well-ordered policy. The intention of the founder of this microcosm is to have a soul therein to be entertained, which is lodged there, as a guest with its host, that it may live there for a while. Life consists in blood; blood is the seat of the soul; therefore the chiefest work of the microcosm is to be making blood continually.

“At this forge are exercised all the members of the body; none is exempted from labour, each takes its part, and does its proper office. And such is their hierarchy, that perpetually the one borrows from the other, the one lends the other, and the one is the other’s debtor. The stuff and matter convenient which nature gives to be turned into blood is bread and wine. All kind of nourishing victuals is understood to be comprehended in these two, and hence in the Gothish tongue is called companage. To find out this meat and drink, to prepare and boil it, the hands are put to work; the feet do walk and bear up the whole bulk of the corporal mass; the eyes guide and conduct all; the appetite in the orifice of the stomach, by means of a little sourish black humour, called melancholy, which is transmitted thereto from the milt, gives warning to shut in the food. The tongue makes the first essay, and tastes it, the teeth chews it, and the stomach receives, digests, and chillifies it. The mesaraic veins suck out of it what is good and fit, leaving behind the excrements, which are, through special conduits for that purpose, voided by an expulsive faculty. Thereafter it is carried to the liver, where it being changed again, it, by the virtue of that new transmutation, becomes blood. What joy, conjecture you, will then be found amongst those officers when they see this rivulet of gold, which is their sole restorative? No greater is the joy of alchemists when, after long travail, toil, and expense, they see in their furnaces the transmutation. Then is it that every member prepares itself, and strives anew to purify and to refine this treasure. The kidneys, through the emulgent veins, draw that aquosity thence which you call urine, and there send it away through the ureters to be slipped downwards; where, in a lower receptacle, and proper for it, to wit, the bladder, it is kept, and stays there until an opportunity presents to void it out. The spleen draweth from the blood its terrestrial part, viz., the grounds, lees, or thick substance settled in the bottom thereof, which you term melancholy. The bottle of the gall subtracts thence all the superfluous choler, whence it is brought to another shop or workhouse to be yet better purified and fined, that is, the heart, which by its agitation of diastolic and systolic motions so neatly subtilises and inflames it, that in the right side ventricle it is brought to perfection, and through the veins is sent to all the members. Each parcel of the body draws it then unto itself, and after its own fashion is cherished and alimented by it. Feet, hands, thighs, arms, eyes, ears, back, breasts, yea, all; and then it is that who before were lenders now become debtors. The heart in its left side ventricle so thinnifies the blood that it thereby obtains the name of spiritual; which being sent through the arteries to all the members of the body, serves to warm and winnow the other blood which runs through the veins. The lights never cease with its lappets and bellows to cool and refresh it; in acknowledgment of which good, the heart, through the arterial vein, imparts unto it the choicest of its blood. At last it is made so fine and subtle within the rete mirabile that thereafter those animal spirits are framed and composed of it; by means whereof the imagination, discourse, judgment, resolution, deliberation, ratiocination, and memory have their rise, actings, and operations.

“Copsbody, I sink, I drown, I perish, I wander astray, and quite fly out of myself, when I enter into the consideration of the profound abyss of this world, thus lending, thus owing. Believe me, it is a divine thing to lend; to owe, an heroic virtue. Yet is not this all. This little world, thus lending, owing, and borrowing, is so good and charitable, that no sooner is the above-specified alimentation finished, but that it forthwith projects, and already forecasts, how it shall lend to those who are not as yet born, and by that loan endeavour, what it may, to eternise itself, and multiply in images like the pattern, that is, children. To this end every member does, of the choicest and most precious of its nourishment, pare and cut off a portion, then instantly despatches it downwards to that place where nature has prepared for it very fit vessels and receptacles, through which descending to the genitories by long ambages, circuits, and flexuosities, it receives a competent form, and rooms apt enough both in the man and woman for the future conservation and perpetuating of human kind. All this is done by loans and debts of the one unto the other; and hence have we this word, the debt of marriage. Nature reckons pain to the refuser, with a most grievous vexation to his members, and an outrageous fury amidst his senses. But, on the other part, to the lender a set reward, accompanied with pleasure, joy, solace, mirth, and merry glee."

CHAPTER V.

How Pantagruel abhors Debtors and Borrowers.

"I UNDERSTAND you very well," responded Pantagruel, "and take you to be very good at topics, and thoroughly in love with your own cause. But preach it up, and argue it, prattle on it, and defend it as much as you will, even from hence to the next Whitsuntide, if you please so to do, yet in the end you will be astonished to find how you shall have gained no ground at all upon me, nor persuaded me by your fair speeches and smooth talk to enter never so little into the thralldom of debt. 'You shall owe to none,' saith the Holy Apostle, 'anything save love, friendship, and a mutual benevolence.'

"You serve me here, I confess, with fine graphides and diatypooses, descriptions and figures, which truly please me very well. But let me tell you, if you will represent to your fancy an impudent, blustering bully, and an importunate borrower, entering afresh and newly into a town already informed of his manners, you shall find that at his ingress the citizens will be more hideously affrighted and amazed, and in a greater terror and fear, dread and trembling, than if the pest itself should step into it, in the very same garb and accoutrements wherein the Tyanean philosopher found it within the city of Ephesus. And I am fully confirmed in the opinion that the Persians erred not when they said that the second vice was to lie, the first being that of owing money. For, in very truth, debts and lying are ordinarily joined together. I will, nevertheless, not hence infer that none must owe anything, or lend anything. For who so rich can be that sometimes may not owe? or who can be so poor that sometimes may not lend?"

“Let the occasion, notwithstanding, in that case, as Plato very wisely remarks, and ordains in his laws, be such that none be permitted to draw any water out of his neighbour’s well until first they by continual digging and delving into their own proper ground shall have hit upon a kind of potter’s earth, which is called Ceramite, and there had found no source or drop of water; for that sort of earth, by reason of its substance, which is fat, strong, firm, and close, so retains its humidity that it does not easily evaporate it by any outward excursion or evaporation.

“In good sooth, it is a great shame to choose rather to be still borrowing in all places from every one than to work and win. Then only, in my judgment, should one lend, when the diligent, toiling, and industrious person is no longer able by his labour to make any purchase unto himself; or otherwise, when by mischance he hath suddenly fallen into an unexpected loss of his goods.

“Howsoever, let us leave this discourse, and henceforward do not hang upon creditors, nor tie yourself to them. I make account for the time past to rid you freely of them, and from their bondage to deliver you.” “The least I should in this point,” quoth Panurge, “is to thank you, though it be the most I can do. And if gratitude and thanksgiving be to be estimated and prized by the affection of the benefactor, that is to be done infinitely and sempiternally; for the love which you bear me of your own accord and free grace, without any merit of mine, goes far beyond the reach of any price or value. It transcends all weight, all number, all measure; it is endless and everlasting; therefore, should I offer to measure and adjust it, either to the size and proportion of your own noble and gracious deeds, or yet to the contentment and delight of the obliged receivers, I would come off but very faintly and flaggingly. You have verily done me a great deal of good, and multiplied your favours on me more frequently than was fitting to one of my condition. You have been more bountiful towards me than I have deserved, and your courtesies have by far surpassed the extent of my merits; I must needs confess it. But it is not, as you suppose, in the proposed matter. For it is not there where I itch, it is not there where it fretteth, hurts, or vexes me; for, henceforth, being quit and out of debt, what countenance will I be able to keep? You may imagine that it will become me very ill for the first month, because I have never hitherto been brought up or accustomed to it. I am very much afraid of it. Furthermore, there shall not one hereafter, native of the country of Salmygondy, but he shall level the shot towards my nose. All the back-cracking fellows of the world, in discharging of their postern petarades, used commonly to say, Voila pour les quittes; that is, For the quit. My life will be of very short continuance, I do forsee it. I recommend to you the making of my epitaph; for I perceive I will die confected in the very stench of farts. If at any time to come, by way of restorative to such good women as shall happen to be troubled with the grievous pain of the wind-colic, the ordinary medicaments do not prove at all effectual, the mummy of all my befarted body will straight be as a present remedy appointed by the physicians; whereof they, taking any small modicum, it will incontinently for their ease afford them a rattle of bum-shot like a volley of muskets.

"Therefore would I beseech you to leave me some few centuries of debts; as King Louis the Eleventh, exempting from suits in law the Reverend Miles d'Illiers, Bishop of Chartres, was by the said bishop most earnestly solicited to leave him some few for the exercise of his mind. I had rather give them all my revenue of the periwinkles, together with the other incomes of the locusts, albeit I should not thereby have any parcel abated from off the principal sums which I owe." "Let us waive this matter," quoth Pantagruel, "I have told it you over again."

CHAPTER VI.

Why Newly-Married Men were exempted from going to the Wars.

"BUT, in the interim," asked Panurge, "by what law was it constituted, ordained, and established that such as should plant a new vineyard, those that should build a new house, and the newly-married men, should be exempted and discharged from the duty of warfare for the first year?" "By the law," answered Pantagruel, "of Moses." "Why," replied Panurge, "the lately married? As for the vine-planters, I am now too old to reflect on them; my condition at the present moment induces me to remain satisfied with the care of vintage, finishing and turning the grapes into wine. Nor are these pretty new builders of dead stones written or pricked down in my Book of Life. It is all with live stones that I set up and erect the fabrics of my architecture, to wit, Men." "It was, according to my opinion," quoth Pantagruel, "to the end, first, that the newly-married folks should for the first year reap a full and complete fruition of their pleasures in their mutual exercise of the act of love, in such sort that, in waiting more at leisure on the production of posterity, and propagating of their progeny, they might the better increase their race, and make provision of new heirs. That if, in the years thereafter, the men should, upon their undergoing of some military adventure, happen to be killed, their names and coats of arms might continue with their children in the same families. And next, that the wives thereby coming to know whether they were barren or fruitful (for one year's trial, in regard to the maturity of age wherein of old they married, was held sufficient for the discovery), they might pitch the more suitably, in case of their first husband's decease, upon a second match. The fertile women to be wedded to those who desire to multiply their issue; and the sterile ones to such other mates as, misregarding the storing of their own lineage, choose them only for their virtues, learning, genteel behaviour, domestic consolation, management of the house, and matrimonial conveniences and comforts, and such like." "The preachers of Varennes," said Panurge, "detest and abhor the second marriages as altogether foolish and dishonest."

"Foolish and dishonest?" quoth Pantagruel. "A plague take such preachers!" "Yea, but," quoth Panurge, "the like mischief also befell the Friar Charmer, who in a full auditory, making a sermon at Pareilly, and therein abominating the reiteration of marriage, and the entering again the bonds of a nuptial tie, did swear and heartily give himself to the swiftest devil in hell if he had not rather choose, and would much more willingly undertake, the unmaidening or depucelating of a hundred virgins than the simple drudgery of one widow. Truly I find your reason in that point right good, and strongly grounded.

"But what would you think if the cause why this exemption or immunity was granted had no other foundation but that, during the whole space of the said first year, they so lustily bobbed it with their female consorts, as both reason and equity require they should do, that they had drained and evacuated their spermatic vessels, and were become thereby altogether feeble, weak, emasculated, drooping, and flaggingly pithless; yea, in such sort, that they, in the day of battle, like ducks which plunge over head and ears, would sooner hide themselves behind the baggage than in the company of valiant fighters and daring military combatants, appear where stern Bellona deals her blows, and moves a bustling noise of thwacks and thumps? Nor is it to be thought that, under the standards of Mars, they will so much as once strike a fair stroke, because their most considerable knocks have been already jerked and whirritated within the curtains of his sweetheart Venus.

"In confirmation of this, amongst other relics and monuments of antiquity, we now as yet often see that in all great houses, after the expiry of a few days, these young married blades are readily sent away to visit their uncles, that in the absence of their wives, reposing themselves a little, they may recover their decayed strength by the recruit of a fresh supply, the more vigorous to return again and face about to renew the duelling shock and contact of an amorous dalliance, albeit for the greater part they have neither uncle nor aunt to go to.

“Just so did the King Crackart,* after the battle of the Cornets, not cashier us (speaking properly), I mean me and the quail-piper, but for our refreshment remanded us to our houses; and he is as yet seeking after his own. My grandfather’s god-mother was wont to say to me when I was a boy,—

‘Not orisons nor patenotres
 Shall ever disorder my brain;
 One cadet, to the field as he flutters,
 Is worth two when they end the campaign.’

“That which prompts me to that opinion is, that the vine-planters did seldom eat of the grapes, or drink of the wine of their labour, till the first year was wholly elapsed. During all which time also the builders did hardly inhabit their new-structured dwelling places, for fear of dying suffocated through want of respiration; as Galen has most learnedly remarked in the second book of the Difficulty of Breathing. Under favour, sir, I have not asked this question without cause causing, and reason truly very ratiocinant. Be not offended, I pray you.”

CHAPTER VII.

How Panurge had a Flea in His Ear, and desisted from wearing His Magnificent Codpiece.

PANURGE, the day thereafter, had his right ear pierced after the Jewish fashion, and thereto clasped a little gold ring of a fearny-like kind of workmanship, in the bezil or collet whereof was set and enchased a flea; and, to the end you may be rid of all doubts, you are to know that the flea was black. Oh, what a brave thing it is, in every case and circumstance of a matter, to be thoroughly well informed! The sum of the expense hereof being cast up, brought in, and laid down upon his council-board carpet, was found to amount to no more quarterly than the charge of the nuptials of a Hircanian tigress; even as you would say 609,000 maravedis. At these vast costs and excessive disbursements, as soon as he perceived himself to be out of debt, he fretted much; and afterwards, as tyrants and lawyers use to do, he nourished and fed her with the sweat and blood of his subjects and clients.

He then took four French ells of a coarse brown russet cloth, and therein apparelling himself, as with a long, plain-seamed, and single-stitched gown, left off the wearing of his breeches, and tied a pair of spectacles to his cap. In this equipage did he present himself before Pantagrue; to whom this disguise appeared the more strange that he did not, as before, see that goodly, fair, and stately codpiece, which was the sole anchor of hope whereon he was wont to rely, and the last refuge he had amidst all the waves and boisterous billows which a stormy cloud in a cross fortune would raise up against him. Honest Pantagrue, not understanding the mystery, asked him by way of interrogatory what he intended to personate in that newfangled prosopopeia. "I have," answered Panurge, "a flea in mine ear, and have a mind to marry." "At a good time," quoth Pantagrue, "you have told me joyful tidings. Yet would not I hold a red-hot iron in my hand for all the gladness of them. But it is not the fashion of lovers to be accoutred in such dangling vestments, so as to have their shirts flagging down over their knees, without breeches, and with a long robe of a dark brown mingled hue, which is a colour never used in Talarian garments amongst any persons of honour, quality, or virtue. If some heretical persons and schismatical sectaries have at any time formerly been so arrayed and clothed (though many have imputed such a kind of dress to cozenage, cheat, imposture, and an affectation of tyranny upon credulous minds of the rude multitude), I will nevertheless not blame them for it, nor in that point judge rashly or sinistrously of them. Every one overflowingly abounds in his own sense and fancy; yea, in things of a foreign consideration, altogether extrinsical and indifferent, which in and of themselves are neither commendable nor bad, because they proceed not from the interior of the thoughts and heart, which is the shop of all good and evil; of goodness, if it be upright, and that its affections be regulated by the pure and clean spirit of righteousness; and, on the other side, of wickedness, if its inclinations, straying beyond the bounds of equity, be corrupted and depraved by the malice and the suggestions of the devil. It is only the novelty and newfangledness thereof which I dislike, together with the contempt of common custom and the fashion which is in use.

"The colour," answered Panurge, "is convenient, for it is conformable to that of my council-board carpet; therefore will I henceforth hold to it, and more narrowly and circumspectly than ever hitherto I have done, look to my affairs and business. Seeing I am once out of debt, you never yet saw man more unpleasing than I will be, if God help me not. Lo, here are my spectacles. To see me afar off, you would readily say that it were Friar John Burgess. I believe certainly that in the next ensuing year I shall once more preach the crusade, bounce buckram. Do you see this russet? Doubt not but there lurketh under it some hidden property and occult virtue known to very few in the world. I did not take it on before this morning, and nevertheless am already in a rage after lust, mad after a wife, and vehemently hot upon untying the codpiece-point; I itch, I tingle, I wriggle, and long exceedingly to be married, that, without the danger of cudgel blows, I may labour my female copesmate with the hard push of a grey friar devil. Oh, the provident and thrifty husband that I then will be! After my death, with all honour and respect due to my frugality, will they burn the sacred bulk of my body, of purpose to preserve the ashes thereof, in memory of the choicest pattern that ever was of a perfectly wary and complete householder. Copsbody, this is not the carpet whereon my treasurer shall be allowed to play false in his accounts with me, by setting down an X for a V, or an L for an S. For in that case should I make a hail of fisticuffs to fly into his face. Look upon me, sir, both before and behind; it is made after the manner of a toga, which was the ancient fashion of the Romans in time of peace. I took the mode, shape, and form thereof in Trajan's Column at Rome, as also in the Triumphal Arch of Septimus Severus. I am tired of the wars, weary of wearing buff-coats, cassocks, and hoquetons. My shoulders are pitifully worn and bruised with the carrying of harness. Let armour cease, and the long robe bear sway! At least it must be so for the whole space of the succeeding year if I be married, as yesterday, by the Mosaic law, you evidenced. In what concerns the breeches, my great aunt Laurence did long ago tell me that the breeches were only ordained for the use of the codpiece, and to no other end; which I upon a no less forcible consequence give credit to every whit, as well as to the saying of the fine fellow Galen, who, in his ninth book of the Use and Employment of our Members, alleges that the head was made for the eyes. For nature might have placed our heads in our knees or elbows, but having beforehand determined that the eyes should serve to discover things from afar, she for the better enabling them to execute their designed office, fixed them in the head, as on the top of a long pole, in the most eminent part of all the body: no otherwise than we see the phares, or high towers, erected in the mouths of havens, that navigators may the further off perceive with ease the lights of the nightly fires and lanterns. And because I would gladly, for some short while (a year at least) take a little rest and breathing time from the toilsome labour of the military profession, that is to say, be married, I have desisted from wearing any longer a codpiece, and, consequently, have laid aside my breeches. For the codpiece is the principal and most especial piece of armour that a warrior doth carry; and therefore do I maintain, even to the fire (exclusively, understand you me), that no Turks can properly be said to be armed men, in regard that codpieces are by their law forbidden to be worn.

CHAPTER VIII.

“WILL you maintain,” quoth Pantagruel, “that the codpiece is the chief piece of a military harness? It is a new kind of doctrine, very paradoxical; for we say, at the spurs begins the arming of a man.” “Sir, I maintain it,” answered Panurge, “and not wrongfully do I maintain it. Behold how nature,—having a fervent desire after its production of plants, trees, shrubs, herbs, sponges, and plant-animals, to eternise and continue them unto all succession of ages—in their several kinds or sorts, at least, although the individuals perish—unruinable, and in an everlasting being,—has most curiously armed and fenced their buds, sprouts, shoots, and seeds, wherein the above-mentioned perpetuity consists, by strengthening, covering, guarding, and fortifying them, with an admirable industry, with husks, cases, scarfs, and swads, hulls, cods, stones, films, cartels, shells, ears, rinds, barks, skins, ridges, and prickles, which serve them instead of strong, fair, and natural codpieces. As is manifestly apparent in pease, beans, fasels, pomegranates, peaches, cottons, gourds, pumpions, melons, corn, lemons, almonds, walnuts, filberts, and chestnuts; as likewise in all plants, slips, or sets whatsoever wherein it is plainly and evidently seen that the sperm and semence is more closely veiled, overshadowed, corroborated, and thoroughly harnessed, than any other part, portion, or parcel of the whole.

“Nature, nevertheless, did not after that manner provide for the sempiternising of the human race; but, on the contrary, created man naked, tender, and frail, without either offensive or defensive arms, and that in the estate of innocence, in the first age of all, which was the golden season; not as a plant, but living creature, born for peace, not war, and brought forth into the world with an unquestionable right and title to the plenary fruition and enjoyment of all fruits and vegetables, as also to a certain calm and gentle rule and dominion over all kinds of beasts, fowls, fishes, reptiles, and insects. Yet afterwards it happening in the time of the iron age, under the reign of Jupiter, when, to the multiplication of mischievous actions, wickedness and malice began to take root and footing within the then perverted hearts of men, that the earth began to bring forth nettles, thistles, thorns, briars, and such other stubborn and rebellious vegetables to the nature of man. Nor was there hardly any animal which by a fatal disposition did not then revolt from him, and tacitly conspire and covenant with one another to serve him no longer, nor, in case of their ability to resist, to do him any manner of obedience, but rather, to the uttermost of their power, to annoy him with all the hurt and harm they could. The man, then, that he might maintain his primitive right and prerogative, and continue his sway and dominion over all, both vegetable and sensitive creatures, and knowing of a truth that he could not be well accommodated, as he ought, without the servitude and subjection of several animals, bethought himself that of necessity he must needs put on arms, and make provision of harness against wars and violence. "By the holy Saint Babingoose,"* cried out Pantagrue, "you are become, since the last rain, a great liferelofre—philosopher, I should say." "Take notice, sir," quoth Panurge, "when Dame Nature had prompted him to his own arming, what part of the body it was where, by her inspiration, he clapped on the first harness. It was forsooth by the double pluck † of my little dog the ballock, and good Senor Don Priapos Stabo-stando—which done, he was content, and sought no more. This is certified by the testimony of the great Hebrew captain and philosopher Moses, who affirms that he fenced that member with a brave and gallant codpiece, most exquisitely framed, and by right curious devices of a notably pregnant invention made up and composed of fig tree leaves, which, by reason of their solid stiffness, incisory notches, curled frising, sleeked smoothness, large ampleness, together with their colour, smell, virtue, and faculty, were exceeding proper, and fit for the covering and arming of the sachels of generation, the hideously big Lorrain cullions being thence only excepted; which swaggering down to the lowermost bottom of the breeches, cannot abide (for being quite out of all order and method) the stately fashion of the high and lofty codpiece, as is manifest by the noble Valentin Viardiere, whom I found at Nancy, on the first day of May—the more flauntingly to gallantise it afterwards—rubbing his ballocks spread out upon a table after the manner of a Spanish cloak. Wherefore it is that none should henceforth say, who would not speak improperly, when any country bumpkin lieth to the wars, 'Have a care, my roister, of the wine-pot,' that is, the skull, but 'Have a care, my roister, of the milk-pot,' that is the testicles. By the whole rabble of the horned fiends of hell, the head being cut off, that single person only thereby dieth. But, if the ballocks be marred, the whole race of human kind would forthwith perish, and be lost for ever.

“This was the motive which incited the goodly writer Galen, lib. 1, de Spermate, to aver with boldness that it were better, that is to say, a less evil, to have no heart at all, than to be quite destitute of genitories; for in them is laid up, conserved, and put in store as in a secessive repository, and sacred warehouse, the semence and original source of the whole offspring of mankind. Therefore would I be apt to believe, for less than a hundred francs, that those are the very same stones by means whereof Deucalion and Pyrrha restored the human race, in peopling with men and women the world, which a little before that had been drowned in the overflowing waves of a poetical deluge. This stirred up the valiant Justinian, lib. 4, de Cagotis tollendis, to collocate his summum bonum, in braguibus, et braguetis. For this, and other causes, the Lord Humphry de Merville, following his king to a certain warlike expedition, whilst he was in trying upon his own person a new suit of armour, for of his old rusty harness he could make no more use, by reason that some few years since the skin of his belly was a great way removed from his kidneys, his lady thereupon, in the profound musing of a contemplative spirit, very maturely considering that he had but small care of the staff of love and packet of marriage, seeing he did not otherwise arm that part of the body than with links of mail, advised him to shield, fence, and gabionate it with a big tilting helmet, which she had lying in her closet, to her otherways utterly unprofitable. On this lady were penned these subsequent verses, which are extant in the third book of the Shitbrena of Paultry Wenches:—

‘When Yoland saw her spouse equipped for fight,
And, save the codpiece, all in armour dight,
“My dear,” she cried, “Why, pray, of all the rest
Is that exposed you know I love the best?”
Was she to blame for an ill-manag’d fear,
Or rather pious conscionable care?
Wise lady, she! In hurly-burly fight,
Can any tell where random blows may light?

“Leave off then, sir, from being astonished, and wonder no more at this new manner of decking and trimming up of myself as you now see me.”

CHAPTER IX.

How Panurge asks Counsel of Pantagruel whether He should Marry, Yea or Nay.

PANTAGRUEL not replying to this, Panurge prosecuted the discourse he had already broached, and therewithal fetching, as from the bottom of his heart, a very deep sigh, said, "My lord and master, you have heard the design I am upon, which is to marry, if by some disastrous mischance all the holes in the world be not shut up, stopped, closed, and bushed. I humbly beseech you, for the affection which of a long time you have borne me, to give me your best advice therein." "Then," answered Pantagruel, "seeing you have so decreed and taken deliberation thereon, and that the matter is fully determined, what need is there of any further talk about it, but forthwith to put into execution what you have resolved?" "Yea, but," quoth Panurge, "I would be loth to act therein without your counsel had thereto." "It is my judgment also," quoth Pantagruel, "and I advise you to it." "Nevertheless," quoth Panurge, "if I understood aright that it were much better for me to remain a bachelor as I am than to run headlong upon new hair-brained undertakings of conjugal adventure, I would rather choose not to marry." Quoth Pantagruel, "Then do not marry." "Yea, but," quoth Panurge, "would you have me so solitarily drag out the whole course of my life without the comfort of a matrimonial consort? You know it is written: Væ soli! and a single person is never seen to reap the joy and solace that is found with married folks." "Then marry, in the name of God," quoth Pantagruel. "But if," quoth Panurge, "my wife should make me a cuckold—as it is not unknown unto you how this has been a very plentiful year in the production of that kind of cattle—I would fly off the hinges, and grow impatient beyond all measure and mean. I love cuckolds with all my heart, for they seem unto me to be of a right honest conversation, and I truly do very willingly frequent their society; but should I die for it, I would not be one of their number. That is a point for me of a too sore prickling point." "Then do not marry," quoth Pantagruel, "for without all controversy this sentence of Seneca is infallibly true, 'What thou to others shalt have done, others will do the like to thee.' "Do you," quoth Panurge, "aver that without all exception?" "Yes, truly," quoth Pantagruel, "without all exception." "Ho, ho," says Panurge, "by the wrath of a little devil, his meaning is, either in this world or in the other which is to come. Yet seeing I can no more do without a wife than a blind man without his staff—for the funnel must be in agitation, without which manner of occupation I cannot live—were it not a great deal better for me to apply and associate myself to some one honest, lovely, and virtuous woman, than as I do, by a new change of females every day, run a hazard of being bastinadoed, or (which is worse) of the great pox, if not of both together. For never—be it spoken by their husbands' leave and favour—had I enjoyment yet of an honest woman." "Marry, then, in God's name," quoth Pantagruel. "But if," quoth Panurge, "it were the will of God, and that my destiny did unluckily lead me to marry an honest woman who should beat me, I would be stored with more than two-third parts of the patience of Job if I were not stark mad by it, and quite distracted with such rugged dealings. For it hath been told me that those exceeding honest women have ordinarily very wicked headpieces; therefore it is that their family lacks not for good vinegar. Yet, in that case, should it go worse with me, if I did not then in such sort bang her back and breast, so thumpingly bethwack her gilletts, to wit, her arms, legs, head, lights, liver, and milt, with her other entrails, and mangle, jag, and slash her coats so, after the cross-billet fashion, that the greatest devil of hell should wait at the gate for the reception of her damned soul. I could make a shift for this year to waive such molestation and disquiet, and be content to lay aside that trouble, and not to be engaged in it."

"Do not marry, then," answered Pantagruel. "Yea, but," quoth Panurge, "considering the condition wherein I now am, out of debt and unmarried; mark what I say, free from all debt, in an ill hour! for, were I deeply on the score, my creditors would be but too careful of my paternity, but being quit, and not married, nobody will be so regardful of me, or carry towards me a love like that which is said to be in a conjugal affection. And if by some mishap I should fall sick, I would be looked to very waywardly. The wise man saith, where there is no woman, I mean the mother of a family and wife in the union of a lawful wedlock, the crazy and diseased are in danger of being ill-used, and of having much brabbling and strife about them: as by clear experience hath been made apparent in the persons of popes, legates, cardinals, bishops, abbots, priors, priests, and monks; but there, assure yourself, you shall not find me." "Marry, then, in the name of God," answered Pantagruel. "But if," quoth Panurge, "being ill at ease, and possibly through that distemper being unable to discharge the matrimonial duty that is incumbent to an active husband, my wife, impatient of that drooping sickness and faint-fits of a pining languishment, should abandon and prostitute herself to the embraces of another man, and not only then not help and assist me in my extremity and need, but withal flout at and make sport of that my grievous distress and calamity; or, peradventure, which is worse, embezzle my goods, and steal from me, as I have seen it oftentimes befall unto the lot of many other men, it were enough to undo me utterly, to fill brimful the cup of my misfortune, and make me play the madpate reeks of Bedlam." "Do not marry, then," quoth Pantagrue. "Yea, but," said Panurge, "I shall never by any other means come to have lawful sons and daughters, in whom I may harbour some hope of perpetuating my name and arms, and to whom also I may leave and bequeath my inheritances and purchased goods (of which latter sort you need not doubt but that in some one or other of these mornings I will make a fair and goodly show), that so I may cheer up and make merry, when otherwise I should be plunged into a peevish, sullen mood of pensive sullenness, as I do perceive daily by the gentle and loving carriage of your kind and gracious father towards you; as all honest folks use to do at their own homes and private dwelling-houses. For being free from debt, and yet not married, if casually I should fret and be angry, although the cause of my grief and displeasure were never so just, I am afraid, instead of consolation, that I should meet with nothing else but scoffs, frumps, gibes, and mocks at my disastrous fortune." "Marry, then, in the name of God," quoth Pantagrue; "and thus have I given you my advice."

CHAPTER X.

*How Pantagrue represents unto Panurge the Difficulty of giving Advice in the Matter of Marriage; and of the Homeric and Virgilian Lotteries.**

"YOUR counsel," quoth Panurge, "under your correction and favour, seems unto me not unlike the song of Gammer Yea-by-nay. It is full of sarcasms, mockeries, bitter taunts, nipping bobs, derisive quips, biting jerks, and contradictory iterations, the one part destroying the other. I know not," added Panurge, "which of all your answers to lay hold on." "Good reason why," quoth Pantagrue, "for your proposals are so full of ifs and buts that I can ground nothing on them, nor pitch upon any solid and positive determination satisfactory to what is demanded by them. Are not you assured within yourself of what you have a mind to? The chief and main point of the whole matter lies there. All the rest is merely casual, and totally depends upon the fatal disposition of the heavens.

“We see some so happy in the fortune of this nuptial encounter, that their family shines, as it were, with the radiant effulgency of an idea, model, or representation of the joys of paradise; and perceive others, again, to be so unluckily matched in the conjugal yoke, that those very basest of devils, which tempt the hermits that inhabit the deserts of Thebais and Montserrat, are not more miserable than they. It is therefore expedient, seeing you are resolved for once to make a trial of the state of marriage, that, with shut eyes, bowing your head and kissing the ground, you put the business to a venture, and give it a fair chance, in recommending the success of the residue to the disposal of Almighty God. It lies not in my power to give you any other manner of assurance, or otherwise to certify you of what shall ensue on this your undertaking. Nevertheless, if it please you, this you may do. Bring hither Virgil’s poems, that after having opened the book, and with our fingers severed the leaves thereof three several times, we may, according to the number agreed upon between ourselves, explore the future hap of your intended marriage. For frequently by a Homeric lottery have many hit upon their destinies, as is testified in the person of Socrates, who, whilst he was in prison, hearing the recitation of this verse of Homer, said of Achilles, in the ninth of the Iliads—thereby foresaw that on the third subsequent day he was to die. Of the truth whereof he assured Æschines; as Plato, in Critone, Cicero in primo, de Divinatione, Diogenes, Laertius, and others, have to the full recorded in their works. The like is also witnessed by Opilius Macrinus, to whom, being desirous to know if he should be the Roman Emperor, befell by chance of lot this sentence, in the eighth of the Iliads—

‘Dotard, new warriors urge thee to be gone;
Thy life decays, and old age weighs thee down.’

“In fact, he, being then somewhat ancient, had hardly enjoyed the sovereignty of the empire for the space of fourteen months, when by Heliogabalus, then both young and strong, he was dispossessed thereof, thrust out of all, and killed. Brutus also bears witness of another experiment of this nature, who willing, through this exploratory way, by lot to learn what the event and issue should be of the Pharsalian battle, wherein he perished, he casually encountered on this verse, said of Patroclus, in the sixteenth of the Iliads—

‘Fate, and Latona’s son have shot me dead.’

“And accordingly Apollo was the field-word in the dreadful day of that fight. Divers notable things of old have likewise been foretold and known by casting of Virgilian lots; yea, in matters of no less importance than the obtaining of the Roman Empire, as it happened to Alexander Severus, who, trying his fortune at the said kind of lottery, hit upon this verse, written in the sixth of the Æneids—

‘Know, Roman, that thy business is to reign.’

“He within very few years thereafter was effectually and in good earnest created and installed Roman emperor. A similar story thereto is related of Adrian, who, being hugely perplexed within himself out of a longing humour to know in what account he was with the Emperor Trajan, and how large the measure of that affection was which he bore unto him, had recourse, after the manner above specified, to the Maronian lottery, which by haphazard tendered him these lines out of the sixth of the Æneids—

‘But who is he, conspicuous from afar,
With olive boughs, that doth his offerings bear?
By the white hair and beard I know him plain
The Roman king.’

“Shortly thereafter was he adopted by Trajan, and succeeded him in the empire. Moreover, to the lot of the praiseworthy Emperor Claudius befell this line of Virgil, written in the first of his Æneids—

‘Whilst the third summer saw him reign a king
In Latium.’

“And in effect he did not reign above two years. To the said Claudian also, inquiring concerning his brother Quintilius, whom he proposed as a colleague with himself in the empire, happened the response following, in the sixth of the Æneids—

‘Whom fate just let us see,
And would no longer suffer him to be.’

And so it fell out; for he was killed on the seventeenth day after he had attained unto the management of the imperial charge. The very same lot also, with the like mishap, did betide the Emperor Gordian the younger. To Claudius Albinus, being very solicitous to understand something of his future adventures, did occur this saying, which is written in the sixth of the Æneids—

‘The Romans boiling with tumultuous rage,
This warrior shall the dangerous storm assuage;
With victories he the Carthaginian mauls,
And with strong hand shall crush the rebel Gauls.’

“Likewise when the Emperor D. Claudius, Aurelian’s predecessor, did with great eagerness research after the fate to come of his posterity, his fortune was to alight on this verse, in the first of the Æneids—

‘No bounds are to be set, no limits here.’

Which was fulfilled by the goodly genealogical row of his race. When Mr Peter Amy did in like manner explore and make trial if he should escape the ambush of the hobgoblins who lay in wait all-to-bemaul him, he fell upon this verse, in the third of the Æneids—

‘Ah, flee the bloody land, the wicked shore!’

Which counsel he obeying, safe and sound, forthwith avoided all their ambuscades.

“Were it not to avoid prolixity, I could enumerate a thousand such like adventures, which, conformable to the dictate and verdict of the verse, have by that manner of lot-casting encounter befallen to the curious researchers of them. Do not you, nevertheless, imagine, lest you should be deluded, that I would upon this kind of fortune-flinging proof infer an uncontrollable and not to be gainsaid infallibility of truth.”

CHAPTER XI.

“It would be sooner done,” quoth Panurge, “and more expeditiously, if we should try the matter at the chance of three fair dice.” Quoth Pantagruel, “That sort of lottery is deceitful, abusive, illicitous, and exceeding scandalous. Never trust in it. The accursed book of the Recreation of Dice was a great while ago excogitated in Achaia near Bourre, by that ancient enemy of mankind, the infernal calumniator, who, before the statue or massive image of the Bouraïc Hercules, did of old, and does in several places of the world yet, make many simple souls to err and fall into his snares. You know how my father Gargantua hath forbidden it over all his kingdoms and dominions; how he hath caused to burn the moulds and draughts thereof; and altogether suppressed, abolished, driven forth, and cast it out of the land, as a most dangerous plague and infection to any well-polished state or commonwealth. What I have told you of dice, I say the same of the play at cockall. It is a lottery of the like guile and deceitfulness; and, therefore, do not for convincing of me allege in opposition to this my opinion, or bring in the example of the fortunate cast of Tiberius, within the fountain of Aponus, at the oracle of Gerion. These are the baited hooks by which the devil attracts and draws unto him the foolish souls of silly people into eternal perdition.

"Nevertheless, to satisfy your humour in some measure, I am content you throw three dice upon this table, that, according to the number of the blots which shall happen to be cast up, we may hit upon a verse of that page which, in the setting open of the book, you shall have pitched upon."

"Have you any dice in your pocket?" "A whole bagful," answered Panurge. "That is provision against the devil, as is expounded by Merlin Coccaius, lib. 2, de Patria Diabolorum. The devil would be sure to take me napping, and very much at unawares, if he should find me without dice." With this the three dice being taken out, produced, and thrown; they fell so pat upon the lower points that the cast was five, six, and five. "These are," quoth Panurge, "sixteen in all. Let us take the sixteenth line of the page. The number pleases me very well; I hope we shall have a prosperous and happy chance. May I be thrown amidst all the devils of hell, even as a great bowl cast athwart a set of ninepins, or cannon-ball shot among a battalion of foot, in case so many times I do not boult my future wife the first night of our marriage!" "Of that, forsooth, I make no doubt at all," quoth Pantagruel. "You needed not have rapped forth such a horrid imprecation, the sooner to procure credit for the performance of so small a business, seeing possibly the first bout will be amiss, and that, you know, is usually at tennis called fifteen. At the next justling turn you may readily amend that fault, and so complete your reckoning of sixteen." "Is it so," quoth Panurge, "that you understand the matter? And must my words be thus interpreted? Nay, believe me, never yet was any solecism committed by that valiant champion who often has for me in Belly-dale stood sentry at the hypogastrian cranny. Did you ever hitherto find me in the confraternity of the faulty. Never, I trow; never, nor ever shall, for ever and a day. I do the feat like a goodly friar, or father confessor, without default. And therein am I willing to be judged by the players." He had no sooner spoken these words than the works of Virgil were brought in. But before the book was laid open, Panurge said to Pantagruel, "My heart, like the fork of a hart in a rut, doth beat within my breast. Be pleased to feel and grope my pulse a little on this artery of my left arm. At its frequent rise and fall you would say that they swinge and belabour me after the manner of a probationer, posed and put to a peremptory trial in the examination of his sufficiency for the discharge of the learned luty of a graduate in some eminent degree in the college of the Sorbonists.

“But would you not hold it expedient, before we proceed any further, that we should invoke Hercules and the Tenetian goddesses, who in the chamber of lots are said to rule, sit in judgment, and bear a presidential sway?” “Neither him nor them,” answered Pantagruel; “only open up the leaves of the book with your fingers, and set your nails at work.

CHAPTER XII.

How Pantagruel doth explore by the Virgilian Lottery what Fortune Panurge shall have in His Marriage.

THEN at the opening of the book, in the sixteenth row of the lines of the disclosed page, Panurge encountered the following verse—

“The god him from his table banished, Nor would the goddess have him in her bed.”

“This response,” quoth Pantagruel, “maketh not very much for your benefit or advantage; for it plainly signifies and denotes that your wife shall be a strumpet, and yourself, by consequence, a cuckold. The goddess whom you shall not find propitious nor favourable unto you is Minerva, a most redoubtable and dreadful virgin, a powerful and fulminating goddess, an enemy to cuckolds and effeminate youngsters, to cuckold-makers and adulterers. The god is Jupiter, a terrible and thunder-striking god from heaven. And withal it is to be remarked that, conform to the doctrine of the ancient Hetrurians, the manubes, for so did they call the darting hurls or slinging casts of the Vulcanian thunderbolts, did only appertain to her, and to Jupiter her father capital. This was verified in the conflagration of the ships of Ajax Oileus; nor does this fulminating power belong to any other of the Olympic gods. Men, therefore, stand not in such fear of them. Moreover, I will tell you, and you may take it as extracted out of the profoundest mysteries of mythology, that when the giants had undertaken the waging of a war against the power of the celestial orbs, the gods at first laughed at those attempts, and scorned such despicable enemies, who were, in their conceit, not strong enough to cope in feats of warfare with their pages; but when they saw, by the gigantine labour, the high hill Pelion set on lofty Ossa, and that the mount Olympus was made shake, in order to be erected on the top of both, then did they all stand aghast.

“Then it was that Jupiter held a parliament, or general convention, wherein it was unanimously resolved upon, and consented to, by all the gods, that they should worthily and valiantly stand to their defence. And because they had often seen battles lost by the cumbersome lets and disturbing encumbrances of women, confusedly huddled in amongst armies, it was at that time decreed and enacted that they should expel and drive out of heaven, into Egypt and the confines of Nile, that whole crew of goddesses, disguised in the shapes of weasels polecats, bats, shrew-mice, ferrets, fulmarts, and other such lik odd transformations, only Minerva was reserved to participate with Jupiter in the horrific fulminating power, as being the goddess both of war and learning, of arts and arms, of counsel and despatch; a goddess armed from her birth, a goddess dreaded in heaven, in the air, by sea and land.” “By the belly of Saint Buff,” quoth Panurge, “should I be Vulcan, whom the poet blazons! Nay, I am neither a cripple, coiner of false money, nor smith as he was. My wife, possibly, will be as comely and handsome as ever was his Venus, but not a whore like her, nor I a cuckold like him. The crook-legged, slovenly slave made himself to be declared a cuckold by a definite sentence and judgment, in the open view of all the gods. For this cause ought you to interpret the aforementioned verse quite contrary to what you have said. This lot imports that my wife will be honest, virtuous, chaste, loyal, and faithful; not armed, surly, wayward, cross, giddy, humorous, heady, hair-brained, or extracted out of brains, as was the goddess Pallas; nor shall this fair, jolly Jupiter be my co-rival. He shall never dip his bread in my broth,* though we should sit together at one table.

“Consider his exploits and gallant actions. He was the most manifest ruffian, wench, whoremonger, and most infamous cuckold-maker that ever breathed. He did always lecher it like a boar, and no wonder, for he was fostered by a sow in the Isle of Candia, if Agathocles the Babylonian be not a liar, and more rammishly lascivious than a buck; whence it is that he is said by others to have been suckled and fed with milk of the Amalthæan goat. By the virtue of Acheron, he justled, bulled, and lastauriated in one day the third part of the world, beasts and people, floods and mountains; that was Europa. For this grand subagitary achievement, the Ammonians caused draw, delineate, and paint him in the figure and shape of a ram ramming and horned ram. But I know well enough how to shield and preserve myself from that horned champion. He will not, trust me, have to deal in my person with a sottish, dunsical Amphytrion, nor with a silly, witless Argus, for all his hundred spectacles, nor yet with the cowardly meacock Acrisius, the simple goosicap Lycus of Thebes, the doating blockhead Agenor, the phlegmatic pea-goose Asopus, rough-footed Lycaon, the luskish misshapen Corytus of Tuscany, nor with the large-backed and strong-reined Atlas. Let him alter, change, transform, and metamorphose himself into a hundred various shapes and figures, into a swan, a bull, a satyr, a shower of gold, or into a cuckoo, as he did when he unmaiden'd his sister Juno; into an eagle, ram, or dove, as when he was enamoured of the virgin Phthia, who then dwelt in the Ægean territory; into fire, a serpent, yea, even into a flea, into epicurean and democratical atoms, or, more magistronostalistically, into those sly intentions of the mind which in the schools are called second notions, I'll—catch him in the nick, and take him napping. And would you know what I would do unto him? Even that which to his father Cœlum Saturn did—Seneca foretold it of me, and Lactantius hath confirmed it—what the goddess Rhea did to Athis. I would make him two stone lighter, rid him of his Cyprian cimbals, and cut so close and neatly by the breech that there should not remain thereof so much as one pelet, so cleanly would I shave him, and disable him for ever from being pope, for Testiculos non habet.” “Hold, there,” said Pantagruel; “ho, soft and fair, my lad! Enough of that—cast up, turn over the leaves, and try your fortune for the second time.” Then he fell upon the ensuing verse—

“His joints and members quake, he becomes pale,
And sudden fear doth his cold blood congeal.”

“This imports,” quoth Pantagruel, “that she will soundly bang your back and belly.” “Clean and quite contrary,” answered Panurge; “it is of me that he prognosticates, in saying that I will beat her like a tiger if she vex me. Sir Martin Wagstaff will perform that office, and in default of a cudgel, the devil gulp him, if I should not eat her up quick, as Candaules the Lydian king did his wife, whom he ravened and devoured.”

“You are very stout,” says Pantagruel, “and courageous. Hercules himself dared hardly venture to scuffle with you in this your raging fury. Nor is it strange, for a cuckold is worth two; and two in fight against Hercules are too strong.” “Am I a cuckold?” quoth Panurge. “No, no,” answered Pantagruel. “My mind was only running upon the lurch and trictrac.” Thereafter he hit upon, at the third opening of the book, this verse—

“After the spoil and pillage, as in fire,
He burnt with a strong feminine desire.”

“This portends” quoth Pantagruel, “that she will steal your goods, and rob you. Hence this, according to these three drawn lots, will be your future destiny, I clearly see it—you will be a cuckold, you will be beaten, and you will be robbed.” “Nay, it is quite otherwise,” quoth Panurge, “for it is certain that this verse presages that she will love me with a perfect liking. Nor did the satire-writing poet lie in proof hereof when he affirmed that a woman, burning with extreme affection, takes sometimes pleasure to steal from her sweetheart. And what, I pray you? A glove, a point, or some such trifling toy of no importance, to make him keep a gentle kind of stirring in the research and quest thereof. In like manner, these small, scolding debates, and petty, brabbling contentions, which frequently we see spring up, and for a certain space boil very hot betwixt a couple of high-spirited lovers, are nothing else but recreative diversions for their refreshment, spurs to, and incentives of, a more fervent amity than ever. As, for example, we do sometimes see cutlers with hammers maul their finest whetstones, therewith to sharpen their iron tools the better. And therefore do I think that these three lots make much for my advantage; which if not, I from their sentence totally appeal.” “There is no appealing,” quoth Pantagruel, “from the decrees of fate or destiny, of lot or chance: as is recorded by our ancient lawyers, witness Baldus, lib. ult. Cap. de Leg. The reason hereof is, fortune doth not acknowledge a superior to whom an appeal may be made from her or any of her substitutes. And in this case the pupil cannot be restored to his right in full, as openly by the said author is alleged in lib. Ait Prætor, paragr. ult. ff. de minor.”

CHAPTER XIII.

How Pantagruel advises Panurge to try the Future Good or Bad Luck of His Marriage by Dreams.

“Now, seeing we cannot agree together in the manner of expounding or interpreting the sense of the Virgilian lots, let us bend our course another way, and try a new sort of divination.” “Of what kind?” asked Panurge. “Of a good ancient and authentic fashion,” answered Pantagruel; “it is by dreams. For in dreaming, such circumstances and conditions being thereto adhibited, as are clearly enough described by Hippocrates, in lib. Περὶ τῶν ἐνυπνίων, by Plato, Plotin, Iamblicus, Sinesius, Aristotle, Xenophon, Galen, Plutarch, Artemidorus, Daldianus, Herophilus, Q. Calaber, Theocritus, Pliny, Athenæus, and others, the soul does oftentimes foresee what is to come. How true this is you may conceive by a very vulgar and familiar example; as when you see that at such a time as suckling babes, well nourished, fed, and fostered with good milk, sleep soundly and profoundly, the nurses in the interim get leave to sport themselves, and are licentiated to recreate their fancies at what range to them shall seem most fitting and expedient, their presence, sedulity, and attendance on the cradle being, during all that space, held unnecessary. Even just so, when our body is at rest, that the concoction is everywhere accomplished, and that, till it awake, it lacks for nothing, our soul delights to disport itself, and is well pleased in that frolic to take a review of its native country, which is the heavens, where it receives a most notable participation of its first beginning, with an imbument from its divine source, and in contemplation of that infinite and intellectual sphere, whereof the centre is everywhere, and the circumference in no place of the universal world (to wit, God, according to the doctrine of Hermes Trismegistus), to whom no new thing happens, whom nothing that is past escapes, and unto whom all things are alike present; it remarks not only what is preterit and gone, in the inferior course and agitation of sublunary matters, but withal takes notice of what is to come; then bringing a relation of those future events unto the body by the outward senses and exterior organs, it is divulged abroad unto the hearing of others. Whereupon the owner of that soul deserves to be termed a vaticinator or prophet. Nevertheless, the truth is that the soul is seldom able to report those things in such sincerity as it hath seen them, by reason of the imperfection and frailty of the corporeal senses, which obstruct the effectuating of that office; even as the moon doth not communicate unto this earth of ours that light which she receives from the sun with so much splendour, heat, vigour, purity, and liveliness, as it was given her. Hence it is requisite, for the better reading, explaining, and unfolding of these somniatory vaticinations, and predictions of that nature, that a dexterous, learned, skilful, wise, industrious, expert, rational, and peremptory expounder or interpreter be pitched upon, such a one as by the Greeks is called Onirocrit or Oniropolist. For this cause Heraclitus was wont to say that nothing is by dreams revealed to us, that nothing is by dreams concealed from us, and that only we thereby have a mystical signification and secret evidence of things to come, either for our own prosperous or unlucky fortune, or for the favourable or disastrous success of another. The sacred Scriptures testify no less, and profane histories assure us of it, in both which are exposed to our view a thousand several kinds of strange adventures, which have fallen pat, according to the nature of the dream, and that as well to the party dreamer as to others. The Atlantic people, and those that inhabit the island of Thasos, one of the Cyclades, are of this grand commodity deprived; for in their countries none yet ever dreamed. Of this sort were Cleon of Daulia, Thrasymedes, and in our days the learned Frenchman Villanovanus, neither of all which knew what dreaming was.

“Fail not, therefore, to-morrow, when the jolly and fair Aurora with her rosy fingers draws aside the curtains of the night to drive away the sable shades of darkness, to bend your spirits wholly to the task of sleeping sound, and thereto apply yourself. In the meanwhile you must denude your mind of every human passion or affection, such as are love and hatred, fear and hope; for as of old the great vaticinator, most famous and renowned prophet, Proteus was not able in his disguise or transformation into fire, water, a tiger, a dragon, and other such like uncouth shapes and visors, to presage anything that was to come, till he was restored to his own first natural and kindly form, just so does man; for, at his reception of the art of divination, and faculty of prognosticating future things, that part in him which is the most divine (to wit, the Noûs, or Mens) must be calm, peaceable, untroubled, quiet, still, hushed, and not busied or distracted with foreign soul-disturbing perturbations.” “I am content,” quoth Panurge. “But, I pray you, sir, must I this evening, ere I go to bed, eat much or little? I do not ask this without cause. For if I sup not well, large, round, and amply, my sleeping is not worth a forked turnip. All the night long I then but dose and rave, and in my slumbering fits talk idle nonsense, my thoughts being in a dull brown study, and as deep in their dumps as is my belly hollow.”

“Not to sup,” answered Pantagruel, “were best for you, considering the state of your complexion and healthy constitution of your body. A certain very ancient prophet, named Amphiaraus, wished such as had a mind by dreams to be imbued with any oracles, for four-and-twenty hours to taste no victuals, and to abstain from wine three days together. Yet shall not you be put to such a sharp, hard, rigorous, and extreme sparing diet. I am truly right apt to believe that a man whose stomach is replete with various cheer, and in a manner surfeited with drinking, is hardly able to conceive aright of spiritual things; yet am not I of the opinion of those who, after long and pertinacious fasting, think by such means to enter more profoundly into the speculation of celestial mysteries. You may very well remember how my father Gargantua (whom here, for honour sake, I name) hath often told us that the writings of abstinent, abstemious, and long-fasting hermits were every whit as saltless, dry, jejune, and insipid, as were their bodies when they did compose them. It is a most difficult thing for the spirits to be in a good plight, serene, and lively, when there is nothing in the body but a kind of voidness and inanity; seeing the philosophers with the physicians jointly affirm that the spirits, which are styled animal, spring from and have their constant practice in and through the arterial blood, refined and purified to the life within the admirable net which, wonderfully framed, lieth under the ventricles and tunnels of the brain. He gave us also the example of the philosopher, who, when he thought most seriously to have withdrawn himself unto a solitary privacy, far from the rustling clutterments of the tumultuous and confused world, the better to improve his theory, to contrive, comment, and ratiocinate, was, notwithstanding his uttermost endeavours to free himself from all untoward noises, surrounded and environed about so with the barking of curs, bawling of mastiffs, bleating of sheep, prating of parrots, tattling of jackdaws, grunting of swine, girning of boars, yelping of foxes, mewing of cats, cheeping of mice, squeaking of weasels, croaking of frogs, crowing of cocks, cackling of hens, calling of partridges, chanting of swans, chattering of jays, peeping of chickens, singing of larks, creaking of geese, chirping of swallows, clucking of moorfowls, cucking of cuckoos, bumping of bees, rammage of hawks, chirring of linnets, croaking of ravens, screeching of owls, whicking of pigs, gushing of hogs, curring of pigeons, grumbling of cushat-doves, howling of panthers, curkling of quails, chirping of sparrows, crackling of crows, nuzzing of camels, whining of whelps, buzzing of dromedaries, mumbling of rabbits, cricking of ferrets, humming of wasps, mioling of tigers, bruizing of bears, sussing of kitlings, clamouring of scarfes, whimpering of fulmarts, boeing of buffaloes, warbling of nightingales, quavering of mavisés, drintling of turkeys, coniating of storks, frantling of peacocks, clattering of magpies, murmuring of stockdoves, crouting of cormorants, cigling of locusts, charming of beagles, guarring of puppies, snarling of messens, rantling of rats, guerieting of apes, snuttering of monkeys, pioling of pelicans, quacking of ducks, yelling of wolves, roaring of lions, neighing of horses, barring of elephants, hissing of serpents, and wailing of turtles, that he was much more troubled than if he had been in the middle of the crowd at the fair of Fontenay or Niort. Just so is it with those whose are tormented with the grievous pangs of hunger. The stomach begins to gnaw and bark, as it were, the eyes to look dim, and the veins, by greedily sucking some refection to themselves from the proper substance of all the members of a fleshy consistence, violently pull down and draw back that vagrant, roaming spirit, careless and neglecting of his nurse and natural host, which is the body; as when a hawk upon the fist, willing to take her flight by a soaring aloft in the open, spacious air, is on a sudden drawn back by a leash tied to her feet.

“To this purpose also did he allege unto us the authority of Homer, the father of all philosophy, who said that the Grecians did not put an end to their mournful mood for the death of Patroclus, the most intimate friend of Achilles, till hunger in a rage declared herself, and their bellies protested to furnish no more tears unto their grief. For from bodies emptied and maccrated by long fasting there could not be such supply of moisture and brackish drops as might be proper on that occasion.

“Mediocrity at all times is commendable; nor in this case are you to abandon it. You may take a little supper, but thereat must you not eat of a hare, nor of any other flesh. You are likewise to abstain from beans, from the preak, by some called the polyp, as also from coleworts, cabbage, and all other such like windy victuals, which may endanger the troubling of your brains, and the dimming or casting a kind of mist over your animal spirits. For, as a looking-glass cannot exhibit the semblance or representation of the object set before it, and exposed to have its image to the life expressed, if that the polished sleekedness thereof be darkened by gross breathings, dampish vapours, and foggy, thick, infectious exhalations, even so the fancy cannot well receive the impression of the likeness of those things which divination doth afford by dreams, if any way the body be annoyed or troubled with the furnish steam of meat which it had taken in a while before; because, betwixt these two there still hath been a mutual sympathy and fellow-feeling of an indissolubly knit affection. You shall eat good Eusebian and bergamot pears, one apple of the short-shank pippin kind, a parcel of the little plums of Tours, and some few cherries of the growth of my orchard. Nor shall you need to fear that thereupon will ensue doubtful dreams, fallacious, uncertain, and not to be trusted to, as by some peripatetic philosophers hath been related; for that, say they, men do more copiously in the season of harvest feed on fruitages than any other time. The same is mystically taught us by the ancient prophets and poets, who allege that all vain and deceitful dreams lie hid and in covert, under the leaves which are spread on the ground, by reason that the leaves fall from the trees in the autumnal quarter. For the natural fervour which, abounding in ripe, fresh, recent fruits, cometh by the quickness of its ebullition to be with ease evaporated into the animal parts of the dreaming person—the experiment is obvious in most—is a pretty while before it be expired, dissolved, and evanished. As for your drink, you are to have it of the fair, pure water of my fountain.”

“The condition,” quoth Panurge, “is very hard. Nevertheless, cost what price it will, or whatsoever come of it, I heartily condescend thereto; protesting that I shall to-morrow break my fast betimes after my somniatory exercitations. Furthermore, I recommend myself to Homer’s two gates, to Morpheus, to Iselon, to Phantasus, and unto Phobetor. If they in this my great need succour me, and grant me that assistance which is fitting, I will, in honour of them all, erect a jolly, genteel altar, composed of the softest down. If I were now in Laconia, in the temple of Juno, betwixt Oetile and Thalamis, she suddenly would disentangle my perplexity, resolve me of my doubts, and cheer me up with fair and jovial dreams in a deep sleep."

Then did he thus say unto Pantagruel, "Sir, were it not expedient for my purpose to put a branch or two of curious laurel betwixt the quilt and bolster of my bed, under the pillow on which my head must lean?" "There is no need at all of that," quoth Pantagruel, "for, besides that it is a thing very superstitious, the cheat thereof hath been at large discovered unto us in the writings of Serapion, Ascalonites, Antiphon, Philochorus, Artemon, and Fulgentius Planciades. I could say as much to you of the left shoulder of a crocodile, as also of a cameleon, without prejudice be it spoken to the credit which is due to the opinion of old Democritus, and likewise of the stone of the Bactrians, called Eumetrides, and of the Hammonian horn; for so by the Æthiopians is termed a certain precious stone, coloured like gold, and in the fashion, shape, form, and proportion of a ram's horn, as the horn of Jupiter Hammon is reported to have been, they over and above assuredly affirming that the dreams of those who carry it about them are no less veritable and infallible than the truth of the divine oracles. Nor is this much unlike to what Homer and Virgil wrote of these two gates of sleep, to which you have been pleased to recommend the management of what you have in hand. The one is of ivory, which letteth in confused, doubtful, and uncertain dreams, for through ivory, how small and slender soever it be, we can see nothing, the density, opacity, and close compactedness of its material parts hindering the penetration of the visual rays and the reception of the species of such things as are visible. The other is of horn, at which an entry is made to sure and certain dreams, even as through horn, by reason of the diaphanous splendour and bright transparency thereof, the species of all objects of the sight distinctly pass, and so without confusion appear that they are clearly seen." "Your meaning is, and you would thereby infer," quoth Friar John, "that the dreams of all horned cuckolds, of which number Panurge, by the help of God and his future wife, is without controversy to be one, are always true and infallible."

CHAPTER XIV.

Panurge's Dream, with the Interpretation thereof.

AT seven o'clock of the next morning Panurge presented himself before Pantagruel, in whose chamber were at that time Epistemon, Friar John of the Funnels, Ponocrates, Eudemon, Carpalim, and others, to whom, at the entry of Panurge, Pantagruel said, "Lo, here cometh our dreamer." "That word," said Epistemon, "in ancient times cost very much, and was dearly sold to the children of Jacob." "Then," said Panurge, "I have been plunged into the dumps as deeply as if I had been lodged with Gaffer Noddy-cap. Dreamed, indeed, I have, and that right lustily; but I could take along with me no more thereof that I did truly understand, save only that I in my vision had a pretty, fair, young, gallant, handsome woman, who no less lovingly and kindly treated and entertained me, hugged, cherished, cockered, dandled, and made much of me, as if I had been another neat dilli-darling minion like Adonis. Never was man more glad than I was then, my joy at that time was incomparable. She flattered me, tickled me, stroked me, groped me, frizzled me, curled me, kissed me, embraced me, laid her hands about my neck, and now and then made jestingly pretty little horns above my forehead. I told her in the like disport, as I did play the fool with her, that she should rather place and fix them a little below my eyes, that I might see the better what I should stick at with them; for, being so situated, Momus then would find no fault therewith, as he did once with the position of the horns of bulls. The wanton, toying girl, notwithstanding any remonstrance of mine to the contrary, did always drive and thrust them further in; yet thereby, which to me seemed wonderful, she did not do me any hurt at all. A little after, though I know not how, I thought I was transformed into a tabor, and she into a chough or madge-howlet.

"My sleeping there being interrupted, I awoke in a start, angry, displeased, perplexed, chafing, and very wroth. There have you a large platterful of dreams, make thereupon good cheer, and, if you please, spare not to interpret them according to the understanding which you have in them. Come, Carpalim let us to breakfast." "To my sense and meaning," quoth Pantagruel, "if I have skill or knowledge in the art of divination by dreams, your wife will not really, and to the outward appearance of the world, plant or set horns, and stick them fast in your forehead, after a visible manner, as satyrs use to wear and carry them; but she will be so far from preserving herself loyal in the discharge and observance of her conjugal duty, that, on the contrary, she will violate her plighted faith, break her marriage oath, infringe all matrimonial ties, prostitute her body to the dalliance of other men, and so make you a cuckold. This point is clearly and manifestly explained and expounded by Artemidorus, just as I have related it. Nor will there be any metamorphosis or transmutation made of you into a drum or tabor, but you will surely be as soundly beaten as ever was tabor at a merry wedding. Nor yet will she be changed into a chough, but will steal from you, chiefly in the night, as is the nature of that thievish bird. Hereby may you perceive your dreams to be in every jot conformable and agreeable to the Virgilian lots. A cuckold you will be, beaten and robbed." Then cried out Father John with a loud voice, "He tells the truth; upon my conscience, thou wilt be a cuckold, an honest one, I warrant thee. Oh, the brave horns that will be borne by thee! Ha, ha, ha! Our good Master de Cornibus. God save thee and shield thee! Wilt thou be pleased to preach but two words of a sermon to us, I will go through the parish church to gather up alms for the poor."

"You are," quoth Panurge, "very far mistaken in your interpretation; for the matter is quite contrary to the sense thereof. My dream presageth that I shall by marriage be stored with plenty of all manner of goods—the hornifying of me showing that I will possess a cornucopia, that Amalthæan horn, which is called the horn of abundance, whereof the fruition did still portend the wealth of the enjoyer. You possibly will say that they are rather like to be satyr's horns, for you of these did make some mention. Amen, amen, Fiat, fiat, ad differentiam papæ. Thus shall I have my touch-her-home still ready. My staff of love, semipiternally in a good case, will, satyr-like, be never toiled out; a thing which all men wish for, and send up their prayers to that purpose, but such a thing as nevertheless is granted but to few. Hence it follows, by a consequence as clear as the sunbeams, that I will never be in danger of being made a cuckold, for the defect hereof is Causa sine qua non; yea, the sole cause, as many think, of making husbands cuckolds. What makes poor scoundrel rogues to beg, I pray you? Is it not because they have not enough at home wherewith to fill their bellies and their pokes? What is it makes the wolves to leave the woods? Is it not the want of flesh meat? What maketh women whores? You understand me well enough. And herein may I very well submit my opinion to the judgment of learned lawyers, presidents, counsellors, advocates, procurers, attorneys, and other glossers and commentators on the venerable rubric, De frigidis et maleficiatis. You are, in truth, sir, as it seems to me (excuse my boldness, if I have transgressed), in a most palpable and absurd error to attribute my horns to cuckoldry. Diana wears them on her head after the manner of a crescent. Is she a cucquean for that? How the devil can she be cuckolded who never yet was married? Speak somewhat more correctly, I beseech you, lest she, being offended, furnish you with a pair of horns, shapen by the pattern of those which she made for Actæon. The goodly Bacchus also carries horns—Pan, Jupiter Hammon, with a great many others. Are they all cuckolds? If Jove be a cuckold, Juno is a whore. This follows by the figure metalepsis; as to call a child in the presence of his father and mother a bastard, or whore's son, is tacitly and underboard no less than if he had said openly the father is a cuckold, and his wife a punk. Let our discourse come nearer to the purpose. The horns that my wife did make me are horns of abundance, planted and grafted in my head for the increase and shooting up of all good things. This will I affirm for truth, upon my word, and pawn both my faith and credit upon it. As for the rest, I will be no less joyful, frolicsome, glad, cheerful, merry, jolly, and gamesome, than a well-bended tabor in the hands of a good drummer at a nuptial feast, still making a noise, still rolling, still buzzing and cracking. Believe me, sir, in that consists none of my least good fortunes. And my wife will be jocund, feat, compt, neat, quaint, dainty, trim, tricked up, brisk, smirk, and smug, even as a pretty little Cornish cough. Who will not believe this, let hell or the gallows be the burden of his Christmas carol."

"I remark," said Pantagruel, "the last point or particle you spoke of, and, having seriously compared it with the first, find that at the beginning you were delighted with the sweetness of your dream; but in the end you startingly awaked, and on a sudden were forthwith vexed to a cholera, and annoyed." "Yea," quoth Panurge, "the reason of that was because I had fasted too long." "Flatter not yourself," quoth Pantagruel; "all will go to ruin. Know for a certain truth that every sleep that ends with a starting, and leaves the person irksome, grieved, and fretting, either signifies a present evil, or otherwise presages a future imminent mishap. To signify an evil, that is to say, to show some sickness hardly curable, a kind of pestilentious or malignant bile, botch, or sore, lying and lurking hid, occult and latent, within the very centre of the body, which many times by the means of sleep, whose nature is to reinforce and strengthen the faculty and virtue of concoction, begins according to the theorems of physic to declare itself, and moves toward the outward superficies. At this sad stirring is the sleeper's rest disturbed and broken, whereof the first feeling and stinging smart admonishes that he must patiently endure great trouble, and thereunto provide some remedy: as when we say proverbially, to incense hornets move a stinking puddle, and to awake a sleeping lion, instead of these more usual expressions, and of a more familiar and plain meaning, to provoke angry persons, to make a thing the worse by meddling with it, and to irritate a testy choleric man when he is quiet. On the other hand, to presage an evil, especially in what concerns the exploits of the soul, in matter of somnial divinations, is as much as to say that it gives us to understand that some dismal fortune is prepared for us, which shortly will not fail to come to pass. A clear example hereof is to be found in the dream and dreadful awaking of Hecuba, as likewise in that of Eurydice, the wife of Orpheus, neither of which was no sooner finished, saith Ennius, than they incontinently awoke in a start, and were horribly affrighted. Thereupon these accidents ensued: Hecuba had her husband Priamus, together with her children, slain before her eyes, and saw then the destruction of her country; and Eurydice died speedily thereafter in a most miserable manner. Æneas, dreaming that he spoke to Hector a little after his decease, did on a sudden on a great start awake, and was afraid. Now hereupon followed this event: Troy that same night was spoiled, sacked, and burned. At another time the same Æneas, dreaming that he saw his familiar genii and penates, in a ghastly fright awoke, of which terror and amazement the issue was that the very next day, by a most horrible tempest on the sea, he was like to have perished and been cast away. Moreover, Turnus being instigated and stirred up by the fantastic vision of an infernal fury to enter into a bloody war against Æneas, awoke in a start much troubled and disquieted in spirit, in sequel whereof, after many notable and famous routs, defeats, and discomfitures in open field, he came at last to be killed in single combat by the said Æneas. A thousand other instances I could afford, if it were needful, of this matter. Whilst I relate these stories of Æneas, remark the saying of Fabius Pictor, who faithfully averred that nothing had at any time befallen unto, was done, or undertaken by him, whereof he had not previously had notice, and foreseen it to the full, by sure predictions founded on the oracles of somnial divination. To this there is no want of pregnant reasons, any more than of examples. For if repose and rest in sleeping be a special gift and favour of the gods, as is maintained by the philosophers, and by the poet attested in these lines—

‘Then sleep, that heavenly gift, came to refresh
Of human labourers the wearied flesh,’ such a gift or benefit can never terminate in wrath and indignation without portending some unlucky fate and disastrous fortune. Otherwise it were a molestation and not a pleasure; a scourge, and not a gift; at least, not proceeding from the gods above, but from the infernal devils our enemies, according to the common vulgar saying.

“Suppose the lord, father, or master of a family, sitting at a very sumptuous dinner, furnished with all manner of good cheer, and having at his entry to the table his appetite sharp set upon his victuals, whereof there was plenty, should be seen to rise in a start, and on a sudden jump out of his chair, abandoning his meat, frightened, appalled, and in a horrid terror, who should not know the cause hereof would wonder and be astonished exceedingly. But what? He heard his male servants cry, 'Fire, fire, fire, fire!' his serving maids and women yell, 'Stop thief, stop thief!' and all his children shout as loud as ever they could, 'Murder, oh, murder, murder!' Then was it not high time for him to leave his banqueting, to apply a speedy remedy, and to give orders for the succouring of his distressed household? Truly I remember that the Cabalists and Massorets, interpreters of the sacred Scriptures, in treating how with verity one might judge of evangelical apparitions (because oftentimes the angel of Satan is disguised and transfigured into an angel of light), said that the difference of these two mainly did consist in this: the favourable and comforting angel used in his appearance unto man at first to terrify and hugely affright him, but in the end he brought consolation, left the person who had seen him joyful, well pleased, fully content, and satisfied. On the other side, the angel of perdition, that wicked, devilish, and malignant spirit, at his appearance unto any person, in the beginning cheered up the heart of his beholder, but at last forsook him, and left him troubled, angry, and perplexed."

CHAPTER XV.

Panurge's Excuse and Exposition of the Monastic Mystery concerning Powdered Beef.

"THE Lord save those who see and do not hear!" said Panurge. "I see you well enough, but know not what it is that you have said. The hunger-starved belly wants ears. For lack of victuals, before God, I roar, bray, yell, and fume, as in a furious madness. I have performed too hard a task to-day, an extraordinary work indeed. He shall be craftier, and do far greater wonders than ever did Mr Mush, who shall be able no more this year to bring me on the stage of preparation for a dreaming verdict. Fie! not to sup at all, that is the devil. Pox take that fashion! Come, Friar John, let us go break our fast, for if I hit on such a round refection in the morning as will serve thoroughly to fill the mill-hopper and hog's-hide of my stomach, and furnish it with meat and drink sufficient, then at a pinch, as in the case of some extreme necessity which presses, I could make a shift that day to forbear dining. But not to sup! A plague rot that base custom, which is an error offensive to nature. That lady made the day for exercise, to travel, work, wait on, and labour in each of his negotiations and employments; and that we may with the more fervency and ardour prosecute our business, she sets before us a clear burning candle, to wit, the sun's resplendency, and at night, when she begins to take the light from us, she thereby tacitly implies no less than if she would have spoken thus unto us: 'My lads and lasses, all of you are good and honest folks; you have wrought well to-day, toiled and moiled enough, the night approaches, therefore cast off these moiling cares of yours, desist from all your painful labours, and set your minds as to how to refresh your bodies, in the renewing of their vigour with good bread, choice wine, and store of wholesome meats;' then may you take some sport and recreation, and after that lie down and rest yourselves, that you may strongly, nimbly, lustily, and with the more alacrity to-morrow attend on your affairs.

"Falconers, in like manner, when they have fed their hawks, will not suffer them to fly, but let them abide on a perch a little, that they may rouse, bait, tower, and soar the better. That good pope who was the first institutor of fasting understood this well enough, for he ordained that our fast should reach but to the hour of noon, all the remainder of that day was at our disposal, freely to eat and feed at any time thereof. In ancient times there were but few that dined, as you would say, some churchmen, monks, and canons, for they have little other occupation. Each day is a festival unto them, who diligently heed the claustral proverb, De missa ad mensam. They linger and defer their sitting down and placing of themselves at table only so long as they have a mind in waiting for the coming of the abbot; then they fall to without ceremony, terms, or conditions; and everybody sups, unless it were some vain, conceited, dreaming dotard. Hence is a supper called cæna, which signifies that it is common to all sorts of people. Thou knowest it well, friar John. Come, let us go, my dear friend; in the name of all the devils of the infernal regions, let us go. The gnawings of my stomach in this rage of hunger are so tearing that they make it bark like a mastiff. Let us throw some bread and beef into his throat to pacify him, as once the sibyl did to Cerberus. Thou likest best monastical brewis, the prime, the flower of the pot. I am for the solid, principal verb that comes after—the good brown loaf, always accompanied with a round slice of the Nine-lecture-powdered-labourer." "I know thy meaning," answered Friar John; "this metaphor is extracted out of the claustral kettle. The labourer is the ox that has wrought and done the labour, after the fashion of nine lectures, that is to say, most exquisitely well and thoroughly boiled. These holy religious fathers, by a certain cabalistic institution of the ancients, not written, but carefully by tradition conveyed from hand to hand, rising betimes to go to morning prayers, were wont to flourish their matutinal devotion with some certain notable preambles before their entry into the church, viz., they dunged in the dungeries, pissed in the pisseries, spit in the spitteries, melodiously coughed in the cougheries, and doted in their doteries, that to the divine service they might not bring anything that was unclean or foul. These things done, they very zealously repaired to the Holy Chapel, for so in their canting language was termed the convent kitchen, where they with no small earnestness had care that the beef-pot should be put on the crook for the breakfast of the religious brothers of our Lord and Saviour; and the fire they would kindle under the pot themselves. Now, the matins, consisting of nine lessons, were so incumbent on them, that they must have risen the earlier the better to expedite the despatching of them all. The sooner that they rose, the sharper was their appetite and the barkings of their stomachs, and the gnawings increased in the like proportion, and consequently made these godly men thrice more a-hungred and a-thirst than when their matins were hemmed over with only three lessons. The more betimes they rose, by the said cabal, the sooner was the beef-pot put on; the longer that the beef was on the fire, the better it was boiled; the more it boiled, it was the tenderer; the tenderer that it was, the less it troubled the teeth, delighted more the palate, less charged the stomach,* and nourished our good religious men the more substantially; which is the only end and prime intention of the first founders, as appears by this, that they eat, not to live, but live to eat, and in this world have nothing but their life. Let us go, Panurge."

"Now I understand thee," quoth Panurge, "my plushcod friar, my caballine and claustral ballock. I freely quit the costs, interest, and charges, seeing you have so egregiously commented upon the most especial chapter of the culinary and monastical cabal. Come along, my Carpalim, and you, Friar John, my leather-dresser. Good-morrow to you all, my good lords: I have dreamed enough to drink. Let us go." Panurge had no sooner done speaking, than Epistemon, with a loud voice, said these words, "It is a very ordinary and common thing amongst men to conceive, foresee, know, and presage the misfortune, bad luck, or disaster of another; but to have the understanding, providence, knowledge, and prediction of a man's own mishap, is very scarce, and rare to be found anywhere. This is exceeding judiciously and prudently deciphered by Æsop in his Apologues, who there affirms that every man in the world carries about his neck a wallet, in the fore-bag whereof are contained the faults and mischances of others, always exposed to his view and knowledge; and in the other scrip thereof, which hangs behind, are kept the bearer's proper transgressions and inauspicious adventures, at no time seen by him, nor thought upon, unless he be a person that hath a favourable aspect from the heavens."

CHAPTER XVI.

How Pantagrue counselled Panurge to Confer with the Sibyl of Panzoust.

A LITTLE while thereafter Pantagrue sent for Panurge, and said unto him, "The affection which I bear you being now intense, and quite settled in my mind by a long continuance of time, prompts me to the serious consideration of your welfare and profit; in order whereto, remark what I have thought thereon. It has been told me that at Panzoust, near Crouly, there dwells a very famous sibyl, who is endowed with the skill of foretelling things to come. Take Epistemon in your company, repair to her, and hear what she will say unto you." "She is possibly," quoth Epistemon, "some Canidia, Sagana, or Pythonissa, either of which with us is vulgarly called a witch—I being the more easily induced to give credit to the truth of this character of her, that the place of her abode is vilely stained with the abominable repute of abounding more with sorcerers and witches than ever did the plains of Thessaly. I should not, to my thinking, go thither willingly, for that it seems to me a thing unwarrantable, and altogether forbidden in the law of Moses." "We are not Jews," quoth Pantagrue, "nor is it a matter judicially confessed by her, nor authentically proved by others, that she is a witch. Let us for the present suspend our judgment, and defer till after your return from thence the sifting of those niceties. How do we know but she may be an eleventh sibyl, or a second Cassandra? But although she were neither, and she did not merit the name or title of any of these renowned prophetesses, what risk, in the name of God, do you run by offering to talk and confer with her of the instant perplexity and perturbation of your thoughts? Seeing especially, and which is most of all, she is, in the estimation of those that are acquainted with her, held to know more, and to be of a deeper reach of understanding than is either customary to the country wherein she lives, or to the sex to which she belongs. What hindrance, hurt, or harm doth the laudable desire of knowledge bring to any man, were it from a sot, a pot, a fool, a stool, a winter mitten, a truckle for a pulley, the lid of a goldsmith's crucible, an oil-bottle, or old slipper? You may remember to have read, or heard at least, that Alexander the Great, immediately after his having obtained a glorious victory over the King Darius at Arbela, refused, in the presence of the splendid and illustrious courtiers that were about him, to give audience to a poor certain despicable-like fellow, who, through the solicitations and mediation of some of his royal attendants, was admitted humbly to beg that grace and favour of him. But sore did he repent, although in vain, a thousand and ten thousand times thereafter, the surly state which he then took upon him to the denial of so just a suit, the grant whereof would have been worth unto him the value of a couple of powerful cities. He was indeed victorious in Persia, but withal so far distant from Macedonia, his hereditary kingdom, that the joy of the one did not expel the extreme grief which, through occasion of the other, he had inwardly conceived for not being able with all his power to find or invent a convenient expedient how to get or come by the certainty of any news thence, both by reason of the great remoteness of the places from one another, and also because of the impediment of many great rivers, the obstacle of divers wild deserts, and the obstruction of sundry almost inaccessible mountains. Whilst he was in this sad quandary and solicitous pensiveness, which, you may suppose, could not be a small vexation to him, considering that it was a matter of no great difficulty to run over his whole native soil, possess his country, seize on his kingdom, instal a new king on the throne, and plant thereon foreign colonies, long before he could have any warning of it; for obviating the jeopardy of so dreadful an inconvenience, and putting a fit remedy thereto, a certain Sidonian merchant, of low stature, but of high fancy, very poor in show, and, to the outward appearance, of little or no account, having presented himself before him, went about to affirm and declare that he had excogitated and lit upon a ready mean and way by the which those of his territories at home should come to the certain notice of his Indian victories, and himself be perfectly informed of the state and condition of Egypt and Macedonia within less than five days. Whereupon the said Alexander, plunged into a sullen animadvertence of mind, through his rash opinion of the improbability of performing so strange and impossible-like an undertaking, dismissed the merchant without giving ear to what he had to say, and vilified him. What could it have cost him to hearken unto what the honest man had invented for his good? What detriment, annoyance, damage, or loss could he have undergone in listening to the discovery of that secret which the good fellow would have most willingly revealed unto him? Nature, I am persuaded, did not without a cause frame our ears open, putting thereto no gate at all, nor shutting them up with any manner of enclosures, as she has the tongue, the eyes, and other such outward parts of the body. The cause, as I imagine, is to the end that every day and every night, and that continually, we may be ready to hear, and by a perpetual hearing come to learn. For, of all the senses, it is the fittest for the reception of the knowledge of the arts, sciences, and discipline; and it may be that man was an angel, that is to say, a messenger sent from God, as Raphael was to Tobit. Too suddenly did he contemn, despise, and disregard him; but for long thereafter, by an untimely and too late repentance, did he do penance for it." "You talk very well," answered Epistemon, "yet shall you never for all that induce me to believe that it can tend any way to the advantage or comfort of a man to take advice and counsel of a woman, namely, of such a woman, and the woman of such a country." "Truly I have found," quoth Panurge, "a great deal of good in the counsel of women, chiefly in that of the old wives amongst them; for, every time I consult with them, I readily get an extraordinary stool or two, to the great solace of my bum-gut passage. They are as sleuth-hounds in the infallibility of their scent, and in their sayings no less sententious than the rubrics of the law.* Therefore, in my conceit, it is not an improper kind of speech to call them sage or wise women. In confirmation of which opinion, the customary style of my language allows them the denomination of presage women. The epithet of sage is due unto them because they are surpassing dexterous in the knowledge of most things. And I give them the title of presage for that they divinely foresee, and certainly fortell, future contingencies and events to come. Sometimes I call them not maunettes (sluts), but monettes, from their wholesome monitions. Whether it be so, ask Pythagoras, Socrates, Empedocles, and our master Ortuinus. I furthermore praise and commend above the skies the ancient memorable institution of the pristine Germans, who ordained the responses and documents of old women to be highly extolled, most cordially revered, and prized as in nothing inferior to the weight, test, and standard of the sanctuary. And as they were respectfully prudent in receiving these sound admonitions, so by honouring and following them they proved no less fortunate in the happy success of all their endeavours. Witness the old wife Aurinia, and the good mother Velleda, in the days of Vespasian. You need not in any way doubt but that feminine old age is always fructifying in sublime qualities, I might have said sibylline. Let us go; by the help, by the virtue of God, let us go. Farewell, Friar John; I recommend the care of my cod-piece to you." "Well," quoth Epistemon, "I will follow you, with this protestation, nevertheless, that if I happen to get sure information, or otherwise find that she does use any kind of charm or enchantment in her responses, it may not be imputed to me as a fault to leave you at the gate of her house without accompanying you any further in."

CHAPTER XVII.

How Panurge Spoke to the Sibyl of Panzoust.

THEIR voyage was of six days' duration. On the seventh there was shown unto them the house of the vaticinatress, standing on the knap of a hill, under a spacious walnut tree. Without great difficulty they entered into that straw-thatched cottage, scurvily built, badly furnished, and all besmoked. "It matters not," quoth Epistemon; "Heraclitus, the grand Scotist, and dismal philosopher, was nothing astonished at his entrance into such a coarse and paltry habitation; for he did usually show forth unto his sectaries and disciples that the gods made as cheerfully their residence in these homely mansions as in sumptuous palaces replenished with all manner of delight, pomp, and pleasure. I withal do really believe that the dwelling-place of the so famous and renowned Hecate was just such another petty cell as this is, when she made a feast therein to the valiant Theseus; and that of no better structure was the cot or cabin of Hyreus, or Cœnopion, wherein Jupiter, Neptune, and Mercury were not ashamed, all three together, to sojourn a whole night, and there to take a hearty repast; and in payment of the bill they thankfully pissed Orion." They, finding the ancient woman at a corner of her own chimney, Epistemon said, "She is indeed a true sibyl, and the lively portrait of one represented by the Γρηΐ καμινού of Homer." The old hag was in a pitiful plight and condition in matter of the outward state of her body, the ragged and tattered equipage of her person, in the point of accoutrement and beggarly poor provision of fare for her diet and entertainment; for she was ill apparelled, worse nourished, toothless, blear-eyed, crook-shouldered, snotty, her nose still dropping, and herself still drooping, faint, and pithless. Whilst in this wofully wretched case, she was making ready, for her dinner, porridge of wrinkled green coleworts, with a swerd of yellow bacon, mixed with a twice-before-cooked sort of waterish, unsavoury broth, extracted out of bare and hollow bones. Epistemon said, "By the cross of a groat, we are to blame, nor shall we get from her any response at all, for we have not brought along with us the branch of gold." "I have," quoth Panurge, "provided pretty well for that, for here I have it within my bag, in the substance of a gold ring, accompanied with some fair pieces of small money." No sooner were these words spoken, when Panurge, coming up towards her, after the ceremonial performance of a profound and humble salutation, presented her with six neats' tongues dried in the smoke, a great butter-pot full of fresh cheese, a borracho furnished with good beverage, and a ram's cod stored with single pence, newly coined. At last he, with a low courtesy, put on her medial finger a pretty handsome golden ring, whereinto was artificially enchased a precious toadstone of Beausse. This done, in few words, and very succinctly, he explained unto her the reason of his coming, most civilly and courteously entreating her that she might be pleased to vouchsafe to give him full intelligence concerning the future good-luck of his intended marriage.

The old trot for a while remained silent, pensive, and grinning like a dog; then, after she had set her withered breech upon the bottom of a bushel, she took into her hands three old spindles, which, when she had turned and whirled betwixt her fingers very diversely, and after several fashions, she pried more narrowly into, by the trial of their points, the sharpest whereof she retained in her hand, and threw the other two under a stone trough. After this she took a pair of yarn windles, which she nine times unintermittently veered and frisked about, then at the ninth revolution or turn, without touching them again, maturely perpending the manner of their motion, she very demurely waited on their repose and cessation from any further stirring. Continuing, she pulled off one of her wooden pattens, put her apron over her head, as a priest uses to do his amice when he is going to sing mass, and with a kind of antic, gaudy, party-coloured string, knit it under her neck. Being thus covered and muffled, she whiffed off a lusty draught out of the borracho, took three several pence out of the ram-cod fob, put them into so many walnut shells, which she set down upon the bottom of a feather-pot, and then, after she had given them three whisks of a broom besom athwart the chimney, casting into the fire half a bevin of long heather, together with a branch of dry laurel, she observed, with a very coy silence, in what form they did burn, and saw that, although they were in a flame, they made no kind of noise or crackling din. Hereupon she gave a most hideous shout, muttering betwixt her teeth some few barbarous words of a strange termination.

This so terrified Panurge that he forthwith said to Epistemon, "The devil mince me into a gallimaufry if I do not tremble for fear! I do not think but I am now enchanted; for she does not speak in the terms of any Christian language. Oh, look, I pray you, how she seems to me to be three full spans higher than she was when she began to hood herself with her apron. What means this restless wagging of her slouchy chaps? What can be the signification of the uneven shrugging of her hulchy shoulders? To what end does she quaver with her lips, like a monkey in the dismembering of a lobster? My ears through horror glow. Ah! how they tingle! I think I hear the shrieking of Proserpina; the devils are breaking loose to come here. Oh, the foul, ugly, and deformed beasts! Let us run away! By the hook of God, I am like to die for fear! I do not love the devils; they vex me, and are unpleasant fellows. Now let us fly, and betake us to our heels. Farewell, gammer; thanks and grammercy for your goods! I will not marry; no, believe me, I will not. I fairly quit my interest therein, and totally abandon and renounce it from this time forward, even as much as at present." With this, as he endeavoured to make an escape out of the room, the old crone anticipated his flight, and made him stop. The way she prevented him was this. Whilst in her hand she held the spindle, she hurried out to a back-yard close by her lodge, where, after she had peeled off the bark of an old sycamore three several times, she very summarily, upon eight leaves which dropped from it, wrote with the spindle-point some curt and briefly-couched verses, which she threw into the air, then said unto them, "Search after them if you will; find them if you can; the fatal destinies of your marriage are written in them."

No sooner had she done thus speaking than she withdrew herself into her lurking-hole, where on the upper seat of the porch she tucked up her gown, her coats and smock, as high as her armpits, and gave them a full inspection of the nockandro;* which being perceived by Panurge, he said to Epistemon, "God's bodikins, I see the sibyl's hole, where many have perished in seeing; let's fly this hole." She suddenly then bolted the gate behind her, and was never seen any more. They jointly ran in haste after the fallen and dispersed leaves, and gathered them, though not without great labour and toil, for the wind had scattered them amongst the thorn bushes of the valley. When they had ranged them each after the other in their due places, they found out their sentence, as it is metrifed in this octastic:—

"Thy fame upheld,
Even so, so;
And she with child
Of thee: No."

Thy good end
Suck she shall,
And flay thee, friend,
But not all."

CHAPTER XVIII.

How Pantagrue and Panurge did differently expound the Verses of the Sibyl of Panzoust.

THE leaves collected, and orderly disposed, Epistemon and Panurge returned to Pantagrue's court, in part well pleased and in part discontented: glad for their return, and vexed for the trouble they had sustained by the way, which they had found to be craggy, rugged, stony, rough, and ill-adjusted. They made a full relation of their voyage unto Pantagrue, as likewise of the estate and condition of the sibyl. Then having presented to him the leaves of the sycamore, they showed him the short and twattle verses that were written in them. Pantagrue having read and considered the whole sum and substance of the matter, fetched a deep and heavy sigh, and said to Panurge: "You are now, forsooth, in a good taking, and have brought your hogs to a fine market. The prophesy of the sibyl explains and lays out before us the very same predictions which have been denoted, foretold, and presaged to us by the decree of the Virgilian lots, and the verdict of your own dreams: to wit, that you shall be very much disgraced, shamed, and discredited by your wife; for that she will make you a cuckold, in prostituting herself to others, being big with child by another than you; will steal from you a great deal of your goods, and will beat, scratch, and bruise you, even to plucking the skin in a part from off you; will leave the print of her blows in some member of your body." "You understand as much," answered Panurge, "in the veritable interpretation and expounding of recent prophesies as a sow in the matter of spicery. Be not offended, sir, I beseech you, that I speak thus boldly; for I find myself a little in choler, and that not without cause, seeing it is the contrary that is true. Take heed, and give ear unto my words. The old woman said, that as the bean is not seen till first it be unhusked, and that its swad or hull be shelled and peeled from off it, so it is that my virtue and transcendant worth will never come by the mouth of fame to be blazed abroad, proportionable to the height, extent, and measure of the excellency thereof, until preallably I get a wife, and make the full half of a married couple. How many times have I heard you say that the function of a magistrate, and office of dignity, discovers the merits, parts, and endowments of the person so advanced and promoted, and what is in him. That is to say, we are then best able to judge aright of the deservings of a man when he is called to the management of affairs; for when he lived in a private condition, we could have no more certain knowledge of him than of a bean within his husk. And thus stands the first article explained. Otherwise, could you imagine that the good fame, repute, and estimation of an honest man should depend upon the tail of a whore?

“Now to the meaning of the second article. My wife will be with child: here lies the prime felicity of marriage, but not of me. Copsody, that I do believe indeed! It will be of a pretty little infant. Oh, how heartily I shall love it! I do already dote upon it; for it will be my dainty feedle-darling, my genteel dilly-minion. From thenceforth no vexation, care, or grief shall take such deep impression in my heart, how great or vehement soever it otherwise may appear, but that it shall vanish forthwith at the sight of that my future babe, and at the hearing of the chat and prating of its childish gibberish. And blessed be the old crone. By my troth, I have a mind to settle some good revenue or pension upon her, out of the readiest increase of the lands of my Salmygondinois; not an inconstant, and uncertain rent-seeke, like that of witless, giddy-headed bachelors, but sure and fixed, of the nature of the well-paid incomes of regenting doctors. If this interpretation does not please you, think you my wife will bear me in her flanks, conceive with me, and be of me delivered, as women use in childbed to bring forth their young ones; so as that it may be said, ‘Panurge is a second Bacchus, he hath been twice born; he is re-born, as was Hippolytus, as was Proteus, one time of Thetis; and, secondly, of the mother of the philosopher Apollonius,* as were the two Palici,† near the flood Simæthos in Sicily. His wife was big with child by him. In him is renewed and begun again the palintokis‡ of the Megarians, and the palingenesis§ of Democritus.’ Fie upon such errors! To hear stuff of that nature rends mine ears.

“The words of the third article are: “She will suck me at my best end. Why not? That pleases me right well. You know the thing; I need not tell you that it is my intercrural pudding with one end. I swear and promise that, in what I can, I will preserve it sappy, full of juice, and as well victualled for her use as may be. She shall not suck me, I believe, in vain, nor be destitute of her allowance; there shall her justum both in peck and lippy be furnished to the full eternally. You expound this passage allegorically, and interpret it to theft and larceny. I love the exposition, and the allegory pleases me; but not according to the sense whereto you stretch it. It may be that the sincerity of the affection which you bear me moves you to harbour in your breast those refractory thoughts concerning me, with a suspicion of my adversity to come. We have this saying from the learned, that a marvellously fearful thing is love, and that true love is never without fear. But, sir, according to my judgment, you do understand both of and by yourself that here stealth signifies nothing else, no more than in a thousand other places of Greek and Latin, old and modern writings, but the sweet fruits of amorous dalliance, which Venus likes best when reaped in secret, and culled by fervent lovers filchingly. Why so? I prithee tell. Because, when the feat of the loose-coat skirmish happens to be done underhand and privily, between two well-disposed, athwart the steps of a pair of stairs, lurkingly, and in covert, behind a suit of hangings, or close hid and trussed upon an unbound faggot, it is more pleasing to the Cyprian goddess, and to me also—I speak this without prejudice to any better or more sound opinion—than to perform that culbusting art, after the Cynic manner, in the view of the clear sunshine, or in a rich tent, under a precious stately canopy, within a glorious and sublime pavilion, or yet on a soft couch, betwixt rich curtains of cloth of gold, without fear, at long intermediate respites, enjoying of pleasures and delights a bellyful, all at great ease, with a huge fly-flap fan of crimson satin, and a bunch of feathers of some East Indian ostrich serving to give chase unto the flies all round about, whilst, in the interim, the female picks her teeth with a stiff straw, picked even then from out of the bottom of the bed she lies on. If you be not content with this my exposition, are you of the mind that my wife will suck and sup me up as people use to gulp and swallow oysters out of the shell? or as the Cicilian women, according to the testimony of Dioscorides, were wont to do the grain of Alkermes? Assuredly that is an error. Who seizes on it, neither gulches up, nor swills down, but takes away what has been packed up, catches, snatches, and plies the play of hey-pass, repass.

“The fourth article implies that my wife will flay me, but not all. Oh, the fine word! You interpret this to beating strokes and blows. Speak wisely. Will you eat a pudding? Sir, I beseech you to raise your spirits above the low-sized pitch of earthly thoughts unto that height of sublime contemplation which reaches to the apprehension of the mysteries and wonders of Dame Nature. And here be pleased to condemn yourself, by renouncing those errors which you have committed very grossly, and somewhat perversely, in expounding the prophetic sayings of the holy sibyl. Yet put the case (albeit I yield not to it) that, by the instigation of the devil, my wife should go about to wrong me, make me a cuckold down to my very breech, disgrace me otherways, steel my goods, yea, and lay violent hands upon me, she nevertheless should fail of her attempts, and not attain to the proposed end of her reasonable undertakings. The reason which induces me hereto is totally grounded on this last point, which is extracted from the profoundest privacies of a monastic pantheology, as good Friar Arthur Wagtail told me once upon a Monday morning, as we were (if I have not forgot) eating a bushel of trotter-pies; and I remember well it rained hard. God give him the good morrow! The women at the beginning of the world, or a little after, conspired to flay the men quick, because they found the spirit of mankind inclined to domineer it, and bear rule over them upon the face of the whole earth; and, in pursuit of this their resolution, promised, confirmed, swore, and covenanted amongst themselves by the pure faith they owe to the nocturnal Sanct Rogero. But, oh, the vain enterprises of women! Oh, the great fragility of that sex feminine! They did begin to flay the man, or peel him (as says Catullus), at that member which of all the body they loved best, to wit, the nervous and cavernous cane, and that above five thousand years ago; yet have they not till this hour of that small part alone flayed any more than the head. In mere despite whereof the Jews snip off that parcel of the skin in circumcision, choosing far rather to be called clipyards, rascals, than to be flayed by women, as are other nations. My wife, according to this female covenant, will flay it to me, if it be not so already. I heartily grant my consent thereto, but will not give her leave to flay it at all. Nay, truly will I not, my noble king."

"Yea, but," quoth Epistemon, "you say nothing of her most dreadful cries and exclamations, when she and we both saw the laurel bough burn without yielding any noise or crackling. You know it is a very dismal omen, an inauspicious sign, unlucky indication, and token formidable, bad, disastrous, and most unhappy, as is certified by Propertius, Tibullus, the quick philosopher Porphyrius, Eustathius on the Iliads of Homer, and by many others." "Verily, verily," quoth Panurge, "brave are the allegations which you bring me, and the testimonies of two-footed calves. These men were fools, as they were poets; and dotards, as they were philosophers: full of folly, as they were of philosophy."

CHAPTER XIX.

How Pantagrue! praised the Counsel of Dumb Men.

PANTAGRUEL, when this discourse had ended, held for a while his peace, seeming to be exceeding sad and pensive, then said to Panurge: "The malignant spirit misleads, beguiles, and seduces you. I have read that in times past the surest and most veritable oracles were not those which either were delivered in writing or uttered by word of mouth. For many times, in their interpretation, witty, learned, and ingenious men have been deceived through amphibologies, equivoques, and obscurity of words, no less than by the brevity of their sentences. For which cause Apollo, the god of vaticination, was surnamed Λοξίας. Those which were represented then by signs and outward gestures were accounted the truest and the most infallible. Such was the opinion of Heraclitus. And Jupiter himself in this manner frequently gave forth in Ammon predictions. Nor was he single in this practice, for Apollo did the like amongst the Assyrians. His prophesying thus unto those people moved them to paint him with a large, long beard, and clothes beseeming an old settled person, of a most posed, staid, and grave behaviour; not naked, young, and beardless, as he was portrayed most usually amongst the Grecians. Let us make trial of this kind of fatidicency; and go you take advice of some dumb person." "I am content," quoth Panurge. "But," says Pantagruel, "it were requisite that the dumb you consult be such as have been deaf from the hour of their nativity, and consequently dumb, for none can be so lively, natural, and kindly dumb as he who has never heard."

"How is it," quoth Panurge, "that you conceive this matter? If you apprehend it so, that never any spoke who had not before heard the speech of others, I will from that antecedent bring you to infer very logically a most absurd and paradoxical conclusion. But let it pass; I will not insist on it. You do not then believe what Herodotus wrote of two children, who at the special command and appointment of Psammeticus, King of Egypt, having been kept in a petty country cottage, where they were nourished and entertained in a perpetual silence, did at last, after a long space of time, pronounce this word 'Bec,' which in the Phrygian language signifieth bread?" "None the less," quoth Pantagruel, "do I believe that it is a mere abuse of our understandings to give credit to the words of those who say that there is any such thing as a natural language. All speeches have had their primary origin from the arbitrary institutions, accords, and agreements of nations. An articulate voice, according to the dialecticians, hath naturally no signification at all; for that the sense and meaning thereof totally depended upon the goodwill and pleasure of the first deviser and imposer of it. I do not tell you this without a cause, for Bartholus, lib. 5, de Verb. Oblig., very seriously reports that even in his time there was in Eugubia one named Sir Nello de Gabriclis, who, although he, by a sad mischance, became altogether deaf, understood nevertheless every one that talked in the Italian dialect, howsoever he expressed himself, and that only by looking on his external gestures and casting an attentive eye upon the divers motions of his lips and chaps. I have read, I remember also, in a very literary and eloquent author, that Tyridates, King of Armenia, in the days of Nero, made a voyage to Rome, where he was received with great honour and solemnity, and with all manner of pomp and magnificence. Yea, to the end that there might be a sempiternal amity and correspondence preserved betwixt him and the Roman senate, there was no remarkable thing in the whole city which was not shown unto him. At his departure the emperor bestowed upon him many liberal presents of an inestimable value, and, besides, the more entirely to testify his affection towards him, heartily entreated him to be pleased to make choice of anything in Rome which was most agreeable to his fancy, with a promise, legally confirmed, that he should not be refused his demand. Thereupon, after a suitable return of thanks for so gracious an offer, he required a certain Jack-pudding whom he had seen to act his part most egregiously upon the stage, and whose meaning, albeit he knew not what it was he had spoken, he understood perfectly enough by the signs and gesticulations he made. And for this suit of his, in that he asked nothing else, he gave this reason: that in the wide and spacious dominions, which were reduced under the sway and authority of his sovereign government, there were sundry countries and nations much differing from one another in language, with whom, whether he was to speak unto them or give any answer to their requests, he was always necessitated to make use of divers sorts of truchmen and interpreters. Now with this man alone, sufficient for supplying all their places, that great inconvenience would hereafter be totally removed, seeing he is such a fine gesticulator, and in the practice of chirology an artist so complete, expert, and dexterous, that with his very fingers he speaks. Howsoever, you are to pitch upon such a dumb one as is deaf by nature, and from his birth, to the end that his gestures and signs may be the more vividly and truly prophetic, and not counterfeit by the intermixture of some adulterated lustre and affectation. Yet whether this dumb person shall be of the male or female sex is, in your option, at your discretion, and altogether depends on your own election."

"I would more willingly," quoth Panurge, "consult with and be advised by a dumb woman, were it not that I am afraid of two things. The first is, that the greater part of women, whatever it be that they see, do always represent to their fancies, think and imagine, that it has some relation to the sugared entering of the goodly ithyphallos and grafting in the cleft of the overturned tree, the quick-set-imp of the pin of copulation. Whatever signs, shows, or gestures we shall make, or whatever our behaviour, carriage, or demeanour, shall happen to be in their view and presence, they will interpret the whole in reference to the act of androgynation, and the culbatising exercise; by which means we shall be abusively disappointed of our designs, in that she will take all our signs for nothing else but tokens and representations of our desire to entice her into the lists of a Cyprian combat or catsenconny skirmish. Do you remember what happened at Rome two hundred and threescore years after the foundation thereof? A young Roman gentleman, encountering by chance at the foot of Mount Celion a beautiful Latin lady named Verona, who from her very cradle upwards had been both deaf and dumb, very civilly asked her, not without a chironomatic Italianising of his demand, with various jectigation of his fingers, and other gesticulations, as yet customary amongst the speakers of that country, 'What senators,* in her descent from the top of the hill, she had met going up thither?' For you are to conceive that he knew nothing of her deafness and dumbness. She in the meantime, who neither heard nor understood so much as one word of what he said, at once imagined, by all that she could apprehend in the lovely gesture of his manual signs, that what he required of her was what she herself had a great mind to, even that which a young man doth naturally desire of a woman. Then was it that by signs, which in all occurrences of venereal love are incomparably more attractive, valid, and efficacious than words, she beckoned to him to come along with her to her house; which when he had done, she drew him aside to a privy room, and then made a most lively alluring sign unto him, to show that the game did please her. Whereupon, without any more ado, or so much as the uttering of one word on either side, they fell to and bringuardised it lustily.

"The other cause of my being averse from consulting with dumb women is, that to our signs they would make no answer at all, but suddenly fall backwards in a divaricating posture, to intimate thereby to us the reality of their consent to the supposed motion of our tacit demands. Or, if they should chance to make any counter-signs responsive to our propositions, they would prove so foolish, impertinent, and ridiculous, that by them we should easily judge their thoughts to have no excursion beyond the duffling academy. You know very well how at Brignoles, when the nun Sister Fatbun was made big with child by the young Stifly-stand-to't, her pregnancy came to be known, and she, cited by the abbess, and in a full convention of the convent, was accused of incest. Her excuse was that she did not consent thereto, but that it was done by the violence and impetuous force of the Friar Stifly-stand-to't. Hereto the abbess very austerely replying, 'Thou naughty, wicked girl, why didst thou not cry—"a rape, a rape?"' then should all of us have run to thy succour.' Her answer was that the rape was committed in the dortor, where she durst not cry, because it was a place of sempiternal silence. 'But,' quoth the abbess, 'thou rougish wench, why didst not thou then make some sign to those that were in the next chamber beside thee?' To this she answered, 'That with her buttocks she made a sign to them as vigorously as she could, yet never one of them did so much as offer to come to her help and assistance.' 'But,' quoth the abbess, 'thou scurvy baggage, why didst not thou tell it me immediately after the perpetration of the act, that so we might orderly, regularly, and canonically have accused him?' 'I would have done so, had the case been mine, for the clearer manifestation of mine innocency.' 'I truly, madam, would have done the like with all my heart and soul,' quoth Sister Fatbun; 'but that fearing I should remain in sin, and in the hazard of eternal damnation, if prevented by a sudden death, I did confess myself to the father friar before he went out of the room, who, for my penance, enjoined me not to tell it, or reveal the matter unto any. It were a most enormous and horrid offence, detestable before God and the angels, to reveal a confession. Such an abominable wickedness would have possibly brought down fire from heaven, wherewith to have burnt the whole nunnery, and sent us all headlong to the bottomless pit to bear company with Corah, Dathan, and Abiram.'"

"You will not," quoth Pantagrue, "with all your jesting, make me laugh. I know that all the monks, friars, and nuns, had rather violate and infringe the highest of the commandments of God than break the least of their provincial statutes. Take you therefore Goatsnose, a man very fit for your present purpose; for he is, and hath been, both dumb and deaf from the very remotest infancy of his childhood."

CHAPTER XX.

How Goatsnose by Signs made Answer to Panurge.

GOATSNOSE being sent for, came the following day to Pantagrue's court. On his arrival, Panurge gave him a fat calf, the half of a hog, two puncheons of wine, one load of corn, and thirty francs of small money; then having brought him before Pantagrue, in presence of the gentlemen of the bedchamber, he made this sign unto him. He yawned a long time, and in yawning made with the thumb of his right hand the figure of the Greek letter Tau, by frequent reiterations. Afterwards he lifted up his eyes heavenwards, then turned them in his head like a she goat in the painful fit of an absolute birth, in doing whereof he coughed and sighed heavily. This done, and after he had made demonstration of the want of his codpiece, he from under his shirt took his placket-racket in a full grip, making it clack very melodiously betwixt his thighs; then, no sooner had he with his body stooped a little forwards, and bowed his left knee, than immediately, holding both his arms on his breast, in a loose, faint-like posture, the one over the other, he paused a while. Goatsnose looked wistfully upon him, and having heedfully viewed him all over, he lifted up into the air his left hand, the whole fingers whereof he retained fistways, except the thumb and the forefinger, whose nails he softly joined and coupled to one another. "I understand," quoth Pantagruel, "what he means by that sign. It denotes marriage, and withal the number thirty, according to the profession of the Pythagoreans. You will be married." "Thanks to you," quoth Panurge, in turning himself towards Goatsnose, "my little sewer; pretty master's mate, dainty baily, curious sergeant-marshal, and jolly catchpole leader." Then he lifted higher than before his said left hand, stretching out all the five fingers thereof, and severing them as wide from one another as he possibly could. "Here," says Pantagruel, "he more amply and fully insinuates to us, by the token which he shows forth of the quinary number, that you shall be married. Yea, that you shall not only be affianced, betrothed, wedded, and married, but that you shall furthermore cohabit and live jollily and merrily with your wife; for Pythagoras called five the nuptial number, which, together with marriage, signifies the consummation of matrimony, because it is composed of a ternary, the first of the odd, and binary, the first of the even numbers, as of a male and female knit and united together. In very deed it was the fashion of old in the city of Rome, at marriage festivals, to light five wax tapers; nor was it permitted to kindle any more at the nuptials of the most potent and wealthy; nor yet any fewer at the penurious weddings of the poorest and most abject of the world. Moreover, in times past, the heathen or paynims implored the assistance of five deities, or of one helpful at least in five several good offices to those that were to be married. Of this sort were the nuptial Jove; Juno, president of the feast; the fair Venus; Pitho, the goddess of eloquence and persuasion; and Diana, whose aid and succour was required to the labour of child-bearing." "Then," shouted Panurge, "oh, the gentle Goatsnose, I will give him a farm near Cinais, and a windmill hard by Mirebalais!" Hereupon the dumb fellow sneezed with an impetuous vehemency and concussion of the spirits of the whole body, withdrawing himself in so doing with a jerking turn towards the left hand. "By the body of a fox just slain," quoth Pantagruel, "what is that? This makes nothing for your advantage; for he betokens thereby that your marriage will be inauspicious and unfortunate. This sneezing, according to the doctrine of Terpsion, is the Socratic demon. If done towards the right side, it imports and portends that boldly, and with all assurance, one may go whither he will, and do what he listeth, according to what resolution he shall be pleased to have thereupon taken: his entries in the beginning, progress in his proceedings, and success in the events and issues, will be all lucky, good, and happy. The contrary thereto is implied and pre-saged if it be done towards the left." "You," quoth Panurge, "do take always the matter at the worst, and continually, like another Davus, cast in new disturbances and obstructions; nor ever yet did I know this old, paltry Terpsion worthy of citation but in points only of cozenage and imposture." "Nevertheless," quoth Pantagruel, "Cicero hath written I know not what to the same purpose in his Second Book of Divination."

Panurge then turning himself towards Goatsnose, made this sign unto him. He inverted his eyelids upwards, wrenched his jaws from the right to the left side, and drew forth his tongue half out of his mouth. This done, he placed his left hand wholly open, the mid-finger wholly excepted, which was perpendicularly placed upon the palm thereof, and set it just in the room where his codpiece had been. Then did he keep his right hand altogether shut up in a fist, save only the thumb, which he straight turned backwards directly under the right armpit, and settled it afterwards on that most eminent part of the buttocks which the Arabs call the Al-Katim. Suddenly he made this interchange; he held his right hand after the manner of the left, and posited it on the place wherein his codpiece sometime was, and retaining his left hand in the form and fashion of the right, he placed it upon his Al-Katim. This altering of hands he reiterated nine several times; at the last he reseated his eyelids into their own first natural position. Then doing the like also with his jaws and tongue, he cast a squinting look upon Goatsnose, diddering and shivering his chaps, as apes do now-a-days, and rabbits, whilst, almost starved with hunger, they are eating oats in the sheaf.

Then it was that Goatsnose, lifting up into the air his right hand wholly open and displayed, put the thumb thereof, even close to its first articulation, between the two third joints of the middle and ring fingers, pressing about the said thumb very hard with them both, and, whilst the remaining joints were contracted and shrunk in towards the wrist, he stretched forth with as much straightness as he could the fore and little fingers. That hand, thus framed and disposed of, he laid and placed upon Panurge's navel, moving withal continually the aforesaid thumb, and bearing up, supporting, or under-propping that hand upon the above-specified fore and little fingers as upon two legs. Thereafter he made in this posture his hand, little by little, and by degrees and pauses, successively to mount from athwart the belly to the stomach, whence he made it to ascend to the breast, even upwards to Panurge's neck, still gaining ground till, having reached his chin, he had put within the concave of his mouth his afore-mentioned thumb; then fiercely brandishing the whole hand, which he made to rub and grate against his nose, he heaved it further up, and made the gesture as if with the thumb thereof he would have put out his eyes. With this Panurge grew a little angry, and was about to withdraw, and rid himself from this ruggedly untoward dumb devil. But Goatsnosé, meantime prosecuting the intended purpose of his prognosticatory response, touched very rudely, with the above-mentioned shaking thumb, now his eyes, then his forehead, and, after that, the borders and corners of his cap. At last, Panurge cried out, saying, "Before God, master-fool, if you do not let me alone, or that you will presume to vex me any more, you shall receive from the best hand I have a mask wherewith to cover your rascally scoundrel face, you paltry, shitten varlet." Then said Friar John, "He is deaf, and doth not understand what thou sayest unto him. Bulli-ballock, make sign to him of a hail of fisticuffs upon the muzzle."

"What the devil," quoth Panurge, "means this busy, restless fellow? What is it that this polypragmonetic Aliboron* to all the fiends of hell doth aim at? He has almost thrust out mine eyes, as if he would poach them in a skillet of butter and eggs. By God, da jurandi, I will feast you with flirts and raps on the snout, interlarded with a double row of bobs and finger fillipings!" Then he left him, and gave him by way of salvo a volley of farts for his farewell. Goatsnose, perceiving Panurge thus to slip away from him, got before him, and, by mere strength enforcing him to stand, made this sign unto him. He let fall his right arm toward his knee, on the same side, as low as he could, and, raising all the fingers of that hand into a close fist, passed his dexter thumb betwixt the foremost and mid-fingers thereto belonging. Then scrubbing and swingeing a little with his left hand alongst and upon the uppermost in the very bow of the elbow of the said dexter arm, the whole cubit thereof, by leisure, fair and softly, at these thumpatory warnings, did raise and elevate itself even to the elbow, and above it; on a sudden he let it fall down as low as before, and after that, at certain intervals and such spaces of time raising and abasing it, he made a show thereof to Panurge. This so incensed Panurge that he forthwith lifted his hand to have struck the dumb roister, and given him a sound whirret on the ear, but that the respect and reverence which he carried to the presence of Pantagruel restrained his choler, and kept his fury within bounds. Then said Pantagruel, "If the bare signs now vex and trouble you, how much more grievously will you be perplexed and disquieted with the real things, which by them are represented and signified. All truths agree, and are consonant with one another. This dumb fellow prophesies and foretells that you will be married, cuckolded, beaten, and robbed." "As for the marriage," quoth Panurge, "I yield thereto, and acknowledge the verity of that point of his prediction; as for the rest, I utterly abjure and deny it; and believe, sir, I beseech you, if it may please you so to do, that in the matter of wives and horses* never any man was predestinated to a better fortune than I."

---

CHAPTER XXI.

"I NEVER thought," said Pantagruel, "to have encountered any man so headstrong in his ideas, or in his opinions so wilful, as I have found you to be, and see you are. Nevertheless, the better to clear your doubts, let us try all courses, and leave no stone unturned, nor wind unsailed by. Take good heed to what I am going to say to you. The swans, which are fowls consecrated to Apollo, never chant but in the hour of their approaching death, especially in the Meander flood, which is a river that runs along some of the territories of Phrygia. This I say because Ælianus and Alexander Myndius write that they had seen several swans in other places die, but never heard any of them sing or chant before their death. However, it passes current that the imminent death of a swan is presaged by his foregoing song, and that no swan dies until preallably he has sung.

"After the same manner, poets, who are under the protection of Apollo, when they are drawing near their latter end, ordinarily become prophets, and, by the inspiration of that god, sing sweetly, in vaticinating things which are to come. It has been likewise told me frequently that old, decrepit men, upon the brink of Charon's banks, do usher their decease with a disclosure, all at ease, to those that are desirous of such information of the determinate and assured truth of future accidents and contingencies. I remember, also, that * Alluding to the proverb, that there's more deceit in women and horses than in any other creatures whatever.

Aristophanes, in a certain comedy of his, calls the old folks sibyls, Εἰθ γέρων Σιβυλλιά. For as when, being upon a pier by the shore, we see afar off mariners, seafaring men, and other travellers, amongst the curled waves of azure Thetis within their ships, we then consider them in silence only, and seldom proceed any further than to wish them a happy and prosperous arrival; but, when they approach near to the haven, and come to wet their keels within their harbour, then both with words and gestures we salute them, and heartily congratulate their safe arrival to the port wherein we are ourselves. Just so the angels, heroes, and good demons, according to the doctrine of the Platonics, when they see mortals drawing near the harbour of the grave, as the most sure and calmest port of any, full of repose, ease, rest, tranquillity, free from the troubles and solitudes of this tumultuous and tempestuous world; then is it that they with alacrity hail and salute them, cherish and comfort them, and, speaking to them lovingly, begin even then to bless them with illuminations, and to communicate to them the abstrusest mysteries of divination. I will not attempt here to confound your memory by quoting antique examples of Isaac, of Jacob, of Patroclus towards Hector, of Hector towards Achilles, of Polymnestor towards Agamemnon, of Hecuba, of the Rhodian renowned by Posidonius, of Calanus the Indian towards Alexander the Great, of Orodes towards Mezentius, and of many others. It shall suffice for the present that I remind you of the learned and valiant knight and cavalier William of Bellay, late Lord of Langey, who died on the hill of Tarara, the 10th of January, in the climacteric year of his age, and of our supputation 1543, according to the Roman account. The last three or four hours of his life he employed in the serious utterance of a very pithy discourse, whilst, with a clear judgment and spirit void of all trouble, he foretold several important things, whereof a great deal has come to pass, and the rest we wait for. Howbeit his prophecies did at that time seem to us somewhat strange, absurd, and unlikely, because there did not then appear any sign sufficient to engage our faith to the belief of what he did prognosticate. We have here, near to the town of Villamere, a man that is both old and a poet, to wit, Raminagrobis, who for his second wife espoused my Lady Breadsow, on whom he begot the fair Basoche. It has been told me he is dying, and so near to his latter end that he is almost at the very last moment. Repair thither as fast as you can, and be ready to give an attentive ear to what he shall chant to you. It may be that you shall obtain from him what you desire, and that Apollo will be pleased by his means to clear your scruples." "I am content," quoth Panurge. "Let us go thither, Epistemon, and that in all haste, least otherwise his death supervenes. Wilt thou come along with us, Friar

John?" "Yes, that I will," quoth Friar John, "right heartily, to do thee a courtesy, my billy-ballocks; for I love thee with the best of my milt and liver."

Thereupon, without any further lingering, they all three set out, and quickly thereafter—for they made good speed—arriving at the poetical habitation, they found the jolly old man, albeit in the agony of his departure from this world, looking cheerful, with an open countenance, splendid aspect, and behaviour full of alacrity. After Panurge had very civilly saluted him, he, as a free gift, presented him with a gold ring, which he even then put upon the medial finger of his left hand, in the collet or bezel whereof was enchased an oriental sapphire, very fair and large. Then, in imitation of Socrates, he made an oblation unto him of a fair white cock, which was no sooner set upon the tester of his bed than, with a high raised head and crest, lustily shaking his feather coat, he crowed stentoriphonically loud. This done, Panurge very courteously required of him that he would vouchsafe to favour him with the grant and report of his sense and judgment touching the future destiny of his intended marriage. For answer hereto, when the honest old man had forthwith asked for pen, paper, and ink, to be brought unto him, which was at the same call served, he wrote these following verses:—

"Take, or not take her,
Off, or on:
Handy dandy is your lot,
When her name you write, you blot.

"'Tis undone, when all is done,
Ended e'er it was begun:
Hardly gallop, if you trot,
Set not forward when you run,
Nor be single, though alone,
Take, or not take her.

"Before you eat begin to fast;
For what shall be was never past.
Say, unsay, gainsay, save your breath:
Then wish at once her life and death.
Take, or not take her."

These lines he gave them with his own hands, saying, "Go, my lads, in peace—the great God of the highest heavens be your guardian and preserver—and do not attempt any more to trouble or disquiet me with this or any other business whatsoever. I have this very day, which is the last both of May and of me, with a great deal of labour, toil, and difficulty, chased out of my house a rabble of filthy, unclean, and plaguily pestilential rake-hells, black beasts, dusk, dun, white, ash-coloured, speckled, and a foul vermin of other hues, whose obtrusive importunity would not permit me to die at my ease: for by fraudulent and deceitful pricklings, ravenous, harpy-like graspings, waspish stings, and such like unwelcome approaches, forged in the shop of I know not what kind of insatiabilities, they went about to withdraw and to call me out of those sweet thoughts wherein I was already beginning to repose myself, and acquiesce in the contemplation and vision, yea, almost in the very touch and taste of the happiness and felicity which the good God hath prepared for his faithful saints and elect in the other life and state of immortality. Turn out of their courses, and eschew them; step forth of their ways, and do not resemble them; meanwhile, let me be no more troubled by you, but leave me now in silence, I beseech you."

CHAPTER XXII.

How Panurge argued and defended the Order of the Begging Friars.

PANURGE, on leaving Raminagrobis's chamber, said, as if he had been horribly frightened, "By the virtue of God, I believe that he is a heretic—the devil take me, if I do not!—he so villainously rails at the mendicant friars and Jacobins, who are the two hemispheres of the Christian world; by whose gyronomic circumbilivaginations, as by two celivagous filopendulums, all the autonomic metagrobolism of the Romish church, when tottering and emblustricated with the gibble gabble gibberish of this odious error and heresy, is homocentrically poised. But what harm, in the devil's name, have these poor devils the Capuchins and minims done him? Are not these beggarly devils sufficiently wretched already? Who can imagine that these poor snakes, the very extracts of ichthyophagy, are not thoroughly enough besmoked and besmeared with misery, distress, and calamity? Dost thou think, Friar John, by thy faith, that he is in the state of salvation? He goeth, before God, as surely damned to thirty thousand baskets full of devils as a pruning-bill to the lopping of a vine-branch. To revile with opprobrious speeches the good and courageous props and pillars of the church—is that to be called a poetical fury? I cannot rest satisfied with him, he sinneth grossly, and blasphemeth against the true religion. I am very much offended at his scandalising words and contumelious obloquy." "I do not care a straw," quoth Friar John, "for what he hath said; for although everybody should twit and jerk them, it were but a just retaliation, seeing all persons are served by them with the like sauce; therefore have I no interest therein. Let us see, nevertheless, what he hath written." Panurge very attentively read the paper which the old man had penned, then said to his two fellow-travellers, "The poor drinker dotes. Howsoever, I excuse him, for that I believe he is now drawing near to the end and final closure of his life. Let us go make his epitaph. By the answer which he has given us, I am not, I protest, one jot wiser than I was. Hearken here, Epistemon, my little bully, dost not thou hold him to be very resolute in his responsory verdicts? He is a witty, quick, and subtle sophister. I will lay an even wager that he is a miscreant apostate. By the belly of a stalled ox, how careful he is not to be mistaken in his words. He answered but by disjunctives, therefore it cannot be true what he saith; for the verity of such like propositions is inherent only in one of its two members. Oh, the cozening prattler that he is! I wonder if Santiago of Bressure be one of these cogging shirks." "Such was of old," quoth Epistemon, "the custom of the grand vaticinator and prophet Tiresias, who used always, by way of a preface, to say openly and plainly, at the beginning of his divinations and predictions, that what he was to tell would either come to pass or not. And such is truly the style of all prudent prognosticators." "He was, nevertheless," quoth Panurge, "so unfortunately misadventurous in the lot of his own destiny, that Juno thrust out both his eyes."

"Yes," answered Epistemon, "and that merely out of spite and spleen for having pronounced his award more veritably than she upon the question which was merrily proposed by Jupiter." "But," quoth Panurge, "what arch-devil is it that has possessed this Master Raminagrobis, that so unreasonably and without any occasion should have so snappishly and bitterly inveighed against these poor honest fathers, Jacobins, minors, and minims? It vexes me grievously, I assure you; nor am I able to conceal my indignation. He has transgressed most enormously; his soul goes infallibly to thirty thousand panniers full of devils." "I understand you not," quoth Epistemon, "and it offends me very much that you should so absurdly and perversely interpret that of the friar mendicants, which by the harmless poet was spoken of as black beasts, dun, and other sorts of other coloured animals. He is not, in my opinion, guilty of such a sophistical and fantastic allegory as by that phrase of his to have meant the begging brothers. He in downright terms speaks absolutely and properly of fleas, punies, hand-worms, flies, gnats, and other such like scurvy vermin, whereof some are black, some dun, some ash-coloured, some tawny, and some brown and dusky, all noisome, molesting, tyrannous, cumbersome, and unpleasant creatures, not only to sick and diseased folks, but to those also who are of a sound, vigorous, and healthful temperament and constitution. It is not unlikely that he may have the ascarids, and the lumbrics, and worms within the entrails of his body. Possibly he suffers, as it is frequent and usual amongst the Egyptians, together with all those who inhabit the Erythrean confines and dwell along the shores and coasts of the Red Sea, some sour prickings and smart stingings in his arms and legs of those little speckled dragons which the Arabians call meden. You are to blame for offering to expound his words otherwise, and wrong the ingenious poet, and outrageously abuse and miscall the said fraters, by an imputation of baseness undeservedly laid to their charge. We still should, in such like discourses of fatiloquent soothsayers, interpret all things to the best." "Will you teach me," quoth Panurge, "how to discern flies among milk, or show your father the way how to beget children? He is, by the virtue of God, an arrant heretic, a resolute, formal heretic; I say, a rooted, riveted, combustible heretic, one as fit to burn as the little wooden clock at Rochel. His soul goes to thirty thousand carts full of devils. Would you know whither? Cocksbody, my friend, straight under Proserpina's close stool, to the very middle of the self-same infernal pan within which she, by an excrementitious evacuation, voids the fecal stuff of her stinking clysters, and that just upon the left side of the great cauldron of three fathom height, hard by the claws and talons of Lucifer, in the very darkest of the passage which leads towards the black chamber of Demogorgon. Oh, the villain!"

CHAPTER XIII.

How Panurge maketh a Motion of a Return to Raminagrobis.

"LET us return," quoth Panurge, "not ceasing, to the uttermost of our abilities, to ply him with admonitions, for the furtherance of his salvation. Let us go back, for God's sake; let us go, in the name of God. It will be a very meritorious work, and of great charity in us, to deal so in the matter, and provide so well for him that, albeit he come to lose both body and life, he may at least escape the risk and danger of the eternal damnation of his soul. We will by our holy persuasions bring him to a sense and feeling of his danger, induce him to acknowledge his faults, move him to a repentance of his errors, and stir up in him such a sincere contrition of heart for his offences as will prompt him with all earnestness to cry for mercy, and to beg pardon at the hands of the good fathers, as well of the absent as of such as are present. Whereupon we will take measures formally, to the end he be not, after his decease, declared an heretic, and condemned, as were the hobgoblins of the provost's wife of Orleans, to the undergoing of such punishments, pains, and tortures as are due to and inflicted on those that inhabit the horrid cells of the infernal regions; and withal incline, instigate, and persuade him to bequeath, and leave in legacy (by way of amends and satisfaction for the outrage and injury done to those good religious fathers, throughout all the convents, cloisters, and monasteries of this province) many pittances, a great deal of mass-singing, store of obits, and that sempiternally, on the anniversary day of his decease, every one of them all to be furnished with a quintuple allowance, and that the great borracho, replenished with the best liquor, trudge apace along the tables, as well of the young duckling monkitoes, lay-brothers, and lowest degree of the abbey-lubbards, as of the learned priests and reverend clerks—the very meanest of the novices and mitiants unto the order being equally admitted to the benefit of those obsequial festivals, with the aged rectors and professed fathers. This is the surest ordinary means whereby from God he may obtain forgiveness.

“Ho, ho, I am quite mistaken, I digress from the purpose, and fly out of my discourse, as if my spirits were a wool-gathering. The devil take me if I go thither! Virtue God! the chamber is already full of devils. Oh, what a swingeing, thwacking noise is now amongst them! Oh, the terrible coil that they keep! Harken, do you not hear the rustling bustle of their strokes and blows, as they scuffle one with another, like true devils indeed, who shall gulp up Raminagrobis's soul, and be the first bringer of it, whilst it is hot, to Monsieur Lucifer? Beware, and get you hence; for my part, I will not go thither. The devil roast me if I go! Who knows but that these hungry, mad devils may in the haste of their rage, and fury of their impatience, take a qui for a quo, and instead of Raminagrobis snatch up poor Panurge, frank and free? Though formerly when I was deep in debt they always failed. Get you hence! I will not go thither. Before God, the very bare apprehension thereof is like to kill me. To be in the place where there are greedy, famished, and hunger-starved devils; amongst factious devils; amidst trading and trafficking devils—oh, the Lord preserve me! Get you hence! I dare pawn my credit on it, that no Jacobin, Cordelier, Carmelite, Capuchin, Theatin, or Minim, will bestow his personal presence at his interment. The wiser they, because he has ordained nothing for them in his latter will and testament. The devil take me if I go thither. If he be damned, to his own loss and hindrance be it. What the deuce moved him to be so snappish and bent against the good fathers of the true religion? Why did he cast them off, reject them, and drive them out of his chamber, even in that very time when he stood in greatest need of the aid and assistance of their devout prayers and holy admonitions? Why did not he by testament leave them, at least, some jolly pieces and cantles of substantial meat, a parcel of cheek-puffing victuals, and a little belly-timber and provision for the guts of these poor folks who have nothing but their life in this world? Let him go thither who will; the devil take me if I go; for, if I should, the devil would not fail to snatch me up. Cancro. Ho, the pox! Get you hence, Friar John; art thou content that thirty thousand wainload of devils should get away with thee at this same very instant? If thou be, at my request do these three things. First, give me thy purse; for besides that thy money is marked with crosses, and the cross is an enemy to charms, the same may befall thee which not long ago happened to John Dodin, collector of the excise of Coudray, at the ford of Vede, when the soldiers broke the planks. This monied fellow, meeting at the very brink of the ford with Friar Adam Crankcod, a Franciscan Observatin of Mirebeau, promised him a new frock, provided that, in transporting him over the water, he would bear him upon his neck and shoulders, after the manner of carrying dead goats; for he was a lusty, strong-limbed, sturdy rogue. The condition being agreed upon, Friar Crankcod trussed himself up to his very ballocks, and laid on his back, like a fair little Saint Christopher, the load of the said suppliant Dodin, and so carried him gaily and with a good will (as Æneas bore his father Anchises through the conflagration of Troy), singing in the meanwhile a pretty Ave Maris Stella. When they were in the very deepest place of the ford, a little above the main-wheel of the water-mill, he asked if he had any coin about him. 'Yes,' quoth Dodin, 'a whole bag full;' and that he needed not mistrust his ability in the performance of the promise which he had made unto him concerning a new frock. 'How!?' quoth Friar Crankcod, 'thou knewest well enough that by the express rules, canons, and injunctions of our order, we are forbidden to carry about us any kind of money. Thou art truly unhappy, for having made me on this point commit a heinous trespass. Why didst thou not leave thy purse with the miller? Without fail thou shalt presently receive thy reward for it; and if ever hereafter I may but lay hold on thee within the limits of our chancel at Mirebeau, thou shalt have the miserere even to the vitulos.' With this, suddenly discharging himself of his burden, he threw down your Dodin headlong. Take example by this Dodin, my dear friend, Friar John, to the end that the devils may the better carry thee away at thine own ease. Give me thy purse. Carry no manner of cross upon thee. Therein lies an evident and apparent danger. For, if you have any silver coined with a cross upon it, they will cast thee down headlong upon some rocks, as the eagles used to do with the tortoises for the breaking of their shells, as the bald pate of the poet Æschylus can sufficiently bear witness. Such a fall would hurt thee very sore, my sweet bully, and I would be sorry for it. Or otherwise they will let thee fall, and tumble down into the high swollen waves of some capacious sea, I know not where, but, I warrant thee, far enough hence, as Icarus fell; which from thy name would afterwards get the denomination of the Funnellian Sea.

“Secondly, be out of debt. For the devils have a great liking to those that are out of debt. I have sorely felt the experience thereof in mine own case; for now the lecherous varlets are always wooing me, courting me, and making much of me, which they never did when I was all to pieces. The soul of one in debt is insipid, dry, and heretical altogether.

“Thirdly, with thy cowl and Domino de Grobis, return to Raminagrobis, and in case, being thus qualified, thirty thousand boats full of devils forthwith come not to carry thee away, I shall willingly be at the expense of paying for the pint and faggot. Now if, for more security, thou wouldst have some associate to bear thee company, let not me be the comrade thou searchest for; think not to get a fellow-traveller of mē; nay, do not. I advise thee for the best. Get you hence, I will not go thither; the devil take me if I go.” “Notwithstanding all the fright that you are in,” quoth Friar John, “I would not care so much as might possibly be expected I should if I once had but my sword in my hand.” “Thou hast verily hit the nail on the head,” quoth Panurge, “and speakest like a learned doctor, subtle and well-skilled in the art of devilry. At the time when I was a student in the University of Toulouse, that same reverend father in the devil, Picatrix, rector of the Diabological Faculty, was wont to tell us that the devils did naturally fear the bright glancing of swords as much as the splendour and light of the sun. In confirmation of the truth whereof, he related this story: ‘Hercules, at his descent into hell, to all the devils of those regions, did not by half so much terrify them with his club and lion’s skin as afterwards Æneas did with his clear shining armour upon him, and his sword in his hand, well furbished by the aid, council, and assistance of the Sibylla Cumana.’ That was perhaps the reason why the senior John James Trivolve, whilst he was dying at Chartres, called for his cutlass, and died with a drawn sword in his hand, laying about him, alongst and athwart, around the bed and everywhere within his reach, like a stout, doughty, valorous, and knight-like cavalier; by which resolute manner of fence he scared away and put to flight all the devils that were then lying in wait for his soul at the time of his death. When the Massorets and Cabalists are asked why it is that none of the devils at any time enter into the terrestrial paradise? there answer has been, is, and will be still, that there is a cherubim standing at the gate, with a flame-like, glistening sword in his hand. Although, to speak in the true diabolical sense or phrase of Toledo, I must needs confess and acknowledge that the devils cannot be killed or die by the stroke of a sword, I do nevertheless avow and maintain, according to the doctrine of the said Diabology, that they may suffer a solution of continuity (as if with thy shable thou shouldst cut athwart the flame of a burning fire, or the gross opacous exhalations of a thick and obscure smoke), and cry out like very devils at their sense and feeling of this dissolution, which in very deed I must aver is devilishly painful, smarting, and dolorous.

“When thou seest the impetuous shock of two armies, and vehement violence of the push in their horrid encounter with one another, dost thou think, Ballockasso, that so horrible a noise as is heard proceeds from the voice and shouts of men? the dashing and jolting of harness? the clattering and clashing of armies? the hacking and slashing of battle-axes? the justling and crashing of pikes? the bustling and breaking of lances? the clamour and shrieks of the wounded? the sound and din of drums? the clangour and shrillness of trumpets? the neighing and rushing of horses? with the fearful claps and thundering of all sorts of guns, from the double cannon to the pocket pistol inclusive? I cannot really deny but that in these various things which I have rehearsed there may be the occasion of the huge yell and tintamarre of the two engaged bodies. But the most fearful and tumultuous coil and stir, the terriblest and most boisterous garboil and hurry, the chiefest rustling black santus of all, and principal hurly burly, springs from the grievous howling and lowing of devils, who, pell-mell, in a hand-over-head confusion, waiting for the poor souls of the maimed and hurt soldiery, receive unawares some strokes with swords, and so by those means suffer a solution of, and division in, the continuity of their aërial and invisible substances: as if some lackey, snatching at the lard-slices stuck in a piece of roast meat on the spit, should get from Mr Greasyfist a good rap on the knuckles with a cudgel. They cry out and shout like devils, even as Mars did when he was hurt by Diomedes at the siege of Troy, who, as Homer testifies of him, did then raise his voice more horribly loud, and sonoriferously high, than ten thousand men together would have been able to do. What makes all this for our present purpose? I have been speaking here of well-furbished armour and bright shining swords. But so is it not, Friar John, with thy weapon; for by a long discontinuance of work, cessation from labour, desisting from making it officiate, and putting it into that practice wherein it had been formerly accustomed, and, in a word, for want of occupation, it is, upon my faith, become more rusty than the key-hole of an old powdering-tub. Therefore it is expedient that you do one of these two things, either furbish your weapon bravely, and as it ought to be, or otherwise have a care that, in the rusty case it is in, you do not presume to return to the house of Raminagrobis. For my part, I vow I will not go thither. The devil take me if I go."

CHAPTER XXIV.

How Panurge consulted with Epistemon.

HAVING left the town of Villaumere, as they were upon their return towards Pantagruel, Panurge, in addressing his discourse to Epistemon, spoke thus: "My most ancient friend and gossip, thou seest the perplexity of my thoughts, and knowest many remedies for the removal thereof; art thou not able to help and succour me?" Epistemon, thereupon taking speech in hand, represented to Panurge how the open voice and common fame of the whole country did run on no other discourse but the derision and mockery of his new disguise; whereof his counsel to him was that he would, in the first place, be pleased to make use of a little hellebore, for the purging of his brain of that peccant humour which, through that extravagant and fantastic mummery of his, had furnished the people with a too just occasion of flouting and gibing, jeering and scoffing him, and that next he would resume his ordinary accoutrement, and go apparelled as he was wont to do. "I am," quoth Panurge, "my dear gossip Epistemon, of a mind and resolution to marry, but am afraid of being a cuckold, and to be unfortunate in my wedlock. For this cause I have made a vow to young Saint Francis—who at Plessis le Tours is much revered of all women, earnestly cried unto by them, for he was the first founder of the confraternity of good men, whom they naturally covet, affect, and long for—to wear spectacles in my cap, and to carry no codpiece in my breeches, until the present inquietude of my spirits be fully settled."

"Truly," quoth Epistemon, "that is a pretty vow, of thirteen to a dozen. It is a shame to you, and I wonder much at it, that you do not return unto yourself, and recall your senses from thus straying abroad, to that rest and stillness which becomes a virtuous man. This whimsical conceit of yours brings me to the remembrance of a solemn promise made by the shaghaired Argives, who having, in their controversy against the Lacedæmonians for the territory of Thyrea, lost the battle, which they hoped should have decided it for their advantage, vowed never to wear any hair on their heads till preallably they had recovered the loss of both their honour and lands. As likewise to the memory of the vow of a pleasant Spaniard called Michael Doris, who vowed to carry in his hat a piece of the skin of his leg till he should be revenged of him who had struck it off. Yet do I not know which of these two deserves most to wear a green and yellow hood with a hare's ears tied to it, either the aforesaid vain-glorious champion, or that Enguerrant who, having forgot the art of writing histories, set down by the Samosatian philosopher, makes a most tediously long narrative and relation thereof. For, at the first reading of such a profuse discourse, one would think it had been suggested for the introduction of a story of great importance and moment, concerning the waging of some formidable war, or the notable change and mutation of potent states and kingdoms; but, in conclusion, the world laugheth at the capricious champion, at the Englishman who had affronted him, as also at their scribbler Enguerrant, more driveling at the mouth than a mustard pot. The jest and scorn thereof is not unlike that of the mountain of Horace, which by the poet was made to cry out and lament most enormously, as a woman in the pangs and labour of childbirth, at which deplorable cries and lamentations the whole neighbourhood being assembled in expectation to see some marvellous monstrous production, could at last perceive no other but the paltry, ridiculous mouse."

"Your mousing," quoth Panurge, "will not make me leave my musing why folks should be so frumpishly disposed, seeing I am certainly persuaded that some flout who merit to be flouted at; yet, as my vow imports, so will I do. It is now a long time since, by Jupiter, we did swear faith and amity to one another. Give me your advice, Billy, and tell me your own opinion freely, should I marry or no?" "Truly," quoth Epistemon, "the case is hazardous, and the danger so eminently apparent, that I find myself too weak and insufficient to give you a punctual and peremptory resolution therein; and if ever it was true that judgment is difficult in matters of the medicinal art, what was said by Hippocrates of Lango is certainly so in this case. True it is that in my brain there are some rolling fancies, by means whereof somewhat may be pitched upon of a seeming efficacy to the disentangling your mind of those dubious apprehensions wherewith it is perplexed; but they do not thoroughly satisfy me. Some of the Platonic sect affirm that whosoever is able to see his proper genius may know his own destiny. I understand not their doctrine, nor do I think that you adhere to them; there is a palpable abuse.

I have seen the experience of it in a very curious gentleman of the country of Estangourre. This is one of the points. There is yet another not much better. If there were any authority now in the oracles of Jupiter Ammon; of Apollo in Lebadia, Delphos, Delos, Cyrra, Patara, Tegyres, Preneste, Lycia, Colophon, or in the Castilian Fountain; near Antioch in Syria, between the Branchidians; of Bacchus in Dodona; of Mercury in Phares, near Patras; of Apis in Egypt; of Serapis in Canope; of Faunus in Menalia, and Albunea near Tivoli; of Tiresias in Orchomenus; of Mopsus in Cilicia; of Orpheus in Lesbos; and of Trophonius in Leucadia, I would in that case advise you, and possibly not, to go thither for their judgment concerning the design and enterprise you have in hand. But you know that they are all of them become as dumb as so many fishes since the advent of that Saviour King whose coming to this world hath made all oracles and prophesies to cease; as the approach of the sun's radiant beams expelleth goblins, bugbears, hob-thruses, brooms, screech owl-mates, night-walking spirits, and tenebrions. These now are gone; but although they were as yet in continuance and in the same power, rule, and request that formerly they were, yet would not I counsel you to be too credulous in putting any trust in their responses. Too many folks have been deceived thereby. It stands, furthermore, upon record how Agrippina did charge the fair Lollia with the crime of having interrogated the oracle of Apollo Clarius to understand if she should be at any time married to the Emperor Claudius; for which cause she was at first banished, and thereafter put to a shameful and ignominious death."

"But," saith Panurge, "let us do better; the Ogygian Islands are not far distant from the haven of Sammallo. Let us, after that we shall have spoken to our king, make a voyage thither. In one of these four isles, to wit, that which hath its primest aspect towards the sun setting, it is reported, and I have read in good antique and authentic authors, that there reside many soothsayers, fortune-tellers, vaticinators, prophets, and diviners of things to come; that Saturn inhabiteth that place, bound with fair chains of gold, and within the concavity of a golden rock, being nourished with divine ambrosia and nectar, which are daily in great store and abundance transmitted to him from the heavens by I do not well know what kind of fowls—it may be that they are the same ravens which in the deserts are said to have fed Saint Paul, the first hermit. He very clearly foretelleth unto every one who is desirous to be certified of the condition of his lot, what his destiny will be, and what future chance the fates have ordained for him; for the Parcæ, or Weird Sisters, do not twist, spin, or draw out a thread, nor yet doth Jupiter perpend, project, or deliberate anything, which the good old celestial father knoweth not to the full, even whilst he is asleep. This will be a very summary abbreviation of our labour, if we but hearken unto him a little upon the serious debate and canvassing of this my perplexity." "That is," answered Epistemon, "a gullery too evident, a plain abuse and fib too fabulous. I will not go, not I—I will not go."

CHAPTER XXV.

"NEVERTHELESS," quoth Epistemon, continuing his discourse, "I will tell you what you may do, if you believe me, before we return to our king. Hard by here, in the Brown-wheat [Bouchart] Island, dwelleth Her Trippa. You know how by the arts of astrology, geomancy, chiromancy, metopomancy, and others of a like stuff and nature, he foretelleth all things to come; let us talk a little, and confer with him about your business." "Of that," answered Panurge, "I know nothing; but of this much concerning him I am assured, that one day, and that not long since, whilst he was prating to the great king of celestial, sublime, and transcendent things, the lackeys and footboys of the court, upon the upper steps of stairs between two doors, jummed, one after another, as often as they listed, his wife, who is passable fair, and a pretty snug hussy. Thus he who seemed very clearly to see all heavenly and terrestrial things without spectacles, who discoursed boldly of adventures past, with great confidence opened up present cases and accidents, and stoutly professed the presaging of all future events and contingencies, was not able, with all the skill and cunning that he had, to perceive the bumbasting of his wife, whom he reputed to be very chaste, and hath not till this hour got notice of anything to the contrary. Yet let us go to him, seeing you will have it so; for surely we can never learn too much." They on the very next ensuing day came to Her Trippa's lodging. Panurge, by way of donative, presented him with a long gown, lined all through with wolf-skins, with a short sword, mounted with a gilded hilt, and covered with a velvet scabbard, and with fifty good single angels; then, in a familiar and friendly way, did he ask of him his opinion touching the affair. At the very first Her Trippa, looking on him very wistly in the face, said unto him: "Thou hast the metoposcopy and physiognomy of a cuckold; I say, of a notorious and infamous cuckold." With this casting an eye upon Panurge's right hand, in all the parts thereof, he said: "This rugged draught which I see here, just under the mount of Jove, was never yet but in the hand of a cuckold." Afterwards, he with a white lead pen swiftly and hastily drew a certain number of divers kinds of points, which by rules of geomancy he coupled and joined together, then said: "Truth itself is not truer than that it is certain thou wilt be a cuckold a little after thy marriage." That being done, he asked of Panurge the horoscope of his nativity; which was no sooner by Panurge tendered unto him, than that, erecting a figure, he very promptly and speedily formed and fashioned a complete fabric of the houses of heaven, in all their parts, whereof, when he had considered the situation and the aspects in their triplicities, he fetched a deep sigh, and said: "I have clearly enough already discovered unto you the fate of your cuckoldry, which is unavoidable; you cannot escape it. And here have I got new and further assurance thereof, so that I may now hardly pronounce, and affirm without any scruple or hesitation at all, that thou wilt be a cuckold; that, furthermore, thou wilt be beaten by thine own wife, and that she will purloin, filch, and steal of thy goods from thee; for I find the seventh house, in all its aspects, of a malignant influence, and every one of the planets threatening thee with disgrace, according as they stand seated towards one another in relation to the horned signs of Aries, Taurus, and Capricorn. In the fourth house, I find Jupiter in a decadence, as also in a tetragonal aspect to Saturn, associated with Mercury. Thou wilt be soundly peppered, my good, honest fellow, I warrant thee." "I will be?" answered Panurge. "A plague rot thee, thou old fool and doating sot, how graceless and unpleasant thou art! When all cuckolds shall be at a general rendezvous, thou shouldst be their standard-bearer. But whence comes this ciron-worm betwixt these two fingers?" This Panurge said, putting the forefinger of his left hand betwixt the fore and mid-finger of the right, which he thrust out towards Her Trippa, holding them open after the manner of two horns, and shutting into his fist his thumb with the other fingers. Then, in turning to Epistemon, he said: "Lo, hear the true Olus of Martial, who addicted and devoted himself wholly to the observing the miseries, crosses, and calamities of others, whilst his own wife, in the interim, did keep an open bawdy-house. This varlet is poorer than ever was Irus, and yet he is proud, vaunting, arrogant, self-conceited, over-weening, and more insupportable than seventeen devils; in one word, Πτωχολόζων, which term of old was applied to the like beggarly, strutting coxcombs. Come, let us leave this madpash bedlam, this hair-brained fop, and give him leave to rave and dose his bellyful, with his private and intimately acquainted devils; who, if they were not the very worst of all infernal fiends, would never have deigned to serve such a knavish, barking cur as this is. He hath not learnt the first precept of philosophy, which is, Know thyself; for, whilst he braggeth and boasteth that he can discern the least mote in the eye of another, he is not able to see the huge block that puts out the sight of both his eyes. This is such another Polypragmon as is by Plutarch described. He is of the nature of the Lamian witches, who in foreign places, in the houses of strangers, in public, and amongst the common people, had a sharper and more piercing inspection into their affair than any lynx, but at home, in their own proper dwelling-mansions, were blinder than mold-warps, and saw nothing at all. For their custom was, at their return from abroad, when they were by themselves in private, to take their eyes out of their head, from whence they were as easily removeable as a pair of spectacles from their nose, and to lay them up into a wooden slipper, which for that purpose did hang behind the door of their lodging."

Panurge had no sooner done speaking when Her Trippa took into his hand a tamarisk branch. "In this," quoth Epistemon, "he doth very well, right, and like an artist, for Nicander calleth it the Divinatory tree." "Have you a mind," quoth Her Trippa, "to have the truth of the matter yet more fully and amply disclosed unto you by pyromancy, by aeromancy, whereof Aristophanes in his Clouds maketh great estimation, by hydromancy, by lecanomancy, of old in prime request amongst the Assyrians, and thoroughly tried by Hermolaus Barbarus? Come hither, and I will show thee, in this platter full of fair fountain water, thy future wife lechering and sercroupierising it with two swaggering ruffians, one after another." "Yea, but have a special care," quoth Panurge, "when thou comest to put thy nose within mine arse, that thou forget not to pull off thy spectacles." Her Trippa, going on in his discourse, said: "By catoptromancy, likewise held in such account by the Emperor Didius Julianus, that by means thereof he ever and anon foresaw all that which at any time did happen or befall unto him. Thou shalt not need to put on thy spectacles, for in a mirror thou wilt see her as clearly and manifestly nebrundiated, and billibodring it, as if I should show it in the fountain of the temple of Minerva near Patras. By coscinomancy, most religiously observed of old amidst the ceremonies of the ancient Romans. Let us have sieve and shears, and thou shalt see devils. By alphetomancy, cried up by Theocritus in his Pharmaceutria. By alentomancy, mixing the flower of wheat with oatmeal. By astragalomancy, whereof I have the plots and models all at hand ready for the purpose. By tiromancy, whereof we make some proof in a great Brehemont cheese, which I here keep by me. By giromancy, if thou shouldest turn round circles, thou mightest assure thyself from me that they would fall always on the wrong side. By sternomancy, which maketh nothing for thy advantage, for thou hast an ill-proportioned stomach. By libanomancy, for the which we shall need but a little frankincense. By gastromancy, which kind of ventral fatiloquency was for a long time together used in Ferrara by Lady Giacomina Rodogina, the Engastrimythian prophetess. By cephalomancy, often practised amongst the High Germans, in their boiling of an ass's head upon burning coals. By ceromancy, where, by the means of wax dissolved into water, thou shalt see the figure, portrait, and lively representation of thy future wife, and of her fredin fredaliatory belly-thumping blades. By capnomancy; oh, the gallantest and most excellent of all secrets! By axionomancy; we want only a hatchet and a jet-stone to be laid together upon a quick fire of hot embers. Oh, how bravely Homer was versed in the practice hereof towards Penelope's suitors! By onymancy, for that we have oil and wax. By tephromancy, thou wilt see the ashes thus aloft dispersed, exhibiting thy wife in a fine posture. By botanomancy, for the nonce I have some few leaves in reserve. By sicomancy; oh, divine art in fig tree leaves! By ichthyomancy, in ancient times so celebrated, and put in use by Tiresias and Polydamas, with the like certainty of event as was tried of old at the Dina-ditch, within that grove consecrated to Apollo, which is in the territory of the Lycians. By choeromancy, let us have a great many hogs, and thou shalt have the bladder of one of them. By cheromancy, as the bean is found in the cake at the Epiphany vigil. By anthropomancy, practised by the Roman Emperor Heliogabalus. It is somewhat irksome, but thou wilt endure it well enough, seeing thou art destined to be a cuckold. By a sibylline stichomancy. By onomatomancy. How do they call thee?" "Chaw-turd," quoth Panurge. "Or yet by alectryomancy. If I should here with a compass draw a round, and in looking upon thee, and considering thy lot, divide the circumference thereof into four-and-twenty equal parts, then form a several letter of the alphabet upon every one of them; and lastly, posit a barley corn or two upon each of these so disposed letters, I durst promise, upon my faith and honesty, that if a young virgin cock be permitted to range amongst and athwart them, he should only eat the grains which are set and placed upon these letters, A. C.U.C.K.O.L.D. T.H.O.U. S.H.A.L.T. B.E. And that as fatidically as under the Emperor Valens, most perplexedly desirous to know the name of him who should be his successor to the empire, the cock vaticinating and alectryomantic, ate up the pickles that were deposited on the letters Θ.E.O.Δ. T.H.E.O.D. Or, for the more certainty, will you have a trial of your fortune by the art of aruspicy? By augury? Or by extispicy?" "By turdispicy," quoth Panurge. "Or yet by the mystery of necromancy? I will, if you please, suddenly set up again and revive some one lately deceased, as Apollonius of Tyane did to Achilles, and the Pythoness in the presence of Saul; which body, so raised up and re-quickened, will tell us the sum of all you shall require of him; no more nor less than, at the invocation of Erictho, a certain defunct person foretold to Pompey the whole progress and issue of the fatal battle fought in the Pharsalian fields. Or, if you be afraid of the dead, as commonly all cuckolds are, I will make use of the faculty of sciomancy."

"Go, get thee gone," quoth Panurge, "thou frantic ass, to the devil and be buggered, filthy bardachio that thou art, by some Albanian, for a steeple-crowned hat. Why the devil didst not thou counsel me as well to hold an emerald, or the stone of a hyena, under my tongue? Or, to furnish and provide myself with tongues of whoops and hearts of green frogs? Or, to eat the liver and milt of some dragon? To the end that by those means I might, at the chanting and chirping of swans and other fowls, understand the substance of my future lot and destiny, as did of old the Arabians in the country of Mesopotamia. Fifteen brace of devils seize upon the body and soul of this horned renegado, miscreant, cuckold, the enchanter, witch, and sorcerer of anti-christ; away to all the devils of hell! Let us return towards our king; I am sure he will not be well pleased with us if he once come to get notice that we have been in the kennel of this muffled devil. I repent my being come hither. I would willingly dispense with a hundred nobles, and fourteen yeomen, on condition that he, who not long since did blow in the bottom of my breeches, should instantly with his squirting spittle inluminat his moustaches. O Lord God, now! how the villain hath besmoked me with vexation and anger, with charms and witchcraft, and with a terrible coil and stir of infernal and Tartarian devils! The devil take him! Say Amen, and let us go drink. I shall not have any appetite for my victuals, how good cheer soever I make these two days to come, —hardly these four."

How Panurge consulted with Friar John of the Funnels.

PANURGE was indeed very much troubled in mind and disquieted at the words of Her Trippa, and therefore, as he passed by the little village of Huymes, after he had made his address to Friar John, in pecking at, rubbing, and scratching his own left ear, he said unto him, "Keep me a little jovial and merry, my dear and sweet bully, for I find my brains altogether meta-grabolised and confounded, and my spirits in a most dunsical puzzle at the bitter talk of this devilish, hellish, damned fool. Harken my dainty cod.

“My harcabusing cod, and buttock-stirring ballock, Friar John, my friend, I do carry a singular respect unto thee, and honour thee with all my heart. Thy counsel I hold for a choice and delicate morsel, therefore have I reserved it for the last bit. Give me thy advice freely, I beseech thee, should I marry, or no?” Friar John very merrily, and with a sprightly cheerfulness, made this answer to him: “Marry, in the devil’s name. Why not? What the devil else shouldst thou do but marry? Take thee a wife, and furbish her harness to some tune. Swinge her skin-coat as if thou wert beating on a stock-fish; and let the repercussion of thy clapper from her resounding metal make a noise as if a double peal of chiming-bells were hung at the cremasters of thy ballocks. As I say, marry, so do I understand that thou shouldst fall to work as speedily as may be; yea, my meaning is that thou oughtest to be so quick and forward therein, as on this same very day, before sunset, to cause proclaim thy banns of matrimony, and make provision of bedsteads. By the blood of a hog’s-pudding, till when wouldst thou delay the acting of a husband’s part? Dost thou not know, and is it not daily told unto thee, that the end of the world approacheth? We are nearer it by three poles and half a fathom than we were two days ago. The anti-christ is already born, at least it is so reported by many. The truth is, that hitherto the effects of his wrath have not reached further than to the scratching of his nurse and governesses. His nails are not sharp enough as yet, nor have his claws attained to their full growth—he is little.

‘Crescat; nos qui vivimus, multiplicemur.’

“It is written so, and it is holy stuff, I warrant you: the truth whereof is like to last as long as a sack of corn may be had for a penny, and a puncheon of pure wine for threepence. Wouldst thou be content to be found with thy genitories full in the day of judgment? Dum venerit judicare?” “Thou hast,” quoth Panurge, “a right clear and neat spirit. Friar John, my metropolitan cod, thou speakst in very deed pertinently and to purpose. That belike was the reason which moved Leander of Abydos, in Asia, whilst he was swimming through the Hellespontic Sea, to make a visit to his sweetheart Hero of Sestus, in Europe, to pray unto Neptune, and all the other marine gods, thus:—

‘Now, whilst I go, have pity on me,
And at my back returning drown me.’

He was loath, it seems, to die with his cods overgorged. He was to be commended; therefore do I promise that from henceforth no malefactor shall by justice be executed within my jurisdiction of Salmygondinois who shall not, for a day or two at least before, be permitted to culbut and foraminate, onocrotalwise, so that there remain not in all his vessels to write a Greek γ. Such a precious thing should not be foolishly cast away. He will perhaps therewith beget a male, and so depart the more contentedly out of this life that he shall have left behind him one for one."

CHAPTER XXVII.

How Friar John merrily and sportingly counselled Panurge.

"By Saint Rigomé," quoth Friar John, "I do advise thee to nothing, my dear friend Panurge, which I would not do myself were I in thy place. Only have a special care and take good heed thou solder well together the joints of the double-backed and two-bellied beast, and fortify thy nerves so strongly that there be no discontinuance in the knocks of the venerean thwacking, else thou are lost, poor soul. For if there pass long intervals betwixt the priapising feats, and that thou make an intermission of too large a time, that will befall thee which betides the nurses if they desist from giving suck to children, they lose their milk; and if continually thou do not hold thy aspersion tool in exercise, and keep thy mentul going, thy lacticinian nectar will be gone, and it will serve thee only as a pipe to piss out at, and thy cods for a wallet of lesser value than a beggar's scrip. This is a certain truth I tell thee, friend, and doubt not of it, for myself have seen the sad experiment thereof in many who cannot now do what they would, because before they did not what they might have done; Ex desuetudine amittuntur privilegia. Non-usage oftentimes destroys one's right, say the learned doctors of the law; therefore, my billy, entertain as well as possibly thou canst that hypogastric lower sort of troglodytic people, that their chief pleasure may be placed in the case of sempiternal labouring. Give order that henceforth they live not like idle gentlemen idly upon their rents and revenues, but that they may work for their livelihood by breaking ground within the Paphian trenches." "Nay, truly," answered Panurge, "Friar John, my left ballock, I will believe thee, for thou dealest plain with me, and fallest downright square upon the business without going about the bush with frivolous circumstances and unnecessary reservations. Thou with the splendour of a piercing wit hast dissipated all the lowering clouds of anxious apprehensions and suspicions which did intimidate and terrify me; therefore the heavens be pleased to grant to thee at all she-conflicts a stiff-standing fortune. Well, then, as thou hast said, so will I do; I will, in good sooth, marry—in that point there shall be no failing, I promise thee—and shall have always by me pretty girls clothed with the name of my wife's waiting-maids, that, lying under thy wings, thou mayest be night protector of their sisterhood when thou comest to see me."

"Let this serve for the first part of the sermon. Hearken," quoth Friar John, "to the oracle of the bells of Varennes. What say they?" "I hear and understand them," quoth Panurge; "their sound is, by my thirst, more uprightly fatidical than that of Jove's great kettles in Dodona. Hearken! Take thee a wife, take thee a wife, and marry, marry, marry; for if thou marry thou shalt find good therein; herein a wife thou shalt find good, so marry, marry. I will assure thee that I shall be married; all the elements invite and prompt me to it. Let this word be to thee a brazen wall, by diffidence not to be broken through. As for the second part of this our doctrine, thou seemest in some measure to mistrust the readiness of my paternity, in the practising of my placket-racket within the Aphrodisian tennis-court at all times fitting, as if the stiff god of gardens were not favourable to me. I pray thee, favour me so much as to believe that I still have him at a beck, attending always my commandments, docile, obedient, vigorous, and active in all things, and everywhere, and never stubborn or refractory to my will or pleasure. I need no more, but to let go the reins, and slacken the leash, which is the belly-point, and when the game is shown unto him, say, 'Hey, Jack, to thy booty!' he will not fail even then to flesh himself upon his prey, and tussle it to some purpose. Hereby you may perceive, although my future wife were as unsatiated and gluttonous in her voluptuousness and the delights of venery as ever was the Empress Messalina, or yet the Marchioness of Oincester in England, yet I desire thee to give credit to it, that I lack not for what is requisite to overlay the stomach of her lust, but have wherewith aboundingly to please her. I am not ignorant that Solomon said, who indeed of that matter speaketh clerk-like and learnedly—as also how Aristotle after him declared for a truth—that, for the greater part, the lechery of a woman is ravenous and unsatisfiable. Nevertheless, let such as are my friends, who read those passages, receive from me, for a most real verity, that I for such a Gill have a fit Jack; and that, if women's things cannot be satiated, I have an instrument indefatigable—an implement as copious in the giving as can in craving be their vade mecums. Do not here produce ancient examples of the paragons of Paillardice, and offer to match with my testicularity ability the Priapæan prowess of the fabulous fornicators, Hercules, Proculus Cæsar, and Mahomet, who in his Alcoran doth vaunt that in his cods he had the vigour of threescore bully ruffians; but let no zealous Christian trust the rogue—the filthy, ribald rascal is a liar. Nor shalt thou need to urge authorities, or bring forth the instance of the Indian prince, of whom Theophrastus, Plinius, and Athenæus testify, that, with the help of a certain herb, he was able, and had given frequent experiments thereof, to toss his sinewy piece of generation in the act of carnal concupiscence above threescore and ten times in the space of four-and-twenty hours. Of that I believe nothing; the number is supposititious, and too prodigally foisted in. Give no faith unto it, I beseech thee, but prithee trust me in this, and thy credulity therein shall not be wronged; for it is true, and Probatum est, that my pioneer of nature—the sacred ithyphallian champion—is of all stiff-intruding blades the primest. Come hither, my ballochette, and hearken. Didst thou ever see the monk of Castre's cowl? When in any house it was laid down, whether openly in the view of all, or covertly out of the sight of any, such was the ineffable virtue thereof for excitating and stirring up the people of both sexes unto lechery, that the whole inhabitants and indwellers, not only of that but likewise of all the circumjacent places thereto, within three leagues around it, did suddenly enter into rut, both beasts and folks, men and women, even to the dogs and hogs, rats and cats.

“I swear to thee that many times heretofore I have perceived and found in my codpiece a certain kind of energy, or efficacious virtue, much more irregular and of a greater anomaly than what I have related. I will not speak to thee either of house or cottage, nor of church or market, but only tell thee that once at the representation of the Passion, which was acted at Saint Maxent's, I had no sooner entered within the pit of the theatre, but that forthwith, by the virtue and occult property of it, on a sudden all that were there, both players and spectators, did fall into such an exorbitant temptation of lust, that there was not angel, man, devil, nor deviless, upon the place who would not then have bricollitched it with all their heart and soul. The prompter forsook his copy, he who played Saint Michael's part came down from his perch, the devils issued out of hell, and carried along with them most of the pretty girls that were there, yea, Lucifer, got out of his fetters,—in a word, seeing the huge disorder, I disparted myself forth of that enclosed place, in imitation of Cato the Censor, who perceiving, by reason of his presence, the Floralian festivals out of order, withdrew himself.”

CHAPTER XXVIII.

“I UNDERSTAND thee well enough,” said Friar John; “but time makes all things plain. The most durable marble or porphyry is subject to old age and decay. Though for the present thou possibly be not weary of the exercise, yet is it like I will hear thee confess a few years hence that thy cods hang dangling downwards for want of a better truss. I see thee waxing a little hoar-headed already. Thy beard, by the distinction of grey, white, tawny, and black, hath to my thinking the resemblance of a map of the terrestrial globe or geographical chart. Look attentively upon and take inspection of what I shall show unto thee. Behold there, Asia. Here are Tigris and Euphrates. Lo, there, Africa. Here is the mountain of the moon—yonder thou mayest perceive the fenny march of Nilus. On this side lieth Europe. Dost thou not see the Abbey of Theleme? This little tuft, which is altogether white, is the Hyperborean Hills. By the thirst of my throple, friend, when snow is on the mountains, I say the head and the chin, there is not then any considerable heat to be expected in the valleys and low-countries of the cod-piece.” “By the kibes of thy heels,” quoth Panurge, “thou dost not understand the topics. When snow is on the tops of the hills, lightning, thunder, tempest, whirlwinds, storms, hurricanes, and all the devils of hell rage in the valleys. Wouldst thou see the experience thereof, go to the territory of the Swiss, and earnestly perpend with thyself there the situation of the Lake of Wunderberlich, about four leagues distant from Berne, on the Syon side of the land. Thou twittest me with my grey hairs, yet considerest not how I am of the nature of leeks, which with a white head carry a green, fresh, straight, and vigorous tail. The truth is, nevertheless (why should I deny it?), that I now and then discern in myself some indicative signs of old age. Tell this, I prithee, to nobody, but let it be kept very close and secret betwixt us two; for I find the wine much sweeter now, more savoury to my taste, and unto my palate of a better relish than formerly I was wont to do; and withal, besides mine accustomed manner, I have a more dreadful apprehension than I ever heretofore have had of lighting on bad wine. Note and observe that this doth argue and portend I know not what of the west and occident of my time, and signifieth that the south and meridian of mine age is past. But what then, my gentle companion. That doth but betoken that I will hereafter drink so much the more. That is not, the devil hale it, the thing that I fear; nor is it there where my shoe pinches. The thing that I doubt most, and have greatest reason to dread and suspect, is, that through some long absence of our King Pantagruel (to whom I must needs bear company, should he go to all the devils of Barathrum) my future wife shall make me a cuckold. This is, in truth, the long and short of it. For I am by all those whom I have spoken to menaced and threatened with a horned fortune; and all of them affirm it is the lot to which from heaven I am predestinated." "Every one," answered Friar John, "that would be a cuckold is not one. If it be thy fate to be hereafter of the number of that horned cattle, then may I conclude with an ergo, thy wife will be beautiful, and ergo, thou wilt be kindly used by her. Likewise with this ergo, thou shalt be blessed with the fruition of many friends and well-willers. And, finally, with this other ergo, thou shalt be saved, and have a place in paradise. These are monachal topics and maxims of the cloister. Thou mayst take more liberty to sin. Thou shalt be more at ease than ever. There will be never the less left for thee, nothing diminished, but thy goods shall increase notably. And if so be it was preordinated for thee, wouldst thou be so impious as not to acquiesce in thy destiny? Speak, thou jaded cod.

“Balockatso, to the devil, my dear friend Panurge, seeing it is so decreed by the gods, wouldst thou invert the course of the planets, and make them retrogade? Wouldst thou disorder all the celestial spheres, blame the intelligences, blunt the spindles, join the wherves, slander the spinning quills, reproach the bobbins, revile the clew-bottoms, and finally ravel and untwist all the thread of both the warp and the waft of the Weird Sister Parcæ? What a pox to thy bones dost thou mean, stony cod? Thou wouldst, if thou couldst, a great deal worse than the giants of old intended to have done. Come hither, billicullion. Whether wouldst thou be jealous without a cause, or be a cuckold and know nothing about it?” “Neither the one nor the other,” quoth Panurge, “would I choose to be. But if I can get an inkling of the matter, I will provide well enough, or there shall not be one stick of wood within five hundred leagues about me whereof to make a cudgel.” “In good faith,” Friar John, “I speak now seriously unto thee; I think it will be my best not to marry. Harken to what the bells do tell me, now that we are nearer to them! Do not marry, marry not, not, not, not, not; marry, marry not, not, not, not, not. If thou marry, thou wilt miscarry, carry carry; thou wilt repent it, resent it, sent it! If thou marry, thou a cuckold, a cou-cou-cuckoe, cou-cou-cuckold thou shalt be. By the worthy wrath of God, I begin to be angry. This campanalian oracle fretteth me to the guts—a March hare was never in such a chafe as I am. Oh, how I am vexed! You monks and friars of the cowl-pated and hood-polled fraternity, have you no remedy nor salve against this malady of grafting horns in heads? Hath nature so abandoned human kind, and of her help left us so destitute, that married men cannot know how to sail through the seas of this mortal life, and be safe from the whirlpools, quicksands, rocks, and banks that lie alongst the coast of Cornwall.”

“I will,” said Friar John, “show thee a way, and teach thee an expedient, by means whereof thy wife shall never make thee a cuckold without thy knowledge and thine own consent.” “Do me the favour, I pray thee,” quoth Panurge, “my pretty, soft, downy cod; now tell it, Billy, tell it, I beseech thee.” “Take,” quoth Friar John, “Hans Carvel’s ring upon thy finger, who was the King of Melinda’s chief jeweller. Besides that, this Hans Carvel had the reputation of being very skilful and expert in the lapidary’s profession; he was a studious, learned, and ingenious man, a scientific person, full of knowledge, a great philosopher, of sound judgment, of a prime wit, good sense, clear-spirited, an honest creature, courteous, charitable, a giver of alms, and of a jovial humour, a boon companion, and a merry blade, if ever there was any in the world. He was somewhat gorbellied, had a little shake in his head, and was in effect unwieldy of his body. In his old age he took to wife the bailiff of Concordat’s daughter, young, fair, jolly, gallant, spruce, frisk, brisk, neat, feat, smirk, smug, compt, quaint, gay, fine, trixy, trim, decent, proper, graceful, handsome, beautiful, comely, and kind—a little too much—to her neighbours and acquaintance.

“Hereupon it fell out, after the expiring of a scantling of weeks, that Master Carvel became as jealous as a tiger, and entered into a very profound suspicion that his new-married gixy did keep a buttock-stirring with others. To prevent which inconveniency, he did tell her many tragical stories of the total ruin of several kingdoms by adultery; did read unto her the legend of chaste wives; then made some lectures to her in the praise of the choice virtue of pudicity, and did present her with a book in commendation of conjugal fidelity, wherein the wickedness of all licentious women was odiously detested; and withal he gave her a chain enriched with pure oriental sapphires. Notwithstanding all this, he found her always more and more inclined to the reception of her neighbour copes-mates, so that day by day his jealousy increased. In sequel whereof, one night as he was lying by her, whilst in his sleep the rambling fancies of the lecherous deportments of his wife did take up the cellules of his brain, he dreamt that he encountered with the devil, to whom he had discovered to the full the buzzing of his head, and suspicion that his wife did tread her shoe awry. The devil, he thought, in this perplexity, did for his comfort give him a ring, and therewithal did kindly put it on his middle finger, saying, 'Hans Carvel, I give thee this ring; whilst thou carriest it upon that finger, thy wife shall never carnally be known by any other than thyself without thy special knowledge and consent.' 'Grammercy,' quoth Hans Carvel, 'my Lord Devil, I renounce Mahomet if ever it shall come off my finger.' The devil vanished, as is his custom, and then Hans Carvel, full of joy, awaking, found that his middle finger was as far as it could reach within the what-do-you-call-it of his wife. I did forget to tell thee how his wife, as soon as she had felt the finger there, said, in recoiling her buttocks: 'Off, yes, nay, tut, pish, tush, ay, lord, that is not the thing which should be put up in that place.' With this Hans Carvel thought that some pilfering fellow was about to take the ring from him. Is not this an infallible and sovereign antidote? Therefore, if thou wilt believe me, in imitation of this example, never fail to have continually the ring of thy wife's commodity upon thy finger." When that was said, their discourse and their way ended.

CHAPTER XXIX.

How Pantagruel caused to meet a Theologian, Physician, Lawyer, and Philosopher, to relieve Panurge from his Perplexity.

No sooner were they come into the royal palace, but they, to the full, made report unto Pantagruel of the success of their expedition, and showed him the response of Raminagrobis. When Pantagruel had read it over and over again, the oftener he perused it, being the better pleased therewith, he said, in addressing his speech to Panurge: "I have not as yet seen any answer framed to your demand which affordeth me more contentment. For in this his succinct copy of verses, he summarily and briefly, yet fully enough, expresseth how he would have us to understand that every one in the project and enterprise of marriage ought to be his own carver, sole arbitrator of his proper thoughts, and from himself alone take counsel in the main and peremptory closure of what his determination should be, in either his assent to or dissent from it. Such always hath been my opinion to you, and when at first you spoke thereof to me, I truly told you this same very thing; but tacitly you scorned my advice, and would not harbour it within your mind. I know for certain, and therefore may I with the greater confidence utter my conception of it, that philauty, or self-love, is that which blinds your judgment, and deceiveth you.

“Let us do otherways, and that is this. Whatever we are, or have, consisteth in three things—the soul, the body, and the goods. Now, for the preservation of these three, there are three sorts of learned men ordained, each respectively to have care of that one which is recommended to his charge. Theologues are appointed for the soul, physicians for the welfare of the body, and lawyers for the safety of our goods. Hence it is that it is my resolution to have on Sunday next with me at dinner a divine, a physician, and a lawyer, that with those three assembled thus together we may in every point and particle confer at large of your perplexity.” “By Saint Picot,” answered Panurge, “we never shall do any good that way; I see it already. And you see yourself how the world is vilely abused, as when with a fox-tail one claps another’s breech to cajole him. We give our souls to keep to the theologues, who for the greater part are heretics. Our bodies we commit to the physicians, who never themselves take any physic. And then we entrust our goods to the lawyers, who never go to law against one another.” “You speak like a courtier,” quoth Pantagruel. “But the first point of your assertion is to be denied; for we daily see how good theologues make it their chief business, their whole and sole employment, by their deeds, their words, and writings, to extirpate errors and heresies out of the hearts of men, and in their stead profoundly plant the true and lively faith. The second point you spoke of I commend; for, in truth, the professors of the art of medicine give so good order to the prophylactic or conservative part of their faculty, in what concerneth their proper healths, that they stand in no need of making us of the other branch, which is the curative, or therapeutic, by medicaments. As for the third, I grant it to be true, for learned advocates and counsellors at law are so much taken up with the affairs of others in their consultations, pleadings, and such like patrocinations of those who are their clients, that they have no leisure to attend any controversies of their own. Therefore, on the next ensuing Sunday, let the divine be our godly Father Hippothadeus, the physician our honest Master Rondibilis, and our legist, our friend Bridlegoose. Nor will it be (to my thinking) amiss that we enter into the pythagoric field, and choose for an assistant to the three aforementioned doctors our ancient faithful acquaintance, the philosopher Trouillogan; especially seeing a perfect philosopher, such as is Trouillogan, is able positively to resolve all whatsoever doubts you can propose. Carpalim, have you a care to have them here all four on Sunday next at dinner, without fail.”

“I believe,” quoth Epistemon, “that throughout the whole country, in all the corners thereof, you could not have pitched upon such other four. Which I speak not so much in regard of the most excellent qualifications and accomplishments wherewith all of them are endowed for the respective discharge and management of each his own vocation and calling (wherein without all doubt or controversy they are the paragons of the land, and surpass all others), as for that Rondibilis is married now who before was not, Hippothadeus was not before nor is yet, Bridlegoose was married once but is not now, and Trouillogan is married now who wedded was to another wife before. Sir, if it may stand with your good liking I will ease Carpalim of some parcel of his labour, and invite Bridlegoose myself, with whom I of a long time have had a very intimate familiarity, and unto whom I am to speak on the behalf of a pretty, hopeful youth who now studieth at Tolouse, under the most learned virtuous Doctor Boissonet." "Do what you deem most expedient," quoth Pantagruel, "and tell me if my recommendation can in anything be steadable for the promoal of the good of that youth, or otherwise serve for bettering of the dignity and office of the worthy Boissonet, whom I do so love and respect for one of the ablest and most sufficient in his way that any where are extant. Sir, I will use therein my best endeavours, and heartily bestir myself about it."

CHAPTER XXX.

How the Theologue, Hippothadeus, gave Counsel to Panurge in the Matter of His Nuptial Enterprize.

THE dinner on the subsequent Sunday was no sooner made ready than that the aforementioned invited guests gave thereto their appearance all of them, Bridlegoose only excepted, who was the deputy-governor of Fonsbeton. At the ushering in of the second service, Panurge, making a low reverence, spake thus: "Gentlemen, the question I am to propound unto you shall be uttered in very few words. Should I marry, or no? If my doubt herein be not resolved by you, I shall hold it altogether insolvable, as are the Insolubilia de Aliaco; for all of you are elected, chosen, and culled out from amongst others, every one in his own condition and quality, like so many picked peas on a carpet."

The Father Hippothadeus, in obedience to the bidding of Pantagruel, and with much courtesy to the company, answered exceeding modestly after this manner: "My friend, you are pleased to ask counsel of us, but first you must consult with yourself. Do you find any trouble or disquiet in your body by the importunate stings and pricklings of the flesh?" "That I do," quoth Panurge, "in a hugely strong and almost irresistible measure. Be not offended, I beseech you, good father, at the freedom of my expression." "No, truly, friend, not I," quoth Hippothadeus; "there is no reason why I should be displeased therewith. But in this carnal strife and debate of yours, have you obtained from God the gift and special grace of continency?" "In good faith not," quoth Panurge. "My counsel to you, in that case, my friend, is that you marry," quoth Hippothadeus, "for you should rather choose to marry once than to burn still in fires of concupiscence." Then Panurge with a jovial heart and a loud voice cried out, "That is spoke gallantly, without circumbilivaginating about and about, and never hitting it in its central point. Grammercy, my good father! In truth, I am resolved now to marry, and without fail I shall do it quickly. I invite you to my wedding. By the body of a hen, we shall make good cheer, and be as merry as crickets. You shall wear the bridegroom's colours, and, if we eat a goose, my wife shall not roast it for me. I will entreat you to lead up the first dance of the bridesmaids, if it may please you to do me so much favour and honour. There resteth yet a small difficulty, a little scruple, yea, even less than nothing, whereof I humbly crave your resolution. Shall I be a cuckold, father, yea or no?" "By no means," answered Hippothadeus, "will you be a cuckold, if it please God." "Oh, the Lord help us now," quoth Panurge; "whither are we driven to, good folks? To the Conditionals, which, according to the rules and precepts of the dialectic faculty, admit of all contradictions and impossibilities. If my Transalpine mule had wings, my Transalpine mule would fly. If it please God, I shall not be a cuckold, but I shall be a cuckold if it please him. Good God, if this were a condition which I knew how to prevent, my hopes should be as high as ever, nor would I despair. But you here send me to God's privy council, to the closet of his little pleasures. You, my French countrymen, which is the way you take to go thither?"

"My honest father, I believe it will be your best not to come to my wedding. The clutter and dingle dangle noise of marriage guests will but disturb you, and break the serious fancies of your brain. You love repose with solitude and silence; I really believe you will not come. And then you dance but indifferently, and would be out of countenance at the first entry. I will send you some good things to your chamber, together with the bride's favour, and there you may drink our health, if it may stand with your good liking." "My friend," quoth Hippothadeus, "take my words in the sense wherein I mean them, and do not misinterpret me. When I tell you—if it please God—do I to you any wrong therein? Is it an ill expression? Is it a blaspheming clause, or reserve any way scandalous unto the world? Do not we thereby honour the Lord God Almighty, Creator, Protector, and Conserver of all things? Is not that a means whereby we do acknowledge him to be the sole giver of all whatsoever is good? Do not we in that manifest our faith, that we believe all things to depend upon his infinite and incomprehensible bounty? and that without him nothing can be produced, nor after its production be of any value, force, or power, without the concurring aid and favour of his assisting grace? Is it not a canonical and authentic exception, worthy to be premised to all our undertakings? Is it not expedient that what we propose unto ourselves be still referred to what shall be disposed of by the sacred will of God, unto which all things must acquiesce, in the heavens as well as on the earth? Is not that verily a sanctifying of his holy name? My friend, you shall not be a cuckold, if it please God, nor shall we need to despair of the knowledge of his good will and pleasure herein, as if it were such an abstruse and mysteriously hidden secret, that for the clear understanding thereof it were necessary to consult with those of his celestial privy council, or expressly make a voyage unto the empyrean chamber where order is given for the effectuating of his most holy pleasures. The great God hath done us this good, that he hath declared and revealed them to us openly and plainly, and described them in the Holy Bible. There will you find that you shall never be a cuckold, that is to say, your wife shall never be a strumpet, if you make choice of one of a commendable extraction, descended of honest parents, and instructed in all piety and virtue—such a one as hath not at any time haunted or frequented the company or conversation of those that are of corrupt and depraved manners, one loving and fearing God, who taketh a singular delight in drawing near to him by faith, and the cordial observing of his sacred commandments; and finally, one who, standing in awe of the Divine Majesty of the Most High, will be loth to offend him, and lose the favourable kindness of his grace, through any defect of faith, or transgression against the ordinances of his holy law, wherein adultery is most rigorously forbidden, and a close adherence to her husband alone most strictly and severely enjoined; yea, in such sort, that she is to cherish, serve, and love him above any thing, next to God, that meriteth to be beloved. In the interim, for the better schooling of her in these instructions, and that the wholesome doctrine of a matrimonial duty may take the deeper root in her mind, you must needs carry yourself so on your part, and your behaviour is to be such that you are to go before her in a good example, by entertaining her unfeignedly with a conjugal amity, by continually approving yourself in all your words and actions a faithful and discreet husband; and by living, not only at home and privately, with your own household and family, but in the face also of all men, and open view of the world, devoutly, virtuously, and chastely, as you would have her on her side to deport and to demean herself towards you, as becomes a godly, loyal, and respectful wife, who maketh conscience to keep inviolable the tie of a matrimonial oath. For as that looking-glass is not the best which is most decked with gold and precious stones, but that which representeth to the eye the liveliest shapes of objects set before it, even so that wife should not be most esteemed who richest is, and of the noblest race, but she who, fearing God, conforms herself nearest unto the humour of her husband.

“Consider how the moon doth not borrow her light from Jupiter, Mars, Mercury, or any other of the planets, nor yet from any of those splendid stars which are set in the spangled firmament, but from her husband only, the bright sun, which she receiveth from him, more or less, according to the manner of his aspect and variously bestowed eradiations. Just so should you be a pattern to your wife in virtue, goodly zeal, and true devotion, that by your radiance in darting on her the aspect of an exemplary goodness, she, in your imitation, may outshine the luminaries of all other women. To this effect you daily must implore God’s grace to the protection of you both.” “You would have me, then,” quoth Panurge, twisting the whiskers of his beard on either side with the thumb and forefinger of his left hand, “to espouse and take to wife the prudent, frugal woman described by Solomon? Without all doubt she is dead, and truly, to my best remembrance, I never saw her; the Lord forgive me! Nevertheless, I thank you, father. Eat this slice of marchpane, it will help your digestion; then shall you be presented with a cup of claret hypocras, which is right healthful and stomachal. Let us proceed.”

CHAPTER XXXI.

How the Physician, Rondibilis, counselled Panurge.

PANURGE, continuing his discourse, said the first word which was spoken by him who gelded the lubbardly, quaffing monks of Saussiniac, after that he had unstoned Friar Cauldaureil, was this: “Now for the rest.” In like manner, I say, “Now for the rest. Therefore, I beseech you, my good master Rondibilis, should I marry or not?” “By the raking pace of my mule,” quoth Rondibilis, “I know not what answer to make to this problem of yours.

“You say that you feel in you the pricking stings of sensuality, by which you are stirred up to venery. I find in our faculty of medicine, and we have founded our opinion therein upon the deliberate resolution and final decision of the ancient Platonics, that carnal concupiscence is cooled and quelled five several ways.

“First, by the means of wine.” “I shall easily believe that,” quoth Friar John, “for when I am well whittled with the juice of the grape, I care for nothing else so I may sleep.” “When I say,” quoth Rondibilis, “that wine abateth lust, my meaning is, wine immoderately taken; for by intemperance proceeding from the excessive drinking of strong liquor, there is brought upon the body of such a swill-down bouser a chillness in the blood, a slackening in the sinews, a dissipation of the generative seed, a numbness and hebetation of the senses, with a perversive wryness and convulsion of the muscles; all which are great lets and impediments to the act of generation. Hence it is that Bacchus, the god of bibbers, tipplers, and drunkards, is most commonly painted beardless, and clad in a woman’s habit, as a person altogether effeminate, or like a libbed eunuch. Wine, nevertheless taken moderately worketh quite contrary effects, as is implied by the old proverb, which saith that Venus takes cold when not accompanied with Ceres and Bacchus. This opinion is of great antiquity, as appeareth by the testimony of Diodorus the Sicilian, and confirmed by Pausanias, and it universally held amongst the Lampsacians that Don Priapus was the son of Bacchus and Venus.

“Secondly, the fervency of lust is abated by certain drugs, plants, herbs, and roots, which make the taker cold, maleficiated, unfit for, and unable to perform the act of generation; as hath been often experimented in the water-lily, Heraclea, Agnus Castus, willow twigs, hemp stalks, woodbine, honeysuckle, tamarisk, chaste tree, mandrake, bennet, keckbugloss, the skin of a hippopotamus, and many other such, which, by convenient doses proportioned to the peccant humour and constitution of the patient, being duly and seasonably received within the body—what by their elementary virtues on the one side, and peculiar properties on the other—do either benumb, mortify, and beclumpse with cold the prolific semence, or scatter and disperse the spirits which ought to have gone along with and conducted sperm to the places destinated and appointed for its reception—or lastly, shut up, stop, and obstruct the ways, passages, and conduits through which the seed should have been expelled, evacuated, and ejected. We have, nevertheless, of those ingredients which, being of a contrary operation, heat the blood, bend the nerves, unite the spirits, quicken the senses, strengthen the muscles, and thereby rouse up, provoke, excite, and enable a man to the vigorous accomplishment of the feat of amorous palliance.” “I have no need of those,” quoth Panurge, “God be thanked, and you, my good master. Howsoever, I pray you, take no exception or offence at these my words; for what I have said was not out of any ill-will I did bear to you, the Lord he knows."

"Thirdly, the ardour of lechery is very much subdued and checked by frequent labour and continual toiling. For by painful exercises and laborious working so great a dissolution is brought upon the whole body, that the blood, which runneth alongst the channels of the veins thereof, for the nourishment and alimentation of each of its members, hath neither time, leisure, nor power to afford the seminal resudation or superfluity of the third concoction, which nature most carefully reserves for the conservation of the individual, whose preservation she more heedfully regardeth than the propagating of the species and the multiplication of human kind. Whence it is that Diana is said to be chaste, because she is never idle, but always busied about her hunting. For the same reason was a camp, or leaguer, of old called Castrum, as if they would have said Castum; because the soldiers, wrestlers, runners, throwers of the bar, and other such like athletic champions as are usually seen in a military circumvallation, do incessantly travail and turmoil, and are in a perpetual stir and agitation. To this purpose Hippocrates also writeth in his book, De Aere, Aqua, et Locis, that in his time there was a people in Scythia as impotent as eunuchs in the discharge of a venerean exploit; because that, without any cessation, pause, or respite, they were never from off horseback, or otherwise assiduously employed in some troublesome and molesting drudgery.

"On the other part, in opposition and repugnancy hereto, the philosophers say that idleness is the mother of luxury. When it was asked Ovid, 'Why Ægisthus became an adulterer?' he made no other answer but this, 'Because he was idle.' Who were able to rid the world of loitering and laziness might easily frustrate and disappoint Cupid of all his designs, aims, engines, and devices, and so disable and appal him that his bow, quiver, and darts, should from thenceforth be a mere needless load and burthen to him, for that it could not then lie in his power to strike or wound any of either sex with all the arms he had. He is not, I believe, so expert an archer as that he can hit the cranes flying in the air, or yet the young stags skipping through the thickets, as the Parthians knew well how to do; that is to say, people moiling, stirring, and hurrying up and down, restless, and without repose. He must have those hushed, still, quiet, lying at a stay, lither, and full of ease, whom he is able to pierce with all his arrows. In confirmation hereof, Theophrastus being asked on a time what kind of beast or thing he judged a toyish, wanton love to be, he made answer that it was a passion of idle and sluggish spirits. From which pretty description of tickling love-tricks, that of Diogenes's hatching was not very discrepant when he defined lechery the occupation of folks destitute of all other occupation. For this cause the Sicyonian sculptor Canachus, being desirous to give us to understand that sloth, drowsiness, negligence, and laziness, were the prime guardians and governesses of ribaldry, made the statue of Venus, not standing, as other stone-cutters had used to do, but sitting.

“Fourthly, the tickling pricks of incontinency are blunted by an eager study, for from thence proceedeth an incredible resolution of the spirits that oftentimes there do not remain so many behind as may suffice to push and thrust forwards the generative resudation to the places thereto appropriated, and there withal inflate the cavernous nerve whose office is to ejaculate the moisture for the propagation of human progeny. Lest you should think it is not so, be pleased but to contemplate a little the form, fashion, and carriage of a man exceeding earnestly set upon some learned meditation, and deeply plunged therein, and you shall see how all the arteries of his brains are stretched forth and bent like the string of a cross-bow, the more promptly, dexterously, and copiously to suppeditate, furnish, and supply him with store of spirits sufficient to replenish and fill up the ventricles, seats, tunnels, mansions, receptacles, and cellules of common sense, of the imagination, apprehension, and fancy, of the ratiocination, arguing, and resolution, as likewise of the memory, recordation, and remembrance; and with great alacrity, nimbleness, and agility to run, pass, and course from the one to the other through those pipes, windings, and conduits which to skilful anatomists are perceivable at the end of the wonderful net where all the arteries close in a terminating point; which arteries, taking their rise and origin from the left capsule of the heart, bring through several circuits, ambages, and anfractuositities, the vital spirits, to subtilise and refine them to the ætherial purity of animal spirits. Nay, in such a studiously musing person you may espy so extravagant raptures of one, as it were, out of himself, that all his natural faculties for that time will seem to be suspended from each their proper charge and office, and his exterior senses to be at a stand. In a word, you cannot otherwise choose than think that he is by an extraordinary ecstasy quite transported of what he was or should be; and that Socrates did not speak improperly when he said that philosophy was nothing else but a meditation upon death. This possibly is the reason why Democritus deprived himself of the sense of seeing, prizing at a much lower rate the loss of his sight than the diminution of his contemplations, which he frequently had found disturbed by the vagrant, flying-out strayings of his unsettled and roving eyes. Therefore is it that Pallas, the goddess of wisdom, tutoress and guardianess of such as are diligently studious and painfully industrious, is, and hath been still, accounted a virgin. The Muses, upon the same consideration, are esteemed perpetual maids; and the Graces, for the like reason, have been held to continue in a sempiternal pudicity.

“I remember to have read that Cupid on a time being asked of his mother Venus why he did not assault and set upon the Muses, his answer was that he found them so fair, so sweet, so fine, so neat, so wise, so learned, so modest, so discreet, so courteous, so virtuous, and so continually busied and employed—one in the speculation of the stars; another in the supputation of numbers; the third in the dimension of geometrical quantities; the fourth in the composition of heroic poems; the fifth in the jovial interludes of a comic strain; the sixth in the stately gravity of a tragic vein; the seventh in the melodious disposition of musical airs; the eighth in the completest manner of writing histories and books on all sorts of subjects; and the ninth in the mysteries, secrets, and curiosities of all sciences, faculties, disciplines, and arts whatsoever, whether liberal or mechanic, that, approaching near unto them, he unbent his bow, shut his quiver, and extinguished his torch, through mere shame and fear that by mischance he might do them some hurt or prejudice. Which done, he thereafter put off the fillet wherewith his eyes were bound, to look them in the face, and to hear their melody and poetic odes. There took he the greatest pleasure in the world, that many times he was transported with their beauty and pretty behaviour, and charmed asleep by the harmony, so far was he from assaulting them or interrupting their studies. Under this article may be comprised what Hippocrates wrote in the aforecited treatise concerning the Scythians, as also that in a book of his, entitled “Of Breeding and Production,” where he hath affirmed all such men to be unfit for generation as have their parotid arteries cut—whose situation is beside the ears—for the reason given already, when I was speaking of the resolution of the spirits, and of that spiritual blood whereof the arteries are the sole and proper receptacles; and that, likewise, he doth maintain a large portion of the parastatic liquor to issue and descend from the brains and backbone.

“Fifthly, by the too frequent reiteration of the act of venery.” “There did I wait for you,” quoth Panurge, “and shall willingly apply it to myself, whilst any one that pleaseth may, for me, make use of any of the four preceding.” “That is the very same thing,” quoth Friar John, “which Father Scyllino, Prior of Saint Victor at Marseilles, calleth by the name of maceration and taming of the flesh. I am of the same opinion—and so was the hermit of Saint Radegonde, a little above Chinon—for,” quoth he, “the hermits of Thebaide can no way more aptly or expediently macerate and bring down the pride of their bodies, daunt and mortify their lecherous sensuality, or depress and overcome the stubbornness and rebellion of the flesh, than by duffling and fanfreluching it five-and-twenty or thirty times a day." "I see Panurge," quoth Rondibilis, "neatly featured, and proportioned in all the members of his body, of a good temperament in his humours, well complexioned in his spirits, of a competent age, in an opportune time, and of a reasonably forward mind to be married. Truly, if he encounter with a wife of the like nature, temperament, and constitution, he may beget upon her children worthy of some transpontine monarchy; and the sooner he marry, it will be the better for him, and the more conducive for his profit, if he would see and have his children in his own time well provided for." "Sir, my worthy master," quoth Panurge, "I will do it, do not you doubt thereof, and that quickly enough, I warrant you. Nevertheless, whilst you were busied in the uttering of your learned discourse, this flea which I have in mine ear hath tickled me more than ever. I retain you in the number of my festival guests, and promise you that we shall not want for mirth and good cheer enough, yea, over and above the ordinary rate. And, if it may please you, desire your wife to come along with you, together with her she-friends and neighbours—that is to be understood—and there shall be fair play."

CHAPTER XXXII.

"THERE remaineth as yet," quoth Panurge, going on in his discourse, "one small scruple to be cleared. You have seen heretofore, I doubt not, in the Roman standards, S. P. Q. R., Si, Peu, Que, Rien. Shall not I be a cuckold?" "By the haven of safety," cried out Rondibilis, "what is this you ask of me? If you shall be a cuckold? My noble friend, I am married, and you are like to be so very speedily; therefore be pleased, from my experiment in the matter, to write in your brain with a steel pen this subsequent ditton, 'There is no married man who doth not run the hazard of being made a cuckold.' Cuckoldry naturally attendeth marriage. The shadow doth not more naturally follow the body than cuckoldry ensueth after marriage to place fair horns upon the husbands' heads.

"And when you shall happen to hear any man pronounce these words—he is married—if you then say he is, hath been, shall be, or may be a cuckold, you will not be accounted an unskilful artist in framing of true consequences.” “Tripes and bowels of all the devils,” cries Panurge, “what do you tell me?” “My dear friend,” answered Rondibilis, “as Hippocrates on a time was in the very nick of setting forwards from Lango to Polistillo, to visit the philosopher Democritus, he wrote a familiar letter to his friend Dionysius, wherein he desired him that he would, during the interval of his absence, carry his wife to the house of her father and mother, who were an honourable couple, and of good repute. ‘Because I would not have her at my home,’ said he, ‘to make abode in solitude. Yet, notwithstanding this her residence beside her parents, do not fail,’ quoth he, ‘with a most heedful care and circumspection, to pry into her ways, and to espy what places she shall go to with her mother, and who those be that shall repair unto her. Not,’ quoth he, ‘that I do mistrust her virtue, or that I seem to have any diffidence of her pudicity and chaste behaviour—for of that I have frequently had good and real proofs—but, I must freely tell you, she is a woman. There lies the suspicion.’

“My worthy friend, the nature of women is set forth before our eyes, and represented to us by the moon in divers other things as well as in this, that they squat, skulk, constrain their own inclinations, and, with all the cunning they can, dissemble and play the hypocrite in the sight and presence of their husbands; who come no sooner to be out of the way, but that forthwith they take their advantage, pass the time merrily, desist from all labour, frolic it, gad abroad, lay aside their counterfeit garb, and openly declare and manifest the interior of their dispositions, even as the moon, when she is in conjunction with the sun, is neither seen in the heavens, nor on the earth, but in her opposition, when remotest from him, shineth in her greatest fulness, and wholly appeareth in her brightest splendour whilst it is night. Thus women are but women.

“When I say womankind, I speak of a sex so frail, so variable, so changeable, so fickle, inconstant, and imperfect, that, in my opinion, nature, under favour, nevertheless, of the prime honour and reverence which is due unto her, did in a manner mistake the road which she had traced formerly, and stray exceedingly from that excellence of providential judgment, by the which she had created and formed all other things, when she built, framed, and made up the woman. And having thought upon it a hundred and five times, I know not what else to determine therein, save only that in the devising, hammering, forging, and composing of the woman, she hath had a much tenderer regard, and, by a great deal, more respectful heed to the delightful consortship and sociable delectation of the man than to the perfection and accomplishment of the individual womanishness or muliebrity. The divine philosopher Plato was doubtful in what rank of living creatures to place and collocate them, whether amongst the rational animals, by elevating them to an upper seat in the specifical classes of humanity, or with the irrational, by degrading them to a lower bench on the opposite side, of a brutal kind, and mere bestiality. For nature hath posited in a privy, secret, and intestine place of their bodies a sort of member, by some not impertinently termed an animal, which is not to be found in men. Therein sometimes are engendered certain humours, so saltish, brackish, clammy, sharp, nipping, tearing, prickling, and most eagerly tickling, that by their stinging acrimony, rending nitrosity, figging itch, wriggling mordicancy, and smarting salitude (for the said member is altogether sinewy, and of a most quick and lively feeling), their whole body is shaken and ebrangled, their senses totally ravished and transported, the operations of their judgment and understanding utterly confounded, and all disordinate passions and perturbations of the mind throughly and absolutely allowed, admitted, and approved of; yea, in such sort, that if nature had not been so favourable unto them as to have sprinkled their forehead with a little tincture of bashfulness and modesty, you should see them in a so frantic mood run mad after lechery, and hie apacè up and down with haste and lust in quest of and to fix some chamber-standard in their Paphian ground, that never did the Proëtides, Mimallonides, nor Lyæan Thyads, deport themselves in the time of their Bacchanlian festivals more shamelessly, or with a so effronted and brazen-faced impudency; because this terrible animal is knit unto and hath an union with all the chief and most principal parts of the body, as to anatomists is evident. Let it not here be thought strange that I should call it an animal, seeing therein I do no otherwise than follow and adhere to the doctrine of the academic and peripatetic philosophers. For if a proper motion be a certain mark and infallible token of the life and animation of the mover, as Aristotle writeth, and that any such thing as moveth of itself ought to be held animated, and of a living nature, then assuredly Plato with very good reason did give it the denomination of an animal, for that he perceived and observed in it the proper and self-stirring motions of suffocation, precipitation, corrugation, and of indignation, so extremely violent, that oftentimes by them is taken and removed from the woman all other sense and moving whatsoever, as if she were in a swounding lipothymy, benumbing syncope, epileptic, apoplectic palsy, and true resemblance of a pale-faced death.

“Furthermore, in the said member there is a manifest discerning faculty of scents and odours very perceptible to women, who feel it fly from what is rank and unsavoury, and follow fragrant and aromatic smells. It is not unknown to me how Cl. Galen striveth with might and main to prove that these are not proper and particular notions, proceeding intrinsically from the thing itself, but accidentally, and by chance. Nor hath it escaped my notice how others of that sect have laboured hardly, yea, to the utmost of their abilities, to demonstrate that it is not a sensitive discerning or perception in it of the difference of wafts and smells, but merely a various manner of virtue and efficacy, passing forth and flowing from the diversity of odoriferous substances applied near unto it. Nevertheless, if you will studiously examine, and seriously ponder and weigh in Critolaus's balance, the strength of their reasons and arguments, you shall find that they, not only in this, but in several other matters also of the like nature, have spoken at random, and rather out of an ambitious envy to check and reprehend their betters, than for any design to make inquiry into the solid truth.

“I will not launch my little skiff any further into the wide ocean of this dispute, only will I tell you that the praise and commendation is not mean and slender which is due to those honest and good women who, living chastely and without blame, have had the power and virtue to curb, range, and subdue that unbridled, heady, and wild animal to an obedient, submissive, and obsequious yielding unto reason. Therefore here will I make an end of my discourse thereon, when I shall have told you that the said animal being once satiated—if it be possible that it can be contented or satisfied—by that aliment which nature hath provided for it out of the epididymal storehouse of man, all its former and irregular and disordered motions are at an end, laid, and assuaged—all its vehement and unruly longings lulled, pacified, and quieted—and all the furious and raging lusts, appetites, and desires thereof appeased, calmed, and extinguished. For this cause, let it seem nothing strange unto you if we be in a perpetual danger of being cuckolds, that is to say, such of us as have not wherewithal fully to satisfy the appetite and expectation of that voracious animal.” “Ods fish!” quoth Panurge, “have you no preventive cure in all your medicinal art for hindering one's head to be horny-graffed at home whilst his feet are plodding abroad?” “Yes, that I have, my gallant friend,” answered Rondibilis, “and that which is a sovereign remedy, whereof I frequently make use myself; and, that you may the better relish, it is set down and written in the book of a most famous author, whose renown is of a standing of two thousand years. Harken, and take good heed.” “You are,” quoth Panurge, “by cocks-hobby, a right honest man, and I love you with all my heart. Eat a little of this quince pie; it is very proper and convenient for the shutting up of the orifice of the ventricle of the stomach, because of a kind of astringent stypticity, which is in that sort of fruit, and is helpful to the first concoction. But what? I think I speak Latin before clerks. Stay till I give you somewhat to drink out of this Nestorian goblet. Will you have another draught of white hippocras? Be not afraid of the squinsky, no. There is neither squinanthus, ginger, nor grains in it; only a little choice cinnamon, and some of the best refined sugar, with the delicious white wine of the growth of that vine which was set in the slips of the great sorb-apple, above the walnut tree."

CHAPTER XXXIII.

"AT what time," quoth Rondibilis, "when Jupiter took a view of the state of his olympic house and family, and that he had made the calendar of all the gods and goddesses, appointing unto the festival of every one of them its proper day and season, establishing certain fixed places and stations for the pronouncing of oracles, and relief of travelling pilgrims, and ordaining victims, immolations, and sacrifices suitable and correspondent to the dignity and nature of the worshipped and adored deity." "Did not he do," asked Panurge, "therein as Tinteville, the Bishop of Auxerre, is said once to have done? This noble prelate loved entirely the pure liquor of the grape, as every honest and judicious man doth; therefore was it that he had an especial care and regard to the bud of the vine tree as to the great grandfather of Bacchus. But so it is that, for sundry years together, he saw a most pitiful havoc, desolation, and destruction made amongst the sprouts, shootings, buds, blossoms, and scions of the vines, by hoary frost, dank fogs, hot mists, unseasonable colds, chill blasts, thick hail, and other calamitous chances of foul weather, happening, as he thought, by the dismal inauspiciousness of the holy days of Saint George, Saint Mary, Saint Paul, Saint Eutropius, Holy Rood, the Ascension, and other festivals, in that time when the sun passeth under the sign of Taurus, and thereupon harboured in his mind this opinion, that the aforementioned saints were Saint Hail-flingers, Saint Frost-senders, Saint Fog-mongers, and Saint Spoilers of the vine buds. For which cause he went about to have transmitted their feasts from the spring to the winter, to be celebrated between Christmas and Epiphany, so the mother of the three kings called it, allowing them with all honour and reverence the liberty then to freeze, hail, and rain as much as they would, for that he knew that at such a time frost was rather profitable than hurtful to the vine buds, and in their steads to have placed the festivals of Saint Christopher, Saint John the Baptist, Saint Magdalene, Saint Ann, Saint Domingo, and Saint Lawrence; yea, and to have gone so far as to collocate and transpose the middle of August in and to the beginning of May, because during the whole space of their solemnity there was so little danger of hoary frosts and cold mists, that no artificers are then held in greater request than the afforders of refrigerating inventions, makers of junkets, fit disposers of cooling shades, composers of green arbours, and refreshers of wine."

"Jupiter," said Rondibilis, "forgot the poor devil Cuckoldry, who was then in the court at Paris, very eagerly soliciting a piddling suit at law for one of his vassals and tenants. Within some few days thereafter, I have forgot how many, when he got full notice of the trick which in his absence was done unto him, he instantly desisted from prosecuting legal processes in the behalf of others, full of solicitude to pursue after his own business, lest he should be foreclosed, and thereupon he appeared personally at the tribunal of the great Jupiter, displayed before him the importance of his preceding mérits, together with the acceptable services, which in obedience to his commandments he had formerly performed, and therefore, in all humility, begged of him that he would be pleased not to leave him alone amongst all the sacred potentates, destitute and void of honour, reverence, sacrifices, and festival ceremonies. To this petition Jupiter's answer was excusatory, that all the places and offices of his house were bestowed. Nevertheless, so importuned was he by the continual supplications of Monsieur Cuckoldry, that he, in fine, placed him in the rank, list, roll, rubric, and catalogue, and appointed honours, sacrifices, and festival rites to be observed on earth in great devotion, and tendered to him with solemnity. The feast, because there was no void, empty, nor vacant place in all the calendar, was to be celebrated jointly with and on the same day that had been consecrated to the goddess Jealousy. His power and dominion should be over married folks, especially such as had handsome wives. His sacrifices were to be suspicion, diffidence, mistrust, a lowering, pouting sullenness, watchings, wardings, researchings, plyings, explorations, together with the waylayings, ambushes, narrow observations, and malicious doggings of the husbands' scouts, and espials of the most privy actions of their wives. Herewithal every married man was expressly and rigorously commanded to reverence, honour, and worship him, to celebrate and solemnise his festival with twice more respect than that of any other saint or deity, and to immolate unto him, with all sincerity and alacrity of heart, the above-mentioned sacrifices and oblations, under pain of severe censures, threatenings, and comminations of these subsequent finer, mulcts, amercements, penalties, and punishments to be inflicted on the delinquents; that Monsieur Cuckoldry should never be favourable nor propitious to them—that he should never help, aid, supply, succour, nor grant them any subventitious furtherance, auxiliary, suffrage, or adminiculary assistance—that he should never hold them in any reckoning, account, or estimation—that he should never deign to enter within their houses, neither at the doors, windows, nor any other place thereof—that he should never haunt nor frequent their companies or conversations, how frequently soever they should invoke him and call upon his name—and that not only he should leave and abandon them to rot alone with their wives in a sempiternal solitariness, without the benefit of the diversion of any copesmate or corrival at all, but should withal shun and eschew them, fly from them, and eternally forsake and reject them as impious heretics and sacrilegious persons, according to the accustomed manner of other gods, towards such as are too slack in offering up the duties and reverences which ought to be performed respectively to their divinities; as is evidently apparent in Bacchus towards negligent vine dressers; in Ceres, against idle ploughmen and tillers of the ground; in Pomona, to unworthy fruiterers and costard mongers; in Neptune, towards dissolute mariners and seafaring men; in Vulcan, towards loitering smiths and forgemen, and so throughout the rest. Now, on the contrary, this infallible promise was added, that unto all those who should make a holy day of the above-recited festival, and cease from all manner of worldly work and negotiation, lay aside all their own most important occasions, and be so retchless, heedless, and careless of what might concern the management of their proper affairs, as to mind nothing else but a suspicious espying and prying into the secret deportments of their wives, and how to coop, shut up, hold at under, and deal cruelly and austere with them, by all the harshness and hardships that an implacable and every way inexorable jealousy can devise and suggest, conform to the sacred ordinances of the afore-mentioned sacrifices and oblations, he should be continually favourable to them, should love them, sociably converse with them, should be day and night in their houses, and never leave them destitute of his presence. Now I have said, and you have heard my cure.”

“Ha, ha, ha,” quoth Carpalim, laughing, “this is a remedy yet more apt and proper than Hans Carvel’s ring. The devil take me if I do not believe it! The humour, inclination, and nature of women is like the thunder, whose force in its bolt, or otherwise, burneth, bruise, and breaketh only hard, massive, and resisting objects, without staying or stopping at soft, empty, and yielding matters. For it dasheth into pieces the steel sword, without doing any hurt to the velvet scabbard which insheatheth it. It crusheth also, and consumeth the bones, without wounding or endamaging the flesh wherewith they are veiled and covered. Just so it is that women for the greater part never bend the contention, subtilty, and contradictory disposition of their spirits, unless it be to do what is prohibited and forbidden." "Verily," quoth Hippothadeus, "some of our doctors aver for a truth that the first woman of the world, whom the Hebrews call Eve, had hardly been induced or allured into the temptation of eating of the fruit of the tree of life if it had not been forbidden her so to do. And that you may give the more credit to the validity of this opinion, consider how the cautelous and wily tempter did commemorate unto her, for an antecedent to his enthymeme, the prohibition which was made to taste it, as being desirous to infer from thence: It is forbidden thee; therefore thou shouldst eat of it, else thou canst not be a woman."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

How Women ordinarily have the greatest longing after things prohibited.

"WHEN I was," quoth Carpalim, "a whore-master at Orleans, the whole heart of rhetoric, in all its tropes and figures, was not able to afford unto me a colour or flourish of greater force and value; nor could I by any other form or manner of elocution pitch upon a more persuasive argument for bringing young beautiful married ladies into the snares of adultery, through alluring and enticing them to taste with me of amorous delights, than with a lively sprightfulness to tell them in downright terms, and to remonstrate to them (with a great show of detestation of a crime so horrid), how their husbands were jealous. This was none of my invention. It is written, and we have laws, examples, reasons, and daily experiences confirmative of the same. If this belief once enter into their noddles, their husbands will infallibly be cuckolds; yea, by God, will they, without swearing, although they should do like Semiramis, Pasiphaë, Egesta, the women of the Isle Mandez in Egypt, and other such like queanish flirting harlots mentioned in the writings of Herodotus, Strabo, and such like puppies."

"Truly," quoth Ponocrates, "I have heard it related, and it hath been told me for a verity, that Pope John XXII., passing on a day through the abbey of Toucherome, was in all humility required and besought by the abbess, and other discreet mothers of the said convent, to grant them an indulgence, by means whereof they might confess themselves to one another, alleging that religious women were subject to some petty secret slips and imperfections, which would be a foul and burning shame for them to discover and to reveal to men, how sacerdotal soever their function were; but that they would freelier, more familiarly, and with greater cheerfulness, open to each other their offences, faults, and escapes, under the seal of confession. 'There is not anything,' answered the pope, 'fitting for you to impetrate of me which I would not most willingly condescend unto; but I find one inconvenience. You know confession should be kept secret, and women are not able to do so.' 'Exceeding well,' quoth they, 'most holy father, and much more closely than the best of men.'

"The said pope, on the very same day, gave them in keeping a pretty box, wherein he purposely caused a little linnet to be put, willing them very gently and courteously to lock it up in some sure and hidden place, and promising them, by the faith of a pope, that he should yield to their request if they would keep secret what was enclosed within that deposited box: enjoining them withal not to presume one way nor other, directly or indirectly, to go about the opening thereof, under pain of the highest ecclesiastical censure, eternal excommunication. The prohibition was no sooner made but that they did all of them boil with a most ardent desire to know and see what kind of thing it was that was within it. They thought it long already, that the pope was not gone, to the end they might jointly, with the more leisure and ease, apply themselves to the box-opening curiosity.

"The holy father, after he had given them his benediction, retired and withdrew himself to the pontifical lodgings of his own palace. But he was hardly gone three steps from without the gates of their cloister, when the good ladies throngingly, and as in a huddled crowd, pressing hard on the backs of one another, ran thrusting and shoving who should be first at the setting open of the forbidden box, and descrying of the Quod latitat within.

"On the very next day thereafter the pope made them another visit, of a full design, purpose, and intention, as they imagined, to despatch the grant of their sought and wished-for indulgence. But before he would enter into any chat or communing with them, he commanded the casket to be brought unto him. It was done so accordingly; but, by your leave, the bird was no more there. Then was it that the pope did represent to their maternities how hard a matter and difficult it was for them to keep secrets revealed to them in confession, unmanifested to the ears of others, seeing for the space of four-and-twenty hours they were not able to lay up in secret a box which he had highly recommended to their discretion, charge, and custody.

“Welcome, in good faith, my dear master, welcome! It did me good to hear you talk, the Lord be praised for all. I do not remember to have seen you since the last time that you acted at Montpellier with our ancient friends, Anthony Saporta, Guy Bourguyer, Balthasar Noyer, Tolet, John Quentin, Francis Robinet, John Perdrier, and Francis Rabelais, the moral comedy of him who had espoused and married a dumb wife.” “I was there,” quoth Epistemon. “The good, honest man her husband was very earnestly urgent to have the fillet of her tongue untied, and would needs have her speak by any means. At his desire, some pains were taken on her, and partly by the industry of the physician, other part by the expertness of the surgeon, the encylogotte which she had under her tongue being cut, she spoke, and spoke again; yea, within a few hours she spoke so loud, so much, so fiercely, and so long, that her poor husband returned to the same physician for a receipt to make her hold her peace. ‘There are,’ quoth the physician, ‘many proper remedies in our art to make dumb women speak, but there are none that ever I could learn therein to make them silent. The only cure which I have found out is their husband’s deafness.’ The wretch became within a few weeks thereafter, by virtue of some drugs, charms, or enchantments, which the physician had prescribed unto him, so deaf that he could not have heard the thundering of nineteen hundred cannons at a salvo. His wife, perceiving that indeed he was as deaf as a door-nail, and that her scolding was but in vain, sith that he heard her not, she grew stark mad.

“Some time after the doctor asked for his fee of the husband, who answered, ‘That truly he was deaf, and so was not able to understand what the tenour of his demand might be.’ Whereupon the leech bedusted him with a little I know not what sort of powder, which rendered him a fool immediately, so great was the stultifying virtue of that strange kind of pulverised dose. Then did this fool of a husband and his mad wife join together, and falling on the doctor and the surgeon, did so scratch, bethwack, and bang them, that they were left half dead upon the place, so furious were the blows which they received. I never in my lifetime laughed so much as at the acting of that buffoonery.”

“Let us come to where we left off,” quoth Panurge. “Your words, being translated from the clapper-dudgeons to plain English, do signify that it is not very inexpedient that I marry, and that I should not care for being a cuckold. You have there hit the nail on the head. I believe, master doctor, that on the day of my marriage you will be so much taken up with your patients, or otherwise so seriously employed, that we shall not enjoy your company. Sir, I will heartily excuse your absence.

‘Stercus et urina medici sunt prandia prima.
Ex aliis paleas, ex istis collige grana.’”

“You are mistaken,” quoth Rondibilis, “in the second verse of our distich, for it ought to run thus—

‘Nobis sunt signa, vobis sunt prandia digna.’

“If my wife at any time prove to be unwell, and ill at ease, I will look upon the water which she shall have made in an urinal glass,” quoth Rondibilis, “grope her pulse, and see the disposition of her hypogaster, together with her umbilicary parts—according to the prescript rule of Hippocrates, 2 Aph. 35—before I proceed any further in the cure of her distemper.” “No, no,” quoth Panurge, “that will be but to little purpose. Such a feat is for the practice of us that are lawyers, who have the rubric, De ventre inspiciendo. Do not therefore trouble yourself about it, master doctor; I will provide for her a plaster of warm guts. Do not neglect your more urgent occasions elsewhere for coming to my wedding. I will send you some supply of victuals to your own house, without putting you to the trouble of coming abroad, and you shall always be my special friend.” With this, approaching somewhat nearer to him, he clapped into his hand, without the speaking of so much as one word, four rose nobles. Rondibilis did shut his fist upon them right kindly; yet, as if it had displeased him to make acceptance of such golden presents, he in a start, as if he had been wroth, said, “He, he, he, he, he, there was no need of anything; I thank you, nevertheless. From wicked folks I never get enough, and from honest people I refuse nothing. I shall be always, sir, at your command.” “Provided that I pay you well,” quoth Panurge. “That,” quoth Rondibilis, “is understood.”

CHAPTER XXXV.

How the Philosopher Trouillogan handled the Difficulty of Marriage.

As this discourse was ended, Pantagruel said to the philosopher Trouillogan: “Our loyal, honest, true, and trusty friend, the lamp from hand to hand is come to you. It falleth to your turn to give an answer, should Panurge, pray you, marry, yea, or no?” “He should do both,” quoth Trouillogan. “What say you?” asked Panurge. “That which you have heard,” answered Trouillogan. “What have I heard?” replied Panurge. “That which I have said," replied Trouillogan. "Ha, ha, ha, are we come to that pass?" quoth Panurge. "Let, it go nevertheless; I do not value it at a rush, seeing we can make no better of the game. But, howsoever, tell me, should I marry or no?" "Neither the one nor the other," answered Trouillogan. "The devil take me," quoth Panurge, "if these odd answers do not make me dote, and may he snatch me presently away if I do understand you. Stay awhile, until I fasten these spectacles of mine on this left ear, that I may hear you better." With this Pantagrue perceived at the door of the great hall, which was that day their dining-room, Gargantua's little dog, whose name was Kyne; for so was Toby's dog called, as is recorded. Then did he say to these who were there present: "Our king is not far off—let us all rise."

That word was scarcely sooner uttered than that Gargantua with his royal presence graced that banqueting and stately hall. Each of the guests arose to do their king that reverence and duty which became them. After that Gargantua had most affably saluted all the gentlemen there present, he said, "Good friends, I beg this favour of you, and therein you will very much oblige me, that you leave not the places where you sate, nor quit the discourse you were upon. Let a chair be brought hither unto this end of the table, and reach me a cup full of the strongest and best wine you have, that I may drink to all the company. You are, in faith, all welcome, gentlemen. Now let me know what talk you were about." To this Pantagrue answered that at the beginning of the second service Panurge had proposed a problematic theme, to wit, whether he should marry or not marry? that Father Hippothadeus and Doctor Rondibilis had already despatched their resolutions thereupon; and that, just as his majesty was coming in, the faithful Trouillogan, in the delivery of his opinion, hath thus far proceeded, that when Panurge asked whether he ought to marry, yea or no, at first he made this answer, both together. When this same question was again propounded, his second answer was, neither the one nor the other. Panurge exclaimeth that those answers are full of repugnancies and contradictions, protesting that he understands them not, nor what it is that can be meant by them. "If I be not mistaken," quoth Gargantua, "I understand it very well. The answer is not unlike to that which was once made by a philosopher in ancient time, who, being interrogated if he had a woman whom they named him to his wife, 'I have her,' quoth he, 'but she hath not me; possessing her, by her I am not possessed.'" "Such another answer," quoth Pantagrue, "was once made by a certain bouncing wench of Sparta, who, being asked if at any time she had had to do with a man, 'No,' quoth she, 'but sometimes men have had to do with me.'" "Well then," quoth Rondibilis, "let it be a neuter in physic, as when we say a body is neuter when it is neither sick nor healthful, and a mean in philosophy; that, by an abnegation of both extremes, and this by the participation of the one and of the other. Even as when lukewarm water is said to be both hot and cold; or, rather, as when time makes the partition and equally divides betwixt the two, a while in the one, another while as long in the other opposite extremity." "The holy apostle," quoth Hippothadeus, "seemeth, as I conceive, to have more clearly explained this point when he said, 'Those that are married, let them be as if they were not married; and those that have wives, let them be as if they had no wives at all.'" "I thus interpret," quoth Pantagrue, "the having and not having of a wife. To have a wife is to have the use of her in such a way as nature hath ordained, which is for the aid, society, and solace of man, and propagating of his race. To have no wife is not to be uxorious, play the coward, and be lazy about her, and not for her sake to distain the lustre of that affection which man owes to God; or yet for her to leave those offices and duties which he owes unto his country, unto his friends, and kindred; or for her to abandon and forsake his precious studies and other businesses of account to wait still on her will, her beck, and her buttocks. If we be pleased in this sense to take having and not having of a wife, we shall indeed find no repugnancy nor contradiction in the terms at all."

CHAPTER XXXVI.

"You speak wisely," quoth Panurge, "if the moon were green cheese. Such a tale once pissed my goose. I do not think but that I am let down into that dark pit, in the lowermost bottom whereof the truth was hid, according to the saying of Heraclitus. I see no whit at all, I hear nothing, understand as little, my senses are altogether dulled and blunted; truly I do very shrewdly suspect that I am enchanted. I will now alter the former style of my discourse, and talk to him in another strain. Our trusty friend, stir not, nor imburse any; but let us vary the chance, and speak without disjunctives. I see already that these loose and ill-joined members of an enunciation do vex, trouble, and perplex you."

"Now, go on, in the name of God! Should I marry?"
Trouillogan. There is some likelihood therein.

Panurge. But if I do not marry?

Trouil. I see in that no inconvenience.

Pan. You do not?

Trouil. None, truly, if my eyes deceive me not.

Pan. Yea, but I find more than five hundred.

Trouil. Reckon them.

Pan. This is an impropriety of speech, I confess; for I do no more thereby but take a certain for an uncertain number, and posit the determinate term for what is indeterminate. When I say, therefore, five hundred, my meaning is, many.

Trouil. I hear you.

Pan. Is it possible for me to live without a wife, in the name of all the subterranean devils?

Trouil. Away with these filthy beasts.

Pan. Let it be, then, in the name of God, for my Salmygon-dinish people used to say, "To lie alone, without a wife, is certainly a brutish life." And such a life, also, was it assevered to be by Dido in her lamentations.

Trouil. At your command.

Pan. By the pody cody, I have fished fair; where are we now? But will you tell me? Shall I marry?

Trouil. Perhaps.

Pan. Shall I thrive or speed well withal?

Trouil. According to the encounter.

Pan. But if in my adventure I encounter aright, as I hope I will, shall I be fortunate?

Trouil. Enough.

Pan. Let us turn the clean contrary way, and brush our former words against the wool: what if I encounter ill?

Trouil. Then blame not me.

Pan. But, of courtesy, be pleased to give me some advice. I heartily beseech you, what must I do?

Trouil. Even what thou wilt.

Pan. Wishy washy; trolly, lolly.

Trouil. Do not invoke the name of anything, I pray you.

Pan. In the name of God, let it be so! My actions shall be regulated by the rule and square of your counsel. What is it that you advise and counsel me to do?

Trouil. Nothing.

Pan. Shall I marry?

Trouil. I have no hand in it.

Pan. Then shall I not marry?

Trouil. I cannot help it.

Pan. If I never marry, I shall never be a cuckold.

Trouil. I thought so.

Pan. But put the case that I be married.

Trouil. Where shall we put it?

Pan. Admit it be so, then, and take my meaning in that sense

Trouil. I am otherwise employed.

Pan. By the death of a hog, and mother of a toad, oh, Lord, if I durst hazard upon a little fling at the swearing game, though privily and under thumb, it would lighten the burden of my heart, and ease my lights and reins exceedingly. A little patience, nevertheless, is requisite. Well, then, if I marry, I shall be a cuckold?

Trouil. One would say so.

Pan. Yet if my wife prove a virtuous, wise, discreet, and chaste woman, I shall never be cuckolded?

Trouil. I think you speak congruously.

Pan. Hearken.

Trouil. As much as you will.

Pan. Will she be discreet and chaste? This is the only point I would be resolved in.

Trouil. I question it.

Pan. You never saw her?

Trouil. Not that I know of.

Pan. Why do you then doubt of that which you know not?

Trouil. For a cause.

Pan. And if you should know her?

Trouil. Yet more.

Pan. Page, my little, pretty darling, take here my cap—I give it to thee. Have a care you do not break the spectacles that are in it. Go down to the lower court. Swear there half-an-hour for me, and I shall in compensation of that favour swear hereafter for thee as much as thou wilt. But who shall cuckold me?

Trouil. Somebody.

Pan. By the belly of the wooden horse at Troy, Master Somebody, I shall bang, belam thee, and claw thee well for thy labour.

Trouil. You say so.

Pan. Nay, nay, that Nick in the dark cellar, who hath no white in his eye, carry me quite away with him if, in that case, whensoever I go abroad from the palace of my domestic residence, I do not, with as much circumspection as they use to ring mares in our country to keep them from being sallied by stoned horses, clap a Bergamasco lock upon my wife.

Trouil. Talk better.

Pan. It is bien chien, chié chanté, well cacked, and cackled, shitten, and sung, in matter of talk. Let us resolve on somewhat.

Trouil. I do not gainsay it.

Pan. Have a little patience. Seeing I cannot on this side draw any blood of you, I will try if with the lancet of my judgment I be able to bleed you in another vein. Are you married, or are you not?

Trouil. Neither the one nor the other, and both together.

Pan. Oh, the good God help us! By the death of a buffle-ox, I sweat with the toil and travail that I am put to, and find my digestion broke off, disturbed, and interrupted; for all my phrenes, metaphrenes, and diaphragms, back, belly, midriff, muscles, veins, and sinews, are held in a suspense, and for a while discharged from their proper offices, to stretch forth their several powers and abilities, for incornifistibulating and laying up into the hamper of my understanding your various sayings and answers.

Trouil. I shall be no hinderer thereof.

Pan. Tush, for shame! Our faithful friend, speak, are you married?

Trouil. I think so.

Pan. You were also married before you had this wife?

Trouil. It is possible.

Pan. Had you good luck in your first marriage?

Trouil. It is not impossible.

Pan. How thrive you with this second wife of yours?

Trouil. Even as it pleaseth my fatal destiny.

Pan. But what, in good earnest? Tell me—do you prosper well with her?

Trouil. It is likely.

Pan. Come on, in the name of God. I vow, by the burden of Saint Christopher, that I had rather undertake the fetching of a fart forth of the belly of a dead ass than to draw out of you a positive and determinate resolution. Yet shall I be sure at this time to have a snatch at you, and get my claws over you. Our trusty friend, let us shame the devil of hell, and confess the verity. Were you ever a cuckold? I say you who are here, and not that other you, who playeth below in the tennis-court?

Trouil. No, if it was not predestinated.

Pan. By the flesh, blood, and body, I swear, reswear, forswear, adjure, and renounce: he evades and avoids, shifts and escapes me, and quite slips and winds himself out of my gripes and clutches.

At these words Gargantua arose, and said, "Praised be the good God in all things, but especially for bringing the world into that height of refinedness beyond what it was when I first became acquainted therewith, that now the most learned and most prudent philosophers are not ashamed to be seen entering in at the porches and frontispieces of the schools of the Pyrrhonian, Aporrhetic, Sceptic, and Ephetic sects. Blessed be the holy name of God! Veritably it is like henceforth to be found an enterprise of much more easy undertaking to catch lions by the neck, horses by the mane, oxen by the horns, bulls by the muzzle, wolves by the tail, goats by the beard, and flying birds by the feet, than to entrap such philosophers in their words. Farewell, my worthy, dear, and honest friends."

When he had done thus speaking, he withdrew himself from the company. Pantagruel, and others with him, would have followed and accompanied him, but he would not permit them so to do. No sooner was Gargantua departed out of the banqueting hall than that Pantagruel said to the invited guests: "Plato's Timæus, at the beginning always of a solemn festival convention, was wont to count those that were called thereto. We, on the contrary, shall at the closure and end of this treatment reckon up our number. One, two, three; where is the fourth? I miss my friend Bridlegoose. Was not he sent for?" Epistemon answered that he had been at his house to bid and invite him, but could not meet with him, for that a messenger from the parliament of Myrelingois, in Myrelingues, was come to him, with a writ of summons, to cite and warn him personally to appear before the reverend senators of the High Court there, to vindicate and justify himself at the bar of the crime of prevarication laid to his charge, and to be peremptorily instanced against him, in a certain decree, judgment, or sentence lately awarded, given, and pronounced by him; and that, therefore, he had taken horse and departed in great haste from his own house, to the end that, without peril or danger of falling into a default or contumacy, he might be the better able to keep the prefixed and appointed time.

"I will," quoth Pantagruel, "understand how that matter goeth. It is now above forty years that he hath been constantly the judge of Fonsbeton, during which space of time he hath given four thousand definitive sentences. Of two thousand three hundred and nine whereof, although appeal was made by the parties whom he had judicially condemned, from his inferior judicatory to the supreme court of the parliament of Myrelingois, in Myrelingues, they were all of them, nevertheless, confirmed, ratified, and approved of by an order, decree, and final sentence of the said sovereign court, to the casting of the appellants, and utter overthrow of the suits wherein they had been foiled at law, for ever and a day. That now, in his old age, he should be personally summoned, who in all the foregoing time of his life hath demeaned himself so unblameably in the discharge of the office and vocation he had been called unto, it cannot assuredly be that such a change hath happened without some notorious misfortune and disaster. I am resolved to help and assist him in equity and justice to the uttermost extent of my power and ability. I know the malice, despite, and wickedness of the world to be so much more now-a-days exasperated, increased, and aggravated by what it was not long since, that the best cause that is, how just and equitable soever it be, standeth in great need to be succoured, aided, and supported. Therefore presently, from this very instant forth, do I purpose, till I see the event and closure thereof, most heedfully to attend and wait upon it, for fear of some underhand, tricky surprisal, cavilling, pettifoggery, or fallacious quirks in law, to his detriment, hurt, or disadvantage."

Then dinner being done, and the tables drawn and removed, when Pantagruel had very cordially and affectionately thanked his invited guests for the favour which he had enjoyed of their company, he presented them with several rich and costly gifts, such as jewels, rings set with precious stones, gold and silver vessels, with a great deal of other sort of plate besides, and lastly, taking of them all his leave, retired himself into an inner chamber.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

How Pantagruel persuaded Panurge to take Counsel of a Fool.

WHEN Pantagruel had withdrawn himself, he, by a little sloping window in one of the galleries, perceived Panurge in a lobby not far from thence, walking alone, with the gesture, carriage, and garb of a fond dotard, raving, wagging, and shaking his hands, dandling, lolling, and nodding with his head, like a cow bellowing for her calf, and, having then called him nearer, spoke unto him thus: "You are at this present, as I think, not unlike to a mouse entangled in a snare, who the more that she goeth about to rid and unwind herself out of the gin wherein she is caught, by endeavouring to clear and deliver her feet from the pitch whereto they stick, the fouler she is bewrayed with it, and the more strongly pestered therein. Even so is it with you. For the more that you labour, strive, and enforce yourself to disencumber and extricate your thoughts out of the implicating involutions and fetterings of the grievous and lamentable gins and springs of anguish and perplexity, the greater difficulty there is in the relieving of you, and you remain faster bound than ever. Nor do I know for the removal of this inconvenience any remedy but one.

"Take heed, I have often heard it said in a vulgar proverb, 'The wise may be instructed by a fool.' Seeing the answers and responses of sage and judicious men have in no manner of way satisfied you, take advice of some fool, and possibly by so doing you may come to get that counsel which will be agreeable to your own heart's desire and contentment. You know how, by the advice and counsel and prediction of fools, many kings, princes, states, and commonwealths have been preserved, several battles gained, and divers doubts of a most perplexed intricacy resolved. I am not so diffident of your memory as to hold it needful to refresh it with a quotation of examples; nor do I so far undervalue your judgment but that I think it will acquiesce in the reason of this my subsequent discourse. As he who narrowly takes heed to what concerns the dexterous management of his private affairs, domestic businesses, and those adoes which are confined within the strait-laced compass of one family, —who is attentive, vigilant, and active in the economic rule of his own house—whose frugal spirit never strays from home—who loseth no occasion whereby he may purchase to himself more riches, and build up new heaps of treasure on his former wealth—and who knows warily how to prevent the inconveniences of poverty, is called a worldly wise man, though perhaps, in the second judgment of the intelligences which are above, he be esteemed a fool,—so, on the contrary, is he most like, even in the thoughts of celestial spirits, to be not only sage, but to presage events to come by divine inspiration, who laying quite aside those cares which are conducible to his body, or his fortunes, and, as it were, departing from himself, rides all his senses of terrene affections, and clears his fancies of those plodding studies which harbour in the minds of thriving men. All which neglects of sublunary things are vulgarly imputed folly. After this manner, the son of Picus, King of the Latins, the great sooth-sayer Faunus, was called Fatuus by the witless rabble of the common people. The like we daily see practised amongst the comic players, whose dramatic rôles, in distribution of the personages, appoint the acting of the fool to him who is the wisest of the troop. In approbation also of this fashion, the mathematicians allow the very same horoscope to princes and to sots. Whereof a right pregnant instance by them is given in the nativities of Æneas and Chorœbus: the latter of which two is by Euphorion said to have been a fool, and yet had with the former the same aspects and heavenly genethliac influences.

“I shall not, I suppose, swerve much from the purpose in hand if I relate unto you what John Andrew said upon the return of a papal writ, which was directed to the mayor and burgesses of Rochelle, and after him by Panorme, upon the same pontifical canon, Barbatias on the Pandects, and recently by Jason, in his councils concerning Seyny John, the noted fool of Paris, and Caillette’s fore great-grandfather. The case is this:

“At Paris, in the roast-meat cookery of the Petit-Chastelet, before the cook-shop of one of the roast-meat sellers of that lane, a certain hungry porter was eating his bread, after he had by parcels kept it a while above the reek and steam of a fat goose on the spit, turning at a great fire, and found it so besmoked with the vapour to be savoury; which the cook observing, took no notice, till after having ravined his penny loaf, whereof no morsel had been unsmokified, he was about decamping and going away. But, by your leave, as the fellow thought to have departed thence shot-free, the master cook laid hold upon him by the gorget, and demanded payment for the smoke of his roast-meat. The porter answered that he had sustained no loss at all; that by what he had done there was no diminution made of the flesh; that he had taken nothing of his; and that, therefore, he was not indebted to him in anything. As for the smoke in question, that although he had not been there, it would howsoever have been evaporated; besides that, before that time, it had never been seen nor heard that roast-meat smoke was sold upon the streets of Paris. The cook hereto replied that he was not obliged, nor any way bound, to feed and nourish for nought a porter whom he had never seen before with the smoke of his roast-meat, and thereupon swore that if he would not forthwith content and satisfy him with present payment for the repast which he had thereby got, that he would take his crooked staves from off his back; which, instead of having loads thereafter laid upon them, should serve for fuel to his kitchen fires. Whilst he was going about so to do, and to have pulled them to him by one of the bottom rungs, which he had caught in his hand, the sturdy porter got out of his gripe, drew forth the knotty cudgel, and stood to his own defence. The altercation waxed hot in words, which moved the gaping hoydons of the sottish Parisians to run from all parts thereabouts to see what the issue would be of that babbling strife and contention. In the interim of this dispute, to very good purpose, Seyny John, the fool and citizen of Paris, happened to be there, whom the cook perceiving, said to the porter: 'Wilt thou refer and submit unto the noble Seyny John the decision of the difference and controversy which is betwixt us?' 'Yes, by the blood of a goose,' answered the porter, 'I am content.' Seyny John the fool, finding that the cook and porter had compromised the determination of their variance and debate to the discretion of his award and arbitrement, after that the reasons on either side, whereupon was grounded the mutual fierceness of their brawling jar, had been to the full displayed and laid open before him, commanded the porter to draw out of the fob of his belt a piece of money, if he had it. Whereupon the porter immediately without delay, in reverence to the authority of such a judicious umpire, put the tenth part of a silver Philip into his hand. This little Philip Seyny John took, then set it on his left shoulder, to try by feeling if it was of a sufficient weight. After that, laying it on the palm of his hand, he made it ring and tingle, to understand by the ear if it was of a good alloy in the metal whereof it was composed. Thereafter he put it to the ball or apple of his left eye, to explore by the sight if it was well stamped and marked ; all which being done, in a profound silence of the whole doltish people, who were there spectators of this pageantry, to the great hope of the cook's, and despair of the porter's, prevalency in the suit that was in agitation, he finally caused the porter to make it sound several times upon the stall of the cook's shop. Then, with a presidential majesty, holding his bauble sceptre-like in his hand, muffling his head with a hood of marten skins, each side whereof had the resemblance of an ape's face, spruced up with ears of pasted paper, and having about his neck a bucked ruff, raised, furrowed, and ridged with pointing sticks of the shape and fashion of small organ-pipes, he first, with all the force of his lungs, coughed two or three times, and then with an audible voice pronounced this following sentence : 'The court declareth that the porter who ate his bread at the smoke of the roast hath civilly paid the cook with the sound of his money. And the said court ordaineth that every one return to his own home, and attend his proper business, without costs and charges, and for a cause.' This verdict, award, and arbitrement of the Parisian fool did appear so equitable, yea, so admirable to the aforesaid doctors, that they very much doubted, if the matter had been brought before the sessions for justice of the said place, or that the judges of the Rota at Rome had been umpires therein, or yet that the Areopagites themselves had been the deciders thereof, if by any one part, or all of them together, it had been so judicially sententiated and awarded. Therefore advise if you will be counselled by a fool."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

How Triboulet is set forth and blazoned by Pantagruel and Panurge.

"BY my soul," quoth Panurge, "that overture pleaseth me exceedingly well. I will therefore lay hold thereon, and embrace it. At the very motioning thereof, my right entrail seemeth to be widened and enlarged, which was but just now hard-bound, contracted, and costive. But as we have hitherto made choice of the purest and most refined cream of wisdom and sapience for our counsel, so would I now have to preside and bear the prime sway in our consultation as very a fool in the supreme degree." "Triboulet," quoth Pantagruel, "is completely foolish, as I conceive." "Yes, truly," answered Panurge, "he is properly and totally a fool, a

Pan. If there was any reason why at Rome the Quirinal holiday of old was called the Feast of Fools, I know not why we may not for the like cause institute in France the Tribouletic Festivals, to be celebrated and solemnised over all the land.

Pan. If all fools carried cruppers.

Pant. If he were the god Fatuus, of whom we have already made mention, the husband of the goddess Fatua, his father would be Good Day and grandmother Good Even.

Pan. If all fools paced, albeit he be somewhat wry-legged, he would overlay, at least, a fathom at every rake. Let us go toward him without any further lingering or delay: we shall have, no doubt, some fine resolution of him. I am ready to go, and long for the issue of our progress impatiently.

"I must needs," quoth Pantagruel, "according to my former resolution therein, be present at Bridlegoose's trial. Nevertheless, whilst I shall be upon my journey towards Myrelingues, which is on the other side of the river Loire, I will despatch Carpalim to bring along with him from Blois the fool Triboulet." Then was Carpalim instantly sent away, and Pantagruel at the same time, attended by his domestics, Panurge, Epistemon, Ponocrates, Friar John, Gymnast, Ryzotomus, and others, marched forward on the high-road to Myrelingues.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

How Pantagruel was present at the Trial of Judge Bridlegoose, who decided Causes and Controversies in Law by the Chance and Fortune of the Dice.

ON the day following, precisely at the hour appointed, Pantagruel came to Myrelingues. At his arrival the presidents, senators, and counsellors, prayed him to do them the honour to enter in with them, to hear the decision of all the causes, arguments, and reasons, which Bridlegoose in his own defence would produce why he had pronounced a certain sentence against the subsidy assessor, Toucheronde, which did not seem very equitable to that centumviral court. Pantagruel very willingly condescended to their desire, and accordingly entering in, found Bridlegoose sitting within the middle of the enclosure of the said court of justice; who immediately upon the coming of Pantagruel, accompanied with the senatorian members of that worshipful judicatory, arose, went to the bar, had his indictment read, and for all his reasons, defences, and excuses, answered nothing else but that he was become old, and that his sight of late was very much failed, and become dimmer than it was wont to be; instancing therewithal many miseries and calamities which old age bringeth along with it, and are concomitant to wrinkled elders; which not. per. Archid. d. l. lxxxvi. c. tanta. By reason of which infirmity he was not able so distinctly and clearly to discern the points and blots of the dice as formerly he had been accustomed to do. "Whence it might very well have happened," said he, "as old, dim-sighted Isaac took Jacob for Esau, that I, after the same manner, at the decision of causes and controversies in law, should have been mistaken in taking a quatre for a cinque, or trois for a deuce. This, I beseech your worships," quoth he, "to take into your serious consideration, and to have the more favourable opinion of my uprightness (notwithstanding the prevarication whereof I am accused in the matter of Toucheronde's sentence), for that at the time of that decree's pronouncing I only had made use of my small dice; and your worships," said he, "knew very well how, by the most authentic rules of the law, it is provided that the imperfections of nature should never be imputed unto any for crimes and transgressions; as appeareth, ff. de re milit. l. qui cum uno. ff. de reg. Jur. l. fere. ff. de ædil. edict. per totum. ff. de term. mod. l. Divus Adrianus, resolved by Lud. Rom. in l. si. vero. ff. Sol. Matr. And who would offer to do otherwise should not thereby accuse the man, but nature and the all-seeing providence of God, as is evident in l. maximum vitium, c. de lib. prætor."

"What kind of dice," quoth Trinquamelle, grand president of the said court, "do you mean, my friend Bridlegoose?" "The dice," quoth Bridlegoose, "of sentences at law, decrees, and peremptory judgments, Alea Judiciorum, whereof it written, Per Doct. 26, qu. 2, cap. sort. l. nec emptio ff. de contrahend. empt. l. quod debetur. ff. de pecul. et ibi Bartol., and which your worships do, as well as I, use in this glorious sovereign court of yours. So do all other righteous judges, in their decision of processes, and final determination of legal differences, observing that which hath been said thereof by D. Henri. Ferrandat, et not. gl. in c. fin. de sortil. et l. sed cum ambo. ff. de jud. Ubi. Docto. Mark, that chance and fortune are good, honest, profitable, and necessary for ending of and putting a final closure to dissensions and debates in suits at law. The same hath more clearly been declared by Bald. Bartol. et Alex. c. communia de leg. l. si duo." "But how is it that you do these things?" asked Trinquamelle. "I very briefly," quoth Bridlegoose, "shall answer you, according to the doctrine and instructions of Leg. ampliolem § in refutatoriis c. de appel., which is conformable to what is said in Gloss. l. 1, ff. quod. met. causa. Gaudent brevitare moderni. My practice is therein the same with that of your other worships, and as the custom of the judicatory requires, unto which our law commandeth us to have regard, and by the rule thereof still to direct and regulate our actions and procedures; ut not. extra. de consuet. c. ex literis et ibi innoc. For having well and exactly seen, surveyed, overlooked, reviewed, recognised, read, and read over again, turned and tossed over, seriously perused and examined the bills of complaint, accusations, impeachments, indictments, warnings, citations, summonings, comparitions, appearances, mandates, commissions, delegations, instructions, informations, inquests, preparatories, productions, evidences, proofs, allegations, depositions, cross speeches, contradictions, supplications, requests, petitions, inquiries, instruments of the deposition of witnesses, rejoinders, replies, confirmations of former assertions, duplies, triplies, answers to rejoinders, writings, deeds, reproaches, disabling of exceptions taken, grievances, salvation bills, re-examination of witnesses, confronting of them together, declarations, denunciations, libels, certificates, royal missives, letters of appeal, letters of attorney, instruments of compulsion, delinatories, anticipatories, evocations, messages, demissions, issues, exceptions, dilatory pleas, demurs, compositions, injunctions, reliefs, reports, returns, confessions, acknowledgments, exploits, executions, and other such like confects and spiceries, both at the one and the other side, as a good judge ought to do, conform to what hath been noted thereupon. Spec. de ordination. Paragr 3, et Tit. de Offi. omn. jud. paragr. fin. et de rescriptis præsentat. paragr. 1.—I posit on the end of a table in my closet all the pokes and bags of the defendant, and then allow unto him the first hazard of the dice, according to the usual manner of your other worships. And it is mentioned, l. favorabiliores ff. de reg. jur. et in cap. cum sunt eod. tit. lib. 6, which saith, ‘Quum sunt partium jura obscura, reo potius favendum est quam auctori.’ That being done, I thereafter lay down upon the other end of the same table the bags and satchels of the plaintiff, as your other worships are accustomed to do, visum visu, just over against one another; for, Opposita juxta se posita clarius elucescunt: ut not in lib. 1, paragr. Videamus. ff. de his qui sunt sui vel alieni juris, et in l. munerum § mixta ff. de mun. et hon. Then do I likeways and semblably throw the dice for him, and forthwith liver him his chance.” “But,” quoth Trinquamelle, “my friend, how come you to know, understand, and resolve the obscurity of these various and seeming contrary passages in law which are laid claim to by the suitors and pleading parties?” “Even just,” quoth Bridlegoose, “after the fashion of your other worships: to wit, when there are many bags on the one side, and on the other, I then use my little, small dice, after the customary manner of your other worships, in obedience to the law, Semper in stipulationibus ff. de reg. jur. and the law versale verifieth that Eod. tit. semper in obscuri quod minimum est sequimur: canonised in c. in obscuris. eod. tit. lib. 6. I have other large, great dice, fair, and goodly ones, which I employ in the fashion that your other worships use to do; when the matter is more plain, clear, and liquid, that is to say, when there are fewer bags.” “But when you have done all these fine things,” quoth Trinquamelle, “how do you, my friend, award your decrees, and pronounce judgment?” “Even as your other worships,” answered Bridlegoose; “for I give out sentence in his favour unto whom hath befallen the best chance by dice, judiciary, tribunian, pretorial, what comes first. So our laws command, ff. qui. pot. in pign. l. creditor. c. de consul. 1. Et. de regul. jur. in 6. Qui prior est tempore potior est jure.”

CHAPTER XI.

How Bridlegoose gave Reasons why He looked over those Law Papers which he decided by the Chance of the Dice.

“YEA, but,” quoth Trinquamelle, “my friend, seeing it is by the lot, chance, and throw of the dice that you award your judgments and sentences, why do not you deliver up these fair throws and chances the very same day and hour, without any further procrastination or delay, that the controverting party-pleaders appear before you? To what use can those writings serve you, those papers and other procedures contained in the bags and pokes of the law suitors?” “To the very same use,” quoth Bridlegoose, “that they serve your other worships. They are behooful unto me, and serve my turn in three things very exquisite, requisite, and authentic. First, for formality sake; the omission whereof, that it maketh all, whatever is done, to be of no force nor value, is excellently well proved by Spec. i. tit. de instr. edit. et tit. de rescript. present. Besides that, it is not unknown to you, who have had many more experiments thereof than I, how oftentimes in judicial proceedings the formalities utterly destroy the materialities and substances of the causes and matters agitated; for Forma mutata, mutatur substantia. ff. ad exhib. l. Julianus ff. ad leg. fals. l. si is qui quadraginta. Et extra. de decim. c. ad audientiam, et de celebrat miss. c. in quadam.

“Secondly, they are useful and steadable to me, even as unto your other worships, in lieu of some other honest and healthful exercise. The late Master Othoman Vadat [Vadere], a prime physician, as you would say, Cod. de Commit, et Archi. lib. 12, hath frequently told me that the lack and default of bodily exercise is the chief, if not the sole and only, cause of the little health and short lives of all officers of justice, such as your worships and I am. Which observation was singularly well, before him, noted and remarked by Bartholus in lib. i. c. de sent. quæ pro eo quod. Therefore is it that the practice of such like exercitations is appointed to be laid hold on by your other worships, and consequently not to be denied unto me, who am of the same profession; Quia accessorium naturam sequitur principalis, de reg. jur. l. 6, et l. cum principalis, et l. nihil dolo. ff. eod. tit. ff. de fide-jus. l. fide-jus et extra de officio deleg. cap. i. Let certain honest and recreative sports and plays of corporeal exercises be allowed and approved of; and so far, ff. de allus. et aleat. l. solent. et authent. et omnes obed. in princ. coll. 7, et ff. de præscript. verb. l. si gratuitam et l. i. cod. de spect. l. ii. Such also is the opinion of D. Thomæ, in secunda, secundæ, Q. I. 168. Quoted to very good purpose by D. Albert de Rosa, who fuit magnus practicus, and a solemn doctor, as Barbatias attesteth in principiis consil. Wherefore the reason is evidently and clearly deduced and set down before us in gloss. in proemio ff. par ne autem tertii.

‘Interpone tuis interdum gaudia curis.’

“In very deed, once, in the year a thousand four hundred four-score and nine, having a business concerning the portion and inheritance of a younger brother depending in the court and chamber of the four High Treasurers of France, whereinto as soon as ever I got leave to enter, by a pecuniary permission of the usher thereof—as your other worships know very well, that Pecuniæ obediunt omnia, and there, says Baldus, in l. singularia ff. si cert. pet. et Salic. in l. receptitia. Cod. de constit. pecuni. et Card. in Clem. i. de baptism—I found them all recreating and diverting themselves at the play called muss, either before or after dinner: to me, truly, it is a thing altogether indifferent whether of the two it was, provided that hic not., that the game of the muss is honest, healthful, ancient, and lawful, a Muscho inventore, de quo cod. de petit. hæred. l. si post motam, et Muscarii. Such as play and sport at the muss are excusable in and by law, lib. i. c. de excus. artific. lib. 10. And at the very same time was Master Tielman Piquet one of the players of that game of muss. There is nothing that I do better remember, for he laughed heartily when his fellow-members of the aforesaid judicial chamber spoiled their caps in swingeing of his shoulders. He, nevertheless, did even then say unto them, that the banging and flapping of him to the waste and havoc of their caps should not, at their return from the palace to their own houses, excuse them from their wives, Per c. extra. de præsumpt. et ibi gloss. Now, resolutorie loquendo, I should say, according to the style and phrase of your other worships, that there is no exercise, sport, game, play, nor recreation in all this palatine, palacial, or parliamentary world, more aromatising and fragrant than to empty and void bags and purses, turn over papers and writings, quote margins and backs of scrolls and rolls, fill panniers, and take inspection of causes, Ex Bart. et Joan. de Pra. in l. falsa de condit. et demonst. ff.

“Thirdly, I consider, as your own worships used to do, that time ripeneth and bringeth all things to maturity; that by time everything cometh to be made manifest and patent; and that time is the father of truth and virtue. Gloss. in l. i. cod. de servit. authent. de restit. et ea quæ pa. et spec. tit. de requisit. cons. Therefore is it that, after the manner and fashion of your other worships, I defer, protract, delay, prolong, intermit, surcease, pause, linger, suspend, prorogate, drive out, wire-draw, and shift off the time of giving a definitive sentence, to the end that the suit or process, being well fanned and winnowed, tossed and canvassed to and fro, narrowly, precisely, and nearly garbelled, sifted, searched, and examined, and on all hands exactly argued, disputed, and debated, may, by succession of time, come at last to its full ripeness and maturity. By means whereof, when the fatal hazard of the dice ensueth thereupon, the parties cast or condemned by the said aleatory chance will with much greater patience, and more mildly and gently, endure and bear up the disastrous load of their misfortune than if they had been sentenced at their first arrival unto the court, as not. gl. ff. de excus. tut. l. tria onera.

‘Portatur leviter quod portat quisque libenter.’

“On the other part, to pass a decree or sentence when the action is raw, crude, green, unripe, and unprepared as at the beginning, a danger would ensue of a no less inconveniency than that which the physicians have been wont to say befalleth to him in whom an imposthume is pierced before it be ripe, or unto any other whose body is purged of a strong predominating humour before its digestion. For as it is written, in authent. hæc constit. in Innoc. de consist. princip., so is the same repeated in gloss. in c. cæterum, extra de juram, calumn. Quod medicamenta morbis exhibent, hoc jura negotiis. Nature furthermore admonisheth and teacheth us to gather and reap, eat and feed, on fruits when they are ripe, and not before. Instit. de rer. div. paragr. is ad quem. et ff. de action. empt. l. Julianus. To marry likewise our daughters when they are ripe, and no sooner, ff. de donation. inter vir. et uxor. l. cum. hic status. paragr. si quis sponsam et 27 qu. 1. c. sicut dicit gloss.

‘Jam matura thoro plenis adoleverat annis Virginitas.’

“And, in a word, she instructeth us to do nothing of any considerable importance, but in a full maturity and ripeness, 23 q. 1. § ult. et 23, de c. ultimo.

CHAPTER XLI.

How Bridlegoose related the History of the Reconcilers of Parties at Variance in Matters of Law.

“I REMEMBER to the same purpose,” quoth Bridlegoose, in continuing his discourse, “that in the time when at Poictiers I was a student of law under Brocadium Juris, there was at Semerve one Peter Dendin, a very honest man, careful labourer of the ground, fine singer in a church desk, of good repute and credit and older than the most aged of all your worships, who was wont to say that he had seen the great and goodly good man, the Council of Lateran, with his wide and broad-brimmed red hat. As also, that he had beheld and looked upon the fair and beautiful pragmatistical sanction, his wife, with her huge rosary or patenotrian chaplet of jet beads hanging at a large sky-coloured riband. This honest man compounded, attoned, and agreed more differences, controversies, and variances at law, than had been determined, voided, and finished, during his time in the whole palace of Poitiers, in the auditory of Montmorillon, and in the town-house of the old Partenay. This amicable disposition of his rendered him venerable, and of great estimation, sway, power, and authority, throughout all the neighbouring places of Chauvigny, Nouaillé, Legugé, Vivonne, Mezeaux, Estables, and other bordering and circumjacent towns, villages, and hamlets. All their debates were pacified by him; he put an end to their brabbling suits at law and wrangling differences. By his advice and counsels were accords and reconcilements no less firmly made than if the verdict of a sovereign judge had been interposed therein, although, in very deed, he was no judge at all, but a right honest man, as you may well conceive,—arg. in l. sed si unius ff. de jurejur. et de verbis obligatoriis l. continuus. There was not a hog killed within three parishes of him whereof he had not some part of the haslet and puddings. He was almost every day invited either to a marriage banquet, christening feast, an uprising, or women-churching treatment, a birthday's anniversary, solemnity, a merry frolic, gossiping, or otherwise to some delicious entertainment in a tavern, to make some accord and agreement between persons at odds and in debate with one another. Remark what I say: for he never yet settled and compounded a difference betwixt any two at variance but he straight made the parties agreed and pacified to drink together, as a sure and infallible token and symbol of a perfect and completely well-cemented reconciliation, a sign of a sound and sincere amity, and proper mark of a new joy and gladness to follow thereupon,—Ut not. per doct. ff. de peric. et com. rei vend. l. 1. He had a son, whose name was Tenot Dendin, a lusty, young, sturdy, frisking roister, so help me God, who likewise, in imitation of his peace-making father, would have undertaken and meddled with the making up of variances and deciding of controversies between disagreeing and contentious party-pleaders, as you know ‘*Sæpe solet similis filius esse patri.

Et sequitur leviter filia matris iter.*’

l. quisquis c. ad leg. Jul. majest excipio filios à moniali susceptos ex Monacho. per gloss. in c. impudicas. 27, quæstione. 1. And such was his confidence to have no worse success than his father, that he assumed unto himself the title of Law-strife-settler. He was likewise in these pacificatory negotiations so active and vigilant—for, Vigilantibus jura subveniunt. ex l. pupillus. ff. quæ in fraud. cred. et ibid. l. non enim. et instit. in præm.—that when he had smelt, heard, and fully understood—ut ff. si quando paup. fec. l. Agaso. gloss. in verb. olfecit, id est, nasum ad culum posuit—and found that there was anywhere in the country a debateable matter at law, he would incontinently thrust in his advice, and so forwardly intrude his opinion in the business, that he made no bones of making offer and taking upon him to decide it, how difficult soever it might happen to be, to the full contentment and satisfaction of both parties. It is written, Qui non laborat non manducat; and the said gl. ff. de damn. infect. l. quamvis and Currere plus que le pas vetulam compellit egestas. gloss. ff. de lib. agnosc. l. si quis pro qua facit. l. si plures. c. de cond. incert. But so hugely great was his misfortune in this his undertaking, that he never composed any difference, how little soever you may imagine it might have been, but that, instead of reconciling the parties at odds, he did incense, irritate, and exasperate them to a higher point of dissension and enmity than ever they were at before. Your worships know, I doubt not, that ‘Sermo datur cunctis, animi sapientia paucis.’

“Gl. ff. de alien. jud. mut. caus. fa. lib. 2. This administered unto the tavern-keepers, wine-drawers, and vintners of Semerve an occasion to say that, under him they had not in the space of a whole year so much reconciliation wine, for so were they pleased to call the good wine of Légugé, as under his father they had done in one half-hour’s time. It happened a little while thereafter that he made a most heavy regret thereof to his father, attributing the causes of his bad success in pacificatory enterprises to the perversity, stubbornness, froward, cross, and backward inclinations of the people of his time; roundly, boldly, and irreverently upbraiding, that if but a score of years before the world had been so wayward, obstinate, perversicacious, implacable, and out of all square, frame, and order as it was then, his father had never attained to and acquired the honour and title of Strife-appeaser, so irrefragably, inviolably, and irrevocably, as he had done. In doing whereof Tenot did heinously transgress against the law which prohibiteth children to the actions of their parents; per gl. et Bart. l. 3, paragr. si quis. ff. de cond. ob caus. et authent. de nupt. par. sed quod sancitum. col. 4. To this the honest old father answered thus, ‘My son Dendin, when Don Oportet taketh place, this is the course which we must trace. Gl. c. de appell. l. eos etiam. For the road that you went upon was not the way to the fuller's mill, nor in any part thereof was the form to be found wherein the hare did sit. Thou hast not the skill and dexterity of settling and composing differences. Why? Because thou takest them at the beginning, in the very infancy and bud, as it were, when they are green, raw, and indigestible. Yet I know, handsomely and featly, how to compose and settle them all. Why? Because I take them at their decadence, in their weaning, and when they are pretty well digested. So saith Gloss.

'Dulcior est fructus post multa pericula ductus.'

L. non moriturus. c. de contrahend. et committ. stip. Didst thou ever hear the vulgar proverb, 'Happy is the physician whose coming is desired at the declension of a disease.' For the sickness being come to a crisis, is then upon the decreasing hand, and drawing towards an end, although the physician should not repair thither for the cure thereof; whereby, though nature wholly do the work, he bears away the palm and praise thereof. My pleaders, after the same manner, before I did interpose my judgment in the reconciling of them, were waxing faint in their contestations. Their altercation heat was much abated, and in declining from their former strife, they of themselves inclined to a firm accommodation of their differences; because there wanted fuel to that fire of burning rancour and despitful wrangling, whereof the lower sort of lawyers were the kindlers. That is to say, their purses were emptied of coin, they had not a win in their fob, nor penny in their bag, wherewith to solicit and present their actions.

'Deficiente pecu, deficit omne, nia.'

"There wanted then nothing but some brother to supply the place of a paranymp, brawl-broker, proxenete, or mediator, who, acting his part dexterously, should be the first broacher of the motion of an agreement for saving both the one and the other party from that hurtful and pernicious shame, whereof he could not have avoided the imputation when it should have been said that he was the first who yielded and spoke of a reconcilment, and that, therefore, his cause not being good, and being sensible where his shoe did pinch him, he was willing to break the ice, and make the greater haste to prepare the way for a condescendment to an amicable and friendly treaty. Then was it that I came in pudding time, Dendin, my sou; nor is the fat of bacon more relishing to boiled peas than was my verdict then agreeable to them. This was my luck, my profit, and good fortune. I tell thee, my jolly son Dendin, that by this rule and method I could settle a firm peace, or at least clap up a cessation of arms and truce for many years to come betwixt the Great

King and the Venetian State—the Emperor and the Cantons of Switzerland—the English and the Scots—and betwixt the pope and the Ferrarians. Shall I go yet further? Yea, as I would have God to help me, betwixt the Turk and the Sophy, the Tartars and the Muscoviters. Remark well what I am to say unto thee. I would take them at that very instant nick of time, when both those of the one and the other side should be weary and tired of making war, when they had voided and emptied their own cashes and coffers of all treasure and coin, drained and exhausted the purses and bags of their subjects, sold and mortgaged their domains and proper inheritances, and totally wasted, spent, and consumed the munition, furniture, provision, and victuals that were necessary for the continuance of a military expedition. There I am sure, by God, or by his mother, that, would they, would they not, in spite of all teeth, they should be forced to take a little respite and breathing time to moderate the fury and cruel rage of their ambitious aims. This is the doctrine in Gl. 37, d. c. si quando.

‘Odero, si potero; si non, invitus amabo.’

CHAPTER XLII.

How Suits at Law are bred at first, and how they come afterwards to their Perfect Growth.

“FOR this cause,” quoth Bridlegoose, going on in his discourse, “I temporise and apply myself to the times, as your other worships use to do, waiting patiently for the maturity of the process, the full growth and perfection thereof in all its members, to wit, the writings and the bags. Arg. in l. si major. c. commun. divid. et de cons. di 1. c. solemnitates, et ibi gl. A suit in law, at its production, birth, and first beginning, seemeth to me, as unto your other worships, shapeless, without form or fashion, incomplete, ugly, and imperfect, even as a bear, at his first coming into the world, hath neither hands, skin, hair, nor head, but is merely an inform, rude, and ill-favoured piece and lump of flesh, and would remain still so if his dam, out of the abundance of her affection to her hopeful cub, did not with much licking put his members into that figure and shape which nature had provided for those of an arctic and ursinal kind; ut not. Doct. ad. l. Aquil. l. 2, in fin. Just so do I see, as your other worships do, processes and suits of law, at their first bringing forth, to be without shape, deformed, and disfigured, for that then they consist only of one or two writings, or copies of instruments, through which defect they appear unto me, as to your other worships, foul, loathsome, filthy, and misshapen beasts. But when there are heaps of these legiformal papers, packed, piled, laid up together, impoked, ensatcheled, and put up in bags, then is it that with a good reason we may term that suit to which, as pieces, parcels, parts, portions, and members thereof, they do pertain and belong, well-formed and fashioned, big-limbed, strong set, and in all and each of its dimensions most completely membered. Because forma dat esse rei. l. si is qui. ff. ad leg. Falcid. in c. cum dilecta de rescript. Barbat. concil. 12, lib. 2, and before him, Baldus, in c. ult. extra de consuet. et l. Julianus ad exhib. ff. et l. quæsitum ff. de leg. 3. The manner is such as is set down in gl. p. quæst. 1. c. Paulus.

‘Debile principium melior fortuna sequetur.’

“Like your other worships also, the serjeants, catchpoles, ursuivants, messengers, summoners, apparitors, ushers, door-keepers, pettifoggers, attorneys, proctors, commissioners, justices of the peace, judge delegates, arbitrators, overseers, sequestrators, advocates, inquisitors, jurors, searchers, examiners, notaries, tabellions, scribes, scriveners, clerks, prenotaries, secondaries, and expedanean judges, de quibus tit. est. l. 3 c., by sucking very much, and that exceeding forcibly, and licking at the purses of the pleading parties, they, to the suits already begot and engendered, form, fashion, and frame head, feet, claws, talons, beaks, bills, teeth, hands, veins, sinews, arteries, muscles, humours, and so forth, through all the similiary and dissimiliary parts of the whole; which parts, particles, pendicles, and appurtenances, are the law pokes and bags, gl. de cons. d. 4, accepisti.

‘Qualis vestis erit, talia corda gerit.’

“Hic notandum est, that in this respect the pleaders, litigants, and law suitors are happier than the officers, ministers, and administrators of justice. For beatius est dare quam accipere. ff. commun. l. 3, extra. de celebr. Miss. c. cum Marthæ. et 24, quæst. 1. cap. Od. gl.

‘Affectum dantis penset censura tonantis.’

Thus becometh the action or process, by their care and industry, to be of a complete and goodly bulk, well-shaped, framed, formed, and fashioned, according to the canonical gloss.

‘Accipe, sume, cape, sunt verba placentia Papæ.’

Which speech hath been more clearly explained by Albert de Ros, in verbo Roma.

‘*Roma manus rodit, quas rodere non valet, odit.
Dantes custodit, non dantes spernit, et odit.*’

The reason whereof is thought to be this :

‘Ad præsens ova, cras pullis sunt meliora,’

ut est gl. in l. quum hi. ff. de transact. Nor is this all; for the inconvenience of the contrary is set down in gloss. c. de aliu. fin.

‘Quum labor in damno est, crescit mortalis egestas.’

In confirmation whereof we find that the true etymology and exposition of the word process is purchase; viz., of good store of money to the lawyers, and of many pokes—id est Prou Sacks—to the pleaders: upon which subject we have most celestials, quips, gibes, and girds.

‘Ligitando jura crescunt, litigando jus acquiritur.’

‘Et si non prosunt singula, multa juvant.’”

“Yea, but,” asked Trinquamelle, “how do you proceed, my friend, in criminal causes, the culpable and guilty party being taken and seized upon flagrante crimine?” “Even as your other worships use to do,” answered Bridlegoose. “First, I permit the plaintiff to depart from the court, enjoining him not to presume to return thither till he preallably should have taken a good sound and profound sleep, which is to serve for the prime entry and introduction to the legal carrying on of the business. In the next place, a formal report is to be made to me of his having slept. Thirdly, I issue forth a warrant to convene him before me. Fourthly, he is to produce a sufficient and authentic attestation of his having thoroughly and entirely slept, conform to the Gloss. 37, Quest. 7, c. Si quis cum.

‘Quandoque bonus dormitat Homerus.’

“Being thus far advanced in the formality of the process, I find that this consopiating act engendereth another act, whence ariseth the articulating of a member. That again produceth a third act, fashionative of another member; which third bringeth forth a fourth, procreative of another act. New members in a no fewer number are shapen and framed, one still breeding and begetting another—as link after link the coat of mail at length is made—till thus, piece after piece, by little and little, by information upon information, the process be completely well-formed and perfect in all his members. Finally, having proceeded this length, I have recourse to my dice; nor is it to be thought that this interruption, respite, or interpellation, is by me occasioned without very good reason inducing me thereunto, and a notable experience of a most convincing and irrefragable force.

“I remember, on a time, that in the camp at Stockholm there was a certain Gascon named Gratianauld, native of the town of Saint Sever, who having lost all his money at play, and consecutively being very angry thereat—as you know, Pecunia est alter sanguis, ut ait Anto. de Burtio, in c. accedens. 2, extra ut lit. non contest. et Bald. in l. si tuus. c. de opt. leg. per tot. in l. advocati. c. de advoc. div. jud. pecunia est vita hominis et optimus fide-jussor in necessitatibus—did, at his coming forth of the gaming-house, in the presence of the whole company that was there, with a very loud voice, speak in his own language these following words: ‘Pao cap de bious, hillots, que mau de pippe bous tresbire : ares que de pergudes sont les mies bingt, et quouatre baquettes, ta pla donnerien picz, trucz, et patactz ; Sei degun de bous aulx, qui boille truquar ambe iou a bels embis.’ Finding that none would make him any answer, he passed from thence to that part of the leaguer where the huff-snuff, honder-sponder, swash-buckling High Germans were, to whom he renewed these very terms, provoking them to fight with him ; but all the return he had from them to his stout challenge was only, ‘Der Gascongner thut sich ausz mit eim ieden zu schlagen, aber er ist geneigter zu stehlen ; darum, liebe frauwen, habt sorg zu euerm hauszrath.’ Finding also that none of that band of Teutonic soldiers offered himself to the combat, he passed to that quarter of the leaguer where the French freebooting adventurers were encamped, and, reiterating unto them what he had before repeated to the Dutch warriors, challenged them likewise to fight with him, and therewithal made some pretty little Gasconado frisking gambols, to oblige them the more cheerfully and gallantly to cope with him in the lists of a duelling engagement ; but no answer at all was made unto him. Whereupon the Gascon, despairing of meeting with any antagonists, departed from thence, and laying himself down, not far from the pavilions of the grand Christian cavalier Crissé, fell fast asleep. When he had thoroughly slept an hour or two, another adventurous and all-hazarding blade of the forlorn hope of the lavishly-wasting gamesters, having also lost all his moneys, sallied forth with a sword in his hand, in a firm resolution to fight with the aforesaid Gascon, seeing he had lost as well as he.

‘Ploratur lachrymis amissa pecunia veris, saith the Gl. de penitent. distinct. 3, c. sunt plures. To this effect having made inquiry and search for him throughout the whole camp, and in sequel thereof found him asleep, he said unto him : ‘Up, ho, good fellow ; in the name of all the devils of hell, rise up, rise up, get up ! I have lost my money as well as thou hast done, let us therefore go fight lustily together, grapple and scuffle it to some purpose. Thou mayest look and see that my tuck is no longer than thy rapier.' The Gascon, altogether astonished at his unexpected provocation, without altering his former dialect, spoke thus: 'Cap de Sanct Arnaud, quau seys tu, qui me rebeilles? Que mau de taberne te gire. Ho San Siobé, cap de Gascoigne, ta pla dormie iou, quand aquoest taquain me bingut estéé." The venturous roister inviteth him again to the duel, but the Gascon, without condescending to his desire, said only this: 'Hé paovret iou tesquinerie ares, que son pla reposat. Wayne un pauque te posar come iou, pusses truqueren.' Thus, in forgetting his loss, he forgot the eagerness which he had to fight. In conclusion, after that the other had likewise slept a little, they, instead of fighting, and possibly killing one another, went jointly to a sutler's tent, where they drank together very amicably, each upon the pawn of his sword. Thus by a little sleep was pacified the ardent fury of two warlike champions. There, gossip, comes the golden word of John Andr. in cap. ult. de sent. et re judic. l. sexto.

'Sedendo, et quiescendo fit anima prudens.'"

CHAPTER XLIII.

How Pantagruel excused Bridlegoose in the Matter of Sentencing Actions at Law by the Chance of the Dice.

WITH this Bridlegoose held his peace. Whereupon Trinquanelle bid him withdraw from the court—which accordingly was done—and then directed his discourse to Pantagruel after this manner: "It is fitting, most illustrious prince, not only by reason of the deep obligations wherein this present parliament, together with the whole Marquisate of Myrelingues, stand bound to your Royal Highness for the innumerable benefits which, as effects of mere grace, they have received from your incomparable bounty, but for that excellent wit also, prime judgment, and admirable learning wherewith Almighty God, the giver of all good things, hath most richly qualified and endowed you, that we tender and present unto you the decision of this new, strange, and paradoxical case of Bridlegoose; who, in your presence, to your both hearing and seeing, hath plainly confessed his final judging and determinating of suits of law by the mere chance and fortune of the dice. Therefore do we beseech you that you may be pleased to give sentence therein as unto you shall seem most just and equitable." To this Pantagruel answered:

“Gentlemen, it is not unknown to you how my condition is somewhat remote from the profession of deciding law controversies; yet, seeing you are pleased to do me the honour to put that task upon me, instead of undergoing the office of a judge, I will become your humble supplicant. I observe, gentlemen, in this Bridlegoose several things which induce me to represent before you that it is my opinion he should be pardoned. In the first place, his old age; secondly, his simplicity: to both which qualities our statute and common laws, civil and municipal together, allow many excuses for any slips or escapes which, through the invincible imperfection of either, have been inconsiderably stumbled upon by a person so qualified. Thirdly, gentlemen, I must need display before you another case, which in equity and justice maketh much for the advantage of Bridlegoose, to wit, that this one, sole, and single fault of his ought to be quite forgotten, abolished, and swallowed up by that immense and vast ocean of just dooms and sentences which heretofore he hath given and pronounced; his demeanours for these forty years and upwards that he hath been a judge having been so evenly balanced in the scales of uprightness, that envy itself, till now, could not have been so impudent as to accuse and twit him with any act worthy of a check or reprehension; as, if a drop of the sea were thrown into the Loire, none could perceive or say that by this single drop the whole river should be salt and brackish.

“Truly, it seemeth unto me, that in the whole series of Bridlegoose’s juridical decrees there hath been I know not what of extraordinary savouring of the unspeakable benignity of God, that all these his preceding sentences, awards, and judgments, have been confirmed and approved of by yourselves in this your own venerable and sovereign court. For it is usual (as you know well) with him whose ways are inscrutable to manifest his own ineffable glory in blunting the perspicacity of the eyes of the wise, in weakening the strength of potent oppressors, in depressing the pride of rich extortioners, and in erecting, comforting, protecting, supporting, upholding, and shoring up the poor, feeble, humble, silly, and foolish ones of the earth. But, waving all these matters, I shall only beseech you, not by the obligations which you pretend to owe to my family, for which I thank you, but for that constant and unfeigned love and affection which you have always found in me, both on this and on the other side of the Loire, for the maintenance and establishment of your places, offices, and dignities, that for this one time you would pardon and forgive him upon these two conditions. First, that he satisfy or posit sufficient surety for the satisfaction of the party wronged by the injustice of the sentence in question. For the fulfilment of this article I will provide sufficiently. And, secondly, that for his subsidiary aid in the weighty charge of administrating justice, you would be pleased to appoint and assign unto him some virtuous counsellor, younger, learned, and wiser than he, by the square and rule of whose advice he may regulate, guide, temper, and moderate in times coming all his judiciary procedures; or otherwise, if you intend totally to depose him from his office, and to deprive him altogether of the state and dignity of a judge, I shall cordially entreat you to make a present and free gift of him to me, who shall find in my kingdoms charges and employments enough wherewith to imbuse him, for the bettering of his own fortunes and furtherance of my service. In the meantime I implore the Creator, Saviour, and sanctifier of all good things, in his grace, mercy, and kindness, to preserve you all, now and evermore, world without end."

These words thus spoken, Pantagruel, veiling his cap and making a leg with such a majestic grace as became a person of his paramount degree and eminency, farewelled Trinquamelle, the president and master speaker of that Myrelinguesian parliament, took his leave of the whole court, and went out of the chamber, at the door whereof finding Panurge, Epistemon, Friar John, and others, he forthwith, attended by them, walked to the outer gate, where all of them immediately took horse to return towards Gargantua. Pantagruel by the way related to them from point to point the manner of Bridlegoose's sententiating differences at law. Friar John said that he had seen Peter Dendin, and was acquainted with him at that time when he sojourned in the monastery of Fontaine le Comte under the noble Abbot Ardillon. Gymnast likewise affirmed that he was in the tent of the grand Christian cavalier de Crissé when the Gascon, after his sleep, made an answer to the adventurer. Panurge was somewhat incredulous in the matter of believing that it was morally possible Bridlegoose should have been for such a long space of time so continually fortunate in that aleatory way of deciding law debates. Epistemon said to Pantagruel: "Such another story, not much unlike to that in all the circumstances thereof, is vulgarly reported of the provost of Montlehery." In good sooth, such a perpetuity of good luck is to be wondered at. To have hit right twice or thrice in a judgment so given by haphazard might have fallen out well enough, especially in controversies that were ambiguous, intricate, abstruse, perplexed, and obscure.

CHAPTER XLIV.

How Pantagruel related a Strange History of the Perplexity of Human Judgment.

“SEEING you talk,” quoth Pantagruel, “of dark, difficult, hard, and knotty debates, I will tell you of one controverted before Cneius Dolabella, Proconsul in Asia. The case was this:

“A wife in Smyrna had of her first husband a child named Abecé. He dying, she, after the expiring of a year and a day, married again, and to her second husband bore a boy called Effegé. A pretty long time thereafter it happened, as you know the affection of stepfathers and stepdames is very rare towards the children of the first fathers and mothers deceased, that this husband, with the help of his son Effegé, secretly, wittingly, willingly, and treacherously murdered Abecé. The woman came no sooner to get information of the fact, but, that it might not go unpunished, she caused kill them both, to revenge the death of her first son. She was apprehended and carried before Cneius Dolabella, in whose presence, she, without dissembling anything, confessed all that was laid to her charge; yet alleged that she had both right and reason on her side for the killing of them. Thus was the state of the question. He found the business so dubious and intricate that he knew not what to determine therein, nor which of the parties to incline to. On the one hand, it was an execrable crime to cut off at once both her second husband and her son. On the other hand, the cause of the murder seemed to be so natural as to be grounded upon the law of nations, and the rational instinct of all the people of the world, seeing they two together had feloniously and murderously destroyed her first son; not that they had been in any manner of way wronged, outraged, or injured by him, but out of an avaricious intent to possess his inheritance. In this doubtful quandary and uncertainty what to pitch upon, he sent to the Areopagites, then sitting at Athens, to learn and obtain their advice and judgment. That judicious senate, very sagely perpending the reasons of his perplexity, sent him word to summon her personally to compeer before him a precise hundred years thereafter, to answer to some interrogatories touching certain points which were not contained in the verbal defence. Which resolution of theirs did import that it was in their opinion so difficult and inextricable a matter, that they knew not what to say or judge therein. Who had decided that plea by the chance and fortune of the dice, could not have erred nor awarded amiss, on which side soever he had passed his casting and condemnatory sentence. If against the woman, she deserved punishment for usurping sovereign authority, by taking that vengeance at her own hand, the inflicting whereof was only competent to the supreme power to administer justice in criminal cases. If for her, the just resentment of a so atrocious injury done unto her, in murdering her innocent son, did fully excuse and vindicate her of any trespass or offence about that particular committed by her. But this continuation of Bridlegoose for so many years, still hitting the nail on the head, never missing the mark, and always judging aright, by the mere throwing of the dice, and the chance thereof, is that which most astonisheth and amazeth me."

"To answer," quoth Pantagruel, "categorically to that which you wonder at, I must ingeniously confess and avow that I cannot; yet, conjecturally to guess at the reason of it, I would refer the cause of that marvellously long-continued happy success in the judiciary results of his definitive sentences to the favourable aspect of the heavens, and benignity of the intelligences; who out of their love to goodness, after having contemplated the pure simplicity and sincere unfeignedness of Judge Bridlegoose, in the acknowledgment of his inabilities, did regulate that for him by chance which by the profoundest act of his maturest deliberation he was not able to reach unto. That, likewise, which possibly made him to diffide in his own skill and capacity, notwithstanding his being an expert and understanding lawyer, for anything that I know to the contrary, was the knowledge and experience which he had of the antinomies, contrarieties, antilogies, contradictions, traversings, and thwartings of laws, customs, edicts, statutes, orders, and ordinances, in which dangerous opposition, equity and justice being structured and founded on either of the opposite terms, and a gap being thereby opened for the ushering in of injustice and iniquity through the various interpretations of self-ended lawyers; being assuredly persuaded that the infernal calumniator, who frequently transformeth himself into the likeness of a messenger or angel of light, maketh use of these cross glosses and expositions in the mouths and pens of his ministers and servants, the perverse advocates, bribing judges, law-monging attorneys, prevaricating counsellors, and such other like law-wresting members of a court of justice, to turn by those means black to white, green to grey, and what is straight to a crooked ply. For the more expedient doing whereof, these diabolical ministers make both the pleading parties believe that their cause is just and righteous; for it is well known that there is no cause, how bad soever, which doth not find an advocate to patrocinate and defend it—else would there be no process in the world, no suits at law, nor pleadings at the bar. He did in these extremities, as I conceive, most humbly recommend the direction of his judicial proceedings to the upright judge of judges, God Almighty—did submit himself to the conduct and guideship of the blessed Spirit, in the hazard and perplexity of the definite sentence—and, by this aleatory lot, did as it were implore and explore the divine decree of his goodwill and pleasure, instead of that which we call the final judgment of a court. To this effect, to the better attaining to his purpose, which was to judge righteously, he did, in my opinion, throw and turn the dice, to the end that by the providence aforesaid the best chance might fall to him whose action was uprightest, and backed with greatest reason. In doing whereof he did not stray from the sense of the Talmudists, who say that there is so little harm in that manner of searching the truth, that in the anxiety and perplexedness of human wits God oftentimes manifesteth the secret pleasure of his Divine Will.

“Furthermore, I will neither think nor say, nor can I believe, that the unstraightness is so irregular, or the corruption so evident, of those of the Parliament of Myrelingois in Myrelingues, before whom Bridlegoose was arraigned for prevarication, that they will maintain it to be a worse practice to have the decision of a suit at law referred to the chance and hazard of a throw of the dice, hab nab, or luck as it will, than to have it remitted to and passed by the determination of those whose hands are full of blood, and hearts of wry affections. Besides that, their principal direction in all law matters comes to their hands from one Tribonian, a wicked, miscreant, barbarous, faithless, and perfidious knave, so pernicious, unjust, avaricious, and perverse in his ways, that it was his ordinary custom to sell laws, edicts, declarations, constitutions, and ordinances, as at an outroop or put-sale, to him who offered most for them. Thus did he shape measures for the pleaders, and cut their morsels to them by and out of these little parcels, fragments, bits, scantlings, and shreds of the law now in use, altogether concealing, suppressing, disannulling, and abolishing the remainder, which did make for the total law; fearing that, if the whole law were made manifest and laid open to the knowledge of such as are interested in it, and the learned books of the ancient doctors of the law upon the exposition of the Twelve Tables and Prætorian Edicts, his villainous pranks, naughtiness, and vile impiety should come to the public notice of the world. Therefore were it better, in my conceit, that is to say, less inconvenient, that parties at variance in any juridical case should in the dark march upon caltrops than submit the determination of what is their right to such unhallowed sentences and horrible decrees: as Cato in his time wished and advised that every judiciary court should be paved with caltrops.

CHAPTER XLV.

How Panurge took Advice of Triboulet.

ON the sixth day thereafter, Pantagruel was returned home at the very same hour that Triboulet was by water come from Blois. Panurge, at his arrival, gave him a hog's bladder, puffed up with wind, and resounding because of the hard peas that were within it. Moreover, he did present him with a gilt wooden sword, a hollow budget made of a tortoiseshell, an osier-wattled wicker bottle full of Breton wine, and five-and-twenty apples of the orchard of Blandureau.

"If he be such a fool," quoth Carpalim, "as to be won with apples, there is no more wit in his pate than in the head of an ordinary cabbage." Triboulet girded his sword and scrip to his side, took the bladder in his hand, ate some few of the apples, and drunk up all the wine. Panurge very wistly and heedfully looking upon him, said, "I never yet saw a fool, and I have seen ten thousand francs worth of that kind of cattle, who did not love to drink heartily, and by good long draughts." When Triboulet had done with his drinking, Panurge laid out before him, and exposed the sum of the business wherein he was to require his advice, in eloquent and choicely sorted terms, adorned with flourishes of rhetoric. But, before he had altogether done, Triboulet with his fist gave him a bouncing whirret between the shoulders, rendered back into his hand again the empty bottle, flipped and flirited him on the nose with the hog's bladder, and lastly, for a final resolution, shaking and wagging his head strongly and disorderly, he answered nothing else but this: "By God, God, mad fool, beware the monk, Buzançay hornpipe!" These words thus finished, he slipped himself out of the company, went aside, and, rattling the bladder, took a huge delight in the melody of the rickling, crackling noise of the peas. After which time it lay not in the power of them all to draw out of his chaps the articulate sound of one syllable, insomuch that, when Panurge went about to interrogate him further, Triboulet drew his wooden sword, and would have struck him therewith. "I have fished fair now," quoth Panurge, "and brought my pigs to a fine market. Have I not got a brave determination of all my doubts, and a response in all things agreeable to the oracle that gave it? He is a great fool, that is not to be denied, yet he is a greater fool who brought him hither to me; but of the three I am the greatest fool, who did impart the secret of my thoughts to such an idiot ass and native ninny." "That bolt," quoth Carpalim, "levels point blank at me."

"Without putting ourselves to any stir or trouble in the least," quoth Pantagruel, "let us maturely and seriously consider and perpend the gestures and speech which he hath made and uttered. In them, veritably," quoth he, "have I remarked and observed some excellent and notable mysteries, yea, of such important worth and weight, that I shall never henceforth be astonished, nor think strange, why the Turks, with a great deal of worship and reverence, honour and respect natural fools equally with their primest doctors, mufties, divines, and prophets. Did not you take heed," quoth he, "a little before he opened his mouth to speak, what a shogging, shaking, and wagging his head did keep? By the approved doctrine of the ancient philosophers, the customary ceremonies of the most expert magicians, and the received opinions of the most learned lawyers, such a brangling agitation and moving should by us all be judged to proceed from, and be quickened and suscitated by, the coming and inspiration of the prophetising and fatidical spirit, which, entering briskly and on a sudden into a shallow receptacle of a debil substance (for, as you know, and as the proverb shows it, a little head containeth not much brains) was the cause of that commotion. This is conform to what is avouched by the most skilful physicians, when they affirm that shakings and tremblings fall upon the members of a human body, partly because of the heaviness and violent impetuosity of the burden and load that is carried, and other part, by reason of the weakness and imbecility that is in the virtue of the bearing organ. A manifest example whereof appeareth in those who, fasting, are not able to carry to their head a great goblet full of wine without a trembling and a shaking in the hand that holds it. This of old was accounted a prefiguration and mystical pointing out of the Pythian divineress, who used always, before the uttering of a response from the oracle, to shake a branch of her domestic laurel. Lampridius also testifieth that the Emperor Heliogabalus, to acquire unto himself the reputation of a soothsayer, did, on several holy days, of prime solemnity, in the presence of the fanatic rabble, make the head of his idol, by some slight within the body thereof, publicly to shake. Plautus, in his Asinaria, declareth likewise that Saurias, whithersoever he walked, like one quite distracted of his wits, kept such a furious lolling and mad-like shaking of his head, that he commonly affrighted those who casually met with him in their way. The said author in another place, showing a reason why Charmides shook and brangled his head, assevered that he was transported, and in an ecstasy. Catullus, after the same manner, maketh mention, in his Berecynthia and Atys, of the place wherein the Menades, Bacchical women, she-priests of the Lyæan god, and demented prophetesses, carrying ivy boughs in their hands, did shake their heads. As in the like case, amongst the Galli, the gelded priests of Cybele were wont to do in the celebrating of their festivals. Whence, too, according to the sense of the ancient theologues, she herself has her denomination; for κυβιστᾶν signifieth to turn round, whirl about, shake the head, and play the part of one that is wry-necked.

“Semblably, Titus Livius writeth that, in the solemnisation time of the Bacchanalian holidays at Rome, both men and women seemed to prophesise and vaticinate, because of an affected kind of wagging of the head, shrugging of the shoulders, and jectigation of the whole body, which they used then most punctually. For the common voice of the philosophers, together with the opinion of the people, asserteth for an irrefragable truth that vaticination is seldom by the heavens bestowed on any without the concomitancy of a little frenzy, and a head-shaking, not only when the said presaging virtue is infused, but when the person also therewith inspired declareth and manifesteth it unto others. The learned lawyer Julian being asked on a time if that slave might be truly esteemed to be healthful and in a good plight who had not only conversed with some furious, maniac, and enraged people, but in their company had also prophesied, yet without a noddle-shaking concussion, answered: ‘That seeing there was no head-wagging at the time of his predictions, he might be held for sound and competent enough.’ Is it not daily seen how schoolmasters, teachers, tutors, and instructors of children, shake the heads of their disciples, as one would do a pot in holding it by the lugs, that by this erection, vellication, stretching, and pulling their ears, which, according to the doctrine of the sage Egyptians, is a member consecrated to the memory, they may stir them up to recollect their scattered thoughts, bring home those fancies of theirs which perhaps have been extravagantly roaming abroad upon strange and uncouth objects, and totally range their judgments, which possibly by disordinate affections have been made wild, to the rule and pattern of a wise, discreet, virtuous, and philosophical discipline. All which Virgil acknowledgeth to be true, in the branglement* of Apollo Cynthius.”

CHAPTER XLVI.

How Pantagruel and Panurge diversely interpret the Words of Triboulet.

“HE says you are a fool. And what kind of fool? A mad fool, who in your old age would enslave yourself to the bondage of matrimony, and shut your pleasures up within a wedlock, whose key some ruffian carries in his codpiece. He says, furthermore, beware of the monk. Upon mine honour, it gives me in my mind that you will be cuckolded by a monk. Nay, I will engage mine honour, which is the most precious pawn I could have in my possession, although I were sole and peaceable dominator over all Europe, Asia, and Africa, that if you marry, you will surely be one of the horned brotherhood of Vulcan. Hereby may you perceive how much I do attribute to the wise foolery of our Morosoph Triboulet. The other oracles and responses did in the general prognosticate you a cuckold, without descending so near to the point of a particular determination as to pitch upon what vocation amongst the several sorts of men he should profess who is to be the copesmate of your wife, and hornifier of your proper self. Thus noble Triboulet tells it us plainly, from whose words we may gather, with all ease imaginable, that your cuckoldry is to be infamous, and so much the more scandalous, that your conjugal bed will be incestuously contaminated with the filthiness of a monkery lecher. Moreover, he says that you will be the hornpipe of Buzançay, that is to say, well-horned, hornified, and cornuted. And, as Triboulet's uncle asked from Louis the Twelfth, for a younger brother of his own, who lived at Blois, the hornpipes of Buzançay for the organ-pipes, through the mistake of one word for another, even so, whilst you think to marry a wise, humble, calm, discreet, and honest wife, you shall unhappily stumble upon one witless, proud, loud, obstreperous, bawling, clamorous, and more unpleasant than any Buzançay hornpipe. Consider withal how he flirted you on the nose with the bladder, and gave you a sound thumping blow with his fist upon the ridge of the back. This denotes and presageth that you shall be banged, beaten, and flipped by her, and that, also, she will steal of your goods from you, as you stole the hog's bladder from the little boys of Vaubreton."

"Flat contrary," quoth Panurge, "not that I would impudently exempt myself from being a vassal in the territory of folly. I hold of that jurisdiction, and am subject thereto, I confess it. And why should I not? For the whole world is foolish. In the old Lorraine language, fou for oou; all and fool were the same thing. Besides, it is avouched by Solomon, that infinite is the number of fools. From an infinity nothing can be deducted or abated, nor yet, by the testimony of Aristotle, can anything thereto be added or subjoined. Therefore, were I a mad fool if, being a fool, I should not hold myself a fool. After the same manner of speaking, we may aver the number of the mad and enraged folks to be infinite. Avicenna maketh no bones to assert that the several kinds of madness are infinite. Though this much of Triboulet's words tend little to my advantage, howbeit the prejudice which I sustain thereby be common with me to all other men, yet the rest of his talk and gesture maketh altogether for me. He said to my wife, 'Be wary of the monkey;' that is as much as if she should be cheery, and take as much delight in a monkey as ever did the Lesbia of Catullus in her sparrow, who will for his recreation pass his time no less joyfully at the exercise of snatching flies than heretofore did the merciless fly-catcher Domitian. Withal he meant by another part of his discourse that she should be of a jovial, country-like humour, as gay and pleasing as a harmonious hornpipe of Saulieu or Buzançay. The veridical Triboulet did therein hint at what I liked well, as perfectly knowing the inclinations and propensities of my mind, my natural disposition, and the bias of my interior passions and affections. For you may be assured that my humour is much better satisfied and contented with the pretty, frolic, rural, dishevelled shepherdesses, whose bums, through their coarse canvass smocks, smell of the clover-grass of the field, than with those great ladies in magnificent courts, with their flaunting top-knots and sultanas, their polvil, musk, and cosmetics. The homely sound, likewise, of a rustic hornpipe is more agreeable to my ears than the curious warbling and musical quivering of lutes, theorbos, viols, rebecs, and violins. He gave me a lusty rapping thwack on my back—what then? Let it pass, in the name and for the love of God, as an abatement of, and deduction from, so much of my future pains in purgatory. He did it not out of any evil intent. He thought, belike, to have hit some of the pages. He is an honest fool, and an innocent changeling. It is a sin to harbour in the heart any bad conceit of him. As for myself, I heartily pardon him. He flirted me on the nose. In that there is no harm, for it importeth nothing else but that betwixt my wife and me there will occur some toyish wanton tricks which usually happen to all newly-married folks."

CHAPTER XLVII.

How Pantagruel and Panurge resolved to make a Visit to the Oracle of the Holy Bottle.

"THERE is as yet another point," quoth Panurge, "which you have not at all considered on, although it be the chief and principal head of the matter. He put the bottle in my hand, and restored it me again. How interpret you that passage? What is the meaning of that?" "He possibly," quoth Pantagruel, "signifieth thereby that your wife will be such a drunkard as shall daily take in her liquor kindly, and ply the pots and bottles apace." "Quite otherwise," quoth Panurge; "for the bottle was empty. I swear to you, by the backbone of Saint Fiacre in Brie, that our unique Morosoph, whom I formerly termed the lunatic Triboulet, referreth me, for attaining to the final resolution of my scruple, to the response-giving bottle. Therefore do I renew afresh the first vow which I made, and here in your presence protest and make oath, by Styx and Acheron, to carry still spectacles in my cap, and never to wear a codpiece in my breeches, until upon the enterprize in hand of my nuptial undertaking I shall have obtained an answer from the holy bottle. I am acquainted with a prudent, understanding, and discreet gentleman, and, besides, a very good friend of mine, who knoweth the land, country, and place where its temple and oracle is built and posited. He will guide and conduct us thither sure and safely. Let us go thither, I beseech you. Deny me not, and say not nay; reject not the suit I make unto you, I entreat you. I will be to you an Achates, a Damis, and heartily accompany you all along in the whole voyage, both in your going forth and coming back. I have of a long time known you to be a great lover of peregrination, desirous still to learn new things, and still to see what you had never seen before."

"Very willingly," quoth Pantagruel, "I condescend to your request. But before we enter in upon our progress towards the accomplishment of so far a journey, replenished and fraught with imminent perils, full of innumerable hazards, and every way stored with evident and manifest dangers—" "What dangers?" quoth Panurge, interrupting him. "Dangers fly back, run from, and shun me whithersoever I go seven leagues around, as in the presence of the sovereign a subordinate magistracy is eclipsed; or as clouds and darkness quite vanish at the bright coming of a radiant sun; or as all sores and sicknesses did suddenly depart at the approach of the body of Saint Martin à Quande." "Nevertheless," quoth Pantagruel, "before we adventure to set forward on the road of our projected and intended voyage, some few points are to be discussed, expedited, and despatched. First, let us send back Triboulet to Blois." Which was instantly done after that Pantagruel had given him a frieze coat. "Secondly, our design must be backed with the advice and counsel of the king my father. And, lastly, it is most needful and expedient for us that we search for and find out some sibyl to serve us for a guide, truchman, and interpreter." To this Panurge made answer: "That his friend Xenomanes would abundantly suffice for the plenary discharge and performance of the sibyl's office; and that, furthermore, in passing through the Lanternatory revelling country, they should take along with them a learned and profitable Lanternesse, who would be no less useful to them in their voyage than was the sibyl to Æneas, in his descent to the Elysian fields." Carpalim, in the interim, as he was upon the conducting away of Triboulet, in his passing by, hearkened a little to the discourse they were upon, then spoke out, saying: "Ho, Panurge, master freeman, take my Lord Debitis at Calais along with you, for he is goud-fallot, a good fellow. He will not forget those who have been debtors; these are Lanternes. Thus shall you not lack for both fallot and lanterne." "I may safely, with the little skill I have," quoth Pantagruel, "prognosticate that by the way we shall engender no melancholy. I clearly perceive it already. The only thing that vexeth me is, that I cannot speak the Lanternatory language." "I shall," answered Panurge, "speak for you all. I understand it every whit as well as I do mine own maternal tongue; I have been no less used to it than to the vulgar French.

'Brisz marg dalgotbric nubstzne zos,
Isquebsz prusq albork crinqs zacbac.
Misbe dilbarkz morp nipp stancz bos,
Strombtz, Panurge, walmap quost gruszbac.'

"Now guess, friend Epistemon, what is this?" They are," quoth Epistemon, "names of errant devils, passant devils, and rampant devils." "These words of thine, dear friend of mine, are true," quoth Panurge, "yet are they terms used in the language of the court of the Lanternish people. By the way, as we go upon our journey, I will make to thee a pretty little dictionary, which, notwithstanding, shall not last you much longer than a pair of new shoes. Thou shalt have learned it sooner than thou canst perceive the dawning of the next subsequent morning. What I have said in the foregoing tetrastic is thus translated out of the Lanternish tongue into our vulgar dialect,—

'All miseries attended me whilst I
A lover was, and had no good thereby.
Of better luck the married people tell;
Panurge is one of those, and knows it well.'

"There is little more, then," quoth Pantagruel, "to be done, but that we understand what the will of the king my father will be therein, and purchase his consent."

CHAPTER XLVIII.

How Gargantua showeth that the Children ought not to Marry without the Special Knowledge and Advice of their Fathers and Mothers.

No sooner had Pantagruel entered in at the door of the great hall of the castle than that he encountered full butt with the good honest Gargantua coming forth from the council board, unto whom he made a succinct and summary narrative of what had passed and occurred, worthy of his observation, in his travels abroad since their last interview; then, acquainting him with the design he had in hand, besought him that it might stand with his goodwill and pleasure to grant him leave to prosecute and go thorough-stitch with the enterprise which he had undertaken. The good man Gargantua, having in one hand two great bundles of petitions, indorsed and answered, and in the other some remembrancing notes and bills, to put him in mind of such other requests of supplicants, which, albeit presented, had nevertheless been neither read nor heard, he gave both to Ulrich Gallet, his ancient and faithful Master of Requests, then drew aside Pantagruel, and with a countenance more serene and jovial than customary, spoke to him thus: "I praise God, and have great reason so to do, my most dear son, that he hath been pleased to entertain in you a constant inclination to virtuous actions. I am well content that the voyage which you have motioned to me be by you accomplished, but withal I could wish you would have a mind and desire to marry, for that I see you are of competent years." [Panurge, in the meanwhile, was in a readiness of preparing and providing for remedies, salves, and cures against all such lets, obstacles, and impediments as he could in the height of his fancy conceive might by Gargantua be cast in the way of their itinerary design.] "Is it your pleasure, most dear father, that you speak?" answered Pantagruel. "For my part, I have not yet thought upon it. In all this affair I wholly submit and rest in your good liking and paternal authority. For I shall rather pray unto God that he would throw me down stark dead at your feet, in your pleasure, than that against your pleasure I should be found married alive. I never heard that by any law, whether sacred or profane, yea, amongst the rudest and most barbarous nations in the world, it was allowed and approved of that children may be suffered and tolerated to marry at their own goodwill and pleasure without the knowledge, advice, or consent asked and had thereto of their fathers, mothers, and nearest kindred. All legislators, everywhere upon the face of the whole earth, have taken away and removed this licentious liberty from children, and totally reserved it to the discretion of the parents."

"My dearly beloved son," quoth Gargantua, "I believe you, and from my heart thank God for having endowed you with the grace of having both a perfect notice of, and entire liking to, laudable and praiseworthy things, and that through the windows of your exterior senses he hath vouchsafed to transmit unto the interior faculties of your mind nothing but what is good and virtuous. For in my time there hath been found on the continent a certain country wherein are I know not what kind of Pastophorian mole-catching priests, who, albeit averse from engaging their proper persons into a matrimonial duty, like the pontifical flamens of Cybele in Phrygia, as if they were capons, and not cocks, full of lasciviousness, salacity, and wantonness, who yet have, nevertheless, in the matter of conjugal affairs, taken upon them to prescribe laws and ordinances to married folks. I cannot goodly determine what I should most abhor, detest, loathe, and abominate—whether the tyrannical presumption of those dreaded sacerdotal mole-catchers, who not being willing to contain and coop up themselves within the grates and trellises of their own mysterious temples, do deal in, meddle with, obtrude upon, and thrust their sickles into harvests of secular businesses quite contrary and diametrically opposite to the quality, state, and condition of their callings, professions, and vocations; or the superstitious stupidity and senseless scrupulousness of married folks who have yielded obedience, and submitted their bodies, fortunes, and estates to the discretion and authority of such odious, perverse, barbarous, and unreasonable laws. Nor do they see that, which is clearer than the light and splendour of the morning star, how all these nuptial and connubial sanctions, statutes and ordinances have been decreed, made, and instituted, for the sole benefit, profit, and advantage of the flaminal mysts and mysterious flamens, and nothing at all for the good, utility, or emolument of the silly hood-winked married people. Which administereth unto others a sufficient cause for rendering these churchmen suspicious of iniquity, and of an unjust and fraudulent manner of dealing, no more to be connived at nor countenanced, after that it be well weighed in the scales of reason, than if with a reciprocal temerity the laics, by way of compensation, would impose laws to be followed and observed by those mysts and flamens how they should behave themselves in the making and performance of their rites and ceremonies, after what manner they ought to proceed in the offering up and immolating of their various oblations, victims, and sacrifices; seeing that, besides the edecimation and tithe-haling of their goods, they cut off and take parings, shreddings, and clippings of the gain proceeding from the labour of their hands, and sweat of their brows, therewith to entertain themselves the better. Upon which consideration, in my opinion, their injunctions and commands would not prove so pernicious and impertinent as those of the ecclesiastic power unto which they had tendered their blind obedience. For, as you have very well said, there is no place in the world where, legally, a licence is granted to the children to mary without the advice and consent of their parents and kindred. Nevertheless, by those wicked laws and mole-catching customs, whereat there is a little hinted in what I have already spoken to you, there is no scurvy, measly, leprous, or pocky ruffian, pander, knave, rogue, scellum, robber, or thief, pilloried, whipped, and burn-marked in his own country for his crimes and felonies, who may not violently snatch away and ravish what maid soever he had a mind to pitch upon, how noble, how fair, how rich, honest, and chaste soever she be, and that out of the house of her own father, in his own presence, from the bosom of her mother, and in the sight and despite of her friends and kindred looking on a so woful spectacle, provided that the rascal villain be so cunning as to associate unto himself some mystical flamen, who, according to the covenant made betwixt them two, shall be in hope some day to participate of the prey.

“Could the Goths, the Scythians, or Massagetæ, do a worse or more cruel act to any of the inhabitants of a hostile city, when, after the loss of many of their most considerable commanders, the expense of a great deal of money, and a long siege, that they shall have stormed and taken it by a violent and impetuous assault? May not these fathers and mothers, think you, be sorrowful and heavy-hearted when they see an unknown fellow, a vagabond stranger, a barbarous lout, a rude cur, rotten, fleshless, putrified, scraggy, boily, botchy, poor, a forlorn caitiff, and miserable sneak, by an open rapt snatch away before their own eyes their so fair, delicate, neat, well-behavioured, richly provided for, and healthful daughters, on whose breeding and education they had spared no cost nor charges, by bringing them up in an honest discipline to all the honourable and virtuous employments becoming one of their sex, descended of a noble parentage, hoping by those commendable and industrious means, in an opportune and convenient time, to bestow them on the worthy sons of their well-deserving neighbours and ancient friends, who had nourished, entertained, taught, instructed, and schooled their children with the same care and solicitude, to make them matches fit to attain to the felicity of a so happy marriage, that from them might issue an offspring and progeny no less heirs to the laudable endowments and exquisite qualifications of their parents, whom they every way resemble, than to their personal and real estates, moveables and inheritances? How doleful, trist, and plangorous, would such a sight and pageantry prove unto them? You shall not need to think that the collachrymation of the Romans and their confederates at the decease of Germanicus Drusus was comparable to this lamentation of theirs? Neither would I have you to believe that the discomfort and anxiety of the Lacedæmonians, when the Greek Helen, by the perfidiousness of the adulterous Trojan, Paris, was privily stolen away out of their country, was greater or more pitiful than this ruthless and deplorable collugency of theirs. You may very well imagine that Ceres at the ravishment of her daughter Proserpine was not more attristed, sad, nor mournful than they. Trust me and your own reason that the loss of Orsiris was not so regrettable to Isis, nor did Venus so deplore the death of Adonis, nor yet did Hercules so bewail the straying of Hylas, nor was the rapt of Polyxena more throbbingly resented and condoled by Priamus and Hecuba, than this aforesaid accident would be sympathetically bemoaned, grievous, ruthless, and anxious, to the wofully desolate and disconsolate parents.

“Notwithstanding all this, the greater part of so vilely abused parents are so timorous and afraid of the devils and hobgoblins, and so deeply plunged in superstition, that they dare not gainsay nor contradict, much less oppose and resist, those unnatural and impious actions, when the mole-catcher hath been present at the perpetrating of the fact, and a party contractor and covenanter in that detestable bargain. What do they do then? They wretchedly stay at their own miserable homes, destitute of their well-beloved daughters, the fathers cursing the days and the hours wherein they were married, and the mothers howling and crying that it was not their fortune to have brought forth abortive issues when they happened to be delivered of such unfortunate girls, and in this pitiful plight spend at best the remainder of their time with tears and weeping for those their children, of and from whom they expected (and, with good reason, should have obtained and reaped), in these latter days of theirs, joy and comfort. Other parents there have been, so impatient of that affront and indignity put upon them and their families, that, transported with the extremity of passion, in a mad and frantic mood, through the vehemency of a grievous fury and raging sorrow, they have drowned, hanged, killed, and otherwise put violent hands on themselves. Others, again, of that parental relation, have, upon the reception of the like injury, been of a more magnanimous and heroic spirit, who, in imitation and at the example of the children of Jacob, revenging upon the Sichemites the rapt of their sister Dina, having found the rascally ruffian in the association of his mystical mole-catcher, closely and in huggermugger conferring and parleying with their daughters, for the suborning, corrupting, depraving, perverting, and enticing these innocent unexperienced maids unto filthy lewdnesses, have without any further advisement on the matter cut them instantly to pieces, and thereupon forthwith thrown out upon the fields their so dismembered bodies to serve for food unto the wolves and ravens. Upon the chivalrous, bold, and courageous achievement of a so valiant, stout, and manlike act, the other mole-catching symmists have been so highly incensed, and have so chafed, fretted, and fumed thereat, that bills of complaint and accusations having been in a most odious and detestable manner put in before the competent judges, the arm of secular authority hath with much importunity and impetuosity been by them implored and required; they proudly contending that the servants of God would become contemptible if exemplary punishment were not speedily taken upon the persons of the perpetrators of such an enormous, horrid, sacrilegious, crying, heinous, and execrable crime.

“Yet neither by natural equity, by the law of nations, nor by any imperial law whatsoever, hath there been found so much as one rubric, paragraph, point, or tittle, by the which any kind of chastisement or correction hath been adjudged due to be inflicted upon any for their delinquency in that kind. Reason opposeth, and nature is repugnant. For there is no virtuous man in the world who both naturally and with good reason will not be more hugely troubled in mind, hearing of the news of the rapt, disgrace, ignominy, and dishonour of his daughter, than of her death. Now any man finding in hot blood one who with a forethought felony hath murdered his daughter, may, without tying himself to the formalities and circumstances of a legal proceeding, kill him on a sudden, and out of hand, without incurring any hazard of being attainted and apprehended by the officers of justice for so doing. It is no wonder, then, if a lechering rogue, together with his mole-catching abettor, be entrapped in the flagrant act of suborning his daughter, and stealing her out of his house, though herself consent thereto, that the father in such a case of stain and infamy, by them brought upon his family, should put them both to a shameful death, and cast their carcasses upon dunghills, to be devoured and eaten up by dogs and swine, or otherwise fling them a little further off, to the direption, tearing, and rending asunder of their joints and members by the wild beasts of the field, as being unworthy to receive the gentle, the desired, the last kind embraces of their great Alma Mater, the earth, commonly called burial.

“Dearly beloved son, have an especial care that after my decease none of these laws be received in any of your kingdoms; for whilst I breathe, by the grace and assistance of God, I shall give good order. Seeing, therefore, you have totally referred unto my discretion the disposure of you in marriage, I am fully of an opinion that I shall provide sufficiently well for you in that point. Make ready and prepare yourself for Panurge's voyage. Take along with you Epistemon, Friar John, and such others as you will choose. Do with my treasures what unto yourself shall seem most expedient. None of your actions, I promise you, can in any manner of way displease me. Take out of my arsenal Thalasse whatsoever equipage, furniture, or provision you please, together with such pilots, mariners, and truchmen, as you have a mind to, and with the first fair and favourable wind set sail and make out to sea, in the name of God our Saviour. In the meanwhile, during your absence, I shall not be neglective of providing a wife for you, nor of those preparations which are requisite to be made for the more sumptuous solemnising of your nuptials with a most splendid feast, if ever there was any in the world."

CHAPTER XLIX.

How Pantagruel put Himself in Readiness to go to Sea; and of the Herb named Pantagruelion.

WITHIN very few days after that Pantagruel had taken his leave of the good Gargantua, who devoutly prayed for his son's happy voyage, he arrived at the seaport, near to Sammalo, accompanied with Panurge, Epistemon, Friar John of the Funnels, Abbot of Theleme, and others of the royal house, especially with Xenomanes the great traveller, and thwarter of dangerous ways, who was to come at the bidding and appointment of Panurge, of whose Castlewick of Salmygondin he did hold some petty inheritance by the tenure of a mesne fee. Pantagruel, being come thither, prepared and made ready for launching a fleet of ships, to the number of those which Ajax of Salamine had of old equipped in convoy of the Grecian soldiery against the Trojan state. He likewise picked out for his use so many mariners, pilots, sailors, interpreters, artificers, officers, and soldiers, as he thought fitting, and therewithal made provision of so much victuals of all sorts, artillery, munition of divers kinds, clothes, moneys, and other such luggage, stuff, baggage, chaffer, and furniture, as he deemed needful for carrying on the design of a so tedious, long, and perilous voyage. Amongst other things, it was observed how he caused some of his vessels to be fraught and loaded with a great quantity of an herb of his called Pantagruelion, not only of the green and raw sort of it, but of the confected also, and of that which was notably well befitted for present use, after the fashion of conserves. The herb Pantagruelion (hemp) hath a little root, somewhat hard and rough, roundish, terminating in an obtuse and very blunt point, and having some of its veins, strings, or filaments coloured with some spots of white, never fixeth itself into the ground above the profoundness almost of a cubit, or foot and a-half. From the root thereof proceedeth the only stalk, orbicular, cane-like, green without, whitish within, and hollow like the stem of smyrnium, olus atrum, beans, and gentian, full of long threads, straight, easy to be broken, jagged, snipped, nicked and notched a little after the manner of pillars and columns, slightly furrowed, chamfered, guttered and channelled, and full of fibres or hairs like strings, in which consisteth the chief value and dignity of the herb, especially in that part thereof which is termed mesa, as one would say the mean, and in that other which had got the denomination of mylasea. Its height is commonly five or six feet. Yet sometimes it is of such a tall growth as doth surpass the length of a lance, but that is only when it meeteth with a sweet, easy, warm, wet, and well-soaked soil—as is the ground of the territory of Olone, and that of Rosea, near to Preneste in Sabinia—and that it want not for rain enough about the season of the fisher's holidays and the æstival solstice. There are many trees whose height is by it very far exceeded, and you might call it dendromalache, by the authority of Theophrastus. The plant every year perisheth—the tree neither in the trunk, root, bark, or boughs, being durable.

From the stalk of this Pantagruelion plant there issue forth several large and great branches, whose leaves have thrice as much length as breadth, always green, roughish, and rugged like the Orcanet, or Spanish Bugloss, hardish, slit round about like unto a sickle, as betony, and finally ending, as it were, in the points of a Macedonian spear, or of such a lancet as surgeons commonly make use of in their phlebotomizing tiltings. The figure and shape of the leaves thereof is not much different from that of those of the ash tree, or of Agrimony; the herb itself being so like the Eupatorian plant, that many skilful herbalists have called it the Domestic Eupator, and the Eupator the Wild Pantagruelion. These leaves are in equal and parallel distances spread around the stalk, by the number in every rank either of five or seven, nature having so highly favoured and cherished this plant that she hath richly adorned it with these two odd, divine, and mysterious numbers. The smell thereof is somewhat strong, and not very pleasing to nice, tender, and delicate noses. The seed enclosed therein mounteth up to the very top of its stalk, and a little above it.

This is a numerous herb: for there is no less abundance of it than of any other whatsoever. Some of these plants are spherical, some rhomboid, and some of an oblong shape, and all of these either black, bright-coloured, or tawny, rude to the touch, and mantled with a quickly-blasted-away coat, yet such a one as is of a delicious taste and savour to all shrill and sweetly singing birds, such as linnets, goldfinches, larks, canary birds, yellowhammers, and others of that airy, chirping choir; but it would quite extinguish the natural heat and procreative virtue of the semence of any man who would eat much and often of it. And although that of old amongst the Greeks there was certain kind of fritters and pancakes, buns and tarts, made thereof, which commonly for a liquorish daintiness were presented on the table after supper, to delight the palate and make the wine relish the better, yet is it of a difficult concoction, and offensive to the stomach. For it engendereth bad and unwholesome blood, and with its exorbitant heat woundeth them with grievous, hurtful, smart, and noisome vapours. And as in divers plants and trees there are two sexes, male and female, which is perceptible in laurels, palms, cypresses, oaks, holmes, the daffodil, mandrake, fern, the agaric, mushroom, birthwort, turpentine, pennyroyal, peony, rose of the mount, and many other such like, even so in this herb there is a male, which beareth no flower at all, yet it is very copious of and abundant in seed. There is likewise in it a female, which hath great store and plenty of whitish flowers, serviceable to little or no purpose, nor doth it carry in it seed of any worth at all, at least comparable to that of the male. It hath also a larger leaf, and much softer than that of the male, nor doth it altogether grow to so great a height. This Pantagrueelion is to be sown at the first coming of the swallows, and is to be plucked out of the ground when the grasshoppers begin to be a little hoarse.

CHAPTER L.

How the Famous Pantagrueelion ought to be Prepared and Wrought.

THE herb Pantagrueelion in September, under the autumnal equinox, is dressed and prepared several ways, according to the various fancies of the people and diversity of the climates wherein it groweth. The first instruction which Pantagrueel gave concerning it was to divest and despoil the stalk and stem thereof of all its flowers and seeds, to macerate and mortify it in stagnant, not running, water for five days together, if the season be dry and the water hot, or for full nine or twelve days, if the weather be cloudish and the water cold. Then must it be dried in the sun till it be drained of its moisture.

After this, it is in the shadow, where the sun shines not, to be peeled, and its rind pulled off. Then are the fibres and strings thereof to be parted, wherein, as we have already said, consisteth its prime virtue, price, and efficacy, and severed from the woody part thereof, which is unprofitable, and serveth hardly to any other use than to make a clear and glistening blaze, to kindle the fire, and for the play, pastime, and disport of little children, to blow up hog's bladders and make them rattle. Many times some use is made thereof by tippling, sweet-lipped bibbers, who out of it frame quills and pipes through which they with their liquor-attractive breath suck up the new, dainty wine from the bung of the barrel. Some modern Pantagruellists, to shun and avoid that manual labour which such a separating and partitional work would of necessity require, employ certain cataractic instruments, composed and formed after the same manner that the forward, pettish, and angry Juno did hold the fingers of both her hands interwovenly clenched together when she would have hindered the childbirth delivery of Alcmena at the nativity of Hercules, and athwart those cataracts they break and bruise to very trash the woody parcels, thereby to preserve the better the fibres, which are the precious and excellent parts. In and with this sole operation do these acquiesce and are contented who, contrary to the received opinion of the whole earth, and in a manner paradoxical to all philosophers, gain their livelihoods backwards and by recoiling. But those that love to hold it at a higher rate, and prize it according to its value, for their own greater profit, do the very same which is told us of the recreation of the three fatal Sister-Parcæ, or of the nocturnal exercise of the noble Circe, or yet of the excuse which Penelope made to her fond wooing youngsters and effeminate courtiers during the long absence of her husband Ulysses.

By these means is this herb put into a way to display its inestimable virtues, whereof I will discover a part; for to relate all is a thing impossible to do. I have already interpreted and exposed before you the denomination thereof. I find that plants have their names given and bestowed upon them after several ways. Some got the name of him who first found them out, knew them, sowed them, improved them by culture, qualified them to a tractability, and appropriated them to the uses and subserviencies they were fit for. As the Mercurialis from Mercury; Panacea from Panace, the daughter of Esculapius; Armois from Artemis, who is Diana; Eupatoria from the king Eupator; Telephion from Telephus; Euphorbium from Euphorbus, King Juba's physician; Clymenos from Clymenus; Alcibiadium from Alcibiades; Gentian from Gentius, King of Slavonia, and so forth, through a great many other herbs or plants. Truly, in ancient times, this prerogative of imposing the inventor's name upon an herb found out by him was held in a so great account and estimation that, as a controversy arose betwixt Neptune and Pallas from which of them two that land should receive its denomination, which had been equally found out by them both together—though thereafter it was called and had the appellation of Athens, from Athene, which is Minerva—just so would Lynceus, King of Scythia, have treacherously slain the young Triptolemus, whom Ceres had sent to show unto mankind the invention of corn, which until then had been utterly unknown; to the end that, after the murder of the messenger, whose death he made account to have kept secret, he might, by imposing, with the less suspicion of false dealing, his own name upon the said found out seed, acquire unto himself an immortal honour and glory for having been the inventor of a grain so profitable and necessary to and for the use of human life. For the wickedness of which treasonable attempt he was by Ceres transformed into that wild beast which by some is called a lynx, and by others an ounce. Such also was the ambition of others upon the like occasion, as appeareth, by that very sharp wars, and of a long continuance, have been made of old betwixt some residentiary kings in Cappadocia upon this only debate, of whose name a certain herb should have the appellation; by reason of which difference, so troublesome and expensive to them all, it was by them called Polemonion, and by us for the same cause termed Make-bate.

Other herbs and plants there are which retain the names of the countries from whence they were transported, as the Median apples from Media, where they first grew; Punic apples from Punicia, that is to say, Carthage; Ligusticum, which we call Louage, from Liguria, the coast of Genoa; Rhubarb from a flood in Barbary, as Ammianus attesteth, called Ru; Santonica from a region of that name; Fenugreek from Greece; Castanes from a country so called; Persicaria from Persia; Sabine from a territory of that appellation; Stæchas from the Stæchad Islands; Spica Celtica from the land of the Celtic Gauls, and so throughout a great many other which were tedious to enumerate. Some others, again, have obtained their denominations by way of antiphrasis or contrariety, as Absinth, because it is contrary to Ψυθος, for it is bitter to the taste in drinking; Holosteon, as if it were all bones, whilst, on the contrary, there is no frailer, tenderer, nor brittler herb in the whole production of nature than it.

There are some other sorts of herbs which have got their names from their virtues and operations, as Aristolochia, because it helpeth women in childbirth; Lichen, for that it cureth the disease of that name; Mallow, because it mollifieth; Callithricum, because it maketh the hair of a bright colour; Alyssum, Ephemereum, Bechium, Nasturtium, Henbane, and so forth through many more.

Other some there are which have obtained their names from the admirable qualities that are found to be in them, as Heliotropium, which is the marigold, because it followeth the sun, so that at the sun rising it displayeth and spreads itself out, at his ascending it mounteth, at his declining it waneth, and, when he is set, it is close shut; Adianton, because, although it grow near unto watery places, and albeit you should let it lie in water a long time, it will nevertheless retain no moisture nor humidity; Hierachia, Eringium, and so throughout a great many more. There are also a great many herbs and plants which have retained the very same names of the men and women who have been metamorphosed and transformed in them, as from Daphne the laurel is called also Daphne; Myrrh from Myrrha, the daughter of Cinarus; Pythis from Pythis; Cinara, which is the artichoke, from one of that name; Narcissus, with Saffron, Smilax, and divers others.

Many herbs, likewise, have got their names of those things which they seem to have some resemblance to, as Hippuris, because it hath the likeness of a horse's tail; Alopecuris, because it representeth in similitude the tail of a fox; Psyllion, from a flea, which it resembleth; Delphinium, for that it is like the dolphin fish; Bugloss is so called because it is an herb like an ox's tongue; Iris, so called because in its flowers it hath some resemblance of the rainbow; Myosota, because it is like the ear of a mouse; Coronopus, for that it is of the likeness of a crow's foot. A great many other such there are which here to recite were needless. Furthermore, as there are herbs and plants which have had their names from those of men, so by a reciprocal denomination have the surnames of many families taken their origin from them, as the Fabii, à fabis, beans; the Pisons, à pisis, peas; the Lentuli, from lentils; the Cicerons, à ciceribus, vel ciceris, a sort of pulse called chickpeas, and so forth. In some plants and herbs the resemblance or likeness hath been taken from a higher mark or object, as when we say Venus's navel, Venus's hair, Venus's tub, Jupiter's beard, Jupiter's eye, Mar's blood, the Hermodactyl or Mercury's fingers, which are all of them names of herbs, as there are a great many more of the like appellation. Others, again, have received their denomination from their forms, such as the trefoil, because it is three-leaved; Pentaphylon, for having five leaves; Serpolet, because it creepeth along the ground; Helxine, Petast, Myrobalon, which the Arabians called Been, as if you would say an acorn, for it hath a kind of resemblance thereto, and withal is very oily.

CHAPTER LI.

Why it is called Pantagrueion, and of the Admirable Virtues thereof.

By such like means of attaining to a denomination, the fabulous ways being only from thence excepted—for the Lord forbid that we should make use of any fables in this a so very veritable history—is this herb called Pantagrueion, for Pantagrue was the inventor thereof. I do not say of the plant itself, but of a certain use which it serves for, exceeding odious and hateful to thieves and robbers, unto whom it is more contrarious and hurtful than the strangle-weed and choke-fitch is to the flax, the catstail to the brakes, the sheave-grass to the mowers of hay, the fitches to the chickney-peas, the darnel to barley, the hatchet-fitch to the lentil-pulse, the antramium to the beans, tares to wheat, ivy to walls, the water-lily to lecherous monks, the birchen rod to the scholars of the college of Navarre in Paris, colewort to the vine tree, garlic to the load-stone, onions to the sight, fern-seed to women with child, willow grain to vicious nuns, the yew tree shade to those that sleep under it, wolfsbane to wolves and libbards, the smell of fig tree to mad bulls, hemlock to goslings, purslane to the teeth, or oil to trees. For we have seen many of those rogues, by virtue and right application of this herb, finish their lives short and long, after the manner of Phyllis, Queen of Thracia, of Bonosus, Emperor of Rome, of Amata, King Latinus's wife, of Iphis, Autolia, Lycambes, Arachne, Phædra, Leda, Achiüs, King of Lydia, and many thousands more, who were chiefly angry and vexed at this disaster therein, that, without being otherwise sick or evil disposed in their bodies, by a touch only of the Pantagrueion, they came on a sudden to have the passage obstructed, and their pipes, through which were wont to bolt so many jolly sayings, and to enter so many luscious morsels, stopped more cleverly than ever could have done the squinancy.

Others have been heard most wofully to lament, at the very instant when Atropos was about to cut the thread of their life, that Pantagrue held them by the gorge. But, well-a-day, it was not Pantagrue; he never was an executioner. It was the Pantagrueion, manufactured and fashioned into an halter, and serving in the place and office of a cravat. In that, verily, they solecised and spoke improperly, unless you would excuse them by a trope, which alloweth us to posit the inventor in the place of the thing invented; as when Ceres is taken for bread, and Bacchus put instead of wine. I swear to you here, by the good and frolic words which are to issue out of that wine bottle, which is a-cooling below in the copper vessel full of fountain water, that the noble Pantagrue never snatched any man by the throat, unless it was such a one as was altogether careless and neglective of those obviating remedies which were preventive of the thirst to come.

It is also termed Pantagrueion by a similitude. For Pantagrue, at the very first minute of his birth, was no less tall than this herb is long whereof I speak unto you—his measure having been then taken the more easy that he was born in the season of the great drought, when they were busiest in the gathering of the said herb, to wit, at that time when Icarus's dog, with his fiery brawling and barking at the sun, maketh the whole world Troglodytic, and enforceth people everywhere to hide themselves in dens and subterranean caves. It is likewise called Pantagrueion, because of the notable and singular qualities, virtues, and properties thereof. For as Pantagrue hath been the idea, pattern, prototype, and exemplary of all jovial perfection and accomplishment—in the truth whereof I believe there is none of you, gentlemen drinkers, that putteth any question—so in this Pantagrueion have I found so much efficacy and energy, so much completeness and excellency, so much exquisiteness and rarity, and so many admirable effects and operations of a transcendent nature, that, if the worth and virtue thereof had been known when those trees, by the relation of the prophet, made election of a wooden king to rule and govern over them, it without doubt would have carried away from all the rest the plurality of votes and suffrages.

Shall I yet say more? If Oxylus, the son of Orius, had begotten this plant upon his sister Hamadryas, he had taken more delight in the value and perfection of it alone than in all his eight children, so highly renowned by our ablest mythologians that they have sedulously recommended their names to the never-failing tuition of an eternal remembrance. The eldest child was a daughter, whose name was Vine; the next born was a boy, and his name was Fig tree; the third was called Walnut tree; the fourth Oak; the fifth Sorb-apple tree; the sixth Ash; the seventh Poplar; and the last had the name of Elm, who was the greatest surgeon in his time. I shall forbear to tell you how the juice or sap thereof, being poured and distilled within the ears, killeth every kind of vermin that by any manner of putrefaction cometh to be bred and engendered there, and destroyeth also any whatsoever other animal that shall have entered in thereat. If, likewise, you put a little of the said juice within a pail or bucket full of water, you shall see the water instantly turn and grow thick therewith, as if it were milk curds, whereof the virtue is so great that the water thus curded is a present remedy for horses subject to the colic, and such as strike at their own flanks. The root thereof well boiled mollifieth the joints, softeneth the hardness of shrunkin sinews, is every way comfortable to the nerves, and good against all cramps and convulsions, as likewise all cold and knotty gouts. If you would speedily heal a burning, whether occasioned by water or fire, apply thereto a little raw Pantagrue, that is to say, take it so as it cometh out of the ground, without bestowing any other preparation or composition upon it; but have a special care to change it for some fresher, in lieu thereof, as soon as you shall find it waxing dry upon the sore.

Without this herb, kitchens would be detested, the tables of dining-rooms abhorred, although there were great plenty and variety of most dainty and sumptuous dishes of meat set down upon them—and the choicest beds also, how richly soever adorned with gold, silver, amber, ivory, porphyry, and the mixture of most precious metals, would without it yield no delight or pleasure to the repositors in them. Without it millers could neither carry wheat, nor any other kind of corn, to the mill, nor would they be able to bring back from thence flour, or any other sort of meal whatsoever. Without it, how could the papers and writs of lawyers' clients be brought to the bar? Seldom is the mortar, lime, or plaster brought to the workhouse without it. Without it, how should the water be got out of a draw-well; in what case would tabellions, notaries, copyists, makers of counterpanes, writers, clerks, secretaries, scriveners, and such like persons be without it? Were it not for it, what would become of the toll-rates and rent-rolls? Would not the noble art of printing perish without it? Whereof could the chassis or paper windows be made? How should the bells be rung? The altars of Isis are adorned therewith, the Pastophorian priests are therewith clad and accoutred, and whole human nature covered and wrapped therein at its first position and production in and into this world. All the lanific trees of Seres, the bumbast and cotton bushes in the territories near the Persian Sea and Gulf of Bengala, the Arabian swans, together with the plants of Malta, do not all of them clothe, attire, and apparel so many persons as this one herb alone. Soldiers are now-a-days much better sheltered under it than they were in former times, when they lay in tents covered with skins. It overshadows the theatres and amphitheatres from the heat of a scorching sun. It begirdeth and encompasseth forests, chases, parks, copses, and groves, for the pleasure of hunters. It descendeth into the salt and fresh of both sea and river waters, for the profit of fishers. By it are boots of all sizes, buskins, gamashes, brodskins, gambados, shoes, pumps, slippers, and every cobbled ware wrought and made steadable for the use of man. By it the butt and rover bows are strung, the cross-bows bended, and the slings made fixed. And, as if it were an herb every whit as holy as the vervain, and revered by ghosts, spirits, hobgoblins, fiends, and phantoms, the bodies of deceased men are never buried without it.

I will proceed yet further. By the means of this fine herb the invisible substances are visibly stopped, arrested, taken, detained, and prisoner-like committed to their receptive gaols. Heavy and ponderous weights are by it heaved, lifted up, turned, veered, drawn, carried, and every way moved quickly, nimbly, and easily, to the great profit and emolument of human kind. When I perpend with myself these and such like marvellous effects of this wonderful herb, it seemeth strange unto me how the invention of so useful a practice did escape through so many by-past ages the knowledge of the ancient philosophers, considering the inestimable utility which from thence proceeded, and the immense labour which, without it, they did undergo in their pristine lucubrations. By virtue thereof, through the retention of some aerial gusts, are the huge barges, mighty galleons, the large floats, the Chiliander, the Myriander ships launched from their stations, and set agoing at the pleasure and arbitrement of their rulers, conders, and steersman. By the help thereof those remote nations, whom nature seemed so unwilling to have discovered to us, and so desirous to have kept them still in abscondito and hidden from us, that the ways through which their countries were to be reached unto, were not only totally unknown, but judged also to be altogether impermeable and inaccessible, are now arrived to us, and we to them.

Those voyages outreached the flights of birds, and far surpassed the scope of feathered fowls, how swift soever they had been on the wing, and notwithstanding that advantage which they have of us in swimming through the air. Taproban hath seen the heaths of Lapland, and both the Javas, the Riphæan mountains; wide distant Phebol shall see Theleme, and the Islanders drink of the flood of Euphrates. By it the chill-mouthed Boreas hath surveyed the parched mansions of the torrid Auster, and Eurus visited the regions which Zephyrus hath under his command; yea, in such sort have interviews been made, by the assistance of this sacred herb, that, maugre longitudes and latitudes, and all the variations of the zones, the Peræcian people, and Antoecian, Amphiscian, Heteroscian, and Periscian, have oft rendered and received mutual visits to and from other upon all the climates. These strange exploits bred such astonishment to the celestial intelligences, to all the marine and terrestria I gods, that they were on a sudden all afraid. From which amazement, when they saw how, by means of this blessed Pantagruelion, the Arctic people looked upon the Antarctic, scoured the Atlantic Ocean, passed the tropics, pushed through the torrid zone, measured all the zodiac, sported under the equinoctial, having both poles level with their horizon, they judged it high time to call a council for their own safety and preservation.

The Olympic gods, being all and each of them affrighted at the sight of such achievements, said Pantagruel hath shapen work enough for us, and put us more to a plunge, and nearer our wit's end, by this sole herb of his, than did of old the Aloidæ by overturning mountains. He very speedily is to be married, and shall have many children by his wife. It lies not in our power to oppose this destiny; for it hath passed through the hands and spindles of the Fatal Sisters, necessity's inexorable daughters. Who knows but by his sons may be found out an herb of such another virtue and prodigious energy as that by the aid thereof, in using it aright, according to their father's skill, they may contrive a way for human kind to pierce into the high ærian clouds, get up unto the spring-head of the hail, take an inspection of the snowy sources, and shut and open as they please the sluices from whence proceed the floodgates of the rain; then, prosecuting their ethereal voyage, they may step in unto the lightning work-house and shop, where all the thunderbolts are forged, where, seizing on the magazine of heaven, and storehouse of our warlike fire munition, they may discharge a bouncing peal or two of thundering ordnance, for joy of their arrival to these new supernal places, and, charging those tonitruous guns afresh, turn the whole force of that artillery wherein we most confided against ourselves. Then is it like they will set forward to invade the territories of the moon, whence, passing through both Mercury and Venus, the Sun will serve them for a torch, to show the way from Mars to Jupiter and Saturn. We shall not then be able to resist the impetuosity of their intrusion, nor put a stoppage to their entering in at all whatever regions, domiciles, or mansions of the spangled firmament they shall have any mind to see, to stay in, or to travel through for their recreation. All the celestial signs together, with the constellations of the fixed stars, will jointly be at their devotion then. Some will take up their lodging at the Ram, some at the Bull, and others at the Twins; some at the Crab, some at the Lion inn, and others at the sign of the Virgin; some at the Balance, others at the Scorpion, and others will be quartered at the Archer; some will be harboured at the Goat, some at the Water-pourer's sign, some at the Fishes; some will lie at the Crown, some at the Harp, some at the Golden Eagle and the Dolphin; some at the Flying Horse, some at the Ship, some at the Great, some at the Little Bear; and so throughout the glistening hostelries of the whole twinkling asteristic welkin. There will be sojourners come from the earth, who, longing after the taste of the sweet cream, of their own skimming off, from the best milk of all the dairy of the Galaxy, will set themselves at table down with us, drink of our uectar and ambrosia, and take to their own beds at night, for wives and concubines, our fairest goddesses, the only means whereby they can be deified. A junto hereupon being convocated, the better to consult upon the manner of obviating so dreadful a danger, Jove, sitting in his presidential throne, asked the votes of all the other gods, which, after a profound deliberation amongst themselves on all contingencies, they freely gave at last, and then resolved unanimously to withstand the shocks of all whatsoever sublunary assaults.

CHAPTER LII.

How a Certain Kind of Pantagruelion is of that Nature that the Fire is not able to consume it.

I HAVE already related to you great and admirable things ; but, if you might be induced to adventure upon the hazard of believing some other divinity of this sacred Pantagruelion, I very willingly would tell it you. Believe it if you will, or, otherwise, believe it not ; I care not which of them you do, they are both alike to me. It shall be sufficient for my purpose to have told you the truth, and the truth I will tell you. But to enter in thereat, because it is of a knaggy, difficult, and rugged access, this is the question which I ask of you. If I had put within this bottle two pints, the one of wine and the other of water, thoroughly and exactly mingled together, how would you unmix them ? After what manner would you go about to sever them, and separate the one liquor from the other, in such sort that you render me the water apart free from the wine, and the wine also pure, without the intermixture of one drop of water, and both of them in the same measure, quantity, and taste, that I had embottled them ? Or, to state the question otherwise. If your carmen and mariners, entrusted, for the provision of your houses, with the bringing of a certain considerable number of tuns, puncheons, pipes, barrels, and hogsheads of Graves wine, or of the wine of Orleans, Beaune, and Mirevaux, should drink out the half, and afterwards with water fill up the other empty halves of the vessels as full as before—as the Limosins use to do, in their carriages by wains and carts of the wines of Argenton and Sangaultier—after that, how would you part the water from the wine, and purify them both in such a case ? I understand you well enough. Your meaning is, that I must do it with an ivy funnel. That is written, it is true, and the verity thereof explored by a thousand experiments; you have learned to do this feat before, I see it. But those that have never known it, nor at any time have seen the like, would hardly believe that it were possible. Let us nevertheless proceed.

But put the case we were now living in the age of Sylla, Marius Cæsar, and other such Roman emperors, or that we were in the time of our ancient Druids, whose custom was to burn and calcine the dead bodies of their parents and lords, and that you had a mind to drink the ashes or cinders of your wives or fathers in the infused liquor of some good white wine, as Artemisia drunk the dust and ashes of her husband Mausolus; or, otherwise, that you did determine to have them reserved in some fine urn or reliquary pot; how would you save the ashes apart, and separate them from those other cinders and ashes into which the fuel of the funeral and bustuary fire hath been converted? Answer if you can. By my figgings, I believe it will trouble you so to do.

Well, I will dispatch, and tell you that, if you take of this celestial Pantagruelion so much as is needful to cover the body of the defunct, and after that you shall have enwrapped and bound therein, as hard and closely as you can, the corpse of the said deceased persons, and sewed up the folding-sheet with thread of the same stuff, throw it into the fire, how great or ardent soever it be, it matters not a straw, the fire through this Pantagruelion will burn the body and reduce to ashes the bones thereof, and the Pantagruelion shall be not only not consumed nor burnt, but also shall neither lose one atom of the ashes enclosed within it, nor receive one atom of the huge bustuary heap of ashes resulting from the blazing conflagration of things combustible laid round about it, but shall at last, when taken out of the fire, be fairer, whiter, and much cleaner than when you did put it in first. Therefore it is called Asbeston, which is as much as to say incombustible. Great plenty is to be found thereof in Carpasia, as likewise in the climate Dia Cyenes, at very easy rates. Oh, how rare and admirable a thing it is, that the fire, which devoureth, consumeth, and destroyeth all such things else, should cleanse, purge, and whiten this sole Pantagruelion Carpasian Asbeston! If you mistrust the verity of this relation, and demand for further confirmation of my assertion a visible sign, as the Jews and such incredulous infidels use to do, take a fresh egg, and orbicularly, or rather ovally, enfold it within this divine Pantagruelion. When it is so wrapped up, put it in the hot embers of a fire, how great or ardent soever it be, and, having left it there as long as you will, you shall at last, at your taking it out of the fire, find the egg roasted hard and, as it were, burnt, without any alteration, change, mutation, or so much as a calefaction of the sacred Pantagruelion. For less than a million of pounds sterling, modified, taken down, and amoderated to the twelfth part of one four pence half-penny farthing, you are to put it to a trial, and make proof thereof.

Do not think to overmatch me here, by paragoning with it, in the way of a more eminent comparison, the Salamander. That is a fib; for, albeit a little ordinary fire, such as is used in dining-rooms and chambers, gladden, cheer up, exhilarate and quicken it, yet may I warrantably enough assure that in the flaming fire of a furnace it will, like any other animated creature, be quickly suffocated, choked, consumed, and destroyed. We have seen experiments thereof, and Galen many ages ago hath clearly demonstrated and confirmed it, lib. 3 De Temperamentis, and Dioscorides maintaineth the same doctrine, lib. 2. Do not here instance, in competition with this sacred herb, the feather alum, or the wooden tower of Pyræus, which Lucius Sylla was never able to get burnt; for that Archelaus, governor of the town for Mithridates, King of Pontus, had plastered it all over on the outside with the said alum. Nor would I have you to compare therewith the herb which Alexander Cornelius called Eonem, and said that it had some resemblance with that oak which bears the misletoe, and that it could neither be consumed nor receive any manner of prejudice by fire, nor by water, no more than the misletoe, of which was built, said he, the so renowned ship Argos. Search where you please for those that will believe it. I in that point desire to be excused. Neither would I wish you to parallel therewith—although I cannot deny but that it is of a very marvellous nature—that sort of tree which groweth along the mountains of Briançon and Ambrun, which produceth out of its root the good Agaric. From its body it yieldeth unto us a so excellent rosin that Galen hath been bold to equal it unto the turpentine. Upon the delicate leaves thereof it retaineth for our use that sweet heavenly honey which is called the manna; and, although it be of a gummy, oily, fat, and greasy substance, it is notwithstanding unconsumable by any fire. It is in the Greek and Latin called Larix. The Alpinese name is Melze. The Antenorides and Venetians term it Larége, which gave occasion to that castle in Piedmont to receive the denomination of Larignum, by putting Julius Cæsar to a stand at his return from amongst the Gauls.

Julius Cæsar commanded all the yeomen, boors, hinds, and other inhabitants in, near unto, and about the Alps and Piedmont, to bring all manner of victuals and provision for an army to those places, which on the military road he had appointed to receive them for the use of his marching soldiery. To which ordinance all of them were obedient, save only those as were with the garrison of Larignum, who, trusting in the natural strength of the place, would not pay their contribution. The emperor, purposing to chastise them for their refusal, caused his whole army to march straight towards that castle, before the gate whereof was erected a tower built of huge big spars and rafters of the larch tree, fast bound together with pins and pegs of the same wood, and interchangeably laid on one another after the fashion of a pile or stack of timber, set up in the fabric thereof to such an apt and convenient height that from the parapet above the portcullis they thought with stones and leavers to beat off and drive away such as should approach thereto.

When Cæsar had understood that the chief defence of those within the castle did consist in stones and clubs, and that it was not an easy matter to sling, hurl, dart, throw, or cast them so far as to hinder the approaches, he forthwith commanded his men to throw great store of bavins, faggots, and fascines round about the castle, and, when they had made the heap of a competent height, to put them all in a fair fire, which was thereupon incontinently done. The fire put amidst the faggots was so great and so high that it covered the whole castle, that they might well imagine the tower would thereby be altogether burnt to dust, and demolished. Nevertheless, contrary to all their hopes and expectations, when the flame ceased, and that the faggots were quite burnt and consumed, the tower appeared as whole, sound, and entire as ever. Cæsar, after a serious consideration, had thereof commanded a compass to be taken without the distance of a stonecast from the castle, round about it, there, with ditches and entrenchments to form a blockade; which when the Larignans understood, they rendered themselves upon terms. And then, by a relation from them, it was that Cæsar learned the admirable nature and virtue of this wood, which of itself produceth neither fire, flame, nor coal, and would, therefore, in regard of that rare quality of incombustibility, have been admitted into this rank and degree of a true Pantagrueion plant; and that so much the rather for that Pantagrue directed that all the gates, doors, angiports, windows, gutters, fretted and embowed ceilings, cans, and other whatsoever wooden furniture in the abbey of Theleme, should be all materiated of this kind of timber. He likewise caused to cover therewith the sterns, stems, cook-rooms or laps, hatchets, decks, courses, bends, and walls of his carricks, ships, galleons, galleys, brigantines, foysts, frigates, crears, barks, floyts, pinks, piunaces, hoys, catches, capers, and other vessels of his Thallassian arsenal, were it not that the wood or timber of the larch tree, being put within a large and ample furnace, full of huge vehemently flaming fire proceeding from the fuel of other sorts and kinds of wood, cometh at last to be corrupted, consumed, dissipated, and destroyed, as are stones in a lime-kiln. But this Pantagrueion Asbeston is rather by the fire renewed and cleansed than by the flames thereof consumed or changed

Therefore,

Arabians, Indians, Sabæans,
Sing not, in hymns and Io Pæans,
Your incense, myrrh, or ebony.
Come here, a nobler plant to see,
And carry home, at any rate,
Some seed, that you may propagate.
If in your soil, it takes to heaven
A thousand thousand thanks be given;
And say with France, it goodly goes,
Where the Pantagrue lion grows.

TREATING OF THE HEROIC DEEDS AND SAYINGS OF THE GOOD PANTAGRUEL.

---

THE AUTHOR'S EPISTLE DEDICATORY,

TO THE MOST ILLUSTRIOUS PRINCE, AND MOST REVEREND LORD ODET, CARDINAL DE CHASTILLON.

You are not unacquainted, most illustrious prince, how often I have been, and am daily pressed and required by great numbers of eminent persons to proceed in the Pantagruelian fables; they tell me that many languishing, sick, and disconsolate persons, perusing them, have deceived their grief, passed their time merrily, and been inspired with new joy and comfort. I commonly answer that I aimed not at glory and applause when I diverted myself with writing, but only designed to give by my pen, to the absent who labour under affliction, that little help which at all times I willingly strive to give to the present that stand in need of my art and service. Sometimes I at large relate to them how Hippocrates, in several places, and particularly in lib. 6 Epidem., describing the institution of the physician his disciple, and also Soranus of Ephesus, Oribasius, Galen, Hali Abbas, and other authors, have descended to particulars, in the prescription of his motions, deportment, looks, countenance, gracefulness, civility, cleanliness of face, clothes, beard, hair, hands, mouth, even his very nails, as if he were to play the part of a lover in some comedy, or enter the lists to fight some potent enemy. And indeed the practice of physic is properly enough compared by Hippocrates to a fight, and also to a farce acted between three persons, the patient, the physician, and the disease. Which passage has sometimes put me in mind of Julia's saying to Augustus her father. One day she came before him, in a very gorgeous, loose, lascivious dress, which very much displeased him, though he did not much discover his discontent. The next day she put on another, and, in a modest garb, such as the chaste Roman ladies wore, came into his presence. The kind father could not then forbear expressing the pleasure which he took to see her so much altered, and said to her, "Oh! how much more this garb becomes, and is commendable in the daughter of Augustus." But she, having her excuse ready, answered: "This day, sir, I dressed myself to please my father's eye; yesterday, to gratify that of my husband." Thus disguised in looks and garb, nay even, as formerly was the fashion, with a rich and pleasant gown with four sleeves, which was called philonium, according to Petrus Alexandrinus in 6 Epidem., a physician might answer to such as might find the metamorphosis indecent: "Thus have I accoutred myself, not that I am proud of appearing in such a dress, but for the sake of my patient, whom alone I wholly design to please, and no ways offend or dissatisfy." There is also a passage in our father Hippocrates, in the book I have named, which causes some to sweat, dispute, and labour: not indeed to know whether the physician's frowning, discontented, and morose Catonian look render the patient sad, and his joyful, serene, and pleasing countenance rejoice him, for experience teaches us that this is most certain; but whether such sensations of grief or pleasure are produced by the apprehension of the patient observing his motions and qualities in his physician, and drawing from thence conjectures of the end and catastrophe of his disease, as by his pleasing look, joyful and desirable events, and by his sorrowful and unpleasing air, sad and dismal consequences; and whether these sensations be produced by a transfusion of the serene or gloomy, ærial or terrestrial, joyful or melancholic spirits of the physician into the person of the patient, as is the opinion of Plato and Averroes.

Above all things, the fore-cited authors have given particular directions to physicians about the words, discourse, and converse which they ought to have with their patients: every one aiming at one point, that is, to rejoice them without offending God, and in no ways whatsoever to vex or displease them. Which causes Herophilus much to blame the physician Callianax, who, being asked by a patient of his, "Shall I die?" impudently made him this answer,—

"Patroclus died, whom all allow,
By much a better man than you."

Another, who had a mind to know the state of his distemper, asking him, after our merry Patelin's way: "Well, doctor, does not my water tell you I shall die?" He foolishly answered: "No; if Latona, the mother of those lovely twins, Phœbus and Diana, begot thee." Galen, lib. 4, Comment. 6, Epidem., blames much also Quintus his tutor, who, a certain nobleman of Rome, his patient, saying to him, "You have been at breakfast, my master, your breath smells of wine," answered arrogantly, "Yours smells of fever: which is the better smell of the two, wine or a putrid fever?" But the calumny of certain cannibals, misanthropes, perpetual eavesdroppers, has been so foul and excessive against me, that it had conquered my patience, and I had resolved not to write one jot more. For the least of their detractions were that my books are all stuffed with various heresies, of which, nevertheless, they could not show one single instance: much, indeed, of comical and facetious fooleries, neither offending God nor the king (and truly I own they are the only subject and only theme of these books), but of heresy, not a word, unless they interpreted wrong, and against all use of reason and common language, what I had rather suffer a thousand deaths, if it were possible, than have thought; as who should make bread to be stone, a fish to be a serpent, and an egg to be a scorpion. This, my lord, emboldened me once to tell you, as I was complaining of it in your presence, that if I did not esteem myself a better Christian than they show themselves towards me, and if my life, writings, words, nay, thoughts, betrayed to me one single spark of heresy, or I should in a detestable manner fall into the snares of the spirit of detraction, Διάβολος, who, by their means, raises such crimes against me, I would then, like the phoenix, gather dry wood, kindle a fire, and burn myself in the midst of it. You were then pleased to say to me that King Francis, of eternal memory, had been made sensible of those false accusations. and that having caused my books (mine, I say, because several, false and infamous, have been wickedly laid to me) to be carefully and distinctly read to him by the most learned and faithful anagnost in this kingdom, he had not found any passage suspicious; and that he abhorred a certain envious, ignorant, hypocritical informer, who grounded a mortal heresy on an n put instead of an m by the carelessness of the printers.

As much was done by his son, our most gracious, virtuous, and blessed sovereign, Henry, whom Heaven long preserve: so that he granted you his royal privilege, and particular protection for me, against my slandering adversaries.

You kindly condescended since to confirm me these happy news at Paris; and also lately, when you visited my Lord Cardinal du Bellay, who, for the benefit of his health, after a lingering distemper, was retired to Saint Maur, that place (or rather paradise) of salubrity, serenity, conveniency, and all desirable country pleasures.

Thus, my lord, under so glorious a patronage, I am emboldened once more to draw my pen, undaunted now and secure, with hopes that you will still prove to me, against the power of detraction, a second Gallic Hercules in learning, prudence, and eloquence; an Alexicacos in virtue, power, and authority: you, of whom I may truly say what the wise monarch Solomon saith of Moses, that great prophet and captain of Israel, Ecclesiast. xlv. A man fearing and loving God, who found favour in the sight of all flesh, well-beloved both of God and man; whose memorial is blessed. God made him like to the glorious saints, and magnified him so that his enemies stood in fear of him, and for him made wonders; made him glorious in the sight of kings, gave him a commandment for his people, and by him showed his light; he sanctified him in his faithfulness, and meekness, and chose him out of all men. By him he made us to hear his voice, and caused by him the law of life and knowledge to be given.

Accordingly, if I shall be so happy as to hear any one commend those merry composures, they shall be adjured by me to be obliged, and pay their thanks to you alone, as also to offer their prayers to Heaven for the continuance and increase of your greatness, and to attribute no more to me than my humble and ready obedience to your commands; for by your most honourable encouragement, you at once have inspired me with spirit, and with invention, and without you my heart had failed me, and the fountain head of my animal spirits had been dry. May the Lord keep you in his blessed mercy.—My Lord, your Most Humble and Most Devoted Servant,

FRANCIS RABELAIS, Physician.

THE AUTHOR'S PROLOGUE.

Good people. God save and keep you! Where are you? I can't see you. Stay—I'll saddle my nose with spectacles—oh, oh! it will be fair anon, I see you. Well, you have had a good vintage, they say: this is no bad news to Frank, you may swear. You have got an infallible cure against thirst: rarely performed of you, my friends! You, your wives, children, friends, and families, are in as good case as hearts can wish; it is well, it is as I would have it: God be praised for it, and if such be his will, may you long be so. For my part, I am thereabouts, thanks to his blessed goodness; and by the means of a little Pantagruellism (which you know is a certain jollity of mind, pickled in the scorn of fortune), you see me now hale and cheery, as sound as a bell, and ready to drink, if you will. Would you know why I'm thus, good people? I will even give you a positive answer—Such is the Lord's will, which I obey and revere; it being said in his word, in great derision to the physician neglectful of his own health, Physician, heal thyself.

Galen had some knowledge of the Bible, and had conversed with the Christians of his time, as appears lib. 11. De Usu Partuum: lib. 2, De Differentiis Pulsuum, cap. 3, and ibid. lib. 3, cap. 2, and lib. De Rerum Affectibus (if it be Galen's). Yet it was not for any such veneration of holy writ that he took care of his own health. No, it was for fear of being twitted with the saying so well known among physicians—

Ἰατρὸς ἄλλων αὐτὸς ἔλκεσι βρύων.

“He boasts of healing poor and rich,
Yet is himself all over itch.”

This made him boldly say that he did not desire to be esteemed a physician, if from his twenty-eighth year to his old age he had not lived in perfect health, except some ephemeral fevers, of which he soon rid himself; yet he was not naturally of the soundest temper, his stomach being evidently bad. Indeed, as he saith, lib. 5, De Sanitate tuenda, that physician will hardly be thought very careful of the health of others who neglects his own. Asclepiades boasted yet more than this, for he said that he had artiled with fortune not to be reputed a physician, if he could be said to have been sick, since he began to practise physic, to his latter age, which he reached, lusty in all his members, and victorious over fortune, till at last the old gentleman unluckily tumbled down from the top of a certain ill-propped and rotten staircase, and so there was an end of him.

If by some disaster health is fled from your worships to the right or to the left, above or below, before or behind, within or without, far or near, on this side or the other side, wheresoever it be, may you presently, with the help of the Lord, meet with it. Having found it, may you immediately claim it, seize it, and secure it. The law allows it; the king would have it so; nay, you have my advice for it. Neither more nor less than the law-makers of old did fully empower a master to claim and seize his runaway servant wherever he might be found. Ods bodikins, is it not written and warranted by the ancient customs of this so noble, so rich, so flourishing realm of France, that the dead seizes the quick? See what has been declared very lately in that point by that learned, wise, courteous, humane, and just civilian, Andrew Tiraqueau, counsellor of the great, victorious, and triumphant Henry II., in the most honourable court of Parliament at Paris. Health is our life, as Aripbron the Sicyonian wisely has it; without health life is not life, it is not living life: 'ΑΒΪΟΣ ΒΪΟΣ, ΒΪΟΣ ΑΒΪΩΤΟΣ. Without health life is only a languishment, and an image of death. Therefore, you that want your health, that is to say, that are dead, seize the quick; secure life to yourselves, that is to say, health.

I have this hope in the Lord, that he will hear our supplications, considering with what faith and zeal we pray, and that he will grant this our wish, because it is moderate and mean. Mediocrity was held by the ancient sages to be golden, that is to say, precious, praised by all men, and pleasing in all places. Read the sacred Bible, you will find the prayers of those who asked moderately were never unanswered. For example, little dapper Zaccheus, whose body and relics the monks of Saint Garlick, near Orleans, boast of having, and nicknamed him Saint Sylvanus; he only wished to see our blessed Saviour near Jerusalem. It was but a small request, and no more than anybody then might pretend to. But, alas! he was but low-built; and one of so diminutive a size, among the crowd, could not so much as get a glimpse of him. Well, then, he struts, stands on tip-toes, bustles, and bestirs his stumps, shoves, and makes way, and with much ado clambers up a sycamore. Upon this the Lord, who knew his sincere affection, presented himself to his sight, and was not only seen by him, but heard also; nay, what is more, he came to his house, and blessed his family.

One of the sons of the prophets in Israel felling wood near the river Jordan, his hatchet forsook the helve, and fell to the bottom of the river, so he prayed to have it again (it was but a small request, mark ye me), and having a strong faith, he did not throw the hatchet after the helve, as some spirits of contradiction say, by way of scandalous blunder, but the helve after the hatchet, as you all properly have it. Presently two great miracles were seen; up springs the hatchet from the bottom of the water, and fixes itself to its old acquaintance the helve. Now had he wished to coach it to heaven in a fiery chariot like Elias, to multiply in seed like Abraham, be as rich as Job, strong as Samson, and beautiful as Absalom, would he have obtained it, do you think? In troth, my friends, I question it very much.

Now I talk of moderate wishes in point of hatchet but (harkee me, be sure you do not forget when we ought to drink), I will tell you what is written among the apologues of wise Æsop the Frenchman. I mean the Phrygian and Trojan, as Max. Planudes makes him; from which people, according to the most faithful chroniclers, the noble French are descended. Ælian writes that he was of Thrace; and Agathias, after Herodotus, that he was of Samos; it is all one to Frank.

In his time lived a poor, honest country fellow of Gravot, Tom Wellhung by name, a wood-cleaver by trade, who in that low drudgery made shift so to pick up a sorry livelihood. It happened that he lost his hatchet. Now tell me who ever had more cause to be vexed than poor Tom? Alas! his whole estate and life depended on his hatchet; by his hatchet he earned many a fair penny of the best woodmongers or log merchants, among whom he went a jobbing; for want of his hatchet he was like to starve; and had death but met him six days after without a hatchet, the grim fiend would have mowed him down in the twinkling of a bed-staff. In this sad case he began to be in a heavy taking, and called upon Jupiter with the most eloquent prayers—for you know necessity was the mother of eloquence. With the whites of his eyes turned up towards heaven, down on his marrow-bones, his arms reared high, his fingers stretched wide, and his head bare, the poor wretch, without ceasing, was roaring out, by way of litany, at every repetition of his supplications, “My hatchet! lord Jupiter, my hatchet! my hatchet! only my hatchet, oh, Jupiter, or money to buy another, and nothing else! alas! my poor hatchet!”

Jupiter happened then to be holding a grand council about certain urgent affairs, and old gammer Cybele was just giving her opinion, or, if you would rather have it so, it was young Phœbus the beau; but, in short, Tom’s outcries and lamentations were so loud that they were heard with no small amazement at the council-board by the whole consistory of the gods. “What a devil have we below,” quoth Jupiter, “that howls so horridly? By the mud of Styx, have not we had all along, and have not we here still enough to do to set to rights a world of damned puzzling businesses of consequence? We made an end of the fray between Presthan, King of Persia, and Soliman the Turkish Emperor; we have stopped up the passages between the Tartars and the Muscovites; answered the Xeriff’s petition; done the same to that of Golgots Rays; the state of Parma’s despatched; so is that of Maydenburg, that of Mirandola, and that of Africa, that town on the Mediterranean which we call Aphrodisium; Tripoli, by carelessness, has got a new master; her hour was come.

“In yonder corner are the Saxons, Easterlings, Ostrogoths, and Germans, nations formerly invincible, but now aberkeids, bridled, curbed, and brought under by a paltry, diminutive, crippled fellow; they ask us revenge, relief, restitution of their former good sense, and ancient liberty.

“But what shall we do with this same Ramus, and this Galland, with a pox to them, who, surrounded with a swarm of their scullions, blackguard ragamuffins, sizers, vouchers, and stipulators, set together by the ears the whole university of Paris. I am in a sad quandary about it, and for the heart’s blood of me cannot tell yet with whom of the two to side.

“Both seem to me notable fellows, and as true cods as ever pissed. The one has rose nobles, I say fine and weighty ones; the other would gladly have some too. The one knows something; the other is no dunce. The one loves the better sort of men; the other is beloved by them. The one is an old, cunning fox; the other with tongue and pen, tooth and nail, falls foul on the ancient orators and philosophers, and barks at them like a cur.

"What thinkest thou of it, say, thou bawdy Priapus? I have found thy council just before now, et habet tua mentula mentem."

"King Jupiter," answered Priapus, standing up and taking off his cowl, his snout uncased and reared up, fiercely and stiffly propped, "since you compare the one to a yelping, snarling cur, and the other to sly Reynard the fox, my advice is, with submission, that without fretting or puzzling your brains any further about them, without any more ado, even serve them both as, in the days of yore, you did the dog and the fox." "How?" asked Jupiter; "when? who were they? where was it?" "You have a rare memory, for aught I see," returned Priapus. "This right worshipful father Bacchus, whom we have here nodding with his crimson phiz, to be revenged on the Thebans, had got a fairy fox, who, whatever mischief he did, was never to be caught or wronged by any beast that wore a head.

"The noble Vulcan here present had framed a dog of Monesian brass, and, with long puffing and blowing, put the spirit of life into him: he gave it to you, you gave it your Miss Europa, Miss Europa gave it Minos, Minos gave it Procris, Procris gave it Cephalus. He was also of the fairy kind, so that, like the lawyers of our age, he was too hard for all other sorts of creatures; nothing could escape the dog. Now who should happen to meet but these two. What do you think they did? Dog by his destiny was to take fox, and fox by his fate was not to be taken.

"The case was brought before your council: you protested that you would not act against the fates; and the fates were contradictory. In short, the end and result of the matter was that to reconcile two contradictions was an impossibility in nature. The very pang put you into a sweat; some drops of which happening to light on the earth, produceth what the mortals call cabbage. All our noble consistory, for want of a categorical resolution, were seized with such a horrid thirst that above seventy-eight hogsheads of nectar were swilled down at that sitting. At last you took my advice, and transmogrified them into stones; and immediately got rid of your perplexity, and a truce with thirst was proclaimed through this vast Olympus. This was the year of flabby cods, near Teumessus, between Thebes and Chalcis.

"After this manner, it is my opinion that you should petrify this dog and this fox. The metamorphosis will not be incongruous, for they both bear the name of Peter. And because, according to the Limosin proverb, 'To make an oven's mouth there must be three stones,' you may associate them with Master Peter du Coignet, whom you formerly petrified for the same cause. Then those three dead pieces shall be put in an equilateral trigone, somewhere in the great temple at Paris—in the middle of the porch, if you will—there to perform the office of extinguishers, and with their noses put out the lighted candles, torches, tapers, and flambeaux: since, while they lived, they still lighted, ballock-like, the fire of faction, division, ballock sects, and wrangling among those idle bearded boys the students. And this will be an everlasting monument to show that those puny, self-conceited pedants, ballock-framers, were rather contemned than condemned by you. Dixi, I have said my say."

"You deal too kindly by them," said Jupiter, "for aught I see, Monsieur Priapus. You do not use to be so kind to everybody, let me tell you; for as they seek to eternise their names, it would be much better for them to be thus changed into hard stones than to return to earth and putrefaction. But now to other matters. Yonder behind us, towards the Tuscan Sea, and the neighbourhood of Mount Appenine, do you see what tragedies are stirred up by certain topping ecclesiastical bullies? This hot fit will last its time, like the Limosins's ovens, and then will be cooled, but not so fast.

"We shall have sport enough with it; but I foresee one inconveniency; for methinks we have but little store of thunder ammunition since the time that you, my fellow gods, for your pastime, lavished them away to bombard new Antioch, by my particular permission; as since, after your example, the stout champions, who had undertaken to hold the fortress of Dindenarois against all comers, fairly wasted their powder with shooting at sparrows; and then not having wherewith to defend themselves in time of need, valiantly surrendered to the enemy, who were already packing up their awls, full of madness and despair, and thought on nothing but a shameful retreat. Take care this be remedied, son Vulcan: rouse up your drowsy cyclopes, Asteropes, Brontes, Arges, Polyphemus, Steropes, Pyracmon, and so forth; set them at work, and make them drink as they ought.

"Never spare liquor to such as are at hot work. Now let us despatch this bawling fellow below. You, Mercury, go see who it is, and know what he wants." Mercury looked out at heaven's trap-door, through which, as I am told, they hear what is said here below. By the way, one might well enough mistake it for the scuttle of a ship; though Icaromenippus said it was like the mouth of a well. The light-heeled deity saw that it was honest Tom, who asked for his lost hatchet; and accordingly he made his report to the synod. "Marry," said Jupiter, "we are finely helped up, as if we had now nothing else to do here but to restore lost hatchets. Well, he must have it then, for all this, for so it is written in the book of fate (do you hear?) as well as if it was worth the whole Duchy of Milan. The truth is, the fellow's hatchet is as much to him as a kingdom to a king. Come, come, let no more words be scattered about it, let him have his hatchet again."

Now, let us make an end of the difference betwixt the levites and mole-catchers of Landerousse. Whereabouts were we? Priapus was standing in the chimney-corner, and having heard what Mercury had reported, said in a most courteous and jovial manner: "King Jupiter, while by your order and particular favour I was garden-keeper-general on earth, I observed that this word hatchet is equivocal to many things; for it signifies a certain instrument by the means of which men fell and cleave timber. It also signifies (at least I am sure it did formerly) a female soundly and frequently thumpthumpriggleticketwiddle-toyed. Thus I perceived that every cock of the game used to call his doxy his hatchet; for with that same tool (this he said lugging out and exhibiting his nine-inch knocker) they so strongly and resolutely shove and drive in their helves, that the females remain free from a fear epidemical amongst their sex, viz., that from the bottom of the male's belly the instrument should dangle at his heel for want of such feminine props. And I remember (for I have a member, and a memory too, ay, and a fine memory, large enough to fill a butter-firkin) I remember, I say, that one day of tubilustre [horn-fair], at the festivals of good-man Vulcan in May, I heard Josquin Des Prez, Ockeghem, Hobrecht, Agricola, Brumel, Camelin, Vigoris, de la Fage, Bruyer, Prioris, Seguin, de la Rue, Midy, Moulu, Mouton, Gascogne, Loysel, Compere, Penet, Fevin, Rousée, Richard Fort, Rousseau, Consillion, Constantio Festi, Jacquet Bercan, melodiously singing the following catch on a pleasant green,—

' Long John to bed went to his bride,
 And laid a mallet by his side:
 "What means this mallet, John?" saith she;
 "Why, it is to wedge thee home," quoth he.
 "Alas!" cried she, "the man's a fool:
 What need you use a wooden tool?
 When lusty John does to me come,
 He never shoves but with his bum.'

"Nine Olympiads and an intercalary year after (I have a rare member, I would say memory; but I often make blunders in the symbolisation and colligance of those two words) I heard Adrian Villart, Gombert, Janequin, Arcadet, Claudin, Certon, Manchicourt, Auxerre, Villiers, Sandrin, Sohier, Hesdin, Morales, Passereau, Maille, Maillart, Jacotin, Heurteur, Verdelot, Carpentras, l'Heritier, Cadeac, Doublet, Vermont, Bouteiller, Lupi, Pagnier, Millet, du Moulin, Alaire, Maraut, Morpain, Gendre, and other merry lovers of music, in a private garden, under some fine shady trees, round about a bulwark of flagons, gammons, pasties, with several coated quails, and laced mutton, waggishly singing—

‘Since tools without their hafts are usless lumber,
And hatchets without helves are of that number;
That one may go in t’other, and may match it,
P’ll be the helve, and thou shalt be the hatchet.’

“Now would I know what kind of hatchet this bawling Tom wants? This threw all the venerable gods and goddesses into a fit of laughter, like any microcosm of flies, and even set limping Vulcan a hopping and jumping smoothly three or four times for the sake of his dear. “Come, come,” said Jupiter to Mercury, “run down immediately, and cast at the poor fellow’s feet three hatchets; his own, another of gold, and a third of massy silver, all of one size; then having left it to his will to take his choice, if he take his own, and be satisfied with it, give him the other two; if he take another, chop his head off with his own; and henceforth serve me all those losers of hatchets after that manner.” Having said this, Jupiter, with an awkward turn of his head, like a jackanapes swallowing of pills, made so dreadful a phiz that all the vast Olympus quaked again. Heaven’s foot-messenger, thanks to his low-crowned, narrow-brimmed hat, his plume of feathers, heel-pieces, and running stick with pigeon wings, flings himself out at heaven’s wicket, through the empty deserts of the air, and in a trice nimbly alights on the earth, and throws at friend Tom’s feet the three hatchets, saying unto him: “Thou hast bawled long enough to be a-dry. Thy prayers and request are granted by Jupiter; see which of these three is thy hatchet, and take it away with thee.” Wellhung lifts up the golden hatchet, peeps upon it, and finds it very heavy, then, staring on Mercury, cries, “Codszouks, this is none of mine; I will not have it.” The same he did with the silver one, and, said, “It is not this neither; you may even take them again.” At last he takes up his own hatchet, examines the end of the helve, and finds his mark there; then, ravished with joy, like a fox that meets some straggling poultry, and sneering from the tip of his nose, he cried, “By the mass, this is my hatchet, master god; if you will leave it me, I will sacrifice to you a very good and huge pot of milk, brim full, covered with fine strawberries, next ides, i.e., the 15th of May.”

“Honest fellow,” said Mercury, “I leave it thee; take it; and because thou hast wished and chosen moderately, in point of hatchet, by Jupiter’s command I give thee these two others.

Thou hast now wherewith to make thyself rich; be honest." Honest Tom gave Mercury a whole cartload of thanks, and revered the most great Jupiter. His old hatchet he fastens close to his leathern girdle, and girds it above his breech like Martin of Cambray; the two others, being more heavy, he lays on his shoulder. Thus he plods on, trudging over the fields, keeping a good countenance amongst his neighbours and fellow-parishioners with one merry saying or other after Patelin's way. The next day, having put on a clean white jacket, he takes on his back the two precious hatchets, and comes to Chinon, the famous city, noble city, ancient city, yea, the first city in the world, according to the judgment and assertion of the most learned Massorets. At Chinon he turned his silver hatchet into fine testons, crown pieces, and other white cash; his golden hatchet into fine angels, curious ducats, substantial ridders, spankers, and rose nobles; then with them purchases a good number of farms, barns, houses, out-houses, thatched houses, stables, meadows, orchards, fields, vineyards, woods, arable lands, pastures, ponds, mills, gardens, nurseries, oxen, cows, sheep, goats, swine, hogs, asses, horses, hens, cocks, capons, chickens, geese, ganders, ducks, drakes, and a world of all other necessaries, and in a short time became the richest man in the country, nay even richer than that limping scrape-good Maulevrier. His brother bumpkins and the other yeomen and country-puts thereabouts, perceiving his good fortune, were not a little amazed, insomuch that their former pity of Tom was soon changed into an envy of his so great and unexpected rise; and as they could not for their souls devise how this came about, they made it their business to pry up and down, and lay their heads together to inquire, seek, and inform themselves by what means, in what place, on what day, what hour, how, why, and wherefore, he had come by his great treasure.

At last, hearing it was by losing his hatchet, "Ha, ha!" said they, "was there no more to do but to lose a hatchet to make us rich? Mum for that; it is as easy as pissing a bed, and will cost but little. Are then at this time the revolutions of the heavens, the constellations of the firmament, and aspects of the planets such that whosoever shall lose a hatchet shall immediately grow rich? Ha, ha, ha! by Jove, you shall even be lost, and it please you, my dear hatchet." With this they all fairly lost their hatchets out of hand. The devil of one that had a hatchet left; he was not his mother's son that did not lose his hatchet. No more was wood felled or cleaved in that country through want of hatchets. Nay, the Æsopian apologue even saith that certain petty country gents of the lower class, who had sold Wellbung their little mill and little field, to have wherewithal to make a figure at the next muster, having been told that his treasure was come to him by this only means, sold the only badge of their gentility, their swords, to purchase hatchets to go lose them, as the silly clodpates did, in hopes to gain store of chink by that loss.

You would have truly sworn they had been a parcel of your petty spiritual userers Rome-bound, selling their all, and borrowing of others to buy store of mandates, a pennyworth of a new-made pope.

Now they cried out and brayed, and prayed and bawled, and invoked Jupiter. "My hatchet! my hatchet! Jupiter, my hatchet!" on this side; "my hatchet!" on that side; "my hatchet! ho, ho, ho, ho, Jupiter, my hatchet!" The air round about rung again with the cries and howlings of these rascally losers of hatchets.

Mercury was nimble in bringing them hatchets; to each offering that which he had lost, as also another of gold, and a third of silver.

Every he still was for that of gold, giving thanks in abundance to the great giver, Jupiter; but in the very nick of time that they bowed and stooped to take it from the ground, whip, in a trice, Mercury looped off their heads, as Jupiter had commanded; and of heads thus cut off the number was just equal to that of the lost hatchets.

You see how it is now; you see how it goes with those who in the simplicity of their hearts wish and desire with moderation. Take warning by this, all you greedy, fresh-water shirks, who scorn to wish for anything under ten thousand pounds; and do not for the future run on impudently, as I have sometimes heard you wishing, "Would to God I had now one hundred seventy-eight millions of gold! Oh! how I should tickle it off." The deuce on you, what more might a king, an emperor, or a pope wish for? For that reason, indeed, you see that after you have made such hopeful wishes, all the good that comes to you of it is the itch or the scab, and not a cross in your breeches to scare the devil that tempts you to make these wishes; no more than those two mumpers, wishers after the custom of Paris; one of whom only wished to have in good old gold as much as hath been spent, bought, and sold in Paris, since its first foundations were laid, to this hour; all of it valued at the price, sale, and rate of the dearest year in all that space of time. Do you think the fellow was bashful? Had he eaten sour plums unpeeled? Were his teeth on edge, I pray you? The other wished our lady's church brimful of steel needles, from the floor to the top of the roof, and to have as many ducats as might be crammed into as many bags as might be sewed with each and every one of these needles, till they were all either broke at the point or eye. This is to wish with a vengeance! What think you of it? What did they get by it, in your opinion? Why at night both my gentlemen had kibed-heels, a tetter in the chin, a churchyard cough in the lungs, a catarrh in the throat, a swingeing boil at the rump, and the devil of one musty crust of a brown george the poor dogs had to scour their grinders with. Wish, therefore, for mediocrity, and it shall be given unto you, and over and above yet; that is to say, provided you bestir yourself manfully, and do your best in the meantime.

Ay, but say you, God might as soon have given me seventy-eight thousand as the thirteenth part of one-half: for he is omnipotent, and a million of gold is no more to him than one farthing. Oh, oh! pray tell me who taught you to talk at this rate of the power and predestination of God, poor silly people? Peace, tush, st, st, st! fall down before his sacred face, and own the nothingness of your nothing.

Upon this, oh ye that labour under the affliction of the gout, I ground my hopes, firmly believing, that if it so pleases the divine goodness, you shall obtain health, since you wish and ask for nothing else, at least for the present. Well, stay yet a little longer with half an ounce of patience.

The Genoese do not use, like you, to be satisfied with wishing health alone, when after they have all the live-long morning been in a brown study, talked, pondered, ruminated, and resolved in the counting-houses of whom and how they may squeeze the ready, and who by their craft must be hooked in, wheedled, bubbled, sharpened, overreached, and choused, they go to the exchange, and greet one another with a Sanità et guadagno messer; health and gain to you, sir. Health alone will not go down with the greedy curmudgeons; they over and above must wish for gain, with a pox to them; ay, and for the fine crowns or scudi di Guadaigne: whence, heaven be praised, it happens many a time, that the silly wishers and woulders are baulked, and get neither.

Now, my lads, as you hope for good health, cough once aloud with lungs of leather, take me off three swingeing bumpers, prick up your ears, and you shall hear me tell wonders of the noble and good Pantagruel.

ON THE AUTHOR'S PROLOGUE.—The main design of this prologue is to teach us to be moderate in our wishes. The author brings several examples to prove what advantages arise from it; particularly he makes use of a fable, in which (after some long but most diverting excursions) the moderation of a poor country fellow, who had lost his hatchet, and wished only to have it again, was largely rewarded; and others, who lost theirs on purpose, to be thus made rich, were undone. This is thought by some to mean a gentleman of Poictou, who came to Paris with his wife about some business, where Francis the First fell in love with her; and having bestowed large sums of money on the husband, who some time after returned into the country, some of the neighbouring gentlemen, who had handsome wives or daughters, made their appearance with them at court, in hopes of the like fortune, but, instead of it, were forced to sneak into the country, after they had spent their estates, which was all they got for their pains.

Jupiter is brought in complaining of Ramus and Galland, who, surrounded with a swarm of their scullions, ragamuffins, sizers, vouchers, etc., set together by the ears the whole university of Paris. Petrus Ramus, or de la Ramée, was royal philosophy and oratory professor at that time, and Petrus Gallandus, or Galland, royal Greek professor; both were learned men, and Ramus particularly famous for rhetoric and oratory; he also wrote three books of dialectic institutions. But what divided the university was his elegant but too passionate animadversions on Aristotle's physics and metaphysics. Carpentarius, Schekius, and Riolanus answered him, and particularly the first. I cannot find that Gallandus wrote against Ramus; yet either he has done it or opposed him viva voce. Priapus is of opinion they ought to be turned into stone, and associated to their namesake, Master Peter de Coignet, formerly petrified for such a reason. This Du Coignet can be no other than Peter de Coigneres, the king's advocate in his Parliament, mentioned by Pasquier. In 1329 he caused all the prelates of France to be summoned before King Philip, who sat in his court of Parliament attended by several princes and lords. There the advocate represented many abuses committed by the ecclesiastical court, which had encroached upon the Parliament's rights, and used to take cognisance of all civil matters, under divers pretences of conscience, and unjustly favoured those that appealed or removed their causes to the spiritual court. The Archbishop of Sens and the Bishop of Autun spoke in behalf of the church's right, grounded on custom, time out of mind, and of equal validity of the law, then proffered to rectify everything, and, in short, so cunningly worked upon the king, that he told them he would make no innovations, nor would show his successors a way to molest the church. This made the clergy triumph, as if they had gained their point; and to be revenged on Pierre de Coigneres, they got a monkey hewed out of stone, and had it set up in a corner of Notre Dame at Paris; which figure, says Pasquier, by a kind of pun, was called Maitre Pierre du Coignet. So Priapus advises Jupiter to petrify Ramus and Galland, saying that Peter du Coignet had been turned into stone for the same cause, that is, for setting the learned at variance. Though, after all, France is much obliged to that advocate, who seems to have laid the foundation of the liberties of the Gallican church.

In the same council of the gods, Jupiter says, "Here are the Gascons, cursing and damning, demanding the restitution of their bells." I find in Du Tillet that they had been taken from them in 1548. It appears that this prologue was written in 1548 or 1549; and I am apt to believe that these are the bells for whose recovery Master Janotus de Bragmardo made the comical speech in the 19th chapter of the first book; the rather because Henry d'Albret, King of Navarre (Rabelais's Gargantua) was then governor of Guienne, and acted against the rebels.—M.

CHAPTER I.

How Pantagruel went to Sea to Visit the Oracle of Bacbuc, alias the Holy Bottle.

IN the month of June, on Vesta's Holiday, the very numerical day on which Brutus, conquering Spain, taught its strutting dons to truckle under him, and that niggardly miser Crassus was routed and knocked on the head by the Parthians, Pantagrue took his leave of the good Gargantua, his royal father. The old gentleman, according to the laudable custom of the primitive Christians, devoutly prayed for the happy voyage of his son and his whole company, and then they took shipping at the port of Thalassa. Pantagrue had with him Panurge, Friar John des Entomeures, alias of the Funnels, Epistemon, Gymnast, Eusthenes, Rhizotomus, Carpalim, cum multis aliis, his ancient servants and domestics, also Xenomanes, the great traveller, who had crossed so many dangerous roads, dikes, ponds, seas, and so forth, and was come some time before, having been sent for by Panurge.

For certain good causes and considerations him thereunto moving, he had left with Gargantua, and marked out, in his great and universal hydrographical chart, the course which they were to steer to visit the Oracle of the Holy Bottle, Bacbuc. The number of ships were such as I described in the third book, convoyed by a like number of triremes, men of war, galleons, and feluccas, well-rigged, caulked, and stored with a good quantity of Pantagrueion.

All the officers, dragomen (interpreters), pilots, captains, mates, boatswains, midshipmen, quartermasters, and sailors, met in the Thalemege, Pantagrue's principal flag-ship, which had in her stern, for her ensign, a huge large bottle, half silver, well polished, the other half gold, enamelled with carnation; whereby it was easy to guess that white and red were the colours of the noble travellers, and that they went for the word of the Bottle.

On the stern of the second was a lantern, like those of the ancients, industriously made with diaphanous stone, implying that they were to pass by Lanternland. The third ship had for her device a fine deep China ewer. The fourth, a double-handed jar of gold, much like an ancient urn. The fifth, a famous can, made of sperm of emerald. The sixth, a monk's mumping bottle, made of the four metals together. The seventh, an ebony funnel, all embossed and wrought with gold, after the tauchic manner. The eighth, an ivy goblet, very precious, inlaid with gold. The ninth, a cup of fine obriz gold. The tenth, a tumbler of aromatic agoloch (you call it lignum aloes), edged with Cyprian gold, after the Azemine make. The eleventh, a golden vine tub, of mosaic work. The twelfth, a runlet of unpolished gold, covered with a small vine of large Indian pearl, of topiarian work. Insomuch that there was not a man, however in the dumps, musty, sourlooked, or melancholic he were, not even excepting that blubbering whiner Heraclitus, had he been there, but seeing this noble convoy of ships and their devices, must have been seized with present gladness of heart and smiling at the conceit, have said that the travellers were all honest toppers, true pitcher men, and have judged by a most sure prognostication that their voyage, both outward and homeward bound, would be performed in mirth and perfect health.

In the Thalamege, where was the general meeting, Pantagruel made a short but sweet exhortation, wholly backed with authorities from Scripture, upon navigation; which being ended, with an audible voice prayers were said in the presence and hearing of all the burghers of Thalassa, who had flocked to the mole to see them take shipping. After the prayers was melodiously sung a psalm of the holy King David, which begins, "When Israel went out of Egypt;" and that being ended, tables were placed upon deck, and a feast speedily served up. The Thalassians, who had also borne a chorus in the psalm, caused store of belly timber and vinegar to be brought out of their houses. All drank to them; they drank to all: which was the cause that none of the whole company gave up what they had eaten, nor were sea-sick, with a pain at the head and stomach; which inconveniency they could not so easily have prevented by drinking, for some time before, salt water, either alone or mixed with wine, using quinces, citron peel, juice of pomegranates, sourish sweetmeats, fasting a long time, covering their stomachs with paper, or following such other idle remedies as foolish physicians prescribe to those that go to sea.

Having often renewed their tipplings, each mother's son retired on board his own ship, and set sail all so fast with a merry gale at south east; to which point of the compass the chief pilot, James Brayer by name, had shaped his course, and fixed all things accordingly. For seeing that the Oracle of the Holy Bottle lay near Cathay, in the Upper India, his advice, and that of Xenomanes also, was not to steer the course which the Portuguese use while sailing through the torrid zone, and Cape Bona Speranza, at the south point of Africa, beyond the equinoctial line, and losing sight of the northern pole, their guide, they make a prodigious long voyage; but rather to keep as near the parallel of the said India as possible, and to tack to the westward of the said pole, so that winding under the north they might find themselves in the latitude of the port of Olone, without coming nearer it, for fear of being shut up in the frozen sea; whereas, following this canonical turn, by the said parallel, they must have that on the right to the eastward which at their departure was on their left.

This proved a much shorter cut; for without shipwreck, danger, or loss of men, with uninterrupted good weather, except one day near the island of the Macreons, they performed in less than four months the voyage of Upper India, which the Portuguese, with a thousand inconveniences and innumerable dangers, can hardly complete in three years. And it is my opinion, with submission to better judgments, that this course was perhaps steered by those Indians who sailed to Germany, and were honourably received by the King of the Swedes, while Quintus Metellus Celer was pro-consul of the Gauls, as Cornelius Nepos, Pomponius Mela, and Pliny after them tell us.

CHAPTER II.

How Pantagruel bought many Rarities in the Island of Medamothy.

THAT day and the two following they neither discovered land nor anything new, for they had formerly sailed that way; but on the fourth they made an island called Medamothy, of a fine and delightful prospect, by reason of the vast number of light-houses and high marble towers in its circuit, which is not less than that of Candia. Pantagruel, inquiring who governed there, heard that it was King Philophanes, absent at that time upon account of the marriage of his brother Philotheamon with the Infanta of the kingdom of Engys.

Hearing this, he went ashore in the harbour, and while every ship's crew watered, passed his time in viewing divers pictures, pieces of tapestry, animals, fishes, birds, and other exotic and foreign merchandises which were along the walks of the mole and in the markets of the port. For it was the third day of the great and famous fair of the place, to which the chief merchants of Africa and Asia resorted. Out of these Friar John bought him two rare pictures; in one of which, the face of a man that brings in an appeal (or that calls out to another) was drawn to the life; and in the other a servant that wants a master, with every needful particular, action, countenance, look, gait, feature, and deportment, being an original, by Master Charles Charmois, principal painter to King Megistus; and he paid for them in the court fashion, with congé and grimace. Panurge bought a large picture, copied and done from the needle-work formerly wrought by Philomela, showing to her sister Progne how her brother-in-law Tereus had by force hand-selled her copyhold, and then cut out her tongue, that she might not (as women will) tell tales. I vow and swear, by the handle of my paper lantern, that it was a gallant, a mirific, nay, a most admirable piece. Nor do you think, I pray you, that in it was the picture of a man playing the beast with two backs with a female; this had been too silly and gross: no, no; it was another-guise thing, and much plainer. You may, if you please, see it at Theleme, on the left hand, as you go into the high gallery. Epistemon bought another, wherein were painted to the life the ideas of Plato, and the atoms of Epicurus. Rhizotomus purchased another, wherein Echo was drawn to the life. Pantagruel caused to be bought, by Gymnast, the life and deeds of Achilles, in seventy-eight pieces of tapestry, four fathoms long and three fathoms broad, all of Phrygian silk, embossed with gold and silver: the work beginning at the nuptials of Peleus and Thetis, continuing to the birth of Achilles—his youth, described by Statius Papinius; his warlike achievements, celebrated by Homer; his death and obsequies, written by Ovid and Quintus Calabar; and ending at the appearance of his ghost; and Polyxena's sacrifice, rehearsed by Euripides.

He also caused to be bought three fine young unicorns; one of them a male of a chestnut colour, and two grey dappled females; also a tarand, whom he bought of a Scythian of the Gelone's country.

A tarand is an animal as big as a bullock, having a head like a stag, or a little bigger, two stately horns with large branches, cloven feet, hair long like that of a furred Muscovite, I mean a bear, and a skin almost as hard as steel armour. The Scythian said that there are but few tarands to be found in Scythia, because it varieth its colour according to the diversity of the places where it grazes and abides, and represents the colour of the grass, plants, trees, shrubs, flowers, meadows, rocks, and generally of all things near which it comes. It hath this common with the sea-pulp, or polypus, with the thoes, with the wolves of India, and with the chameleon, which is a kind of a lizard so wonderful that Democritus hath written a whole book of its figure and anatomy, as also of its virtue and property in magic. This I can affirm, that I have seen it change its colour, not only at the approach of things that have a colour, but by its own voluntary impulse, according to its fear or other affections: as for example, upon a green carpet, I have certainly seen it become green; but having remained there some time, it turned yellow, blue, tanned, and purple in course, in the same manner as you see a turkey-cock's comb change colour according to its passions. But what we find most surprising in this tarand is that not only its face and skin, but also its hair, could take whatever colour was about it. Near Panurge, with his kersey coat, its hair used to turn grey; near Pantagruel, with its scarlet mantle, its hair and skin grew red; near the pilot, dressed after the fashion of the Isiaci of Anubis, in Egypt, its hair seemed all white; which two last colours the chameleon cannot borrow.

When the creature was free from any fear or affection, the colour of its hair was just such as you see that of the asses of Meung.

CHAPTER III.

How Pantagruel received a Letter from His Father Gargantua, and of the Strange Way to have Speedy News from Far Distant Places.

WHILE Pantagruel was taken up with the purchase of those foreign animals, the noise of ten guns and culverins, together with a loud and joyful cheer of all the fleet, was heard from the mole. Pantagruel looked towards the haven, and perceived that this was occasioned by the arrival of one of his father Gargantua's celoces, or advice-boats, named the Chelidonia, because on the stern of it was carved in Corinthian brass a sea swallow, which is a fish as large as a dare-fish of Loire, all flesh, without scale, with cartilaginous wings (like a bat's), very long and broad, by the means of which I have seen them fly a fathom above water about a bow-shot. At Marseilles this flying fish is called lendole. And indeed that ship was as light as a swallow, so that it rather seemed to fly on the sea than to sail. Malicorne, Gargantua's esquire carver, was come in her, being sent expressly by his master to have an account of his son's health and circumstances, and to bring him credentials. When Malicorne had saluted Pantagruel, and the prince had embraced him about the neck, and showed him a little of the cap-courtesy before he opened the letters, the first thing he said to him was: "Have you here the gozal, the heavenly messenger?" "Yes, sir," said he; "here it is, swaddled up in this basket." It was a grey pigeon taken out of Gargantua's dove-house, whose young ones were just hatched when the advice-boat was going off.

If any ill fortune had befallen Pantagruel, he would have fastened some black riband to his feet; but because all things had succeeded happily hitherto, having caused it to be undressed, he tied to its feet a white riband, and, without any further delay, let it loose. The pigeon presently flew away, cutting the air with an incredible speed, as you know that there is no flight like a pigeon's, especially when it hath eggs or young ones, through the extreme care which nature hath fixed in it to relieve and be with its young; insomuch that, in less than two hours, it compassed in the air the long tract which the advice-boat, with all her diligence with oars and sails, and a fair wind, could not go through in less than three days and three nights, and was seen as it was going into the dove-house to its nest. Whereupon the worthy Gargantua, hearing that it had the white riband on, was joyful and secure of his son's welfare. This was the custom of the noble Gargantua and Pantagruel when they would have speedy news of something of great concern, as the event of some battle, either by sea or land; the surrendering or holding out of some strong place; the determination of some difference of moment; the safe or unhappy delivery of some queen or great lady; the death or recovery of their sick friends or allies, and so forth. They used to take the gozal, and had it carried from one to another by the post to the places whence they desired to have news. The gozal, bearing either a black or white riband, according to the occurrences and accidents, used to remove their doubts at its return, making in the space of one hour more way through the air than thirty post-boys could have done in one natural day. May not this be said to redeem and gain time with a vengeance, think you? For the like service, therefore, you may believe as a most true thing that, in the dove-houses of their farms, there were to be found, all the year long, stores of pigeons hatching eggs or rearing their young. Which may be easily done in aviaries and voleries, by the help of saltpetre and the sacred herb vervain.

The gozal being let fly, Pantagruel perused his father Gargantua's letter, the contents of which were as follows:—

“MY DEAREST SON,—The affection that naturally a father bears to a beloved son is so much increased in me, by reflecting on the particular gifts which by the divine goodness have been heaped on thee, that since thy departure it hath often banished all other thoughts out of my mind, leaving my heart wholly possessed with fear lest some misfortune has attended thy voyage; for thou knowest that fear was ever the attendant of true and sincere love. Now because, as Hesiod sayeth, ‘A good beginning of anything is the half of it;’ or, ‘Well begun is half done,’ according to the old saying, to free me I send you this anxiety, I have expressly despatched <sup>freely</sup> tapestry; assuring you may give me a true account of thy <sup>travels</sup> birds, or precious stones, thy voyage. ## CHAPTER IV.

How Pantagruel writ to His Father Gargantua, and sent Him several Curiosities.

PANTAGRUEL, having perused the letter, had a long conference with the esquire Malicorne, insomuch that Panurge, at last interrupting them, asked him, "Pray, sir, when do you design to drink? When shall we drink? When shall the worshipful esquire drink? What a devil! have you not talked long enough to drink?" "It is a good motion," answered Pantagruel; "go, get us something ready at the next inn; I think it is the Satyr on Horseback." In the meantime he writ to Gargantua as followeth, to be sent by the aforesaid esquire:—

"MOST GRACIOUS FATHER,—As our senses and animal faculties are more discomposed at the news of events unexpected, though desired (even to an immediate dissolution of the soul from the body), than if those accidents had been foreseen, so the coming of Malicorne hath much surprised and disordered me. For I had no hopes to see any of your servants, or to hear from you, before I had finished our voyage, and contented myself with the dear remembrance of your august majesty, deeply impressed in the hindmost ventricle of my brain, often representing you to my mind.

"But since you have made me happy beyond expectation, by sir, ~~surusal~~ <sup>surusal</sup> of your gracious letter, and the faith I have in grey pigeon ~~takeh~~ <sup>takeh</sup> revived my spirits by the news of your wel-ones were just hatchèd" compelled to do what formerly I did

“As for us, I have this assurance in the Lord’s mercy and help, that the end of our voyage will be answerable to its beginning, and so it will be entirely performed in health and mirth. I will not fail to set down in a journal a full account of our navigation, that, at our return, you may have an exact relation of the whole.

“I have found here a Scythian tarand, an animal strange and wonderful for the variations of colour on its skin and hair, according to the distinction of neighbouring things: it is as tractable and easily kept as a lamp; be pleased to accept of it.

“I also send you three young unicorns, which are the tamest of creatures.

“I have conferred with the esquire, and taught him how they must be fed. These cannot graze on the ground, by reason of the long horn on their forehead, but are forced to browse on fruit trees, or on proper racks, or to be fed by hand with herbs, sheaves, apples, pears, barley, rye, and other fruits and roots being placed before them.

“I am amazed that ancient writers should report them to be so wild, furious, and dangerous, and never seen alive: far from it, you will find that they are the mildest things in the world, provided they are not maliciously offended. Likewise I send you the life and deeds of Achilles, in curious tapestry; assuring you whatever rarities of animals, plants, birds, or precious stones, and others, I shall be able to find and purchase in our travels, shall be brought to you, God willing, whom I beseech, by his blessed grace, to preserve you.

“From Medamothy, this 15th of June. Panurge, Friar John, Epistemon, Xenomanes, Gymnast, Eusthenes, Rhizotomus, and Carpalim, having most humbly kissed your hand, return your salute a thousand times.

“Your most dutiful son and servant, PANTAGRUEL.”

While Pantagruel was writing this letter, Malicorne was made welcome with a thousand goodly good-morrows and howd’ye’s: they clung about him so that I cannot tell you how much they made of him, how many humble services, how many from my love and to my love were sent with him. Pantagruel, having writ his letters, sat down at table with him, and afterwards presented him with a large chain of gold weighing eight hundred crowns, between whose septenary links some large diamonds, rubies, emeralds, turquoise stones, and unions were alternately set in. To each of his bark's crew he ordered to be given five hundred crowns. To Gargantua, his father, he sent the tarand, covered with a cloth of satin brocaded with gold, and the tapestry containing the life and deeds of Achilles, with the three unicorns in frized cloth of gold trappings; and so they left Medamothy—Malicorne to return to Gargantua, and Pantagruel to proceed in his voyage: during which Epistemon read to him the books which the esquire had brought; and because he found them jovial and pleasant, I shall give you an account of them, if you earnestly desire it.

CHAPTER V.

How Pantagruel met a Ship with Passengers returning from Lanternland.

ON the fifth day, beginning already to wind by little and little about the pole, going still farther from the equinoctial line, we discovered a merchantman to the windward of us. The joy for this was not small on both sides; we in hopes to hear news from sea, and those in the merchantman from land. So we bore upon them, and coming up with them, we hailed them; and finding them to be Frenchmen of Xaintonge, backed our sails and lay by to talk to them. Pantagruel heard that they came from Lanternland, which added to his joy and that of the whole fleet. We inquired about the state of that country, and the way of living of the Lanterns, and were told that about the latter end of the following July was the time prefixed for the meeting of the general chapter of the Lanterns, and that if we arrived there at that time, as we might easily, we should see a handsome, honourable, and jolly company of Lanterns; and that great preparations were making, as if they intended to lanternise there to the purpose. We were told also that, if we touched at the great kingdom of Gebarim, we should be honourably received and treated by the sovereign of that country, King Ohabé, who, as well as all his subjects, speaks Touraine French.

While we were listening to this news, Panurge fell out with one Dingdong, a drover or sheep merchant of Taillebourg. The occasion of the fray was thus:

This same Dingdong, seeing Panurge without a codpiece, with his spectacles fastened to his cap, said to one of his comrades: "Prithee, look, is there not a fine medal of a cuckold?" Panurge, by reason of his spectacles, as you may well think, heard more plainly by half with his ears than usually, which caused him (hearing this) to say to the saucy dealer in mutton, in a kind of a pet :

“How the devil should I be one of the hornified fraternity, since I am not yet a brother of the marriage-noose as thou art, as I guess by thy ill-favoured pliz?”

“Yea, verily,” quoth the grazier, “I am married, and would not be otherwise for all the pairs of spectacles in Europe, nay, not for all the magnifying gim-cracks in Africa, for I have got me the cleverest, prettiest, handsomest, properest, neatest, tightest, honestest, and soberest piece of woman’s flesh for my wife that is in all the whole country of Xaintonge ; I will say that for her, and a fart for all the rest. I bring her home a fine eleven-inch-long branch of red coral for her Christmas box. What hast thou to do with it? what is that to thee? who art thou? whence comest thou, oh, dark lanthorn of anti-christ? Answer, if thou art of God.” “I ask thee, by the way of question,” said Panurge to him very seriously, “if with the consent and countenance of all the elements I had giugumbob’d, cod-pieced, and thumpthumpriggledtickledtwidled thy so clever, so pretty, so handsome, so proper, so neat, so tight, so honest, and so sober female importance, insomuch that the stiff deity that has no forecast, Priapus (who dwells here at liberty, all subjection of fastened codpieces, or bolts, bars, and locks abdicated), remained sticking in her natural Christmas box in such a lamentable manner that it were never to come out, but eternally should stick there, unless thou didst pull it out with thy teeth, what wouldst thou do? Wouldst thou everlastingly leave it there, or wouldst thou pluck it out with thy grinders? Answer me, oh thou ram of Mahomet, since thou art one of the devil’s gang.” “I would,” replied the sheepmonger, “take thee such a woundy cut on this spectacle-bearing lug of thine with my trusty bilbo as would smite thee dead as a herring.” Thus, having taken pepper in the nose, he was lugging out his sword, but, alas! cursed cows have short horns—it stuck in the scabbard, as you know that at sea cold iron will easily take rust, by reason of the excessive and nitrous moisture. Panurge, so smitten with terror that his heart sunk down to his midriff, scoured off to Pantagruel for help; but Friar John laid hand on his flashing scimitar, that was new ground, and would certainly have despatched Dingdong to rights had not the skipper and some of his passengers beseeched Pantagruel not to suffer such an outrage to be committed on board his ship. So the matter was made up, and Panurge and his antagonist shook fists, and drank in course to one another in token of a perfect reconciliation.

CHAPTER VI.

THIS quarrel being hushed, Panurge tipped the wink upon Epistemon and Friar John, and taking them aside,—"Stand at some distance out of the way," said he, "and take your share of the following scene of mirth: you shall have rare sport anon, if my cake be not dough, and my plot do but take." Then addressing himself to the drover, he took off to him a bumper of good Lantern wine. The other pledged him briskly and courteously. This done, Panurge earnestly entreated him to sell him one of his sheep.

But the other answered him, "Is it come to that, friend and neighbour? Would you put tricks upon travellers? Alas! how finely you love to play upon poor folk! Nay, you seem a rare chapman, that is the truth on it. Oh, what a mighty sheep merchant you are! In good faith, you look liker one of the diving trade than a buyer of sheep. Adzookers, what a blessing it would be to have one's purse well lined with chink, near your worship at a tripe-house, when it begins to thaw! Humph, humph, did not we know you well, you might serve one a slippery trick! Pray do but see, good people, what a mighty conjuror the fellow would be reckoned." "Patience," said Panurge; "but waving that, be so kind as to sell me one of your sheep. Come, how much?" "What do you mean, master of mine?" answered the other. "They are long-woolled sheep: from these did Jason take his golden fleece. The order of the house of Burgundy was drawn from them. Zwoons, man, they are oriental sheep, topping sheep, fatted sheep, sheep of quality." "Be it so," said Panurge; "but sell me one of them, I beseech you, and that for a cause, paying you ready money upon the nail, in good and lawful occidental current cash. Wilt say how much?" "Friend, neighbour," answered the seller of mutton, "hark ye me a little, on the ear."

Panurge. On which side you please; I hear you.

Dingdong. You are going to Lanternland, they say?

Pan. Yea, verily.

Ding. To see fashions?

Pan. Yea, verily.

Ding. And be merry?

Pan. Yea, verily.

Ding. Your name is, as I take it, Robin Mutton?

Pan. As you please for that, sweet sir.

Ding. Nay, without offence.

Pan. So I understand it.

Ding. You are, as I take it, the king's jester, are not you?

Pan. Yea, verily.

Ding. Give me your hand—humph, humph, you go to see fashions; you are the king's jester; your name is Robin Mutton! Do you see this same ram? His name, too, is Robin. Here Robin, Robin, Robin! Baea, baea, baea. Hath he not a rare voice?

Pan. Ay, marry has he, a very fine and harmonious voice.

Ding. Well, this bargain shall be made between you and me, friend and neighbour; we will get a pair of scales, then you Robin Mutton shall be put into one of them, and Tup Robin into the other. Now I will hold you a peck of Busch oysters that in weight, value, and price, he shall outdo you, and you shall be found light in the very numerical manner, as when you shall be hanged and suspended.

"Patience," said Panurge; "but you would do much for me, and your whole posterity, if you would chaffer with me for him, or some other of his inferiors. I beg it of you; good your worship, be so kind." "Hark ye, friend of mine," answered the other, "with the fleece of these your fine Rouen cloth is to be made; your Leominster superfine wool is mine arse to it—mere flock in comparison. Of their skins the best Cordovan will be made, which shall be sold for Turkey and Montelimart, or for Spanish leather at least. Of the guts shall be made fiddle and harp strings, that will sell as dear as if they came from Muncan or Aquileia. What do yo think of it, hah?" "If you please, sell me one of them," said Panurge, "and I will be yours for ever. Look, here is ready cash. What's the price?" This he said exhibiting his purse stuffed with new Henricuses.

CHAPTER VII.

Which if you Read, you will find how Panurge bargained with Dingdong.

"NEIGHBOUR, my friend," answered Dingdong, "they are meet for none but kings and princes; their flesh is so delicate, so savoury, and so dainty, that one would swear it melted in the mouth. I bring them out of a country where the very hogs, God be with us, live on nothing but myrobalans. The sows in the styes, when they lie in (saving the honour of this good company), are fed only with orange flowers." "But," said Panurge, "drive a bargain with me for one of them, and I will pay you for it like a king, upon the honest word of a true Trojan; come, come, what do you ask?" "Not so fast, Robin," answered the trader; "these sheep are lineally descended from the very family of the ram that wafted Phryxus and Helle over the sea, since called the Hellespont." "A pox on it," said Panurge, "you are clericus vel addiscens!" "Ità is a cabbage, and verè is a leek," answered the merchant. "But rr, rrr, rrrr, rrrrr, hoh, Robin, rr, rrrrrrr, you do not understand that gibberish, do you? Now I think of it, over all the fields where they piss, corn grows as fast as if the Lord had pissed there; they need neither be tilled nor dunged. Besides, man, your chemists extract the best saltpetre in the world out of their urine. Nay, with their very dung (with reverence be it spoken) the doctors in our country make pills that cure seventy-eight kinds of diseases, the least of which is the evil of Saint Eutropius of Xaintes, from which good Lord deliver us! Now what do you think on't, neighbour, my friend? The truth is they cost me money, that they do." "Cost what they will," cried Panurge, "trade with me for one of them, paying you well." "Our friend," quoth the quack-like sheepman, "do but mind the wonders of nature that are found in those animals, even in a member which one would think were of no use. Take me but these horns, and bray them a little with an iron pestle, or with an andiron, which you please, it is all one to me, then bury them wherever you will, provided it be where the sun may shine, and water them frequently, in a few months, I will engage, you will have the best asparagus in the world, not even excepting those of Ravenna. Now, come and tell me whether the horns of you other knights of the bull's feather have such a virtue and wonderful propriety?"

"Patience," said Panurge. "I do not know whether you be a scholar or no," pursued Dingdong. "I have seen a world of scholars, I say great scholars, that were cuckolds, I'll assure you. But hark you me, if you were a scholar, you should know that in the most inferior members of those animals—which are the feet—there is a bone—which is the heel—the astragalus, if you will have it so, wherewith, and with that of no other creature breathing, except the Indian ass, and the dorcades of Libya, they used in old times to play at the royal game of dice, whereat Augustus, the Emperor, won above fifty thousand crowns one evening. Now such cuckolds as you will be hanged ere you get half so much at it." "Patience," said Panurge; "but let us despatch." "And when, my friend and neighbour," continued the canting sheepseller, "shall I have duly praised the inward members, the shoulders, the legs, the knuckles, the neck, the breast, the liver, the spleen, the tripes, the kidneys, the bladder, wherewith they make footballs; the ribs, which serve in Pigmyland to make little cross-bows, to pelt the cranes with cherry stones; the head which with a little brimstone serves to make a miraculous decoction to loosen and ease the belly of costive dogs?" "A turd on it," said the skipper to his preaching passenger, "what a fiddle-faddle have we here? There is too long a lecture by half: sell him if thou wilt; if thou wilt not, do not let the man lose more time. I hate a gibble-gabble, and a rible-ramble talk. I am for a man of brevity." "I will, for your sake," replied the holder forth; "but then he shall give me three livres, French money, for each pick and choose." "It is a woundy price," cried Panurge; "in our country, I could have five, nay, six for the money: see that you do not overreach me, master. You are not the first man whom I have known to have fallen, even sometimes to the endangering, if not breaking, of his own neck, for endeavouring to rise all at once." "A murrain seize thee for a blockheaded booby," cried the angry seller of sheep; "by the worthy vow of our Lady of Charroux, the worst in this flock is four times better than those which in days of yore the Coraxians in Tuditania, a country of Spain, used to sell for a gold talent each; and how much dost thou think, thou Hibernian fool, that a talent of gold was worth?" "Sweet sir, you fall into a passion, I see," returned Panurge. "Well, hold, here is your money." Panurge, having paid his money, chose him out of all the flock a fine topping ram; and as he was hauling it along, crying out and bleating, all the rest, hearing and bleating in concert, stared to see whither their brother ram should be carried. In the meanwhile the drover was saying to his shepherds: "Ah! how well the knave could choose him out a ram; the whore-son has skill in cattle. On my honest word, I reserved that very piece of flesh for the Lord of Cancalle, well knowing his disposition; for the good man is naturally overjoyed when he holds a good-sized, handsome shoulder of mutton instead of a left-handed racket in one hand, with a good sharp carver in the other: got wot how he bestirs himself then."

CHAPTER VIII.

How Panurge caused Dingdong and His Sheep to be Drowned in the Sea.

ON a sudden, you would wonder how the thing was so soon done—for my part I cannot tell you, for I had not leisure to mind it—our friend Panurge, without any further tittle-tattle, throws you his ram overboard into the middle of the sea, bleating and making a sad noise. Upon this all the other sheep in the ship, crying and bleating in the same tone, make all the haste they could to leap nimbly into the sea, one after another; and great was the throng who should leap in first after their leader. It was impossible to hinder them, for you know that it is the nature of sheep always to follow the first, wheresoever it goes; which makes Aristotle, lib. 9, De Hist. Animal., mark them for the most silly and foolish animals in the world. Dingdong, at his wit's end, and stark staring mad, as a man who saw his sheep destroy and drown themselves before his face, strove to hinder and keep them by might and main, but all in vain; they all, one after the other, frisked and jumped into the sea, and were lost. At last he laid hold on a huge sturdy one by the fleece, upon the deck of the ship, hoping to keep it back, and so save that and the rest, but the ram was so strong that it proved too hard for him, and carried its master into the herring pond in spite of his teeth, where it is supposed he drank somewhat more than his fill, so that he was drowned, in the same manner as one-eyed Polyphemus's sheep carried out of the den Ulysses and his companions. The like happened to the shepherds and all their gang, some laying hold on their beloved tup, this by the horns, the other by the legs, a third by the rump, and others by the fleece, till in fine they were all of them forced to sea, and drowned like so many rats. Panurge, on the gunnel of the ship, with an oar in his hand, not to help them, you may swear, but to keep them from swimming to the ship, and saving themselves from drowning, preached and canted to them all the while like any little Friar Oliver Maillard, or another Friar John Burgess, laying before them rhetorical commonplaces concerning the miseries of this life, and the blessings and felicity of the next; assuring them that the dead were much happier than the living in this vale of misery; and promising to erect a stately cenotaph and honorary tomb to every one of them, on the highest summit of Mount Cenis, at his return from Lanternland; wishing them, nevertheless, in case they were not disposed to shake hands with this life, and did not like their salt liquor, they might have the good luck to meet with some kind whale which might set them ashore safe and sound, on some land of Gotham, after a famous example.

The ship being cleared of Dingdong and his tups, "Is there ever another sheepish soul left lurking on board?" cried Panurge. "Where are those of Toby Lamb, and Robin Ram, that sleep whilst the rest are a feeding? Faith I cannot tell myself. This was an old coaster's trick. What thinkest of it, Friar John, hah?" "Rarely performed," answered Friar John; "only methinks that, as formerly in war, on the day of battle, a double pay was commonly promised the soldiers for that day; for if they overcome, there was enough to pay them, and if they lost, it would have been shameful for them to demand it, as the cowardly presters did after the battle of Cerizoles; so likewise, my friend, you ought not to have paid your man, and the money had been saved." "A fart for the money," said Panurge, "have I not had above fifty thousand pounds worth of sport? Come now, let us be gone; the wind is fair. Hark you me, my friend John, never did man do me a good turn but I returned, or at least acknowledged it: no, I scorn to be ungrateful. I never was, nor ever will be; never did man do me an ill one without rueing the day that he did it, either in this world or the next. I am not yet so much a fool neither." "Thou damnest thyself like any old devil," quoth Friar John; "it is written, Mihi vindictam, etc. Matter of breviary, mark ye me."

CHAPTER IX.

How Pantagruel arrived at the Island of Ennasin, and of the Strange Ways of being akin in that Country.

WE had still the wind at south-south-west, and had been a whole day without making land. On the third day, at the flies' uprising (which, you know, is some two or three hours after the sun's), we got sight of a triangular island, very much like Sicily for its form and situation. It was called the Island of Alliances.

The people there are much like your carrot-pated Poitevins, save only that all of them, men, women, and children, have their noses shaped like an ace of clubs. For that reason the ancient name of the country was Ennasin. They were all akin, as the mayor of the place told us; at least they boasted so.

You people of the other world esteem it a wonderful thing that, out of the family of the Fabii at Rome, on a certain day, which was the 13th of February, at a certain gate, which was the Porta Carmentalis, since named Scelerata, formerly situated at the foot of the Capitol, between the Tarpeian rock and the Tiber, marched out against the Veientes of Etruria three hundred and six men bearing arms, all related to each other, with five thousand other soldiers, every one of them their vassals, who were all slain near the River Cremera, that comes out of the lake of Beccano. Now from this same country of Ennasin, in case of need, above three hundred thousand, all relations, and of one family, might march out. Their degrees of consanguinity and alliance are very strange; for being thus akin and allied to one another, we found that none was either father or mother, brother or sister, uncle or aunt, nephew or niece, son-in-law, or daughter-in-law, godfather or godmother to the other; unless, truly, a tall, flat-nosed old fellow, who, as I perceived, called a little shitten-arsed girl of three or four years old father, and the child called him daughter.

Their distinction of degrees of kindred was thus: a man used to call a woman, my lean bit; the woman called him, my porpoise. "Those," said John Friar, "must needs stink damnably of fish when they have rubbed their bacon one with the other." One smiling on a young buxom baggage, said, "Good morrow, dear currycomb." She, to return him his civility, said, "The like to you, my steed." "Ha! ha! ha!" said Panurge, "that is pretty well, in faith; for indeed it stands her in good stead to currycomb this steed." Another greeted his buttock with a "Farewell, my case." She replied, "Adieu trial." "By Saint Winifred's placket," cried Gymnast, "this case has been often tried." Another asked a she-friend of his, "How is it, hatchet?" She answered him, "At your service, dear helve." "Odds belly," saith Carpalim, "this helve and this hatchet are well matched." As we went on I saw one who, calling his she-relation, styled her my crum, and she called him, my crust.

Quoth one to a brisk, plump, juicy female, "I am glad to see you, dear tap." "So am I to find you so merry, sweet spiggot," replied she. One called a wench, his shovel; she called him, her peal: one named his, my slipper; and she, my foot: another, my boot; she, my shasoon.

In the same degree of kindred, one called his, my butter; she called him, my eggs; and they were akin just like a dish of buttered eggs. I heard one call his, my tripe, and she called him, my faggot. Now I could not, for the heart's blood of me, pick out or discover what parentage, alliance, affinity, or consanguinity was between them, with reference to our custom; only they told us that she was faggot's tripe. (Tripe de fagot, means the smallest sticks in a faggot.) Another, complimenting his convenient, said, "Yours, my shell;" she replied, "I was yours before, sweet oyster." "I reckon," said Carpalim, "she hath gutted his oyster." Another long-shanked, ugly rogue, mounted on a pair of high-heeled wooden slippers, meeting a strapping, fusty, squobbed dowdy, says he to her, "How is it, my top?" She was short upon him, and arrogantly replied, "Never the better for you, my whip." "By Saint Anthony's hog," said Xeomanes, "I believe so; for how can this whip be sufficient to lash this top?"

A college professor, well provided with cod, and powdered and prinked up, having a while discoursed with a great lady, taking his leave, with these words: "Thank you, sweatmeat;" she cried, "There needs no thanks, sour sauce." Saith Pantagruel, "This is not altogether incongruous, for sweetmeat must have sour sauce." A wooden loggerhead said to a young wench: "It is long since I saw you, bag;" "All the better," cried she, "pipe."

“Set them together,” said Panurge, “then blow in their arses, it will be a bagpipe.” We saw, after that, a diminutive hump-backed gallant pretty near us, taking leave of a she relation of his thus: “Fare thee well, friend hole;” she reparteed, “Save thee, friend peg.” Quoth Friar John, “What could they say more, were he all peg and she all hole? But now would I give something to know if every cranny of the hole can be stopped up with that same peg.”

A bawdy bachelor, talking with an old trout, was saying, “Remember, rusty gun.” “I will not fail,” said she, “scourer.” “Do you reckon these two to be akin?” said Pantagruel to the mayor; “I rather take them to be foes: in our country a woman would take this as a mortal affront.” “Good people of the other world,” replied the mayor, “you have few such and so near relations as this gun and scourer are to one another, for they both come out of one shop.” “What, was the shop their mother?” quoth Panurge. “What mother,” said the mayor, “does the man mean? That must be some of your world’s affinity; we have here neither father nor mother: your little paltry fellows, that live on the other side the water, poor rogues, booted with whisps of hay, may indeed have such; but we scorn it.” The good Pantagruel stood gazing and listening; but at those words he had like to have lost all patience.

Having very exactly viewed the situation of the island, and the way of living of the Enasséd nation, we went to take a cup of the creature at a tavern, where there happened to be a wedding after the manner of the country. Bating that shocking custom, there was special good cheer.

While we were there, a pleasant match was struck up betwixt a female called Pear (a tight thing, as we thought, but by some who knew better things said to be quaggy and flabby) and a young soft male called Cheese, somewhat sandy. (Many such matches have been, and they were formerly much commended.) In our country we say, Il ne fut oncques tel mariage, qu’est de la poire et du fromage—there is no match like that made between the pear and the cheese; and in many other places good store of such bargains have been driven. Besides, when the women are at their last prayers, it is to this day a noted saying that after cheese comes nothing.

In another room I saw them marrying an old greasy boot to a young pliable buskin. Pantagruel was told that young buskin took old boot to have and to hold because she was of special leather, in good case, and waxed, seared, liquored, and greased to the purpose, even though it had been for the fisherman that went to bed with his boots on. In another room below I saw a young brogue taking a young slipper for better for worse; which they told us was neither for the sake of her piety, parts, or person, but for the fourth comprehensive p, portion—the spankers, spur-royals, rose nobles, and other coriander seed with which she was quilted all over.

CHAPTER X.

How Pantagruel went Ashore at the Island of Chely, where He saw King Saint Panigon.

We sailed right before the wind, which we had at west, leaving those odd alliancers with their ace-of-clubs snouts, and having taken height by the sun, stood in for Chely, a large, fruitful, wealthy, and well-peopled island. King Saint Panigon, first of the name, reigned there, and attended by the princes his sons, and the nobles of his court, came as far as the port to receive Pantagruel, and conducted him to his palace, near the gate of which, the queen, attended by the princesses her daughters, and the court ladies, received us. Panigon directed her and all her retinue to salute Pantagruel and his men with a kiss, for such was the civil custom of the country; and they were all fairly bussed accordingly, except Friar John, who stepped aside, and sneaked off among the king's officers. Panigon used all the entreaties imaginable to persuade Pantagruel to tarry there that day and the next; but he would needs be gone, and excused himself upon the opportunity of wind and weather, which being oftener desired than enjoyed, ought not to be neglected when it comes. Panigon, having heard these reasons, let us go, but first made us take off some five-and-twenty or thirty bumpers each.

Pantagruel, returning to the port, missed Friar John, and asked why he was not with the rest of the company. Panurge could not tell how to excuse him, and would have gone back to the palace to call him, when Friar John overtook them, and merrily cried, "Long live the noble Panigon! As I love my belly, he minds good eating, and keeps a noble house and a dainty kitchen. I have been there, boys. Everything goes about by dozens. I was in good hopes to have stuffed my puddings there like a monk." "What! always in a kitchen, friend?" said Pantagruel, "By the belly of Saint Crampacon," quoth the Friar, "I understand the customs and ceremonies which are used there much better than all the formal stuff, antic postures, and nonsensical fiddle-faddle that must be used with those women, magni magna, shittencumshita, cringes, grimaces, bows, scrapes, and congées; double honours this way, triple salutes that way, the embrace, the grasp, the squeeze, the hug, the leer, the smack, baso las manos de vostra mercé, de vostra maestá. You are most tarabin, tarabas, Strout; that is downright Dutch. Why all this ado?

I do not say but a man might be for a bit by the bye and away, to be doing as well as his neighbours; but this little nasty cringing and courtesying made me as mad as any March devil. You talk of kissing ladies; by the worthy and sacred frock I wear, I seldom venture upon it, least I be served as was the Lord of Guyercharois." "What was it?" said Pantagruel, "I know him; he is one of the best friends I have."

"He was invited to a sumptuous feast," said Friar John, "by a relation and neighbour of his, together with all the gentlemen and ladies in the neighbourhood. Now some of the latter [the ladies] expecting his coming, dressed the pages in women's clothes, and finified them like any babies; then ordered them to meet my lord at his coming near the drawbridge; so the complimenting monsieur came, and there kissed the petticoated lads with great formality. At last the ladies, who minded passages in the gallery, burst out with laughing, and made signs to the pages to take off their dress, which the good lord having observed, the devil a bit he durst make up to the true ladies to kiss them, but said that, since they had disguised the pages, by his great grandfather's helmet, these were certainly the very footmen and grooms still more cunningly disguised. Odds fish, da jurandi, why do not we rather remove our humanities into some good warm kitchen of God, that noble laboratory, and there admire the turning of the spits, the harmonious rattling of the jacks and fenders, criticise on the position of the lard, the temperature of the pottages, the preparation for the dessert, and the order of the wine service? Beati immaculati in via. Matter of breviary, my masters."

CHAPTER XI.

Why Monks love to be in Kitchens.

"THIS," said Epistemon, "is spoke like a true monk; I mean like a right monking monk, not a bemonked monastical monking. Truly you put me in mind of some passages that happened at Florence some twenty years ago, in a company of studious travellers, fond of visiting the learned, and seeing the antiquities of Italy, among whom I was. As we viewed the situation and beauty of Florence, the structure of the dome, the magnificence of the churches and palaces, we strove to outdo one another in giving them their due, when a certain monk of Amiens, Bernard Lardon by name, quite angry, scandalised, and out of all patience, told us I do not know what the devil you can find in this same town that is so much cried up; for my part, I have looked, and pored, and stared as well as the best of you; I think my eyesight is as clear as another body's; and what can one see after all? There are fine houses, indeed, and that is all. But the cage does not feed the birds. God and Monsieur Saint Bernard, our good patron, be with us! in all this same town I have not seen one poor lane of roasting cooks; and yet I have not a little looked about, and sought for so necessary a part of a commonwealth; ay, and I dare assure you that I have pried up and down with the exactness of an informer, as ready to number, both to the right and left, how many and on what side we might find most roasting cooks, as a spy would be to reckon the bastions of a town. Now at Amiens, in four, nay, five times less ground than we have trod in our contemplations, I could have shown you above fourteen streets of roasting cooks, most ancient, savoury, and aromatic. I cannot imagine what kind of pleasure you can have taken in gazing on the lions and Africans (so methinks you call their tigers) near the belfry, or in ogling the porcupiness and ostriches in the Lord Philip Strozzi's palace. Faith and truth, I had rather see a good fat goose at the spit. This porphyry, those marbles are fine, I say nothing to the contrary; but our cheesecakes at Amiens are far better in my mind. These ancient statues are well made, I am willing to believe it; but, by Saint Ferreol of Abbeville, we have young wenches in our country which please me better a thousand times."

"What is the reason," asked Friar John, "that monks are always to be found in kitchens, and kings, emperors, and popes are never there?" "Is there not," said Rhizotomus, "some latent virtue and specific property hid in the kettles and pans, which, as the loadstone attracts iron, draws the monk there, and cannot attract emperors, popes, or kings? Or is it a natural induction and inclination, fixed in the frocks and cowls, which of itself leads and forceth those good religious men into kitchens whether they will or no?" "He means, forms following matter as Averroës calls them," answered Epistemon. "Right," said Friar John.

"I will not offer to solve this problem," said Pantagruel; "for it is somewhat ticklish, and you can hardly handle it without coming off scurvily; but I will tell you what I have heard.

"Antigonus, King of Macedon, one day coming to one of his tents, where his cooks used to dress his meat, and finding there poet Antagoras frying a conger, and holding the pan himself, merrily asked him, 'Pray, Mr Poet, was Homer frying congers when he wrote the deeds of Agamemnon?' Antagoras readily answered. 'But do you think, sir, that when Agamemnon did them, he made it his business to know if any in his camp were frying congers?' The king thought it an indecency that a poet should be thus a frying in a kitchen; and the poet let the king know that it was a more indecent thing for a king to be found in such a place." "I will clap another story upon the neck of this," quoth Panurge, "and will tell you what Breton Villandry answered one day to the Duke of Guise."

"They were saying that at a certain battle of King Francis against the Emperor Charles the Fifth, Breton, armed cap-à-pie to the teeth, and mounted like Saint George, yet sneaked off, and played least in sight during the engagement. 'Blood an'ouns,' answered Breton, 'I was there, and can prove it easily; nay, even where you, my lord, dared not have been.' The duke began to resent this as too rash and saucy, but Breton easily appeased him, and set them all a laughing. 'I, gad, my lord,' quoth he, 'I kept out of harm's way; I was all the while with your page Jack, skulking in a certain place where you had not dared hide your head, as I did.'" Thus discoursing they got to their ships, and left the Island of Chely.

CHAPTER XII.

How Pantagruel passed through the Land of Pettifogging, and of the Strange Way of Living among the Catchpoles.

STEERING our course forwards the next day, we passed through Pettifogging, a country all blurred and blotted, so that I could hardly tell what to make on it. There we saw some pettifoggers and catchpoles, rogues that will hang their father for a groat. They neither invited us to eat or drink; but, with a multiplied train of scrapes and cringes, said they were all at our service, for a consideration.

One of our interpreters related to Pantagruel their strange way of living, diametrically opposite to that of our modern Romans; for at Rome a world of folks get an honest livelihood by poisoning, drubbing, lambasting, stabbing, and murdering; but the catchpoles earn theirs by being thrashed, so that if they were long without a tight lambasting, the poor dogs, with their wives and children, would be starved. "This is just," quoth Panurge, "like those who, as Galen tells us, cannot erect the cavernous nerve towards the equinoctial circle unless they are soundly flogged. By Saint Patrick's slipper, whoever should jirk me so would soon, instead of setting me right, throw me off the saddle, in the devil's name."

"The way is this," said the interpreter. "When a monk, levite, close-fisted usurer, or lawyer, owes a grudge to some neighbouring gentleman, he sends to him one of those catch-poles, or apparitors, who nabs, or at least cites him, serves a writ or warrant upon him, thumps, abuses, and affronts him impudently by natural instinct, and according to his pious instructions; insomuch that, if the gentleman hath but any guts in his brains, and is not more stupid than a gyryn frog, he will find himself obliged either to apply a faggot-stick or his sword to the rascal's jobbernal, give him the gentle lash, or make him cut a caper out at the window, by way of correction. This done, Catchpole is rich for four months at least, as if bastinadoes were his real harvest; for the monk, levite, usurer, or lawyer, will reward him roundly; and my gentleman must pay him such swingeing damages, that his acres must bleed for it, and he be in danger of miserably rotting within a stone doublet, as if he had struck the king."

Quoth Panurge, "I know an excellent remedy against this, used by the Lord of Basché." "What is it?" said Pantagruel. "The Lord of Basché," said Panurge, "was a brave, honest, noble-spirited gentleman, who, at his return from the long war, in which the Duke of Ferrara, with the help of the French, bravely defended himself against the fury of Pope Julius the Second, was every day cited, warned, and prosecuted at the suit and for the sport and fancy of the fat prior of Saint Louant.

"One morning, as he was at breakfast with some of his domestics (for he loved to be sometimes among them), he sent for one Loire, his baker, and his spouse, and for one Oudart, the vicar of his parish, who was also his butler, as the custom was then in France, then said to them, before his gentlemen and other servants: 'You all see how I am daily plagued with these rascally catchpoles; truly, if you do not lend me your helping hand, I am finally resolved to leave the country, and go fight for the sultan, or the devil, rather than be thus eternally teased. Therefore, to be rid of their damned visits hereafter, when any of them come here, be ready you baker and your wife to make your personal appearance in my great hall, in your wedding clothes, as if you were going to be affianced. Here take these ducats, which I give you to keep you in a fitting garb. As for you, Sir Oudart, be sure you make your personal appearance there in your fair surplice and stole, not forgetting your holy water, as if you were to wed them. Be you there also, Trudon,' said he to his drummer, 'with your pipe and tabour. The form of matrimony must be read, and the bride kissed at the beat of the tabour; then all of you, as the witnesses used to do in this country, shall give one another the remembrance of the wedding—which, you know, is to be a blow with your fist, bidding the party struck remember the nuptials by that token. This will but make you have the better stomach to your supper; but when you come to the catchpole's turn, thrash him thrice and threefold, as you would a sheaf of green corn; do not spare him; maul him, drub nim, lambast him, swinge him off, I pray you. Here, take these steel gauntlets, covered with kid. Head, back, belly, and sides, give him blows innumerable: he that gives him most, shall be my best friend. Fear not to be called to an account about it; I will stand by you: for the blows must seem to be given in jest, as it is customary among us at all weddings.'

"'Ay, but how shall we know the catchpole,' said the man of God? 'All sorts of people daily resort to this castle.' 'I have taken care of that,' replied the lord. 'When some fellow, either on foot, or on a scurvy jade, with a large broad silver ring on his thumb, comes to the door, he is certainly a catchpole: the porter, having civilly let him in, shall ring the bell; then be all ready, and come into the hall, to act the tragi-comedy whose plot I have now laid for you.'

"That numerical day, as chance would have it, came an old fat, ruddy catchpole. Having knocked at the gate, and then pissed, as most men will do, the porter soon found him out, by his large greasy spatterdashes, his jaded, hollow-flanked mare, his bag full of writs and informations dangling at his girdle, but, above all, by the large silver hoop on his left thumb.

"The porter was civil to him, admitted him kindly, and rung the bell briskly. As soon as the baker and his wife heard it, they clapped on their best clothes, and made their personal appearance in the hall, keeping their gravities like a new-made judge. The dominie put on his surplice and stole, and, as he came out of his office, met the catchpole, had him in there, and made him suck his face a good while, while the gauntlets were drawing on all hands; and then told him, 'You are come just in pudding-time; my lord is in his right cue; we shall feast like kings anon; here is to be swingeing doings; we have a wedding in the house; here, drink and cheer up; pull away.'

"While these two were at hand-to-fist, Basché, seeing all his people in the hall in their proper equipages, sends for the vicar. Oudart comes with the holy water pot, followed by the catchpole, who, as he came into the hall, did not forget to make good store of awkward cringes, and then served Basché with a writ. Basché gave him grimace for grimace, slipped an angel into his mutton fist, and prayed him to assist at the contract and ceremony: which he did. When it was ended, thumps and fisticuffs began to fly about among the assistants; but when it came to the catchpole's turn, they all laid on him so unmercifully with their gauntlets that they at last settled him, all stunned and battered, bruised and mortified, with one of his eyes black and blue, eight ribs bruised, his brisket sunk in, his omoplates in four quarters, his under jawbone in three pieces; and all this in jest, and no harm done. God wot how the levite belaboured him, hiding within the long sleeve of his canonical shirt his huge steel gauntlet lined with ermine; for he was a strong-built ball, and an old dog at fisticuffs. The catchpole, all of a bloody tiger-like stripe, with much ado crawled home to L'Isle Bouchart, well pleased and edified, however, with Basché's kind reception; and, with the help of the good surgeons of the place, lived as long as you would have him. From that time to this, not a word of the business; the memory of it was lost with the sound of the bells that rung with joy at his funeral."

CHAPTER XIII.

How, like Master Francis Villon, the Lord of Basché commended His Servants.

THE catchpole being packed off on Blind Sorrel—so he called his one-eyed mare—Basché sent for his lady, her women, and all his servants, into the arbour of his garden; had wine brought, attended with good store of pasties, hams, fruit, and other table-ammunition, for a nunchion; drank with them joyfully, and then told them this story:

"Master Francis Villon, in his old age, retired to Saint Maxent, in Poictou, under the patronage of a good honest abbot of the place. There to make sport for the mob, he undertook to get 'The Passion' acted after the way and in the dialect of the country. The parts being distributed, the play having been rehearsed, and the stage prepared, he told the mayor and aldermen that the mystery would be ready after Niort fair, and that there only wanted properties and necessaries, but chiefly clothes fit for the parts; so the mayor and his brethren took care to get them.

"Villon, to dress an old clownish father grey-beard, who was to represent God the Father, begged of Friar Stephen Tickletohy, sacristan to the Franciscan friars of the place, to lend him a cope and a stole. Tickletohy refused him, alleging that by their provincial statutes it was rigorously forbidden to give or lend anything to players. Villon replied that the statute reached no farther than farces, drolls, antics, loose and dissolute games, and that he asked no more than what he had seen allowed at Brussels and other places. Tickletohy, notwithstanding, peremptorily bid him provide himself elsewhere if he would, and not to hope for anything out of his monastical wardrobe. Villon gave an account of this to the players, as of a most abominable action, adding, that God would shortly revenge himself, and make an example of Tickletohy.

"The Saturday following he had notice given him that Tickletoby, upon the filly of the convent—so they call a young mare that was never leaped yet—was gone a mumping to Saint Ligarius, and would be back about two in the afternoon. Knowing this, he made a cavalcade of his devils of ‘The Passion’ through the town. They were all rigged with wolves’, calves’, and rams’ skins, laced and trimmed with sheep’s heads, bull’s feathers, and large kitchen tenter-hooks, girt with broad leathern girdles, whereat hanged dangling huge cow-bells and horse-bells, which made a horrid din. Some held in their claws black sticks full of squibs and crackers; others had long lighted pieces of wood, upon which, at the corner of every street, they flung whole handfuls of rosin-dust, that made a terrible fire and smoke. Having thus led them about, to the great diversion of the mob, and the dreadful fear of little children, he finally carried them to an entertainment at a summer-house without the gate that leads to Saint Ligarius.

“As they came near to the place, he espied Tickletooby afar off coming home from mumping, and told them in macaronic verse—

‘Hic est de patria, natus, de gente belistra,
Qui solet antiquo bribas portare bisacco!’

“‘A plague on his friarship,’ said the devils then; ‘the lousy beggar would not lend a poor cope to the fatherly father; let us fright him.’ ‘Well said,’ cried Villon; ‘but let us hide ourselves till he comes by, and then charge him home briskly with your squibs and burning sticks.’ Tickletooby being come to the place, they all rushed on a sudden into the road to meet him, and in a frightful manner threw fire from all sides upon him and his filly foal, ringing and tingling their bells, and howling like so many real devils, ‘Hho, hho, hho, hho, brrou, rrou, rrourrs, rrourrs, hoo, hou, hou, hho, hho, hhoi. Friar Stephen, don’t we play the devils rarely?’ The filly was soon scared out of her seven senses, and began to start, to funk it, to squirt it, to trot it, to fart it, to bound it, to gallop it, to kick it, to spurn it, to calcitrate it, to wince it, to frisk it, to leap it, to curvet it, with double jerks and bum-motions; insomuch that she threw down Tickletooby, though he held fast by the tree of the pack-saddle with might and main. Now his straps and stirrups were of cord; and on the right side his sandals were so entangled and twisted that he could not for the heart’s blood of him get out his foot. Thus he was dragged about by the filly through the road, scratching his bare breech all the way; she still multiplying her kicks against him, and straying for fear over hedge and ditch; insomuch that she trepanned his thick skull so that his cockle brains were dashed out near the Osanna or high-cross. Then his arms fell to pieces, one this way, and the other that way; and even so were his legs served at the same time. Then she made a bloody havoc with his puddings; and being got to the convent, brought back only his right foot and twisted sandal, leaving them to guess what had become of the rest.

"Villon, seeing that things had succeeded as he intended, said to his devils, 'You will act rarely; gentlemen devils, you will act rarely; I dare engage you will top your parts. I defy the devils of Saumur, Douay, Montmorillon, Langez, Saint Espain, Angers, nay, by gad, even those of Poitiers, for all their bragging and vapouring, to match you.'

"Thus, friends," said Basché, "I foresee that hereafter you will act rarely this tragical farce, since the very first time you have so skilfully hampered, bethwacked, belammed, and bebumped the catchpole. From this day I double your wages; as for you, my dear," said he to his lady, "make your gratifications as you please; you are my treasurer, you know. For my part, first and foremost, I drink to you all. Come on, box it about; it is good and cool. In the second place, you, Mr Steward, take this silver basin; I give it you freely. Then you, my gentlemen of the horse, take these two silver-gilt cups, and let not the pages be horse-whipped these three months. My dear, let them have my best white plumes of feathers, with the gold buckles to them. Sir Oudart, this silver flagon falls to your share; this other I give to the cooks. To the valets de chambre I give this silver basket; to the grooms, this silver-gilt boat; to the porter, these two plates; to the hostlers, these ten porringers. Trudon, take you these silver spoons and this sugar box. You, footman, take this large salt. Serve me well, and I will remember you. For, on the word of a gentleman, I had rather bear in war one hundred blows on my helmet, in the service of my country, than be one cited by these knavish catchpoles merely to humour this same gorbellied prior."

A Further Account of Catchpoles who were drubbed at Basché's House.

FOUR days after, another young, long-shanked, raw-boned catchpole, coming to serve Basché with a writ at the fat prior's request, was no sooner at the gate, but the porter smelt him out, and rung the bell; at whose second pull all the family understood the mystery. Loire was kneading his dough; his wife was sifting meal; Oudart was toping in his office; the gentlemen were playing at tennis; the Lord Basché at in and out with my lady; the waiting-men and gentlewomen at push-pin; the officers at lanterlue; and the pages at hot-cockles, giving one another smart bangs. They were all immediately informed that a catchpole was housed.

Upon this Oudart put on his sacerdotal, and Loire and his wife their nuptial badges; Trudon piped it, and then taboured it like mad: all made haste to get ready, not forgetting the gauntlets. Basché went into the outward yard; there the catchpole meeting him, fell on his marrow-bones, begged of him not to take it ill if he served him with a writ at the suit of the fat prior, and in a pathetic speech let him know that he was a public person, a servant to the mouking tribe, apparitor to the abbatial mitre, ready to do as much for him, nay, for the least of his servants, whensoever he would employ and use him.

“Nay, truly,” said the lord, “you shall not serve your writ till you have tasted some of my good quinquenays wine, and been a witness to a wedding which we are to have this very minute. Let him drink and refresh himself,” added he, turning towards the levitical butler, and then bring him into the hall. After which, Catchpole, well stuffed and moistened, came with Oudart to the place where all the actors in the farce stood ready to begin. The sight of their game set them a laughing, and the messenger of mischief grinned also for company’s sake. Then the mysterious words were muttered to and by the couple, their hands joined, the bride bussed, and all besprinkled with holy water. While they were bringing wine and kickshaws, thumps began to trot about by dozens. The catchpole gave the levite several blows. Oudart, who had his gauntlet hid under his canonical shirt, draws it on like a mitten, and then, with his clenched fist, souse he fell on the catchpole, and mauled him like a devil; the junior gauntlets dropped on him likewise like so many battering rams. “Remember the wedding by this, by that, by these blows,” said they. In short they stroked him so to the purpose that he pissed blood out at mouth, nose, ears, and eyes, and was bruised, thwacked, battered, bebumped, and crippled at the back, neck, breast, arms, and so forth. Never did the bachelors at Avignon, in carnival time, play more melodiously at raphe than was then played on the catchpole’s microcosm: at last down he fell.

They threw a great deal of wine on his snout, tied round the sleeve of his doublet a fine yellow and green favour, and got him upon his snotty beast, and God knows how he got to L’Isle Bouchart; where I cannot truly tell you whether he was dressed and looked after or no both by his spouse and the able doctors of the country, for the thing never came to my ears.

The next day they had a third part to the same tune, because it did not appear by the lean catchpole’s bag that he had served his writ. So the fat prior sent a new catchpole, at the head of a brace of bums, for his guard du corps, to summon my lord. The porter ringing the bell, the whole family was overjoyed, knowing that it was another rogue. Basché was at dinner with his lady and the gentlemen; so he sent for the catchpole, made him sit by him, and the bums by the women, and made them eat till their bellies cracked with their breeches unbuttoned. The fruit being served, the catchpole arose from table, and before the bums cited Basché. Basché kindly asked him for a copy of the warrant, which the other had got ready; he then takes witness, and a copy of the summons. To the catchpole and his bums he ordered four ducats for civility money. In the meantime all were withdrawn for the farce. So Trudon gave the alarm with his tabour. Basché desired the catchpole to stay and see one of his servants married, and witness the contract of marriage, paying him his fee. The catchpole slap dash was ready, took out his ink-horn, got paper immediately, and his bums by him.

Then Loire came into the hall at one door, and his wife with the gentlewomen at another, in nuptial accoutrements. Oudart, in pontificalibus, takes them both by their hands, asketh them their will, giveth them the matrimonial blessing, and was very liberal of holy water. The contract written, signed, and registered, on one side was brought wine and comfits; on the other, white and orange-tawny-coloured favours were distributed; on another, gauntlets privately handed about.

CHAPTER XV.

How the Ancient Custom at Nuptials is renewed by the Catchpole.

THE catchpole, having made shift to get down a swingeing sneaker of Breton wine, said to Basché, "Pray, sir, what do you mean? You do not give one another the memento of the wedding. By Saint Joseph's wooden shoe, all good customs are forgot. We find the form, but the hare is scampered; and the nest, but the birds are flown. There are no true friends now-a-days. You see how, in several churches, the ancient laudable custom of tipping, on account of the blessed saints O O, at Christmas, is come to nothing. The world is in its dotage, and doomsday is certainly coming all so fast. Now come on; the wedding, the wedding, the wedding; remember it by this." This he said striking Basché and his lady, then her women and the levite. Then the tabour beat a point of war, and the gauntlets began to do their duty; insomuch that the catchpole had his crown cracked in no less than nine places. One of the bums had his right arm put out of joint, and the other his upper jawbone or mandibule dislocated, so that it hid half his chin, with a denudation of the uvula, and sad loss of the molar, masticatory, and canine teeth. Then the tabour beat a retreat; the gauntlets were carefully hid in a trice, and sweetmeats afresh distributed to renew the mirth of the company. So they all drank to one another, and especially to the catchpole and his bums. But Oudart cursed and damned the wedding to the pit of hell, complaining that one of the bums had utterly disincornifistibulated his nether shoulder-blade. Nevertheless he scorned to be thought a flincher, and made shift to tope to him on the square.

The jawless bum shrugged up his shoulders, joined his hands, and by signs begged his pardon, for speak he could not. The sham bridegroom made his moan that the crippled bum had struck him such a horrid thump with his shoulder-of-mutton fist on the nether elbow that he was grown quite esperruquanchuzelubelouzerireliced down to his very heel, to the no small loss of mistress bride.

“But what harm had poor I done?” cried Trudon, hiding his left eye with his kerchief, and showing his tabour cracked on one side; “they were not satisfied with thus poaching, black and blueing, and morrambouzevezengouzequoquemorgasacbaquevezinemaffreliding my poor eyes, but they have also broke my harmless drum. Drums indeed are commonly beaten at weddings, and it is fit they should; but drummers are well entertained, and never beaten. Now let Belzebug even take the drum to make his devilship a nightcap.” “Brother,” said the lame catchpole, “never fret thyself; I will make thee a present of a fine, large, old patent, which I have here in my bag, to patch up thy drum, and for Madame Saint Ann’s sake I pray thee forgive us. By our Lady of Riviere, the blessed dame, I meant no more harm than the child unborn.” One of the querries, who, hopping and halting like a mumping cripple, mimicked the good limping Lord de la Roche Posay, directed his discourse to the bum with the pouting jaw, and told him, “What, Mr Manhound, was it not enough thus to have morcrocastebesteverestegrigeligoscopapopondrillated us all in our upper members with your botched mittens, but you must also apply such morderegripippiatabirofreluchamburelurecaquelurintimpaniments on our shin-bones with the hard tops and extremities of your cobbled shoes. Do you call this children’s play? By the mass, it is no jest.” The bum, wringing his hands, seemed to beg his pardon, muttering with his tongue, “Mon, mon, mon, vrelon, von, von,” like a dumb man. The bride crying laughed, and laughing cried, because the catchpole was not satisfied with drubbing her without choice or distinction of members, but had also rudely roused and toused her; pulled off her topping, and not having the fear of her husband before his eyes, treacherously trepignemanpenillorifrizonoufresterfumbledtumbled and squeezed her lower parts. “The devil go with it,” said Basché, “there was much need indeed that this same Master King (this was the catchpole’s name) should thus break my wife's back ; however, I forgive him now ; these are little nuptial caresses. But this I plainly perceive, that he cited me like an angel, and drubbed me like a devil. He hath something in him of Friar Thumpwell. Come, for all this, I must drink to him, and to you likewise his trusty esquires." "But," said his lady, "why hath he been so very liberal of his manual kindness to me without the least provocation ? I assure you I by no means like it ; but this I daresay for him, that he hath the hardest knuckles that ever I felt on my shoulders." The steward held his left arm in a scarf as if it had been rent and torn in twain. "I think it was the devil," said he, "that moved me to assist at these nuptials ; shame on ill luck ; I must needs be meddling with a pox, and now see what I have got by the bargain ; both my arms are wretchedly engoulevezinemassed and bruised. Do you call this a wedding ? By Saint Bridget's tooth, I had rather be at that of a Tom T——d-man. This is on my word, even just such another feast as was that of the Lapithæ, described by the philosopher of Samosata." One of the bums had lost his tongue. The two other, though they had more need to complain, made their excuse as well as they could, protesting that they had no ill design in thus dumfounding ; begging that, for goodness sake, they would forgive them ; and so, though they could hardly budge a foot, or wag along, away they crawled. About a mile from Basché's seat, the catchpole found himself somewhat out of sorts. The bums got to L'Isle Bouchard, publicly saying that since they were born they had never seen an honester gentleman than the Lord of Basché, or civiller people than his, and that they had never been at the like wedding (which I verily believe) ; but that it was their own faults if they had been tickled off and tossed about from post to pillar, since themselves had began the beating. So they lived I cannot exactly tell you how many days after this. But from that time to this it was held for a certain truth that Basché's money was more pestilential, mortal, and pernicious to the catchpoles and bums than were formerly the aurum Tholosanum and the Sejan horse to those that possessed them. Ever since this, he lived quietly, and Basché's wedding grew into a common proverb.

CHAPTER XVI.

How Friar John made Trial of the Nature of the Catchpoles.

"THIS story would seem pleasant enough," said Pantagruel, "were we not to have always the fear of God before our eyes." "It had been better," said Epistemon, "if those gauntlets had fallen upon the fat prior. Since he took a pleasure in spending his money partly to vex Basché, partly to see those catchpoles banged, good lusty thumps would have done well on his shaven crown, considering the horrid concussions now-a-days among those puny judges. What harm had done those poor devils the catchpoles?" "This puts me in mind," said Pantagrue, "of an ancient Roman named L. Neratius. He was of noble blood, and for some time was rich, but had this tyrannical inclination, that whenever he went out of doors, he caused his servants to fill their pockets with gold and silver, and meeting in the street your spruce gallants and better sort of beaux, without the least provocation, for his fancy, he used to strike them hard on the face with his fist, and immediately after that, to appease them, and hinder them from complaining to the magistrates, he would give them as much money as satisfied them, according to the law of the twelve tables. Thus he used to spend his revenue beating people for the price of his money." "By Sáint Bennet's sacred boot," quoth Friar John, "I will know the truth of it presently."

This said, he went on shore, put his hand in his fob, and took out twenty ducats, then said with a loud voice, in the hearing of a shoal of the nation of catchpoles, "Who will earn twenty ducats for being beaten like the devil?" "Io, Io, Io," said they all; "you will cripple us for ever, sir, that is most certain; but the money is tempting." With this they were all thronging who should be first to be thus preciousy beaten. Friar John singled him out of the whole knot of these rogues in grain a red-snouted catchpole, who upon his right thumb wore a thick, broad silver hoop, wherein was set a good large toad-stone. He had no sooner picked him out from the rest but I perceived that they all muttered and grumbled; and I heard a young thin-jawed catchpole, a notable scholar, a pretty fellow at his pen, and, according to public report, much cried up for his honesty at Doctors' Commons, making his complaint and muttering because this same crimson phiz carried away all the practice; and that if there were but a score and a half of bastinadoes to be got, he would certainly run away with eight and twenty of them. But all this was looked upon to be nothing but mere envy.

Friar John so unmercifully thrashed, thumped, and belaboured Redsnout, back and belly, sides, legs, and arms, head, feet, and so forth, with the home and frequently repeated application of one of the best members of a faggot, that I took him to be a dead man; then he gave him the twenty ducats, which made the dog get on his legs, pleased like a little king or two. The rest were saying to Friar John: "Sir, sir, brother devil, if it please you to do us the favour to beat some of us for less money, we are all at your devilship's command, bags, papers, pens, and all." Redsnout cried out against them, saying, with a loud voice: "Body of me, you little prigs, will you offer to take the bread out of my mouth? will you take my bargain over my head? would you draw and inveigle from me my clients and customers? Take notice, I summon you before the official this day sevensnight; I will law and claw you like any old devil of Vauverd, that I will." Then turning himself towards Friar John, with a smiling and joyful look, he said to him, "Reverend father in the devil, if you have found me a good hide, and have a mind to divert yourself once more by beating your humble servant, I will bate you half in half this time rather than lose your custom—do not spare me, I beseech you—I am aH, and more than all yours, good Mr Devil: head, lungs, tripes, guts, and garbage, and that at a pennyworth, I'll assure you." Friar John never heeded his proffers, but even left them. The other catchpoles were making addresses to Panurge, Epistemon, Gymnast, and others, entreating them charitably to bestow upon their carcasses a small beating, for otherwise they were in danger of keeping a long fast; but none of them had a stomach to it. Some time after, seeking fresh water for the ship's company, we met a couple of old female catchpoles of the place, miserably howling and weeping in concert. Pantagruel had kept on board, and already had caused a retreat to be sounded. Thinking that they might be related to the catchpole that was bastinadoed, we asked them the occasion of their grief. They replied that they had too much cause to weep; for that very hour, from an exalted triple tree, two of the honestest gentlemen in Catchpole-land had been made to cut a caper on nothing. "Cut a caper on nothing," said Gymnast; "my pages use to cut capers on the ground: to cut a caper on nothing should be hanging and choking, or I am out." "Ay, ay," said Friar John, "you speak of it like Saint John de la Palisse."

We asked them why they treated these worthy persons with such a choking hempen salad. They told us they had only borrowed, alias stolen, the tools of the mass, and hid them under the handle of the parish. "This is a very allegorical way of speaking," said Epistemon.

CHAPTER XVII.

How Pantagruel came to the Islands of Tohu and Bohu; and of the Strange Death of Widenostrils, the Swallower of Windmills.

THAT day Pantagruel came to the two islands of Tohu and Bohu, where the devil a bit we could find anything to fry with. For one Widenostrils, a huge giant, had swallowed every individual pan, skillet, kettle, frying-pan, dripping-pan, and brass and iron pot in the land, for want of windmills, which were his daily food. Whence it happened that, somewhat before day, about the hour of his digestion, the greedy churl was taken very ill with a kind of a surfeit, or crudity of stomach, occasioned, as the physicians said, by the weakness of the concocting faculty of his stomach, naturally disposed to digest whole windmills at a gust, yet unable to consume perfectly the pans and skillets; though it had indeed pretty well digested the kettles and pots, as they said they knew by the hypostases and eneoremes of four tubs of second hand drink which he had evacuated at two different times that morning. They made use of divers remedies, according to art, to give him ease; but all would not do: the distemper prevailed over the remedies, insomuch that the famous Wide-nostrils died that morning of so strange a death that I think you ought no longer to wonder at that of the poet Æschylus. It had been foretold him by the soothsayers that he would die on a certain day, by the ruin of something that should fall on him. That fatal day being come in its turn, he removed himself out of town, far from all houses, trees, rocks, or any other things that can fall and endanger by their ruin, and strayed in a large field, trusting himself to the open sky; there, very secure, as he thought, unless, indeed, the sky should happen to fall, which he held to be impossible. Yet, they say, that the larks are much afraid of it; for if it should fall, they must all be taken.

The Celts that once lived near the Rhine—they are our noble valiant French—in ancient times were also afraid of the sky's falling; for being asked by Alexander the Great what they feared most in this world, hoping well they would say that they feared none but him, considering his great achievements they made answer, that they feared nothing but the sky's falling: however, not refusing to enter into a confederacy with so brave a king; if you believe Strabo, lib. 7, and Arrian, lib. 1.

Plutarch also, in his book of the face that appears on the body of the moon, speaks of one Pharnaces, who very much feared the moon should fall on the earth, and pitied those that live under that planet, as the Æthiopians and Taprobanians, if so heavy a mass ever happened to fall on them; and would have feared the like of heaven and earth, had they not been duly propped up and borne by the atlantic pillars, as the ancients believed, according to Aristotle's testimony, lib. 5, Metaphys. Notwithstanding all this, poor Æschylus was killed by the fall of the shell of a tortoise, which falling from betwixt the claws of an eagle high in the air, just on his head, dashed out his brains.

Neither ought you to wonder at the death of another poet, I mean old, jolly Anacreon, who was choked with a grape stone. Nor at that of Fabius the Roman prætor, who was choked with a single goat's hair as he was supping up a porringer of milk. Nor at the death of that bashful fool who, by holding in his wind, and for want of letting out a bumgunshot, died suddenly in the presence of the Emperor Claudius. Nor at that of the Italian, buried on the Via Flaminia at Rome, who, in his epitaph complains that the bite of a she puss on his little finger was the cause of his death. Nor of that of Q. Lecanius Bassus, who died suddenly of so small a prick with a needle on his left thumb that it could hardly be discerned. Nor of Quenelault, a Norman physician, who died suddenly at Montpellier merely for having sideways took a worm out of his hand with a penknife. Nor of Philomenes, whose servant having got him some new figs for the first course of his dinner, whilst he went to fetch wine, a straggling well-hung ass got into the house, and seeing the figs on the table, without further invitation, soberly fell to. Philomenes coming into the room, and nicely observing with what gravity the ass eat its dinner, said to his man, who was come back: "Since thou hast set figs here for this reverend guest of ours to eat, methinks it is but reason thou also give him some of this wine to drink." He had no sooner said this, but he was so excessively pleased, and fell into so exorbitant a fit of laughter, that the use of his spleen took that of his breath utterly away, and he immediately died. Nor of Spurius Saufeius, who died supping up a soft boiled egg as he came out of a bath. Nor of him who, as Boccacio tells us, died suddenly by picking his grinders with a sage stalk. Nor of Phillipot Placut, who being brisk and hale, fell dead as he was paying an old debt; which causes, perhaps, many not to pay theirs, for fear of the like accident. Nor of the painter Zeuxis, who killed himself with laughing at the sight of the antic jobbernal of an old hag drawn by him. Nor, in short, of a thousand more of which authors write: as Varrius, Pliny, Valerius, J. Bapista Fulgosus, and Bacabery the elder. In short, Gaffer Widenostrils choked himself with eating a huge lump of fresh butter at the mouth of a hot oven, by the advice of physicians.

They likewise told us there that the King of Cullan in Bohu had routed the grandes of King Mecloth, and made sad work with the fortresses of Belima.

After this we sailed by the islands of Nargues and Zargues; also by the islands Telemabin and Geleneabin, very fine and fruitful in ingredients for clysters; and then by the islands of Enig and Erig, on whose account formerly the Landgrave of Hessa was swunged off with a vengeance.

END OF VOL. II.

THE WORKS OF RABELAIS.

“Beyond a doubt Rabelais was among the deepest, as well as boldest, thinkers of his age. His buffoonery was not merely Brutus’s rough stick, which contained a rod of gold: it was necessary as an amulet against the monks and legates. . . . I could write a treatise in praise of the moral elevation of Rabelais’ work, which would make the church stare, and the conventicle groan, and yet would be truth, and nothing but the truth. I class Rabelais with the great creative minds of the world, Shakspeare, Dante, Cervantes, etc.”

COLERIDGE.

“Rabelais seems to have been farther of the ridicule, a man of excellent and universal learning, as well as wit.”

SIR WILLIAM TEMPLE.

“Cardinal Duprat was so enamoured of Rabelais’ Works, that he was never without a copy of them. Wherever he went, his Rabelais went with him.”

“Cardinal Jean du Bellay was possessed of the same feeling; he admired Rabelais so much, that he refused a learned individual of the day a seat at his table because he had not read THE BOOK, for so Rabelais’ singular narrative was called.”

VENTOUILLAC.

“Of course everybody reads Rabelais.”

---

CHAPTER XVIII.

How Pantagruel met with a Great Storm at Sea.

THE next day we espied nine sail that came spooning before the wind: they were full of Dominicans, Jesuits, Capuchins, Hermits, Austins, Bernardins, Egnatins, Celestins, Theatins, Amadeans, Cordeliers, Carmelites, Minims, and the devil and all of other holy monks and friars, who were going to the Council of Chesil, to sift and garble some new articles of faith against the new heretics. Panurge was overjoyed to see them, being most certain of good luck for that day and a long train of others. So having courteously saluted the blessed fathers, and recommended the salvation of his precious soul to their devout prayers and private ejaculations, he caused seventy-eight dozen of Westphalia hams, units of pots of caviare, tens of Bohemia sausages, hundreds of botargoes, and thousands of fine angels, for the souls of the dead, to be thrown on board their ships. Pantagrue seemed metagrabolized, dozing, out of sorts, and as melancholic as a cat. Friar John, who soon perceived it, was inquiring of him whence should come this unusual sadness? when the master, whose watch it was, observing the fluttering of the ancient above the poop, and seeing that it began to overcast, judged that we should have wind; therefore he bid the boatswain call all hands upon deck, officers, sailors, foremast-men, swabbers, and cabin-boys, and even the passengers; made them first settle their top-sails, take in their sprit-sail; then he cried, in with your top-sails, lower the fore-sail, tallow under the parrels, brade up close all them sails, strike your top-masts to the cap, make all sure with your sheepsfeet, lash your guns fast. All this was nimbly done. Immediately it blowed a storm; the sea began to roar, and swell mountain high: the rut of the sea was great, the waves breaking upon our ship's quarter; the north-west wind blustered and over-blowed; boisterous gusts, dreadful clashing and deadly scuds of wind whistled through our yards, and made our shrouds rattle again. The thunder grumbled so horribly that you would have thought heaven had been tumbling about our ears; at the same time it lightened, rained, hailed; the sky lost its transparent hue, grew dusky, thick, and gloomy, so that we had no other light than that of the flashes of lightning, and rending of the clouds: the hurricanes, flaws, and sudden whirlwinds began to make a flame about us, by the lightnings, fiery vapours, and other aerial ejaculations. Oh, how our looks were full of amazement and trouble, while the saucy winds did rudely lift up above us the mountainous waves of the main! Believe me, it seemed to us a lively image of the chaos, where fire, air, sea, land, and all the elements were in a refractory confusion. Poor Panurge having, with the full contents of the inside of his doublet, plentifully fed the fish, greedy enough of such odious fare, sat on the deck all in a heap, with his nose and arse together, most sadly cast down, moping and half dead; invoked and called to his assistance all the blessed he and she saints he could muster up; swore and vowed to confess in time and place convenient, and then bawled out frightfully, steward, maitre d'hotel, see ho! my friend, my father, my uncle, prithee let us have a piece of powdered beef or pork, we shall drink but too much anon, for aught I see. Eat little and drink the more, will hereafter be my motto, I fear. Would to our dear Lord, and to our blessed, worthy, and sacred Lady, I were now, I say this very minute of an hour, well on shore, on terra firma, hale and easy. O twice and thrice happy those that plant cabbages! O Destinies, why did you not spin me for a cabbage-planter? O how few are there to whom Jupiter hath been so favourable, as to predestinate them to plant cabbages! They have always one foot on the ground, and the other not far from it. Dispute who will of felicity, and summum bonum, for my part, whosoever plants cabbages is now, by my decree, proclaimed most happy; for as good a reason as the philosopher Pyrrho, being in the same danger, and seeing a hog near the shore eating some scattered oats, declared it happy in two respects; first, because it had plenty of oats, and besides that, was on shore. Ha, for a divine and princely habitation, commend me to the cow's floor.

Murder! This wave will sweep us away, blessed Saviour! O, my friends! a little vinegar. I sweat again with mere agony. Alas, the mizen-sail is split, the gallery is washed away, the masts are sprung, the main-top-mast-head dives into the sea; the keel is up to the sun; our shrouds are almost all broke, and blown away. Alas! alas! where is our main course? Alis verlooren, by Godt: our top-mast is run adrift. Alas! who shall have this wreck? Friend, lend me here behind you one of these whales. Your lanthorn is fallen, my lads. Alas! do not let go the main tack nor the bowlin. I hear the block crack; is it broke? For the Lord's sake, let us have the hull, and let all the rigging be damned. Be, be, be, bous, bous, bous. Look to the needle of your compass, I beseech you, good Sir Astrophil, and tell us, if you can, whence comes this storm. My heart's sunk down below my midriff. By my troth, I am in a sad fright, bou, bou, bou, bous, bous, I am lost for ever. I conskrite myself for mere madness and fear. Bou, bou, bou, ou, ou, ou, bou, bou, bous. I sink, I am drowned, I am gone, good people, I am drowned.

CHAPTER XIX.

PANTAGRUEL, having first implored the help of the great and Almighty Deliverer, and prayed publicly with fervent devotion, by the pilot's advice held tightly the mast of the ship. Friar John had stripped himself to his waistcoat, to help the seamen. Epistemon, Ponocrates, and the rest did as much. Panurge alone sat on his breech upon deck, weeping and howling. Friar John espied him going on the quarter-deck, and said to him, Odzoons! Panurge the calf, Panurge the whiner, Panurge the brayer, would it not become thee much better to lend us here a helping hand, than to lie lowing like a cow, as thou dost, sitting on thy stones like a bald-breeched baboon? Be, be, be, bous, bous, bous, returned Panurge; Friar, John, my friend, my good father, I am drowning, my dear friend! I drown! I am a dead man, my dear father in God, I am a dead man, my friend; your cutting hanger cannot save me from this: alas! alas! we are above ela. Above the pitch, out of tune, and off the hinges. Be, be, be, bou, bous. Alas! we are now above g sol re ut. I sink, I sink, ha, my father, my uncle, my all. The water has got into my shoes by the collar; bous, bous, bous, paish, hu, hu, hu, he, he, he, ha, ha, I drown. Alas! alas! Hu, hu, hu, hu, hu, hu, hu, be, be, bous, bous, bobous, bobous, ho, ho, ho, ho, ho, alas! alas! Now I am like your tumblers, my feet stand higher than my head. Would to heaven I were now with those good holy fathers bound for the council, whom we met this morning, so godly, so fat, so merry, so plump, and comely. Holos, bolos, holas, holas, alas! This devilish wave, (mea culpa Deus,) I mean this wave of God, will sink our vessel. Alas, Friar John, my father, my friend, confession. Here I am down on my knees; confiteor; your holy blessing. Come hither and be damned, thou pitiful devil, and help us, said Friar,—who fell a swearing and cursing like a tinker,—in the name of thirty legions of black devils, come; will you come? Do not let us swear at this time, said Panurge; holy father, my friend, do not swear, I beseech you; to-morrow as much as you please. Holos, holos, alas, our ship leaks. I drown, alas, alas! I will give eighteen hundred thousand crowns to any one that will set me on shore, all bewrayed and bedaubed as I am now. If ever there was a man in my country in the like pickle. Confiteor, alas! a word or two of testament or codicil at least. A thousand devils seize the cuckoldy cow-hearted mongrel, cried Friar John. Ods belly, art thou talking here of making thy will, now we are in danger, and it behoveth us to bestir our stumps lustily, or never? Wilt thou come, ho devil? Midshipman, my friend; O the rare lieutenant; here Gymnast, here on the poop. We are, by the mass, all beshit now, our light is out. This is hastening to the devil as fast as it can. Alas, bou, bou, bou, bou, bou, alas, alas, alas, alas, said Panurge, was it here we were born to perish? Oh! ho! good people, I drown, I die. Consummatum est. I am sped—Magna, gna, gna, said Friar John. Fye upon him, how ugly the shitten howler looks. Boy, younker, see hoyh. Mind the pumps, or the devil choke thee. Hast thou hurt thyself? Zoons, here fasten it to one of these blocks. On this side, in the devil's name, hay—so my boy. Ah, Friar John, said Panurge, good ghostly father, dear friend, do not let us swear, you sin. Oh, ho, oh, ho, be be be bous, bous, bhous, I sink, I die, my friends. I die in charity with all the world. Farewell, in manus. Bohus bohous, bhousowauswaus. St. Michael of Aure! St. Nicholas! now, now or never, I here make you a solemn vow, and to our Saviour, that if you stand by me this time, I mean if you set me ashore out of this danger, I will build you a fine large little chapel or two, between Candé and Monsoreau, where neither cow nor calf shall feed. Oh ho, oh ho. Above eighteen pailfuls or two of it are got down my gullet; bous, bhous, bhous, bhous, how damned bitter and salt it is! By the virtue, said Friar John, of the blood, the flesh, the belly, the head, if I hear thee again howling, thou cuckoldy cur, I will maul thee worse than any sea wolf. Ods fish, why do not we take him up by the lugs and throw him overboard to the bottom of the sea? Here, sailor, ho honest fellow. Thus, thus, my friend, hold fast above. In truth, here is a sad lightning and thundering; I think that all the devils are got loose; it is holiday with them; or else Madame Proserpine is in child's labour: all the devils dance a morrice.

CHAPTER XX.

OH, said Panurge, you sin, Friar John, my former crony! former, I say, for at this time I am no more, you are no more. It goes against my heart to tell it you: for I believe this swearing doth your spleen a great deal of good; as it is a great ease to a wood cleaver to cry hem at every blow; and as one who plays at nine pins is wonderfully helped, if, when he hath not thrown his bowl right, and is like to make a bad cast, some ingenious stander by leans and screws his body half way about on that side which the bowl should have took to hit the pin. Nevertheless you offend, my sweet friend. But what do you think of eating some kind of cabirotaoes? Would not this secure us from this storm? I have read, that in a storm at sea no harm ever befel the ministers of the gods Cabiri, so much celebrated by Orpheus, Apollonius, Pherecides, Strabo, Pausanias, and Herodotus. He doats, he raves, the poor devil! A thousand, a million, nay, a hundred million of devils seize the hornified doddipole. Lend us a hand here, hoh, tiger, wouldst thou? Here, on the starboard side. Ods me, thou buffalo's head stuffed with relics, what ape's paternoster art thou muttering and chattering here between thy teeth?

That devil of a sea calf is the cause of all this storm, and is the only man who doth not lend a helping hand. By G—, if I come near thee, I'll fetch thee out by the head and ears with a vengeance, and ehaustise thee like any tempestative devil. Here mate, my lad, hold fast, till I have made a double knot. O brave boy! Would to heaven thou wert abbot of Talemouze, and that he that is were guardian of Croullay. Hold, brother Ponocrates, you will hurt yourself man. Epistemon, pray thee stand off out of the hatch-way. Methinks I saw the thunder fall there but just now. Con the ship, so ho—mind your steerage. Well said, thus, thus, steady, keep her thus, get the long boat clear—steady. Ods fish, the beak-head is staved to pieces. Grumble, devils, fart, behel, shite, a turd on the wave. If this be weather, the devil is a ram. Nay, by G—, a little more would have washed me clear away into the current. I think all the legions of devils hold here their provinicial chapter, or are polling, eanvassing, and wrangling for the election of a new rector. Starboard; well said. Take heed: have a eare of your noddle, lad, in the devil's name. So ho, starboard, starboard. Be, be, be, bous, bous, bous, cried Panurge, bous, bous, be, be, be, bous, bous. I am lost. I see neither heaven nor earth; of the four elements we have here only fire and water left. Bou, bou, bou, bous, bous, bous. Would it were the pleasure of the worthy divine bounty, that I were at this present hour in the elose at Seville, or at Innocent's, the pastry-cook, over against the painted wine vaults at Chinon, though I were to strip to my doublet, and bake the petti-pasties myself.

Honest man, could not you throw me ashore? you can do a world of good things, they say. I give you all Salmigondinois, and my large shore full of whilks, eoekles, and periwinkles if, by your industry, I ever set foot on firm ground. Alas, alas, I drown. Harkee, my friend, since we cannot get safe into port, let us come to an anehor into some road, no matter whither. Drop all your anehors; let us be out of danger, I beseeeh you. Here honest tar, get you into the ehains, and heave the lead, if it please you. Let us know how many fathom water we are in. Sound, friend, in the Lord Hardy's name. Let us know whether a man might here drink easily, without stooping. I am apt to believe one might. Helm a-lee, hoh, cried the pilot. Helm a-lee; a hand or two at the helm; about ships with her; helm a-lee, helm a-lee. stand off from the leech of the sail. Hoh! belay, here make fast below; hoh, helm a-less, lash sure the helm a-lee, and let her drive. Is is come to that? said Pantagruel: our good Saviour then help us. Let her lie under the sea, cried James Brahier, our ehief mate, let her drive. To prayers, to prayers, let all think on their souls, and fall to prayers; nor hope to escape but by a miracle. Let us, said Panurge, make some good pious kind of vow : alas, alas, alas ! bou, bou, be, be, be, bous, bous, bous, oho, oho, oho, oho, let us make a pilgrim : come, come, let every man club his penny towards it, come on. Here, here, on this side, said Friar John, in the Devil's name. Let her drive, for the Lord's sake unhang the rudder : hoh, let her drive, let her drive, and let us drink, I say, of the best and most cheering ; do you hear, steward, produce, exhibit ; for do you see this, and all the rest will as well go to the devil out of hand. A pox on that wind-broker Æolus, with his fluster-blusters. Sirrah, page, bring me here my drawer (for so he called his breviary) ; stay a little here, haul, friend, thus. Odzoons, here is a deal of hail and thunder to no purpose. Hold fast above, I pray you. When have we All-saints day ? I believe it is the unholy holiday of all the devil's crew. Alas, said Panurge, Friar John damns himself here as black as buttermilk for the nonce. Oh, what a good friend I lose in him. Alas, alas, this is another gats-bout than last year's. We are falling out of Scylla into Charybdis. Oho ! I drown. Confiteor ; one poor word or two by way of testament, Friar John, my ghostly father ; good Mr. Abstractor, my crony, my Achates, Xenomanes, my all. Alas ! I drown ; two words of testament here upon this ladder.

CHAPTER XXI.

A continuation of the storm, with a short discourse on the subject of making testaments at sea.

To make one's last will, said Epistemon, at this time that we ought to bestir ourselves and help our seamen, on the penalty of being drowned, seems to me as idle and ridiculous a maggot as that of some of Cæsar's men, who, at their coming into the Gauls, were mightily busied in making wills and codicils ; be-moaned their fortune, and the absence of their spouses and friends at Rome ; when it was absolutely necessary for them to run to their arms, and use their utmost strength against Ariovistus their enemy.

This also is to be as silly, as that jolt-headed loblolly of a carter, who, having laid his waggon fast in a slough, down on his marrow-bones, was calling on the strong-backed deity, Hercules, might and main, to help him at a dead lift, but all the while forgot to goad on his oxen, and lay his shoulder to the wheel, as it behoved him : as if a Lord have mercy upon us, alone, would have got his cart out of the mire.

What will it signify to make your will now ? for either we shall come off or drown for it. If we escape, it will not signify a straw to us ; for testaments are of no value or authority, but by the death of the testators. If we are drowned, will it not be drowned too ? Pr'ythee who will transmit it to the executors ? Some kind wave will throw it ashore, like Ulysses, replied Panurge ; and some king's daughter, going to fetch a walk in the fresco, on the evening, will find it, and take care to have it proved and fulfilled ; nay, and have some stately cenotaph erected to my memory, as Dido had to that of her good man Sichæus ; Æneas to Deiphobus, upon the Trojan shore, near Rhœte ; Andromache to Hector, in the city of Buthrotus ; Aristotle to Hermias and Eubulus ; the Athenians to the poet Euripides ; the Romans to Drusus in Germany, and to Alexander Severus, their Emperor in the Gauls ; Agentier to Callaischre ; Xenocrates to Lysidices ; Timares to his son Teleutagoras ; Eupolis and Aristodice to their son Theotimus ; Onestus to Timocles ; Callimachus to Sopolis, the son of Diocliides ; Catullus to his brother ; Statius to his father : Germain of Brie to Hervé, the Breton tarpaulin. Art thou mad, said Friar John, to run on at this rate ? Help, here, in the name of five hundred thousand millions of cart-loads of devils, help ! may a shanker gnaw thy moustachios, and the three rows of pock-royals and cauliflowers cover thy bum and turdbarrel, instead of breeches and cod-piece. Cod-sooks our ship is almost overset. Ods death, how shall we clear her ? it is well if she do not founder. What a devilish sea there runs ! She will neither try nor hull ; the sea will overtake her, so we shall never escape ; the devil escape me. Then Pantagruel was head to make a sad exclamation, saying, with a loud voice, Lord save us, we perish ; yet not as we would have it, but thy holy will be done. The Lord and the blessed Virgin be with us, said Panurge. Holos, alas, I drown ; be be bous, be bous, bous : in manus. Good heaven, send me some dolphins to carry me safe on shore, like a pretty little Arion. I shall make shift to sound the harp, if it be not unstrung. Let nineteen legions of black devils seize me, said Friar John, (the Lord be with us, whispered Panurge, between his chattering teeth). If I come down to thee, I will show thee to some purpose, that the badge of thy humanity dangles at a calf's breech, thou ragged, horned, cuckoldy booby : magna, magnan, magnan : come hither and help us, thou great weeping calf, or may thirty millions of devils leap on thee. Wilt thou come, sea-calf ? Fie ! how ugly the howling whelp looks. What, always the same ditty ? Come on now, my bonny drawer. This he said, opening his breviary. Come forward, thou and I must be somewhat serious for a while; let me peruse thee stiffly. Beatus vir qui non abiit. Pshaw, I know all this by heart; let us see the legend of Mons. St. Nicholas.

Tempeste was a mighty flogger of lads, at Mountaigu College. If pedants be damned for whipping poor little innocent wretches their scholars, he is, upon my honour, by this time fixed within Ixion's wheel, lashing the crop-eared bob-tailed cur that gives it motion. If they are saved for having whipped innocent lads, he ought to be above the—

CHAPTER XXII.

An end of the storm.

SHORE, shore! cried Pantagruel. Land to, my friends, I see land! Pluck up a good spirit, boys, it is within a kenning. So! we are not far from a port.—I see the sky clearing up to the northwards.—Look to the south-east! Courage, my hearts, said the pilot; now she will bear the hullock of a sail: the sea is much smoothen; some hands aloft to the main-top. Put the helm a-weather. Steady! steady! Haul your after mizen bowlings. Haul, haul, haul! Thus, thus, and no near. Mind your steerage; bring your main tack aboard. Clear your sheets; clear your bowlings; port, port. Helm a lee. Now to the sheet on the starboard side, thou son of a whore. Thou art mightily pleased, honest fellow, quoth Friar John, with hearing make mention of thy mother. Luff, luff, cried the quartermaster that conned the ship, keep her full, luff the helm. Luff. It is, answered the steersman. Keep her thus. Get the bonnets fixed. Steady, steady.

That is well said, said Friar John; now this is something like a tansey. Come, come, come children, be nimble. Good, Luff, luff, thus. Helm a-weather. That is well said and thought on. Methinks the storm is almost over. It was high time, faith: however, the Lord be thanked. Our devils begin to scamper. Out with all your sails. Hoist your sails. Hoist. That is spoke like a man, hoist, hoist. Here, a God's name, honest Ponocrates; thou art a lusty fornicator; the whoreson will get none but boys. Eusthenes, thou art a notable fellow. Run up to the fore-top sail. Thus, thus." Well said, I faith; thus, thus. I dare not fear anything all this while, for it is holiday. Vea, vea, vea! huzza! This shout of the seaman is not amiss, and pleases me, for it is holiday. Keep her full thus. Good. Cheer up my merry mates, all, cried out Epistemon; I see already Castor on the right. Be, be, bous, bous, bous, said Panurge, I am much afraid it is the bitch Helen. It is truly Mixarchagenas, returned Epistemon, if thou likest better that denomination, which the Argives give him. Ho, ho! I see land too: let her bear in with the harbour: I see a good many people on the beach: I see a light on an obeliscolychny. Shorten your sails, said the pilot; fetch the sounding line: we must double that point of land, and mind the sands. We are clear of them, said the sailors. Soon after, Away she goes, quoth the pilot, and so doth the rest of our fleet: help came in good season.

By St. John, said Panurge, this is spoke somewhat like: O the sweet word! there is the sweet soul of music in it. Mgna, mgna, mgna, said Friar John; if ever thou taste a drop of it, let the devil's dam taste me, thou ballocky devil. Here, honest soul, here is a full sneaker of the very best. Bring the flagons: dost hear, Gymnast? and that same large pasty jambic, or gammonic, even as you will have it. Take heed you pilot her in right.

Cheer up, cried out Pantagruel; cheer up, my boys: let us be ourselves again. Do you see yonder, close by our ship, two barks, three sloops, five ships, eight pinks, four yawls, and six frigates, making towards us, sent by the good people of the neighbouring island to our relief? But who is this Ucalegon below, that cried, and makes such a sad moan? Were it not that I hold the mast firmly with both my hands, and keep it straighter than two hundred tacklings—I would——It is, said Friar John, that poor devil, Panurge, who is troubled with a calf's ague; he quakes for fear when his belly is full. If, said Pantagruel, he hath been afraid during this dreadful hurricane and dangerous storm, provided he hath done his part like a man, I do not value him a jot the less for it. For as, to fear in all encounters, is the mark of a heavy and cowardly heart; as Agamemnon did, who, for that reason, is ignominiously taxed by Achilles with having dog's eyes, and a stag's heart; so, not to fear when the case is evidently dreadful, is a sign of want or smallness of judgment. Now, if anything ought to be feared in this life, next to offending God, I will not say it is death. I will not meddle with the disputes of Socrates and the academics, that death of itself is neither bad nor to be feared; but, I will affirm, that this kind of shipwreck is to be feared, or nothing is. For, as Homer saith, it is a grievous, dreadful, and unnatural thing, to perish at sea. And, indeed, Æneas, in the storm that took his fleet near Sicily, was grieved that he had not died by the hand of the brave Diomedes; and said that those were three, nay four times happy, who perished in the conflagration at Troy. No man here hath lost his life, the Lord our Saviour be eternally praised for it: but in truth here is a ship sadly out of order. Well, we must take care to have the damage repaired. Take heed we do not run aground and bulge her.

CHAPTER XXIII.

WHAT cheer, ho, fore and aft? quoth Panurge. Oh ho! all is well, the storm is over. I beseech ye, be so kind as to let me be the first that is sent on shore; for I would by all means a little untruss a point. Shall I help you still? Here, let me see, I will coil this rope; I have plenty of courage, and of fear as little as may be. Give it me yonder, honest tar. No, no, I have not a bit of fear. Indeed, that same decumane wave, that took us fore and aft, somewhat altered my pulse. Down with your sails: well said. How now, Friar John? you do nothing. Is it time for us to drink now? Who can tell but St. Martin's running footman may still be hatching us some further mischief? shall I come and help you again? Pork and peas choke me, if I do heartily repent, though too late, not having followed the doctrine of the good philosopher, who tell us that to walk by the sea, and to navigate by the shore, are very safe and pleasant things: just as it is to go on foot, when we hold our horse by the bridle. Ha! ha! ha! by G— all goes well. Shall I help you here, too? Let me see, I will do this as it should be, or the devil is in it.

Epistemon, who had the inside of one of his hands all flayed and bloody, having held a tackling with might and main, hearing what Pantagruel had said, told him: You may believe, my lord, I had my share of fear as well as Panurge; yet I spared no pains in lending my helping hand. I considered, that since by fatal and unavoidable necessity, we must all die, it is the blessed will of God that we die this or that hour, and this or that kind of death: nevertheless, we ought to implore, invoke, pray, beseech, and supplicate him: but we must not stop there; it behoveth us also to use our endeavours on our side, and, as the holy writ saith, to co-operate with him.

You know what C. Flaminius, the consul, said, when by Hannibal's policy he was penned up near the lake of Peruse, alias Thrasymene. Friends, said he to his soldiers, you must not hope to get out of this place barely by vows or prayers to the gods; no, it is by fortitude and strength we must escape and cut ourselves a way with the edge of our swords through the midst of our enemies.

Sallust likewise makes M. Portius Cato say this: The help of the gods is not obtained by idle vows and womanish complaints; it is by vigilance, labour, and repeated endeavours, that all things succeed according to our wishes and designs. If a man, in time of need and danger, is negligent, heartless, and lazy, in vain he implores the gods; they are then justly angry and incensed against him. The devil take me, said Friar John (I'll go his halves, quote Panurge), if the close of Seville had not been all gathered, vintaged, gleaned, and destroyed, if I had only sung contra hostium insidias (matter of breviary) like all the rest of the monkish devils, and had not bestirred myself to save the vineyard as I did, despatching the truant picaroons of Lerné with the staff of the cross.

Let her sink or swim a God's name, said Panurge, all's one to Friar John; he doth nothing; his name is Friar John Dottle; for all he sees me here sweating and puffing to help with all my might this honest tar, first of the name.—Hark you me, dear soul, a word with you;—but pray be not angry. How thick do you judge the planks of the ship to be? Some two good inches and upwards, returned the pilot; don't fear. Odschilderkins, said Panurge, it seems then we are within two fingers' breadth of damnation.

Is this one of the nine comforts of matrimony? Ah, dear soul, you do well to measure the danger by the yard of fear. For my part, I have none on't; my name is William Dreadnought. As for my heart, I have more than enough on't; I mean none of your sheep's heart; but of wolf's heart; the courage of a bravo. By the pavilion of Mars, I fear nothing but danger.

CHAPTER XXIV.

How Panurge was said to have been afraid without reason, during the storm.

Good morrow, gentlemen, said Panurge, good morrow to you all: you are in very good health, thanks to heaven and yourselves: you are all heartily welcome, and in good time. Let us go on shore.—Here cockswain, get the ladder over the gunnel; man the sides: man the pinnace, and get her by the ship's side. Shall I lend a hand here? I am stark mad for want of business, and would work like any two yoke of oxen. Truly this is a fine place, and these look like a very good people. Children, do you want me still in anything? do not spare the sweat of my body, for God's sake. Adam—that is man—was made to labour and work, as the birds were made to fly. Our Lord's will is, that we get our bread with the sweat of our brows, not idling and doing nothing, like this tatterdamallion of a monk here, this Friar Jack, who is fain to drink to hearten himself up, and dies for fear.—Rare weather.—I now find the answer of Anacharsis, the noble philosopher, very proper: being asked what ship he reckoned the safest? he replied, That which is in the harbour. He made yet a better repartee, said Pantagruel, when somebody inquiring which is greater, the number of the living or that of the dead? he asked them, amongst which of the two they reckoned those that are at sea? ingeniously implying, that they are continually in danger of death, dying alive, and living die. Portius Cato also said, that there were but three things of which he would repent; if ever he had trusted his wife with his secret, if ever he had idled away a day, and if he had ever gone by sea to a place which he could visit by land. By this dignified frock of mine, said Friar John to Panurge, friend, thou hast been afraid during the storm, without cause or reason: for thou wert not born to be drowned, but rather to be hanged, and exalted in the air, or to be roasted in the midst of a jolly bonfire. My lord, would you have a good cloak for the rain; leave me off your wolf and badger-skin mantle: let Panurge but be flayed, and cover yourself with his hide. But do not come near the fire, nor near your blacksmith's forges, a God's name; for in a moment you will see it in ashes. Yet be as long as you please in the rain, snow, hail, nay, by the devil's maker, throw yourself, or dive down to the very bottom of the water, I'll engage you'll not be wet at all. Have some winter boots made of it, they'll never take in a drop of water: make bladders of it to lay under boys, to teach them to swin, instead of corks, and they will learn without the least danger. His skin, then, said Pantagruel, should be like the herb called true maiden's hair, which never takes wet nor moistness, but still keeps dry, though you lay it at the bottom of the water as long as you please; and for that reason is called Adiantos.

Friend Panurge, said Friar John, I pray thee never be afraid of water: thy life for mine thou are threatened with a contrary element. Ay, ay, replied Panurge, but the devil's cooks dote sometimes, and are apt to make horrid blunders as well as others; often putting to boil in water, what was designed to be roasted on the fire: like the head cooks of our kitchen, who often lard partridges, queests, and stock-doves, with intent to roast them, one would think; but it happens sometimes, that they even turn the partridges into the pot, to be boiled with cabbages, the queests with leak pottage, and the stock-cloves with turnips. But hark you me, good friends, I protest before this noble company, that as for the ehapel which I vowed to Mons. St. Nicholas, between Candé and Monsoreau, I honestly mean that it shall be a ehapel of rose-water, which shall be be where neither eow nor ealf shall be fed, for between you and I, I intend to throw it to the bottom of the water. Here is a rare rogue for you, said Eusthenes: here is a pure rogue, a rogue in grain, a rogue enough, a rogue and a half. He is resolved to make good the Lombardic proverb, Passato el pericolo, gabbato el santo? (The danger once over, the saint is despised.)

“The devil was siek, the devil a monk would be;
The devil was well, the devil a monk was he.”

CHAPTER XXV.

How, after the storm, Pantagruel went on shore in the Islands of the Macreons.

IMMEDIATELY after, he went ashore at the port of an island which they called the island of the Macreons. The good people of the plaee received us very honourably. An old Macrobius (so they called their eldest elderman) desired Pantagruel to come to the town-house to refresh himself, and eat something; but he would not budge a foot from the mole till all his men were landed. After he had seen them, he gave order that they should all change clothes, and that some of all the stores in the fleet should be brought on shore, that every ship's crew might live well; which was aeordingly done, and God wot how well they all toped and earouzed. The people of the plaee brought them provisions in abundance. The Pantagruelists returned them more; as the truth is their's were somewhat damaged by the late storm. When they had well-stuffed the insides of their doublets, Pantagruel desired every one to lend their help to repair the damage; which they readily did. It was easy enough to refit there; for all the inhabitants of the island were carpenters, and all such handicrafts as are seen in the arsenal at Veniec. None but the largest island was inhabited, having three ports and ten parishes; the rest being overrun with wood, and desert, much like the forest of Arden. We entreated the old Maerobius to show us what what was worth seeing in the island; which he did; and in the desert and dark forest we discovered several old ruined temples, obelisks, pyramids, monuments, and ancient tombs, with divers inscriptions and epitaphs: some of them in hieroglyphic characters; others in the Ionic dialect; some in the Arabic, Agarenian, Slavonian, and other tongues; of which Epistemon took an exact account. In the interior, Panurge said to Friar John, is this the islands of the Maereons? Maereon signifies in Greek an old man, or one much stricken in years. What is that to me, said Friar John, how can I help it? I was not in the country when they christened it. Now I think on it, quoth Panurge, I believe the name of mackerel (that is a bawd in French) was derived from it; for proeuring is the province of the old, as buttock-riggling is that of the young. Therefore I do not know but this may be the bawdy or Mackerel island, the original and prototype of the island of that name at Paris. Let us go and dredge for cock oysters. Old Macrobius asked, in the Ionic tongue, How, and by what industry and labour, Pantagruel got to their port that day, there having been such blustering weather, and such a dreadful storm at sea. Pantagruel told him that the Almighty Preserver of mankind had regarded the simplicity and sincere affection of his servants, who did not travel for gain or sordid profit; the sole design of their voyage being a studious desire to know, see, and visit the Oracle of Baebue, and take the word of the Bottle upon some difficulties offered by one of the company: nevertheless this had not been without great affliction, and evident danger of shipwreck. After that, he asked him what he judged to be the cause of that terrible tempest, and if the adjacent seas were thus frequently subject to storms; as in the ocean are the Ratz of Sammaieu, Maumusson, and in the Mediterranean sea the gulph of Sataly, Montargentan, Piombino, Capo Melio in Laconia, the Straits of Gibraltar, Faro oi Messina, and others.

CHAPTER XXVI.

How the good Macrobius gave us an account of the Mansion and Decease of the Heroes.

THE good Macrobius then answered,—Friendly strangers, this island is one of the Sporades; not one of your Sporades that lie in the Carpathian sea, but one of the Sporades of the ocean; in former times rich, frequented, wealthy, populous, full of traffic, and in the dominions of the rulers of Britain, but now, by course of time, and in these latter ages of the world, poor and desolate, as you see. In this dark forest, above seventy-eight thousand Persian leagues in compass, is the dwelling-place of the demons and heroes, that are grown old, and we believe that some one of them died yesterday; since the comet, which we saw for three days before together, shines no more : and now it is likely, that at his death there arose this horrible storm ; for while they are alive all happiness attends both this and the adjacent islands, and a settled calm and serenity. At the death of every one of them, we commonly hear in the forest, loud and mournful groans, and the whole land is infested with pestilence, earthquakes, inundations, and other calamities ; the air with fogs and obscurities, and the sea with storms and hurricanes. What you tell us, seems to me likely enough, said Pantagruel. For, as a torch or candle, as long as it hath life enough and is lighted, shines round about, disperses its light, delights those that are near it, yields them its service and clearness, and never causes any pain or displeasure ; but as soon as it is extinguished, its smoke and evaporation infect the air, offend the by-standers, and are noisome to all : so, as long as those noble and renowned souls inhabit their bodies, peace, profit, pleasure, and honour never leave the places where they abide ; but as soon as they leave them, both the continent and adjacent islands are annoyed with great commotions ; in the air fogs, darkness, thunder, hail ; tremblings, pulsations, agitations of the earth ; storms and hurricanes at sea ; together with sad complaints amongst the people, broachings of religions, changes in governments, and ruins of commonwealths.

We had a sad instance of this lately, said Eustemon, at the death of that valiant and learned knight, William du Bellay ; during whose life France enjoyed so much happiness, that all the rest of the world looked upon it with envy, sought friendship with it, and stood in awe of its power ; but, now, after his decease, it hath for a considerable time been the scorn of the rest of the world.

Thus, said Pantagruel, Anchises being dead at Drepani, in Sicily, Æneas was dreadfully tossed and endangered by a storm ; and perhaps for the same reason, Herod, that tyrant and cruel King of Judea, finding himself near the passage of a horrid kind of death,—for he died of a phthiriasis, devoured by vermin and lice ; as before him died L. Sylla, Pherecydes, the Syrian, the preceptor of Pythagoras, the Greek poet Alcmaeon, and others, and foreseeing that the Jews would make bonfires at his death, caused all the nobles and magistrates to be summoned to his seraglio, out of all the cities, towns, and castles of Judea, fraudulently pretending that he had some things of moment to impart to them. They made their personal appearance ; whereupon he caused them all to be shut up in the hippodrome of the seraglio ; then said to his sister Salome and Alexander her husband, I am certain that the Jews will rejoice at my death ; but if you will observe and perform what I tell you, my funeral shall be honourable, and there will be a general mourning. As soon as you see me dead, let my guards, to whom I have given strict commission to that purpose, kill all the noblemen and magistrates that are secured in the hippodrome. By these means, all Jewry shall, in spite of themselves, be obliged to mourn and lament, and foreigners will imagine it to be for my death, as if some heroic soul had left her body. A desperate tyrant wished as much when he said, When I die, let earth and fire be mixed together; which was as good as to say, let the whole world perish. Which saying the tyrant Nero altered, saying, While I live, as Suetonius affirms it. This detestable saying, of which Cicero, lib. De Finib. and Seneca, lib. 2, De Clementia, make mention, is ascribed to the Emperor Tiberius, by Dion Nicæus and Suidas.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Pantagruel's discourse of the decease of heroic souls; and of the dreadful prodigies that happened before the death of the late Lord de Langey.

I WOULD not, continued Pantagruel, have missed the storm that hath thus disordered us, were I also to have missed the relation of these things told us by this good Macrobius. Neither am I unwilling to believe what he said of a comet that appears in the sky some days before such a decease. For some of those souls are so noble, so precious, and so heroic that heaven gives us notice of their departing some days before it happens. And as a prudent physician, seeing by some symptoms that his patient draws towards his end, some days before, gives notice of it to his wife, children, kindred, and friends, that, in that little time he hath yet to live, they may admonish him to settle all things in his family, to tutor and instruct his children as much as he can, recommend his relict to his friends in her widowhood, and declare what he knows to be necessary about a provision for the orphans; that he may not be surprised by death without making his will, and may take care of his soul and family: in the same manner the heavens, as it were, joyful for the approaching reception of those blessed souls, seem to make bonfires by those comets and blazing meteors, which they at the same time kindly design should prognosticate to us here, that in a few days one of those venerable souls is to leave her body, and this terrestrial globe. Not altogether unlike this was what was formerly done at Athens, by the judges of the Areopagus. For when they gave their verdict to cast or clear the culprits that were tried before them, they used certain notes according to the substance of the sentences; by  $\Theta$ , signifying sentence to death; by T, absolution; by A, ampliation or a demur, when the case was not sufficiently examined. Thus, having publicly set up those letters, they eased the relations and friends of the prisoners, and such others as desired to know their doom, of their doubts. Likewise by these comets, as in ætherial characters, the heavens silently say to us, Make haste, mortals, if you would know or learn of the blessed souls any thing concerning the public good, or your private interest; for their catastrophe is near, which being past, you will vainly wish for them afterwards.

The good-natured heavens still do more: and that mankind may be declared unworthy of the enjoyment of those renowned souls, they fright and astonish us with prodigies, monsters, and other foreboding signs, that thwart the order of nature.

Of this we had an instance several days before the decease of the heroic soul of the learned and valiant Chevalier de Langey, of whom you have already spoken. I remember it, said Epistemon; and my heart still trembles within me, when I think on the many dreadful prodigies that we saw five or six days before he died. For the Lords D'Assier, Chemant, one-eyed Mailly, St. Ayl, Villeneuve-la-Guyart, Master Gabriel, physieian of Savillan, Rabelais, Cohuau, Massuau, Majoriei, Bullou, Cereu, alias Bourgmaistre, Francis Proust, Ferron, Charles Girard, Francis Bourré, and many other friends and servants to the deceased, all dismayed, gazed on each other without uttering one word; yet not without foreseeing that France would in a short time be deprived of a knight so accomplished, and necessary for its glory and protection, and that heaven claimed him again as its due. By the tufted tip of my cowl, cried Friar John, I am even resolved to become a scholar before I die. I have a pretty good head-piece of my own, you must confess. Now pray give me leave to ask you a civil question. Can these same heroes or demigods you talk of, die? May I never be damned, if I was not so much a lobecock as to believe they had been immortal, like so many fine angels. Heaven forgive me! but this most reverend father, Macrobius, tells us they die at last. Not all, returned Pantagruel.

The stoies held them all to be mortal, except one, who alone is immortal, impassable, invisible. Pindar plainly saith, that there is no more thread, that is to say, no more life, spun from the distaff and flax of the hard-hearted fates for the goddesses Hamadryades, than there is for those trees that are preserved by them, which are good, sturdy, downright oaks; whence they derived their original, according to the opinion of Callimachus, and Pausanias in Phoci. With whom concurs Martianus Capella. As for the demigods, fauns, satyrs, sylvans, hobgoblins, ægipanes, nymphs, heroes, and demons, several men have, from the total sum, which is the result of the divers ages calculated by Hesiod, reckoned their life to be 9720 years: that sum consisting of four special numbers orderly arising from one, the same added together, and multiplied by four every way, amounts to forty; these forties, being reduced into triangles by five times, make up the total of the aforesaid number. See Plutarch, in his book about the Cessation of Oracles.

This, said Friar John, is not matter of breviary; I may believe as little or as much of it as you and I please. I believe, said Pantagruel, that all intellectual souls are exempted from Atropos's scissors. They are all immortal, whether they be of angels, of demons, or human: yet I will tell you a story concerning this, that is very strange, but is written and affirmed by several learned historians.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

How Pantagruel related a verry sad story of the death of the heroes.

EPITHERSES, the father of Æmilian the rhetorician, sailing from Greece to Italy, in a ship freighted with divers goods and passengers, at night the wind failed them near the Echinades, some islands that lie between the Morea and Tunis, and the vessel was driven near Paxos. When they got thither, some of the passengers being asleep, others awake, the rest eating and drinking, a voice was heard that called aloud, Thamous! which cry surprised them all. This same Thamous was their pilot, an Egyptian by birth, but known by name only to some few travellers. The voice was heard a second time, calling Thamous, in a frightful tone; and none making answer, but trembling, and remaining silent, the voice was heard a third time, more dreadful than before.

This caused Thamous to answer, Hear am I; what dost thou call me for? What wilt thou have me do? Then the voice, louder than before, bid him publish, when he should come to Palodes, that the great god Pan was dead.

Epitherses related that all the mariners and passengers, having heard this, were extremely amazed and frighted; and that consulting among themselves, whether they had best conceal or divulge what the voice had enjoined; Thamous said, his advice was, that if they happened to have a fair wind, they should proceed without mentioning a word of it, but if they chanced to be becalmed, he would publish what he had heard. Now when they were near Palodes, they had no wind, neither were they in any current. Thamons then getting up on the top of the ship's fore-castle, and casting his eyes on the shore, said that he had been commanded to proclaim that the great god Pan was dead. The words were hardly out of his mouth, when deep groans, great lamentations, and doleful shrieks, not of one person, but of many together, were heard from the land.

The news of this—many being present—was soon spread at Rome; insomuch that Tiberius, who was then emperor, sent for this Thamons, and having heard him, gave credit to his words. And inquiring of the learned in his court, and at Rome, who was that Pan? he found by their relation that he was the son of Mereury and Penelope, as Herodotus and Cicero in his third book of the Nature of the Gods had written before.

For my part, I understand it of that great Saviour of the faithful, who was shamefully put to death at Jerusalem, by the envy and wickedness of the doctors, priests, and monks of the Mosaic law. And methinks, my interpretation is not improper; for he may lawfully be said in the Greek tongue to be Pan, since he is our all. For all that we are, all that we live, all that we have, all that we hope, is him, by him, from him, and in him. He is the god Pan, the great shepherd, who, as the loving shepherd Corydon affirms, hath not only a tender love and affection for his sheep, but also for their shepherds. At his death, complaints, sighs, fears, and lamentations were spread through the whole fabric of the universe, whether heavens, land, sea or hell.

The time also concurs with this interpretation of mine: for this most good, most mighty Pan, our only Saviour, died near Jerusalem, during the reign of Tiberius Caesar.

Pantagruel, having ended this discourse, remained silent, and full of contemplation. A little while after, we saw the tears flow out of his eyes as big as ostrich's eggs. God take me presently, if I tell you one single syllable of a lie in the matter.

CHAPTER XXIX.

How Pantagruel sailed by the Sneaking Island, where Shrovetide reigned.

THE jovial fleet being refitted and repaired, new stores taken in, the Macreons over and above satisfied and pleased with the money spent there by Pantagruel, our men in better humour than they used to be, if possible, we merrily put to sea the next day, near sunset, with a delicious fresh gale.

Xenomanes showed us afar off the Sneaking Island, where resigned Shrovetide, of whom Pantagruel had heard much talk formerly: for that reason he would gladly have seen him in person, had not Xenomanes advised him to the contrary: first, because this would have been much out of our way; and then for the lean cheer, (manger maigre,) which he told us was to be found at that prince's court, and indeed all over the island.

You can see nothing there for your money, said he, but a huge greedy guts, a tall woundy swallower of hot wårdens and muscles; a long-shanked mole-catcher; an overgrown bottler of hay; a mossy-chinned demi-giant, with a double shaven crown, of lantern breed; a very great loitering noddly-peaked youngster, banner bearer to the fish-eating tribe, dictator of mustard land, flogger of little children, calciner of ashes, father and foster-father to physieians; swarming with pardons, indulgences, and stations; a very honest man; a good catholic, and as brimful of devotion as ever he can hold.

He weeps the three-fourth parts of the day, and never assists at any weddings, but, give the devil his due, he is the most industrious larding-stiek and skewer-maker in forty kingdoms.

About six years ago, as I passed through Sneaking-land, I brought home a large skewer from thence, and made a present of it to the butchers of Quande, who set a great value upon them, and that for a cause. Some time or other, if ever we live to come baek to our own eountry, I will show you two of them fastened on the great elurch porch. His usual food is pickled coats of mail, salt helmets and head-pieees, and salt sallads; which sometimes makes him piss pins and needles. As for his clothing, it is comieal enough of conseience, both for make and colour; for he wears grey and eold, nothing before, and nought behind, with the sleeves of the same.

You will do me a kindness, said Pantagruel, if as you have described his clothes, food, actions and pastimes, you will also give me an account of his shape and disposition in all its parts. Prithee do, dear eod, said Friar John, for I have found him in my breviary, and then follows the moveable holy-days. With all my heart, answered Xenomanes; we may chance to hear more of him as we touch at the Wild Island, the dominions of the squob Chitterlings, his enemies; against whom he is eternally at odd: and were it not for the help of the noble Carnival, their protector, and good neighbour, this meagre-looking Shrovetide would long before this have made sad work among them, and rooted them out of their habitation. Are these same Chitterlings, said Friar John, male or female, angels, or mortals, women or maids? They are, replied Xenomanes, females in sex, mortal in condition, some of them maids, others not. The devil have me, said Friar John, if I be not for them. What a shameful disorder in nature, is it not, to make war against women? Let us go back, and hack the villain to pieces.—What! meddle with Shrovetide? cried Panurge, in the name of Belzebub, I am not yet so weary of my life. No, I am not yet so mad as that comes to. Quid juris? Suppose we should find ourselves pent up between the Chitterlings and Shrovetide? between the anvil and the hammers? Shankers and bnboes stand off! godzooks, let us make the best of our way, I bid you good night, sweet Mr. Shrovetide; I reecommand to you the Chitterlings, and pray don't forget the puddings.

CHAPTER XXX.

How Shrovetide is anatomized and described by Xenomanes.

As for the inward parts of Shrovetide, said Xenomanes; his brain is (at least it was in my time) in bigness, colours, substance, and strength, much like the left eod of a he hand-worm.

The ventricles of his said brain, like an auger.	The throat, like a pincushion stuffed with oakun.
The worm-like excrescence, like a christmas-box.	The lungs, like a prebend's furgown.
The membranes, like a monk's cowl.	The heart, like a cope.
The funnel, like a mason's chisel.	The mediastine, like an earthen cup.
The fornix, like a casket.	The pleura, like a crow's bill.
The glandula pinealis, like a bag-pipe.	The arteries, like a watch-coat.
The rete mirabile, like a gutter.	The midriff, like a montero-cap.
The dug-like processus, like a patch.	The liver, like a double-tongued mattock.
The tympanums, like a whirly-gig.	The veins, like a sash-window.
The rocky bones, like a goose-wing.	The spleen, like a catcal.
The nape of the neck, like a paper lantern.	The guts, like a trammel.
The nerves, like a pipkin.	The gall, like a cooper's adze.
The uvula, like a saekbut.	The entrails, like a gantlet.
The palate, like a mitten.	The mesentery, like an abbot's mitre.
The spittle, like a shuttle.	The hungry-gut, like a button.
The almonds, like a telescope.	The blind gut, like a breast-plate.
The bridge of his nose, like a wheelbarrow.	The colon, like a bridle.
The head of the larynx, like a vintage-basket.	The arse-gut like a monk's leathern bottle.
The stomach; like a belt.	The kidneys, like a trowel.
The pylorus, like a pitchfork.	The loins, like a padlock.
The wind-pipe, like an oyster-knife.	The ureters, like a pot-hook.
	The emulgent veins, like two gilliflowers.

The spermatie vessels, like a eully-mully-puff.	The ligaments, like a tinker's budget.
The parastata, like an ink-pot.	The marrow, like a wallet.
The bladder, like a stone-bow.	The cartilages, like a field-tortoise, alias a mole.
The neck, like a mill-elapper.	The glandules in the mouth, like a pruning-knife.
The mirach, or lower parts of the belly, like a high-crowned hat.	The animal spirits, like swingeing fisty-cuffs.
The siphach, or its inner rind, like a wooden euff.	The blood-fermenting, like a multiplication of flirts on the nose.
The muscles, like a pair of bellows.	The urine, like a fig-pecker.
The tendons, like a hawking-glove.	The sperm, like a hundred tenpenny nails.
The bones, like three-cornered cheese-cakes.

And his nurse told me, that being married to Mid-lent, he only begot a good number of local adverbs, and certain double fasts.

His memory he had like a scarf.	His undertakings, like the ballast of a galleon.
His common sense, like a buzzing of bees.	His understanding, like a torn breviary.
His imagination, like the ehime of a set of bells.	His notions, like snails crawling out out of strawberries.
His thoughts, like a flight of starlings.	His will, like three filberts in a porringer.
His conscience, like the unnestling of a parcel of young herons.	His desire, like six trusses of hay.
His deliberations, like a set of organs.	His judgment, like a shoeing horn.
His repentance, like the carriage of a double cannon.	His discretion, like the truckle of a pully.
	His reason, like a cricket stool.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Shrovetide's outward parts anatomized.

SHROVETIDE, continued Xenomanes, is somewhat better proportioned in his outward parts, excepting the seven ribs which he had over and above the common shape of men.

His toes, were like a virginal on an organ.	His belly as big as a tun, buttoned after the old fashion, with a girdle riding over the middle of his bosom.
His nails, like a gimlet.	His navel, like a eymbal.
His feet, like a guitar.	His groin, like a minced pie.
His heels, like a club.	His member, like a slipper.
The soles of his feet, like a erucible.	His purse, like an oil cruet.
His legs, like a hawk's lure.	His genitals, like a joiner's plainer.
His knees, like a joint-stool.	Their erecting muscles, like a racket.
His thighs, like a steelcap.	The perineum, like a flageolet.
His hips, like a wimble.

His arse-hole, like crystal looking-glass.	His ears, like a pair of gloves.
His bum, like a harrow.	His nose, like a buskin.
His loins, like a butter-pot.	His nostrils, like a forehead cloth.
The peritonæum, or caul, wherein his bowels were wrapped, like a billiard-table.	His eye-brows like a dripping-pan.
His back, like an over-grown rack-bent cross-bow.	On his left brow was a mark of the shape and bigness of an urinal.
The vertebræ, or joints of his back-bone, like a bagpipe.	His eye-lids like a fiddle.
His ribs, like a spinning-wheel.	His eyes, like a comb-box.
His brisket, like a canopy.	His optic nerves, like a tinder-box.
His shoulder-blades, like a mortar.	His forehead, like a false cup.
His breast, like a game at nine-pins.	His temples, like the cock of a cistern.
His paps, like a horn-pipe.	His cheeks, like a pair of wooden shoes.
His arm-pits, like a chequer.	His jaws, like a caudle cup.
His shoulders, like a hand-barrow.	His teeth, like a hunter's staff. Of such colt's teeth as his, you will find one at Colonges les Royaux in Poietou, and two at la Brosse in Xaintonge, on the cellar door.
His arms, like a riding-hood.	His tongue, like a jew's harp.
His fingers, like a brotherhood's and irons.	His mouth, like a horse-cloth.
The fibulæ, or lesser bones of his legs like a pair of stilts.	His face embroidered like a mule's pack saddle.
His shin-bones, like sickles.	His head contrived like a still.
His elbows, like a mouse-trap.	His skull, like a pouch.
His hands, like a curry-comb.	The suturæ, or seams of his skull, like the annulus piscatoris, or the fisher's signet.
His neck, like a talboy.	His skin, like a gabardine.
His throat, like a felt to distil hip-pocras.	His epidermis, or outward skin, like a bolting-cloth.
The knob in his throat, like a barrel, where hanged two brazen wens, very fine and harmonious, in the shape of an hour-glass.	His hair, like a scrubbing-brush.
His beard, like a lantern.	His fur, such as above said.
His chin, like a mushroom.

CHAPTER XXXII.

A continuance of Shrovetide's countenance, postures and way of behaving.

It is a wonderful thing, continued Xenomanes, to hear and see the state of Shrovetide.

If he chanced to spit, it was whole baskets full of goldfinches.	When he trembled, it was large venison pasties.
If he blowed his nose, it was pickled grigs.	When he did sweat, it was old ling with butter sauce.
When he wept, it was ducks with onion sauce.	When he belched, it was bushels of oysters.

When he sneezed, it was whole tubs full of mustard.	When he muttered, it was lawyers' revels.
When he coughed, it was boxes of marmalade.	When he hopped about, it was letters of licence and protections.
When he sobbed, it was water-cresses.	When he stepped back, it was sea cockle-shells.
When he yawned, it was pots full of pickled pease.	When he slabbered, it was common ovens.
When he sighed, it was dried neat's tongues.	When he was hoarse, it was an entry of morrice-dancers.
When he whistled, it was a whole scuttle full of green apes.	When he broke wind, it was dun cows' leather spatterdashes.
When he snored, it was a whole pan full of fried beans.	When he funcked, it was washed-leather boots.
When he frowned, it was soused hogs' feet.	When he scratched himself, it was new proclamations.
When he spoke, it was coarse brown russet cloth; so little it was like crimson silk, with which Parisatis desired that the words of such as spoke to her son Cyrus, King of Persia, should be interwoven.	When he sung, it was peas in cods.
When he blowed, it was indulgence money-boxes.	When he evaeuated, it was mushroom rooms and morilles.
When he winked, it was buttered buns.	When he puffed, it was cabbages with oil, alias caules amb'olif.
When he grumbled, it was Mareh cats.	When he talked, it was the last year's snow.
When he nodded, it was iron-bound waggons.	When he dreamt, it was of a eock and a bull.
When he made mouths, it was broken staves.	When he gave nothing, so much for the bearer.
	If he thought to himself, it was whimsies and maggots.
	If he dozed, it was leases of lands.

What is yet more strange, he used to work doing nothing, and did nothing though he worked; caroused sleeping, and slept carousing, with his eyes open, like the hares in our country, for fear of being taken napping by the Chitterlings, his inveterate enemies; biting he laughed, and laughing bit; eat nothing fasting, and fasted eating nothing; mumbled upon suspicion, drank by imagination, swam on the tops of high steeples, dried his clothes in ponds and rivers, fished in the air, and there used to catch decumane lobsters; hunted at the bottom of the herring-pond, and caught there ibices, stamboucs, chamois, and other wild goats; used to put out the eyes of all the crows which he took sneakingly; feared nothing but his own shadow, and the cries of fat kids; used to gad abroad some days, like a truant school-boy; played with the ropes of bells on festival days of saints; made a mallet of his fist, and writ on hairy parchment prognostications and almanacks with his huge pin-case.

Is that the gentleman? said Friar John: he is my man: this is the very fellow I looked for: I will send him a challenge immediately. This is, said Pantagruel, a strange and monstrous sort of man, if I may call him a man. You put me in mind of the form and looks of Amodunt and Dissonance. How were they made, said Friar John? May I be peeled like a raw onion, if ever I heard a word of them. I'll tell you what I read of them in some ancient apologues, replied Pantagruel.

Physis—that is to say, Nature—at her first burthen begat Beauty and Harmony, without carnal copulation, being of herself very fruitful and prolific. Antiphysis, who ever was the antagonist of Nature, immediately, out of a malicious spite against her for her beautiful and honourable productions, in opposition begot Amodunt and Dissonance, by copulation with Tellumon. Their heads were round like a football, and not gently flatted on both sides, like the common shape of men. Their ears stood pricked up like those of asses; their eyes, as hard as those of crabs, and without brows, stared out of their heads, fixed on bones like those of our heels; their feet were round, like tennis-balls; their arms and hands turned backwards towards the shoulders; and they walked on their heads, continually turning round like a ball, topsy-turvy, heels over head.

Yet—as you know that apes esteem their young the handsomest in the world—Antiphysis extolled her offspring, and strove to prove that their shape was handsomer and neater than that of the children of Physis: saying, that thus to have spherical heads and feet, and walk in a circular manner, wheeling round, had something in it of the perfection of the divine power, which makes all beings eternally turn in that fashion; and that to have our feet uppermost, and the head below them, was to imitate the Creator of the universe; the hair being like the roots, and the legs like the branches of man: for trees are better planted by their roots than they could be by their branches. By this demonstration she implied, that her children were much more to be praised for being like a standing tree than those of Physis, that made a figure of a tree upside down. As for the arms and hands, she pretended to prove that they were more justly turned towards the shoulders, because that part of the body ought not to be without defence, while the forepart is duly fenced with teeth, which a man can not only use to chew, but also to defend himself against those things that offend him. Thus, by the testimony and astipulation of the brute beasts, she drew all the witless herd and mob of fools into her opinion, and was admired by all brainless and nonsensical people.

Since that, she begot the hypoeritical tribes of eaves-dropping dissemblers, superstitious pope-mongers, and priest-ridden bigots, the frantie Pistolets, the demoniaecal Calvins, impostors of Geneva, the serapers of benefices, apparitors with the devil in them, and other grinders and squeezers of livings, herb-stinking hermits, gulligutted dunces of the cowl, church vermin, false zealots, devourers of the substance of men, and many more other deformed and ill-favoured monsters, made in spite of nature.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

How Pantagruel discovered a monstrous physeter, or whirlpool, near the Wild Island.

ABOUT sunset, coming near the Wild Island, Pantagruel spied afar off a huge monstrous physeter—a sort of whale, which some call a whirlpool,—that came right upon us, neighing, snorting, raised above the waves higher than our main-tops, and spouting water all the way into the air, before itself, like a large river falling from a mountain: Pantagruel showed it to the pilot, and to Xenomanes.

By the pilot's advice, the trumpets of the Thalamege were sounded, to warn all the fleet to stand close, and look to themselves. This alarm being given, all the ships, galleons, frigates, brigantines,—according to their naval discipline,—placed themselves in the order and figure of a Greek upsilon, ( $\Psi$ ) the letter of Pythagoras, as cranes do in their flight; and like an acute angle, in whose cone and basis the Thalamege placed herself ready to fight smartly. Friar John, with the grenadiers, got on the forecastle.

Poor Panurge began to cry and howl worse than ever; Babilcabou, said he, shrugging up his shoulders, quivering all over with fear, there will be the devil upon dun. This is a worse business than that the other day. Let us fly, let us fly; old Nick take me if it is not Leviathan, described by the noble prophet Moses, in the life of patient Job. It will swallow us all, ships and men, shag, rag, and bobtail, like a dose of pills. Alas, it will make no more of us, and we shall hold no more room in its hellish jaws, than a sugar-plum in an ass's throat. Look, look, it is upon us; let us wheel off, whip it away, and get ashore. I believe it is the very individual sea monster that was formerly designed to devour Andromeda: we are all undone. Oh! for some valiant Perseus here now to kill the dog.

I'll do its business presently, said Pantagruel; fear nothing. Odds-belly, said Panurge, remove the cause of my fear then. When the devil would you have a man be afraid, but when there is so much cause? If your destiny be such, as Friar John was saying a while ago, replied Pantagruel, you ought to be afraid of Pyroeis, Eous, Æthon, and Phlegon, the sun's coach horses, that breathe fire at the nostrils; and not of physeters, that spout nothing but water at the snout and mouth. Their water will not endanger your life; and that element will rather save and preserve than hurt or endanger you.

Ay, ay, trust to that, and hang me, quoth Panurge: your is a very pretty fancy. Odd's fish: did I not give you a sufficient account of the element's transmutation, and the blunders that are made of roast for boiled, and boiled for roast? Alas, here it is; I'll go hide myself below. We are dead men, every mother's son of us: I see upon our main-top that merciless hag Atropos, with her scissors new ground, ready to cut our threads all at one snip. Oh, how dreadful and abominable thou art; thou hast drowned a good many beside us, who never made their brags of it. Did it but spout good, brisk, dainty, delicious white wine, instead of this damned bitter salt water, one might better bear with it, and there would be some cause to be patient; like that English lord, who being doomed to die, and had leave to choose what kind of death he would, chose to be drowned in a butt of malmsey. Here it is.—Oh, oh! devil! Sathanas! Leviathan! I cannot abide to look thee, thou art so abominably ugly.—Go to the bar, go take the pettifoggers.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

How the monstrous physeter was slain by Pantagruel.

THE physeter, coming between the ships and the galleons, threw water by whole tuns upon them, as if it had been the cataracts of the Nile in Ethiopia. On the other side, arrows, darts, gleaves, javelins, spears, harping irons, and partizans, flew upon it like hail. Friar John did not spare himself in it. Panurge was half dead from fear. The artillery roared and undered like mad, and seemed to gall it in good earnest, but did but little good: for the great iron and brass cannon-shot, entering its skin, seemed to melt like tiles in the sun.

Pantagruel then, considering the weight and exigency of the matter, stretched out his arms, and showed what he could do. You tell us, and it is recorded, that Commodus, the Roman Emperor, could shoot with a bow so dexterously, that at a good distance he would let fly an arrow through a child's fingers, and never touch them. You also tell us of an Indian archer, who lived when Alexander the Great conquered India, and was so skilful in drawing the bow, that at a considerable distance he would shoot his arrows through a ring, though they were three cubits long, and their iron so large and weighty, that with them he used to pierce steel outlasses, thick shields, steel breast-plates, and generally what he did hit, how firm, resisting, hard, and strong soever it were. You also tell us wonders of the industry of the ancient Franks, who were preferred to all others in point of archery; and when they hunted either black or dun beasts, used to rub the head of their arrows with hellebore, because the flesh of the venison, struck with such an arrow, was more tender, dainty, wholesome, and delicious—paring off, nevertheless, the part that was touched round about. You also talk of the Parthians, who used to shoot backwards, more dexterously than other nations forwards; and also celebrate skill of the Seythians in that art, who sent once to Darius, King of Persia, an ambassador, that make him a present of a bird, a frog, a mouse, and five arrows, without speaking one word; and being asked what those presents meant, and if he had commission to say anything, answered, that he had not: which puzzled and gravelled Darius very much, till Gobrias, one of the seven captains that had killed the magi, explained it, saying to Darius: By these gifts and offerings the Seythians silently tell you, that except the Persians, like birds, fly up to heaven, or like mice, hide themselves near the centre of the earth, or, like frogs, dive to the very bottom of ponds and lakes, they shall be destroyed by the power and arrows of the Seythians.

The noble Pantagruel was, without comparison, more admirable yet in the art of shooting and darting: for with his dreadful piles and darts, nearly resembling the huge beams that support the bridges of Nantes, Saumur, Bergerac, and at Paris the millers and the changers bridges, in length, size, weight, and iron-work, he, at a mile's distance, would open an oyster, and never touch the edges; he would snuff a candle, without putting it out; would shoot a mag-pie in the eye; take off a boot's under-sole, or a riding-hood's lining, without soiling them a bit; turn over every leaf of Friar John's breviary, one after another, and not tear one.

With such darts, of which there was good store in the ship, at the first blow he ran the physeter in at the forehead so furiously, that he pierced both its jaws and tongue: so that from that time to this it no more opened its guttural trap-door, nor drew and spouted water. At the second blow he put out its right eye, and at the third its left: and we had all the pleasure to see the physeter bearing those three horns in its forehead, somewhat leaning forward in an equilateral triangle.

Meanwhile it turned about to and fro, staggering and straying like one stunned, blinded, and taking his leave of the world. Pantagruel, not satisfied with this, let fly another dart, which took the monster under the tail likewise sloping; then with three other on the chine, in a perpendicular line, divided its flank from the tail to the snout at an equal distance: then he larded it with fifty on one side, and after that, to make even work, he darted as many on its other side: so that the body of the physeter seemed like the hulk of the galleon with three masts, joined by a competent dimension of its beams, as if they had been the ribs and chain wales of the keel; which was a pleasant sight. The physeter then giving up the ghost, turned itself upon its back, as all dead fishes do; and being thus overturned, with the beams and darts upside down in the sea, it seemed a scolopendra or centipede, as that serpent is described by the ancient sage Nicander.

CHAPTER XXXV.

How Pantagruel went on shore in the Wild Island, the ancient abode of the Chitterlings.

THE boat's crew of the ship Lantern towed the physeter ashore on the neighbouring shore, which happened to be the Wild Island, to make an anatomical dissection of its body, and save the fat of its kidneys, which, they said, was very useful and necessary for the cure of a certain distemper, which they called want of money. As for Pantagruel, he took no manner of notice of the monster; for he had seen many such, nay, bigger in the Gallic ocean. Yet he condescended to land in the Wild Island, to dry and refresh some of his men, (whom the physeter had wetted and bedaubed,) at a small desert seaport towards the south, seated near a fine pleasant grove, out of which flowed a delicious brook of fresh, clear, and purling water. Here they pitched their tents, and set up their kitchens; nor did they spare fuel.

Every one having shifted, as they thought fit, Friar John rang the bell, and the cloth was immediately laid, and supper brought in. Pantagruel eating cheerfully with his men, much about the second course, perceived certain little sly Chitterlings elambering up a high tree near the pantry, as still as so many mice. Which made him ask Xenomanes, what kind of creatures these were; taking them for squirrels, weazels, martins, or ermines. They are Chitterlings, replied Xenomanes. This is the Wild Island, of which I spoke to you this morning: there hath been an irreconcilable war, this long time, between them and Shrovetide, their malicious and ancient enemy. I believe that the noise of the guns, which we fired at the physcter, hath alarmed them, and made them fear their enemy hath come with his forces to surprise them, or lay the island waste; as he hath often attempted to do, though he still came off but bluely; by reason of the care and vigilance of the Chitterlings, who (as Dido said to Æneas's companions, that would have landed at Carthage without her leave or knowledge), were forced to watch and stand upon their guard, considering the malice of their enemy, and the neighbourhood of his territories.

Pray, dear friend, said Pantagruel, if you find that by some honest means we may bring this war to an end, and reconcile them together, give me notice of it; I will use my endeavours in it, with all my heart, and spare nothing on my side to moderate and accommodate the points in dispute between both parties.

That is impossible at this time, answered Xenomanes. About four years ago, passing incognito by this country, I endeavoured to make a peace, or at least a long truce among them; and I certainly had brought them to be good friends and neighbours, if both one and the other parties would have yielded to one single article. Shrovetide would not include in the treaty of peace, the wild puddings, nor the highland sausages, their ancient gossips and confederates. The Chitterlings demanded that the fort of Cacques might be under their government, as is the Castle of Sullouir, and that a parcel of I don't know what stinking villains, murderers, robbers, that held it then, should be expelled. But they could not agree in this, and the terms that were offered seemed too hard to either party. So the treaty broke off, and nothing was done. Nevertheless, they became less severe, and gentler enemies than they were before; but since the denunciation of the national Council of Chesil, whereby they—the Chitterlings—were roughly handled, hampered, and cited; whereby also Shrovetide was declared filthy, beshitten, and bewrayed, in case he made any league or agreement with them; they are grown wonderfully inveterate, incensed, and obstinate against one another, and there is no way to remedy it. You might sooner reconcile cats and rats, or hounds and hares together.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

WHILE Xenomanes was saying this, Friar John spied twenty or thirty young slender-shaped Chitterlings, posting as fast as they could towards their town, eitadel, eastle, and fort of Chinney, and said to Pantagruel, I smell a rat; there will be here the devil upon two stieks, or I am much out. These worshipful Chitterlings may ehance to mistake you for Shrovetide, though you are not a bit like him. Let us once in our lives leave our junketing for a while, and put ourselves in a posture to give them a bellyful of fighting, if they would be at that sport. There can be no false Latin in this, said Xenomanes; Chitterlings are still Chitterlings, always double-hearted and treacherous.

Pantagruel then arose from table to visit and seour the thicket, and returned presently; having discovered on the left an ambuscade of squab Chitterlings; and on the right, about half a league from thence, a large body of huge giant-like armed Chitterlings, ranged in battalia along a little hill, and marehing furiously towards us at the sound of bagpipes, sheep's paunches, and bladders, the merry fifes and drums, trumpets, and elarions, hoping to eatch us as Moss eaught his mare. By the conjecture of seventy-eight standards, which we told, we guessed their number to be two and forty thousand, at a modest computation.

Their order, proud gait, and resolute looks, made us judge that they were none of your raw, paltry links, but old warlike Chitterlings and Sausages. From the foremost ranks to the colours they were all armed cap-à-pié with small arms, as we reckoned them at a distanee: yet, very sharp and ease-hardened. Their right and left wings were lined with a great number of forest puddings, heavy pattipans, and horse sausages, all of them tall and proper islanders, banditti, and wild.

Pantagruel was very much daunted, and not without cause; though Epistemon told him that it might be the use and custom of Chitterlingonians to welcome and receive thus in arms their foreign friends, as the noble kings of France are received and saluted at their first coming into the chief cities of the kingdom, after their advancement to the crown. Perhaps, said he, it may be the usual guard of the queen of the plaece; who, having notice given her by the junior Chitterlings of the forlorn hope whom you saw on the trec, of the arrival of your fine and pompous fleet, hath judged that it was, without doubt, some rich and potent prince, and is come to visit you in person.

Pantagruel, little trusting to this, called a council to have their advice at large in this doubtful case. He briefly showed them how this way of reception, with arms, had often, under colour of compliment and friendship, been fatal. Thus, said he, the Emperor Antonius Caracalla, at one time, destroyed the citizens of Alexandria, and at another time cut off the attendants of Artabanus, King of Persia, under colour of marrying his daughter: which, by the way, did not pass unpunished: for, a while after, this cost him his life.

Thus Jacob's children destroyed the Sichemites, to revenge the rape of their sister Dinah. By such another hypocritical trick Gallienus, the Roman Emperor, put to death the military men in Constantinople. Thus, under colour of friendship, Antonius enticed Artavasdes, King of Armenia; then, having caused him to be bound in heavy chains, and shackled, at last put him to death.

We find a thousand such instances in history; and King Charles VI. is justly commended for his prudence to this day, in that, coming back victorious over the Ghenters and other Flemings, to his good city of Paris, and when he came to Bourget, a league from thence, hearing that the citizens with their mallets—whence they got the name of Maillotins—were marched out of town in battalia twenty thousand strong, he would not go into the town till they had laid down their arms and retired to their respective homes; though they protested to him, that they had taken arms with no other design than to receive him with the greater demonstration of honour and respect.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

How Pantagruel sent for Colonel Maul-Chitterling, and Colonel Cut-Pudding; with a discourse well worth your hearing, about the names of places and persons.

THE resolution of the council was, that, let things be how they would, it behoved the Pantagruelists to stand upon their guard. Therefore Carpalim and Gymnast were ordered by Pantagruel to go for the soldiers that were on board the Cup galley, under the command of Colonel Maul-chitterling, and those on board the Vine-tub frigate, under the command of Colonel Cut-pudding the younger. I will ease Gymnast of that trouble, said Panurge, who wanted to be upon the run: you may have occasion for him here. By this worthy frock of mine, quoth Friar John, thou hast a mind to slip thy neck out of the collar, and absent thyself from the fight, thou white-livered son of a dunghill! upon my virginity thou wilt never come back. Well, there can be no great loss in thee; for thou wouldest do nothing here but howl, bray, weep, and dishearten the good soldiers. I will certainly come back, said Panurge, Friar John, my ghostly father, and speedily too: do but take care that these plaguy Chitterlings do not board our ships. All the while you will be a fighting, I will pray heartily for your victory, after the example of the valiant captain and guide of the people of Israel, Moses. Having said this, he wheeled off.

Then said Epistemon to Pantagruel, the denomination of these two colonels of yours, Maul-chitterling and Cut-pudding, promiseth us assurance, success, and victory, if those Chitterlings should chance to set upon us. You take it rightly, said Pantagruel, and it pleaseth me to see you foresee and prognosticate our victory by the name of our colonels.

This way of foretelling by names is not new; it was in old times celebrated, and religiously observed by the Pythagoreans. Several great princes and emperors have formerly made use of it. Octavianus Augustus, second emperor of the Romans, meeting on a day a country fellow named Eutyehus,—that is fortunate,—driving an ass named Nieon—that is in Greek, victorious,—moved by the signification of the ass's and ass-driver's names, remained assured of all prosperity and victory.

The Emperor Vespasian, being once all alone at prayers, in the temple of Serapis, at the sight and unexpected coming of a certain servant of his, named Basilides,—that is, royal,—whom he had left siek a great way behind, took hopes and assurance of obtaining the empire of the Romans. Regilian was chosen Emperor, by the soldiers, for no other reason, but the signification of his name. See the Cratylus of the divine Plato. (By my thirst I will read him, said Rhizotomus; I hear you so often quote him.) See how the Pythagoreans, by reason of the names and numbers, conclude that Patroclus was to fall by the hand of Hector; Hector by Achilles; Achilles by Paris; Paris by Philoetetes. I am quite lost in my understanding, when I reflect upon the admirable invention of Pythagoras, who by the number, either even or odd, of the syllables of every name, would tell you of what side a man was lame, hunch-backed, blind, gouty, troubled with the palsy, pleurisy, or any other distemper incident to human kind; allotting even numbers to the left, and odd ones to the right side of the body.

Indeed, said Epistemon, I saw this way of syllabising tried at Xaintes, at a general procession, in the presence of that good virtuous, learned, and just president, Brian Vallée, Lord of Douhait. When there went by a man or woman that was either lame, blind of one eye, or hump-backed, he had an account brought him of his or her name; and if the syllables of the name were of an odd number, immediately without seeing the persons, he declared them to be deformed, blind, lame, or crooked of the right side; and of the left, if they were even in number: and such indeed we ever found them.

By this syllabical invention, said Pantagruel, the learned have affirmed, that Achilles kneeling, was wounded by the arrow of Paris in the right heel; for his name is of odd syllables; (here we ought to observe that the ancients used to kneel the right foot :) and that Venus was also wounded before Troy in the left hand; for her name in Greek is Αφροδίτη, of four syllables; Vulcan lamed of his left foot for the same reason; Philip, King of Mæcedon, and Hannibal, blind of the right eye; not to speak of sciaticas, broken bellies, and hemi-craniæ, which may be distinguished by this Pythagorean reason.

But returning to names: do but consider how Alexander the Great, son of King Philip, of whom we spoke just now, compassed his undertaking, merely by the interpretation of a name. He had besieged the strong city of Tyre, and for several weeks battered it with all his power: but all in vain. His engines and attempts were still baffled by the Tyrians, which made him finally resolve to raise the siege, to his great grief; foreseeing the great stain which such a shameful retreat would be to his reputation. In this anxiety and agitation of mind he fell asleep, and dreamed that a satyr was come into his tent, capering, skipping, and tripping it up and down, with his goatish hoofs, and that he strove to lay hold on him. But the satyr still slipt from him, till at last, having penned him up into a corner, he took him. With this he awoke, and telling his dream to the philosophers and sages of his court, they let him know that it was a promise of victory from the gods, and that he should soon be master of Tyre; the word satyros, divided in two, being sa Tyros, and signifying Tyre is thine; and in truth, at the next onset, he took the town by storm, and, by a complete victory, reduced that stubborn people to subjection.

On the other hand, see how, by the signification of one word, Pompey fell into despair. Being overcome by Cæsar at the battle of Pharsalia, he had no other way left to escape but by flight; which, attempting by sea, he arrived near the island of Cyprus, and perceived on the shore, near the city of Paphos, a beautiful and stately palace: now asking the pilot what was the name of it, he told him, that it was called Κακοβασιλέα, that is, evil king: which struck such a dread and terror in him, that he fell into despair, as being assured of losing shortly his life; insomuch that his complaints, sighs, and groans were heard by the mariners and other passengers. And indeed, a while after, a certain strange peasant, called Achilles, cut off his head.

To all these examples might be added what happened to L. Paulus Emilius, when the senate elected him imperator, that is, chief of the army which they sent against Perses, King of Macedon. That evening returning home to prepare for his expedition, and kissing a little daughter of his called Trasia, she seemed somewhat sad to him. What is the matter, said he, my chicken? Why is my Trasia thus sad and melancholy? Daddy, replied the child, Persa is dead. This was the name of a little bitch, which she loved mightily. Hearing this, Paulus took assurance of a victory over Perses.

If time would permit us to discourse of the sacred Hebrew writ, we might find a hundred noted passages, evidently showing how religiously they observed proper names and their significations.

He had hardly ended this discourse, when the two colonels arrived with their soldiers, all well armed and resolute. Pantagruel made them a short speech, entreating them to behave themselves bravely, in case they were attacked; for he could not yet believe that the Chitterlings were so treacherous: but he bad them by no means to give the first offence; giving them carnival for the watch-word.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

How Chitterlings are not to be slighted by men.

You shake your empty noddles now, jolly toppers, and do not believe what I tell you here, any more than if it were some tale of a tub. Well, well, I cannot help it. Believe it if you will; if you will not let it alone. For my part, I very well know what I say. It was in the Wild Island, in our voyage to the Holy Bottle; I tell you the time and place; what would you have more? I would have you call to mind the strength of the ancient gaints, that undertook to lay the high mountain Pelion, on the top of Ossa, and set among those the shady Olympus, to dash out the god's brains, unnestle them, and scour their heavenly lodgings. Theirs was no small strength, you may well think, and yet they were nothing but Chitterlings from the waist downwards, or, at least, serpents, not to tell a lie for the matter.

The serpent that tempted Eve, too, was of the Chitterling kind, and yet it is recorded of him, that he was more subtle than any beast of the field. Even so are Chitterlings. Nay, to this very hour they hold in some universities, that this same tempter was the Chitterling called Ithyphallus, into which was transformed bawdy Priapus, arch-seducer of females in paradise, that is, a garden, in Greek.

Pray now tell me, who can tell but that the Swiss, now so bold and warlike, were formerly Chitterlings? For my part I would not take my oath to the contrary. The Himantopodes, a nation very famous in Ethiopia, according to Pliny's description, are Chitterlings, and nothing else. If all this will not satisfy your worships, or remove your incredulity, I would have you forthwith (I mean drinking first, that nothing be done rashly) visit Lusignan, Pathenay, Vouant, Mervant, and Ponzauges in Poietou. There you will find a cloud of witnesses, not of your affidavit men of the right stamp, but credible, time out of mind, that will take their corporal oath, on Rigomés knuckle-bone, that Melusina, their founder, or foundress, which you please, was woman from the head to the priek-purse, and thence downwards was a serpentine Chitterling, or if you will have it otherwise, a Chitterling-dized serpent. She nevertheless had a genteel and noble gait, imitated to this very day by your hop-merchants of Brittany, in their paspié and country danees.

What do you think was the cause of Erichthonius's being the first inventor of coaches, litters, and chariots? Nothing but because Vulean had begot him with Chitterlingdized legs; which to hide, he chose to ride in a litter, rather than on horse-back; for Chitterlings were not yet in esteem at that time.

The Seythian nymph, Ora, was likewise half woman and half Chitterling; and yet seemed so beautiful to Jupiter, that nothing could serve him but he must give her a touch of his godship's kindness; and accordingly he had a brave boy by her, called Colaxes; and therefore I would have you leave off shaking your empty noddles at this, as if it were a story, and firmly believe that nothing is truer than the gospel.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

FRIAR JOHN, seeing these furious Chitterlings thus boldly march up, said to Pantagruel, here will be a rare battle of hobby-horses, a pretty kind of puppet-show fight, for ought I see. Oh! what mighty honour and wonderful glory will attend our victory! I would have you only be a bare spectator of this fight, and for any thing else leave me and my men to deal with them. What men? said Pantagruel. Matter of breviary, replied Friar John. How came Potiphar, who was head cook of Pharaoh's kitchen, he that bought Joseph, and whom the said Joseph might have made a euekold, if he had not been a Joseph; how came he, I say, to be made general of all the horse in the kingdom of Ægypt? Why was Nabuzardan, King Nebuchadnezzar's head cook, chosen, to the exclusion of all other eaptains, to besiege and destroy Jerusalem? I hear you, replied Pantagruel. By St. Christophier's whiskers, said Friar John, I dare lay a wager that it was because they had formerly engaged Chitterlings, or men as little valued; whom to rout, conquer, and destroy, eooks are, without eomparison, more fit than eurassiers and gens d'armes armed at all points, or all the horse and foot in the world.

You put me in mind, said Pantagruel, of what is written amongst the facetious and merry sayings of Cicero. During the more than civil wars between Cæsar and Pompey, though he was much eourted by the first, he naturally leaned more to the side of the latter. Now one day, hearing that the Pompeyians, in a certain reneontre, had lost a great many men, he took a fancy to visit their eamp. There he preccived little strength, less eourage, but much disorder. From that time, fore-seeing that things would go ill with them, as it since happened, he began to banter now one and then another, and be very free of his cutting jests: so some of Pompey's eaptains, playing the good fellows, to show their assurance, told him, do you see how many eagles we have yet? (They were then the deviee of the Romans in war.) They might be of use to you, replied Cicero, if you had to do with magpies.

Thus seeing we are to fight Chitterlings, pursued Pantagruel, you infer thence that it is a eulinary war, and have a mind to join with the eooks. Well, do as you please. I will stay here in the meantime, and wait for the event of the rumpus.

Friar John went that very moment among the sutlers, into the eook's tents, and told them in a pleasing manner; I must see you crowned with honour and triumph this day, my lads; to your arms are reserved such achievements as never yet were performed within the memory of man. Odd's belly, do they make nothing of the valiant eooks? let us go fight yonder fornifearing Chitterlings! I will be your eaptain. But first let us drink boys,—come on—let us be of good eheer. Noble eaptain, returned the kitchen tribe, this was spoken like yourself: bravely offered: huzza! we are all at your exeellency's eommand, and will live and die by you. Live, live, said Friar

John, a God's name: but die by no means. That is the Chitterlings' lot; they shall have their bellyful of it: come on then, let us put ourselves in order; Nabuzardan's the word.

CHAPTER XL.

How Friar John fitted up the sow; and of the valiant cooks that went into it.

THEN, by Friar John's order, the engineers and their workmen fitted up the great sow that was in the ship Leathern-bottle. It was a wonderful machine, so contrived, that, by means of large engines that were round about in rows, it threw forked iron bars, and four square steel-bolts; and in its hold two hundred men at least could easily fight, and be sheltered. It was made after the model of the sow of Riolo, by the means of which Bergerac was re-taken from the English, in the reign of Charles the Sixth.

Here are the names of the noble and valiant cooks who went into the sow, as the Greeks did into the Trojan horse.

Sour-sauce.	Crisp-pig.	Carbonadoc.
Sweet-meat.	Greasy-slouch.	Sop-in-pan.
Greedy-gut.	Fat-gut.	Pick-fowl.
Liquorice-chops.	Bray-mortar.	Mustard-pot.
Soused-pork.	Lick-sauce.	Hog's-haslet.
Slap-sauce.	Hog's-foot.	Chopt-phiz.
Cock-broth.	Hodge-podge.	Gallimaufrey.
Slipslop.

All these noble cooks in their coat of arms, did bear, in a field gules, a larding-pin vert, charged with a chevron argent.

Lard, hog's-lard.	Pinch-lard.	Snatch-lard.
Nibble-lard.	Top-lard.	Gnaw-lard.
Filch-lard.	Pick-lard.	Scrape-lard.
Fat-lard.	Save-lard.	Chew-lard.

Gaillardon (by syncope) born near Rambouillet. The culinary doctor's name was Gaillardlardon, in the same manner as you used to say idolatrous for idololatrous.

Stiff-lard.	Catch-lard.	Waste-lard.
Dainty-lard.	Cut-lard.	Ogle-lard.
Watch-lard.	Mince-lard.	Weigh-lard.
Sweet-lard.	Fresh-lard.	Gulch-lard.
Fat-lard.	Rusty-lard.	Eye-lard.
Snap-lard.

Names unknown among the Marranes and Jews.

Ballocky.	Monsieur-Ragout.	Mustard-sauce.
Piek-sallad.	Snail-dresser.	Claret-sauce.
Broil-rasher.	Soup-monger.	Swill-broth.
Cony-skin.	Brewis-belly.	Thirsty.
Dainty-chops.	Chine-pieker.	Kitchen-stuff.
Pie-wright.	Crack-pipkin.	Verjuice.
Pudding-pan.	Scrape-pot.	Salt-gullet.
Save-dripping.	Porridge-pot.	Suck-gravy.
Water-cress.	Lick-dish.	Macaroon.
Scrape-turnip.	Toss-pot.	Skewer-maker.
Trivet.

Smell-smoek; he was afterwards taken from the kitchen, and removed to chamber-practice, for the service of the noble Cardinal Hunt-venison.

Rot-Roast.	Flesh-smith.	Sirloin.
Dish-clout.	Cram-gut.	Spit-mutton.
Save-suet.	Tuzzy-mussy.	Fritter-fryer.
Fire-fumbler.	Jacket-liner.	Hog's-gullet.
Pillicock.	Guzzle-drink.	Saffron-sauce.
Long-tool.	Fox-tail.	Strutting-tom.
Prick-pride.	Fly-flap.	Slashed-snoat.
Prick-madam.	Old-Grizzle.	Smutty-face.
Pricket.	Ruff-belly.

Mondam, that first invented madam's sauce, and for that discovery, was thus called in the Scotch-French dialect.

Loblolly.	Goodman-Goosecap.	Snap-gobbet.
Slabber-chops.	Munch-turnip.	Scurvy-phiz.
Scum-pot.	Sloven.	Trencher-man.
Gully-guts.	Swallow-pitcher.	Pudding-bag.
Rinse-pot.	Wafer-monger.	Pig-sticker.
Drink-spiller.

Robert: he invented Robert's sauce, so good and necessary for roasted conies, ducks, fresh pork, poached eggs, salt fish, and a thousand other such dishes.

Cold-ecl.	Frying-pan.	Big-Snout.
Thornback.	Man of dough.	Lick-finger.
Gurnard.	Sauce-doctor.	Tit-bit.
Grumbling-gut.	Waste-butter.	Sauce-box.
Alms-scrip.	Shitbreech.	All fours.
Taste-all.	Thick-brawn.	Whimwham.
Scrap-merchant.	Tom T—d.	Baste-roast.
Belly-timberman.	Mouldy-erust.	Gaping-Hoyden.
Hashee.	Hasty.	Calf's pluck.
Frig-palate.	Red-herring.	Leather-breeches.
Powdering-tub.	Cheesecake.

All these noble cooks went into the sow, merry, cheery, hale, brisk, old dogs at mischief, and ready to fight stoutly. Friar John, ever and anon waving his huge scimitar, brought up the rear, and double-locked the doors on the inside.

CHAPTER XLI.

How Pantagruel broke the Chitterlings at the knees.

THE Chitterlings advanced so near, that Pantagruel perceived that they stretched their arms, and already began to charge their lances, which caused him to send Gymnast to know what they meant, and why they thus, without the least provocation, came to fall upon their old trusty friends, who had neither said nor done the least ill thing to them. Gymnast being advanced near their front, bowed very low, and said to them as loud as ever he could: We are friends, we are friends; all, all of us your friends, yours, and at your command; we are for Carnival, your old confederate. Some have since told me, that he mistook, and said cavernal instead of carnival.

Whatever it was, the word was no sooner out of his mouth, but a huge little squab Sausage, starting out of the front of their main body, would have griped him by the collar. By the helmet of Mars, said Gymnast, I will swallow thee; but thou shalt only come in chips and slices; for, big as thou art, thou couldest never come in whole. This spoke, he lugs out his trusty sword, kiss-mine-arsc, (so he called it,) with both his fists, and cut the sausage in twain. Bless me, how fat the foul thief was! it puts me in mind of the huge bull of Berne, that was slain at Marignan, when the drunken Swiss were so mauled there. Believe me, it had little less than four inches lard on its paunch.

The Sausage's job being done, a crowd of others flew upon Gymnast, and had most scurvily dragged him down, when Pantagruel with his men came up to his relief. Then began the martial fray, higgledy piggledy. Maul-chitterling did maul Chitterlings; Cut-pudding did cut puddings; Pantagruel did break the Chitterlings at the knees; Friar John play'd at least in sight within his sow, viewing and observing all things; when the pattipans; that lay in ambuscade, most furiously sallied out upon Pantagruel.

Friar John, who lay snug all this while, by that time perceiving the route and hurly-burly, set open the doors of his sow, and sallied out with his merry Grecks, some of them armed with iron-spits, others with handirons, racks, fire-shovels, frying-pans, kettles, gridirons, oven forks, tongs, dripping pans, brooms, iron pots, mortars, pestles, all in battle array, like so many house-breakers, hallooing and roaring out altogether most frightfully, Nabuzardan, Nabuzardan, Nabuzardan. Thus shouting and hooting, they fought like dragons, and charged through the pattipans and sausages. The Chitterlings perceiving this fresh reinforcement, and that the others would be too hard for them, betook themselves to their heels, scampering off with full speed, as if the devil had come for them. Friar John, with an iron crow, knocked them down as fast as hops: his men too were not sparing on their side. O! what a woful sight it was! the field was all over strewd with heaps of dead or wounded Chitterlings; and history relates, that had not heaven had a hand in it, the Chitterling tribe had been totally routed out of the world, by the culinary champions. But there happened a wonderful thing, you may believe as little or as much of it as you please.

From the north flew towards us a huge, fat, thick, grizzly swine, with long and large wings, like those of a windmill; its plumes red crimson, like those of a phœnicoptere (which in Languedoe they call flaman;) its eyes were red, and flaming like a carbuncle; its ears green like a Prasin emerald; its teeth like a topaz; its tail long and black like jet; its feet white, diaphonous, and transparent like a diamond, somewhat broad, and of the splay kind, like those of geese, and as Queen Dick's used to be at Thoulouse, in the days of yore. About its neck it wore a gold collar, round which were some Ionian characters, wherof I could pick out but two words, 'ΤΕ ΑΘΗΝΑΝ, hog-teaching Minerva.

The sky was clear before; but at that monster's appearance, it changed so mightily for the worse, that we were all amazed at it. As soon as the Chitterlings perceived the flying hog, down they threw all their weapons, and fell on their knees, lifting up their hands, joined together without speaking one word, in a posture of adoration. Friar John and his party kept on mincing, felling, braining, mangling, and spitting the Chitterlings like mad: but Pantagruel sounded a retreat, and all hostility ceased.

The monster having several times hovered backwards and forwards between the two armies, with a tail-shot voided above twenty-seven butts of mustard on the ground; then flew away through the air, crying all the while, Carnival, Carnival, Carnival.

CHAPTER XLII.

THE monster being out of sight, and the two armies remaining silent, Pantagruel demanded a parley with the lady Niphleseth, Queen of the Chitterlings, who was in her chariot, by the standards; and it was easily granted. The queen alighted, courteously received Pantagruel, and was glad to see him. Pantagruel complained to her of this breach of peace: but she civilly made her excuse, telling him that a false information had caused all this mischief; her spies having brought her word, that Shrovetide their mortal foe, was landed, and spent his time in examining the urine of physeters.

She, therefore, entreated him to pardon them their offence; telling him that sir-reverence was sooner found in Chitterlings than gall; and offering, for herself and all her successors, to hold of him, and his, the whole island and country; to obey him in all his commands, be friends to his friends, and foes to his foes; and also to send every year, as an acknowledgment of their homage, a tribute of seventy-eight thousand Chitterlings, to serve him at his first course at table, six months in the year; which was punctually performed. For the next day she sent the aforesaid quantity of royal Chitterings to the good Gargantua, under the conduct of young Niphleseth, infant of the island.

The good Gargantua made a present of them to the great King of Paris. But by change of air, and for want of mustard, (the natural balsam and restorer of Chitterlings), most of them died. By the great king's particular grant, they were buried in heaps in a part of Paris, to this day called, La Rue pavée d'Andouilles; the street paved with Chitterlings. At the request of the ladies at his court, young Niphleseth was preserved, honourably used, and since that married to her heart's content; and was the mother of many fine children, for which heaven be praised.

Pantagruel civilly thanked the queen, forgave all offences, refused the offer she had made of her country, and gave her a pretty little knife. After that he asked her several nice questions concerning the apparition of that flying hog. She answered, that it was the idea of Carnival, their tutelary god in time of war, first founder, and original of all the Chitterling race; for which reason he resembled a hog; for Chitterlings drew their extraction from hogs.

Pantagruel asking for what purpose, and curative indication, he had voided so much mustard on the earth, the queen replied, that mustard was their sane-greal, and celestial balsam, of which laying but a little in the wounds of the fallen Chitterlings, in a very short time the wounded were healed, and the dead restored to life. Pantagruel held no further discourse with the queen, but retired on shipboard. The like did all the boon companions, with their implements of destruction, and their huge sow.

CHAPTER XLIII.

How Pantagruel went into the island of Ruach.

Two days after, we arrived at the island of Ruach; and I swear to you, by the celestial hen and chickens, that I found the way of living of the people so strange and wonderful, that I cannot, for the heart's blood of me, half tell it you. They live on nothing but wind, eat nothing but wind, and drink nothing but wind. They have no other houses but weather-cocks. They sow no other seeds but the three sorts of wind-flowers, rue, and herbs that make one break wind to the purpose: these scour them off charmingly. The common sort of people, to feed themselves, make use of feather, paper, or linen fans, according to their abilities. As for the rich, they live by the means of windmills.

When they would have some noble treat, the tables are spread under one or two windmills. There they feast as merry as beggars, and during the meal, their whole talk is commonly of the goodness, excellency, salubrity, and rarity of winds; as you, jolly toppers, in your cups, philosophize and argue upon wines. The one praises the south-east, the other the south-west, this the west and by south, and this the east and by north; another the west, and another the east; and so of the rest. As for lovers and amorous sparks, no gale for them like a smock-gale. For the sick they use bellows, as we use clysters among us.

Oh! (said to me a little diminutive swollen bubble) that I had now but a bladder-ful of that same Languedoc wind which they call Cieree. The famous physieian, Seurron, passing one day by this country, was telling us, that it is so strong, that it will make nothing of overturning a loaded waggon. Oh! what good would it not do my œdipodie leg. The biggest are not the best; but, said Panurge, rather would I had here a large butt of that same good Languedoc wine, that grows at Mirevanx, Canteperdrix, and Frontignan.

I saw a good likely sort of a man there, much resembling Ventrose, tearing and fuming in a grievous fret, with a tall curly groom, and a pimping little page of his, laying them on, like the devil, with a buskin. Not knowing the cause of his anger, at first I thought that all this was by the doctor's advice, as being a thing very healthy to the master to be in a passion, and to his man to be banged for it. But at last I heard him taxing his man with stealing from him like a rogue as he was, the better half of a large leathern bag of an excellent southerly wind, which he had carefully laid up, like a hidden reserve, against the cold weather.

They neither exonerate, dung, piss, nor spit in that island; but, to make amends, they belch, fizzle, funk, and give tail shots in abundance. They are troubled with all manner of distempers: and, indeed, all distempers are engendered, and proceed from ventosities, as Hippocrates demonstrates, lib. De Flatibus. But the most epidemical among them is the wind-cholic. The remedies which they use are large clysters, whereby they void store of windiness. They all die of dropsies and tympanies; the men farting, and the women fizzling: so that their soul takes her leave at the back-door.

Some time after, walking in the island, we met three hair-brained airy fellows, who seemed mightily puffed up, and went to take their pastime, and view the plovers, who live on the same diet as themselves, and abound in the island, I observed that as your true toppers, when they travel, carry flasks, leathern bottles, and small runlets along with them, so each of them had at his girdle a pretty little pair of bellows. If they happened to want wind, by the help of those pretty bellows they immediately drew some, fresh and cool, by attraction and reciprocal expulsion: for, as you well know, wind essentially defined, is nothing but fluctuating and agitated air.

Awhile after, we were commanded, in the king's name, not to receive, for three hours, any man or woman of the country, on board our ships; some having stolen from him a rousing fart, of the very individual wind which old goodman Æolus, the snorer, gave Ulysses, to conduct his ship, whenever it should happen to be becalmed. Which fart the king kept religiously, like another sanc-greal, and performed a world of wonderful cures with it, in many dangerous diseases, letting loose, and distributing to the patient, only as much of it as might frame a virginal fart; which is, if you must know, what our sanctimonials, alias nuns, in their dialect, call ringing backwards.

CHAPTER XLIV.

How small rain lays a high wind.

PANTAGRUEL commended their government and way of living, and said to the hypenemian mayor, If you approve Epicurus's opinion, plaicing the summum bonum in pleasure, (I mean pleasure that is easy and free from toil,) I esteem you happy; for your food being wind, eosts you little or nothing, since you need but blow. True, sir, returned the mayor, but alas! nothing is perfect here below: for too often, when we are at table, feeding on some good blessed wind of God, as on eelestial manna, merry as so many friars, down drops on a sudden some small rain, which lays our wind, and so robs us of it. Thus many a meal is lost for want of meat.

Just so, quoth Pamurge, Jenin Toss-pot, of Quinquenais, evaeuating some wine of his own burning (urine) on his wife's posteriors, laid the ill-fumed wind that blowed out of their centre, as out of some magisterial æolipile. Here is a kind of whim on that subject, which I made formerly :

One evening when Toss-pot had been at his butts,
 And Joan, his fat spouse, erammed with turnips her guts,
 Together they pigg'd, nor did drink so besot him,
 But he did what was done when his daddy begot him.
 Now, when to reeruit, he'd fain have been snoring,
 Joan's baek-door was filthily puffing and roaring :
 So, for spite he bepiss'd her, and quickly did find,
 That a small rain lays a very high wind.

We are plagued yearly with a very great ealamity, cried the mayor, for a giant, ealled Widenostrils, who lives in the island of Tohu, eomes hither every spring to purge, by the advice of his physicians, and swallows us, like so many pills, a great number of windmills, and of bellows also, at which his month waters exeedingly.

Now this is a sad mortification to us here, who are fain to fast over three or four whole Lents every year for this, besides certain petty Lents, ember weeks, and other orison and starving tides. And have you no remedy for this? asked Pantagruel. By the advice of our Mezarims, replied the mayor, about the time that he uses to give us a visit, we garrison our windmills with good store of eocks and hens. The first time that the greedy thief swallowed them, they had like to have done his business at once: for they erowed and caekled in his maw, and fluttered up and down athwart and along in his stomach, which threw the glutton into a lipothymy cardiac passion, and dreadful and dangerous convulsions, as if some serpent, creeping in at his mouth, had been frisking in his stomach.

Here is a comparative, as altogether incongruous and impertinent, cried Friar John, interrupting them; for I have formerly heard, that if a serpent chance to get into a man's stomach, it will not do him the least hurt, but will immediately get out, if you do but hang the patient by the heels, and lay a pan full of warm milk near his mouth. You were told this, said Pantagruel, and so were those who gave you this account; but none ever saw or read of such a cure. On the contrary, Hippocrates, in his fifth book of Epidem, writes, that such a case happening in his time, the patient presently died of a spasm and convulsion.

Besides the cocks and hens, said the mayor, continuing his story, all the foxes into the country whipped into Widenostril's mouth, posting after the poultry; which made such a stir with Reynard at their heels, that he grievously fell into fits each minute of an hour.

At last, by the advice of a Baden enchanter, at the time of the paroxysm, he used to flay a fox, by way of antidote and counter-poison. Since that he took better advice, and eases himself with taking a clyster made with a decoction of wheat and barley corns, and of livers of goslings; to the first of which the poultry run, and the foxes to the latter. Besides, he swallows some of your badgers or fox-dogs, by the way of pills and boluses. This is our misfortune.

Cease to fear, good people, cried Pantagruel, this huge Widenostrils, this same swallower of Windmills, is no more, I will assure you: he died, being stifled and choked with a lump of fresh butter at the mouth of a hot oven, by the advice of his physicians.

CHAPTER XLV.

How Pantagruel went ashore in the island of Pope-Figland.

THE next morning we arrived at the island of Popè-figs; formerly a rich and free people, called the Gaillardets; but now, alas! miserably poor, and under the yoke of the Papi-men. The occasion of it was this.

On a certain yearly high holiday, the burgomaster, syndics, and topping rabbies of the Gaillardets, chanced to go into the neighbouring island Papimany to see the festival, and pass away the time. Now one of them having espied the pope's picture, (with the sight of which, according to a laudable custom, the people were blessed on high-offering holidays), made mouths at it, and cried, a fig for it! as a sign of manifest contempt and derision. To be revenged of this affront, the Papimen, some days after, without giving the least warning, took arms, and surprised, destroyed, and ruined the whole island of the Gaillardets; putting the men to the sword, and sparing none but the women and children; and those too only on condition to do what the inhabitants of Milan were condemned to, by the Emperor Frederic Barbarossa.

These had rebelled against him in his absence, and ignominiously turned the empress out of the city, mounting her a horseback on a mule called Thaeor, with her breech foremost towards the old jaded mule's head, and her face turned towards the erupper. Now Frederick being returned, mastered them, and caused so careful a return to be made that he found out and got the famous mule Thaeor. Then the hangman, by his order, elapped a fig into the mule's jimeraek, in the presenee of the enslaved eits that were brought into the middle of the great market-plaee, and proclaimed, in the emperor's name, with trumpets, that whosoever of them would save his own life, should publiely pull the fig out with his teeth, and after that, put it in again in the very individual cranny whence he had drawn it, without using his hands, and that whoever refused to do this should presently swing for it, and die in his shoes. Some sturdy fools, standing upon their punctillio, chose honourably to be hanged, rather than submit to so shameful and abominable a disgraec; and others, less nice in point of eeremony, took heart of grace, and even resolved to have at the fig; and a fig for it, rather than make a worse figure with a hempen eollar, and die in the air, at so short warning: aeordingly when they had neatly pieked out the fig with their teeth, from old Thaeor's snatch-blatch, they plainly showed it the head's-man, saying ecco lo fico, behold the fig.

By the same ignominy the rest of these poor distressed Gaillardets saved their baeon, becoming tributaries and slaves, and the name of Pope-figs was given them, because they said, a fig for the pope's image. Since this, the poor wretches never prospered, but every year the devil was at their doors, and they were plagued with hail, storms, famine, and all manner of woes, as an everlasting punishment for the sin of their ancestors and relations. Perceiving the misery and calamity of that generation, we did not care to go farther up into the country; contenting ourselves with going into a little ehapel near the haven, to take some holy water. It was dilapidated and ruined, wanting also a eover—like St. Peter at Rome. When we were in, as we dipped our fingers in the sanctified cistern, we spied in the middle of that holy pickle, a fellow muffled up with stoles, all under water, like a diving duck, except the tip of his snout to draw his breath. About him stood three priests, true shavelings, clean shorn, and polled, who were muttering strange words to the devils out of a conjuring book.

Pantagruel was not a little amazed at this, and, inquiring what kind of sport these were at, was told, that, for three years last past, the plague had so dreadfully raged in the island, that the better half of it had been utterly depopulated, and the lands lay fallow and unoccupied. Now, the mortality being over, this same fellow, who had crept into the holy tub, having a large piece of ground, chanced to be sowing it with white winter wheat, at the very minute of an hour that a kind of a silly sucking devil, who could not yet write or read, or hail and thunder, unless it were on parsley or coleworts, had got leave of his master Lucifer to go into this island of Popefigs, where the devils were very familiar with the men and women, and often went to take their pastime.

This same devil being got thither, directed his discourse to the husbandman, and asked him what he was doing. The poor man told him, that he was sowing the ground with eorn, to help him to subsist the next year. Ay, but the ground is none of thine, Mr. Plough-jobber, cried the devil, but mine; for since the time that you mocked the pope, all this land has been proscribed, adjudged, and abandoned to us. However, to sow eorn is not my province: therefore I will give thee leave to sow the field, that is to say, provided we share the profit. I will, replied the farmer. I mean, said the devil, that of what the land shall bear, two lots shall be made, one of what shall grow above ground, the other of what shall be covered with earth: the right of choosing belongs to me; for I am a devil of noble and ancient race; thou art a base clown. I therefore choose what shall lie under ground, take thou what shall be above. When dost thou reckon to reap, hah? About the middle of July, quoth the farmer. Well, said the devil, I'll not fail thee then: in the meantime, slave as thou oughtest. Work, clown, work: I am going to tempt to the pleasing sin of whoring, the nuns of Dryfart, the sham saints of the cowl, and the gluttonish crew: I am more than sure of these. They need but meet, and the job is done: true fire and tinder, touch and take: down falls nun and up gets friar.

CHAPTER XLVI.

How a junior devil was fooled by a husbandman of Pope-Figland.

IN the middle of July, the devil came to the place aforesaid, with all his crew at his heels, a whole choir of the younger fry of hell; and having met the farmer, said to him, Well, elodpate, how hast thou done, since I went? Thou and I must share the concern. Ay, master devil, quoth the clown, it is but reason we should. Then he and his men began to cut and reap the corn: and, on the other side, the devil's imps fell to work, grubbing up and pulling out the stubble by the root.

The countryman had his corn thrashed, winnowed it, put it into sacks, and went with it to market. The same did the devil's servants, and sat them down there by the man to sell their straw. The countryman sold off his corn at a good rate, and with the money filled an old kind of a demi-buskin, which was fastened to his girdle. But the devil a sou the devils took: far from taking handsel, they were flouted and jeered by the country louts.

Market being over, quoth the devil to the farmer, Well, clown, thou hast choused me once, it is thy fault; chouse me twice, it will be mine. Nay, good sir devil, replied the farmer, how can I be said to have choused you, since it was your worship that chose first? The truth is, that, by this trick, you thought to cheat me, hoping that nothing would spring out of the earth for my share, and that you should find whole under ground the corn which I had sowed, and with it tempt the poor and needy, the close hypocrite, or the covetous griper; thus making them fall into your snares. But troth, you must even go to school yet: you are no conjurer, for aught I see: for the corn that was sown is dead and rotten, its corruption having caused the generation of that which you saw me sell: so you chose the worst, and therefore are cursed in the gospel. Well, talk no more of it, quoth the devil: what canst thou sow our field with for next year? If a man would make the best of it, answered the ploughman, it were fit he sow it with radishes. Now, cried the devil, thou talkest like an honest fellow, bumpkin: well, sow me good store of radishes, I will see and keep them safe from storms, and will not hail a bit on them. But harkye me, this time I bespeak for my share what shall be above ground; what is under shall be thine. Drudge on, looby, drudge on. I am going to tempt hereties; their souls are dainty viétuals, when broiled in rashers, and well powdered. My Lord Lueifer has the griping in the guts; they will make a dainty warm dish for his honour's maw.

When the season of radishes was come, our devil failed not to meet in the field, with a train of raseally underlings, all waiting devils, and finding there the farmer and his men, he began to eut and gather the leaves of the radishes. After him the farmer with his spade dug up the radishes, and elapped them up into pouehes. This done, the farmer, and their gangs, hied them to market, and there the farmer presently made good money of his radishes: but the poor devil took nothing; nay, what was worse, he was made a eommon laughing stoek by the gaping hoydons. I see thou hast played me a seuryv triek, thou villainous fellow, eried the angry devil: at last I am fully resolved even to make an end of the business betwixt thee and myself, about the ground, and these shall be the terms: we will elapperelaw each other, and whoever of us two shall first ery, Hold, shall quit his share of the field, which shall wholly belong to the eonqueror. I fix the time for this trial of skill, on this day seven-night: assure thyself that I will claw thee off like a devil. I was going to tempt your fornicators, bailiffs, perplexers of eauses, seriveners, forgers of deeds, two-handed counsellors, prevarieating solieitors, and other sueh vermin; but they were so eivil as to send me word by an interpreter, that they are all mine already. Besides our master Lueifer is so eloyed with their souls, that he often sends them baek to the smutty seullions, and slovenly devils of his kitehen, and they searee go down with them, unless now and then, when they are high-seasoned.

Some say there is no breakfast like a student's, no dinner like a lawyer's, no afternoon's nunchion like a vinedresser's, no supper like a tradesman's, no second supper like a serving wench's, and none of these meals equal to a froekified hobgoblin's. All this is true enough. Accordingly, at my Lord Lueifer's first eourse, hobgoblins, alias imps in eowls, are a standing dish. He willingly used to breakfast on students; but, alas, I do not know by what ill luck they have of late years joined the Holy Bible to their studies: so the devil a one we can get down among us; and I verily believe that unless the hypoerites of the tribe of Levi help us in it, taking from the enlightened book-mongers their St. Paul, either by threats, revilings, foree, violenee, fire, and faggot, we shall not be able to hook in any more of them, to nibble at below. He dines eommonly on eounsellors, mischief-mongers, multipliers of law suits, sueh as wrest and pervert right and law, and grind and flecee the poor: he never fears to want any of these. But who can endure to be wedded to a dish?

He said, the other day, at a full chapter, that he had a great mind to eat the soul of one of the fraternity of the cowl, that had forgot to speak for himself, in his sermon; and he promised double pay, and a large pension, to any one that should bring him such a tit-bit piping hot. We all went, a hunting after such a rarity, but came home without the prey: for they all admonish the good women to remember their convent. As for afternoon nunchions, he has left them off, since he was so wofully griped with the eholic; his fosterers, sutlers, eliareoal-men, and boiling cooks having been sadly mauled and peppered off in the northern countries.

His high devilship sups very well on tradesmen, usurers, apothecaries, cheats, coiners, and adulterers of wares. Now and then, when he is on the merry pin, his second supper is of serving wenches; who, after they have, by stealth, soaked their faces with their master's good liquor, fill up the vessel with it at second hand, or with other stinking water.

Well, drudge on, boor, drudge on; I am going to tempt the students of Trebisonde, to leave father and mother, forego for ever the established and common rule of living, disclaim and free themselves from obeying their lawful sovereign's edicts, live in absolute liberty, proudly despise every one, laugh at all mankind, and taking the fine jovial little cap of poetic licence, become so many pretty hobgoblins.

CHAPTER XLVII.

How the Devil was deceived by an old woman of Pope-Figland.

THE country lob trudged home very much concerned and thoughtful, you may swear; insomuch that his good woman, seeing him thus look moping, weened that something had been stolen from him at market: but when she had heard the cause of his affliction, and seen his budget well lined with coin, she bade him be of good cheer, assuring him that he would be never the worse for the scratching bout in question; wishing him only to leave her to manage that business, and not trouble his head about it; for she had already contrived how to bring him off cleverly. Let the worst come to the worst, said the husbandman, it will be but a scratch; for I'll yield at the first stroke, and quit the field. Quit a fart, replied the wife; he shall have none of the field: rely upon me, and be quiet; let me alone to deal with him. You say he is a pimping little devil, that is enough; I will soon make him give up the field, I will warrant you. Indeed, had he been a great devil, it had been somewhat.

The day that we landed in the island happened to be that which the devil had fixed for the combat. Now the countryman, having, like a good catholic, very fairly confessed himself, and received, betimes in the morning, by the advice of the vicar, had hid himself, all but the snout, in the holy water pot, in the posture in which we found him; and just as they were telling us this story, news came that the old woman had fooled the devil, and gained the field. You may not be sorry, perhaps, to hear how this happened.

The devil, you must know, came to the poor man's door, and rapping there, cried, So ho! ho the house! ho, clodpate! where art thou? Come out with a vengeance; come out with a wannion; come out and be damned: now for clawing. Then briskly and resolutely entering the house, and not finding the countryman there, he spied his wife lying on the ground, piteously weeping and howling. What is the matter? asked the devil. Where is he? what does he? Oh! that I knew where he is, replied threescore and five, the wicked rogue, the butcherly dog, the murderer! He has spoiled me; I am undone; I die of what he has done to me. How, cried the devil, what is it? I will tickle him off for you by and by. Alas, cried the old dissembler, he told me, the butcher, the tyrant, the tearer of devils, told me, that he had made a match to scratch with you this day, and to try his elaws, he did but just touch me with his little finger, here betwixt the legs, and has spoiled me for ever. Oh! I am a dead woman; I shall never be myself again: do but see! Nay, and besides, he talked of going to the smith's, to have his pounces sharpened and pointed. Alas! you are undone, Mr. Devil; good sir, scamper quickly, I am sure he won't stay! save yourself, I beseech you. While she said this, she uncovered herself up to her chin, after the manner in which the Persian women met their children who fled from the fight, and plainly showed her what do ye call it. The frighten'd devil, seeing the enormous solution of the continuity in all its dimensions, blessed himself, and cried out, Mahon, Demiourgon, Megæra, Aleeto, Persephone; slife, catch me here when he comes! I am gone: sdeath, what a gash! I resign him the field.

Having heard the catastrophe of the story, we retired a ship board, not being willing to stay there any longer. Pantagruel gave to the poor's box of the fabric of the church, eighteen thousand good royals, in commiseration of the poverty of the people, and the calamity of the place.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

HAVING left the desolate island of the Popefigs, we sailed, for the space of a day, very fairly and merrily, and made the blessed island Papimany. As soon as we had dropt anchor in the road, before we had well moored our ship with ground-tackle, four persons, in different garbs, rowed towards us in a skiff. One of them was dressed like a monk in his frock, draggle-tailed, and booted: the other like a falconer, with a lure, and a long-winged hawk on his fist: the third like a solicitor, with a large bag, full of information, subpœnas, breviates, bills, writs, cases, and other implements of petti-fogging. The fourth looked like one of your vine barbers about Ocleans, with a jantee pair of canvas trousers, a dosser, and a pruning knife at his girdle.

As soon as the boat had clapped them on board, they all with one voice asked, Have you seen him, good passengers, have you seen him?—Who? asked Pantagruel. You know who, answered they. Who is it? asked Friar John. 'Sblood and 'ounds, I'll thrash him thick and threifold. This he said, thinking that they inquired after some robber, murderer, or church-breaker. Oh, wonderful, cried the four, do not you foreign people know the one? Sirs, replied Epistemon, we do not understand those terms: but if you will be pleased to let us know who you mean, we will tell you the truth of the matter, without any more ado. We mean said they, He that is. Did you ever see him? He that is, returned Pantagruel, according to our theological doctrine, is God, who said to Moses, I am that I am. We never saw him, nor can he be beheld by mortal eyes. We mean nothing less than that supreme God, who rules in heaven, replied they; we mean the god on earth. Did you ever see him? Upon my honour, replied Carpalim, they mean the pope. Ay, ay, answered Panurge: yea, verily, gentlemen, I have seen three of them, whose sight has not much bettered me. How! cried they, our sacred decretals inform us, that there never is more than one living. I mean successively, one after the other, returned Panurge: otherwise I never saw more than one at a time.

O thrice and four times happy people! cried they, you are welcome, and more than double welcome! They then kneeled down before us and would have kissed our feet, but we would not suffer it, telling them that, should the pope come thither in his own person, it is all they could do to him. No, certainly, answered they, for we have already resolved upon the matter,

We would kiss his bare arse, without boggling at it, and eke his two pounders : for he has a pair of them, the holy father, that he has ; we find it so by our fine decretals, otherwise he could not be pope. So that, according to our subtilc decretalin philosophy, this is a necessary consequence : he is pope ; therefore, he has genitorics (genitals) and should genitorics no more be found in the world, the world could no more have a pope.

While they were talking thus, Pantagruel inquired of one of the coxswains's crew, who those persons were ? he answered, that they were the four estates of the realm ; and added, that we should be made as welcome as princes, since we had seen the pope. Panurge having been acquainted with this by Pantagruel, said to him in his ear, I swear and vow, sir, it is even so ; he that has patience may compass any thing. Our seeing the pope hath done us no good : now, in the devil's name, it will do us a great deal. We then went ashore, and the whole country, men, women, and children, came to meet us as in a solemn procession. Our four estates cried out to them with a loud voice, " They have seen him ! they have seen him ! they have seen him ! " That proclamation being made, all the mob kneeled before us, lifting up their hands towards heaven, and crying, O happy men ! O most happy ! and this acclamation lasted about a quarter of an hour.

Then came the schoolmaster of the place, with all his ushers, and school-boys, whom he magisterially flogged, as they used to whip children in our country formerly, when some criminal was hanged, that they might remember it. This displeased Pantagruel, who said to them, Gentlemen, if you do not leave off whipping these poor children, I am gone. The people were amazed, hearing his stentorian voice ; and I saw a little hump with long fingers, say to the hypodidascal, What ! in the name of wonder do all those that see the pope grow as tall as yon huge fellow that threatens us ! Ah ! how I shall think time long till I have seen him too, that I may grow and look as big. In short the acclamations were so great, that Homenas (so they called their bishop) hastened thither, on an unbridled mule, with green trappings, attended by his apposts (as they said) and his supposts, or officers, bearing crosses, banners, standards, canopies, torches, holy water-pots, &c. He too wanted to kiss our feet, (as the good Christian Valfuier did to Pope Clement,) saying that one of their hypothetes, that is, one of the scavengers, scourers, and commentators of their holy decretals, had written that, in the same manner as the Messiah, so long and so much expected by the Jews, at last appeared among them ; so, on some happy day of God, the pope would come into that island ; and that while they waited for that blessed time, if any who had seen him at Rome, or elsewhere chanced to come among them, they should be sure to make much of them, feast them plentifully, and treat them with a great deal of reverence. However, we civilly desired to be excused.

CHAPTER XLIX.

HOMENAS then said to us: It is enjoined us by our holy decretals to visit churches first, and taverns after. Therefore, not to decline that fine institution, let us go to church; we will afterwards go and feast ourselves. Man of God, quoth Friar John, do you go before, we will follow you; you spoke in the matter properly, and like a good Christian; it is long since we saw any such. For my part this rejoices my mind very much, and I verily believe that I shall have the better stomach after it. Well it is a happy thing to meet with good men! Being come near the gate of the church, we spied a huge thick book, gilt, and covered all over with precious stones, as rubies, emeralds, diamonds, and pearls, more, or at least as valuable as those which Augustus consecrated to Jupiter Capitolinus. This book hung in the air, being fastened with two thick chains of gold to the zoophore of the porch. We looked on it, and admired it. As for Pantagruel, he handled it, and dandled it, and turned it as he pleased; for he could reach it without straining; and he protested, that whenever he touched it, he was seized with a pleasant tickling at his finger's end, new life and activity in his arms, and a violent temptation in his mind to beat one or two serjeants, or such officers, provided they were not of the shaveling kind. Homenas then said to us, The law was formerly given to the Jews by Moses, written by God himself. At Delphos, before the portal of Apollo's temple, this sentence, ΓΝΩΘΙ ΣΕ ΑΥΤΟΝ, was found written with a divine hand. And some time after it, ΕΙ was also seen, and as divinely written and transmitted from heaven. Cybele's image was brought out of heaven, into a field called Pessinunt, in Phrygia; so was that of Diana to Tauris, if you will believe Euripides; the oriflamb, or holy standard, was transmitted out of heaven to the noble and most Christian kings of France, to fight against the unbelievers. In the reign of Numa Pompilius, second king of the Romans, the famous copper buckler called Ancile, was seen to descend from heaven. At Acropolis, near Athens, Minerva's statue formerly fell from the imperial heaven. In like manner the sacred decretals, which you see, were written with the hand of an angel, of the cherubim kind. You outlandish people will hardly believe this, I fear. Little enough of conscience, said Panurge.—And then, continued Homenas, they were miraculously transmitted to us here from the very heaven of heavens; in the same manner as the river Nile is called Diipetes, by Homer, the father of all philosophy (the holy decretals always excepted). Now, because you have seen the pope, their evangelist and everlasting protector, we will give you leave to see and kiss them on the inside, if you think meet. But then you must fast three days before, and canonically confess; nicely and strictly mustering up, and inventorising your sins, great and small, so thick that one single circumstance of them may not escape you; as our holy decretals, which you see direct. This will take up some time. Man of God, answered Panurge, we have seen and descried decrees, and eke decretals enough of conscience; some on paper, others on parchment, fine and gay like any painted paper lantern, some on vellum, some in manuscript, and others in print: so you need not take half these pains to show these. We will take the good-will for the deed, and thank you as much as if we had. Ay, marry, said Homenas, but you never saw these that are angelically written. Those in your country are only transcripts from ours; as we find it written by one of our old decretaline scholiasts. For me, do not spare me; I do not value the labour; so I may serve you: do but tell me whether you will be confessed, and fast only three short little days of God? As for confessing, answering Panurge, there can be no great harm in it; but this same fasting, master of mine, will hardly down with us at this time, for we have so very much overfasted ourselves at sea, that the spiders have spun their cobwebs over our grinders. Do but look on this good Friar John des Entomeures, (Homenas then courtcously deny-clipped him about the neck) some moss is growing in his throat, for want of bestirring and exercising his chaps. He speaks the truth, vouched Friar John; I have so much fasted that I am almost grown hump-shouldered. Come, then, let us go into the church, said Homenas; and pray forgive us if for the present, we do not sing you a fine high mass. The hour of mid-day is past, and after it our sacred decretals forbid us to sing mass, I mean your high and lawful mass. But I will say a low and dry one, for you. I had rather have one moistened with some good Anjou wine, cried Panurge; fall to, fall to your low mass, and dispatch. Odd's-boddikins, quoth Friar John, it frets me to the guts that I must have an empty stomach at this time of day. For, had I eaten a good breakfast, and fed like a monk, if he should chance to sing us the Requiem æternam dona eis, Domine, I had then brought thither bread and wine for the traits passez (those that are gone before). Well, patience; pull away, and save tide: short and sweet, I pray you, and this for a cause.

CHAPTER L.

How Homenas showed us the arch-type, or representation of a pope.

MASS being mumbled over, Homenas took a huge bundle of keys out of a trunk near the head altar, and put thirty-two of them into so many key-holes; put back so many springs; then with fourteen more mastered so many padlocks, and at last opened an iron window strongly barred above the said altar. This being done, in token of great mystery, he covered himself with wet saekeloth, and drawing a curtain of erimson satin, showed us an image daubed over, coarsely enough, to my thinking: then he touched it with a pretty long stiek, and made us all kiss the part of the stiek that had touched the image. After this he said unto us, What think you of this image? It is the likeness of a pope, answered Pantagrue: I know it by the triple crown, his furred amice, his rochet, and his slipper. You are in the right, said Homenas; it is the idea of that same good god on earth, whose coming we devoutly await, and whom we hope one day to see in this country. O happy, wished for, and much expected day! and happy, most happy you, whose propitious stars have so favoured you, as to let you see the living and real face of this good god on earth! by the single sight of whose picture we obtain full remission of all the sins which we remember that we have committed, as also a third part, and eighteen quarantaines of the sins which we have forgot: and indeed we only see it on high annual holidays.

This caused Pantagrue to say, that it was a work like those which Dædalus used to make, since, though it were deformed and ill drawn, nevertheless some divine energy, in point of pardons, lay hid and concealed in it. Thus, said Friar John, at Seville, the rascally beggars being one evening on a solemn holiday at supper in the spital, one bragged of having got six blanes, or two-pence half-penny; another eight liards, or two-pence; a third, seven earoluses, or six-pence; but an old mumper made his vaunts of having got three testons, or five shillings. Ah, but, cried his comrades, thou hast a leg of God;

as if, continued Friar John, some divine virtue could lie hid in a stenching ulcerated rotten shank. Pray, said Pantagruel, when you are for telling us some such nauseous tale, be so kind as not to forget to provide a bason, Friar John: I'll assure you, I had much ado to forbear bringing up my breakfast. Fie! I wonder a man of your coat is not ashamed to use thus the sacred name of God, in speaking of things so filthy and abominable! fie, I say. If among your monking tribes such an abuse of words is allowed, I beseech you leave it there, and do not let it come out of the cloisters. Physicians, said Epistemon, thus attribute a kind of divinity to some diseases: Nero also extolled mushrooms, and in a Greek proverb, termed them divine food, because with them he had poisoned Claudius his predecessor. But methinks, gentlemen, this same picture is not over-like our late pope's. For I have seen them, not with their pallium, amice, or rochet on, but with helmets on their heads, more like the top of a Persian turban; and while the Christian commonwealth was in peace, they alone were most furiously and cruelly making war. This must have been then, returned Homenas, against the rebellious, heretical Protestants; reprobates, who are disobedient to the holiness of this good god on earth. It is not only lawful for him to do so, but it is enjoined him by the sacred decretals; and if any dare transgress one single iota against their commands, whether they be emperors, kings, dukes, princes, or commonwealths, he is immediately to pursue them with fire and sword, strip them of all their goods, take their kingdoms from them, proscribe them, anathematize them, and destroy not only their bodies, those of their children, relations, and others, but damn also their souls to the very bottom of the most hot and burning cauldron in hell. Here, in the devil's name, said Panurge, the people are no heretics; such as was our Raminagrobis, and as they are in Germany and England. You are Christians of the best edition, all picked and culled, for ought I see. Ay, marry are we, returned Homenas, and for that reason we shall all be saved. Now let us go and bless ourselves with holy-water, and then to dinner.

CHAPTER LI.

Table-talk in praise of the decretals.

Now, toppers, pray observe that while Homenas was saying his dry mass, three collectors, or licensed beggars of the church, each of them with a large bason, went round among the people, with a loud voice; pray remember the blessed men who have seen his face. As we came out of the temple, they brought their basons brim full of papimany ehink to Homenas, who told us that it was plentifully to feast with; and that, of this contribution and voluntary tax, one part should be laid out in good drinking, another in good eating, and the remainder in both: according to an admirable exposition hidden in a corner of their holy decretals; which was performed to a T, and that a noted tavern not much unlike that of Will's Anniens. Believe me, we tickled it off there with copious eramming, and numerous swilling.

I made two notable observations at that dinner: the one, that there was not one dish served up, whether of cabrittas, eapons, hogs, (of which latter there is great plenty in Papimany,) pigeons, eonies, leverets, turkeys, or others, without abundance of magistral stuffing: the other, that every course, and the fruit also, were served up by unmarried females of the place, tight lasses, I will assure you, waggish, fair, good-conditioned, and eomely, spruce and fit for business. They were all elad in fine long white albs, with two girdles: their hair interwoven with narrow tape and purple riband, stuck with roses, gilly-flowers, marjoram, daffidown-dillies, thyme, and other sweet flowers.

At every cadence, they invited us to drink and bang it about, dropping us neat and genteel courtesies: nor was the sight of them unwelcome to all the company: and as for Friar John, he leered on them sideways, like a cur that steals a eapon. When the first course was taken off, the females melodiously sung us an epose in the praise of the sacrosant decretals; and then the second course being served up, Homenas, joyful and cheery, said to one of the she butlers, light here, Clerica. Immediately one of the girls brought him a tall-boy brini-full of extravagant wine. He took fast hold of it, and fetching a deep sigh, said to Pantagruel, My lord, and you my good friends, here's to ye, with all my heart: you are all very welcome. When he had tipped that off, and given the tall-boy to the pretty creature, he lifted up his voice and said. O most holy decretals, how good is good wine found through your means! This is the best jest we have had yet, observed Panurge. But it would still be better, said Pantagruel, if they could turn bad wine into good.

O seraphic Sextum! continued Homenas, how necessary are you not to the salvation of poor mortals! O cherubic Clementinæ! how perfectly the perfect institution of a true Christian is contained and described in you! O angelical Extravagantés! how many poor souls that wander up and down in mortal bodies, through this vale of misery, would perish, were it not for you! When, ah! when shall this speeial gift of graee be bestowed on mankind, as to lay aside all other studies and concerns, to use you, to peruse you, to understand you, to know you by heart, to practise you, to incorporate you, to turn you into blood, and in-centre you into the deepest ventricles of their brains, the inmost marrow of their bones, and most intricate labyrinth of their arteries? Then, ah, then! and no sooner than then, nor otherwise than thus, shall the world be happy! While the old man was thus running on, Epistemon rose and softly said to Panurge, For want of a close stool, I must even leave you for a moment or two: this stuff has unbunged the orifice of my mustard-barrel: but I'll not tarry long.

Then, ah then! continued Homenas, no hail, frost, ice, snow, overflowing, or vis major: then plenty of all earthly goods here below. Then uninterrupted and eternal peace through the universe, an end of all wars, plunderings, drudgeries, robbing, assassinations, unless it be to destroy these cursed rebels the heretics. Oh, then, rejoicing, cheerfulness, jollity, solace, sports, and delicious pleasures, over the face of the earth. Oh! what great learning, inestimable erudition, and god-like precepts, are knit, linked, rivetted, and mortised in the divine chapters of these eternal decretals!

Oh! how wonderfully, if you read but one demy canon, short paragraph, or single observation of these sacrosanct decretals, how wonderfully, I say, do you not perceive to kindle in your hearts a furnace of divine love, charity towards your neighbour, (provided he be no heretic,) bold contempt of all casual and sublunary things, firm content in all your affections, and extatic elevation of soul even to the third heaven.

CHAPTER LII.

A continuation of the miracles caused by the decretals.

SPOKE like an organ, quoth Panurge; but for my part, I believe as little of it as I can. For, one day by chance I happened to read a chapter of them at Poitiers, at the most decretali potent Scotch doctor's, and old Nick turn me into bumfodder, if this did not make me so hide-bound and costive, that for four or five days hardly I scumbered one poor butt of sir-reverence; and that, too, was full as dry and hard, I protest, as Catullus tells us were those of his neighbour Furius:

“Nec toto decies cacas in anno,
Atque id durius est fabâ, et lapillis:
Quod tu si manibus teras, fricesque,
Non unquam digitum inquinare posses.”

Oh, ho, cried Homenas, by our lady, it may be you were then in a state of mortal sin, my friend. Well turned, cried Panurge, this was a new strain egad.

One day, said Friar John, at Seville I had applied to my posteriors, by way of hind-towel, a leaf of an old Clementinæ, which our rent-gatherer, John Guimard, had thrown out into the green of our cloister; now the devil boil me like a black pudding, if I was not so abominably plagued with chaps, chaws, piles at the fundament, that the orifice of my poor nockandroe was in a most woful pickle for I do not know how long. By our lady, cried Homenas, it was a plain punishment of God, for the sin that you had committed in bewraying that sacred book, which you ought rather to have kissed and adored; I say with an adoration of latria, or of hyperdulia at least: the Panormitan never told a lie in the matter.

Saith Ponocrates: At Montpclier, John Choüart having boughts of the monks of St. Olary a delicate set of decretals, written on fine large parchment of Lamballe, to beat gold between the leaves, not so much as a piece that was beaten in them came to good, but all were dilacerated and spoiled. Mark this, cried Homenas; it was a divine punishment and vengeance.

At Mans, said Eudemon, Francis Cornu, apothecary, had turned an old set of Extravagantés into waste paper: may I never stir, if whatever was lapped up in them was not immediately corrupted, rotten, and spoiled; incense, pepper, cloves, cinnamon, saffron, wax, cassia, rhubarb, tamarinds, all drugs and spices, were lost without exception. Mark, mark, quoth Homenas, an effect of divine justice! This comes of putting the sacred Scriptures to such profane uses.

At Paris, said Carpalim, Snip Groignet the tailor had turned an old Clementinæ into patterns and measures, and all the clothes that were cut on them were utterly spoiled and lost; gowns, hoods, cloaks, cassocks, jerkings, jackets, waistcoats, capes, doublets, petticoats, corps de robes, farthingales, and so forth. Snip, thinking to cut a hood, would cut you out a codpiece; instead of a cassock, he would make you a high-crowned hat; for a waistcoat, he would shape you out a rochet; on the pattern of a doublet, he would make you a thing like a frying-pan; then his journeymen having stitched it up, did jag it and pink it at the bottom, and so it looked like a pan to fry chesnuts. Instead of a cape, he made a buskin; for a farthingal, he shaped a montero cap; and thinking to make a cloak, he would cut out a pair of your big out-strouting Swiss breeches, with panes like the outside of a tabour. Inso-much that Snip was condemned to make good the stuffs to all his customers; and to this day poor cabbage's hair grows through his hood, and his arse through his pocket-holes. Mark, an effect of heavenly wrath and vengeance! cried Homenas.

At Cahusae, said Gymnast, a match being made by the lords of Estissac and Viscount Lausun to shoot at a mark, Peroton had taken to pieces a set of deerstals, and set one of the leaves for the white to shoot at: now I sell, nay I give and bequeath for ever and aye, the mould of my doublet to fifteen hundred hampers full of black devils, if ever any archer in the country (though they are singular marksmen in Guienne) could hit the white. Not the least bit of the holy scribble was contaminated or touched: nay, and Sansornin the elder, who held stakes, swore to us, figues dioures, hard figs, (his greatest oath,) that he had openly, visibly, and manifestly seen the bolt of Carquelin moving right to the round circle in the middle of the white; and that just on the point, when it was going to hit and enter, it had gone aside about seven foot and four inches wide of it towards the bakehouse.

Miraele! cried Homenas, miraele! miracle! Cleriea, come wench, light, light here. Here's to you all, gentlemen; I vow you seem to me very sound Christians. While he said this, the maidens began to snicker at his elbow, grinning, giggling, and twittering among themselves. Friar John began to paw, neigh, and whinny at the snout's end, as one ready to leap, or at least to play the ass, and get up and ride tantivy to the devil, like a beggar on horseback.

Methinks, said Pantagrue, a man might have been more out of danger near the white of which Gymnast spoke, than was formerly Diogenes near another. How is that? asked Homenas; what was it? Was he one of our deerstallists? Rarely fallen in again egad, said Epistemon, returning from stool; I see he will hook his deerstals in, though by the head and shoulders.

Diogenes, said Pantagrue, one day, for pastime, went to see some archers that shot at butts, one of whom was so unskilful, that, when it was his turn to shoot, all the bystanders went aside, lest he should mistake them for the mark. Diogenes had seen him shoot extremely wide of it: so when the other was taking aim a second time, and the people removed at a great distance to the right and left of the white, he placed himself close by the mark; holding that place to be the safest, and that so bad an archer would certainly rather hit any other.

One of the Lord d'Estissae's pages at last found out the charm, pursued Gymnast, and by his advice Peroton put in another white made up of some papers of Pouillae's lawsuit, and then every one shot cleverly.

At Landerousse, said Rhizotomus, at John Delif's wedding were very great doings, as it was then the custom of the country. After supper, several farces, interludes, and comical scenes were acted: they had also several morris-dancers with bells and tabours; and divers sorts of masks and mummers were let in. My school-fellows and I, to grace the festival to the best of our power, (for, fine white and purple liveries had been given to all of us in the morning) contrived a merry mask with store of eockle-shells, shells of snails, periwinkles, and such other. Then for want of cuckoo pintle, or priest-pintle, lousebur, clote, and paper, we made ourselves false faces with the leaves of an old Sextum, that had been thrown by, and lay there for any one that would take it up: cutting out holes for the eyes, nose, and mouth. Now, did you ever hear the like since you were born? when we had played our little boyish antic tricks, and came to take off our sham faces, we appeared more hideous and ugly than the little devils that acted the "Passion" at Douay: for our faces were utterly spoiled at the places which had been touched by those leaves: one had there the small-pox; another, God's token, or the plague-spot; a third, the erinckums; a fourth, the measles; a fifth, blotches, pushes, and carbuncles; in short, he came off the least hurt, who only lost his teeth by the bargain. Miracle! bawled out Homenas, miracle!

Hold, hold, cried Rhizotomus, it is not yet time to clap. My sister Kate, and my sister Ren, had put the crepines of their hoods, their ruffles, snuffekins, and neck-ruffs new washed, starched, and ironed, into that very book of decretals; for, you must know, it was covered with thick boards, and had strong clasps. Now by the virtue of God—Hold, interrupted Homenas, what God do you mean? There is but one, answered Rhizotomus. In heaven, I grant, replied Homenas; but we have another here on earth, do you see. Ay, marry have we, said Rhizotomus; but on my soul I protest I had quite forgot it. Well then, by the virtue of god the pope, their pinnars, neck-ruffs, bibs, coifs, and other linen, turned as black as a charcoal-man's sack. Miracle! cried Homenas. Here, Clerica, light me here; and pr'ythee, girl, observe these rare stories. How comes it to pass then, asked Friar John, that people say,

Ever since decrees had tails,
And gens d'armes lugged heavy mails,
Since each monk would have a horse,
All went here from bad to worse.

I understand you, answered Homenas: this is one of the quirks and little satires of the new-fangled heretics.

CHAPTER LIII.

How by the virtue of the decretals, gold is subtilely drawn out of France to Rome.

I WOULD, said Epistemon, it had cost me a pint of the best tripe that ever can enter into gut, so we had but compared with the original the dreadful chapters, Execrabilis, De multa, Si plures. De annatis per totum. Nisi essent. Cum ad monasterium. Quod delectio. Mandatum; and certain others. that draw every year out of France to Rome, four hundred thousand ducats and more.

Do you make nothing of this? asked Homenas. Though, methinks, after all, it is but little, if we consider that France, the most Christian, is the only nurse the see of Rome has. However, find me in the whole world a book, whether of philosophy, physic, law, mathematics, or other human learning, nay, even by my God, of the Holy Scripture itself, will draw as much money thence? None, none, pshaw, tush, blurt, pish; none can. You may look till your eyes drop out of your head, nay, till doomsday in the afternoon, before you can find another of that energy; I will pass my word for that.

Yet these devilish heretics refuse to learn and know it. Burn them, tear them, nip them with hot pincers, drown them, hang them, spit them at the bunghole, pelt them, paut them, bruise them, beat them, cripple them, dismember them, cut them, gut them, bowel them, paunch them, thrash them, slash them, gash them, chop them, slice them, slit them, carve them, saw them, bethwack them, pare them, hack them, hew them, mince them, flea them, boil them, broil them, roast them, toast them, bake them, fry them, crucify them, crush them, squeeze them, grind them, batter them, burst them, quarter them, unlimb them, behump them, bethump them, belump them, belabour them, pepper them, spitchcock them, and carbonate them on gridirons, these wicked heretics! decretalifuges, decretalicides, worse than homicides, worse than patricides, decretalictiones of the devil of hell.

As for you other good people, I must earnestly pray and beseech you to believe no other thing, to think on, say, undertake, or do no other thing, than what's contained in our sacred decretals, and their corollaries, this fine Sextum, these fine Clementinæ, these fine Extravagantés. O deific books! So shall you enjoy glory, honour, exaltation, wealth, dignities, and preferments in this world; be revered, and dreaded by all, preferred, elected, and chosen, above all men.

For, there is not under the cope of heaven a condition of men, out of which you will find persons fitter to do and handle all things, than those who by divine prescience, eternal predestination, have applied themselves to the study of the holy decretals.

Would you choose a worthy emperor, a good captain, a fit general in time of war, one that can well foresee all inconveniences, avoid all dangers, briskly and bravely bring his men on to a breach or attack, still be on sure grounds, always overcome without loss of his men, and know how to make a good use of his victory? Take me a decretist.—No, no, I mean a decretalist. Ho, the foul blunder, whispered Epistemon.

Would you, in time of peace, find a man capable of wisely governing the state of a commonwealth, of a kingdom, of an empire, of a monarchy; sufficient to maintain the clergy, nobility, senate, and commons in wealth, friendship, unity, obedience, virtue, and honesty? Take a decretalist.

Would you find a man, who, by his exemplary life, eloquence, and pious admonitions, may in a short time, without effusion of human blood, conquer the Holy Land, and bring over to the holy church the misbelieving Turks, Jews, Tartars, Muscovites, Mamelukes, and Sarrabonites? Take me a decretalist.

What makes, in many countries, the people rebellious and depraved, pages saucy and mischievous, students sottish and duncical? Nothing but that their governors, and tutors were not decretalists.

But what, on your conscience, was it, do you think, that established, confirmed, and authorised those fine religious orders, with whom you see the Christian world every where adorned, graced, and illustrated, as the firmament is with its glorious stars? The holy decretals.

What was it that founded, underpropped, and fixed, and now maintains, nourishes, and feeds the devout monks, and friars in convents, monasteries, and abbeys; so that did they not daily and nightly pray without ceasing, the world would be in evident danger of returning to its primitive chaos? The sacred decretals.

What makes and daily increases the famous and celebrated patrimony of St. Peter in plenty of all temporal, corporeal, and spiritual blessings? The holy decretals.

What made the holy apostolic see and pope of Rome, in all times, and at this present, so dreadful in the universe, that all kings, emperors, potentates, and lords, willing, nilling, must depend upon him, hold of him, be crowned, confirmed, and authorised by him, come thither to strike sail, buckle, and fall down before his holy slipper, whose picture you have seen? The mighty decretals of God.

I will discover you a great secret. The universities of your world have commonly a book, either open or shut, in their arms and devices: what book do you think it is? Truly, I do not know, answered Pantagruel; I never read it. It is the decretals, said Homenas, without which the privileges of all universities would soon be lost. You must own, that I have taught you this; ha, ha, ha, ha, ha!

Here Homenas began to belch, to fart, to funk, to laugh, to slaver, and to sweat; and then he gave his huge greasy four-cornered cap to one of the lasses, who clapt it on her pretty head with a great deal of joy, after she had lovingly bussed it, as a sure token that she should be first married. Vivat, cried Epistemon, fifat, bibat, pipat.

I was saying then, that giving yourselves thus wholly to the study of the holy decretals, you will gain wealth and honour in this world: I add, that in the next you will infallibly be saved in the blessed kingdom of heaven, whose keys are given to our good god and decretaliarch. O my good god, whom I adore and never saw, by thy special grace open unto us, at the point of death at least, this most sacred treasure of our holy mother church, whose protector, preserver, butler, chief larder, administrator, and disposer thou art; and take care, I beseech thee, O lord, that the precious works of supererogation, the goodly pardons, do not fail us in time of need: so that the devils may not find an opportunity to gripe our precious souls, and the dreadful jaws of hell may not swallow us. If we must pass through purgatory, thy will be done. It is in thy power to draw us out of it when thou pleasest. Here Homenas began to shed huge hot briny tears, to beat his breast, and kiss his thumbs in the shape of a cross.

CHAPTER LIV.

EPISTEMON, Friar John, and Panurge, seeing this doleful catastrophe, began under the cover of their napkins, to cry meeow, meeow, meeow; feigning to wipe their eyes all the while as if they had wept. The wenches were doubly diligent, and brought brimmers of Clementine wine to every one, besides store of sweatcats; and thus the feasting was revived.

Before we arose from table, Homenas gave us a great quantity of fair large pears; saying, Here, my good friends, these are singular good pears; you will find none such anywhere else, I dare warrant. Every soil bears not every thing, you know; India alone boasts black ebony; the best incense is produced in Sabæa; the sphragitid earth at Lemnos: so this island is the only place where such fine pears grow. You may, if you please, make nurseries with their kernels in your country.

I like their taste extremely, said Pantagrue. If they were sliced and put into a pan on the fire with wine and sugar, I fancy they would be very wholesome meat for the sick, as well as for the healthy. Pray what do you call them? No other-wise than you have heard, replied Homenas. We are a plain downright sort of people, as God would have it, and call figs figs; plums, plums; and pears, pears. Truly, said Pantagrue, if I live to go home,—which I hope will be speedily, God willing,—I'll set off and graff some in my garden in Touraine, by the banks of the Loire, and will call them bon-Christian or good-Christian pears; for I never saw better Christians than are these good papimans. I would like him two to one better yet, said Friar John, would he but give us two or three cart-loads of yon buxom lasses. Why, what would you do with them? cried Homenas. Quoth Friar John, No harm, only bleed the kind-hearted souls straight between the two great toes, with certain clever lancets of the right stamp; by which operation good christian children would be inoculated upon them, and the breed be multiplied in our country, in which there are not many over good, the more's the pity.

Nay verily, replied Homenas, we cannot do this; for you would make them tread their shoes awry, crack their pipkins, and spoil their shapes; you love mutton, I see, you will run at sheep; I know you by that same nose and hair of yours, though I never saw your face before. Alas! alas! how kind you are! And would you indeed damn your precious soul? Our decretals forbid this. Ah, I wish you had them at your finger-end. Patience, said Friar John; but, si tu non vis dare, præsta, quasumus. Matter of breviary. As for that, I defy all the world, and I fear no man that wears a head and hood, though he were a chrystallin, I mean a decretalin doctor.

Dinner being over, we took our leave of the right reverend Homenas, and of all the good people, humbly giving thanks; and, to make them amends for their kind entertainment, promised them that, at our coming to Rome, we would make our applications so effectually to the pope, that he would speedily be sure to come to visit them in person. After this we went on board.

Pantagrue, by an act of generosity, and as an acknowledgment of the sight of the pope's picture, gave Homenas nine pieces of double frized cloth of gold, to be set before the grates of the window. He also caused the church box, for its repairs and fabric, to be quite filled with double crowns of gold; and ordered nine hundred and fourteen angels to be delivered to each of the lasses, who had waited at table, to buy them husbands when they can get them.

CHAPTER LV.

How Pantagruel being at sea, heard various unfrozen words.

WHEN we were at sea, junketting, tippling, discoursing, and telling stories, Pantagruel rose and stood up to look out; then asked us, do you hear nothing gentlemen? Methink I hear some people talking in the air, yet I can see nobody. Hark! According to his command we listened, and with full ears sucked in the air, as some of you suck oysters, to find if we could hear some sound scattered through the sky, and to lose none of it, like the Emperor Antoninus, some of us laid their hands hollow next to their ears; but all this would not do, nor could we hear any voice. Yet Pantagruel continued to assure us he heard various voices in the air, some of men and some of women.

At last we began to fancy that we also heard something, or at least that our ears tingled; and the more we listened, the plainer we discerned the voices, so as to distinguish articulate sounds. This mightly frightened us, and not without cause; since we could see nothing, yet heard such various sounds and voices of men, women, children, horses, &c., inso-much that Panurge cried out, Cods belly, there is no fooling with the devil; we are all beshit, let us fly. There is some ambuscade hereabouts. Friar John, art thou here, my love? I pray thee, stay by me, old boy. Hast thou got thy swinging tool? See that it do not stiek in thy scabbard; thou never scourest it half as it should be. We are undone. Hark! They are guns, gad judge me: let us fly, I do not say with hands and feet, as Brutus said at the battle of Pharsalia; I say, with sails and oars: let us whip it away: I never find myself to have a bit of courage at sea; in cellars and elsewhere, I have more than enough. Let us fly and save our bacon. I do not say this for any fear that I have; for I dread nothing but danger, that I do not; I always say it, that should not. The free areher of Baignolet said as much. Let us hazard nothing therefore, I say, lest we come off bluely. Tack about, helm a lee, thou son of a bachelor. Would I were now well in Quinquenois, though I were never to marry. Haste away, let us make all the sail we can; they will be too hard for us: we are not able to cope with them; they are ten to our one; I will warrant you; nay, and they are on their dunghill, while we do not know the country. They will be the death of us. We will lose no honour by flying: Demosthenes saith, that the man that runs away, may fight another day. At least, let us retreat to the leeward. Helm a lee; bring the main tack aboard, hawl the bowlins, hoist the topgallants; we are all dead men; get off, in the devil's name, get off.

Pantagruel, hearing the sad outcry which Panurge made, said, Who talks of flying? Let us first see who they are; perhaps they may be friends: I can discover nobody yet, though I can see a hundred miles round me. But let us consider a little: I have read that a philosopher, named Petron, was of opinion, that there were several worlds, that touched each other in an equilateral triangle; in whose centre, he said, was the dwelling of truth: and that the words, ideas, copies, and images of all things past, and to come, resided there; round which was the age; and that with success of time part of them used to fall on mankind, like rheums and mildews; just as the dew fell on Gideon's fleece, till the age was fulfilled.

I also remember, continued he, that Aristotle affirms Homer's words to be flying, moving, and consequently animated. Besides, Antiphanes said, that Plato's philosophy was like words, which, being spoken in some country during a hard winter are immediately congealed, frozen up, and not heard: for what Plato taught young lads, could hardly be understood by them when they were grown old. Now, continued he, we should philosophize and search whether this be not the place where those words are thawed.

You would wonder very much, should this be the head and lyre of Orpheus. When the Thraecian women had torn him to pieces, they threw his head and lyre into the river Hebrus; down which they floated to the Euxine sea, as far as the island of Lesbos; the head continually uttering a doleful song, as it were, lamenting the death of Orpheus, and the lyre, with the wind's impulse, moving its strings, and harmoniously accompanying the voice. Let us see if we cannot discover them hereabouts.

CHAPTER LVI.

THE skipper made answer: Be not afraid, my lord, we are on the confines of the Frozen Sea, on which, about the beginning of last winter, happened a great and bloody fight between the Arimaspians and the Nephelibates. Then the words and cries of men and women, the hacking, slashing, and hewing of battleaxes, the shocking, knocking, and jolting of armours and harnesses, the neighing of horses, and all other martial din and noise, froze in the air; and now the rigour of the winter being over, by the succeeding serenity and warmth of the weather, they melt and are heard.

By jingo, quoth Panurge, the man talks somewhat like; I believe him: but could not we see some of them? I think I have read, that, on the edge of the mountain on which Moses received the Judaic law, the people saw the voices sensibly.—Here, here, said Pantagruel, here are some that are not yet thawed. He then threw us on the deck whole handfuls of frozen words, which seemed to us like your rough sugar plums, of many colours, like those used in heraldry; some words gules, (this means also jests and merry sayings,) some vert, some azure, some black, some or (this means fair words;) and when we had somewhat warmed them between our hands, they melted like snow, and we really heard them, but could not understand them, for it was a barbarous gibberish. One of them, only, that was pretty big, having been warmed between Friar John's hands, gave a sound much like that of chesnuts when they are thrown into the fire, without being first cut, which made us all start, This was the report of a field piece in its time, cried Friar John.

Panurge prayed Pantagruel to give him some more; but Pantagruel told him, that to give words was the part of a lover. Sell me some then, I pray you, cried Panurge. That is the part of a lawyer, returned Pantagruel. I would sooner sell you silence, though at a dearer rate; as Demosthenes formerly sold it by the means of his argentangina, or silver quinsey.

However, he threw three or four handfuls of them on the deck; among which I perceived some very sharp words, and some bloody words, which, the pilot said, used sometimes to go back, and recoil to the place whence they came, but it was with a slit weasand: we also saw some terrible words, and some others not very pleasant to the eye.

When they had been all melted together, we heard a strange noise, hin, hin, hin, hin, his, tick, tock, taack, bredelin-brededack, fr, fr, fr, bou, bou, bon, bou, bon, bou, bou, bou, track, track, trr, trr, trr, trrr, trrrrr; on, on, on, on, on, on, ououououon, gog, magog, and I do not know what other barbarous words; which, the pilot said, were the noise made by the charging squadrons, the shock and neighing of horses.

Then we heard some large ones go off like drums and fifes, and others like clarions and trumpets. Believe me we had very good sport with them. I would fain have saved some merry odd words, and have preserved them in oil, as ice and snow are kept, and between clean straw. But Pantagrue would not let me, saying, that it is a folly to hoard up what we are never like to want, or have always at hand; odd, quaint, merry, and fat words of giles, never being scarce among all good and jovial Pantagruelists.

Panurge somewhat vexed Friar John, and put him in the pouts; for he took him at his word, while he dreamed of nothing less. This caused the Friar to threaten him with such such a piece of revenge as was put upon G. Jousseau, who having taken the merry Patelin at his word, when he had overbid himself in some cloth, was afterwards fairly taken by the horns like a bullock, by his jovial chapman, whom he took at his word like a man. Panurge, well knowing that threatened folks live long, bobbed, and made mouths at him, in token of derision, then cried, would I had here the word of the Holy Bottle, without being thus obliged to go further in pilgrimage to her.

CHAPTER LVII.

How Pantagruel went ashore at the dwelling of Gaster, the first master of arts in the world.

THAT day Pantagruel went ashore in an island, which, for situation and governor, may be said not to have its fellow. When you just come into it, you find it rugged, craggy, and barren, unpleasant to the eye, painful to the feet, and almost as inaccessible as the mountain of Dauphiné, which is somewhat like a toad-stool, and was never climbed, as any can remember, by any but Doyac, who had the charge of King Charles the Eighth's train of artillery.

This same Doyac, with strange tools and engines, gained that mountain's top, and there he found an old ram. It puzzled many a wise head to guess how it got thither. Some said that some eagle, or great horn-coot, having carried it thither while it was yet a lambkin, it had got away, and saved itself among the bushes.

As for us, having with much toil and sweat overcome the difficult ways at the entrance, we found the top of the mountain so fertile, healthful and pleasant, that I thought I was then in the true garden of Eden, or earthly paradise, about whose situation our good theologues are in such a quandary, and keep such a pother.

As for Pantagruel, he said, that here was the seat of Areté—that is as much as to say, virtue—described by Hesiod. This, however, with submission to better judgments. The ruler of this place was one Master Gaster, the first master of arts in the world. For, if you believe that fire is the great master of arts, as Tully writes, you very much wrong him and yourself: alas, Tully never believed this. On the other side, if you fancy Mereury to be the first inventor of arts, as our ancient Druids believed of old, you are mightily beside the mark. The satirist's sentence, that affirms master Gaster to be the master of all arts, is true. With him peacefully resided old goody Penia, alias Poverty, the mother of the ninety-nine Muses, on whom Porus, the lord of Plenty, formerly begot Love, that noble child, the mediator of heaven and earth, as Plato affirms in Symposio.

We were all obliged to pay our homage, and swear allegiance to that mighty sovereign; for he is imperious, severe, blunt, hard, uneasy, inflexible: you cannot make him believe, represent to him, or persuade him anything.

He does not hear: and as the Egyptians said that Harpocrates, the god of silence, named Sigalion in Greek, was astomé, that is, without a mouth, so Gaster was created without ears, even like the image of Jupiter in Candia.

He only speaks by signs: but those signs are more readily obeyed by every one, than the statutes of senates, or commands of monarchs: neither will he admit the least let or delay in his summons. You say, that when a lion roars, all the beasts at a considerable distance round about, as far as his roar can be heard, are seized with a shivering. This is written, it is true; I have seen it. I assure you, that at master Gaster's command, the very heavens tremble, and all the earth shakes: his command is called, Do this or die. Needs must when the devil drives; there's no gainsaying of it.

The pilot was telling us how, on a certain time, after the manner of the members that mutinied against the belly, as AEsop describes it, the whole kingdom of the Somates went off into a direct faction against Gaster, resolving to throw off his yoke : but they soon found their mistake, and most humbly submitted ; for otherwise they had all been famished.

What company soever he is in, none dispute with him for precedence or superiority ; he still goes first, though kings, emperors, or even the pope, were there. So he held the first place at the council of Basle ; though some will tell you that the council was tumultuous, by the contention and ambition of many for priority.

Every one is busied, and labours to serve him ; and, indeed, to make amends for this, he does this good to mankind, as to invent for them all arts, machines, trades, engines, and crafts : he even instructs brutes in arts which are against their nature, making poets of ravens, jaekdaws, chattering jays, parrots, and starlings, and poetesses of magpies, teaching them to utter human language, speak and sing ; and all for the gut. He reclaimes and tames eagles, gersfaleons, falcons gentle, sakers, lanners, goshawks, sparrow-hawks, merlins, hagdards, passengers, wild rapacious birds ; so that setting them free in the air, whenever he thinks fit, as high and as long as he pleases, he keeps them suspended, straying, flying, hovering, and courting him above the clouds : then on a sudden he makes them stoop, and come down amain from heaven next to the ground ; and all for the gut.

Elephants, lions, rhinoceroses, bears, horses, mares, and dogs, he teaches to dance, prance, vault, fight, swim, hide themselves, fetch and carry what he pleases ; and all for the gut.

Salt and fresh-water fish, whales, and the monsters of the main, he brings them up from the bottom of the deep ; wolves he forces out of the woods, bears out of the rocks, foxes out of their holes, and serpents out of the ground ; and all for the gut.

In short, he is so unruly, that in his rage he devours all men and beasts : as was seen among the Vaseons, when Q. Metellus besieged them in the Sertorian wars ; among the Saguntines besieged by Hannibal ; among the Jews besieged by the Romans, and six hundred more ; and all for the gut. When his regent Penia takes a progress, wherever she moves, all senates are shut up, all statutes repealed, all orders and proclamations vain ; she knows, obeys, and has no law. All shun her, in every place choosing rather to expose themselves to shipwreck at sea, and venture through fire, rocks, eaves, and precipices, than be seized by that most dreadful tormentor.

CHAPTER LVIII.

How, at the Court of the Master of Ingenuity, Pantagruel detested the Engastrimythes and the Gastrolaters.

At the court of that great master of ingenuity, Pantagruel observed two sorts of troublesome and too officious apparitors, whom he very much detested. The first were called Engastrimythes; the others, Gastrolaters.

The first pretended to be descended of the ancient race of Eurycles; and for this brought the authority of Aristophanes, in his comedy called The Wasps: whence of old they were called Euryclians, as Plato writes, and Plutarch in his book of the Cessation of Oracles. In the holy decrees, 26, qu. 3, they are styled Ventriloqui: and the same name is given them in Ionian by Hippocrates, in his fifth book of Epid. as, men who speak from the belly. Sophocles calls them Sternomantes. These were soothsayers, enchanters, cheats, who gulled the mob, and seemed not to speak and give answers from the mouth, but from the belly.

Such a one, about the year of our Lord 1513, was Jacoba Rodogina, an Italian woman of mean extract: from whose belly, we, as well as an infinite number of others at Ferrara, and elsewhere, have often heard the voice of the evil spirit speak; low, feeble, and small, indeed; but yet very distinct, articulate, and intelligible, when she was sent for, out of curiosity, by the lords and princes of the Cisalpine Gaul. To remove all manner of doubt, and be assured this was not a trick, they used to have her stripped stark naked and cause her mouth and nose to be stopped. This evil spirit would be Curled-pate, or Cincinnatulo, seeming pleased when any called him by that name; at which, he was always ready to answer. If any spoke to him of things past or present, he gave pertinent answers, sometimes to the amazement of the hearers: but if of things to come, then the devil was gravelled, and used to lie as fast as a dog can trot. Nay, sometimes he seemed to own his ignorance; instead of an answer, letting out a rousing fart, or muttering some words with barbarous and uncouth inflexions, and not to be understood.

As for the Gastrolaters, they stuck close to one another in knots and gangs. Some of them merry, wanton, and soft as so many milksops; others louring, grim, dogged, demure, and crabbed; all idle, mortal foes to business, spending half their time in sleeping, and the rest in doing nothing, a rent charge and dead unnecessary weight on the earth, as Hesiod saith; afraid, as we judged, of offending or lessening their paunch. Others were masked, disguised, and so oddly dressed, that it would have done you good to have seen them.

There's a saying, and several ancient sages write, that the skill of nature appears wonderful in the pleasure which she seems to have taken in the configuration of sea-shells, so great is their variety in figures, colours, streaks, and inimitable shapes. I protest the variety we perceived in the dresses of the gastrolatrous coquillons was not less. They all owned Gaster for their supreme god, adored him as a god, offered him sacrifices as to their omnipotent deity, owned no other god, served, loved, and honoured him above all things.

You would have thought that the holy apostle spoke of those, when he said, Phil. chap. 3. "Many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are enemies of the cross of Christ: whose end is destruction, whose God is their belly." Pantagrue compared them to the cyclops Polyphemus, whom Euripides brings in speaking thus: I only sacrifice to myself (not to the gods) and to this belly of mine, the greatest of all gods.

CHAPTER LIX.

Of the ridiculous statue Manduce; and how, and what the Gastrolaters sacrifice to their ventripotent god.

WHILE we fed our eyes with the sight of the phyzzes and actions of these lounging gulli-gutted Gastrolaters, we on a sudden heard the sound of a musical instrument called a bell; at which all of them placed themselves in rank and file, as for some mighty battle, everyone according to his office, degree, and seniority.

In this order, they moved towards master Gaster, after a plump, young, lusty, gorbellied fellow, who, on a long staff, fairly gilt, carried a wooden statue, grossly carved, and as scurvily daubed over with paint; such a one as Plautus, Juvenal, and Pomp. Festus describe it. At Lyons, during the carnival, it is called Maseheeroute, or Gnaw-erust; they call this Manduce.

It was a monstrous, ridiculous, hideous figure, fit to fright little children: its eyes were bigger than its belly, and its head larger than all the rest of its body: well mouth-cloven however, having a goodly pair of wide, broad jaws, lined with two rows of teeth, upper tier and under tier, which by the magic of a small twine hid in the hollow part of the golden staff, were made to clash, elatter, and rattle dreadfully one against another; as they do at Metz with St. Clement's dragon.

Coming near the gastrolaters, I saw they were followed by a great number of fat waiters and tenders, laden with baskets, dossers, hampers, dishes, wallets, pots, and kettles. Then under the conduct of Manduce, and singing I do not know what dithyrambics, crepalocomes, and epenons, opening in their baskets and pots, they offered their god,

White hippocras, with dry toasts.	Fricassees, nine sorts.	Cold loins of veal, with spice.
White bread.	Monastical brewis.	Zinziberine.
Brown bread.	Gravy soup.	Beatille pies.
Carbonadoes, six sorts.	Hotch-pots. Soft bread.	Brewis. Marrow-bones,
Brawn.	Household bread.	toast, and cabbage.
Sweet-breads.	Capirotades.	Hashes.

Eternal drink intermixed. Brisk delicate white wine led the van; claret and champaign followed, cool, nay, as cold as the very ice, I say; filled and offered in large silver cups. Then they offered,

Chitterlings gar- nished with mus- tard.	Neat's tongues. Scotch collops. Puddings.	Hog's haslets. Brawn heads. Powdered venison, with turnips.
Hams.	Carvelats.	Pickled olives.
Hung beef.	Bologna sausages.
Sausages.	Chines and peas.

All this associated with sempiternal liquor. Then they housed within his muzzle, Legs of mutton with shalots.	Curlews. Wood-hens.	Pullets, with eggs. Chickens.

Olias.	Coots, with leeks.	Rabbits, and suck- ing rabbits.
Lumber pies with hot sauce.	Fat kids. Shoulders of mutton with capers.	Quails, and young quails.
Ribs of pork with onion sauce.	Sirloins of beef.	Pigeons, squabs, and squeakers.
Roast capons, basted with their own dripping.	Breasts of veal. Pheasants and pheasant poots.	Hérons, and young herons.
Caponets.	Fried pasty-crust.	Fieldfares.
Caviare and toast.	Forced capons.	Olives.
Fawns, deer.	Parmesan cheese.	Thrushes.
Hares, leverets.	Red and pale 'hip- pocras.	Young sea-ravens.
Partridges and young partridges.	Gold-peaches.	Geese, goslings.
Plovers.	Artichokes.	Queests.
Dwarf-herons.	Dry and wet sweet- meats, seventy- eight sorts.	Widgeons. Souced hog's feet.
Teals.		Mavises.
Duckers.		Grouse.
Bitterns.	Boiled hens, and fat capons marinated.	Turtles.
Shovelers.		Doe-conies.

Peacocks.	Flamingoes.	Fritters.
Storks.	Cygnets.	Cakes, sixteen sorts.
Woodcocks.	A reinforcement of	Crisp wafers.
Snipes.	vinegar inter-	Quinec tarts.
Ortolans.	mixed.	Curds and cream.
Turkey cocks, hen	Venison pastics.	Whipped cream.
turkies, and tur-	Lark-pics.	Preserved myrabo-

ard poots.	Then large puffs.	Cream wafers.
Fig-peekers.	Thistle-finches.	Cream-cheese.
Young Guinea hens.	Whore's farts.

Vinegar brought up the rear to wash the mouth, and for fear of the squinsy: also toasts to seour the grinders.

CHAPTER LX.

What the Gastrolaters sacrificed to their god on interlarded fish-days.

PANTAGRUEL did not like this pack of rascally scoundrels, with their manifold kitchen sacrifices, and would have been gone, had not Epistemon prevailed with him to stay and see the end of the farce. He then asked the skipper, what the idle lobcocks used to sacrifice to their gorbellied god on interlarded fish-days? For his first course, said the skipper, they gave him:

Caviarc.	tops, bishop's-	Red herrings.
Botargoes.	cods, cellery,	Pilchards.
Fresh butter.	chives, rampions,	Anchovies.
Pease soup.	jew's-ears (a sort	Fry of tunny.

ses, sodden hop-	others.

Then he must drink, or the devil would gripe him at the throat: this, therefore, they take care to prevent, and nothing is wanting. Which being done, they give him lampreys with hippocras sauce:

Gurnards.	Miller's thumbs.	Trout, not above a
Salmon-trouts.	Precks.	foot long.
Barbels, great and	Bret fish.	Salmon.
small.	Flounders.	Meagers.
Roaches.	Sea-nettles.	Sea breams.
Cockerells.	Mullets.	Halibnts.
Mi miows.	Gudgeons.	Soles.
Thornbacks.	Dabs and sandings.	Dog's tongue, or
Sleeves.	Haddocks.	kind fool.
† turgeons.	Carps.	Mussels.
Sheath-fish.	Pikes.	Lobsters.
Mackêrels.	Bottitoes.	Great prawns.
Maids.	Rochets.	Dacc.
Plaice.	Sea-bears.	Bleaks.
Fried oysters.	Sharplings.	Tenches.
Cockles.	Tunnies.	Ombres.
Prawns.	Silver-eels.	Fresh cods.
Smelts.	Chevins.	Dried melwels.
Rock-fish.	Cray-fish.	Darefish.
Gracious lords.	Pallours.	Fansens, and grigs.
Sword-fish.	Shrimps.	Eelpouts.
Skate-fish.	Congers.	Tortoises.
Lamprels.	Porpoises.	Serpents, i.e. , wood-

Salmons.	Craylings.	Loaches.
Salmon-peels.	Smys.	Crab-fish.
Dolphins.	Turbots.	Snails and whelks.
Barn trouts.		Frogs.

If, when he had crammed all this down his guttural trap-door, he did not immediately make the fish swim again in his pannch, death would pack him off in a trice. Special care is taken to antidote his godship with vine-tree syrup. Then is sacrificed to him, haberdines, poor-jack, minglemangled, mis-mashed, &c.

buttered, poached,	the embers, tossed	Sea-batts.
hardened, boiled,	in the chimney, &c.	Cod's sounds.
broiled, stewed,	Stock-fish.	Sea-pikes.

Which to concoct and digest the more easily, vinegar is multiplied. For the latter part of their sacrifices they offer, Perpetuity of soaking with the whole.

It was none of their fault, I will assure you, if this same god of theirs was not publicly, preciously, and plentifully served in the sacrifices, better yet than Heliogabalus's idol; nay, more than Bel and the Dragon in Babylon, under King Belshazzar. Yet Gaster had the manners to own that he was no god, but a poor, vile, wretched creature. And as King Antigonus, first of the name, when one Hermodotus (as poets will flatter, especially princes), in some of his fustian dubbed him a god, and made the sun adopt him for his son, said to him; My lasanophore (or in plain English, my groom of the close-stool) can give thee the lie; so master Gaster very civilly used to send back his bigoted worshippers to his close-stool, to see, smell, tast, philosophise, and examine what kind of divinity they could pick out of his sir-reverence.

CHAPTER LXI.

How Gaster invented means to get and preserve corn.

THOSE gastrolatrous hobgoblins being withdrawn, Pantagruel carefully minded the famous master of arts, Gaster. You know that, by the institution of nature, bread has been assigned him for provision and food; and that, as an addition to this blessing, he should never want the means to get bread.

Accordingly, from the beginning he invented the smith's art, and husbandry to manure the ground, that it might yield him corn; he invented arms, and the art of war to defend corn; physic and astronomy, with other parts of mathematics, which might be useful to keep corn a great number of years in safety from the injuries of the air, beasts, robbers, and purloiners: he invented water, wind, and handmills, and a thousand other engines to grind corn, and to turn it into meal; leaven to make the dough ferment, and the use of salt to give it a savour; for he knew that nothing bred more diseases than heavy, unleavened, unsavoury bread.

He found a way to get fire to bake it; hour-glasses, dials, and clocks to mark the time of its baking; and as some countries wanted corn, he contrived means to convey it out of one country into another.

He had the wit to pimp for asses and mares, animals of different species, that they might copulate for the generation of a third, which we call mules, more strong and fit for hard service than the other two. He invented carts and waggons, to draw him along with greater ease: and as seas and rivers hindered his progress, he devised boats, gallies, and ships (to the astonishment of the elements) to waft him over to barbarous, unknown, and far distant nations, thence to bring, or thither to carry corn.

Besides, seeing that, when he had tilled the ground, some years the corn perished in it for want of rain in due season, in others rotted, or was drowned by its excess, sometimes spoiled by hail, shook out by the wind, or beaten down by storms, and so his stock was destroyed on the ground; we are told that ever since the days of yore, he has found out a way to conjure the rain down from heaven only with cutting certain grass, common enough in the field, yet known to very few, some of which was then shown us. I took it to be the same as the plant, one of whose boughs being dipped by Jove's priest in the Agrian fountain, on the Lycian mountain in Arcadia, in time of drought, raised vapours which gathered into clouds, and then dissolved into rain, that kindly moistened the whole country.

Our master of arts was also said to have found a way to keep the rain up in the air, and make it to fall into the sea; also to annihilate the hail, suppress the winds, and remove storms as the Methanensians of Trœzene used to do. And as in the fields thieves and plunderers sometimes stole, and took by force the corn and bread which others had toiled to get, he invented the art of building towns, forts, and castles, to hoard and secure that staff of life. On the other hand, finding none in the fields, and hearing that it was hoarded up and secured in towns, forts, and castles, and watched with more care than ever were the golden pippins of the Hesperides, he turned engineer, and found ways to beat, storm, and demolish forts and castles, with machines and warlike thunderbolts, battering-rams, ballistas, and catapults, whose shapes were shown us, not over-well understood by our engineers, architects, and other disciples of Vitruvius; as master Philebert de l'Orme, King Megistus's principal architect, has owned to us.

And seeing that sometimes all these tools of destruction were baffled by the cunning subtilty or the subtle cunning (which you please) of fortifiers, he lately invented cannons, field-pieces, culverins, mortar-pieces, basilisks, murdering instruments that dart iron, leaden, and brazen balls, some of them outweighing huge anvils. This by the means of a most dreadful powder, whose hellish compound and effect has even amazed nature, and made her own herself out-done by art; the Oxydraeian thunders, hails, and storms, by which the people of that name immediately destroyed their enemies in the field, being but mere popguns to these. For, one of our great guns, when used is more dreadful, more terrible, more diabolical, and mains, tears, breaks, slays, mows down, and sweeps away more men, and causes a greater consternation and destruction, than a hundred thunderbolts.

CHAPTER LXII.

How Gaster invented an art to avoid being hurt or touched by cannon balls.

GAster having secured himself with his eorn within strongholds, has sometimes been attacked by enemies; his fortresses, by that thrie three-fold cursed instrument, levelled and destroyed: his dearly beloved eorn and bread snatched out of his mouth, and sacked by a tyrannic force; therefore he then sought means to preserve his walls, bastions, rampiers, and seonees from cannon-shot, and to hinder the bullets from hitting him, stopping them in their flight, or at least from doing him or the besieged walls any damage. He showed us a trial of this, which has been since used by Fronton, and is now common among the pastimes and harmless recreations of the Thelemites. I will tell you how he went to work, and pray for the future be a little more ready to believe what Plutareh affirms to have tried. Suppose a herd of goats were all scampering as if the devil drove them, do but put a bit of eringo into the mouth of the hindmost nanny, and they will all stop stoek still, in the time you can tell three.

Thus Gaster, having caused a brass foleon to be charged with a sufficient quantity of gunpowder, well purged from its sulphur, and curiously made up with fine camphor; he then had a suitable ball put into the piece, with twenty-four little pellets like hail-shot, some round, some pearl fashion: then taking his aim, and levelling it at a page of his, as if he would have hit him on the breast; about sixty strides off the piece, half-way between it and the page in a right line, he hanged on a gibbet by a rope a very large siderite, or iron-like stone, otherwise called herenlean, formerly found on Ida in Phrygia by one Magnes, as Nicander writes, and commonly called loadstone; then he gave fire to the prime on the piece's touch-hole, which in an instant consuming the powder, the ball and hail-shot were with incredible violence and swiftness hurried out of the gun at its muzzle, that the air might penetrate to its chamber, where otherwise would have been a vacuum; which nature abhors so much, that this universal machine, heaven, air, land, and sea would sooner return to the primitive chaos, than admit the least void any where. Now the ball and small shot, which threatened the page with no less than quick destruction, lost their impetuosity, and remained suspended and hovering round the stone: nor did any of them, notwithstanding the fury with which they rushed, reach the page.

Master Gaster could do more than all this yet, if you will believe me: for he invented a way how to cause bullets to fly backwards, and recoil on those that sent them, with as great a force, and in the very numerical parallel for which the guns were planted. And indeed, why should he have thought this difficult, seeing the herb ethiopsis opens all locks whatsoever; and an echinus or remora, a silly weakly fish, in spite of all the winds that blow from the thirty-two points of the compass, will in the midst of a hurricane make you the biggest first-rate remain stock still, as if she were becalmed, or the blustering tribe had blown their last: nay, and with the flesh of that fish, preserved with salt, you may fish gold out of the deepest well that was ever sounded with a plummet; for it will certainly draw up the precious metal. Since, as Democritus affirmed, and Theophrastus believed and experienced, that there was an herb at whose single touch an iron wedge, though never so far driven into a huge log of the hardest wood that is, would presently come out; and it is this same herb your kickways, alias woodpeckers, use, when with some mighty axe any one stops up the hole of their nests, which they industriously dig and make in the trunk of some sturdy tree. Since stags and hinds, when deeply wounded with darts, arrows, and bolts, if they do but meet the herb called dittany, which is common in Canada, and eat a little of it, presently the shafts came out, and all is well again; even as kind Venus cured her beloved by-blow Æneas, when he was wounded on the right thigh with an arrow by Juturna, Turnus's sister. Since the very wind of laurels, fig trees, or sea calves makes the thunder sheer off insomuch that it never strikes them. Since at the sight of a ram, mad elephants recover their former senses. Since mad bulls coming near wild fig trees, called caprifici, grow tame and will not budge a foot, as if they had the cramp. Since the venomous rage of vipers is assuaged if you but touch them with a beechen bough. Since also Euphorion writes, that in the Isle of Samos, before Juno's temple was built there, he has seen some beasts called neades, whose voice made the neighbouring places gape and sink into a chasm and abyss. In short, since elders grow of a more pleasing sound, and fitter to make flutes, in such places where the crowing of cocks is not heard, as the ancient sages have writ, and Theophrastus relates: as if the crowing of a cock dulled, flattened, and perverted the wood of the elder, as it is said to astonish and stupify with fear that strong and resolute animal, a lion. I know that some have understood this of wild elder, that grows so far from towns or villages that the crowing of cocks cannot reach near it; and doubtless that sort ought to be preferred to the stenching common elder that grows about decayed and ruined places; but others have understood this in a higher sense, not literal, but allegorical, according to the method of the Pythagoreans: as when it was said that Mercury's statute could not be made of every sort of wood; to which sentence they gave this sense: that God is not to be worshipped in a vulgar form, but in a chosen and religious manner. In the same manner by this elder, which grows far from places where cocks are heard, the ancients meant, that the wise and studious ought not to give their minds to trivial or vulgar music, but to that which is celestial, divine, angelical, more abstracted, and brought from remoter parts, that is, from a region where the crowing of cocks is not heard: for to denote a solitary and unfrequented place, we say, cocks are never heard to crow there.

CHAPTER LXIII.

How Pantagrueſ fell aſleep near the iſland of Chaneph, and of the Problems propoſed to be ſolved when he wak'd.

THE next day, merrily purſuing our voyage, we came in ſight of the iſland of Cheneph, where Pantagrueſ's ſhip could not arrive, the wind chopping about, and then failing us ſo that we were becalmed, and could hardly get ahead, tacking about from ſtarboard to larboard, and larboard to ſtarboard, though to our ſails we added drabblers.

With this accident we were all out of ſorts, moping, drooping metagrabolized, as dull as dun in the mire, in C ſol fa ut flat, out of tune, off the hinges, and I-don't-know-howiſh, without caring to ſpeak one ſingle ſyllable to each other.

Pantagrueſ was taking a nap, ſlumbering and nodding on the quarter deck, by the cuddy, with an Heliodorus in his hand; for ſtill it was his cuſtom to ſleep better by book than by heart.

Epistemon was conjuring, with his astrolabe, to know what latitude we were in.

Friar John was got into the cook-room, examining, by the ascendant of the spits, and the horoscope of ragouts and fricassees, what time of day it might then be.

Panurge (sweet baby!) held a stalk of Pantagruelion, alias hemp, next his tongue, and with it made pretty bubbles and bladders.

Gymnast was making tooth pickers with lentisk.

Ponocrates, dozing, dozed, and dreaming, dreamed; tickled himself to make himself laugh, and with one finger scratched his noddle where it did not itch.

Carpalim, with a nut-shell, and a trencher of verne, (that's a card in Gascony,) was making a pretty little merry windmill, cutting the card longways into four slips, and fastening them with a pin to the convex of the nut, and its concave to the tarred side of the gunnel of the ship.

Eusthenes, bestriding one of the guns, was playing on it with his fingers, as if it had been a trump-marine.

Rhizotomus, with the soft coat of a field tortoise, alias ycleped a mole, was making himself a velvet purse.

Xenomanes was patching up an old weather-beaten lantern, with a hawk's jesses.

Our pilot (good man!) was pulling maggots out of the seamen's noses.

At last Friar John, returning from the forecastle, perceived that Pantagruel was awake. Then breaking this obstinate silence, he briskly and cheerfully asked him how a man should kill time, and raise good weather, during a calm at sea?

Panurge, whose belly thought his throat cut, backed the motion presently, and asked for a pill to purge melancholy.

Epistemon also came on, and asked how a man might be ready to bepiss himself with laughing, when he has no heart to be merry?

Gymnast, arising, demanded a remedy for a dimness of eyes?

Ponocrates, after he had a while rubbed his noddle, and shaken his ears, asked, how one might avoid dog-sleep. Hold, cried Pantagruel, the Peripatetics have wisely made a rule, that all problems, questions, and doubts, which are offered to be solved, ought to be certain, clear, and intelligible. What do you mean by dog's-sleep? I mean, answered Ponocrates, to sleep fasting in the sun at noon-day, as the dogs do.

Rhizotomus, who lay stooping on the pump, raised his drowsy head, and lazily yawning, by natural sympathy, set almost every one in the ship a yawning too: then he asked for a remedy against oscitations and gapings.

Xenomanes, half puzzled, and tired out with new vamping his antiquated lantern, asked, how the hold of the stomach might be so well ballasted and freighted from the keel to the main hatch, with stores well stowed, that our human vessels might not heel, or be walt, but well trimmed and stiff?

Carpalim, twirling his diminutive windmill, asked how many motions are to be felt in nature, before a gentleman may be said to be hungry?

Eusthenes, hearing them talk, came from between decks, and from the capstern called out to know why a man that is fasting bit by a serpent also fasting, is in greater danger of death, than when man and serpent have eat their breakfasts? Why a man's fasting-spittle is poisonous to serpents and venomous creatures?

One single solution may serve for all your problems, gentlemen, answered Pantagruel, and one single medicine for all such symptoms and accidents. My answer shall be short, not to tire you with a long needless train of pedantic cant. The belly has no ears, nor is it to be filled with fair words; you shall be answered to content by signs and gestures. As formerly at Rome, Tarquin the proud, its last king, sent an answer by signs to his son, Sextus, who was among the Gabii, at Gabii. (Saying this, he pulled the string of a little bell, and Friar John hurried away to the cook-room.) The son having sent his father a messenger, to know how he might bring the Gabii (Gabini) under a close subjection; the king, mistrusting the messenger, made him no answer, and only took him into his privy garden, and, in his presence, with his sword, lopped off the heads of the tall poppies that were there. The express returned without any other dispatch; yet having related to the prince what he had seen his father do, he easily understood that by those signs he advised him to cut off the heads of the chief men in the town, the better to keep under the rest of the people.

CHAPTER LXIV.

How Pantagruel gave no answer to the Problems.

PANTAGRUEL then asked what sort of people dwelt in that damned island? They are, answered Xenomanes, all hypocrites, holy mountebanks, tumblers of Ave Marias, spiritual comedians, sham saints, hermits, all of them poor rogues, who, like the hermit of Lormont between Blaye and Bordeaux, live wholly on alms given them by passengers. Catch me there if you cau, cried Panurge! may the devil's head-cook conjure my bum-gut into a pair of bellows, if ever you find me among them. Hermits, sham saints, living forms of mortification, holy mountebanks, avaunt, in the name of your father Satan, get out of my sight: when the devil's a hog, you shall eat bacon. I shall not forget yet awhile our fat Concilipetes of Chesil. O that Beelzebub and Astaroth had counselled them to hang themselves out of the way, and they had done it! we had not then suffered so much by devilish storms as we did for having seen them. Hark ye me, dear rogue, Xenomanes, my friend, I prithee are these hermits, hypocrites, and eaves-droppers, maids or married? Is there anything of the feminine gender among them? Could a body hypocritically take there a small hypocritical touch? Will they lie backwards and let out their fore-rooms? There's a fine question to be asked, cried Pantagruel. Yes, yes, answered Xenomanes; you may find there many goodly hypocritesses, jolly spiritual actresses, kind hermitesses, women that have a plaguy deal of religion: then there's the copies of them, little hypocritillons, sham sanctitos, and hermetillons. Foh! away with them, cried Friar John; a young saint, an old devil! (Mark this, an old saying, and as true a one as a young whore an old saint.) Were there not such, continued Xenomanes, the isle of Chaneph, for want of a multiplication of progeny, had long ere this been desert and desolate.

Pantagruel sent them by Gymnast, in the pinnace, seventy-eight thousand fine pretty little gold half-crowns, of those that are marked with a lantern. After this he asked, What's o'clock? Past nine, answered Epistemon. It is then the best time to go to dinner, said Pantagruel: for the sacred line, so celebrated by Aristophanes in his play called Concionatores, is at hand, never failing when the shadow is decempedal.

Formerly, among the Persians, dinner time was at a set hour only for kings: as for all others, their appetite and their belly was their clock; when that chimed, they thought it time to go to dinner. So we find in Plautus a certain parasite making a heavy do, and sadly railing at the inventors of hour-glasses and dials, as being unnecessary things, there being no clock more regular than the belly.

Diogenes, being asked at what times a man ought to eat, answered, The rich when he is hungry, the poor when he has anything to eat. Physicians more properly say, that the canonical hours are,

To rise at five, to dine at nine,
To sup at five, to sleep at nine.

The famous king Petosiris's magic was different,—Here the officers for the gut came in, and got ready the tables and cupboards; laid the cloth, whose sight and pleasant smell were very comfortable; and brought plates, napkins, salts, tankards, flacons, tall-boys, ewers, tumblers, cups, goblets, basons, and cisterns.

Friar John, at the head of the stewards, sewers, yeomen of the pantry, and of the mouth, tasters, carvers, cup bearers, and cupboard keepers, brought four stately pasties, so huge, that they put me in mind of the four bastions at Turin. Odds-fish, how manfully did they storm them! What havoc did they make with the long train of dishes that came after them! How bravely did they stand to their pan-puddings, and paid off their dust! How merrily did they soak their noses!

The fruit was not yet brought in, when a fresh gale at west and by north began to fill the main course, missen-sail, foresail, tops, and top-gallants; for which blessing they all sung divers hymns of thanks and praise.

When the fruit was on the table, Pantagruel asked: Now, tell me, gentlemen, are your doubts fully resolved or no? I gape and yawn no more, answered Rhizotomus. I sleep no longer like a dog, says Panoerates. I have cleared my eyesight, said Gymnast. I have broke my fast, said Eusthenes; so that for this whole day I shall be secure from the danger of my spittle.

CHAPTER LXV.

How Pantagruel passed the time with his servants.

IN what hierarchy of such venomous creatures do you place Panurge's future spouse? asked Friar John. Art thou speaking ill of women, cried Panurge, thou mangy scoundrel, thou sorry, noddly-peaked shaveling monk? By the cenomanic paunch and gixie, said Epistemon, Euripides has written, and makes Andromache say it, that by industry, and the help of the gods, men had found remedies against all poisonous creatures; but none was yet found against a bad wife.

This flaunting Euripides, cried Panurge, was gabbling against women every foot, and therefore was devoured by dogs, as a judgment from above: as Aristophanes observes.—Let us go on. Let him speak that is next. I can leak now like any stone-horse, said then Epistemon. I am, said Xenomanes, full as an egg and round as a hoop; my ship's hold can hold no more, and will now make shift to bear a steady sail. Said Carpalin, a truce with thirst, a truce with hunger; they are strong, but wine and meat are stronger. I am no more in the dumps, cried Panurge; my heart is a pound lighter. I am in the right cue now, as brisk as a body-louse, and as merry as a beggar. For my part, I know what I do when I drink; and it is a true thing (though it is in your Euripides) that is said by that jolly toper Silenus of blessed memory, that

The man's emphatically mad,
Who drinks the best, yet can be sad.

We must not fail to return our humble and hearty thanks to the Being, who, with this good bread, this cool delicious wine, these good meats and rare dainties, removes from our bodies and minds these pains and perturbations, and at the same time, fills us with pleasure and with food.

But methinks, sir, you did not give an answer to Friar John's question; which, as I take it, was how to raise good weather? Since you ask no more than this easy question, answered Pantagruel, I will strive to give you satisfaction; some other time we will talk of the rest of the problems if you will.

Well, then, Friar John asked how good weather might be raised. Have we not raised it? Look up and see our full top-sails: Hark! how the wind whistles through the shrouds, what a stiff gale it blows; observe the rattling of the tacklings, and see the sheets, that fasten the main-sail behind; the force of the wind puts them upon the stretch. While we passed our time merrily, the dull weather also passed away; and while we raised the glasses to our mouths, we also raised the wind by a secret sympathy in nature.

Thus Atlas and Hereules clubbed to raise and underprop the falling sky, if you will believe the wise mythologists, but they raised it some half an inch too high; Atlas, to entertain his guest Hereules more pleasantly, and Hereules to make himself amends for the thirst which sometimes before had tormented him in the deserts of Africa.—Your good father, said Friar John, interrupting him, takes care to free many people from such an inconvenience; for I have been told by many venerable doctors, that his chief butler, Turelupin, saves about eighteen hundred pipes of wine yearly, to make servants, and all comers and goers, drink before they are a-dry.—As the camels and dromedaries of a caravan, continued Pantagruel, used to drink for the thirst that is past, for the present, and for that to come; so did Hereules: and being thus excessively raised, this gave new motion to the sky, which is that of titubation and trepidation, about which our crack-brained astrologers made such a pother.—This, said Panurge, makes the saying good;

While jolly companions earouse it together,
A fig for the storm, it gives way to good weather.

Nay, continued Pantagruel, some will tell you, that we have not only shortened the time of the calm, but also much disburthened the ship; not like Æsop's basket, by easing it of the provisions, but by breaking our fasts; and that a man is more terrestrial and heavy when fasting, than when he has eaten and drank, even as they pretend that he weighs more dead than living. However it is, you will grant they are in the right, who take their morning's draught, and breakfast before a long journey; then say that the horses will perform the better, and that a spur in the head is worth two in the flank; or, in the same horse dialect,

That a eup in the pate
Is a mile in the gate.

Don't you know that formerly the Amycleans worshipped the noble Bacchus above all other gods, and gave him the name of Psila, which in the Doric dialect signifies wings: for, as the birds raise themselves by a towering flight with their wings above the clouds; so, with the help of soaring Bacchus, the powerful juice of the grape, our spirits are exalted to a pitch above themselves, our bodies are more sprightly, and their earthly parts become soft and pliant.

CHAPTER LXVI.

How, by Pantagruel's order, the Muses were saluted near the Isle of Ganabim.

THIS fair wind and as fine talk brought us in the sight of a high land, which Pantagruel discovering afar off, showed it Xenomanes, and asked him, Do you see yonder to the leeward a high rock, with two tops much like Mount Parnassus in Phocis? I do plainly, answered Xenomanes; it is the isle of Ganabim. Have you a mind to go ashore there? No, returned Pantagruel. You do well indeed, said Xenomanes; for there is nothing worth seeing in the place. The people are all thieves: yet there is the finest fountain in the world, and a very large forest towards the right top of the mountain. Your fleet may take in wood and water there.

He that spoke last, spoke well, quoth Panurge; let us not by any means be so mad as to go among a parcel of thieves and sharpers. You may take my word for it, this place is just such another as, to my knowledge, formerly were the islands of Sark and Herm, between the smaller and the greater Britain; such as was the Poneropolis of Philip in Thrace; islands of thieves, banditti, picaroons, robbers, ruffians, and murderers, worse than raw-head and bloody bones, and full as honest as the senior fellows of the college of iniquity, the very outcasts of the country goals common-side. As you love yourself, do not go among them: if you go, you will come off but bluey, if you come off at all. If you will not believe me, at least believe what the good and wise Xenomanes tells you: for may I never stir if they are not worse than the very cannibals: they would certainly eat us alive. Do not go among them, I pray you; it were safer to take a journey to hell. Hark, by cod's body, I hear them ringing the alarm bell most dreadfully, as the Gascons about Bourdeaux used formerly to do against the commissaries and officers for the tax on salt, or my ears tingle. Let's sheer off.

Believe me, sir, said Friar John, let's rather land; we will rid the world of that vermin, and inn there for nothing. Old Nick go with thee for me, quoth Panurge. This rash hair-brained devil of a friar fears nothing, but ventures and runs on like a mad devil as he is, and cares not a rush what becomes of others; as if everyone was a monk, like his friarship. A pox on grinning honour, say I. Go to, returned the friar, thou mangy noddy-peak! thou forlorn druggle-headed sneaksby! and may a million of black devils anatomise thy cockle brain. The hen-hearted rascal is so cowardly, that he bewrays himself for fear every day. If thou art so afraid, dunghill, do not go, stay here and be hanged, or go and hide thy loggerhead under Madame Proserpine's petticoat.

Panurge hearing this, his breech began to make buttons: so he slunk in in an instant, and went to hide his head down in the bread-room among the musty biscuits, and the orts and scraps of broken bread.

Pantagruel in the meantime said to the rest, I feel a pressing retraction in my soul, which like a voice admonishes me not to land there. Whenever I felt such a motion within me, I have found myself happy in avoiding what it directed me to shun, or in undertaking what it prompted me to do; and never had occasion to repent following its dictates.

As much, said Epistemon, is related, is related of the dæmon of Socrates, so celebrated among the Academics. Well then, sir, said Friar John, while the ship's crew water, have you a mind to have good sport? Panurge is got down somewhere in the hold, where he is crept into some corner, and lurks like a mouse in a cranny: let them give the word for the gunner to fire yon gun over the round-house on the poop: this will serve to salute the Muses of this Anti-parnassus: besides, the powder does but decay in it. You are in the right, said Pantagruel: here, give the word for the gunner.

The gunner immediately came, and was ordered by Pantagruel to fire that gun, and then charge it with fresh powder; which was soon done. The gunners of the other ships, frigates, galleons, and galleys of the fleet, hearing us fire, gave every one a gun to the island: which made such a horrid noise, that you would have sworn heaven had been tumbling about our ears.

CHAPTER LXVII.

How Panurge bewrayed himself for fear; and of the huge cat Rodilardus, which he took for a puny devil.

PANURGE, like a wild, addle-pated, giddy goat, sallies out of the bread-room in his shirt, with nothing else about him but one of his stockings, half on half off, about his heel, like a rough-footed pigeon; his hair and beard all be-powdered with crumbs of bread, in which he had been over head and ears, and a huge and mighty puss partly wrapped up in his other stocking. In this equipage, his chops moving like a monkey's who is a louse-hunting, his eyes staring like a dead pig's, his teeth chattering, and his bum quivering, the poor dog fled to Friar John, who was then sitting by the chain-wales of the starboard side of the ship, and prayed him heartily to take pity on him, and keep him in the safeguard of his trusty bilbo; swearing, by his share of Papimany, that he had seen all hell broke loose.

Woe is me, my Jacky, cried he, my dear Johnny, my old crony, my brother, my ghostly father! all the devils keep holiday, all the devils keep their feast to-day, man: pork and peas choke me, if ever thou sawest such preparations in thy life for an infernal feast. Dost thou see the smoke of hell's kitchens? (This, he said, showing him the smoke of the gunpowder above the ships.) Thou never sawest so many damned souls since thou wast born; and so fair, so bewitching they seem, that one would swear they are Stygian Ambrosia. I thought at first, God forgive me, that they had been English souls; and I don't know, but that this morning the isle of Horses, near Scotland, was sacked, with all the English who had surprised it, by the lords of Termes and Essay.

Friar John, at the approach of Panurge, was entertained with a kind of smell that was not like that of gunpowder, nor altogether so sweet as musk; which made him turn Panurge about, and then he saw that his shirt was dismally bepawed, and bewrayed with fresh sir-reverence. The retentive faculty of the nerve, which restrains the muscle called sphincter (it is the arse-hole, and it please you) was relaxed by the violence of the fear which he had been in during his fantastic visions. Add to this, the thundering noise of the shooting, which seems more dreadful between decks than above. Nor ought you to wonder at such a mishap; for one of the symptoms and accidents of fear is, that it often opens the wicket of the cupboard wherein second-hand meat is kept for a time. Let us illustrate this noble theme with some examples.

Messer Pantolfe de la Cassina, of Sienna, riding post from Rome, came to Chamberry, and alighting at honest Vinet's, took one of the pitchforks in the stable; then turning to the innkeeper, said to him, "Da Roma inqua, io non son andato del corpo. Di gratia piglia in mano questa forcha, et fa mi paura." I have not had a stool since I left Rome. I pray thee take this pitchfork, and fright me. Vinet took it, and made several offers, as if he would in good earnest have hit the signor, but did not: so the Sienese said to him, "Si tu non fai altramente, tu non fai nulla: pero sforzati di adoperarti più guagliardamente." If thou dost not go another way to work, thou hadst as good do nothing: therefore try to bestir thyself more briskly. With this, Vinet lent him such a swinging stoater with the pitchfork sounce between the neck and the collar of his jerkin, that down fell signore on the ground arsyversy, with his spindle shanks wide straggling over his pole. Then mine host sputtering, with a full-mouthed laugh, said to his guest, by Beelzebub's bum gut, much good may it do you, Signore Italiano. Take notice this is datum Camberiaci, given at Chamberry. It was well the Sienese had untrussed his points, and let down his drawers: for this physick worked with him as soon as he took it; and as copious was the evacuation, as that of nine buffaloes and fourteen missificating arch-lubbers. Which operation being over, the mannerly Sienese courteously gave mine host a whole bushel of thanks, saying to him, "Io ti ringratio, bel messere; cosi facendo tu mai esparmiata la speza d'un servitiale." I thank thee, good landlord; by this thou hast even saved me the expense of a clyster.

I will give you another example of Edward V., king of England. Master Francis Villon, being banished France, fled to him, and got so far into his favour, as to be privy to all his household affairs. One day the king, being on his close stool, showed Villon the arms of France, and said to him, Dost thou see what respect I have for thy French kings? I have none of their arms any where but in this backside, near my close stool. Odd's life, said the buffoon, how wise, prudent, and careful of your health, your highness is! How carefully your learned doctor, Thomas Linacer, looks after you! He saw that, now you grow old, you are inclined to be somewhat costive, and every day were fain to have an apothecary; I mean, a suppository or clyster thrust into your royal nockandroe; so he has, much to the purpose, induced you to place here the arms of France; for the very sight of them puts you into such a dreadful fright, that you immediately let fly, as much as would come from eighteen squattering bonasi of Pæonia. And if they were painted in other parts of your house, by jingo, you would presently conskrite yourself wherever you saw them. Nay, had you but here a picture of the great oriflamb of France, odds bodikins, your tripes and bowels would be in no small danger of dropping out at the orifice of your posteriors. But henh, henh, atque iterum henh.

A silly cockney am I not,
 As ever did from Paris come?
 And with a rope and sliding knot
 My neck shall know what weighs my bum.

A cockney of short reach, I say, shallow of judgment, and judging shallowly, to wonder, that you should cause your points to be untrussed in your chamber before you come into this closet. By our lady, at first I thought your close stool had stood behind the hangings of your bed; otherwise it seemed very odd to me you should untruss so far from the place of evacuation. But now I find it was a gull, a wittal, a woodcock, a mere ninny, a dolt-head, a noddy, a changeling, a calf-lolly, a doddipole. You do wisely, by the mass, you do wisely; for had you not been ready to clap your hind face on the mustard-pot as soon as you came within sight of these arms, mark ye me, cop's body, the bottom of your breeches had supplied the office of a close stool.

Friar John, stopping the handle of his face with his left hand, did, with the fore-finger of the right, point out Panurge's shirt to Pantagruel, who, seeing him in this pickle, scared, appalled, shivering, raving, staring, bewrayed, and torn with the claws of the famous cat Rodilardus, could not choose but laugh, and said to him, Prythee what wouldst thou do with this cat? With this cat, quoth Panurge, the devil scratch me, if I did not think it had been a young soft-chinned devil, which, with this same stocking instead of mitten, I had snatched up in the great hutch of hell, as thievishly as any sizar of Montague college could have done. The devil take Tybert: I feel it has all bepinked my poor hide, and drawn on it to the life I do not know how many lobsters' whiskers. With this he threw his boar-cat down.

Go, go, said Pantagruel, be bathed and cleaned, calm your fears, put on a clean shift, and then your clothes. What! do you think I am afraid, cried Panurge? Not I, I protest: by the testicles of Hercules, I am more hearty, bold, and stout, though I say it that should not, than if I had swallowed as many flies as are put into plum-cakes, and other paste at Paris, from Midsummer to Christmas. But what is this? hah! oh, oh! how the devil came I by this? Do you call this what the cat left in the malt, filth, dirt, dung, dejection, fœcal matter, excrement, stercoration, sir-reverence, ordure, second-hand meats, fumets, stronts, seybal, or spyrathe? 'Tis Hibernian saffron, I protest. Hah, hah, hah! it is Irish saffron, by Shaint Pautrick, and so much for this time. Selah. Let us drink.

TREATING OF THE HEROIC DEEDS AND SAYINGS OF THE GOOD PANTAGRUEL.

THE AUTHOR'S PROLOGUE.

INDEFATIGABLE toppers, and you thrice precious martyrs of the smock, give me leave to put a serious question to your worships, while you are idly striking your codpieces, and I myself not much better employed. Pray, why is it that people say that men are not such sots now-a-days as they were in the days of yore? Sot is an old word, that signifies a dunce, dullard, jolt-head, gull, wittal, or noddy, one without guts in his brains, whose cockloft is unfurnished, and, in short, a fool. Now would I know, whether you would have us understand by this same saying, as indeed you logically may, that formerly men were fools, and in this generation are grown wise? How many and what dispositions made them fools? How many and what dispositions were wanting to make them wise? Why were they fools? How should they be wise? Pray, how came you to know that men were formerly fools? How did you find that they are now wise? Who the devil made them fools? Who in God's name made them wise? Who do you think are most, those that loved mankind foolish, or those that love it wise? How long has it been wise? How long otherwise? Whence proceeded the foregoing folly? Whence the following wisdom? Why did the old folly end now, and no later?

Why did the modern wisdom begin now, and no sooner? What were we the worse for the former folly? What the better for the succeeding wisdom? How should the ancient folly be come to nothing. How should this same new wisdom be started up and established?

Now answer me, and please you: I dare not adjure you in stronger terms, reverend sirs, lest I make your pious fatherly worships in the least uneasy. Come, pluck up a good heart; speak the truth and shame the devil, that enemy to paradise, that enemy to truth: be cheery, my lads; and if you are for me, take me off three or five bumpers of the best, while I make a halt at the first part of the sermon; then answer my question. If you are not for me, avaunt! avoid Satan! For I swear by my great-grandmother's plaeket, that if you do not help me to solve that puzzling problem, I will, nay, I already do repent having proposed it; for still I must remain nettled and gravelled, and a devil a bit I know how to get off. Well, what say you? In faith, I begin to smell you out. You are not yet disposed to give me an answer: nor I neither, by these whiskers. Yet to give some light into the business, I will even tell you what had been anciently foretold in the matter, by a venerable doctor, who being moved by the spirit in a prophetic vein, wrote a book yeled the Prelatical Bagpipe. What do you think the old fornicator saith? Harken, you old noddies, hearken now or never.

The jubilee's year, when all, like fools were shorn,
Is about thirty [trente] supernumerary.
O want of veneration! fools they seemed,
But, persevering, with long breves, at last
No more they shall be gaping greedy fools.
For they shall shell the shrub's delieious fruit,
Whose flow'r they in the spring so much had fear'd.

Now you have it, what do you make of it? The seer is ancient, the style laeonie, the sentenees dark, like those of Seotus, though they treat of matters dark enough in themselves. The best commentators on that good father take the jubilee after the thirtieth, to be the years that are included in this present age till 1550 (there being but one jubilee every fifty years). Men shall no longer be thought fools next green pease season.

The fools, whose number, as Solomon certifies, is infinite, shall go to pot like a parcel of mad bedlamites as they are; and all manner of folly shall have an end, that being also numberless, according to Avieenna, maniae infinitae sunt species. Folly having been driven baek and hidden towards the centre, during the rigour of the winter, it is now to be seen on the surface, and buds out like the trees. This is as plain as a nose on a man's face: you know it by experience; you see it. And it was formerly found out by that great good man Hippocrates, Aphorism. Veræ etenim mania, &c. This world therefore wisifying itself, shall no longer dread the flower and blossoms of every coming spring, that is, as you may piously believe, bumper in hand, and tears in eyes, in the woful time of Lent, which used to keep them company.

Whole cartloads of books, that seemed florid, flourishing and flowery, gay and gaudy as so many butterflies; but in the main were tiresome, dull, soporiferous, irksome, mischievous, crabbed, knotty, puzzling, and dark as those of whining Heraclitus, as unintelligible as the numbers of Pythagoras, that king of the bean, according to l. 2, sat. 6, Horace: those books, I say, have seen their best days, and shall soon come to nothing, being delivered to the executing worms, and merciless petty chandlers: such was their destiny, and to this they were predestinated.

In their stead beans in cod are started up; that is, these merry and fructifying Pantagruelian books, so much sought now-a-days, in expectation of the following jubilee's period: to the study of which writings all people have given their minds, and accordingly have gained the name of wise.

Now, I think, I have fairly solved and resolved your problem: then reform, and be the better for it. Hem once or twice, like hearts of oak; stand to your pan-puddings, and take me off your bumpers, nine go-downs, and huzza! since we are like to have a good vintage, and misers hang themselves. Oh! they will cost me an estate in hempen collars if fair weather hold. For I hereby promise to furnish them with twice as much as will do their business, on free cost, as often as they will take the pains to dance at a rope's end, providently to save charges, to the no small disappointment of the finisher of the law.

Now my friends, that you may put in for a share of this new wisdom, and shake off the antiquated folly this very moment, scratch me out of your scrolls, and quite discard the symbol of the old philosopher with the golden thigh, by which he has forbidden you to eat beans: for you may take it for a truth, granted among all professors in the science of good eating, that he enjoined you not to taste of them, only with the same kind intent with the fresh water physician, Amer, late Lord of Camelotiere, kinsman to the lawyer of that name, who forbad his patients the wing of the partridge, the rump of the chicken, and the neck of the pigeon, saying Ala mala, cropium dubium, collum bonum, pelle remota. For the dunsical dog-lecch was so selfish as to reserve them for his own dainty chops, and allowed his poor patients little more than the bare bones to pick, lest they should over-load their squeamish stomachs.

To the heathen philosopher succeeded a pack of Capucions, monks, who forbid us the use of beans, that is, Pantagruelian books. They seem to follow the example of Philoxenus and Gnatho, one of whom was a Sicilian, of fulsome memory, the ancient master-builders of their monastic cram-gut voluptuousness, who when some dainty bit was served up at a feast, filthily used to spit on it, that none but their nasty selves might have the stomach to eat of it, though their liquorous chops watered never so much after it.

So those hideous, snotty, phthisicky, eves-dropping, musty, moving forms of mortification, both in public and private, curse those dainty books, and like toads spit their venom upon them.

Now though we have in our mother-tongue several excellent works in verse and prose, and, heaven be praised, but little left of the trash and trumpery stuff of those dunsical mumblers of Ave Mariés, and the barbarous foregoing Gothie age; I have made bold to choose to chirrup and warble my plain ditty, or, as they say, to whistle like a goose among the swans, rather than be thought deaf among so many pretty poets and eloquent orators. And thus I am prouder of acting the clown, or any other under part, among the many ingenious actors in this noble play, than of herding among those mutes, who, like so many shadows and eyphers, only serve to fill up the house, and make up a number; gaping and yawning at the flies, and pricking up their lugs, like so many Arcadian asses, at the striking up of the music; thus silently giving to understand, that their fopships are tickled in the right place.

Having taken this resolution, I thought it would not be amiss to move my Diogenieal tub, that you might not accuse me of living without example. I see a swarm of our modern poets and orators, your Colinets, Marots, Herouets, Saint Gelias, Salels, Masuels, and many more; who having commeneed masters in Apollo's academy on Mount Parnassus, and drunk brimmers at the Cabalian fountain, among the nine merry Muses, have raised our vulgar tongue, and made it a noble and everlasting structure. Their works are all Parian marble, alabaster, porphyry, and royal cement: they treat of nothing but heroic deeds, mighty things, grave and difficult matters; and this in a crimson, alamode, rhetorical style. Their writings are all divine nectar, rich, racy, sparkling, delicate, and luscious wine. Nor does our sex wholly engross this honour; ladies have had their share of the glory: one of them, of the royal blood of France, whom it were a profanation but to name here, surprises the age at once by the transcendent and inventive genius in her writings, and the admirable graces of her style. Imitate those great examples, if you can; for my part, I cannot. Every one you know, cannot go to Corinth. When Solomon built the temple, all could not give gold by handfuls ; each offered a shekel of gold.

Since, then, it is not in my power to improve our architectue as much as they, I am even resolved to do like Renault of Montauban : I will wait on the masons, set on the pot for the masons, cook for the stone-cutters ; and since it was not my good luck to be cut out for one of them, I will live and die the admirer of their divine writings.

As for you, little envious prigs, snarling bastards, puny Zoiluses, you will soon have railed your last : go hang yourselves, and choose you out some well-spread oak, under whose shade you may swing in state, to the admiration of the gaping mob ; you shall never want rope enough. While I here solemnly protest before my Helicon, in the presence of my nine mistresses the Muses, that if I live yet the age of a dog, eked with that of three crows, sound wind and limbs, like the old Hebrew captain Moses, Xenophilus the musician, and Demonax the philosopher ; by arguments no ways impertinent, and reasons not to be disputed, I will prove, in the teeth of a parcel of brokers and retailers of ancient rhapsodies, and such mouldy trash, that our vulgar tongue is not so mean, silly, inept, poor, barren, and contemptible, as they pretend. Nor ought I to be afraid of I know not what botchers of old thread-bare stuff, a hundred and a hundred times clouted up, and pieced together ; wretched bunglers, that can do nothing but new-vamp old rusty saws ; beggarly scavengers, that rake even the muddiest canals of antiquity for scraps and bits of Latin, as insignificant as they are often uncertain. Beseeching our grandees of Witland, that, as when formerly Apollo had distributed all the treasures of his poetical exchequer to his favourites, little hulch-backed Æsop got for himself the office of apologue-monger : in the same manner, since I do not aspire higher, they would not deny me that of puny rhyparographer, or riff-raff follower of Pyreicus.

I dare swear they will grant me this : for they are all so kind, so good-natured, and so generous, that they will never boggle at so small a request. Therefore both dry and hungry souls, pot and trenchermen, fully enjoying those books, perusing, quoting them in their merry conventicles, and observing the great mysteries of which they treat, shall gain a singular profit and fame : as in the like case was done by Alexander the Great, with the books of prime philosophy composed by Aristotle.

O rare ! belly on belly ! what swillers, what twisters will there be !

Then be sure all you that take care not to die of the pip, be sure, I say, you take my advice, and stock yourselves with good store of such books, as soon as you meet with them at the booksellers ; and do not only shell those beans, but even swallow them down like an opiate cordial, and let them be in you; I say, let them be within you; then you shall find, my beloved, what good they do to all elever shellers of beans.

Here is a good handsome basketful of them, which I here lay before your worships; they were gathered in the very individual garden whence the former came. So I beseech you, reverend sirs, with as much respect as was ever paid by dedicating author, to accept of the gift, in hopes of somewhat better against next visit the swallows give us.

CHAPTER I.

How Pantagruel arrived at the Ringing Island, and of the noise that we heard.

PURSUING our voyage, we sailed three days without discovering anything; on the fourth we made land. Our pilot told us that it was the Ringing Island, and indeed we heard a kind of a confused and often repeated noise, that seemed to us at a great distance, not unlike the sound of great, middle-sized, and little bells, rung all at once, as it is customary at Paris, Tours, Gergeau, Nantes, and elsewhere, on high holidays; and the nearer we came to the land, the louder we heard that jangling.

Some of us doubted that it was the Dodonian kettle, or the portico called Heptaphone, in Olympia, or the eternal humming of the Colossus raised on Memnon's tomb, in Thebes of Egypt, or the horrid din that used formerly to be heard about a tomb at Lipara, one of the Æolian Islands. But this did not square with chorography.

I do not know, said Pantagruel, but that some swarms of bees hereabouts may be taking a ramble in the air, and so the neighbourhood make this dingle dangle with pans, kettles, and basons, the corybantine cymbals of Cybele, grandmother of the gods, to call them back. Let us hearken. When we were nearer, among the everlasting ringing of these indefatigable bells, we heard the singing, as we thought, of some men. For this reason, before we offered to land on the Ringing Island. Pantagruel was of opinion that we should go in the pinnace to a small rock, near which we discovered a hermitage, and a little garden. There we found a diminutive old hermit, whose name was Braguibus, born at Glenay. He gave us a full account of all the jangling, and regaled us after a strange sort of fashion: four live-long days did he make us fast, assuring us that we should not be admitted into the Ringing Island otherwise, because it was then one of the four fasting, or ember weeks. As I love my belly, quoth Panurge, I by no means understand this riddle: methinks this should rather be one of the four windy weeks; for while we fast we are only puffed up with wind. Pray now, good father hermit, have not you here some other pastime besides fasting? Methinks it is somewhat of the leanest: we might well enough be without so many palace holidays, and those fasting times of yours. In my Donatus, quoth Friar John, I could find yet but three times or tenses, the preterit, the present and the future, and therefore I make a donative of the fourth (i.e., the fast of the quatre-tens) to be kept by my footman. That time or tense, said Epistemon, is aorist, derived from the preter-imperfect tense of the Greeks, admitted in variable and uncertain times. Patience per force is a remedy for a mad dog. Saith the hermit, it is as I told you, fatal to go against this; whoever does it is a rank heretic, and wants nothing but fire and faggot, that is certain. To deal plainly with you, my dear pater, cried Panurge, being at sea, I much more fear being wet than being warm, and being drowned than being burned.

Well, however, let us fast in God's name: yet I have fasted so long, that it has quite undermined my flesh, and I fear that at last the bastions of this bodily fort of mine will fall to ruin. Besides, I am much more afraid of vexing you in this same trade of fasting; for the devil a bit I understand any thing in it, and it becomes me very seurvily, as several people have told me, and I am apt to believe them. For my part I do not much mind fasting: for alas! it is as easy as pissing a bed, and a trade of which any body may set up; there needs no tools. I am much more inclined not to fast for the future: for to do so, there is some stock required, and some tools are set to work. No matter, since you are so steadfast, and would have us fast, let us fast as fast as we can, and then breakfast in the name of famine. Now we are come to these esurial idle days. I vow I had quite put them out of my head long ago. If we must fast, said Pantagruel, I see no other remedy but to get rid of it as soon as we can, as we would out of a bad way. I will in that space of time somewhat look over my papers, and examine whether the marine study be as good as ours at land. For Plato, to describe a silly, raw, ignorant fellow, compares him to those that are bred on shipboard, as we would do one bred up in a barrel, who never saw any thing but through the bung-hole.

To tell you the short and the long of the matter, our fasting was most hideous and terrible; for, the first day we fasted at fisticuffs, the second at cudgels, the third at sharps and the fourth at blood and wounds: such was the order of the fairies.

CHAPTER II.

How the Ringing Island had been inhabited by the Siticines, who were become birds.

HAVING fasted as aforesaid, the hermit gave us a letter from one whom he called Albian Camar, master Ædituus of the Ringing Island: but Panurge greeting him, called him Master Antitus. He was a little queer old fellow, bald-pated, with a snout whereat you might easily have lighted a card match, and a phiz as red as a cardinal's cap. He made us all very welcome, upon the hermit's recommendation, hearing that we had fasted, as I have told you.

When we had well stuffed our puddings, he gave us an account of what was remarkable in the island, affirming that it had been first inhabited by the Siticines; but that, according to the course of nature, as all things, you know, are subject to change, they were become birds.

There I had a full account of all that Atteius Capito, Pollux, Marcellus, A. Gellius, Athenæus, Suidas, Ammonius, and others had writ of the Siticines; and then we thought we might as easily believe the transmutations of Nectymene, Progné, Itys, Alcyone, Antigone, Tereus, and other birds. Nor did we think it more reasonable to doubt of the transmogrification of the Macrobian children into swans, or that of the men of Pallene in Thrace into birds, as soon as they had bathed themselves in the Tritonic lake. After this the devil a word could we get out of him but of birds and cages.

The cages were spacious, costly, magnificent, and of an admirable architecture. The birds were large, fine, and neat accordingly; looking as like the men in my country, as one pea does like another: for they eat and drink like men, muted like men, digested like men, but stunk like devils; slept, billed, and trod their females like men, but somewhat oftener; in short, had you seen and examined them from top to toe, you would have laid your head to a turnip that they had been mere men. However, they were nothing less, as Master Ædituus told us; assuring us, at the same time, that they were neither secular nor laic: and the truth is, the diversity of their feathers and plumes did not a little puzzle us.

Some of them were all over as white as swans, others as black as crows, many as grey as owls, others black and white like magpies, some all red like red-birds, and others purple and white like some pigeons. He called the males clerg-hawks, monk-hawks, priest-hawks, abbot-hawks, bis-hawks, cardin-hawks, and one pope-hawk, who is a species by himself. He called the females clerg-kites, nun-kites, priest-kites, abbess-kites, bis-kites, cardin-kites, and pope-kites.

However, said he, as hornets and drones will get among the bees, and there do nothing but buzz, eat, and spoil every thing; so, for these last three hundred years, a vast swarm of bigottelloes flocked, I do not know how, among these goodly birds every fifth full moon, and have bemuted, bewrayed, and conskited the whole island. They are so hard-favoured and monstrous, that none can abide them. For their wry necks make a figure like a crooked billet; their paws are hairy, like those of rough-footed pigeons; their claws and pounces, belly and breech, like those of the stymphalid harpies. Nor is it possible to root them out: for if you get rid of one, straight four and twenty new ones fly thither.

There had been need of another monster-hunter, such as was Hercules; for Friar John had like to have run distracted about it, so much he was nettled and puzzled in the matter. As for the good Pantagruel, he was even served as was Messer Priapus, contemplating the sacrifices of Ceres, for want of skin.

CHAPTER III.

How there is but one Popehawk in the Ringing Island.

WE then asked Master Ædituus why there was but one popehawk among such venerable birds, multiplied in all their species? He answered, that such was the first institution and fatal destiny of the stars: that the clerg-hawks begot the priest-hawks and monk-hawks, without carnal copulation, as some bees are born of a young bull: the priest-hawks begat the bis-hawks, the bis-hawks the stately cardin-hawks, and the stately cardin-hawks, if they live long enough, at last come to be popehawk.

Of this last kind, there never is more than one at a time; as in a beehive there is but one king, and in the world but one sun.

When the popehawk dies, another rises in his stead out of the whole brood of cardin-hawks; that is, as you must understand it all along, without carnal copulation. So that there is in that species an individual unity, with a perpetuity of succession, neither more or less than in the Arabian phoenix.

It is true, that about two thousand seven hundred and sixty moons ago, two popehawks were seen upon the face of the earth: but then you never saw in your lives such a woful rout and hurly-burly as was all over this island. For all these same birds did so peck, clapperclaw, and maul one another all that time, that there was the devil and all to do, and the island was in a fair way of being left without inhabitants. Some stood up for this pope-hawk, some for the other. Some, struck with a dumbness, were as mute as so many fishes; the devil a note was to be got out of them; part of the merry bells here were as silent as if they had lost their tongues, I mean their clappers.

During these troublesome times, they called to their assistance the emperors, kings, dukes, carls, barons, and commonwealths of the world that live on the other side the water; nor was this schism and sedition at an end, till one of them died, and the plurality was reduced to a unity.

We then asked, what moved those birds to be thus continually chaunting and singing? He answered, that it was the bells that hung on the top of their cages. Then he said to us, Will you have me make these monk-hawks, whom you see bardocuculated with a bag, such as you use to strain Hippocras wine through, sing like any wood-larks? Pray do, said we. He then gave half a dozen pulls to a little rope, which caused a diminutive bell to give so many tingtangs; and presently a parcel of monk-hawks ran to him, as if the devil had drove them, and fell a singing like mad.

Pray master, cried Panurge, if I also rang this bell, could I make those other birds yonder, with redherring-coloured feathers, sing? Aye, marry would you, returned Ædituus. With this Panurge hanged himself (by the hands, I mean) at the bell-rope's end, and no sooner made it speak, but those smoked birds hied them thither, and began to lift up their voices, and make a sort of untowardly hoarse noise, which I grudge to call singing. Ædituus indeed told us, that they fed on nothing but fish, like the herons and cormorants of the world, and that they were a fifth kind of cucullati newly stamped.

He added, that he had been told by Robert Valbringue, who lately passed that way in his return from Africa, that a sixth kind was to fly hither out of hand, which he called capus-hawks, more grum, vinegar-faced, brain-sick, froward, and loathsome, than any kind whatsoever in the whole island. Africa, said Pantagruel, still uses to produce some new and monstrous thing.

CHAPTER IV.

How the birds of the Ringing island were all passengers.

SINCE you have told us, said Pantagruel, how popehawk is begot by the cardinhawks, the cardinhawks by the bishhawks, and the bishhawks by the priesthawks, and the priesthawks by the clerghawks, I would gladly know whence you have these same clerghawks. They are all passengers, or travelling birds, returned Ædituus, and come hither from the other world; part out of a vast country, called Want-o'-bread, the rest out of another towards the west, which they style Too-many-of-'em. From these two countries flock hither, every year, whole legions of these clerghawks, leaving their fathers, mothers, friends, and relations.

This happens when there are too many children, whether male or female, in some good family of the latter country; insomuch that the house would come to nothing, if the paternal estate were shared among them all; (as reason requires, nature directs, and God commands). For this cause parents used to rid themselves of that inconveniency, by packing off the younger fry, and forcing them to seek their fortune in this isle Bossart (or humpy island). I suppose he means L'isle Bouchart, near Chinon, cried Panurge. No, replied the other, I mean Bossart (crooked), for there is not one in ten among them, but is either crooked, crippled, blinking, limping, ill-favoured, deformed, or an unprofitable load to the earth.

It was quite otherwise among the heathens, said Pantagruel, when they used to receive a maiden among the number of vestals: for Leo Antistius affirms that it was absolutely forbidden to admit a virgin into that order, if she had any vice in her soul, or defect in her body, though it were but the smallest spot on any part of it. I can hardly believe, continued Ædituus, that their dams on the other side the water go nine months with them; for they cannot not endure them nine years, nay, scarce seven, sometimes in the house; but putting only a shirt over the other clothes of the young urchins, and lopping off I do not well know how many hairs from their crowns, mumbling certain apostrophised and expiatory words, they visibly, openly, and plainly, by a Pythagorical metempsychosis, without the least hurt, transmogrify them into such birds as you now see; much after the fashion of the Egyptian heathens, who used to constitute isiacs, by shaving them, and making them put on certain linostoles, or surplices. However, I do not know my good friends, but that these she-things, whether clergkites, monkites, and abbess-kites, instead of singing pleasant motets and charisteres, such as used to be sung to Oromasis by Zoroaster's institution, may be bellowing out such catarates and scythropys, (cursed lamentable, and wretched imprecations,) as were usually offered to the Arimanian demon; being thus in continual devotion for their kind friends and relations, that transformed them into birds, whether when they were maids, or thorn-backs, in their prime, or at their last prayers.

But the greatest numbers of our birds came out of Want-o'-bread, which, though a barren country, where the days are of a most tedious lingering length, overstocks this whole island with the lower class of birds. For hither fly the asapheis that inhabit that land, either when they are in danger of passing their time scurvily for want of belly-timber, being unable, or what is more likely, unwilling to take heart of grace, and follow some honest lawful calling, or too proud-hearted and lazy to go to service in some sober family. The same is done by our frantic innamoradoes, who, when crossed in their wild desires, grow stark staring mad, and choose this life suggested to them by their despair (too cowardly to make them swing, like their brother Iphis of doleful memory). There is another sort, that is, your gaol birds, who, having done some rogue's trick, or other heinous villainy, and being sought up and down to be trussed up, and made to ride the two or three-legged mare that groans for them, warily scour off, and come here to save their bacon; because all these sorts of birds are here provided for, and grow in an instant as fat as hogs, though they came as lean as rakes; for having the benefit of the clergy, they are as safe as thieves in a mill within this sanctuary.

But, asked Pantagruel, do these birds never return to the world where they were hatched? Some do, answered Ædituus; formerly some few, but very late and very unwillingly; however, since some certain eclipses, by the virtue of the celestial constellations, a great crowd of them fled back to the world. Nor do we fret or vex ourselves a jot about it: for those that stay, wisely sing, the fewer the better cheer; and all those that fly away first, cast off their feathers here among these nettles and briars.

Accordingly we found some thrown by there; and as we looked up and down, we chanced to light on what some people will hardly thank us for having discovered; and thereby hangs a tale.

CHAPTER V.

Of the dumb knighthawks of the Ringing island.

THESE words were scarce out of his mouth, when some five-and-twenty or thirty birds flew towards us: they were of a hue and feather like which we had not seen anything in the whole island. Their plumes were as changeable as the skin of the chameleon, and the flower of tripolion, or teuerion. They had all under the left wing a mark, like two diameters dividing a circle into equal parts, or, if you had rather have it so, like a perpendicular line falling on a right line. The marks which each of them bore, were much of the same shape, but of different colours; for some were white, others green, some red, others purple, and some blue. Who are those, asked Panurge, and how do you call them? They are mongrels, quoth Ædituus.

We call them knighthawks, and have a great number of rich commanderies (fat livings) in your world. Good, your worship, said I, make them give us a song, and it please you, that we may know how they sing. They scorn your words, cried Ædituus, they are none of your singing birds; but, to make amends, they feed as much as the best two of them all. Pray, where are their hens? where are their females? said I. They have none, answered Ædituus. How comes it to pass, then, asked Panurge, that they are thus bescabbed, bescurfed, all embroidered over the phiz with carbuncles, pushes, and poek-royals, some of which undermine the handles of their faces? This same fashionable and illustrious disease, quoth Ædituus, is common among that kind of birds, because they are pretty apt to be tossed on the salt deep.

He then acquainted us with the occasion of their coming. This next to us, said he, looks so wistfully upon you, to see whether he may not find among your company a stately gaudy kind of huge dreadful birds of prey, which yet are so untoward, that they never could be brought to the lure, nor to perch on the glove. They tell us that there are such in your world, and that some of them have goodly garters below the knee, with an inscription about them, which condemns him (qui mal y pense) who shall think ill of it, to be bewrayed and conskited. Others are said to wear the devil in a string before their paunches; and others a ram's skin. All that is true enough, good master Ædituus, quoth Panurge; but we have not the honour to be acquainted with their knightships.

Come on, cried Ædituus in a merry mood, we have had chat enough of conscience! let's even go to drink.—And eat, quoth Panurge. Eat, replied Ædituus, and drink bravely, old boy; twist like plough jobbers, and swill like tinkers; pull away and save tide, for nothing is so dear and precious as time, therefore, we will be sure to put it to a good use.

He would fain have carried us first to bathe in the bagnios of the cardinhawks, which are goodly delicious places, and have us lieked over with precious ointments by the alyptes, alias rubbers, as soon as we should come out of the bath. But Pantagruel told him, that he could drink but too much without that. He then led us into a spacious delicate refectory, or fratric-room, and told us: Braguibus, the hermit, made you fast four days together; now contrariwise, I will make you eat and drink of the best four days through stitch, before you budge from this place. But hark-ye-me, cried Panurge, may not we take à nap in the meantime? Ay, ay, answered Ædituus, that is as you shall think good; for he that sleeps, drinks. Good Lord! how we lived! what good bub! what dainty cheer! O what an honest cod was this same Ædituus!

CHAPTER VI.

How the birds are crammed in the Ringing island.

PANTAGRUEL looked I do not know howish, and seemed not very well pleased with the four days' junketing which Ædituus enjoined us. Ædituus, who soon found it out, said to him, You know sir, that seven days before winter, and seven days after, there is no storm at sea: for then the elements are still, out of respect for the haleyns, or king-fishers, birds sacred to Thetis, which then lay their eggs and hatch their young near the shore. Now here the sea makes itself amends for this long calm; and whenever any foreigners come hither it grows boisterous and stormy for four days together. We can give no other reason for it, but that it is a piece of its civility, that those who come among us may stay whether they will or no, and be copiously feasted all the while with the incomes of the ringing. Therefore pray do not think your time lost; for willing, nilling, you will be forced to stay; unless you are resolved to encounter Juno, Neptune, Doris, Æolus, and his fluster-busters; and, in short, all the pack of ill-natured left-handed godlings and vejoves. Do but resolve to be cheery; and fall to briskly.

After we had pretty well staid our stomachs with some tight snatches, Friar John said to Ædituus, For ought I see, you have none but a parcel of birds and eages in this island of yours, and the devil-a-bit of one of them all that sets his hand to the plough, or tills the land, whose fat he devours: their whole business is to be frolic, to chirp it, to whistle it, to warble it: tossing it, and roaring it merrily night and day: pray, then, if I may be so bold, whence comes this plenty and overflowing of all dainty bits and good things, which we see among you? From all the other world, returned Ædituus, if you except some part of the northern regions, who of late years have stirred up the jakes. Mum! they may chance ere long to rue the day they did so; their cows shall have porridge, and their dogs oats; there will be work made among them, that there will: come, a fig for it, let us drink.—But pray what countrymen are you? Tourain is your country, answered Panurge. Cod so, cried Ædituus, you were not then hatched of an ill bird, I will say that for you, since the blessed Tourain is your mother: for from thence there comes hither every year such a vast store of good things, that we were told by some folks of the place, that happened to touch at this island, that your Duke of Tourain's income will not afford him to eat his belly full of beans and bacon, (a good dish spoiled between Moses and Pythagoras,) because his predecessors have been more than liberal to these most holy birds of ours; that we might here munch it, twist it, cram it, gorge it, crawl it, riot it, junket it, and tickle it off; stuffing our puddings with dainty pheasants, partridges, pullets with eggs, fat capons of Loudunois, and all sorts of vension and wild fowl. Come, box it about, tope on my friends: pray do you see yon jolly birds that are perched together, how fat, how plump, and in good case they look, with the income that Tourain yields us! And in faith they sing rarely for their good founders, that is the truth on it. You never saw any Arcadian birds mumble more fairly than they do over a dish, when they see these two gilt batons, or when I ring for them those great bells that you see above their cages. Drink on, sirs, whip it away: verily, friends, it is very fine drinking to-day, and so it is every day of the week; then drink on, toss it about, here is to you with all my soul; you are most heartily welcome: never spare it, I pray you; fear not we should ever want good bub, and belly timber; for, look here, though the sky were of brass, and the earth of iron, we should not want wherewithal to stuff the gut, though they were to continue so seven or eight years longer than the famine in Egypt. Let us then, with brotherly love and charity, refresh ourselves here with the creature.

Woons man, cried Panurge, what a rare time you have of it in this world! Pshaw, returned Ædituus, this is nothing to what we shall have in the other: the Elysian fields will be the least that can fall to our lot. Come, in the meantime let us drink here; come, here is to thee, old fuddlecap.

Your first siticines, said I, were superlatively wise, in devising thus a means for you to compass whatever all men naturally covet so much; and so few, or, to speak more properly, none can enjoy together: I mean, a paradise in this life, and another in the next. Sure you were born wrapt in your mothers' smiekets! O happy creatures! O more than men! Would I had the luck to fare like you!

CHAPTER VII.

How Panurge related to Master Ædituus the fable of the horse and the ass.

WHEN we had crammed and crammed again, Ædituus took us into a chamber that was well furnished, hung with tapestry, and finely gilt. Thither he caused to be brought store of mirobolans, cashou, green ginger preserved with plenty of hippoeras, and delieious wine. With those antidotes, that were like a sweet Lethe, he invited us to forget the hardships of our vóyage; and at the same time he sent plenty of provisions on board our ship that rid in the harbour. After this, we then jogged to bed for that night; but the devil a bit poor pilgarlic could sleep one wink: the everlasting jingle jangle of the bells kept me awake whether I would or no.

About midnight Ædituus came to wake us, that we might drink. He himself showed us the way, saying: You men of the other world say that ignorance is the mother of all evil, and so far you are right; yet for all that, you do not take the least care to get rid of it, but still plod on, and live in it, with it, and by it; for which a plaguy deal of mischief lights on you every day, and you are right enough served: you are perpetually ailing somewhat, making a moan and never right. It is what I was ruminating upon just now. And, indeed, ignorance keeps you here fastened in bed, just as that bully-roek Mars was detained by Vulcan's art: for all the while you do not mind that, you ought to spare some of your rest, and be as lavish as you can of the goods of this famous island. Come, come, you should have eaten three breakfasts already: and take this from me for a certain truth, That if you would consume the mouth-ammunition of this island, you must rise betimes; eat them, they multiply; spare them, they diminish.

For example: mow a field in due season, and the grass will grow thicker and better; do not mow it, and in a short time it will be floored with moss. Let us drink, and drink again, my friends: come let us all earouse it. The leanest of our birds are now singing to us all; we will drink to them, if you please. Let us take off one, two, three, nine bumpers. Non zelus, sed charitas.

At the break of day, he waked us again to take a dish of monastical brewess. From that time we made but one meal, that only lasted the whole day: so that I cannot well tell how I may call it, whether dinner, supper, nunchion, or after-supper; only to get a stomaeh, we took a turn or two in the island, to see and hear the blessed singing birds.

At night Panurge said to Ædituus, Give me leave, sweet sir, to tell you a merry story of something that happened some three and twenty moons ago, in the country of Chastelleraud.

One day in April, a certain gentleman's groom, Roger by name, was walking his master's horses in some fallow ground: there it was his good fortune to find a pretty shepherdess, feeding her bleating sheep and harmless lambkins, on the brow of a neighbouring mountain, in the shade of an adjacent grove: near her, some frisking kids tripped it over a green carpet of nature's own spreading; and to complete the landscape, there stood an ass. Roger, who was a wag, had a dish of chat with her, and after some ifs, ands, and buts, hems and heighs on her side, got her in the mind to get up behind him, to go and see his stable, and there take a bit by the bye in a eivil way. While they were holding a parley, the horse, directing his discourse to the ass, (for all brute beasts spoke that year in divers places,) whispered these words in his ear: Poor ass, how I pity thee! thou slavest like any haek, I read it on thy erupper: thou dost well, however, since God has created thee to serve mankind; thou art a very honest ass; but not to be better rubbed down, curricombed, trapped, and fed than thou art, seems to me indeed to be too hard a lot. Alas! thou are all rough coated, in ill plight; jaded, foundered, crest-fallen, and drooping like a mooting duck, and feedest here on nothing but coarse grass, or briars and thistles; therefore do but pae it along with me, and thou shalt see how we noble steeds, made by nature for war, are treated. Come, thou wilt lose nothing by coming; I will get thee a taste of my fare. In troth, sir, I ean but love you and thank you, returned the ass; I will wait on you, good Mr. Steed. Methinks, gaffer ass, you might as well have said Sir Grandpaw Steed. O! cry mercy, good Sir Grandpaw, returned the ass; we eountry clowns are somewhat gross, and apt to knock words out of joint. However, if it please you, I will come after your worship at some distance, lest for taking this run, my side should chance to be firked and curried with a vengeance, as it is but too often, the more is my sorrow.

The shepherdess being got behind Roger, the ass followed, fully resolved to bait like a prince with Roger's steed; but when they got to the stable, the groom, who spied the grave animal, ordered one of his underlings to welcome him with a pitchfork, and curricomb him with a cudgel. The ass, who heard this, recommended himself mentally to the god Neptune, and was packing off, thinking, and syllogising within himself thus: Had not I been an ass, I had not come here among great lords, when I must needs be sensible that I was only made for the use of the small vulgar. Æsop had given me a fair warning of this in one of his fables. Well, I must c'en scamper, or take what follows. With this he fell a trotting, and wincing, and yerking, and calcitrating, alias, kicking, and farting, and funking, and curvetting, and bounding, and springing, and galloping full drive, as if the devil had come for him in propria personâ.

The shepherdess, who saw her ass scour off, told Roger that it was her cattle and desired he might be kindly used, or else she would not stir her foot over the threshold. Friend Roger no sooner knew this, but he ordered him to be fetched in, and that my master's horses should rather chop straw for a week together, than my mistress's beast should want his belly full of corn.

The most difficult point was to get him back; for in vain the youngsters complimented and coaxed him to come. I dare not, said the ass, I am bashful. And the more they strove by fair means to bring him with them, the more the stubborn thing was untoward, and flew out at heels; insomuch that they might have been there to this hour, had not his mistress advised them to toss oats in a sieve, or in a blanket, and call him; which was done, and made him wheel about, and say, Oats by mackins! oats shall go to pot. Adveniat; oats will do, there is evidence in the case: but none of the rubbing down, none of the firking. Thus melodiously singing (for, as you know, that Arcadian bird's note is very harmonious) he came to the young gentleman of the horse, alias, black guard, who brought him to the stable.

When he was there, they placed him next to the great horse, his friend, rubbed him down, curricombed him, laid clean straw under him up to the chin, and there he lay at rack and manger; the first stuffed with sweet hay, the latter with oats; which when the horse's valet-de-chambre sifted, he clapped down his lugs, to tell them by signs that he could eat it but too well without sifting, and that he did not deserve so great an honour.

When they had well fed, quoth the horse to the ass: Well, poor ass, how is it with thee now? How dost thou like this fare? Thou wert so nice at first, a body had much ado to get thee hither. By the fig, answered the ass, which, one of our ancestors eating, Philemon died laughing, this is all sheer ambrosia, good Sir Grandpaw; but what would you have an ass say? Methinks all this is yet but half cheer. Do not your worships here now and then used to take a leap? What leaping dost thou mean? asked the horse, the devil leap thee; dost thou take me for an ass? In troth, Sir Grandpaw, quoth the ass, I am somewhat a blockhead, you know, and cannot, for the heart's blood of me, learn so fast the court way of speaking of you gentlemen horses; I mean, don't you stallionize it sometimes here among your mettled fillies? Tush, whispered the horse, speak lower; for, by Bucephalus, if the grooms but hear thee, they will maul and belam thee thrice and threefold; so that thou wilt have but little stomach to a leaping bout. Cod so, man, we dare not so much as grow stiff at the tip of the lowermost snout, though it were but to leak or so for fear of being jirked and paid out of our lechery. As for anything else, we are as happy as our master, and perhaps more. By this packsaddle, my old acquaintance, quoth the ass, I have done with you; a fart for thy litter and hay, and a fart for thy oats; give me the thistles of our fields, since there we leap when we list: eat less and leap more, I say: it is meat, drink, and cloth to us. Ah! friend Grandpaw, it would do thy heart good to see us at a fair, when we hold our provincial chapter! Oh! how we leap it, while our mistresses are selling their goslings and other poultry! With this they parted. Dixi: I have done.

Panurge then held his peace. Pantagruel would have had him to have gone on to the end of the chapter: but Ædituus said, A word to the wise is enough; I can pick out the meaning of that fable, and know who is that ass, and who the horse; but you are a bashful youth, I perceive. Well, know that there is nothing for you here; scatter no words. Yet, returned Panurge, I saw but even now a pretty kind of a cooing abbess-kite as white as a dove, and her I had rather ride than lead. May I never stir if she is not a dainty bit, and very well worth a sin or two. Heaven forgive me! I meant no more harm in it than you; may the harm I meant in it befall me presently.

CHAPTER VIII.

How with much ado we got a sight of the Popehawk.

Our junketing and banqueting held on at the same rate the third day, as the two former. Pantagruel then earnestly desired to see the pope-hawk: but Ædituus told him it was not such an easy matter to get a sight of him. How, asked Pantagruel, has he Plato's helmet on his crown, Gyges's ring on his pounces, or a chameleon on his breast, to make him invisible when he pleases? No, sir, returned Ædituus: but he is naturally of pretty difficult access: however, I will see and take care that you may see him, if possible. With this he left us piddling: then within a quarter of an hour came back, and told us the pope-hawk is now to be seen: so he led us, without the least noise, directly to the cage wherein he sat, drooping with his feathers staring about him, attended by a brace of little cardin-hawks, and six lusty fusty bishhawks.

Panurge stared at him like a dead pig, examining exactly his figure, size, and motions. Then with a loud voice he said, A curse light on the hatcher of the ill bird; on my word this is a filthy whoophooper. Hush, speak softly, said Ædituus; by G— he has a pair of ears, as formerly Michael de Matiscome remarked. What then, returned Panurge, so hath a whoopeat. Whist, said Ædituus, if he but hear you speak such another blasphemous word, you had as good be damned; do you see that bason yonder in his cage? Out of it shall sally thunderbolts and lightnings, storms, bulls, and the devil and all, that will sink you down to Peg Trantum's, an hundred fathom under ground. It were better to drink and 'be merry, quoth Friar John.

Panurge was still feeding his eyes with the sight of the pope-hawk, and his attendants, when somewhere under his cage he perceived a madgehowlet. With this he cried out, By the devil's maker, master, there is roguery in the case; they put tricks upon travellers here more than anywhere else, and would make us believe that a t—d is a sugar loaf. What damned cozening, gulling, and cony-catching have we here! Do you see this madgehowlet? By Minerva, we are all beshit. Odsoons, said Ædituus, speak softly, I tell you: it is no madgehowlet, no she-thing on my honest word; but a male, and a noble bird.

May we not hear the pope-hawk sing, asked Pantagruel? I dare not promise that, returned Ædituus; for he only sings and cats at his own hours. So do not I, quoth Panurge; poor pilgarlic is fain to make everybody's time his own: come, then, let us go drink if you will. Now this is something like a tansy, said Ædituus, you begin to talk somewhat like; still speak in that fashion, and I will secure you from being thought a heretic. Come on, I am of your mind.

As we went back to have the other fuddling bout, we spied an old green-headed bish-hawk, who sat moping with his mate and three jolly bittern attendants, all snoring under an arbour. Near the old cuff stood a buxom abbess-kite, that sung like any linnet: and we were so mightily tickled with her singing, that I vow and swear we could have wished all our members but one turned into ears, to have had more of the melody.

Quoth Panurge, this pretty cherubim of cherubims is here breaking her head with chaunting to this huge, fat, ugly face, who lies grunting all the while like a hog as he is. I will make him change his note presently in the devil's name. With this he rang a bell that hung over the bish-hawk's head; but though he rang and rang again, the devil a bit bish-hawk would hear: the louder the sound, the louder his snoring. There was no making him sing. By G—, quoth Panurge, you old buzzard, if you will not sing by fair means, you shall by foul. Having said this, he took up one of St. Stephen's loaves, alias a stone, and was going to hit him with it about the middle. But Ædituus cried to him, Hold, hold, honest friend! strike, wound, poison, kill, and murder all the kings and princes in the world, by treachery or how they wilt, and as soon as thou wouldest, unnestle the angels from their cock-loft; pope-hawk will pardon thee all this: but never be so mad as to meddle with these sacred birds, as much as thou lovest the profit, welfare, and life not only of thyself, and thy friends and relations alive or dead, but also of those that may be born hereafter to the thousandth generation; for so long thou wouldest entail misery upon them. Do but look upon that bason. Catso, let us rather drink, then, quoth Panurge. He that spoke last, spoke well, Mr. Antitus, quoth Friar John: while we are looking on these devilish birds, we do nothing but blaspheme; and while we are taking a cup, we do nothing but praise God. Come on, then, let us go drink; how well that word sounds!

The third day (after we had drank, as you must understand) Ædituus dismissed us. We made him a present of a pretty little Pergois knife, which he took more kindly than Artaxerxes did the cup of cold water that was given him by a clown. He most courteously thanked us, and sent all sorts of provisions aboard our ships, wished us a prosperous voyage, and success in our undertakings, and made us promise and swear by Jupiter of stone to come back by his territories. Finally he said to us, Friends, pray note, that there are many more stones in the world than men; take care you do not forget it.

CHAPTER IX.

How we arrived at the Island of Tools.

HAVING well ballasted the holds of our human vessels, we weighed anchor, hoisted up sail, stowed the boats, set the land, and stood for the offing with a fair loom gale, and for more haste unparalleled the mizen-yard, and launched it and the sail over the lee-quarter, and fitted gyves to keep it steady, and boomed it out: so in three days we made the Island of Tools, that is altogether uninhabited. We saw there a great number of trees which bore mattocks, pickaxes, crows, weeding-hooks, seythes, sickles, spades, trowels, hatchets, hedging-bills, saws, adzes, bills, axes, shears, pincers, bolts, piercers, augers, and wimbles.

Others bore dags, daggers, poniards, bayonets, squarebladed tucks, stilettoes, poinadoes, skenes, penknives, puncheons, bodkins, swords, rapiers, back-swords, cutlasses, scymetars, hangers, falchions, glaives, raillons, whittles, and whinyards.

Whoever would have any of these, needed but to shake the tree, and immediately they dropped down as thick as hops, like so many ripe plums; nay, what is more, they fell on a kind of grass called scabbard, and sheathed themselves in it cleverly. But when they came down, there was need of taking care lest they happened to touch the head, feet, or other parts of the body. For they fell with the point downwards, and in they stuck, or slit the continuum of some member, or lopped it off like a twig; either of which generally was enough to have killed a man, though he were a hundred years old, and worth as many thousand spankers, spur-royals, and rose-nobles.

Under some other trees, whose names I cannot justly tell you, I saw some certain sorts of weeds that grew and sprouted like pikes, lances, javelins, javelots, darts, dartlets, halberts, boarspears, eel-spears, partizans, tridents, prongs, troutstaves, spears, half pikes, and hunting staffs. As they sprouted up and chanced to touch the tree, straight they met with their heads, points, and blades, each suitable to its kind, made ready for them by the trees over them, as soon as every individual weed was grown up, fit for its steel: even like the children's coats, that are made for them as soon as they wear them, and you wean them of their swaddling clothes. Nor do you mutter, I pray you, at what Plato, Anaxagoras, and Democritus have said: od's fish! they were none of your lower-form gimeracks, were they?

Those trees seemed to us terrestrial animals, in no wise so different from brute beasts as not to have skin, fat, flesh, veins, arteries, ligaments, nerves, cartilages, kernals, bones, marrow, humours, matrices, brains, and articulations; for they certainly have some, since Theophrastus will have it so: but in this point they differed from other animals, that their heads, that is, the part of their trunks next to the root, are downwards; their hair, that is their roots, in the earth; and their feet, that is their branches, upside down: as if a man should stand on his head with outstretched legs. And as you, battered sinners, on whom Venus has bestowed something to remember her, feel the approach of rains, winds, cold, and every change of weather at your ischiatic legs, and your omoplates, by means of the perpetual almanaek which she has fixed there: so these trees have notice given them, by certain sensations which they have at their roots, stoeks, guns, paps, or marrow, of the growth of the staffs under them; and accordingly they prepare suitable points and blades for them beforehand. Yet as all things, except God, are sometimes subject to error, nature itself not free from it, when it produceth monstrous things; likewise I observed something amiss in these trees. For a halpike, that grew up high enough to reach the branches of one of these instrumentiferous trees, happened no sooner to touch them, but instead of being joined to an iron head, it impaled a stub broom at the fundament. Well, no matter, it will serve to sweep the chimney. Thus a partizan met with a pair of garden shears, Come, all is good for something, it will serve to nip off little twigs, and destroy caterpillars. The staff of a halbert got the blade of a scythe, which made it look like a hermaphrodite. Happy-be-lueky, it is all a case, it will serve for some mower. Oh, it is a great blessing to put our trust in the Lord! As we went baek to our ships, I spied behind I do not know what bush, I do not know what folks, doing I do not know what business, in I do not know what posture, scouring I do not know what tools, in I do not know what manner, and I do not know what plaee.

CHAPTER X.

How Pantagruel arrived at the Island of Sharping (or gaming).

WE left the Island of Tools to pursue our voyage, and the next day stood in for the Island of Sharping, the true image of Fontainbleau; for the land is so very lean, that the bones, that is, the rocks, shoot through its skin. Besides, it is sandy, barren, unhealthy, and unpleasant. Our pilot showed us there two little square rocks, which had eight equal points in the shape of a eube. They were so white, that I might have mistaken them for alabaster or snow, had he not assured us they were made of bone.

He told us that twenty-one ehanee devils very much feared in our country, dwelt there in ix different stories, and that the biggest twins or braces of them were called sixes, and the smallest amb's-aec; the rest cinques, quatres, treys, and duees. When they were conjured up, otherwise coupled, they were called either sicc cinque, sicc quatre, sicc troy, sicc duee, and sicc ace; or cinque quatre, cinque troy, and so forth. I made there a shrewd observation: would you know what it is, gamesters? It is, that there are very few of you in the world, but what eall upon and invoke the devils. For the dice are no sooner thrown on the board, and the greedy gazing sparks have hardly said, Two sixes, Frank; but six devils damn it! cry as many of them. If amb's-ae, then, A braee of devils broil me, will they stay. Quatre duce, Tom, The duce take it, cries another. And so on to the end of the chapter. Nay, they do not forget sometimes to call the black cloven-footed gentlemen by their christian-names and surnames: and what is stranger yet, they use them as the greatest eronies, and make them so often the exeutors of their wills; not only giving themselves, but every body, and every thing, to the devil, that there is no doubt but he takes care to seize, soon or late, what is so zealously bequeathed him. Indeed, it is true, Lueifer does not always immediately appear by his lawful attorneys; but alas! it is not for want of good-will: he is really to be exused for his delay; for what the devil would you have a devil do? He and his blackguards are then at some other plaees, aecording to the priority of the persons that call on them: therefore, pray let none be so venturesome as to think, that the devils are deaf and blind.

He then told us that more wrecks had happened about those square rocks, and a greater loss of body and goods, than about all the Syrtes, Scyllas and Charibdes, Sirens, Strophades, and gulfs in the universe. I had not much ado to believe it, remembering that formerly, among the wise Egyptians, Neptune was described in hieroglyphics for the first eube, Apollo by an ace, Diana by a duce, Minerva by seven, and so forth.

He also told us that there was a phial of Sanc-Greal, a most divinc thing, and known to a few. Panurge did so sweeten up the syndies of the place, that they blessed us with a sight of it: but it was with three times more pother and ado, with more formalities and antic-trieks, than they show the pandects of Justinian at Florence, or the holy Veroniea at Rome. I never saw such a sight of flambeaux, torehes, and hagios, and sanctified tapers, in my whole life. After all, that which was shown us was only the ill-faced countenance of a roasted eency.

All that we saw there worth speaking of, was a good face set upon an ill game, and the shells of the two eggs formerly laid up and hatched by Leda, out of which came Castor and Pollux, fair Helen's brothers. These same syndies sold us a piece of them for a song, I mean, for a morsel of bread.

Before we went, we bought a parcel of hats and caps of the manufacture of the place; which, I fear, will turn to no very good account: nor are those who shall take them off our hands, more likely to commend their wearing.

CHAPTER XI.

How we passed through the wicket, inhabited by Gripe-men-all, Arch-duke of the furred Law-cats.

FROM thence Condemnation was passed by us. It is another damned barren island, whereat none for the world cared to touch. Then we went through the wicket: but Pantagruel had no mind to bear us company; and it was well he did not, for we were nabbed there, and clapped into lob's pound by order of Grip-men-all, Arch-duke of the Furred Law-cats, because one of our company would have put upon a serjeant some hats of the Sharping Island.

The Furred Law-cats are most terrible and dreadful monsters, that devour little children, and trample over marble stones. Pray tell me noble toppers, do they not deserve to have their snouts slit? the hair of their hides does not lie outwards; and every mother's son of them for his device wears a gaping pouch, but not all in the same manner: for some wear it tied to their neck scarf-wise, others upon the breech, some on the paunch, others on the side, and all for a cause, with reason and mystery. They have claws so very strong, long, and sharp, that nothing can get from them what is once fast between their clutches. Sometimes they cover their heads with mortar-like caps, at other times with mortified caparisons.

As we entered their den, said a common mumper, to whom we had given half a teston, Worshipful culprits, God send you a good deliverance. Examine well, said he, the countenance of these stout props and pillars of this catch-coin law and iniquity; and pray observe, that if you still live but six olympiads, and the age of two dogs more, you will see these Furred Law-cats lords of all Europe, and in peaceful possession of all the estates and dominions belonging to it: unless, by divine providence, what is got over the devil's back is spent under his belly; or the goods which they unjustly gob, perish with their prodigal heirs. Take this from an honest beggar.

Among them reigns the sixth essence; by the means of which they gripe all, devour all, conskrite all, burn all, draw all, hang all, quarter all, behead all, murder all, imprison all, waste all, and ruin all, without the least notice of right or wrong: for among them vice is called virtue; wickedness, piety; treason, loyalty; robbery, justice. Plunder is their motto, and when acted by them, is approved by all men, except the heretics: and all this they do, because they dare; their authority is sovereign and irrefragable. For a sign of the truth of what I tell you, you will find, that there the mangers are above the racks. Remember hereafter, that a fool told you this; and if ever plague, famine, war, fire, earthquakes, inundations, or other judgments befall the world, do not attribute them to the aspects and conjunctions of the malevolent planets, to the abuses of the court of Romania, or the tyranny of secular kings and princes: to the impostures of the false zealots of the eowl, heretical bigots, false prophets, and broachers of sects; to the villainy of griping usurers, elippers, and coiners; nor to the ignorance, impudence, and imprudence of physicians, surgeons, and apothecaries: nor to the lewdness of adultresses, and destroyers of by-blows; but charge them all, wholly and solely to the inexpressible, incredible, and inestimable wickedness and ruin, which is continually hatched, brewed, and practised in the den or shop of those Furred Law-eats. Yet it is no more known in the world than the eabala of the Jews; the more is the pity; and, therefore, it is not detested, chastised, and punished, as it is fit it should be. But should all their villainy be once displayed in its true colours, and exposed to the people; there never was, is, nor will be any spokesman so sweet-mouthed, whose fine colloguing tongue could save them; nor any law so rigorous and draconic, that could punish them as they deserve: nor yet any magistrate so powerful, as to hinder their being burnt alive in their coney-burrows without merey. Even their own furred kittlings, friends, and relations would abominate them.

For this reason, as Hannibal was solemnly sworn by his father Amilear to pursue the Romans with the utmost hatred, as long as ever he lived: so, my late father has enjoined me to remain here without, till God Almighty's thunder reduce them there within to ashes, like other presumptuous Titans, prophane wretches, and opposers of God: since mankind is so inured to their oppressions, that they either do not remember, foresee, or have a sense of the woes and miseries which they have caused; or if they have, either will not, dare not, or cannot root them out.

How, said Panurge, say you so? Catch me there and hang me! Damme, let us march off! This noble beggar has scared me worse than thunder in autumn. Upon this we were filing off; but alas! we found ourselves trapped: the door was double locked and barricadoed. Some messengers of ill news told us, it was full as easy to get in there as into hell, and no less hard to get out. Ay, there indeed lay the difficulty, for there is no getting loose without a pass and discharge in due course from the bench. This for no other reason than because folks go easier out of a church than out of a spunging-house, and because they could not have our company when they would. The worst of it was when we got through the wicket: for we were carried, to get out our pass or discharge, before a more dreadful monster than ever was read of in the legends of knight errantry. They called him Gripe-men-all. I cannot tell what to compare it to, better than to a chimera, a Sphynx, a Cerberus; or to the image of Osiris, as the Egyptians represented him, with three heads, one of a roaring lion, the other of a fawning cur, and the last of a howling, prowling wolf, twisted about with a dragon biting his tail, surrounded with fiery rays. His hands were full of gore, his talons like those of the harpies, his snout like a hawk's bill, his fangs or tusks like those of an overgrown brindled wild boar; his eyes were flaming, like the jaws of hell, all covered with mortars interlaced with pestles, and nothing of his arms was to be seen, but his clutches. His hutch, and that of the warren-cats his collaterals, was a long, spick-and-span new ræck, a-top of which (as the mumper told us) some large, stately mangers were fixed in the reverse. Over the chief seat was the picture of an old woman, holding the case or scabbard of a sickle in her right hand, a pair of scales in her left, with spectacles on her nose: the cups or scales of the balance were a pair of velvet pouches: the one full of bullion, which overpoised the other, empty and long, hoisted higher than the middle of the beam. I am of opinion it was the true effigies of Justice Gripe-men-all; far different from the institution of the ancient Thebans who set up the statues of their dieasts without hands. in marble, silver, or gold, according to their merit, even after their death.

When we made our personal appearance before him, a sort of I do not know what men, all clothed with I do not know what bags and pouches, with long scrolls in their elutches, made us sit down upon a cricket: (such as eriminals sit on when tried in France.) Quoth Panurge to them, Good my lords, I am very well as I am; I would as lieve stand, if it please you. Besides, this same stool is somewhat of the lowest for a man that has new breeches and a short doublet. Sit you down, said Gripe-men-all again, and look that you do not make the court bid you twice. Now, continued he, the earth shall immediately open its jaws, and swallow you up to quick damnation, if you do not answer as you should.

CHAPTER XII.

How Gripe-men-all propounded a riddle to us.

WHEN we were sate, Gripe-men-all, in the middle of his furred cats, called to us in a hoarse dreadful voice, Well, come on, give me presently—an answer. Well, come on, muttered Panurge between his teeth, give, give me presently—a comforting dram. Hearken to the court, continued Gripe men-all.

AN ENIGMA.

A young tight thing, as fair as may be,
 Without a dad conceived a baby;
 And brought him forth without the pother
 In labour made by teeming mother.
 Yet the cursed brat feared not to gripe her,
 But gnawed, for haste, her sides like viper.
 Then the black upstart boldly sallies,
 And walks and flies o'er hills and vallies.
 Many fantastic sons of wisdom,
 Amazed, foresaw their own in his doom;
 And thought, like an old Grecian noddy,
 A human spirit moved his body.

Give, give me out of hand—an answer to this riddle, quoth Gripe-men-all. Give, give me—leave to tell you, good, good, my lord, answered Panurge, that if I had but a sphynx at home, as Verres, one of your precursors had, I might then solve your enigma presently: but verily, good my lord, I was not there; and, as I hope to be saved, am as innocent in the matter as the child unborn. Foh, give me—a better answer, cried Gripe-men-all; or, by gold, this shall not serve your turn: I will not be paid in such coin: if you have nothing better to offer, I will let your rascalship know, that it had been better for you to have fallen into Lucifer's own clutches, than into ours. Dost thou see them here, sirah? hah? and dost thou prate here of thy being innocent, as if thou couldst be delivered from our racks and tortures for being so! Give me—Patience! thou widgeon. Our laws are like cobwebs: your silly little flies are stopped, caught, and destroyed therein; but your stronger ones break them, and force and carry them which way they please. Likewise, do not think we are so mad as to set up your nets to snap up your great robbers and tyrants: no, they are somewhat too hard for us, there is no meddling with them; for they would make no more of us than we make of the little ones: but you paltry, silly, innocent wretches, must make us amends: and, by gold, we will inno-centise your fopship with a wannion, you never were so innoentised in your days; the devil shall sing mass among ye.

Friar John, hearing him run on at that mad rate, had no longer the power to remain silent, but eried to him, Heighdey! Pr'ythee, Mr. Devil in a eoif, wouldest thou have a man tell thee more than he knows? Has not the fellow told you he does not know a word of the business? His name is Twyford. A plague rot you, will not truth serve your turns? Why, how now, Mr. Prate-apace, cried Gripe-men-all, taking him short, marry come up, who made you so saucy as to open your lips before you were spoken to? Give me—Patience! By gold! this is the first time, since I have reigned, that any one has had the impudence to speak before he was bidden. How came this mad fellow to break loose? (Villain, thou liest, said Friar John, without stirring his lips.) Sirrah, sirrah, continued Gripe-men-all, I doubt thou wilt have business enough on thy hands, when it comes to thy turn to answer. (Damme, thou liest, said Friar John, silently.) Dost thou think, continued my lord, thou art in the wilderness of your foolish university, wrangling and brawling among the idle, wandering searchers and hunters after truth? By gold, we have here other fish to fry; we go another gat's-way to work, that we do. By gold, people here must give categorical answers to what they do know. By gold, they must confess they have done those things which they have not nor ought to have done. By gold, they must protest that they know what they never knew in their lives; and, after all, patience, per foree, must be their only remedy, as well as a mad dog's. Here silly geese are plucked, yet cackle not. Sirrah, give me,—an account, whether you had a letter of attorney, or whether you were feed or no, that you offered to brawl in another man's cause? I see you had no authority to speak, and I may chance to have you wed to something you will not like. Oh, you devils, eried Friar John, proto-devils, panto-devils, you would wed a monk, would you? Ho hu! ho hu! A heretic! a heretic! I will give thee out for a rank heretic.

CHAPTER XIII.

How Panurge solved Gripe-men-all's riddle.

GRYPE-MEN-ALL, as if he had not heard what Friar John said, directed his discourse to Panurge, saying to him, Well, what have you to say for yourself, Mr. Rogue-enough, hah? Give, give me out of hand—an answer. Say? quoth Panurge, why, what would you have me say? I say, that we are damnably beshit, since you give no heed at all to the equity of the plea, and the devil sings among you: let this serve for all, I beseech you, and let us go out about our business; I am no longer able to hold out, as gad shall judge me.

Go to, go to, cried Gripe-men-all; when did you ever hear that for these three hundred years last past, any body ever got out of this weal without leaving something of his behind him? No, no, get out of the trap if you can without losing leather, life, or at least some hair, and you will have done more than ever was done yet. For why, this would bring the wisdom of the court into question, as if we had took you up for nothing, and dealt wrongfully by you. Well, by hook or by crook, we must have something out of you. Look ye, it is a folly to make a rout for a fart and ado; one word is as good as twenty; I have no more to say to thee, but that as thou likest thy former entertainment, thou wilt tell me more of the next; for it will go ten times worse with thee, unless, by gold, you give me—a solution to the riddle I propound. Give, give—it, without any more ado.

By gold, quoth Panurge, it is a black mite or weevil, which is born of a white bean, and sallies out at the hole which he makes, gnawing it; the mite, being turned into a kind of fly; sometimes walks, and sometimes flies, over hills and dales. Now, Pythagoras, the Greek sage, and his seet, besides many others, wondering at its birth in such a place, (which makes some argue for equivocal generation,) thought that by a metempsychosis, the body of that insect was the lodging of a human soul. Now, were you men here, after your welcome death, according to his opinion, your souls would most certainly enter into the body of mites or weevils; for, as in your present state of life, you are good for nothing in the world, but to gnaw, bite, eat, and devour all things; so in the next you will even gnaw and devour your mother's very sides, as the vipers do. Now, by gold, I think I have fairly solved and resolved your riddle.

May my bauble be turned into a nut-cracker, quoth Friar John, if I could not almost find in my heart to wish that what comes out of my bung-hole were beans, that these evil weevils might feed as they deserve.

Panurge then, without any more ado, threw a large leathern purse, stuffed with gold crowns (escus au soleil) among them.

The furred law-cats no sooner heard the jingling of the chink, but they all began to bestir their claws, like a parcel of fiddlers running a division; and then fell to it, squimble, squamble, catch that catch can. They all said aloud, These are the fees, these are the gloves; now, this is somewhat like a tansy. Oh! it was a pretty trial, a sweet trial, a dainty trial. On my word, they did not starve the cause; these are none of your snivelling forma pauperis's; no, they are noble clients, gentlemen every inch of them. By gold, it is gold, quoth Panurge, good old gold, I'll assure you.

Saith Gripe-men-all, The court upon a full hearing, (of the gold, quoth Panurge,) and weighty reasons given, finds the prisoners not guilty, and accordingly orders them to be discharged out of eustody, paying their fees. Now, gentlemen, proceed, go forwards, said he to us; we have not so much of the devil in us as we have of his hue; though we are stout, we are mereiful.

As we came out at the wicket, we were conducted to the port by a detachment of certain highland griffins, who advised us, before we came to our ships, not to offer to leave the place until we had made the usual presents, first to the Lady Gripe-men-all, then to all the furred law pusses; otherwise we must return to the place from whence we came. Well, well, said Friar John, we will fumble in our fobs, examine every-one of us his concern, and even give the women their due; we will never boggle nor stiek out on that account; as we tickled the men in the palm, we will tickle the women in the right place. Pray gentlemen, added they, do not forget to leave somewhat behind you for us poor devils to drink your healths. O lawd! never fear, answered Friar John, I do not remember that I ever went anywhere yet, where the poor devils are not remembered and encouraged.

CHAPTER XIV.

How the furred law-cats live on corruption.

FRIAR JOHN had hardly said those words ere he perceived seventy-eight gallies and frigates just arriving at the port. So he hied him thither to learn some news; and as he asked what goods they had on board, he soon found that their whole cargo was venison, hares, capons, turkeys, pigs, swine, bacon, kids, calves, hens, ducks, teals, geese, and other poultry and wild fowl.

He also spied among these some pieces of velvet, satin, and damask. This made him ask the new-comers, whither and to whom, they were going to carry those dainty goods? They answered, that they were for Gripe-men-all and the furred law-eats.

Pray, asked he, what is the true name of all these things in your country language? Corruption, they replied. If they live on corruption, said the Friar, they will perish with their generation. May the devil be damned, I have it now: their fathers devoured the good gentlemen, who, according to their state of life, used to go much a hunting and hawling to be the better inured to toil in time of war; for hunting is an image of a martial life; and Xenophon was much in the right of it, when he affirmed that hunting had yielded a great number of excellent warriors, as well as the Trojan horse. For my part, I am no scholar, I have it but by hearsay, yet I believe it. Now, the souls of those brave fellows, according to Gripe-men-all's riddle, after their decease, enter into wild boars, stags, roebucks, herons, and such other creatures, which they loved, and in quest of which they went while they were men; and these furred law-cats, having first destroyed and devoured their castles, lands, demesnes, possessions, rents, and revenues, are still seeking to have their blood and soul in another life. What an honest fellow was that same mumper, who had forewarned us of all these things, and bid us take notice of the manglers above the racks!

But, said Panurge to the new-comers, how do you come by all this venison? Methinks the great king has issued out a proclamation, strictly inhibiting the destroying of stags, does, wild boars, roebucks, or other royal game, on pain of death. All this is true enough, answered one for the rest, but the great king is so good and gracious, you must know, and these furred law-cats so cursed and cruel, so mad, and thirsting after Christian blood, that we have less cause to fear in trespassing against that mighty sovereign's commands, than reason to hope to live, if we do not continually stop the mouths of these furred law-cats with such bribes and corruption. Besides, added he, to-morrow Gripe-men-all marries a furred law-puss of his to a high and mighty double-furred law-tybert. Formerly we used to call them chop-hay; but, alas! they are not such clean creatures now as to cat any, or chew the cud. We call them chop-hares, chop-partridges, chop-woodeoks, chop-pheasants, chop-pullets, chop-venison, chop-ponies, chop-pigs, for they scorn to feed on coarser meat. A t—d for their chops, cried Friar John, next year we will have them called chop-dung, chop-stront, chop-filth.

Would you take my advice, added he to the company. What is it? answered we. Let us do two things, returned he. First, let us secure all this venison and wild fowl,—I mean paying well for them; for my part, I am but too much tired already with our salt meat, it heats my flanks, so horribly. In the next place, let us go back to the wicket, and destroy all these devilish furred law-cats. For my part, quoth Panurge, I know better things: catch me there, and hang me; no, I am somewhat more inclined to be fearful than bold; I love to sleep in a whole skin.

CHAPTER XV.

How Friar John talks of rooting out the furred law-cats.

VIRTUE of the frock, quoth Friar John, what kind of voyage we are making? A shitten one, on my word: the devil of anything we do, but fizzling, farting, funking, squattering, dozing, raving, and doing nothing. Odd's belly, it is not in my nature to lie idle; I mortally hate it: unless I am doing some heroic feat every foot, I cannot sleep one wink at nights. Damn it, did you then take me along with you for your chaplain, to sing mass and shrive you? By Maunday Thursday, the first of ye all that comes to me on such an account shall be fitted; for the only penance I will enjoin shall be, that he immediately throw himself headlong overboard into the sea, like a base cow-hearted son of ten fathers. This in deduction of the pains of purgatory.

What made Hercules such a famous fellow, do you think? Nothing, but that while he travelled, he still made it his business to rid the world of tyrannies, errors, dangers, and drudgeries; he still put to death all robbers, all monsters, all venomous serpents, and hurtful creatures. Why then do we not follow his example, doing as he did in the countries through which we pass? He destroyed the Stymphalides, the Lernean hydra, Cacus, Antheus, the centaurs, and what not; I am no clericus, those that are such tell me so.

In imitation of that noble by-blow, let us destroy and root out these wicked furred law-cats, that are a kind of ravenous devils; thus we shall remove all manner of tyranny out of the land. Mahomet's tutor, swallow me body and soul, tripes and guts, if I would stay to ask your help or advice in the matter, were I but as strong as he was. Come, he that would be thought a gentleman, let him storm a town; well, then, shall we go? I dare swear we will do their business for them with a wet finger; they will bear it, never fear: since they could swallow down more foul language that came from us, than ten sows and their babies could swill hogwash. Damn them, they do not value all the ill words or dishonour in the world at a rush, so they but get the coin into their purses, though they were to have it in a shitten clout. Come, we may chance to kill them all, as Hercules would have done, had they lived in his time. We only want to be set to work by another Eurystheus, and nothing else for the present, unless it be what I heartily wish them, that Jupiter may give them a short visit, only some two or three hours long, and walk among their lordships in the same equipage, that attended him when he came last to his Miss Semele, jolly Bacchus's mother.

It is a very great mercy, quoth Panurge, that you have got out of their clutches: for my part, I have no stomach to go there again; I am hardly come to myself yet, so scared and appalled I was; my hair still stands up on end when I think on it; and most damnably troubled I was there, for three very weighty reasons. First, because I was troubled. Secondly, because I was troubled. Thirdly and lastly, because I was troubled. Hearken to me a little on the right side, Friar John, my left cod, since thou wilt not hear at the other; whenever the maggot bites thee, to take a trip down to hell, and visit the tribunal of Minos, Æacus, Rhadamanthus, and Dis, do but tell me, and I will be sure to bear thee company, and never leave thee, as long as my name is Panurge, but will wade over Acheron, Styx, and Cocytus, drink whole bumpers of Lethe's water,—though I mortally hate that element,—and even pay thy passage to that bawling, cross-grained ferryman, Charon. But as for the damned wicket, if thou art so weary of thy life as to go thither again, thou mayest even look for somebody else to bear thee company, for I will not move one step that way: even rest satisfied with this positive answer. By my good will, I will not stir a foot to go thither as long as I live, any more than Calpe will come over to Abyla. Was Ulysses so mad as to go back into the cyclop's cave to fetch his sword? No, marry was he not. Now, I have left nothing behind me at the wicket through forgetfulness; why then should I think of going thither?

Well, quoth Friar John, as good sit still as rise up and fall; what cannot be cured must be endured. But, pr'ythee, let us hear one another speak in turn. Come, wert thou not a wise doctor to fling away a whole purse of gold on those mangy scoundrels? Ha! A squinzy choke thee, we were too rich, were we? Had it not been enough to have thrown the hell-hounds a few cropt pieces of white cash?

How could I help it? returned Panurge. Did you not see how Gripe-men-all held his gaping velvet pouch, and every moment roared and bellowed. By gold, give me out of hand; by gold, give, give, give me presently? Now, thought I to myself, we shall never come off scot-free; I will even stop their mouths with gold, that the wicket may be opened, and we may get out; the sooner the better. And I judged that lousy silver would not do the business; for, do you see, velvet pouches do not use to gape for little paltry clipped silver and small cash; no, they are made for gold, my friend John, that they are, my dainty cod. Ah! when thou hast been larded, basted, and roasted, as I was, thou wilt hardly talk at this rate, I doubt. But now what is to be done?—We are enjoined by them to go forwards.

The scabby slabberdegullions still waited for us at the port, expecting to be greased in the fist as well as their masters. Now, when they perceived that we were ready to put to sea, they came to Friar John, and begged that we would not forget to gratify the apparitors before we went off, according to the assessment for the fees at our discharge. Hell and damnation, cried Friar John, are ye here still, ye bloodhounds, ye citing, scribbling imps of Satan? Rot you, am I not vexed enough already, but you must have the impudence to come and plague me, ye scurvy fly-catchers you? By cob's body, I will gratify your ruffianships as you deserve; I will apparatorize you presently, with a wannion, that I will. With this he lugged out his slashing cutlass, and, in a mighty heat, came out of the ship, to cut the cozening varlets into steaks, but they scampered away and got out of sight in a trice.

However, there was somewhat more to do, for some of our sailors, having got leave of Pantagruel to go ashore, while we were had before Gripe-men-all, had been at a tavern near the haven, to make much of themselves, and roar it, as seamen will do when they come into some port. Now I do not know whether they had paid their reckoning to the full or no, but, however it was, an old fat hostess, meeting Friar John on the quay, was making a woeful complaint before a serjeant, son-in-law to one of the furred law-cats, and a brace of bums, his assistants.

The Friar, who did not much care to be tried with their impertinent prating, said to them, Harkee me, ye lubberly gnat-snappers, do ye presume to say, that our seamen are not honest men? I will maintain they are, ye doterrels, and will prove it to your brazen faces, by justice: I mean this trusty piece of cold iron by my side. With this he lugged it out and flourished with it. The forlorn lobcocks soon showed him their backs, betaking themselves to their heels; but the old fusty landlady kept her ground, swearing like any butterwhore, that the tarpaulins were very honest cods, but that they only forgot to pay for the bed on which they had lain after dinner, and she asked fivepence French money, for the said bed. May I never sup, said the Friar, if it be not dog-cheap; they are sorry guests, and unkind customers, that they are; they do not know when they have a pennyworth, and will not always meet with such bargains; come, I myself will pay you the money, but I would willingly see it first.

The hostess immediately took him home with her, and showed him the bed, and having praised it for its good qualifications, said, that she thought, as times went, she was not out of the way in asking fivepence for it. Friar John then gave her the fivepence; and she no sooner turned her back, but he presently began to rip up the ticking of the feather-bed and bolster, and threw all the feathers out at the window. In the mean time the old hag came down, and roared out for help, crying out murder, to set all the neighbourhood in an uproar. Yet she also fell to gathering the feathers that flew up and down in the air, being scattered by the wind. Friar John let her bawl on, and, without any further ado, marched off with the blanket, quilt, and both the sheets, which he brought aboard undiscovered, for the air was darkened with the feathers, as it uses sometimes to be with snow. He gave them away to the sailors, then said to Pantagrue, that beds were much cheaper at that place than in Chinnois, though we have there the famous geese of Pantilé; for the old beldam had asked him but fivepence for a bed, which, in Chinnois, had been worth about twelve francs. "As soon as Friar John and the rest of the company were embarked, Pantagrue set sail. But there arose a south-east wind, which blew so vehemently they lost their way, and in a manner going back to the country of the furred law-cats, they entered into a huge gulf, where the sea ran so high and terrible, that the ship-boy on the top of the mast cried out, he again saw the habitation of Gripe-men-all; upon which Panurge, frightened almost out of his wits, roared out, Dear master, in spite of the wind and waves, change your course, and turn the ship's head about: O my friend, let us come no more into that cursed country, where I left my purse. So the wind carried them near an island, where, however, they did not dare at first to land, but entered about a mile off."

CHAPTER XVI.

How Pantagrue came to the Island of the Apedefts, or Ignoramuses, with long claws and crooked paws, and of terrible adventures and monsters there.

As soon as we had cast anchor, and had moored the ship, the pinnace was put over the ship's side, and manned by the cockswain's crew. When the good Pantagrue had prayed publicly, and given thanks to the Lord, that had delivered him from so great a danger, he stepped into the pinnace with his whole company, to go on shore, which was no ways difficult to do, for, as the sea was calm, and the winds laid, they soon got to the cliffs. When they were set on shore, Epistemon, who was admiring the situation of the place, and the strange shape of the rocks, discovered some of the natives.

The first he met had on a short purple gown, a doublet cut in panes, like a Spanish leather jerkin, half sleeves of satin, and the upper part of them leather, a coif like a black pot tipped with tin. He was a good likely sort of a body, and his name, as we heard afterwards, was Double-fee. Epistemon asked him, How they called those strange craggy rocks and deep valleys? He told them it was a colony, brought out of Attorneyland, and called Process; and that if we forded the river somewhat further beyond the rocks, we should come into the island of the Apedefts. By the sacred memory of the decretals, said Friar John, tell us, I pray you, what you honest men here live on? Could not a man take a chirping bottle with you, to taste your wine? I can see nothing among you but parchment, inkhorns, and pens. We live on nothing else, returned Double-fee: and all who live in this place must come through my hands. How, quoth Panurge, are you a shaver, then? Do you fleece them? Ay, ay, their purse, answered Double-fee, nothing else. By the foot of Pharaoh, cried Panurge, the devil a sous will you get of me. However, sweet sir, be so kind as to show an honest man the way to those Apedefts, or ignorant people, for I come from the land of the learned, where I did not learn over much.

Still talking on, they got to the island of the Apedefts, for they were soon got over the ford. Pantagruel was not a little taken up with admiring the structure and habitation of the people of the place. For they live in a swinging winepress, fifty steps up to it. You must know there are some of all sorts, little, great, private, middle-sized, and so forth. You go through a large peristyle, alias a long entry set about with pillars, in which you see, in a kind of landscape, the ruins of almost the whole world; besides so many gibbets for great robbers, so many gallows and racks, that it is enough to fright you out of our seven senses. Double-fee perceiving that Pantagruel was taken up with contemplating those things, Let us go further, sir, said he to him, all this is nothing yet. Nothing, quotha, cried Friar John; by the soul of my overheated codpiece, friend Panurge and I here shake and quiver for mere hunger. I had rather be drinking, than staring on these ruins. Pray come along, sir, said Double-fee. He then led us into a little wine-press, that lay backwards in a blind corner, and was called Pithies in the language of the country. You need not ask whether Master John and Panurge made much of their sweet selves there; it is enough that I tell you there was no want of Bolonia sausages, turkey-pouts, capons, bustards, malmsey-wine, and all other sorts of good belly-timber, very well dressed.

A pimping son of ten fathers, who, for want of a better, did the office of a butler, seeing that Friar John had cast a sheep's eye at a choice bottle that stood near a cupboard by itself, at some distance from the rest of the bottellie magazine, like a jack-in-an-office, said to Pantagruel, Sir, I perceive that one of your men here is making love to this bottle: he ogles it, and would fain caress it; but I beg that none offer to meddle with it; for it is reserved for their worships. How, cried Panurge, there are some grandes here then I see. It is vintage time with you, I perceive.

Then Double-fee led up to a private stair-case, and showed us into a room, whence, without being seen, out at a loophole, we could see their worships in the great wine-press, where none could be admitted without their leave. Their worships, as he called them, were about a score of fusty, crack-ropes and gallow-clappers, or rather more, all posted before a bar, and staring at each other like so many dead pigs: their paws or hands were as long as a crane's leg, and their claws or nails four and twenty inches long at least; for you must know, they are enjoined never to pare off the least chip of them, so that they grow as crooked as a Welch hook, or a hedging-bill.

We saw a swinging bunch of grapes, that are gathered and squeezed in that country, brought in by them. As soon as it was laid down, they clapped it into the press, and there was not a bit of it out of which each of them did not squeeze some oil of gold. Insomuch that the poor grape was tried with a witness, and brought off so drained and picked, and so dry, that there was not the least moisture, juice, or substance left in it; for they had pressed out its very quintessence.

Double-fee told us, they had not often such huge bunches; but, let the worst come to the worst, they were sure never to be without others in their press. But hark you me, master of mine, asked Panurge, have they not some of different growth? Ay marry have they, quoth Double-fee. Do you see here this little bunch, to which they are going to give the other wrench? It is of tythe-growth, you must know; they crushed, wrung, squeezed, and strained out the very heart's blood of it but the other day: but it did not bleed freely; the oil came hard, and smelt of the priest's chest; so that they found there was not much good to be got out of it. Why then, said Pantagruel, do they put it again into the press? Only, answered Double-fee, for fear there should still lurk some juice among the husks and hullings, in the mother of the grape. The devil be damned, cried Friar John, do you call these same folks illiterate lobecks, and dunsical doddipoles? May I be broiled like a red herring, if I do not think they are wise enough to skin a flint, and draw oil out of a brick wall. So they are, said Double-fee; for they sometimes put castles, parks, and forests into the press, and out of them all extract aurum potable. You mean portabile, I suppose, cried Epistemon, such as may be borne. I mean as I said, replied Double-fee, potabile, such as may be drunk; for it makes them drink many a good bottle more than otherwise they should.

But I cannot better satisfy you as to the growth of the vine-tree syrup that is here squeezed out of grapes, than in desiring you to look yonder in that back-yard, where you will see above a thousand different growths that lie waiting to be squeezed every moment. Here are some of the public and some of the private growth; some of the fortifications, loans, gifts, and gratuities, escheats, forfeitures, fines, and recoveries, penal statutes, crown lands, and demesne, privy purse, post-offices, offerings, lordships of manors, and a world of other growths, for which we want names. Pray, quoth Epistemon, tell me of what growth is that great one, with all those little grapplings about it. Oh, oh! returned Double-fee, that plump one is of the treasury, the very best growth in the whole country. Whenever any one of that growth is squeezed, there is not one of their worships but gets juice enough of it to soak his nose six months together. When their worships were up, Pantagruel desired Double-fee to take us into that great wine-press, which he readily did. As soon as we were in, Epistemon, who understood all sorts of tongues, began to show us many devices on the press, which was large and fine, and made of the wood of the cross—at least Double-fee told us so. On each part of it were names of every thing in the language of the country. The spindle of the press was called receipt; the trough, costs and damages; the hole for the vice-pin, state; the side-boards, money paid into the office; the great beam, respite of homage; the branches, radictur; the side-beams, recuperetur; the fats, ignoramus; the two-handled basket, the rolls; the treading-place, acquittance; the dossers, validation; the panniers, authentic decrees; the pails, potentials; the funnels, quietus est.

By the Queen of the Chitterlings, quoth Panurge, all the hieroglyphics of Egypt are mine a—to this jargon. Why! here are a parcel of words full as analogous as chalk and cheese, or a cat and a cart wheel! But why, pr'ythee, dear Double-fee, do they call these worshipful dons of yours ignorant fellows? Only, said Double-fee, because they neither are, nor ought to be, clerks, and all must be ignorant as to what they transact here; nor is there to be any other reason given, but, The court hath said it; The court will have it so; The court has decreed it. Cop's body, quoth Pantagruel, they might full as well have called them necessity; for necessity has no law.

From thence, as he was leading us to see a thousand little puny presses, we spied another paltry bar, about which sat four or five ignorant waspish churls, of so testy, fuming a temper, like an ass with squibs and crackers tied to its tail, and so ready to take pepper in the nose for yea and nay, that a dog would not have lived with them. They were hard at it with the lees and dregs of the grapes, which they griped over and over again, might and main, with their clenched fists. They were called contractors, in the language of the country. These are the ugliest, misshapen, grim-looking scrubs, said Friar John, that ever were beheld, with or without spectacles. Then we passed by an infinite number of little pimping wine-presses, all full of vintage-mongers, who were picking, examining, and raking the grapes with some instruments, called bills of charge.

Finally, we came into a hall down stairs, where we saw an overgrown cursed mangy cur, with a pair of heads, a wolf's belly, and claws like the devil of hell. The son of a bitch was fed with costs, for he lived on a multiplicity of fine amonds and amerciaments, by order of their worships, to each of whom the monster was worth more than the best farm in the land. In their tongue of ignorance they called him Twofold. His dam lay by him, and her hair and shape was like her whelps, only she had four heads, two male and two female, and her name was Fourfold. She was certainly the most cursed and dangerous creature of the place, except her grandam, which we saw, and had been kept locked up in a dungeon, time out of mind, and her name was Refusing-of-fees.

Friar John, who had always twenty yards of gut ready empty, to swallow a gallinaufry of lawyers, began to be somewhat out of humour, and desired Pantagruel to remember he had not dined, and bring Double-fee along with him. So away we went, and as we marched out of the back-gate, whom should we meet but an old piece of mortality in chains. He was half ignorant and half learned, like an hermaphrodite of Satan. The fellow was well caparisoned with spectacles, as a tortoise is with shells, and lived on nothing but a sort of food which, in their gibberish, was called appeals. Pantagruel asked Double-fee of what breed was that prothonotary, and what name they gave him? Double-fee told us that time out of mind he had been kept there in chains, to the great grief of their worships, who starved him, and his name was Review. By the pope's sanctified two-pounders, cried Friar John, I do not much wonder at the meagre cheer which this old chuff finds among their worships. Do but look a little on the weather-beaten scratch-toby, friend Panurge; by the sacred tip of my cowl, I will lay five pounds to a hazel-nut, the foul thief has the very looks of Gripe-men-all. These same fellows here, ignorant as they be, are as sharp and knowing as other folks. But were it my case, I would send him packing with a squib in his breech, like a rogue as he is. By my oriental barnacles, quoth Panurge, honest Friar, thou art in the right, for if we but examine that treacherous Review's ill-favoured phiz, we find that the filthy snudge is yet more mischievous and ignorant than these ignorant wretches here, since they (honest dunces) grapple and glean with as little harm and pother as they can, without any long-fiddle-cum-farts or tantalizing in the case; nor do they dally and demur in your suit, but, in two or three words, whip-stitch, in a trice, they finish the vintage of the close, bating you all these damned tedious interloeuories, examinations, and appointments, which fret to the heart's blood your furred law-eats.

CHAPTER XVII.

How we went Forwards, and how Panurge had like to have been killed.

WE put to sea that very moment, steering our course forwards, and gave Pantagruel a full account of our adventures, which so deeply struck him with compassion, that he wrote some elegies on that subject, to divert himself during the voyage. When we were safe in the port we took some refreshment, and took in fresh water and wood. The people of the place, who had the countenance of jolly fellows, and boon companions, were all of them forward folks, bloated and puffed up with fat; and we saw some who slashed and pinked their skins, to open a passage to the fat, that it might swell out at the slits and gashes which they made; neither more nor less than the shit-breech fellows in our country bepink and cut open their breeches, that the taffety on the inside may stand out and be puffed up. They said, that what they did was not out of pride or ostentation, but because otherwise their skins would not hold them without much pain. Having thus slashed their skin, they used to grow much bigger, like the young trees, on whose barks the gardeners make incisions, that they may grow the better.

Near the haven there was a tavern, which forwards seemed very fine and stately. We repaired thither, and found it filled with people of the forward nation, of all ages, sexes, and conditions; so that we thought some notable feast or other was getting ready, but we were told that all that throng were invited to the bursting of mine host, which caused all his friends and relations to hasten thither.

We did not understand that jargon, and, therefore, thought in that country, by that bursting they meant some merry meeting or other, as we do in ours by betrothing, wedding, groaning, christening, churching (of women), shearing (of sheep), reaping (of corn, or harvest-home), and many other junketing bouts that end in ing. But we soon heard that there was no such matter in hand.

The master of the house, you must know, had been a good fellow in his time, loved heartily to wind up his bottom, to bang the pitcher, and liek his dish: he used to be a very fair swallower of gravy soup, a notable accountant in matter of hours, and his whole life was one continual dinner, like mine host at Rouillac (in Perigord). But now, having farted out much fat for ten years together, according to the custom of the country, he was drawing towards the bursting hour; for neither the inner thin caul wherewith the entrails are covered, nor his skin that had been jagged and mangled so many years, were able to hold and enclose his guts any longer, or hinder them from forcing their way out. Pray, quoth Panurge, is there no remedy, no help for the poor man, good people? Why do you not swaddle him round with good tight girths, or secure his natural tub with a strong sorb-apple-tree hoop? Nay, why do not you iron-bind him, if needs be? This would keep the man from flying out and bursting. The word was not yet out of his mouth, when we heard something give a loud report, as if a huge sturdy oak had been split in two. Then some of the neighbours told us, that the bursting was over, and that the clap or crack, which we heard, was the last fart, and so there was an end of mine host.

This made me call to mind a saying of the venerable abbot of Castilliers, the very same who never cared to humph his chambermaids, but when he was in pontificalibus. That pious person, being much dunned, teased, and importuned by his relations to resign his abbey in his old age, said and professed, That he would not strip till he was ready to go to bed, and that the last fart which his reverend paternity was to utter, should be the fart of an abbot.

CHAPTER XVIII.

How our ships were stranded, and we were relieved by some people that were subject to Queen Whims (qui tenoient de la Quinte).

WE weighed and set sail with a merry westerly gale, when about seven leagues off (twenty-two miles), some gusts or scuds of wind suddenly arose, and the wind veering and shifting from point to point, was, as they say, like an old woman's breech, at no certainty; so we first got our starboard tacks aboard, and hauled off our lee-sheets. Then the gusts increased, and by fits blowed all at once from several quarters, yet we neither settled nor braided up close our sails, but only let fly the sheets, not to go against the master of the ship's direction; and thus having let go amain, lest we should spend our topsails, or the ship's quick-side should lie in the water, and she be overset, we lay by and run adrift; that is, in a landloper's phrase, we temporised it. For he assured us that, as these gusts and whirlwinds would not do us much good, so they could not do us much harm, considering their easiness and pleasant strife, as also the clearness of the sky and calmness of the current. So that we were to observe the philosopher's rule, bear and forbear; that is, trim, or go according to the time.

However, these whirlwinds and gusts lasted so long, that we persuaded the master to let us go and lie at trie with our main course: that is, to haul the tack aboard, the sheet close aft, the bowline set up, and the helm tied close aboard; so, after a stormy gale of wind, we broke through the whirlwind. But it was like falling into Seylla to avoid Charybdis, (out of the frying-pan into the fire). For we had not sailed a league, ere our ships were stranded upon some sands, such as are the flats of St. Maixant.

All our company seemed mightily disturbed, except Friar John, who was not a jot daunted, and with sweet sugar-plum words, comforted now one and then another, giving them hopes of speedy assistance from above, and telling them that he had seen Castor at the main-yard-arm. Oh! that I were but now ashore, cried Panurge, that is all I wish for myself at present, and that you, who like the sea so well, had each man of you two hundred thousand crowns; I would fairly let you set up shop on these sands, and would get a fat calf dressed, and a hundred of faggots cooled for you against you come ashore. I freely consent never to mount a wife, so you but set me ashore, and mount me on a horse, that I may go home; no matter for a servant, I will be contented to serve myself; I am never better treated than when I am without a man. Faith old Plautus was in the right of it when he said, the more servants the more crosses; for such they are, even supposing they could want what they all have but too much of, a tongue, that most busy, dangerous, and pernicious member of servants; accordingly, it was for their sakes alone that the racks and tortures for confession were invented, though some foreign civilians in our time have drawn alogical and unreasonable consequences from it.

That very moment we spied a sail that made towards us. When it was close by us, we soon knew what was the lading of the ship, and who was aboard of her. She was full freighted with drums: I was acquainted with many of the passengers that came in her, who were most of them of good families; among the rest Harry Cotiral the chemist, an old toast, who had got a swinging ass's touch-tripe (penis) fastened to his waist, as the good women's beads are to their girdle. In his left hand he held an old overgrown greasy foul cap, such as your seald-pated fellows wear, and in the right a huge cabbage-stump.

As soon as he saw me he was overjoyed, and bawled out to me, What cheer, ho? How dost like me now? Behold the true Algamana (this, he said, showing me the ass's tickle-gizzard). This doctor's cap is my true elixir; and this (continued he, shaking the cabbage stump in his fist) is lunaria major; I have it, old boy, I have it; we will blow the coal when thou art come back. But pray, father, said I, whence come you? Whither go you? What is your lading? Have you smelt the sea? To these four questions he answered, From Queen Whims; for Touraine; alchymy; to the very bottom.

Whom have you got on board? said I. Said he, Astrologers, fortune-tellers, alchymists, rhymers, poets, painters, projectors, mathematicians, watchmakers, sing-songs, musicianers, and the devil and all of others that are subject to Queen Whims. They have very fair legible patents to show for it, as any body may see. Panurge had no sooner heard this, but he was upon the high-rope, and began to rail at them like mad. What the devil do you mean, cried he, to sit idly here, like a pack of loitering sneaksbies, and see us stranded, while you may help us, and tow us off into the current! A plague on your whims; you can make all things whatsoever, they say, so much as good weather and little children; yet will not make haste to fasten some hawsers and cables, and get us off. I was just coming to set you afloat, quoth Harry Cotiral: by Trismegistus, I will clear you in a trice. With this he caused 7,532,810 huge drums to be unheaded on one side, and set that open side so that it faced the end of the streamers and pendants; and having fastened them to good tacklings, and our ship's head to the stern of theirs, with cables fastened to the bits abaft the manger in the ship's loof, they towed us off ground at one pull, so easily and pleasantly, that you would have wondered at it, had you been there. For the dub-o-dub rattling of the drums, with the soft noise of the gravel, which murmuring disputed us our way, and the merry cheers and huzzas of the sailors, made an harmony almost as good as that of the heavenly bodies, when they roll and are whirled round their spheres, which rattling of the celestial wheels Plato said he heard some nights in his sleep.

We scorned to be behind-hand with them in civility, and gratefully gave them store of our sausages and chitterlings, with which we filled their drums; and we were just a-hoisting two-and-sixty hogsheads of wine out of the hold, when two huge whirlpools (physeteres) with great fury made towards their ship; spouting more water than is in the river Vienne (Vigence), from Chinon to Saumur: to make short, all their drums, all their sails, their concerns, and themselves were soused, and their very hose were watered by the eollar.

Panurge was so overjoyed, seeing this, and laughed so heartily, that he was forced to hold his sides, and it set him into a fit of the colic for two hours and more. I had a mind, quoth he, to make the dogs drink, and those honest whirlpools, egad, have saved me that labour and that cost. There's sauce for them; ἀριστον νέν ὕδωρ. Water is good, said a poet; let them Pindarise upon it: they never eared for fresh water, but to wash their hands or their glasses. This good salt water will stand them in good stead, for want of sal ammoniac and nitre in Geber's kitchen.

We could not hold any further discourse with them; for the former whirlwind hindered our ship from feeling the helm. The pilot advised us henceforwards to let her run adrift, and follow the stream, not busying ourselves with anything, but making much of our careases. For our only way to arrive safe at the Queendom of Whims, was to trust to the whirlwind, and be led by the eurrent.

CHAPTER XIX.

How we arrived at the (Queendom of Whims), or kingdom of Quintessence, called Entelechy.

WE did as he directed us for about twelve hours, and on the third day the sky seemed to us somewhat clearer, and we happily arrived at the port of Mateotehny, not far distant from the palace of Quintessence.

We met full-butt on the quay a great number of guards, and other military men that garrisoned the arsenal; and we were somewhat frighted at first, because they made us all lay down our arms, and, in a haughty manner, asked us whence we came?

Cousin, quoth Panurge to him that asked the question, we are of Touraine, and come from France, being ambitious of paying our respects to the Lady Quintessence, and visit this famous realm of Entelechy.

What do they say? cried they; do you call it Entelechy, or Endelechty? Truly, truly, sweet cousins, quoth Panurge, we are a silly sort of grout-headed lobcocks, and it please you; be so kind as to forgive us if we chance to knock words out of joint: as for anything else, we are downright honest fellows, and true hearts.

We have not asked you this question without a cause, said they: for a great number of others, who have passed this way from your country of Touraine, seemed as mere jolt-headed doddipoles as ever were scored over the coxeomb, yet spoke as correct as other folks. But there has been here from other countries a pack of I know not what overweening self-conceited prigs, as moody as so many mules, and as stout as any Scotch lairds, and nothing would serve these, forsooth, but they must wilfully wrangle and stand out against us at their coming; and much they got by it after all. Troth, we even fitted them, and clawed them off with a vengeance, for all they looked so big and so grum.

Pray tell me, does your time lie so heavy upon you in your world, that you do not know how to bestow it better than in thus impudently talking, disputing and writing of our sovereign lady? There was much need that your Tully, the consul, should go and leave the care of his commonwealth to busy himself idly about her; and after him, your Diogenes Laertius, the biographer, and your Theodorus Gaza, the philosopher, and your Agriopilus, the emperor, and your Bessario, the cardinal, and your Politian, the pedant, and your Budæus, the judge, and your Lascaris, the ambassador, and the devil and all of those you call lovers of wisdom; whose number, it seems, was not thought great enough already, but likely your Sealiger, Bigot, Chambrier, Francis Fluery, and I cannot tell how many such other junior sneaking fly-blows, must take upon them to increase it.

A squincy gripe the cods-headed changeling at the swallow, and eke at the cover-weesel; we shall make them—But the deuce take them; (they flatter the devil here, and smoothify his name, quoth Panurge, between their teeth); you do not come here, continued the captain, to uphold them in their folly, you have no commission from them to this effect; well then, we will talk no more of it.

Aristotle, that first of men, and peerless pattern of all philosophy, was our sovereign lady's godfather; and wisely and properly gave her the name of Entelechy. Her true name then is Entelechy, and may he be in tail beshit, and entail a shit-a-bed faculty, and nothing else on his family, who dares call her by any other name: for whoever he is, he does her wrong, and is a very impudent person. You are heartily welcome, gentlemen. With this they colled and clipt us about the neck, which was no small comfort to us, I will assure you.

Panurge then whispered me, Fellow-traveller, quoth he, hast thou not been somewhat afraid this bout? A little, said I. To tell you the truth of it, quoth he, never were the Ephraimites in a greater fear and quandary, when the Gileadites killed and drowned them for saying sibboleth instead of Shibboleth; and among friends, let me tell you, that perhaps there is not a man in the whole country of Beauce, but might easily have stopt my bunghole with a cart-load of hay.

The captain afterwards took us to the queen's palace, leading us silently with great formality. Pantagruel would have said something to him; but the other, not being able to come up to his height, wished for a ladder, or a very long pair of stilts; then said, Patience, if it were our sovereign lady's will, we would be as tall as you; well, we shall, when she pleases.

In the first galleries, we saw great numbers of sick persons, differently placed according to their maladies. The leprous were apart; those that were poisoned on one side; those that had got the plague, alias the pox, in the first rank accordingly.

CHAPTER XX.

THE captain showed us the queen, attended with her ladies and gentlemen in the second gallery. She looked young, though she was at least eighteen hundred years old; and was handsome, slender, and as fine as a queen, that is as hands could make her. He then said to us: It is not yet a fit time to speak to the queen; be you but mindful of her doings in the meanwhile.

You have kings in your world that fantastieally pretend to cure some certain diseases; as for example, scrofula or wens, swelled throats, nick-named the king's evil, and quartan agues, only with a touch: now our queen cures all manner of diseases without so much as touching the sick, but barely with a song, according to the nature of the distemper. He then showed us a set of organs, and said, that when it was touched by her, those miraculous cures were performed. The organ was indeed the strangest that ever eyes beheld: for the pipes were of cassia fistula in the cod; the top and cornice of guaiacum; the bellows of rhubarb; the pedas of turbith, and the clavier or keys of scammony.

While we were examining this wonderful new make of an organ, the leprous were brought in by her abstractors, spodizators, masticators, pregustics, tabachins, chachanins, neemanins, rabebans, nercins, rozuins, nebidins, tearins, segamions, perarons, chasinins, sarins, soteins, aboth, enilins, archasdarpens, mebins, chabourins, and other officers, for whom I want names; so she played them I do not know what sort of a tunc, or song, and they were all immediatly cured.

Then those who were poisoned were had in, and she had no sooner given them a song, but they began to find a use for their legs, and up they got. Then came on the deaf, the blind, and the dumb, and they too were restored to their lost faculties and senses with the same remedy; which did so strangely amaze us (and not without reason, I think,) that down we fell on our faces, remaining prostrate, like men ravished in ecstasy, and were not able to utter one word through the excess of our admiration, till she came, and having touched Pantagrue with a fine fragrant nosegay of red roses, which she held in her hand, thus made us recover our senses and get up. Then she made us the following speech in Byssin words, such as Parisatis desired should be spoken to her son Cyrus, or at least of crimson alamode.

The probity that scintillizes in the superficies of your persons, informs my ratiocinating faculty, in a most stupendous manner, of the radiant virtues, latent within the precious caskets and ventricles of your minds. For, contemplating the mellifluous suavity of your thrice discreet reverences, it is impossible not to be persuaded with facility, that neither your affections nor your intellects are vitiated with any defect, or privation of liberal and exalted sciences: far from it, all must judge that in you are lodged a cornucopia, and encyclopedia, an unmeasurable profundity of knowledge in the most peregrine and sublime disciplines, so frequently the admiration, and so rarely the concomitants of the imperite vulgar. This gently compels me, who in preceding times indefatigably kept my private affections absolutely subjugated, to condescend to make my application to you in the trivial phrase of the plebeian world; and assure you, that you are well, more than most heartily welcome.

I have no hand at making of speeches, quoth Panurge to me privately: pr'ythee, man, make answer to her for us, if thou canst. This would not work with me, however, neither did Pantagrue return a word: so that Queen Whims, or Queen Quintessence (which you please) perceiving that we stood as mute as fishes, said: Your taciturnity speaks you not only disciples of Pythagoras, from whom the venerable antiquity of my progenitors, in successive propagation was emaned, and derives its original; but also discovers, that through the revolution of many retrograde moons, you have in Egypt pressed the extremities of your fingers, with the hard tenants of your mouths, and scalptized your heads with frequent applications of your unguicules. In the school of Pythagoras, taciturnity was the symbol of abstracted and superlative knowledge; and the silence of the Egyptians was agnized as an expressive manner of divine adoration: this caused the pontiffs of Hierapolis to sacrifice to the great deity in silence, impercussively, without any vociferous or obstreperous sound. My design is not to enter into a privation of gratitude towards you; but by a vivacious formality, though matter were too abstract itself from me, excentricate to you my cogitations.

Having spoken this, she only said to her officers, Tabachins, A panacea; and strait they desired us not to take it amiss, if the queen did not invite us to dine with her; for she never eat anything at dinner but some categories, jecabots, emnins, dimions, abstractions, harborins, chelemins, second intenticns, carradoths, antitheses, metempsychoses, transcendent prolepsies, and such other light food.

Then they took us into a little closet, lined through with alarums, where we were treated God knows how. It is said that Jupiter writes whatever is transacted in the world, on the dipthera or skin of the Amalthæan goat that suckled him in Crete, which pelt served him instead of a shield against the Titans, whence he was nicknamed Ægiochos. Now as I hate to drink water, brother toppers, I protest it would be impossible to make eighteen goat-skins hold the description of all the good meat they brought before us; though it were written in characters as small as those in which were penned Homer's Iliads, which Tully tells us he saw enclosed in a nutshell.

For my part, had I one hundred mouths, as many tongues, a voice of iron, a heart of oak, and lungs of leather, together with the mellifluous abundance of Plato; yet I never could give you a full account of a third part of a second of the whole.

Pantagruel was telling me, that he believed the queen had given the symbolic word used among her subjects, to denote sovereign good cheer, when she said to her tabachins, A panacea; just as Lucullus used to say, In Apollo, when he designed to give his friends a singular treat; though sometimes they took him at unawares, as, among the rest, Cicero and Hortensius sometimes used to do.

CHAPTER XXI.

How the Queen passed her time after dinner.

WHEN we had dined, a chachanin led us into the queen's hall, and there we saw how, after dinner, with the ladies and princes of her court, she used to sift, searse, boult, range, and pass away time with a fine large white and blue silk sieve. We also perceived how they revived ancient sports, diverting themselves together at

- And a thousand other dances.

Afterwards she gave orders that they should show us the apartments and curiosities in her palace; accordingly we saw there such new, strange, and wonderful things, that I am still ravished in admiration every time I think on it. However, nothing surprised us more than what was done by the gentlemen of her household, abstractors, parazons, nebidins, spodizators, and others, who freely and without the least dissembling, told us that the queen their mistréss did all impossible things, and cured men of incurable diseases; and they, her officers, used to do the rest.

I saw there a young parazon cure many of the new consumption, I mean the pox, though they were never so peppered: had it been the rankest Roan ague (Anglicé, the Covent-garden gout), it was all one with him; touching only their dentiform vertebræ thrice with a piece of a wooden shoe, he made them as wholesome as so many sucking pigs.

Another did thoroughly cure folks of dropsies, tympanies, ascites, and hyposarcides, striking them on the belly nine times with a Tenedian hatchet, without any solution of the continuum.

Another cured all manners of fevers and agues on the spot, only with hanging a fox tail on the left side of the patient's girdle.

One removed the tooth-ache only with washing thrice the root of the aching tooth with elder-vinegar, and letting it dry half-an-hour in the sun.

Another the gout, whether hot or cold, natural or accidental, by barely making the gouty person shut his mouth, and open his eyes.

I saw another ease nine gentlemen of St. Francis distemper, in a very short space of time, having clapped a rope about their neeks, at the end of which hung a box with ten thousand gold crowns in it.

One with a wonderful engine, threw the houses out at the windows, by which means they were purged of all pestilential air.

Another cured all the three kinds of heeties, the tabid, atrophes, and emaciated, without bathing, without Tabian milk, dropax, alias depilatory, or other such medicaments; only turning the consumptive for three months into monks; and he assured me that if they did not grow fat and plump in a monastie way of living, they never would be fattened in this world, either by nature, or by art.

I saw another surrounded with a crowd of two sorts of women. Some were young, quaint, clever, neat, pretty, juicy, tight, brisk, buxom, proper, kind-hearted, and as right as my leg, to any man's thinking. The rest were old, weather-beaten, over-ridden, toothless, blear-eyed, tough, wrinkled, shrivelled, tawny, mouldy, phthisieky, deerepit hags, beldams, and walking careases. We were told that this office was to cast anew those she-pieces of antiquity, and make them such as the pretty creatures whom we saw, who had been made young again that day, recovering at once the beauty, shape, size, and disposition, which they enjoyed at sixteen; except their heels, that were now much shorter than in their former youth.

This made them yet more apt to fall backwards, whenever any man happened to touch them, than they had been before. As for their counterparts, the old mother-scratch-lobies, they most devoutly waited for the blessed hour, when the batch that was in the oven was to be drawn, that they might have their turns, and in a mighty haste they were pulling and hauling the man like mad, telling him, that it is the most grievous and intolerable thing in nature for the tail to be on fire, and the head to scare away those who should queneh it.

The officer had his hands full, never wanting patients; neither did his place bring him in little, you may swear. Pantagruel asked him whether he could also make old men young again? He said he could not. But the way to make them new men, was to get them to cohabit with a new-east female: for thus they caught that fifth kind of erinekams, which some call pellade, in Greek, ὀφλασις, that makes them east off their old hair and skin, just as the serpents do; and thus their youth is renewed like the Arabian phoenix's. This is the true fountain of youth, for there the old and deerepit become young, active, and lusty.

Just so, as Euripides tells us, Iolaus was transmogrified; and thus Phaon, for whom kind-hearted Sappho ran wild, grew young again for Venus's use; so Tithon by Aurora's means; so Æson by Medæa, and Jason also, who, if you will believe Pherecides and Simonides, was new-vamped and dy'd by that witch: and so were the nurses of jolly Bacchus, and their husbands, as Æschylus relates.

CHAPTER XXII.

How Queen Whim's officers were employed: and how the said lady retained us among her abstractors.

I THEN saw a great number of the queen's officers, who made black-a-moors white, as fast as hops, just rubbing their bellies with the bottom of a pannier.

Others, with three couples of foxes in one yoke, ploughed a sandy shore, and did not lose their seed.

Others washed burnt tiles, and made them lose their colour.

Others extracted water out of pumice-stones; braying them a good while in a mortar, and changed their substance.

Others sheared asses, and thus got long fleece wool.

Others gathered off of thorns grapes, and figs off of thistles.

Others stroked he-goats by the dugs, and saved their milk in a sieve; and much they got by it.

Others washed asses' heads, without losing their soap.

Others taught cows to dance, and did not lose their fiddling.

Others pitched nets to catch the wind, and took cocklobsters in them.

I saw a spodizator, who very artificially got farts out of a dead ass, and sold them for five pence an ell.

Another did putrify beetles. O the dainty food!

Poor Pannrge fairly cast up his accounts, and gave up his halfpenny (i.e. vomited), seeing an archasdarpenin, who laid a huge plenty of chamberlye to putrify in horse-dung, mis-mashed with abundance of christian sir-reverence. Pugh, fie upon him, nasty dog! However, he told us, that with this sacred distillation he watered kings and princes, and made their sweet lives a fathom or two the longer.

Others built churches to jump over the steeples.

Others set carts before the horses, and began to flay eels at the tail; neither did the eels cry before they were hurt, like those of Melun.

Others out of nothing made great things, and made great things return to nothing.

Others cut fire into steaks, with a knife, and drew water with a fish net.

Others made chalk of cheese, and honey of a dog's t—d.

We saw a knot of others, about a baker's dozen in number, tipping under an arbour. They topped out of jolly bottomless cups, four sorts of cool, sparkling, pure, delicious, vine-tree syrup which went down like mother's milk; and healths and bumpers flew about like lightning. We were told, that these true philosophers were fairly multiplying the stars by drinking till the seven were fourteen, as brawny Hercules did with Atlas.

Others made a virtue of necessity, and the best of a bad market, which seemed to me a very good piece of work.

Others made alchymy with their teeth, and clapping their hind retort to the recipient, made scurvy faces, and then squeezed.

Others in a large grass plat, exactly measured how far the fleas could go at a hop, a step, and a jump; and told us that this was exceedingly useful for the ruling of kingdoms, the conduct of armies, and the administration of commonwealths; and that Socrates, who first got philosophy out of heaven, and from idle and trifling, made it profitable and of moment, used to spend half his philosophizing time in measuring the leaps of fleas, as Aristophanes, the quintessential, affirms.

I saw two gibröins by themselves, keeping watch on the top of a tower, and we were told, they guarded the moon from the wolves.

In a blind corner, I met four more very hot at it, and ready to go to loggerheads. I asked what was the cause of the stir and ado, the mighty coil and pother they made? And I heard that for four or five livelong days, those overwise roisters had been at it ding dong, disputing on three high, more than metaphysical propositions, promising themselves mountains of gold by solving them: the first was concerning a he-ass's shadow; the second, of the smoke of a lantern; and the third, of goat's hair, whether it were wool or no? We heard that they did not think it a bit strange, that two contradictions in mode, form, figure, and time, should be true. Though I will warrant the sophists of Paris had rather be unchristened than own so much.

While we were admiring all those men's wonderful doings, the evening star already twinkling; the queen (God bless her) appeared, attended with her court, and again amazed and dazzled us. She perceived it, and said to us:

What occasions the aberrations of human cogitations through the perplexing labyrinths and abysses of admiration, is not the source of the effects, which sagacious mortals visibly experience to be the consequential result of natural causes: it is the novelty of the experiment which makes impressions on their conceptive, cogitative faculties; that do not prewise the faecility of the operation adequately, with a subaet and sedate intelleetion, assoeiated with diligent and congruous study. Consequently let all manner of perturbation abdicate the ventrieles of your brains, if any one has invaded them while they were contemplating what is transacted by my domestie ministers. Be speetators and auditors of every partieular phenomenon, and every individual proposition, within the extent of my mansion; satiate yourselves with all that can fall here under the consideration of your visual or aseulating powers, and thus emancipate yourselves from the servitude of crassous ignoranee. And that you may be indued to apprehend how sincerely I desire this in consideration of the studious cupidity that so demonstratively emieates at your external organs, from this present partiele of time, I retain you as my abstractors; Geber, my priniepal talaehin, shall register and initiate you at your departing.

We humbly thanked her queenship, without saying a word, accepting of the noble office she conferred on us.

CHAPTER XXIII.

How the Queen was served at dinner, and of her way of eating.

QUEEN WHIMS, after this, said to her gentlemen: The orifice of the ventricle; that ordinary embassador for the alimentation of all members, whether superior or inferior, importunes us to restore, by the apposition of idoneous sustenance, what was dissipated by the internal calidity's action on the radieal humidity. Therefore spodizators, gesinins, memains, and parazons, be not culpable of dilatory protraetions in the apposition of every re-roborating species, but rather let them pullulate and superabound on the tables. As for you, noblissim prægustators, and my gentilissim masticators, your frequently experimented industry, internected with perdiligent sedulity, and sedulous perdiligence, continually adjuvates you to perii-eciate all things in so expeditious a manner, that there is a necessity of exeiting in you a eupidity to consummate them. Therefore I can only suggest to you still to operate, as you are assuefaeted indefatigably to operate.

Having made this fine speech, she retired for a while with part of her women, and we were told that it was to bathe, as the ancients did more commonly than we use now-a-days to wash our hands before we eat. The tables were soon placed, the cloth spread, and then the queen sat down. She eat nothing but celestial ambrosia, and drank nothing but divine nectar. As for the lords and ladies that were there, they as well as we, fared on as rare, costly, and dainty dishes, as ever Apicius wot or dreamed of in his life.

When we were as round as hoops, and as full as eggs, with stuffing the gut, an olla podrida was set before us, to force hunger to come to terms with us, in case it had not granted us a truce; and such a huge vast thing it was, that the golden platter which Pythius Althius gave King Darius, would hardly have covered it. The olla consisted of several sorts of pottages, salads, fricasees, saugrenees, cabirotaoes, roast and boiled meat, carbonadoes, swinging pieces of powdered beef, good old hams; dainty deifical somates, cakes, tarts, a world of curds after the moorish way, fresh cheese, jellies, and fruit of all sorts. All this seemed to me good and dainty: however the sight of it made me sigh; for alas, I could not taste a bit of it; so full I had filled my puddings before, and a bellyful is a bellyful you know. Yet I must tell you what I saw, that seemed to me odd enough of conscience: it was some pasties in paste; and what should those pasties in paste be, do you think, but pasties in pots? At the bottom I perceived store of dice, cards, tarots, luettes, chess-men and chequers, besides, full bowls of gold crowns, for those who have a mind to have a game or two, and try their chance. Under this I saw a jolly company of mules in stately trappings, with velvet foot-cloths, and a troop of ambling nags, some for men and some for women; besides I do not know how many litters all lined with velvet, and some coaches of Ferrara make: all this for those who had a mind to take the air.

This did not seem strange to me: but if anything did, it was certainly the queen's way of eating; and truly it was very new, and very odd: for she chewed nothing the good lady; not but that she had good sound teeth, and her meat required to be masticated; but such was her highness's custom. When her prægustators had tasted the meat, her masticators took it and chewed it most nobly: for their dainty chops and gullets were lined through with crimson satin, with little welts, and gold purls, and their teeth were of delicate white ivory. Thus, when they had chewed the meat ready for her highness's maw, they poured it down her throat through a funnel of fine gold, and so on to her craw. For that reason, they told us, she never visited a close stool but by proxy.

CHAPTER XXIV.

How there was a ball in the manner of a tournament, at which Queen Whims was present.

AFTER supper there was a ball in the form of a tilt or a tournament, not only worth seeing, but also never to be forgotten. First, the floor of the hall was covered with a large piece of velveted white and yellow chequered tapestry, each chequer exactly square, and three full spans in breadth.

Then thirty-two young persons came into the hall; sixteen of them arrayed in cloth of gold; and of these, eight were young nymphs, such as the ancients described Diana's attendants: the other eight were a king a queen, two wardens of the castle, two knights, and two archers. Those of the other band were clad in cloth of silver.

They posted themselves on the tapestry in the following manner: the kings on the last line of the fourth square: so that the golden king was on a white square, and the silvered king on a yellow square, and each queen by her king; the golden queen on a yellow square, and the silvered queen on a white one: and on each side stood the archers to guide their kings and queens; by the archers the knights, and the wardens by them. In the next row before them stood the eight nymphs; and between the two bands of nymphs four rows of squares stood empty.

Each band had its musicians, eight on each side, dressed in its livery; the one with orange-coloured damask, the other with white; and all played on different instruments most melodiously and harmoniously, still varying in time and measure as the figure of the dance required. This seemed to me an admirable thing, considering the numerous diversity of steps, back-steps, bounds, rebounds, jerks, paces, leaps, skips, turns, coupés, hops, leadings, risings, meetings, flights, ambuscadoes, moves, and removes.

I was also at a loss, when I strove to comprehend how the dancers could so suddenly know what every different note meant: for they no sooner heard this or that sound, but they placed themselves in the place which was denoted by the music, though their motions were all different. For the nymphs that stood in the first file, as if they designed to begin the fight, marched straight forwards to their enemies from square to square, unless it were the first step, at which they were free to move over the two steps at once. They alone never fall back, (which is not very natural to other nymphs) and if any of them is so lucky as to advance to the opposite king's row, she is immediately crowned queen of her king, and after that, moves with the same state, and in the same manner as the queen; but till that happens, they never strike their enemies but forwards, and obliquely in a diagonal line. However, they make it not their chief business to take their foes; for if they did, they would leave their queen exposed to the adverse parties, who then might take her.

The kings move and take their enemies on all sides square-ways, and only step from a white square into a yellow one, and vice versâ, except at their first step the rank should want other officers than the wardens; for then they can set them in their place, and retire by him.

The queens take a greater liberty than any of the rest; for they move backwards and forwards all manner of ways, in a straight line, as far as they please, provided the place be not filled with one of their own party, and diagonally also, keeping to the colour on which they stand.

The archers move backwards or forwards, far and near, never changing the colour on which they stand. The knights move, and take in a lineal manner, stepping over one square, though a friend or foe stand upon it, posting themselves on the second square to the right or left, from one colour to another, which is very unwelcome to the adverse party, and ought to be carefully observed, for they take at unawares.

The wardens move, and take to the right or left, before or behind them, like the kings, and can advance as far as they find places empty; which liberty the kings take not.

The law which both sides observe, is, at the end of the fight, to besiege and enclose the king of either party, so that he may not be able to move; and being reduced to that extremity, the battle is over, and he loses the day.

Now, to avoid this, there is none of either sex of each party, but is willing to sacrifice his or her life, and they begin to take one another on all sides in time, as soon as the music strikes up. When any one takes a prisoner, he makes his honours, and striking him gently in the hand, puts him out of the field and combat, and encamps where he stood.

If one of the kings chance to stand where he might be taken, it is not lawful for any of his adversaries that had discovered him, to lay hold on him: far from it, they are strictly enjoined humbly to pay him their respects, and give him notice, saying, God preserve you, sir! that his officers may relieve and cover him, or he may remove, if unhappily he could not be relieved. However, he is not to be taken, but greeted with a Good-morrow, the others bending the knee: and thus the tournament uses to end.

CHAPTER XXV.

How the thirty-two persons at the ball fought.

THE two companies having taken their stations, the music struck up, and, with a martial sound, which had something of horrid in it, like a point of war, roused and alarmed both parties, who now began to shiver, and then soon were warmed with warlike rage; and having got in readiness to fight desperately, impatient of delay, stood waiting for the charge.

Then the music of the silvered band ceased playing, and the instruments of the golden side alone were heard, which denoted that the golden party attacked. Accordingly, a new movement was played for the onset, and we saw the nymph, who stood before the queen, turn to the left towards her king, as it were to ask leave to fight: and thus saluting her company at the same time, she moved two squares forwards, and saluted the adverse party.

Now the music of the golden brigade ceased playing, and their antagonists began again. I ought to have told you that the nymph, who began by saluting her company, had by that formality also given them to understand that they were to fall on. She was saluted by them, in the same manner, with a full turn to the left, except the queen, who went aside towards her king to the right; and the same manner of salutation was observed on both sides during the whole ball.

The silvered nymph that stood before her queen likewise moved, as soon as the music of her party sounded a charge; her salutations, and those of her side, were to the right, and her queen's to the left. She moved in the second square forwards, and saluted her antagonists, facing the first golden nymph: so that there was not any distance between them, and you would have thought they two had been going to fight; but they only strike sideways.

Their comrades, whether silvered or golden, followed them in an intercalary figure, and seemed to skirmish a while, till the golden nymph, who had first entered the lists, striking a silvered nymph in the hand on the right, put her out of the field, and set herself in her place. But soon the music playing a new measure, she was struck by a silvered archer, who after that was obliged himself to retire. A silvered knight then sallied out, and the golden queen posted herself before her king.

Then the silvered king, dreading the golden queen's fury, removed to the right, to the place where his warden stood, which seemed to him strong and well guarded.

The two knights on the left, whether golden or silvered, marched up, and on either side, took up many nymphs, who could not retreat; principally the golden knight, who made this his whole business; but the silvered knight had greater designs, dissembling all along, and even sometimes not taking a nymph when he could have done it, still moving on till he was come up to the main body of the enemies, in such a manner, that he saluted their king with a God save you, sir!

The whole golden brigade quaked for fear and anger, those words giving notice of their king's danger; not but that they could soon relieve him, but because their king being thus saluted, they were to lose their warden on the right wing, without any hopes of a recovery. Then the golden king retired to the left, and the silver knight took the golden warden, which was a mighty loss to that party. However, they resolved to be revenged, and surrounded the knight that he might not escape. He tried to get off, behaving himself with a great deal of gallantry, and his friends did what they could to save him; but at last he fell into the golden queen's hands, and was carried off.

Her forces not yet satisfied, having lost one of her best men, with more fury than conduct, moved about, and did much mischief among their enemies. The silvered party warily dissembled, watching their opportunity to be even with them, and presented one of their nymphs to the golden queen, having laid an ambuscado; so that the nymph being taken, a golden archer had like to have seized the silvered queen. Then the golden knight undertakes to take the silvered king and queen, and says, Good-morrow. Then the silvered archer salutes them, and was taken by a golden nymph, and she herself by a silvered one.

The fight was obstinate and sharp. The wardens left their posts and advanced to relieve their friends. The battle was doubtful, and victory hovered over both armies. Now the silvered host charge and break through their enemy's ranks, as far as the golden king's tent, and now they are beaten back: the golden queen distinguishes herself from the rest by her mighty achievements, still more than by her garb and dignity; for at once she takes an archer, and going sideways, seizes a silvered warden. Which thing the silvered queen perceiving, she came forwards, and rushing on with equal bravery, takes the last golden warden, and some nymphs. The two queens fought a long while hand to hand; now striving to take each other by surprise, then to save themselves, and sometimes to guard their kings. Finally, the golden queen took the silvered queen; but presently after she herself was taken by the silvered archer.

Then the silvered king had only three nymphs, an archer, and a warden left, and the golden only three nymphs and the right knight, which made them fight more slowly and warily than before. The two kings seemed to mourn for the loss of their loving queens, and only studied and endeavoured to get new ones out of all their nymphs, to be raised to that dignity, and thus be married to them. This made them excite those brave nymphs to strive to reach the farthest rank, where stood the king of the contrary party, promising them certainly to have them crowned if they could do this. The golden nymphs were beforehand with the others, and out of their number was created a queen, who was dressed in royal robes, and had a crown set on her head. You need not doubt the silvered nymphs made also what haste they could to be queens: one of them was within a step of the coronation place; but there the golden knight lay ready to intercept her, so that she could go no further.

The new golden queen, resolved to show herself valiant, and worthy of her advancement to the crown, achieved great feats of arms. But, in the mean time, the silvered knight takes the golden warden who guarded the camp: and thus there was a new silvered queen, who, like the other, strove to excel in heroic deeds at the beginning of her reign. Thus the fight grew hotter than before. A thousand stratagems, charges, rallyings, retreats, and attacks, were tried on both sides; till at last the silvered queen, having by stealth advanced as far as the golden king's tent, cried, God save you, sir! Now none but his new queen could relieve him: so she bravely came and exposed herself to the utmost extremity to deliver him out of it. Then the silvered warden, with his queen, reduced the golden king to such a stress, that, to save himself, he was forced to lose his queen: but the golden king took him at last. However, the rest of the golden party were soon taken; and that king being left alone, the silvered party made him a low bow, crying, Good-morrow, sir! which denoted that the silvered king had got the day.

This being heard, the music of both parties loudly proclaimed the victory. And thus the first battle ended to the unspeakable joy of all the spectators.

After this the two brigades took their former stations, and began to tilt a second time, much as they had done before, only the music played somewhat faster than at the first battle, and the motions were altogether different. I saw the golden queen sally out one of the first, with an archer and a knight, as it were angry at the former defeat, and she had like to have fallen upon the silvered king in his tent among his officers; but having been baulked in her attempt, she skirmished briskly and overthrew so many silvered nymphs and officers, that it was a most amazing sight. You would have sworn she had been another Penthesilea; for she behaved herself with as much bravery as that Amazonian queen did at Troy.

But this havoc did not last long; for the silvered party, exasperated by their loss, resolved to perish, or stop her progress: and having posted an archer in ambuscado, on a distant angle, together with a knight-errant, her highness fell into their hands, and was carried out of the field. The rest were soon routed after the taking of their queen, who, without doubt, from that time resolved to be more wary, and keep near her king, without venturing so far amidst her enemies, unless with more force to defend her. Thus the silver brigade once more got the victory.

This did not dishearten or deject the golden party: far from it, they soon appeared again in the field to face their enemies: and being posted as before, both the armies seemed more resolute and cheerful than ever. Now the martial concert began, and the music was above a hemiote the quicker, according to the warlike Phrygian mode, such as was invented by Marsyas.

Then our combatants began to wheel about, and charge with such a swiftness, that in an instant they made four moves, besides the usual salutations. So that they were continually in action, flying, hovering, jumping, vaulting, curvetting, with petauristical turns and motions, and often intermingled.

Seeing them then turn about on one foot after they had made their honours, we compared them to your tops or gigs, such as boys use to whip about; making them turn round so swiftly, that they sleep, as they call it, and motion cannot be perceived, but resembles rest, its contrary: so that if you make a point or mark on some part of one of those gigs, it will be perceived not as a point, but a continual line in a most divine manner, as Cusanus has wisely observed.

While they were thus warmly engaged, we heard continually the claps and epismapsies, which those of the two bands reiterated at the taking of their enemies; and this, joined to the variety of their notions and music, would have forced smiles out of the most severe Cato, the never-laughing Crassus, the Athenian man-hater, Timon: nay, even whining Heraclitus, though he abhorred laughing, the action that is most peculiar to man. For who could have forbore? seeing those young warriors, with their nymphs and queens, so briskly and gracefully advance, retire, jump, leap, skip, spring, fly, vault, caper, move to the right, to the left, every way still in time, so swiftly, and yet so dexterously, that they never touched one another but methodically.

As the number of the combatants lessened, the pleasure of the spectators increased; for the stratagems and motions of the remaining forces were more singular. I shall only add, that this pleasing entertainment charmed us to such a degree, that our minds were ravished with admiration and delight; and the marshal harmony moved our souls so powerfully, that we easily believed what is said of Ismenias's having excited Alexander to rise from table and run to his arms, with such a warlike melody. At last the golden king remained master of the field: and while we were minding those dancers, Queen Whims vanished, so that we saw her no more from that day to this.

Then Geber's michelots conducted us, and we were set down among her abstractors, as her queenship had commanded. After that we returned to the port of Mateotechny, and thence straight aboard our ships: for the wind was fair, and had we not hoisted out of hand, we could hardly have got off in three-quarters of a moon in the wane.

CHAPTER XXVI.

How we came to the Island of Odes, where the ways go up and down.

WE sailed before the wind, between a pair of courses, and in two days made the island of Odes, at which place we saw a very strange thing. The ways there are animals; so true is Aristotle's saying, that all self-moving things are animals. Now the ways walk there. Ergo, they are then animals. Some of them are strange unknown ways, like those of the planets! others are highways, crossways, and bye-ways. I perceived that the travellers and inhabitants of that country asked—Whither does this way go? Whither does that way go? Some answered, between Midy and Fevrolles, to the parish church, to the city, to the river, and so forth. Being thus in their right way, they used to reach their journey's end without any further trouble, just like those who go by water from Lyons to Avignon or Arles.

Now, as you know that nothing is perfect here below, we heard there was a sort of people whom they called highway-men, way-beaters, and makers of inroads in roads; and that the poor ways were sadly afraid of them, and shunned them as you do robbers. For these used to waylay them, as people lay trains for wolves, and set gins for woodcocks. I saw one who was taken up with a lord chief justice's warrant, for having unjustly, and in spite of Pallas, taken the school-way, which is the longest. Another boasted that he had fairly taken the shortest, and that doing so, he first compassed his design. Thus, Carpalim, meeting once Epistemon looking upon a wall with his fiddle-diddle, or live urinal, in his hand, to make a little maid's water, cried, that he did not wonder now how the other came to be still the first at Pantagruel's levee, since he held his shortest and least used.

I found Bourges highway among these. It went with the deliberation of an abbot, but was made to scamper at the approach of some waggons, who threatened to have it trampled under their horses' feet, and make their waggons run over it, as Tullia's chariot did over her father's body.

I also espied there the old way between Peronne and St. Quentin, which seemed to me a very good, honest, plain way, as smooth as a carpet, and as good as ever was trod upon by shoe of leather.

Among the rocks I knew again the good old way to la Ferrare, mounted on a huge bear. This at a distance would have put me in mind of St. Jerome's picture, had but the bear been a lion; for the poor way was all mortified, and wore a long hoary beard uncombed and entangled, which looked like the picture of winter, or at least like a whitefrosted bush.

On that way were store of beads or rosaries, coarsely made of wild pine-tree; and it seemed kneeling, not standing, nor lying flat: but its sides and middle were beaten with huge stones, insomuch that it proved to us at once an object of fear and pity.

While we were examining it, a runner, bachelor of the place, took us aside, and showing us a white smooth way, somewhat filled with straw, said, Henceforth, gentlemen, do not reject the opinion of Thales the Milesian, who said that water is the beginning of all things; nor that of Homer, who tells us that all things derive their original from the ocean: for this same way which you see here had its beginning from water, and is to return whence she came, before two months come to an end; now carts are driven here where boats used to be rowed.

Truly, said Pantagruel, you tell us no news; we see five hundred such changes, and more, every year, in our world. Then reflecting on the different manner of going of those moving ways, he told us he believed that Philolaus and Aristarchus had philosophized in this island, and that Seleucus, indeed, was of opinion, the earth turns round about its poles, and not the heavens, whatever we may think to the contrary: As, when we are on the river Loire, we think the trees and the shore moves, though this is only an effect of our boat's motion.

As we went back to our ships, we saw three waylayers, who, having been taken in ambuscado, were going to be broken on the wheel; and a huge fornicator was burned with a lingering fire, for beating away and breaking one of its sides: we were told it was the way of the banks of the Nile in Egypt.

CHAPTER XXVII.

How we came to the Island of Sandals; and of the order of Semiquaver Friars.

THENCE we went to the islands of Sandals, whose inhabitants live on nothing but ling-broth. However, we were very kindly received and entertained by Benius the Third, King of the island, who, after he had made us drink, took us with him to show us a spick-and-span new monastery, which he had contrived for the Semiquaver Friars; so he called the religious men whom he had there. For he said that, on the other side of the water lived friars who styled themselves her sweet ladyship's most humble servants. Item, the goodly Friar-minors, who are semibreves of bulls: the smoked-herring tribe of Minim Friars; then the Crotchet Friars. So that these diminutives could be no more than Semiquavers. By the statutes, bulls, and patents of Queen Whims, they were all dressed like so many house-burners, except that, as in Anjou your tilers used to quilt their knees when they tile houses, so these holy friars had usually quilted bellies, and thick quilted paunches were among them in much repute. Their cod-pieces were cut slipper-fashion, and every monk among them wore two—one sewed before and another behind—reporting that some certain dreadful mysteries were duly represented by this duplicity of cod-pieces.

They wore shoes as round as basons, in imitation of those who inhabit the sandy sea. Their chins were close shaved, and their feet iron-shod: and to show they did not value fortune, Benius made them shave and poll the hind part of their poles, as bare as a bird's arse, from the crown to the shoulder-blades; but they had leave to let their hair grow before, from the two triangular bones in the upper part of the skull.

Thus did they not value fortune a button, and cared no more for the goods of this world than you or I do for hanging. And to show how much they defied that blind jilt, all of them wore, not in their hands like her, but at their waist, instead of beads, sharp razors, which they used to new grind twice a-day, and set thrice a night.

Each of them had a round ball on their feet, because Fortune is said to have one under hers.

The flap of their cowls hanged forward, and not backwards, like those of others; thus, none could see their noses, and they laughed without fear both at fortune and the fortunate; neither more nor less than our ladies laugh at bare-faced trulls, when they have those mufflers on, which they call masks, and which were formerly much more properly called charity, because they cover a multitude of sins.

The hind part of their faces was always uncovered, as are our faces, which made them either go with the belly or the arse foremost, which they pleased. When their hind face went forward, you would have sworn this had been their natural gait, as well on account of their round shoes as of the double cod-piece, and their face behind, which was as bare as the back of my hand, and coarsely daubed over with two eyes and a mouth, such as you see on some Indian nuts. Now, if they offered to waddle along with their bellies forwards, you would have then thought they were playing at blindman's buff. May I never be hanged if it was not a comical sight.

Their way of living was thus. About owl-light they charitably began to boot and spur one another; this being done, the least thing they did was to sleep and snore; and thus sleeping, they had barnacles on the handles of their faces, or spectacles at most.

You may swear we did not a little wonder at this odd fancy: but they satisfied us presently, telling us that the day of judgment is to take mankind napping; therefore, to show they did not refuse to make their personal appearance, as fortune's darlings used to do, they were always thus booted and spurred, ready to mount whenever the trumpet should sound.

At noon, as soon as the clock struck, they used to awake. You must know that their clock-bell, church-bells, and refectuary-bells, were all made according to the pontial device, that is, quilted with the finest down, and their clappers of fox-tails.

Having then make shift to get up at noon, they pulled off their boots, and those that wanted to speak with a maid, alias piss, pissed; those that wanted to scumber, scumbered; and those that wanted to sneeze, sneezed. But all, whether they would or no (poor gentlemen!), were obliged largely and plentifully to yawn; and this was their first breakfast (O rigorous statute!) Methought it was very comical to observe their transactions; for, having laid their boots and spurs on a rack, they went into the cloisters; there they curiously washed their hands and mouths, then sat them down on a long bench, and picked their teeth till the provost gave the signal, whistling through his fingers; then every he stretched out his jaws as much as he could, and they gaped and yawned for about half an hour, sometimes more, sometimes less, according as the prior judged the breakfast to be suitable to the day.

After that they went in procession, two banners being carried before them, in one of which was the picture of Virtue, and that of Fortune in the other. The last went before, carried by a semiquavering-friar, at whose heels was another, with the shadow or image of Virtue in one hand, and an holy-water-sprinkle in the other; I mean of that holy mercurial-water, which Ovid describes in his Fasti. And as the preceding Semiquaver rang a hand-bell, this shook the sprinkle with his fist. With that, says Pantagrue, This order contradicts the rule which Tully and the academics prescribed, that Virtue ought to go before, and Fortune follow. But they told us they did as they ought, seeing their design was to breech, lash, and bethwack Fortune.

During the processions, they trilled and quavered most melodiously betwixt their teeth, I do not know what antiphonies, or chauntings, by turns: for my part, it was all Hebrew-Greek to me, the devil a word I could pick out of it; at last, pricking my ears, and intensely listening, I perceived they only sang with the tip of theirs. Oh, what a rare harmony it was! How well it was tuned to the sound of their bells! You will never find those to jar, that you will not. Pantagrue made a notable observation upon the processions: For, says he, have you seen and observed the policy of these Semiquavers? To make an end of their procession, they went out at one of their church doors and came in at the other; they took a deal of care not to come in at the place whereat they went out. On my honour, these are a subtle sort of people, quoth Panurge; they have as much wit as three folks, two fools and a madman; they are as wise as the calf that ran nine miles to suck a bull, and when he came there it was a steer. This subtilty and wisdom of theirs, cried Friar John, is borrowed from the occult philosophy: may I be gutted like an oyster if I can tell what to make of it. Then the more it is to be feared, said Pantagrue; for subtilty suspected, subtilty foreseen, subtilty found out, loses the essence and very name of subtilty, and only gains that of blockishness. They are not such fools as you take them to be; they have more tricks than are good, I doubt.

After the procession they went sluggingly into the frater room, by the way of walk and healthful exercise, and there knecled under the tables, leaning their breasts on lanterns. While they were in that posture, in came a huge Sandal, with a pitchfork in his hand, who used to baste, rib-roast, swaddle, and swinge them well favouredly, as they said, and in truth treated them after a fashion. They began their meal as you end yours—with cheese, and ended it with mustard and lettuce, as Martial tells us the ancients did. Afterwards, a platter full of mustard was brought before every one of them, and thus they made good the proverb—after meat comes mustard.

Their diet was this.

On Sundays they stuffed their puddings with puddings, chitterlings, links, Bologna sausages, forced-meats, liverings, hogs'-haslets, young quails, and teals: you must also always add cheese for the first course, and mustard for the last.

On Mondays they were crammed with pease and pork, cum commento, and interlineary glosses.

On Tuesdays they used to twist store of holy-bread, cakes, buns, puffs, lenten loaves, jumbals, and biscuits.

On Wednesdays my gentlemen had fine sheep's-heads, calves'-heads, and brocks'-heads, of which there is no want in that country.

On Thursdays they guzzled down seven sorts of porridge, not forgetting mustard.

On Fridays they munched nothing but services or sorb-apples; neither were these full ripe, as I guessed by their complexion.

On Saturdays they gnawed bones; not that they were poor or needy, for every mother's son of them had a very good fat belly-benefice.

As for their drink, it was an antifortunal; thus they called I do not know what sort of a liquor of the place.

When they wanted to eat or drink, they turned down the back-points or flaps of their cowls forwards, below their chins, and that served them instead of gorgets or slabbering-bibs.

When they had well dined, they prayed rarely all in quavers and shakes; and the rest of the day, expecting the day of judgment, they were taken up with acts of charity, and particularly

On Sundays rubbers at cuffs.

On Mondays, lending each other firts and fillips on the nose.

On Tuesdays, clapperlawing one another.

On Wednesdays, smiting and fly-flapping.

On Thursdays, worming and pumping.

On Fridays tickling.

On Saturdays, jirking and firking one another.

Such was their diet when they resided in the convent, and if the prior of the monk-house sent any of them abroad, then they were strictly enjoined neither to touch nor eat any manner of fish, as long as they were on sea or rivers, and to abstain from all manner of flesh whenever they were at land; that everyone might be convinced that, while they enjoyed the object, they denied themselves the power, and even the desire, and were no more moved with it than the Marpesian rock.

All this was done with proper antiphones, still sung and chaunted by ear, as we have already observed.

When the sun went to bed, they fairly booted and spurred each other as before, and having elapped on their barnacles, even jogged to bed too. At midnight the Sandal came to them, and up they got, and having well wetted and set their razors, and been a proessioning, they elapped the tables over themselves, and like wire-drawers under their work, fell to it as aforesaid.

Friar John des Entoumeures, having shrewdly observed these jolly Semiquaver Friars, and had full account of their statutes, lost all patience, and cried out aloud—Bounce tail, and God have mercy guts; if every fool should wear a bauble, fuel would be dear. A plague rot it, we must know how many farts go to an ounce. Would Priapus were here, as he used to be at the nocturnal festivals in Crete, that I might see him play backwards, and wriggle and shake to the purpose. Ay, ay, this is the world, and that other is the country; may I never piss if this be not an antiehtonian land, and our very antipodes. In Germany they pull down monasteries and unfroekify the monks; here they go quite kaim, and act clean contrary to others, setting new ones up, against the hair.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

How Panurge asked a Semiquaver Friar many questions, and was only answered in monosyllables.

PANURGE, who had since been wholly taken up with staring at these royal Semiquavers, at last pulled one of them by the sleeve, who was as lean as a rake, and asked him,— Hearkee me, Friar Quaver, Semiquaver, Demisemiquavering quaver, where is the punk!

The Friar, pointing downwards, answered, There.

PAN. Pray, have you many? FRI. Few.

PAN. How many scores have you? FRI. One.

PAN. How many would you have? FRI. Five.

PAN. Where do you hide them? FRI. Here.

PAN. I suppose they are not all of one age; but, pray, how is their shape? FRI. Straight.

- PAN. Their complexion? FRI. Clear.
PAN. Their hair? FRI. Fair.
PAN. Their eyes? FRI. Black.
PAN. Their features? FRI. Good.
PAN. Their brows? FRI. Soft.
PAN. Their graces? FRI. Ripe.
PAN. Their looks? FRI. Free.
PAN. Their feet? FRI. Flat.
PAN. Their heels? FRI. Short.
PAN. Their lower parts? FRI. Rare.
PAN. And their arms? FRI. Long.
PAN. What do they wear on their hands? FRI. Gloves.
PAN. What sort of rings on their fingers? FRI. Gold.
PAN. What rigging do you keep them in? FRI. Cloth.
PAN. What sort of cloth is it? FRI. New.
PAN. What colour? FRI. Sky.
PAN. What kind of cloth is it? FRI. Fine.
PAN. What caps do they wear? FRI. Blue.
PAN. What is the colour of their stockings? FRI. Red.
PAN. What wear they on their feet? FRI. Pumps.
PAN. How do they used to be? FRI. Foul.
PAN. How do they used to walk? FRI. Fast.
PAN. Now let us talk of the kitchen, I mean that of the harlots, and without going hand over head, let us a little examine things by particulars. What is in their kitchens?
FRI. Fire.
PAN. What fuel feeds it? FRI. Wood.
PAN. What sort of wood is it? FRI. Dry.
PAN. And of what kind of trees? FRI. Yew.
PAN. What are the faggots and brushes of? FRI. Holme.
PAN. What wood do you burn in your chambers? FRI. Pine.
PAN. And of what other trees? FRI. Lime.
PAN. Hearkeè me; as for the buttocks, I will go you halves: pray, how do you feed them? FRI. Well.
PAN. First, what do they eat? FRI. Bread.
PAN. Of what complexion? FRI. White.
PAN. And what else? FRI. Meat.
PAN. How do they love it dressed? FRI. Roast.
PAN. What sort of porridge? FRI. None.
PAN. Are they for pies and tarts? FRI. Much.
PAN. Then I am their man. Will fish go down with them?
FRI. Well.
PAN. And what else? FRI. Eggs.
PAN. How do they like them? FRI. Boiled.
PAN. How must they be done? FRI. Hard.
PAN. Is this all they have? FRI. No.
PAN. What have they besides, then? FRI. Beef.

- PAN. And what else? FRI. Pork.
 PAN. And what more? FRI. Geese.
 PAN. What then? FRI. Ducks.
 PAN. And what besides? FRI. Coeks.
 PAN. What do they season their meat with? FRI. Salt.
 PAN. What sauce are they most dainty for? FRI. Must.
 PAN. What is their last course? FRI. Riee.
 PAN. And what else? FRI. Milk.
 PAN. What besides? FRI. Peas.
 PAN. What sort? FRI. Green.
 PAN. What do they boil with them? FRI. Pork.
 PAN. What fruit do they eat? FRI. Good.
 PAN. How? FRI. Raw.
 PAN. What do they end with? FRI. Nuts.
 PAN. How do they drink? FRI. Neat.
 PAN. What liquor? FRI. Wine.
 PAN. What sort? FRI. White.
 PAN. In winter? FRI. Strong.
 PAN. In the spring? FRI. Brisk.
 PAN. In summer? FRI. Cool.
 PAN. In autumn? FRI. New.

Buttock of a monk! cried Friar John, how plump these plaguy trulls, these arch Semiquavering strumpets must be! That damned cattle are so high fed that they must needs be high-mettled, and ready to wince, and give two ups for one go-down, when any one offers to ride them below the crupper.

Pr'ythee, Friar John, quoth Panurge, hold thy prating tongue, stay till I have done.

Till what time do the doxies sit up? FRI. Night.

PAN. When do they get up? FRI. Late.

PAN. May I ride on a horse that was foaled of an aeorn, if this be not as honest a cod as ever the ground went upon, and as grave as an old gate-post into the bargain. Would to the blessed St. Semiquaver, and the blessed worthy virgin St. Semiquavera, he were lord chief president (justice) of Paris. Odsbodikins, how he would dispatch! With what expedition would he bring disputes to an upshot! What an abbreviator and elawer of law-suits, reconciler of differences, examiner and fumbler of bags, peruser of bills, scribbler of rough drafts, and an engrosser of deeds, would he not make! Well, Friar, spare your breath to cool your porridge: come, let us now talk with deliberation, fairly and softly, as lawyers go to heaven. Let us know how you victual the venerable camp. How is the snatchblatch? FRI. Rough.

PAN. How is the gate-way? FRI. Free.

PAN. And how is it within? FRI. Deep.

PAN. I mean, what weather is it there? FRI. Hot.

PAN. What shadows the brooks? FRI. Groves.

PAN. Of what is the colour of the twigs? FRI. Red.

PAN. And that of the old? FRI. Grey.

PAN. How are you when you shake? FRI. Brisk.

PAN. How is their motion? FRI. Quick.

PAN. Would you have them vault or wriggle more?

FRI. Less.

PAN. What kind of tools are yours? FRI. Big.

PAN. And in their helves? FRI. Round.

PAN. Of what colour is the tip? FRI. Red.

PAN. When they have been used, how are they? FRI. Shrunk.

PAN. How much weighs each bag of tools? FRI. Pounds.

PAN. How hang your pouches? FRI. Tight.

PAN. How are they when you have done? FRI. Lank.

PAN. Now, by the oath you have taken, tell me, when you have a mind to cohabit, how you throw them? FRI. Down.

PAN. And what do they say then? FRI. Fic.

PAN. However, like maids, they say nay, and take it; and speak the less, but think the more; minding the work in hand: do they not? FRI. True.

PAN. Do they get you bairns? FRI. None.

PAN. How do you pig together? FRI. Bare.

PAN. Remember you are upon your oath, and tell me justly, and bonâ fide, how many times a day you monk it? FRI. Six.

PAN. How many bouts a-nights? FRI. Ten.

Cat so, quoth Friar John, the poor fornicating brother is washful, and stieks at sixteen, as if that were his stint. Right, quoth Panurge, but couldst thou keep pæce with him, Friar John, my dainty cod? May the devil's dam suck my teat, if he does look as if he had got a blow over the nose with a Naples cowl-staff.

PAN. Pray, Friar Shakewell, does your whole fraternity quaver and shake at that rate? FRI. All.

PAN. Who of them is the best cock of the game. FRI. I.

PAN. Do you never commit dry-bobs or flashes in the pan?

FRI. None.

PAN. I blush like any black dog, and could be as testy as an old cock, when I think on all this; it passes my understanding. But, pray, when you have been pumped dry one day, what have you got the next? FRI. More.

PAN. By Priapus, they have the Indian herb, of which Theophrastus spoke, or I am much out. But harkee me, thou man of brevity, should some impediment, honestly or otherwise, impair your talents, and cause your benevolence to lessen, how would it fare with you then? FRI. Ill.

PAN. What would the wenches do? FRI. Rail.

PAN. What if you skipped and let them fast a whole day?

FRI. Worse.

PAN. What do you give them then? FRI. Thwacks.

PAN. What say they to this? FRI. Bawl.

PAN. And what else? FRI. Curse.

PAN. How do you correct them? FRI. Hard.

PAN. What do you get out of them, then? FRI. Blood.

PAN. How is their complexion then? FRI. Odd.

PAN. What do they mend it with? FRI. Paint.

PAN. Then, what do they do? FRI. Fawn.

PAN. By the oath you have taken, tell me truly, what time of the year do you do it least in? FRI. Now.

PAN. What season do you do it best in? FRI. March.

PAN. How is your performance the rest of the year? FRI. Brisk.

Then, quoth Panurge, sneering, Of all, and of all, commend me to ball; this is the friar of the world for my money: you have heard how short, concise, and compendious he is in his answers? Nothing is to be got out of him but monosyllables? By jingo, I believe he would make three bites of a cherry.

Damn him, cried Friar John, that is as true as I am his uncle: the dog yelps at another gat's rate when he is among his bitches; there he is polysyllable enough, my life for yours. You talk of making three bites of a cherry! God sends fools more wit, and us more money; may I be doomed to fast a whole day, if I do not verily believe he would not make above two bites of a shoulder of mutton, and one swoop of a whole pottle of wine: zoons, do but see how down of the mouth the cur looks! He is nothing but skin and bones, he has pissed his tallow.

Truly, truly, quoth Epistemon, this rascally monastical vermin all over the world mind nothing but their gut, and are as ravenous as any kites, and then, forsooth, they tell us they have nothing but food and raiment in this world: 'sdeath, what more have kings and princes?

CHAPTER XXIX.

How Epistemon disliked the institution of Lent.

PRAY did you observe, continued Epistemon, how this damned ill-favoured Semiquaver mentioned March as the best month for caterwauling. True, said Pantagruel, yet Lent and March always go together, and the first was instituted to macerate and bring down our pampered flesh, to weaken and subdue its lusts, and to curb and assuage the venereal rage.

By this, said Epistemon, you may guess what kind of a pope it was who first enjoined it to be kept, since this filthy wooden-shoed Semiquaver owns that his spoon is never oftener nor deeper in the porringer of lechery than in Lent. Add to this, the evident reasons given by all good and learned physicians, affirming, that throughout the whole year no food is eaten, that can prompt mankind to lascivious acts more than at that time.

As for example, beans, peas, phasels, or long-peason, ciches, onions, nuts, oysters, herrings, saltmeats, garum, (a kind of anchovy), and salads, wholly made up of venereous herbs and fruits, as,

Rocket,	Parsley,	Hop-buds,
Nose-smart,	Rampions,	Figs,
Taragon,	Poppy,	Rice
Cresses,	Celery,	Raisins, and others.

It would not a little surprise you, said Pantagruel, should a man tell you, that the good pope, who first ordered the keeping of Lent, perceiving that at that time of the year the natural heat (from the centre of the body, whither it was retired during the winter's cold) diffuses itself, as the sap does in trees, through the circumference of the members, did therefore in a manner prescribe that sort of diet to forward the propagation of mankind. What makes me think so, is, that by the registers of christenings at Touars, it appears that more children are born in October and November than in the other ten months of the year, and, reckoning backwards, it will be easily found that they were all made, conceived, and begotten in Lent.

I listen to you with both my ears, quoth Friar John, and that with no small pleasure, I assure you. But I must tell you, that the vicar of Jambert ascribed this copious proliferation of the women, not to that sort of food that we chiefly eat in Lent, but to the little licensed stooping members, your little-booted Lent-preachers, your little draggle-tailed father confessors, who, during all that time of their reign, damn all husbands that run astray, three fathoms and a half below the very lowest pit of hell. So the silly cod's-headed brothers of the noose dare not then stumble any more at the truckle-bed, to the no small discomfort of their maids, and are even forced, poor souls, to take up with their own bodily wives. Dixi, I have done.

You may descant on the institution of Lent as much as you please, cried Epistemon; so many men so many minds; but certainly all the physicians will be against its being suppressed, though I think that time is at hand: I know they will, and have heard them say, were it not for Lent, their art would soon fall into contempt, and they would get nothing, for hardly anybody would be sick.

All distempers are sowed in Lent; it is the true seminary and native bed of all diseases: nor does it only weaken and putrify bodies, but also makes souls mad and uneasy. For then the devils do their best and drive a subtle trade, and the tribe of canting dissemblers come out of their holes. It is then term-time with your eucullated pieces of formality, that have one face to God and the other to the devil; and a wretched clutter they make with their sessions, stations, dardons, syntereses, confessions, whippings, anathematizations, and much prayer, with as little devotion. However, I will not offer to infer from this that the Arimaspians are better than we are in that point; yet I speak to the purpose.

Well, quoth Panurge to the Semiquaver friar, who happened to be by, dear bumbasting, shaking, trilling, quavering eod, what thinkest thou of this fellow? Is he not a rank heretic? FRI. Mueh.

PAN. Ought he not to be singed? FRI. Well.

PAN. As soon as may be? FRI. Right.

PAN. Should not he be scalded first? FRI. No.

PAN. How then, should he be roasted? FRI. Quick.

PAN. Till at last he be? FRI. Dead.

PAN. What has he made you? FRI. Mad.

PAN. What do you take him to be? FRI. Damned.

PAN. What place is he to go to? FRI. Hell.

PAN. But, first, how would you have him served here? FRI. Burnt.

PAN. Some have been served so? FRI. Store.

PAN. That were hereties? FRI. Less.

PAN. And the number of those that are to be warmed thus hereafter is? FRI. Great.

PAN. How many of them do you intend to save? FRI. None.

PAN. So you would have them burned? FRI. All.

I wonder, said Epistemon to Panurge, what pleasure you can find in talking thus with this lousy tatterdemallion of a monk; I vow, did I not know you well, I might be ready to think you had no more wit in your head, than he has in both his shoulders. Come, come, seatter no words, returned Panurge, every one as they like, as the woman said when she kissed her cow. I wish I might carry him to Gargantua: when I am married he might be my wife's fool. And make you one, eried Epistemon. Well said, quoth Friar John: now, poor Panurge, take that along with thee, thou art even fitted; it is a plain ease thou wilt never escape wearing the bull's feather; thy wife will be as common as the highway, that is certain.

CHAPTER XXX.

How we came to the land of Satin.

HAVING pleased ourselves with observing that new order of semiquaver Friars, we set sail, and in three days, our skipper made the finest and most delightful island that ever was seen; he called it the island of Frize; for all the ways were of frize.

In that island is the land of Satin, so celebrated by our court pages. Its trees and herbage never lose their leaves or flowers, and are all damask and flowered velvet. As for the beasts and birds, they are all of tapestry work. There we saw many beasts, birds on trees, of the same colour, bigness, and shape, of those in our country; with this difference, however, that these did eat nothing, and never sang or bit likes ours: and we also saw there many sorts of creatures which we never had seen before.

Among the rest, several elephants in various postures; twelve of which were the six males and six females that were brought to Rome by their governor in the time of Germanicus, Tiberius's nephew: some of them were learned elephants, some musicians, others philosophers, dancers, and showers of tricks; and all sat down at table in good order, silently eating and drinking like so many fathers in a fratry-room.

With their snouts or proboscises, some two cubits long, they draw up water for their own drinking, and take hold of palm leaves, plums, and all manners of edibles, using them offensively or defensively, as we do our fists; with them tossing men high into the air in fight, and making them burst with laughing when they come to the ground.

They have joints in their legs, whatever some men, who never saw any but painted, may have written to the contrary. Between their teeth they have two huge horns: thus Juba called them, and Pausanias tells us, they are not teeth, but horns: however, Philostratus will have them to be teeth, and not horns. It is all one to me, provided you will be pleased to own them to be true ivory. These are some three or four cubits long, and are fixed in the upper jaw-bone, and consequently not in the lowermost. If you hearken to those who will tell you to the contrary, you will find yourself damnably mistaken, for that is a lie with a latchet: though it were Ælian, that long-bow man, that told you so, never believe him, for he lies as fast as a dog can trot. It was in this very island that Pliny, his brother tell-truth, had seen some elephants dance on the rope with bells, and whip over the tables, presto, be gone, while people were at feasts, without so much as touching the toping toppers, or the toppers toping.

I saw a rhinoceros there, just such a one as Harry Clerberg had formerly showed me: methought it was not much unlike a certain boar which I had formerly seen at Limoges, except the sharp horn on its snout, that was about a cubit long; by the means of which that animal dares encounter with an elephant, that is sometimes killed with its point thrust into its belly, which is its most tender and defenceless part.

I saw there two and thirty unicorns. They are a cursed sort of creatures, much resembling a fine horse, unless it be that their heads are like a stag's, their feet like an elephant's, their tails like a wild boar's, and out of each of their foreheads sprouts a sharp black horn, some six or seven feet long; commonly it dangles down like a turkey-cock's comb. When a unicorn has a mind to fight, or put it to any other use, what does he do but make it stand, and then it is as straight as an arrow.

I saw one of them, which was attended with a throng of other wild beasts, purify a fountain with its horn. With that Panurge told me, that his prancer, alias his nimble-wimble, was like the unicorn, not altogether in length indeed, but in virtue and propriety: for as the unicorn purified pools and fountains from filth and venom, so that other animals came and drank securely there afterwards; in the like manner others might water their nags, and dabble after him without fear of shankers, carnosities, gonorrhæas, buboes, crinkams, and such other plagues, caught by those who venture to quench their amorous thirst in a common puddle; for with his nervous horn he removed all the infection that might be lurking in some blind cranny of the mephitic sweet-scented hole.

Well, quoth Friar John, when you are sped, that is when you are married, we will make a trial of this on thy spouse, merely for charity sake, since you are pleased to give us so beneficial an instruction.

Aye, aye, returned Panurge, and then immediately I will give you a pretty gentle aggregative pill of God, made up of two and twenty kind stabs with a dagger, after the Cæsarian way. Cat so, cried Friar John, I had rather take off a bumper of good cool wine.

I saw there the golden fleece, formerly conquered by Jason, and can assure you on the word of an honest man, that those who have said it was not a fleece, but a golden pippin, because μῆλον signifies both an apple and a sheep, were utterly mistaken.

I saw also a chameleon, such as Aristotle describes it, and like that which had been formerly shown me by Charles Maris, a famous physician of the noble city of Lyons on the Rhone: and the said chameleon lived on air, just as the other did.

I saw three hydars, like those I had formerly seen. They are a kind of serpent, with seven different heads.

I saw also fourteen phœnixes. I had read in many authors that there was but one in the whole world in every century; but, if I may presume to speak my mind, I declare that those who said this had never seen any, unless it were in the land of tapestry; though it were vouched by Lactantius Firmianus.

I saw the skin of Apuleius's golden ass.

I saw three hundred and nine pelicans.

Item, six thousand and sixteen Seleucid birds marching in battalia, and picking up struggling grasshoppers in corn-fields.

Item, some cynamologi, argatiles, caprimulgi, thynnunculs, onocrotals, or bitterns, with their wide swallows, stymphalides, harpies, panthers, dorcasses, or bucks, cemades, cynocephalises, satyrs, cartasans, tarands, uri, monopses, pegasi, neades, ceges, marmosets, or monkeys, presteres, bugles, musimons, byturoses, ophyri, screech owls, goblins, fairies, and griffins.

I saw Mid-Lent on horseback, with Mid-August and Mid-March holding its stirrups.

I saw some mankind wolves, centaurs, tigers, leopards, hyenas, camelopardels, and orixes, or huge wild goats with sharp horns.

I saw a remora, a little fish called echineis by the Greeks, and near it a tall ship, that did not get a head an inch, though she was in the offing with top and top-gallants spread before the wind. I am somewhat inclined to believe, that it was the very numerical ship in which Periander the tyrant happened to be, when it was stopped by such a little fish in spite of wind and tide. It was in this land of Satin, and in no other, that Mutianus had seen one of them.

Friar John told us, that in the days of yore, two sort of fishes used to abound in our courts of judicature, and rotted the bodies and tormented the souls of those who were at law, whether noble or of mean descent, high or low, rich or poor; the first were your April fish or mackerel (pimps, panders, and bawds;) the others your beneficial remoras, that is, the eternity of law-suits; the needless lets that keep them undecided.

I saw some sphynges, some raphes, some ounces, and some cepphi, whose fore-feet are like hands, and their hind-feet like men's feet.

Also some eroentas and some eali as big as sea-horses with elephants' tails, boars' jaws and tusks, and horns as pliant as an ass's ears.

The leueroeutes, most fleet animals, as big as our asses of Mirabelais, have neeks, tails, and breasts like a lion's, legs like a stag's, the mouth up to the ears, and but two teeth, one above and one below; they speak with human voices, but when they do, they say nothing.

Some people say, that none ever saw an aery, or nest of sakers; if you will believe me, I saw no less than eleven, and I am sure I reekoned right.

I saw some left-handed halberts, which were the first that I had ever seen.

I saw some mantieores, a most strange sort of creatures, which have the body of a lion, red hair, a face and ears like a man's, three rows of teeth which close together, as if you joined your hands with your fingers between each other; they have a sting in their tails like a scorpion's, and a very melodious voice.

I saw some eatablepases, a sort of serpents, whose bodies are small, but their heads large without any proportion, so that they have much ado to lift them up; and their eyes are so infectious, that whoever sees them dies upon the spot, as if had seen a basilisk.

I saw some beasts with two baeks, and those seemed to me the merriest creatures in the world; they were most nimble at wriggling the buttocks, and more diligent in tail-wagging than any water-wagtails, perpetually jogging and shaking their double rumps.

I saw there some milehed eraw-fish, creatures that I never heard of before in my life; these moved in very good order, and it would have done your heart good to have seen them.

CHAPTER XXXI.

How in the land of Satin we saw Hearsay, who kept a school of vouching.

WE went a little higher up into the country of Tapestry, and saw the Mediterranean Sea open to the right and left down to the very bottom; just as the Red Sea very fairly left its bed at the Arabian gulf, to make a lane for the Jews, when they left Egypt.

There I found Triton winding his silver shell instead of a horn, and also Glaucus, Proteus, Nereus, and a thousand other godlings and sea monsters.

I also saw an infinite number of fish of all kinds, dancing, flying, vaulting, fighting, eating, breathing, billing, shoving, milting, spawning, hunting, fishing, skirmishing, lying in ambuscado, making truces, cheapening, bargaining, swearing, and sporting.

In a blind corner we saw Aristotle holding a lantern, in the posture in which the hermit uses to be drawn near St. Christopher, watching, prying, thinking, and setting every thing down in writing.

Behind him stood a pack of other philosophers, like so many bums by a head bailiff; as Appian, Heliodorus, Athenæus, Porphyrius, Pancrates, Archadian, Numenius, Possidonius, Ovidius, Oppianus, Olypius, Seleucus, Leonides, Agathocles, Theophrastus, Demonstratus, Mutianus, Nymphodorus, Alian, and five hundred other such plodding dons, who were full of business, yet had little to do; like Chrysippus or Aristarchus of Soli, who for eight and fifty years together did nothing in the world but examine the state and concerns of bees.

I spied Peter Gillies among these, with an urinal in his hand, narrowly watching the water of those goodly fishes.

When we had long beheld every thing in this land of Satin, Pantagrue said, I have sufficiently fed my eyes, but my belly is empty all this while, and chimes to let me know it is time to go to dinner; let us take care of the body, lest the soul abdicate it; and to this effect, let us taste some of these anacampserotes (an herb, the touching of which is said to reconcile lovers) that hang over our heads. Pshaw, cried one, they are mere trash, stark naught on my word, they are good for nothing.

I then went to pluck some myrobolans off of a piece of tapestry, whereon they hung, but the devil a bit I could chew or swallow them; and had you had them betwixt your teeth, you would have sworn they had been thrown silk; there was no manner of savour in them.

One might be apt to think Heliogabalus had taken a hint from thence, to feast those whom he had cause to fast a long time, promising them a sumptuous, plentiful, and imperial feast after it; for all the treat used to amount to no more than several sorts of meat in wax, marble, earthenware, painted and figured tablecloths.

While we were looking up and down to find some more substantial food, we heard a loud various noise, like that of paper-mills, or women bucking of linen: so with all speed we went to the place whence the noise came, where we found a diminutive, monstrous, mis-shapen old fellow, called Hearsay. His mouth was slit up to his ears, and in it were seven tongues, each of them cleft into seven parts. However he chattered, tattled, and prated with all the seven at once, of different matters, and in divers languages.

He had as many cars all over his head, and the rest of his body, as Argus formerly had eyes; and was as blind as a beetle, and had the palsy in his legs.

About him stood an innumerable number of men and women, gaping, listening, and hearing very intensely; among them I observed some who strutted like crows in a gutter, and principally a very handsome bodied man in the face, who held then a map of the world, and with little aphorisms compendiously explained every thing to them; so that those men of happy memories grew learned in a trice, and would most fluently talk with you of a world of prodigious things, the hundredth part of which would take up a man's whole life to be fully known.

Among the rest, they descanted with great prolixity on the pyramids and hieroglyphics of Egypt, of the Nile, of Babylon, of the Troglodytes, the Hymantopodes, or crump-footed nation, the Blemiaë, people that wear their heads in the middle of their breasts, the Pigmies, the Cannibals, the Hyperborei and their mountains, the Egypanes with their goat's feet, and the devil and all of others; every individual word of it by hear-say.

I am much mistaken if I did not see among them Herodotus, Pliny, Solinus, Borosus, Philostratus, Pomponius Mela, Strabo, and God knows how many other antiquaries.

Then Albert, the great Jacobin friar, Peter Tesmoin, alias Witness, Pope Pius the Second, Volaterranus, Paulus Jovius the valiant, Jemmy Cartier, Chaton the Armenian, Marco Polo the Venetian, Ludovico Romano, Pedro Aliares, and forty cartloads of other modern historians, lurking behind a piece of tapestry, where they were at it, ding-dong, privately scribbling the Lord knows what, and making rare work of it, and all by hear-say.

Behind another piece of tapestry (on which Naboth and Susanna's accusers were fairly represented), I saw close by Hearsay, good store of men of the country of Perce and Maine, notable students, and young enough.

I asked what sort of study they applied themselves to? and was told, that from their youth they learned to be evidences, affidavit-men, and vouchers; and were instructed in the art of swearing; in which they soon became such proficient, that, when they left that country, and went back into their own, they set up for themselves, and very honestly lived by their trade of evidencing; positively giving their testimony of all things whatsoever, to those who feed them most roundly to do a job of journey-work for them: and all this by hearsay.

You may think what you will of it, but I can assure you, they gave some of us corners of their cakes, and we merrily helped to empty their hogsheads. Then, in a friendly manner, they advised us to be as sparing of truth as possibly we could, if ever we had a mind to get court preferment.

CHAPTER XXXII.

How we came in sight of Lantern-land.

HAVING been scurvily entertained in the land of Satin, we went on board, and having set sail, in four days came near the coast of Lantern-land. We then saw certain little hovering fires on the sea.

For my part I did not take them to be lanterns, but rather thought they were fishes, which lolled their flaming tongues on the surface of the sea: or lampyrides, which some call cicindelas or glow-worms, shining there as ripe barley does o' nights in my country.

But the skipper satisfied us that they were the lanterns of the watch, or more properly, light-houses, set up in many places round the precinct of the place, to discover the land, and for the safe piloting in of some outlandish lanterns, which, like good Franciscan and Jacobin friars, were coming to make their personal appearance at the provincial chapter.

However, some of us were somewhat suspicious that these fires were the forerunners of some storm, but the skipper assured us again they were not.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

How we landed at the Port of the Lychnobia, and came to Lantern-land.

SOON after we arrived at the port of Lantern-land, where Pantagruel discovered, on a high tower, the lantern of Rochelle, that stood us in good stead, for it cast a great light. We also saw the lantern of Pharos, that of Nauplion, and that of Acropolis, at Athens, sacred to Pallas.

Near the port, there is a little hamlet inhabited by the Lychnobia, that live by lanterns, as the gulligutted friars in our country live by nuns; they are studious people, and as honest men as ever shit in a trumpet. Demosthenes had formerly lanternised there.

We were conducted from that place to the palace by three obeliscoliehnyes, military guards of the port, with high-crowned hats, whom we acquainted with the cause of our voyage, and our design; which was to desire the queen of the country to grant us a lantern to light and conduct us, during our voyage to the Oracle of the Bottle.

They promised to assist us in this, and added, that we could never have come in a better time; for then the lanterns held their provincial chapter.

When we came to the royal place we had audience of her highness the Queen of Lantern-land, being introduced by two lanterns of honour, that of Aristophanes, and that of Cleanthes. Panurge, in a few words, acquainted her with the causes of our voyage, and she received us with great demonstrations of friendship, desiring us to come to her at supper-time, that we might more easily make choice of one to be our guide; which pleased us extremely. We did not fail to observe intensely everything we could see,—as the garbs, motions, and deportments of the queen's subjects,—principally the manner after which she was served.

The bright queen was dressed in virgin crystal of Tutia, wrought damaskwise, and beset with large diamonds.

The lanterns of the royal blood were clad partly with bastard-diamonds, partly with diaphanous stones; the rest with horn, paper, and oiled cloth.

The cresset-lights took place according to the antiquity and lustre of their families.

An earthen dark-lantern, shaped like a pot, notwithstanding this, took place of some of the first quality; at which I wondered much, till I was told it was that of Epictetus, for which three thousand drachmas had been formerly refused.

Martial's polynix lantern made a very good figure there; I took particular notice of its dress, and more yet of the icosimyx, formerly consecrated by Canopa, the daughter of Tisias.

I saw the pensile lantern, formerly taken out of the temple of Apollo Palatinus at Thebes, and afterwards by Alexander the Great carried to the town of Cymos.

I saw another that distinguished itself from the rest by a bushy tuft of crimson silk on its head. I was told it was that of Bartolus, the lantern of the civilians.

Two others were very remarkable for glisterpouches that dangled at their waist. We were told, that one was the greater light, and the other the lesser light of the apothecaries.

When it was supper-time, the queen's highness first sat down, and then the rest, according to their rank and dignity.

For the first course, they were all served with large Christmas candles except the queen, who was served with a hugeous, thiek, stiff, flaming taper of white wax, somewhat red towards the tip; and the royal family, as also the provincial lantern of Mirebalais, who were served with nut-lights; and the provincieial of Lower Poitou, with an armed candle.

After that, God wot, what a glorious light they gave with their wicks: I do not say all, for you must except a parcel of junior lanterns, under the government of a high and mighty one. These did not cast a light like the rest, but seemed to me dimmer than any long-snuff farthing candle, whose tallow has been half melted away in a hot-house.

After supper we withdrew to take some rest, and the next day the queen made us choose one of the most illustrious lanterns to guide us; after which we took our leave.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

How we arrived at the Oracle of the Bottle.

OUR glorious lantern lighting and directing us to our heart's content, we at last arrived at the desired island, where was the Oracle of the Bottle. As soon as friend Panurge landed, he nimbly cut a caper with one leg for joy, and eried to Pantagruel, Now we are where we have wished ourselves long ago. This is the place we have been seeking with such toil and labour. He then made a compliment to our lantern, who desired us to be of good cheer, and not be daunted or dismayed, whatever we might chance to see.

To come to the Temple of the Holy Bottle, we were to go through a large vineyard, in which were all sorts of vines, as the Falernian, Malvesian, the Muscadine, those of Tauge, Beaune, Mirevaux, Orleans, Picardent, Arbois, Coussi, Anjou, Grave, Corsica, Vierron, Nerac, and others. This vineyard was formerly planted by the good Baechus, with so great a blessing, that it yields leaves, flowers, and fruit, all the year round, like the orange trees, at Serene.

Our magnificent lantern ordered every one of us to eat three grapes, to put some vine-leaves in his shoes, and take a vine-branch in his left hand.

At the end of the close we went under an arch built after the manner of those of the ancients. The trophies of a toper were curiously earyed on it.

First, on one side was to be seen a long train of flagons, leathern bottles, flasks, cans, glass bottles, barrels, nipper-kins, pint-pots, quart-pots, pottles, gallons, and old-fashioned semaises, (swinging wooden pots, such as those out of which the Germans fill their glasses;) these hung on a shady arbour.

On another side was store of garlic, onions, shallots, hams, botargos, caviar, biscuits, neats' tongues, old cheese, and such like comfits, very artificially interwoven, and packed together with vine-stocks.

On another were a hundred sorts of drinking glasses, cups, eisterns, ewers, false eups, tumblers, bowls, mazers, mugs, jugs, goblets, talboys, and such other bæchic artillery.

On the frontispiece of the triumphal arch, under the zophore was the following couplet:

You, who presume to move this way,
Get a good lantern lest you stray.

We took special care of that, cried Pantagrue, when he read them; for there is not a better or a more divine lantern than ours in all Lantern-land.

This arch ended at a fine large round alley, covered over with the interlaid branches of vines, loaded and adorned with elusters of five hundred different colours, and of as many various shapes, not natural, but due to the skill of agriculture; some were golden, others blueish, tawny, azure, white, black, green, purple, streaked with many colours, long, round, triangular, cod-like, hairy, great-headed, and grassy. That pleasant alley ended at three old ivy-trees, verdant, and all loaden with rings. Our most illustrious lantern directed us to make ourselves high-crowned hats with some of their leaves, and cover our heads wholly with them, which was immediately done.

Jupiter's priestess, said Pantagrue, in former days, would not, like us, have walked under this arbour. There was a mystical reason, answered our most perspicuous lantern, that would have hindered her. For had she gone under it, the wine, or the grapes of which it is made, that is the same thing, had been over her head, and then she would have seemed overtopped and mastered by wine. Which implies, that priests, and all persons who devote themselves to the contemplation of divine things, ought to keep their minds sedate and calm, and avoid whatever may disturb and discompose their tranquillity; which nothing is more apt to do than drunkenness.

You also, continued our lantern, could not come into the Holy Bottle's presenee, after you have gone through this arch, did not that noble priestess Bæbuc first see your shoes full of vine-leaves; which action is diametrically opposite to the other, and signifies that you despise wine, and having mastered it, as it were, tread it under foot.

I am no scholar, quoth Friar John, for which I am heartily sorry, yet I find, by my breviary, that in the Revelation, a woman was seen with the moon under her feet, which was a most wonderful sight. Now, as Bigot explained it to me, this was to signify, that she was not of the nature of other women; for they have all the moon at their heads, and, consequently, their brains are always troubled with a lunacy: this makes me willing to believe what you said, dear Madam Lantern.

CHAPTER XXXV.

How we went under-ground to come to the Temple of the Holy Bottle, and how Chinon is the oldest city in the world.

WE went under ground through a plastered vault, on which was coarsely painted a dance of women and satyrs, waiting on old Silenus, who was grinning on horseback on his ass. This made me say to Pantagruel, that this entry put me in mind of the painted cellar, in the oldest city in the world, where such paintings are to be seen, and in as cool a place.

Which is the oldest city in the world? asked Pantagruel. It is Chinon, sir, or Cainon in Touraine, said I. I know, returned Pantagruel, where Chinon lies, and the painted cellar also, having myself drunk there many a glass of cool wine; neither do I doubt but that Chinon is an ancient town—witness its blazon. I own it is said twice or thrice, Chinon,

Little town,
Great renown,
On old stone
Long has stood;
There's the Vienné, if you look down;
If you look up, there's the wood.

But how, continued he, can you make it out that 'tis the oldest city in the world? Where did you find this written? I have found it in the sacred writ, said I, that Cain was the first that built a town; we may then, reasonably conjecture, that from his name he gave it that of Cainon. Thus, after his example, most other founders of towns have given them their names: Athena, that is Minerva in Greek, to Athens; Alexander to Alexandria; Constantine to Constantinople; Pompey to Pompeiopolis in Cilicia; Adrian to Adrianople; Canaan, to the Canaanites; Saba, to the Sabæans; Assur, to the Assyrians: and so Ptolemais Cæsare, Tiberias, and Herodium in Judæa got their names.

While we were thus talking, there came to us the great flask whom our lantern called the philosopher, her holiness the Bottle's governor. He was attended with a troop of the temple-guards, all French bottles in wicker armour; and seeing us with our javelins wrapped with ivy, with our illustrious lantern, whom he knew, he desired us to come in with all manner of safety, and ordered we should be immediately conducted to the Princess Bacbuc, the Bottle's Lady of Honour, and priestess of all the mysteries; which was done.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

How we went down the Tetradic steps, and of Panurge's fear.

WE went down one marble step under ground, where there was a resting, or, as our workmen call it, a landing-place, then, turning to the left, we went down two other steps, where there was another resting place; after that we came to three other steps, turning about, and met a third; and the like at four steps which we met afterwards. 'There, quoth Panurge, is it here? How many steps have you told?' asked our magnificent lantern. 'One, two, three, four,' answered Pantagruel. 'How much is that?' asked she. 'Ten,' returned he. 'Multiply that, said she, according to the same pythagorical tétrad. That is ten, twenty, thirty, forty,' cried Pantagruel. 'How much is the whole?' said she. 'One hundred,' answered Pantagruel. 'Add, continued she, the first cube—that is eight: at the end of that fatal number you will find the temple gate; and pray, observe, this is the true psychogony of Plato, so celebrated by the academics, yet so little understood; one moiety of which consists of the unity of the two first numbers full of two square and two cubic numbers. We then went down those numerical stairs, all under ground; and I can assure you, in the first place, that our legs stood us in good stead; for had it not been for them, we had rolled just like so many hogsheads into a vault. Secondly, our radiant lantern gave us just so much light as is in St. Patrick's hole in Ireland, or 'Trophonius' cavern in Bœotia; which caused Panurge to say to her, after we had got down some seventy-eight steps:—

Dear madam, with a sorrowful, aching heart, I most humbly beseech your lanternship to lead us back. May I be led to hell, if I be not half dead with fear; my heart is sunk down into my hose; I am afraid I shall make buttered eggs in my breeches. I freely consent never to marry. You have given yourself too much trouble on my account; the Lord shall reward you in his great rewarding-place; neither will I be ungrateful when I come out of this cave of Troglodytes. Let us go back, I pray you. I am very much afraid this is Tanarus, the low way to hell, and methinks I already hear Cerberus bark. Hark! I hear the cur, or my ears tingle; I have no manner of kindness for the dog, for there never is a greater tooth-ache than when dogs bite us by the shins: and if this be only Trophonius's pit, the lemures, hob-thrushes, and goblins will certainly swallow us alive: just as they devoured formerly one of Demetrius's halbardiers, for want of luncheons of bread. Art thou here, Friar John! Pr'ythee, dear, dear cod, stay by me; I am almost dead with fear. Hast thou got thy bilbo? Alas! poor pilgarlic is defenceless: I am a naked man thou knowest: let us go back. Zoons, fear nothing, cried Friar John, I am by thee, and have thee fast by the collar; eighteen devils shall not get thee out of my clutches, though I were unharmed. Never did a man yet want weapons who had a good arm with as stout a heart; heaven would sooner send down a shower of them; even as in Provence, in the fields of la Crau, near Mariannes, there rained stones (they are there to this day) to help Hercules, who otherwise wanted wherewithal to fight Neptune's two bastards. But whither are we bound? Are we a-going to the little children's limbo? By Pluto, they will bepaw and conskite us all. Or are we going to hell for orders? By cob's body, I will hamper, bethwack, and belabour all the devils, now I have some vine-leaves in my shoes. Thou shalt see me layabout me like mad, old boy. Which way? where the devil are they? I fear nothing but their damned horns: but cuckoldy Panurge's bull-feather will altogether secure me from them.

Lo! in a prophetic spirit I already see him, like another Actæon, horned, horny, hornified. Pr'ythee, quoth Panurge, take heed thyself, dear frater, lest, till monks have leave to marry, thou weddest something thou dost not like, as some quartan ague; if thou dost, may I never come safe and sound out of this hypogeum, this subterranean cave, if I do not tup and ram that disease merely for the sake of making thee a cornuted, corniferous property; otherwise I fancy the quartan ague is but an indifferent bed-fellow. I remember Gripe-men-all threatened to wed thee to some such thing; for which thou callest him heretic.

Here our splendid lantern interrupted them, letting us know this was the place where we were to have a taste of the creature, and be silent; bidding us not despair of having the word of the Bottle before we went baek, since we had lined our shoes with vine-leaves.

Come on, then, eried Panurge, let us charge through and through all the devils of hell; we can but perish, and that is soon done: however, I thought to have reserved my life for some mighty battle. Move, move, move forwards; I am as stout as Hercules, my breeches are full of eourage: my heart trembles a little, I own, but that is only an effect of the coldness and dampness of this vault; it is neither fear nor ague. Come on, move on, piss, pish, push on. My name is William Dreadnought.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

How the temple gates in a wonderful manner opened of themselves.

AFTER we were got down the steps, we came to a portal of fine jasper, of Dorie order, on whose front we read this sentenee in the finest gold, EN 'OINΩ AΛHΘ EI A: that is, In wine, truth. The two folding doors of the gate were of Corinthian-like brass, massy, wrought with little vine-branehes, finely embossed and engraven, and were equally joined and closed together in their mortise without any padlock, key-chain, or tie whatsoever. Where they joined, there hanged an Indian loadstone as big as an Egyptian bean, set in gold, having two points, hexagonal, in a right line; and on each side, towards the wall, hung a handful of seordium.

There our noble lantern desired us not to take it amiss that she went no farther with us, leaving us wholly to the conduct of the priestess Bacbuc: for she herself was not allowed to go in, for certain eauses rather to be eoncealed than revealed to mortals. However, she advised us to be resolute and secure, and to trust to her for the return. She then pulled the loadstone that hung at the folding of the gates, and threw it into a silver box fixed for that purpose: which done, from the threshold of each gate she drew a twine of crimson silk, about nine feet long, by which the seordium hung, and having fastened it to two gold buekles that hung at the sides, she withdrew.

Immediately the gates flew open without being touched; not with a creaking, or loud harsh noise, like that made by heavy brazen gates: but with a soft pleasing murmur that resounded through the arches of the temple.

Pantagrue soon knew the eause of it, having discovered a small cylinder or roller that joined the gates over the threshold; and, turning like them towards the wall on a hard well-polished ophites stone, with rubbing and rolling, caused that harmonious murmur.

I wondered how the gates thus opened of themselves to the right and left, and after we were all got in, I cast my eye between the gates and the wall, to endeavour to know how this happened, for one would have thought our kind lantern had put between the gates the herb æthiopis, which they say opens some things that are shut; but I perceived that the parts of the gates that joined on the inside were covered with steel; and just where the said gates touched when they were opened, I saw two square Indian loadstones, of a blueish hue, well polished, and half a span broad, mortised in the temple wall. Now, by the hidden and admirable power of the loadstones, the steel plates were put into motion, and consequently the gates were slowly drawn; however, not always, but when the said loadstone on the outside was removed, after which the steel was freed from its power, the two bunches of scordium being at the same time put at some distance, because it deadens the magnet, and robs it of its attractive virtue.

On the loadstone that was placed on the right side, the following iambic verse was curiously engraven in ancient Roman characters:

“Ducunt volentem fata, nolentem trahunt.”

Fate leads the willing, and the unwilling draws.

The following sentence was neatly cut in the loadstone that was on the left:

ALL THINGS TEND TO THEIR END.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Of the Temple's admirable Pavement.

WHEN I had read those inscriptions, I admired the beauty of the temple, and particular the disposition of its pavement, with which no work that is now, or has been under the cope of heaven, can justly be compared; not that of the Temple of Fortune at Præneste in Sylla's time; or the pavement of the Greeks, called asarotum, laid by Sosistratus in Pergamus. For this here was wholly in compartments of precious stones, all in their natural colours. One of red jasper, most charmingly spotted. Another of ophites. A third of porphyry. A fourth of lycophthalmy, a stone of four different colours, powdered with sparks of gold, as small as atoms. A fifth of agate, streaked here and there with small milk-coloured waves. A sixth of costly chalcedony. And another of green jasper, with certain red and yellowish veins. And all these were disposed in a diagonal line.

At the portico, some small stones were inlaid, and evenly joined on the floor, all in their native colours, to embellish the design of the figures; and they were ordered in such a manner, that you would have thought some vine leaves and branches had been carelessly strewed on the pavement; for in some places they were thick, and thin in others. That inlaying was very wonderful everywhere: here were seen, as it were in the shade, some snails crawling on the grapes; there, little lizards running on the branches; on this side, were grapes that seemed yet greenish; on another, some clusters that seemed full ripe, so like the true, that they could as easily have deceived starlings, and other birds, as those which Zeuxis drew.

Nay, we ourselves were deceived; for where the artist seemed to have strewed the vine-branches thickest, we could not forbear walking with great strides, lest we should entangle our feet, just as people go over an unequal stony place.

I then cast my eyes on the roof and walls of the temple, that were all pargetted with porphyry and mosaie work; which from the left side at the coming in, most admirably represented the battle, in which the good Bacchus overthrew the Indians; as followeth.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

How we saw Bacchus's army drawn up in Battalia in Mosaic work.

At the beginning, divers towns, hamlets, castles, fortresses, and forests were seen in flames; and several mad and loose women, who furiously ripped up, and tore live calves, sheep and lambs, limb from limb, and devoured their flesh. There we learned how Bacchus, at his coming into India, destroyed all things with fire and sword.

Notwithstanding this, he was so despised by the Indians, that they did not think it worth their while to stop his progress; having been certainly informed by their spies, that his camp was destitute of warriors, and that he had only with him a crew of drunken females, a low-built, old, effeminate, sottish fellow, continually addled, and as drunk as a wheelbarrow, with a pack of young clownish doddipoles, stark naked, always skipping and frisking up and down, with tails and horns like those of young kids.

For this reason the Indians had resolved to let them go through their country without the least opposition, esteeming a victory over such enemies more dishonourable than glorious.

In the mean time, Bacchus marched on, burning every thing; for, as you know, fire and thunder are his paternal arms; Jupiter having saluted his mother Semele with his thunder; so that his maternal house was ruined by fire. Bacchus also caused a great deal of blood to be spilt; which, when he is roused and angered, principally in war, is as natural to him, as to make some in time of peace.

Thus the plains of the island of Samos, are called Panema, which signifies all bloody, because Bacchus there overtook the Amazons, who fled from the country of Ephesus, and there let them blood, so that they all died of phlebotomy. This may give you a better insight into the meaning of an ancient proverb, than Aristotle has done in his problems; viz., Why, it was formerly said, Neither eat, nor sow any mint in time of war. The reason is, that blows are given in time of war without any distinction of parts or persons; and if a man that is wounded has that day handled or eaten any mint, it is impossible, or at least very hard, to stanek his blood.

After this, Bacchus was seen marching in battalia, riding in a stately chariot, drawn by six young leopards. He looked as young as a child, to show that all good toppers never grow old: he was as red as a cherry, or a cherub, which you please; and had no more hair on his chin, than there is in the inside of my hand: his forehead was graced with pointed horns, above which, he wore a fine crown or garland of vine-leaves or grapes, and a mitre of crimson velvet, having also gilt buskins on.

He had not one man with him, that looked like a man; his guards, and all his forces, consisted wholly of Bassarides, Evantes, Euthyades, Edonides, Trietherides, Ogygiæ, Mimalonides, Mænades, Thyades, and Bacchides, raving, raging, furious, mad women, begirt with live snakes and serpents, instead of girdles, their dishevelled hair flowing about their shoulders, with garlands of vine-branches instead of forehead-cloths, clad with stag's or goat's-skins, and armed with torches, javelins, spears, and halberts, whose ends were like pine-apples: besides, they had certain small light bucklers, that gave a loud sound if you touched them never so little, and these served them instead of drums; they were just seventy-nine thousand two hundred and twenty-seven.

Silenus, who led the van, was one on whom Bacchus relied very much, having formerly had many proofs of his valour and conduct. He was a diminutive, stooping, palsied, plump, gorbellied, old fellow, with a swinging pair of stiff-standing lugs of his own, a sharp Roman nose, large rough eyebrows, mounted on a well-hung ass; in his fist he held a staff to lean upon, and also bravely to fight, whenever he had occasion to alight: and he was dressed in a woman's yellow gown. His followers were all young, wild, clownish people, as hornified as so many kids, and as fell as so many tigers, naked, and perpetually singing and daneing eountry dances: they were called tityri and satyrs; and were in all eighty-five thousand one hundred and thirty-three.

Pan, who brought up the rear, was a monstous sort of a thing: for his lower parts were like a goat's, his thighs hairy, and his horns bolt upright; a erimson fiery phiz, and a beard that was none of the shortest. He was a bold, stout, daring, desperate fellow, very apt to take pepper in the nose for yea and nay.

In his left hand he held a pipe, and a crooked stiek in his right. His forces consisted also wholly of satyrs, ægipanes, agripanes, sylvans, fauns, lemures, lares, elves, and hobgoblins; and their number was seventy-eight thousand one hundred and fourteen. The signal or word eommon to all the army, was Evohé.

CHAPTER XL.

How the battle, in which the good Bacchus overthrew the Indians, was represented in Mosaic work.

IN the next place we saw the representation of the good Bacchus's engagement with the Indians. Silenus, who led the van, was sweating, puffing, and blowing, belabouring his ass most grievously; the ass dreadfully opened its wide jaws, drove away the flies that plagued it, winched, flounced, went baek, and bestirred itself in a most terrible manner, as if some damned gad-bee had stung it at the breech.

The satyrs, captains, sergeants, and corporals of companies, sounding the orgies with cornets, in a furious manner went round the army, skipping, capering, bounding, jerking, farting, flying out at heels, kieking and praneing like mad, eneouraging their company to fight bravely; and all the delineated army eried out Evohé!

First, the Mænades charged the Indians with dreadful shouts, and a horrid din of their brazen drums and bucklers: the air rung again all round, as the mosaie work well expressed it. And pray, for the future do not so much admire Apelles, Aristides the Theban, and others who drew claps of thunder, lightnings, winds, words, manners, and spirits.

We then saw the Indian army, who had at last taken the field, to prevent the devastation of the rest of their country. In the front were the elephants, with castles well garrisoned on their backs. But the army and themselves were put into disorder; the dreadful cries of the Bacchides having filled them with consternation, and those huge animals turned tail, and trampled on the men of their party.

There you might have seen gaffer Silenus on his ass, putting on as hard as he could, striking athwart and alongst, and laying about him lustily with his staff, after the old fashion of fencing. His ass was prancing and making after the elephants, gaping and martially braying, as it were to sound a charge, as he did when formerly in the bacchanalian feasts, he waked the nymph Lottis, when Priapus, full of priapism, had a mind to priapise, while the pretty creature was taking a nap.

There you might have seen Pan frisk it with his goatish shanks about the Mænades, and with his rusty pipe excite them to behave themselves like Mænades.

A little farther you might have blessed your eyes with the sight of a young satyr who led seventeen kings his prisoners; and a Bacchis, who with her snakes, hauled along no less than two and forty captains; a little faun, who carried a whole dozen of standards taken from the enemy; and good-man Bacchus on his chariot, riding to and fro fearless of danger, making much of his dear carcase, and cheerfully toping to all his merry friends.

Finally, we saw the representation of his triumph, which was thus. First, his chariot was wholly covered with ivy, gathered on the mountain Meros: this for its scarcity, which you know raises the price of every thing, and principally of those leaves in India. In this, Alexander the Great followed his example at his Indian triumph. The chariot was drawn by elephants joined together, wherein he was imitated by Pompey the Great, at Rome, in his African triumph. In it the good Bacchus was seen drinking out of a mighty urn, which action Marius aped after his victory over the Cimbri, near Aix in Provence. All his army were crowned with ivy; their javelins, bucklers, and drums, were also wholly covered with it; there was not so much as Silenus's ass, but was betrayed with it.

The Indian kings were fastened with chains of gold close by the wheels of the chariot; all the company marched in pomp with unspeakable joy, loaded with an infinite number of trophies, pageants, and spoils, playing and singing merry epinicions, songs of triumph, and also rural lays and dithyrambs.

At the farthest end was a prospect of the land of Egypt; the Nile with its crocodiles, marmosets, ibides, monkeys, trochilos's, or wrens, ichneumons, or Pharaoh's mice, hippopotami, or sea-horses, and other creatures, its guests and neighbours. Bacchus was moving towards that country under the conduct of a couple of horned beasts, on one of which was written in gold, Apis, and Osiris on the other; because no ox or cow had been seen in Egypt till Bacchus came thither.

CHAPTER XLI.

How the temple was illuminated with a wonderful lamp.

BEFORE I proceed to the description of the Bottle, I will give you that of an admirable lamp, that dispensed so large a light over all the temple, that, though it lay under ground, we could distinguish every object as clearly as above it at noon day.

In the middle of the roof was fixed a ring of massy gold, as thick as my clenched fist. Three chains somewhat less, most curiously wrought, hung about two feet and a half below it, and in a triangle supported a round plate of fine gold, whose diameter or breadth did not exceed two cubits and half a span. There were four holes in it, in each of which an empty ball was fastened, hollow within, and open at the top, like a little lamp; its circumference about two hands' breadth: each ball was of precious stone; one an amethyst, another an African carbuncle, the third an opal, and the fourth an anthracites; they were full of burning water, five times distilled in a serpentine lymbeck, and inconsumptible, like the oil formerly put into Pallas' golden lamp at Acropolis of Athens by Callimachus. In each of them was a flaming wick, partly of abestine flax, as of old in the temple of Jupiter Ammon, such as those which Cleombrotus, a most studious philosopher, saw: partly of Carpasian flax, which were rather renewed than consumed by the fire.

About two feet and a half below that gold plate, the three chains were fastened to three handles, that were fixed to a large round lamp of most pure crystal, whose diameter was a cubit and a half, and opened about two hands' breadth on the top: by which open place a vessel of the same crystal, shaped somewhat like the lower part of a gourd-like lymbeck, or an urinal, was put at the bottom of the great lamp, with such a quantity of the afore-mentioned burning-water, the flame of asbestine wick reached the centre of the great lamp. This made all its spherical body seem to burn and be in a flame, because the fire was just at the centre and middle point, so that it was not more easy to fix the eye on it than on the disc of the sun, the matter being wonderfully bright and shining, and the work most transparent and dazzling, by the reflection of the various colours of the precious stones, whereof the four small lamps above the main lamp were made, and their lustre was still variously glittering all over the temple. Then this wandering light being darted on the polished marble and agate, with which all the inside of the temple was pargetted, our eyes were entertained with a sight of all the admirable colours which the rainbow can boast, when the sun darts his fiery rays on some dropping clouds.

The design of the lamp was admirable in itself, but, in my opinion, what added much to the beauty of the whole, was, that round the body of the crystal lamp, there was carved in cataglyphic work, a lively and pleasant battle of naked boys, mounted on little hobby-horses, with little whirligig lances and shields, that seemed made of vine-branches with grapes on them; their postures generally were very different, and their childish strife and motions were so ingeniously expressed, that art equalled nature in every proportion and action. Neither did this seem engraved, but rather hewed out and embossed in relief, or, at least, like grotesque, which, by the artist's skill, has the appearance of the roundness of the object it represents; this was partly the effect of the various and most charming light, which, flowing out of the lamp, filled the carved places with its glorious rays.

CHAPTER XLII.

How the Priestess Bacbuc showed us a fantastic fountain in the temple, and how the fountain-water had the taste of wine, according to the imagination of those who drank of it.

WHILE we were admiring this incomparable lamp, and the stupendous structure of the temple, the venerable priestess Bacbuc, and her attendants, came to us with jolly smiling looks, and seeing us duly accoutred, without the least difficulty, took us into the middle of the temple, where, just under the aforesaid lamp, was the fine fantastic fountain. She then ordered some cups, goblets, and talboys of gold, silver, and crystal to be brought, and kindly invited us to drink of the liquor that sprung there, which we readily did: for, to say the truth, this fantastic fountain was very inviting, and its materials and workmanship more precious, rare, and admirable than any thing Plato ever dreamt of in limbo.

Its basis or ground work was of most pure and limpid alabaster, and its height somewhat more than three spans, being a regular heptagon on the outside, with its stylobates or footsteps, arulets, cymasults or blunt tops, and doric undulations about it. It was exactly round within. On the middle point of each angle brink stood a pillar orbiculated, in form of a circle of ivory or alabaster. These were seven in number, according to the number of the angles.

Each pillar's length, from the basis to the architraves, was near seven hands, taking an exact dimension of its diameter through the centre of its circumference and inward roundness; and it was so disposed, that, casting our eyes behind one of them, whatever its cube might be, to view its opposite, we found that the pyramidal cone of our visual light ended at the said centre, and there, by the two opposites, formed an equilateral triangle, whose two lines divided the pillar into two equal parts.

That which we had a mind to measure, going from one side to another, two pillars over, at the first third part of the distance between them, was met by their lowermost and fundamental line, which, in a consult line drawn as far as the universal centre, equally divided, gave, in a just partition, the distance of the seven opposite pillars in a right line, beginning at the obtuse angle on the brink, as you know that an angle is always found placed between two others in all angular figures odd in number.

This tacitly gives us to understand, that seven semidiameters are in geometrical proportion, compass, and distance, somewhat less than the circumference of a circle, from the figure of which they are extracted; that is to say, three whole parts, with an eighth and a half, a little more, or a seventh and a half, a little less, according to the instructions given us of old by Euclid, Aristotle, Archimedes, and others.

The first pillar, I mean that which faced the temple gate, was of azure, sky-coloured sapphire.

The second, of hyacinth, a precious stone, exactly of the colour of the flower into which Ajax's choleric blood was transformed; the Greek letters A I being seen on it in many places.

The third, an anachite diamond, as bright and glittering as lightning.

The fourth, a masculine ruby ballais (peach-coloured) amethystizing, its flame and lustre ending in violet or purple, like an amethyst.

The fifth, an emerald, above five hundred and fifty times more precious than that of Serapis in the labyrinth of the Egyptians, and more verdant and shining than those that were fixed instead of eyes, in the marble lion's head, near King Hermias's tomb.

The sixth, of agate, more admirable and various in the distinctions of its veins, clouds, and colours, than that which Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, so mightily esteemed.

The seventh, of syenites, transparent, of the colour of a beryl, and the clear hue of Hymettian honey; and within it the moon was seen, such as we see her in the sky, silent, new, and in the wane.

These stones were assigned to the seven heavenly planets by the ancient Chaldeans; and that the meanest capacities might be informed of this, just at the central perpendicular line, on the chapter of the first pillar, which was of sapphire, stood the image of Saturn in elutian lead, with his scythe in his hand, and at his feet a crane of gold, very artfully enamelled, according to the native hue of the saturnine bird.

On the second, which was of hyacinth, towards the left, Jupiter was seen in jovetian brass, and on his breast an eagle of gold enamelled to the life.

On the third, was Phœbus in the purest gold, and a white cock in his right hand.

On the fourth, was Mars in Corinthian brass, and a lion at his feet.

On the fifth, was Venus in copper, the metal of which Aristonidas made Athamas's statue, that expressed in a blushing whiteness his confusion at the sight of his son Learchus, who died at his feet of a fall.

On the sixth, was Mercury in hydrargyre; I would have said quicksilver, had it not been fixed, malleable, and unmovable; that nimble deity had a stork at his feet.

On the seventh, was Luna in silver, with a greyhound at her feet.

The size of these statues was somewhat more than a third part of the pillars on which they stood, and they were so admirably wrought, according to mathematical proportion, that Polycletus's canon (or rule) could hardly have stood in competition with them.

The basis of the pillars, the chapters, the architraves, zoophores, and cornices, were Phrygian work of massy gold, purer and finer than any that is found in the rivers Leede near Montpellier, Ganges in India, Po in Italy, Hebrus in Thrace, Tagus in Spain, and Pactolus in Lydia.

The small arches between the pillars were of the same precious stone of which the pillars next to them were. Thus, that arch was of sapphire which ended at the hyacinth pillar, and that was of hyacinth which went towards the diamond, and so on.

Above the arches and chapiters of the pillars, on the inward front, a cupola was raised to cover the fountain; it was surrounded by the planetary statues, heptagonal at the bottom, and spherical on the top, and of crystal so pure, transparent, well-polished, whole and uniform in all its parts, without veins, clouds, flaws, or streaks, that Zenocrates never saw such a one in his life.

Within it were seen the twelve signs of the Zodiae, the twelve months of the year, with their properties, the two equinoxes, the ecliptic line, with some of the most remarkable fixed stars about the antarctic pole, and elsewhere, so curiously engraven, that I fancied them to be the workmanship of King Neepsus, or Petosiris, the ancient mathematician.

On the top of the eupola, just over the centre of the fountain, were three noble long pearls, all of one size, pear fashion, perfectly imitating a tear, and so joined together as to represent a flower-de-lis or lily, each of the flowers seeming above a hand's breadth. A carbuncle jetted out of its calix or eup, as big as an ostrich's egg, cut seven square, (that number so beloved of nature,) and so prodigiously glorious, that the sight of it had like to have made us blind, for the fiery sun, or the pointed lightning, are not more dazzling and insufferably bright.

Now were some judicious appraisers to judge of the value of this incomparable fountain, and the lamp of which we have spoke, they would undoubtedly affirm, it exceeds that of all the treasures and curiosities in Europe, Asia, and Africa put together. For that carbuncle alone would have darkened the pantarbe of Iarehus the Indian magician, with as much ease as the sun outshines and dims the stars with his meridian rays.

Now let Cleopatra, that Egyptian queen, boast of her pair of pendants, those two pearls, one of which she caused to be dissolved in vinegar, in the presence of Anthony the Triumvir, her gallant!

Or let Pompeia Plautina be proud of her dress covered all over with emeralds and pearls curiously intermixed, she who attracted the eyes of all Rome, and was said to be the grave-pit and magazine of the conquering robbers of the universe.

The fountain had three tubes or channels of right pearl, seated in three equilateral angles already mentioned, extended on the margin, and those channels proceeded in a snail-like line, winding equally on both sides.

We looked on them awhile, and had cast our eyes on another side, when Baebus directed us to watch the water; we then heard a most harmonious sound, yet somewhat stopped by starts, far distant, and subterranean, by which means it was still more pleasing than if it had been free, uninterrupted, and near us, so that our minds were as agreeably entertained through our ears with that charming melody, as they were through the windows of our eyes, with those delightful objects.

Bacuc then said, Your philosophers will not allow that motion is begot by the power of figures; look here and see the contrary. By that single snail-like motion, equally divided as you see, and a five-fold infoliation, movable at every inward meeting, such as is the vena cava, where it enters into the right ventricle of the heart; just so is the flowing of this fountain, and by it a harmony ascends as high as your world's ocean.

She then ordered her attendants to make us drink; and, to tell you the truth of the matter as near as possible, we are not, heaven be praised! of the nature of a drove of calf-lollies, who (as your sparrows cannot feed unless you bob them on the tail) must be rib-roasted with tough crab-tree, and firked into a stomach, or, at least, into a humour to eat or drink: no, we know better things, and scorn to scorn any man's civility, who civilly invites us to a drinking bout. Bacuc asked us then, how we liked our tiff. We answered, that it seemed to us good harmless sober Adam's liquor, fit to keep a man in the right way, and in a word, mere element; more cool and clear than Argyrontes in Ætolia, Peneus in Thessaly, Axius in Mygdonia, or Cydnus in Cilicia, a tempting sight of whose cool silver stream caused Alexander to prefer the short-lived pleasure of bathing himself in it, to the inconveniences which he could not but foresee would attend so ill-timed an action.

This, said Bacuc, comes of not considering with ourselves, or understanding the motions of the muscous tongue, when the drink glides on it in its way to the stomach. Tell me, noble strangers, are your throats lined, paved, or enamelled, as formerly was that of Pithyllus, nicknamed Theutes, that you can have missed the taste, relish, and flavour of this divine liquor? Here, said she, turning towards her gentlewoman, bring my scrubbing-brushes, you know which, to scrape, rake, and clear their palates.

They brought immediately some stately, swinging, jolly hams, fine substantial neat's-tongues, good hung-beef, pure and delicate botargos, venison, sausages, and such other gullet-sweepers. And, to comply with her invitation, we crammed and twisted till we owned ourselves thoroughly cured of thirst, which before did damnably plague us.

We are told, continued she, that formerly a learned and valiant Hebrew chief, leading his people through the deserts, where they were in danger of being famished, obtained of God some manna, whose taste was to them, by imagination, such as that of meat was to them before in reality: thus drinking of this miraculous liquor, you will find its taste like any wine that you shall fancy to drink. Come then, fancy and drink. We did so, and Panurge had no sooner whipped off his brimmer, but he cried, By Noah's open shop, it is vin de Baulne, better than ever was yet tipped over tongue, or may ninety and sixteen devils swallow me. Oh! that to keep its taste the longer, we gentlemen toppers had but necks some three cubits long or so, as Philoxenus desired to have, or, at least, like a crane's as Melanthus wished his.

On the faith of true lanterners, quoth Friar John, it is gallant, sparkling Greek wine; now for God's sake, sweet-heart, do but teach me how the devil you make it. It seems to me Mirevaux wine, said Pantagruel; for before I drank, I supposed it to be such. Nothing can be disliked in it, but that it is cold, colder, I say, than the very ice; colder than the water of Nonacris and Dircé, or the Conthoporian spring at Corinth, that froze up the stomach and nutritive parts of those that drank of it.

Drink once, twice, or thrice more, said Bacbuc, still changing your imagination, and you shall find its taste and flavour to be exactly that on which you shall have pitched. Then never presume to say that any thing is impossible to God. We never offered to say such a thing, said I; far from it, we maintain he is omnipotent.

CHAPTER XLIII.

How the priestess Bacbuc equipt Panurge, in order to have the word of the Bottle.

WHEN we had thus chatted and tippled, Bacbuc asked, Who of you here would have the word of the Holy Bottle? I, your most humble little funnel, if it please you, quoth Panurge. Friend, said she, I have but one thing to tell you, which is, that when you come to the Oracle, you take care to hearken and hear the word only with one ear. This, cried Friar John, is wine of one ear, as Frenchmen call it.

She then wrapped him up in a gaberdine, bound his noddle with a goodly clean biggin, clapped over it a felt, such as those through which hypocras is distilled, at the bottom of which, instead of a cowl, she put three obelisks, made him draw on a pair of old-fashioned cod-pieces instead of mittens, girded him about with three bagpipes bound together, bathed his jobbernot thrice in the fountain; then threw a handful of meal on his phiz, fixed three cock's feathers on the right side of the hypocritical felt, made him take a jaunt nine times round the fountain, caused him to take three little leaps, and to bump his a— seven times against the ground, repeating I do not know what kind of conjurations all the while in the Tusean tongue, and ever and anon reading in a ritual or book of ceremonies, carried after her by one of her mystagogues.

For my part, may I never stir if I do not really believe, that neither Numa Pompilius, the second King of the Romans, nor the Cerites, of Tuseia, nor the old Hebrew captain, ever instituted so many ceremonies as I then saw performed; nor were ever half so many religious forms used by the soothsayers of Memphis in Egypt to Apis; or by the Euboians, at Rhamnus, to Rhamnusia; or to Jupiter Ammon, or to Faronia.

When she had thus accoutred my gentleman, she took him out of our company, and led him out of the temple, through a golden gate on the right, into a round chapel made of transparent specular stones, by whose solid clearness the sun's light shined there through the precipice of the rock without any windows or other entrance, and so easily and fully dispersed itself through the greater temple, that the light seemed rather to spring out of it than to flow into it.

The workmanship was not less rare than that of the sacred temple at Ravenna, or that in the island of Chemnis in Egypt. Nor must I forget to tell you, that the work of that round chapel was contrived with such a symmetry, that its diameter was just the height of the vault.

In the middle of it was an heptagonal fountain of fine alabaster most artfully wrought, full of water, which was so clear that it might have passed for element in its purity and simplicity. The sacred bottle was in it to the middle, clad in pure fine crystal, of an oval shape, except its muzzle, which was somewhat wider than was consistent with that figure.

CHAPTER XLIV.

How Bacbuc, the high-priestess, brought Panurge before the Holy Bottle.

THERE the noble priestess Bacbuc made Panurge stoop and kiss the brink of the fountain; then bade him rise and dance three ithymbi. Which done, she ordered him to sit down, between two stools placed there for that purpose, his arse upon the ground. Then she opened her ritual book, and whispering in his left ear, made him sing an epiphany, as follows :

BOTTLE ! whose mysterious deep
Does ten thousand secrets keep,
With attentive ear I wait ;
Ease my mind, and speak my fate.
Soul of joy, like Bacchus, we
More than India gain by thee.
Truths unborn thy juice reveals,
Which futurity conceals.
Antidote to frauds and lies,
Wine, that mounts us to the skies,
May thy father Noah's brood
Like him drown, but in thy flood.
Speak, so may the liquid mine
Of rubies or of diamonds, shine.

Bottle ! whose mysterious deep,
Does ten thousand secrets keep,
With attentive ear I wait ;
Ease my mind, and speak my fate.

When Panurge had sung, Bacbuc threw I do not know what into the fountain, and straight its water began to boil in good earnest, just for the world as doth the great monastical pot at Bourgneil, when it is high holiday there. Friend Panurge was listening with one ear, and Bacbuc kneeled by him, when such a kind of humming was heard out of the Bottle, as is made by a swarm of bees bred in the flesh of a young bull, killed and dressed according to Aristæus's art, or such as is made when a bolt flies out of a cross bow, or when a shower falls on a sudden in summer. Immediately after this was heard the word TRINC. By cob's body, cried Panurge, it is broken, or cracked at least, not to tell a lie for the matter ; for, even so do crystal bottles speak in our country, when they burst near the fire.

Bacbuc arose, and gently taking Panurge under the arms, said, Friend, offer your thanks to indulgent heaven, as reason requires ; you have soon had the word of the Goddess-Bottle : and the kindest, most favourable, and certain word of answer that I ever yet heard her give, since I officiated here at her most sacred oracle ; rise, let us go to the chapter, in whose gloss that fine word is explained. With all my heart, quoth Panurge ; by jingo, I am just as wise as I was last year ; light, where is the book ? Turn it over, where is the chapter ? Let us see this merry gloss.

CHAPTER XLV.

BACBUC having thrown I do not know what into the fountain, straight the water ceased to boil: and then she took Panurge into the greater temple, in the central place, where there was the enlivening fountain.

There she took out a hugeous silver book, in the shape of a half-tierce, or hogshead, of sentences; and having filled it at the fountain, said to him: The philosophers, preachers, and doctors of your world, feed you up with fine words and cant at the ears; now, here we really incorporate our precepts at the mouth. Therefore I will not say to you, read this chapter, see this gloss; no, I say to you, taste me this fine chapter, swallow me this rare gloss. Formerly an ancient prophet of the Jewish nation eat a book, and became a clerk even to the very teeth! now will I have you drink one, that you may be a clerk to your very liver. Here, open your mandibles.

Panurge gaping as wide as his jaws would stretch, Bacbuc took the silver book, at least we took it for a real book, for it looked just for the world like a breviary; but, in truth, it was a breviary, a flask of right Falernian wine, as it came from the grape, which she made him swallow every drop.

By Bacchus, quoth Panurge, this was a notable chapter, a most authentic gloss, on my word. Is this all that the trismegistian Bottle's word means? In troth I like it extremely, it went down like mother's milk. Nothing more, returned Bacbuc; for Trinc is a panoniphean word, that is, a word understood, used, and celebrated by all nations, and signifies drink.

Some say in your world, that sack is a word used in all tongues, and justly admitted in the same sense among all nations; for, as Æsop's fable hath it, all men are born with a sack at the neck, naturally needy, and begging of each other: neither can the most powerful king be without the help of other men, or can any one that is poor subsist without the rich, though he be never so proud and insolent; nay, even were it Hippias the philosopher, who boasted he could do every thing. Much less can any one make shift without drink than without a sack. Therefore here we hold not that laughing, but that drinking is the distinguishing character of man. I do not say drinking, taking that word singly and absolutely in the strictest sense: no, beasts then might put in for a share; I mean drinking cool delicious wine. For you must know, my beloved, that by wine we become divine; neither can there be a surer argument, or a less deceitful divination. Your academics assert the same, when they make the etymology of wine, which the Greeks call ΟΙΝΟΣ, to be from vis, strength, virtue, and power; for it is in its power to fill the soul with all truth, learning, and philosophy.

If you observe what is written in Ionie letters on the temple gate, you may have understood that truth is in wine? The goddess Bottle therefore directs you to the divine liquor; be yourself the expounder of your undertaking.

It is impossible, said Pantagrue to Panurge, to speak more to the purpose than does this true priestess; you may remember I told you as much when you first spoke to me about it.

Trine then; what says your heart, elevated by Bacchie enthusiasm?

With this, quoth Panurge,
 Trine, trine; by Baechus let us tope,
 And tope again; for, now I hope
 To see some brawny, juicy rump,
 Well tickled with my carnal stump.
 E'er long, my friends, I shall be wedded,
 Sure as my trap-stick has a red head;
 And my sweet wife shall hold the combat,
 Long as my baws can on her bum beat.
 O what a battle of a—fighting
 Will there be! which I much delight in!
 What pleasing pains then shall I take
 To keep myself and spouse awake!
 All heart and juice, I'll up and ride,
 And made a duchess of my bride.
 Sing Iö pæan! loudly sing
 To Hymen, who all joys will bring.
 Well, Friar John, I'll take my oath,
 This oracle is full of troth:
 Intelligible truth it bears,
 More certain than the sieve and shears.

---

CHAPTER XLVI.

How Panurge and the rest rhymed with poetic fury.

WHAT a pox ails the fellow? quoth Friar John. Stark staring mad, or bewitched on my word! Do but hear the chiming dotterel gabble in rhyme. What the devil has he swallowed? His eyes roll in his loggerhead, just for the world like a dying goat's. Will the addle-pated wight have the grace to sheer off? Will he rid us of his damned company, to go shite out his nasty rhyming balderdash in some bog-house? Will nobody be so kind as to cram some dog's-bur down the poor cur's gullet? or will he, monk-like, run his fist up to the elbow into his throat to his very maw, to scour and clear his flanks? Will he take a hair of the same dog?

Pantagruel chid Friar John, and said:

Bold monk, forbear; this, I'll assure ye,
Proceeds all from poetic fury;
Warmed by the God, inspired with wine,
His human soul is made divine.

For without jest,
His hallowed breast,
With wine possessed,
Could have no rest,
Till he had expressed
Some thoughts at least
Of his great guest.
Then strait he flies
Above the skies,
And mollifies,
With prophesies,
Our miseries.
And since divinely he's inspired,
Adore the soul by wine acquired.
And let the tosspot be admired.

How! quoth the Friar, is the fit of rhyming upon you too? Is it come to that? Then we are all peppered, or the devil pepper me. What would I not give to have Gargantua see us while we are in this maggoty crambo-vein! Now may I be cursed with living on that damned empty food, if I can tell, whether I shall escape the catching distemper. The devil a bit do I understand which way to go about it: however the spirit of fustian possesses us all, I find. Well, by St. John, I will poetise, since everybody does; I find it coming. Stay, and pray pardon me, if I do not rhyme in crimson; it is my first essay.

Thou, who canst water turn to wine,
Transform my bum, by power divine,
Into a lantern, that may light
My neighbour in the darkest night.

Panurge then proceeds in his rapture, and says:

From Pythian Tripes ne'er were heard
More truths, nor more to be revered.
I think from Delphos to this spring,

Some wizard brought that conjuring thing,
 Had honest Plutarch here been toying,
 He then so long had ne'er been groping
 To find according to his wishes,
 Why oracles are mute as fishes
 At Delphos : now the reason's clear,
 No more at Delphos they're, but here.
 Here is the tripod, out of which
 Is spoke the doom of poor and rich.
 For Athenæus does relate
 This Bottle is the womb of Fate;
 Prolific of mysterious wine,
 And big with prescience divine ;
 It brings the truth with pleasure forth,
 Besides you haven't a pennyworth.
 So, Friar John, I must exhort you
 To wait a word that may import you,
 And to inquire, while here we tarry,
 If it shall be your luck to marry.

Friar John answers him in a rage, and says :

How, marry! by St, Bennet's boot,
 And his gambadoes, I'll ne'er do't.
 No man that knows me ne'er shall judge
 I mean to make myself a drudge ;
 Or that pilgarlic e'er will doat
 Upon a paltry petticoat.
 I'll ne'er my liberty betray
 All for a little leap-frog play ;
 And ever after wear a clog
 Like monkey or like mastiff-dog :
 No, I'd not have, upon my life,
 Great Alexander for my wife,
 Nor Pompey, nor his dad-in-law,
 Who did each other clapper-claw.
 Not the best he that wears a head,
 Shall win me to his truckle-bed.

Pamurge, pulling off his gaberdine and mystical accoutrements, replied :

Wherefore thou shalt, thou filthy beast,
 Be damned twelve fathoms deep at least ;
 While I shall reign in Paradise,
 Whence on thy loggerhead I'll piss.
 Now when that dreadful hour is come,
 That thou in hell receiv'st thy doom,
 E'en there, I know, thou'lt play some trick,
 And Proserpine shan't scape a prick

Of the long pin within thy breeches.
But when thou'rt using these capriches,
And catterwauling in her cavern,
Send Pluto to the farthest tavern,
For the best wine that's to be had,
Lest he should see, and run horn mad :
She's kind, and ever did admire
A well-fed monk, or well-hung friar.

Go to, quoth Friar John, thou old noddy, thou doddipoled ninny, go to the devil thou art prating of ; I have done with rhyming ; the rheum gripes me at the gullet. Let us talk of paying and going ; come.

---

CHAPTER XLVII.

How we took our leave of Bacbus, and left the Oracle of the Holy Bottle.

Do not trouble yourself about anything here, said the priestess to the friar ; if you be but satisfied, we are. Here, below, in these circumcentral regions, we place the sovereign good not in taking and receiving, but in bestowing and giving ; so that we esteem ourselves happy, not if we take and receive much of others, as perhaps the sects of teachers do in your world, but rather if we impart and give much. All I have to beg of you, is that you leave us here your names in writing, in this ritual. She then opened a fine large book, and as we gave our names, one of her (she) mystagogues, with a gold pin, drew some lines on it, as if she had been writing ; but we could not see any characters.

This done, she filled three small leather vessels with fantastic water, and giving them into our hands, said, Now, my friends, you may depart, and may that intellectual sphere, whose centre is everywhere, and circumference nowhere, whom we call GOD, keep you in his almighty protection. When you come into your world, do not fail to affirm and witness, that the greatest treasures, and most admirable things, are hidden under ground ; and not without reason.

Ceres was worshipped, because she taught mankind the art of husbandry, and by the use of corn, which she invented, abolished that beastly way of feeding on acorns ; and she grievously lamented her daughter's banishment into our subterranean regions, certainly foreseeing that Proserpine would meet with more excellent things, more desirable enjoyments, below, than she her mother could be blest with above.

What do you think is become of the art of forcing the thunder and celestial fire down, which the wise Prometheus had formerly invented? It is most certain you have lost it; it is no more on your hemisphere: but here below we have it. And, without a cause, you sometimes wonder to see whole towns burned and destroyed by lightning and ethereal fire, and are at a loss about knowing from whom, by whom, and to what end, those dreadful mischiefs were sent. Now, they are familiar and usual to us; and your philosophers, who complain that the ancients have left them nothing to write of, or to invent, are very much mistaken. Those phenomena which you see in the sky; whatever the surface of the earth affords you, and the sea, and every river contains, is not to be compared with what is hid within the bowels of the earth.

For this reason the subterranean ruler has justly gained in almost every language, the epithet of rich. Now, when your sages shall wholly apply their minds to a diligent and studious search after truth, humbly begging the assistance of the sovereign God, whom formerly the Egyptians in their language called The Hidden and the Concealed, and invoking him by that name, beseech him to reveal and make himself known to them, that Almighty Being will, out of his infinite goodness, not only make his creatures, but even himself known to them.

Thus will they be guided by good lanterns. For all the ancient philosophers and sages have held two things necessary, safely and pleasantly to arrive at the knowledge of God, and true wisdom: first God's gracious guidance, then man's assistance.

So among the philosophers, Zoroaster took Arimaspes for the companion of his travels; Æsculapius, Mereury; Orpheus, Musæus; Pythagoras, Aglaophemus; and among princes and warriors, Hereules, in his most difficult achievements, had his singular friend Theseus; Ulysses, Diomedes; Æneas, Achates: you followed their examples, and came under the conduct of an illustrious lantern; now, in God's name depart, and may he go along with you!

END OF VOL. III.
